In that connection I should like to point out that on the same pages of Hansard it is indicated that the small communities in my own constituency, with a total population of over 12,000 people, have had four loans in the last 11 years under the National Housing Act. I know, as a result of visiting this constituency, that the housing is not of the kind that means they do not need these loans. I hope the minister will tell us what steps Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and the various officers of his department, are going to take to see that the benefits of these lending privileges are spread to this underprivileged 45 per cent.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house but I should like to say just a word on behalf of the communities of Canada under 50,000 population. In doing so I hope I will not be accused of being regional or sectional in my thinking. I should like to draw the minister's attention to one small but, in my opinion, important aspect of the availability of mortgage funds for house building.

One of the greatest problems of the smaller communities is the continual siphoning off of investment money to the larger centres. I am not suggesting that this is anything new or anything of a special problem that has arisen since this government has been in charge of affairs. It is not in that sense that I am raising this question.

It is not my intention to name companies today, but how often have we heard the explanation given that this company or that company are not lending money for housing in this or that community. I am sure that most hon. members on all sides of the house who come from the smaller cities and towns in this country have heard this same complaint. I believe the lending institutions have a responsibility to make more of their funds available for home building. In the second place I believe they have a responsibility to lend more money for this purpose in the communities in which they are doing business.

I recognize the fact that the lending institutions have the right to invest their funds to the best advantage of their respective companies and I naturally am not suggesting any government interference or compulsion. However, by permitting this trend of ignoring the mortgage needs of the smaller centres to continue, a great disservice is being done to the over-all development of this country. Unless this trend can be arrested or unless the government is prepared to supply substantially larger sums, home builders in the future may be forced to deal with private lenders to a greater degree at ridiculously high interest rates. Such a development will eliminate any hope of low cost housing which all of us, on all sides of the house, recognize is badly needed.

I hope the minister will not be annoyed at what I am going to say now. I am sure he will agree that there has been a considerable levelling off in the Canadian economy during the past few months. The proof of this is the present legislation. It now seems desirable—and I am not opposing this action—to pump more funds into the economy. However, in view of these changing circumstances, it is quite conceivable that the lending institutions may well become more selective in their lending in the small centres, with those areas suffering accordingly.

As I said earlier, I am not suggesting in any sense that there be government interference or compulsion of any kind. But if a way could be found of bringing this matter to the attention of the lending institutions I think we could well tap a substantial amount of money that could be used for home building in the smaller cities across this country, thereby eliminating to a degree the need for the kind of legislation that seems necessary here today.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to speak on this bill because, in my opinion, it seems to do all that it is intended to do at this time. I look upon it more or less as an emergency measure. It provides a substantial sum of money for the building of new homes, something which will be a big stimulant to the building industry. With the lowering of the down payments it will also make it possible for many more people with less capital to purchase a new home for themselves.

This new bill is going to create jobs throughout the country not only in the building trade but also in industry, the manufacturing of plumbing goods, electrical supplies, heating equipment and a great many other industries allied to the construction trade. However, the bill does not provide complete methods to solve our housing problem, especially in the large cities. During the past five years home building has been on a stop and go basis. Each year substantial sums of money were provided. Then the boom was on until the money was spent. Then there was a lull until a further appropriation was made and the boom was on again, always on a higher mortgage interest rate. I am pleased that at this time there is going to be no increase in the rate.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have done a big job in providing homes but now we find that a large group of Canadians have not been able to keep up with the steady climb in the cost of building and high interest rates. This amendment to the act cannot do much for them other than if many new homes are built, more of the older homes will be available for those in the lower income brackets.

The gap seems to have widened considerably during the past five years between those people who can afford to build and those who cannot afford to do so, with the result that there is a very large group of people now earning about $3,000 who cannot hope to own a home of their own or to be able to rent a good house under existing conditions. I therefore feel that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have a job to do in ways and means to solve the housing problem of those people in the low income brackets, because those people are entitled to much better housing than they have at the present time, especially in the larger cities.

A condition of this kind developed just prior to the beginning of the last war and with the co-operation of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the builders a house was developed to sell for $3,000, with a small down payment, something which helped greatly at that time. I feel that something like that could be done again, of course on the basis of probably a $6,000 to $7,000 house. A very popular house some years ago was one with a story and a half, finished downstairs and the upstairs unfinished. Something was said today about the owners or the buyers and that if they could just put more of their own time into the house, they could bring the cost down. That was one of the reasons why this house to which I made reference was developed. Such houses provided a home for a great many people who otherwise would not have been able to get it. A house like that will comply with the N.H.A. regulations on a 40 foot lot. I know that some of our town planners probably will not agree to that, but a house of that type on a 40 foot lot would provide a six foot side yard and a ten foot drive. Using dry wall construction and other lower cost materials, and on lots with a narrow fronting, I am confident that it can be done again.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation seems to be promoting the wide frontage house today which requires a wide front lot, entailing greater cost, higher taxes and more local improvement costs. I would suggest, Mr. Minister, that consideration be given to a low cost home along the lines I have suggested.

Another department of housing that I think should be encouraged is the building of low rental housing units for those in the low income brackets. In almost every city there are areas—some of them large and some of them small—which, while not slum areas, are blighted areas which could be redeveloped for new housing. Generous assistance and encouragement should be given to municipalities who wish to enter into this type of municipal housing. I might say that we are a little behind in municipal housing in this country. In Great Britain you will find that practically 50 per cent of the houses over there are owned by the municipalities who are able to rent them at very reasonable rents.

Land assembly schemes should be encouraged as that type of land development eliminates the high profits in serviced lots and makes such lots available to builders and home owners at reasonable prices.

Mr. Speaker, I heartily endorse the passing of this bill. I have heard very favourable comments on it from builders and from people who wish to buy a home, but it is not the final answer to this housing problem in Canada. I am sure that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be able in the near future to provide new ideas and better leadership in the housebuilding industry under the direction of this government.

Mr. Alex. B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I take five minutes of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the amendments proposed by the minister as they affect my own city of Vancouver. I think Vancouver can be proud of its home ownership. I say this from observation and not from a knowledge of statistics but I would say that there is a higher percentage of home ownership in Vancouver than in any other big city in Canada. The homes are neat, clean and attractive, with gardens suited to the balmy climate to which the minister referred the other night. And yet, in the heart of Vancouver as in many other big cities, there are blighted areas, areas that are not in any way the fault of the people who live there but areas of squalid, decrepit, crowded housing which inevitably infect the health and civic life of the whole city. One such area in the city of Vancouver, probably the principal blighted area, is east of Main and north of False creek. You could probably say that area totalled one square mile and could be called a blighted area crying out for slum clearance, land acquisition, demolition and rebuilding to take care of the inhabitants.

It seems to me that if the city of Vancouver would see that the health and building by-laws were applied rigorously many of these buildings would be condemned now as unfit for habitation. But that would still be no solution. That would not give to the people who live there dwellings into which they could move.

The houses themselves are often firetraps, many of them a menace not only to the lives of the people who live in them but also a threat to the lives of the firefighters who from time to time are called upon to rescue lives in time of fire. The whole of such an area contributes to the social toll which we pay in disease, crime, delinquency and vice.

Now to what extent would the amendments proposed help people who live in such an area? I would reply, to a very little extent. For instance, how many of these people would be able to borrow say $10,000; I would not imagine that any less would be required to build in such an area and they would also have to pay interest at 6 per cent on that loan. Interest alone would start at the rate of $50 a month. How many of them would be able to raise the down payment in cash; I would think it would require at least $1,200 as a down payment and probably, in view of land values there, the figure would be very much greater.

How many could acquire land in such an area? How many could afford to devote, not 23 per cent as formerly, but 27 per cent of their family budget to housing needs? This would inevitably mean cutting down on other family necessities. How many of these people have an income of $3,450 a year, bearing in mind that although many of them are making good wages, not too many of them are able to work 52 weeks of the year.

The answer to all these questions is summed up in the fact that these amendments simply do not begin to approach the problem of an area such as that. Yet the problem should be approached now; now is the time of labour surplus, the time when many of our skilled building workers are condemned to enforced idleness; the time when particularly in British Columbia we have ample supplies of good building materials. Never was there a better time to approach such a problem and it has to be approached as a slum clearance project. It has to be approached, in my opinion, under sections 23 and 36 of the National Housing Act.

I do not think all the blame for lack of initiative rests either with this government or the former government. I think the city fathers of Vancouver have shown a lack of foresight; I think they have shown procrastination and timidity and even callousness in the face of this problem. This is evidenced by the very limited extent to which Vancouver has even taken advantage of the limited dividend sections of the National Housing Act, let alone the land acquisition and slum clearance sections.

So I say if we are to bring life, and health, and laughter and good living into the kind of blighted area I have been describing, the time to start is now and the sections that the government must invoke, publicize and proclaim are sections 23 and 36 of the National Housing Act. If they will, in co-operation with the provincial and municipal governments, undertake a bold and imaginative scheme under those sections in the city of Vancouver I am sure the people of that city would applaud that kind of action.

(Translation):

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have the honour of taking part in the debates of this house and, as do all new members, I beg your indulgence.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to offer you my congratulations upon your appointment to your high office.

Allow me in particular to tell you how happy I am, as Liberal member of the constituency of St. Ann, to have served and to continue to serve the electors of my riding under the direction of our great leader, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. He has always been to me a source of inspiration and, in spite of the decision he has taken, he will forever remain one of the greatest figures of Canadian history.

Now, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as we are required to stick to the subject matter of this bill, I must say that our economy was so upset by world war II that no field of finance, federal, provincial or municipal, escaped the effects of the war.

Because of restricted house building, people are forced to live in crowded quarters. As a consequence, we find that delinquency and discord in the homes are on the increase, that the standards of health are lowered, and so on. Those evils have been felt for about twenty years. We must therefore continue and even intensify the campaign launched by the previous government to meet the continuing seriousness of that problem.

On account of the restrictions which were extended into the post-war period, some dwellings have now become so outmoded that very many of them are now but slums, and a disgrace to our cities. Cities cannot rigorously enforce their regulations without evicting a certain number of families or without aggravating conditions which have become a social evil.

It is a good thing that certain changes introduced by the Liberal government should have opened up numerous horizons. Some municipalities started to carry out vast projects, in keeping with the requirements, with results which did not encourage others to do likewise. Were such projects really practicable in altogether different environments, both from the standpoint of population, family formation and of other particular social problems?

The legislation favoured the building of multiple dwellings where families of two, three or four persons could easily find accommodation. But the children of working families or of low income families have an equal right to such welfare. It is our duty to preserve these men of tomorrow, who are our greatest asset. It is our duty to provide them with an environment where life will be agreeable and where their vitality will develop normally. If we neglect them, we will only have helpless and unfit men and women to save the honour of the country when danger comes. Can this be called foresight?

Representing as I do the constituency of St. Ann, with a labour population, I know of the difficulties faced by those humble people who have entrusted me with the mandate of representing them in this house. That is why I ask that the government, in co-operation with the provincial government and the various municipalities involved, take such steps as are necessary to bring about the disappearance of these old ramshackle buildings, with no modern conveniences whatever, having neither bathroom nor shower, often having only a single combined entrance and exit, which makes these dwellings real firetraps. In proof of this, may I recall, Mr. Speaker, what happened last spring in that part of Montreal which is being rebuilt at this time. When one of those shacks burned down, one or two children perished in the flames because this dwelling provided no means of escape for its occupants.

The committee entrusted with a survey of slum conditions in Montreal classified as slum areas four well-defined sections of my constituency alone. That is why I urge the government to do all it can to make the amendments to this act, and other means available not only to Montreal authorities but to all Canadian municipalities so that all those cities and towns may bring about renewed life in their areas marked for future clearance. And this, of course, applies not only to the Montreal city authorities but to all Canadian municipalities.

I must congratulate the preceding Liberal government which, since 1954, has constantly improved the national housing act thereby making it possible not only for individuals but also for cities and towns to take advantage of it, to improve the lot of thousands of Canadians who are still dependent upon public authorities to help them maintain their standard of living.

Slums cost us as much as the upkeep of an army division for a whole year. In a country as young as this, we cannot remain idle in the face of this succession of daily happenings which should open our eyes to true conditions.

I would like to see all the people in my riding living in surroundings favourable to their normal development and that is why I urge this government to make credit for home building more easily available and to introduce legislation with clauses flexible enough to provide for an infinite number of particular cases.

If we manage to create happiness in a few hundred families in each of our municipalities, we will be able to say that our government has done something to help the Canadian people. When the air of slum areas is cleared of the foulness fostered by neglect or laziness, it will become wholesome, and we shall see brighter faces thanking us.

People who are happy in their homes become good citizens, and it is easy for them to deal with those degrading aspects that are unavoidable in any society. Let us keep our people strong, and to this effect, they should be comfortably and decently housed.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) recently explained the amendments he proposes to bring to the 1954 National Housing Act for the purpose, mainly, of encouraging low cost housing and the building of low rental apartment houses.

There is no doubt that higher loans and lower down payments will make it possible for more citizens to become home owners. This action is justified. However, there are other measures which the government could have proposed and which would have had greater effects in that field. There is first the rate of interest charged on loans. Under present conditions, this rate is so exorbitant that many heads of families prefer not to build a house and many promoters prefer not to undertake any large project. This rate of interest should be revised and maintained at such a level that the cost of money will not be out of proportion with other costs which the small home owner must bear. There certainly is justification at this time to consider the advisability of revising section 4 of the National Housing Act. There are also local improvements namely sewage and water services, pavements and sidewalks, which impose a considerable burden upon the small home owner. There is no provision for this in the National Housing Act except in the case of a project undertaken jointly with a provincial government or a municipality. However, everywhere those local improvements constitute a basic obstacle to the building of low cost houses. It is certainly advisable to consider helping the small home owner in that regard, either by including the cost of such services in the total annual amount charged for the loan, or by advancing to the home owner the necessary credit to pay this expense and spreading the repayment over a very long period of time, at a very low rate of interest. Not only would that facilitate construction of low cost houses but it would also be an indirect help to municipalities, which could thus provide their people with more adequate services and do it faster. Many lots which are unusable at the present time would become available sooner for the construction of small houses.

The federal government should arrange with provincial and municipal governments for them to assume the cost of public services at no cost to the owners.

Finally, there is the extravagant cost of building lots. The government should consider the advisability of establishing a policy for buying and reselling land, at terms which would encourage the building of low cost single houses.

The hon. member proposes to increase the amount available under section 22 of the National Housing Act, concerning low rental housing.

This legislation seems chiefly designed to encourage housing construction by limited dividend companies. It is obvious that there is a great demand for low cost housing in most cities. However, this legislation does not tackle the real problem, the problem of the single-family dwelling, renting at a price more closely related to the income of the head of the family and the number of his children. In my opinion, it is in the field of single-family dwellings that the act must be amended. Section 2, which deals with an increase of available funds, takes no account whatever of family conditions.

We are going through a difficult period and the shadow of unemployment is increasingly threatening our cities, from coast to coast. The number of families no longer able to pay an economic rent, that is a rent allowing limited dividend companies to make a reasonable profit, is increasing from day to day.

The slums, which have multiplied over the years, are more than ever inhabited by low-income families.

It is in that field that government action should be stepped up without delay. In his remarks, the hon. minister has pointed out the necessity to provide employment. Well, housing construction at this time would increase by many thousands the number of jobs available in Canada.

It is up to the federal government, when unemployment is on the increase, to encourage a greater number of slum-clearance projects and to provide comfortable and healthy dwellings at a rental price commensurate with the low income of poor families whose number is much greater than we like to admit and is constantly increasing.

I wonder then why the government seems to be delaying the implementation of a family rent housing project undertaken in the heart of the city of Montreal by the former government. This project which goes under the name of Habitations Jeanne-Mance has, among other advantages, that of bringing about the clearance of dreadful slums where large families are crowded together without any form of physical or mental hygiene whatever. This project will enable 800 families to live in conditions calculated to make the most of their social potentialities. I hope that it will be possible to eliminate delays and that the government will see to it that this project is brought to a successful conclusion as soon as possible.

I am extremely sorry that the government seems to be taking so little heed of this festering sore, slums. I know whereof I speak, representing as I do a working class district, in which industry has constantly been encroaching upon residential areas, thereby hastening the spread of blighted areas.

I feel I am entitled to request, on behalf of the people of my constituency, that public funds be used to improve housing conditions in equal if not in a higher proportion than to foster the construction of low cost housing. There is room for low cost rental housing in my constituency and I have received assurance that the authorities of the city of Montreal will co-operate with me in bringing this about, as long as the federal government provides its own co-operation unhesitatingly.

The third and sixth parts of the housing act should be amended so as to make it easier to expropriate slum dwellings and to foster construction of subsidized housing for low income families who have no hope of ever owning their own homes. It is in that regard that the government should increase the amounts made available to various housing and mortgage corporations. The sum provided by section 23 should not be $25,000,000 but $50,000,000. As far as section 26 is concerned, we would need not $50,000,000 but $100,000,000 and even more.

There is no reason why the government should contribute 75 per cent to the cost of family houses while contributing only 50 per cent of the cost of expropriation of slum areas. The federal government would be justified in raising to 75 per cent its contribution to slum clearance. This measure would encourage many municipalities to clear up their slums and substandard houses. In fact, it is as important to clear the slums which degrade our youth physically and morally as it is to provide it with healthy housing. Both measures go hand in hand, and section 23 should tie in with section 36.

The approach to the problem of slum clearance and urban rehabilitation is not easy for municipalities. To be practical, the federal government should encourage municipalities to undertake studies of urban rehabilitation and, to this end, expand the credit facilities provided by part 5 of the National Housing Act, specially for the application of subsection (h) of section 33, providing for studies of slum clearance in co-operation with provinces and municipalities. There is no reason why the federal government should not pay at least 75 per cent of the cost of such studies.

I wish at this point to congratulate the Canadian association of town-planning for its initiative in this field. That association hired a town-planner specialized in slum clearance and urban rehabilitation and has been carrying for the past year an intensive propaganda program on this matter all across this country.

There is no reason why in a country as wealthy as Canada, slums should remain the refuge of needy families. We must use all means at our disposal to enable those families to live under conditions fit for human beings and such as to help them become good citizens. So, I hope the government will consider those few suggestions, within the shortest possible delay, and that the required amendments to the National Housing Act will immediately follow.

(Text):

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I am one of the members who decided yesterday to wait until today to take part in the debate on this bill. I find that quite a number of matters that I had intended to deal with have already been covered to some extent today by one hon. member or another. As a result, and in an effort to avoid repetition, I shall try to curtail my remarks considerably from what I originally intended to say. If perchance I should find that I am repeating some of the matters which have been dealt with today it is for the reason that I think they can bear repetition.

In addition to the normal housing needs, as they are recognized in this country, we have our rapidly increasing unemployment and increasing immigration in the last few years. The figures for this are very easy to get. All we have to do is to turn to the dominion bureau of statistics, and they give us the picture immediately of just what the need might be. But I should like to deal with another aspect of the question which is perhaps not so quickly and readily recognized in this country today. It has been touched upon by several speakers but I do not believe any of them have had the opportunity that I have had over the last number of years to realize just what a problem we have in this field. In the last seven years I have had the opportunity to work in a city fire department and, through the medium of inspections and of actually responding to fire calls, I have certainly had occasion to see just how big a problem we have in this country today in regard to slums and people living in matchboxes for houses, shacks and firetraps.

The social side of this problem was dealt with quite well by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald). Through close association with the municipal police department, which always works closely with the firefighters, I have also been able to see that in addition to the major proportion of fire calls the major proportion of police calls are always to the same area, the same district or the same family living in the same slums. We should add up the costs involved in police protection and fire protection, jails, courts and so forth throughout the country. If we could save only part of that cost not only would we be curing a social ill but with the money we could afford to build all the houses required, clean out the slums and solve one of our biggest problems.

If hon. members over the Christmas weekend could take one day or so and go out with one of the fire inspectors and see some of these buildings believe me, Mr. Speaker, they would get an idea of what the problem is. You have to see the buildings to believe it. It is just simply impossible for the human mind to realize the conditions under which some people exist in this country. If hon. members could undergo the absolutely unforgettable experience that I have had on different occasions of stumbling around through smoke-filled rooms and carrying out the bodies of little children burned to death in those firetraps they would realize that it is a problem that we are going to have to meet in this country.

I should now like to turn to the remarks made by the minister yesterday, as reported at page 2499 of Hansard. In dealing with the problem, he said:

> If those interest rates are reduced to the extent that the lending institutions and the banks will no longer lend any money for housing, then we are in a real tailspin in so far as housing in Canada is concerned.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, he put his finger on the basic fundamental of this problem in Canada today. It is an admission that interest on money in this country is the most important factor and takes precedence over human welfare. Until we face up to the realization that this condition exists and grapple with the problem and do something about it, the housing problem in the country will never be solved by this bill or any other bill like it.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, that was a very revealing speech that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) made last night, possibly inadvertently revealing but revealing nevertheless. Just what was it that he told us and indirectly the people of Canada? He told us and the people of Canada in effect that in this country, which is the second wealthiest country per capita in the world, our economy is organized in such a way that it is not possible for the people of Canada to have the housing they require. In explaining this amending bill, by which the government is increasing its direct contribution to the housing needs of the Canadian people, the minister told us that this was necessitated by the fact that the ordinary traditional lending sources of funds were drying up.

But he also expressed great concern for the future of housing in Canada because in his view it was not possible for the government to continue indefinitely playing the role that they propose to play under this new amendment. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the minister is going to go further than that and tell the people of Canada just why that is so. I hope, for instance, that he is not going to tell the people of Canada or try to tell them that it was all the fault of the previous government's tight money policy, as he suggested yesterday.

You know, Mr. Speaker, one gets a little weary of listening to this nonsense about tight money, even when it is gilded by coming from ministerial lips. I for one find it very hard to believe that my hon. friend and fellow British Columbian is really so ignorant and so silly as he tried to make out last night. I am sure he knows perfectly well that the tight money situation about which he was complaining was not the result of any government action. It was the result of the almost automatic operations of our economy, and if he is suggesting now that since his government came to office the tight money situation has relaxed, is he trying to tell us that it was due to some action on the part of his government or does he not really know that if there has been a relaxation it has been because there has been a slackening off in the level of economic activity in Canada. There has been less demand for funds and that is the reason, of course, why interest rates have been falling. Neither his government nor the previous government had anything to do with it.

It is true enough that the monetary authorities during the regime of the previous government did take some rather ineffective steps to curb the inflationary spiral which, despite the brave words of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), is still continuing to climb. They did take some steps within their very limited means of action. I wonder whether the minister is suggesting to us that the way his government hopes to see housing financed in Canada is by another shot of inflation. I wonder whether that is his reason.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government had better face the realities of the situation in Canada today. I remember last session, Mr. Speaker, speaking on this particular issue, I believe it was, when I had occasion to quote from the words of a very eminent United States economist who was dealing with the economy of the Soviet union. He pointed out that there had been some very tragic economic mistakes made by the soviet authorities, that they had diverted such a very large proportion of their capital accumulations to industrial expansion that there was nothing left for the needs of the people, particularly housing needs.

At that time I pointed out that it was ironic that the totalitarian government of Russia and the laissez-faire government of Canada had presided over the same operation and had landed in the same impasse fundamentally for the same reason. In the Soviet union we have authorities making decisions with regard to the direction of investment who are not susceptible at all to any sort of public control. They make the decision and the people have to abide by it. In Canada we have a group who are making these decisions and they are equally not susceptible to public control because they have control of the accumulated savings of the Canadian people.

I think that is an important matter for us to bear in mind and I would commend to my hon. friends of the Social Credit party that they should bear in mind the fact that housing for the Canadian people can only come out of the savings of the Canadian people. There is no magic wand by which the government or the Bank of Canada can suddenly call into being funds to make house building operations possible that have no relation to real savings in the Canadian economy.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cameron: Certainly.

Mr. Blackmore: Will he tell us how the Guernsey island government managed to build their market house around 1820 with Guernsey island notes?

Mr. Cameron: Yes, I could, but I do not intend to divert myself to that just now. I knew of that case probably long before the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), I think.

Mr. Blackmore: Naturally you would not like to explain it. You cannot do it.

Mr. Cameron: I read the documents about it when I was a boy, but I do not intend to be diverted to that. As a matter of fact, that particular instance underlines exactly what I am saying, if only the hon. member understood it.

Mr. Blackmore: You need to read them twice now that you have grown up.

Mr. Cameron: Mr. Speaker, as I say, housing can only come from the savings of the Canadian people and those savings are found in a number of places. They are found in the savings accounts of the chartered banks, in the funds of the life insurance companies, in the trust funds of trust companies and so on, and the individuals who are in control of them have a responsibility in the investment of those funds. I for one am not going to criticize them for having adopted the policy they have in recent months and years, for that matter, of finding more lucrative fields of investment than housing for the funds entrusted to their care.

But there is another place in which the savings of the Canadian people can be found and it is a place where most people do not look for them. They do not consider them as savings of the Canadian people. They are found in such places as these, Mr. Speaker, in the depreciation and depletion allowances permitted Canadian corporations which in 1956 amounted to $2 billion. They are found also in the form of the undistributed profits of Canadian corporations which in 1956 amounted to some $1 billion. In those two sums alone we had nearly 10 per cent of the total wealth production of Canada, a very large proportion of the savings of the Canadian people.

I am going to suggest that if the government really intends to do something about housing in Canada it will have to stop talking nonsense about tight money, it will have to stop blaming either the Bank of Canada or the Liberal government and it will have to look to the place where those savings have accumulated and start channelling them to meet the housing needs of the Canadian people. At the present time, of course, the National Housing Act does literally nothing to aid the people in Canada who need housing most desperately. It is, of course, notorious that what the National Housing Act actually is doing is aid the more fortunate sections of our society.

One has only to examine the conditions even in the capital city of Ottawa, the capital of the second wealthiest nation in the world, to see that there are a great many Canadian citizens living in the most disgraceful conditions. There are in this city ramshackle, falling-down firetraps in which human beings are living, and they are living there because the Canadian economy cannot afford to build them houses, as the minister told us last night. We cannot afford to build them houses because we are indulging in the luxury of permitting large and powerful groups in our society to take to themselves a very large part of the savings of the Canadian people. People do not have to be even on the lower rungs of incomes in this country to be denied any benefits under the National Housing Act.

I have a young man in mind who is a high school teacher in British Columbia, drawing a good salary of over $4,000 a year and desperately in need of adequate housing for his family. It is literally impossible for him to raise the necessary down payment or the necessary funds for the purchase of a lot in order to build a house under the National Housing Act. Of course, it is equally impossible for him to save from his salary enough money to eventually build it without a National Housing Act loan.

The National Housing Act is, I think, rather ironically named because it is not contributing anything to the desperate housing needs of the Canadian people but is, as I say, really helping those more fortunate members of our community who can afford the down payment and can afford to buy lots. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that while this was a very revealing speech we had from the Minister of Public Works last night, we can expect many more revealing speeches from other ministers and other spokesmen for our country within the next few years explaining just why it is that the Canadian people cannot have the things that they should have from the second wealthiest economy in the world. In fact to my mind, Mr. Speaker, this bill points out the fact that we are going to come full circle to the position in which we were some years ago.

It is up to this government, and also I would suggest to the official opposition, to make sure that they have the means to make this sort of society continue to operate. I suggest to them again that to permit nearly 10 per cent of the wealth production of the country to fall into the hands of the large corporations, not for distribution to the shareholders but in order to control the form and direction of investments, is to hang around their necks a millstone that will drag them down to destruction yet.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, the particular area I represent is affected to a large degree by the situation that has developed in housing because part of our economy is dependent on that industry. While I feel some good is going to come out of Bill No. 238, I certainly do not think it is going to meet all the requirements of the people of my area. We have a large lumber industry, specializing in white pine and making the majority of the trim that is used in housing today, and there are many people dependent on that industry. We have also, fortunately or unfortunately, one of the largest plants in Ontario manufacturing lumber products, the Hill, Clarke and Francis plant. This plant normally employs between 500 and 700 workers. All these employees have been informed there will be a shutdown and nobody will be employed for the three weeks over the Christmas holidays. Even in the last few weeks less than one-third of the normal number of employees have been working.

Housing has, therefore, had a great deal of effect on the unemployment situation, and in turn the unemployment situation has an effect on the housing industry. I noticed that according to yesterday's Gazette the minister stated:

> Mr. Green also disclosed that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had been advised to halt eviction proceedings against unemployed workers in Windsor—an action which might be taken with respect to other areas where required.

I would suggest that an amendment should be introduced to the effect that no unemployed person shall be evicted from a home that is financed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I believe we have some responsibility to our people. We ask them to build homes; we allow them to borrow money; we certainly want and are going to insist on the slum clearance mentioned by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald). We are going to do something to rid ourselves of that blight, and I say we must also do something to protect the people who, through no fault of their own, are in an area where unemployment makes it necessary for the government to protect them against eviction and to protect the amount of money they have put into a home. I believe that this is a responsibility of the federal government and I, for one, would be very happy to see such a provision written into the act. Then whenever an area is declared a surplus labour area, and we have a number of those areas today, this clause could be brought into effect and people would not be faced with the possibility of losing their homes and the money they have put into them.

I believe the government must give consideration also to the problem of low cost housing. I am not going to repeat the figures given concerning the number of people who are not able to buy a home because they have not got the down payment. It is my opinion that the large down payment required has been more responsible for the slump in housing than any other factor. I do not believe it has been necessary for the government to advance money to lending institutions for housing purposes. If the government had not obliged individuals to use second mortgages and chattel mortgages in order to obtain the down payment, as many working people did, then I do not believe we would have been faced with the housing slump with which we are now faced. It is certainly impossible, in my opinion, for most of the people I know and with whom I have worked to save enough money to meet the down payment under the act as it was, and I think it is going to be equally difficult for them to do so under this amendment.

We have another problem that has been dealt with in several ways, and that is the housing problem in mining communities in particular. I refer to those mining communities that have been built and developed in the last few years, such as Elliot Lake, the Blind River development, the Bancroft area development and many others that are taking place. We are asking people to go into these communities, as they did in my own area a number of years ago, in Matachewan, Cobalt and numerous other areas, to build houses and guarantee payment over a period of 20 or 30 years. No consideration is given to the fact that in the majority of cases these mining developments will not last long enough for the people to carry out this contract. There were certain people who knew this at the time, but it was not general knowledge. I feel that some consideration should be given to areas like Blind River and Elliot Lake, where people who are working for low wages are trying to build houses and yet the mining development may not last long enough for them to complete their contract. I am told that these people are only guaranteed by Central Mortgage and Housing to the end of the uranium contracts, which is 1962. I think some consideration should be given by the government to those people who have to buy housing in these areas.

One of those particular properties in Bancroft has a novel idea which I think is a good one, whereby the employee rents the house for a period of a year. During the year he is paying a nominal rent. After the year is over, he has the option either to apply the rent that he paid for the year to the down payment on the property or to continue to rent it at a much higher rate of rent. I think that some consideration along this line could be given to houses built under the National Housing Act so that our people would be able to establish this down payment much more easily than they have been able to do it in the past.

Another thing that I think should be attached to the loans that our people get under the National Housing Act is a life insurance policy so that if a person buying one of these houses, the breadwinner of the family, were to die after paying into it for a number of years, then at least the dependants of that breadwinner would be able to live in that house and have it debt free. As I am sure hon. members know, this is done in connection with automobiles. When you buy an automobile on credit, if you die, at least your family are left with a paid-up automobile. I certainly think we should at least give the same consideration to these people who buy houses.

I believe that we in Canada should be thinking very seriously about going into a low cost rental housing development. We are finding difficulty. Certainly the fact that slums have been mentioned, and that when we walk even through the city of Ottawa we see many houses that should be torn down with decent houses being built in their place, indicates that we should be considering low cost housing where the government will put up all the money for the house and will build it. These developments are taking place at municipal levels now and they are being satisfactorily completed. They are being developed, in rare cases, by provincial authorities and I think are being satisfactorily developed in that field. The government, if it goes into this low cost rental housing, would be able to finance that housing project over a period of 40 years to 60 years and sometimes even a greater length of time. They are getting the money for the amount that they are having to pay for it and they are not having to pay high rates. I think we should give this matter great consideration. Many of the people who are existing on $1,200 and $1,400 income per year are in no way able to take advantage of this type of housing project. If they are going to have any housing benefits, they will have to receive those benefits from a low cost rental project.

Another thing which must be borne in mind—and which is not borne in mind—in connection with housing is the fact that the people who can afford housing in Canada are the people who do not need housing and will not need housing. We have many young families which are being raised with the breadwinner starting out in an occupation in which he is going to advance. He has more expense in the early days of his employment when he is raising a young family and may need four bedrooms or five bedrooms. But when finally he has raised his family and is in a position to afford the housing that our country is asking him to pay for, he no longer needs four or five bedrooms, he needs only one for his wife and himself. Hence some subsidy should be given to our young people. What we want is to see that our children are raised in comfortable fire-safe homes, not necessarily to provide a big mansion for a man and his wife in those days when his earning power has reached its peak. We want to be able to give the best possible housing to the young married couples of our country and the children who are growing up in this country. I think some subsidization consideration should be given to this problem that faces all young married couples. When their need is greatest, their resources are the smallest. If we have the welfare of our Canadian people at heart, I think we are going to give this matter some consideration.

[Mr. Peters.]

I should like to conclude by just mentioning the fact that I believe that in the mining areas in particular special housing projects are going to have to be developed. If we are going to be fair and honest with those people whom we are asking to move into these remote areas, we are going to have to give them some consideration. If they are going to move into Blind River without the possibility of knowing how long that development is going to last because of federal government guarantees on the sale of the product, then I think we are going to have to give them greater consideration in those particular areas than we do elsewhere. I think we are going to have to give consideration to the fact that people who rent in these new housing developments should be given some assistance in the down payment, whether it be in the form of no down payment or in the form of a year's rent as down payment. Some consideration should be given to them. We should scale our payments for our housing so that the smaller payments are made at the beginning, and interest rates must be taken into consideration because otherwise obviously there is not going to be any principal payment at all. But there should be low payments for the first ten years of that loan while the children are small and growing and increased payments when the people can afford to make them.

I think that if we take a survey of the needs of the Canadian people, we can continually build houses for the people in the areas in which they are needed at a rate they can afford to pay for them and that we will supply employment for a good number of the people that are dependent entirely on the housing industry for their livelihood. The one seems to me to go hand and hand with the other because in a city where unemployment is growing every day I cannot see those people or their friends going out and buying new houses; and if they do not go out and buy new houses the unemployment situation is going to grow in pace.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, before I left my constituency to come to Ottawa for this session of parliament I promised a number of people who are supporters of all parties in this house that I would extend to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) their sincere congratulations on his appointment to his present position and would wish him well in all he undertakes to the general advantage of Canada. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I have to convey the particular congratulations and good wishes of all his comrades who served in the 54th battalion and who now reside in that constituency. The hon. gentleman's uncle, the former member for Kootenay West, later served in the Senate. His mother at the present time is a constituent of mine. I had the opportunity for some years of being with the minister in the famous 54th Kootenay battalion. I think it is a very good indication that we live in a democracy when, regardless of difference in political opinions and keen differences on policies and things of that sort, we can rejoice in someone's receiving a recognition he well deserves. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I must refer to the principle of the bill which is to do something to improve housing conditions in Canada.

I must say that I did appreciate the rather frank way in which the minister indicated that he would not for a moment suggest that this bill is a cure-all. If I heard him correctly last night, I think that was the emphasis he wished to place on his remarks and that he thought further consideration should be given to this subject in the near future, and, possibly, something more should be done about it. I am very pleased to hear that. To judge from his remarks as a whole I would say he would not for a moment contend that this is a complete remedy for our housing problems. This bill is a partial remedy, a very limited step in the right direction along a long trail over which we must yet proceed.

In my opinion, and I think this opinion is shared by the members of this group and every other thinking person in this house who has given consideration to these problems, a sound family life is essential for the development of a sound and healthy democratic nation. Furthermore, to have such sound families we must house them in adequate and satisfactory housing and all families must have the opportunity to enjoy such housing.

I think the minister will not for a moment deny that our present housing legislation does not provide for the needs of the most needy in Canada at the present time. I was very interested to read a short time ago an article in the Nelson Daily News on a talk given by Dr. Anderson, health officer for the Rossland Trail district with respect to housing and public health. I am just going to take the time of the house for a moment or two to read this because I think it places the emphasis on the subject very well.

> One of the most difficult and universal public health problems of the young adult group is housing, Dr. L. S. Anderson, director of the West Kootenay health unit told Nelson Rotarians at a luncheon in the Hume Monday. The young married couples supporting families have little left over to buy houses.

He was talking about legislation making provision for securing houses under present circumstances. Dr. Anderson said:

> Next to putting milk into babies, there is no national policy that pays a better dividend to the public health than that of putting young couples into homes.

And that is the point we wish to emphasize particularly in this group—the provision for the needs of those people and for the older citizens in this country. There is no question about it, in my opinion, that with all our resources in Canada, with all our materials and with all our skill we lag far behind a number of other nations in the provision of satisfactory housing at a satisfactory price. I have done some reading in respect to housing in New Zealand and Australia and I would suggest that members might well do the same; in fact I would suggest that the minister could find ample occupation for his good looking parliamentary assistant if he more or less delegated to him this search for information as to what is being done in other countries.

Now, with regard to all these things we lag behind Sweden, we lag behind Norway and Denmark. Why should we, a virile, energetic and skilful people with ample financial resources and land, lag behind these countries who in some cases have lesser opportunities than ourselves. That is a situation that must soon, in my opinion, be corrected.

It is a funny thing—I should say in some respects it has been a rather tragic thing—that housing has been a problem peculiar to Canada for many years. I recently read that it has been a problem since 1891; just imagine that, housing in Canada has been a problem since 1891. I want to read very briefly from the Globe and Mail of November 28 in this respect as follows:

> "The situation is acute", says Howard S. Rupert, Toronto welfare commissioner. "Even worse than 1913, because it is permanent", says Dr. Alvin Boyd, deputy medical officer of health. "Desperate" says Kathleen Gorrie, university settlement director. "A civic scandal", says the Reverend G. P. Parson, Anglican rector.

You can always bank on it, the Anglican rectors will dig up the scandal—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: —with respect to housing. I quote:

> It is my considered opinion the big real estate interests and land speculators plus the lack of courage of governments at all levels are solely responsible for the housing mess existing in our land. The housing problem goes back many years. In 1891, Goldwin Smith, in an article entitled Working Men's Homes, pointed out there were plenty of homes for the well-to-do. Today it would appear the same assumption is prevalent—housing provided for the well-to-do will gradually filter down to the rest of the population. Some little change in this laissez-faire attitude was seen in the Bruce report of 1934 and in the report of the parliamentary committee on housing in 1935.

The National Construction Council of Canada among whose constituent members were the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the unions of the building trade, the manufacturers of building material and the Architectural and Engineering Institute said: "Our investigations of housing for low-income groups show that provisions of this class of housing cannot ultimately be profitable to private enterprise. The responsibility of housing these groups is, in the final analysis, the responsibility of the state."

That is the opinion of these groups representing important segments of free enterprise in this country and we are of the same opinion, that these people are not going to obtain the housing they require unless the state accepts responsibility on a much wider basis than has been the case up to the present time.

It may interest hon. members to know that the only occasion, so far as I can find in Canadian history—and history is rather a hobby of mine on those week ends when I am not in Ottawa—when a governor general of this country has appeared before a parliamentary committee of this house was to give his view on a housing measure and to urge the necessity for improved housing for low-income groups in Canada. That was Lord Aberdeen and, if my memory serves me correctly, he appeared before a committee of this house in the railway committee room in 1898. Now the problem must have been mighty acute at that time for a governor general to appear before a committee of this house in connection with housing problems. And so it has remained ever since; we have spent a great deal of money and the previous governments have done something in this department but, to date, because we have never been able to tackle the core and to meet the essential problem, which is to provide housing for persons in the lower income groups, the problem remains unsolved.

I think it is correct to say, as has been said by members of this group speaking on the resolution preceding the bill and on the bill itself, that the majority of those who require houses most at the present time are not provided for in this legislation. I hope, therefore, that the minister will continue to go into this matter and will bring in some further amendments to the housing act to look after the present situation.

I do not want to repeat the many things that have been so well said prior to my rising; I do not wish to take up the time of the house unnecessarily, but I do want to suggest that there are other things that could be done so that we might have an adequate knowledge of the situation as it exists today. I think we should explore every avenue of information so that we have the facts when it comes to dealing with this problem from the point of view of population, of financial matters, cost of materials, types of materials, the possibility of promoting more building of houses for the low-income groups and the possibility of utilizing some of the successful methods and procedures of the small holding section of the Veterans' Land Act. You have to explore every avenue to get the information, and on the basis of that information you must build a satisfactory national housing policy.

Strangely enough, in 1945, when this house was considering the bill to incorporate Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—a proposal which my friends in the Social Credit group opposed most vigorously at that time—we were told by the then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, that we could not build houses at a satisfactory rate because there was a shortage of material in the country. Now we are told, generally, that we cannot build houses at a suitable rate because there is a shortage of money, though there are ample materials. We are a funny people, Mr. Speaker; one would think that it was Walt Disneyland as far as housing is concerned.

In this connection I should like to quote a prominent Canadian authority on this matter, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, on November 9, 1945, made a very brilliant speech on this bill to incorporate the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I do not wish to read all of it because we would not have any supper tonight in that case. But at page 2006 of unrevised Hansard he said this:

The Minister of Finance knows that one of my favourite quotations from him, which I have read to the house before, was made on March 3, 1943. At that time he was being criticized by certain hon. members of this house, both on his own side and to my right, for what were regarded as huge war expenditures. He was being told that these expenditures would bankrupt the country, and that we simply could not go on. As recorded at page 930 of Hansard for March 3, 1943, the minister said:

"We do not pay for the war out of some hoard of money that we have accumulated in the past. We pay for it out of the taxes and savings that we obtain from the current income of the whole nation. We shall not run short of money. Indeed, our danger is the very reverse of that, namely, that we may pile up too much money in the pockets and bank accounts of Canadians, unless we strive with every effort to promote the sale of victory bonds and war savings certificates.

If we are bankrupting the nation, is it not indeed a strange type of bankruptcy? How can we use such a term to describe the process under which this country has doubled its national income in three years, has wiped out unemployment, has multiplied its production of many things and learned many types of new skills; has expanded and diversified the production equipment, has multiplied its governmental revenues by more than four times, has enabled millions of its citizens to acquire a nest egg for the future, has mobilized its full strength as a producing machine, and has developed a sense of productive achievement not hitherto known?"

And then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre goes on:

Then came this really telling sentence from the Minister of Finance, and I can tell him I have quoted it on the hustings wherever I have gone:

"No country goes bankrupt in this way; no country goes bankrupt by increasing its production and devoting part or all, or more than all, of that increase to a supreme cause."

And then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quotes the minister again:

Later in the same speech the minister said:

"Let those of us who are inclined to fear the economic consequences of our war expenditures remember that these expenditures have developed and brought to light an enormous increase in our Canadian capacity to produce—an increase greater than any of us had ever before suspected."

My plea to the minister is that he launch forth upon a program of building houses for our Canadian people in the same way as he launched into a program of producing war goods. If he did so I suggest we would have the same results. Instead of bankrupting the nation or leaving us with financial problems we could not carry, such a policy would bring about an enormous increase in our capacity to produce. It would reveal all sorts of associated fields in which people could be employed, and the total result would be a tremendous improvement in the economic position of the entire country and of all our people.

After that, the record reads:

Mr. Ilsley: Does not my hon. friend agree that at the present time the construction of houses is in no way limited by financial considerations? Does he not agree that it is limited purely by physical considerations?

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to have the minister ask that question, because he is admitting, although it is not the first time, that in his view financial considerations are not a limiting factor.

Mr. Ilsley: They are not limiting the construction of houses at this time at all. The limitation at the present time is physical, and is found in the present capacity of the country to produce materials.

Mr. Speaker, I have just quoted at length what was said on that occasion to illustrate that in 1945 it was suggested we could not build houses because we were short of materials. In 1957 we are told we cannot build houses because we are short of money, though we have an abundance of materials. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that by using in housing the methods we used during the war and mobilizing our credit behind the full resources of this country we could provide the lower income groups in Canada with all the houses they require on a very sound basis.

I just forgot this, Mr. Speaker: I had intended before sitting down to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that there are certain people who are trying to do their best in present circumstances. Does the minister realize that there are small lumber operators in the interior of British Columbia who are working on a very small margin of profit and have been doing so for the whole of this year, although in a good number of cases these are efficient and well operated mills. Some of them, indeed, have been running at a considerable loss. At the same time there are employees in the lumber industries in the interior of British Columbia who have voted not to accept a 6 per cent increase in wages to which they were entitled under a two-year contract, in order to help keep the lumber industry going. These people have been shipping lumber to the prairies, particularly No. 1 common fir, in log lumber, two by four, two by six, two by eight and two by ten, shiplaps, sidings, boarding materials generally, at prices f.o.b. southern interior of British Columbia points—I can see the parliamentary assistant pricking his ears up as he hears me speak of this—ranging from $57.50 to $62 a thousand. I think the parliamentary assistant should be asked to find out what the lumber yards are charging to persons who wish to build homes with this same lumber after making allowance for the cost of transportation and so on.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that now is the time for an examination to be made of all aspects of this problem—the need for providing an adequate fund, sound methods of financing the cost of materials, the type of materials and the services to be provided. The average man earning a low income cannot afford to pay more than $6,000 for a home. I say that from my personal experience. I think a great deal more could be done to provide the type of house necessary to a person in the low income group. Could not some further study be undertaken, particularly with respect to the possibility of the owner-building of homes and the possibility of using more of the procedures and methods which have been used so successfully under the small holding section of the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this problem which faces us is of such great importance to the people of our nation that I regret no more members have volunteered to speak on it. I was expecting that at least every hon. member from British Columbia would want to express the reaction of the people in their ridings to this subject.

Our people need housing very badly, our businessmen need the business which house building provides, our workers in the lumber industry need some assurance of continuing employment and, above all, our unemployed need some ray of hope at this time that this government is going to initiate a mass house building program which will supply them with a pay cheque at the end of the month.

I appreciate the fact the minister has admitted that a decline in the rate of house construction has taken place in Canada. I would like to underline what the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said when he referred to the minister's solution as being only a partial solution. I have before me the D.B.S. daily bulletin of December 6 last which shows the decline in completed houses for the first 10-month period to be 14,292. If we add another one-fifth of the year in order to obtain the picture for the whole year we would have, unless action were taken, a decline in house building this year over last year of 17,150 houses. The $150 million that the minister made available some months ago was most welcome indeed. However, that alone was not sufficient. The first $150 million would build only 15,000 homes. I therefore endorse the principle of the minister asking this house for authority to have a larger allocation of money.

I mentioned some statistics yesterday to show that ever since the war we have not even kept pace with the growth in our population through natural causes and immigration. We have done nothing, and the act has failed in this respect. We are today faced with a worse shortage than we had at the end of the war. During all the hard years in Canada from 1929 to 1939 house building came to a standstill, and while we had six years of war we were not able to afford either labour or the physical goods with which to build any houses; therefore, we are at least 16 years behind in our house building program, and so far I see no ray of hope that this government, like the previous government, has any intentions of overcoming this shortage.

I was very pleased this morning to see the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Holowach) place on the record, as the hon. member for Kootenay West did what is being done in other western democracies of the world. I hold in my hand a clipping from the British Columbian of December 7, 1953, in which appears a British United Press dispatch from West Germany where, in referring to West Germany, it says:

> It built 400,000 houses last year, and probably will build that many again this year.

We thought the German people were a defeated nation, yet in 1952 they were building four times as many units as we were building. I was very fortunate last month in being able to spend a few days in the German seaport of Hamburg. Half the city was laid waste as a result of the bombings during the war, and yet in the city of Ottawa today you will find more slums than you will find in Hamburg. We thought that the German nation had lost the war and that we were the victors. I did not see anywhere in that city any of the slum areas that you can find in almost any major Canadian city.

[Mr. Regier.]

Our proposals are that this government must realize that much more money has to be spent on housing, and if private enterprise is not willing to supply this money at adequate rates of interest I think the managers of Canadian investment funds should consider very carefully the consequences to their might and their power if they do not meet the social needs of the Canadian people. If they fail—and they are failing, as the record shows, and the record shows they have failed ever since the end of the war—then the government will have to assume the responsibility and see to it that these financial resources are made available to meet our social needs.

I know that the previous prime minister was opposed to subsidized interest rates for housing. I believe he said so on one occasion in this house. However, may I remind the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) that regardless of the attitude toward subsidized interest rates that a former prime minister may have taken, one of the reasons why the premier of the province of Quebec wins re-elections so handily is that he possibly does more than any other public figure in Canada in making investment money available for housing for low-income citizens of Canada. Much as I may disagree with Premier Duplessis on many matters, in this one aspect at least he stands head and shoulders above any other premier in our nation.

Yesterday I noted a little conversation that went on between the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) and the minister in regard to research. Action must be taken to reduce the price of houses. Today you can look over the whole industrial empire in Canada and in practically no case except in the field of house construction will you find us turning out either goods or services in almost the same manner as we did 30 or 40 years ago. We have made very little progress in applying the discoveries of technology to this enterprise. I should like to commend one thought to the minister, namely to attempt to subsidize some experiments in the field of low-cost housing.

I believe the files of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are full of ideas on how we might tackle the problem of building a house by new methods. However, it is then left to the individual little builder to risk his neck to see whether this scheme would work. I think that some of the money voted for the field of research might be devoted to taking some of those ideas off the shelf, out of the pigeon-holes, and saying to some of our more reputable building firms: "We will make an agreement with you. Let us see whether some good might not result, and if you lose we, the people of Canada, are willing to share with you the loss in this experiment." I have seen—and the minister well knows this—a number of builders in our province of British Columbia go out on a limb and experiment. However, they have failed and they personally had to stand the loss.

I am not very happy about the proposal to reduce the size of houses. Immediately after the war we embarked upon a rather large-scale program of building little houses,—you could almost call them little shacks —which today are not very much desired because of their smallness. I do not think the Canadian economy is so hard up or so poor that we have to begin to trim down either the size or the quality of the houses that our Canadian people are supposed to live in. I do not think that therein lies the answer.

The minister has assured us that the lending value will henceforth be more realistic. I hope when he speaks of lending value the minister also thinks of the lot as a part, as being entitled to the new approach, in determining the lending value because therein have lending values most often fallen short. The valuation placed on the lot was very much more out of line than the valuation placed on the actual home itself.

I should like to endorse in principle at least what was recommended by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) with regard to insurance policies on homes. I know it is not within the field of the federal government to entertain a proposal to declare a moratorium particularly for people who are unemployed. I believe that is within the field of the provincial governments. However, at the present time the insurance feature protects only the lender and does nothing for the buyer except that the buyer has to pay for the premium. In my opinion the protection provided by the insurance feature could be broadened so that the house would be paid for in case of the death of the buyer, as recommended by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I think we could also include a provision whereby the payments would be continued in case of such unemployment as might be recognized by the offices of the unemployment insurance commission. The insurance provision now is rather lopsided in that the buyer pays the premium in order to ensure that the approved lender will be able to get his money out of the house.

My main reason for rising was that I wanted to call the minister's attention to a pamphlet issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I had to send to Hull yesterday for a copy of it. It is called "Housing for the Aged in Canada" and was published in November, 1957. I should like to compliment the department for giving a little publicity to this problem. They go to some length to explain how through limited dividend companies and otherwise the people of Canada are able to supply housing for the aged, especially for the aged in the low income categories. On page 3 of the pamphlet I find the following:

> Most housing projects have been built in central and western Canada, under the National Housing Act. During the period from 1946 to 1957, C.M.H.C. advanced loans of nearly $5.8 million towards the cost of 1,416 living units for the elderly.

That sounds very nice until you analyse it. There have been 1,416 living units built for the elderly in 11 years or 129 units per year. If we divide that by ten representing the number of provinces we have an average of 13 housing units for our elderly citizens in each province in each of the past 11 years. It is a shameful record, to say the least, when the figure is broken down. When you see the figure of $5.8 million it sounds like a lot of money but when you break it down you see that it is a most niggardly amount indeed.

I think that the minister might be able to do something in this respect. I know that at the present time there are various arrangements under different sections of the act. The most commonly used section is that whereby a mortgage is granted for a period up to 50 years in the case of homes built by limited dividend corporations. However, in the province of British Columbia the provincial government pays a grant towards the capital cost of such building. Their contribution amounts to one-third of the cost. The government of Saskatchewan also pays a grant to any organization building low rental homes for senior citizens in that province. Not only does it do that, but it also pays an annual grant for the maintenance of such homes thus enabling the rentals to be kept low.

In my opinion the federal government is not assuming its share of the obligation in this respect when it offers only a mortgage for 50 years which it expects to be repaid with interest. I realize that the interest rate is much lower than the rates on individual homes. However, I believe that the government should be able to match the grant of any provincial government, thereby enabling and encouraging the supply of low rental homes for senior citizens.

In other words, we recommend that a lot more money be made available, that interest rates and rentals be based on cost and that where necessary they be subsidized, that our municipal governments be given greater encouragement and provided with more money at lower rates of interest and that the government exercise greater control.

I remember that the C.C.F. fought an election in 1945 and in their program they advocated that one million homes be built at the rate of 100,000 per year in each of the next ten years. The people of Canada likely thought we were too radical and not enough of them voted for us. However, since that time Canada has done just that. In the ten year period roughly one million new homes have been built at an approximate rate of 100,000 per year, some years more and some less. The C.C.F. party was overly modest at the time and I hope that now the minister's slogan will be that he is going to embark on a program that will build for Canada 250,000 homes in each of the next ten years. If he does that, then at the end of the ten year period I believe rents will begin to decline and we will have somewhere near an adequate number of homes.

I should like to close with this thought. As the minister knows, the late E. E. Winch, father of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), possibly did more than any other man in British Columbia in his lifetime to supply housing for those on low incomes. After he had passed away a bulletin was issued in February, 1957, by the Vancouver housing association which contained an article by Laura Jamieson, president of the new vista society, in which she had this to say about the late E. E. Winch:

> Of all the causes to which he gave his devotion and enthusiasm, housing for senior citizens of low income was the one where he could build and see the result; where he could see and talk to the elderly people who, by his efforts, were able to leave their hovels and cold rooms and live in simple comfort and security.

I was one who yesterday wished the new minister well and expressed some confidence that in this field at least his heart would be in the right place. When the day comes when both he and I possibly will no longer be here I hope someone may write this of him: When the late Hon. Howard Green took over as Canada's minister of public works in 1957 he found mass unemployment in the construction and lumber industries; he found that the savings of the Canadian people were at an all-time high but that too little of these savings was being devoted to housing; he found that his fellow citizens lacked over a million homes. The late member had long subscribed to the belief that government is an instrument whereby people do for themselves together those things which they cannot well do for themselves as individuals. The socialist approach, the cleansing sea breezes and rains of his province, combined with his intelligence and strength of character, caused him to embark upon a mass home building program until after a 10-year period it could be said that rents were declining and every Canadian family was supplied with an adequate home.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to call the late Howard Green back to life so that I may address a few words to him, on the basis of which I hope he will take the kind of action that could result in an appropriate epitaph being written many years hence.

Mr. Speaker, because this bill does propose two amendments in the housing legislation, because the minister has at the same time indicated that one or two other improvements are to be made by a change in the regulations and by ministerial direction, we of course welcome the legislation and will give it our support. We were pleased also to hear the minister indicate in his remarks last evening that he is serious about the housing situation and that he would welcome suggestions from members of the house, indeed suggestions from any source. I hope that he will give very serious consideration to the many suggestions that have been made to him during the course of this debate.

Perhaps there are others, but I should like to catalogue some of them for him within a brief compass. First of all, there has been urged, particularly from this corner of the house, that there should be a reduction in the rate of interest on mortgage loans. I shall come back to that in a moment, but I list it as the first of the problems to which the government should address itself. Secondly, there has been made the suggestion from a number of quarters in the house that the amortization period should be extended perhaps to 30 years or even longer. The third suggestion is—

Mr. Green: May I point out that it can be 30 years rather than 25 years under this agency loan plan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, I recognize that. I would point out to the minister that I suggested 30 years or even longer. One or two members in the debate have suggested an amortization period of 40 years, which should be reasonable if we are building good homes.

The third point which has been made a number of times is that the price of the lot should be taken into consideration in arriving at the lending value of a home. The fourth suggestion has been made on other occasions, I am not sure whether it has been made during the course of this debate but I present it for the minister's consideration now, that the cost of major appliances might also be considered as part of the cost of a home for mortgage purposes. No one doubts that the cost of heating equipment is part of the price of a home, but in this day and age some other things, particularly in the field of major appliances, are also a part of a home and we think they should be included in that cost so far as the lending value is concerned.

A fifth suggestion that has been made has to do with life insurance for the wage earner who purchases the home, and I think that, too, should be given consideration by the government. A sixth suggestion that has been pressed, particularly from this corner of the house but from other sources as well, is that of the need of low rental housing. We feel that that is one area where the government policy is seriously lacking. We would like, in the seventh place, to urge an expansion of facilities to make possible homes for the aged, and that in addition to assistance for the building of projects for housing senior citizens in one location special consideration might be given to assisting elderly people individually to have decent homes to live in, on the understanding that they are good homes and the kind on which money could be lent knowing that they will have value for some considerable time.

Perhaps there are other suggestions, such as redevelopment and slum clearance, Mr. Speaker, but I thought that it might be useful to catalogue these seven proposals and to urge that very serious consideration be given to them by the government if, as the minister said yesterday, this government is serious about the business of housing and really wants suggestions from members of parliament. I have in mind the words the minister used yesterday as recorded at page 2498 of Hansard for December 17, 1957:

> We regard ourselves as being in business for the purpose of improving housing in Canada, and particularly housing for Canadians in lower income groups.

I said when I indicated the first of the seven points which I listed that I was coming back to it, and I do so because it seems to me that what the minister said yesterday regarding interest rates is an indication of the bankruptcy of the present government and the former government with regard to housing policy. Both the two major parties in this house seem to accept as an insuperable barrier the fact that interest rates cannot be reduced so that our people can have proper housing. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) used certain words yesterday as recorded on page 2499 of Hansard. They have already been read back to him today by my colleague the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) in another connection when he made reference to the tragedy of the number of fires that take place in our country at this time of the year. One is conscious of the fact that these serious fires, in which children and others lose their lives, are for the most part fires that take place because we have far too many substandard dwellings, houses of a type that should not continue to exist in Canada in this second half of the 20th century. These were the words the minister used yesterday:

> There is nothing the government would like more than to be able to reduce interest rates on housing. If those interest rates are reduced to the extent that the lending institutions and the banks will no longer lend any money for housing, then we are in a real tailspin in so far as housing in Canada is concerned. This is one reason why housing has fallen away in Canada this year.

My colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), let his imagination work a bit, and quite effectively, when he referred a few moments ago to the late Howard Green, so let me use my imagination and ask the house what would have been said if the Minister of Public Works, in making this statement yesterday, had used exactly these same words in relation to something other than housing. This is imaginary, for it deals with a field in which the federal government does not have responsibility, but just supposing this minister or a minister of any government anywhere in Canada had said this yesterday:

> There is nothing the government would like more than to be able to reduce interest rates on education. If those interest rates are reduced to the extent that the lending institutions and the banks will no longer lend any money to enable parents to pay for the education of their children, then we are in a real tailspin in so far as education in Canada is concerned. This is one reason why education has fallen away in Canada this year.

Mr. Speaker, if any minister of any government in Canada had made a statement like that in this year of 1957 it would have been treated with the ridicule it deserved.

Our people would say, "Surely education does not depend upon the possibility of banks and lending institutions making a profit out of it. Education is something our people are entitled to. It is something that we can afford and that our people are going to have regardless of the incomes of our individual families." We say that for the government to claim that housing will go into a tailspin if we reduce the cost of it to our people is to admit bankruptcy in this field.

I was interested in the quotation that my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) put on the record a while ago, in which he quoted me quoting Mr. Ilsley a number of years ago to the effect that anything we produce, anything that we provide for ourselves as a nation, we pay for out of current production, that we do not go bankrupt by increasing our production and devoting that production to a great cause. We have the materials. We have the labour power. We can produce decent housing for our people to live in. But somehow or other this insuperable barrier seems to have gotten in the way, this notion that there has to be an adequate rate of interest or in other words that profit for the banks and the lending institutions must come first, and that if that profit cannot be had, then we cannot have housing.

We would not stand for an attitude like that toward education. Just imagine what would happen if this heading in this afternoon's Ottawa Journal had read in a slightly different way than it reads. This is the story of yesterday's debate on housing and the headline on page 7 of tonight's Journal reads; "Green Worried Money for Homes May Run Out". I think that is a fair comment on the speech the minister made yesterday. Suppose instead the headline had read, "Green Worried Money for Education May Run Out". We would not accept that. We would take the position that this country has come to, namely that education is the right of all our children and that it has a prior claim over the profits that banks and private lending institutions feel they must make. We say the day will come when the country will accept housing on the same basis and will say that our people, being the people who produce this nation's wealth, are entitled to good homes to live in and must have them rather than that profit should be made first.

As a footnote to what the minister said in that statement to which I have taken exception, he said later on, as reported in the same column on the same page 2499 of Hansard:

> —I pointed out that the bulk of the money being advanced now is coming from government funds through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and that is actually the case. But that situation cannot go on forever.

Why not, Mr. Speaker? If the minister admits that under the present circumstances the only way in which homes can get built for people who need them, the only way in which we can get around this insuperable barrier of high interest rates and the demand for profit, is for the government to make the money available, why should it be just a temporary means? Why should we not accept it as a basic principle that we are going to use the powers that we have as a community, as a nation, through the state to channel the savings and the wealth that our people produce into this socially desirable aim, namely the building of homes?

I urge the minister to give serious consideration to all the points that we have brought to his attention in the course of this debate but I say to him if he really wants to do something about housing, if he is really in earnest about the matter, he must get over this notion that somehow or other the profit of the banks and lending institutions as expressed in the interest rate they must have takes priority. That notion must be got around and we have to get to the principle that the providing of homes is a socially desirable aim and that it is perfectly consistent with our way of life that we direct the savings of our people through government channels to make money available at low interest rates so that people can have decent homes in which to live.

There is just one other comment I wish to make, Mr. Speaker. We are urging improvements in our housing legislation because we believe in the provision of good homes for their own sake, for the sake of our people. But it is also true that in the building of homes there is to be found one of the most immediate ways in which to deal with the problem of unemployment. As everyone knows, house building involves a great many subsidiary types of employment. We feel that this is something to which the government should pay very close attention, particularly in view of the alarming figures which were made public yesterday by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics. The figures which were published yesterday show that in the month from the middle of October to the middle of November this year there was an increase in the unemployment rolls of 26 per cent. Those figures also show that as at the middle of November this year compared with the middle of November a year ago there has been an increase in unemployment to the extent of 74 per cent. In the light of those figures I suggest that this minister responsible for this important field of housing should realize that he has a tremendous opportunity, not only to take steps to meet the need of better housing for our people but to make some real dent in this unemployment situation.

We welcome the statement of the minister that he is serious about the matter. We welcome his statement that he would like to have suggestions. Now that we have given them to him, we hope that he will act upon them with the least possible delay.

(Translation):

Mr. C. N. Barbes (Chapleau): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I wish to make a few very brief remarks concerning the bill under discussion at this time.

The government proposes to amend the 1954 National Housing Act with a view to increasing by $150,000,000 the money made available to Canadians to further improve the housing situation in this country. The former government had set aside $250,000,000, for that purpose, and loans were being granted from these funds as late as September 1957, according to the terms of section 16 of the National Housing Act, chapter 23 of the statutes of 1953-54.

The Société des habitations modernes incorporées, of Amos, in the county of Chapleau, had a $372,685 loan approved on September 19, 1957 by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in order to promote the construction of 48 new housing units in the town of Amos. This money will be paid over to the construction company and eventually people will be put in a position to occupy the housing units built in this way, the amortization period in this case being spread over 40 years.

The monthly payments will be approximately $60.50 for single, two bedroom units. This step is altogether praiseworthy. I am happy that workers from my constituency have been able to find employment during a difficult period and that this work happens to be connected with housing. I am also happy that these houses are to be offered to workers who are in most pressing need of housing, as well as to their families.

It is fortunate also that the 1954 housing act and action taken by the former government have made this progress possible in my constituency. I am in favour of the amendments, Mr. Speaker. As one father who has himself bought a comfortable home for his family on favourable terms, I would like to see every one of my fellow citizens enjoy a higher standard of living through improved housing accommodation.

In 1956 we built close to 135,000 housing units and, as of September 1956, one million new housing units had been built over the last 12 years through federal financial assistance as well as through unassisted private enterprise.

Mr. O'Hurley: Would the hon. member care to give more information on the figures he has just quoted?

Mr. Barbes: 135,000 housing units in 1956 alone, and one million housing units constructed between September 1954 and September 1956.

I know that certain minimum standards must be respected, and certain definite types of houses built according to federal legislation. I wonder though what kind of supervision is carried out as far as the building itself is concerned. The new house being the government's security, it will readily be understood that it should be built according to certain standards of soundness, also to protect the occupant who has to pay for the house, and to ensure him improved accommodation. An attempt will be made to reduce the price of homes under construction but we wonder if, as an immediate consequence, there will not be a falling off in quality of craftsmanship in proportion to the corresponding decrease in price. If the price is $2,000 less, for example, there should be a check on the quality of materials used, and especially on the soundness of the construction methods.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation acts through the bank and lending institutions, as well as through private organizations. But who supervises the work? Who gives approval? Who guarantees that the building is put up in accordance with the plans and specifications laid down by Central Mortgage and Housing, that is, in final analysis, by the government?

I wonder if there is adequate supervision in cases where the prospective owner cannot personally supervise the work. It might be said that the houses are checked by a local agent of the C.M.H.C., a man who is very busy and who possibly lives forty miles or more from the building site. I do not question the competence of the men who pour the concrete into the forms, or of those who put up the framework and make the windows draught-proof but, as section 18 of the act prescribes that the work be inspected while the house is being built, I believe it is wise to determine when, by whom and how the certificates are issued testifying that the work was done according to the regulations and to the plans.

I have some fears in this regard and I point out to the government the need of closer supervision during construction if the purpose of the act is to be fully achieved. If the foundation breaks down because there is not enough cement in the concrete, if the walls are not properly insulated against cold, if heating costs are too high, this legislation, meant to be so helpful, will have failed of its main purpose.

To my mind, close supervision is important if we want the poor owner to be spared the obligation of giving up his house after a few years because of too rapid a deterioration of a house which was not properly supervised when it was being built.

A man who undertakes to make payments for 40 years has the right to demand that a house be sound enough for him to feel some pride of ownership.

Therefore, as we are about to put another $150 million into this undertaking, I believe it is advisable to call the attention of the government to the need of closer supervision of the work while the house is going up and not after the purchaser occupies it with his family. The builders, men of initiative, will receive the money so loaned, which the owner will have to pay back. So, let us lend the money but let us protect the ones who will have to pay back the cost of the building. Of course, it is important that builders make a profit but, above all, what is required is good low cost housing for Canadians and their families.

Having said this, I approve of the bill because I approve of more housing, better living conditions and I wish to facilitate the purchase of a house by the greatest possible number of young Canadians and thus encourage them to save more by becoming home owners.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): After having had such a nice epitaph written about me I am not sure that it is safe for one with Irish blood in his veins to say anything at all at this time because, after all, we are a bit superstitious. However, this has been a very useful debate and I am grateful to those members who have taken part in it. Many suggestions have been advanced in addition to quite a few new ideas, all of which will be given, as I promised when speaking at the resolution stage of this measure, the most careful consideration.

It is very fitting that there is such interest shown by members of the house in this housing question, which, after all, is pre-eminently a human question. The lives of our Canadian people are so involved in the whole matter that naturally all of us are deeply concerned about working out the best possible solution to the problem.

I think it would be inappropriate if I were to deal with the questions which have been raised during last evening and again this afternoon, but there are one or two points which I would like to place before the house. The first is this: There are other schemes under the National Housing Act which bring about lower rental housing, for example, the limited dividend plan under section 16. Hon. members will be pleased to learn that great advantage has been taken of that section during the present calendar year. In fact, during the last ten months Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has received more applications for loans to limited dividend companies than in any previous period of comparable duration. In these 10 months there has been more than $21 million committed for loans to limited dividend corporations.

Then there have been many different schemes in which a provincial government and the federal government have shared. We are always on the lookout for a redevelopment plan and I am sure that was also the attitude of the former government.

One of the members mentioned today that the Jeanne Mance project in Montreal had been delayed by the present government. We are going right ahead with the plans for that huge project and we are hoping it can be completed at the earliest possible time. Mind you, there was some difficulty about it some weeks ago because it was all mixed up with the municipal election in the city of Montreal. One group wanted to go ahead and another group did not want it to go ahead, so until that dispute could be resolved it was rather difficult for the government to step in and show much activity.

We would be delighted to see redevelopment schemes of this kind in other cities. One, for example, has been recommended after a survey, for which we paid a large portion of the cost, in the city of Vancouver, and some reference was made to this by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald). I am hoping that the city and provincial authorities will see fit to start moving on that project at a very early date. This type of work, I am sure, has the wholehearted support of everybody in the house.

Some hon. members have referred again today to the interest rate. I dealt with this matter last evening. It is a situation which has to be faced, and there is one further feature which I did not mention last night but which I think is material, that is, that under our small homes loan plan, commonly called the agency plan, loans have already been approved for almost $150 million, as I pointed out yesterday, involving 15,456 units. Part of the money we are now requesting is to carry on this agency plan. Hon. members will realize it would be very unfair to the people who have signed up under the plan if we were to make a change in the interest rate at the present time. It is not as though the money were not being taken up; it is being called for at a very rapid rate and I believe that with the additional funds for which we are now asking there will be perhaps 25,000 housing units built in Canada during this winter period as a result of the plan.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I should like to ask the minister if it would not be possible to re-write the interest rate of existing contracts?

Mr. Green: I would suggest that that would not be a practical thing to do where you have over 12,000 loans out already and more going out every day. One of the dangerous features about these suggestions under present conditions is that we are trying to get these houses built quickly; we are trying to get men at work quickly. If we assume there are five men at work on each of these units, that would mean 75,000 men at work in Canada on this housing, and if there were some doubt as to whether the interest rate were to be reduced as a result of the suggestions being made now, the first thing that would happen would be that people would stop taking loans and building would stop. As I say, there is this time element involved. One of the main reasons why the government adopted the policy of using government funds for these loans was to help the employment situation. The policy is essentially one to meet the conditions existing in Canada at the present time, and it would be very detrimental to have changes announced now which would, or which might, have the effect of stopping employment.

This plan is going extremely well now, far beyond what my colleagues or myself dared hope. It is a great success, and I hope that nothing will be done to stop it continuing to be a great success, giving thousands of Canadians work, making thousands of new homes available for Canadians in a much lower income group than those who have been benefited hitherto under the National Housing Act and, I think, helping to build a far better Canada.

I am very grateful for the support which has been given to this particular bill from all sides of the house even if there have been a lot of "ifs" and "buts" attached to that approval.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On clause 1.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, arising out of the remarks made by the minister, I should like to ask for further clarification of one or two points. I note the minister said that a lowering of the interest rate would have the effect of reducing still further the amount of money which private lenders might put into the lending field. Are we to conclude from this statement that the minister does not see in the foreseeable future any reduction in the present high rate of interest? Does the minister in effect say that if we are to expect an increase in housing in Canada it is going to depend on an increase in the interest rate? The minister made a statement to the effect that by lowering the interest rate we would be putting housing starts into a tailspin, except for the fact that the minister looks upon this as being a temporary way of dealing with the situation; that is to say, direct lending is simply an expedient, an emergency program designed to carry us over a temporary period. Can the minister indicate whether he feels that there is a likelihood of private lenders taking up the slack by increasing the amount of money which they might put into mortgages without an increase in the interest rate?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I am very hopeful that private money will provide the necessary funds next year for housing, and that those funds will be provided at a rate which certainly would not be any higher than the present rate of 6 per cent. No one can tell at the moment what the situation will be next year. My hon. friend will realize that the rates under the insured loans which are made by the lending institutions with their own funds would have to be kept at the same rate as is charged on these agency loans which are made with government funds. It would be chaotic to have a different rate on the two different types of loans.

I am informed by my officials that in the normal course the amount of $150 million in a year, which was what we provided under our original plan, would be only something like 10 per cent of the total amount of money required for housing. That will explain our difficulty to the hon. member. I do not say there is anything sacred about the present rate. Rates have been changed before and I would think that they would be keeping in line with what the actual conditions are across the country.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, would the minister care to give us his opinion as to why lending by private lenders has fallen off in the past year, thus necessitating an increase in direct lending by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? Why have conventional lenders not provided the mortgage money?

Is it because they feel the interest rate is too low? Would the minister venture an opinion on that?

Mr. Green: I mentioned last night that I believed there were two main reasons. One was that the mortgage companies and the banks could get higher returns by making other investments; therefore, they put their money in other fields. The other reason was the tight money policy which was in existence at the time we took over the responsibilities of government and which had resulted in a shortage of money, a shortage of loans, for builders and for activities of that kind. In my judgment it hit the house-building industry harder than any other industry. We were faced with the position where there simply was not the money going into the house-building field and if we had not moved the picture in house building in Canada this year would have been very bad. We moved to meet this need.

Mr. Ellis: Would the minister not say that next year the same situation will apply; that the approved lenders might find it more advantageous to invest their money in other types of construction work; in other words, the situation which exists this year. What reason has the minister for suggesting that the situation will be materially different next year or the year after?

Mr. Green: The situation has already changed considerably because money is now cheaper and the yields are not as high, for example, on bonds, and also the tight money policy is not in effect and it is easier for builders to borrow money from the banks.

Mr. Ellis: If money is cheaper why can the effect of that cheaper money not be passed on to house builders?

Mr. Green: I think that earlier in the year the situation was out of line. Mortgage lending was not an attractive investment. The position is now getting back to normal where you do not ordinarily expect to get the same return from a bond, a provincial bond, for example, as you would get from a mortgage. That was almost the situation last spring.

Mr. Marler: I should like to add a few remarks to what has been said on the subject of the rate of interest. I think it is a fact that the increasing of the rate to 6 per cent during the early part of this year had the definite effect of increasing the supply of money for mortgages. I had the occasion earlier in the year, after the increase of the rate to 6 per cent had come into effect, to talk to the president of one of the large life insurance companies of Canada and he told me that as a result of the increase in the rate his company was going to invest a larger sum of money in mortgages this year than they had originally planned to do. I think the truth of the matter is that though all of us would like to see a much lower rate of interest prevailing on mortgage loans the rate must always be set at a level which will attract not just government money but outside money.

The point I was trying to emphasize yesterday when we were at the resolution stage of the bill was that in the three years, 1954, 1955 and 1956, a period of great activity in Canada, a period of great development and a period when there was tremendous demand for investment moneys of all kinds for all kinds of purposes, more than $1,500 million was put up by the lending institutions of Canada to build, I would say, pretty close to 400,000 dwellings. Of the total, as I said yesterday, the amount put up by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was, I think, in the neighbourhood of $65 million. In other words, the government contribution was small and the lending institutions were satisfied with a lower rate of interest than now prevails to advance some $1,500 million. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that that situation is going to repeat itself and we are going to find that lending institutions generally will be attracted by the mortgage as a form of investment for their funds, that is to say, the funds of their policy holders and in some cases the funds of their shareholders.

But, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word in reply to what the minister said on the question of tight money. The fact of the matter is that you can call it tight money and try to attribute responsibility to the former government for that situation. If there is responsibility for the former government there is certainly responsibility for the present government which has done nothing whatever to change the tight money situation.

Mr. Green: This $150 million is helping that.

Mr. Marler: No, all the minister is doing by taking the $150 million and applying it to housing is to increase the amount available for housing but he is subtracting a corresponding amount from the supply that is available for other forms of endeavour.

Mr. Green: Oh, no.

Mr. Marler: I know the minister will not understand that because he has repeated the same thing too often now to be convinced. But I do want to say that the truth of the matter is that in Canada we have had a program of expansion without precedent and every form of industry which wished to develop wanted to borrow money or wanted to obtain money by the sale of shares or in some other fashion. Personally I think we have been very fortunate in that we have succeeded in attracting some $1,500 million into the mortgage field and building as many houses as have been built in the last three years. In the year 1957 I think conditions have been more difficult because there has been a much greater demand from industry for money and those people who have some association with investors and mortgages know that a great many investors prefer the simplicity of a bond, the fact that they can go to their safety deposit boxes and clip the coupons every six months. They do not have to worry whether the taxes on the property are paid, whether the house is going to burn down, whether it is insured, whether the borrower is keeping up with his payments.

The unfortunate fact is that in comparison with other forms of investment a mortgage presents greater difficulties of administration, is less negotiable and consequently is less popular with certain investors. I think that is a disability that is very difficult to overcome and, while it may not be popular to say so, I think the rate should be at a level which will attract funds rather than discourage them. Whether or not that rate should be 6 per cent is something for the government to decide but it should always be a rate which is going to attract funds into the housing business because we certainly need to go on building houses.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure which is the pot and which is the kettle in this exchange between the Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount. I was not sure whether the member for St. Antoine-Westmount was trying to put up a better defence for present government policy than the minister has put up or whether he was defending the policy of the former government. But it does seem that what has been said by the minister and the member for St. Antoine-Westmount underlines the contention that we in this corner of the house sometimes make. Members of the two old parties do not like it, but it has been demonstrated again tonight that there is not really much difference between them when it comes to something fundamental.

Mr. Pickersgill: Facts are facts.

Mr. Castleden: And interest is interest.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, with whom I used to have interesting discussions in the halls of United College in Winnipeg in bygone days, says that facts are facts. Well, the fact is that both the Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount talk about this matter in terms of housing being an attractive investment to those with money to lend. It is our contention that that is what is wrong, that is what is bankrupt about the policies of both the old parties.

Mr. Pickersgill: You want to make it unattractive.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They think of housing in relation to the amount of profit that can be made by private investors. In one little sector of this housing legislation, which was put on the statute books by the Liberals and which the Conservatives are using there is a slight departure from that principle, namely in the one little sector where provision is made for public money to be used when private money will not come into the breach because not enough profit is being made. Yet even when the Minister of Public Works is taking credit for the loosening up on tight money by extending more money through agency loans, he still says that this cannot go on forever, that it is only temporary. The Minister of Public Works said that you cannot ask for the return on money invested in housing to be out of line with the return that investors can obtain in other fields. We contend that what is out of line is that the cost of homes for our people is out of line with the priority that should be given to homes, out of line with the social desirability of homes being one of the things that we produce first with the effort that our people apply to our raw materials.

If it is being demonstrated by the facts, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate put it, and by the arguments of the Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount that the present system is not able to get homes built for our people, then we contend we have got to move a great deal further along the line of making public money available so that in effect we channel the savings of our people into the socially desirable purpose of building homes. We regret very greatly the slowness and delay of the present and the former government in this field but at least we welcome the fact that the picture is becoming clear that both of the old parties think in terms of housing only as an attractive investment. We think rather of housing as a social end that should be achieved, an end to which the resources, raw materials and the labour power of this country should be devoted.

One of the reasons we have given support to the bill is that it proposes to extend slightly the amount of money available for agency loans. However, we are just as sure as we are that we are here in the house that the day will come when we will have to move a great deal further in that direction. We think the Canadian people deserve a government that will move that way because the government believes in it rather than because it is forced into it.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I assume that part of the $150 million allocated a few months ago and part of the additional $150 million now being asked for will be supplied to approved lenders and will reach the purchasers of homes by way of purchaser loans. Am I right in the assumption that a share of the first $150 million and of the additional $150 million for which the minister is asking will be used to supply additional insured loans to the Canadian people?

Mr. Green: I am not very sure that I heard the hon. member's question correctly. Agency loans are quite different from insured loans. In the latter case the money is put up by the lending institution. The agency loan is put up by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which in turn obtains its money from the receiver general. Agency loan money did not go into the insured loan plan.

Mr. Regier: I wish to thank the minister. In other words, I am now assuming that none of the $300 million is to be used for the purpose of supplying any of what we have been used to labelling insured loans.

Now, I must return to the question I was asking yesterday. Could the minister tell me, if I obtain one of these new loans from a bank on which I have to pay the standard 6 per cent, how much does the bank have to pay to the government for this money?

Mr. Green: In so far as the insured loan is concerned, the lending institution does not get money from the government at all. It advances its own money. All that is done under the National Housing Act is that repayment is insured under the insurance terms of the act.

Mr. Regier: The minister has explained that none of this money will be used for the purpose of issuing insured loans. However, I understand that if I want one of these loans I will have to apply at a lending institution, one of the approved lenders, and I must pay the approved lender 6 per cent. How much does the approved lender have to pay in order to get this money out of the government?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Green: I think the hon. member's difficulty is this, that in addition to lending their own money, the lending institutions are acting as agents for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in putting out this $150 million which will be increased when we get the amendment through.

There are two types of loans. You may go to an approved lender and get a loan under the insured plan or you may get it under the agency loan plan. In the latter case the money is government money, but mind you the agency loan plan money is only available for these small homes. If you want to build a big house on Shaughnessy Heights you cannot get any money under the agency plan. You would have then to come under the insurance plan and take your chances with the lender.

Mr. Regier: I wish to thank the minister. However, perhaps now the minister can answer this, and this is what I have been after all along. Who gets the difference between the cost of this money to the government and the rate that the purchaser has to pay? I believe the government obtains its money at slightly under 4 per cent. Who gets the spread between the 4 per cent or whatever it is and the 6 per cent? Is it the approved lender who is acting as agent in this case or is it the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Green: In so far as an agency loan is concerned, it would be Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The figures I gave last night showed that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation pay 4⅜ per cent to the receiver general for the money, then pay about ⅔ of 1 per cent for putting the loan on the books and pay ½ of 1 per cent per annum for the collection fee.

Mr. Regier: According to my calculations, Mr. Chairman, and I think I have it right now, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation pays 4⅜ per cent, then the lender, who is an agent, receives ⅔ of 1 per cent and ½ of 1 per cent, so the interest rate is up to 5-13/24 per cent. In other words, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a net return there for handling all this money of 11/24 of 1 per cent. I understand that in addition to the ⅔ of 1 per cent and ½ of 1 per cent there is also a scale of fees which is paid by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the lending institution or are the fees which the minister read out this ⅔ and ½ of 1 per cent?

Mr. Green: These fees of ⅔ of 1 per cent are paid to the lending institutions for putting the loan on the books.

Mr. Marler: That is paid once, I take it?

Mr. Green: Yes, and ½ of 1 per cent per year is paid to the lending institution for collecting the money.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I realize the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was referring to himself just as an example and the Minister of Public Works was answering him as though he was an example, but just to have the record clear is it not a fact that by a provision of the Senate and the House of Commons Act members of parliament are barred from the advantages of the National Housing Act?

Mr. Pickersgill: Do not give a legal opinion.

Mr. Green: I am afraid I do not know.

Mr. Castleden: I had difficulty in following the minister's answer to one of the questions that came from this corner of the house. It was stated we thought the government should lower the rate of interest, and that was our amendment. The minister stated that they could not possibly lower the rate of interest being charged for these loans because that would discourage investment. I should like to ask the minister this. Is it not a fact that if he were to lower the rate there would be more houses built than if the rate were allowed to continue where it is? If you lowered the rate of interest you would lower the cost of building houses.

Mr. Green: I think the result would be exactly the opposite. If we lowered the rate on these agency loans, then the rate is automatically lowered on the insured loans and that would probably mean the lending institutions would stop lending their money on first mortgages and would put it into some other investment. Then, there would not be sufficient money available in Canada to build houses.

Mr. Castleden: In other words, we are doing more good to the investors in insured loans than we are to the potential home owners.

Some hon. Members: Nonsense.

Mr. Castleden: Supposing we take the example of a person who was fortunate enough to obtain a serviced lot and who paid his 10 per cent down, which would be $1,000 on a $10,000 house. If he amortized the balance over a 30-year period, what would be the total of all payments which he would have to make before he finally owned that house at the end of a 30-year period?

Mr. Marler: He owns it to start with.

Mr. Castleden: I suppose we can figure that out. The balance he would owe would be $9,000 and at the end of 30 years he would have paid $18,000.

An hon. Member: Part of it is rent.

Mr. Castleden: Yes, part of it is rent. The reason housing is not available to the people who need it is that they cannot afford to pay that amount. If the interest rate is 6 per cent and you amortize it over a 30-year period, a person has to pay double for the house. Part of this trouble goes back a long way. It goes back to the high cost of building, and some years ago we advocated that price controls be kept on. If that had been done a house costing $10,000 to construct today could be built for $6,000. Then, people could afford to build. You are saddling these people with a load of debt from which they will not free themselves within an ordinary earning lifetime.

Let us get these things down into the realm where they can be used, where greater consideration will be given for the safety of the people, the kind of houses in which they live and the social value of good houses instead of slum houses or in other words the safety value and the health value. You are denying to the people who need it most a commodity that is essential to good standards of Canadian living. I think that has been said before in other words by other hon. members of this house. The party will go ahead and put this bill through. We have pointed out to them that they will just continue to fail to provide what should be provided, namely housing for the vast number of Canadian people who need it, such as the fellow on the small salary, people living out in the smaller communities where it is absolutely impossible for them to come under the provisions of this bill and where perhaps if the burden of interest were not left loaded on top of them they could provide themselves with houses.

Mr. Green: The hon. member must not overlook the fact that a great deal of money is being lent out directly by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the smaller communities, quite apart from the agency loans. I have here figures for the loans under section 40 which are in that category. They amount to $57,210,071 since the act of 1954 came into effect. These are additional loans which are made directly by the corporation and they have not entered into the discussions which have taken place earlier this evening.

Mr. Castleden: The rate of interest is the same, though?

Mr. Green: Yes. The rate of interest must be kept the same on all these loans. Otherwise you would have confusion.

Mr. Castleden: For that reason the amendment is not of any value to the people who need assistance.

Mr. Regier: May I ask the minister this question. Last night I referred to consideration of the value of our veterans housing legislation. The minister has informed us that some of his regulations are being changed. Has any consideration been given to amending the regulations in such a way that people would be able to build their own homes and take advantage of the provisions of the National Housing Act? I know that from a technical standpoint there is nothing in the way. However, I think the minister is well aware of the fact that most lending institutions, as soon as they find that the prospective home owner intends to build his own home, are no longer interested in accommodating him. The argument they use is that their experiences have not been good, that in so many cases it takes too long for the prospective home owner to complete the building, and they do not want to be bothered by that type of enterprise. Has the minister given any consideration to amending the regulations in respect thereto so that those wishing to build their own homes under the National Housing Act would be in as advantageous a position as are the veterans of today, many of whom are doing a remarkably excellent job and are obtaining a low cost home because much of the initial cost is their own labour.

Then I have another question to ask the minister. What is his estimate of the existing housing shortage at the present time? How many units does his department feel we are short? Also, what are the estimated needs for housing within the next ten year period, say, in Canada?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to be a prophet or the son of a prophet. I have no idea what the expectation is for the next ten years. In this house, as the hon. member knows, we live from day to day.

Mr. Marler: Truer words were never spoken.

Mr. Green: When the agency loan plan was adopted the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation believed that the demand for the more expensive homes had already been met. In some areas they were a drug on the market. It was estimated that the increased demand this year for the more modest homes, such as are made possible by the agency loan arrangement, would be about 15,000 homes. We have already had 15,456 units covered by loans actually completed and there is not any indication that the demand has been met. Hence apparently there is still an effective demand for these lower cost homes.

The hon. member asked me earlier whether a change could not be made in order to give more consideration to an applicant who was building his own home. That is one of the questions that is being looked into, but there is some provision for consideration of that type at the present time. The lending value established for residential property includes the value of the land and the value of the structure built on the land. If the applicant owns the land on which the house is to be built, the value of this land is considered to be part of the applicant's equity. If the applicant is able to contribute owner labour by virtue of his own skills, the value of that owner labour is discussed with him and is included as part of his equity. For the home owner applicant, the applicant's equity may include the value of the property which he owns, the value of his own labour and some cash, provided that the sum of these three equals the difference between the amount of the mortgage and the cost of the finished house.

Mr. Regier: I appreciate this reply. I am glad the minister said the matter is being looked into a little bit more. The minister will admit that if the lending institution is not interested in this type of applicant the regulation as to valuation means very little in effect. If the bank or the insurance company does not want to do business with an applicant who wants to do his own building there is not much use in saying you will assist his own efforts, if he is unable to obtain the mortgage.

Mr. Ellis: I note that the minister pointed out that some 15,456 starts were made under the agency loan plan in this third quarter. In answer to a question asked the other day he pointed out that the agency loan plan was the answer to the frequent complaints that the cost of the average home was going up and getting further and further out of reach of the ordinary citizen. Would the minister care to comment on this matter and to state whether or not the department feel that the agency loan plan is the only way in which we can be guaranteed houses of lower cost and that otherwise the insured loan plan will go on producing homes of the value which he pointed out the other day.

I hope the minister can understand the point I am trying to make, that if the government is going to have to depend on the agency loan plan in order to provide low cost homes, then I suggest the $150 million of additional money passed over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not going to make very much impression on the housing needs of the low income groups.

Mr. Green: Well the agency loan plan was, of course, our main way of trying to meet the situation, but in addition to that we have been investigating every other possibility which would result in the building of cheaper homes and I think the success of the agency plan has convinced a great many builders and many of the lending institutions as well that this is a pretty good field into which they might enter. I am hoping the result will be that both the builders and the lending institutions will concentrate next year on these lower priced homes. There are indications that that is the trend at the present time.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, the minister last evening at page 2499 of Hansard pointed out that the lending institutions were not in a position to impose the type of restriction necessary to bring about a greater increase in low-cost homes. Now my question to the minister is this: is it not possible for the government to amend the legislation in order to provide that necessary authority? In other words, in the minister's own words, the situation as it now stands is that lending institutions who are engaged in insured loans apparently are not able to touch these lower priced homes, and that the only way in which these homes can be obtained is through the agency loan plan of the government.

Mr. Green: We will make every endeavour to get the lending institutions and the builders to stay in this lower cost home field. There is this feature about it, if the more expensive homes cannot be sold and if they are going to lie empty as they have done in some of the Canadian cities, then the higher price field becomes unattractive to the lending institutions and they are just that much more likely to put their money into loans on smaller homes. This is a problem which we will have to face if it arises and I am hoping that it will not be a problem in 1958.

Mr. Ellis: One other matter. I know the minister said last evening that he had given instructions that his officials would look into the question of lending values particularly in some of the cities where—as he pointed out—loan prices had sky-rocketed. I wonder if the minister could inform us whether this investigation is going to take place immediately and whether some decision is going to be made in the very near future. If something is not done then it simply means that persons wishing to build homes in certain cities are going to be required to pay, not merely the 10 per cent of the first $12,000 an additional cost which will make the down payment in cash which they have to put forward completely out of line with the money they have available.

Mr. Green: Yes; the policy I announced last night is already being implemented.

Mr. Batten: I would like at this time to bring to the attention of the minister a case in my own riding which came about during the past year and to ask him if he will give to the people concerned such assistance as he is able to give. About a year or so ago a company by the name of the Clouston Development Company, which is a home construction company, came into my home city of Corner Brook in Newfoundland purporting to be operating under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and entered into a deal with about 40 people to build homes. These people were supposed to deposit with the company certain amounts of money ranging from $3,000 to $5,000. At the end of the year, when there was no evidence of any construction beginning, people began to make enquiries and they found that although they had deposited with the company a considerable sum of money, the company had gone bankrupt and the 40 prospective home owners had lost their money.

I do not want to belabour the minister with all the details but might I give him just two or three particulars. One young married man, living in a small home not sufficiently large to accommodate his family, decided to mortgage his small home in order to purchase a bigger one under this plan. Another young man sold his home in order to get the amount of money necessary for the deposit and then found, after the company had gone bankrupt that he had actually lost his original home. Another older man—now 65 years of age and who will retire within a month or two if he has not already done so—took all his life savings to put into a new home. He in turn lost all his money.

Now this development company was, as I say, purporting to be operating through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and it is for that reason that I would ask the minister to look into the details of this case and to see if he could give any assistance to those people who have been involved in this most unfortunate incident.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, if I remember correctly Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was not in any way involved with this bankrupt company. We very much regret what has happened although the corporation is not responsible for it. We are trying to move in and give whatever help is possible to clean up this unfortunate situation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have one question I would like to ask the minister, but before I do so I would like to make a very brief comment on an argument he used just before six o'clock. He said that to reduce the interest rate now would be unfair to those who have taken out mortgages at the present interest rate. I am sure that is an argument which the minister would just as soon not have on the record because that argument against the lowering of the interest rate could be applied to the lowering of the down payment which is to be the effect of the clause we are now discussing.

I am sure he does not take the position that it is unfair to those who had to put up a higher down payment that we should now be proposing to lower the down payment, and I am sure he does not take the position that for all time the interest rate on housing mortgages must either stay where it is or go up.

Mr. Green: I did not say that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to know that. In that connection may I ask the minister if there has been any change in the interest rate on long-term government bonds as defined in section 4, subsection 3 of the National Housing Act since the present rate of 6 per cent for loans under the act was established.

Mr. Green: Well as I understand it, the rate paid by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is set for six months. At the moment we are working under that rate of $4\frac{3}{8}$ per cent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On what date was that set?

Mr. Green: I cannot tell the hon. member that at the moment. It is quite recent. May I point out that under the terms of the National Housing Act the maximum rate is set by the governor in council, so that 6 per cent is the maximum rate. The rate could be anything lower than that if a loan could be obtained at a lower rate.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I still have not been able to get through my thick head just what the picture is on this matter of reimbursing the lending agencies. Yesterday, as recorded at page 2501 of Hansard, the minister quoted from paragraph 9 of the agency agreement for the administration of N.H.A. loans and he said paragraph 9 states:

[Mr. Green.]

> For the making and advancing of loans the corporation will pay to the approved lender a fee of > (i) $100 for each loan made in respect of a house other than to a builder;

And corresponding amounts for certain other categories. I understood that was a flat figure for a loan paid to a lender acting as an agent of the corporation. Now the minister has been saying in reply to questions by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that the lender acting as agent receives two-thirds of 1 per cent and one-half of 1 per cent by way of reimbursement. If I understood the minister correctly, one-half of 1 per cent refers to a recurring amount which the lender would get each year as a collection fee, but I am still at a loss to understand what the connection is between this $100 flat rate and the two-thirds of 1 per cent to which he referred.

Mr. Green: The two-thirds of 1 per cent is the converted charge, taking all the loans together, and it works out at that average of two-thirds of 1 per cent.

Mr. Barnett: And that is the same as the $100 to which the minister referred? The two-thirds of 1 per cent is the converted figure representing the amount paid to the agency in respect of this clause of the agreement. Is that correct?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall the bill be read the third time. Now?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave.

Mr. Green moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO REMOVE THRESHOLD PROVISION FROM AGREEMENTS, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Assistance Act so as to remove the threshold provision from the agreements that have been concluded or that may be entered into hereafter; and to make certain changes for the better administration of the act through the deletion of a number of obsolete provisions.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution can be stated very simply. We seek authority to delete the so-called threshold from the Unemployment Assistance Act.

This threshold provision at present prevents the federal government from sharing in the cost of unemployment assistance until the number of needy persons receiving such assistance in any month rises above .45 per cent of the provincial population. The effect of abolishing this provision from the act and from the agreements with the provinces under the act will be to authorize federal assistance to the provinces and, indirectly to the municipalities, regardless of the numbers who may receive assistance in any given month.

Since the Unemployment Assistance Act has now been opened up for amendment along the lines I have mentioned it is also proposed at the same time to delete in part or entirely certain transitional provisions of the act which were necessary at the time it was passed but which are now obsolete. I refer to the reference in section 5 of the present act to the date of July 1, 1955, and also to section 8 of the present act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like by leave of the committee to make a few comments on this resolution. The hon. minister has not at this stage given us a very detailed explanation, but when the bill is before the house he will undoubtedly say more about the government's policies in this particular regard.

Mr. Monteith: I will give a lot more detail.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, and as he says he will give a lot more detail. But at this stage I think it is desirable that some comment should be made on the measure which the hon. gentleman recommends to our consideration by way of amendment. I think at this stage it would be well to remember the situation which caused the previous administration to recommend to parliament that the present government should share in the maintenance of a group of individuals in our country who from time to time find themselves without work, often without the means to obtain work, and also the decision of the administration to assist those classes in the community who are regarded as unemployable.

The federal government in 1940 took a very important step when it asked the provinces to give the federal government the necessary power under the British North America Act to legislate for a system of unemployment insurance, and when the federal government took over the responsibility for unemployment insurance, taking over as well the administration of local employment offices. It made a very important contribution toward assuaging the problem of unemployment as it confronts this country from time to time, and no one will deny that the decision of the government at that time, taken at a very difficult period in our history, represented a very important step in providing a form of unemployment insurance which has meant a great deal to the working force of this country.

When the legislation was introduced in 1940 it did not represent the first attempt by an administration to provide unemployment insurance. It had been tried in the latter days of the government under the leadership of the late Lord Bennett. But, as was pointed out at that time, the unemployment insurance measure introduced by that administration was clearly contrary to the provisions of the British North America Act. It was urged by opposition members of that day that the measure would not stand testing by the courts and this indeed proved to be true when the Supreme Court of Canada and the judicial committee of the privy council declared it ultra vires of the parliament of Canada.

But, notwithstanding the passage of unemployment insurance and the undoubted benefits which have flowed therefrom, many of the working force of our country, and those who are now unemployable, found themselves at the mercy of municipalities and of provinces for assistance. It is a fact that during the period from the time the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed up until recent days many municipalities did not regard it as their normal function to provide assistance for individuals out of work, certainly, for individuals who could qualify at one time or another for unemployment insurance. Even with regard to those who did not and could not qualify for unemployment insurance, a number of municipalities in a number of our provinces did not provide assistance for the unemployable group. Therefore, from year to year we were confronted in this country with the spectacle of individuals either denied assistance by the municipality or, if given assistance, in many instances given inadequate assistance.

Certain provinces refused to share in this assistance with the municipalities and, as hon. members know, that was particularly true in Ontario where, for some reason or another, there was a reluctance on the part of the provincial administration to share in the cost of assisting individuals whose unemployment insurance and seasonal benefits had run out. The argument they advanced was that this was a responsibility that did not rest with particular provincial administrations. Municipal representatives went to provincial governments and asked for moneys to assist them in bolstering up their funds to provide for these two classes of out-of-work people. The provincial governments would say: This is not our responsibility; this is a matter that rests with the federal authority and you must look to them for assistance. This throwing of the responsibility back and forth undoubtedly caused much confusion and a great deal of understandable criticism on the part of municipal officers and citizens in given communities. It was because of this kind of situation that the previous government decided that it should embark upon a program of public assistance so that finally we might be able to eradicate entirely from the Canadian scene this shifting of responsibility from one government to another in respect of individuals out of work with no opportunity of receiving assistance at the hands of any of the three levels of government of this country.

When the measure was announced it was widely acclaimed. It was first of all discussed with the provinces and at the conference which I had the privilege of attending there was a unanimous expression of opinion from the provinces that this was a step in the right direction. There were some difficulties in the proposal put forward by the government of the day. For instance, there was the difficulty in the case of Nova Scotia, but generally speaking the principle of the measure was one which all of the provinces agreed was a very important and constructive step to take in the field of social welfare.

When the proposal was put forward the government, of course, indicated that the only way in which it could be implemented was by agreements entered into between the federal government on the one hand and the 10 provincial governments on the other. It is regrettable that agreements were not consummated between the governments of the two larger provinces and the federal government. Six agreements were concluded and, as a result, in these six provinces the federal government shares with the provincial governments on a fifty-fifty basis the cost of a measure of public assistance that undoubtedly has produced very satisfactory results and gives very important assistance to these two groups of individuals.

The cost of the scheme at the present time —the minister will correct me if I am wrong— perhaps in so far as the federal government is concerned is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $5 million. I have made an estimate of the proposal the minister now makes, assuming the participation of the two larger and the two smaller provinces that have not come into the scheme, and it will represent possibly an additional $8 million or $9 million; but these are figures which I have just estimated. Undoubtedly the minister, with more accurate information at his disposal, will be able to comment on it later on.

I would remind the Minister of National Health and Welfare that it is our duty at this time to point out the significance of the step that is now being taken in the light of the problem that now confronts us in Canada, a problem that we were reminded of when this measure was introduced and when I proposed this public assistance measure. We were told that what the government should be doing was to put forward schemes that would not provide assistance to men and women but schemes that would keep men and women at work. Those were observations made by the present Prime Minister when he discussed unemployment and this particular measure. Those were observations made by the former leader of the opposition, not with regard to the particular proposal for public assistance, but when he discussed unemployment from time to time.

All of us in this house recognize the difficulties that confront any government in the matter of unemployment; but that does not free any of us from the obligation of looking at this problem squarely in the light of the facts that confront us at a given moment. The fact is that since the end of the war we have had in this country a level of employment never exceeded before. We have never had as high a working force and our working force has never been as continuously employed as during the past decade. But we must recognize that the situation today is somewhat alarming because of the volume of unemployment that is to be found throughout the nation. We were told yesterday that some 82,000 individuals are now out of work who were not out of work a month ago. I think that is the correct figure.

Mr. Starr: Eighty-four thousand.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the Minister of Labour. I know that the Minister of Labour is concerned about this problem as indeed we all are. There will be differences as to the number of men actually out of work. The differences between the figures supplied by two departments of government indicate that it is not easy to determine the exact number of individuals out of work. But the fact is that there are certainly double the number out of work today as were out of work at this time a year ago and the indications from government statisticians are that the increase is likely to continue for some time to come.

We will all hope that unemployment will be corrected, that more and more individuals will be able to find work, will be able to go off the unemployment insurance rolls and will not require the necessity of seasonal benefits and the advantages of public assistance. But we have to face the fact that in the present period and for some months to come at any rate we are likely to be confronted with a serious unemployment problem. None of us can shirk our responsibility no matter what our position in the house may be, no matter where we may sit, and it will not be valid to suggest that for any hon. member to emphasize the problem is to create a lack of confidence in Canada or in the Canadian economy. When this question was raised on another occasion the then leader of the opposition, Mr. George Drew, dealt with this aspect of the problem. As found at page 2498 of Hansard for March 29, 1955, he said:

> I regret that anyone would suggest that a discussion on unemployment is an attempt to undermine confidence. If there is any attempt to undermine confidence on that basis, then of course it must come from the agency of the government which gives the figures.

These agencies, of course, are the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics.

> The figures that have been used are given by the dominion bureau of statistics. Surely there is no suggestion that the dominion bureau of statistics is deliberately seeking to undermine public confidence. After all, it is a statistical agency which we believe has been giving us reliable information within the pattern it has established with regard to these and other matters. The interpretation to be placed upon those figures is for the members of this house and the public of Canada.

I think that statement, admittedly made in another context, is a justification for our raising this question when the opportunity is presented as I am seeking to do tonight. It would be unfair, I believe, to charge the present administration with full responsibility for the situation and I am not doing that. But I would remind hon. members opposite that when much less unemployment existed in this country some hon. members sitting on the treasury benches, in spite of the high level of economic prosperity that Canada enjoyed, did charge the government, not with the responsibility of providing public assistance or unemployment insurance but with the obligation to provide work for people out of work. It is open to us in the light of these criticisms, all of which are recorded in Hansard, to remind hon. gentlemen opposite of what they said on these occasions and to remind them that they have a responsibility with regard to this problem in the light of the arguments they made throughout the years with respect to this particular matter.

We never took the position that it was possible for us to correct the situation fully, but the argumentation made by some hon. members opposite when they were sitting in our places clearly implied, give us the opportunity and these unfortunate situations will not arise. But they have arisen. They are now here and all over the country many thousands of men and women are out of work in every one of our cities. The Minister of Labour may say that in his city unemployment possibly is not as great as it is in my community. He is indeed very fortunate that that is the situation and I recognize that it is the case. But I am sure the Minister of Labour will be the first to agree that the city of Oshawa is perhaps the only city in Canada where there is not a very serious unemployment situation.

The daily bulletin issued by the dominion bureau of statistics for Monday, December 16, gives an indication not of the latest figures but of the situation existing in the country. It points out that the number of initial and renewal claims received at local offices of the unemployment insurance commission rose 34 per cent in October to 167,363 from the September total of 124,949, and it was 90 per cent in excess of last year's October figure of 87,929. The same daily bulletin reminds us that a total of 268,005 claimants, comprising 198,000 males and 69,951 females, had their unemployment registered in the live files on October 31, an increase of 41,475 or 18 per cent over the September 30 count of 226,530. On October 31 last year the total was 139,377 and claimants as at October 31 this year accounted for 6.8 per cent of the estimated insured population on October 1 versus 3.7 per cent a year earlier.

So one can refer to the latest bulletin and to bulletins issued subsequent to October 14 and find there a steady increase in the number of applicants for unemployment insurance reflecting, of course, the growth in unemployment itself. I am sure the minister has more recent figures available than we have at this moment. I remember that about the middle of November he gave us some figures for October and the next day, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he gave figures for November 7 of this year. They reflected, of course, what I have said has been a gradual increase of unemployment during last autumn.

What the final figure today is I do not know except that we do know from what the Minister of Labour has just said that there were 84,000 more men and women out of work last month than there were in the preceding month. The minister nods his head. That represents a very significant increase, 84,000 more in November than in October. What it will be in December, what it will be in January, February, March and April, I do not know. There are indications, and my authority for saying this is the statements made by government officers themselves, that we will find the figures will be considerably higher than what they are now.

If the figure reaches the suggested 700,000, and I have seen even 800,000 mentioned, undoubtedly that will represent a very dangerous point. It will represent the highest point reached at any time since 1934. As a matter of fact, this figure, for this time of year, is greater than in any other year before since 1933. I believe these facts speak for themselves. If the former administration had a responsibility in connection with the matter, so has the present administration. We have a right to ask what steps are going to be taken by the government to correct this situation.

I must, in fairness to the Minister of Labour note that at least on two occasions he has indicated to the house the steps which his department is taking to try to improve this picture. He has told us of the steps he is taking with industry and in government departments, with regard to public organizations and the like, to try to mitigate this problem somewhat. But I think we must ask him, are these steps going to correct this situation? Can the government take any steps that will correct this situation? What is the government's view with regard to that particular question on which they had strong views when in opposition? We were told unemployment insurance, seasonal benefits and public assistance was no substitute for the provision of work for men and women; that was the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite on other occasions. Is that still their position? Is it still their position that these various social measures which I have enumerated are not enough and that what is wanted are policies that will lead to providing work for Canada's working force?

I think the position is clear. The government has the responsibility to be consistent with the criticism that it levelled at the previous administration, an administration that at no time ever took the position that unemployment insurance, seasonal benefits or public assistance were, of themselves, a substitute for work. At no time did we indicate that we were embarking on policies that would correct this situation, if and when it arose, and particularly during this difficult season period. The government has, in its departmental files I am sure, many projects which if implemented now would, in many cases, provide work for individuals.

The other day I referred in this house to the tax policy of the government with regard to the automobile industry. I am sure that the policy pursued by the Minister of Finance in that case was not calculated to relieve the unemployment problem that exists in the automobile and related industries. Did the government consider, when it decided on that particular course, that that was the way to provide a corrective measure for a very important segment in the unemployment picture in Canada? Did the government believe that a reduction of 2½ per cent was calculated to stimulate sales?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are we going to discuss that again? I suggest that the speaker is out of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I think the hon. member for Essex East knows we have already passed that legislation concerning excise tax. I do not believe that should be discussed again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect to you, Mr. Chairman, what I have indicated tonight is that we have this unemployment problem. I am indicating too that the administration of the day, when sitting in opposition, argued that the government should take stronger steps than the mere provision of social measures in order to find some way of providing employment for the unemployed population of our country. I am examining now the steps the government has taken in attempting to reach its objective of providing employment. What I am arguing is that these policies of this government are not following along lines which were clearly implied in the positions they took about the provision of employment when they were in opposition.

What national development schemes has the government in mind for relieving this problem? We were told by the present Prime Minister, at least on two occasions and on one occasion I recall by the former leader of the opposition speaking for those of the treasury bench party when they were on this side, about schemes which if pursued by this government could provide employment for many thousands of our workmen. We were told about a special highway scheme in addition to the national scheme that was envisaged by the previous administration. In other words, the positions taken by hon. gentlemen opposite on former occasions, and the suggestions made by them for the relief of unemployment are now applicable and open to them for adoption and certainly for consideration as as to whether or not those are the methods which if adopted, might somewhat mitigate this problem of unemployment.

There were proposals made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. We were reminded of them today. He wrote to the prime minister pointing out that in the city of Vancouver there was much unemployment.

He had gone out to see that situation himself, and as a result of his investigations he put forward a program of development. It was embodied in the letter which he addressed to the prime minister. We have a right to know, in discussing unemployment, what the government's attitude is with regard to that particular proposal. Does the government regard it as a means by which unemployment in that particular section of the country could be reduced? It will not be enough for this administration to say tonight that they are taking another step in improving legislation brought down by the previous government because that legislation, as we were reminded then, is not a means by which men and women out of work can be provided with gainful employment.

I suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is charged with the responsibility of this particular relief or social measure, that the government as a whole is responsible for providing, in accordance with the stand it has taken on previous occasions, measures by which unemployment can be reduced in this country. It will not be open to suggestion that this is a difficult problem. We all recognize it is a difficult problem. It will not be open to them to say they are pursuing the same kind of course which the previous administration pursued. The fact is that they took a position when in opposition; and if those positions were sincere then, we have every right to ask them to implement those suggestions or now to admit that criticisms which they made on those occasions did not have the validity which they argued at that time and that these various proposals put forward by them did possess the merit they were said to possess. Have we the assurance of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that there will be agreement now by all of the provinces with regard to the measure that he is now suggesting for amendment?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I must advise the hon. member for Essex East that his time has expired.

Mr. Cameron: This resolution takes me back a great many years—20 years to be precise—when I was sitting, as it were, at the other end of the country as a member of the legislature of British Columbia. It takes me back 20 years because that was the date upon which the federal government of the day decided to appoint a royal commission to examine dominion-provincial relations; and included in their terms of reference was an examination of the respective responsibilities for the relief of unemployment.

I recall very clearly, Mr. Chairman, those rather grim years when those of us who sat in the legislature of British Columbia used to watch the flood of misery that poured into our province from the whole of Canada because the unfortunate people who came there came on the very understandable thesis that it was more comfortable to starve in a mild climate than in subzero temperatures. That flood, added to our sea of misery, presented an almost impossible burden to the legislature and the government of British Columbia. If my memory serves me rightly, the total cost to the taxpayers of British Columbia during those tragic years was in the neighbourhood of $96 million, a staggering sum for a population which at that time was very little in excess of half a million and whose provincial revenues were in the neighbourhood of $18 or $19 million a year. That was a very different proposition from the present British Columbia with a population of, I believe, 1¾ million and provincial revenues running into the neighbourhood of, I believe, $300 million.

The lapse of time since then has wiped out from my memory the strict chronology of all the various shifts and turns that were taken in the policies between the provincial government and the federal government, the various schemes that were promoted for grants in aid, for loans from the federal authorities and so on. Finally, of course, in 1937 there was the establishment of the Rowell-Sirois commission. It will be readily understandable that those of us who were dealing with those frightful problems on the coast at that time should have been keenly interested in the establishment of that royal commission and keenly interested in what would be their findings with regard to what was then the major problem of public administration in Canada.

I think it might be of interest, Mr. Chairman, if we were to recall just what were the recommendations of that commission with regard to the responsibility it suggested should be assumed by the federal government. On page 25 of the second volume of the Rowell-Sirois report we find this in their recommendations under the heading "Prevention and Relief of Unemployment". I am rather interested to find now—I had forgotten it—the use of the word "prevention" there as well. The commission says:

> The assumption of responsibility by the dominion for relief or aid of unemployed employables would entail (1) complete financial responsibility; (2) full control of administration.

Then it goes on to outline the various things it considered would be necessary for efficient administration. The point I want to emphasize is that at that time the Rowell-Sirois commission recommended that the federal government should assume 100 per cent responsibility for aid to the employable unemployed. At that time, the time of the establishment of the Rowell-Sirois commission, the unemployment figure stood at 411,000 or 9.08 per cent of the labour force of that date. I believe it is useful for us to consider those figures.

Mr. Pickersgill: What was the date?

Mr. Cameron: The year 1937 was the year in which the commission was established. I believe it is useful for us to consider that point now, namely that that was the unemployment situation at that time when, in the opinion of this royal commission, it was no longer possible for the provinces to assume even part of the financial responsibility for the care of the employable unemployed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a purely factual question?

Mr. Cameron: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it not true that the report was made in 1941, not in 1937?

Mr. Cameron: Yes; it was made in 1940, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should say 1940.

Mr. Cameron: Yes. I am not pretending that it was not made in 1940. The report was made in 1940. I merely wanted to emphasize the conditions that obtained when the commission first began its hearing. In fact, I think one might say that by the time the report was made the findings with regard to unemployment assistance were largely academic because we had moved out of that situation; and it is not until the last 18 months that we have gone back to something approximating those conditions. I think that is the point which we should consider now, namely that if at that time it was considered that unemployment of 9.08 per cent of our labour force warranted a recommendation that the federal government should assume 100 per cent responsibility, we should examine our present situation to discover just what level of unemployment would have to be reached today to approximate those conditions of 1937, with this additional point, that the Rowell-Sirois commission came to the conclusion that the province was unable to assume that responsibility at that time. It is fair to admit, of course, that they were recommending changes in the distribution of tax fields but at that time the income tax and the corporation tax were still in the hands of the provincial authorities.

To reproduce the unemployment situation of 1937 today would require unemployment figures to rise to some 578,000 in order to be 9.08 per cent of the present labour force of some 5,900,000; that is the figure if my arithmetic is correct. I note that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is doing some figuring. If I have done the calculation wrongly, I hope he will tell me. However, that is what I figure it to be, that about 578,000 will reproduce those conditions that obtained in 1937 when it was considered impossible for the provinces to bear any of the load of unemployment assistance for the employable unemployed.

What are the figures today? The latest figures I have seen are these. I agree with the hon. member for Essex East that it is extremely difficult to know what figures one accepts as there are conflicting figures produced on different bases by different government agencies. But one figure I have seen for November 15, a month ago, was 352,000 out of work. Like the hon. member for Essex East, I have seen estimates from responsible trade union officials—research men—that the figure may very well reach 800,000 before this winter is out. However, even if we discount that estimate to a great extent and even if we suggest that the figure of 800,000 is an exaggeration, I think we can hardly avoid the conclusion that a figure approximating 600,000 is certainly within the realm of possibility for the future months. That would bring the situation in 1957 not really on a level with that in 1937, it would even be slightly worse than the situation was then. This bill to amend the Unemployed Assistance Act is proposing in 1957, 20 years after the Rowell-Sirois commission was set up, to go just 50 per cent of the way along the road recommended by that commission.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the government should seriously consider what the situation may be a few months' time. I am in receipt almost every day of letters from my own and neighbouring constituencies pointing out to me the very serious and increasingly bad unemployment situation in British Columbia. I am not in a position to know whether it is worse there than it is in other parts of the country, but I do know it is extremely bad and I can very well foresee that if we do reach unemployment figures such as have been suggested by research officials of various bodies in the country, the province of British Columbia is going to find it as impossible to carry this load as was formerly the case 20 years ago, namely in 1937.

If on the other hand unemployment figures show no rise and begin to decline and they remain within manageable proportions, then I would suggest to the government that the payment of 100 per cent as proposed by the Rowell-Sirois commission would not be a crushing burden on the federal government. If, however, they do rise to that figure then this government is going to have to do it and they are going to have to completely re-cast their whole fiscal policy in order to be able to do it.

Of even more importance is the fact that if they are going to have to do the sort of thing the hon. member for Essex East was challenging them to do just now, that is to put into practical effect the rather ambiguous suggestions made when they were in opposition, then there will be even more necessity for a complete re-casting of the fiscal policy of the federal government. I say this because, as was said earlier today, we are facing a very difficult financial problem with regard to another social need and it is perfectly obvious that if that social need is to be looked after the fiscal policies of this government are going to have to be changed.

I therefore suggest to the government that it should take the bull by the horns now and go on the assumption that before very many months are out it is going to have to assume 100 per cent of the cost of assistance to employable unemployed, and I urge it to make the necessary arrangements now and make the necessary plans for fulfilling that task which is going to be laid on their shoulders, I think, within the next six months. I can think of no better authority for making that suggestion than the highly responsible commission of 20 years ago which, in circumstances not very different from those which lie before us today, made that as their first recommendation with regard to social services and the division of the cost of such social services between the two levels of government. I would hope that the government would not rest content merely with this rather pointless and not very effective amendment to an existing and inadequate piece of legislation brought in by my friends of the Liberal administration which preceded the present Conservative government.

Mr. McLeod: I would like to get in a few words in order to state our policies and our views with respect to this resolution. So far as we are concerned, we understand that in this resolution of a very few and concise words we are asked to consider an important matter and I can quite well appreciate the fact that there is room to open up the whole unemployment problem. I do not think, however, that this is the time or the place for such a debate.

It seems to me from the two speakers we have just heard that there has been no commitment as to whether or not they are in favour of this legislation. We know, just as well as they do, that it is not a cure-all for the serious problems facing this government but we do believe it is legislation which is necessary and, in accord with our policy ever since this session opened, we assess each resolution or each piece of legislation which is presented to us on its merits. We then plan our action accordingly and it is therefore our position in respect to this legislation that it is timely and it should be welcomed by this house.

Now having said that, of course, I am not admitting that we have no serious unemployment problem but, in face of the rising numbers of unemployment and in face of the financial problems and burdens which this is placing on the various provinces, I do believe it is necessary that we should take very prompt action to rid the provinces of all that portion of the burden which can possibly be taken off their shoulders at this time.

We are well aware that unemployment should be strictly a federal problem, because unemployment in large measure—especially at the present time—is due to the financial policies not only of this government but of the past government. We are therefore fully conscious that this legislation is not perfect; it is not placing the full responsibility where it should be placed, but even on the understanding that it is a step in the right direction and that it is going to take some of the burden off the provinces, where it should not at any time be placed, I say we welcome it and we are going to support it. We will do our best to speed it through the house and will do nothing to delay its passing.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to approach this resolution from a somewhat different angle than that discussed by the three hon. members who have preceded me. If I rise at this time to take part in the discussion it is not so much to deal with the unemployment situation, as has been dealt with so ably by my colleague the hon. member for Essex East, as to deal with another aspect of the subject.

It seems to me that while on the face of it the resolution seems innocent enough, nonetheless it is subject to interpretation which in my opinion makes it perhaps complex and confusing. I thought the Prime Minister stated in his letter of October 31 when he invited the provincial premiers to the dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa that at that time there would be taken up the question of financial arrangements and fiscal accords with the provinces; such was not the case.

In his speech at the conference the Prime Minister devoted but one paragraph—and that paragraph was vague enough—to the subject of fiscal arrangements. In his letter he had suggested that other aspects of the dominion-provincial relations could be considered, but only incidentally. In his speech it was these special subjects which were brought to the attention of the premiers, notably the hospitalization plan, the unemployment assistance which is now before the house by way of resolution, and assistance to the Atlantic provinces.

It seems to me that the resolution which we have before us must be considered in its historical aspect, its historical perspective, to understand its nature and its implications.

It seems necessary to me, Mr. Chairman, to view this measure in its historical perspective in order to understand its nature and implications.

Traditionally, the whole field of assistance to the unemployed was considered to be a provincial responsibility. In 1941, when it was felt that a national unemployment insurance scheme, to be financed mainly through direct taxes, had become necessary in Canada the constitution was amended so as to give to the federal government complete authority in this matter. The amendment, however, applied only to the restricted sector of unemployment insurance and did not affect the constitutional responsibilities of the provinces with respect to assistance to the unemployed.

Up until recently, those responsibilities were left largely to the municipalities, which did their best, within their own limited financial ability, to meet the most evident cases of hardship and indigence through various schemes of public assistance.

Since the federal-provincial conferences of 1945 and 1946 it has become customary to make a distinction between employable and unemployable unemployed, and in recent years the federal government has offered to participate with the provinces in the cost of assistance to employable unemployed not receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

However, the previous federal government was of the view that assistance to unemployable unemployed was, and should remain, a responsibility of the provinces and the municipalities, because the nature and the forms of such assistance depended very largely on local conditions and customs.

While it was relatively easy to make a distinction in principle between employable and unemployable unemployed, it was found that it was quite impossible to apply this distinction in practice and to define clearly these two categories in legislative terms. That is why in the present legislation a statistical device was used to maintain that distinction and to assert provincial responsibility in the field of public assistance to needy people not really belonging to the labour market.

The provincial statistics of public assistance cases showed that even during recent periods of intense prosperity and acute labour shortages, there was always a certain small proportion of the Canadian population which was unemployed, although of working age, so that it could safely be assumed that these unemployed people were, in fact, unemployable.

In discussions with provincial governments it was found that Ontario had the lowest proportion of such people and it was decided to accept its figures as a national basis to define the category of unemployable unemployed. This explains why the present legislation does not provide for federal participation in the assistance of unemployed people if the number of such people not receiving unemployment insurance benefits or mothers' allowances exceeds 0.45 per cent of the Canadian population.

In proposing to drop this threshold the present federal government is, therefore, asserting that it has a responsibility equal to that of the provinces in the field of assistance to unemployable unemployed or, more precisely, in the field of general public assistance which up to now had been considered, for good and sound reasons, as belonging exclusively to the provinces and the municipalities.

With the measure now before the committee, Mr. Chairman, the present government is thus invading one of the last sectors of social assistance which had been left, mainly, in certain provinces, to private charitable organizations and which is determined so largely by local conditions and customs. I merely want to point out, at this stage, that such a measure is quite inconsistent with the definite undertaking made by the Conservative party during the last electoral campaign to decentralize government responsibilities in our country. The provision embodied in the present resolution is a definite and important step in the direction of centralization, since the federal government assumes a new financial responsibility clearly belonging to the provinces, in the field of public assistance.

I should like also to recall briefly the amazing position taken by the Quebec government in this respect. It is reported—and I am sure that the minister will be able to confirm these reports—that when the federal government made the proposal included in this resolution at the last federal-provincial conference this modification of the federal legislation did not appear to the Quebec premier to go far enough. In fact, the attitude taken by Mr. Duplessis was that the whole field of unemployment assistance as defined in the legislation belonged exclusively to the federal government, which should assume complete financial responsibility and, therefore, also administrative responsibility. I must confess that I am really surprised to see the Quebec government taking such an attitude, because it is evident that unemployment assistance, as defined in the federal legislation, covers the whole field of public assistance, with the exception of mothers' allowances.

It is the first time, to my knowledge that the Quebec premier criticized a measure favouring centralization by saying that it does not go far enough in that direction. Moreover, I am sure that most members in this house would be strongly opposed to the federal government taking over complete financial and administrative responsibility for unemployment assistance, as the scope of such assistance is usually defined. It would be most inappropriate and undesirable for the federal government to assume such responsibility.

There must be some confusion and misunderstanding somewhere. This is, Mr. Chairman, a very important matter, indeed, and we on this side of the house need some clarification on this issue. We want to know what is the position of the federal government in this respect. More precisely, we want to know from the minister what is his reaction to the contention of the premier of Quebec that the field of unemployment assistance, as presently defined, is an exclusive federal responsibility.

I see, Mr. Chairman, that it is ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the leader of the house if he will tell us the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, we will begin with item No. 1 on the day's order paper, house in committee on a bill dealing with branch lines of the Canadian National Railways; then item No. 2, an act respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners; item No. 3, an act to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act; afterwards we will take item No. 17 which has just been under discussion, the resolution preceding an amendment to the Unemployment Assistance Act; item No. 7, second reading of an act to amend the Pension Act; followed by item No. 5, second reading of an act to provide for annual vacations with pay. The house would then consider the estimates of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the leader of the house if he is able to indicate at this time—it is now Wednesday, and there are three days left—what the business is likely to be for the remaining days of the session.

Mr. Green: I think that on Friday we will be taking item No. 9, second reading of an act to provide for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities. I am not yet able to say what the business will be on Saturday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FRENCH T.V. STATION, MONCTON, N.B.

Question No. 200—Mr. Michaud:

Is the government giving active consideration to the recommendation of the Fowler commission respecting the establishment of a French language television station at Moncton, New Brunswick?

Answer by: Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

Regarding the possible establishment of a French language television station at Moncton the commission said only that "a study of the matter should be made at an early date". Under existing licensing policies an application could be made for a privately owned French language television station at Moncton to which the C.B.C. would supply national program service in French. The possibility of a C.B.C. owned station could be studied after consideration by parliament on matters of the financing and structure of the broadcasting system arising from the report of the Fowler commission.

INTERNATIONAL SERVICE, C.B.C.—PROGRAM SCHEDULES

Question No. 271—Mr. Barbes:

1. Did the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation publish a program schedule for December, 1957, January, 1958?
2. If so, how many copies were distributed in Canada?
3. What was the full cost of this program schedule?

Answer by: Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises:

1. Yes.
2. 1,481 in Canada; 186,500 to listeners outside Canada.
3. $3,792.73.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 19, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COLOMBO PLAN—STATEMENT ON ALLOCATION OF CANADIAN FUNDS

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with your permission and the permission of the house I should like, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, to make a short report to the house regarding some recent decisions under our Canadian Colombo plan program in India, Pakistan and Ceylon, and to table a more detailed statement on these matters.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke in the recent external affairs debate he undertook to provide the house with a report on the allocation of Canadian funds to particular projects in the countries to which we are giving assistance as decisions are made on these matters. Since he did not have time before his departure for the NATO conference in Paris to inform the house that approval had been given for Canadian aid to a number of projects in the Colombo plan area and for aid in a variety of forms, and since he will not return in time to do so before the Christmas adjournment, I wish to take this opportunity to do so on his behalf.

The document to be tabled gives in adequate detail a description of all these projects and I propose to do little more orally than to list them. However, I should emphasize that these programs will be financed by funds already voted by parliament or provided for in the main estimates of the Department of External Affairs for the current year, with the one exception of the Indian program. For India these projects, together with the shipment of $7 million worth of wheat, will take up not only the funds now available, but in addition $5 million of the sums which parliament will be asked to vote for the Colombo plan next year. The authority which has now been given for a number of projects and forms of aid will enable purchasing to go forward over the next six to eight months. By making these decisions now subject of course to parliament voting the necessary funds, we are ensuring that Canadian aid will flow as quickly as possible during the next half year. In this fashion we are endeavouring to speed up the flow of available aid to India.

I should also mention, before listing the projects, that the great bulk of these goods and materials and the engineering services associated with them will be provided from Canadian sources.

With regard to the program in India, Canada proposes to make available a further $2 million to continue work on the Canada-India reactor; $5 million for the erection of transmission lines as part of the Kundah hydroelectric development near Madras; $3 million for treated wooden railway ties; $120,000 for three cobalt beam cancer therapy units; $65,000 for audio-visual equipment and educational material, and $10.8 million for the supply of industrial metals urgently required by India's metal working industry.

With regard to the program in Pakistan, Canada will provide $1 million for the construction of a transmission line for the Ganges-Kobadak project and $1.6 million for the doubling of the circuit on the Dacca-Chittagong electric transmission line.

With regard to our Colombo plan program in Ceylon, hon. members will recall that of the $2 million available for Ceylon $1 million is being supplied in the form of flour which, when sold, will create counterpart funds for use on a number of projects which will be reported to the house in due course. As far as the other $1 million is concerned, Canada will make available a further $200,000 for the construction of additional transmission lines for the river valley development scheme in eastern Ceylon; $12,500 for remedial equipment for the rehabilitation centre at the University of Ceylon; $640,000 for the continuation of the aerial survey; $14,000 for additional agricultural pest control units; $17,500 for a stand-by radio unit for Colombo airport; $3,000 for X-ray maintenance equipment; $100,000 for further equipment for a technical institute, and $13,000 for a crane for Colombo harbour.

With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to table the detailed statement with regard to these individual projects.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the minister's suggestion that these be printed in Hansard?

Mr. Fulton: If hon. members wish, yes.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Is the house unanimously agreed to have this statement which has been tabled printed in Hansard?

[For text of statement referred to above, see appendix, pages 2642-44.]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESTRICTING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT TO CERTAIN OFFENCES

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 239, to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that no person shall, except where the offence is treason, levying of war or piracy with violence, be sentenced in Canada to suffer death, but shall suffer life imprisonment. I shall be happy on second reading to give the facts and the reasoning in support of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AGRICULTURE

PRICE STABILIZATION LEGISLATION—REPORTED CHANGE IN BILL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if the statement is correct which appears in the press this morning, to the effect that the bill having to do with support prices is to be materially changed before second reading. If that is the case, will the bill be distributed in the new form as soon as possible? If it is to be carried over, as the article suggests, until after the Christmas vacation, will it be possible to have distribution of the bill, if it is to be changed, before we leave for the vacation?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the right hon. gentleman knows that any announcements with regard to government decisions or policies will be made in the house in due course, and not as a consequence of either confirming or denying speculative reports in newspapers.

Mr. Marler: That has not been our experience.

An hon. Member: What about television?

Mr. Speaker: The question is rather like questions which were asked yesterday and which I have been disallowing. However, the right hon. gentleman asked for information about the time the matter might be brought forward, and I thought perhaps the house leader might have something to say on that matter. If there is no change, I think to be consistent that questions with respect to this bill ought to be reserved until the matter comes before the house, in accordance with the previous ruling.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a supplementary question of the house leader. Last night he indicated that the bill might come before the house tomorrow. Is it the intention of the government to bring the bill before the house tomorrow?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct to the Minister of Agriculture a question arising out of a press report in this morning's Gazette under the heading "P.C.'s Set Revision for Bill". My question to the minister is this. In view of the fact that the only suggested change in this press report is the silly idea that the moving average would be changed to a 10-year period, can the minister inform the house whether the government continues to disregard the principle of parity prices in this legislation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I think this question is of the same order as the others. It relates to this particular bill, and I must rule it out of order.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a supplementary question before you leave this matter, Mr. Speaker. Will it be possible to distribute the bill in its final form as far as the government is concerned before it is brought up for second reading?

Mr. Harkness: The bill has been distributed, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister notified any of the major farm organizations of his intention to change the base for price supports under Bill No. 237?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Zaplitny: If so, what farm organizations have been notified and what response did the minister receive?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Zaplitny: My question is perfectly in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that questions in connection with this matter have already been ruled out of order, I do not propose to answer further.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST THAT BOXING DAY BE MADE ADDITIONAL HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was last Monday that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the Secretary of State whether or not civil servants would have a holiday on Boxing day. I notice this morning that the Secretary of State is beaming with the spirit of Christmas. I was wondering whether she has any statement to make about the policy of the government in that respect.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that it was so noticeable. The answer I gave the other day to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre still stands. Probably I had better explain that I was asked about six weeks ago to make an announcement with reference to the two half days before Christmas and New Year's in order to give those civil servants who desired to travel over the holiday an opportunity to arrange transportation. It seems to me that it would be unfair to them to make any last minute changes in the holidays which are to be given this Christmas.

I recognize that the observance of Boxing day has increased. As a matter of fact it is an observance that has grown up in Canada over just a relatively few years, although it has long been a recognized holiday in the United Kingdom. I can assure my hon. friend that the matter is under active consideration, and before another holiday season comes around we hope we will have a satisfactory solution to the problem.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask a supplementary question of the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that in Winnipeg Boxing day is a holiday recognized everywhere, is it possible that civil servants in Winnipeg will be given Boxing day as a holiday?

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think, Mr. Speaker, we could differentiate between domiciles.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PAYMENT OF OVERTIME TO SESSIONAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I am not quite certain whether this question should be addressed to the Secretary of State; but with regard to the sessional staff, I understand they were told that when the house sat on Saturdays they would be paid for Saturdays because theirs is only a five-day week. I understand that now, however, they have been told they will not be paid for work on Saturdays. Would the minister explain that situation?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, may I inform the hon. gentleman that that is a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker, but I am sure I can speak for him and say that he will take it under consideration.

[Later:]

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—ARRANGEMENTS FOR TRANSPORTATION OF MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know a number of hon. members are obtaining T.C.A. reservations to go home. In order to facilitate them in picking up their tickets, arrangements have been made with T.C.A. to have a representative on duty in room 574 from one o'clock to three o'clock today and from nine o'clock until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning. I repeat that the room number is 574, and the times are from one o'clock to three o'clock this afternoon and from nine o'clock until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Can the minister inform the house if the Parliamentary Guide will be distributed before the holiday season?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this is not within the jurisdiction of my department, but I shall be glad to make inquiries about it.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIONS FROM CANADIAN FORESTRY WORKERS EMPLOYED IN UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Bellechasse): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister tell the house under what authority the Department of National Revenue collects income tax at the source from forestry workers working in the United States of America, although the same workers are not entitled to unemployment insurance?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think I had better take a look at that question before I give an answer.

BRIDGES

OTTAWA—INQUIRY AS TO CONSENT OF PREMIER OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I address a question to the Minister of Public Works. On December 17, at page 2468 of Hansard, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska concerning a bridge between New Brunswick and Quebec, the minister answered:

—the hon. member has been a very persistent advocate of action—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Caron: This is the question; you want to go too fast. If we need persistence to get bridges would the minister assure me that if I were persistent enough with respect to a bridge between Ontario and Quebec, east of the present Alexandra bridge, he would do his best to get the consent of the premier of Quebec?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): May I point out to the hon. member that "if" questions are not in order.

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE BY ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question. If he is not able to answer this morning he can take it as notice and give me an answer tomorrow. Have the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan made application for assistance in the construction of a bridge across the North Saskatchewan river north of Lloydminster, one end of which would be in Saskatchewan and the other end in Alberta? Has the government been urged by the two provinces to assist in constructing that bridge under the usual practice followed when three governments are involved?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such request having been made.

Mr. Coldwell: Is there a request on file from any member of the previous government?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is one of the things the previous government did not do.

Mr. Gardiner: I can answer my hon. friend. There was a request from me.

[Mr. Laflamme.]

BLIND PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO ABOLITION OF MEANS TEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): May I address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the government considered the request of the companions' club of the blind for an allowance free of the means test for blind Canadians? If so, can the minister report anything encouraging in response to the requests?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have not actually, to my knowledge, received such a request from the institute for the blind although I understand I am going to do so. However, as I say, as yet I have received no such request.

HOUSING

QUEBEC-ONTARIO—PROPORTIONS OF LOANS GRANTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leopold Demers (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Solicitor General. On December 11 of this year, the newspaper La Presse was supplied by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with certain statistics on housing construction in Canada. They include the following:

Area	Loans	Amount
Quebec	2,092	$24,000,507
Ontario	5,944	79,306,439

I would therefore ask the hon. Solicitor General, as a minister representing the province of Quebec, to use his utmost influence in seeing that a more equitable distribution is ensured to all provinces, especially to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of my hon. friend, let me say that I shall do so with great pleasure, which will be easy in any case since the present government is only too happy to take an interest in problems which concern the province of Quebec.

(Text):

PUBLIC WORKS

BONAVISTA, NFLD.—CONSTRUCTION OF BAIT DEPOT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may ask the Minister of Fisheries if he still hopes to get construction of the bait depot at Bonavista started with a view to providing winter employment.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, plans are being pressed forward to get the construction of the bait depot at Bonavista under way as soon as that is practicable. I am not in a position to state at the moment if we will succeed in doing that during this winter season, but if not we will have it under way as soon as weather permits.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—REQUEST FOR EARLY REPORT ON OIL AND GAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

In view of the statement in this morning's edition of the Globe and Mail by Mr. Henry Borden that the royal commission on energy does not intend to produce an interim report on oil and gas export policy, would the government, recognizing the serious problems of the petroleum industry, request the commission to give immediate consideration to the problems of this industry with a view to avoiding lengthy delay in establishing a development policy?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government will be very glad to look into the suggestion made by the hon. member.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—REQUEST FOR RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. When the government is in touch with the Borden commission along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Calgary South, will the government ask the commission to include in any early report it may make its recommendations concerning the ownership and control of the trans-Canada natural gas pipe line, and also its recommendations concerning the regulation of prices to be charged, for example by the board of transport commissioners?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will be very glad to take those suggestions into consideration also.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO WINTER PROGRAM FOR B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Douglas Jung (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is the minister able to announce at this time any plans to put men to work this winter on outdoor activities which will be of help to the province of British Columbia?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Minister of Labour the provision of winter employment on projects that could be undertaken by or through the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has been under careful study. The department regularly provides substantial winter work through its operations in the national parks, in northern Canada and in various other fields.

Within the funds that have been made available by parliament, steps have already been taken to carry out additional winter work over and above normal level. Examples of these steps are at Cape Breton Highlands park, Terra Nova park and Prince Edward Island park, where a total of about 200 jobs have already been made available or will be available within a few days.

However, plans have been under way for projects on a much greater scale, providing additional funds are voted by parliament. It is the intention to bring in additional estimates, and if these are voted before January 15 work will be started within a few days thereafter on a series of jobs throughout the national park system, including Wood Buffalo park which is astride the Alberta-Northwest Territories boundary.

These works will include cutting and clearing projects on highways and trails, forest sanitation cutting, preliminary work on camp and picnic ground development, the construction of bungalow camps, and a stepped-up program of building and equipment repair. The work will provide employment from January 15 throughout the winter for some 1,500 persons on the basis of a 44-hour week. Additional work under this same general plan will provide a further 200 jobs on the Mackenzie highway. Between now and January 15 all necessary arrangements will be made so the work can start immediately after that date.

Of these jobs some 600 will be in the western parks, some 400 in the maritimes, and the remainder in the prairie provinces and in the southern part of the Northwest Territories. I will be in close consultation with my colleague the Minister of Labour to ensure that these jobs are filled by persons coming from areas with high rates of unemployment. Most of the work is of an outdoor nature and should, for example, provide substantial assistance in finding jobs for unemployed forest workers in British Columbia. I estimate that this program will provide about 1,000 jobs for the area of the hon. member. I should emphasize that all these projects are of a most useful nature and would have to be undertaken at some time in the next year or two in any event. We are not creating work; we are stepping up our planned program.

I should also mention that further studies are being made at the present time which I am hopeful will result in the provision in the immediate future of an even greater number of jobs than those I have outlined above. As soon as possible I will be glad to make a further announcement as to what we have been able to do.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if any plans have been made for the work for Point Pelee national park to take care of some of the unemployment in the Windsor area?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PEACE RIVER AREA—RAILWAY LINE, GRIMSHAW-PINE POINT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Is the minister prepared to make a report on the survey I understand was undertaken to provide a railway line from Grimshaw north to Pine Point? That was a project which I think was considered as one which might give employment to a considerable number of the stricken farmers in the Peace river area. Could the minister say if progress has been made on that survey?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the department which I happen to head has divided its efforts along this line into two parts. In the first instance there are short-term projects such as those I mentioned this morning, and then there are long-term projects. The railway project to which my hon. friend has referred is not one that could be carried out in one season or in one winter.

As for the survey, it was conducted by the two railways, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and naturally enough we in the department are very hopeful that when the reports come in to us in formal form we can do everything possible to encourage the construction of this very necessary project so vital to the opening up of the north at the very earliest moment.

Mr. Low: Just one other supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What I was thinking of more particularly was the possibility of sending out brushing crews during this winter, which would give employment to many of the farmers in that area who are stricken.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes. I am quite aware of what the hon. member is asking, Mr. Speaker, but the decision to go out and cut and clear a right of way must be based on an acceptance of the final route of the railway, and the final decision as to whether it will start from Grimshaw or Waterways or the other alternatives has not been made.

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Are we to infer from the answer given just a moment ago by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources that the government will bring down further supplementary estimates early in the new year for all the various departments?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be necessary to go that far. I am not in a position to say, of course, exactly what supplementary estimates would be brought down, but it is obvious that some will be required.

Mr. Marler: May I take it that it would be early in January?

Mr. Green: Just as quickly as possible, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question with reference to possible supplementary estimates, Mr. Speaker, and I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the support expressed from all over the house last Monday for doing something to bring up the lower pensions of retired civil servants, will the government consider bringing down a supplementary estimate to achieve this purpose so that when we vote interim supply such a move could be brought into effect without delay?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I think there are a couple of fishhooks in that question.

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will take a look at my question which he did not want to answer today and give an answer tomorrow? I can assure him there were no fishhooks in it. It is a very serious question.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the fishhooks will still be there tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister answer it tomorrow?

TRANSPORT

PORTUGAL COVE-BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE TO FERRY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if consideration is being given by his department at the present time to assistance for the ferry from Portugal Cove to Bell island, Newfoundland.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that question has been under consideration for some time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it under active consideration at the present time?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

WESLEYVILLE—PROPOSED NEW POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works about something else the previous government did not do. If he is going to bring in any supplementary estimates, will he consider including the Wesleyville post office?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has a guilty conscience about that post office.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST—STATEMENT ON BOUNTY OR FLOOR PRICE ON DOGFISH

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on December 5 and 6 the hon. members for Comox-Alberni and Burnaby-Richmond asked questions regarding dogfish on the Pacific coast. These questions arose out of a letter addressed to me by the united fishermen and allied workers' union.

I may say this is not a new problem. Dogfish, a species of small shark, have been a nuisance to fishermen and a predator on food fish for many years on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. In some years there appears to be a greater concentration of these predators than in others.

In 1956 parliament approved a plan to encourage the catching of dogfish on the Pacific coast and their manufacture into meal for animal feed. An amount of $300,000 was voted to give a bounty of $10 per ton on 30,000 tons. Actually only 220 tons of dogfish were caught. The fishermen and the processors could not get together on price and other arrangements.

There is obviously not much point in renewing an offer of this kind. If, however, the fishermen's union along with the operators of the fish reduction plants and the processors of dogfish liver oil would get together and present a jointly agreed proposal which has a reasonable chance of successfully eliminating or reducing the numbers of this predator, the government will be prepared to consider such a proposal carefully.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I wish to ask a supplementary question. Has the minister or the government considered redrafting the original proposal in such a way as to ensure, through government action, that the proposed bounty would go directly to the fishermen? If that were done, would it not remove the necessity of a joint arrangement to which the minister has referred?

Mr. MacLean: Yes, the department and I have considered the situation carefully, but I must admit that so far we have been unable to come up with any suggestion which would seem to be workable.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

TRANSPORT—LAND EXPROPRIATIONS, CORNWALL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I bring to the attention of the Secretary of State an order for return which was passed by the house on November 18 concerning certain expropriations of land. I am most anxious to get the information before the year is out. Would the Secretary of State be good enough to hasten the reply?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): I shall be very happy to do what I can.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPPING

UNION STEAMSHIP LINES, B.C.—SUBVENTION PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I gave him verbal notice yesterday of my intention to ask it. Has a decision been reached regarding the payment of a subsidy to Union Steamships, having in mind the unnecessarily high subsidy of $562,000 paid to this line? If so, what is the decision?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me yesterday of his intention to ask this question. The situation concerning subsidized services on the west coast has been under study for some time as the result of complaints by unsubsidized operators who are operating in competition with the subsidized services. To continue the existing services involving two passenger-cargo vessels would have involved unjustifiably large expenditures of public funds, since the subsidized operator requested a substantial increase in subsidy as a condition of continuation. This was particularly undesirable at a time when both passenger and cargo offerings on the British Columbia coast have diminished considerably.

It was not possible to reach agreement with Union Steamships for service in the area involving the use of one vessel only. At the present moment alternative methods of providing reduced services to certain essential points at less cost are being explored and we expect a solution at an early date. In the meantime Union Steamships company is continuing to operate the existing services until January 2. When these other arrangements are finalized I will make a more detailed statement in the house.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I understood the Minister of Transport to intimate that Union Steamships would continue certain services until January 2 next. What steps is the government taking to ensure that communities now being served by Union Steamships are not going to be completely stranded without any steamer service at all?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I think I indicated in my answer to the hon. member for New Westminster that at present we are negotiating with other operators on the west coast to see that that does not happen.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSTRUCTION AND PURCHASE OF BRANCH LINES IN MANITOBA

The house in committee on Bill No. 196, respecting the construction of a line of railway by Canadian National Railway Company from Optic lake to Chisel lake, and the purchase by Canadian National Railway Company from the International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited, of a line of railway from Sipiwesk to a point on Burntwood river near Mystery lake, all in the province of Manitoba —Mr. Hees—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

On clause 1—Construction of line of railway.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, this bill has been thoroughly examined by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I believe all questions which hon. members asked in committee were answered by those who appeared as witnesses. I very much hope this bill can go through the committee stage.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I could ask the minister a question which I did not have the opportunity of asking in the committee. What is government policy with reference to these lines? I have reference now to developmental lines and to lines that are being built by Canadian National Railways. The former government had laid down a policy which was explained in this house from time to time, and I wonder whether, briefly, the minister could not tell us what is the policy of the government with reference to developmental lines, and with regard to lines that are to be built for the government by Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any change in governmental outlook on the building of railway lines. The present government believes that transportation facilities usually have to precede development in various parts of the country. Where it appears that the building of a line will materially assist in the development of certain areas, and that it is a good economic risk, then the government is inclined to endorse the construction of the railway line.

So far as the two branch lines with which we are dealing now are concerned, they have both been thoroughly examined by the management of Canadian National Railways and are believed to be good economic risks. On that basis the government approved the building of the lines.

Mr. Chevrier: I was not questioning the soundness of the economic position of the lines. I think that was clearly taken care of in the committee. What I was trying to inquire from the minister was the financial aspect of these lines. Is it the policy of the government to pay a portion of the cost itself and ask the government owned company to contribute a portion? I am not referring to this line particularly, but I am referring to government policy as a whole.

Mr. Hees: I think I would rather wait until a specific proposal is put forward by a particular area of the country. For instance, at the moment a submission has gone forward to the management of Canadian National Railways concerning a proposal to build a railway line in the Gaspe peninsula. This proposal is being thoroughly studied by the research and development department of Canadian National Railways, and I expect the government will receive a report on the economic aspects of such a line in due course. When we receive that report we will give it very thorough consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister if this particular proposal to which he refers is one which is being investigated by Canadian National Railways or by the Department of Transport?

Mr. Hees: It is being investigated by Canadian National Railways. A delegation from the Gaspe peninsula came to see the Prime Minister and myself some two weeks ago and presented a brief. I have sent that brief along to the management of Canadian National Railways with a request that it be examined and a report on it sent to me as soon as it has been possible to make a thorough study of the proposal.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry; did the minister say he had the report? I could not hear.

Mr. Hees: No, I requested that a report be forwarded to me as soon as it is ready. I believe this project has been brought up by the people of Gaspe from time to time in the past. I do not believe any conclusion was reached by the previous government.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, it was studied as recently as last May, I am informed.

Mr. Hees: When a report is received by me from the management of Canadian National Railways concerning this particular project I will be in a better position to know whether or not it is economically justifiable. I do not believe there is any more I can say at the present time. All I can say is that whenever an area brings forward a proposal I can assure the house that it will be thoroughly examined by my department and by the Canadian National Railways, if Canadian National is requested to build a line, and an intensive study will be made of the project.

Mr. Marler: I should like to ask the minister one question. Earlier today during questions on orders of the day with regard to a proposed line from Grimshaw to Pine Point or from some other place such as Waterways to Pine Point, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources seemed to indicate that the matter was under study by his department. I was just wondering if the Minister of Transport did not seem to be abdicating the responsibilities which seemed to belong to his department in connection with that project. I should like to know if it is not his own department that has the subject of a railway line to Pine Point under consideration, rather than the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman, the present minister is not abdicating anything. The department of northern affairs is very interested in this case, just as the Department of Transport is. At the moment the study is being undertaken jointly, as I believe the hon. member knows, by Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways. As soon as a report is forthcoming I will examine it with just as keen interest as the minister of northern affairs. I have not abdicated any of my interest in railway matters in this country.

Mr. Zaplitny: Before this clause is carried I wonder if the minister could say what assurance the railway company has from the International Nickel Company as to the tonnage of freight that will be moving over this line over a period of years. I would assume that there is some assurance, perhaps in the form of a contract in writing with the railway company, that a certain minimum tonnage will be moving over this line.

Mr. Hees: The guarantee which has been given to Canadian National Railways by the International Nickel Company relates to the gross tolls which will be received by the railway company during the first 10 years of operation of the line. In what I said when the bill was first introduced I think I outlined the details of that guarantee. If the hon. member wishes me to deal further with the matter I shall be glad to do so. However, the railway company and the government feel that the guarantee which has been given by the International Nickel Company is a very satisfactory one indeed.

Hamilton Harbour Commissioners

On clause 4—Purchase of line of railway.

Mr. Marler: I should like to take this opportunity of correcting the record with regard to this project. Hon. members will recall that under clause 4 the railway company is authorized to purchase a branch line constructed by the International Nickel Company of Canada Limited for a price of $5,400,000. During the debate on second reading or at the resolution stage of this bill I pointed out that there had been an increase in the cost of this branch line since the time the matter was first considered by me when I was minister of transport.

I should just like to put on record the fact that during the study of this bill in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines the difference between the amount which had originally been mentioned to me, which was $4,500,000, and the present figure of $5,400,000 was quite satisfactorily explained by Dr. Solandt, who is vice president in charge of research and development for the Canadian National Railway Company.

For the information of this committee I should merely like to say that after the matter was approved by the previous government there was a small increase in the cost of the project, and that the difference between that price, which I think was $4,685,000, and the amount of $5,400,000 which has been specified in the bill is explained by the usual allowance of 15 per cent which it is customary to make in these railway projects. I should like to correct any impression there might be that there had been something wrong in the change from $4,500,000 to $5,400,000.

LEGISLATION TO AUTHORIZE LOANS FOR ADDITIONAL FACILITIES

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 197, respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Hees: As in the case of the railway branch line bill, this bill was also thoroughly considered by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I believe all the questions were thoroughly considered and answered by the witnesses who came before the committee.

During the examination of the bill in that committee the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount made a suggestion as to the change of a word in clause 5. I told him that I would take it under consideration. I have discussed the matter with the law officers of the crown and they find no objection to the change being made. I am very glad to be able to tell the hon. member that when clause 5 is reached I will ask my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare to move the appropriate amendment.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can reiterate what I said in the committee, namely that we on this side of the house are in support of this bill. I particularly went perhaps a little further than I would go under normal circumstances, in saying that I felt the facilities that were being provided by this bill were required because of the enhancement of traffic that would follow upon the construction of the seaway.

However, I want here to bring to the attention of the minister a suggestion I made in another debate, and to which I cannot refer without repeating it. I shall therefore repeat it as briefly as possible. It is this. The question is raised here, as it will be again from time to time, about facilities for ports and harbours all along the route of the seaway from, say, Seven Islands up to the head of the lakes. I wonder whether the minister has given any consideration to the suggestion I made about an economic survey. On another occasion I suggested the carrying out by his department of an economic survey to ascertain what the effects of the seaway would be on the various regions of Canada, the ports and harbours along the seaway route, and finally with particular reference to the great metropolitan areas of Montreal and the Toronto-Hamilton area.

It seems to me that for the consideration of this bill and others which I am sure will come up for consideration from time to time, some attention must be given to planning, because it is evident that with iron ore moving upbound and grain and coal moving downbound, there is quite likely to be a new type of vessel in operation. To what extent the new traffic, together with the traffic which already exists and other specialized traffic, will be directed toward one port rather than another are questions to which I am sure the minister will want to give consideration. I am therefore wondering whether he has had an opportunity of discussing with his officers the suggestion which I made earlier and which I now repeat.

Hamilton Harbour Commissioners

Mr. Hees: Some few days ago the hon. member for Laurier made what I considered to be a very helpful and constructive speech in the house. In it he made several constructive suggestions to me, and I wish to assure him that I have taken them very seriously. I am having each one studied by the officials of my department. I expect very shortly to be able to give him a report as to the feasibility of carrying out the suggestions he has made.

I feel that the suggestion with regard to an economic survey is a good one; there is no question about that. It is just a question as to how it could best be done, and that is being examined at the present time.

Mr. Marler: I would like to make one or two comments with regard to this bill. In essence the bill is to provide the financing for a project which contemplates substantial and useful enlargements to Hamilton harbour. I think we are all fully impressed with the importance of Hamilton harbour and with the volume of traffic it is now handling.

When we discussed the project on second reading it developed that the total cost is likely to be about $8 million, of which $4 million is to be advanced by the government under this bill as a loan to the Hamilton harbour commissioners, and the other $4 million is to be provided by the Department of Public Works. I take it that in due course we shall have the opportunity of dealing with the estimates which will be brought forward for that purpose, but I would like to draw to the attention of the minister particularly that this is quite a significant departure from past practices in the sense that I think, broadly speaking, it has not been the practice of previous governments to defray even in part the expenditures which are made by these autonomous harbour commissioners. It might therefore create a precedent which other harbour commissioners will expect to have followed in their own cases.

For example, in the case of some of the harbours coming under the national harbours board the full cost of those improvements is, in effect, assessed against the local harbour in the accounts of the national harbours board. If one builds a large wharf for Montreal, for example, at a cost of $4 million, that $4 million forms part of the investment of the national harbours board in the Montreal harbour and no part is paid by the taxpayers at large. It forms part of the accounts of the national harbours board, and the interest and amortization of the cost is taken care of through the revenues from that particular harbour in the accounts of the board.

In this particular case what is really happening is that approximately half the cost will be furnished, interest free, by the federal government to this harbour commission. During the course of the discussion of the bill in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines this subject was touched on very briefly; to this extent, that I asked Mr. Harstone, who was the chairman of the commission, what would be the additional revenues which would accrue to the commission from the construction of the proposed facilities. He said in round figures they had estimated it would be approximately $230,000. That was the additional revenue that would be received from the three projects which would be financed under this bill.

That seems to suggest rather clearly that the harbour would not be capable of bearing the interest cost of the whole investment of $8 million, because even if one calculates principal and interest at an annual rate of 5 per cent on $8 million, one sees that the annual charge would be at least $400,000, and consequently the revenues which would be available to the commission from these projects, at least, would not be sufficient to make them self-sustaining.

But I would like to say to the minister that I realize that is not the issue in this bill. The issue in the bill is whether or not $4 million is to be loaned to the commission, and there is no doubt from the evidence placed before the committee that the commission would be able to service the principal and interest on this $4 million.

I fully expect that when the Minister of Public Works brings before the house his estimates with regard to the balance of the cost, he will then be in a position to supply us with a more detailed statement of the economics of the situation than we had in the committee, and I am sure hon. members will appreciate that we were under some disability in that connection in that we could hardly make that an issue in the discussion of a loan project.

However, when it comes to voting the government contribution to this project I fully expect the Minister of Public Works, who is always most anxious to provide the fullest information on everything under the sun, will bring with him information as to the economics of this particular project so we may see how fully it has been justifiable to depart from the ordinary process, or perhaps I should say the ordinary procedure, of allowing the autonomous harbour commissioners to finance their own improvements.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might save myself a little time on the public works estimates—

Mr. Marler: That may be.

Mr. Green: —if I said a word about this at the present time. The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount, I am afraid, is not aware of the policy which had been adopted by his own government. I understood him to say that all these harbour commissions were supposed to be able to finance their own projects. That is not the case at all; in fact although in some cases they have financed some of their projects, even in the case of the Toronto harbour commission the Department of Public Works stepped in and spent very large sums of money—

Mr. Marler: On dredging.

Mr. Green: No, money has been spent in other ways as well, and in our opinion it would be most unfair to the city of Hamilton if the policy being urged by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount were to be followed. Mind you, the policy with regard to Hamilton harbour was enunciated by my hon. friend's colleague, Hon. Robert Winters, in 1956.

We have an economic studies branch of the Department of Public Works, and before any legislation was brought forward they had made a very careful study of this whole Hamilton harbour situation in co-operation with the officials from the Department of Transport. Incidentally, the two departments work very closely together on many projects and I think that in this case there were also other governmental departments. As a result of that study it was found that the payment of charges on one-half the investment required for these works in Hamilton harbour would be about as much as the commissioners could undertake at this time.

Here is the basis for government policy as represented by this bill. There is no such thing as a uniform policy in all the harbour commissions. Each harbour must be dealt with on the merits of that particular harbour. There are, as the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount knows, several other harbour commissions, and the Department of Public Works has built almost all the public facilities in Winnipeg-St. Boniface, Port Alberni, North Fraser, Belleville—

An hon. Member: New Westminster.

An hon. Member: No, not New Westminster.

Mr. Green: —and Windsor.

There will be developments in other harbours as a result of the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway which will have to be paid for at least in part by the Department of Public Works. Take for example Fort William-Port Arthur. I wrote a letter to the mayors of these two cities just a few days ago outlining the results of the surveys made, again by the economic studies branch of the Departments of Public Works and Transport. We have also investigated Sault Ste. Marie and the need for harbour developments there as a result of the opening of the seaway. That report is not yet available. Today our investigation team is down in the city of Windsor investigating the need for developments at Windsor.

These activities are all being carried out with great dispatch in an attempt to meet the needs in these different centres, and I suggest to the hon. member that this proposal that the Department of Public Works should pay half the cost and the harbour commissions pay the other half is a very reasonable plan.

As a matter of fact, before this policy was adopted the Department of Public Works had been paying everything. Now the department is only having to find one half, so to adopt the policy urged by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount and make the harbour commission pay all the cost would be very detrimental to the city of Hamilton and to the area served by that great city.

The hon. member made some statements on December 3 about this question which were not accurate. For example, he said:

> I can, however, recall no instance in which the government has used public funds, obviously through the budget of the Department of Public Works, and either alone or jointly with any harbour commission undertaken the construction of facilities which by their very nature are revenue producing.

The fact is that in practice the Department of Public Works has at its own expense constructed most of the public facilities in the commission harbours. Hence the present proposal does not represent a precedent other than in the question of sharing, as against full responsibilty by the Department of Public Works.

Then the hon. member said, again on December 3:

> It never occurred to me that the Department of Public Works had any responsibility to provide the facilities in the harbours where a harbour commission had been established.

The answer, as I have already mentioned, is that in practice the Department of Public Works has in the past provided nearly all such facilities. The hon. member said further:

> The New Westminster harbour commission borrowed moneys from the federal government to cover its new ocean terminal, but there was no question of the federal government sharing half the cost.

Well, this certainly represented a precedent at the time, and represents a move in the direction of more responsibility for harbour works on the part of the local harbour commissions.

Mr. Marler: When they were self-liquidating.

Mr. Green: It remains to be seen whether many of these projects will be self-liquidating. I hope they will be, but that is by no means certain. Then the hon. member said on the same day:

> I think a new terminal was put up at not inconsiderable expense by the Toronto harbour commission. In that particular case, it obtained its own funds without government help and the government did nothing towards contributing to the costs of those facilities which were entirely paid for by the commission itself, as I said.

Mr. Chairman, this new terminal represents a building on a wharf, the headwalls of which were constructed at the cost of the federal government. Again the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount said:

> I think there must be some reason for departing from a policy which had been followed uniformly with all the harbour commissions across Canada.

To which the answer is that it has not been practical to have a uniform practice regarding harbour commissions because of the different financial and other conditions which govern their activities. Then the hon. member said:

> The government is making a gift of approximately half the cost of these facilities to a body which, I think we should all agree, is probably fully capable of meeting its own responsibilities and standing on its own feet.

He was referring to the proposed development at Hamilton. I point out in this connection that it must be borne in mind that hitherto the Department of Public Works has borne the full cost of all public structures in Hamilton harbour and nearly all elsewhere. Hence the present proposal is a move in the direction of the commissioners accepting more responsibility for their own harbours. Regarding the capacity of the Hamilton harbour commissioners to cover the full cost of the facilities, it must be kept in mind that the investigation made by the aforementioned officials of the three departments included a visit on site, and indicated that the payment of charges on one-half the investment would be about as much as the commissioners could undertake at this time.

I repeat that we are of the opinion that the policy being followed by the government with regard to the projects in Hamilton harbour is a fair policy, and we are confirmed in that opinion by the fact that it was also the policy of my predecessor.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister of Public Works, perhaps unwittingly, has sought to give the impression that I was opposed to the making of these changes in Hamilton harbour. The point I tried to make during the course of the discussions on this bill is really twofold. First there was the question of the loan aspect, as to which I think my remarks would bear no misinterpretation. We thought the loan was fully secured, and that there would be no difficulty experienced by the harbour commission in meeting the payments of principal and interest.

With regard to the remaining part of the cost, the $4 million being borne by the department, what the minister is now saying is, "We have looked at this and we find that the harbour commission is unable itself, to bear this full cost of $4 million". So, in effect, what the minister is doing is to confirm the general principle I have been trying to enunciate, namely that where the works are self-supporting it is reasonable that the harbour commission should bear the cost.

The minister has said, and Mr. Harstone in his evidence before the committee confirmed it, that the amount of income which would be derived from the construction of these facilities would not be sufficient to defray the whole cost of the improvements.

Consequently one is faced with the choice of either not building the improvements or of the dominion government financing them.

I am not quarrelling with the dominion government financing the additional $4 million after the statement has been made in committee and again by the Minister of Public Works that the board is not capable of doing so itself. My own feeling has been that in the case of the autonomous harbour commissions, where they have adequate revenues either in being or in prospect to finance improvements to their harbours the dominion government ought not to make expenditures in the form, if you like, of gifts to the harbour commissions. If the harbour commission is capable of repaying the principal and interest of the additional investment it should be called upon to do so.

In this particular case, as the Minister of Public Works has pointed out, Hamilton is not capable. I am not excusing the minister from giving us perhaps more detailed information when we come to his estimates, but I am not quarrelling at the moment with the principle of the federal government doing it after the study which the minister has referred to of the economics of the situation.

Mr. Green: That study was completed before this plan was brought forward. In what I quoted a few moments ago I could not place my hand on the list of other departments which participated, but I find that the third department participating was the Department of Finance; and as I think the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount well knows, anything that the spending departments can get past the Department of Finance has to be pretty good.

Mr. Hees: We will all vote for that.

Mr. Marler: I think that is something on which we can all agree very fully, but I would point out that of course the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport in considering this particular improvement were in the fortunate position of having this economic study in their possession. It was not made available to the committee, and I think the ministers would agree that all we have had from it so far are the headlines. However, I realize that that is not a pertinent part of this bill, and I am not going to try to protract the discussion by needling the minister to give us something more than the headlines of this study.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, I was rather surprised when I heard the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount say this was a change of policy, because I happen to know from correspondence I have seen in connection with the Hamilton harbour project that the former minister of public works and the former minister of finance had agreed to this plan. Surely the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount, who at that time was minister of transport, should have known that.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my approval of this bill. I would be a lot happier if there were full assurance that it was definitely a self-liquidating project, but I think if any project in the country has a chance of being self-liquidating this project has, because these dock facilities will serve a highly industrialized section of the country. I refer, of course, to the group of cities and towns just north of Hamilton including Kitchener, Waterloo, Guelph, Hespeler, Preston, Galt and Brantford. These are all extremely active and highly industrialized centres. This will serve as their seaport on the new St. Lawrence seaway, and I therefore express my approval of this loan.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the fact that the Minister of Public Works spoke about the lakehead situation gives me an opportunity to ask some questions and draw some comparisons, but before I do so I would like to congratulate both the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Public Works for their action in getting things under way at the lakehead. I think it is a magnificent step and one on which they should be highly complimented. I know the feeling at the lakehead in regard to the steps that have been taken is very good.

However, there are some comparisons and contrasts between the Hamilton situation and the lakehead situation. As the ministers well know, we have complexities at the lakehead which are different from the situation that obtains at Hamilton. First of all, we have pressure from the west and particularly from the Manitoba government. I believe there is no provincial government pushing in the Hamilton situation. Second, we have the two railroads involved right in the centre of this situation, because they already have facilities at the lakehead which could come in conflict, and furthermore they are tied up with the lakehead shipping interests which at the present time feel that the provision of deep-sea facilities will redound to the advantage of foreign shipping interests rather than Canadian interests. The trucking associations are of course applying very strong pressure in the situation at the lakehead. I understand this was also a factor at Hamilton, where the truckers wanted better facilities.

Finally, of course, we have in the lakehead situation something of which the ministers have become aware and that is the inter-city rivalry which has a history stretching back to the 1860's, and which is still bitter at the present time.

The Minister of Public Works said there is no over-all policy in this regard; you have national harbours, you have a situation where there are harbour commissions, and you have the present lakehead situation where you have neither of these contingencies. At the same time there has been in the past a great deal of expenditure by the federal government for dredging and to a certain extent for rock work. Would this not be a splendid opportunity for either of the ministers to present their analysis of the lakehead harbour situation and relate it to what has developed at Hamilton? I think this is the perfect time for a statement in this forum in relation to the lakehead matter. If the ministers cannot do it now I would look forward to their giving such a statement in the future, because there are comparisons and contrasts between the two situations.

Mr. Green: We will be very glad to deal with this question when our estimates are under consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the Minister of Public Works leaves I should like to express the appreciation we all feel over here for his tribute to Mr. Harris which he made a few moments ago, when he said it was very difficult to get expenditures past the Department of Finance.

Mr. Green: Oh, I was referring to the hon. member for Eglinton, the present Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the minister made it quite clear by a slip of the tongue that he thought it was a continuing policy. What I rose to say is that since the Minister of Public Works has deliberately extended the scope of this debate I hope he will not forget that we are very concerned about the early development of the harbour at St. John's, Newfoundland.

Mr. Houck: Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. When the tolls and charges and other sources of revenue are set by the Hamilton harbour commission, do they have to be approved by the board of transport commissioners before they become final?

Mr. Hees: Well, my understanding is that they do. I am afraid I am not very much of an expert on that as yet, but I think they do.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Chairman, I am happy to take this opportunity of expressing our appreciation to the Minister of Public Works for having sent an investigating team to Windsor to look over the situation with respect to the Windsor harbour commission formed by the previous government; and to say, too, that I think the commissioners who have been appointed by the present government to the Windsor harbour commission are most satisfactory and I am sure will do a most commendable job.

In my constituency there are about seven miles of waterfront on the Detroit river which is reputed to be the busiest inland waterway in the world, and there are great possibilities there for development of seaway projects. I understand that the investigation will probably reveal that bulk storage facilities will be required in that area. In the counties of Kent and Essex about 85 per cent of all Canadian corn is produced, as well as a large percentage of the total Canadian soy bean production. I am not sure of the exact percentage in relation to soy beans but I think it is around 80 per cent. This, coupled with the large acreage of wheat and other grains, means that we will require bulk storage facilities. I am hoping that if the commission makes a recommendation to the government for the erection of bulk storage facilities to handle these products, favourable consideration will be given by this government to making such provision.

Mr. Hees: May I correct an answer I gave the hon. member for Niagara Falls. I am advised that I was wrong in saying there is approval by the transport board of the rates that the Hamilton harbour commissioners may set. They establish their own rates, subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Laurier that we should have an economic survey along the St. Lawrence and great lakes system. I may say I had this particularly in mind the other day when I asked the Minister of Transport about having such a survey made before the imposition of tolls on the seaway. I said I had in mind the fact that the tolls set should have no discriminatory effect against Canada or any industry in Canada. I think the minister said at that time that the tolls committee was giving the matter of tolls very intensive investigation.

It strikes me that an economic committee set up to study the effect tolls might have on the Canadian economy would approach the matter from a different viewpoint than a tolls committee. Hamilton, for instance, is totally within the toll area and I think may be at some disadvantage compared with Cleveland and Buffalo. It is possible for steel plants in Cleveland and Buffalo to get their iron ore and practically all their raw materials without having to transport them through the toll area at all, while in the case of Hamilton raw materials such as iron ore, coal, etc. would all have to go through the toll area.

Vessel Construction Assistance

CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEDUCTIONS, REASSESSMENTS, DEPOSITS, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 72, to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act—Mr. Hees—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

On clause 1—Deduction in respect of capital cost of vessels for purposes of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, as in the case of the other two bills that have come before the committee this morning this bill was also examined by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. As it is a very technical bill dealing to a large extent with income tax law I very much hope that most of the questions of hon. members were asked and answered in that committee. I hope hon. members will be as considerate with me in the case of this bill as with the last two, because I appreciate very much their co-operation in passing those bills so rapidly.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I had a number of very complicated questions with reference to income tax but I will not ask them of the minister. I just have one or two questions I am sure he can answer. I wonder whether he can give us the number of vessels that have benefited under the act and the value of such assistance?

Mr. Hees: I have not the figure offhand. I think that was answered in the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I will not insist. The minister can give it to me later.

Mr. Hees: I will certainly give it to the hon. member at a later date.

Mr. Chevrier: What I am particularly interested in is the number of ships, the division of the ships, so far as yards are concerned, across Canada, and the amount of financial assistance that was derived under the present act.

Mr. Hees: I certainly will be glad to get that information in detail for the hon. member.

Mr. Marler: I should like to ask the minister one question in connection with clause 1 of the bill, I think it is. We had an opportunity to discuss the matter during the committee hearings, and I think the minister was going to give it some further consideration. As the bill is now drafted the benefits of the act can accrue only to the first operator of the vessel, as I understand it. It was suggested during the course of the discussion in the committee that perhaps the benefits should not be so restricted but that they might follow the vessel into the hands of a second purchaser.

I fully realized at the time the issue was brought up in the committee that perhaps it would depend on the circumstances. If, for example, there was a change of ownership of the vessel in the first year of its life it might not be unreasonable that the benefit should accrue to the purchaser for the remaining period in which this special depreciation might be written off.

On the other hand, I realize that if this were to take place many years after the vessel had been built we would in effect perhaps be encouraging the use of second-hand vessels rather than the construction of new vessels. I believe the minister was going to give that point some consideration. If he has done so since the committee sat I would be very much interested in hearing what his conclusions are.

Mr. Hees: I have taken up the matter in some detail and discussed it very thoroughly with the chairman of the maritime commission. He is very strongly of the opinion, and I think I agree with him, that the main purpose of the legislation is to encourage the purchase of new ships from Canadian shipyards. Although there might be something to be said for the suggestion that a prospective purchaser might be more inclined to purchase a new ship if he thought these income tax advantages would remain with the ship and be passed along to a subsequent buyer if he decided to sell the ship after the first year or two when there would still be considerable value to be depreciated, and that this might to some extent incline him to buy the ship from a Canadian yard, there does not seem to be very much evidence to that effect.

I agree that there is certainly something to be said for the hon. member's argument, but having discussed the matter thoroughly with the chairman of the maritime commission I have decided on his advice to leave the bill as it is.

Mr. Marler: I am sure the minister realizes that my remarks were in no sense expressed by way of criticism, because those who were members of the last house will recall that the Liberal government introduced this measure in the earlier part of the session early this year. There have been only very minor changes in the bill since then.

I think the important thing to remember, Mr. Chairman, is that the act is intended to stimulate construction in Canadian shipyards. There is no doubt at all that since the act was adopted originally it has had the effect of encouraging people to build in Canadian yards. However, there were income tax difficulties that arose which are covered by the very complex language contained in one of the later sections of this bill.

It is a fact, though, that the measure has had a beneficial effect on shipbuilding in Canada. As a good many members know, the fact that Canadian yards have been able to give more rapid deliveries of new ships than some of the continental yards, the yards in the United Kingdom, has given a further impetus to shipbuilding in Canada. At all events, Mr. Chairman, I think this is a useful measure and I am glad the government has continued this element of Liberal policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to take advantage, Mr. Chairman, of the interpretation of the rules we heard so often from the Minister of Public Works when he was on this side of the house and say a word on clause 1. I agree with my colleague the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount that this is a very good bill indeed. I do hope, however, that this does not represent all the government is going to do for shipping and the shipbuilding industry.

As a vessel owner myself, and as a representative of a province the more populous part of which is an island, I should like to point out that, in the last few years, there has been a steady decrease in the number of vessels engaged in the local carrying trade along the coast of Newfoundland. While that makes it much easier for a vessel owner like myself to get cargoes readily because there are more cargoes than vessels—I am speaking against my own interests in saying this—I am sure all of us in Newfoundland would welcome anything the government could do to contribute to the amelioration of that situation.

I am not going to trespass further on the time of the house with a speech which I regard, though the Minister of Public Works would not, as being completely out of order.

Mr. Fisher: I want to point out one thing to the minister, not that it will affect this bill, but we have a shipyard at the lakehead. It has not had much work recently. This yard happens to be owned by the same shipbuilding firm that owns all the yards on the Canadian side of the great lakes. In other words, in a sense there is a monopoly by one company so far as ship construction is concerned on the Canadian side of the great lakes and the St. Lawrence.

This bill is undoubtedly going to help the parent company, but it does not appear that it is going to help the Port Arthur shipyard to any extent at all, except as production from the busier yards of this company bumps off down the line to Port Arthur. In other words, since we happen to have the highest cost yard in the whole chain we are going to be the last to get any advantage from the bill. I should tell the minister that even that much is appreciated.

I should like to remind the minister of a suggestion I made in the committee and which the civil servant being questioned thought would be very difficult to implement, that is finding some way of equalizing the position of the Port Arthur shipyard with those of the other yards concerned. I hope he will keep that in mind when consideration is given to this measure in the future, or when consideration is given to the shipbuilding industry.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO REMOVE THRESHOLD PROVISION FROM AGREEMENTS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 18, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Monteith—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Assistance Act so as to remove the threshold provision from the agreements that have been concluded or that may be entered into hereafter; and to make certain changes for the better administration of the act through the deletion of a number of obsolete provisions.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to say at the outset, Mr. Chairman, that I shall certainly vote for the bill to be based upon this resolution because in the province of Newfoundland, where we certainly have more than the national average of unemployment at the present time and where the system of public assistance for the unemployed is perhaps better than it is in any other part of Canada, this bill will provide a welcome measure of financial assistance to the provincial treasury. It is a welcome measure, and a very badly needed measure. I would have no choice, therefore, as the representative of a constituency in that province, but to support it.

I do think, sir, having said that, there are some criticisms that can properly be made of this particular method of procedure in order to meet the problem. I want to emphasize that this proposed bill will do nothing whatever by itself to help the unemployed. It has only one purpose, and that is to make a contribution from the federal treasury to the treasuries of the provinces or municipalities.

Mr. Monteith: What other purpose could the bill have?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not suggesting that it has. I am simply pointing out that is the only purpose it does have. I am pointing that out because it is on that premise I want to found the rest of what I have to say about this measure.

It is rather surprising, as the hon. member for Laurier pointed out last evening, that at a conference which was called for the purpose of discussing general fiscal relations between the federal and provincial governments, at a conference about which before it was held it was very difficult for those of us on this side of the house to find out whether any other subjects could be discussed at all, that the only kind of concrete proposal put forward by the federal government was a proposal to do something about a measure that, so far as I have been able to discover, no provincial government has made any specific request in public to have anything done about.

I find it very difficult to reconcile this course of action on the part of the federal government with the so-called new attitude toward the provinces about which the Prime Minister spoke at the opening of the federal-provincial conference on November 25. I am quoting from the official record of the conference and from the Prime Minister's opening observations which, as one would expect in the circumstances, were televised. This is what the Prime Minister said:

> In welcoming you, too, I would point out that you will have noted by this time there is some change in the faces of the occupants of the portfolios of the government of Canada that has taken place in recent months, and I hope, too, that we shall also show a change in philosophy and in outlook to some of the problems facing our country.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, by the Prime Minister, by other members of the government and by their supporters in this house that the present government had made a great change from the previous government in its attitude toward the provincial governments. It has been charged over and over again that we adopted a take it or leave it attitude and that the present government was going to change all that, that it was going to listen to the provinces; and the implication was that it was going to do what the provinces wanted it to do.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that was a proper description of the attitude of the preceding government. I call to witness—and I think I should put this on the record—one whom I think it would be extremely hard for hon. gentlemen opposite to disavow. I propose to put on the record what Mr. Frost, the premier of Ontario, said about previous conferences under the previous government and the way in which they were conducted. What he said does not support or bear out in any way the kind of criticism that has been made of the attitude of the previous government toward the provincial governments. Mr. Frost was speaking about the present Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. friend the hon. member for Quebec East, and he said:

> Now at this moment in history, because it is a moment of history, when he is no longer chairman of this conference and when he is retiring from his leadership of his party, I would like to express my admiration for him which has been well known and which I have stated here on many other occasions. Of course, like the prime minister of Quebec—

I say "premier".

> —I have disagreed with him in regard to matters of policy but I have never disagreed with him as a personality and as a great Canadian.

This is Mr. Frost whom I am quoting.

> As I say I would like today to again express my appreciation for his ability as chairman over several conferences and meetings and my thanks for his infinite patience which he has invariably shown, for his unfailing courtesy which I think sprang from Mr. St. Laurent himself and from the fact that he was, centrally, a Canadian gentleman and came from that great race one of the attributes of which is courtesy and understanding.

I think it is useful to have on the record this opinion from one who has never been a supporter of my right hon. friend, about the way in which our government conducted its relations with the provinces. To those of us who attended, as I did, at all but a few minutes of the open sessions of the federal-provincial conference—and I make no apology for referring to it as the federal-provincial conference—in November, it was perfectly clear that all the premiers there really came desiring—and that was what they said publicly—to have the central issue discussed; and the central issue, of course, was the apportionment between the federal government and the provincial governments of the tax revenues from the three principal direct taxes which have been the subject of these various discussions between the federal and provincial governments ever since 1945.

When they got there they found that the federal government had no proposals to make, had not even any suggestions to make, had not even any hints as to how this fiscal matter would be dealt with, and that despite repeated attempts by the premiers of Manitoba and Saskatchewan to get from the federal government an admission that the principle of equalization would continue to be applied in any additional apportionment of these taxes, no such commitment could be secured from the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Monteith: What has that to do with unemployment assistance?

Mr. Pickersgill: Hon. gentlemen opposite will soon find out if they have the patience to listen.

Mr. Monteith: It will take a great deal of patience.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): How about the rules of the house?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be very happy to deal with that point. Unlike the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, I do not pose as an expert on the rules. However, it has always been my understanding that the sole reason for having this stage of proceedings, this resolution stage preceding a money bill, is that we should be allowed to discuss whether it is appropriate to have a bill about this particular subject or whether it is appropriate to use that amount of money in some other way. It is precisely to that point that I am addressing myself at the moment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In what other way would you use it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am coming to that matter if the hon. gentleman, the minister without portfolio, who must find it very hard to do so, will possess his soul in patience a little longer.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned for the luncheon interval I was being interrupted by hon. gentlemen opposite who wanted to know what was the relationship between what I was saying and the proposed measure. As I said, the only thing this proposed measure does is that it puts a certain amount, or it will put a certain amount, of additional money collected from the taxpayers of Canada into the treasuries of the provinces and the municipalities of this country.

As I said at the outset I am of the opinion, speaking as a representative of a province which very badly needs this money, that I have no choice but to support the measure. But I would point out, as I was also saying, that I am supporting it without enthusiasm, because it is such an inadequate substitute for what the members of this house and the people of Canada generally were led to expect they would get from this government in its relations with the provincial governments before June 10, and even after.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): They are getting more than that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, there is no evidence whatsoever of that. There is nothing on the order paper that has been brought to the attention of this house which would indicate that there is anything else to expect. I know the hon. gentlemen opposite prefer to announce their policies elsewhere than in this house, but until such policies are announced in this house it is very hard for us in our deliberations to take them very seriously.

The federal-provincial conference, as I shall continue to call it, was convoked for the purpose of discussing general fiscal relations between the federal and provincial governments; at least that is what the premiers were told. The country expected many serious things to come of this conference, but instead at the opening we had the Prime Minister making this statement about the matter which is now before the committee, and I shall quote from the official record of the conference for Monday, November 25, at page C-3:

> That brings me to a question that has been discussed on a number of occasions—the request of some provinces for the removal of the so-called "threshold" of .45 per cent under the Unemployment Assistance Act. Its removal would have the result that the dominion treasury would share the costs of all eligible cases upon the relief rolls—whether employable or unemployable—and not just the numbers in excess of .45 per cent of the provincial population. We should then be avoiding entirely this invidious distinction between employable and unemployable persons and sharing the costs of providing aid to all those in need, apart from the normal statutory responsibilities of the provinces in respect of mothers' allowances.
> I am told that a change of this nature would make it much easier for some suitable arrangements to be made to assist their municipalities which have been carrying most of this burden of assistance to those in need, apart of course from the bulk of the cost being carried by unemployment insurance. The benefits of removing this "threshold" would be fairly equitably divided among all the provinces that would be participating in agreements under this act, and we see no serious obstacle to meeting your wishes in this regard.

I find this a very very puzzling statement. As I say, there is nothing I have been able to find in the records anywhere to suggest that any provincial governments were seriously concerned about the removal of this threshold, and I think I might perhaps remind you, sir, and the members of this committee that this threshold was there precisely to avoid the invidious distinction to which the Prime Minister refers, between the employable and unemployable person.

For no other reason was it put there. It was put there on the assumption, and a quite sensible assumption it was too, that the .45 per cent of the provincial population represented an average of the cases of public charity and assistance to the normally unemployable who have always been regarded, ever since confederation, as a provincial responsibility. The federal government has never taken any responsibility for that group, and it was in order to preserve that constitutional distinction without creating any hardship to individuals that my right hon. friend devised, recommended and persuaded this parliament to enact the present legislation.

I therefore suggest, sir, that my hon. friend the member for Laurier was perfectly right last night when he said that in removing this threshold all the government is doing is making an invasion of provincial rights and taking a very big step toward centralization, against which they have preached—I was going to say so hypocritically, but I suppose that would be unparliamentary—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would my hon. friend allow a question? Would he say that the introduction of old age pensions and pensions for the blind and disabled was an invasion of provincial rights?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, because originally old age pensions were simply a sharing arrangement between the federal and provincial governments, and before the field of old age security was taken over by this government a constitutional amendment was made. Once that amendment was made there could be no question of any invasion of provincial rights.

I do not say this is an action which necessarily should be condemned, that is assistance to the provinces with respect to some of these obligations. I do not say that at all, but I do say it is contrary to the professions of hon. gentlemen opposite when they sat over here. That is all the hon. member for Laurier said last night and that is all I am saying now.

I have one or two other things I would like to say about this proposed measure. In the first place, I would ask the minister when he speaks again if he would tell us whether this proposed measure meets the objections voiced by the premier of Manitoba at the conference. So far as I have been able to find from the published record, the premier of Manitoba was the only premier who had suggestions to make about this matter and I presume that following the attitude, the new attitude of listening which the present government claims to have adopted, all Mr. Campbell's objections will have been met in this legislation.

An hon. Member: Are you referring to the outgoing premier of Manitoba?

Mr. Pickersgill: Or if Mr. Campbell's objections have not been met, is this a straight take it or leave it proposition? I would like the minister to give us an answer to that when he speaks again.

Mr. Chevrier: It looks like it.

Mr. Pickersgill: But what I am most particularly anxious to say is that this proposed measure, at best, is a very poor second best. It is a tiny nibble at a problem which hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were campaigning for votes, said would be their first concern when they got into office. I am not going to take the red book and take the time of the house to read all his statements, although I would be glad to point out such statements to the hon. gentlemen if they wish, but the Prime Minister said over and over again that the first thing he was going to do was call a conference to bring about a new deal with the provinces in order to give them a larger share of the revenues from these large tax fields.

All we get after six months is this pitiful little measure, the benefits of which the Prime Minister says will be distributed fairly equitably across Canada. I wonder. The two most populous provinces have not made agreements; they do not benefit at all under this bill, and there are two other provinces which do not have agreements. I think the minister ought to tell us before we proceed further with this matter whether all the provinces have now agreed—

Mr. Monteith: I will tell you the exact situation on second reading.

Mr. Pickersgill: I assume the minister will take his usual attitude that we are not entitled to any information at all.

Mr. Monteith: I said I would tell you.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister does not seem to realize that a minister of the crown is a member of the government. Every time we ask him a question about policy he says, "This is a matter of government policy, and I do not dare to tell you about it". We are getting a little tired of this one-man government here in the house. We would like to see some of the ministers over there possessing enough courage and initiative to take a little responsibility on their shoulders as members of the government.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We are getting a little tired of this speech, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman does not like the speech. I am not awfully surprised, because the hon. gentleman is, I think, rather fonder of the sound of his own voice than that of others.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is one thing in which I may resemble the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I should like to get on with my speech. I think that would be more productive than any exchange with the hon. member for Carleton, amusing though it might be for him.

I want to say one or two things about what was said last night by the hon. member for Nanaimo, because he did deal with a very serious problem and one which all of us in this house are going to have to face as a result of the increasing unemployment we are bound to have during the next few months; that is, the whole question of responsibility for unemployment assistance. In saying something about this I should like to correct the impression—not to correct the facts, because I think the hon. gentleman's facts were perfectly correct—but to correct the impression he gave in the course of the recital of certain facts last evening.

The first thing the hon. gentleman said to which I take some exception was that in 1937, at the time the Rowell-Sirois commission was appointed, the provinces enjoyed revenues from personal income and corporation taxes. That seemed to imply that they do not have them now. That is not true at all. The fact is that the revenue which the provinces derive from these tax fields is manifestly greater today than it was in 1937, and a very large part of this revenue comes in the form of equalization payments, the purpose of which is to put the provinces and the provincial treasuries in a position to discharge their responsibility for themselves; and it seems to me that this principle of equalization which has been imported into our federal-provincial relations since 1945 does change the whole picture in respect to this matter.

I am not saying for one moment that this necessarily means there may not be situations arise in which parliament should assume full responsibility for unemployment assistance. I do not think, however, that any government with any sense of responsibility would undertake the financial burden of unemployment assistance in full unless it also undertook the administration. I should be very surprised if any government, even a government as reckless as the one we have at the present time, would undertake such a course of action. That, of course, would involve a very much greater degree of centralization than we in this party have been willing to embark upon.

I consider that though this measure will certainly be welcomed, I imagine, by every provincial treasurer whose government has made an agreement with the federal government, it would have been much more welcome to most of them if the government had gone ahead with what it promised to do before the election and produced the new fiscal deal which it promised.

Mr. Monteith: It will.

Mr. Pickersgill: If it had done so the provinces would already be in a position to do something on their own, not merely to pay unemployment assistance but also to get on with a good many useful and badly needed works—and I can certainly speak about the province of Newfoundland—which would have the effect of diminishing the amount of unemployment.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, we have to go back some considerable time in our history before we reach a period similar to that through which our country is passing today. I think my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo yesterday gave a very clear illustration of the situation when Canada was faced with problems similar to those which confront us now. He made reference to the setting up of the Rowell-Sirois commission which dealt particularly with this question of unemployment, the subject matter of the present bill. As I understand the report of that commission, it was suggested that responsibility for the unemployed of this country should be divided in the following manner, namely that the provinces should accept full responsibility for the unemployable—people physically unable to work—while the federal government should accept responsibility for unemployed employables.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder what is the use of going to the expense of setting up these royal commissions to devote great care to the study of these questions when the recommendations which are finally made are not acted upon. Two or three royal commissions have been set up this session by this government to consider various problems. If the recommendations of these commissions are not going to be acted upon any more than the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission, it would seem to me a waste of time and money to keep them sitting.

Let us consider this question of responsibility and the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission. The whole matter puts me in mind of the old story of the constitution of horse and rabbit stew in the armed forces canteen. Under this recipe one horse equalled one rabbit. Under the terms of the commission's recommendation the rabbit would be the responsibility of the province—the relatively small number unable to work. The horse—in this case a situation such as we are fast approaching, namely a terrific number of unemployed people—would be the responsibility of the federal government. But now, instead of each accepting his share, we find that the federal government is proposing to share the cost. In other words they will pay for half the rabbit, but they want the province to look after half their horse.

Moreover, I see that the division of responsibility in the old days of the depression was supposed to be on a 40-40-20 basis, the 20 per cent being paid by the municipalities, and I also note that under this new offer from the federal government to raise its proportion by 10 per cent, my own province of Ontario has decreased its contribution from 40 to 30 per cent.

That is the proposition. In other words it is a straight transfer of 10 per cent from the Ontario government to the federal government. That certainly is not going to aid the municipalities. I think we have had it amply demonstrated to us in the past that the municipalities are completely and physically unable to cope with the situation of unemployment. The municipal governments do not have the sources of revenue in their taxation fields which would allow them to meet this situation in any way, shape or form.

Further than that, there is very little the municipalities can do to change the policies or lack of policies that cause these periods of unemployment from time to time. I believe that responsibility rests with the federal government, and in cases like this it should accept that responsibility. If it cannot ensure that we will not have these blights of unemployment every so often in our country, at least it should do something to lift the load from the provincial governments and certainly from the municipal governments.

I have here the latest figures for unemployment I could find, prepared as of November 14, 1957. This table gives the unemployment picture for Canada as a whole and breaks it down by provinces and even by regions. I have not found this too satisfactory, at least on the local basis. I do not know just in what region my constituency would fall according to the regional breakdown in this table. The closest area I can see geographically is the region of Sudbury, which is stated to have 2,736 unemployed at the present time.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

As president of the Timmins Cochrane and district labour council I have had occasion to see just what the situation is in my locality. Local 2995 of the lumber and sawmill workers union is the bargaining agent for the bush workers, log cutters and other similar workers in the northern area. Normally at this time it has between 7,000 and 8,000 dues paying members in the local. Last week the figure was down to 1,200, I believe. I don't know where the balance of these people totalling approximately 6,000 are listed on this table. Perhaps they are listed in some other locality according to this breakdown; either that or my region is not listed at all.

Certainly those 6,000 people in that area will be absolutely beyond the means of the municipality to help. I think the story is pretty much the same across the country. The municipal governments are in desperate straits trying to meet the present calls on their resources, and certainly are unable to meet any new situations such as the one confronting us at the present time.

There is another point I would like to raise at this time. The figures to which I referred represent a list of the unemployed in Canada. I presume it shows merely the total number of people who are unemployed, those who might be described as wage earners. I wonder if this table takes into account the members of their families. Do these figures account for just the head of the family, the wage earner? If we also take into consideration the number of dependants of each of these unemployed, then on the basis of these figures there would be in the neighbourhood of one and a half million who can expect to experience a pretty bleak Christmas this year.

We have seen at lot of activity in the country to the south of us and more recently in this country on the part of certain groups who are aggressively advocating what they term as right to work laws. Anyone familiar with the trade union movement realizes full well that these are not right to work laws at all. Rather they are the right to go through picket lines, the right to refuse to participate in union shops and closed shops; in other words the right to try to undermine all the union security that presently exists in this country. I believe in right to work laws, but I believe these words should be taken for just what they say. I believe that each of these 352,000 unemployed people—and I understand this figure has increased tremendously in the past month because, as I said, these are the figures for November, 1957—has a right to work.

Even if this bill is improved beyond its present terms it certainly is not going to be a solution to the unemployment problem. There is only one solution to unemployment and that is employment. I maintain that if half the effort, time and ingenuity that in the past have gone into this buck passing among the federal, provincial and municipal governments in trying to decide who is responsible for these unemployed people had been put into making jobs available for them, we certainly would not be faced with the unemployment problem that confronts us today.

I do not know how many hon. members have been in the position of some of these unemployed. I do not know if they realize just how demoralizing it can be to a man who is willing and able to work but who cannot find a job, when he sees his wife and family depending on him and through no fault of his own he is unable to provide a living for them. It is certainly an extremely demoralizing experience. There can be no doubt but that he would tend to lose faith not only in our way of life and the system under which we operate, but would also become highly fertile ground for the spread of the dread disease of communism. I believe it is in fields like this that communists can spread their propaganda in the world today.

In drawing my remarks to a close I would like to add one point. If this government feels it is helpless to meet this emergency any better than it has been met in the past with all the resources at its disposal in this nation, then how in the world can the government expect the municipalities and provinces and in the final analysis the wage earning head of the family with the limited resources at his disposal—his only resource being his ability to work, which is denied him when he is unemployed—to meet the situation?

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to take up the time of the committee in an attempt to hold up this measure because I think it is most desirable, but the unemployment situation in my constituency is such that I should like to call upon the government to give whatever assistance is possible. When I picked up my morning paper, the Windsor Daily Star, I noted that as of December 5, 1957, there were 14,052 people unemployed. I trust that the word "unemployed" is not unparliamentary. In some circles it is felt that it is a word which should not be used, but being an old-fashioned person I think we should describe a situation by the word that conveys the proper connotation and meaning.

As I said, there were 14,052 persons unemployed as of December 5. These for the most part are middle class people, hard working, conscientious, honest and industrious. They are just the average type of citizen one finds throughout the length and breadth of this country. Many of them are expert mechanics or craftsmen who were employed in the automobile factories and its feeder plants in the city. These people are not anxious to be in this situation; they are people who deplore the situation and are most anxious to help themselves as much as possible.

For that reason they are looking for assistance to provide an atmosphere wherein industry may thrive and business may be carried on successfully and profitably. They are asking for an atmosphere where there is some measure of security and assurance. We have many projects through which work could be provided. It is not to their liking to be accepting unemployment insurance, although it is theirs as of right; it is insurance they have bought and paid for. But it is not the natural state of man to be unemployed and inactive. For that reason these people are most anxious to be working, to be doing things and taking part in production and the building up of the country.

There are many projects which could be used properly by the government to advance the welfare of the country as a whole. I suggest the construction of highways. In my constituency we would also like to have a post office built at one place, and it has been in the planning stage for a considerable time. I note that recently the Minister of Public Works decided he would proceed with the project. Ever since the opening day of the session I have been pressing him to get along with it. Apparently it could not be done until just recently, but I understand he has now decided he can proceed with the work expeditiously. For this I congratulate him, and I hope he will make good his promise and see that the construction of this building is proceeded with promptly.

There are many other projects of a semi if not wholly national aspect. A sewage disposal plant is needed for sewage going into international waters. The municipality cannot hope to complete it because it involves an expenditure of at least $25 million to $30 million. If it is not proceeded with considerable hardship will be created for the people in that community. We are also building an auditorium and we would like some assistance there if it could be arranged. I realize that the building of an auditorium is not necessarily a national project, but there are precedents in regard to other projects throughout the country which are not of a national character.

I refer particularly to the policy of the government announced yesterday by the Minister of Justice, whereby assistance is to be given to the people of a particular mining community and the sum of $16,000 a month is to be expended from the federal treasury to help maintain them. Therefore I make a particular plea on behalf of the 14,000 people in my constituency who are unemployed at the present time. That number may be increased very shortly because of declining conditions, and I urge the government to follow the precedent they have set by providing assistance through work and the promotion and development of the assets of this country.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, this legislation will provide some additional funds for some of the provincial treasuries of the country and will be of at least a little assistance with regard to the unemployment situation. Therefore we shall support the legislation. I confess, however, that we do not intend to wax very eloquent about it, because no one can claim that it is a major piece of legislation.

I have taken the trouble to read through the debate on unemployment that took place in the house starting on March 2, 1955, on an amendment to the motion to go into supply moved by the present Secretary of State. I have also read the debate that took place in 1956 when the Unemployment Assistance Act was put on the statute books, and the things the Tories called for in those two debates by way of an attack on the problem of unemployment were a lot more than is suggested by the measure now being presented to the house.

I also want to agree with one or two things the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said. I will make it clear shortly that I disagree with some of his comments. I agree with him that this measure is a poor substitute for the improvement in federal provincial fiscal arrangements that we were led to believe would be undertaken early in the regime of the new Prime Minister. Some hon. members opposite complained when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate raised this question, but the fact is that we were led to believe that something would be done with regard to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, and so far only two or three little things like this have reached the light of day. We have to accept them as the moves the government is making in that direction, but this little move is a very poor substitute for real improvement in federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

It is also a poor substitute for an assurance from the government that the principle of equalization will be maintained in those arrangements. I come from one of two provinces, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, where the governments and the people are deeply concerned lest the direction in which federal-provincial fiscal arrangements seem to be going may mean the losing of that equalization principle to the detriment of the economic position of those two provinces. I confess that that is a larger subject of which this is only a small part, but on behalf of the people of those two provinces, indeed on behalf of the people of Canada as a whole, on behalf of national unity, I urge that the equalization principle be maintained in federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

This measure is not only a poor substitute for a larger measure of improvement in federal-provincial fiscal arrangements; it is also a poor substitute for what has been talked about for many years with regard to federal responsibility for the employable unemployed. When I say this has been talked about for many years, I want to make it clear it has been advocated in years gone by both by Liberals and by Conservatives. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate suggested that certain changes had taken place in the meantime, and I will come to those in a few moments.

First of all may I remind him, and Liberals generally, that the position of the Liberals for many years was that the responsibility for the employable unemployed should rest with the federal government. In that connection I was rather amazed last night to hear the hon. member for Laurier say this, as recorded at page 2572 of Hansard for December 18, 1957:

> Since the federal-provincial conferences of 1945 and 1946 it has been customary to make a distinction between employable and unemployable unemployed, and in recent years the federal government has offered to participate with the provinces in the cost of assistance to employable unemployed not receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

I emphasize that the hon. member said that the former government, during recent years, had been offering to participate with the provinces in these costs. May I remind him, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and other Liberals that in line with the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission the former Liberal government, at the federal-provincial conference of 1945, made it clear that it believed not just in participating with the provinces but in full federal responsibility for the employable unemployed.

I hold in my hand a copy of one of the green books prepared in connection with that conference. It is the one entitled "Proposals of the Government of Canada", and starting on page 42 there is a section under the heading "Unemployment Assistance". I read one or two sentences:

> The dominion government in its statement on employment and income, announced that the maintenance of a high level of employment and income was "a primary object of policy".

In other words the federal government admitted responsibility for something we claim is a federal responsibility, that is the level of employment itself. One of the reasons that the federal government, in our view, must not try to pass the responsibility for the maintenance of employable unemployed to the provinces is because it is primarily a federal responsibility as to whether or not our economic situation will be such that there will be a high level of employment. I submit that was implied in the position taken at the 1945 federal-provincial conference by the then federal government, and it is implied in the sentence I have just read.

I go farther down on the same page and there are these words:

> The dominion is therefore accompanying its proposal for general acceptance of responsibility—

That is responsibility for the employable unemployed.

> —with a concrete plan for its implementation in the field of assistance for employable unemployed persons.

Over on page 43, amongst other details that are spelled out, there is this paragraph:

> (d) The plan proposes acceptance of dominion responsibility for unemployed employables and provincial and local responsibility for unemployables, but it is recognized that this division presents problems of definition in some individual cases, and that in operating practice the only final test of employability is ability to get and hold a job.

It is quite true that later in the story the former prime minister sought to deal with the problem as to how you draw the line between employable and unemployable by this .45 per cent formula, but even the devising of that formula did not detract from the position taken by the Liberals in 1945 that the responsibility for the employable unemployed rests with the federal government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I am quite sure he wants to be completely fair about this. Is it not true that this offer to assume responsibility for assistance to the employable unemployed was part of a package deal, and was never offered in any other way? This was turned down by certain of the provinces, and as a result the tax rental payments, as they were then called, were substantially increased because it had not been possible to get agreement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is correct that the proposals made in 1945 were part of a package deal, and because that conference blew up we did not get the package. Across the years we have managed to get out of this and former governments some of the elements that were in that package such as improvements in old age pensions; the beginning of a health grants program; the beginning of a hospital insurance program, and so on.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says we have a different situation in that we now have equalization payments. I submit that that is essentially a part of the financial aspect of the package of 1945, and that the change the hon. member says has taken place does not change the basic fact which the Liberals accepted in 1945, namely that the central government is the government that is mainly responsible for those policies that determine the level of economic activity in the country.

Mr. Pickersgill: We never denied that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to hear the hon. member's statement. I take it he will agree with me that it is still the case, and that being the case we contend that if the central government, which is primarily responsible for economic policies, tries to push responsibility for the maintenance of the employable unemployed on to the provinces it is shirking something which is the responsibility of the central government. If the federal government is going to get out from under, either the former government or the new government, the consequences of policies that create unemployment, it is not going to be under the same impetus to maintain policies that will provide full employment as it would if it were faced with its full responsibilities in that field.

Along with these equalization payments which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and I hope will be continued, there have come increased responsibilities so far as the provinces are concerned in all the fields of social security and social welfare. I submit that none of the changes to which the hon. member referred alter the basic picture that was so well set out in the green book proposals of 1945, which were based on the studies of the Rowell-Sirois commission a few years earlier. It is our view, therefore, that the country is being let down in connection with the proposal for 100 per cent federal responsibility for employable unemployed, because that was not implemented by the government that went out of office on June 21 and it is not being implemented by the government that is now in power.

It has been a matter of interest to me in reading the green book proposals and the debates that took place in 1945, as well as in reading the debate on unemployment insurance in 1940, to notice the way in which the view was expressed that we should deal with this matter before the situation became serious. We are heading into a situation that is very serious right now, with unemployment just about 5 per cent of the working force. That was the picture in the middle of November, and it is probably over 5 per cent of the working force now.

We think it is a sorry picture with whatever government is in power, Liberal or Conservative, that this principle of 100 per cent federal responsibility for the employable unemployed seems to be forgotten.

I suggest that the Liberals have put themselves in a rather strange position in this debate yesterday and today. First of all there is this contrast between the readiness to assume 100 per cent of this responsibility back in 1945 and the position taken by the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in this debate, that the 50 per cent share is adequate under what they refer to as the changed conditions.

I think it is also very interesting to notice the difference in the points of view expressed by the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I think in the very first paragraph of his speech said that he would be voting for the bill. The hon. member for Laurier last night characterized the bill as an invasion of a provincial right. He pointed out that to his amazement even Mr. Duplessis was supporting this invasion, this move in the direction of centralization. In other words, after I listened to what the hon. member for Laurier said last night and after I read again this morning the record of what he said, it seemed to me to be fairly clear that he has no alternative but to vote against the measure. He says it is centralization.

Mr. Pickersgill: So did I.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So does my hon. friend the history teacher. It looks to me as though my hon. friend is not only a former teacher of history but that he is trying to turn back the pages of history, trying to get back to the position of 90 years ago when it was the Conservatives who wanted a strong central government and the Liberals who were the advocates of provincial rights.

Mr. Pickersgill: And have been ever since.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And have been ever since, says my history teacher friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. When he talks about history, I think of the old days in United College.

Mr. Pickersgill: Apparently my lectures were not as good as they should have been.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry, but I did not have the advantage of taking lectures given by the hon. member when he was a professor at United College. My conversations with him were out in the halls. It seems to me that what the Liberals are trying to do is turn back the pages of history. If that is their position with respect to this bill, that they are against it because it is a form of centralization, because it is invading a field that is a matter of provincial rights, I hope those who take that view will vote accordingly if a vote is called on this measure.

But not only is the position of the Liberals a strange one; so is the position of my hon. friends on the other side of the house, the Conservatives. I imagine that one of these days the people who make up the Hansard index will get a new heading for some of my speeches, namely "A Plague on Both Your Houses", and it would be appropriate.

An hon. Member: Just "A Plague".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have read with interest the debate on the Unemployment Assistance Act when it was put on the statute books in 1956. The chief spokesman for the Progressive Conservatives, who were then in opposition, was the hon. lady who is now the Secretary of State. Let me give one or two quotations from the hon. lady just in order to show the tone of that debate. On June 28, 1956, as recorded at page 5573 of Hansard of that date, she said:

> No, Mr. Chairman. We were very happy to cooperate with the minister last evening and again today in trying to get this bill through the house for the reasons which he explained to us. But I would think if the minister wants to get this bill through the house, he jolly well had better quit making political speeches.

The minister to whom she was referring there, of course, was the hon. member for Essex East. Then at another point the hon. lady said:

> I tell the minister to cut out this nonsense. I tell him either to lay no claim to these false virtues or else put in the act something which will actually give the provinces the thing which he claims he is giving here and which he is not giving.

Those two quotations represent faithfully the character of the debate that took place on that occasion, during which the present Secretary of State and others complained that the Liberals who were then in power had scuttled their 1945 green book proposals. The hon. member for Hamilton West complained that this measure, this Unemployment Assistance Act, was not providing for federal responsibility to the extent of 100 per cent for the employable unemployed, and she quoted from the green book proposals of 1945 and condemned the Liberals out of hand for having put those proposals on the shelf. She complained also that even this 50 per cent of assistance that the federal government was prepared to give for those over the .45 per cent threshold was not all it was cracked up to be because administration costs, health and hospital costs and that sort of thing were still left either to the provinces or the municipalities.

Hence the whole story of that debate in 1956, so far as the case made by the Conservatives was concerned, was that this measure did not go far enough. Their whole point was that the Liberals should still come through with their 1945 promise for 100 per cent federal responsibility for the employable unemployed. The hon. lady and her colleagues are now on the government side of the house. They can carry out the Liberals' promises which they condemned the Liberals for not carrying out. But are they doing so? No; they are bringing in a bill which the hon. member for Timmins has characterized so well by his reference to the horse and the rabbit. They are bringing in a bill which makes no change in the percentage that Ottawa puts up so far as the employable unemployed are concerned. All they give by way of an improvement is the offer that the federal government will pay 50 per cent of the relief costs of the unemployable unemployed, those who are now excluded by that threshold formula. It seems to me that if the Liberals look strange in the stand they are taking on this bill, the Conservatives look equally strange.

We think the Rowell-Sirois commission, to which a distinguished member of this house rendered great service during the days when that commission met, and those who prepared the green book proposals of 1945 laid before the country some very sensible, tangible and constructive policies so far as unemployment is concerned. We still think those proposals should be carried out and that this government should not ask us to get enthusiastic about this bill which merely removes that threshold but which still leaves, to use the words of the Secretary of State, the provinces and the municipalities having to carry not just 50 per cent of the load so far as the employable unemployed are concerned but more than 50 per cent, because of their responsibility for administration costs, for health and hospital costs and so on.

I indicated a moment ago that I had done some reading of bygone debates with reference to this matter. One of the debates that interested me a great deal was the debate in 1940 when the Unemployment Insurance Act was first put upon the statute books. Many of those who took part in that debate are no longer with us, but one hon. gentleman is. I refer to the hon. member for Essex East. He welcomed the introduction by the government of which he was a supporter of the unemployment insurance scheme, but he wanted it to be made crystal clear that unemployment insurance by itself was not enough, was not all that the federal government should be doing. On July 19, 1940, as recorded at page 1777 of Hansard, the then hon. member for Essex East, who again is just the hon. member for Essex East, had this to say:

> No unemployment insurance scheme in any part of the world has yet been able to operate without calling from time to time upon the national exchequer for further assistance, and for us to assume today that there will in the course of time be no further demands upon the treasury is, I think, not to face realities.

Then over on page 1778 he continued that theme by saying:

> This legislation, as far as I can see, does not envisage all the possibilities, and it falls short of adequate consideration of what the perfected legislation in England has taken into consideration, namely, that during a period of prolonged depression, or during a period such as the present when the depression is certainly less acute, unemployment insurance in itself is not sufficient to meet the needs presented by a situation of that sort and must be related to the question of unemployment relief, to the question of the rehabilitation of labour, and to such questions as national health insurance and the like. All these matters are part of a composite scheme—

Another package I might say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

> —and consequently when the hon. gentleman said that he agreed with my interjection as to the impossibility of unemployment insurance ever doing away with relief, he concurs, I take it, in the view that unemployment insurance and unemployment assistance or unemployment relief must go hand in hand.

There was a recognition in this by the hon. member for Essex East way back in 1940 that if the federal government is going to concern itself with unemployment it cannot stop just with unemployment insurance; it has to concern itself with unemployment assistance as well and with all these other matters that are part of a composite scheme.

I would suggest Mr. Chairman, that this is of a piece with the position that the Liberals took back in 1945 and which the Conservatives tried to get the Liberals to take in 1956, that responsibility for employable unemployed should rest with the federal government.

Now to come back to the point I made in answer to my hon. friend from Newfoundland a little while ago, that the basic fact about all this—and he agrees with me—is that it is the central government that is primarily responsible for the economic policies in this country and it is the central government whose policies determine whether we will have a high or a low level of employment, we contend very strongly that that being the case, the central government should be responsible for the consequences of those policies. You do not carry out that responsibility by passing 50 per cent of the cost of looking after the employable unemployed to the provinces. We contend therefore that the Rowell-Sirois commission was right; we contend that the Liberals were right in their green book proposals; we contend that the hon. member for Essex East was right when he was speaking on unemployment insurance in 1940; we contend that the Secretary of State was right when, in 1956, she called on the Liberal government to stand by this principle which had been laid down across the years, that the responsibility for employable unemployed should rest 100 per cent with the federal government.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I might just say a few words in response to some of the matters which have been mentioned during the course of the debate in the committee stage.

I would like to thank the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke for his unqualified support of the bill. I am going to leave any discussion of the unemployment situation until the labour estimates are before the house. Actually there was a discussion on unemployment a couple of weeks ago and I do not think any purpose can be served in forwarding the cause of this bill by my making remarks on that particular point at the moment.

As I said in my opening statement, the purpose of this legislation is to extend the amount of aid now given to the provinces under the Unemployment Assistance Act so that it will henceforth cover all needy persons in receipt of assistance, whether employable or unemployable. I propose to place on the record some statistics at this time which will show the relative burdens carried by the various levels of government with respect to unemployment. Have I the permission of the house to put these figures on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Monteith: The table follows:

COMPARATIVE TABLE—EXPENDITURES RELATING TO UNEMPLOYMENT

	Municipal Relief	Provincial Relief	Unemployment Insurance Benefits	Unemployment Assistance (federal share)
		(Millions of Dollars)
1941-42	$5.4	$10.3	$ .03
1942-43	3.3	5.3	.7
1943-44	2.6	3.7	1.7
1944-45	3.2	3.4	5.0
1947-48	3.6	6.4	34.9
1948-49	4.1	6.9	49.8
1949-50	5.5	13.3	85.8
1950-51	5.9	11.8	90.0
1951-52	6.8	12.9	90.2
1952-53	6.4	10.8	135.8
1953-54	6.4	11.9	186.9
1954-55	7.2	15.2	257.6
1955-56	8.2*	17.0	215.2	$3.8
1956-57	8.3*	16.2*	231.3	$4.1

*Estimated.

If the hon. members will examine the statistics they will agree that after the passage of this legislation which is now proposed the residual load which will be left to the provinces and municipalities will be of very small proportion indeed. I might just mention the estimated figures for 1956-1957. Expenditures relating to unemployment on the municipal level is $8.3 million, estimated; provincial $16.2 million, estimated. Unemployment insurance benefits $231.3 million, and unemployment assistance, federal share, $4.1 million.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder if the minister has an extra copy of the table available.

Mr. Monteith: I am sorry that I did not have more copies made but I will be pleased to send my own copy over to the hon. member. There was a statement made by the hon. member for Timmins. I am sorry I did not quite get the full import of what he said, but it struck me that he implied there was only a reduction of 10 per cent in the municipal load as a result of this legislation. I am not sure whether or not that is what he said, but I would like to point out that in Ontario at any rate there is going to be a decrease in the municipal share from 40 to 20 per cent, which is a 50 per cent decrease.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? I take it that implies that there is an agreement expected with Ontario, because there is no agreement, as I understand it, under the present legislation.

Mr. Monteith: I mentioned to the hon. gentleman that I would tell him all about that on the second reading. However, I will be quite frank about it and say there is an agreement expected from Ontario.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well I think the minister will admit, in fairness to the committee, that if he is going to talk about what is going to happen in Ontario he might let us in on the secret.

Mr. Monteith: Well you are in on the secret now. There is one expected from Ontario. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned several things at great length but I think all I need do is point out that nothing really could meet all the objections voiced by the premier of Manitoba. I am quite convinced of that. All his demands total something like $950 million if I recall the estimate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister completely misunderstood what I was saying. The premier of Manitoba had certain objections to the existing legislation with respect to unemployment assistance and that is what I was referring to, not to his general proposals at all.

Mr. Monteith: Might I point out, Mr. Chairman, that there has actually been one situation which has been cleaned up and which has been hanging fire since the previous government was in office. That is that Mr. Bend of Manitoba and myself have ironed out, to our mutual satisfaction, differences concerning the operation of this act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would you let us in on that secret too?

Mr. Monteith: It is a matter of interpretation of what is subject to unemployment assistance. There were some cases disputed—a certain type of case—because of the way the legislation is drawn up, and because of the way the estimates were drawn by the province of Manitoba, which were disallowed by the previous government. We have undertaken to allow some of those, having taken the interpretation they should be allowed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Should not the committee be told, since this is going to involve a further charge on the taxpayers, precisely what the hon. gentleman ironed out with the minister from Manitoba?

Mr. Monteith: Yes, I have no objections to telling the hon. member, unless he has already contacted the Hon. Mr. Bend and found out on his own, which he could always do.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, sir, on a question of privilege, we are entitled to information in this house without any kind of insinuation about relations we have outside.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I will be glad when we get into the committee on second reading to give the exact picture and I will get a report on the proper designation of the classes involved. I do not take this to be any particular insinuation, Mr. Chairman, but I think, in so far as the reference to the speech of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate goes, it might well be described in the words of Sir Winston Churchill who is reported to have said in somewhat similar circumstances: "there is a difference between taking time and infringing on eternity."

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not take the whole 30 minutes.

Mr. Monteith: As far as the speech made by the hon. member for Laurier is concerned, from what he said last night I gather he is opposed to the abolition of the threshold and that his reason for this is that he considers that the federal government in abolishing the threshold is somehow invading the last preserve of provincial jurisdiction. I may say I do not see how he arrives at that conclusion. This proposal represents no fundamentally new departure from the legislation introduced by the previous administration. The effect of the proposal to abolish the threshold is simply to deal more generously with the provinces in the sharing of assistance than the former administration was prepared to do. We are not proposing, as the hon. member for Laurier appears to think, to enter for the first time the field of aid to unemployables. If the hon. gentleman has any doubts on this score he should read what was said by his colleague the former minister of national health and welfare when the unemployment assistance measure was adopted in June, 1956. It is quite clear that ever since its passage unemployment assistance was provided for needy employables and needy unemployables alike, no distinction being made between these two groups.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? Does the minister take the view that this matter in no way invades provincial rights.

Mr. Monteith: I will just finish this statement, Mr. Chairman. It certainly does not invade them any more than many measures which the government of the hon. gentleman brought into being.

Mr. Chevrier: That was not the question. If I might repeat it to the minister, it was this: does he deny that this measure does not in any way invade provincial rights?

Mr. Monteith: I take the view that this measure is acceptable to the provinces. The hon. member seems to have in mind that the unemployables have always been regarded as a provincial and local responsibility and that the federal government has up to this moment never taken any responsibility in this direction.

Apart from the considerations which I have already pointed out respecting unemployment assistance, what is the difference between aid offered to the provinces in respect to unemployables under the Unemployment Assistance Act and that offered to the provinces in respect to disabled persons under the Disabled Persons Act? As the former minister of this department reminded us when we were discussing the subject, this last legislation was the brain child of no less a person than the former prime minister of Canada who surely understands the constitutional position and the attitude of Quebec as well as the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: You should ask the former prime minister what he thinks of it, then.

Mr. Monteith: Why was it right, Mr. Chairman, for a Liberal administration to offer aid to the provinces for unemployables, the aged, the blind and unemployables who even now come under the Unemployment Assistance Act yet the minute this government proposes to extend this aid on a more generous basis, the hon. member for Laurier suddenly suggests that it becomes an invasion of provincial jurisdiction and, to use the hon. member's words, a definite and important step in the direction of centralization.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, there is a question I should like to ask the minister. I hope he will not get so involved in this argument with the hon. member for Laurier that the committee will get away from the more substantial aspects of this legislation. Can he tell us how much additional money will be available to the provinces, on the assumption that all ten sign agreements by removing the .45 floor? Let me tell him that if he answers that question I have another one for him: how much additional money would the federal government be paying if instead of removing the .45 floor the amendment proposed paying 100 per cent of unemployment assistance above the .45 floor? Of course, it is quite easy to answer that last question; all the minister has to do is tell us what 50 per cent amounts to, and we will know what the other 50 per cent would amount to. What we want to know is how much money will be going to the provinces under this legislation compared with what it would be if instead of removing the floor it went to 100 per cent above the floor.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I can give those figures. I had a nice little story, based on the cost in detail, which I was going to give on second reading. But I think I could give you the figure now. It is, roughly, $16 million, but it is made up of various items, such as items taken over from provinces not within the agreement now, and that sort of thing. If the hon. member would wait until the second reading I shall be glad to give him the complete picture.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, with the tables which the minister placed on record a while ago, this presents a bit of a problem. I do not think he would mind admitting that he has told us he would like to proceed with the second reading of this bill later this day. If we are going to be presented with tables of this kind it seems to me that if such a request is made it should not involve proceeding immediately, but, rather, at some time later this day, say at eight o'clock.

In the meantime I think the more of these figures the minister can give us now, the more intelligent our discussion will be.

Mr. Monteith: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to give some of these figures now. With reference to the abolition of the threshold, the cost in the case of the six participating provinces can be precisely calculated from monthly returns or claims submitted by the provinces. On this basis the cost and the benefit to each province will be approximately as follows: Newfoundland, $130 million—

Mr. Pickersgill: One hundred and thirty million dollars?

Mr. Monteith: One hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was going to withdraw my speech.

Mr. Monteith: Prince Edward Island, $45,000; New Brunswick, $150,000; Manitoba, $525,000; Saskatchewan, $450,000; British Columbia, $1,150,000, making a total of $2,450,000. That would be the cost of the abolition of the threshold in respect to the six provinces now under the agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that the total cost, or is it the federal share?

Mr. Monteith: That is the federal share. We will be paying half of the amount underneath the .45.

Mr. Pickersgill: To give me a concrete example, the cost to Newfoundland is $260,000 and the saving for Newfoundland is $130,000. Is that correct?

Mr. Monteith: That is right. That is the cost to the federal government.

Cost estimates in the case of four non-participating provinces which we hope will now come into the scheme are based on somewhat less accurate data submitted by the provinces themselves at the time of the 1955 discussion on unemployment assistance, or derived from an analysis of data contained in later provincial reports. On this basis it is estimated that the cost of abolishing the threshold in the four non-participating provinces will be as follows: Nova Scotia, $140,000; Quebec, $3,300,000; Ontario, $2,900,000; Alberta, $575,000, making a total of $6,915,000, that is, below the .45.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt just at this moment for the purpose of clarity? I take it from what the minister says that the province of Quebec is going to enter into an agreement with the federal government in the same manner he indicated the province of Ontario would?

Mr. Monteith: No, I did not intimate that in my remarks at all. I have not given any indication that the province of Quebec is considering it nor do I know.

Mr. Chevrier: Could I ask the question then. Will the province of Quebec enter into an agreement with the federal government?

Mr. Monteith: I think I remarked just a moment ago that we hoped so. Adding these cost estimates to those already given for the six participating provinces we arrive at a total of $9,365,000 as the probable annual cost to the federal treasury of abolishing the threshold. It should be noted however, that while the cost of the abolition of the threshold will not exceed $9 million to $9.5 million per annum this will not be the only cost resulting from the proposed amendments. The fact is that the four non-participating provinces could benefit even at the present time if they were to enter the plan without the threshold being abolished. Consequently, on the assumption that the abolition of the threshold will result in agreements with all ten provinces, the following additional costs above the threshold must also be included in the reckoning. Nova Scotia could receive under the present threshold approximately $20,000 per annum; Quebec, approximately $4 million; Ontario, approximately $1,350,000; Alberta, approximately $600,000, a total of $5,970,000. This item, approximately $6 million, represents amounts to which the four provinces are presently entitled but which they are passing up because they have not signed agreements under the Unemployment Assistance Act. This is, of course, in addition to the cost of $9 million to $9.5 million involved in the abolition of the threshold.

The total annual costs of bringing in the four non-participating provinces and of abolishing the threshold will be approximately $15 million to $15.5 million in a normal year. This, added to present expenditures of between $5 million and $6 million annually in six provinces, will raise the total federal contribution to unemployment assistance costs under this measure to a total of $20 million annually or more. To the extent that in the coming year the numbers requiring unemployment assistance are higher than they have been in the past few years this may be a low estimate. To the extent that one or more provinces may continue to stay out of the scheme, this may be an overestimate of probable costs. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister has given most of the figures I sought. Has he the figures as to what is now being paid annually to the six participating provinces above the threshold? I think he gave the total as $5 million or $6 million but does he have it broken down?

Mr. Monteith: Yes. I might mention that the first annual report of the operations of the Unemployment Assistance Act was tabled recently covering the fiscal year 1956-57 but also nine months of the previous fiscal year beginning July 1, 1955. The statistical tables filed with that report show the following facts applicable only to the six participating provinces. Total expenditures on federal account in the six provinces for nine months of 1955-56 were $3,823,611.27, an average of $424,845.70 per month, for the period July 1, 1955, to March 31, 1956. The largest beneficiaries under the program were British Columbia with $1,721,339.28 and Newfoundland with $1,174,734.83. Manitoba and Saskatchewan were next with $484,130.67 and $369,519.12 respectively and Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick followed with $55,033.37 and $18,854. respectively. In the case of New Brunswick this actually covered only a three-month period instead of a nine-month period. Are you interested at the moment in the number of persons?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am still wondering whether the minister has any figures for a recent 12-month period for the participating provinces above the threshold?

Mr. Monteith: The participating provinces benefited by the following amounts in 1956-57.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That should be it.

Mr. Monteith: British Columbia, $2,299,-894.48; Newfoundland, $1,562,058.32; Manitoba $650,000, an estimated figure; Saskatchewan, $512,678.33; Prince Edward Island, $54,035.89 and New Brunswick, $32,886.96. Are those the figures the hon. member required?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, thank you. Have you the total or do I have to add them up myself?

Mr. Monteith: I am afraid I have not got it; would you mind telling me when you get it?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Gladly.

Mr. Denis et: Mr. Chairman, some reference was made to the proposals made by the government of Manitoba. To clarify the matter and to help the minister to deal with the matter when the bill comes up for second reading it would seem proper to place on record some of the remarks made by the premier of the province of Manitoba at the dominion-provincial conference which was held in Ottawa on November 25 and 26. The following are the words Premier Campbell used at the conference:

> Turning to the field of welfare, we in Manitoba, as I am sure is the case throughout the nation, are concerned with the apparent rapid increase in unemployment. We know that the federal government will be giving serious consideration to measures to correct this very undesirable situation and you, Mr. Prime Minister, may rest assured that Manitoba will be anxious to co-operate with you in all possible ways. We would like to draw to your attention the fact that a commitment was given by the previous federal government, that when the unemployment figure reaches 2 per cent of the population the present unemployment assistance arrangements would be reviewed with the provinces. There is reason to believe that this condition may arise shortly.
> The present unemployment assistance agreement, as Manitoba's representatives forecast at the time of negotiation, has proved unsatisfactory in several respects. Our minister has been in touch with the federal minister on several points remaining at issue between us, and only yesterday, on our arrival in Ottawa, received notification from the Minister of National Health and Welfare that these representations had been rejected, and indicating quite clearly that redress could be secured only by carrying our case to the Exchequer Court.
> The agreement is unnecessarily complicated and expensive to administer. The complicated assistance formula, with its inclusions and exclusions, its formula of .45 per cent of population, its use of annual population estimates, and its references to mothers' allowance cases whose costs are in no way shared by Canada, has produced administrative problems of the most difficult order, and a need for completely new administrative machinery —the cost of which must be borne entirely by the province and the municipalities.
> Moreover, we believe that the agreement is discriminatory as between provinces. It allows certain cases to be included in the claims of one province and excludes exactly the same type of case from the claims of another province, simply because of variations existing in their legislative provisions at the time the agreement was signed.
> For example, families of dependent disabled men may be included in the claims of some provinces because these cases are municipal relief responsibilities in those provinces. The same kinds of cases may not, however, be included in Manitoba's claims because they are receiving payments from our provincial mothers' allowance appropriation.

[Mr. Monteith.]

Manitoba is anxiously awaiting for some solution to these problems. We are hoping that these objections will be met. As a matter of fact, we are under the impression that the present Minister of National Health and Welfare is the type who will not adopt a take it or leave it attitude.

Mr. Monteith: I presume the hon. member does not know that a letter, signed by myself, has gone forward to the minister in Manitoba clarifying the whole situation. The hon. member indicates that is not so but it is because I have seen it.

Mr. Denis et: I am not aware of it.

Mr. Monteith: It is because I have seen it. At any rate, I think the hon. member will find that the Hon. Mr. Bend and myself have come to a satisfactory agreement.

Mr. Kirk: Possibly I misunderstood the minister but I think he said that Nova Scotia was one of the non-participating provinces. I was quite certain that Nova Scotia had signed an agreement some two years or more ago.

Mr. Monteith: No, Nova Scotia is not a participating province.

Mr. Kirk: And has never been?

Mr. Monteith: No, not to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. McMillan: Can a non-participating province sign an agreement and have it made retroactive?

Mr. Monteith: Yes. Discussions commenced, I believe, in June, 1955 and the act was not passed until June, 1956. As a consequence there was a provision in the act—incidentally, it is one of the obsolete provisions which we propose to remove at this time—making it possible because of the time the discussions originated for a province to receive the benefits for one year prior to the date of the signing of an agreement.

Mr. McMillan: I think the minister mentioned the saving to the municipalities. Did he mean municipalities in Ontario?

Mr. Monteith: I simply referred to the announcement by the premier of Ontario. Yes, I mean Ontario.

Mr. McMillan: I saw an article in the press indicating that the municipalities would continue to pay 20 per cent.

Mr. Monteith: Well, they have been paying 40 per cent.

Mr. Barnett: I have one or two questions I should like to ask the minister in relation to the table of figures he put on Hansard a little earlier, a copy of which he sent over to me. The table lists comparative figures over a substantial period of years but for the purpose of my questions I will refer only to the last figures given, namely for 1956-57. The minister may have explained this when he was introducing the table and I was not able to follow him. However, looking at the table I am not quite sure as to the relationship between the various figures listed. Under the heading "Municipal Relief" there is $8.3 million for the year 1956-57. Under "Provincial Relief" there is a total of $16.2 million. Is the figure of $8.3 million for municipal relief included as part of the $16.2 million for provincial relief?

Mr. Monteith: No, that is just the municipal share. The provincial share is $16.2 million and the amount the federal government has paid is $231.3 million plus $4.1 million for unemployment assistance.

Mr. Barnett: Then I should like to ask about the relationship between the total of $16.2 million for provincial relief and the total of $4.1 million for the federal share of unemployment assistance. Is the $4.1 million included as part of the $16.2 million?

Mr. Monteith: No, it is not part of the $16.2 million; it is a separate item. I should like to point out that at the moment only six provinces have signed agreements and those provinces actually cover only some 4½ million residents of Canada. If Ontario comes in there will be approximately 10 million people covered. I am speaking of total population. The $4.1 million really covers about one-quarter of the population, you might say.

Mr. Barnett: For the moment I am not concerned with the over-all total of expenditure that might be involved if every province signs an agreement. All I am concerned with is to establish clearly for the record the relationship between the various totals listed. Do I understand correctly that if one wants to get the total of expenditures relating to unemployment so far as the provinces now under the legislation we are discussing are concerned, one should add the $8.3 million paid by the municipalities, the $16.2 million paid by the provinces and the $4.1 million which is the present amount of the federal share?

Mr. Monteith: Those are the provincial and municipal figures for all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Barnett: Oh, I see. The $16.2 million and $8.3 million are the totals for the ten provinces.

Mr. Monteith: That is right.

Mr. Barnett: Whereas the $4.1 million is the total amount paid by the federal government.

Mr. Monteith: It is the total we have paid but it all went to six provinces.

Mr. Barnett: To the six provinces which now have agreements with the federal government. In view of the fact that this table is going to appear on Hansard I think it is important that we understand the true meaning and significance of these figures.

Mr. Monteith: I quite agree. I am glad the hon. member brought it up.

Mr. Barnett: I am rather intrigued by the fact that the table also includes a reference to unemployment insurance benefits. I think we should have it clear for the record just what is the $231.3 million listed as unemployment insurance benefits for 1956-57. I take it that is the total amount paid out by the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Monteith: That is right.

Mr. Barnett: And that figure has no relationship to the amount paid out by the federal government—

Mr. Monteith: No, I admit that unemployment insurance is a contributory scheme. This figure represents the total benefits that have been paid.

Mr. Barnett: —in meeting the problem of payments to the unemployed, but it is not to be taken that the $231.3 million is an amount which the federal government is now paying out of federal revenue.

Mr. Monteith: There is no such assumption at all. The only difference will be that the $4.1 million will probably rise to about $20 million.

Mr. Barnett: When the other provinces come in.

Mr. Monteith: If they all come in.

Mr. Pickersgill: It depends on how many unemployed there are.

Mr. Monteith: I mentioned that.

Mr. Barnett: While we are discussing the resolution on unemployment assistance I think we should not forget the Unemployment Insurance Act which, of course, is an act of parliament designed to meet at least part of the problem of those who find themselves without work. As I understand it, when the present Unemployment Insurance Act was first introduced it was as the result of an amendment to the British North America Act which added the words "unemployment insurance".

I suppose that technically one could argue that the inclusion of the words "unemployment insurance" as part of the federal jurisdiction and responsibility under the British North America Act does not of itself put the question of unemployment completely within federal jurisdiction. But I think the people of Canada quite rightly can infer that when that amendment was made to the British North America Act it was made with the idea that we were going to have a system of unemployment insurance under federal jurisdiction which would meet the problem of providing at least some income to those who become unemployed.

It has become obvious, to me at least, as the discussion has progressed that these two questions of the Unemployment Assistance Act, which comes under the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Unemployment Insurance Act, which comes under the Minister of Labour, are difficult to separate in our thinking when dealing with the unemployment situation. As a matter of fact, I do not know whether or not the Minister of National Health and Welfare was intending to indicate how closely these matters are related in his mind, but I did notice that according to yesterday's Hansard, when he was introducing this resolution, inadvertently or otherwise, the minister referred to the Unemployment Insurance Act instead of the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Mr. Monteith: Has that not been corrected?

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Barnett: Not in the copy of Hansard I have in my hand. I assume the minister did that inadvertently or that it was a misunderstanding on the part of the Hansard reporter. I felt that it was perhaps an indication of a subconscious realization on the part of the minister that the whole question of dealing with the problem of unemployment is one which properly belongs within federal jurisdiction. Perhaps this lends some weight to the argument my colleagues have been advancing that instead of talking about the removal of this threshold we more properly perhaps should be considering the changing of that 50 per cent contribution—

Mr. Monteith: I do not think that is in order at the moment.

Mr. Barnett: —to a 100 per cent contribution, at least until such time as the minister's colleague in the Department of Labour introduces an Unemployment Insurance Act that will remove this problem from his jurisdiction.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the significance of some of the figures we have elicited from the Minister of National Health and Welfare. My hon. friend defended the continuance of the 50 per cent arrangement above the floor, pointing out certain changes had taken place since the green book was written in 1945.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to be unfair. I said I was going to vote for this measure as is.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is exactly what I was going to say next. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said he was going to vote for this measure as it is, and he gave the reason that it would put some dollars into the treasury of his adopted province.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How many dollars would it put into that treasury? According to the figures of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, $130,000 a year. If instead of removing the threshold, the present government or the former had gone in for 100 per cent of the cost of assistance to the employable unemployed above the threshold it would have put into the treasury of Newfoundland $1,562,058.32 a year. That indicates the difference in terms of provinces that are hit by unemployment between the one approach and the other. The contrast is not so sharp in the case of my own province. But again, Manitoba would do better under 100 per cent above the threshold rather than 50 per cent below the threshold. In the case of Manitoba, under the changes proposed in this legislation, there would be an increase of $525,000 a year. The other proposal would have given to Manitoba an extra $650,000 a year.

Looking at the figures for another province where unemployment is high, namely British Columbia, I find that the government's legislation will increase the contribution to that province by $1,150,000. On the other hand, if this 100 per cent payment above the threshold had not been scuttled by the former government and buried by this one the increase in the contribution to British Columbia would be $2,299,894.48, which is considerably more than would be obtained under this legislation. So far as the six participating provinces together are concerned, they will get an additional $2,450,000 as the result of this legislation. If the other proposal had been adopted they would have obtained an additional $5,100,000. That is the sum of those figures the minister gave a few minutes ago.

I am free to admit that in so far as Ontario is concerned, it happens to work out the other way. Apparently in Ontario the situation with regard to employable unemployed is not as serious as it is in Newfoundland, Manitoba and British Columbia. It appears that Ontario will gain more by giving that province 50 per cent under the floor than would be gained by giving an additional 50 per cent over the floor.

Mr. Chairman, we are right back to the principle that we tried to enunciate throughout this whole debate, that unemployment is a national responsibility which flows from economic policies which are the responsibility of the central government. Since this is the case we believe the responsibilities of the federal government should include full responsibility for assistance to employable unemployed wherever they may live in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make one or two observations about what the hon. member has said. I said at the beginning that I was going to vote for the bill as it is because it would put more dollars into the treasury of Newfoundland. I stand by that because this is all we are being offered. I quite agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that as an abstract proposition I would find it easier to defend paying 100 per cent above the threshold—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is this green book abstract?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am not talking about the green book at all. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow me to finish my sentence. As an abstract proposition, I would rather support 100 per cent above the threshold than what is proposed by the government because, not merely for monetary reasons but as a matter of principle it seems to me that this threshold was put there by my right hon. friend and was defended by the hon. member for Laurier for the very good reason that the people below the threshold are deemed to be those under public assistance and not unemployed. As a question of principle, it seems to me the hon. gentleman's case is good, and for Manitoba, British Columbia and Newfoundland it would be in a dollar sense better. Of course, the bill the government is proposing is better for Ontario, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out.

What I want to say particularly is that the hon. gentleman has very skilfully—we all know how skilful he is and we all know how difficult it is for a simple person like me to counter his arguments—reversed the whole record. First of all, he talks about the Liberal government having scuttled or having pushed back to the provinces something, as though there had ever been, in the history of this country, a time the federal government in fact had assumed the full cost of unemployment assistance. There never has been.

The first occasion since the war when any responsibility was taken was when it was taken by the Liberal government when the present legislation was enacted which hon. gentlemen opposite are now recommending should be changed. I would remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the other members of the committee of one or two facts which the hon. gentleman left out. In the first place, the green book proposal was a proposal for unemployment assistance to be administered and paid for by the federal government; and as a matter of principle the Liberal party has never stood, as fas as I can recall, for paying 100 per cent of the cost of any service administered by someone else. I think that is a thoroughly unsound principle and I would defend that position at any time.

In the second place, the proposal made in 1945 was not that unemployment assistance should be taken over by the federal government as an isolated thing. As I said, it was part of a package deal. It was to be done if the provinces in conference agreed to certain other things which they have never agreed to from that day to this. As a consequence of the failure to reach agreement, the tax rental payments and subsequently the equalization payments were greatly increased; and as a consequence of those greatly increased charges put upon the federal treasury, it was felt by the government, before I became a member of the government and afterwards, that there was no longer the same case that there had been—certainly not the case there had been before the war nor the case there was in 1945—for assuming these charges in two different ways, one by direct tax rental payment into the treasury of the province and then again by assuming the charges in another statute as well.

But on the first occasion on which there was anything more than a very slight amount of seasonal unemployment—and that was the winter of 1954-55—the Liberal government recognized a measure of responsibility and took the initiative in recognizing it, and brought in the legislation with which the hon. gentlemen opposite are now tinkering, and I use the word "tinkering" advisedly. While we have no choice but to accept what they are offering, it is not very much.

Mr. Barnett: In view of what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has just said about tinkering with this question of dealing with unemployment and in view of what he was just saying about the proposals to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been referring, namely the green book proposals, it seems to me that this matter of tinkering is not something which has been initiated with the present administration. I think that what was done in the winter of 1954-55 as a result of seasonal employment could be quite as well described by the use of the word "tinkering", in view of the green book proposal, as what the present administration is doing. However, it seems to me that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, in view of what he was saying, might be interested in having drawn to his attention at this time some words which were used in the debate on the Unemployment Assistance Act by the present Secretary of State. To me at least they point up the fact that while theoretically apparently both the Liberals and the Conservatives have common thinking on this subject, nevertheless all that either of them is prepared to do, when an emergency situation of unemployment arises, is a little bit of tinkering. As found at page 5462 of Hansard of June 28, 1956, the present Secretary of State had this to say. She was speaking following the introduction of the Unemployment Insurance Act by the then minister of national health and welfare and said this:

> Having had some experience in municipal affairs I know it is unrealistic to expect the provincial or municipal administrations to be responsible for the administration of this assistance. The government of Canada has set up right across Canada its own machinery to handle unemployment insurance benefits and it would seem to me that if the government of Canada intends to do something to assist those persons who are not otherwise covered, either by reason of failure to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits because of being in uninsurable employment or by reason of having made insufficient contributions, if the government intends to go along with some sort of assistance it seems to me it could have gone much further than is indicated here in administering these applications.

I would commend those words not only to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate but to the present Minister of National Health and Welfare as an indication of just how far he seems prepared to go in dealing with this matter, as it was advocated by his colleagues in 1956.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure it is useless, Mr. Chairman, ever to try to have the last word in any debate with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. However, I should just like to make an attempt and say that it surely was not tinkering with this problem to get a constitutional amendment and to enact the Unemployment Insurance Act which deals with well over 90 per cent of the problem.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will be quite happy, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate seeks to have the last word, as far as I am concerned. But let me give him something to which he might try to utter that last word.

First of all, he accused me of reversing the record. The record on which I based my argument today was the Rowell-Sirois report and more particularly the green book proposals of the then Liberal government. If the former minister thinks that I was unfair to suggest by implication that something that existed had been scuttled, I will admit that up until 1956 there was no legislation providing for any federal responsibility for the employable unemployed not covered by unemployment insurance. My whole point —and I think the use of the word "scuttled" was perfectly proper—was that when the Liberal government in 1956 finally took a step in that direction, it was only to the extent of 50 per cent instead of to the extent of 100 per cent which was laid down in the green book proposals of 1945.

Mr. Pickersgill: As part of a bargain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There has been a good deal of history since then, and many aspects of that package deal have been achieved, thanks in part to some of the legislation that my hon. friends placed on the statute books under pressure from certain quarters, as they know.

The other comment I wish to make is that I am still amazed at the stand taken by my Liberal friends with regard to what this legislation actually proposes to do. They say —and say correctly—that what it does is to provide for federal payment of 50 per cent of the cost of maintaining unemployables. The Liberals argue that that is a provincial responsibility and that this legislation, this tinkering with their act, means that the federal government is invading that provincial field. They say they are against it. The hon. member for Laurier said it last night.

Mr. Pickersgill: I never said I was against it. I was merely attempting to point out what the fact was, that abolishing the threshold did appear to me to be an invasion of what had always been regarded as an exclusively provincial jurisdiction. That was merely factual. I was not attempting to express any moral judgment of any kind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then is the hon. member willing to approve what he calls an invasion in the field of provincial rights?

An hon. Member: We have to.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why do you have to?

Mr. Pickersgill: Because I happen to represent, from the point of view of income, one of the less favoured provinces and one in which this money is badly needed. However, I would much rather see it done, as I explained in the speech I made originally, in a different way, in the way in which the Prime Minister prior to the election led us to believe this problem would be dealt with.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In other words, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is voting for something based on a principle to which he is opposed, something he does not believe in, so that he can get the $130,000 for the treasury of Newfoundland. I would have more respect for his position if he stood on his principles and voted against it.

Mr. Pickersgill: You have no principles.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As far as we are concerned—when the laughter is over—we are prepared to take the same position that my hon. friend's colleague, the member for Essex East took in 1956, when he was the minister of national health and welfare and when he likened this measure to 50 per cent of the pension for the disabled. We are not against this in principle; we approve of the federal government contributing to pensions or allowances for disabled persons, the blind and so on. Likewise we approve of the federal government making a contribution to assistance for unemployables. We are not against this in principle; we think it is a perfectly acceptable proposition and so we are voting for it because to us it is all right in principle and because it does get some dollars into the provincial treasuries.

We think however that a much more desirable move would be to go in for 100 per cent above the floor and thus get much more money into the provincial treasuries. Nevertheless, I think I have made it clear, both on principle and because of the dollars involved, that we are prepared to vote for this legislation.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Monteith thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 240, to amend the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall the said bill be read a second time? Now?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would agree to have the second reading later this day in order to give us a chance to look at some of these tables. It could be taken either after the next piece of legislation is disposed of or at eight o'clock.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes I would be very happy, Mr. Speaker, if that arrangement is suitable to the house, to have the second reading later this day.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEPENDANTS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 35, to amend the Pension Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a resolution preliminary to the introduction of Bill 35 was debated a few weeks ago. At that time I explained it was necessary to introduce a bill amending the Pension Act, principally to put into statutory form certain amendments increasing the basic rate pension as amended by the former minister of finance on March 14, 1957, and for which financial provision was made in the statutory estimates by vote No. 670 and Bill No. 418. These increases came into effect July 1, 1957. The bill also provides for additional benefits and brings these benefits more in line with the increases in the basic scale of pensions.

It was also decided to introduce amendments designed to clarify sections of the act in which some doubt regarding interpretation has existed. This is just a tidying up process, mainly to clarify the situation, and which does not infringe in any way on any existing benefits or incur any added liability. At the conclusion of the debate on the resolution, I stated that the observations of hon. members would be studied and I would defer my comments until second reading.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) expressed his concern because, although the proposed amendments would prove to be acceptable, nothing was mentioned about a further increase in the basic scale of pension awards. The present increase just came into effect on July 1 of this year. A brief review of the situation might be helpful. From 1920 to 1947 a 100 per cent pension for a married man was $100 monthly; in 1947 a 100 per cent pension for a married man was increased to $125; in 1952 it was increased to $170 and in 1957 it was increased to $200.

The hon. member for Rosthern, whom I am sorry to see is not here at the moment, was no doubt aware that the Canadian Legion urged a 33⅓ per cent increase last year and the national council—which represents the amps, blind, paraplegics, army, navy and air force veterans, Canadian corps association, Hong Kong veterans, etc.—requested in February 1957 "that the basic rate of pension, i.e., war disability compensation for 100 per cent disability be increased to at least double the 1939 rate". As a matter of fact the request was implemented on July 1 of this year. The Legion, in a brief presented to the cabinet, a copy of which has been circulated to each hon. member, upheld a short time ago its request that the increase be 33⅓ per cent and that is the subject of close study in the light of other governing factors.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald) was another who expressed his disappointment at there being no increase in the basic scale and suggested the scale had gone behind the cost of living in other indices. That again illustrates the need of further study and reference to a committee on veterans affairs as has happened in the past and, might I state from my own personal knowledge, took up considerable time in past committees. He also observed that when a disability pensioner entered into a common law union after his discharge from service some consideration should be given on behalf of his partner. He suggested our divorce laws were medieval. This is a situation which I would not desire to discuss any further at this stage, but it illustrates the need for an examination by a committee.

[Mr. Brooks.]

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway also claimed that British disability pensioners who came to Canada after discharge had no rights under the Pension Act and suggested they were deserving cases. Canada does supplement the awards of Canadians with pre-war domicile who served in the forces of Her Majesty or Her Majesty's allies but has never accepted the principle that such pensioners who had no pre-war residence and came to Canada for the first time after discharge from service with their own country are entitled to that benefit.

The hon. member wished some clarification regarding the award of pension and other allowances to paraplegics. The Canadian pension commission assesses the disability from paraplegia as total and pays a pension at 100 per cent. In addition thereto, the commission pays a helplessness allowance as provided in section 30 (1) of the act. This allowance varied from a minimum of $480 per annum to a maximum of $1,400, and the latter amount was increased to $1,800 from July 1, 1957. This increase was granted on the urgent representations of the commission to provide for a group of helpless pensioners who required constant attendance day and night, the majority being bedridden. The commission revised their table of disabilities as of July 1, 1957, to provide for the following four classifications under which helplessness allowance is paid:

Constant

A bedridden case or equivalent who requires constant nursing care and attendance in his home, $1,800 per annum.

Almost Constant

Cases totally disabled and helpless who require a great deal of attendance, particularly during the day, $1,440 per annum.

Intermittent attendance—day and night

This degree of attendance is self-explanatory, $960.

Occasional attendance during the day

This degree of attendance is self-explanatory, $480.

Paraplegics, prior to July 1, 1957, received $1,400 and, unless they require constant attendance in their homes day and night, are classed as almost constant and paid now at $1,440.

I might state that earlier this month I met a delegation of the paraplegic association from Toronto and Montreal who, quite frankly, were of the opinion they should receive the maximum award of helplessness allowance of $1,800 and their representations are now being studied. However, the actual amount to be paid is subject to the decision of the commission, which is charged with sole responsibility and jurisdiction. This is another subject which should be studied by a parliamentary committee.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter), as the result of a most detailed study suggested that Newfoundland veterans, contrary to the terms of union of 1949 and the proposals for confederation of 1947, did not benefit to the same extent as former members of the Canadian forces. This naturally raised the question in my mind as to the number of pensioners and the annual liability as at the date of union, April 1, 1949, in relation to the latest date this year for which records are available.

The figures are:

Newfoundland Pensioners
As at 30/4/49
(end of first month following union)

Number	Annual Liability
1,816	$779,021

As at 30/9/57

An increase of over 100 per cent in amount. It does seem to me that these figures disprove the impression created by the hon. member that Newfoundland veterans have not benefited from union. The total number of pensioners has increased by about 15 per cent, which is evidence of a broader and more generous interpretation of the basis of entitlement compared with that which they formerly enjoyed. He raised a number of points which I may assure him will have my personal study, as well as that of the commission, and which demonstrate the need for a more complete examination by a parliamentary committee.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo also stated the life certificates issued by the commission were misleading and that pensioners were not aware they could claim the continuation of additional pension for children who were continuing their education after attaining the statutory age limitation of 16 or 17. This statement resulted in an immediate inquiry, because the commission has always maintained its responsibility is to provide the maximum benefits permissible by the statute. When a child reaches the statutory age limitation for pension, the chief treasury officer sends out a statement on form 250-B, showing the adjustment of pension. Accompanying this is a form letter, over the signature of the chairman, which quotes the act, gives information regarding the additional pension under section 26(1) (a) and (b), and instructs the pensioner what to do.

Frankly, I do not see what more the commission can do, as pensioners are encouraged at all times to make application on behalf of these children. A further letter of advice goes with the adjustment cheque when pension for the child is continued beyond the statutory age limitation.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) advocated the expedition of this legislation and the setting up of a permanent committee. I dealt with this subject, Mr. Speaker, when I was discussing this matter on the resolution.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) drew attention to matters affecting treatment and pension medical re-examination, also to the cases of merchant seamen and those covering disability and death during peace time service, and these will have my close study and that of the commission. Again they illustrate the need for a committee, as does his proposal that peacetime service personnel should be covered by an insurance plan.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the problem of the merchant seamen has been discussed in this house and in committee on many occasions. There were certain provisions made for the merchant seamen, but possibly there has not been as much done for them as there should have been. This matter also should receive study by a committee when one is set up.

The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) stated it was not unusual to find the same members on the appeal board as had adjudicated on the original decision. This is not the case, and would be in direct violation of section 60 (5) (c), which states:

> That no member of an appeal board of the commission shall adjudicate upon any case coming before an appeal board pursuant to this section, if such member has previously sat as a member of the commission at any hearing of such case, as herein provided, unless the applicant's consent thereto has first been obtained.

An appeal board consists of three members, and two boards sit in different parts of Canada each week. Occasionally one member of the board may have adjudicated upon the claim previously. If so, the applicant is advised by his advocate and, if he refuses to give his consent, the hearing is deferred.

The same hon. member stated it was almost impossible to have the decision of the commission modified by the appeal board. Actually, the reverse is true, as will be found on page 63 of the annual report of my department for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957:

Number of claims heard by the appeal boards during the year	1,510
Number of claims granted by the appeal boards during the year	624
Number of claims not granted	752

The balance of 134 were pending, struck off or withdrawn. Further, if the hon. member will refer to page 69 of the same report he will find what happened to all the world war

I applications for pension received during the year and, on page 83, what happened to the world war II applications. He will be surprised to see the number granted on first application, and those on further hearing or renewal after the presentation of additional evidence without the necessity of going to appeal.

The hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) asked how the commission reaches decisions regarding entitlement in cases where an applicant was enlisted as category A and discharged in a lower category; how does the commission disclaim responsibility? This involves a question, Mr. Speaker, which has on many occasions been the subject of discussion in this house and before committees on veterans affairs. I must say that when the Canadian pension commission renders a decision, it states the reasons leading thereto and the sources are open to the applicant should he desire to proceed further with his claim. Also, there is a branch of my department called the veterans' bureau, which is staffed with qualified personnel who are able to advise applicants, without cost, as to their claims. Parliament has charged the commission with sole responsibility in all matters relating to the adjudication and award of pension. I have taken careful note regarding the observations of my hon. friend, which are by no means new, and know full well that this subject of pre-enlistment conditions will be fully explored by the first committee of this house to deal with the Pension Act.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) made particular mention of the fire fighters. Considerable study was given by previous committees of this house to the problems of the fire fighters. We have the Fire Fighters War Service Benefits Act making special provision for the fire fighters and they also get special attention under the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. There will be further study if it is felt something more is needed.

In closing with these general observations, Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank hon. members for their constructive criticism all of which will be studied and which, may I state again, points out the need for a careful study and review of pension legislation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this group welcomes this amending bill as it does bring forward some worth-while amendments to the Pension Act. Although there are a number of omissions so far as the representations made by the Canadian Legion and the National Council of Veterans are concerned, nevertheless the amendments are all to the good. I have been nice up to this point but I am going to be nasty from now on.

Mr. Brooks: I do not believe you can be nasty.

Mr. Herridge: The last time I spoke about veterans affairs I made the statement that needy veterans were being denied admission to hospitals of the Department of Veterans Affairs in Canada. I made that statement as the result of a visit to Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver, meeting veterans and their parents and information given me at Legion meetings. Since I made that statement I have received a lot of correspondence particularly from the coastal cities of British Columbia supporting my contention.

I am not one given to making exaggerated statements. I try to get the facts before I make a statement and I am one who does not relish his word being challenged. Therefore I am going to deal with one particular letter which I have received which definitely proves my case. Many of these old boys cut clippings out the Vancouver Province or the Vancouver Sun commenting on my previous statement and send them to me. One of such clippings reads as follows:

DVA Denies Veterans Not Looked After—

A charge in the commons at Ottawa that male immigrants are getting treatment at Shaughnessy hospital while "war veterans are denied admission" was denied here.

"At no time has an entitled veteran been refused admission to treatment," William Roaf, western regional administrator for the veterans affairs department said.

The protest against "needy veterans" being turned away from the military hospital while male immigrants were receiving hospital services, dentures, and glasses, was made in the commons by C.C.F. member for Kootenay West, H. W. Herridge.

That was my contention, Mr. Speaker. I am not blaming any of the officials or anyone in the department. I know that no eligible veteran has been denied treatment but I can prove that needy and destitute veterans knocking on the door of Shaughnessy hospital have been denied admission while immigrants and others were being well taken care of.

I am going to quote from the letter to which I referred earlier which indicates that my protest was quite correct based on the experience of the author of the letter. This man writes saying that he has a wife and three children depending on him. He has been unemployed since November 1956, received no unemployment insurance benefits and no relief but is in receipt of a pension of 20 per cent. His private doctor has informed him that both his feet are infected and that at age 58 the chances of recovery are indeed very remote and if something is not done immediately amputation may be required. He indicates that he applied to Shaughnessy for further treatment and was denied it, he got the brushoff. He writes:

I am out of work. I have no money. The Department of Veterans Affairs are or seem to be reluctant about giving me the necessary treatment. They won't admit me to hospital.

He goes on to say that because of his unemployment he is suffering from starvation and also a lack of medical treatment. The man gives his complete history here and outlines the difficulties he has encountered since he returned from the war. I use this as an illustration to prove my contention is correct. I have a file here on my desk containing many similar letters.

Mr. Brooks: Could the hon. member give us the date on which this veteran made application to enter the hospital? Does he know if his file has been checked up?

Mr. Herridge: He gives his regimental number and all the other details. I will take up the case with the minister's officials promptly.

Mr. Brooks: I think in all fairness you should do that.

Mr. Herridge: He says that it was early in 1957 that he applied for treatment.

Mr. Brooks: Early in 1957?

Mr. Herridge: Yes. I am sure a man would not write in this tone and describe his situation so clearly unless the facts were correct. Before proceeding with what I have to say about the bill under consideration I urge the minister to have this situation investigated. I am one who believes that not a single veteran in Canada should be denied admission to a departmental hospital who requires treatment, because of his circumstances. I can tell the minister that some of the boys in the hospital were not too pleased to know that other veterans were denied admission. We make provision for many other people while needy veterans seek admission. I admit that these people have to be looked after but instead of provision being made for the veteran to be looked after by the provincial authorities which I was told was done on a number of occasions the immigrants should be cared for by the provincial authorities and payment made by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to the appropriate authorities. I realize they have to be looked after but it causes a lot of discontent and ill-feeling when you find that veterans have been denied admission to the departmental hospital while immigrants are well cared for. I know the minister's officials do what they can to have veterans looked after by some provincial institution and so on but that is not good enough. The veteran has a first right to be given treatment in Department of Veterans Affairs hospitals. I know that the minister's heart is in the right place in these matters. I urge that he have this situation looked into and urgently have the regulations amended, a course of action which I think is necessary, so these needy cases can be cared for.

Mr. Brooks: I would appreciate very much if the hon. member would give the name and number of that particular case to the officials of the department so they could check up on it.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall bring them all to the attention of the departmental officials.

Mr. Brooks: Yes, at once.

Mr. Herridge: As I said before, the bill is welcomed by this group as offering a number of improvements but there are some omissions with which I want to deal. I am sure the minister will support me 100 per cent in the first omission I am going to discuss because we stood together in support of this omission in the past. I refer to the question of increasing the rates payable under the Pension Act by 33⅓ per cent. I do not want to take the time of the house to deal with it at length. I think the shortest way to deal with it would be to put on the record the opinion of the Canadian Legion as expressed in the brief presented to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the cabinet in November 1957. This outlines the situation very well indeed, as follows:

Historically, the scale of pensions was related to the common labour market. Some examples from the above tables show that this is no longer the case and that pension rates have failed to keep pace with the salaries and wages paid in the forces, the civil service and industry:—

(1) Cleaner and helper, one of the lower paid brackets in the civil service receive $300 less than a married 100 per cent pensioner in 1920. Today such a worker receives $510 more. His wages have increased over 223 per cent, the married pensioner's rate only 100 per cent.

(2) It should be noted that the rates shown on the chart for a private soldier are those which apply to an untrained recruit on entry. He may after four months' service, if he reaches the required standard of competency, get a further $72 per annum; after an additional 12 months he may get another $156 per annum. These increases are for the untrained soldier but do not take into account group pay for which tradesmen may be eligible. Thus a private soldier with 13 months' service and no previous experience would, if married, get $2,928 per annum as compared with $2,400 for a 100 per cent disability married pensioner.

(3) The wage index reflecting the rates paid workers in industry (logging, mining, manufacturing, trade, transportation, construction, light and power and personal services) shows that since 1920 the index has risen from 52.3 to 149.4 in 1956, which is an increase of approximately 185 per cent, whilst in the same period the rate for a married 100 per cent pensioner has risen only 100 per cent.

There is no question but that the standard of living as illustrated in these groups has permanently improved.

And we are all glad of it.

We submit that with due regard to all the difficulties of exact comparison, these figures indicate the necessity of an upward revision of the pension rates. This should be at least 33⅓ per cent over the 1956 rates in order to bring them more into line with the substantial increase in general wage rates in recent years. The Canadian Legion therefore recommends that the rates payable under schedules "A" and "B" of the Canadian Pension Act as of June 30, 1957 be increased by 33⅓ per cent.

I am quite sure the minister has not changed his mind on this matter in a period of 18 months or two years and I do urge that consideration be given to these representations when further amendments to the act are considered. Then there is another amendment lacking which the minister will remember was the subject of considerable discussion in the veterans affairs committee on a number of occasions. That is the one having to do with conditions not recorded on enlistment. If my memory serves me correctly, the minister was very keen on an amendment of this type being placed in the act in order to correct what he, with other members of the committee, considered was an injustice. The brief has something to say about this question and I am going to quote it because the Legion spent a lot of time in drafting it and have presented the case well with an economy of words. This is what the brief has to say on page 13:

We request that section 13 (1) (a) of the Pension Act be amended so that, where a pension applicant who served in an actual threatre of war is found to have a disability resulting from an injury or a disease not recorded on medical examination made on enlistment or prior thereto, such injury or disease shall be presumed to have occurred or had its inception subsequent to enlistment.

Whether a recruit is taken from the comparative protection of civilian life and subjected to the dangers and rigours of military life is determined by government regulation. The government, for the purpose of determining whether the recruit is physically fit and is to be accepted, gives him a medical examination. The nature and extent of such examination is under the sole control of the state. The examination is very comprehensive and rigorous. The findings are recorded. On the basis of such findings the government determines whether the recruit is to be accepted for military service and whether he is to be subjected to conditions of service in a theatre of war. Having full control of the recruiting and the character and place of the recruit's subsequent service, the government should abide, for pension purposes, by its recorded findings in such medical examination, supplemented by actual medical records in existence prior to enlistment.

How many times members of the committee made use of that argument throughout the years.

This is not so under section 13 (1) (a). Many war disabled veterans notwithstanding the ameliorating provisions of section 13 (1) (c) undoubtedly are denied pensions which they would receive if the government were to abide by the results of medical examination on enlistment or pre-enlistment medical records. This situation is particularly acute in cases involving mental or nervous conditions.

I have had one or two in that category brought to my attention.

The Legion submits that the Pension Act should be changed so that Canada's obligation will be honoured. The Canadian Legion therefore recommends that section 13 (1) (a) of the Pension Act be amended so that, where a pension applicant who served in an actual theatre of war is found to have a disability resulting from an injury or a disease not recorded on medical examination prior to enlistment, such injury or disease shall be presumed to have occurred or had its inception subsequent to enlistment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we do not want to be unfair. We cannot expect everything to be done overnight by a government that has just recently taken office but the minister knows this has been the cause of considerable discontent and debate in the veterans affairs committee in past years and on behalf of this group I do urge him to give further consideration to this recommendation of the Canadian Legion, a recommendation which has been brought forward year after year because of the experience of the members of the Legion with the situation as it exists throughout the country.

There is another deficiency having to do with retroactive awards under section 31. Here is a matter that has also been dealt with by the committee from time to time and the minister knows the story just as well as I do. I am going to quote again from the Legion brief because I can say more in a few words.

We would advocate that it be made mandatory that when a decision is given favourable to the veteran, pension will be paid as of date of application. At present this is a matter which is left to the discretion of the Canadian pension commission, but section 31 (1) of the act limits the discretion to a maximum of 12 months. Section 31 (2) permits an additional six months when hardship and distress would otherwise occur, and section 31 (3) permits an additional 18 months pension where there are administrative delays beyond the applicant's control.

I think the commission has administered this section of the act very fairly indeed.

For a number of years after world war I pensions when granted became retroactive to the appearance of the disability or sometimes the date of discharge. As a result some awards involved large retroactive payments and it was argued that this fact made the commission extremely reluctant to grant the application. To do away with this psychological barrier a practical injustice was permitted in order to secure a more unbiased consideration of the merits of the applicant's claim without being unduly influenced by the financial consequences of a favourable decision.

Experience, however, has shown that there are many cases of delay beyond the applicant's control which often result, under present regulations, in both injustice and hardship. We believe that the adoption of our recommendation will go a long way to rectify these abuses. . . . The Canadian Legion therefore recommends that all disability pensions when granted become effective from the date of application, but in order to allay fears of excessive awards going back to world war I jeopardizing the chances of the applicant, we append the following saving clause:

"This provision shall not apply to claims granted prior to January 1, 1946, and no retroactive payments shall be made for a period prior to that date."

I trust the minister will give that recommendation some consideration. I know that the present provisions of the act were finally placed in the act as the result of considerable discussion in the veterans affairs committee and representations by members of the commission and others. The Legion feels there is still a measure of injustice under the application of the present section.

I want to deal now with a section which is termed "Debts Due to the Crown" because I have had a few cases of this sort brought to my attention. While they are not frequent, on occasion there is some difficulty and some injustice done the veteran because of the present legislation.

The Canadian Legion has information indicating that it is the policy of the treasury board, where a veteran is in receipt of pension with respect to a disability attributable to military service and the Canadian government has a money claim against the veteran, to authorize the deduction of the amount of such claim from the veteran's disability pension. The Minister of Finance upon receiving such authorization thereupon makes the deduction.

The alleged basis of the above-mentioned procedure is section 95 (1) of the Financial Administration Act, which provides for the crown setting off a debt to it against a debt by the crown to its creditor.

We are confident that parliament did not have veterans' pensions in mind when it enacted section 95 (1) of the Financial Administration Act, and, moreover, that it would not have enacted that section in its present form if it had been informed that the section would be used to deprive veterans of their pension benefits.

We urge that the crown's obligation to make monthly payments under an award of the pension commission is not an ordinary debt such as is contemplated by section 95 (1) of the Financial Administration Act.

It is something different and of a much higher character. It is a moral obligation of Canada, acknowledged by the nation through its own tribunal, the Canadian pension commission, to ensure that the hardship to the pensioner resulting from his disability incurred in the service of his country shall be minimized. Having assumed that obligation the nation is, in the Legion's view, bound not to disavow it.

Parliament has declared by section 24 (3), formerly section 20 (3) of the Pension Act, that a pension may not be attached. The Canadian Legion says that this is a statutory confirmation of the special character of Canada's obligation to its disabled veterans. It is essentially a debt of honour. Parliament has in effect said and decreed that money payments arising out of that obligation must not be diverted from their purpose, that of ameliorating financial hardship arising out of war disability.

The Legion submits that the Canadian government is bound, if not legally then morally, by section 24 (3) of the Pension Act.

The Canadian Legion therefore recommends:

That in order to obviate all possibility of future diversion of war pensions section 24 (3) be amended so that it will specifically bind the crown.

Why should the crown not be bound in this respect when ordinary individuals or corporations are bound. I believe there is a section of the act that certainly should be amended according to the recommendation of the Legion.

I have a final complaint. I told the minister I was going to be a bit nasty this afternoon. My complaint is in connection with marital status under the act. I had a case recently which particularly brought to my attention the necessity for some amendment to this section of the act. The cases are relatively few in percentage, but very often innocent people are the victims of circumstances over which they had no control. In that connection the Legion has this to say:

There are Canadian pensioners and widows of deceased pensioners who have lost pension rights because of their marital status. In these cases either the man or the woman was married peviously and obtained a divorce outside of Canada which is not recognized under Canadian law.

I dealt with a case like that just last month.

Therefore the second form of marriage is held to be improper by the Canadian pension commission which refuses to recognize the wife for purposes of additional pension, and when the man dies it similarly refuses to recognize the widow. In some cases the commission has previously recognized the woman and paid additional pension during the man's lifetime and then after his death discovered the invalid divorce and refused to recognize the widow. The commission has exercised its discretion in some cases but there is evidence that it does not always do so.

There are other instances where a separation has occurred and as a result there is an impediment to marriage creating a situation comparable to an unrecognized divorce.

There are not many of these cases but those that have come to our attention have been tragic.

That has been my experience.

With respect to those that result from an unrecognized divorce there is little doubt but that the parties concerned acted in good faith and felt that they were free to remarry.

The commission, following a meeting in January 1955, asked the Legion what is could suggest as a remedy to this problem.

This is their suggestion:

We believe that it could be remedied by a provision similar to section 30 (11) (b) of the War Veterans Allowance Act, but worded so as to take care of the widows also. . . .

The Canadian Legion therefore recommends: That a clause similar to section 30 (11) (b) of the War Veterans Allowance Act be included in the Canadian Pension Act, and further, that this clause be so worded as to provide for the widow.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said when commencing my few remarks, we in this group welcome the amendments provided in this bill, but we also urge the minister to give consideration to the other representations of the Canadian Legion. There is only one representation, sir, that will affect a large number of people, and that is the one asking for a 33⅓ per cent increase in the basic pension rate. The other amendments that I have outlined affect relatively few people, but the people affected are entitled to justice as well as the larger number, and the present act causes a certain injustice in those cases. On behalf of this group, I do ask the minister in the time between now and the next session to give serious consideration to these representations and give effect to his own previously expressed wishes by amending the act to meet the requests of the Canadian Legion.

Mr. Monteith: There was a discussion a few moments ago to the effect that we might continue discussion of the unemployment assistance measure at 5.15. If that would be agreeable to the house, we might leave this order of business upon which we are engaged at the moment and proceed with this other matter.

Mr. Chevrier: If I might say so, that is quite satisfactory. I understand it is satisfactory to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who speaks on behalf of his group.

If that is the case, and I have the permission of the house, I should like to make one or two observations. I should like to follow up the question which I asked the minister earlier.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The proposal is acceptable to us, but should we not have the debate in which we are now engaged adjourned and start on the other order of business?

Mr. Carter: I would move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Carter the debate was adjourned.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO REMOVE THRESHOLD PROVISION FROM AGREEMENTS, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. 240, to amend the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I had asked the minister what the attitude of the province of Quebec was with reference to the resolution, and whether or not the province would enter into agreements. I think the minister answered that while he hoped that there would be an agreement between the federal government and Quebec, such was not the case at the moment. I wonder if he could say, when he rises, whether or not any negotiations or any discussions have taken place between the two bodies leading to an agreement.

While I am on my feet I should like to clarify the attitude which I adopted last night in discussing this matter. I did not think it was necessary to do that because surely it is possible for an hon. member to get up and question certain parts of a bill without, for that reason, being opposed to it. Next, my position and certainly the position of this side of the house, was clearly indicated when we assured the minister that we were willing at once, following disposal of the resolution, to move on to second reading of the bill. This is indicative of an attitude of co-operation and not one of opposition.

This leads me to the statement that there is no difficulty about my position, which is that of supporting the bill and voting for the bill, because it is going to increase the contributions to the provincial governments. The point I was making was that because of the amendment which was made to the British North America Act which authorized the federal government to enter into the field of unemployment insurance, that did not authorize the federal government to enter into the field of unemployment assistance. In that case I feel, as I am sure most hon. members on this side of the house feel, that for that reason this bill is an impingement upon provincial rights.

I do not want to repeat what I said last night but it strikes me that there can be no doubt about that, not only because of the constitutional position as it stands today but I am sure most hon. members who have given this matter any thought would feel that way about the matter. But what amazed me more than anything else was that the province of Quebec which as a rule takes quite a strong stand against the infringement of provincial rights would, through the head of its delegation at the provincial conference, as I understand it did, adopt the position that the federal government should go all the way and pay all of unemployment assistance.

I thought I should make these points. They should not be surprising to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Surely it is possible to say in the house that one is against certain views. Surely it is possible to say that a bill infringes upon provincial rights and still support it because of the fact that the provinces and incidentally the municipalities are going to be assisted. My position also was brought about by the fact that during the campaign some fairly strong statements were made as well as prior to the campaign over a period of years, by the former leader of the opposition and other hon. members who now sit on the other side of the house, to the effect that there would be a positive decentralization of these matters if they took office. It strikes me that in this case there is just the contrary. There is a tendency to invade the field of public assistance, leaving very little in that field other than perhaps mothers' allowances and several other smaller matters. For that reason it seems to me that the position which I have taken is quite tenable.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we had a debate on this matter at the resolution stage. In the meantime we had a chance to look at the bill and I do not think it is necessary to debate it at length at this stage. One of my colleagues has a few remarks of a general character which he will be making while Your Honour is in the chair, but our position is clear. We feel that there is nothing wrong about federal assistance to the provinces in fields such as moneys for disabled persons, blindness allowances and other such measures. Accordingly we do not see that it is wrong for the federal government to assist the provinces in the field of assistance to the unemployable unemployed. We therefore have no difficulty in voting for this measure. We are also prepared to vote for it because it puts a few more dollars into the provincial treasuries.

I confess that I am still amazed at the position taken by my friend the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). There is nothing else that this bill does but to provide money to assist the provinces in their payments to the unemployable unemployed. If he thinks that is an infringement upon provincial responsibility it seems to me that his course should be to vote against the measure. But since we are for it, I am glad to know that everybody else is for it as well. Nevertheless we think we express the disappointment of the Canadian people that, after all these years during which it has been contended in many quarters that there should be 100 per cent federal responsibility for the employable unemployed that contention is still not being implemented in the legislation that is now before us. We hope that even yet we may reach that point. I am glad to hear that my hon. friends of the Liberal party now say that they still take that position. I hope that between us we may yet be able to persuade the government to go that far as well. Nevertheless, as we have already made clear at the resolution stage, we support this legislation as far as it goes.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, so far the discussion, chiefly on the resolution stage, has dealt with the technical implications in this proposed resolution. I do not wish to get involved in that particular part of the debate because there are others who are far more capable of investigating the technical fields. However, I was glad to hear the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) somewhat shift his ground, as we reached second reading of the bill, from the position he had taken earlier. I was becoming concerned, on hearing him talk about the invasion of provincial rights, because it is rather unusual to find an hon. member from his party taking a position politically to the right of the premier of Quebec. I was afraid that he was quickly going to become the sole surviving Canadian Dixiecrat of the Canadian House of Commons. But apparently he is prepared to go along with this bill at this time.

The point I wanted to raise at this particular juncture of the debate is that we are in danger of losing sight of the chief objective or the chief purpose toward which this parliament should be working with regard to employment. Certainly we are in favour of doing everything possible—whether it is at the federal level, the provincial level or the municipal level or any combination thereof—to alleviate the effects of unemployment and to do something to alleviate the suffering that may result from prolonged periods of unemployment. But I am afraid that this is the kind of legislation which, as I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, we all hope will not be required. I think we all believe that it would be far more desirable if we could do something to keep the level of employment in such a state that not only would there not be any crisis in unemployment but that even the .45 formula would not have to come up for consideration.

The present situation seems to be, on the basis of the latest figures, that we are approaching very rapidly a figure of 400,000 unemployed in this country. I wonder if we assess the full significance of what is happening. On a very conservative estimate, —and I use the word conservative with a small "c" there—if there are 400,000 unemployed, and if the loss in work that could be performed or products that could be produced were taken conservatively at $10 a day—and that in this day is a very small figure—that would be a loss of $4 million a day, which would come to approximately $120 million a month. That figure in itself indicates how costly and expensive unemployment can be. That is taking into consideration only the financial side of it. When we take into consideration the human side of it,—the uncertainty, the fears, the doubts and the worries that go along with unemployment and what it does to the average family—then of course the cost is incalculable.

I am wondering why the government has not, even in the course of this debate or at any previous time when unemployment was being discussed, made some announcement of some long range plan, something more imaginative and bold than has been indicated by the previous administration or so far by this administration. I am thinking of something like the setting up of a national employment commission which would lay the emphasis not on looking after the unemployed but on providing the widest possible opportunity for employment. In other words, they would look at the positive side of this question rather than the negative results. I believe a commission of that nature could be very useful and could do a great deal in co-operation with the provinces and the municipalities. Certainly if such a commission were set up and were given authority by this parliament to enter into negotiations, discussions and agreements with the provinces and the municipalities, in my view that would be one of the finest and easiest ways of overcoming this continuing argument that comes up again and again as to who enters into another field of endeavour, and the question of infringing upon provincial rights or provincial autonomy.

I say this because an agreement of that nature would mean that under the terms of this bill they would be empowered by negotiation and agreement to enter into public works and long-range plans and winter employment programs with the provinces and municipalities, provided that the financial basis upon which to make all those things possible was provided by this parliament. I think it would grip the imagination of the Canadian people and would give us a sense of national enterprise which I think is lacking today.

I have been in this house for a considerable number of years now and have heard hundreds of debates and arguments about public enterprise and private enterprise and the relative virtues of the two or the virtues of one as opposed to the other, but I have never heard any member of the government bring forward an imaginative program which we could call a national enterprise in which there would be room for public enterprise, private enterprise and co-operative enterprise, but with the emphasis on enterprise. I believe we have the kind of country which needs that kind of leadership and that type of leadership would result in the minimum need of this kind of legislation.

To give an example of what such a national commission could do, I might take the suggestion which was made by a member who was on this side of the house, I believe last year or two years ago. That member was the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) who is now one of the parliamentary assistants on the government side. At that time he brought in a resolution to deal with the dispersal of industry and he pointed out that there was a potential for small processing and manufacturing industries, particularly but not exclusively in western Canada. The possibilities, of course, are great both to the east and to the west of our national capital and this is a time when I believe the hon. member for Brandon-Souris would be doing a great national service if he would put these arguments and ideas before the government and bring them to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), and try to persuade them to take some positive steps along those lines in the near future.

Statistics show that in the last six years there have been almost 50,000 farmers who have left their lands—that is taking the whole area right across Canada. On the prairies the process has been perhaps more speedy than in any other province. We are losing our farm population by the thousands in every one of our rural communities in western Canada. Now I may be asked "what has that to do with this legislation?" It has this to do with it. Every time a farmer leaves his land and goes into the city to seek employment he is creating more than the normal employment problem. In the average farm family there would be more than one working adult and as long as they stay on the farm they are not in the labour market. They are their own employers but, the minute they leave that farm and enter the city they have in my opinion made a very fatal decision because they have decided to stop being their own employers and to throw themselves on the mercy of some other employer. Now I am not critical of such persons as they may do so as a matter of necessity or as a matter of choice, but it is a process which has been going on and which is going on and which I believe is a very dangerous process if we should run into any further unemployment difficulties.

Now, if we had small manufacturing and processing industries dispersed throughout our farming areas, particularly in the prairie provinces where we do not at the present time have many such industries, many of which have to be planned and initiated by such a planning commission as I have described and perhaps even initially financed by the federal government, this would in my opinion be a sound investment.

Small industries would have a stabilizing effect in keeping farm families on the farm. It is well known there are many farms today, I believe, particularly in the province of Quebec, where the people would not be living on the farm at all since the land is not capable of sustaining a sufficient income if it were not that they lived somewhere in the vicinity of a pulp mill, paper mill or a mine of some kind where they may obtain part-time if not full-time employment. This makes it possible for them to stay at home on the farm and supplement their farm income with a certain amount of income from employment in industry.

Now in western Canada such a program is particularly important and would have very beneficial results which would help to stem this tide of families leaving the farms and seeking employment in industrial areas, thus boosting the large unemployment figures. At the same time it would make it possible for those who find it difficult to maintain themselves on a farm income to do part-time work in the off-season period so far as farms are concerned and would enable them to earn sufficient extra income to keep their families together, maintain themselves, and stay on the land.

Apart from the opportunities I have outlined, I would like to draw the attention of the government to the obvious opportunities before us that were mentioned the other day in another context. It does seem rather strange, and in fact a little ridiculous, that a country such as ours where no one seems to think we lack resources, the physical capacity to produce or even financial resources, that we are not somehow able to relate the financial and the physical possibilities in order to provide full employment and full production in our country.

As I have already pointed out, we are losing approximately $4 million worth of labour per day as a result of unemployment at the present time, over $100 million a month. If that amount of money were to be put into useful public works projects—and I am not talking merely about providing employment per se but providing employment through socially useful public works projects —we would be recovering that money in a valuable way. If the government wants some ideas as to where such employment could be found or what could be done, I will give them a few recommendations or suggestions.

If they would look at recent reports on the position of our educational facilities across Canada I think they would find there is a tremendous need for school construction. As a former schoolteacher I can assure the house that I have followed the position of our educational facilities very closely, even though I am no longer active in that field, and I find there is a tremendous amount of replacement to be done. There are many small schoolhouses, built 40 or 50 years ago, which ought to be replaced with buildings having modern facilities. The same might be said of many of our hospitals and other public institutions which are crying out for replacement. The materials are there and labour apparently is there, almost 400,000 men. Somehow the government up to this time, however, has failed to relate these two things and to produce the socially necessary institutions.

There are many demands in every province in this country of ours and yet we do not have full employment at the present time. It is not something that needs any great amount of planning or great technicians or scientists; all it needs is a little bit of common sense and then we can get right down to work.

I mentioned the other day in a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Hamilton) the question of houses on our Indian reservations. I do not refer to the reservations in eastern Canada but those in my own province.

I happen to have five Indian reservations in my own constituency, and I can say that the housing conditions of most of them are disgraceful. Many of them are living in log shacks, shacks which are broken down and no longer suitable as residences, and at least a few of these Indians happen to be right alongside large sawmills where there is a huge surplus of lumber waiting to be sold. At the same time there is unemployment in the area, yet somehow the government cannot manage to relate this raw material this available labour and these log shacks and provide the Indians with decent frame houses in which to live in some measure of comfort. This is one of the things which could be done right away to bring a measure of relief to the situation.

And what about homes for our senior citizens? What about schools for the technical training of our young people? News stories have appeared recently showing how far behind this country has fallen in relation to the training of scientists. Here is a field which could be tackled right away. Let us provide the facilities to give our young people the education and the technical training to fit them for the new kind of world in which we are living and in which we are likely to be living in the future.

These are random ideas, Mr. Speaker, but the main thought I should like to leave with the government is this: it is nothing short of ridiculous to have a position where we are losing approximately $4 million worth of labour a day, and in which there are thousands of things to be done at a time when we have all the materials necessary to do these things and plenty of resources behind those materials to replace them when they are used. I know that this government is firmly attached to the idea that private enterprise can do everything, but let them swallow their pride to some extent, throw that book away and say that what is required now is a little imagination and the use of all forms of enterprise. If this is done I think we will reach the stage when this type of legislation will no longer be required.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) asked me a few moments ago if Quebec would enter into the agreement and whether there have been any discussions. All I can say is that to the best of my knowledge, and certainly not on my level, there have been no discussions. I cannot say there have been none at the technical level, or the official level, but there has been no indication as far as I can tell at the moment, to that effect. I would say that we are, of course, hopeful that Quebec will come in. The offer is open to all provinces in Canada. I am very pleased to hear that the hon. member for Laurier is going to support the bill. There is no doubt that if there is any invasion of provincial rights it is certainly no more so than the Blind Persons Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Old Age Assistance Act, all of which acts were instituted by the previous administration. I would just emphasize that we firmly believe in decentralization just as much as possible, taking into consideration the all-embracing attitude of the previous government.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) made a very interesting speech, and all I can say to him is that we do agree that as much as possible and in as many ways as possible we should do something to assist those who are unfortunate enough to be unemployed. This, in our estimation, is one way of giving such assistance. In one way or another our assistance goes to the provinces and, indirectly, down to the municipalities and we assume it does eventually assist in relieving the unemployment situation. I will not say anything further about unemployment because, as I said earlier, I think this is a matter for discussion at a time when the labour estimates are considered.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister was going to tell us about what had been done with regard to the agreement with Manitoba. Is he going to do that in committee?

Mr. Monteith: I will be happy to.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Form of Agreements.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if he would tell us what precisely has been done with regard to the points raised about Manitoba? Would he at the same time tell us what the situation is with respect to discussions or negotiations with Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island which I understand are the other two provinces which have no agreements.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I think I will have to ask my officials with regard to some of the details, but I can tell the hon. member something concerning the agreement reached with the Hon. Mr. Bend of Manitoba.

Manitoba estimates recorded as part of the mothers' allowance case load and cost that there were certain charges which, until two years ago, had been accepted by the provincial government as part of their mothers' allowance and appeared as such in their estimates. Now they claim that this is a category—deserted mothers with children—which under the Manitoba child welfare act was charged to the mothers' allowance vote, but to which the federal government should have provided assistance.

There was another category, namely scholarships or bursaries paid to the children of mothers' allowance recipients. It was subsequently agreed, I think amicably, between Mr. Bend and myself that we should pay for the first class I mentioned—I might add that this was a hangover from the previous government—but that we should not pay for the second class.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the statement Mr. Campbell made about the case that had to be referred to the exchequer court?

Mr. Monteith: I did suggest, in a previous letter, that, as there was an appropriate provision in the agreement, if there was a difference of opinion possibly the best thing to do would be to appeal to the exchequer court. That provision is in the agreement, namely that any province which does not like our decision with regard to the interpretation of the regulations has that privilege. We seemed to feel for some time that the appropriate course would be to make that appeal to the exchequer court.

But when Mr. Bend and I sat down and discussed the whole thing for the first time I understood his problem concerning these deserted mothers better than I had. I could see that he had a point in declaring that they should be in on claims for assistance from the federal government and as a consequence I gave way on that point and he decided he did not have a just claim on the child bursaries.

Mr. Pickersgill: The premier raised the question of families dependent on disabled men. Was that question settled as well?

Mr. Monteith: No, that has not been discussed with Manitoba but that province is in the same position as the other five provinces with regard to that particular point.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the premier said it was not.

Mr. Monteith: I understand that Alberta is the only province that has provision for disability cases but the other provinces are in exactly the same position.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister was also going to tell us about Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Alberta.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Monteith: You said Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Pickersgill: I admit I made a mistake in mentioning Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Monteith: No, Mr. Chairman, we have had no word from either Nova Scotia or Alberta as to their intentions under the proposed change in the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I would ask the minister this question. I said, at the resolution stage, there was no discussion about this at the federal-provincial conference at all, this was just a straight take it or leave it proposition coming from the Prime Minister. Now it appears quite evident from the discussion we have had so far that that is precisely what it is. The minister admitted that he had no discussion with Nova Scotia, Alberta or Quebec. He did not say that about Ontario. Of course, I have my own suspicions about Ontario. Indeed I have my suspicions about where the idea of this proposal really came from; it was just to save the face of the premier of Ontario but at any rate it is going to provide a little incidental advantage to some of the other provinces.

It does seem evident that all there is to this measure is a straight take it or leave it proposition from the federal government. If I be unfair and if the minister thinks I am wrong—

Mr. Monteith: I certainly do.

Mr. Pickersgill: —let him answer my questions. Was it discussed before the conference? Which provinces asked to have this particular thing done? When did it happen?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I think I have already explained my situation in this regard. I have answered questions in the house to the effect that there had been discussions with Ontario. As I recall it, Premier Stanfield indicated at the dominion-provincial conference that he was pleased that this would happen.

Mr. Pickersgill: After the proposition had been announced in a "take it or leave it" attitude.

Mr. Monteith: There have been no official approaches by either Nova Scotia or Alberta.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or Quebec.

Mr. Monteith: Or Quebec; I mentioned that. There have been no official approaches as far as this change in the act goes. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that as far as a take it or leave it attitude is concerned there was nothing of that sort at the recent dominion-provincial conference as compared with the degree to which that attitude was exhibited in previous dominion-provincial conferences held when the government to which he recently belonged was in power.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is very easy to make assertions but the hon. gentleman has not offered one tittle of evidence except to mention what I suspected all along that this was asked for quietly and privately by Ontario.

Mr. Monteith: That is only your statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, produce your evidence instead of just making assertions. I do not think there is the slightest evidence but if you think you have any, produce it. That is all I am asking.

Mr. Monteith: You have not got any.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman will produce his evidence I will accept it at once but he has produced none. The Prime Minister said that this was asked for by someone but he did not say who. I read the quotation earlier today. He indicated that it was asked for by someone but he did not say by whom. I have been trying to find out all day who it was that really asked for this. There is no evidence anywhere on the record that any provincial government asked for this measure before the conference. The Prime Minister spoke first and he said, "You can have this," and it was obvious from his attitude that it was a handout.

Mr. Monteith: There has been correspondence tabled on it.

Mr. Pickersgill: On unemployment assistance? No, none.

Mr. Monteith: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would cite specific correspondence on this question I would be interested in seeing it.

Mr. Monteith: It was done on a motion by the hon. member for Essex East calling for the tabling of correspondence since June 10. It has been tabled; go and look it up.

Mr. Pickersgill: With Ontario? Has there been correspondence with any other province?

Mr. Monteith: I do not know.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, you are the minister. If you do not know, who does?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, clause 1 involves substituting a new agreement for the two agreements that were scheduled to the original bill. It is often indicated to us around here that there are discussions between Ottawa and the provinces when agreements are being drafted or altered. May I ask the minister if there were discussions with the participating provinces, or with all ten of them for that matter, as to the changes in the form of the agreement from the form as in the act to the form in the amending bill?

Mr. Monteith: Only in so far as the abolition of the threshold is concerned. Under the old bill we were required to have a separate agreement with Nova Scotia but under the new agreement with the abolition of the threshold one agreement will suffice for everybody.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, but a few other changes, even if they are not substantial, are being made in the agreement which I take it the provinces will have to sign in order to continue to draw the assistance they have been receiving and in order to draw assistance for those under the threshold. I think it is a fair question to ask whether there were discussions with the provinces as to the form of this agreement before it was put in this bill and submitted to the House of Commons?

Mr. Monteith: Well, Mr. Chairman, we are taking out only those provisions which might be described as obsolete, dead and no longer required. I think that is the only change.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am prepared to admit all that but I still think it is a fair question to ask if there were any discussions with the provinces as to the change in the form of the agreement before the agreement was submitted to the House of Commons?

Mr. Monteith: No, Mr. Chairman, I will have to admit that there were not.

Mr. Pickersgill: Take it or leave it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cardiff: Try and get your own party off the hook on that statement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, this is a serious matter. We have been used to it across the years from the former government and I am sure we will be told the same thing by this government whenever we ask for something to be done involving the provinces, namely that they have to be consulted before something is handed to them on a take it or leave it basis.

Mr. Pallett: The government changed on June 10.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I did not hear that remark.

Mr. Pallett: I said that the hon. member attributed certain dealings and attitudes to the previous government and I remind him that the government changed on June 10.

Mr. Pickersgill: And now we have a real take it or leave it attitude.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There have been some changes and apparently one is that so far as this agreement with the provinces is concerned it was drafted and presented to them on a take it or leave it basis. I think that is hardly in keeping with the basis on which the federal government and provinces should get along.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has already admitted there was a take it or leave it attitude.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to say something else about the agreement but I guess I will have to leave it until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'colck.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one brief statement to the effect that this legislation never has been and is not a take it or leave it proposition. The amendment we are proposing to the act is a most generous offer to increase approximately four times the federal contribution to unemployment assistance, or from $5 million to approximately $20 million per annum. There is no doubt that such action by the present government does cause some concern to the opposition. May I say very forcibly that this amendment has brought great satisfaction to the provincial governments and, of course, to the municipalities which in the long run stand to benefit most.

Would anybody really suggest that the provinces should be consulted about the deletion of words applicable back to 1955? They have no possible effect now. Section 8 is deleted and this section was put in the act only to allow ratification of the six provincial agreements signed prior to the passing of the federal legislation in June, 1956. It has no further force or effect.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the minister admitted just before six o'clock that the provinces had not been shown copies of the revised agreement which is the schedule to the bill and which is under discussion because it is referred to in clause 1. I admitted that there were few changes of substance in the agreement other than the dropping of the threshold and the provinces of course knew that that was contemplated. Nevertheless, the minister had to admit that the form of the new agreement had not been shown to the provinces before it was presented to us in this bill.

The minister now comes back after the supper hour and tries to persuade us that it is not on a take it or leave it basis because it is nothing other than a generous offer. I have seldom heard figures used in the way that the Minister of National Health and Welfare used them a few minutes ago. He made the statement that the bill has as its purpose increasing by four times the money available to the provinces, and to prove that statement from his standpoint he said that it raises the amount from $5 million a year to $20 million a year. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that when one is comparing figures one should compare figures that are comparable. The minister is doing no such thing.

The $5 million he talks about is the amount the six participating provinces are now receiving above the threshold. If no other provinces come in and only these six continue to participate, the increase to them as the result of this legislation will be $2,450,000, an increase from $5,100,000 to $7,500,000 odd. The minister gets the $20 million figure by comparing the $5 million that the six provinces are now getting above the threshold with what the ten provinces would get if they all came in, both above and below the threshold, and that is making a comparison of things that are not comparable at all. I simply express my amazement that the minister chose to argue in that way.

Of course, the bill gives something to the provinces but to the participating provinces it gives an increase of only $2,450,000, an increase of only 50 per cent and not the fourfold increase to which the minister referred, and I submit that that does not detract from the admission he had to make prior to the adjournment at six o'clock that the form of the agreement was not submitted to the provinces before it was presented in parliament.

We were talking about the agreement, Mr. Chairman, the form of which is in the schedule referred to in clause 1 of the bill, and there is something else I should like to ask the minister about that agreement. He made it clear in the debate this afternoon that he has read the debate that took place in 1956 when the Unemployment Assistance Act was first enacted. He at least read the speech of the then minister of national health and welfare because he quoted from it or referred to it a number of times this afternoon.

Mr. Monteith: Just once.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just once? Well, even once makes it clear that the minister read that speech. I wonder whether he also read the many speeches made on that occasion by the chief spokesman for his party at that time on this matter, the hon. member for Hamilton West who is now Secretary of State. Let me make it clear that she took a position that some of us did not take and she took it very strongly. She criticized the former government vigorously and vehemently for not sharing in the health and hospital costs of the employable unemployed. She complained bitterly that the agreement was drafted in such a form that those costs were excluded from the kind of expenses in which the federal government would share. She came back to that repeatedly. She called it nonsense for the former minister of national health and welfare to talk about the federal government sharing in these costs to the extent of 50 per cent and she used some pretty powerful language with regard to the matter.

I wonder whether the minister has paid any attention to what his colleague said on that occasion. If so, why is it that no change has been made in that and why are these costs, about which the member for Hamilton West complained, still left exclusively to the provinces and the municipalities?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare no answer to that question?

Mr. Monteith: I do not think any particular answer is required. As I suggested when the committee resumed this evening, we are undertaking at the moment to make a contribution to unemployment assistance on a greater scale than has been done before. That is the simple purpose of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Breton: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this bill. First of all, I want to commend the government for this alleviation of unemployment. I also would like to say that in view of the conditions now developing in Canada, I think this government should make a still greater effort toward a solution of the problem.

One of my saddest experiences has indeed been to see how many people come to us in our offices asking for jobs because they don't qualify for unemployment benefits.

I do not know who was saying some years ago that the mortal sin of democracy was to let people be unemployed. Our society is responsible for the unemployment of the labouring masses who were attracted to the cities by industries that later left them jobless.

According to figures given by an association which met recently with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), there are at present 800,000 people who do not come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. That is over 10 per cent of our labour force. In rural districts like mine, this proportion is even greater in these difficult times.

I therefore commend the government for improving the act, but I do regret that it did not do more. I understood it was going to introduce far-reaching reforms not only in unemployment insurance, but in our social system in general, since it claimed to be filled with good intentions.

As for me, whatever government may be in power, I will never fail to approve of any legislation providing help for those who have to rely on public assistance.

I have already said that legislation stands in need of continued improvement. I feel that at this time, because of the unemployment which is far more acute this year than anything we have known since the war, we should be prepared to do more.

I have attempted to understand this problem of unemployment by looking at statistics. If I look at the monthly bulletin put out by the Labour Gazette I must admit that the information provided there is unfortunately altogether incomplete. We are given figures about men at work, we are told how many claims there have been for unemployment insurance benefits, the amount of claims allowed and so on, but we are not told how many unemployed do not qualify for benefits. How many unemployed are at this time not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits? We know nothing about it. To understand perfectly the problem of unemployment as it exists in this country, the Labour Gazette should publish fuller information. All we can do about this matter at this time is to act on feeling alone, knowing nothing of the basic factors of the problem.

Newspaper reports tell us that at the present time there are 392,000 unemployed. How many of those people do not receive unemployment benefits?

Moreover, there is confusion, as was stated quite often in the past, between statistics of the dominion bureau of statistics and those of the unemployment insurance commission. One thing is certain. It is that the unemployed care little about statistics. That is what happened not so long ago in Vancouver when a Conservative member tried to explain to 1,000 unemployed people that, owing to the present policy of the government, there was more work available than last year. These people replied: "What do we care about your statistics, give us jobs."

If we are to maintain the prestige and value of our democratic system, the government must take strong measures, even if it has to resort to deficit budgeting. Its first duty is to fight unemployment efficiently.

Recently two hundred Hungarians clamoured to be sent back home because they had failed to find in Canada the jobs they had a right to expect. Today the first right of man, after his right to live, is the right to work. In my own country, I see healthy people of 45 or 50 years of age who are jobless.

People at 65, in perfect health, who could still be useful to society cannot find jobs; qualified engineers with an experience of 10 or 15 years, at a time when we complain about a shortage of engineers in Canada, are turned down because industry cannot pay them a decent salary. I am therefore inclined to think that there is something wrong with our system. I take this opportunity to urge our national authorities to assume their responsibilities instead of being satisfied with half measures.

What I am saying today, I have said before; I have always held the same opinion. A country as rich as ours; one of the leading democratic countries which now sets itself as an example for other countries by its broad-mindedness and its tolerance; a country anxious to take an important part in international affairs, must start by putting its own house in order. This unemployment problem being extremely important, we must strive first and foremost to find a solution to it. Any government which can solve that problem shall deserve our gratitude.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate seems to have bothered the minister somewhat by asking him to make some statements in relation to the province of Ontario in so far as this particular proposal is concerned. I feel that perhaps as an Ontario member the minister might be a bit more liberal with his information by giving me some answers in relation to the position of Ontario in connection with the negotiations that have preceded this measure.

I have received from the city of Port Arthur a copy of a resolution that was passed around by a number of cities, approved and sent to Premier Frost about a month ago—and I believe it was also sent to the present federal ministers—asking for immediate action on this question. We therefore know that the government of Ontario was under pressure from the municipalities to take advantage of the legislation. Obviously there has been a switch in the approach that Mr. Frost had towards this bill. Is that switch as a result of some negotiations with the minister? Are these changes exactly what Mr. Frost wants? Have we an assurance that Ontario will sign or take up this agreement that is contained in the new bill. How much money will it mean to Ontario and hence to the municipalities in the way of assistance? How much of this money that is going from the federal government to the provinces under this act will go directly to the municipalities? Will the provincial government—and this is an accusation that I have seen in the Toronto press—retain at least 10 per cent of this money for themselves or in other words for their administration? Has the minister any of the answers to those questions?

Mr. Monteith: I think I have given some of those figures previously to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The hon. member for Port Arthur mentioned that there had been a petition from the city of Port Arthur to the provincial government. I think that is what the hon. member said.

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Monteith: I can understand that concern on the part of the city of Port Arthur. As I mentioned earlier, I have tabled correspondence with the province of Ontario which we have had since June 10 on this matter of the possibility of the province of Ontario signing an agreement under the Unemployment Assistance Act. As to the other provinces, there were six which had signed prior to July, 1956, which agreements were ratified at the time of the federal legislation at that date. It seemed only reasonable that as time went by other provinces might be interested in joining and signing agreements with us. As I intimated earlier, I hope all ten provinces do so.

Mr. Barnett: This question as to whether or not there was adequate consultation with the provinces before this proposal in the schedule to this bill was brought into parliament I think has some rather interesting aspects. My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has brought this point forward. Some of us in the house listened to the exchange and the discussion that took place between the minister and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. We all realize that in times past in this house when the party to which the minister belongs was sitting over here on the opposition side we used to hear quite a bit about this question of the need for consulting with the provinces. If the minister is inclined to think that some of us who are still over on this side of the house are unduly concerned about this matter in view of the explanation he has given, I should like to suggest to him that perhaps part of that concern results from the kind of interjections that were made by the hon. member for Peel earlier this afternoon and which were designed to emphasize something which he and many of the Conservatives in this house and outside of the house have been doing, namely trying to create the impression throughout the country that somehow, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister, a great new era of dominion-provincial relations has been ushered in. I am sure the minister will understand that some of us over here may have some scepticism on this subject and that we are still open to be convinced by something more than the sort of thing we heard on the election hustings. I do not see that the minister should be worried whenever questions are asked by people like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on this subject.

Mr. Monteith: Did the hon. member say "worried"?

Mr. Barnett: The minister may not be prepared to admit that but, sitting over here, I had the impression that he was not too happy about some of the questions that were being asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

An hon. Member: What are you doing, making a mountain out of a molehill?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Were you here?

Mr. Barnett: This is a fairly important consideration as far as the Canadian people are concerned. Great claims in this connection have been made by the present Prime Minister. Part of our duty here as members of this house is to assess, and to assist the Canadian people to assess, the validity or otherwise of the claims which were made by the present Prime Minister as to what he would do if he assumed office. From the discussion that has taken place I think it has become obvious that, without perhaps using the term in a derogatory sense, this is a take it or leave it proposition. The minister says that it is a good proposition. He suggests that it is so good that anybody would be foolish not to take it. I certainly agree with him in the hope that all ten provinces will see fit to come under the provisions of this act. Nevertheless I do not see that anything he has done in this connection gives him, the hon. member for Peel or anybody else over there on the opposite side of the house, any right to claim that the course of action that has been pursued by the administration is very much different from the sort of action that was pursued by the members who are now in the official opposition when they were carrying on negotiations with the provinces. Sitting over here where I do in the C.C.F. corner of the house perhaps I can say this, because I might be considered an impartial observer as to the activities of the Liberal party and the Conservative party and their relative merits.

An hon. Member: Merits?

Mr. Barnett: Or lack of merits. My colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo, with his usual astuteness, suggests there is perhaps not as much merit in the actions of either of them as they would like to suggest there is.

There is one aspect of this matter which is implicit in the schedule to the bill which we have before us, as it was in the schedule to the original Old Age Assistance Act that came before this house, and which has yet not been touched upon. I think it is one of the reasons that lie behind the arguments we have been making that a more proper solution would have been for the federal authority to assume 100 per cent of the responsibility in the field of unemployment. As I see it—and the minister can correct me if I am wrong—under the new situation that will exist when this bill is passed we shall still have people in some parts of Canada getting from the federal government different levels of assistance than people in other parts of Canada are getting, because of different rates that may be paid by different provinces.

Now I am not suggesting to the minister that within the terms of the schedule he should have the right to dictate to any province what rate they shall pay. Nevertheless I think that is one of the facts of the situation facing us and it would perhaps be useful if the minister would now give us, since the subject of the Old Age Assistance Act is reopened, a picture of what rates are being paid at the present time by the six provinces who now have agreements with the federal government and in respect of which the federal treasury is considering 50 per cent of the cost.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I presume the hon. member for Comox-Alberni refers to the rates paid to individuals by the various provinces?

Mr. Barnett: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is what I had in mind. The rates paid by the provinces to which the federal government contributes under this act for those who are in need and are not covered by unemployment insurance or any other form of assistance.

Mr. Monteith: I might state, Mr. Chairman, that the average of assistance paid per individual varies greatly from province to province, in fact from $8 per person per month in New Brunswick to a range of $9 to $13 in Newfoundland, $11 to $16 in Prince Edward Island, $15 to $23 in Saskatchewan, $19 to $24 in Manitoba and $30 to $32 in British Columbia.

Mr. Barnett: So that I might be quite clear on this point, may I take it that those figures which the minister has just given are the total payments made to the individuals by the provinces, on which the federal authority reimburses them.

Mr. Monteith: Right.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister repeat the figure for Newfoundland?

Mr. Monteith: Newfoundland $9 to $13.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well I think those rates have just been increased again.

Mr. Monteith: That could very well be.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave.

Mr. Monteith moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEPENDANTS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooks for the second reading of Bill No. 35, to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, members of the official opposition spoke extensively on this bill when it was before this house earlier at the resolution stage. We do not now propose to add to or to repeat the representations which we made at that time. We do however wish to confirm our support of this bill and to say at the same time that we feel further changes are necessary in the veterans' legislation in order to embody those representations which have been made from this side of the house and also from veterans' organizations.

The spirit of our veterans' legislation is that the veteran should always be given the benefit of doubt. Many of us have come across cases which would seem to indicate that the law is administered in accordance with the letter rather than the spirit and consequently the veterans are deprived of the benefit of doubt.

The hon. member for Kootenay West mentioned this afternoon cases of disability where the condition had been ruled to have existed prior to enlistment. We feel that any veteran who was accepted by the medical authorities on behalf of the government and inducted into any of the armed services must be given the benefit of doubt, and whether any condition existed or not, the fact that the government accepted him in that condition necessitates that the government should therefore accept responsibility and rule that any condition developing afterwards was attributable to his service.

There are other cases where veterans developed conditions during service which necessitated surgical operation. Sometimes many years after his discharge another condition develops which is not related to the condition for which the operation was performed, but to the operation itself. We feel that in such cases the veteran should also receive the benefit of doubt.

There are cases of cancer development, hypertensional blood pressure, all of which developed in postwar years many years after the veteran was discharged and which have been attributed to pre-enlisted conditions. We feel in such cases they should be ruled as resulting from service.

There are also cases such as mental and nervous disorders which often develop after discharge and, in view of the hardships, the stresses and the strains to which the veteran has been subjected in his service, particularly while on active service, who is to say that these conditions would have developed had the veteran not enlisted at all. We feel in all these cases the veteran should receive the benefit of doubt.

Furthermore, there are cases resulting from incomplete records. The legislation as it is now administered gives the advantage to the type of person who reports to the medical officer for any ailment, however trivial. On the other hand, there are other veterans who in private life would never develop that kind of habit and have even made light of their illnesses although they were serious.

There were also cases when they did develop serious ailments but did not recognize them as such and therefore failed to report them at the proper time, and this was particularly so with regard to men on small vessels and patrol boats operating in rough waters. Small injuries occurred, but the servicemen did not think them worth bothering about and consequently there was no record of these happenings. Later on, when some complication developed from these injuries, the absence of a record handicapped them in having these disabilities attributed to service.

We regret that the government has not seen fit to embody in this bill the recommendations made by the Canadian Legion with respect to the special case of Newfoundland veterans. We regret also that the government has not seen fit to follow the established procedure and have this bill go before the committee on veterans affairs. However, we have been assured by the minister that a veterans affairs committee will be set up next session and we hope the government will take the opportunity to give this legislation a thorough overhaul and bring in further legislation in accordance with the representations of the Canadian Legion and hon. members on this side of the house.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take very much time addressing the house because while we were on the resolution stage a number of hon. members from this group spoke and expressed their approval of the measure. The matters covered by this bill are in accordance with requests made from time to time by the committee on veterans affairs and, also, I think they go a very long way toward meeting the requests of the various veterans organizations.

When we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs I suggested that perhaps the main weakness in the Pensions Act could be found in sections 13 and 70. Section 13 deals with disabilities of pre-enlistment origin. A great deal of time has been taken up in committees in the past in dealing with this section, and the minister has, I understand, promised that further consideration will be given to these suggestions. He has said that next session a committee on veterans affairs will be dealing with the Pensions Act and that further consideration may be given to this section at that time.

The other section is section 70—probably the most contentious section in the act,—the one about the benefit of a doubt. Here again, veterans affairs committees have spent a lot of time in the past discussing this matter, and amendments have been moved to try to improve the section, but there is still a feeling among veterans organizations that veterans today are still not getting the full benefit of the doubt. I cited a case, when we were discussing the estimates, of a veteran who had died and whose widow had been refused a pension. Since then I have received a letter from the pension commission explaining the case to me and pointing out that in the light of all the circumstances it would not be possible for them to award that widow a pension even though they gave her the full benefit of the doubt. When I raised that case I did not criticize the pension commission. I pointed out then that I believed they were going just as far as they could under the terms of section 70.

But I did suggest, and again I make the suggestion to the minister, that consideration should be given to giving the pension commission greater latitude in dealing with cases under this section. I think they should have more power and we could give them this greater power because otherwise I am sure we will continue to have complaints as we have had in the past from veterans organizations that many of the veterans who apply for help under this section are not getting the benefit of the doubt. I trust that when the committee on veterans affairs is set up next session section 70 will also be given very serious consideration.

So I will say again that we think the bill is a good bill. It goes quite a long way, and if we can make as much progress next year with regard to the other sections we will certainly have accomplished a good deal.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, there is one point I should like to raise at this time. I have taken this matter up with the minister and with the pensions board and I have received co-operation in every way, but it just seems to me that the way the law is at present this young woman I am going to talk about can get no help whatever. This young woman's husband was killed while going home on leave in France somewhere. This young woman has two children and can get no pension of any kind. I have had the matter explained to me. The way the law reads at present it seems nothing can be done for her, but I am going to appeal to the minister or to the government to take some action so that this woman may receive some pension.

When these young fellows went to the war they were promised anything they asked for. Here we have this chap buried in France somewhere. The wife is alive, and the only thing that keeps her from getting a pension is that her husband went on leave at six o'clock at night and was killed at eight o'clock. What difference does that make? He would never have been in France if he had not joined the air force. I do not want to dwell on this, but it does seem to me there is something wrong when we cannot do something for the women who are left. It is true that this man was not on duty when he was killed, but if he had not joined the air force he would have been driving a tractor or something else at home. But he joined the air force, and the defence of the department with regard to this pension is that he was not on duty at the time.

These fellows who enlist are going to be in the peace army and, just at the crack of the whip, in an hour's time, they can be in the war army, call it anything you like. I do hope the minister is going to do something about this case. I visited this lady and the two small children and believe me, gentlemen, it is a pitiful case and something should be done about it.

I have another case here. I went to the department to get information about it and there is just one question I want to ask. It deals with a man who is getting a pension, and who becomes mentally sick and is confined to a mental hospital. I understand from the department that they pay for the hospitalization of that man, and have his pension accumulate. If he gets better, he gets the whole thing back. If he dies it reverts to the crown. I wonder if the minister thinks on a Saturday afternoon when the patient's relatives come to the hospital and take him this and take him that, surely if he has got a disability pension he should have the right to spend some of the money whether he is mentally sick or not. When you visit a hospital you often see the patients smoking. Who is going to give them their cigarettes? They should be allowed to buy their own. The same thing applies to the veterans allowance. If a man dies it reverts to the crown. That is accumulated over some time. These are situations which could be improved upon by amendments to the Pension Act.

I want to ask the minister one other thing. Is there anything left in the fund that was collected in connection with Hong Kong? Mr. Chairman, I am just wasting my wind here in talking because the minister is not even listening.

Mr. Brooks: I am sorry.

Mr. Bryce: I am always as brief as I possibly can be when I rise to speak in order to save the time of the house but when I do ask a question I feel I am entitled to expect a civil answer.

Mr. Brooks: I apologize to the hon. member. I was interrupted at the time as the hon. member no doubt noticed. Would he ask his question again because I followed him up to that point.

Mr. Bryce: I would not criticize you for the world but I do want to know something about the Hong Kong fund. Is there any money left in it? I want to know what they are going to do with it. Are those people who were at Hong Kong and who are still alive going to get it? I think there were 26 people who were never found; what is going to be done with the share of the 26 missing men? My friend the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) in his remarks covered practically everything that could be said on this subject at this time and I wish to express my agreement with what he said about the disability pension being raised by one-third. When it was set it was sought to bring the basic pension up in relation to the prevailing wages in the district. In many cases it never did that and this should be taken care of. I know of many cases, and I am sure the minister knows of many too, involving people who through war service have developed various conditions of ill health and ailments which render them unable to work. When they seek assistance they are advised that their condition has nothing to do with their enlistment and I think some consideration should be given to these matters.

Most of the other points I intended to deal with have been covered by the hon. member for Kootenay West and I support him 100 per cent in the requests he has made. I will be looking for answers to the questions we have raised when the minister rises to deal with our questions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

On clause 1—Retention of benefits under Civil Service Act.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might make a few remarks in connection with some of the questions that were asked. In the first place, the hon. member for Kootenay West spoke about hospitalization. I might point out that hospitalization does not come under this act. However, the hon. member mentioned some cases which came to his attention with reference to Shaughnessy hospital. I might say that his information is not the same as the information which we had in the department but it is our intention to investigate the criticisms that have been made by the hon. gentleman and we intend to investigate the facts. While I do not doubt the hon. member nor do I doubt the veteran who has written to him, it is often our experience that when we go over the files in these cases, we find the situation is different from what is stated in the letters which hon. members receive.

The hon. member for Kootenay West also spoke about the brief presented by the Canadian Legion; as a matter of fact, he based most of his remarks on that brief which, as hon. members know, was presented to us just a short time ago. I might point out that we have reviewed the brief with officials and representatives of the Canadian Legion and we also reviewed this bill with them. It has been nearly a month since the resolution was before the house. The bill is well known to all hon. members and also to the various veterans organizations. The Canadian Legion, I am sure, went through it with a fine tooth comb. They agreed to practically every provision in the bill with the exception of about four sections. We spent a couple of hours the other day with officials and representatives of the Legion and came to agreement with them on certain amendments to the bill.

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo with reference to Newfoundland veterans, I think there is a real case there and I am very much surprised that the problem of the Newfoundland veteran has not been dealt with before this time. It should have been dealt with long ago and I am extremely surprised that this problem was not solved when the terms of confederation were discussed with Newfoundland. However, the problem which the hon. member raised with reference to the Newfoundland veteran who served with the British forces during the second world war is not different from the problem of many hundreds—I think I might say over 1,000—veterans whose domicile was in Canada before the first world war and who served in Great Britain. They receive exactly the same treatment as does the Newfoundland veteran. This is a matter which certainly should be and must be considered by a veterans committee. Any veteran who is a Canadian, whether he comes from Newfoundland or from any other part of Canada, should receive exactly the same treatment as that received by other Canadian veterans. That is my opinion and I think that would be the opinion of a veterans committee which might review the matter. I can assure the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo that it will be given every consideration.

The hon. member also mentioned the benefit of the doubt and used the words, "we feel on this side of the house". I wonder who he means by "we"? Does he mean the present opposition, the former government? I wonder why they did not feel that way over the past years? The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo was, I think, a member of the veterans affairs committee in 1952 and I did not hear him bring up this matter at that time although, as the hon. member for Acadia and other hon. members who have spoken tonight have said, this question of the benefit of the doubt has been before veterans committees on many occasions. Of course, the present opposition was then the government and were in power for some 22 years while our party has only been in power for a few months. However, this is a matter which I assure my hon. friend, will receive consideration.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member for Acadia was very brief tonight. I may say I listened with close attention to the recommendations he made. I sat on a good many committees with him and I do not think any member of those committees gave more attention to representations by the Legion and other veterans organizations or made sounder recommendations than did the hon. member for Acadia. We will certainly give attention to the recommendations he has made.

My very good friend, the hon. member for Selkirk, has always been very sympathetic to the veterans. No one has been more sympathetic. He mentioned some individual cases. Unfortunately the act seemingly does not provide for these cases. We will go into them again and if they can be brought under the act we will certainly be very glad to see that they are taken care of.

The hon. member referred to a mental case and wanted to know the answer. If the mental patient in hospital has a credit balance the hospital superintendent may authorize allowances for clothing and comforts. If the veteran dies the credit balance does not form part of his estate but if he has dependants they get it. The statement of the hon. member is quite correct that it would go back to the government if he had no dependants.

Mr. Bryce: But if he has dependants it goes back to them.

Mr. Brooks: It goes to his dependants. The hon. member spoke about a Hong Kong fund. I am not aware of any Hong Kong fund and I have a note from the official advising me that there is no such fund. The hon. member no doubt refers to the question of reparations. A special commission was appointed to deal with those claims which was headed by Mr. Justice Thane Campbell of Prince Edward Island.

I think these are the main points that have been brought to our attention tonight. We will be very glad to deal with any other questions which may arise as we deal with the different sections of the bill.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the minister most sincerely for the remarks he has made with respect to Newfoundland veterans, for his sympathetic attitude and for his assurance that the case of the Newfoundland veterans will be brought before a veterans affairs committee next session. The minister raised the question of why we did not bring up this matter before. There is a very simple explanation. I gave part of the explanation when I spoke on the resolution stage of the bill, but I did not want to take up the time then to go farther.

The explanation is that this kind of case had not come to our attention. The bulk of veterans cases that come to the attention of members of parliament are cases dealing with the veterans allowance, and it must be remembered, as I pointed out when I spoke at the resolution stage, that the definition of a Newfoundland veteran in the veterans allowance act is satisfactory. We do not get very many complaints from pensioners and even those we do get are usually mixed up with the need for supplementation by veterans allowances.

The reason why we did not bring this matter up in the committee was that we did not really have any cases like these brought to our attention. We did have cases brought to our attention last year but it must be remembered that in the early part of the session the veterans affairs estimates did not come before the house and there was no opportunity to talk about the matter. In fact, it was only a short time ago that the minister brought his estimates before the house and there was an opportunity to discuss it. The minister said that there were cases similar to the Newfoundland veterans, and I think he cited British citizens who served in the Canadian forces and are now domiciled in Canada.

Mr. Brooks: If the hon. member will pardon me, they were Canadians domiciled in Canada who went overseas voluntarily, joined the British forces and served with the British forces. There are over a thousand of them in exactly the same position as the Newfoundland men who went over and served with the Imperials. As a matter of fact, most of them were first war veterans but there are some second war.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister most sincerely because he has just outlined the point I was going to make. He said that these were Canadian citizens domiciled in Canada who voluntarily by-passed the Canadian forces, went overseas and enlisted in the British forces. Our submission is that the Newfoundlanders are not in the same position. They did not by-pass the Canadian forces because we were not a part of Canada at that time, and so we say we are different. If there is an actual force in a person's own country and he deliberately by-passes it and enlists in the armed forces of another country that is his own business and he must take the consequences, but the Newfoundlanders did not do that. Had we been part of Canada we would have enlisted in the Canadian forces, as we did during the Korean war. The fact is that we were not a part of Canada at that time and did not by-pass the Canadian forces. We did the only thing we could do and the definition in the War Veterans' Allowance Act acknowledges that and gives us full status on the same basis as if we had served in the Canadian forces.

But in the case of the Pension Act the definition is different and is not nearly so clear. The trouble is both with the wording of the definition and the interpretation which the pension commission has placed upon it. I am told that during the second world war there were some members of the Royal Canadian Air Force who, because there was a shortage of airmen in Britain, were transferred to the Royal Air Force. As I understand it, they did not volunteer. There was an emergency and Britain was short of personnel to man her planes. We had men available and they were transferred to the Royal Air Force and served in that force very much in the same way as Newfoundland servicemen served in British forces, not of their own choice but because of the exigencies of the situation and because they were required as part of the war effort in an emergency.

I should like the minister to explain this matter because I am informed that when the veterans who went from the Royal Canadian Air Force to the Royal Air Force came back to Canada some sort of deal was worked out with the British ministry of pensions whereby that body agreed to pay a flat rate and the Canadian government supplemented those pensions to the full amount. If that is wrong, I should like the minister to correct me. But if it is right, we say that the same sort of treatment should be accorded to Newfoundland veterans.

Mr. Brooks: I assure the hon. member that he would have persuaded me if I were not persuaded before.

Mr. Blackmore: Before this clause is carried, I should like to bring two matters up for the consideration of the minister. Earlier in the day when the hon. member for Kootenay West was talking about certain veterans in need of treatment who, upon application to Shaughnessy hospital had been denied such treatment, the word came out that no veteran who was entitled to treatment or who was eligible for treatment was denied it. I should like to ask, what more should a man do than enlist and go through a war and be a veteran in order to entitle him to treatment in any hospital in this country? What do you mean by saying any veteran should not be entitled to help whenever he needs it and wherever he needs it?

Mr. Brooks: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; in the first place I never said that; and in the second place, we are not dealing with hospital treatment in this bill. Both the hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Lethbridge were out of order, as I think they will agree.

Mr. Blackmore: If the minister starts talking about being out of order we may do something about it. The important fact is that this question was brought up by the hon. member for Kootenay West. The minister undertook to answer it on the first clause of the bill when we went into committee. If it is not in order for me to raise the matter and ask the minister for clarification, I am just a little astonished. I just want to raise the matter, but if I am out of order I will just say this. If any veteran who has signed up and gone through a war is not entitled to such treatment as he needs in any hospital in this country, then the sooner everybody in Canada knows about it the better.

Mr. Brooks: May I say to the hon. member that the whole subject of treatment is under very serious consideration and study by the department. I am encouraging that study, but I must state again that the subject does not really come under this bill.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, I raised the question and I have told you what I mean and what I think. I hope I never have to sit in this house and hear any more of this particular doctrine that has been advocated in this connection.

The next matter that troubles me deeply is that the minister, out of the kindness of his heart, and I appreciate it, said that the department was considering various cases with a view to bringing these cases under the act. The question comes to my mind, have we drafted this act for the veterans or are we trying to make the veterans fit the act? If we have not drafted the act for the sake of the veterans it seems to me that we have gone off the track a long way. It seems to me that a veterans' act ought to include all veterans. I just wish to bring that to the minister's attention. I will not bother him any more at the present time. I appreciate the fact that he said these cases are receiving very careful attention. I hope they receive more careful attention than they received from the Liberal party during the years and years I have sat here while they formed the government.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to make mention of this word "entitled". Reference was made by the last speaker to the fact that any veteran who signed up and went through a war was entitled to something. I do not go along with that, and for this reason. I signed up, I went through the war and I came out with an A category. It is some time since I came out, and I do not feel I am entitled to any benefits under this act. I believe the same thing would apply to anybody who has come out with an A category because it is twelve years since that happened and I do not think we are entitled to anything under this act.

Mr. Blackmore: I might say that it is the men who are big, fine, noble men like this who pave the way for trouble for their weaker brethren. There are plenty of men, I will agree, who go through a war and at the end of it think they are all right. However any soldier who enlists for a modern war and goes right through that war, no matter how well he feels at the end of his service he has had things happen to his make-up which will tell on him sooner or later. Consequently we must have our act and our policies so framed that any veteran who needs treatment will be taken care of at any time.

Mr. Castleden: I should like to say that I believe the amendments to this act are in good order. There are some things here for which the Canadian Legion has been asking for a number of years and which I feel are very necessary in order to give a measure of justice to the men who served in the two wars.

I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Lethbridge has just said. As you travel through the country and visit Legion branches you find veterans of the first war who are today feeling the effects of their service in a way that they never realized they would feel them. Men who serve in a war, even when they come out with an A category, find that when they get to be 50 or 60 years of age the war has had an effect upon them. I understand that it is difficult to legislate exactly to cover all disabilities. If one interprets the act literally word for word I can see that there is a possibility of men not receiving justice who are deserving of it.

I note that the average age of veterans in Canada who are in receipt of pensions is something like 66.8 years, that is as of March, 1957. I do believe there is need for some easing of the interpretation of the act or the medical findings of the board when an application is made. I hope that the minister will ask his officers to give consideration to cases where veterans have come through the first war and who are now feeling the effects of that war. Some of these men received a pension, some received a pension and were taken off pension, and others did not receive any pension.

I have a particular case in my own constituency in mind. I wrote the minister about it some weeks ago, and I hope he is still investigating the matter. This case concerns a man who enlisted with the Canadian army in the first war. There were many volunteers from the west. This man was stationed in the barracks in Regina. There was a call for men to go out on harvesting leave to help with the harvesting. A great many men were called out at that time. His statement to me over a period of years has been that these men were ordered to go out on harvesting leave; the men were told they were expected to go out. His statement to me is they went on leave in that regard. He was unfortunate enough, while on leave, to have his arm badly mangled and the result was an amputation.

Apparently the officials of the department at that time—that is the Department of National Defence—thought this man deserved a pension and he received a pension of some $30 or $40 per month for the balance of the war. He continued on pension until 1919. He thought that was what was going to be paid to him. He had certainly been badly disabled, but perhaps not in active service. However, the pension was cut off and he has been denied any pension since that time. He continued all through life with his arm amputated and with that disability he carried on as best he could. The man is now retired and can no longer work. The pension he receives as a result of the work in which he was engaged is very small because he was in a more or less minor position and could not receive the same wages as an able bodied person would receive. He is now over 60 years of age. His pension is so small that he and his wife find considerable difficulty in making ends meet.

He is not a complaining man. He does his bit. He is a fine citizen. The pension commission refuses him any consideration on the ground that his service while going out on harvest leave was voluntary. He states that it was not voluntary. He only has his statement against that of the pension commission and they refuse to give any consideration to the matter. I have written to the minister and have asked him to take the case up and look into it with a view to seeing whether or not this man, for the few remaining years of his life, is not as much entitled to a pension today as he was when he first received the injury. I doubt whether the matter of whether or not he was ordered to go on leave can be finally settled at this time. I would just ask the minister to take into consideration the fact that this man volunteered to go and was willing to serve his country. He was granted a pension during the war. Public opinion probably demanded it. When the war ended or at least shortly thereafter his pension ended. The dispute about whether or not he was sent on harvest leave has been the one thing that has barred him.

I just draw this matter to the minister's attention and ask him if he would give this case consideration under the circumstances. If he can find proof that these men were not ordered out on harvest leave and can substantiate it, all right. But we have at any rate the statement of men who served at that time and others since then that those men were ordered out to do harvest work. Surely this is a deserving case. I am drawing it to the minister's attention and asking him if he will look into it and give me a reply to my letter.

Mr. Brooks: I thank the hon. member for Yorkton for drawing my attention to this case. As a matter of fact, I recall reading the case not very long ago and looking into it. This soldier received his pension I think in 1916.

Mr. Castleden: That is right.

Mr. Brooks: That is when he had his accident. The Pension Act was passed in 1919 and in the act there is a section, namely section 13 subsection (f), which reads as follows:

> (f) no pension shall be paid for disability or death incurred by a member of the forces,
> (i) while on leave of absence without pay—

Unfortunately under that section it is impossible to grant a pension to this man, unless that section should be amended at some time.

Mr. Castleden: The passing of the Pension Act excluded this man, in spite of the fact that the man had done what he considered was his duty. I would ask the minister to look into the correspondence. Several appeals were made. In one case where an investigation was made of the case those who came up and presented the case to the pension commission recommended in his favour. There has been considerable correspondence over the case. The man will not be with us for too many years. I think it is a case that is deserving of more consideration than it has had at the present time. He certainly had a pension during the time that the war was on. Since that time it has been cut off through a technicality.

Mr. Brooks: Yes. I think I recall some of the other facts of the case. The man went home to his father's farm, and it was while threshing on the father's farm that he lost his arm or it was mutiliated by the threshing machine.

Mr. Castleden: Yes. I draw the attention of the minister to the case. In fact, he had gone home on harvest leave and when the voluntary harvest leave was completed he went back to camp. It was after he went back to camp that they were ordered to go out and complete the harvest because the harvest was not completed. I think a search of the newspaper records of the time will vindicate what he said. However, I will not take up the time of the house any longer. I believe the minister will give the case consideration later.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Blackmore: May I suggest to the minister in all kindliness that I believe the house would entertain very thoughtfully any suggested change in the act which the minister thought appropriate to make. The act is not sacred as it stands.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Pension counsel.

Mr. Deniset: The more I read this section, the more I am convinced that there is in it what I would call a loophole. In order to explain what I mean I think I shall be obliged to read the old section first. It reads as follows:

> There may be appointed such number of persons as may be considered necessary, who shall be barristers or advocates of good standing at the bar of any of the provinces of Canada, to be officers of the department and to be called "pension counsel".

The amendment reads as follows:

> There may be appointed such number of persons as may be considered necessary, who are or have been barristers or advocates of good standing at the bar of any province, as officers of the department to be called "pension counsel".

I fully appreciate the purpose of this amendment which, as is stated in the bill itself, is to permit the appointment of persons with training in law who have elected to make a career in the public service, whether or not they have continued to pay annual dues to their respective law societies.

I submit that when you look at the persons eligible, who are or have been barristers or solicitors in good standing at the bar of any province, you might have a barrister who has been in good standing for quite a number of years and yet has become disbarred. With the way this section reads at the present time I submit that you could have a disbarred solicitor appointed as pension counsel, advocate or officer of the department. I would submit quite respectfully to the minister that somewhere in there, possibly after the words "of any province", he should add the words "who have not been disbarred". Otherwise you run the danger of possibly having a disbarred solicitor appointed as counsel for the department.

Mr. Brooks: I may explain to the hon. member that that point was fully considered when this bill was before the committee on legislation. It was felt that anyone who had been disbarred would not be considered for an appointment. The reason the section was changed was that in order to be in good standing with the law societies across Canada in the different provinces they would have to pay their fees. That is one of the qualifications, as the hon. member mentioned. But there are a good many younger lawyers who, after graduating, take up work with the public service. We did not think this section was broad enough to include them. The idea in changing it was to allow those younger men or men who had been in the public service and not paying fees to any barrister society to be eligible, to give them an opportunity. However, it was not felt that we were running any risk in connection with this question of disbarment; they would not be appointed.

Mr. Deniset: I respectfully submit that it is not clear just the same. You are leaving yourself open. Why leave a loophole in the legislation? Why not correct it before the bill is passed?

You might have solicitors who have been in good standing for several years but who have been disbarred for, let us say, two years and then have been re-instated. What of them?

Mr. Brooks: Well if they are re-instated they are in good standing.

Mr. Deniset: I respectfully submit you are taking an awful chance of something like that happening. Why not have something like "have not been disbarred" or something like that. It is not because the bill has already been printed that you do not want to change it.

Mr. Brooks: We did not consider it necessary.

Mr. Caron: It does not change anything much with the intention of the minister, but if it was marked on the bill it would be much clearer that a lawyer who had been disbarred would not be entitled to practise in that profession. I do not see why the minister or the government should refuse to accept the suggestion of the hon. member who has just spoken.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If I might make a comment, I think their experience with the clause as it is at the present time should be sufficient guarantee of the adequacy of the wording they are putting in, because it says "shall be barristers in good standing". That is in the act as it stands now.

Mr. Deniset: I am sorry but it does not say shall be—it says "have been".

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am speaking of the amendment as it is today, on this page you read yourself. A man might have made some mistake in his past life and might have been disbarred and then re-instated. Well then he is a barrister in good standing so he is qualified under the present legislation. I think their experience shows they are men of good sense in selecting counsel for their departments and they will do the same thing again. I do not think the danger is as great as the hon. member believes.

Mr. Deniset: Oh, I agree that we can expect a lot of good sense from the department, or any government department as a matter of fact; I think they would be very careful but you still have a loophole in there and I do not see why we should pass legislation that has loopholes.

Clauses 4 to 8 agreed to.

On clause 9—Physical or mental infirmity.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I would like to move that clause 9 be changed as follows:

Clause 9 subclause (2)—page 4, delete lines 23 to 29, both inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"(10a) when any pension has been awarded to a child or children of a member of the forces who, at the time of his death, was a widower and who, during his lifetime, maintained a domestic establishment for such child or children, pension at a rate not exceeding that provided in schedule B for a widow may, in the discretion of the Commission, be paid to a daughter or other person."

Mr. Brooks: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that that is one of the recommendations of the Canadian Legion and we agree that it should be changed.

Pension Act

On clause 16—Pension to parent where dependent.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister explain just how close this clause comes to meeting the requests of the Canadian Legion?

Mr. Brooks: This clause, Mr. Chairman, was considered by the officers of the department and myself with the members of the Canadian Legion just the other day. We spent some time on this clause and it was agreed that it be left as it is and they expressed the wish that when the committee was set up it would give further study to this matter.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17 agreed to.

On clause 18—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have the same amendment to make here, Mr. Chairman, with respect to clause 18—

On page 9 at line 9 the words "not more than" to be deleted so that it will read as it did before: "Where pension is awarded by the commission, or by an appeal board thereof, upon a date twelve months or more after the date of death, from the date of award, or, in the discretion of the commission, from a date 12 months prior thereto;"

Mr. Brooks: This is another recommendation of the Canadian Legion.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 19 and 20 agreed to.

On clause 21—Decision of remaining members.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have an amendment to move here, Mr. Chairman, to subclause (2) on page 10, line 4, to delete words "of an appeal board" and substitute therefor "on an appeal from a decision" so that the subsection will read:

An application based upon error in any decision on an appeal from a decision of the commission, by reason of evidence not having been presented,—

Bill reported.

Mr. Brooks moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Louis Deniset (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to labour the point which I was discussing a minute ago, but I think it deserves attention, though it might be considered a legal technicality. I strongly urge the minister to think it over, and possibly next time he will decide to amend the bill accordingly.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I assure the hon. member I will think this matter over, and I thank him very much for his suggestion.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PROVISION OF ANNUAL VACATIONS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES IN FEDERAL WORKS

The house resumed, from Friday, November 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Starr for the second reading of Bill No. 16, to provide for annual vacations with pay for employees in public works, undertakings and businesses.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it was on November 8 that I adjourned the debate on the second reading of this bill. The house will recall that at that period of the session we had been having considerable discussion about holidays with pay. A good deal has happened here since November 8, and possibly some hon. members may have forgotten that this was one of the topics of discussion at that time.

When I rose to speak on that occasion I drew to the attention of the house the fact that a bill somewhat similar to the one the minister is bringing in had been first introduced in this house in 1956 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Perhaps I may also remind the house at this time that a bill similar to the one which he introduced in 1956 has been under discussion in this house under another order.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out when I was speaking for a few minutes before this debate was adjourned, the principal point of difference as far as I see it between the bill which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) has brought into the house and the proposal which has been brought in on behalf of the C.C.F. group by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is that the minister's bill requires that an employee shall be entitled to only one week's vacation with pay after a year of employment whereas the bill which we are proposing would require that employees be given at least two weeks vacation after one year's employment. That, Mr. Speaker, will be the principal point on which we differ from the minister in the bill which he has introduced. I made it clear that we were glad that at last we had a bill of this kind sponsored on the government side of the house, and that in general we had no quarrel with the minister for bringing in a bill the principle of which was to provide for annual vacations with pay.

One of the interesting things which was mentioned by my colleague the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) when he spoke on November 8 was the fact that on July 27, 1956, ten of the members of the present government voted in favour of a bill which provided for two week's vacation with pay after one year's employment, and therefore we are somewhat at a loss to know why the present Minister of Labour has not seen fit to incorporate this provision into his bill. There is another point in the bill which we have under discussion which I think deserves some attention. When the minister introduced this bill on second reading, he pointed out on page 925 of Hansard that the provision for annual vacation does not apply if the employment is less than 30 days in duration.

Mr. Speaker, I have given this question a little thought. I have in my hand a copy of the bill providing for annual holidays with pay in British Columbia, and I think I should point out to the minister that there is no limiting factor such as he is suggesting in our British Columbia act. Section 5 of the annual holidays with pay for employees act of British Columbia provides in subsection 1, and I am quoting:

> Where an employee's employment terminates before he becomes entitled to an annual holiday in accordance with section 4, the employer shall on the termination of employment pay to the employee in addition to any payment accruing to him for his service an amount equal to 4 per cent of his total wages and salary earned during the period of his employment.

As you will note, Mr. Speaker, there is no limiting period during which an employee must work for a given employer in order to be entitled to holiday pay. Theoretically, at least, if he has worked for one hour he is entitled to 4 per cent of that hour's wages when his employment is terminated, and while I am not suggesting that normal employment should be of that short duration, nevertheless this is an important question in respect to many of the tradesmen of our country. This was the experience we had when holidays with pay were first brought in by law in British Columbia; many of the tradesmen of our province, carpenters and plumbers and electricians to name only a few, were being disqualified from receiving the benefits of the legislation because of the fact that they normally did not work a full year for one employer.

Now I should like to suggest to the minister that the effect of this limitation in his bill will be to disqualify tradesmen who may be working in the employment of companies under federal jurisdiction.

As a result the tradesmen, if they happen to work in an undertaking under federal jurisdiction, are going to find themselves in many cases entitled to less vacation pay than they would have if they confined their activities entirely to work under provincial jurisdiction. Certainly that will be the case in the province of British Columbia and I think that is a point well worth consideration because of the fact that workers in those categories normally do not engage in a continuous period of employment with any one particular employer. In their case at least there would be no validity to an argument being advanced that attachment to a certain employer for a given minimum period should be a requirement of entitlement to holiday pay.

This bill, of course, is confined to providing vacations with pay for those who are not employed by the federal government but who do come under federal labour jurisdiction. However, I think it should be considered in relation to the provisions which do apply to those who are directly employed by the federal government. According to information I received on a quick check of this matter I believe those who are classified as civil servants receive one and one-half days off for each month with pay for the purpose of vacation up to a maximum of 18 days exclusive of Sundays and holidays in one fiscal year.

Generally speaking those who are in the category of being prevailing rate employees receive one week after one year of service and two weeks after two years of service but there is one particular classification of people employed by the federal government for whom no provision for holidays is made. I refer to those who are considered to be casual employees. Those are people who may work for the government for a period of time and in this case, we will say, then work for an employer who comes under federal labour jurisdiction; as it stands those people are going to be entitled to less than the normal period of vacation with pay.

I think it might be well worth considering when we are passing a bill providing vacations with pay for employees under federal labour jurisdiction we should at the same time pick up these loose ends of employment in the government service. The minister should consider this question in relation to this bill and should be prepared before consideration of it is completed to bring in some appropriate amendment to the bill which would ensure that those who are in the direct employ of the government of Canada in any capacity are not going to be entitled to vacations with pay under conditions less favourable than those that are going to be provided in this bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since it is within two minutes of ten o'clock perhaps you might permit me to move the adjournment of the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Has the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre permission to move the adjournment of the debate at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, may I ask what will be the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with item No. 9 on today's order paper, the second reading of the bill to provide for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities and then take the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Justice.

Mr. Marler: Has the house leader been able to peer into the future as far as Saturday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, it is rather dangerous to peer very far ahead in this parliament, I think. I am not sure yet about Saturday. We may go on with the agricultural bill or we may take estimates and if we do take estimates we would take the same two departments, and possibly add one or two more departments just for good measure.

Mr. Marler: There is no law against optimism.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the rumours that some of the employees around the building have heard to the effect that the government might change its plans and have us adjourn tomorrow night, may I ask whether or not that is correct?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, now I know where the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gets a lot of his information.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You must admit they are a very good source.

Mr. Green: I am hoping that the Prime Minister will be back in his seat on Saturday morning. There is no intention whatever of adjourning tomorrow night.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS POSTPONED

Question No. 182—Mr. Bourget:

1. Has the government decided not to proceed during the present fiscal year with certain of the projects provided for in the main and supplementary estimates of the Department of Public Works?

2. If so, what projects?

Answer by: Mr. Hodgson, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

1. Yes.

2. The projects listed below:

Location	Project	Reason
	ARCHITECTURAL PROJECTS
New Glasgow, N.S.	Federal building	Site unsettled.
Oromocto, N.B.	Federal building	Site unsettled.
Dorion, P.Q.	Federal building	Drawings had to be changed.
Nicolet, P.Q.	Federal building	Site unsettled.
Quebec, P.Q.	Postal terminal	Site unsettled.
Morrisburg, Ont.	Post office	Site unsettled.
Emerson, Man.	Customs building	Requirements changed.
Glacier National Park, B.C.	Federal housing	Alternative scheme being investigated.
London, England	Canadian government building	Site unsettled.
	ENGINEERING PROJECTS
Glace Bay, N.S.	Harbour improvements	The original project has been found unsatisfactory and alternate proposals are being studied.
Pleasant Harbour, N.S. (Glawson's Cove)	Breakwater-wharf	Site changed to Carter's Point.
Port Hood, N.S.	Breakwater	Borings show that known deposits of rock do not continue in depth and as a result the cost of securing the rock has greatly exceeded the original estimate. Efforts are continuing to find suitable rock at a reasonable cost.
Port Medway, N.B. (Long Cove)	Breakwater reconstruction	Site has not been acquired.
Back Bay, N.B.	Wharf extension	This project requires further study to effect most economic method of repair.
Ste. Agathe des Monts, P.Q. (Lac des Sables)	Wharf	Site not obtained.
St. Flavie, P.Q.	Dredging	This was to remove old wharf. Project was abandoned after many protests.
Mutton Bay, P.Q.	Wharf	Site has not yet been acquired.
Pointe au Pere, P.Q.	Wharf improvements	It has been found necessary to carry out further planning.
Riviere du Loup, P.Q.	Wharf improvements	Detailed borings on the site have shown that a very expensive type of construction would be required to provide the improvements.
Little Cascapedia River, P.Q.	Dredging	Bathurst Power & Paper Co. were to share cost with Department of Public Works. Company advised that dredging was unnecessary because they had revised their proposed construction layout.

Questions

LABOUR FORCE—ADDITIONS AND UNEMPLOYED

Question No. 292—Mr. Robichaud:

1. What was the total number of workers added to the labour force in Canada in each year from 1953 to 1957, inclusive?

2. What was the total number of unemployed in Canada on or about December 10, in each year from 1953 to 1957, inclusive?

3. What was the total number of unemployed registered at the Edmundston, Campbellton and Bathurst offices on or about December 10, 1956?

4. What was the total number of unemployed registered at the same offices on or about December 10, 1957?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. Growth of the labour force—1953-1957 (in thousands)

APPENDIX

CANADIAN COLOMBO PLAN PROJECTS IN INDIA, PAKISTAN AND CEYLON

December 18, 1957.

This statement describes a number of projects and forms of aid in India, Pakistan and Ceylon which each of the governments concerned has recommended, and which have recently been approved by Canada. These aid projects will be financed by funds already voted by parliament, or provided for in the main estimates of the Department of External Affairs for 1957-58, with the exception that the total aid approved for India will require for its completion $5 million of 1958-59 Canadian Colombo plan funds.

India

Discussions have been under way since January last between Canadian and Indian officials as to the allocation of the $21 million tentatively earmarked by the Canadian government out of the Colombo plan fund for capital assistance in India.

The program, proposed by the Indian government, and now approved by the Canadian government, is set out below.

(a) Canada-India Reactor—When the Canada-India reactor agreement was signed two years ago, it was estimated that the external cost of the reactor would be approximately $7,544,000, and it was agreed by the two governments that the bulk of these dollar costs, which were to be financed by Canada, would be met without affecting the regular Canadian aid program in India. $5 million of these external expenditures were met out of 1956-57 funds. In order to proceed with the work on the project, it has been decided to make available a further $2 million. Such additional sums as will be needed to complete the reactor will be a charge on such funds as may be allocated to India in 1958-59.

(b) Kundah-Madras Transmission Line—The Kundah project is a substantial hydroelectric development in Madras State in south India. It is designed to bring power to a rapidly developing industrial area around the major seaport of Madras.

Canadian participation up to $20 million for engineering services and electric generating equipment and auxiliary equipment, was approved in 1956. $13 million was allocated for this project out of money made available in 1955-1956. The balance of $7 million was provided out of sums made available in 1956-1957.

Canada has now agreed to meet up to $5 million of the external cost of a transmission line which will link this hydroelectric project with the electricity distribution system of Madras State, subject to satisfactory detailed arrangements being worked out with the government of India.

(c) Railway Ties—One of the basic economic problems of India is the lack of adequate transportation facilities. Goods are at times available in one part of India which can not easily be transported to another area where they are needed. The world bank mission, which visited India, concluded that the expansion and modernization of the railway system should be a matter of the highest priority.

Canada has already contributed locomotives and boilers to the India railway system under the Colombo plan. Additional assistance is still, however, a matter of great urgency. The government has, accordingly, approved a request of the Indian government for $3 million worth of treated wooden railway ties.

(d) Cobalt Beam Therapy Units—Canada has approved a request of the Indian government for three cobalt beam therapy units to be used in hospitals in Calcutta, Bombay and Ludhiana. The total cost of these units will be $120,000.

(e) Audio-Visual Equipment and Educational Material—The Canadian government has agreed to provide up to $65,000 worth of audio-visual equipment and educational material for co-operative training centres in India.

(f) Industrial Metals—India's development plans place great emphasis on the expansion and modernization of her metal-working industry. Canada has agreed to provide India with up to $10.8 million worth of copper, aluminum and nickel. This aid scheme is similar to the arrangement under which Canada supplied India with $5 million worth of metals during the past two years.

The sale of these metals to Indian industry by the Indian government will generate counterpart funds of rupees. The governments of India and Canada will explore the various uses and projects to which these counterpart funds may be allocated.

(g) Wheat—The sums made available for those projects are in addition to the provision of $7 million worth of wheat already provided to India in the past few months.

Pakistan

The bulk of Canadian Colombo plan funds available for Pakistan are committed to the Warsak hydroelectric project. However, sufficient funds are available for other small projects; Canada has now agreed to undertake two additional transmission line schemes, as outlined below subject to satisfactory detailed arrangements being worked out with the government of Pakistan.

Bheramara-Kushtia Power Transmission Line

The Ganges-Kobadak irrigation scheme is part of a multi-purpose project for the irrigation and development of the Brahmaputra-Ganges delta in East Pakistan. In addition to irrigating a substantial area of arid land by pumping water from the river Ganges into certain old river-beds which are thus to become irrigation canals, this project will also produce electric power. Canada, Pakistan and the United States are contributing to the over-all scheme.

In 1954, Canada agreed to the allocation of $1.8 million for a steam power plant at Bheramara as a part of this broad scheme. A suitable plant has now been purchased and erected.

Canada has now agreed to build, at a cost of $1 million, a power transmission line from this generating plant for about 20 miles to a developing light industrial area which is acutely in need of electric power. Half of the sum required will be allocated from funds previously authorized for the power station but now no longer required.

Dacca-Chittagong Power Transmission Line

In 1954, Canada agreed to the allocation of $4 million to provide equipment and engineering services for the construction of an electricity transmission line between Dacca, the provincial capital, and Chittagong, the chief seaport of East Pakistan. The line was designed to carry power from Dacca, where a steam plant is under construction, to Chittagong some 153 miles away, where there is an urgent need for power.

It was understood in 1954 that a surplus of power would be created in the Chittagong area when the Karnafuli hydroelectric plant near Chittagong was completed by the United States. The Canadian transmission towers were, therefore, designed to carry two circuits, with a view to the ultimate reversal of flow from Chittagong to Dacca and an increase in the amount of power transmitted, but Canada did not at that time undertake to supply the second circuit.

At the request of the government of Pakistan, Canada has now agreed to provide the second circuit, in view of the need for it in the fairly near future. It is estimated that the cost will amount to $1.6 million, providing that it is erected at the same time as the first circuit.

Ceylon

Discussions have recently taken place between Ceylon and Canada concerning the allocation of $2 million earmarked for the 1957-58 Canadian Colombo plan capital aid program in Ceylon. Ceylon suggested that $1 million worth of this amount be supplied in flour. Canada has approved this proposal, as indicated to the house on October 22 by the Prime Minister. With regard to the counterpart funds, which will be created by the sale of the flour to distributors in Ceylon, arrangements will be made to allocate these to development purposes.

With regard to the other $1 million, Ceylon has submitted the following proposals, which have been accepted by Canada.

Additional Transmission Lines in the Gal Oya Valley

In this area in eastern Ceylon, Canada has been contributing to the construction of power lines as part of a multipurpose agricultural development scheme. Last year $400,000 was made available for power lines in connection with the irrigation pumping stations. Canada will now undertake a further stage in the construction of the electric power transmission system in the development area, at a cost of $200,000.

Remedial Equipment for the Rehabilitation Centre at the University of Ceylon

Remedial equipment to a value of $12,500 will be provided for the treatment of crippled and deformed people under a teaching and training program of the University of Ceylon.

Continuation of Canadian Aerial Survey in Ceylon

One of the major Canadian projects in Ceylon has been the carrying out of an aerial photographic survey which Ceylon regards as an essential basis for its economic development program. At the request of the Ceylon government, Canada has now agreed to undertake a supplementary geophysical survey at an estimated cost of $750,000, of which $640,000 will be allocated from this year's funds and the balance from the 1958-59 program.

Pest Control Units

A number of agricultural pest control units have already been supplied to Ceylon by Canada, initially as a pilot project, and then as a continuing project. At the request of the Ceylon authorities, Canada will provide an additional four units this year, at a cost of $14,000.

Standby Radio Unit for Colombo Airport

In 1954 Canada agreed to provide $205,000 worth of telecommunications equipment for use at the Colombo airport. This equipment, largely of Canadian manufacture, is being installed under the direction of a Canadian telecommunications firm. Ceylon has accepted the recommendation of this firm that there should be a stand-by radio unit for use at the airport; Canada has agreed to provide this unit, at a cost of $17,500.

X-ray Maintenance Equipment

On the recommendation of a Canadian Colombo plan expert who is instructing Ceylonese technicians on the use and maintenance of X-ray equipment, Ceylon has asked Canada, and Canada has agreed, to provide $3,000 worth of X-ray maintenance equipment which is required in his teaching program.

Equipment for Technical Institute

A Canadian Colombo plan expert has made detailed proposals as to the final instalment of training equipment needed by the technical institute, which is being built, in the main, through the use of counterpart funds generated by the sale of Canadian flour, and being equipped almost completely by Canada. The institute, when completed, will be virtually an entirely Canadian project. Canada has agreed to contribute an additional $100,000 for equipment.

Installation Crane

Canada has already contributed a number of cranes for use in Colombo harbour. To complete this project, Ceylon has requested an installation crane costing $13,000, which is required to erect the harbour cranes, and which will be used in regular harbour work afterwards. Canada has agreed to meet this request.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 20, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House,
Ottawa, December 20, 1957

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 20th December, at 12.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Secretary to the Governor General
(Administrative)

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

POSTAGE STAMPS—STATEMENT ON ELIMINATION OF CORNER BLOCKS

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief announcement in connection with stamps. The previous administration decided early this year to eliminate certain identifying marks known as plate numbers on the corner of each sheet of postage stamps sold. While this action was designed to avoid confusion and delays in the public sale of stamps by those collectors who desired special selections to be made by post office clerks, it had the unfortunate effect of denying to those same people the opportunity of pursuing their hobby of collecting corner plate blocks of stamps.

I have been impressed by the representations from these collectors and others, and in accordance with the government's policy of operating as efficiently as possible while still giving due weight to the interests of those who are affected by government action, I have decided on an amendment to the decision of the previous government in this matter.

Therefore, while plate numbers will no longer appear on those sheets of stamps sold at post offices throughout the country, thus eliminating a cause of annoyance and delay to those purchasing stamps for ordinary use, sheets bearing such a designation will be available for sale to any interested collector, at the face value of the stamps, through the philatelic section of the Post Office Department at Ottawa.

Since stamps are designed and printed a considerable time in advance of their issue, it will not be possible to apply this new treatment to certain issues designed by the previous administration which were too far advanced in production for it to be applied. However, the new system will enable all collectors who are interested in this branch of the philatelic hobby to continue their collections as in the past, and is yet another indication of the desire of the Post Office Department to offer satisfactory service to every Canadian.

SHIPPING

GROUNDING OF C.G.S. "BAFFIN"—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the following statement:

Requests have been made by some hon. members of the house for a public inquiry to be made on the stranding of our hydrographic ship Baffin, which accident happened in July last off the coast of Nova Scotia. A similar request has been made by correspondence to my colleague the Minister of Transport.

In view of these circumstances I wish to inform the house that I have requested my colleague the Minister of Transport to take the necessary steps to conduct a formal investigation under the Canada Shipping Act into the circumstances surrounding the accident.

[Later:]

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will this formal investigation into the bad day at Black rock be a public investigation or a public inquiry?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ACCELERATED WORKS PROJECTS TO PROVIDE WINTER EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the house that the Canadian National Railways today announced an accelerated works project involving an expenditure of $3,500,000. The work being undertaken will be included in the Canadian National Railways 1958 budget. The government has given advance approval to these projects in order that the work may provide winter employment.

The accelerated works program includes equipment conversion work to be carried out in the railway shops at Moncton, New Brunswick; London, Ontario; Calder, Alberta; and Port Mann, British Columbia; enlargement of railway yards at Corner Brook, Newfoundland, and Moncton, New Brunswick; railway spur construction at Atikokan, Ontario; and the construction of portable railway dwellings. This program will provide approximately 1,062,000 man hours of work for approximately 600 men during the winter months.

I should also like to inform the house that a request has been forwarded to the Department of Public Works to proceed as early as possible to call for tenders for the construction of a new marine agency building at Halifax, and also for the second stage in the wharf construction program in the Saint John, New Brunswick agency.

[Later:]

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. He spoke earlier of the special projects being undertaken by Canadian National Railways. In view of the fact there are some 38,000 unemployed in Montreal, is it the intention of the railway company to proceed more rapidly with the construction program at the Cote de Liesse yard and other works in the Montreal area?

Mr. Hees: That is a question, the answer to which I do not think the hon. member would expect me to have at my finger tips. I shall make inquiries of the management of Canadian National and answer as soon as possible.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): The other day the Minister of Transport was kind enough to give us a review of some projects he was carrying on in his department, and he did so again this morning. Would he give consideration now to whether or not it is possible to carry out the program he has in mind for the Windsor airport at once, at a time when it may provide some work? I do not know whether or not that can be done, but I would ask the minister if he would mind looking into this and giving me a reply tomorrow.

Mr. Hees: Yes, I shall be glad to look into the matter and give an answer soon.

[Later:]

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Under the policy as announced yesterday by the minister for providing work for the unemployed, is it the intention of the government to set up these work camps for unemployed persons in central Canada as well as in the west and north?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the projects that I announced yesterday are not work camps; they are simply moving forward in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources those projects that we ordinarily do in the national parks, with one exception, the Mackenzie highway, which I described separately. Therefore, it is a question of taking ordinary work and moving it forward. As the hon. member knows, we have not too many national parks in the central provinces.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister any estimate as to the number of jobs there will be in the Terra Nova park?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Terra Nova project comes under several headings on my plan sheet. Therefore I shall have to speak subject to correction. However, I do not think the error will be serious. I would say roughly on the one project at Terra Nova there will be about 75 men. There is another project here under "roads and trails" which might add something to that number, but I would say that 75 would be about the estimate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I congratulate the minister.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question also. Is there any mention of Fundy national park there?

Mr. Chevrier: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to get all this attention. There are several projects in Fundy. One project will take 150 men and another project about 20 men. I do not know how many will come under "miscellaneous projects". That gives a total of approximately 170 in that area.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LAY-OFFS AT TRANSCONA AND FORT ROUGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, of which I gave him oral notice, following the statement he made earlier today as to the welcome decision of Canadian National Railways to go in for certain special projects. In view of the lay-offs that have taken place during the fall and winter at the Fort Rouge and Transcona shops of the Canadian National Railways, why did this statement not include the announcement of some special projects for those two shops as well?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): This was an announcement made by Canadian National Railways today, and I simply repeated it in the house. I shall be glad to communicate with the management of Canadian National Railways to see if something can be done in Winnipeg.

TRADE

MISSION TO UNITED KINGDOM—REQUESTS FOR STATEMENTS BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but first let me tell him that we are happy to see him back in the house and to welcome him here—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: —after what appears to have been a successful trip. I do hope the mission is more successful in fact than in appearance, but I listened with care to the news report broadcast this morning wherein I thought I understood the minister to state, among other things, that he did not think purchases made in the United Kingdom were going to take business away from Canadian firms. In view of that statement I would like to ask this question. Has the minister any estimate of the amount of trade which has already been diverted from the United States to the United Kingdom because of the trade mission?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Laurier for his kind welcome back to the house and for his complimentary remarks on a mission which achieved a success in Great Britain beyond all expectation.

I am unable to give him the information he is now seeking because we have not assembled the full information from the members of the mission who were over there. A certain number of orders were placed and others are being contemplated, but what those amount to in the diversion of orders from the United States to the United Kingdom will have to be determined later.

We stressed throughout the course of the mission that we were aiming at long-term results, and that we could not assess the success of the mission merely on what orders might be placed this month or next.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful for the answer the minister is able to give, but as I followed the results of the mission there were, it appeared to me, three orders which were of consequence by way of purchases from the United Kingdom, that of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, that of the Canadian National Railways and that of the B.C. Packers, the latter for tin plate. I would like to ask the minister if he can assure the house that this tin plate order could not have been produced in Hamilton.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the particulars of the order the hon. member has mentioned, and I have no information on that particular subject at this moment.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I understand that an office is to be established in the city of Ottawa to encourage British sales in Canada? The question I have in mind is this. Will this office also promote orders for sales to the United Kingdom or encourage two-way trade? Is this merely an office to promote the sales of British goods in Canada, or is it a reciprocal arrangement which will also promote the sale of Canadian goods in Britain?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the establishment of an office in Ottawa, which I announced when we landed at Dorval yesterday, is to complete the work of the mission. The members of the mission are preparing reports which will be sent in to this office, and those reports will be analysed and summarized. A general report of the work of the mission in its entirety will be published, and all that will take some time.

In order to make an immediate start I thought it wise to set up an office in the building now occupied by the Department of Trade and Commerce, No. 1 building on Wellington street. I have placed in charge of that office Mr. Peter Stursberg, who rendered invaluable assistance to the mission while it was in the United Kingdom. He, along with Mr. Parlour of the trade and commerce department who acted as secretary of the mission while it was overseas, will maintain contact with the members of the mission and with their counterparts in the United Kingdom, and in the course of four to six weeks will assemble all the information, which will then be incorporated in the report. At the same time that office will provide any immediate information which may be required by people in the United Kingdom. I did not conceive it as being a permanent office, as one of the articles in one of the papers indicated. It is for the purpose of completing the task of the mission.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister will remember that before he went to England I asked him whether he was going to take advantage of his visit not only to head the official trade mission, but more particularly—and I think the house will regard this as more important—whether he was going to discuss with the British government its proposal for freer trade arrangements between Canada and the United Kingdom, and whether or not he was going to take advantage of his visit to give more precise information about the Canadian proposal made by the Prime Minister for the transfer of purchases from one country to another.

Can the minister say now whether or not he has had discussions about these two important proposals with members of the British government, and can he give the Canadian people some information as a result of those discussions?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I think everyone appreciates the interest of the hon. member for Essex East in stimulating trade. I did not have the opportunity which he thought perhaps I might have to discuss with the United Kingdom government these important and weighty problems. The mission had two distinct objectives. One was to investigate thoroughly the productive capacity of British industry, and the second was to draw to the attention of the people in the United Kingdom the great advantages that lie ahead for Canada.

We visited 100 manufacturing establishments in the United Kingdom; we travelled about 1,500 miles through England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland. Our time was fully occupied in making that investigation, in discussing with British businessmen their problems and pointing out to them the advantages that lie ahead in this country. When you consider that more than 1,200 British firms asked permission to meet and talk with members of our mission you will fully appreciate that we did not have much time for any other activities.

Hundreds of those who asked to see the members of our mission were accommodated in London, in Manchester, in Glasgow and in Leeds, and sat down and talked in small conference groups or face to face with members of our mission. I participated in some of these conferences; but with all this activity going on—and the hon. member for Essex East has been on various missions abroad himself—he will fully appreciate that there was not an opportunity to discuss at great length, as would be necessary, the problems involved in his question with regard to trade with the United Kingdom along the lines he was suggesting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary question. I thank the minister for his statement in which he said he discussed trade problems with officials of the British government and with private individuals. May I ask him whether he is in a position now to say whether the government is giving serious consideration to the British proposal, which I understand is the only way by which the proposal made by the Prime Minister could be validated under GATT?

Mr. Green: Well, that is a speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: What did we have from the minister?

Mr. Churchill: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not object to commenting at length on any of these questions if that is desired.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; I think it is good.

Mr. Churchill: I have not had an opportunity to confer with my colleagues, as the hon. member for Essex East well knows, due to a considerable absence from Ottawa, and I am not at this moment in a position to give an answer to his question.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Laurier has asked for restrictions on purchases abroad and the hon. member for Essex East has asked for free trade, can the Minister of Trade and Commerce say just what it is he is being expected to reply to?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman from Winnipeg North Centre obviously did not listen to my questions. There is no doubt where I stand as to the desirability of freer trade, but that was not the question I asked. The question I asked was what is the government's policy with regard to this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is hardly a point of order.

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I should like to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could he advise the house as to the cost of this buying mission to the Canadian government?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker, not at the present time. That will come later.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All bills do.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he does not think that, in view of the fact that this office he is setting up here in Ottawa is for the purpose of diverting trade, it would have been more appropriate to have put a businessman at its head rather than a publicity man?

Mr. Churchill: I think not, Mr. Speaker. We have made considerable contacts with very experienced businessmen, all of whom, the hon. member will discover, were very much impressed with the activities of the mission in England and thought it was an excellent idea. Mr. Stursberg is well acquainted with these businessmen and has their entire confidence.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce another question arising out of the mission to Britain. I hold in my hand a copy of La Presse for Thursday evening which reports a statement made by Mr. Ouimet, one of the members of the mission and a person whom I know very well, in which he pays some tribute to the mission. Perhaps I could just preface my question with what is said. Mr. Ouimet is reported as saying:

(Translation):

The month-long journey in British territory by the 58 members of the mission was very successful and interesting in more than one respect.

The mission, stated Mr. Ouimet, "really sold Canada, a land with a great future, which ranks among the world's largest importers."

(Text):

This is the question, which I shall read in French and then translate:

Le but principal du voyage n'était pas d'acheter de la marchandise mais plutôt de rencontrer des industriels britanniques et leur faire part du besoin de notre pays d'exporter.

"The principal object of the trip was not to buy merchandise or commodities, but rather to meet British industrialists and to advise them of the needs of our country to export." Does this statement meet with the minister's understanding of the objective of the mission to the United Kingdom?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, of course I shall have to check the original to see whether the hon. member's translation is accurate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Ouimet was a very distinguished and competent member of our mission and was of great assistance to us during the course of our tour. I think perhaps he has not been quoted in full because, as was stated time and time again, we were urging the people in the United Kingdom to take a more active part in the exporting of goods to this country because there is an imbalance in our trade as far as they are concerned. They buy $2 worth of goods for every $1 that we spend in the United Kingdom. Naturally in the course of these conversations people discussed the expansion of Canada's trade with the United Kingdom, and I think that is precisely what Mr. Ouimet was dealing with.

Mr. Marler: I think the minister needs to read the paper again.

BASE METALS—RETALIATION AGAINST UNITED STATES TARIFF INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to address a question to that industrious minister whose modest use of the words, "devotion", duty, destiny and dedication" we all appreciate, the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Has the government recently received any representations from representatives of employers or employees in the base metal mining industry urging retaliatory measures against the United States threat to increase tariffs on non-ferrous metals? If so, is the government giving consideration to such proposals?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member caught me off guard, because I did not recognize that his introduction could possibly apply to me. I have not had time to check all the material that has reached the office in my absence, and I am not sure whether such representations have been made.

IMPORT PERMITS FOR COMMODITIES UNDER FLOOR PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I appreciate the fact that the minister has been absent from the house, but the question might be answered by the Minister of Agriculture because it affects his department as well. Has any import permit been issued by the government for the importation of any commodity or commodities that have established floor prices?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what period the hon. member refers. I would think if he tied his question to a certain period we would be in a better position to answer it. I do not recall any import permits having been issued within the last short period, though there may have been.

Mr. Huffman: I meant since June 21, under the present government.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is the sort of question that might very well be put on the order paper, because it is just for general information.

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH SPAIN AND POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Peter Stefura (Vegreville): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. For the last two weeks or so we have had trade delegations from Spain and Poland in our country who desire to buy our Canadian wheat. Can the minister tell us what negotiations, if any, have been completed and what was the nature of those negotiations?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think no public announcement should be made with regard to negotiations such as these until they are complete. I have nothing to report to the hon. member at the moment.

Mr. Stefura: On December 7 the minister stated that he might consider the acceptance of soft currency from these different countries. Is that being considered in these cases?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I certainly expressed it as "might" and did not express it as "will", as I noticed it in press reports. I said that the acceptance of soft currency to me was equivalent to a loan, and what I was saying in those remarks was that the question of loans might have to be seriously considered in negotiations with certain countries which have not been in the past cash customers for Canadian wheat.

AGRICULTURE

BOW RIVER, ALTA.—PETITION RESPECTING FARM UNITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. Has the Acting Prime Minister considered the petition dated December 11 addressed to the Prime Minister regarding the settlers in the Bow river project, Hays area, Alberta? If so, will the minister assure the house that steps will be taken immediately to allow these farmers to obtain economic farm units? If not, would the minister look into the matter as soon as possible?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture will deal with that question.

[Mr. Huffman.]

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not the particular petition referred to. I will be glad to look into the matter when and if I receive it. However, I think the matter referred to is one which was contained in a long letter addressed to the Prime Minister and forwarded to me containing numerous but confused complaints with regard to the difficulty of a certain family group at Hays. I might say that those complaints were investigated by the local of the Alberta farm union at Hays, and the local did not seem to think there was very much in them.

Mr. Olson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The petition to which I am referring is not a family affair. It is signed by 104 farmers in that area.

Mr. Harkness: Probably it is a different matter, and I shall be very glad indeed to look into it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE ON NORTH SHORE OF ST. LAWRENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lomer Brisson (Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement made yesterday by the minister that the Canadian National Railways is studying a proposal for the construction of a railway line between Matane and Ste. Anne des Monts, will the minister give consideration to the construction of a railway line on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, east from Murray Bay, extending through Baie Comeau and Seven Islands, which is required because of the tremendous development of natural resources in that area?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this government is willing to consider any sensible proposition that is put forward to it, and if the people of that area present a brief, urging study of such a project, the government will be glad to study it when it is received.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question. May I remind the minister that this railway to which the hon. member has reference was brought to the attention of the Gordon commission and representations were made on that occasion. Therefore I think the minister can get a detailed statement of the proposal there.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the former minister what was the attitude of the former government toward that proposal?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I will be delighted to answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: I must declare the question out of order. It is no longer the responsibility of the former minister.

AIR TRANSPORT

MARITIME AIRWAYS CRASH, QUEBEC—PUBLIC INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has a public inquiry been held into the disaster which occurred to the Maritime Airways plane some time ago in the province of Quebec? If so, will the report be tabled in the house?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that inquiry will be conducted, but it has been held up due to the fact that this was an accident in which there was practically nothing left that could form reasonable evidence from which the reason for the crash could be deduced. It has been necessary to bring out from England a specialist to examine what evidence has been brought forward so far, and it is expected that the public inquiry will start some time soon after the new year. I can assure the hon. member and the house that it is the desire of my department and the board of inquiry that is to sit on this question to have the matter examined just as soon as possible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—TRANSPORTATION BY AIRCRAFT ACROSS CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister able to confirm or deny the report that nuclear weapons are being transported by Canadian or foreign aircraft over Canadian territory? If such is the case, is this being done with the agreement and consent of the Canadian government?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe that question should be answered by the minister himself when he returns. Although I am in a position to give an answer I would prefer that it be dealt with by the minister, in view of the fact that he will be back within the next few hours.

TELEVISION

CORNER BROOK, NFLD.—REQUEST FOR COVERAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Can the Minister of National Revenue give any information concerning what provision is being made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for television coverage in the city of Corner Brook, Newfoundland?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is conducting surveys and making preliminary plans for the extension of television in various centres of the country, including the area to which the hon. member has referred. No specific commitment can be made until the corporation's appropriations have been approved by parliament for the forthcoming year.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—CHANGE OF RAILWAY TO STANDARD GAUGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if the Minister of Transport could tell the house what progress has been made by his department in arranging for the transformation of the Newfoundland railway to standard gauge, as was promised by the Prime Minister in St. John's before the election?

Mr. Green: Why did you not do it?

Mr. Marler: We never promised it.

Mr. Pickersgill: We did not promise it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me, with all due respect to the hon. gentleman and his interest in this matter, that it is not urgent. It has been under consideration for some time and possibly will be for some further time. I think it might go on the order paper.

Mr. Pickersgill: I defer to you, sir.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTARY GUIDE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Verdun asked a question with regard to the distribution of the Parliamentary Guide. As hon. members are probably aware, this is published by a private individual. We have made inquiries, and find it will probably be ready for distribution toward the end of January.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN SHIPS STORES REGULATIONS RESPECTING TOBACCO AND CIGARETTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister give consideration to extending the ships stores regulations to include tobacco and cigarettes for deep sea fishermen who spend more than 10 days at sea on any one voyage?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The regulations are being amended at the moment, and I am making a submission to council in that respect. I am prepared to recommend that the regulations be amended with respect to cigarettes, tobacco and cigars for fishermen who spend more than 10 days at sea.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS UNDER ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have the regulations under the Disabled Persons Act, which I believe were amended just before the former government went out of office, been revised or amended since the act itself was amended? If not, is this matter under consideration with the provinces?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think I had better take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker. I cannot give the hon. member a direct answer at the moment.

AIRPORTS

MEDICINE HAT, ALBERTA—INQUIRY AS TO ENLARGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, on October 29 the Minister of Transport stated that his department was considering lengthening the runways at the Medicine Hat airport. Can the minister say what action has now been taken to have this work done as soon as possible?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The construction program for next year is being reviewed to see what projects could be speeded up by an earlier start, but no decision has yet been reached with regard to Medicine Hat.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE GUARANTEED PRICES FOR CERTAIN COMMODITIES, ETC.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 237, for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the stage at which the general principle of the legislation before the house is debated. For this bill the principle is to establish a flexible agricultural price support program which will provide a guaranteed yearly price for any—and I should like to stress the word "any"—agricultural commodity for which such a guaranteed price may be required; and further, to provide an ultimate security feature which will ensure that, as far as nine key agricultural commodities are concerned, a mandatory floor will be in effect at all times. Both these levels of support are to be related to a moving average formula.

The guarantees provided to Canadian farmers by this bill are much greater than anything they have ever had before, and these guarantees are implicit in the bill. However, concern has been expressed by members of parliament of this party representing rural constituencies and by officials of farm organizations that these guarantees are not spelled out in sufficient detail in the bill, and that this omission has led to misunderstanding as to what the bill can and will do for our farmers.

In order to remove any doubts as to what is intended I am quite willing to spell out the guarantees which are implicit in the bill. To this end I have consulted officials of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and of the farm unions, and have asked them for their opinions and recommendations as to how they think the legislation can be improved within the general principle of the bill of providing a flexible price support system.

Having held these various consultations, I am prepared at the committee of the whole stage to move, or rather I should say to have moved, amendments along the following lines. First, the inclusion of a preamble in these words:

> Whereas it is expedient to enact a measure for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy: Therefore—

And then comes the usual enactment phrase. This preamble has been put in so it will serve to indicate clearly the nature and purpose of the act, to the end that there will be no ambiguity whatever as to what is intended by the act and what its purpose is.

Second, to add a new subsection to section 2 to read:

(2) In prescribing a percentage of the base price of an agricultural commodity under subparagraph (i) or (ii) of paragraph (e) of subsection (1), the governor in council shall have regard to the estimated average cost of production of the commodity, and such other factors as the governor in council considers to be relevant.

The addition of this new subsection will make it clear that the cost of production is the most important factor to be taken into consideration in setting the guaranteed annual price.

Third, in connection with the make-up of the advisory committee, I have been informed that some doubt existed because of the wording there, as to whether the members of that committee would be all farmers or representative of farm organizations. To remove any doubt along that line the proposal is to strike out the words "include representation from" and make the clause read:

5. (1) The minister shall appoint an advisory committee, consisting of a chairman and at least six, but not more than nine, other members, composed of farmers and representatives of farm organizations.

As I said, that change is in order to make it absolutely clear that the advisory committee will be made up of farmers or their representatives from farm organizations.

Fourth, to add to subclause (1) of clause 7 in order to make it read:

The board shall from time to time in accordance with this act take such action as is necessary to stabilize the prices of agricultural commodities at their respective prescribed prices—

And this is the part which is added:

—and shall take such action and make such recommendations as are necessary to ensure that the prescribed prices for an agricultural commodity in effect from time to time shall bear a fair relationship to the base price for such commodity.

This wording has been added in order to ensure that the guaranteed yearly prices will be at an adequate level.

In addition to the representations that the guarantees in regard to the annual guaranteed prices were not spelled out sufficiently, the advice I have received is that the use of the three-year moving average as the means of determining the base price is viewed with disfavour at the present time because the prices during the past three years have not been satisfactory. As far as the general principle of this bill is concerned, it does not matter whether the formula used is the three-year moving average, a five-year moving average, or a ten-year moving average. I personally favour the three-year moving average formula, as I believe that over the long term it would prove more satisfactory and provide greater assistance to farmers than a five or ten-year base period.

However, in view of the recommendations of the farm organizations, and because the use of a 10-year moving average will now include five years of the highest prices which farmers have received—that is the period from 1948 to 1952—the government is prepared to amend the bill to provide for the use of a 10-year moving average as the base period rather than the three-year moving average. All that is required to do is to substitute the word "ten" for the word "three" where it appears in section 8 of the bill.

I think it is apparent that the willingness we have shown to consult with farm organizations and to make amendments to improve the bill in line with their thinking shows that this government takes no hard and fast take it or leave it attitude in regard to this very important matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: It demonstrates that we are prepared to go to any possible limit to meet the needs and desires of farmers within the general principle of putting into effect a flexible support system which will be practical and workable.

The general position taken by the right hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner) and the Liberal party at the resolution stage of this legislation was that it does no more for the farmers than the Agricultural Prices Support Act which they introduced, and is probably not as good. I do not think any farmer who studies this legislation will agree with that contention.

There are, in particular, four very important differences between this legislation and the legislation we have had in effect so far. First of all, this legislation provides a formula to serve as a basis for setting support prices, and it will be possible to get some system into the type of support prices and the level of those support prices which have been set. Under the present legislation the comparatively small number of products which were put under price support were put on the level provided for them on an entirely ad hoc basis, and those supports were put on one level for one commodity which bore no relationship whatever to that put on for another commodity.

Second, this legislation provides quite definitely for an advisory committee, composed and representative of farmers, for the specific purpose of advising as to what commodities should be under price support and the level of the guaranteed yearly price to be provided for them. The old legislation did contain provision for the board to appoint an advisory committee, and there was in fact an advisory committee. That committee was not, however, for the specific purpose of advising the board in regard to price support legislation, but was a carry-over from an advisory committee which had existed during the war. It was under the price support board, apparently only for what you might call a lack of any other place to put it.

The committee which has been in existence consisted of the deputy ministers of agriculture of the various provinces and some representatives of farm organizations. It met twice a year as a rule, though sometimes only once a year. It met for two days, gave advice on general agricultural questions, discussed general agricultural problems, and then made certain recommendations to the government; but as I say, it was not a committee for the specific purpose of advising in regard to the commodities which should be under price support and the levels of those supports.

The third main difference between this legislation and what we have had previously is that it provides for a guaranteed yearly price to be set one year in advance. Once they are set they are to remain in effect for the following 12 months. The old legislation contained no such provision, and nothing along that line is really done under it. Very frequently a price support was set for two or three months or something along that line; otherwise it was just set and there was no term provided, and it could be cut off at any moment.

There has been a very strong demand on the part of the farmers that the level of price supports should be known to them; that they should know when the supports are going to be in effect and what the levels are going to be during that period so that they as farmers may plan their operations accordingly. This legislation makes that provision.

The fourth main difference is that this legislation provides an ultimate security feature. It provides for a mandatory floor at all times on nine key commodities. The old legislation provided for no mandatory floors at all, and was not comparable to or in line with this in any way whatsoever.

The C.C.F. and Social Credit groups at the resolution stage criticized this bill because it has no rigid formula. That, in effect, is what most of their criticism boiled down to. An examination of what has happened in the countries where a rigid formula has been tried is a sufficient answer to that. I would just like to quote a little in regard to what has happened in the United States under a rigid price support formula to give to the house some indication of how very badly this has worked out. This particular document in my hand is a copy of a speech delivered by the secretary of agriculture for the United States, Mr. Benson, before an agricultural banquet at Iowa state college on December 5 of this year, just a short time ago. The first page is a summary and the rest is his speech itself. He states:

The only way in which price support by rigid—

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. The minister is now proceeding to discuss a bill which in some important particulars will not be the bill which will be finally passed, and I would refer you to Beauchesne's third edition, page 231, citation 666, which reads as follows:

It may become necessary, before the second reading of a bill, to make considerable changes in its provisions, which can only be accomplished, at this stage, by discharging the order for the second reading and withdrawing the bill.

It strikes me that the very consequential amendments which the minister indicates will be moved are changes in the bill which are so substantial that hon. members of this house will be discussing, when the minister sits down, a bill which is not the bill that the government now recommends and which we are going to finally pass. Consequently it seems to me that in order to facilitate the business of the house the only thing to do is to withdraw the bill, discharge it, and introduce a new bill which will give hon. members an opportunity of discussing the matter intelligently.

Member after member will rise in this house and discuss a bill which has been distributed and which, Mr. Speaker, according to the statement of the minister this morning, will not be the bill that will go into committee, let alone come out of it, because he has already told us that in certain important particulars the bill will not be the same. Consequently at second reading we can scarcely discuss a bill which is to be amended so fundamentally and which will no longer be the bill we are going to discuss this morning.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether you would like to discuss this matter now, but I am raising it at this time in order that the matter may be considered.

Mr. Speaker: Before another hon. member speaks, may I ask the minister whether he has any intention, when he finishes his remarks, of substituting another bill at this stage. What is his plan of procedure?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Speaker. Speaking on the point of order, I think none of the objections which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has taken apply. As I stated in the earlier part of my speech, I was merely indicating that I was prepared to move amendments which would spell out the guarantees which are implicit in the bill, and I put considerable emphasis, you will perhaps remember, Mr. Speaker, on that point. I indicated also that the change from the three-year moving average to the ten-year moving average makes no change in the principle of the bill whatever. As far as the principle of the bill is concerned, which is to introduce a flexible price support system, whether you use a three, four, five, six, or ten-year moving average makes no difference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Do you want to hold it up?

Mr. Harkness: The result is, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments which I indicated the government is quite prepared to move have no effect on the general principle of the bill and there is no necessity for a new bill. This is merely a matter of writing in in more explicit terms the guarantees which are already there, and which are implicit in the bill, and of substituting one year-period for a different period.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I point out one or two things in connection with this point of order which has been raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar? It is the accepted practice in this house for the government to move amendments to a government bill while it is in the committee stage. Last evening the Minister of Veterans Affairs introduced several amendments to the bill which was amending the Pension Act, and those amendments were moved at the committee stage. This is done time after time, and I really am puzzled about the objective of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he raises a point of order of this kind on this particular bill.

The Minister of Agriculture need not have mentioned that there would be any amendments at all during this second reading stage of the debate; he could have waited until we were in committee, but in order to be absolutely fair to the hon. members of the house and tell them what he had in mind by way of amendments, at the opening of his remarks he said very frankly exactly what he is proposing to do. That was done many times by the former government, and it is a practice adopted so as to be fair to opposition parties.

For that reason the Minister of Agriculture has followed this same procedure today; and I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to take that courtesy shown to the house as a foundation for an argument that the bill should now be withdrawn is really going very much further than any of the rules of the house have ever contemplated.

I suggest that what the Minister of Agriculture is now doing is the sensible and fair thing. He is perfectly in order in carrying on with his speech, just as the members of all three opposition parties would be in order in carrying on and debating the bill and at the same time dealing with the proposals he has mentioned.

Mr. Louis Denisel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, it would be easier at least if we could have copies of these proposed amendments made available immediately so we would know what we are talking about; and possibly the minister would agree to adjourn the debate until later on in the day in order that hon. members may have a chance to study these amendments.

Mr. Green: We never give copies in advance of amendments to be moved in committee. The government did not have to say one word about these amendments until second reading was over.

An hon. Member: But they did.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I object to what the hon. gentleman has just said, and particularly to the manner in which he has said it. Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture—I should like to be allowed to proceed, Mr. Speaker, but if there are others over there who want to obstruct me, then it is all right.

Mr. Speaker: I should appreciate it if all hon. members would direct their remarks to the point of order which is before the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Speaking to the point of order I should like to say this; that yesterday the hon. member for Melville asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture dealing with a press report in the Montreal Gazette in which it was announced in advance what is being done this morning. The details now being discussed were contained in the newspaper article. The hon. minister at that time answered this:

> Mr. Speaker, I think the right hon. gentleman knows that any announcements with regard to government decisions or policies will be made in the house in due course, and not as a consequence of confirming or denying speculative reports in newspapers.

Mr. Harkness: Well?

Mr. Chevrier: That sounded pretty well, but in effect what is happening, what has been stated this morning, is a confirmation of what we read in the press yesterday, which is in entire contradiction to what the leader of the house says now.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is straying from the point of order. He is discussing something that was done yesterday. The question before the house is whether the amendments which have been proposed, or rather the amendments which it is the intention of the Minister of Agriculture to propose, make such changes in the character or the principle of the bill that it would not be fair to debate the principle without having those amendments before the house.

I do not believe I can make a decision at the moment on that point, but perhaps I could give my preliminary thoughts on the matter. I know hon. members do not wish to delay the consideration of this legislation because of a technical objection. If there is an objection of substance we must, of course, deal with it so the house may have a fair opportunity to consider the bill. But I wonder whether the proposed amendments, which seem to me to be fairly precise—as I recall it there were five points in a bill of 17 sections—could be reduced to writing and distributed to the house before the debate resumes after lunch. It may be, as has been suggested by the minister, that they are not of such a novel character as to change the principle of the bill, and the debate could then proceed without any unfairness.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I think the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was well taken. At the present time we have the bill before us. The minister has referred to certain amendments, and these amendments are not before us at the present time. But we are supposed to debate the bill as it is, not as it may be, and I think the suggestion made by Your Honour is a good one. If these amendments could be printed and distributed to us and the debate then resumed I think most of the objections could be overcome, but I certainly think it is a mistake to continue to debate this bill until such time as these amendments are before us.

Mr. Coldwell: I think that would be more satisfactory than anything else.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the house when this point of order was first raised but I do know, and this is within the recollection of many hon. members, of numerous occasions when bills have been introduced and after their introduction, at this stage, the minister in charge has given notice of amendments which he proposes to ask one of his colleagues to move in committee.

It seems to be an eminently sensible arrangement, a much fairer thing to do at this stage than to wait until we are in committee and do it then.

The point of order therefore seems to be solely whether the proposed amendments are of such a character that they take the bill outside the scope of the preliminary resolution; and I think you will find, Mr. Speaker, that they do not have that effect and that they are perfectly in order.

All that is being done now is that as a matter of courtesy the minister is giving notice of his intention to move amendments in committee. If he had not given such notice we would later be accused of taking the house by surprise, and of being unfair to parliament. It seems to me that the sensible thing to do is to proceed with the debate. I am quite certain that my colleague the Minister of Agriculture will be willing to prepare copies of the proposed amendments so they will be in the hands of party leaders and spokesmen within a matter of a very few minutes. Surely the sensible course to follow is to accept the notice now and go on with the debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): Mr. Speaker, after listening to what you had to say a few moments ago I am inclined to think that we should have the amendments in our hands as soon as possible, indicating exactly what is being suggested by way of those changes. I do not wish at this time to be a party to holding up the discussion or stopping it. As a matter of fact the action I took yesterday in asking questions was in order to avoid that very thing. We all know what the rule is, and it is purely a question as to whether or not the principle of the bill has been changed in what is being suggested. I am inclined to think it has, but that is a matter which will be settled by Mr. Speaker himself when he looks into the matter fully; therefore I am not going to argue that question further.

My object yesterday in asking the question was to have the bill distributed in its new form before we reached this point at all. If that had been done the question would not have been raised by anyone. I still think the answer given yesterday was not in accordance with what has turned up today, and therefore I suggest that probably, as you have suggested, it is the proper thing for the minister to go on and finish his speech. I had intended to follow him. I do not know whether I should be expected to do that before I see the terms of the new measure.

An hon. Member: You should not be.

Mr. Gardiner: But whatever your ruling is on the matter, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to follow it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might make a suggestion. I agree with Your Honour's contention that what has to be determined is whether or not the changes proposed by the Minister of Agriculture are substantial. I suggest that if in your opinion they are substantial you will have to have regard to the point of order raised on the basis of citation 666 of Beauchesne's third edition. If they are not substantial, then I think Your Honour will agree that as a matter of courtesy the amendments the minister proposed to have made in committee should be reduced to some sort of written form and placed in the hands of hon. members before they are asked to proceed with the debate.

The point raised by my leader may be construed as an attempt to delay debate. May I make it clear that the citation which he read from Beauchesne's third edition is taken from pages 388 and 389 of May's thirteenth edition, where May says:

> It may become necessary, before the second reading of a bill, to make considerable changes in its provisions, which can only be accomplished, at this stage, by discharging the order for the second reading and withdrawing the bill.

Let me read on in this paragraph:

> If a change of title be necessary, the practice is to order the bill to be withdrawn, and to move subsequently for leave to bring in another bill: but where the bill is withdrawn, for the purpose of making numerous amendments, without any change of title, a simpler form of proceeding is adopted. Upon the withdrawal of the first bill, a motion is made forthwith that leave be given "to present another bill instead thereof".

I wish to make it clear that if my leader's point of order was sustained that would not mean we would have to conduct a brand new debate at the resolution stage. It would simply mean the simple process of withdrawing this bill and asking leave of the house to present, in the words of May, "another bill instead thereof."

As I say, I agree thoroughly with your position that the decision you make will turn upon your view as to whether or not the changes are substantial. If they are substantial I suggest that May will have to be followed. If they are not substantial, then all that is needed is the courtesy of a written statement as to what are the changes the government propose.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, on this point I do not think your attention should be directed to the word "substantial". Reading from Beauchesne's third edition, citation 347 at page 138, the words used there are "to the granting or enacting". I think these are the important words and not the word "substantial" which has been referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak again on the point of order, I think the material and important thing here is that these amendments which I have indicated we are ready to move in committee of the whole do not change the principle of the bill in any particular whatever. The principle of the bill remains exactly the same.

There are two types of amendments, or perhaps I should say the amendments seek to do two things. The first group of amendments which I said we were willing to have moved are designed to spell out in explicit terms the guarantees which I say are absolutely implicit in the bill in any event, and are merely for the purpose of removing any doubt or ambiguity which may exist as to what is the purpose of the bill. The second amendment is merely a matter of changing in the bill the word "three" to the word "ten" so the base period of the formula contained in the bill will be on a ten-year moving average rather than a three-year moving average.

As I pointed out, as far as putting into effect a flexible price support system is concerned it makes no difference whatever what particular period of years you take as the base period for your moving average.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, just one word before you make your ruling. I certainly would not want to hold up the discussion of the bill, but I think we have to take under very careful consideration what has been cited from Beauchesne's third edition in citation 666. This citation does not refer in any way to the principle of the bill or changes in the principle of the bill. The citation makes reference to considerable changes in the provisions of the bill. All the discussion thus far on the part of hon. members of the government has centred around whether or not there are changes in the principle of this bill. I simply point out to you, sir, that the citation is worded as follows:

> It may become necessary, before the second reading of a bill, to make considerable changes in its provisions, which can only be accomplished, at this stage, by discharging the order for the second reading and withdrawing the bill.

I contend that the amendments proposed by the minister constitute considerable changes in the bill. To refer to only one he suggested, I think as the second amendment he is prepared to propose a new subsection, and that new subsection refers to a "having regard" provision to the estimated average cost of production, which was not contained in the old bill at all.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Either it is a change or it is not.

Mr. Low: Either it is a substantial change or it is not. As far as I am concerned it is substantial enough to warrant asking the minister to provide the members with a written statement of the changes he proposes before we have to debate the principle of the bill.

Mr. Harkness: I have already asked my colleague to take out the notes I have and get the changes which are proposed mimeographed so they will be ready for distribution as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the assistance I have had from all sides of the house on this point. I think it is an important point. I am not disposed to rule the minister out of order in this debate on second reading, though I think he comes pretty close to being out of order in discussing particular sections of the bill which it is necessary for him to do in giving a forecast of his amendments.

However, I am not prepared to deal with the ruling at this moment. With the leave of the house I should like to defer that question until after luncheon and allow the minister to proceed with his address. As the house knows, we are to have royal assent at a quarter to one. Perhaps the right hon. member for Melville may not have to begin before that time. I shall reserve my decision and give it right after the noon adjournment.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When the minister prepares the amendments for distribution will he make enough copies so that all members can have one, because if just the leaders get them other hon. members will not know what they contain.

Mr. Speaker: He will do the best he can, and we shall consider the position we have before us at that time.

Mr. Harkness: At the time I was interrupted I was just going to quote certain statements made by the secretary of agriculture of the United States to indicate what great difficulties their rigid support system has got them into, and the desire which exists in that country to get away from a rigid price support system. The quotation I just started to read is as follows:

> The only way in which price support by rigid formula can be made to work—even in the short run—is by effective control over production, so that gluts in the market are rather quickly removed and supply is rapidly adjusted to what the market will take. We have no such control over production today.

That is in spite of the fact that they had very considerable controls as far as acreage quotas were concerned, and things of that sort. I do not think there is any farmer in this country who wants us to put into effect a system under which he is told how many acres of barley or any other commodity he can plant, or how much livestock he can raise of a particular kind. To put into effect and even attempt to make work a rigid system of price support, something along that line is necessary.

Mr. Benson went on and said:

> Price supports "used in a manner that fits today's conditions" have an important function in agriculture, but that he does not believe in supports which price products out of markets, build up unmanageable surpluses and force controls on farmers which make their farms inefficient.
> Stating that many people "have the false impression that most agricultural prices and incomes are government supported", he points out that items from "only 13 crops, plus dairy products and wool, are in government inventory—out of about 250 commodities that farmers produce". He adds that wheat and cotton account for over 48 per cent of price support costs. "Is it good for agriculture", he asks, "that more than four-fifths (82.2 per cent) of these price support costs should go to the producers of four commodities? Is it good for agriculture as a whole that nearly four-fifths (79 per cent) of these price support costs should go to about one-fourth of our farms?"

That is one of the further difficulties so far as a rigid price support system is concerned. You have a rigid formula which is laid down by law. You cannot alter it, and you get all kinds of anomalies. The way in which it has worked out over there, as he indicates, is that four-fifths of the money paid out for price supports has gone to only one-fourth of their farmers. Mr. Benson summarizes these various difficulties in two short statements, one of which appears on page 5 and the other a little later. These are his words in summarizing really the disadvantages of a rigid price support system:

> I say again that price supports—used in a manner that fits today's conditions—do have an important function in agriculture.

We believe that, and that is why we have this bill before us at the present time. He goes on:

> But I do not believe in price supports set at levels which price our products out of markets that farmers must have.
> I do not believe in price supports which build up unmanageable surpluses that depress prices and cost millions to store.

No, I do not believe in price supports which force controls upon farmers, making their farms inefficient, and which chase acres out of one crop only to dump both the acres and surplus problems on other crops.

I can quite understand that the C.C.F. party does believe in this control. They are a party who believe in a socialized country and a socialized industry, and I can quite understand that they would like to have a socialized agriculture, and to have controls of all sorts as far as agriculture is concerned. But I do not think very many farmers in this country believe in it, and I am quite sure very few if any farmers would agree to acreage controls and to be told what they could plant, how much of it, and so forth.

Mr. Ellis: Tell the whole story.

Mr. Harkness: Furthermore, Mr. Benson goes on in his speech and says:

Farmers must have freedom to plant, freedom to market, agriculture is dynamic. It cannot be dynamic in a price support straitjacket.

The type of price support system which the hon. members in that corner of the house are advocating is a support straitjacket.

An hon. Member: Very good for the farmer.

Mr. Harkness: It is a rigid type of support system which would get this country into unbelievable difficulties.

Mr. Ellis: What do the farmers think of Mr. Benson?

Mr. Castleden: What difficulties are the farmers in now?

Mr. Harkness: There is one other statement in this speech which I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members, and it is found on page 9. Mr. Benson says:

I know how the human mind longs for panaceas. Nobody would welcome an honest to goodness genuine agricultural panacea more warmly than I—but there just isn't any such animal.

Well, I would most sincerely re-echo those words. There is nobody who would welcome a real panacea for agriculture any more than I would, but there just is no such thing. As I pointed out when we were dealing with this particular bill at the resolution stage, no one bill can be a cure-all for all of the difficulties which beset agriculture in this country and in other countries at the present time; but this bill is, I think, a big step forward in order to assist farmers along the road to the place where agriculture will be in a healthy situation.

I noticed that somebody down in that corner was asking what the farmers think of Mr. Benson, and so on and so forth. I should like to just read something in connection with what the farm bureau, which is the biggest farm organization in the United States, has to say in connection with these matters. This is a quotation from a newspaper dated December 12, and reads as follows:

A farm bureau scheme which would scrap parity as a "fair" yardstick for pegging the level at which the U.S. supports farm prices, and let market prices seek their own level, with government price props geared to stay 10 per cent below the market average of the previous three years.

In other words, the farm bureau over there now is talking of a three-year moving average formula instead of the rigid formula which they have had.

Mr. Zaplitny: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: I will when I have finished. I should like to finish what I have to say at the moment.

Then this report goes on:

Although the farm bureau helped push the administration's present farm program through congress, it's "a demonstrated failure", concedes Charles B. Shuman, bureau president. His organization, which represents 1.6 million farmers and claims to be the country's largest farm group, wants an "entirely new concept of price supports," he said.

Then it goes on further:

One proposal is to set the support level at 90 per cent of the preceding three-year average market price of each type of crop.

I believe these few quotations as to what the thinking is at the present time in the United States, where they have had a rigid price support program in existence for many years, serve a useful purpose. The farmers of the United States have seen what such a program accomplishes; they have found out what are its disadvantages. They have found it is unworkable, and they have found it piles up terrific surpluses. They have found particularly, that it does not do the job it was intended to do, and that is the greatest disadvantage. Under these circumstances I think the situation there speaks for itself.

I should like to point out particularly, Mr. Speaker, that a rigid system can only support a limited number of commodities. This has been the experience in every country where such a program has been tried. In the United States they support 13 commodities plus dairy products and wool out of a total of 250 farm commodities produced. A flexible system, such as the one proposed in this bill, makes it possible to support any commodity for which support is required. This is one of the outstanding advantages of a flexible system as compared with a rigid type of system which the members of the C.C.F. particularly are advocating.

I cannot come to any other conclusion but this, Mr. Speaker; that no one with any real desire to help our farmers and put agriculture in a healthy economic position, and no one with any sense of responsibility, would even contemplate putting into effect in Canada a system like that of the United States.

The ultimate security feature of this legislation has been completely misrepresented by some hon. members in this house.

Mr. Ellis: Is that why you changed the bill?

Mr. Harkness: Their irresponsible statements in regard to it have been printed in the newspapers and have resulted in a misconception throughout the country. What is the minimum guaranteed in the bill has been represented as the maximum. The provision that for nine key commodities a mandatory floor in effect at all times of 80 per cent of the base price has been represented as all that the bill provides for the very opposite is true. The main thing provided in this bill is guaranteed yearly prices set each year and guaranteed to be in effect for the following 12 months.

This was the point I stated and restated during the resolution stage, and those guarantees that are implicit in the bill have always been there. The amendments are proposed in order to spell these out so there will be no ambiguity about them, no question that they are there.

There has been further criticism, so far as the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties are concerned, that this bill is a denial and repudiation of this party's election pledges.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: This, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely untrue. I have here the election pledges, and I will read them in a moment and demonstrate that this legislation carries out those election pledges to the letter. This is what we promised so far as this matter is concerned. I am reading from a booklet put out at the time of the last election and which deals with agriculture. This booklet says:

> To this end, we will:
> 1. Maintain a flexible price support program—

We did not say we would maintain a rigid price support program; we said we would maintain a flexible price support program.

Mr. Ellis: Distress prices.

Mr. Harkness: I continue:

> —to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural producers—

An hon. Member: Where did that one go?

Mr. Harkness:

> —based on a fair price-cost relationship.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Where did that one go?

[Mr. Harkness.]

An hon. Member: What about that?

Mr. Harkness: This bill provides the perfect vehicle for doing that, because of the fact that these guaranteed yearly prices can be set at any percentage of the base price which is necessary each year to provide an adequate support price. The pledge that we have given to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural producers based on a fair price-cost relationship can be met better by a provision of that sort than it could possibly be met by a rigid type of support system for which my hon. friends over there are asking. The legislation makes it possible, and is intended to make it possible, to carry out that election pledge.

The second pledge was:

> 2. Include a definite formula in the Agricultural Prices Support Act for arriving at support prices, such formula to allow for variation in production and demand for individual products.

We have included a definite formula, a formula that is based on a moving average. This is the only formula of which I know that makes possible the implementation of the latter part of that pledge, the allowance for variation in production and demand in the individual product.

The third of our pledges was:

> 3. The formula and support prices will be established in consultation with representative farm organizations, and will be announced each year well in advance of the production period, as required.

The bill makes complete provision for that. We have set up an advisory committee to be drawn from farmers and representatives of farm organizations, and we have provided that these guaranteed prices will be set for a year in advance and will be in effect for 12 months after they have been set. I believe it is quite clear from that, Mr. Speaker, that we have carried out or we will carry out to the letter our election pledges in regard to support prices, once this bill has been passed and put into operation.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this. The success of any program depends to a great extent on the will and determination of the people in charge to make it work. I think it has been made clear to the people of Canada, particularly to the Canadian farmers, that during the six months we have been in office—it will not be six months until tomorrow, as a matter of fact—we have made a determined effort to improve the position of agriculture. We have taken definite steps which have accomplished that improvement in regard to some particular commodities. We have made a start in several other directions in which improvements have to be made in order to put agriculture in a truly healthy position.

I am sure that every agricultural delegation which has made representations to the present government, and there have been many of them, has been struck by the fact that we are glad to hear what their problems are and are anxious to take any steps we can to improve their situation. We are making an honest and wholehearted effort to improve the position of agriculture. This bill is one of the means we are taking to accomplish that end. I would hope that it might get second reading before the Christmas recess, and that we might complete it early in the new year, so the benefits it will provide may be available to Canadian farmers early in 1958.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): Mr. Speaker, is it your desire that I should proceed now? It is within a minute of quarter to one.

An hon. Member: Call it one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I think the right hon. gentleman should proceed. We have an uncertain length of time to wait until the message comes from the Senate.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the argument which has been put forth within the last 15 minutes impels me to recall the point of order that was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when we were on this bill previously. He got to his feet and asked whether or not there was something wrong with the loudspeaker system, and suggested that the voice, while it was coming from the other side of the house, seemed to be an expression of what had been said by myself when I was minister of agriculture.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The voice of Jacob but the hand of Esau.

Mr. Gardiner: Having listened to a review of what Mr. Benson has said, I would refer the present Minister of Agriculture back to Hansard to find a considerable part of it already there.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is probably where he got his speech.

Mr. Gardiner: Even where I was not referring to Mr. Benson I referred to other United States organizations, some of which were quoted a few moments ago, to the effect that the United States system of price support known as parity prices would not be suitable to this country. In so far as he has given expression to that point of view it is in accordance with the point of view which we took.

I was a little surprised this morning when the minister suggested that such considerable changes were going to be made in the legislation which had been introduced by way of resolution a few days ago. But one has only to call attention to the title of the old act and that of the new bill in order to see what the real difference is intended to be. In the act as we now have it, the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the title is as follows:

> An act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace.

There could be a question raised as to whether we are already through that period. At the time the legislation was brought in it was argued that it might run for 18 or 20 years after the war, but there could be an argument as to whether that period has ceased to exist. But that is not the important feature which has been changed in the title of the new bill, which is:

> An act to provide for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities.

What is the difference between "supporting" and "stabilizing"? "Stabilizing" is keeping them as they are and "supporting" is doing whatever is necessary in order to improve them. Hence, as I say, one does not need to go beyond the title of the bill in order to indicate that not as much is being provided in this legislation, if it abides by the principle of the title, as there was in the legislation we had previously.

But in so far as the discussion at the moment is concerned, I want to turn to another feature of the speech to which we have just listened. It was largely addressed to our friends over in the corner, the C.C.F. I want to point out that this is a rather new attitude on the part of the government party of today. The present government while in opposition joined with the C.C.F. in a number of activities. The one which was most spectacular was in their opposition to the pipe line; and one, of course, can understand the attitude taken with regard to that matter.

That, however, was only the final act in a well planned effort to defeat Liberalism. The co-operation was first evident in Saskatchewan following the election of 1940, when the Conservative provincial leader was elected to the House of Commons. The common practice was to join the C.C.F. in attacks upon the Liberals, both federally and provincially, and then on nomination day to withdraw most of their candidates and leave those opposed to the Liberals with only one choice. That was the plan of operation.

After they had met with considerable success as a result of these tactics in Saskatchewan, the idea was introduced into their plans to oust the Liberals from power in Ottawa. Because of the fact that agriculture is the basic industry of the prairies they both naturally made their attack upon agricultural policy. The first year the then hon. member for Lake Centre was in the house of Commons, on a motion to go into supply—which made it a want of confidence motion—he moved an amendment in favour of parity prices as they then existed in the United States. We have been listening to a review of parity prices as they then existed in the United States. The resolution read as follows, as recorded on page 2280 of Hansard, April 8, 1941:

—it be resolved that the government should take immediate steps to create a parity of prices as between agricultural and other products—

He was supported on this occasion by all the C.C.F. members from Saskatchewan and Manitoba not only in speeches but in any votes that were cast in the house following that discussion. On each occasion that my estimates were before the house from then on the present Prime Minister renewed his suggestion that the one solution for farm problems was parity prices. On each occasion he was strongly supported by the western C.C.F. members or, if they introduced the subject, he strongly supported them.

In 1953 the then hon. member for Lake Centre moved another amendment to the motion to go into supply in the following words, as recorded in Hansard, March 23, 1953, page 3208:

—in the opinion of this house consideration should be given by the government to the advisability of introducing during the present session legislation to provide floor prices for agricultural products at such levels as to ensure producers a fair price-cost relationship.

Hon. members who were in the house at that time will recall that when the resolution came to a vote there was a scurrying from this section of the house in which they were then sitting to the curtains behind in order to avoid voting.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just like last Friday.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says, "Just like last Friday". I am recalling their attention to the fact that that is an old device which they used. From 1953 until 1956, on every occasion upon which there was any excuse for renewing the attack upon government agricultural policy, the allies joined their forces until on March 12, 1956, the hon. member for Prince Albert, again on a motion to go into supply, moved an amendment in these words, as reported on page 2024 of Hansard, March 12, 1956:

—in the opinion of this house consideration should be given by the government to the advisability of introducing during the present session legislation to create a parity of prices for agricultural products at levels to ensure producers a fair price-cost relationship.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

It will be noted that the wording of this resolution calls for parity prices by law, the most definite kind of parity prices. The C.C.F. members went along and gave their enthusiastic support, just as they are still doing, to the idea. But the Conservative convention was held in December of 1956, and the ardent advocate of parity prices, as they existed in the United States, became the leader of the Conservative party. There must have been some hitch in the understanding between the two allies. When the address in reply to the speech from the throne was under discussion the member for Yorkton moved an amendment as recorded in Hansard—

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners.
An act to amend the Unemployment Assistance Act.
An act to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. Speaker: Upon the resumption of the sitting the house will proceed with the business which was interrupted by the message from the other place.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE GUARANTEED PRICES FOR CERTAIN COMMODITIES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Harkness for the second reading of Bill No. 237, for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before asking the right hon. gentleman to resume I think I should say a word about the point of order which was raised when the Minister of Agriculture was speaking on the second reading of this bill. He announced his intention to move certain specific amendments at the committee stage of the bill, but of course no motion was made at the time, as the house was at the second reading stage and the debate was continuing at that stage.

I could see that some problems might arise for the minister in achieving his objective of making these amendments, and I suggested that the house might consider expediting the bill by having the amendments distributed and if they saw fit to do so incorporating them in the first reading of the bill at this time by unanimous consent.

That would be one solution of the difficulty. Otherwise we are on second reading, and would of course have to proceed through second reading and through the committee stage before the point of order raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would really be a point of order. We are anticipating a difficulty now which would only arise at the committee stage. So it seems to me it is a matter for the house to determine whether the suggestion made this morning is one which it wishes to adopt or whether we shall just proceed with the debate and allow the question of these amendments to come forward when they are proposed at the committee stage, because we have nothing before us now except the second reading of the bill. Perhaps the minister or some hon. members might have something to say about that.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, we do not want to hold up this measure because it is a very important one, but I raised a point of order which I thought was the proper thing to do at the time. We now have the amendments before us in mimeographed form, and I think what you have suggested would be quite satisfactory. I might say that had the government consulted the farm organizations before the bill was introduced instead of afterwards perhaps we should not have found ourselves in this position.

Mr. Speaker: My suggestion, and I put it forward now to the house, is whether or not the house would be prepared by unanimous consent to permit the reprinting of the bill as at first reading with the proposed changes which have been circulated in mimeographed form; that the first copies of the bill which have been already distributed be withdrawn, and that we continue at the present stage of the bill, that is second reading, all by unanimous consent. What we would have in effect would be a reprint of the bill incorporating these amendments, and we would proceed with the debate on second reading with that bill before the house rather than the one which was first printed.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, may I make it clear that this should establish no precedent for the future.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned that is perfectly satisfactory. I have no objection whatever to proceeding along that line.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, might I just ask a question with regard to the proposed amendments, mimeographed copies of which have been handed to us. I have looked through them rather hurriedly, I admit, and I have not had time to read them carefully; but during the minute or two I spent looking them over I have not been able to find the provision for increasing the base period from a three-year average to a ten-year average. Does that provision appear here?

Mr. Harkness: It should. I have not looked it over myself.

Mr. Fulton: No, it is not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Maybe it has been dropped.

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid that in the process of having the proposed amendments mimeographed that particular part has been left out. It could be added quite readily. It is simply a matter of changing the word "three" to the word "ten" where it appears in clause 8.

Mr. Gardiner: It is intended in discussing it on second reading to include that in the bill?

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one observation. I think I am prepared to say I would be agreeable to the course of action that has been suggested and would give unanimous consent if the minister could give us his assurance that the principle of the bill has not been changed in any way.

Mr. Harkness: All right.

Mr. Speaker: I think the amendments will speak for themselves. If the house gives consent it will have a bill as reprinted with the proposed changes. I would rather call them changes than amendments at this stage. The debate will then be on the bill as reprinted which we will have by combining the circulated bill and the mimeographed amendments plus the addition of the change of "three" to "ten". Do I understand, then, that the house is prepared to give unanimous consent?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if I understood him correctly this morning that it was intended to have the second reading of the bill and then leave it until we return after the Christmas recess for consideration in committee, so the bill could be reprinted in the meantime and when we get to the committee stage it would be in the form in which it would be deemed to have originally received first reading? I assume it could be reprinted so that hon. members could have the reprints to take away with them over the recess, in order that when they returned they would be prepared to discuss the clauses as they will then appear in the reprint.

I note with satisfaction, because of the traditional respect that is accorded to the practices of the past and to the rules of procedure, that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar wishes to make it quite clear that this will not be deemed to be a precedent, and that it is done because of the special conditions of this session and the fact that we are about to leave for the Christmas recess. I feel that all hon. members would like to have the reprint and have the days of the Christmas recess during which they could consider the reprinted bill and thereby be better prepared to deal with it when they come back after the recess. I would wish to add my statement that I do hope this will not be taken as a precedent that can be resorted to too frequently.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, may I just give the assurance for which the right hon. gentleman asked, that the committee stage of this bill will not be proceeded with until after the recess.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, may I ask one question just for the purpose of clarification. If we proceed in this way do I understand that the bill we have before us at the present time will not be the bill we will be considering but the bill with these amendments inserted in it?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. I think I can assure the house that there will be no delay in having the reprints made. The reprint will be distinguished by being marked as a reprint of the first reading of the first bill No. 237 in accordance with unanimous consent, or in some way as to distinguish it from the first form of the bill. It will then be circulated incorporating these amendments and the one which has been inadvertently omitted and we shall proceed with the debate on second reading, all by unanimous consent and without creating any precedent because it is something we could not do without unanimous consent. I appreciate the attitude taken by the house.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, before lunch I was placing on Hansard the relationship of the different groups in the house toward proposals that had been made from time to time to accept parity prices. I had just stated that the Conservative convention was held in December, 1956, and the ardent advocate of parity prices as they had them in the United States became leader of the Conservative party. There must have been some hitch at that time in the understanding between those who had been allies previously, namely the Conservative party and the C.C.F.

Mr. Coldwell: There was no understanding, ever.

Mr. Gardiner: When the address in reply to the speech from the throne was under discussion the hon. member for Yorkton moved an amendment in these words, as reported at page 582 of Hansard of January 23, 1957:

> We regret, however, that Your Excellency's advisers seem to favour a flexible price support program . . .

Of course it is obvious that His Excellency's advisers at that time were the Liberal government:

> We regret, however, that Your Excellency's advisers seem to favour a flexible price support program, the effect of which is to leave the agricultural industry in a state of uncertainty and insecurity; we also regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary steps to establish a system of parity prices for agricultural products at levels to ensure 100 per cent parity of income for agricultural producers.

It will be noted that two points were raised there. The first was intended to condemn flexible price support, and the second was to support 100 per cent of parity. When the vote was taken every Conservative who was in the house, including the leader of the official opposition, the then member for Prince Albert, voted against the amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So did every Liberal in the house.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I am coming to that. It should be noted here that when previous votes had been recorded there was a tendency for some persons not to be present at the time the vote was taken, but on this occasion most of those who had previously been absent were present, as the vote will show. On this occasion the official opposition were present to vote with the government, not with the C.C.F. In other words the position which had been taken on previous occasions had been altered, in that there was a direct vote. I presume if you can take a vote against an amendment to be in favour of something, there was a vote in favour of the flexible price which the government of the day had been putting into effect and there was, in the same way, a vote against 100 per cent of parity, which was a new position for one of the parties to have taken.

This gave rise to considerable cross-firing between the official opposition and the C.C.F. group which would be interesting if I had time to record it. I might say, however, one is not required to quote much to prove the position taken then by the present Prime Minister. He summarized the position in his speech on the amendment to the motion to go into supply in 1956, as reported at pages 2021 to 2023 of Hansard. He said:

The squeeze which the farmer suffers results from the disparity in the relationship between the prices of farm products and the prices the farmer has to pay. When they are in proper relationship parity is established, and it is parity that the farm organizations across this country are asking for today.

Later on the hon. member for Prince Albert said:

I know of no better definition of parity than that which appeared in yesterday's New York Times. I have made the necessary changes in the definition to meet the situation in this country. It is as follows:

"Parity prices are the dollars and cents prices that give to farm products the same buying or purchasing power they had in a selected base period when prices received by and prices paid by farmers were regarded as in good balance.

He illustrated by saying one should be able to buy the same quantity of necessities with a load of barley in each of those periods. The hon. member for Prince Albert again went on to say:

It goes on to point out—

He was referring to the article in the New York Times.

—the difference between rigid price supports which have not proved successful and flexible price supports which have proved successful in the experience of the United States.

He then continued to point out the number of times he had advocated parity prices, and he went back over the record which I have placed on Hansard today and said this, as reported at page 2023 of Hansard:

One of the earliest occasions was in 1941, during the war. The last occasion when we moved an amendment regarding this question of parity prices was on March 23, 1953.

I refer to that to come back to the statement I made earlier, namely that the words "parity prices" were not in that resolution moved at that time, but the present Prime Minister said later on, when reviewing it, that it was a motion in favour of parity prices. Then he said:

At that time I moved this amendment.

The amendment, as I have pointed out, does not have the words "parity prices" in it. The amendment reads:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Since I have already put this resolution on the record I will not do it again. The present Prime Minister then argued that the Conservative platform of 1948 was intended to support parity prices. The present Prime Minister moved, seconded by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton), the following motion, as reported at page 2024 of Hansard of 1956:

[Mr. Gardiner.]

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this house consideration should be given by the government to the advisability of introducing during the present session legislation to create a parity of prices for agricultural products at levels to ensure producers a fair price-cost relationship.

In speaking to the amendment the hon. member for Prince Albert said, as reported at page 2026 of Hansard of March 12, 1956:

The trend referred to in the amendment moved in 1953 has continued. Canadian agriculture today would not be in its present precarious position if action had been taken at that time on the basis of the experience of our neighbour to the south and also on the basis of the demands of farmers generally.

There can be no question, then, that what the present Prime Minister had in mind when he was playing along with the C.C.F. was parity prices as they had them in the United States down to 1953. On each occasion when the hon. member for Prince Albert moved such an amendment to the motion to go into supply I rose and said we had two reasons for opposing it. First, we were opposed to the United States system of parity price support and, second, it was a trick motion to put our candidates in wrong in agricultural constituencies.

We were not surprised when in January, 1957, the C.C.F. called their hand, and we found the Conservative party had so acted as to cause their leader to follow Conservative rather than C.C.F. doctrine.

But what happened when the Prime Minister got into the election campaign? He was naturally speaking in the larger centres and always through the larger dailies to the people who were opposed to 100 per cent parity prices which had been attempted in the United States. He was reported in the Winnipeg Free Press as having said on May 14:

The price support system advanced by the Conservatives would feature a flexible formula. Critics of support prices said they would create huge surpluses such as those which had developed in the United States from the support system there. The difference was, Mr. Diefenbaker said, that the program proposed by his party would be based on a flexible formula, the United States surpluses had developed because of a fixed formula.

The following day in the Winnipeg Free Press and other dailies he was reported to have said:

The C.C.F. in the last session of parliament had called for 100 per cent parity price support for agriculture. "What nonsense". Did anyone believe that the people of Canada would permit the taxation necessary to give farmers their full pay regardless of production?

He went on to use an illustration following that, and asked if a labourer should be paid full prices when he came under unemployment insurance. Should he be given his full pay, and therefore should the farmer be given his full pay?

A few days later, on May 18, he is reported in the Regina Leader-Post as saying:

> I urged a system of parity prices in 1941 in a resolution in the house, and asked for it two other times. But every Liberal voted against it. This year I moved a resolution for a price support program to allow a fair cost relationship. That's what the farmers want, not the 100 per cent parity prices the C.C.F. asks which I voted against because I knew it was a trick motion. The Liberals voted my motion down again.

As I pointed out, every one of those resolutions except one was on a motion to go into supply and therefore a trick motion. The one which was not on a motion to go into supply was on the address. The recorded vote on the one on the address is in Hansard to be looked at by anyone to corroborate what I have been saying. During the campaign, in speaking to the audiences I have mentioned, the Prime Minister made the statements to which I have referred. At least he is reported to have made them, and I presume the reports are correct; I have not heard of them being corrected.

Then what was being said throughout the rural press of western Ontario? Candidates were carrying advertisements based on the Prime Minister's previous statement in the house claiming that he was for 100 per cent parity. If anyone doubts that, though I am sure there are members on the other side of the house who know it is correct, all they need to do is look at the advertisements. I have one of them here. What does that advertisement say? It was issued on June 5, 1957 in the Chatham Daily News. It says:

> Mr. Consumer says: "Our cost of living continues to rise with lower farm prices". What is the answer?

I may say there is something just as interesting in the upper part of this advertisement, but I am not going to take time to read it because it does not strictly refer to the question under discussion.

> What is the answer? John Diefenbaker and Albert Jolley say 100 per cent parity support prices. Protection from American subsidized surpluses. Regain foreign markets. Diefenbaker tax policy. Diefenbaker monetary policy. A vote for Albert Jolley is a vote for John Diefenbaker.

The only point to which I wish to draw attention at the moment is that the very first item mentioned in that advertisement is 100 per cent parity support prices. I can quite understand, Mr. Speaker, why there have been some changes in the legislation as it was first brought down. I can understand why some members from the rural areas of Ontario, who were elected on the strength of these advertisements, were insisting on some changes being made in the bill as it was first brought before this house.

I want to say to those members that the amendments which have been made, and which have been introduced today, are not sufficient to meet the criticism they are going to receive when they go back home after this session as a result of having appealed for votes and succeeded on the basis of these advertisements. I understand these advertisements were placed generally all through agricultural sections of the east and some of them, probably not quite so strong as that, in some of the newspapers in the west.

What did the Minister of Agriculture say about this when speaking on the resolution? The minister spoke on Wednesday, December 11, 1957, and at page 2186 of Hansard we find this:

> However, what was generally in mind was some sort of system such as that in effect in the United States—

That is, when people were talking about parity prices that was what most of them had in their minds.

> —because our farmers were aware that men across the border in the same lines of production as themselves in many cases were receiving higher prices.
> At the same time it was common knowledge amongst all who had studied the matter at all that the United Strates parity price system had led to difficulties of various kinds.

Apparently the leader of the Conservative party of that day had not made any studies, because on several occasions and right until he became leader of the Conservative party he had advocated the adoption of that particular system. The Minister of Agriculture went on to say:

> It had resulted in the accumulation of vast surpluses of many agricultural products which had proven embarrassing to the United States agricultural economy and government, and the disposal of which has had serious effects on Canada and other nations.

I think it was about at that point that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose on a point of order to ascertain whether or not his system was working properly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not my system, the loud speaker system.

Mr. Gardiner: I continue reading from the Minister of Agriculture:

> The United States system proved unworkable as far as some products were concerned. It produced anomalies and illogical situations in many cases, and it had constituted a heavy drain on the general taxpayer.

I am not too sure that even the system of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been working correctly, because the minister has been saying some rather peculiar things outside as well as inside the house on this same question. I continue to read from the Minister of Agriculture's speech:

> In view of all this, as a first step in attempting to devise a practical and workable agricultural prices stabilization bill for Canada I took a fairly close look at the United States system with a view to determining the defects in that system so we might avoid the difficulties which they have run into.
> The first and most important defect, I believe, is the lack of flexibility and from this cause most of their troubles have developed.

Now, I just refer back to the resolution which was put on the record to the effect that the C.C.F. party did not believe in flexibility. They apparently do not believe in flexibility even now, judging from what we have heard during the discussion of this question. I can quite understand why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre thought there was something wrong with the loudspeaker system. Up to this point the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture could have been quoted from my speeches when I was trying to keep his leader on the right track on other occasions. I would not have been surprised if the minister had said at that point, "We have therefore decided to continue on the statute books the most flexible plan ever devised, that is the present Agricultural Prices Support Act."

Instead, he proceeded to suggest changes, every one of which I suggest rendered the new plan less flexible than the old one. Everything which can be done under this measure could be done under the old act. We did select a group of commodities under which we placed supports. The act was so flexible that it was possible to deal with cattle while the foot-and-mouth disease was prevalent and take them out again when it would have done harm to deal with them any longer.

In other words, there is nothing in the act which said we were going to deal with foot-and-mouth disease under this legislation. No one had any idea that foot-and-mouth disease was going to develop, but this legislation is sufficiently flexible that we were able to step in and deal with the problems which resulted from the fact that there had been foot-and-mouth disease in this country, and when it became necessary to get rid of beef and pork products. There was more flexibility under the old legislation relating to cattle than there is in the new. Then the act was so flexible that we were able actually to raise the price of butter to the producer when we decided to support the price. Later we were able to make deficiency payments on butter, and thus maintain a lower price to the consumer without lowering the price to the producer.

The act has all these possibilities in it and many more. Deficiency payments are provided for in the act, and deficiency payments were made in connection with a number of products. That matter in itself having to do with butter was a deficiency payment. When you say to the producer, "We are going to take butter from you at 58 cents a pound", and then turn around and say, "We are going to give the butter to the wholesaler at 58 cents a pound" resulting in the consumer getting his butter at 2 to 3 cents less a pound with the government paying the carrying charges in between, that is a deficiency payment. There are dozens of ways of making deficiency payments. The law we have now makes it possible to do it in any one of those ways.

In putting this legislation before the house my hon. friend said he had examined very carefully into five different ways of putting a formula into the act, and he had decided that the one providing for a three-year base, in order to establish a basic price, was the best of all. Today he has come along and said that some people think a ten-year base is better.

With regard to that matter I am only going to say that the other day when he mentioned the matter the hon. member for Moose Mountain put in his comment and said this ten-year average was a silly proposal. I just remind the member for Moose Mountain of the fact that the first man from whom I ever heard about a ten-year average was an hon. member over in that corner of the house who is sitting looking at me now. I refer to the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schulz).

Mr. Schulz: But not the same years.

Mr. Gardiner: No; a ten-year moving basis, which would not be the same years all the time. That was the submission made to the previous government, namely a ten-year basis. We gave the same answer to all those who came along with these proposals; "It does not make any difference what proposal you bring in, our act is so flexible that it is possible to utilize the suggestions in arriving at a decision as to what the support price should be".

In connection with that matter, I recall that the other day the Minister of Agriculture enumerated all the considerations which would be taken into account in putting into effect even the three-year average, and he left out what I consider to be the most important one. If I was listening carefully enough to hear all the suggestions he made, it seemed to me that he did not suggest the possible importation of products into this country from outside. When we were setting support prices under the Agricultural Prices Support Act that was always one of the most important factors to be taken under consideration, and it will still remain one.

As I recall it there is only one piece of legislation that is available at the present time in order to deal with situations of that kind if you want to go further than the support act can go in dealing with them, and that is the Export and Import Permits Act. If I remember correctly that is the act upon which the official opposition of that day first decided to put on a filibuster. When that legislation was brought down following the end of the war, when it became necessary to get rid of all the proposals that had been made under the War Measures Act, we had a battle that went on for days. They did not want that legislation at all.

There are certain things which have been done since this government came into office which I do not think could have been done without the assistance of that act. It is being utilized in connection with some of these matters. In other words, the price at which you can ship products into Canada must be considered when you are putting on supports in this country.

The one with which I can illustrate the point best was dealt with effectively by the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture a year ago at the December conference. At that time he dealt with this matter of support prices, particularly parity prices, and he used the term "parity of income" instead of "parity prices". Then he went on to deal with the suggestion which had been made by the interprovincial farm union to the effect that there should be a price on hogs established at 100 per cent of parity basis of some $33, and that there should be a price of some $23 provided on cattle.

The president of the farm federation at that time—and he is still president—illustrated the point in his discussion at the dominion-provincial conference in December a year ago, when he said that if you were to put in that particular price as the support price in Canada, the market would be flooded in a short time by United States beef. So that question always had to be discussed or considered when supports on these products were being dealt with.

The legislation as it is made it possible for us to consider the three-year basis. As a matter of fact the three-year basis is fundamental to that legislation. We set as the basis from which we were to figure the last three years of the war, namely 1943, 1944 and 1945, and we took that as the basis because farmers were fairly well satisfied at the time. We put right in the act the authority for comparing any support price that was brought in later on with the conditions in those three years.

Naturally it was in the middle of the three-year period that the legislation was put on the statute books, namely in 1944, and it was anticipated it would not come into effect until after the war was over. It was first applied in 1946, and so the years that were considered then were the preceding three years, 1943, 1944 and 1945. As we moved up year by year we compared three years with the last three years of the war.

I heard one of my friends back here a little while ago say, "But we never did get up to 100 per cent parity". We were supported in that, too, by farm organizations of the day. The federation said finally, after giving the matter full consideration, that the support should not be higher than 85 per cent of parity and it should not be lower than 65 per cent of parity. At a later date they changed the lower figure from 65 per cent to 70 per cent; nevertheless the fact is that on every occasion that we set a support price from that time on we checked it with the formula that had been established by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

There was nothing in the act that said we were compelled to do so. There was nothing in the act that said we could not do so. There was nothing in the act that said we had to abide by a three-year basis. There was nothing in the act which said we had to abide by a ten-year basis. I therefore say again that to the extent that this act says either three years or ten years, and binds anyone by it, it is not as flexible as the act that is already on the statute books, and so does not meet the conditions that may exist so well as the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

Having said that about the general statements that have been made with regard to the system which is proposed in this bill, and in view of the fact that the minister has dealt with some of the clauses seriatim, I think I should not be required to stick too closely to the rules, though I know that one of the important rules is that you do not deal with sections seriatim when you are dealing with second reading of a bill.

They could, of course, be dealt with when we are putting them through the committee, and I do not think I need say that I am not urging that anyone should not feel free to do so. But when we get into committee I suggest we can move amendments to some of these sections which are referred to. I know there will be some, and I have one in mind particularly which is very important, and which has already been discussed at great length by the minister at the resolution stage, at which time I might say that none of us knew exactly what was in the bill. They were discussed again this morning on second reading. I referred to one of them when I first got to my feet, and that was the title of the bill.

The long title of the act as it now stands on the statute books is "An act for the support of the price of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace". There is a similar title to the bill which is now before the house, namely "An act to provide for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities". Those two titles are intended to indicate the difference in principle between the two bills, a difference which makes it necessary to bring down a new bill.

Well, stabilization is keeping things just as much as possible where they are at the moment, and support means adding to whatever you have got. So I think if that is intended to be the difference, then the statement I made when we were discussing this at the resolution stage was quite correct and does describe the two measures quite fully.

Mr. Harkness: I think the right hon. member knows quite well that is not intended to be the difference, and it never was.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I always take the indication from the English language that expresses it.

Mr. Harkness: You had better look up the meaning of the word "support" in the dictionary.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, I think we all know the meaning of the word "support". It is doing something to help, but you do not help by putting the price down, as may be in this case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: And I think also the word "stabilization" is pretty well understood. The fact is that farmers do not want prices rushing up to an unusual height.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Gardiner: And they do not want them rushing down to unusual levels either. They want stabilized prices which would stay pretty much on the same level, so they can understand what is going to happen in a year from now or two years from now, as my hon. friend said when he was discussing stabilization. That is the intention of the word "stabilization", and so I say there is a difference between the two measures in that regard.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

There has been considerable discussion of the advisory committee to be set up under the board. Under the old act, as was stated by the minister the other day after he had had another look at it, such a committee is provided for under section 9, subclause (j); it does state that the board has authority to appoint a committee or committees. We could have appointed more than one to assist the board in an advisory capacity. In the new bill this has been thought important enough to be set up in a separate clause, and that clause states certain things. I can quite understand why some of the critics of the bill wanted it changed and I notice that there had been changes made in it. However, the changes suggested do not cover all the points which I would suggest should be covered.

In the old legislation, as has been stated by the minister, we utilized a committee which was already in existence. It was put there for the purpose of assisting in price support measures during the war, after the war action was taken under subclause "j" to name the same persons to a committee to advise the agricultural prices support board.

The board was constituted almost entirely of persons who could be appointed under this present bill with one exception, that there is no representation of the provincial departments of agriculture under this bill.

The minister has stated "Well, there were only deputy ministers from the provincial governments on that committee". That is not true in all cases. In many cases it was not a deputy at all; as a matter of fact in some cases the provincial governments nominated representatives from farm organizations who were not in the employ of the governments at all, and that was particularly true in the early stages of the existence of that committee.

The board had authority under that act to appoint a committee, and they did appoint a committee. That committee did not remain the same year after year; whenever farm organizations wanted a change made—either because some person who had been on it changed his mind and joined some other farm organization, or for some other reason—they came along and nominated some other representative. We accepted those nominations in every case and had the one man replaced with another. So that committee was kept up to date right along.

There is one other thing which should be stated here with respect to the committee. We never at any time suggested to the committee on what they should advise us. We never at any time asked the committee to advise us on certain things. They came here of their own volition. They asked for a date to be set, and we set a date which was satisfactory both to them and to ourselves; we met them and they made their recommendations. Now what does this bill say?

> The minister shall appoint an advisory committee, to include representation from farm organizations, consisting of a chairman and at least six, but not more than nine, other members.

As I remember the committee as at present constituted, it has a membership of about 19, and when you take off the 10 provincial representatives you are left with nine. None of those nine were nominated by the provinces but were nominated by the farm organizations. Even some of those nominated by the provinces under the act had been nominated from farm organizations. Then it goes on:

> The advisory committee established under subsection (1) shall advise the minister and the board with respect to such matters relating to the stabilization of prices of agricultural commodities under this act as are referred to it by the minister or the board.

I assume that is still in the amended clause as we now have it. In other words the only matters on which this committee is going to advise are those matters referred to it by the minister or by the board. They are not going to advise on matters referred to them by their own organizations when they are told to come here. And then it goes on to say that the members of the advisory committee may be paid for their services such remuneration and expenses as are fixed by the governor in council.

Well, I think that is the same as it was in the old act; at least the provision is the same, whether it is in the same wording I do not know. At least we had the authority to do it under either measure. When we were considering the matter of an advisory committee and of whom that advisory committee should be composed, we called in the presidents of the farm organizations and the officials who were concerned and I personally asked them this question: "Do you want to be put in the same position as the heads of the wheat board?" When they were appointed they were members of one or other of the wheat pools which are known to be farm organizations and nothing but farm organizations, but before they were on the board for two years people were referring to them in this house and outside as no longer being dirt farmers, saying they had no right to be on a board representing farmers but should be replaced by somebody else who did represent the dirt farmers.

I said to them, "Do you wish your representative to be paid a salary and put in that same position later on, or do you wish whoever happens to be nominated by your organization, and no matter who he is, to come here to advise the government from time to time as a representative of that organization?" Well, the presidents at that time took that question back to their organizations and reported to me later that the organizations had unanimously decided that they did not wish the government to pay their representatives. They wanted to pay their own, and the only amounts they hoped would be supplied by the government were the expenses of their trips to Ottawa from time to time.

Mr. Harkness: I can assure the hon. member there is no intention to force payment on anybody who does not want it.

Mr. Gardiner: That is not the question. The question is are you going to make him a paid official, appointed and paid by the government no matter whether he wants it or not, or are you going to leave the advisers still the spokesmen for the farm organizations which pay them their salaries? That is the important question. This legislation makes it possible to get men who are going to advise as they are asked to advise by the minister or the board, and only on the things about which they are asked to advise by the minister or the board. I think the supporters of the government on the back benches ought to tell their leaders there are some further changes which must be made in this measure before it can become as flexible or as effective as the act already on the statute books.

There is one other thing in these amendments which have been brought in about which I should like to say a word. We are going to have a preamble, it seems. In discussions in this house while we were in the government we were condemned in season and out of season for putting preambles in bills which, our opponents said, were intended to mean this, that and the other. When I was speaking on the introduction of the Agricultural Prices Support Act I was even accused by an hon. member sitting on the other side of the house of putting a preamble into that measure which meant something the bill did not provide for.

I excused that hon. gentleman for having thought there was a preamble by saying that probably the title was so long that it had caused him to become confused on the point —"an act for the support of prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace". I said this was not a preamble but merely the title of the bill. But the opposition did not want a preamble, that was clear. Now, apparently, someone in the same party on the opposite side of the house does want a preamble, and thus we have one brought down in the second copy of the bill submitted to this house for second reading:

> Whereas it is expedient to enact a measure for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy:

Where did they get that, Mr. Speaker? That in substance is the wording that was in subsection 2 of section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. In other words even they have found that there is not so much in this bill as there was in that act, and they have gone back to it and have had a second look at it and taken out some of the things that were in it and put them into this preamble so that on second reading the measure might have a better chance of getting through.

Mr. Harkness: I can assure the hon. gentleman that was not the case.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not want to read the other act, but since the minister doubts whether this is the case maybe I had better do so. Section 9, subsection 2 on page 4 of the act reads:

> In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection 1 the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting an orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is the same idea that is now being put into this new bill by way of a preamble. Every farm organization, every hon. member who took steps to put out advertisements such as I mentioned a few moments ago, knew what was the intention of this act, and when they found that a statement of that kind was not in the bill as given to this house we had an amendment brought down today. They were so ashamed—I guess that is the right word—of what they had been compelled to do that they would not even tell us about it, and when we tried to get them out of trouble by suggesting that they should reprint the bill as they intended to have it they tried to put us off by saying that the bill was before the house. A bill was before the house, but it was not the bill we are discussing now. There have been considerable changes made in it.

So I say you can go through this bill from one end to the other, and if you do not find all that was in section 3 of the old act, the Agricultural Prices Support Act, then turn to the new one and take sections 3 and 4 and you will find practically all of it in the two sections. And if you do not find what is in section 5 in the new bill you will find it in a subsection of the old act. You can go right through it, and when you have come to the end you will find that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was absolutely correct when he said that you would think the present Minister of Agriculture was reciting the very same things that had been said by the previous minister of agriculture. So what I say to the minister at the moment is that so far as I am concerned I do not know how he is going to expect me to vote against this bill.

Mr. Nowlan: We were sure you wouldn't.

Mr. Harkness: We felt confident about that.

Mr. Gardiner: The minister seems to have overcome the opinions of his own leader, the Prime Minister, in getting a bill before this house which did not have 100 per cent parity in it.

Mr. Macdonnell: Are you going to claim parentage?

Mr. Gardiner: I don't know just what the hon. gentleman means by that. Any parentage I have will be in the Liberal party and not in the Tory party.

In other words, we have a measure before the house which does not do all the things that could have been done under the old measure, yet there is not a single thing in it that could not have been done under the old measure without any change whatsoever excepting an additional $50 million, and it will take a lot of demonstrating to indicate that since they could not settle one problem when there was $170 million in the fund with which to settle it, they will be any more able to settle similar problems when there is $250 million there, because it will not take that much in connection with any particular project and, as I say, it could have been dealt with under the old measure.

I want to sum up by saying this. The legislation already on the statute books is the most flexible of any legislation on the statute books of any country having to do with price support, and our friends in the United States did us the honour of saying they were going to pay us the compliment of following our practice. After they had copied the idea of flexibility, our hon. friends opposite look down to the United States and say well, we guess we are in favour of flexible prices, too.

The new legislation is less flexible, but it appears to be too flexible for the C.C.F. group. They do not like flexibility in legislation of this kind, and to the extent that the Minister of Agriculture is twitting the C.C.F. with being opposed to flexible prices I am pretty much in agreement with him. We think flexible prices are appropriate to legislation enacted for the purpose of stabilizing the return for farm products. But there is less flexibility in this act.

With regard to products, we could take in any groups of products whatsoever. We could classify them, as they are classified under the new bill, divide them into different groups and say, "We are going to deal with this one for a few months at present, and not with the other". The minister says that flexibility to this extent is a bad thing, and he is stating today he is taking it out of the act. He says we should not be in a position to put support prices on for only a few months; we should not be in a position to say, when we put a support price on hogs, that we are going to take it off in a few months' time.

Our support price on hogs is not limited to any period of a few months or to any one year. It was simply put there and it has remained there ever since the taking off of the foot-and-mouth embargo at $23 and every farmer has known it is there at $23. It is true that for the first year after the foot-and-mouth disease we did put a limit of time on it but when we dealt with it later on we took out that limit. It runs on continuously. Then, in addition to that, the act that is now on the statute books was declared in 1950 to be continuous. There is nothing limited about it. It goes right on until some other government takes it off and I am sorry to see that the some other government which is taking it off is the Conservative government whose members tell us believes in flexible prices. They propose taking off the statute books legislation that provides for the most flexible method of setting prices that has been provided anywhere. In this bill there is not so much flexibility for products and there is not so much flexibility in placing price supports as under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. My friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) took butter as an example in order to illustrate how the act works. He said that they propose to take the average price for the last three years which would be 60 cents and put a permanent basis of 80 per cent under butter and that would be 48 cents.

What I want to say to him, and I am sure every farmer in this house will agree with me when I say it, is that when you set up in a piece of legislation a set price—call it anything you like—you give an indication to someone, usually some trader dealing with the farmer, that that is the price the government thinks ought to be paid for the commodity and the tendency will be to gravitate toward that price. For that reason we never did put a price of this kind in our supports during the time we were in power and I do not think it is a good thing to put such a price in.

When you go back to the time when we put a support under butter what do you find? You find that we took into consideration all of the facts including the price of dairy products in the United States, and the price in Britain, New Zealand, Australia and everywhere. Then we worked out under the formula which was then set up what the price might be, or ought to be, here in Canada to bring 100 per cent parity. And after we worked that out we then determined what price could be put in here without finding this market flooded with commodities from somewhere else in the world and that served as the established price. It was a higher price than we had been obtaining on an average the year before. We did not say it was an average of this, that or something else. We thought the farmer needed that much in order to carry on in dairy farming and so we set it at 58 cents. Every farm organization at some time or other during the period in which that has been in effect has said that it served the farmers and served them well.

The present measure is less flexible with regard to products and prices and supports and is less flexible in its provisions with relation to the advisory committee. These were the main things mentioned by the minister when he was speaking of the act itself and the principle underlying it. Because the act that is presently on the statute books is more flexible in all three respects than the provision now before the house I am going to say again that the present act is the most flexible legislation that has ever been put on the statute books of any country to deal with price supports. Any change that is made in it in order to meet conditions will tend to make it less flexible than it had been before.

I said a few moments ago that as far as I am concerned I am voting for the measure which has been brought in. If I had an opportunity to vote for the act which presently exists I would vote for it because it is of greater benefit to the farmer. Since it has been decided by the government to repeal the present measure and bring this new bill forward I can only say there is nothing in it I would be particularly opposed to although I must comment that it does not do as much as the existing act does and I am opposed to it on that basis. But since this bill represents all this government thinks it ought to do for the farmers—and after all it said it was going to do this is what it feels is worth while doing—I am prepared to see it go on the statute books and deal with the government in light of developments when it goes to the country, whenever that might be.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us to provide for the stabilization of agricultural commodities is one which to my knowledge has received more publicity than any measure which has been enacted since I have been a member of this house. It has been heralded as the main plank of the Conservative farm program; indeed, it has been described as the bill of rights for the farmer.

Right at the very outset, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have considered this bill and I think it is a fiasco, a monstrosity and the product of political ineptitude. I believe that one could call it a Jekyll and Hyde bill. After months of delay the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) brought into this house a measure which was supposed to be the Conservatives' key legislation to provide justice for the farmer and after bringing it in late in the dying days of the session we find that the minister is not too sure of it. In his explanation at the resolution stage the minister attempted to indicate that his officials have investigated many price formulas and supports in other countries. The events of the last week seem strange to me. After the introduction of the bill when farm organizations started to take exception to it and when members of the opposition parties expressed strong disapproval of it apparently this opposition to the proposed measure caused the backbenchers of the Tory party to do some second thinking.

I would like to ask those members sitting on the back benches in the Tory party why they did not review this proposed legislation in caucus before it was presented to the house.

More particularly I want to point out to the Minister of Agriculture that one of the firm commitments members of this party made as a political party in regard to farm policy was that the farm organizations would be called in for discussion and consultation before farm legislation with regard to farm support prices would be presented to this house. The government utterly failed to do that. Only this morning did I understand that after the bill was proposed to the house the Minister of Agriculture who was so sure of himself when he introduced the resolution decided to ask representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other farm organizations to come to Ottawa, sit down with members of the government and talk it over. Of course there was little these leaders of the farm organizations could suggest within the scope of this bill.

In the discussion that took place this morning when the minister tried to bring in amendments to this bill he said that they did not change the principle of the bill and I think I must fully agree with him in that regard because it is a non-principle bill. There is not much principle in it and so it is pretty hard to change.

After the bill was introduced the minister, in the face of the opposition that had been voiced, decided to call in representatives of the farm organizations to try and doctor it up for the government. You can readily see the stupidity of this method of operation. I called it silly the other day and of course it is both silly and stupid. I want to warn the government that it is going to see more opposition, even with these new amendments to the bill, than any government has ever seen from farm organizations in Canada. At this moment in western Canada farm organizations are calling mass meetings with respect to this legislation. Members of this house are receiving telegrams and letters daily from farmers and farm organizations appealing to them to try to do something and asking them not to support this legislation. This proposal represents an affront to the people of Canada. Many people have lost faith in this new government which they voted for last June 10. Some things could have been done under the Agricultural Prices Support Act but with the exception of butter only on one occasion did the former government step in and do something in a real way since 1944 and that was under an emergency.

While prices of everything that the farmer had to buy were going up and the price of everything that he had to sell were going down the last Liberal government stood idly by and did nothing about it. It was not strange to me to hear the hon. member for Melville, the former minister of agriculture in the Liberal government, a party which at one time had a lot of prestige in Canada, say what he did. I am convinced that when the right hon. member said that he could do nothing but support the present legislation he truly admitted that they were bedfellows and that they agreed with the Conservative policy.

Mr. Gardiner: We do not have any bedfellows. You tried that and they kicked you out.

Mr. McCullough: If the minister who is bringing down the suggested amendments thinks that he is fooling the backbenchers in his own party—I cannot say, that is up to them—I want to say to him that he is not fooling the farm organizations. I talked to one of the leading farm organization officials this morning and he said to me: "This legislation makes me sick". It is not going to fool the western farmer; it is not going to fool the man on the land, the man who for the past number of years has been doing a real job to feed the people of this country and the hungry people of the world. It is not going to fool the farmers. They know. They know the past Liberal government had promised to give them justice in the promises they made when the Agricultural Prices Support Act was enacted, but the government failed to do so. Under the new amendments there is nothing but pious hopes.

I want to deal briefly with the Agricultural Prices Support Act. The hon. member for Melville, of course, went into that act quite completely and I do not think I should spend too much time on it. However, I do want to say that under that legislation the former government, with the help of the revolving fund, could have supported agricultural prices so that the farmer would have received his fair share of the national income. I wish to quote from the act. This act received royal assent on August 15, 1944, and an amendment in 1950 made it continuous from April 1, 1950. The agricultural prices support board was set up under the act to:

> Endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture . . . and to endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

These are noble sentiments, Mr. Speaker. There is a real meaning to these words if they are taken literally by any government and I can only say that the past government must have looked on this in the same way as this government appears to look on it, namely that the man on the farm should be a second-rate citizen; that he is not entitled to parity, that he is not entitled to justice as a reward for his efforts in producing foodstuffs for this country.

Of course, under the former Agricultural Prices Support Act there was an advisory board. Under the proposed act the minister is saying that they are going to have an advisory committee. The suggestion is that they will be called in and perhaps their suggestions will be listened to in formulating price support levels for the farmers. But, if past history means anything, Mr. Speaker, what assurance have we that this government, which has brought in this bill without any guarantee of a floor price in relation to parity, is going to listen to the farm organizations? What assurance have we when they have already practically ignored the farm organizations when they were drafting this bill? How can we be sure that their representations are going to be listened to? I think this bill is infamous, and it will become more infamous for the things that it leaves out than the things it contains. In no way is it a guarantee to the farmer.

I listened very carefully, and I have gone over many times, to what the Minister of Agriculture said when he introduced this bill on December 11. He used a lot of strange words. First, he said, as reported at page 2186 of Hansard:

> This is a far-reaching and important piece of legislation, perhaps the most important, in its implications, in its expected results for agriculture and its effect on the general economy, that has been considered by the Canadian parliament for many years.

Well, these are pious hopes, Mr. Speaker, because, when we discuss, as I should like to do this afternoon, the mechanics of this act, I am sure that everybody will agree it is even worse than the act we had before.

Then, the minister goes on to say that many parity price systems have been examined and that the United States price support program had been found to have many flaws. That may well be. I think almost any system of support prices or any farm program would have some flaws but let it not be forgotten that in the United States the farmers over the years have had a support price and they have had prosperity. It may well be that they have had some surpluses, but I can say that five members of the C.C.F. group went to Washington. We spent five days in the capital city and we had the good fortune to meet with many of the farm leaders of the farm bureau, and particularly of the national farmers' union of the United States, and they told us that the support prices then in force in the United States had brought prosperity to the farmers and at that time the national farmers' union was resisting the attempt of the Eisenhower government to try to break the stable price supports they had down there. Where they had brought in low flexible support prices, such as for dairy products, the support went down to 65 per cent and many dairy people were quitting the dairy industry and leaving the farm.

I am not this afternoon trying to defend what has been done under the United States prices support program but I wish to say that the prosperity of the farmer in the United States has certainly exceeded that of the Canadian farmer.

The minister tried to make a lot out of the fact that this bill has a base price based on a three year moving average. He did not say, of course, that the base price was going to be paid to the farmer. Later on in his speech he indicated that the minimum under the key commodities would be 80 per cent of the base price. I have gone a little farther than the illustration which he gave to the house. In respect of butter, I have taken the period from where he left off. He took the three years on the moving average and arrived at the position where the farmer would get 48 cents in the third year under the 80 per cent formula. Now, Mr. Speaker, following that through if, in a subsequent year, butter went down 18 cents the farmer, under the 80 per cent guarantee formula, would get 43.2 cents. In the subsequent year, if it went down another 12 cents, he would get under this formula a guarantee of only 35.2 cents. Therefore, the house can see that there is really no guarantee of an adequate return so far as the price support is concerned.

These are some of the other key things which the minister indicated he hoped this bill would do. He said, as reported at page 2187 of Hansard:

> First, he wants prices for his products which will cover his cost of production and leave him enough to live on;

Well, of course, this bill does nothing of the kind, Mr. Speaker. It only guarantees him at the best, under a moving average, 80 per cent of the average for the previous three years.

There is no resemblance whatever to the cost of production. Then, he says:

> The farmer—he desires a sense of security in his price structure, the removal of his long-time fear that prices will fall away to nothing while his crop is growing or his livestock developing to market size.

Again, this bill fails utterly to do that very thing. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that if the government ever had the intention of introducing an adequate price support bill for agriculture, they must have completely capitulated from that stand. If the minister had taken the opportunity to call in farm organizations we would not have had this inocuous bill before us.

For the benefit of the members of this house I want first to show the reaction of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to the proposals in this bill. This is what the federation said in making its statement on the apparent guarantees under the proposed price support bill, expressed in terms of parity as calculated by the C.F.A. formula. The average parity position of farm commodities for the past three years has been as follows: 1955, 85 per cent; 1956, 84 per cent; 1957, 82 per cent. This results in an average of 83.6 per cent. Now, 80 per cent of this three-year percentage of parity is 66.8 per cent; that is what the farmer would be guaranteed under the minister's proposal. For 1958, the guaranteed floors under the new bill would seem to be—I am going to illustrate this by citing some of the farm products:

	Per cent of Parity (C.F.A. Formula)
	Amount
B-1 hogs, Toronto	$21.56	64 per cent
Butter, Montreal	47.7c	66 per cent
Good steers, Toronto .	15.3c	61 per cent

In only one case, Mr. Speaker, and that is the case of No. 1 cheese at Toronto where the amount is 27.8 cents and the percentage of parity would be 72.6 per cent, would the percentage of parity be over 70 per cent. Then, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture formula prices for 1958, percentages of parity, are as follows:

	100 per cent	70 per cent
B-1 hogs, Toronto	$33.58	$23.50

In other words, under the bill which was introduced by the minister, the approved floor price would be $21.56, whereas under the C.F.A. formula of 70 per cent of parity, which is the minimum they suggest, the price would be $23.50 or 50 cents over the present support price under the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, the time has come for political parties to stop fooling the Canadian public, particularly the Canadian farmer. This talk about no one knowing what parity prices are and not knowing how we could work out a reasonable formula having regard to parity prices should be taken out of the books because here we have in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, 38 of the top Canadian economists, suggesting a price formula which they have put before the different governments since 1948. I feel this matter is so important I am going to put on the record their most recent recommendations regarding price support. They are as follows:

> 1. Support prices should be established according to a known formula.
> 2. A modernized formula for the calculation of fair relationship prices, which may be accepted as the best presently known, and which is, therefore, recommended as a guide to the setting of price supports, requires:
> (a) Calculating prices for farm products which would give them the same purchasing power per unit as in the base period 1925-29, and then—
> (b) Adjusting these individual prices so that they will have the same relationship to each other as they have had on the average during the most recent ten years.

There is your flexibility, Mr. Speaker. I continue:

> These two steps should provide a set of fair relationship prices, in sound relationship to one another, but with a unit purchasing power on the average equal to the purchasing power of farm products in 1925-29.
> 3. It is recommended that a formula, for use in the setting of farm price supports, be embodied in price support legislation.

4. Support prices for the following commodities—cheese, butter, concentrated milk products, eggs, poultry meats, bacon hogs, and wheat grown in areas outside the jurisdiction of the Canadian wheat board should be required by the price support legislation to be in effect at all times. Grains marketed by the Canadian wheat board should be supported as is suggested for the above key commodities, except that they should be administered through the agency of the wheat board.

5. All other farm commodities should be subject to price supports as conditions may make this desirable.

6. Support prices should not be established at less than 70 per cent of fair relationship prices and only in exceptional cases should supports be set at such a low level.

7. Market price supports and deficiency payments should be applied on a national basis as a general rule, but regional supports, under some circumstances, should not be ruled out.

8. Support prices to the producer must be known, and where support operations are carried on at a processing or wholesale level, producers must be assured the full benefit of such supports.

9. The deficiency payment method of supporting incomes of producers should be applied on individual products to correct income deficiencies:

(c) To correct income deficiencies after the product has been marketed where prices for a commodity have fallen to an unreasonably low level each year for two years; or to meet conditions such as inability to deliver production, or other special circumstances.

(d) To be used as a guaranteed support level where the interests of consumers, continuity of supply or other special marketing problems require it.

10. Price supports should not create incentives to production which perpetuate surplus production problems and prevent necessary and desirable production adjustments being made.

I am not going to read into the record the steps in calculating the fair relationship price, but they are here. I should think the minister should give consideration to the fact that here we have one of the leading farm organizations which has a flexible formula for parity on a basis which meets the needs of the farmers today. I am not saying I fully support it, but certainly it is something which should have been looked at before, as I say, this inocuous bill we have before us was introduced.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the other main farm organization, the interprovincial farm union council, has asked that any legislation concerning support prices be effective so that the producer would receive his fair share of the national income. I want to read into the record their submission of recent date to the government. It is this:

We appreciate that provision has been made for a federal system of price supports, but regret that it has been of little direct benefit to the producers. We believe that in order to make this policy effective, the following principles should be incorporated:

1. Price supports should be maintained at parity levels, in order that agriculture may obtain its fair share of the national income.

That is the recommendation of the interprovincial farm union council concerning its request for adequate price support.

I now want to deal with some of the statements which have been made by various members of this government. I think the time has come that this government be called before the bar of public opinion. These statements made by Conservative members in the past now require, in my opinion, to be put before this house. I want to say in particular that I believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself should be called before the bar of public opinion. I recognize that ordinarily in a court of law people are not called to testify against themselves. But in this case the Prime Minister has willingly done so. He has done so by speeches in the house and he has done so by speeches outside the house. I should like to read into the record some of the statements made by the Prime Minister. Speaking in 1944 on the address in regard to agricultural support prices, as recorded at page 102 of Hansard of that year the Prime Minister said this:

Reference has been made in the speech from the throne to agriculture but time does not permit my discussing that today except to say that I believe in the principle of floor prices, but like hon. members who have already spoken I ask the government what level is to be set. Is it to be a price level in accordance with present prices and subsidies? Is it to be a level that will ensure the cost of production and a reasonable profit? If it is not, it will be a denial of the farmers' due.

Those were brave words in 1944. As found at page 2023 of Hansard of March 12, 1956, the present Prime Minister of Canada said this:

The parity situation has been very thoroughly canvassed during recent years. We, in the Progressive Conservative party, tried to get some action on this matter on several occasions, but without success. One of the earliest occasions was in 1941, during the war. The last occasion when we moved an amendment regarding this question of parity prices was on March 23, 1953.

Later on he said this:

At that time I moved this amendment:

"That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

'in the opinion of this house consideration should be given by the government to the advisability of introducing during the present session legislation to provide floor prices for agricultural products at such levels as to ensure producers a fair price-cost relationship.'"

As found at page 2024 of Hansard of March 12, 1956 in a declaration of Conservative policy, the Prime Minister said this:

"(d) The floor price formula will be arrived at in consultation with representative producers.

We will establish a board of livestock commissioners similar to the board of grain commissioners. We will give every legitimate encouragement to co-operative agencies whether relating to purchase, sale or credit."

As found on the same page, the Prime Minister said this:

I intend to move, sir, seconded by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton):

"That all the words after 'that' be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

'in the opinion of this house consideration should be given by the government to the advisability of introducing during the present session legislation to create a parity of prices for agricultural products at levels to ensure producers a fair price-cost relationship.'"

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When was that?

Mr. McCullough: That was on March 12, 1956, as found at page 2024 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal more to say but I notice that I have spoken at some length already. However, I think I have brought to the attention of the house the very fact that there should be a reconsideration of this whole bill. At this moment I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny), the following amendment:

That Bill No. 237 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

I should like to continue with the Prime Minister, as I was, before the bar of public opinion on his basic principles. I want to add that, as found at page 2026 of Hansard of March 12, 1956, the Prime Minister said this:

The trend referred to in the amendment moved in 1953 has continued. Canadian agriculture today would not be in its present precarious position if action had been taken at that time on the basis of the experience of our neighbour to the south and also on the basis of the demands of farmers generally.

Again, Mr. Speaker, as found at page 2021 of Hansard of March 12, 1956, the Prime Minister said this:

The squeeze which the farmer suffers results from the disparity in the relationship between the prices of farm products and the prices the farmer has to pay. When they are in proper relationship parity is established, and it is parity that the farm organizations across this country are asking for today. Not charity but parity. When one looks at the general price relationship one begins to realize how far in recent years that desirable end has been departed from. As far as parity is concerned, it must be related to a basic period which is regarded as one in which prices and costs are in approximate equivalence one to the other.

Then further, on January 13, 1956, as recorded in Hansard at page 78, speaking about problems regarding farm income and the sale of wheat, the Prime Minister said this:

The handling of this problem is a tragedy of errors; it is a chronic and tragic record of self-deception, optimism and arrogance. It is an attitude on the part of the government that constitutes a mockery of the public demand for action.

Also during the election campaign when he was trying to get votes the Prime Minister had occasion to come down near my home constituency. Speaking at Kipling, where he was outlining part of the agricultural farm policy of the Conservative party, he said this:

The only answer the Liberals had made to these proposals,—

He was then speaking of the proposals made by himself in the house.

—he said, was to vote against them. . .

He had, he said, presented resolutions in the House of Commons since 1941 asking for price supports to ensure farmers a fair relationship between prices and costs.

But what a far cry from what we are getting today. I therefore say, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister, the man who has the highest elective honour in this land, stands before the court of public opinion in this country. Surely, in his own words, the farmer is not asking for charity but simply for parity.

I should now like to bring forward further witnesses to what I am saying this afternoon. I do not think I need to repeat anything further of what the Prime Minister himself has said. He is a western member. The Minister of Agriculture is a western member. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a western member in this new government. There can be no excuse that they do not know the situation. But at this moment I am going to call as witnesses of the need of some assistance to the man on the land some of the people whom I know personally. The first I am going to call to testify is a young man who won the D.F.C. during the last war. He came back to our community, built himself a little house on the farm, bought himself a tractor and equipment under D.V.A. and for five or six years tried to make a living for his wife whom he had brought over from the old country and for his children. In the last two years he has had to leave his farm. He is a truck driver today.

Another person whom I want to call to testify that something must be done for the man on the land is another veteran, a man whom I know very well. He was five years in the service. He fought during the roughest fighting overseas in order to try to save democracy for the world. He has come back. What has he today after 12 years of work? He does not own a car. He is not able to put electrical power into his home. He told me he was not able to get married because he did not feel it was fair to bring a wife to a farm where he did not have modern conveniences.

Another witness I want to bring forward is another person who was wounded severely overseas, who has come back and tried to make a living for his wife and three little girls. Year by year it is just a question how long they can stay on the farm. If it were not for his disability pension he would not be able to stay there.

Another person whom I know very well is a young lad who went into the service almost as a boy, spent five years, fought during the roughest fighting in Germany, came back, bought equipment under D.V.A. and tried to farm under this cost-price squeeze facing the western people today. In the past three years he has been going to the city of Regina taking construction work. His wife leaves the farm too and, as she is a registered nurse, she works as a nurse and then comes back to try and maintain their little home, both of them fighting against the cost-price inflation which we have in Canada today.

I also want to call as a witness a young man, a very able young man, who was a veteran of almost the full length of the last war and who came up while I was away from home to see me and told my wife that he would like to tell us his story and to see if I could help him. This veteran had married a young Scottish girl while overseas and had brought her back to Canada, moving in just south of where I live, and has farmed there since the end of the war. He said "I have tried time and time again at the end of the year to make plans for the spring and each year it seems to be getting worse and worse. For the last two years my wife has worked in the local hospital." The last time he came to see me they had had a big rain in his area and he had not finished combining. He said "It does not seem to matter how much I grow because the things I have to buy take all my money. Taxes and other things are eating up every bit of my income. My wife who has been working as a nurse is now also ready to quit."

Mr. Speaker, I call these people as witnesses before this parliament. Surely this government, at a time when they have billions for defence, when they have millions for landing fields, millions for this and for that, will recognize that the time has come for us to see some action on their part, rather than the mockery indicated in this bill.

I therefore close at this time in the hope that this government will take this bill from the floor of the house, will call in organized agriculture and will give us a bill which will meet the needs of Canadian agriculture.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, when the leader of the house this morning intervened he suggested that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) had announced the amendment which he proposed to move later on, as a courtesy to the house. Well I do not think he can fool anybody by that suggestion. After all, the government is a minority and they know very well they could never have got the bill through this house in its original form. Apparently they did not desire to go to the country with that bill as the issue, because they would have been defeated in every agricultural constituency in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Quelch: The Minister of Agriculture when he was speaking this afternoon criticized the idea of parity on a fixed base period plan. He says no one with any sense of responsibility would support such a proposal. He bitterly criticized members of the opposition for suggesting such a thing, but let me remind the hon. minister that when he says nobody with a sense of responsibility would support a fixed based formula—when he criticizes members for doing that—he is criticizing the Prime Minister, (Mr. Diefenbaker) his own leader, and calling him irresponsible because for—

Mr. Harkness: Nonsense. I said that nobody with any sense of responsibility would advocate a system such as they have had in the United States for the past several years.

Mr. Quelch: Which is a fixed base parity. He has been very critical of the idea of having a fixed formula inserted in the bill. Now several references have already been made to the stand taken by the Prime Minister of this country. On April 9, 1957 the Prime Minister was quite upset because certain farm organizations were criticizing him for the stand he took on a certain amendment that had been made to the speech from the throne and he stated on page 3305 of Hansard:

> Throughout the years we in this party have advocated that action be taken on behalf of the farmer, and I am going to set out in detail some of the suggestions we have made and the motions we have moved in order to answer the propaganda that is sometimes spread that the Conservative party has no interest in the welfare of the farmer.

And then he quotes a number of motions and amendments that he or his party had moved since 1941 and in every case they had advocated either a parity price or a fair price-cost relationship. And then, on March 12, 1956 at page 2021 of Hansard he defined exactly what he means by parity. I will only quote a few of his words because his statement has already been referred to, but he says:

As far as parity is concerned, it must be related to a basic period which is regarded as one in which prices and costs are in approximate equivalence one to the other.

That is something of which the present Minister of Agriculture is very critical. Apparently he cannot see eye to eye with his own leader on this question. I believe in the absolute soundness of the statement made by the Prime Minister at that time, but apparently the Minister of Agriculture does not agree with him, otherwise he would never have brought into the house the insidious type of bill before us. It still seems to me that he is referring to the Prime Minister as being irresponsible in bringing such a suggestion before the country.

Now I think it is quite easy to understand why the Minister of Agriculture does not want a fixed formula in the bill because if we have a fixed formula for parity in the bill, then we will have a support price fixed by law, and the government would then have to pay that support price on the basis of parity. But under the bill that we have before us, even with the amendment, it is of such a general character that there would be absolutely no guarantee whatsoever that the farmers would receive a parity of price. It says that the governor in council will have regard to the cost of production but also will have regard to other things and among the other things which the Minister of Agriculture listed was the supply and demand situation. No doubt, if there was a fairly large supply of any commodity then they would consider they would be perfectly justified in refusing to maintain a price that would give the farmers their whole cost of production and that is why the farm organizations have insisted from time to time that a parity formula should be written into the act so that support prices would not depend upon the whims of the minister whom we have today, or the minister who may follow him at some later date.

Now the Minister of Agriculture at the resolution stage stated, as reported at page 2393 of Hansard, that he opposed the parity price on a fixed formula. He said:

Any price support program which attempts to use as its formula a base period in the past and apply an index to it, and so forth, immediately gets you into a rigid formula. I think the experiences of all countries in the world demonstrate the fact that a rigid formula just does not work.

And then he went on to explain that we should have a prescribed price based upon the average price for the past three years. But when he was discussing the resolution he said that altogether too much emphasis was being placed upon this three-year period, and he had this to say at page 2396:

I should like to make the point that the base price is arrived at by taking the average of prices for three years previous and is used the same as a foot rule is used in measuring length. In other words, it is a measuring device to a large extent and therefore one should not try to put a great deal of emphasis on the particular type of measuring device.

The minister expects parliament to accept that as a measuring device even after it was agreed that it was not a satisfactory period to have chosen. Thus, he is asking the farmers to accept a measuring stick which is not satisfactory. How would you like to buy so many yards of cloth using a measuring stick which had only eleven inches to the foot? Would you be satisfied with that kind of measuring stick? That is exactly the same as the kind of measuring stick the farmers are asked to accept. It has been admitted that in the past three years the average prices have not been satisfactory as far as many farmers are concerned, yet the minister expects farmers to be satisfied to use that period as a measuring stick.

When I spoke on the resolution I criticized the government for failing to embody in the act a parity or fair price-cost relationship. On page 2197, I say:

I look upon the main essential of a support price program as the assuring to farmers of the maintenance of a fair relationship between the prices of farm products and the prices of other commodities. The present proposal appears to ignore that relationship entirely.

Well, when the minister replied, he had this to say:

The hon. member for Acadia said that the legislation ignores the relationship between the cost of goods bought and the prices received for agricultural products. That is absolutely not correct. I think the hon. member just did not understand the explanation that I gave, or he did not pay any attention to it.

Well, I challenge the minister to show anywhere in the bill as we have it where there was any mention of a fair cost relationship or a parity price. These words do not occur anywhere in that bill. And I think the fact that the minister has now felt obliged to bring down these amendments placing these words in the bill proves that he himself at that time either did not understand the implication of his own bill or, if he did understand them, that he was misleading the house.

Mr. Harkness: That relationship was, as I have said a dozen times, implicit in the whole bill and still is.

Mr. Quelch: It may have been implicit in the mind of the minister, but nowhere in the bill was it even implied. On the contrary there was every reason to believe that the minister was going to base the price upon something other than a fair price relationship, because when he defined the different things that would affect the prescribed rates, one of the things listed was the law of supply and demand.

We all know what happens under this so-called law of supply and demand. When you have over-production or a surplus, you either reduce production or you reduce the price in order to discourage production, and I have no doubt that the intention of the minister at that time—and, very likely it is the intention of the minister still—was that if production of any commodity began to increase, then the government would take steps to reduce the price of that commodity, even though they said they would have some regard to the cost of production; if the condition of the law of supply required it, in his own mind, he would allow the law of supply and demand to out weigh the cost of production feature.

The minister and the government still show a great deal of concern regarding the supply situation. They are afraid that maintaining floor support prices may result in an expansion of production and the consequent building up of surpluses. It is quite apparent that the government has little faith in its own marketing or trade policy. Instead of finding ways and means of distributing possible surpluses, they consider it would be better to take action to reduce production rather than to try to find ways and means of getting this surplus food to the people who need it. There is no doubt that in Canada today there is still a tremendous potential market for many of our farm commodities among the low income groups, and there are many steps which could be taken to help increase the sale of agricultural products.

I think the government might well give consideration to a plan they had in the United States many years ago known as the stamp plan, in view of the situation developing in many parts of Canada today where there is quite a serious unemployment problem and many families are going to find it extremely difficult to get enough food to maintain themselves at even a minimum standard of living. The government might give very careful consideration to this stamp plan, because this would be one way, and quite an efficient way, of expanding the sale of farm products on the home market; and, of course, anybody in the lower income groups could be helped by certain social measures in this regard.

I think that when we are considering farm surpluses we must keep the world situation in mind at all times. I was glad to see that the Prime Minister, speaking at the NATO meeting, had expressed support for the setting up of a world food bank. Some international organization of this kind is essential to deal with agricultural surpluses, and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the international federation of agriculture have done exceptionally fine work in this regard. We recall how they were largely responsible for the formation of the plan known as the international commodity clearing house, which unfortunately was turned down. But I am continually running into people who say: this idea that there is starvation in the world just because in some countries a few people are undernourished is over-played, and there is no reason why we should say that there is a serious situation in the world. But I am going to quote a few passages which I have quoted before in this house, though not this session or last session, from a statement made by Mr. Gove Hambidge, the North American regional representative of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations when he appeared before the Senate standing committee on Canadian trade relations in 1955. This is on page 10 of the report of that standing committee. He said:

> Over against this prosperous group of countries blessed with plenty of food and so many of the good things of life, you have another group still far down the scale of economic and physical well-being. They include half the people of the world or more, and they are still poor and undernourished, many of them living in bleak hovels, without enough clothing, illiterate and uneducated, dying young, lacking the modern tools and equipment necessary for good production, and often without enough physical vigor to do what we would call a really good day's work even though they work as hard as they can. But better living and greater abundance are possible for these great masses of mankind, and they are becoming more and more sharply aware that their lives and the lives of their children can be better.

This is the paragraph I want the house to take special notice of.

> It is this possibility of better times, opened up by modern scientific developments but not yet reaching down to all the levels of mankind, that creates much of the tension among nations and within nations today. When people see something they want very badly and think they can have it and are entitled to it, they are likely to try to get it by violent means if more peaceful ones don't seem to work. And there are plenty of trouble-makers around to encourage them to use violence.

I think we would all agree that there can be no justification for large surpluses in some countries whilst we have millions of people on the verge of starvation in others. We should at the present time be devoting far more time and energy to ways and means by which we can get our surplus to the nations that need it instead of talking about ways and means about reducing production. This statement says that because these people know there is an ample supply of food they are not prepared to peaceably submit to this situation. What appears to be the answer of the minister? It would appear that the minister thinks that so as not to aggravate these people by letting them see the surpluses it would be better to reduce production so there would be no surpluses and people could starve peaceably without the irritation of seeing quantities of surplus food available in some parts of the world. Of course we all know that this is not the solution. We have to face up to the problem and find ways and means of getting this surplus food to the peoples that need it.

If the nations had adopted the international commodity clearing house idea I believe this problem would have been solved by now. Unfortunately it was turned down by the member nations and the problem of surpluses has been left on the doorstep of each individual nation. There is only one nation that has tried to face up to that responsibility and that is the United States of America. When the problem of surpluses was left on its doorstep it adopted certain proposals such as its food disposal policy making it possible for that country to get this surplus food to nations which are not able to obtain it through the normal channels of trade by the acceptance of their currency, by barter or by gift. Instead of Canada criticizing the United States for that policy, which after all is a humanitarian policy, we should consider ways and means by which we might do the same thing. I am not suggesting that we should go as far as that country has gone but certainly we could go much further than we have up to the present time.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): And at the same time pay the farmers a fair price for that food.

Mr. Quelch: As the hon. member for Bow River just said, while we are doing that we should pay the farmer a fair price for his food and make it available to the nations that need it.

I want to discuss the question of a sound parity formula.

I believe it was in 1943 when farm products were under price ceilings the prime minister of that day promised that if farmers would be satisfied to sell their products under a ceiling the government would guarantee to stabilize the price on farm products at a fair level in the post-war period as compensation and to stabilize the price of all the main farm products. I ask you to remember that word "main".

But for some strange reason, in spite of the government of that day, having said it would stabilize the price of all the main farm products at a level that would give the farmer a fair price relationship, they have never supported the price of wheat in any shape or form. The farm organizations have continually asked for a support price formula to be inserted in the act. The old Agricultural Prices Support Act was supported by farm organizations as quite a good act but they were continually urging the government to insert into that act a formula that would set the price on farm products at a parity level. The principle of parity was contained in section 9 subsection 2 of the act but unfortunately the former government did not live up to the full implications of that section and so during the past several years we have had many commodities not supported at all and we have had other commodities supported in some cases at 80 per cent of parity and in the case of eggs only about 54 per cent of parity.

The present Prime Minister criticized the former government for not living up to the principle of the Agricultural Prices Support Act and that principle as embodied in section 9 was a fair price relationship. And then, strangely enough, after criticizing the former government for not living up to that principle which was embodied into the act he—I was going to say "he" but I should say the Prime Minister allowed his minister, the Minister of Agriculture—to bring a bill into this house that does not even mention the words "parity" or "fair price relationship" from the beginning to the end of the entire bill.

We now have in our possession certain amendments that are going to be moved. I believe these amendments will improve the bill but they still fall far short of giving the farmer a guarantee of a parity price because there still will be no formula in the act under which support prices will be paid automatically and it will continue to depend on the whims of the Minister of Agriculture as to the level at which these support prices should be set. It is also quite possible that this could become a kind of political football under which there would be a fairly high support price in the year before an election and afterwards it might possibly be lower.

The price provided for in the bill is not a parity price of course and it is merely based on the last three-year average. The last three years happen to have been extremely unsatisfactory years. The farmer is guaranteed only 80 per cent of that. The minister told us at the resolution stage about a number of things that would help to guide the government as to the level at which support prices should be set if it is decided to set them above 80 per cent of the base period and, as I have already mentioned, one of those is the question of supply and demand. Although the amended bill does use the words "relationship to cost of production", it also mentions that these other things will be taken into consideration at the same time. One cannot help wondering, therefore, which will win the battle, the cost of production on the one hand or the law of supply and demand on the other. After listening to the Minister of Agriculture warn of the tremendous danger of having a price that might encourage farmers to raise too much, one cannot help feeling he will pay far more consideration to the law of supply and demand than he will to the cost of production.

The question I have never been able to answer satisfactorily, and I have been asked it many times on the platform, is "Why did the former government not include grains under the Agricultural Prices Support Act?" As I already mentioned, the former prime minister promised that all the main products would be supported and yet wheat, which is one of the main products, has never had support under the act since the end of the war. The price of wheat the farmer receives is the world market price.

It is interesting to note that if wheat had been under the Agricultural Prices Support Act and if the support price under wheat had been governed to the full extent by the formula that the government used,—that is using the years 1943-45 as the base period—then the support price for wheat would have been $2.37 a bushel,—I got these prices this spring from the bureau of statistics—and yet the farmers are getting only around $1.19 a bushel, only about half of a parity price.

The old Agricultural Prices Support Act left wheat out of the act. Today the Minister of Agriculture goes a step farther and also excludes oats and barley. At different times the farm organizations have asked that grain should be placed under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and at other times they have asked that at least wheat or grain be sold under a two-price system; that is, the price for wheat in the domestic market should be governed by parity and the world price, the best possible. In view of the fact that farmers have had to sell their grains at very low prices in the past, at world market prices, farm organizations are asking today that a deficiency payment should be made on wheat to compensate for those losses, and I think that is a very reasonable demand.

When the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) spoke earlier he referred to the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and therefore I am not going to quote in again. However, I do want to refer to certain paragraphs that have been criticized at times in the past. I should like to refer to section 6 on paragraph 11. This brief, by the way, is dated July 24, 1957. The paragraph reads:

> A range of from 70 to 85 per cent of the fair-relationship prices would, for the key commodities mentioned, appear to leave the price support program with the maximum of flexibility consistent with protection of the interests of the farmer.

Personally, I have always been somewhat critical of that for the simple reason that if you selected a base period during which there was a fair cost-price relationship I do not see why the parity price should be at less than 100 per cent. In that case a base period is only giving the farmers a fair cost-price relationship. No one would suggest that in 1943-45 the price of farm products was higher than the price of other commodities because we were still under a price ceiling. Therefore, I have always felt that when we use the base period 1943-45 the farmers are entitled to 100 per cent of that. It gives them only a price that will bear a fair relationship to the price of other commodities. Why should anybody expect the farmers of this country to accept a price which is less than a fair price relationship?

I know that all other forms of society would object very much if they were chosen as the one body in the country that should receive less than their fair share of the national income. I am not critical any more of this declaration of the federation because they have now added something to their program that, in my opinion, fully covers the situation. I say that because section 10 says:

> The deficiency payment method of supporting incomes of producers should be applied on individual products to correct income deficiencies:

If you are going to have deficiency payments in addition to your support prices, then it is no longer so important that your support prices should be at 100 per cent of the parity price, that is of the fair cost-price relationship, because at the end of the year, or at the end of two years, when you have assessed the relationship between farm income and total income and you find that the farm income is down, the deficiency payment can be made to compensate for the deficiency in income of the farmer.

When the Minister of Agriculture is so critical of a fixed base period he should keep in mind the recommendations of the federation of agriculture because whilst it is true that they use a fixed period of 1925 to 1929 they also use the last 10 years for the purpose of ensuring that a fair relationship exist as between the product of one industry and the product of another. In other words, their formula is a very flexible one; but the minister seems to be so strongly prejudiced against the idea of a base period that he classifies them all as being rigid and ones that would have a disastrous result in spite of the fact that his own Prime Minister has declared that a parity price must have a fixed base period.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in closing, I would say that the bill as it is brought before the house is, in our opinion, an insidious one. It is all very well for the Minister of Agriculture to try to make us believe that it was meant to embody a parity price principle. The fact of the matter is there is no mention of parity or fair price relationship anywhere in the bill. It may have been in the mind of the minister. I am still convinced, after listening to him for the last few years, that he is one of those great supporters of the so-called law of supply and demand. I think the motion moved by the C.C.F. is a good one. As a matter of fact, I had a similar amendment all ready written out, ready to move if the C.C.F. had not moved it. I think the logical thing to do is to refer the subject matter of this bill to a committee, where a thorough discussion and investigation could be had, so that we could call representatives of the various farm organizations and take the time to draft a satisfactory bill. There is no rush. The Agricultural Prices Support Act is still with us. We can carry on with that until such time as we get a new bill.

If the government wants to increase support prices at the present time there is nothing to prevent them from doing so under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. They did it with sugar beet and they can do it with a lot of other commodities. Therefore, I say they cannot use the argument that we have to rush this thing because we want to give the benefit of it to the farmers. Any benefit that they want to give to the farmers they can give under the present legislation. Let us do a worth-while job on it. Let us send the subject matter of this bill to the agriculture committee and let us make a thorough investigation of the whole act.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): And get something worth while.

Mr. Quelch: The minister does not seem to like the idea and somebody said, "of course not". I can quite understand that. He knows very well that if the subject matter of this bill is sent to the agriculture committee a very different kind of bill will come back, if the committee is given a free hand. At least, the recommendation will be very different from the amendments he gave us today. These amendments do not begin to deal with the situation of distressed agriculture today.

(Translation):

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have carefully gone over the various sections of this bill: An act to provide for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities, and I have checked it against the Agricultural Prices Support Act, enacted by the Liberal government in 1944 and put in operation in 1946. On the basis of this comparison, I do not see any useful purpose being served by this new bill. It does or allows nothing which was not already possible under the old act, one which was flexible enough to meet the wishes and recommendations of our various Canadian agricultural organizations, from year to year. Let me refer to the fiery statement made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), on December 11 last. He then said:

> This is a far-reaching and important piece of legislation, perhaps the most important, in its implications, in its expected results for agriculture and its effect on the general economy that has been considered by the Canadian parliament for many years.

And he went on:

> No one piece of legislation can be expected, at one stroke, to transform a complex industry, such as agriculture, from a depressed state to one of full and abounding health.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as far as the farmers of the province of Quebec are concerned, we can say that they are getting used to such bombastic statements. Let us have no more of this posing as the emancipator of the agricultural community. Legislation should be introduced which can really improve, at its very basis, the agricultural situation. The government of Quebec has also long claimed to have pulled farmers out of depressed conditions.

The preamble to this bill sets out the statements which made headlines when it was decided that a further $50 million would go into the fund provided by the act, giving farmers the impression that the federal government, the Conservative government, was presenting them with a gift of $50 million, which is not correct. Well, that legislation, with its additional $50 million, has the same value as the statements of the minister when he claims that he will settle all of the Canadian farmers' problems.

A moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I stated that, because of its flexibility, the previous legislation was such as to meet the requests and representations of the various agricultural bodies of this country. We had an example of this when the last government stabilized the price of butter on the basis of representations made by the producers. The government went so far as to announce that butter would be supported at 58 cents a pound for two years. That was one of the steps which the previous government was able to take as a result of the flexibility of legislation whose repeal is now sought.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I note that this bill provides for the setting up of a board called "Agricultural Stabilization Board". I wonder in what respects this board can be different from the previous one.

To my mind the government of Canada, responsible for the national policy regarding agricultural products, should deal primarily with products of concern to farmers in all of the provinces. Now national interest is not necessarily a matter of geography, and when a fairly large group of farmers in a particular province are engaged in producing a certain commodity, this commodity should be rated as of national interest and should therefore be included in the items listed in paragraph (i), subsection A, section 2 of this bill.

In fact, the bill should set out the conditions under which a product could be covered by the act.

I have in mind particularly maple products, which are a source of revenue for a considerable number of farmers in an important area of the province of Quebec and I can see why my colleague from Beauce, (Mr. Poulin), put a question to the Minister of Agriculture in this regard the other day.

Granting that 90 per cent of the maple sugar is produced in the province of Quebec, its importance to a great number of Quebec farmers, the value of the product, its large market and its genuine export quality make it a product of national importance.

Personally, I think that the bill does not touch the basic problem of economic agricultural rehabilitation in several areas of Quebec. Before deciding on the price stabilization of agricultural products, it is necessary to know whether or not production itself in all branches could not be improved.

That is why I asked the Minister of Agriculture last Tuesday if the Senate committee on land use, established by the former government, specially in eastern Canada, would continue to function and I was very glad to learn that it would.

I am very glad of the action taken by the former government in establishing this committee which, to my mind, deals with the very fundamentals of the required development and improvement of economic conditions for a great number of our farmers, specially in the areas of Quebec and the Maritimes.

When this committee was established, the then prime minister had stated: "Everyone knows that the Senate has been called upon to inquire into the best possible ways of utilizing our land. I know that there are still some ways to increase production and the income of our primary producers."

Mr. Speaker, the farmers of my area are deeply interested in the work of this committee which has already received advice from several experts and briefs from various parts of this country.

I wish to call the attention of the house to two briefs in particular which were submitted to the members of the Senate committee, one by the assistant deputy minister of agriculture (Mr. Chagnon), which was included in the proceedings of this committee on February 21, 1957, and one by Mr. J. P. Lemoine, president of the Catholic Farmer's Union, which was submitted on February 28, 1957.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Five o'clock.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to consider private and public bills, the former having precedence.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF ANNUAL VACATIONS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

The house resumed, from Friday, November 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to provide for annual vacations with pay for employees.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, it is with some humility that I rise to discuss this bill. It appears that it is the government's intention to introduce legislation involving the same principles. It appears to me that on this question there is now considerable variation in the thinking of industry and labour who many times, left to themselves, work out their problems around the conference table. This is done in most cases to the mutual satisfaction of both parties. These holidays in almost all cases are for a week or longer; and a week, let me say, Mr. Speaker, is almost universal while it is not uncommon in a great many cases to have two weeks and even longer. In some cases they extend to even three and four weeks. In most cases the length of the vacation with pay is directly related to the length of service. It will be found that office workers generally get two weeks.

The provinces across Canada vary in their regulations. It might well be that the matter should be left to the labour unions to negotiate or the provinces, as conditions vary so widely from the Atlantic to the Pacific. For example, for some workers a longer holiday might be of distinct value, for example in construction work; and I am sure that many hon. members in this house can think of many other occupations as well. We have made a great deal of progress in this field. The impact of this legislation proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will affect roughly between 4,000 to 5,000 workers who now get only one week. The legislation which the government has in mind I believe will serve this purpose better than the bill proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I would submit that I would have to go along with our legislation.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): In principle, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the bill which is now before the house. It is also in principle the same as the bill brought in by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) which is now before the house as Bill No. 16 and which is on the order paper for second reading.

I have taken the opportunity of comparing the two bills which are before the house. I am quite well aware of the fact that it is contrary to the rules of the house to deal seriatim with these bills on second reading because basically we are discussing the principle of the bill. But in view of the fact that the principle of this bill is similar to that of the one introduced by the Minister of Labour, I feel it is necessary to discuss some of the differences; and only by referring to different sections can the differences become apparent. I will make every effort possible to avoid contravening any rules of the house.

Section 3 of this bill defining the application of the act is identical with section 2, subsection (a) of Bill No. 16. It is also the same as the application of another bill brought forward with reference to statutory holidays. From this I can only assume that the wording of the various bills is derived from some source of well settled precedents which are designed to keep this bill clearly within federal jurisdiction. But since they are similar and since I intend to support Bill No. 16, I see no objection whatever in connection with this particular section.

There is just one other principle in connection with the bill that I should like to mention, namely section 4 of this bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not want to press a point of order too severely, particularly with my hon. friend who is a new member of the house. But where do we get if we begin discussing the individual clauses of these bills when we are at the debate on second reading? Is it not required by the rules that the discussion at this stage be with respect to the principle of the bill? I realize the difficulty created by the fact that there are these two bills; but if the hon. member is going to spend his time in comparing the clauses of two bills, it seems to me we are contravening the rules.

Mr. Aiken: When I rose, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member addressing himself to the point of order?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Speaker. When I rose to speak I attempted to indicate that that would be my effort, to keep the two bills separate. But as I recall it, when this bill was originally brought in, on first reading there was some discussion then as to whether it was in order because it was so similar in principle to Bill No. 16, which the Minister of Labour had placed on the order paper. The resolutions also appeared to be quite similar.

At the time the argument was put forward, as I recall it, that although the bills were similar there were differences and so there would be no real objection to bringing forward the bill of the hon. member of Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). That is the history, according to my recollection of the case, and therefore we are discussing two bills before the house, similar in principle but different in detail. I therefore submit that it would only be by discussing the differences between the two bills that we could talk intelligently about them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, might I suggest to the hon. member that he could make the kind of speech which I gather he wishes to make and yet stay within the rules if, for example, he would address his remarks to the fact that one bill asks for two weeks after one year and the other bill asks for two weeks after two years. He could discuss that difference in principle without picking out the particular clauses and comparing them word by word.

Mr. Speaker: I think that is the only avenue which the hon. member could follow. It is quite clear that on second reading the principles involved in the bill are before the house for discussion and in so far as he can bring out the differences in principle by reference to the provisions of the bill, without reference to or quoting sections, and by describing the principles in general terms as the differences appear from the reading of the bills, I think he could proceed although, perhaps, not in the way in which he is attempting to proceed.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order. Is this not the result of the fact that we have these two bills on the order paper at the same time. With deference, I realize we are proceeding with the discussion of this bill of the private member, but surely in connection with your interpretation of speaking on the principle, when we have two items of legislation before us, the member is talking about principles when he speaks, quite definitely, on the differences which exist between specific clauses in the bills and sections in the two acts. I would suggest, sir, that this is something different from the ordinary course of arguing the principle involved which has been put forward by my friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and that at this stage it is going to be very difficult to actually discuss the principle of the bills unless there can be pretty specific reference to what is involved in each of these pieces of legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Well I have already ruled on the question of whether this bill is properly before the house. What we have before us at the moment is one bill only and my ruling, as I remember it, was that until the house had taken some action on either of these bills it did not preclude discussion on the other, but the house is now getting into discussion of this particular bill on second reading and if it is desired to make comparisons with the other bill there is no difficulty about that and I do not intend to exclude comparisons. They should, however, be comparisons of principle. It is perhaps rather a fine line to draw when you have bills which are so closely parallel. If there are differences they could be pointed out, I think, in general terms rather than by reading the clauses of this bill.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would agree with me when I say there is no objection to reading the clauses of another bill which is not before the house.

Mr. Green: Is this not a very strange procedure, Mr. Speaker? After all, last night we had a debate on second reading of Bill No. 16, the last business with which we were concerned when the house adjourned at ten o'clock was the debating of Bill No. 16. Now while it is true that there are some differences in the terms of these two bills, they deal entirely with the same subject and I do suggest to Your Honour that it might be well for you to consider whether or not this debate today is in order.

We have a measure sponsored by the government which is actually under debate and it does seem to me to be quite ridiculous that the house can debate a government measure one day and then the next day debate a private bill which deals with exactly the same thing. That, surely, does not make sense under our rules or anything else and I am very doubtful as to whether it is in order for the house to proceed with this debate today.

If this is proper, then on any government bill which does not involve the expenditure of funds a private member can put in a private member's bill which deals with the same subject, perhaps in a slightly different way, and then you have two debates. It does seem to me that that is a waste of the time of the house and if you can have two debates, why can you not have three or four or five, or six? Why could not another private member bring in another bill dealing with the same subject which might vary in the days or the weeks or other little differences in the terms, which is the position here in so far as these two bills are concerned? I think the house has got itself into an impossible situation on this debate which of course is highlighted by the fact that last night the government measure was actually under debate and then this afternoon we are asked to debate the same subject under a private members bill.

Now I do not believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre can find anything in the rules that would justify a procedure of this kind being followed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, not only can I produce items in the rules, but I can quote Your Honour. This point was raised on the 29th of October and Your Honour made a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) that this matter is not open to debate. I did rule on this matter before. Now it may seem an absurd thing for the house to debate two bills concurrently but it does have it within its own power to deal with the situation if it does not wish to debate two measures. It can take the appropriate action to defer one in favour of the other.

I did come to the conclusion before that there was no priority as between the bill standing in the name of the minister and the bill standing in the name of the private member and that until the house comes to a decision debate on one does not preclude debate on the other. Having made that decision I cannot very well change it. I am always glad to reconsider decisions, and I may make errors in my rulings, but that is the position we are in at the present time.

Mr. Green: May I ask Your Honour to reconsider this ruling because perhaps at the time when the previous point of order was discussed it was not fully realized just where this kind of situation might lead, and I doubt that Your Honour had any lengthy arguments placed before you. I do, however, suggest that if Your Honour should allow a precedent of this kind to stand it would not be in the best interests of efficient parliamentary procedure and I submit, with due deference sir, that this point is of sufficient importance to justify further consideration.

Mr. Speaker: I did give full consideration to the matter at the time I made the ruling and I do not feel I can change my mind in the middle of the debate. I do not think the hon. members should ask me to do so. I am afraid we must proceed on the basis of the former decision and the hon. member who has the floor will have to do the best he can with the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wonder if I may be permitted to correct just one statement which the Minister of Public Works

(Mr. Green) made? I am not going to argue with him about the ruling, because it was made by Your Honour after arguments had been addressed to you from both sides of the house and it must stand. But the Minister of Public Works, the leader of the house, said a moment or two ago that my bill was presented to the house after the government's bill was presented. He asked what is going to prevent private members time and time again from bringing in bills similar to government bills? Well, so far as this particular bill is concerned, it was on the order paper before the government's bill, and this was one of the factors which was taken into consideration at the time the point of order was under debate.

The Minister of Public Works will recall that there was some debate on this matter in which members on both the government side and the opposition side took part. The Speaker gave the matter consideration, read a number of citations and delivered a ruling on the point. I do not wish to get into an argument about the validity of the two bills being on the order paper at the same time, for that validity was settled by Your Honour, but I think it should be made clear that my bill was on the order paper first.

Putting the words used by the Minister of Public Works in reverse, it could equally well be argued that the government could come along at any time and get rid of a private member's bill by bringing in its own bill.

Mr. Green: On that point, I submit that is exactly what the government can do. When the government sees fit to bring in a bill it can do so, and it cannot be stopped by a private member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree, but it works both ways.

Mr. Green: It could not be stopped by a private member putting on a bill a day or two before. That would be another ridiculous situation.

Mr. Speaker: As I said, this matter has been settled and I think we are not spending time profitably in discussing it further.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Could I have one word?

Mr. Speaker: No, I will not permit my ruling to be discussed further. I have made my ruling and I will not consider the matter further. However, if there is another point of order—

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It is not exactly on the same point of order. It was only about the difficulty of dealing with the matter of principle. Perhaps the hon. member could stay within the rule if he simply refrained from referring to the number of the specific sections he is speaking about.

Mr. Aiken: The point of order which was originally raised, I believe, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has become diverted, and I will, in deference to Your Honour's ruling, attempt to proceed with the provisions of this bill without references to the clauses of the same but merely to differences in principle between the two bills as presented.

It is my understanding that the rules of the house prevent dealing with the clauses seriatim which I understand to mean taking them in sequence, one, two, three, four, five and so forth, and I wish to assure the hon. member that I do not intend to proceed on that basis.

Now there is one other provision in the bill presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which differs from that presented by the Minister of Labour in Bill No. 16. The basic difference is that in the bill we are now discussing there is provision for an annual vacation with pay of two weeks for each year of employment with any employer and this two-week period begins after one year of service with that employer. Bill No. 16, however, provides only one week's vacation after the first year of employment. Now I think the limitation imposed by Bill 16 presented by the government is a fair limitation, and I should like to put forward two reasons for thinking this is the case. In the first place, it is well known that any employee entering on a new occupation or employment requires a period of time in which to become familiar with the work he is doing. The first year of employment might well be considered a training period during which the value of the services rendered to the employer is, perhaps, not as great as it would be in subsequent years.

An engineer employed in one of the services of the government might be extremely well trained in his own profession, he might have extensive experience in the type of work in which he has been engaged, but he might find that the work for which he has been employed is different in its character and surroundings from that which he has done before. Even with his extensive training it would take him some time to adjust himself to the routine of his new work. I might also mention the example of a stenographer taking up a new position. She might be able to type well, to take shorthand and to file, but in order to become familiar with the surroundings of her employment, the people with whom she has to work and the different circumstances under which she works, she does require a period of acclimatization or training. For this reason I would suggest that the first year of employment with one particular employer might not justify the full amount of vacation which might otherwise be given. The first year is fully justified, I believe, on this ground.

A further reason in its favour is that it would provide greater stability in employment. If an employee could move from one position to another within the government service, or an allied service, freely, or move freely from one type of employment to another and still secure each year the same amount of vacation or vacation pay, there would be no reason for that employee staying in any one place, and I think the provision in the other bill would make the stability of employment much less than it ought to be. For these two reasons I think the limitation which has been placed in the bill by the Minister of Labour is justified. That is all I want to say about this particular difference.

There is one more difference between the two bills to which I would like to call attention. Bill No. 2 is somewhat more complicated in its wording and application than the bill subsequently presented as Bill No. 16. The bill we are now considering contains some 25 paragraphs to which it is obvious a great deal of effort and thought have been given. I wish to refer in particular to clause 15 which sets up the principle of a vacation book system and which does provide in my opinion a more detailed and difficult accounting system than does Bill No. 2.

The provisions of the bill we are considering would involve a good deal more accounting, inspection and paper work—red tape, if you would have it that way—than the provisions of Bill No. 16. Those are the three main differences in principle to which I want to draw attention. I think the bills are similar in purpose, namely providing two weeks vacation with pay in respect of every year of service. The government has a bill before the house which seeks to give effect to this principle and I think I can safely say that in principle I am in favour of both bills.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have an opportunity to say a few words in connection with the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I believe in reasonable annual vacations and they are generally accepted in our society today. However, since there are now two bills before the house this situation places hon. members on this side of the chamber in an awkward position.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I give my friend full marks for honesty.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): I am coming to that. If the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is accepted it does constitute to some degree want of confidence in the government. I do not know how you can avoid that implication. Therefore, although hon. members on this side of the house may agree with the principle of the bill we are now debating, since the government is sponsoring a bill which gives effect to the same principle—and especially since this legislation would have the effect of requiring the expenditure of government moneys indirectly if not directly —our acceptance on this side of the house of a private member's bill from the opposition side of the house would constitute want of confidence. As far as I am personally concerned as a private member on this side of the house I see no alternative but to oppose the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. I wonder if he is aware of the fact that in 1956 when my bill in identical form was before the house eleven hon. members who are now members of the cabinet voted for it and therefore would he not be voting confidence in those eleven hon. gentlemen, who are after all a majority of the cabinet, if he voted today the same way they voted in 1956?

An hon. Member: What do you expect, logic?

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): It is quite easy to ask questions which put one in an awkward position, I recognize that. Nevertheless I still think I am on sound ground when I say it does constitute or at least implies a lack of confidence in the government for myself as a private member on the government side of the house to support a motion which comes from an hon. member of the opposition and replaces a bill which is being sponsored by the government.

Mr. Barnett: Which bill was on the order paper first?

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): I do not know which bill came first but the fact remains that the two bills are now before this house. I presume that under the rules of the house I can argue the merits of the bill which I am placed in the position of having to support and for that reason I am going to refer to Bill No. 16. Up to this point the Speaker has not intimated that this is wrong so I will proceed.

Bill No. 16 seeks to provide for annual vacations with pay for employees in federal works, undertakings and businesses. Clause 2 sets out interpretations some of which I will place on the record:

2. In this act,

(a) "federal works, undertakings or businesses" means (i) works, undertakings or businesses operated or carried on for or in connection with navigation and shipping, whether inland or maritime, including the operation of ships and transportation by ship anywhere in Canada; (ii) railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting a province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of a province; (iii) lines of steam and other ships connecting a province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of a province; (iv) ferries between any province and any other province or between any province and any country other than Canada; (v) aerodromes, aircraft and lines of air transportation; (vi) radio broadcasting stations; (vii) banks and banking;

There are a great many people who are engaged in these various so-called federal works, undertakings and businesses who already have the advantage of vacations with pay. The interpretation clause goes on to provide:

(viii) such works or undertakings as, although wholly situate within a province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces; and (ix) any work, undertaking or business outside the exclusive legislative authority of the legislature of any province, and all other works, undertakings or businesses that are within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, but not including any works undertakings or businesses of a local or private nature in the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories;

Perhaps there is not much point in reading the rest of these interpretation items but the interpretation of "vacation pay" might be of interest. Subclause (c) of clause 2 provides that:

(c) "vacation pay" means

(i) four per cent of the wages of an employee during the year of employment in respect of which he is entitled to the vacation, if he is entitled to a vacation of two weeks, and (ii) two per cent of the wages of an employee during the year of employment in respect of which he is entitled to the vacation, if he is entitled to a vacation of one week;

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member agree with that last subclause of the other bill?

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): I am not at liberty to discuss the section of the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member agree with the sub-clause he has just read? Perhaps he would like to look at it and see what it means?

Mr. Maloney: That is cross-examination.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): I would like to answer the hon. gentleman's question. In general, yes, I agree with that principle. There is this to be said in connection with this definition. It implies that where an employee does not take his holidays, or ceases to be employed after the end of one or two years, and if between the end of this first year of employment and the end of his second year of employment he severs his connection he would receive 2 per cent of his annual wages by way of vacation pay. If he had completed two years of employment thereafter and severed his employment he would receive 4 per cent of his annual pay. To that extent it does not provide for a vacation but it provides for vacation pay.

I am not too familiar with the usages and customs as outlined in labour-management contracts, but I should like to make this point. Any time that wages are interfered with, any time that we pass such legislation as this, increasing costs—and that is what it amounts to—we affect the whole economy to a greater or a lesser extent. It has the effect of raising costs somewhere. Now, the public are interested, and have the right to be interested, when anything of this kind is done or any such action as is contemplated is taken. I think that by and large the public are in favour of this legislation. It is a matter of transferring some advantages from one group in our economy to another group. Still, I think the public are in favour of it.

I represent for the most part a rural constituency. Most of the people in our area are farmers and I should take the opportunity to get in a plug for the farming interests. There is legislation before the house which we were discussing just before we began this discussion which purports to improve the position of the farmer.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "Purports" is right.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member will find anything in Bill No. 2 which relates to farming.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I was simply undertaking in the statement I was making to prove that such action on the part of the government would in fact have some effect on the farmers and I was going to say to those who are supporting this legislation for the benefit of the wage earners that certainly the farmers have a right to expect that the farm matters which are under consideration will also receive sympathetic support. Maybe that is out of order.

Let me get back to the government legislation which is proposed. Subject to this act, every employee would be entitled to a vacation of at least two weeks with vacation pay in respect of every completed year of employment. There is something wrong there. I had better go back. I read:

This act applies to and in respect of (a) employment upon or in connection with any federal works, undertakings or businesses;—

An hon. Member: What bill is that?

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Bill No. 16.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is returning to Bill No. 16, may I say to him I allowed him a fair amount of latitude in dealing with Bill No. 16 a while ago, hoping that he would somehow relate it to the bill under discussion, but I do not think I should permit him to return to Bill No. 16 unless he has some purpose in mind in connection with the bill which is now before us.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I was trying to show why it is necessary for me to vote against the bill as proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. There is an alternative bill before the house and therefore I should support the alternative bill. At any rate, this bill is sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And supported last year by the Conservatives.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): As I understand it, the principle of the bill is supported by the Conservative element in this house and, as I said, the principle is largely supported by the population all across the country; but unfortunately, it is introduced in such a way that we cannot vote for it without indicating a measure of lack of confidence in the government. Therefore, we have to praise it and let it go.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just like the Liberals during this session, barking but not biting.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): And at an opportune time enact legislation which will serve the purposes intended to be served by the bill now before the house. The opposition members who are sponsoring this bill have done a great deal of promotion in the way of legislation for the working people. I would point out that they are not the only ones who have promoted legislation of this kind. I would point out that the record of the present administration in bringing forward legislation to help the working people, and to help the farmers of this country, is not to be surpassed by any government which has been in power in this country since 1867. With that, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude.

[Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West).]

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Here is the official talker-outer.

Mr. Dinsdale: —the hon. member who has preceded me in this discussion has not left much time for the contribution that I wished to make. I say that quite seriously. The interjection of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with reference to myself indicated that I was the official talker-outer. This remark will indicate that there is a certain amount of professional jealousy between him and me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the old school tie.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is precisely the point I was going to make. I want to take part in this discussion this afternoon because on the bill before us I can agree almost completely with a fellow graduate from my own alma mater. It is not always that we see eye to eye on matters in this house.

There was only one small criticism I wanted to make, however. The principle of Bill No. 2, as well as of Bill No. 16, is a very commendable one. I should like to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member sponsoring the bill does not practice what he preaches. He is the only man in this house who never takes a vacation. If you look down the list on the order paper, I am sure it would demonstrate that fact.

I do not believe any hon. member in this chamber would be against the idea that is being sponsored here this afternoon. It is an idea which is perhaps more firmly established in private industry than it is in public business, that every working man deserves a reasonable period of holidays. I think the principle has come about for entirely practical reasons. I should like to approach it from two standpoints. First of all, if you give an employee a reasonable period for vacation it makes him a much more effective employee. This principle perhaps applies today more than it ever did before because so much of the work in this age of mechanization is of a routine and administrative nature. Secondly, in the kind of world in which we live today it is to an increasing extent becoming obvious that more leisure time is at the disposal of the working man. The hours of work are decreasing and the amount of leisure time available is on the increase.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does he not believe that both of these principles apply just as well to the first year of employment as to the second year of employment?

Mr. Dinsdale: Quite; the first year of employment should certainly allow for a reasonable period of vacation. My time has almost expired, and I had intended to deal with this point before concluding my remarks. Now that the question has been raised by the hon. member, I should like to make a reasonable appeal to him. I will put it in the form of a question. Does he not think that any employee should establish a reasonable degree of competence and also indicate by his attitude towards his job that he has a reasonable degree of dedication and seriousness of purpose to his occupation?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member like an answer?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Dinsdale: It seems—

Mr. Cardiff: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: May I proceed without further interruption? It seems to me that this is the only point of difference between Bill No. 2 and Bill No. 16. I have the utmost confidence in the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) who is sponsoring Bill No. 16. I have read his bill along with that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and it seems to me that all the available information on this problem has been gathered together by the Minister of Labour. He has taken these important principles into consideration. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will adjust his thinking in this slight respect, this difference between one week for the first year as against two weeks for the first year, he will find it possible to support Bill No. 16. Then, we will move more rapidly to a very desirable goal and I think we will avoid considerable—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is a vacation with pay a reward or a right?

Mr. Dinsdale: It is a bit of both, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is where we differ.

Mr. Dinsdale: It could be both.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time for consideration of public and private bills having expired, the house will resume, when it resumes, consideration of the matter which was under discussion at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE GUARANTEED PRICES FOR CERTAIN COMMODITIES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Harkness for the second reading of Bill No. 237, for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural commodities.

(Translation):

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned, at five o'clock, I was discussing Bill No. 237 and I had mentioned the work done by the important Senate committee on the use of land in Canada. Quoting from a brief submitted by the assistant deputy minister of agriculture, Mr. Chagnon. Here is what he said before the committee on Thursday, February 21, 1957:

"Farming as now practised in Eastern Canada does not seem to provide for a substantial proportion of our farmers and their families, a standard of living comparable to the average standard prevailing in Canada at the present time. A common explanation for this is that farms are too small, labour costs too high, farm prices too low, and so on."

Mr. Chagnon, whose experience and knowledge of Canadian agriculture are very wide, then deals in this brief with the problem of the economic recovery of a certain portion of Eastern farmers, and highlights a solution which he found very successful, the fertilization of grazing land in areas where farming requires too much work for the returns it has to offer.

Quebec agriculture in particular owes much to the work and knowledge of Mr. Chagnon. May I, incidentally, point out that he has rendered numerous services to the Quebec farmers, especially before he was called into the federal Department of Agriculture where he is continuing his admirable work.

It should be noted, however, that the remedy proposed by the assistant deputy minister of agriculture necessarily requires a transformation of the agricultural methods used in less fertile areas.

One factor which must necessarily be considered is the fact that on many small farms too much money is being spent on farming machinery.

Nobody, of course, can blame a farmer for wanting to mechanize his farm, but in many cases farmers have to spend $5, $10, $15 and even $20,000 on farming machinery which serves only four months a year. The cost of these machines, their normal depreciation and their uselessness during too great a part of the year, are a heavy load on the budget of many farmers and constitute, I think, a capital expenditure which does not give sufficient return, if not a pure loss.

The pooling by a number of farmers of the machinery necessary to proper farming should be practised more efficiently than it is at the proper time. Now let me turn to the brief presented by the president of the U.C.C., Mr. Lemoine, to the same committee on Thursday, February 28, 1957. I would like to call the attention of the house to the figures submitted by him to point to the complexity of the problem. According to Mr. Lemoine's survey, in 1956 46.2 per cent of Quebec farmers lived on farming alone. The percentage for the whole of Canada, including Quebec that same year was 38 per cent. Therefore, 54 per cent of our farmers have to work outside the farm for part at least of their livelihood. In Quebec, as a matter of fact, 32 per cent derive income from logging and 22 per cent from industry. When I mention the percentage of those who must find some revenue through working in the bush, I believe that this demonstrates the necessity for farmers—especially Quebec farmers—to be assured of a minimum price for pulpwood. This request was often presented by groups belonging to the U.C.C. and the authorities concerned should see to it that a favourable conclusion in this regard be arrived at since this is a matter which involves at least 32 per cent of farmers.

Moreover, in the province of Quebec, there are 18 per cent of farmers whose income from sources outside farming is greater than from farming itself. In his brief Mr. Lemoine also deals with the matter of fertilizing grazing land in areas where raising crops is extremely difficult. In this regard also he went on record as approving the opinion expressed by the assistant deputy minister, Mr. Chagnon.

Taking up then the matter of pasture land in these districts, and that of markets for agricultural products, Mr. Lemoine refers to that part of the Gordon Commission report where it is predicted that in 1980 or thereabouts Canada will have 26,000,000 people. Mr. Lemoine states that the expected increase in population as well as the increase in income will make for a stronger consumer demand, with an increasingly pronounced preference for food of the best quality.

This means of course that the development of our agriculture is closely tied to the increase in the population. That is obvious in the case of farmers whose farms are situated close to large centres where they have natural outlets for their products, practically on their doorstep.

In any event, agriculture in those areas should, as much as possible, be directed in such a way that the greatest possible number of farms may provide our farmers with an income comparable to that of other Canadian workers.

The Conservative government merely changed the title and introduced complications in eleven year old Liberal legislation. If the Minister of Agriculture meant to play Santa Claus to the Canadian farmer, he will soon find out that the agricultural class is greatly disappointed by a political party which has promised it everything in that field.

The problems of agriculture are not new. In his brief, Mr. Chagnon states: "I have known the technical aspects of agriculture for the past 30 years and I can say that the problem of inadequate income on the farm is not new. I heard of it even when I was young".

Personally, I am far from approving the formula, which I would describe as one-sided, proposed by the C.C.F. party and I do not like the lack of objectivity of their basically demagogical statements, with regards the best means of increasing farm income.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the applause from my friends on both sides of the house. As this is the first time that I have risen this session I might be permitted to congratulate you, and to say that I am happy to see so many of my old friends in parliament and I am especially happy to see so many new friends in parliament. I think probably both are an improvement.

I have listened to the debate on this particular bill with some interest and some concern. I believe it is the most important agricultural bill that has ever been brought before this parliament. I can quite appreciate the attitude of those who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, especially that of my genial friend the former minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner) for whom I have always had a very high regard, whether he believes it or not, when it is suggested that this was an election issue or an election dodge. The reason, Mr. Speaker, is probably—as he has emphasized so fluently—that it is the same bill that he proposed in 1944, just before the 1945 election. In fact he did very well with it at that time but now he comes back with the attitude of scorn it but still adorn it, because he has seen it work twice. It served his purpose very well in 1944; it elected him. He thought so much of it, Mr. Speaker, that he decided he would not use it and now he comes back and sees it is better than it was, and now he condemns it. I sometimes wonder just where we farmers come in here. My hon. friend laughs but I have been a farmer—

An hon. Member: You still are.

Mr. Rowe: —and I am still a farmer and I am still responsible for the management of a lot of acres. My right hon. friend, the former minister of agriculture, in a facetious mood, when somebody said one day that I was a dirt farmer, replied maybe I was a dirty farmer. Well, Mr. Speaker, he and I both know how difficult it is to keep a farm clean; our farms might be cleaner were it not that we are in parliament. But I will remind him, and he will recall it very well, that a very great friend of his and of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider), said that the right hon. former minister of agriculture was one of the greatest politicians ever to be the minister of agriculture. He said—in a very facetious mood because I did not agree with it and I know my right hon. friend did not agree with it either—that when the right hon. gentleman went home after he had been talking politics for so long and he ground up some of his surplus wheat and wanted to feed it to a hog, the hog backed up and said "You have fooled so many people, I do not believe I will try to eat it."

However, Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the right hon. the former minister of agriculture this afternoon and I could not help but think of how regretful he must have been that he had not used that mediocre bill more than he did. There was nobody to your left, Mr. Speaker, who could have done more to help re-elect the previous government than the right hon. gentleman. I would not like to say that he was the most responsible for their defeat but he could have been the most responsible for their remaining in power had he then used a little more of the powers he had under that bill. I know that he had opposition in his cabinet; I know that he was not able to do all the things he wanted to do and perhaps he and I are both in the twilight of our careers so I would hesitate to say the things I used to say about him—

Mr. Gardiner: Go right ahead.

Mr. Rowe: I know he likes this bill. I know he knows it is an improvement on his bill. I know when he speaks about hesitating to support it that he has no intention of opposing it, because he would rather risk the fortunes of the farmers than risk the next election on this issue—

Mr. Gardiner: Try me.

Mr. Rowe: I know if I was in his position I would too. Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent bill. This bill has been improved.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) today is a very fortunate choice as the Minister of Agriculture at this time. No man in Canada on our side of the house—and certainly with their reputation there is no one over there one would want to pick now—could have been picked who would have made a finer minister of agriculture than the present minister. He is one of those down to earth men, he is a farmer.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, do not be so modest.

Mr. Rowe: He is a lot better minister than you would have made. There is no one, Mr. Speaker, in this house who talks so long on so many things of such very little interest to anyone as the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted. Just compare the two, Mr. Speaker; just compare the two. God help the Canadian farmer if the member for Winnipeg North Centre had been minister of agriculture. He would not know a dairy cow from a beef steer.

Mr. Speaker, we have a practical man; we have a man who does not split hairs; a man who does not waste a lot of the time of parliament. I have been sitting here and you may have thought that I have not been thinking about what has been going on, but I have been counting up what has been going on here in parliament. The right hon. the former prime minister of this dominion, a most distinguished Canadian—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: —is a man who, next to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) is the most responsible man in parliament, as you will all agree. Now, I have checked in Hansard and I find my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has used just eight times as many pages as the right hon. the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in this house. May I remind my hon. friend, because I always have to be an economist in order to pay my hotel bills here, that every hour of this parliament costs our taxpayers $1,000.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Closure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this one worth it?

Mr. Rowe: Since last fall he has cost the country about $10,000 in the hours he has spent speaking in this parliament while the right hon. the Leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition has cost this country about $800. In fact he is worth that much to the country and I would have paid his expenses myself. Perhaps his silence is due to his years of experience and his tolerance in listening, as he and I have had to do, to a lot of things that have been of little help to either the farmers or the industrialists or business generally.

An hon. Member: Not much help is right.

Mr. Rowe: And as for my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre, I have great admiration for him too. He knows the rules so well and emphasizes them so much that I sometimes wonder if he is a theorist who would almost make parliament look ridiculous. Mr. Speaker, there are 100 members in this house who have not taken up as much time during this session as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Perhaps the wagon that makes the most noise needs the most grease, but I must say I have seen more men talk themselves out of parliament than I have ever seen talk themselves into it. I have heard more nonsense from those who talk the most than from those who talk the least. I listened to the hon. members in the far corner discussing this bill and then moving the amendment that Bill No. 237 be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization. My congenial friend, the former minister of agriculture, would not have moved a motion like that, because he would see that this casts the die for another election and would put them further into oblivion than ever before. It needs Spartans to make a motion like that —people like the hon. members in the far corner to make a motion that Bill 237 be not read the second time.

Mr. Speaker, with all your technicalities and rules can you imagine what that means? It would mean the end of this bill. It would mean that these great champions who want to give the farmers 100 per cent parity are saying to the farmers of Canada that we are here in parliament to see that the bill should end entirely. The former minister of agriculture says he does not like it. I think he made an excellent speech; in fact, I have never heard him when he did not make a good speech. I never heard a man who could speak louder when his case was weaker. I have always enjoyed his speeches, because I enjoy the sporty style he has, but he would never be so stupid as to move a motion which would eliminate the bill. He gives quiet acquiescence to it rather than go to the country. He says: it is just a little bit better than the one I brought in that won an election for us.

My hon. friends in the far corner who never hope to have responsibility can champion $100 for old age pensions and 100 per cent parity and not even know what parity means. These champions of agriculture, knowing they will never have an opportunity to come into power, will suggest anything. They would find the former minister of agriculture and myself probably both voting against some of the wild ideas they have. Mr. Speaker, it sounds to me like the last swan song of a party which has seen two other parties get very close in competition; of a party which has no hope; almost like those who have very little pride of ancestry politically and no hope of posterity in the future. My hon. friends in the far corner will not have a corporal's guard here after the next election.

I am amazed at the hon. members to my right who, tonight, would move a motion in the terms I have mentioned with the guaranteed support of those sitting in turn on their right. Neither one would have had the courage, Mr. Speaker, to make such a motion if they thought the other great historic party would support such nonsense. They can be champions, they can hurl, they can move the hell from the blue in their speeches provided they know that the former minister of agriculture and those who follow his good political judgment are not going to be carried down the wild garden path with them.

Mr. Herridge: You are both rowing in the same boat.

Mr. Rowe: I would never want you to row in my boat because I know it would be sure to sink. A man who has had the Conservative inclination you have and who has rowed with the group you have been rowing with for years could not row a thing politically.

The Minister of Agriculture has shown me in the short time he has been Minister of Agriculture in this dominion that history will recall him as the best minister of agriculture we have had since confederation. I have great regard for the former minister of agriculture. I have a keen regard for him. He knows I have. I have a keen regard, too, for the old historic Liberal party. I say to my hon. friend from Essex East (Mr. Martin) than I do not want to show him any partiality because I do not know which way he would take it if I did, but I do say to him and to the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) and to whoever else might be a candidate for the leadership of the great historic Liberal party in Canada, that I hope, and I say this with all sincerity, the Liberal party will select a good leader. They have had an excellent leader in the right hon. gentleman, the member for Quebec East (Mr. St. Laurent). He is a gentleman, a great Canadian, a great statesman and a man who will go down in history as having been the prime minister of this dominion for many years without one finger pointing at him. So I hope that whoever is named will be a good leader, because I am confident that if democracy is going to continue in this country it will go on with a two-party system. I am satisfied—and I am more confident than ever after listening to the debate on the motion which has been moved today—that there is no room in this house for more than a yes or no to any question, and that does not need more than two parties.

Mr. Speaker, I am, as probably you know, a champion—or I am trying to be a champion; I am not much of a champion—of free enterprise. I am a subscriber, at least, to private enterprise, and I am confident that no man merits his place in this country who does not burn the midnight oil. You will see that whoever is chosen leader of the Liberal party will burn the most midnight oil in Canada between now and the time the hon. member for Quebec East retires.

I do not believe in regimentation. That is why I can quite understand that hon. members to my right would not subscribe to this bill because it would not guarantee 100 per cent parity, in other words it would not guarantee over-payments for over-production and guarantee surpluses which would put us in a worse mess than the United States is in today. Mr. Speaker, stop and think. Have any responsible people in Canada been suggesting that we should go out for 100 per cent parity. Why, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Benson in the United States today is almost smothered with his surpluses which are now worth $10 billion. A few years ago it cost $1,300 million to handle the surpluses of the United States. Last year it cost $3,300 million. If they are going on as they are going on at present in this great new land and produce much more of what they do not need it may well be that the cost in future will be greater than $10 billion.

The former minister of agriculture says this bill is not much better than it was before.

Mr. Gardiner: Not quite as good.

Mr. Rowe: Well, then, if you think it is not quite as good I cannot figure out in my limited experience why you do not vote against it. Probably you can, and you will tell me on the side.

Mr. Speaker, the former legislation which the Liberal administration brought in emphasized the uncertainty of the farmers' prices. The bill which the Minister of Agriculture has brought in now emphasizes stability. You did not have a 12 months guarantee. You could do as you like with it, which you did, and that is why the farmers of Canada voted against you. They had lost confidence in your administration of the act, though they believed there was some merit in it. In all fairness, you did not even take what merit there was in the act out of it, and yet you are criticizing the present Minister of Agriculture who has improved it and who has suggested it will give at least a 12 months guarantee.

The flexibility has been criticized. I know the former minister of agriculture tried to emphasize today—and I ask his pardon because I was called out to the telephone; in fact, I expected to leave on the 4.15 plane; I went out to the airport, but the plane was grounded; I cannot blame either the opposition or the government for this—

Mr. Pickersgill: Lost in the fog.

Mr. Rowe: I heard the hon. member waxing eloquent and speaking loudly and with all due regard for him I must say that every time I hear him speaking loudly I know that his case is almost lost. The hon. member knew that this bill was an improvement on his. He realized that it meant stability. As a farmer he knows there is nothing the Canadian farmers need more than stability.

I have farmed all my life as did my parents and grandparents and I think I farm with relative efficiency. I am not going to say that I farm as efficiently as I would like to but I am still farming a lot of acres and I leave it to you to draw your own conclusions. If I were too inefficient in my operations I would lose acres. My farming experience has taught me that there is nothing as important to the farmer as stability of prices. When a farmer has his stock ready for market and learns that the price has dropped 50 per cent it is a heartbreaking experience. When the taxes are due and the buyers come in and offer him five cents a pound less for beef or some other product it is a soul-sickening ordeal for both the farmer and his wife.

What is being proposed now is that the farmer will have at least an 80 per cent guarantee as a minimum. The maximum can be 100 per cent or it can be more. The former minister of agriculture knows as well as he knows he is a prominent member of the Liberal party that you cannot have a sound agricultural policy without flexibility such as is provided in this bill. He emphasized the flexibility existing in 1944. My hon. friends to his left would recklessly suggest that we should have 100 per cent guaranteed parity. I have heard my hon. friends to my right and my hon. friends in the far corner on the other side of the house say that the Prime Minister had at some time in the past talked about parity. Certainly he talked about parity but at no time did he say that he stood for 100 per cent parity as a fixed principle.

Mr. McCullough: Be careful.

Mr. Rowe: The provisions of the bill before us might very well mean 125 per cent parity. The rigidity of 100 per cent parity would be a most dangerous precedent for any party to put into force and the only ones who suggest it are those who know they have no hope of ever being in power.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Rowe: Surely.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did I understand the hon. member to suggest that his leader has no fixed principles?

Mr. Rowe: I think the hon. member made that comment in a facetious way and therefore I will not repeat what my good friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said the other day to the effect that there were no principles down in his riding. I am sure there are but I am sorry he does not recognize any in other places. I shall only say that I think he phrased that question rather facetiously.

The leader of our party has said on repeated occasions that he believed in a principle of parity that would bear a fair relationship to the cost of production and farm prices and I believe he has stood on that principle. I know that my friend, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, has at least enough principles to recognize that that is the principle. I do not believe that any party should follow the principle of rigid parity.

I am not going to suggest that this bill is a cure-all for the entire agricultural industry. Agriculture is a unique industry and it is considered the basic industry. It is not many years ago that 80 per cent of the people in Canada were involved in agricultural production and dependent for their livelihood upon it. Today only about 15 or 18 per cent are in this position because the machine age and all that it implies has changed the situation. I am convinced that no government in Canada is doing its duty toward this young dominion if it neglects agriculture. In saying that I am not suggesting that any government should assist agriculture with a view to winning the farmer's vote. We have been through two great wars within the last few years and we know that if the agricultural industry in Canada should fall down our armies would fall down. The high prices that were paid for agricultural commodities during periods of war are an indication that agriculture is not only indigenous to Canada in peace but is of paramount importance in time of war.

If we are worthy of the place we hold in parliament we should keep agriculture in a reasonably prosperous position. I do not believe we should be expected to build up supports to the extent of pap-feeding the production of agricultural products of which we have a surplus but I do believe that agriculture generally should be taken into account. We have unemployment insurance for the labourer when he is out of a job but to date we have had very little that would assist the farmer when his prices drop and he has to sell his goods at a price less than his cost of production or even the cost of the labour involved in his production in some cases.

I do not believe we can put a set, fixed and rigid price on agricultural commodities to the extent that we are going to encourage the production of something that nobody wants. I have great regard for the Minister of Agriculture. With all due respect for the former minister of agriculture I would express my belief that the present Minister of Agriculture is one of the best ministers of agriculture that Canada has had since confederation. I do not want to see him follow the policies my hon. friends down to the left who know very little about agriculture advocate in their wild and impetuous suggestions which they can never hope or expect to put in practice. If he did, I think some day he would be wiping rotten eggs off his hat like Mr. Benson in the United States. Mr. Benson is a great gentleman but he got hold of a policy like the Irishman who had hold of a wildcat by the tail; he was afraid to let go and he was terrified to hang on. Mr. Benson under this policy has built up surpluses that neither the present nor the former minister of agriculture could have possibly tolerated. I will say that while the former minister of agriculture did not do everything he might have done for the farmers of Canada—and many farmers thought so—and although he lost an election he did not put Canada into the position that he might have put it into had he followed the policies he almost indicated today we should follow.

I am glad we have a Minister of Agriculture today who is responsible, practical and who is also a free enterpriser.

Probably it would suit my hon. friends down in the far corner better to establish surpluses for which eventually they would have to provide controls and take over and tell the farmer whether he is going to produce soybeans or beef cattle, or whether he is going to produce seed corn or jersey cattle. I have heard them wax eloquent and I have read their manifestos over many years past. They do not believe in free enterprise and the farmer is the greatest free enterpriser in the world. If they can establish those unsound policies there is no need to have anything, Mr. Speaker, except totalitarian controls. If you are going to give the farmer more money than the product will bring on the world market and increase the world surplus, then there is nothing left to do but to curtail his acreage and get the control that they would expect to have over every industry, every enterprise and every vocation in Canada.

Mr. Stefura: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rowe: Go ahead, if you wish.

Mr. Stefura: I should like to know what agricultural commodity is in a surplus position so far as the world is concerned?

Mr. Rowe: Since the question comes from the hon. member, I do not know why I should have to answer it.

Mr. Stefura: I did not hear that.

Mr. Hahn: I thought you were going to tell us.

Mr. Rowe: I thought you should know, that is why you asked me. I do know this. Many years ago, not only now, we had more wheat than we could sell in Canada. Before the hon. member was a member of the House of Commons I was a member here when the party that sits to Mr. Speaker's left left office and left every elevator in Canada bursting with unsold wheat in 1929, just as they left every lumber yard filled with lumber that had not been burned.

I have heard the former minister of agriculture wax eloquent about the Bennett buggies. I tell him that nobody built the Bennett buggies more than the Liberal regime that started in 1921 and ran to 1930. More big institutions were built in those years than ever before and the farmers of Canada were buying Danish bacon over the counters in Regina in the province of Saskatchewan to feed their own people. The minister was talking about mixed farming in those days. I have lived long enough, Mr. Speaker, to see, in the slang of the street, the chickens come home to roost.

I hear my hon. friends to your left, Mr. Speaker, harping about the fact that we might buy a few manufactured products. I have been in this house when I have heard them say that we should buy wherever we could get goods cheaper; that the only way we can sell our wheat and manufactured products is to have people buy our farm products. Well, they bought $1,400,000,000 worth of goods from the United States of America last year more than we sold them. How much wheat did you sell to them? How much bacon did you sell to them? How much cheese did you sell to them? People do not buy from us because we buy from them. They buy from us because they need our products. They buy our raw products because they have exhausted their raw products. We sell the wheat because they need our farm products. When I hear these gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, I wonder. I look over at the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider), and I wonder whether the old dusty scales of free trade have dropped off his eyes yet because I realize, Mr. Speaker, that he knows about the industries in that county, he knows that if he followed the policies of the Liberal party he would never have been elected, let alone re-elected to parliament.

The greatest market for agricultural products, Mr. Speaker, is the home market. I believe in free trade but I believe in fair trade. I believe in equalization of conditions. I believe that when we pay three times the wages that are paid in some other countries and our employees work only two-thirds of the time that should be taken into account when you sit down around a table rather than the theoretical and philosophical ideas we have from people over there in one breath and government control in another.

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the bill that is before the house at this time will do more to stabilize agricultural conditions than anything in the past has done. I should like to give a word of encouragement to our new Minister of Agriculture. I believe, Mr. Speaker—I do not know yet; he has not told me; he may not tell me until after the next election—that the right hon. former minister of agriculture knows in his heart of hearts, as he is getting in the twilight of his career which has been an outstanding one, that the present minister is one of the finest ministers of agriculture this country has ever had. I believe his policy is sound. I am glad that he does not allow himself to be twisted or turned by the fantastic suggestions which are made by my hon. friends to the left.

Oh, I listened to the boys the other day. When they were not laughing they were jeering; when they were not jeering they were jibing, trying to knock this legislation. My hon. friends over there moved an amendment—you are not going to support it. If you support it it will be the climax of your folly:

That Bill No. 237 be not now read—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Apparently you have not read it.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, I have read it. While you were talking I was reading. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seems to have such ecclesiastical pride that he thinks nobody listens even when he is talking nonsense. He suggests:

That Bill No. 237 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

As the great champion of parliamentary rights he knows, as the former minister of agriculture knows, that this does not mean giving the bill a six-months hoist but ending it entirely. I hope the farmers know that this great champion of the agricultural industry would know nothing about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe does not realize that time passes very quickly when he is on his feet. His time has expired.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who preceded me seemed to feel it wise that he should chide the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for taking up a great deal of the time of this house. I think it can be left to the judgment of the house and of the Canadian people as to which one of those two hon. members uses the time of this house more usefully. This evening the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), according to his own calculations, used up about $800 worth of time, and although he did provide us with some entertainment he certainly did not say anything about the bill. I will have to pass by most of what he said since it had nothing to do with the legislation before us, but I cannot resist the temptation to refer to at least one of his statements.

He made quite a thing of free enterprise. I think he should know from his wide experience in this house, and certainly the members of the party to which he belongs must know, that it was the leader of their own party, the first prime minister of Canada as a matter of fact, who struck a blow at free enterprise from which it has never recovered.

It was he who introduced the tariff system in this country. No member can stand up in this house and talk about free enterprise and at the same time endorse a tariff system such as we had in the days of the late R. B. Bennett, which practically ruined this country. It was the antithesis of free enterprise. Certainly it was the most damaging kind of control that could have been introduced.

However, this evening I should like to deal with the legislation which is before us. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that what we are doing now in debating this bill is a continuation of something which has become an historical struggle in this country that is the struggle of agriculture to obtain its fair share of the national income. This struggle has been going on for many, many years. I should like to pay tribute to the many members, particularly those from western Canada and not all of the same political persuasion, who have from time to time championed the cause of agriculture and have made some progress. I take some pride and satisfaction in the fact that if we go over the records containing the history of this question we will find that many of the leaders of the movement to which I belong, some of whom are no longer with us, took a very active and valuable part in continuing that struggle for a fair share of the national income for agriculture.

After all, that is the central and main issue. The government may make all the excuses they want to make, the government can try to pretend that they are changing this bill in any way they want, but the central issue and the issue which farm organizations are placing before this parliament is a fair share of the national income for agriculture. Unless the government faces this issue of whether or not this legislation is designed to, and will have the effect of, providing agriculture with a fair share of the national income, then I say they are not fulfilling the objectives for which farm organizations and various members of the House of Commons from the west have fought all during these years.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe repeated several times that the amendment now before us, which I seconded and support, would have the effect of killing the bill. He made a very obvious attempt to try to frighten the opposition with that statement. He knows, if he was in the house this morning, that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) has already killed the bill. The minister tried to drag in certain amendments in order to change the bill but ended up by saying that the bill would have to be redrafted. As a matter of fact, therefore, the original bill which came before the house has already met its demise at the hands of the Minister of Agriculture. I am glad my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) moved the motion he did. We are trying to play fair with the farm organizations of this country. We are trying to keep faith with the people whom we represent. When I say "we" I mean not only the members in this group but the members who represent agriculture generally in this house.

During the election campaign the former government took a certain stand on agriculture. Whether that stand was the right one or the wrong one is not the question at issue at this time. I have my opinion on that and I have expressed it many times before. The former government took its stand on this question, and the three other opposition parties took an opposite stand. The Liberal government was not in favour of a parity price system. While I often disagree with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner) I must express a certain amount of admiration for the fact that tonight he said substantially what he has been saying in this house for the last 22 years so far as agriculture is concerned. On the other hand, we had the Progressive Conservative party, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit who went out on the hustings in the last election and advocated parity prices for farm products. I am proud to be able to say that my colleagues in the C.C.F. are living up to that promise. We are keeping faith with our electors. I can give the same credit to my Social Credit friends. I cannot put any blame upon my Liberal friends because they took the opposite stand and are still taking the opposite stand. However, I cannot condone or forgive the attitude of the Conservative party or their leader who went out at election time and prate to the farmers about parity prices from one end of the country to the other. At that time every Conservative candidate seemed to know what parity prices meant and had no hesitation in talking about them. Today one of their elder members, a former minister in the second last Conservative government we had in this country, has the temerity to get up and say nobody knows what parity prices are. Let me say to him that if he does not know I would suggest he consult his own Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) because his own Prime Minister seemed to know a few months ago. I shall have occasion to refer to that again later.

I said that the historic fight of agriculture in this country has been an honourable one. The farmers of this country have never come to parliament asking for something which was not their due. If anything, they have been guilty of modesty. They have a perfect right to claim that agriculture is still the basic industry of Canada. It is still the backbone of our economy, and it is still an industry which, unless it prospers, is going to bring down with it all the rest of our economy. I shall give you, Mr. Speaker, five reasons why I believe agriculture has a good case for asking for its fair share of the national income.

First of all, agriculture is the only source of food and fibre in this country. This is true not only of this country, but the Canadian farm has been traditionally the breadbasket of the world. We will never forget—I am sure the members of the government do not forget—that in the first and second world wars—perhaps to a greater extent in the second world war—the farmers of Canada provided food enough not only to feed the population of this country but to send food to Great Britain, France and our allies. I believe that to a marked extent they were instrumental in helping to win that war.

Agriculture is the source, and the only source of food and fibre in this country, without which there could be nothing else. We can talk about our manufacturing industries, important as they may be, our processing industries, our professions and everything else, but without the food and fibre upon which mankind depends there could be none of these other good things of life. Secondly, agriculture is the basis for many of our secondary industries. I sometimes feel resentful when I hear people who are interested primarily in the secondary industries, manufacturing and processing treating agriculture as if it were something unimportant. They should realize that without agriculture probably anywhere from 40 to 50 per cent of our secondary industries would not exist because they are built around what is produced on the land. The people who find employment in these industries would have no income.

Thirdly, farming is a way of life; it is more than a way of making a living. Agriculture, traditionally and historically, has been a way of life and one of the finest ways of life. Those of us who were fortunate enough to have been brought up on a farm realize that there are certain advantages in it. It is true there are certain disadvantages as well, but there are certain innate advantages in living close to the land. You get benefits there which you do not get anywhere else. It would be a good thing for this country if there were more people living on the land, getting the feel of the soil and living close to nature. I believe it would eliminate a great many of the problems we are facing in our lives today.

Fourth, agriculture is an important part of our national defence system. I have referred already to that in one context, but even at the present time, when we are in so-called peace, the role that Canada could play, whether through NATO or the United Nations or any other system of collective security, would be to guarantee a large and secure supply of food which could be made available in case of a world conflict. When we look at the matter from that point of view, how ridiculous and how petty is all this talk about this unmanageable surplus, about this huge world surplus. At what point does a surplus become unmanageable. I say to the Minister of Agriculture that it becomes unmanageable at the point when the leaders of the government have not the imagination to know how to manage it.

When you look at it in the context of the defence of the western world, you ask yourself what our best possible contribution would be. Do we have guided missiles? Do we have other armaments that amount to anything compared with the great military giants of the world? What would be our best contribution? It would be the secure availability of a food supply. If we had some real sense about this matter we would be providing a food bank on a national basis, to begin with, and integrating that bank with an international food bank which would be the greatest contribution any national defence scheme of this country could make to the world.

Fifth, another reason why agriculture deserves and has a perfect right to demand its fair share of the national income is that it is the one industry in which the Canadian people really excel. I do not think there is another nation in the world where, per man or per man hour or per man day, as much is produced in the way of food and fibre as is produced in Canada. In other words, we are the most efficient producers of food and fibre of any country in the world. We excel in that production. It is a matter of national pride. It is our national emblem. That is the one thing that we can do better than any other country in the world. We fall behind some other nations in the scientific field and we certainly cannot ever hope to compete in the military field. We may fall behind in some other fields. But there is no nation in the world that can out-produce Canada, man for man. Here is something in which we can take a feeling of national pride. Here is something we can do better than anyone else in the world. We should have the sincerity to back that feeling up with something more solid than this kind of trick bill which this minister is trying to pawn off on the farmers of Canada.

The whole objection of the members of the government, including the hon. member who preceded me, to the setting up of a parity price system is the matter of what it would cost the taxpayers. I have not heard of any valid reason which they produced other than that. Certainly it is not a matter of producing too much. The only argument they have used that is understandable is that it may cost the national treasury from time to time some money to maintain a system of support prices based on parity. However, none of them, including the Minister of Agriculture, has to date placed on the record any figures or any estimate whatsoever as to what it may cost the treasury of this country if we were to establish a system of price support based on parity over a period of years. Surely the officials of his department—and if he has not economists there he might borrow a few from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming); there should be a supply in that department—should be able to sit down and give him at least a rough estimate of what may be the cost under various conditions to the treasury of this country.

A good reason why neither the Minister of Agriculture nor any other minister has produced such figures is this. If they did so, I think they or at least the people of Canada would find that this whole business of what it may cost the treasury has been grossly exaggerated out of all proportion. I think what he would find is this. The hon. member for Melville gave us a very good lead in this matter when he spoke today and when he made what I thought was the most important statement in his speech. He said that the market price for food products tends to gravitate to the floor price. That was an extremely important statement from an hon. member who for 22 years was Minister of Agriculture in this country. I want to repeat that statement. He said that the market price has a tendency to gravitate to the floor price. In other words, when a floor price is set with the backing of the treasury and it becomes a national policy that that shall be the price for that particular commodity, that fact in itself—the very setting up of that floor price—has a strong tendency to bring the market price to that level.

The former minister of agriculture when he made that statement did not make it off the cuff. It was a well considered statement and he knew exactly what he was saying. If that is true—and I believe it is true—then the only way in which we can hope to bring the market price up to the parity level is to set a proper floor price to begin with. If we did that and if it did turn out that the market price did gravitate to the floor price, and if it stayed at that level, it would not cost the treasury of this country five cents to maintain this parity price system.

But suppose that, under certain conditions, the market price did not reach that particular level and it was necessary then, under a system of deficiency payments or subsidies or whatever term you want to use, to pay some money out of the treasury in order to subsidize certain food products. What would it cost? I have not the figures. I have not the facilities to be able to make even a rough guess. But whatever the sum of money may be—and I have a suspicion that it would be a great deal less than we are led to believe—the question arises: is it worth it? Is that industry important enough to Canada that we should be prepared to take a few million dollars or a few hundred million dollars, as the case may be, in order to subsidize certain food products.

Let me point out to the Minister of Agriculture that in the last ten years the people of Canada have paid approximately $4 billion in the form of duties as a result of our tariff structure. I am not asserting that the farmers of Canada have paid all that money, but the consumers of Canada have paid that amount of money, namely $4 billion, as a subsidy—indirectly, but it is still a subsidy—to the manufacturing industry of this country. They have paid $4 billion in the last ten years. That averages to $400 million a year. I am sure that a fraction of that amount—half of it or less—would be sufficient to cover any of the deficiency payments or any of the subsidies that may be required to maintain all our food products at the parity level. Is there any reason why the taxpayers and the consumers—because after all the taxpayers and the consumers in this country are one and the same people—should not contribute to agriculture a fraction of what they are contributing and have been contributing practically since Confederation to the manufacturing industry of this country. On that basis alone that money could be found.

But let us look at the matter from another point of view. Let us compare the value of our agricultural industry with some of the things we are doing for our so-called national defence. If a war were declared, or if we were in the misfortune of becoming involved in a world war within the next few days, instead of the approximately $2 billion which we are paying for national defence at the present time, it is quite likely that we would be paying anywhere from $5 billion to $6 billion or maybe $10 or $12 billion a year. No one knows where the limit may be. As a matter of fact, once we were in it there would be no limit. We would spend as much as would be necessary to maintain our war effort. We found that out in 1939, when the C.C.F. members of the house, as in 1936, 1937 and 1938, asked for a floor price. There was apprehension and we were told, if you do that the country will go bankrupt. Our whole budget in 1938 amounted to $600 million, including national defence. By the end of the war we were spending about $5 billion a year and the country was never in better economic shape than it was at that time.

That means that if the will is there the resources are there. We are capable of providing the money once this parliament makes up its mind that this is an industry which deserves that kind of support and which is going to get that as a matter of principle and as a matter of right.

We could stabilize and support a parity price system for our products for about the cost of one sputnik, half the cost of a D.E.W. line or about the cost of one fleet of modern jets. Now there is a comparison of what we could do for agriculture if we put our minds to it and if we decided it was just as important to this nation and to the world as these national defence armaments on which we are spending so much money.

Now I would like to say a word or two about the actual provisions of the bill itself. I think there are four points in particular to which the farmers of this country took strong exception when they saw the original bill. In the first place, in spite of what the Minister of Agriculture has said—in two speeches now—there is still no basis for parity in this bill. There is nothing in the bill he has introduced, which will include the amendments which he has proposed which provides a base for parity. The best one can say for the base that he is prepared to place under price supports, is that it will be something like 80 per cent of 80 per cent of the three poorest years the farmers ever had.

Secondly, there is no formula upon which such a base can be calculated. All of the power, all of the discretion is left to the Minister of Agriculture who is asking parliament for a blank cheque—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. My hon. friend is doubtless talking about the bill but should he not be talking about the amendment?

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need to comment on that. It is only a waste of time and I am sure the hon. member will find out for himself what are the rules of this house.

I was saying that in this bill the Minister of Agriculture is asking for a blank cheque. He is asking the people of Canada and the farmers of this country to agree that he should be the one to decide when there should be a certain price support or when he should place a certain commodity under a support. Is that not exactly what the farmers objected to most strenuously in the old legislation, the Agricultural Prices Support Act? That is one of the reasons why the Liberal administration was defeated, because the farmers had the feeling that the former administration or the former minister of agriculture was using the Agricultural Prices Support Act merely as a political instrument to play around with and for the purpose of influencing people before an election. I am surprised that the present Minister of Agriculture, who himself—and certainly his leader on many occasions in the past has done this—pointed out in rather vivid language in this house, and out of it, that very point which I have made, should now have fallen into exactly the same trap. He is asking this parliament to give him a blank cheque in order that he can fill in the figures a few days before the next election and then tear it up and throw it away the day after the election. That is exactly what he is asking for.

Thirdly, the so-called stabilization board which is provided for under the bill is given absolutely no power and therefore becomes meaningless. When one examines this bill one finds there are certain powers and duties provided for in the bill which the stabilization board "shall exercise" but another part of this bill states in plain language that the stabilization board shall do—and I am only paraphrasing it now—exactly what the Minister of Agriculture tells it to do. In other words, the members have no discretionary power of their own; they have no power whatsoever to administer the act without direction from the Minister of Agriculture. In other words he has decapitated the stabilization board even before he has established it. He has made it completely meaningless under the act.

Fourthly, and this is again one of the chief objections that the farmers had in relation to the Agricultural Prices Support Act, there is nothing in this bill whatsoever to guarantee that the producer shall receive the benefit of price supports that are put into this legislation. There are some pious expressions in the bill —most of them are put there as an afterthought either in the preamble or attached to some clause as a subsection—in which it is hoped that whoever gets the benefit of these price supports will pass them on to the producer, but there is nothing in the bill and there is nothing in the law which states that the producer is entitled to get a certain price support. There is nothing in the administration to say that the producer is entitled to a certain support on any commodity. There is nothing in this bill to indicate that the minister intends that the producer will get the benefit of even those support prices which may be found in the bill.

These are the chief weaknesses and this is the reason why we have received a storm of protests from organized agriculture since this bill came before the house. I can bring to the attention of the minister a whole sheaf of telegrams from various farm union locals, in addition to letters, which set out in no uncertain language what they think of this bill. As a matter of fact I want to give some advice to my colleagues, particularly from the province of Manitoba, who are of the Progressive Conservative party. It is somewhat along the lines of the advice I offered to my Liberal colleagues about a year ago when we were discussing the question of cash advances in this house. My colleagues from Manitoba who represented rural areas were not only not assisting us in trying to get cash advances, but were actually placing stumbling blocks before us. I gave them a friendly warning; I told them that if they did not change their tactics and if they did not get in on the side of the farmers there would not be one of them returned to this House of Commons after the election in 1957. Now they laughed at that; they thought it was a good joke and as a matter of fact they told me they would be here long after I was gone. Well, that is exactly what happened; not one Liberal member from Manitoba came back. The lonesome one who is here is a new member who could not be blamed for what took place before and he just squeezed in.

Now I am going to give that same advice to my Progressive Conservative friends. We have eight members from the province of Manitoba and most of them represent rural areas. Let me say to them that unless they get up on the floor of this house and put themselves solidly on the side of support prices based on parity they will be taking the grave risk of facing the wrath of the electors in those constituencies and they may meet the same fate as was met by their Liberal opponents.

I think the farmers have now reached the stage where they will not stand for any more broken promises. They have been kidded for so many years and they have been fooled so many times by the previous administration that they are going to give this government just one chance. They are going to give them an opportunity to fulfil the promises which the Prime Minister made. Oh, when he went across this country what rolling phrases he used when he talked about parity prices. I can almost see him today! They are not going to forget that. He made a very vivid impression, perhaps too vivid for his own good, because he is going to live long in the memory of those farmers. As a matter of fact they seem to be remembering it right now.

I can remember an episode about a year and a half ago when the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) who was trying to defend the agricultural policy of his government on television became involved in a shot that was heard all across Canada. I am sure the gentleman who loosed that shot decided to vote Conservative and, after having voted Conservative in the last election and after having seen this bill, he decided to write a little verse. So that there can be no question of a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I will take full responsibility for this verse. It is entitled "A Farmer's Lament" and it goes like this:

A fair share of the nation's wealth
For food to guard the nation's health
The Tories promised they would give
If I would vote Conservative!

With eloquence and clarity
John spoke to us of parity
His soft soap was superlative
Who would not vote Conservative?

I did—and got the Harkness Bill
And there it is: a nasty pill
As full of loopholes as a sieve
For this I turned Conservative?

Well, this is it: This is the end
They've really gone around the bend
A hundred years if I should live
I'll never vote Conservative?

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, no doubt the minister realizes by this time that his predecessor in office may have had some uncomfortable times in dealing with the complex problems of agriculture. I did not speak on the resolution. I was one of those who over the period of the past six or seven weeks have been looking to the early introduction of the bill which is now before us. It was my hope that if the bill was going to do all it was expected to do, and all it was intended to do, for agriculture, it would be debated as soon as possible. I was prepared to forego any comment at the resolution stage in the hope, as I say, that an early implementation of its proposals would assist in solving some of the difficulties facing the agricultural industry. I did prepare some notes in readiness to take part in the debate on the resolution stage. Those notes were discarded. Then, on the introduction of the bill some further notes were prepared, but with the amendments the minister announced at the beginning of this sitting I thought I had better hear all the speeches from all parts of the house and then speak currently in case there might be further amendments before I had a chance to do so.

Mr. Speaker, we seem to be moving from precedent to precedent. First, we had a budget that was not a budget; then we had a ruling in this house that made a precedent as well, and now we have a bill that is not a bill. Nonetheless, I should like to congratulate the members of the farm organizations who have very effectively presented their thinking to the government and to hon. members in all parts of the house. This has resulted in changes being made to the bill, and I think the minister will be able to detect that further representations and requests will be made before the bill is passed in whatever form it may finally appear for approval.

This afternoon we heard the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) say there was really no hurry about passing this bill because the government could do anything it might want to do under the bill now in effect, namely the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and that for this reason he thought his party would support the amendment which is before the house at this time.

I was always concerned about the provisions of the Agricultural Support Act, I think hon. members opposite will recall when I sat just further down on this side of the house—I have never sat on the other side of the house—I told the government of which I was a supporter that there were some problems with regard to agriculture, and I did make some recommendations to the previous government, so anything I say at this time will not be different from what I said on previous occasions.

We have heard a great deal said today about flexible prices, parity prices and so on. I should just like to refer to the remarks which were made by the Prime Minister

(Mr. Diefenbaker) on one occasion. I cannot find the exact quotation at the moment, but the Prime Minister's words were reported in the Ottawa Journal. He was speaking about what proposals the new administration would make for agriculture and his remarks contained reference to three proposals. One was that they would restore the markets for farm products, the second was that they would provide security, and the third that they would give assurance to the farmers, and all of this would be based on the relationship between the cost of the things the farmer had to buy and the price at which he had to sell.

Now, I should like to refer to three words in that reference, the word "restore", the word "guarantee" and the word "assure". It was very interesting to hear the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) speak, because always when he spoke in this house on previous occasions he spoke about our lost markets in the United Kingdom. Well, he did not go so far tonight, I am sure everyone will agree on that. I was able to get some figures as to the price at which beef is being provided to the United Kingdom at this time by Australia—hind quarters, grade A, $17.60. Everyone knows that live beef is selling in this country at that price and higher, so it would be impossible for Canadian producers, unless the government was prepared to subsidize the production of beef very substantially, to recapture this market which we have been accused of losing. Again, I notice that Denmark is supplying bacon to the United Kingdom at 33 cents a pound, and I think everyone knows that the price of bacon in this country is a great deal higher than that, so again it would have to be subsidization at a level which few people in this country would be prepared to accept. But this phrase about recapturing lost markets was a good phrase to go around the country with, and I think it was quite effective. Nonetheless it was not one which had a real practical application.

The other word I referred to was "security". I listened when the Minister of Agriculture was presenting the resolution preceding this bill and I recall a reference he made to butter which was put forward as a very simple example on the basis of which he hoped everyone would understand the intent, proposal and formula of this bill. With regard to butter, he said, we would take an easy figure of 60 cents, and he added: we will assure the Canadian people that the price will not fall below 80 per cent of that figure, namely 48 cents.

Mr. Harkness: I said that the guaranteed price would be better than 60 cents.

Mr. Gardiner: You said what he said too.

Mr. Huffman: I also recall that the minister said this as well: you take the base period and you can fix a price at 105 per cent of the base, or 120 per cent of the base but that the assured price would not be less.

Mr. Harkness: That is not assured price, that is the absolute mandatory floor which is always there under the legislation. It is not the price set for a year ahead.

Mr. Huffman: You said the guaranteed price would not be less than 80 per cent.

Mr. Harkness: No, that is not the guaranteed price. That is the mandatory floor price.

Mr. Huffman: The minister in his own words mentioned 120 per cent. That was the figure he used as a maximum.

Mr. Harkness: No, I did not. I said it could be anything.

Mr. Huffman: You said it could be 120 per cent or it could be this other figure.

Mr. Harkness: That was used as an illustration. I did not say it was the maximum.

Mr. Huffman: All right, we will take your illustration but there was a difference of 40 per cent between your illustration of 120 per cent on the one hand and 80 per cent on the other hand. I cannot see where the people of Canada could believe that there will be a great deal of security with a fluctuation of 40 per cent in the commodity that the minister used by way of example. I was only using the example the minister used so I thought I would be perfectly safe in so doing.

Mr. Harkness: On the contrary you are trying to misrepresent the figures. You are attempting to convey the impression that the 80 per cent mandatory floor price was all that there was.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. Since the beginning of this debate the minister has been interrupting and talking out of turn. I believe he should remain in his seat and wait until his turn comes again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is correct. The minister should not interrupt.

Mr. Harkness: I have been doing very little interrupting but I have often been strongly tempted.

Mr. Huffman: If the statement I have made concerning my understanding of the minister's statement can be so misunderstood in this house then I can only conclude that his statement will be misunderstood outside the house as well.

Mr. Pickersgill: And is.

Mr. Huffman: Another point to which I wish to refer might also cause some misunderstanding. This afternoon the former minister of agriculture indicated that there were candidates in the last election who went about advocating 100 per cent of parity and he referred to an advertisement that appeared in the Chatham Daily News on June 5. This was a rather difficult campaign in which to be engaged because this advertisement contains the following words:

Farmers Income:

Grains	Down 30 per cent
Beef Cattle	Down 40 per cent
Chickens	Down 33 per cent
Turkeys	Down 30 per cent
Eggs	Down 35 per cent

It then goes on to say:

Mr. Consumer says:
"Our cost of living continues to rise with lower farm prices."
What is the answer?
John Diefenbaker and Albert Jolley say 100 per cent parity support prices.

Anybody with $1,000 worth of any of the commodities listed in that advertisement would assume from this wording that instead of receiving $1,000 for their commodities they could expect to receive $1,400 under a Conservative administration and so on all down the list of the commodities as indicated. What has been the effect of this kind of advertisement? The Conservative government came to office and has proceeded to introduce certain measures but there has also been introduced a certain unfortunate attitude expressed in words such as those which can be found at page 2405 of Hansard of December 14 and on other occasions. On December 14 the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) was speaking and reminding the government of what had been said in the way of promises by Conservative candidates in the election campaign. An unidentified hon. member is reported on this occasion as saying:

It worked did it not?

On the occasion when the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) was speaking about the budget proposals brought in by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and concerning the Conservative charge to the effect that there had been overtaxation to the extent of $500 million an hon. member also said, "It worked". I feel that is an unfortunate attitude that has permeated this house. I found it was difficult to combat policies and promises in the election campaign such as those stated in print in the press of this country. The principle of 100 per cent of parity must have been the view of Conservative candidates and I presume as a result of advertisements of this kind many people felt that the policy of the present government would be for 100 per cent of parity.

Shortly after the present government took office information came to us that many people were coming to Ottawa to make representations to the government on behalf of the agricultural industry to the effect that something should be done immediately for this industry. It was reported in the press that the government did not plan to do anything at the present time because it would not do it by order in council. I know that some of the things that have been done since that time for the agricultural industry must have been done by order in council. If the orders in council are properly presented to the people of this country they will be able to assess whether or not it was in the best interests of this country to do what was done by order in council. I know every government must pass orders in council from time to time.

There is one other thing that disturbs me. If the government places a floor of 120 per cent of the base price and the floor is above the price in a country that has such commodities to export, what will the government do to prevent supporting a foreign commodity. If the government uses the export-import regulations indiscriminately many people will ask where this will lead us. An article published in the Family Herald of October 3, 1957 entitled "Canadian Farmers Must Still Export" contains some interesting figures. I note that in 1956 Canada exported $1,009 million of agricultural products but in the same period we imported $690 million of agricultural products. Of that $690 million of imports $335 million were commodities not obtainable in Canada. I think it is clear that we are bound to export many of the agricultural commodities that we produce. Our export of agricultural products amounts to approximately 25 per cent of our total exports. I hope that when the government is considering all the implications of this bill as it presently stands it will take into account all that is involved in the export and import of our agricultural commodities.

In this morning's Globe and Mail there appeared a headline reading, "Ontario Plans to Give Up Farm Marketing Controls". I know that that headline will certainly cause a great deal of concern among those who over the years have developed what has been a sound basis for selling commodities that are produced within a province and those products are sold in all the provinces of Canada or outside of Canada.

The article refers to too much pressure. I do not know whether it is right to assume that if too much pressure is exercised on a government, that government will abandon the legislation and turn all the problems over to the farm organizations. If that is so, then I am convinced that it would be a retrograde step for any government to take because so much goes into interprovincial and export trade. I think we should do everything we can to try to maintain the best relationships between governments and the agricultural industry. Since we export so much, I think there is every good reason why the government should be concerned with the problems of the industry.

The agricultural problem is not an insoluble one. It is necessary for every hon. member, no matter where he sits in this house, to work toward a solution that will bring stability to a worthy occupation, one that has contributed a great deal to Canada. The whole economic structure of Canada is moving toward a specific goal, namely that of security. We have social services: we have retirement pension plans and hospitalization proposals. The primary producers, whatever their line of production, are moving toward the same goal. The minister has asked for an early adoption of this bill. Since we have waited this long, let us examine the bill thoroughly so that there will be no misunderstanding before the bill passes or after it is passed.

Mr. J. W. Baskin (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the first time to address this house and to take part in this extremely important debate. May I first of all congratulate you, sir, upon your election to the high office of Speaker of this house. I would like to join with those who have extended congratulations to my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith), who so ably moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne and also to my seatmate, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), who so ably seconded the address.

The legislation before us, Mr. Speaker, is a matter of great interest to the rural people of Canada, the people who are the backbone of this country. The farm voters on June 10 went on record across our country as supporting this government and its election promise to establish a firm but flexible price support program for farm products. Failure of rigid or fixed price supports has already been experienced in the United States of America. Surely we can benefit from the mistakes of our United States neighbours and avoid the pitfalls of rigid price-fixing as advocated by some hon. members in the opposition party.

As recently as the 12th day of this month 2,000 American farm men and women gathered in Chicago and discussed their farm problems. Their chosen leader, President Charles B. Shuman, of the American farm bureau federation, representing a farm organization of 1,500,000 farm families, was reported by the Christian Science Monitor correspondent as follows:

> As talking the way most farmers like to hear a man talk, soundly, and without resorting to emotional appeal, relying on what they call common sense.

He urged a conservative approach to the problem of farm surpluses. President Shuman said in part:

> Change in agriculture is inevitable and continuous. Government policies should be such as to facilitate rather than retard the needed changes in production and marketing practices.
> Price fixing and acreage controls have encouraged farmers to find ways of expanding output of farm commodities beyond market needs instead of making adjustments in production.

Farther on in his address he offered a seven-point program designed to end government purchases of farm commodities and to take steps to liquidate present holdings. He advocated—and I emphasize this—the use of price supports only as a floor and not as a price fixing device. Here we have the advice of a top farm leader, Mr. Speaker, a genuine farmer and a highly qualified agronomist and economist, who states that a fixed price farm program is not the answer.

This bill now before the house provides a sound and flexible price support program. And, of course, Mr. Speaker, although agricultural production does not play as great a part in our national economy as it did a number of years ago, nevertheless it is still a fact that there is no sound prosperity in Canada when the rural areas are depressed.

The problem that I want to bring to the attention of the house is a general one to many farmers in my constituency of Renfrew South, and to farmers generally in eastern Canada. Therefore, my riding is no exception. However, Renfrew South, which I represent, is the riding I know best. In this great constituency are located many splendid and excellent dairy farms, also numerous and good mixed farming activities. I am strongly in support of the effort that is being made through this bill by our government and presented by our capable Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness). I am confident that the proposed measure will give much needed stability to the livestock and dairy production industry, as well as to fruits and vegetables and other products which are perhaps the basic features of a sound agricultural economy. However, Mr. Speaker, I think I am in order in drawing to the attention of this house, and more especially to the Minister of Agriculture, a somewhat forgotten branch of our great agricultural industry.

The older residents of my riding will recall with no small degree of pride the great native forest wealth of our picturesque Ottawa valley, the great white pines that meant so much in the early development of this country as they were shipped in great volume to Great Britain and to other countries beyond the seas. These facts are only a pleasant memory today. I might add, however, that we still have, even though more limited, high quality white pine and other species of timber. This, Mr. Speaker, does not exactly involve what I wanted to bring to the attention of the department, but many may have overlooked the fact that a rich forest area does not always necessarily mean that a rich agricultural area should follow. The nature of the soil, the rigours of the climate that affect successful forestry are not always conducive to equally successful agriculture. Nevertheless I know many enterprising farmers who amaze me with their unique genius for making marginal soils produce and who supplement their income by cutting pulpwood off the balance of their farm. They look upon their wood lot as just another field, and with long-range policy anticipate a reasonable income for generations yet to come.

Indeed, we are a very young country. However, we are at least old enough to learn that in countries such as Sweden and Norway, where by sound management, similar incomes from forestry production have been perpetuated for 500 years on farms that have been providing livestock and other food products for their people and still providing wood fibre from parts of their farms. In Sweden, for instance, one is almost ostracized from society if he harvests this great product of the soil in a manner that would jeopardize the chances of future generations benefiting from this great heritage.

The annual harvest of a pulpwood crop will not be of much interest to our many prairie friends. I suggest to my sincere wheat growers from western Canada, however, that while we in Renfrew South can grow some wheat and we are interested in the great problems of wheat sales, and while it may take a few months to grow a crop of wheat on your soil, it takes our people up to 60 years to grow a crop of trees suitable for pulpwood. We in Renfrew South love our trees; indeed, they are part of our national pride. May I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that while I am supporting this bill 100 per cent I should like to see consideration given in the future to the many farmers who annually depend on a reasonable sale price for this great agricultural crop of pulpwood.

Mr. Speaker, I and my family have been in the lumber business for many years. I feel I know the problems of the farmers who produce pulpwood. I can remember as a young boy accompanying my father and learning firsthand the problems of those for whom I speak. In many cases their farms are located on the back concessions of townships throughout the various constituencies in eastern Canada. They are the people who live in little houses away in off the roads. I learned at an early age that their problems are as real, and as important, as their neighbours' living in the rich farming belts. I realize also the importance of pulp companies securing their raw products at a reasonable price. However, I do not believe that when consideration is being given that is long overdue to the price structure of farm products, that a careful consideration and indeed a thorough investigation should be made at this time and initiated by the Department of Agriculture to ascertain why our farmers to whom I have referred should be forced to sell this valuable soil production so often at less than half what the companies pay for pulpwood cut from crown lands. The company's cost includes ground rent, fire tax and crown dues paid to our respective provincial governments. The government of Canada derives great revenues from the pulp and paper industry. Over 80 per cent of the pulpwood produced each year in Canada is produced in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes.

Farmers generally, on whose behalf I speak, have supplied to that industry during the year just past over two million cords of pulpwood at ridiculously low prices; indeed, at almost one-half the price paid by the companies for wood coming from their own limits. In spite of this, the cash income for forest products sold off farms in Canada in 1952 was over $87,464,000; in 1953, $83,637,000; in 1954, $83,336,000. Figures for 1955 and 1956 are not available. This has brought into our national economy about $130 million of United States capital.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member suggest that pulpwood comes under the bill? I have been looking at the bill, and while it might be called an agricultural product, I was wondering whether or not he did consider the bill related to pulpwood.

Mr. Baskin: Yes.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order, I would suggest that it is grown from the soil. In many districts in Canada it is part of the crop on marginal farms. Many farmers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec make more money out of pulpwood than they do from their dairy herds.

Mr. Speaker: I did not want to divert the hon. member because it is his maiden speech, but it is approximately ten o'clock, and I thought he might consider that point before he resumes.

Mr. Baskin: I can finish in about two more minutes. Much of this has gone to the national revenue of Canada, and 75 per cent of it has gone to workmen other than farmers.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Just hand it to the Hansard reporter and he will put it on the record.

Mr. Baskin: You will not be here next time to give anything to the Hansard reporter. Indirectly, this forgotten branch of Canadian farmland production has contributed much to the economy of this great country. Mr. Speaker, I shall not burden you longer but I must say that we have had a change in government. I know we have had a change of heart. Canada now has a government that is vitally concerned with the problems of the ordinary citizen, and has shown its determination to help him. I know that the minister, realizing these facts, will give some thought and consideration to this little publicized phase of agriculture which is so important and so vital, not only to my own constituency but to many others throughout this land. I know this is a government that is striving, and will continue to strive, to give a square deal to all.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the government leader what is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall commence with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare; then, take the estimates of the Department of Justice; then, national revenue and then trade and commerce.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if the leader would not give some indication this evening as to what the business of the house is likely to be when we reconvene.

Mr. Green: When we meet again on January 3 we shall start with interim supply and then go into the estimates of the departments of national defence and finance.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TAXICAB CONCESSIONS, EDMONTON

Question No. 173—Mr. Holowach:

1. Have contracts been signed with regard to taxicab concessions at the Canadian National Railways depot and Macdonald hotel, in Edmonton, Alberta?
2. If so, with whom and for what duration of time?
3. Were these awarded by way of public tender?
4. If not, on what basis are such contracts or concessions established?
5. Are there any restrictions regarding the pick-up and unloading of passengers by other taxicab companies?
6. If so, what restrictions prevail?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

The management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows:—

1. Yes.

2. Yellow Cab Limited and Checker Taxicab Limited. Duration at pleasure.

3. See answer to No. 4.

4. With respect to the hotel, an agreement was originally entered into with the Twin City Transfer Company in 1915, and so far as the station is concerned, an agreement with the same party was entered into in 1922. It is not known whether public tenders were called at that time. In each case agreement has been carried on by the successor company.

5. Any taxicab which has been hired by a passenger or prospective passenger is permitted to load or discharge its passengers at the station or hotel.

6. See answer to No. 5.

C.N.R. PROPERTY, INNER HARBOUR, VICTORIA, B.C.

Question No. 223—Mr. McPhillips:

1. Did Canadian National Railways sell or otherwise dispose of its wharves and adjacent property (originally property of the Grand Trunk Pacific) in the inner harbour of Victoria, British Columbia?
2. If so, at what date was the disposition made, to whom and at what consideration?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The property was sold to Evans, Coleman and Johnson Bros. Ltd., in 1947. It is not the policy of the company to divulge details of such sales.

STOBIE RAILWAY SPUR LINE, SUDBURY

Question No. 246—Mr. Mitchell:

1. Have any representations been received by the Minister of Transport with regard to the removal of the Stobie railway spur line running through the centre of the city of Sudbury?
2. If so, from whom?
3. What has been done to carry out such representations?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1, 2 and 3. No, but a letter dated February 26, 1957, was received by the former minister of transport from the deputy clerk of the city of Sudbury quoting a resolution passed by the city council regarding the Stobie spur line. This letter was referred to the board of transport commissioners. The board forwarded a copy of the resolution to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and in transmitting to the city under date of April 8 the observations of the company, the board indicated that no further action would be taken until further submissions were received from the city. On July 23 the city requested that a representative of the board visit Sudbury. The board's reply of July 30 outlined the history of the case, which goes back to 1950, and concluded as follows:

"There would seem to be no point in having an engineer of the board go to Sudbury on this matter if the city is not willing to put in writing their comments with respect to the reasons given by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for keeping the spur line where it is. After the city has presented its case fully and if it is then found that there are engineering questions needing clarification, arrangements will be made for an inspection by the board's engineer."

RAILWAY BRANCH LINE, MINTON-BIG BEAVER, SASK.

Question No. 260—Mr. McCullough:

1. What consideration has been given by the government to the completion of the Minton-Big Beaver rail line in southern Saskatchewan?
2. Will the government give consideration to a subsidy on this branch line?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1. This matter has not been considered by the government because Minton and Big Beaver are served by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and consequently the completion of a line between these two points would be a question for consideration by that company.

2. In the circumstances as set out in the answer to part 1, the government is not considering the question of a subsidy.

MIRAMICHI RIVER BRIDGE

Question No. 286—Mr. McWilliam:

1. During the past two months did the Minister of Transport receive representations from the

Questions

Chatham, New Brunswick, board of trade, in connection with the highway traffic problem and proposed construction of a highway bridge across the Miramichi river at Chatham?

2. If so, did the minister reply to such representations, and what was the nature of the reply?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1. Yes, a telegram was received from the board of trade.

2. The following reply was sent:

"Your telegram November 29 requesting survey traffic conditions relative to need for a bridge at Chatham have spoken to several of my officials and must advise cannot find any indication the proposed bridge would be a federal government responsibility. The bridge would be within province of New Brunswick and consequently I would suggest your representations be addressed to the province."

UNEMPLOYMENT, QUEBEC, NOVEMBER 1956 AND 1957

Question No. 291—Mr. LaCroix:

1. How many persons were unemployed at the end of November, 1956, and at the end of November, 1957, in the Quebec district?

2. How many persons, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, were unemployed at the end of November, 1956, and at the end of November, 1957, for the Quebec district?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. The number of persons registered for employment at the Quebec city office of the unemployment insurance commission on the specified dates were as follows:

November 29, 1956	7,650
November 28, 1957	9,997

2. Unemployment data for the Quebec city district are not available from the monthly labour force survey conducted by the dominion bureau of statistics.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, December 21, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

LIVESTOCK

ANNOUNCEMENT OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING HUMANE METHODS OF SLAUGHTER

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, later this morning I shall be introducing a bill to amend the Criminal Code with regard to the humane slaughtering of food animals. It is the intention to give this bill first reading only and I should like to make a statement now to advise the house of our plans.

For some time there has been a growing demand for action that would compel the slaughterers of food animals to adopt a humane method of killing. The concern has been mainly that these animals are subjected to shackling, hoisting, bleeding, or other processes connected with slaughtering while they are still fully conscious. Special humane slaughter associations have been formed and these, together with the various branches of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, have spearheaded the drive for legislation to make humane methods of slaughter mandatory.

The previous government took the position that no further legislation was necessary; that the present section 387 of the Criminal Code makes it an offence to cause unnecessary pain and suffering to an animal, and that all that was required was enforcement of this legislation. However, a test case involving the usual slaughter methods in an abattoir came before a magistrate in Vancouver this fall and was dismissed. The decision was appealed, but the appeal was also dismissed. This demonstrated pretty conclusively that something more is required, and we are prepared to act accordingly.

There are difficulties in this field which all have recognized. There are questions as to what type of action or legislation is called for by the government, and at what level of government, and whether a method or methods of humane slaughter exist which it would be sound, from a practical and economic point of view, to require the slaughterers to follow.

A special committee was formed in the province of Ontario to study these problems, including representatives from the meat packers' council of Canada and the Ontario S.P.C.A. The government made available two of its experts in the field, and more recently the national research council has joined in a full-scale investigation program.

The government welcomed the formation of this committee and looked forward to its advice. We were concerned to avoid action which would produce legislation which would either be simply unenforced and unenforceable or, alternatively, if enforced would simply result in driving a number of packers out of business. At the suggestion of the committee action was accordingly deferred until they might have an opportunity to report.

An interim report was received from the committee on October 31, and on November 13 my colleague the Minister of Agriculture and I, together with our parliamentary assistants and departmental officers, met with the joint chairmen and other representatives of the committee.

At that meeting we were advised that while no complete solution to the problem of method so far as hogs and sheep are concerned had been agreed upon as being immediately practicable for universal action in Canada, nevertheless such methods do exist. We were also advised that there was agreement that humane methods of slaughter of cattle could immediately be enforced. It was also clear that the committee felt that action by government is essential.

The committee is to continue its study on the same basis as before, with the full assistance of the government experts and the national research council. In this connection I find that I must make a correction in a statement I made on December 10. It was my understanding as a result of that meeting, that the S.P.C.A. representatives felt there was nothing further they could usefully do, having made clear their views as to the necessity for legislation. I am glad to find that they are continuing as members of the committee, and that the committee is functioning fully.

There is, then, general agreement that humane methods of slaughter exist and can be made applicable in Canada although there are still some problems to be solved. In considering our course of action we have had to bear the following factors in mind. First, that there is a measure of divided responsibility, and that in any criminal legislation to be introduced we must bear in mind that the responsibility for enforcement rests with the provinces. Second, that hasty action on the part of the government might force out of business abattoirs and packing plants and could result in a shortage of such commodities as bacon, etc. Third, that impracticable or unenforceable legislation does more harm than good. Fourth, that the provinces have an interest in the matter especially from the point of view of enforcement, and therefore should be consulted.

We have accordingly drafted a bill which we believe to be practical and enforceable, first reading of which I shall be moving in a few moments. It is not the intention to proceed further with the bill at this session, but to make it available to all interested persons, including especially the attorneys general of the provinces. We shall welcome their views and suggestions as to the legislation, and also the views and suggestions of the packers and all those interested or involved in this problem.

All representations received will then be studied, and we shall be prepared to make such changes in the legislation as appear desirable in the light of those studies. After making such changes as are necessary we would propose to reintroduce and enact the legislation at the next session of parliament.

In this way we will hope to have sound legislation which will produce the desired result with a minimum of hardship and a maximum of co-operation.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HUMANE SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 241, to amend the Criminal Code (slaughtering of animals).

Mr. Herridge: I congratulate the government on accepting the C.C.F. approach.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POWER

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—LEGISLATION RESPECTING THERMAL PROJECTS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the government of Canada to enter into agreements with any of the Atlantic provinces to provide assistance in the generation of electric energy by thermal electric power projects and in the control and transmission of electric energy, and including provisions for the payment of a subvention on coal used in the production of electric energy.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FURTHER STATEMENT ON WINTER EMPLOYMENT PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked why the work program announced by the Canadian National Railways did not include some special projects for Fort Rouge and Transcona.

The car equipment program that is being undertaken by the Canadian National Railways is the conversion of damaged or obsolete cars into extra gang feeding cars, bunk cars, and so forth. This work can only be done in regularly equipped car shops. In the case of Fort Rouge, as the hon. member knows, the car shops at that point were destroyed by fire two years ago. With regard to Transcona, a special work program on hopper and general service cars is already under way there.

I might advise the house that I have asked the management of the Canadian National Railways to make a careful review of possible work projects that might be put into effect at other points on the system, and they have assured me they will do so.

Also, yesterday the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount inquired if it is the intention of the railway to proceed more rapidly with the work at Cote de Liesse and other points in the Montreal area.

As he knows, a contract has been let for grading at Cote de Liesse, and the management advise me that this work is well in hand and they do not think it could be further expedited. With regard to other points in the Montreal area, as I have just mentioned in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the management have indicated they will give earnest consideration to expanding the work program wherever that is possible.

The hon. member for Essex East asked yesterday if the work program planned for Windsor airport could be expedited. Certain additional runway work is contemplated for the airport next year, and my officials are presently reviewing the project to see whether a start could be made this winter. The problem is one of getting the engineering plans ready, and every effort will be made to expedite the project, although it is not yet possible to say exactly how soon tenders may be called.

AIRPORTS

GANDER—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might address a question to the Minister of Transport. I wonder if in view of the unique national importance of Gander airport his department is still giving consideration to the possibility of federal assistance to the hospital at Gander, which consideration was begun by the previous administration.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question some time earlier this year—

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it was that question.

Mr. Hees: —and the hospital at Gander is, I am told, the responsibility of the provincial government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could remind the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, perhaps I should ask the hon. gentleman if he has not found on consulting the files that the previous administration did consider the possibility of federal assistance, and that no final decision was made about it.

Mr. Hees: It is my information that no decision was taken by the previous administration to give the assistance for which the hon. member is asking.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely what I said; it was still under consideration.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am told by my department that the previous administration did not agree to give the assistance. The hon. member is now asking the present government to do something which the previous government did not do.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could clarify that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not in order to make clarifying statements at this stage of the day.

DEER LAKE, NFLD.—FURTHER CONSTRUCTION ON AIR STRIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to give any information regarding what provision has been made for further construction on the air strip at Deer Lake in the province of Newfoundland?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me some time ago of his intention to ask this question.

There was an agreement in principle, I believe, with the provincial government of Newfoundland about a sharing of costs in certain further development at the Deer Lake air strip, but the provincial government was not able to provide funds for this purpose in 1957. We remain ready to discuss further development with them at any time.

TRADE

GATT—PROPOSED INCREASE IN DUTY ON FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, and in his absence to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the house as to what action was taken or what conclusions were reached at GATT in respect to the proposed increase in duties on fruits and vegetables?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marler: Very informative.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he inform the house whether the meetings of GATT have been concluded for this year, and whether the duties on fruits and vegetables coming into Canada were discussed at those meetings?

Mr. Speaker: I think that question might properly be put on the order paper. It does not seem to me to be one of urgency.

MISSION TO UNITED KINGDOM—PURCHASE OF HYDRO EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He may take it as notice if he wishes, because I realize he has not been back in his office long enough to have answered all his fan mail. I wonder if the minister has received any letters of protest from Welland, St. Catharines, Hamilton or Peterborough pursuant to the $10 million purchase of hydro equipment in the United Kingdom and, if so, would he table those letters?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Concerning the $10 million purchase of what?

Mr. Houck: Hydro equipment.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have not received any letters of protest with regard to that matter, but again I have not checked all my mail.

GRAIN

CASH ADVANCES ON FARM-STORED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could he tell the house the amount that has been advanced to farmers under the cash advance plan?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As of December 18, 1957, the total of the advances was $22,281,361. The total amount refunded to date is $408,836. This leaves a total advance outstanding of $21,872,525.

Mr. Tucker: Could I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister have that broken down by provinces?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have. The figures by provinces are as follows:

Province	Number of applications	Total amount advanced	Total amount refunded
Manitoba	7,597	$ 4,942,911	$127,042
Saskatchewan ..	17,758	13,866,410	246,838
Alberta	5,187	3,472,040	34,956

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

CIGARETTES—INQUIRY AS TO LOSS LEADER SELLING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. M. T. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister say whether the combines branch has recently received complaints about the loss leader selling of cigarettes and, if so, what is being done about it?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, although it is ordinarily not the practice to disclose whether inquiries are going on in any particular trade or industry unless and until a report is made and published, nevertheless since no particular part of the business community is identified in the question just asked I can say that the combines branch has lately received a considerable number of complaints about the loss leader selling of cigarettes with injurious effects on small businesses. Inquiries are accordingly being pursued under section 412 of the Criminal Code. This section provides in part that it is an offence to engage in a policy of selling goods at prices unreasonably low, having or designed to have the effect of substantially lessening competition or eliminating a competitor. The inquiry will be pursued vigorously.

DISABLED PERSONS

STATEMENT ON AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS UNDER ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me whether or not the regulations pertaining to the Disabled Persons Act had been amended since the revision of this measure at the current session of parliament.

In answer, I would inform the hon. member that a number of changes had to be made in the disability allowance regulations consequent upon the amendments to the act approved by parliament last month. For example, changes in the legislation with respect to the eligibility of certain patients in certain types of institutions require some follow-up by way of alterations in the regulations covering this same matter. These changes are under consideration at the present time, and when drafts are ready the provincial authorities will be consulted with regard to them. As soon as there is general agreement on the text of proposed changes in the regulations these will be put forward for approval by the governor in council. I expect that this will be done early in the new year.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that I have not forgotten the undertaking I gave at the time of the debate on the Disabled Persons Act to carry out a comprehensive review of the regulations as soon as possible. For reasons which the hon. member will, I am sure, appreciate, I have not yet been able to complete this task, but I shall follow up what I said during the debate at the earliest possible opportunity.

CALLING OF WITNESSES BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. As I look at the list of the cabinet ministers, according to precedence I gather that my good friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs is at the moment the Acting Prime Minister in this house. My question is based on press reports that senior members of the government regard it as a matter of non-confidence that the committee on external affairs decided to call Mr. Lawson and Mr. Zeckendorf to appear before that committee. Can the Acting Prime Minister give us the assurance that the government will not interfere in any way with the unanimous decision of that committee?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my term of office as Acting Prime Minister is going to be short. Perhaps I should explain to the house that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) would have been here himself at eleven o'clock this morning except that his plane is late. We are expecting him here very shortly, and I shall call his attention to the question asked by the hon. member and see whether we can get him an answer. Frankly, I know nothing about it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED ALL-PARTY MEETING RESPECTING PERMANENT SPEAKER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister another question which perhaps can be taken as notice. In view of the fortunate and indeed pleasant situation which exists in this house, is the government prepared to give consideration to having an all-party meeting with a view to the election of a permanent Speaker?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Acting Prime Minister): I shall certainly take that as notice, sir.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

249. Departmental administration, $1,303,859.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister going to make a statement? I think he will find it is the custom, particularly when a minister is introducing estimates for the first time, for him to take advantage of the opportunity to make a statement. I am wondering whether the hon. gentleman intends to follow that course.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, it may be the traditional course for a minister being in such a position for the first time to make a statement, but I do not propose to do so. I propose to follow the example set by the previous minister of the department for many years past of not making an opening statement but replying to questions as the estimates are proceeded with.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words at this time. First of all I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to say what I am sure the minister has learned by this time, that the Department of National Health and Welfare is indeed manned by a distinguished group of public servants from the deputy minister level down to the lower grade workers. As one who was minister of the department for almost 11 years I thought I should like to take this opportunity to pay a tribute to the personnel of the Department of Health and Welfare who made my task an agreeable one; a task, I think, that produced some very constructive results.

The Acting Prime Minister said the other day that Canada had reason to be proud of its public servants. I am sure all of us in every quarter of the house will agree with that observation, and I want to say in particular that the public servants of the Department of National Health and Welfare are ladies and gentlemen who have served and are serving the country with distinction and the people of the Canada have every reason to be proud of them. As the former minister I want to say in the house that I have special reason to be grateful for the loyalty and service which they gave to Canada and to the department during my tenure of office.

I am wondering whether or not it is the minister's intention to indicate at some stage the extent to which it has been possible for him to cut down the expenditures of the department, in accordance with the statements made during the course of the election campaign by hon. gentlemen opposite. I recognize, of course, that the expenditures of the Department of National Health and Welfare are by no means all controllable, but there are areas where, if an administration wanted to, that could be done. I do not know whether or not the minister will indicate whether he has been able to effect the kind of savings which it was suggested, not with regard to any particular department but with regard to the government generally, would be effected by the administration of which he is now a member. We shall look forward to hearing from him in that particular later on.

I want to take advantage on the first item to again express what I believe is a wide measure of regret in this country at the failure of the government to give evidence of any progress in the implementation of the federal government's share of responsibility under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. This matter has been referred to by interrogation in the house and by statements made by some hon. members from time to time, but I think the minister will agree that anything I have said, certainly anything involving him personally, cannot be characterized as having been anything but responsible and fair. However, I find it necessary now to say that as we come to the period of adjournment, after many days of discussion in parliament since October 14, there is a wide measure of regret at the lack of evidence of progress being made by this government in respect of this particular matter.

In reply the hon. gentleman may say that as a result of the discussions at the dominion-provincial conference my statement cannot be fully substantiated. In that context I think it must be realized what took place at the dominion-provincial conference. The Prime Minister at that conference said—although he had refused to say so on the Friday before the conference in this house—that the federal government was prepared to include tuberculosis and mental illness under the terms of the hospital insurance act. He noted that this was in conformity with assurances he himself had given during the course of the election campaign and assurances that had been given by implication as a result of the stand taken by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition.

The fact is that these promises are not being kept by the government in its stated policy. The Prime Minister said the federal government was prepared to include tuberculosis and mental illness but that the costs involved would be deducted from any increase made in further fiscal grants to the provinces. That statement is not in conformity with the promises made during the election campaign. That is not the kind of urging that was made of the previous government by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in the opposition. The result will be —and I am now giving my warning to the minister—that certainly two provinces, namely the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec, will want to get their full fiscal grants under the new arrangement. Then in subsequent years, having received those moneys, they will come to the administration and seek to get compensation with regard to tuberculosis and mental illness. I am sure the minister will be aware of that danger. I am sure it is a likely development as a result of the changed position which the government has taken in this matter.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

My reason for expressing regret again is that the minister, in answer to questions, has not revealed that any negotiations whatsoever have taken place between the government and the provincial governments in the matter of the implementation of the hospital insurance act. The minister has said on occasion that his officials are available, and we know that recently there was a technical conference on the public services level. However, I am sure the only way in which to make progress in a matter of this sort is for these negotiations to be initiated and carried on by the minister himself. Officials in government departments can go only so far. They must always have their conduct tempered by considerations of government policy. The only way in which you can have any advance made in a matter of this sort is by a vigorous interest on the part of the minister concerned and on the part of the government as a whole.

In this context I ask the minister this question. Apart from his meetings at the dominion-provincial conference, can he tell the house what negotiations he has carried on with any provincial government in trying to encourage the latter to take steps by which this measure can be implemented at the earliest possible date? I find it difficult to understand why, at this late date, there are no agreements whatsoever with any of the provinces. I cannot understand why there are no agreements signed now with the provinces of Saskatchewan and British Columbia, provinces that now have schemes in being. If the minister wants to give the country the impression that there has been no dilatoriness on his part or on the part of the administration, I think he will have to explain why no agreements have yet been concluded with at least these two provinces in which hospital insurance is in existence.

Prior to the election on June 10 the situation was that all the provinces that had expressed their willingness to come within the four corners of the federal scheme had been sent a draft master agreement. My recollection is that not only had that agreement been sent to the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Ontario but that as well, in order to facilitate matters, we had sent the agreement to the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, two provinces that had given evidence of rather intensive interest in the possibility of an agreement with the federal government.

What has happened? What reaction have we had from the provinces with regard to these agreements? Why has no agreement been signed yet, for instance, with the province of Ontario? In the month of April we met with the government of the province of Ontario and I indicated, on behalf of the government of the day, that if by the end of September we had not concluded agreements with any of the provinces we would have to give consideration to arrangements which would place the province of Ontario in a position where it could begin its scheme without any concern over the failure of other provinces to participate. This is a serious situation. Ontario has indicated that it is going to begin its scheme on January 1 next. In the meantime, in a large province like Ontario—

Mr. Monteith: May I interrupt the hon. member at this point? Did the hon. member really mean January 1 next?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; January 1, 1959.

Mr. Monteith: That is better.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank my hon. friend for that correction. The situation is that in the province of Ontario arrangements are now being made—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the applause which greeted the entrance into this chamber of the Prime Minister will be shared by everyone, and that as the one who has the floor I would be expected to say on our behalf how pleased we are to see the Prime Minister back. We are looking forward at the earliest opportunity to a report from him on important matters; we trust his health is good; we believe that his humour is satisfactory, and we hope his outlook for the future will be tempered by events over which he will not have the fullest control.

My colleague the former minister of agriculture tells me the Minister of Finance has also come in, and I welcome back that hon. gentleman. I am glad to see him in a happy mood, which I hope will also temper his conduct in the future. The Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are also home. I hope they have had a very useful assignment at a very important meeting, and we will be looking forward to having a report from them.

On this particular matter which I am discussing, however—

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I believe the Prime Minister is prepared to make a statement at once, not having taken advantage of an opportunity to do so either to the C.B.C. or the press at the airport. I wonder if the house would give unanimous consent to revert to motions so that he may make his statement now.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, I think it would be the desire of the committee that we rise, report progress and be given leave to sit again later this day, because I am sure we are all anxious to assure the Prime Minister and his colleagues of our pleasure at seeing them back, of welcoming them most warmly and congratulating them on their safe return from a very important meeting of the north Atlantic treaty organization about which we all are most anxious to hear the impressions of the Prime Minister and, if possible, have confirmed to us the optimistic expressions of those impressions which we have read in the newspapers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, we also are happy to join in the unanimous consent that we rise and report progress and that the house then revert to motions. We would like to join in the welcome to the Prime Minister and his colleagues on their return to this house which has already been extended by a spokesman for and the leader of the official opposition.

Mr. Chairman, since we are doing a number of things these days by unanimous consent, and since there are a few members who are not in the chamber but who would, I am sure, like to hear the report of the Prime Minister, I wonder if we could either delay a moment or two or if we could do a most unusual thing and ring the bell to bring those members back.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, we would like to make the motion unanimous, and also wish to join the other members in welcoming back the Prime Minister and his colleagues from their trip. We are glad to see they are here safely and looking well. I do not quite understand the patch on the cheek of the Secretary of State for External Affairs; perhaps he could explain that to us later on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He forgot to turn the other cheek.

Progress reported.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON RETURN FROM CONFERENCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank the house for granting me the right at this time, by their indulgence, to say a few words in regard to the conference which concluded the night before last. May I also express my thanks and appreciation and those of my colleagues to my hon. friend the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent), to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) for their warm words of welcome.

It is very difficult at such short notice to have what I would like to prepare, namely a reasonably full summary of the negotiations which took place and the decisions which were made on that occasion. I cannot fail once again to feel wonder at the fact that due to modern means of transportation it was possible for me to have been in the gallery of the House of Commons in the United Kingdom last evening and to have heard there the conclusion of the debate on the report of the Prime Minister and foreign secretary of that country on the deliberations which had taken place but the day before at Paris.

This morning I endeavoured to put together some ideas which came to me as a result of the meeting and the opportunity to meet with the 14 leaders of the respective countries and feel something of the atmosphere which was apparent; not one of fear nor of bravado, but certainly one which indicated a new spirit of unity among the nations composing the north Atlantic treaty organization. There have recently been times when that unity has not been as complete as it is at this moment, and I think that fact to a large extent, coupled with the meeting in Washington of the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, added emphasis to the general demand that a meeting at top level should take place.

I make my first report to parliament before communicating with anyone else so the house will have a general picture of the atmosphere which prevailed, the decisions which were made and the prospects for the future. This conference brought together not only the heads of state but it also assembled for discussion most of the basic problems and issues which currently divide the free world and indeed the world in general. To deal with these problems, after consultation with all the partners, the conference charted a course for the future. We decided on the principles by which we would be guided in the months to come, and we have taken decisions which I believe are far-reaching in the course they will determine for the reinforcement of the alliance, to ensure its basic and continuing unity and to reinvigorate its basic objectives.

That was a declaration of our principles and objectives which was accepted. This was a Canadian initiative which received the support of all other delegations. In the declaration we stated clearly and for the whole world to understand our determination for peace, and also our determination to protect and guarantee the rights of our peoples to live in peace and freedom under governments of their own choice.

To those who say—I know this has been said over and over again, and I remember the right hon. gentleman the Leader of the Opposition saying so on one occasion—that it is not all perfect—it is well to remember this; that when NATO was formed nine years ago its purpose was to protect the right of nations to live in face of the expansionist and subversive policies of the Soviet union, and so far has it succeeded that since it was formed no nation in Europe has fallen under Kremlin control, either directly or indirectly.

Regardless of the particular area from which the representatives came there was a general feeling, unalloyed in any way, that at this time our unity and combined strength are indispensable not only to the security of our alliance but to the peace of the world, and that until such time as the Soviet union is prepared, under a comprehensive and controlled disarmament agreement, to come to reasonable terms, for so long would it be necessary for us to maintain the integrity of our defences.

The meetings took three and a half days and throughout the entire period, Mr. Speaker, the question of disarmament was of paramount importance. We of the Canadian delegation stressed the need to take whatever steps might be required, not in the spirit of appeasement, however, to reopen negotiations with the U.S.S.R. on this vital issue respecting which Canada has played such a large and important part.

The house will be fully aware that our previous attempts to reach agreement have been blocked and rejected by the Soviet union. Reasonable and equitable proposals which were put forward last summer were rejected without discussion on the part of the U.S.S.R., and only recently the decision of 56 members of the United Nations voting in this regard was rejected in anticipation, though the commission of 25 members is not to commence its deliberations until January 1.

In connection with the Bulganin note, the general attitude was that if the U.S.S.R. means business then it should give some direct evidence, some tangible evidence, of its desire in this regard. The attitude taken in that connection was that while the U.S.S.R. pretends it wants disarmament it is indeed strange that it constantly refuses to permit those guarantees which would assure that the pledged word under agreements in this regard would be carried out, namely guarantees for inspection and control. The heads of government attached the greatest importance, however, to the reopening of negotiations, and agreed to examine any proposal from whatever source for general or partial disarmament and any proposal enabling agreement to be reached on the controlled reduction of armaments of all types.

In order to give effect to this it was agreed that should the Soviets refuse to participate in the committee set up by the United Nations, the alliance—and again, I say, not in a spirit of fear or appeasement, either—would welcome a meeting at the level of foreign ministers for full diplomatic negotiations in order to resolve the present deadlock, which, unless it is resolved, will lay upon this and future generations a weight far too great to be borne at the present rates of defence expenditure. Those rates are increasing year by year, and even looking forward only two, three or four years, having regard to the increase which is taking place, they will have attained colossal and gigantic proportions even compared with the expenditures of today.

What I am trying to say is this. The basic thought that underlay all the discussion was the desire to reach a stage which would permit of disarmament and, subsequently, reductions in the production of ordinary weapons, ordinary armaments, and a very strong measure of control over the production of nuclear energy to the end that as far as possible the developments in this regard would be for peaceful purposes. Unfortunately this desire—and it is a desire felt on the part of all these nations—is dependent on the attitude of the Russian government.

We devoted our full attention to ensuring that appropriate steps are taken to strengthen the military, economic and political aspects of the alliance so as to ensure that until negotiation permits disarmament, our defences will constitute a bulwark and deterrent against aggression. Only yesterday afternoon in the British House of Commons Mr. Macmillan, with Sir Winston Churchill present, quoted the words of Sir Winston that what was required was continued preparation for defence to the end that we may ultimately be able, through strength, to bring about the achievement of negotiations.

In connection with Soviet advances in the field of military technology, there was strong urgency added to the reconsideration of our collective security arrangements. We had to ensure that the NATO defence structure, first erected to meet the needs of 1949, was adjusted to meet the needs of 1957, to render impregnable, as I said a moment ago, the defensive capacity of the Atlantic community in the nuclear era.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to refer to one or two particular matters; first, the matter of disarmament with which I have been dealing in general terms up to now. It was made clear on the part of the U.S.S.R. within the last three or four weeks, and earlier than that at the Washington meetings, that the most modern and destructive weapons, including missiles of all kinds, are now being incorporated into the Soviet armed forces. Therefore, as I said a moment ago, the alliance has no choice but to build up its forces with similar weapons.

It was therefore decided on a bilateral basis—I want to underline that and emphasize it—to make available ballistic missiles in case of need, these missiles to be placed at the disposal of the supreme allied commander in Europe, and it was also decided to establish stocks of nuclear warheads which, again, will be readily available in case of need in defence of the alliance. Final decisions, bilateral decisions in the main, in this regard will await the further meeting in March at the ministerial level.

These decisions on principle were taken only after a searching review of the necessity for strengthening NATO's capacity to deter aggression. Specific plans for implementing these proposals will, of course, await the ministerial meetings. It was also decided that our forces and production for defence should be more completely integrated so that each member of the alliance could make the most effective contribution to defence.

The United States particularly impressed upon the representatives there the necessity of co-ordination in defence production, the co-ordination of research and development. I pointed out in that connection something to which I now refer again in this house as a striking example of how the principle of co-ordination and interdependence within the alliance can be employed. I refer to the arrangements we made with the United States government for the integrated air defence of North America under what is called NORAD. I want to re-emphasize that I pointed out there, and it was accepted as a fact, that these integrated forces are an integral part of the NATO military structure in the Canada-United States region; that there is a committee of NATO dealing with Canada-United States relations in this regard, and that anything we have done has been reported to the standing group and that course will be followed in the future. The NATO council will have full reports on everything we do, similar to the practice followed in all other NATO military commands.

Now I come to the question that was raised in the house in connection with economic developments. To a surprising degree, I thought, having regard to the experience of the last few years, it was reiterated over and over again that NATO is more than a military alliance; that it is a community whose members are guided by similar fundamental ideas, and that under article II of the treaty we have agreed to give effect to the community by co-operation and collaboration in the important aspects of international relations.

At the meeting this week the flowering of this concept of the Atlantic community was much in evidence. There was not a great deal of divergence of view as to the necessity of greater and more expanding developments in connection with the article in question. Indeed, the wording of the communique itself indicates the degree to which, almost for the first time, the nations comprising the alliance were in agreement when they pledged themselves to this effect; that "they will co-operate among themselves and with other free governments to further the achievement of economic stability, a steady rate of economic growth, and the expansion of international trade through the further reduction of exchange and trade barriers."

Then there was a reference that I think I should mention at this moment. They reaffirmed the desirability of a closer economic association with the countries of western Europe, which they deemed to be in the interest of all countries and which will lend encouragement to the successful development of the European economic community and the European free trade area. In connection with the latter, when this matter came before the council I used the following words in order to clarify and make certain Canada's stand in this regard:

> When the proposal for the European free trade area was placed before the Canadian government for consideration it qualified its approval by specifically excluding from its scope food, drink and tobacco. By this exclusion the trading interests of Canada were protected, and on this qualified basis the Canadian government has been able to give its approval to the proposal.
> I would have preferred to have had this omitted from the communique, or alternatively to spell out the nature of our reservation. However, recognizing the strong desire of a number of governments represented here to include a brief endorsement along the lines of the draft before us, I am not going to press our objection.

We did repeat for the record that Canada's approval of the European free trade area depends on the exclusion of the three groups of products to which I have already referred, the exclusion from the ambit of the proposals of the commodities in question.

I come now to one other matter that has been foremost in recent weeks, particularly in connection with the shipment of small amounts of arms to Tunis and the strong objection taken by the government of France to the course of action followed in that regard, which underlined the necessity of there being the closest consultation among all the members before action is taken. That was one of the most striking general matters at this conference, the determination of all the partners to develop still further the habit of consultation, which is an essential element in maintaining the cohesion and unity of the alliance. The Canadian delegation stressed the importance of the habit of consultation, the neighbourly frame of mind, and the desirability of member nations refraining from adopting firm policy stands or making major political announcements on questions that affect the interests of their NATO partners until they have consulted with them.

I am convinced that this habit, this frame of mind, will still further develop interdependence. Certainly there was unanimous support in this regard among all the members present. It was recognized, too, that since the aim of the Soviet bloc was to weaken and disrupt the western world by all the means at its disposal, the alliance could not be concerned only with the north Atlantic area and the military defence of that area. It was agreed that our political and economic strength must be organized on the principle of interdependence.

However, this does not imply, and the Canadian delegation made that very clear during the discussions, an extension of the commitment of the alliance to defend other areas, nor does it imply in any way a desire on the part of NATO to interfere in the affairs of other countries. Our interest was to affirm the support of our governments for the independence and sovereignty of states in areas such as the Middle East, and our continuing interest in the economic well-being of their peoples. To the many nations which have gained their independence since the end of the second world war and to all other peoples who are dedicated to peace and freedom, the NATO countries offered their co-operation on a basis of complete equality and in a spirit of fraternity.

I stated in the house before the Canadian delegation left for Paris that the government felt that particular attention should be given at the NATO meeting to the implementation of the objectives set forth in article 2. I stressed this view in Paris, with particular reference for the need of members of the alliance to bear in mind the needs of the underdeveloped nations. I said the free world would not accept a situation where half mankind is well fed and the other half is not. Such a situation merely invites communist mischief.

In this connection I said that something in the nature of a NATO food bank might be created to make food available to countries which are in need and which are in danger of being overrun and subverted by the Soviet union. It would also make possible the availability of those deposits of food in the event of war. It is our hope that such an eventuality will not occur, and that we have come a long way in the last few days toward once more reinforcing the forces of peace.

In connection with scientific and technical matters within the alliance there was a general recognition of the need to increase the number of trained scientists and technicians in most of the countries. In Canada, as elsewhere, progress in this field will depend not only on the state contribution but also on the devoted contribution of teachers and scientists in our schools and universities. It will also depend on the support which governments will give to institutions which provide courses in scientific subjects, and this government intends shortly to give full reconsideration to its policy in this regard and have it placed before parliament.

To give effect to a co-operative effort within the alliance it was decided to arrange a NATO science committee on which all member countries will be represented by men qualified to speak authoritatively on scientific policy, and to appoint a scientific adviser to the secretary general of NATO. While some may say these were merely procedural decisions, none the less we had before us specific proposals for developing co-operation in this field between NATO countries which will be worked out in detail by qualified authorities on the new committee.

Let me mention one other matter. We thought of the people behind the iron curtain, people who believe in freedom as we do. Sometimes we are apt to forget them. When the declaration was being drafted I had the honour to move that there should be the inclusion of a paragraph to give to those people, whether in the Ukraine, in Hungary, in Poland, in East Germany, in the Balkan states, or in any other countries, the hope that the day will come when they will be able to live in freedom; to let them realize that we have not forgotten and do not forget their heroism and their plight. We want them to know that the flickering flame of freedom they have kept alive is being seen by those who represent countries under democratic control. It was accepted that this paragraph should be included in order to give some hope to those who live in the expectation that tomorrow may give them new opportunities in life and the right of human beings to enjoy a measure of freedom. The portion in question is as follows:

> For the entire world it is both a tragedy and a great danger that the peoples under international communist rule—their national independence, human liberties and their standard of living as well as their scientific and technological achievements—have been sacrificed to the purposes of world domination and military power. The suppression of their liberty will not last forever. Already in these countries there is evidence of the growing desire for intellectual and economic freedom. If the free nations are steadfast the totalitarian menace that now confronts them will eventually recede.

While I was in Paris I was met by a group of 15 to 20 representatives of those peoples behind the iron curtain, who asked for nothing in the nature of a declaration belligerent in its wording. All they asked for was a word of appreciation so the aspirations and hopes of those people will be maintained.

That in general, sir, represents a summary of the principles that activated those who met there. In brief the alliance, I believe, has made a substantive contribution to the cause of peace, not only by reaffirming its purely defensive character—that was underlined and re-emphasized over and over again—but also by leaving the door open to meaningful disarmament negotiations. Decisions have been taken which, through a closer integration of our individual forces, will result in the strengthening of the alliance and I believe will ensure greater security to our peoples.

The machinery of NATO will be adapted to make possible the full use of the resources of each and all of the member nations. Above everything else a new impetus has been given at the highest possible level and a revised vision to our alliance which will help us to translate its aims and objectives into practical achievements. While there may be those who feel otherwise, one of the most moving things that took place at that conference was at its conclusion, when the President of the United States asked that the leaders of the various countries should engage in silent prayer for the welfare and the preservation of freedom in mankind.

I am not going to say more than that; but never have I seen a group of men less actuated by any purpose other than to achieve, or to lay the foundations for, peace, and so to act that the 450 million people whom they represented will at least know that everything has been done and everything will be done to ensure through negotiation the maintenance of our way of life; that we are prepared, not in a spirit of appeasement but with a realization of the awful realities that face us, to go as far as possible to bring about that climate and that atmosphere which will ensure the laying of the foundation, internationally, of peace through disarmament.

Each member government will now have to review either individually or in the council the implications of the practical steps that have been taken. Each of us—and I speak personally when I say this—endeavoured to express the view of the Canadian people and to make some contribution to the development of that sense of partnership with our immediate allies which has been so necessary in recent days. No one who was there could countenance the thought that we shall not succeed, for we must.

I know what the cynics will say. They have done it all down through the ages. They will contend that the declaration and the communique are simply the same old tired cliches strung together in a different arrangement but leaving the old patterns substantially unchanged. That is not so. This conference has taken striking decisions that affect the military posture, the scientific disposition, and a new and imaginative economic approach that have both domestic and external applications to all the 15 countries. We have extended the range of our concern where economic and social matters are involved to take in underdeveloped countries outside and beyond our alliance.

These to me are significant and profound advances in the NATO of today; and I hope, sir, that what has been done will render NATO perceptibly more united, actually more united, more effective, and with a more revived purpose than was the case one week ago today.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all listened with great interest to this summary report by the Prime Minister of Canada with respect to the important meeting of the heads of the governments of the countries that make up the north Atlantic treaty organization, and that no one would wish either to underestimate or, on the other hand, to exaggerate the practical results of these deliberations.

There is no doubt that there is something of value in having had the heads of the governments participate in the communique that was issued and in which their unity about the objectives of the alliance is once more very clearly asserted, perhaps asserted with even more clarity and certainly with more specific developments than were included even in the treaty that was signed. But as in all other human endeavours it is not sufficient to state objectives and do what might be the implementation of wishful thinking. What is necessary is to have achievements expressed not only in words, however necessary that is in the first instance, but by actual conduct that gives effect to the expressions found in those words.

Everything that is said in the communique and everything we have had in the interesting report given to us by the Prime Minister was expressed in general terms contained implicitly in the treaty itself, and has been expressed in diplomatic exchanges many times since. I think we have reason to feel that the cost to us and to our people, to all who belong to the north Atlantic treaty organization, great as it has been has been a cost that provided in return to our peoples value for the whole of it.

It is now nine years that the alliance has been in existence and has been pursuing its objectives. As the Prime Minister pointed out, during that time there has been no further expansion of the domination of one great power over its neighbouring countries. That was the thing against which the participants in the alliance wished to guard when the treaty was originally signed. Everyone accepted the language of the treaty, and I would imagine that all the member nations feel that their respective governments have endeavoured to give effect to the undertakings of the various clauses. But although the objectives have been the same for all of us, the extent to which the conduct of the 15 nations has been directed at realizing those objectives has not been completely satisfactory to every one of the nations forming the alliance.

With respect, for instance, to the matter of economic collaboration, I am sure all the governments wish to have the other members of the alliance in a satisfactory economic position. But more could have been done than has been done to strengthen the economies of the participant nations. Now that attention has been called to the matter again in this solemn pronouncement by the heads of the governments who attended the recent meeting we will hope there will be an increase in the effectiveness of the economic collaboration that is necessary to maintain our standards of living, and at the same time feel that we are doing everything it is proper to do to maintain that defensive strength that will permit the alliance to realize the general objective for which we have been striving.

We note that the Prime Minister says we should all feel that everything that can be done by negotiation to give greater assurance to the foundations of peace in the world is being done and will continue to be done and that, in spite of what we cannot all look upon as universal good will, we will continue to hope that there will be achievements that will be substantial. I am sure those of us who heard over the radio this morning that Mr. Gromyko had declared that Russia could not participate in a conference at the level of ministers of external affairs shuddered somewhat at that early pronouncement. We do hope we will be able to convince them that we are sincere in our desire to treat with them on a basis of national equality in regard to the objective which is and must be of as great interest to them as it is to us, or at least to their people as it is to our people.

I suppose in order to make progress all of us, each and every one, who have any influence whatsoever on the conduct of ourselves and our fellow citizens, should endeavour to bring ourselves to the frame of mind in which we can attempt to negotiate with some feeling that there could be decisions arrived at that would be kept which would enable us to protect our own and future generations against the catastrophic consequences that will be inevitable if we cannot reach some satisfactory arrangements —arrangements we will not have to call appeasement, but that will at least appease the anxieties that must somewhat becloud the frame of mind we endeavour to reach at this season of the year.

Whether it be brought about by silent prayer, as the head of the great American nation requested at the close of the conference, or otherwise, I think there is a necessity perhaps on both sides of a more confident approach to the possibilities of reaching some kind of an arrangement that will be the result of negotiating from strength, but not forgetting that there is strength on both sides and that that strength would be disastrous to both sides as soon as unleashed by either one or the other.

We are coming to the anniversary of that event which was heralded to the world by the declaration that peace was being brought to men of good will. I think the men who attended this top level meeting of the north Atlantic treaty organization were all men of good will. I hope their good will will be recognized. It is sometimes necessary, without being disposed to resort to anything to which the term "appeasement" in the unacceptable sense could be applied, to express a genuine, confident desire to conduct negotiations on the basis of it being possible that they will succeed. It is in that spirit that I think we should, in our silent prayers, accept this heralding of the coming of peace to men of good will in this world.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think it is well that the Prime Minister should have taken the earliest opportunity to come before the house and give us a report on the extremely important conference from which he has just come.

I think there are times when an atmosphere is felt. As I listened, particularly to the Leader of the Opposition, whose words I think were well chosen and who expressed the thoughts of many of us as we listened to him, I thought that this morning we have such an atmosphere. I do not think there is an individual anywhere who is not impressed with the dangers that surround us and beset the world. I think we all looked to this great conference which has just concluded in Paris in the hope that something concrete might come of it, something that would give us hope for the future.

As I listened to the Prime Minister this morning my heart sank, because I could find nothing concrete that gave us any hope of peace. There is to be co-ordination of defence, co-ordination of defence production, but no co-ordination for economic integration among the nations comprising the north Atlantic treaty organization which was envisaged nine years ago when article 11 was adopted by the nations which now compose the north Atlantic alliance.

I should like to know what the Prime Minister had in his mind in concrete terms when he mentioned economic aid at the NATO conference, but perhaps that may come when we reassemble after Christmas. However, I think this statement, in the light of the documents that may be issued and what we may know at that time, should be the basis for a debate on external affairs so that we may have more than a few moments in which to discuss this extremely important matter.

Then we have the proposal for a conference of the scientists of the NATO countries. What for? To improve our weapons of war, to make further preparation for defence. That may be necessary in the world in which we live, but as I said on a former occasion, why can we not go beyond that? Why cannot Canada say that we would welcome within our borders a scientific conference representing scientists of all the nations of the world, so that others than statesmen may discuss these problems and guide the world toward some peaceful solutions? I welcome the suggestion that there should be negotiation but, like the Leader of the Opposition, I believe it must be negotiation with a large measure of good will.

If I may stray outside of our own parliament, may I say that I read with a good deal of misgiving an article by the secretary of state for the United States as well as some of his statements just prior to this conference. How can you expect negotiation to be successful when the spokesman for the most powerful nation within NATO makes the kind of statements which one heard and which one read in the current issue of Life magazine? I think we need a new approach, and I think particularly we need a new approach among the most powerful of the nations on both sides.

I read the Bulganin letter with a great deal of care. I do not think this letter has been considered or answered by NATO. I think it is a letter which should be answered paragraph by paragraph and sentence by sentence, and if no one else would undertake it, I would say our own Secretary of State for External Affairs should undertake the writing of such a document. Because I believe, when we contrast the report of the Prime Minister this morning respecting the NATO conference and Mr. Dulles' statement with the Bulganin letter, that once again we are losing the battle of propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: This is a struggle for men's minds if ever there was a struggle for anything. We exclude 600 million people because we refuse to recognize that there is a government in China. Yet we are engaged in a struggle, a desperate struggle for men's minds. Through the years I have felt that we have given some of the choicest weapons in that field to the other side.

I feel we need a new approach, and I would like to know what are the concrete proposals for these new approaches. We did not get them this morning. I am anxious to read the documents which will be issued; I am anxious to read what the leaders of other countries have to say in order that I might at least arrive at a clearer understanding of what happened at NATO than I have been able to obtain from the statement of the Prime Minister. It is all very well; the words are fine, the sentiments expressed are good but, as has been pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition, they were generalizations.

So I say to the Prime Minister and to the government that I hope when we reassemble after Christmas we can set aside a day when we may discuss external affairs in the light of the new developments—I have not referred to the new dangers—so that we may make a real appraisal of what happened at NATO and whether there is any cause for hope.

This proposal to put missiles in countries in Europe was, I notice, a bilateral arrangement. I also notice that there is tremendous opposition on the part of some of our most progressive European allies, Norway and Denmark and so on. The Prime Minister said he listened to the debate in the House of Commons in England last night, and no doubt he heard there the speeches of both Mr. Macmillan and the acting leader of the opposition; possibly he also saw the vote taken, one of the narrowest majorities the present government of Britain has received since it took office, with abstentions by some of its own supporters, and possibly also some members voting unwillingly with the government. All this indicates that in the United Kingdom, one of the powerful countries, as well as in the smaller countries, there is misgiving and active opposition as to this proposal to put the new missile weapons in European countries.

If I were a Russian and I lived in the Soviet union I think I would feel just as I would feel as a Canadian living here if I saw all around my country bases with high powered planes in which new weapons of war and guided missiles were being placed for the potential destruction of my country. I cannot see how this helps the cause of peace, but that should be the subject of debate at some other time.

We in this party, in common with others in this house, have supported NATO. We appreciate the achievements which have been made by NATO and we know that what has been said—that NATO has prevented the spread of the influence of the Soviet union through subversive activity since Czechoslovakia—is quite correct. However, are we always going to live under this shadow of war, war that would bring universal destruction and universal annihilation? I want to say that I believe every member of this house—the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and every one of us sitting in our seats—feels, as the Leader of the Opposition said, particularly at this time of the year when the bells ring out and the message of peace on earth to men of good will is in our minds, that we should see if we cannot bring about measures of good will so that we may negotiate an end to this terrible threat which hangs over us all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Over the past week, Mr. Speaker, I believe many Canadians have been keenly interested in the reports which have emanated from Paris. I was particularly interested in the attitude toward the conference and its work expressed by a number of United States reporters. If one is to believe what they wrote, then the NATO meeting was a flop, because that is the general opinion expressed by so many United States writers. Whether that was because those reporters felt the United States did not have its own way entirely at the conference I could not tell, but certainly there seems to be quite a lot of disappointment that the United States suggestions were not altogether followed at the conference. I am glad they were not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: I feel the United States did not have a realistic attitude toward this meeting. I am not asking the Prime Minister or his colleagues to corroborate what I have said, but that has been my impression; that they went over with an eye concentrated on one purpose, which was to impress upon European countries the necessity for accepting equipment of the latest type with which to arm the bases which are supposed to make a ring around Russia. For that reason perhaps many people got the idea that the conference was not successful.

I listened most carefully to the sobering report of the Prime Minister this morning. I am glad he came in as quickly as he did, while parliament is still in session and before the Christmas recess, in order to give us this report. I found that what he had to say contained some reassurance although, as I said, it was to me quite sobering. Like the Leader of the Official Opposition I think he chose his words well, but I feel reaffirmation in high sounding terms of the purposes and objectives of NATO is not enough. What we do in the years ahead, and it seems to me more particularly in the months ahead, to translate the important principles adopted by the alliance nine years ago into effective action is going to be the criterion of the success of that alliance.

I do not for one moment mean to imply that we think the alliance has not accomplished much in the nine years it has been in existence. While the cost of Canada's participation in the north Atlantic treaty has been very great, and probably will continue for years to be exeedingly heavy, we think it can be looked upon as a good investment if it has done nothing more in those nine years than prevent further expansion of Godless communism throughout Europe and the western world. We think, however, that the true measure of whether it will continue to be a good investment in the future will depend on how much is done to give practical application to the high-sounding principles that have been expressed as its purposes and objectives.

Sabre-rattling is not enough to keep the peace. There are those, perhaps, who believe we have to develop a fighting machine which will be superior to that of our competitors, the Russians especially; but I repeat that in my judgment sabre-rattling does not do very much good compared with quiet preparation for negotiation from strength. There is quite a difference between the two; and while many people may say that the strong proposal of the United States to arm the European bases with nuclear warheads frightens the Russians, let us not overlook the fact that Russia does not make any bones about the 500 submarines she has ranging the seas from which she can launch nuclear weapons against her enemies, making us feel a little insecure as well.

I think we must keep that in mind. Both sides, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, are strong, and we must never overlook that fact. But that must not deter us for one moment from completing our preparations so we can carry on negotiations from strength.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the negotiations are going to be mighty important too, and those negotiations will have to be carried out on a high moral plane. Now is the time, if ever in the history of this world, when the nations composing the NATO alliance should put their cards face upward on the table and in every way carry on their dealings on the highest moral plane. There should be no attempt, it seems to me, to negotiate in such a way as to give people the impression that we are attempting to do as Chamberlain did at Munich back in 1938. I do not think this is a time for appeasement, by any means. It is a time for peace with honour, and I think we can only achieve that if we are strong and at the same time seized with the necessity of treating other peoples in the world as equal to ourselves.

I do not like this idea which is too often abroad that what we people in the western nations have to do is to bring other people up to our level. Bless my soul, some of the people in the east are far beyond us in moral and spiritual achievements, and it seems to me we have to get over to them the idea that we are prepared to meet them as equals and negotiate with them as equals for peace.

I wish to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I think it is now time the Prime Minister should prepare and deliver to the Canadian people as a whole the kind of report I suggested he should make when I spoke before he left for the NATO meeting. I think the Canadian people want to hear from the Prime Minister the details of what went on at NATO. Reports from this parliament are not carried adequately enough for the people to get a clear idea of what is going on.

I am glad to see the delegation back, looking as well and fit as they do today. It must have been a very heavy task and a difficult time for them, and I hope every single one of us will be preprared to express his views some time after the resumption of the parliamentary session in the New Year on these very important matters which constitute the effort to attain peace. But I cannot help thinking, Mr. Speaker, that if the world is ever going to achieve peace it has to start with the individual, with each one of us here.

I learned years ago from an old Chinese philosopher who said this: "If there is righteousness in the heart, there will be beauty in the character; if there is beauty in the character, there will be happiness in the home; if there is happiness in the home, there will be strength in the nation; if there is strength in the nation, there will be peace in the world."

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wonder whether the house would take kindly to having appended to Hansard today the declaration and communique, so the discussions which have taken place here may fit in with the general compendium of what actually took place in Paris.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would this course be agreeable to the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should just like to ask the Prime Minister one question. Was it decided that the letter in reply to the Bulganin letter should be made as a NATO reply, or will replies be made by the individual countries?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was no consideration of that point, and that being so the replies will, of course, have to be on an individual basis.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, before we interrupted this particular discussion to enable the Prime Minister to make a report on the important conference in Paris of the north Atlantic powers I was dealing with the situation that confronts us in the province of Ontario as a result of the fact that at the present time no agreements whatsoever have been concluded between the federal government and the provinces pursuant to the provisions of the Hospital Insurance Act introduced in the previous session of parliament by the government at that time headed by the present Leader of the Opposition.

I had indicated that in a conference I had with the government of the province of Ontario some time during the course of last spring agreed that if agreements had not been concluded by the end of September with the five other consenting provinces other arrangements would have to be made to avoid the very difficult situation which could arise in the province of Ontario in view of the fact that the premier of that province had stated that he proposed to begin his hospital insurance scheme in Ontario on January 1, 1959.

I was about to indicate before the interruption that in connection with the preparation which understandably the government of Ontario must make that that government must be in a position well ahead of the starting date of having clear understandings with the federal government. The province of Ontario and indeed every province could not be expected to start their schemes unless they were assured that the federal government would begin to share in the costs of the operation of the various plans. In the meantime arrangements would have to be made with private insurance groups, with labour organizations and with employer organizations all leading to the situation in which insured people under these various plans could be given some guarantee that they would not be without the benefits of hospital insurance either under government or under private auspices. The only way that a chaotic condition could be avoided would be by dispatch in getting agreements between the two senior levels of government, and every step would have to be taken to make sure that that dangerous possibility did not confront the provinces concerned.

Notwithstanding the announcement made by the government, that if there was a measure of unanimity on the part of the provinces it was prepared to bring in an amendment to provide for sharing of costs by the federal government at a date other than that referred to in the existing legislation there is great danger now in the light of the only evidence that is available to the house and to the country of the possibility of that chaotic situation arising. I find it difficult indeed to understand why there are not agreements now concluded with at least four of the provinces. I could go further and say that I am sure that if the necessary interest and will existed on the part of the government agreements with the six provinces could by now be concluded.

It is all very well to suggest that the government proposes to meet this situation by amending the act in order to make payments possible, let us say, to the province of Ontario; but the fact is that if the government is going to take that step, and it has announced its decision so to do, I do not know how it will explain with regard to those provinces that now have schemes in being that it has not taken steps already to provide payments to these particular provinces.

It may be said in answer that that was not the policy of the government of which I was a member. That is true, but as I have indicated we did suggest to the province of Ontario that if agreements were not concluded by September other arrangements would have to be made. But there was a good reason for the policy we were pursuing because our objective was to bring in a maximum number of provinces under a system of hospital insurance based on co-operative financial arrangements between the two senior levels of government. It was as a result of our adhering to the formula of six provinces that we were well on our way to something that approximated a nationwide scheme.

However, as a result of the situation that now develops, are we any nearer to such an approximation? Are we any nearer to having any more than the provinces of British Columbia and Saskatchewan, possibly Alberta, and Ontario with schemes of hospital insurance available to their respective constituents? I think we are not. I think that as a result of the failure of this government to conclude agreements certainly by the end of September and as the result of its failure since the end of September to give evidence of progress we are not going to have the nationwide approach we could have had if there had been alacrity and a greater evidence of interest and concern on the part of the administration.

There will be the greatest regret on the part not only of the people of the various provinces but of the people all over the country that such little progress, if any at all, has been made in the matter of hospital insurance. If there was a justification for the decision that parliament took, in the month of April in accepting the federal government's proposal for a system of hospital insurance, I believe this government can be charged with great neglect in the face of the position which parliament then took, in the light of the demand all over this country, for not having marched with a firmer step and with greater dispatch regarding a matter which means so much to the preservation of the health standards of this country and to providing health assistance to the people.

I was a little disturbed the other day when, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the minister replied that it was proposed to continue the health grants introduced by the government of Mr. Mackenzie King in the month of May, 1948, but, since there might be some overlapping, there could in consequence of that be some modification of those grants, or the withdrawing of some of them. The word "withdrawing" is my own and I do not want to do any injustice to the reply of the minister. But he did indicate the possibility that, because of the overlapping, some of those grants would have to be discontinued or some modifications made as a result of the alleged overlapping. If that is done there will be genuine regret in the country. That kind of reply fails to indicate an appreciation of the full reason for those grants. Those grants have nothing whatever to do with hospitalization.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, there is going to be no withdrawal. There will purely be a re-allocation and the same amount will be given.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says a "re-allocation". That disturbs me all the more. These grants were introduced in this house as a condition precedent to the day when we would be adopting a form of hospital insurance. Indeed, the prime minister of that day said that these grants were a prerequisite to the setting up of a system of, I think the words he used on that occasion were, health insurance, and that the grants themselves were designed to prepare for the day when we would have the facilities to make hospital insurance a possibility. These grants included assistance for public health, for tuberculosis control, for mental health, for hospital construction, for medical scientific research, for professional training, for rehabilitation, for cancer control and the like. None of these grants has anything whatsoever to do with health insurance except in so far as providing a foundation stone for the successful operation of a system of health insurance.

What allocations are to take place? Are we to conclude that because the government is proposing, under certain conditions, inconsistent with the promises that it made during the election, to include tuberculosis and mental illness, they are going, by allocations of the funds provided for in these two particular categories, to spend less money for tuberculosis control. The moneys spent for mental illness have nothing to do with hospital insurance at all. The moneys in these two particular categories had to do with another phase altogether.

Remember what I am discussing now is a project of health insurance, a project designed not to assist the provinces in respect of obligations that they have assumed but to assist individuals in Canada in meeting their hospital costs. The money spent under the tuberculosis control grant and under the mental health grant are moneys spent for the purpose of providing facilities. They are not moneys provided to help individuals meet their hospital costs; they are designed to provide research in these various fields, to give the provinces the wherewithal to employ the necessary personnel and to carry out the general objects and purposes of these particular grants. Therefore, I hope the minister will give very careful consideration to the reply he gave a few days ago and to the observation he made a moment ago.

Take the hospital construction grant. That has nothing to do directly with hospital insurance. That grant was designed to place the provinces and the communities of our country in a position where, when we had hospital insurance in being, there would be the necessary hospital facilities available to make that scheme practicable and possible of operation. Under that grant, with the assistance of the provinces and with the major assistance of communities and voluntary bodies, we would be able together to provide for the construction of somewhere between 70,000 and 75,000 additional hospital beds.

That was a very essential foundation for the operation of a system of hospital insurance. Those grants will have to be continued because the country is growing. The need for hospital beds will continue and if there is to be any allocation of those grants and the moneys used for this particular purpose are to be transferred to take care of part of the federal share of hospital insurance we shall be going back on the commitment which the previous administration made to the provincial governments. That has had the greatest possible consequences. Therefore, I hope the minister will give careful consideration to maintaining the grants in the form in which they are. Of course he will be confronted, as time goes on, with the necessity, possibly, of increasing them if we are to maintain the pace which I believe the provincial, the municipal and the federal governments have been able to achieve in Canada during the past decade or so.

I would remind the minister that he told us quite frankly the other day when I asked him a question that the amendments contemplated to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act had to do with the provision of payment so that one province which was prepared to embark upon a scheme would not find itself handicapped as a result of the fact that at the present time there are no agreements with any one of the six provinces, a situation which I believe would have been avoided if the kind of care and interest had been pursued which I suggested, and about the lack of which I complained.

If that is the only amendment the government has in mind I am forced under these circumstances to point out at this time that it represents but a small portion of the commitments, or of the position which was taken by hon. gentlemen, now on the treasury benches, when they were in opposition. When they were in opposition they said that the hospital insurance measure which the government of that day introduced was a good one but it did not go far enough, notwithstanding the fact that the federal government of that day committed itself to an expenditure of at least $200 million in the first year of complete operation, a sum that represented half of the total cost of hospital insurance in Canada.

They said that we should go farther; that we should do something about taking care of a share in depreciation costs. What is the government going to do about that? They made strong arguments on this side that our measure was weak because it did not include a decision on the part of the federal government to share in the costs of depreciation. Does the government now take the position that it was wrong in urging these things when sitting on this side of the house?

What about the costs of administration? When we introduced hospital insurance we were told that it was inadequate because it was unfair to impose upon the provinces the responsibility for the full cost of administration. We pointed out at that time that the provinces were not going to be called upon to find as much new money as the federal government was going to have to find and that the provinces could be well left with the responsibility of providing for assistance in the matter of depreciation and in the matter of administration if that were thought the desirable thing to do.

But our reply in that particular was not accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite and they now have the responsibility of discharging the obligations which they sought to impose on the previous government or of admitting now that the arguments they made on that occasion were not valid or sound. We have the right to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare what he proposes to do about these particular claims that were made by the opposition of the government of the day, claims that have a great interest and importance in the minds of the various hospital administrations and the various voluntary bodies all over the country who, I know, are most vitally interested in the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the questions of depreciation and the cost of administration.

Therefore I ask the government to realize the importance of this matter. It is not too late for the minister to rise now in his place and to explain why agreements have not been concluded and to give us assurance and evidence that the delay that has taken place will be corrected by a new effort on the part of the government to carry out its obligations in respect of the act—

Mr. Monteith: There has been no delay.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that I think mean so much to the people of the country.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): May I ask the hon. member a question? It has to do with his statements concerning grants for hospital construction. Can the hon. member tell me what percentage of the cost of hospital bed accommodation in Ontario general hospitals was contributed by grants from his government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot give that offhand. As my hon. friend knows, the federal grant was $1,000 for every acute bed and $1,500 for every chronic bed. The provinces contributed a slightly larger amount, as was to be expected, because hospitalization is quite obviously a responsibility of the provincial governments. But the grants made by the two senior levels of government are not, of course, as great as the contributions made by the voluntary organizations themselves. They bear the greatest load. But no one will deny that, in the language of Premier Frost, it was the hospital grants provided by the federal and provincial governments that spurred on hospital construction in this country, and I think every Canadian recognizes that as an achievement of the greatest kind by all levels of government and voluntary bodies.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like at the outset to join with the hon. member for Essex East in paying tribute to the staff and officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Obviously some of us have not had the advantage of the contacts with the officers and staff that the hon. member for Essex East enjoyed for a number of years, but we have met them in committee, we have dealings with them from time to time when we have cases to pursue, and we also have the advantage of the excellent material that the research workers in the department prepare.

I should like also to express appreciation of the tremendous importance of this department to the life of the people of Canada, and I congratulate the minister for having been called upon to preside over the affairs of such an important department. However, I must also join with the hon. member for Essex East in expressing the regret of this party at the delay of the present government in implementing the provisions of the the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. Everyone knows that it is the view of the C.C.F. that we should have on our statute books much more advanced legislation than that act. We feel the time has come for an over-all national insurance plan with provision for provincial administration but with provision for coverage of all aspects of illness on the part of our people.

Nevertheless, we do appreciate the step along the way taken in 1948 by the inauguration of the health grants program and the further step taken in the spring of this year through the enactment of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. Because we appreciate these steps as being in the right direction, we regret very much that the implementation of the act seems to be so slow in coming under the aegis of the present government.

While the former minister was speaking I heard the minister interject that there had been no delay, but I submit that there is evidence of nothing else. It is not my intention to repeat the speech I made in the House of Commons on November 18 when on behalf of our party I moved an amendment to the motion to go into supply. But I would remind the minister that it was pointed out then that the present session was opened on an historic occasion with the speech from the throne read by Her Majesty the Queen but that in that speech there was no mention of health insurance or hospital insurance in any way. I remind the minister that to the first number of questions we on this side of the house asked with respect to whether anything was going to be done about hospital insurance or whether the matter was even on the agenda for the then forthcoming federal-provincial conference the answers were in the negative or evasive.

For several weeks it looked as though nothing was happening. Then for a period of a couple of weeks the air vibrated with assurances and promises. Strangely enough, those two weeks followed the moving from this corner of a non-confidence motion on the question of implementing the hospital insurance plan. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, from whom we had had difficulty in getting any answers to questions, got into that debate and assured us that the matter was being studied in his department. The Prime Minister previously had been unable to assure us that the matter would be discussed at the federal-provincial conference but he got into that debate when the confidence of the house in the government was under discussion and assured us that all matters in relation to the hospital insurance legislation would be discussed at the federal-provincial conference if the provincial representatives wished to discuss those matters.

Then the conference itself was held and at that conference there were discussions regarding the implementation of the hospital insurance plan. We were led to believe that those discussions centred in the main around two points, one being the removal of the six-province requirement and the other the inclusion of mental and tuberculosis institutions within the four corners of this legislation. A few days after that we had statements in the house—both on the initiative of the Prime Minister and in reply to questions—to the effect that the implementation of this legislation would be proceeded with; in fact, that we would get it sooner under the Tories than we would have had it under the Liberals.

These vibrant, sonorous assurances rang through the chamber for a few days and as a result we were led to believe that something would be done. Hence the pace of our questions slackened. But what has happened? Any evidence that anything is being done has died down completely. In fact, although the Prime Minister has been pleased to add to the list of items to be dealt with in this session of parliament, he still has not given the house notice, nor has his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, of any legislation to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. In answer to questions the Minister of National Health and Welfare has admitted that if there are to be any amendments to that act they will relate only to the removal of the six province requirement.

With regard to the other matter, namely mental and tuberculosis hospitals, the minister now says that this is a matter of government policy and that any announcement of any decision made with regard to that question will be made in due course. That latest word, in fact, was given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare as recently as December 17, in response to questions of mine on the orders of the day as recorded in Hansard at page 2473 and 2474 of that date.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, it all adds up to one big zero. No agreements have been signed. No action has been taken. No legislation has been placed on the order paper. In fact, it seems to us that there is on the part of the new administration no appreciation of the importance, social significance and urgency of this legislation to make a beginning in the field of health insurance by doing something with regard to hospital insurance.

The minister may not like my saying that it adds up to nothing, but I submit that that is a fair statement of the case. As I reminded the Conservatives when we debated this matter on November 18 and 19, they were loud and strong last spring in their insistence that the act should be improved; and the point on which they were loudest and strongest was that mental and tubercular hospitals should be included. Indeed, it was they who moved an amendment or two to that effect, even as late in the game as on third reading of the bill, when they moved an amendment to refer the bill back to a committee for the purpose of reconsidering that aspect of the matter.

I remind them that during the election campaign—and I have here excerpts from some of the items that appeared in the press—the Prime Minister made certain promises. According to the Minister of Finance we must not quote what the Conservatives said in the election campaign unless the Prime Minister said it. But during the election campaign the Prime Minister, amongst other items, promised that the Conservatives, if elected, would bring mental and tubercular hospitals under the provisions of this act. Yet, Mr. Chairman, nothing has been done on this matter for which the Conservatives were so strong last spring. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, by his answer on December 17 to which I have made reference, made it clear that that idea has just about been scuttled so far as this present government is concerned. If he wants to say that we have been assured that we are still going to get the amendment to the act to remove the six-province provision, I ask him what value there is in that now. If he replies to me that we moved an amendment to that effect last spring, I remind him that we moved that amendment at a time when only five provinces had signified their willingness to come into the plan. But shortly after that, a sixth province indicated its willingness to participate. Now that there are six agreeing provinces, I say that the six-province provision no longer has any practical limitation so far as the implementation of this act is concerned.

So what the government proposes to do is this. All that has come out of these assurances, all that has come out of the supposed study and attention that has been given to the matter, and the supposed interest that the new government has in this legislation, is the promise that somewhere along in the piece we are going to get an amendment that does not mean anything at all. We are going to get the removal of the six-province requirement at a time when six provinces have already agreed. That being the case, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we have to do to this government exactly what we had to do to the former government, we have to keep on poking and prodding, trying to get them to take action.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did I hear an interjection from my friend the hon. member for Essex East?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. You saw a smile on his face.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I saw a smile on his face. I say to my hon. friend with whom we have had discussions about these matters for many years—and our respective forbears had them back to 1919—that he could have helped us in this effort to secure the implementation of his own legislation if on November 19 he had voted the way he spoke on November 18. He supported in words our contention that steps should be taken to achieve the implementation of this legislation at the earliest possible moment. But the next day he stood up and voted the other way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know that my hon. friend is a very fair-minded member. He will know that I explained clearly the reason, namely what would have happened if we had followed my hon. friend's course, a course which he himself would pursue only in the clear belief that the government would not be defeated. That defeat would have meant postponing the realization of the very matter which he and I are now urging so vehemently.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether the hon. member still believes that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether the hon. member is now prepared to say what his vote on November 19 implied, namely that he has confidence in this government so far as health insurance is concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the hon. member and I will prod on and they will do what we are asking them to do.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That answer, of course, is an admission that he does not have confidence in this government so far as health insurance in concerned; and on that point he and I are agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that the only aspect of lack of confidence?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are other aspects as well. I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has aspects of lack of confidence in the government, but I am sure that any suggestion that this government does not have the confidence of the Liberal party must wait until after January 14, 15 or 16. We shall be greatly interested when that time comes to see whether that confidence still remains.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a great difference between tolerance and confidence.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I confess that we enjoy the way in which the Liberals manoeuvre in trying to explain their position. We prefer to look at these things on their merits. On the merits of the case, on the facts, on the history of this government since it came into power, it has let the Canadian people down in so far as health or hospital insurance is concerned. We call upon this government to get over this attitude of relying on the votes the Liberals will give them, to realize that they made commitments to the Canadian people when they were on the opposition side of the house, that they made commitments in the election campaign and to face the fact that the time has come to implement in full the provisions of the hospital insurance act.

That surely calls for immediate steps to make it possible for the provinces that wish to do so to sign an agreement. We suggest if they are sincere about their proposal to remove the six-province requirement that means they are prepared to make federal money available to some of the provinces, even before six of them have their plans in operation. If they are prepared to do that, why not demonstrate it by making that money available now to those particular provinces that have their plans in operation, even if no more than two or three have plans in operation at the present time.

I insist that the governments and the people of the provinces of British Columbia and Saskatchewan have just as much right to have federal moneys made available to assist them in their plans as the province of Ontario would have if it were the only one, or one of only two or three, which had plans in operation.

I welcome the fact that the government of the province of Ontario is going ahead with plans for a hospital insurance scheme in that province, in order to put it in effect by January 1, 1959. I welcome the fact that discussion on this point so far as the premier of Manitoba is concerned is a little more active than it was before June 10, but why do provinces like British Columbia and Saskatchewan have to wait for these six to get into the field if this government has already declared, both by the way they voted on our amendment last spring and by the statements they have made, that they are prepared to see that this money should be made available to some of the provinces even though the full quota of six have not got their plans in operation. That is an immediate step which this government should now be taking if it wants any of us to believe that it is sincere in its convictions about hospital insurance.

We also contend that the veil must be lifted and that we should be told the full story about mental and tubercular hospitals. There is a strange air of secrecy and mystery about that subject. The speeches were loud, the Conservatives were determined that this should be done; we were assured as a result of questioning in the early part of this session that the promises had not been forgotten. Such reports as we got during the open session of the federal-provincial conference led us to believe that something would be done on this point, but on the following day when the conference was in secret session—in fact from that day to this—there has been no indication of hope from the government side of the house that there is any intention left to implement the Tory promise to bring mental and tubercular hospitals under the provisions of this plan.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman not know that there was a "Frost" in the secret session?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am just waiting for somebody to think up an appropriate reply to that but perhaps I had better go on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have a chill.

Mr. Small: The temperature rose.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Essex East made it clear that when he was minister of national health and welfare he did not agree that mental and tubercular hospitals should be brought under the plan, but I think he has the right, even if he did not take that position then, to call upon the government now in power to implement its own promises. This means that we are unanimous. The Tories stood for it in the last session, the Social Crediters and the C.C.F. have stood for it in both sessions, the Liberals did not stand for it last session but they stand for it now and I think among the four of us we are expressing the views of the Canadian people on this issue. We therefore call upon the government to do something about this and to do it soon.

In speaking to these estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare one must remember that they cover a wide range of subjects and we shall deal with some of those subjects when we get into the individual items of the estimates. However, while we are on this first item there is one other major subject which comes under the jurisdiction of this minister about which I would like to say a few words. I refer to the question of old age pensions. I give to this government all the commendation it deserves for the action taken earlier in this session. I think it is fair to say that following the kind of election campaign we had last summer and in view of the tremendous amount of feeling that existed in Canada because of the fact that the Liberals had raised the old age pensions by only $6 a month, it was inevitable that any government which was returned to power would have to do something about that disgrace and would have to raise the pension to a higher level. Therefore, we welcomed from this corner of the house the amendments to the various statutes such as the Old Age Security Act, the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act, raising the pensions under those statutes to $55 per month.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask a question of the hon. gentleman? Does he not think that perhaps in entering into this subject he is out of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, I have not the slightest fear of that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was merely asking for my education.

Mr. Small: You definitely need it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As I indicated a few days ago, when my hon. friend was a professor and I was a student in the same college we did not happen to connect in the classroom, but we did have discussions out in the hall and I hope we educated each other. It would be out of order, Mr. Chairman, if I were to rehash the debates that took place on the amending bill that was before the house some weeks ago. At this moment, however, it is the law of the land that the old age security pension, among others, is $55 per month. It is perfectly in order for the government to bring in another bill at this session raising it to a higher amount just as it is perfectly in order for a member in this session to urge that the law, as it now stands, should be changed to bring greater benefit to our people.

However, what I propose to do is to suggest that this whole subject does need further and very serious study. Here again I might point out that on one of those occasions when we had before the house a motion of non-confidence in the government we got something out of it. These motions of non-confidence are apparently not without value. It is only when you have a motion of non-confidence or by prodding and poking that you seem to get something out of the government across the way.

During the debate on one of these motions we got a promise from the Prime Minister that the government would study the system of old age and survivors' insurance in the United States and other similar systems to see if some way could not be found to improve our old age pension situation in Canada. We have heard nothing about it since and that is exactly our fear, that this sort of thing gets promised in the heat of debate; this sort of thing gets promised to get the government off the hook, but then time has a way of going on with this government as it did with the former government.

The fact is that we need to raise our sights a great deal so far as old age security is concerned. I can make these remarks brief because I said something along this line in another debate a few days ago. There was a time when it took an heroic effort on the part of my predecessor, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, to sell to parliament the idea of an old age pension at all, even with a means test and even at a rate of only $20 per month. But in due course it got acceptance, although it was not until the first old age pension bill had been defeated over in the other place. Then it took us a number of years to sell the idea that there should be a pension for our senior citizens, as a matter of right, without a means test. I can remember in my time here the occasions when we were told this simply could not be done. We got that principle established, that a pension is a social responsibility and that a pension should be as of right without a means test.

Mr. Chairman, we think we ought to go further, and get to the place where we recognize that people having made their contributions to the economy and life of the country should in their retirement years have a pension, not just sufficient to exist on but sufficient to retire on in dignity and decency; and that means a pension much higher than $55 a month, much higher, even, than the $75 we advocated in the last election campaign.

That means, Mr. Chairman, we may have to do some more thinking about this problem; we may have to go in for a plan that has two aspects; we may have to go in for a combination of the present universal pension on a flat rate basis and a contributory pension based on income supplementary to the flat rate pension. We may have to find a way to provide for portable pensions in industry; a way of making it possible for people to move from one job to another and maintain their pension rights. We may have to recast our income tax structure in relation to old age pensions.

I had something to say about this matter in the special committee on estimates on Thursday, April 12, 1956, as reported at page 284 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of that committee. I suggested then that some of us who had lived through the means test era would never agree to the re-imposition of a means test, and I am sure the hon. member for Essex East now agrees with me, even if he did not always agree with me on it, that to talk about pensions related to need is to talk about the re-imposition of the means test with all the hurt and misery it imposed on so many of our people.

At the same time it is possible by means of a steeply graded income tax and by a special income tax on pensions received by people who have higher incomes to even out the effect of higher pensions. What I am suggesting is, with all these things, the possibility of raising tremendously the present $55 pension, and taking care of the wealthy person by a change in the income tax, by introducing legislation to provide for portable pensions in industry, by introducing a national industrial pension plan as proposed by the Canadian Labour Congress, or a national pension on a contributory basis supplementary to our old age pension on a universal basis. It is possible, if we do these things on the bases I have suggested, to achieve a raising of our sights.

We had the Gordon commission report about a year ago. We do not hear much about it these days, but I remind hon. members that the Gordon commission forecast a substantial increase in the gross national product 20 or 25 years hence. The commission forecast an increase in salaries and wages and we have got to meet the kind of increase forecast by the Gordon commission with the recognition that we may have to find a way whereby all our people on reaching retirement age will enjoy pensions, not just at the charitable level but sufficient to enable them to enjoy decency and dignity in retirement.

I see you moving to the edge of your chair, Mr. Chairman, so may I conclude these remarks—to come back later, because we are in committee of supply—by calling to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare an excellent document entitled "Age and Opportunity" prepared by the welfare council of greater Winnipeg, which is a study of the experience of older citizens in the greater Winnipeg area. This report indicates that to a surprising extent our older people have as their main source of income their old age pensions, which means we have to get that amount up a lot higher. I draw attention also to the fact that this very responsible body urges very strongly on page 41 of this report that there should now be a complete review of the whole question of old age security provisions similar to that undertaken by a joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons back in 1950. All of us who were members of that committee and had the assistance of the staff of the minister's department believed it was one of the finest committees which ever met in parliament. It did a good job and it made recommendations on the basis of which effective steps were taken. We think it is time for another such committee to meet and study these matters with a view to revamping our pension system so as to maintain our older citizens, not just at a subsistence level but at a level which would enable them in retirement to participate in the higher standard of life now possible in this country.

Mr. McLeod: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on the first item that is before us at the present time. Like the two previous speakers, I also should like to pay my tribute to the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare. During the last parliament it was my privilege to head the committee on health and welfare within our little group, and I had occasion more than once to visit the various heads of departments within the Department of National Health and Welfare and I always got a very cordial response. I was given all the information that was available—it was far too much for me to assimilate—and I appreciate their efforts very much to be helpful and agreeable.

Like the other two speakers, I also was keenly disappointed in the action or lack of action on the part of this government in implementing hospital insurance. We listened to the debates in the last parliament, and have listened to the promises made throughout the country that this would be implemented speedily; that mental and tubercular care would be included and that various changes would be made in the act, which would be a much better and much more suitable act; and that greater financial assistance should be given to the provinces.

However, a strange curtain of secrecy seems to have been woven around this question of hospital insurance since parliament assembled here in October, and it is not just with regard to the department of health. We can ask questions of practically every department in the government, and we are given the brush-off in most cases. In this respect our questions as to what progress is being made, how other provinces are reacting to the plan and whether arrangements to cover mental and tubercular care are being considered, have been particularly unsuccessful in obtaining any definite information. We are told that all is proceeding well; we are asked to have confidence in the government.

Mr. Chairman, we may have confidence in the government, but our confidence may be growing less day by day due to the fact that there is no co-operation between the government and members of the house to give us information about what is going on. I say with all seriousness that there cannot be co-operation unless we are advised of what this government is doing; we must at least have some knowledge that they have at heart these problems with which we are concerned. We should be told just a little bit of what is being done in order to sustain our confidence.

I am now going to make a few general remarks and when the detailed items are before us I will perhaps deal with them more specifically. The Department of National Health and Welfare is the second largest in terms of expenditure of all the departments of government, second only to the Department of National Defence, but in many ways it is of the greatest importance to the people of Canada of all departments of government. It is greater in importance than the Department of National Defence which spends more money because the greatest asset of any nation is the health of its people. At the moment I am more concerned with the subject of health than with the subject of welfare and so I will confine my remarks to that aspect of the department. It is the duty of our department of health to ensure that we have a nation of healthy and vigorous people and so it must be constantly on the alert to guard, promote and maintain the health of Canadians.

Today the emphasis in the field of health is on prevention. The medical profession and all our health organizations are today gearing their efforts towards the prevention of sickness and disease rather than cure. In order to facilitate that program of prevention, in other words to combat disease before it occurs, we must have an additional speeded up program of research and study.

The battle that will be waged by our research men against sickness and disease will require a greatly enlarged staff and we will have to provide additional training facilities in order to prepare technicians and experts to carry on this research. This will also require the expenditure of vast sums of money but I am satisfied that the people of Canada will not begrudge money for this important aspect of promoting their own health and welfare and in building a nation of which each of us may well be proud. That is a general review, as I see it, of the need for expanding and continuing research into the prevention of sickness and disease.

One aspect of illness with which I wish to deal in greater detail at the present time is mental illness. This is the No. 1 health problem not only in Canada but throughout the world. It is difficult today to pick up a magazine or newspaper of any repute without finding a report of advances that are being made in the study of mental disorders and in devising cures for the various phases of mental illness with which our people are beset. I sometimes wonder if we are completely on the right track in this respect. Many patients who visit doctors at the present time complaining of stomach disorders, skin disorders, neuritis, sciatica and migraine headaches invariably have their disorder diagnosed as being attributable to nerves. If a person with a chronic skin disorder visits a doctor there is a strong likelihood that the doctor's verdict will be that the patient suffers from nervous eczema. A person suffering from what used to be called gastric stomach disorder or some other common stomach ailment is today invariably told that he has a nervous stomach. Those suffering from various neuralgic pains, sciatica, neuritis or migraine headaches are advised they are suffering from just plain "nerves". The treatment for those conditions, of course, is frequently psychiatry or sedation. I think that in too many cases our doctors today do not have the time to devote to treating these cases which seem to be increasing in number and an easy way out is to prescribe sedation. This of course has a temporary effect and may bring relief but I have often wondered if it is the proper relief.

I was recently intrigued by a series of articles which recently appeared in a publication written by two noted doctors, one from Montreal and one from the province of Saskatchewan. I will not mention any names but I will say that these men are approaching the problem of mental illness in a fresh way. In cases of chronic skin disease they are attempting to find if there is some physical cause for the disease. They are of the view that perhaps chronic skin diseases which can be extremely irritating are the cause of the nervous condition in the patient instead of the nervous temperament of the person being the cause of the skin disease. In other words we are coming back to the question: which came first the chicken or the egg? That is the problem these and other doctors are trying to determine today in the field of mental health. I suspect that all too often doctors have said that the patient's condition was caused by nerves whereas the nervous condition has in fact been the result of physical disability.

The chief of the mental health department of the province of Saskatchewan and the doctor in charge of the research institution there are taking that attitude. They are obtaining wonderful results by treating people who for years have been considered incurable mental patients. They are attacking the problem from the physical standpoint and have discovered that in many cases a physical disability has been the cause of a nervous condition from which patients have been condemned to suffer for many years. Many people have been cured and are leaving that institution to which they were condemned, if you will, and in which they expected to spend the rest of their lives. The problem of mental illness will require a vast amount of study, research and the expenditure of large sums of money.

Hon. members of this house frequently ask the government to cut down expenditures and yet we always seem to be hollering for it to spend more money. I would suggest, however, that there be absolutely no cutback in grants to provinces, universities and health organizations of any kind that are furthering the cause of research into any of the sicknesses and illnesses that plague our people at the present time. I would make a special plea that the grant for research and study in the field of mental illness be greatly increased because it is one of our greatest problems today and it looks as though it will be a continuing problem of increasing proportions unless some drastic action is taken.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, as I said we shall go into the minor details of the huge expenditure contained in these estimates. We shall study the estimates as we go along, but I should like to emphasize this. I hope the Department of National Health and Welfare will do absolutely nothing, in the way of curtailing expenses, to interfere with grants to the provinces, to universities and to health organizations in any plans they may have that bring promise of winning the battle in the prevention of disease and sickness among our people.

Mr. Halpenny: Mr. Chairman, I have been privileged to serve as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare since last August. In the brief space of less than five months I have been greatly impressed with the wide range of the department's activities connected with health and welfare, and with the way in which the work of this department reaches out to touch almost literally the lives and the way of life of almost every one of the 17 million people living in Canada.

In terms of personnel employed in this department, it is not one of the larger ones in the government of Canada. In terms of personnel employed, the establishment this year for the entire department numbers fewer than 5,000, which is only about three per cent of the public service taken as a whole. It does not compare in size, Mr. Chairman, therefore, with the giant establishments of national defence, post office, veterans affairs, transport or the finance department. The entire department actually employs only about half as many people as the national employment service and the unemployment insurance commission.

On the score of budget and expenditures, however, this department is one of the largest and most important of all departments in the public service, with a budget that will this year run somewhere close to $1 billion. This is true when supplementary estimates and additional expenditures arising out of recent legislative changes are added to the $918 million published in the blue book of estimates at the beginning of the current year. Only national defence, with a budget of almost $1¾ billion, and finance with a budget of $1,150 million, exceed the total size of the annual budget of expenditure of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the current year.

Perhaps the most outstanding feature of this budget of close to $1 billion is that only $75 million requires to be voted by parliament. The balance of the $925 million consists of statutory items, where the authority for the expenditure is written into the legislation itself. It continues from year to year as long as the legislation remains on the statute books and consequently an annual appropriation is not required to be voted by this house.

I should like to repeat these two figures, Mr. Chairman, because I doubt whether many members realize how large a proportion of the expenditures of this department is dependent upon the annual procedure of voting the estimates in this house. The sum of $925 million, or roughly 92.5 per cent of all the funds required by the Department of National Health and Welfare this year, is provided automatically by the statutory authority contained in the legislation which this department administers. Only $75 million, or 7.5 per cent of total expenditures, requires to be specifically voted by this parliament.

What I have just said with reference to the small percentage of this department's estimates requiring a vote of parliament does not in any way lessen the importance of close and detailed scrutiny by the members of this house when the estimates come up for consideration. In offering our comments and criticisms with respect to the estimates of this and other departments we are discharging our responsibilities as elected representatives of the people, sent here to ensure the wise and proper administration of the funds which are taken from the people by way of taxes and provided to the various departments to enable them to carry on the administration of the public services of the country.

Since this is the first occasion when this new parliament has had an opportunity to consider the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and since there are so many newly elected members of this present parliament, one might have thought that the work of the department and the programs which it administers would require a good deal of explanation and elaboration at this time. However, the fact is that while the estimates in the formal sense come before this parliament now for the first time for detailed discussion, most of the programs administered by the department have already received a good deal of the attention of this house in the weeks that have elapsed since we first met here on October 14. In fact, the second thing that impresses me as I examine the estimates of this department is this: already, within the short space of two months, the new Conservative administration, under the leadership of our present Prime Minister, has introduced and obtained the passage of amendments effecting major improvements in social legislation now on the statute books of this country. It took almost 20 years for the previous Liberal administration to place on the statute books such enactments as the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Mr. Lesage: What about family allowances?

Mr. Halpenny: We will forget that just now. I must tell you something. You have been up in this house about 30 times. This is my first time up. Will you lay off, or I will have to interrupt you some day.

It took only two months, Mr. Chairman, for this government to effect important and far-reaching changes in all of this legislation. We have amended the Old Age Security Act to raise the amount of benefit from $46 to $55 a month and to reduce the residence requirement from 20 to 10 years. We have made similar changes in the Old Age Assistance Act, in the Disabled Persons Act and in the assistance given to the blind people. These changes have brought great comfort and satisfaction into the lives of over 900,000 aging and handicapped men and women in all parts of Canada. Through the Unemployment Assistance Act, passed only this week, we have offered a much larger measure of financial assistance to the provinces which will have the effect of improving the standards of relief and services to needy persons in many parts of Canada, because it will place the provinces, and particularly the municipalities of this country, in a much better position than before to deal generously with the needs of these unfortunate people.

Here we have no fewer than five pieces of legislation, Mr. Chairman, all of them administrated under the direction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, touching directly the lives of over one million people in this country; I think it is to the very great credit of this administration that in the short space of two months with all the difficulties involved in taking over the reins of government after 22 years in opposition the first priority on the time and attention of this new parliament has been the amelioration of the lot of our senior citizens, our aged blind and disabled and needy persons. This is a very striking demonstration, Mr. Chairman, that the present administration is close to the people, responsive to their needs and gives first priority as a good government should to the human and social needs of the people to whom it is responsible.

The five pieces of legislation to which I have referred are not, of course, the only ones on which the government has taken action or with respect to which it has announced its intention of taking action in the very short space of time since it took over the reins of office. The house has already debated and approved a very important measure for the extension of seasonal benefits in connection with unemployment insurance, a social measure which lies outside the scope of the Department of National Health and Welfare but which none the less is an important item in the list of accomplishments in the social welfare field during the present session of parliament.

Another important announcement concerning changes in the six-provinces requirement in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act has also been made by the Prime Minister during the course of the current session. Since this is the last day on which the house will be sitting during the calendar year 1957, I think I am safe in assuming that this important change in the hospital insurance legislation will not be brought down until some time early in 1958. Its introduction and passage will furnish still one more example of the rapid forward strides that have been made in the field of health and social legislation under the new administration.

I should like to say as one member of the house, Mr. Chairman, that on the basis of the record I have outlined I think the new government is to be heartily commended for the creditable record it has achieved, particularly in the health and social welfare fields, and for the almost unbelievable speed with which it has acted in these matters. To record our satisfaction with these accomplishments is not, however, to suggest that our work is finished. As we examine in detail the work of the Department of National Health and Welfare, we will no doubt find other areas, both in the administrative and legislative fields, for changes and improvements.

One of the most important and valuable programs undertaken on the health side of the department is that represented by the national health grants. Through this program more than $35 million is made available in support of the health services and facilities of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is it not $48 million?

Mr. Halpenny: It is $35 million right now and it will be more next year but I am talking about 1957.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member said "available". I think it is $48 million available and perhaps $35 million has been spent.

Mr. Halpenny: Thirty-five million or $36 million has been spent, somewhere around there, and there is approximately $45 million available. Time does not permit an examination now of the many and varied phases of this program, but one of the problems to which we shall undoubtedly have to give our attention in the years ahead is the relationship of these grants to the new hospital insurance program which will come into effect in 1958 in some provinces and in 1959 in others, and which will have a very real but as yet unpredictable influence on the total structure of health services in this country.

To illustrate the connection between the national health grants program and the hospital insurance program, I need only refer to the fact that the major item in the national health grants program consists of hospital construction grants through which the federal department endeavours to stimulate the building of additional hospital beds to meet the demands which hospital insurance will undoubtedly create. One other important area of program on the health side of the department is that represented by the Indian and northern health services items in the estimates. I referred in my opening remarks to the fact that only $75 million in the estimates of this department is subject to an actual vote of parliament. I might have mentioned at that time that approximately 25 per cent of this total is represented by the salary item in the department as a whole; and likewise, to provide an indication of the relative importance of this item in the expenditure of the department, I should point out that the Indian, Eskimo and northern health services items taken as a whole represent about 25 per cent of the total amount which parliament is asked to vote in the estimates of this department.

May I at this time, Mr. Chairman, take the opportunity to express best wishes for Christmas and the new year to you, to your associates, to the officers of the house, the page boys, the stenographers, the members of the press, of whom there are not too many present at this moment, and to each and every member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Beech: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make some comment on the attitude of the hon. member for Essex East with regard to the $1,000 grant towards the capital cost of the construction of hospitals. It seemed to me that he was satisfied that this was a generous amount. I want to say that the hospital of which I happen to be a director is currently putting on a campaign to raise funds for an addition. When I see the canvassers going from door to door, alienating their friends and spending their valuable time in order to get a few extra dollars for this construction program, it seems to me that a grant of $1,000 a bed is a betrayal of these people. I sincerely hope that the government is going to take a more realistic attitude in the matter of grants for hospital construction.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words before the item carries. If I understood the minister correctly, when we began the discussion of the estimates of the department he indicated that he was going to follow the bad example of his predecessor and was not going to give us an outline of the activities of the department or of his plans for the future. While there may have been some reasonable excuse for the former minister not having done so in recent years on the ground that over a period of years he had made a good many statements and that as he had no new plans to offer it would simply be repetitious if he were to do so, nevertheless it came as a bit of a surprise to me that, with the bold, new government to which the minister belongs, according to statements he and others on the treasury benches have made, he did not see fit to give us some indication of just how the new broom was going to sweep clean. Perhaps after listening to the suggestions and comments made by members like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the minister may see fit to give us some indication before his estimates are carried as to just how we are going to see the new broom in action.

I noticed that the parliamentary assistant gave us quite a resumé of the legislation that had been put on the statute books by the former administration over a period of 22 years. He said what all of us in the house know, that certain amendments have been made to some of these acts since this session began. However, when some of us have the opportunity of assessing just how these amendments are working out perhaps we can be excused for not being quite as enthusiastic with regard to them as was the hon. member for London.

I have no desire to enter into an extended discussion of the subject. However, I should like to make it quite clear, along with other members from the province of British Columbia, that the delay and the silence with respect to when national hospital insurance is going to become effective in our province, referred to by some other speakers, are something about which we are concerned.

According to some reports I have seen in the British Columbia press we have the prospect that our provincial administration may be going to carry out some retrenchment of expenditures in this coming year. It is reported that one of the reasons for that retrenchment is some decline in the revenues that come from our provincial sales tax from which, as the minister knows, the expenses of our hospital insurance services are defrayed. If that is the case, then of course the minister will appreciate the fact that some of us at least in British Columbia are going to have a greater concern as to the future progress of our hospital system in British Columbia than perhaps we have had even before this time.

Any of us who have had any opportunity of a connection with any local hospital board in the province of British Columbia know that our local hospital boards in that province have been labouring under very serious difficulties in maintaining adequate services because of the financial limitations that are being imposed upon them by the provincial administration. For that reason we are more than ever concerned that the financial assistance that is provided under the act that we passed in this house should become available in our province at the earliest possible date.

I am not going to say any more on that subject except that I know the suggestion just made by the hon. member for York South is one which those of us in British Columbia who have seen the problems of our hospital boards there would most heartily second. On more than one occasion in previous discussions we have made it clear that because of the drastic increases in hospital construction costs that have taken place since the present figure was set we feel it to be unrealistic in that it does not bear anything like the same relationship to the costs of providing hospital beds and hospital accommodation that it did originally.

References have already been made to the fact that earlier this year we in this house passed a further increase to the old age pension. It is on record, of course, that those of us in the C.C.F. group considered that to be a step in the right direction. However, in our consideration of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and in our assessment of the effectiveness of the activities that are carried on under the responsibility of this minister, I think we must consider such things as this particular old age pension increase in the context of the general situation in the country. While on the face of it an extra $9 a month appears to be a very welcome addition to the income of those who are dependent primarily on that basic old age security pension,—and the same would apply to some of the other pensions that were increased—nevertheless I think part of our responsibility as members of parliament is to remain alert to what is happening to that money after it goes into the hands of the old age pensioners. There have been a good many indications—in the province of British Columbia at least—that the effective value of that $9 is already disappearing to a large extent. In many of the centres one hears increasing numbers of reports that most, if not all, of that amount has already been taken up by an increase in the rents which people receiving old age pension are going to have to pay.

According to reports I have seen, approaches in this connection have been made to the provincial administration for a resumption of rental controls. But apparently our provincial administration in British Columbia has turned a completely deaf ear to any suggestions of that kind. Perhaps it is not too surprising to some of us that that should be the case, because our provincial administration in British Columbia, just as our federal administration here, seem bound and determined that they are going still to worship at the feet of the golden calf of free enterprise. Just as in this house the present administration turned a deaf ear to our pleas the other day in respect of interest rates on housing, so apparently the provincial administration in British Columbia turned a deaf ear to any suggestion for action that was put to them, at least as far as the rental field is concerned.

As a matter of fact I drew the attention of the house the other day to the effect on the old age pensioners for whom people are attempting to provide low rental housing. The effect of the action of this government in the housing field, in continuing to allow the increase of interest rates that went into effect in the last year or two to remain in effect, is that no matter how they may try to work the thing out these societies are going to have to charge increased rentals to people on the old age pension. Those affected are not only those who are renting individual quarters, the same situation applies to those who are in some of the rest homes for aged persons.

I have here a communication which I received the other day which describes just such a situation. It describes how all of the people there, who are all over 70 years of age were looking forward to having that extra $9 in order to be able to have for the Christmas holiday season some extras that they had not previously been able to enjoy, and how they had been discussing among themselves the thought that, after the Christmas season, with their next $9 they would be able to go out and buy a few extras in the way of clothing which many of them needed badly, and how this interest and anticipation was brought to a sudden and abrupt conclusion when they received official notice that, effective January 1, their rates for room and board were going to go up by $10 a month. The net effect, of course, is that they are now going to be $1 a month less well off than they were before this parliament took the action that we took earlier this session.

These are some of the things that are happening, and these are some of the things that this present administration had better get busy and deal with more effectively than did the previous administration or they are not going to have any 22 years in which to enjoy the emoluments of office. The Canadian people, at least as I have observed them in the last few months, were roused to action. Without going into the gory details of the results of the June 10 election as far as membership of this house is concerned, by observers of the political scene who are outside this house I think it is generally agreed that actually what happened then was that the Canadian people were not voting so much for a new government as voting against inactivity and what some people have described as the complacency of the previous administration.

An hon. Member: I do not know how you could say that.

Mr. Barnett: I can say that because, as far as I am concerned and so far as any indication in this house to date is concerned, all we have got is a new version of the government we had before.

Perhaps the leader of the party to which my hon. friend belongs may have gone across Canada crying a little louder and a little harder than some of the other political spokesmen. He got elected, not because the people thought he was going to give a different kind of government but because they felt he was going to do some of the things which the other government had refused to do or at least do them in larger measure.

I may say that, while the hon. member may think the government he supports has been very kind and generous to the people with their own money in this particular session, when the Canadian people see what is happening to that generosity so far as its practical effect is concerned, and when they see the present administration is just as inconsistent as the previous administration in dealing with the fundamental economic problems of the country, then the day may not be too far away when they are going to look for a government different in kind rather than in degree. However, perhaps I am wandering a little from the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I have no intention of making prolonged remarks at this time but I do hope the minister will realize what is happening to these extra payments that have been going out in administering his department and that he will give us some indication of his attitude towards effective action to prevent moneys being dissipated in the manner which I have just described. I may have some other remarks to make on various items in the estimates of this department as we come to them, but I felt that this was a matter of such wide and general importance to the country that I should spend a few moments in bringing it to the attention of the house while we were still on the first estimate.

Mr. Olson: Before this first item passes there are one or two questions I would like to ask the minister. At page 1564 of Hansard I asked him a question on orders of the day as follows:

> How many of the provinces have indicated that they want the proposed hospitalization plan set up so that the federal government makes a specific contribution to national health and the details and administration of the scheme will be left in the hands of provincial authorities?

He replied as follows:

> —I know of no correspondence from any of the provinces to that effect.

He went on to say:

> I may be wrong. As I say, I have not had an opportunity to check my files, but if I have made an incorrect statement I will let the hon. member know.

I did not pursue the matter at that time because on the orders of the day was not the proper place in which to do it. I was not only concerned with the correspondence he may or may not have had. There have been some dominion-provincial conferences from time to time and there have no doubt also been conferences of a lesser degree between the various ministers of health and his department. I wanted this information from the minister because it seems that there has been some difficulty in getting the provinces to agree to Bill No. 320 in view of certain of the conditions attached to it.

I realize some of the provinces may have felt they could not meet the conditions required by Bill No. 320 in order to come under the act, and I know on several occasions the premier of Alberta, for example, has publicly indicated that that province is all for the health scheme which will be of benefit to all the people but is not too happy about having the federal government seriously intruding into matters which are actually under provincial jurisdiction. As several members have indicated today, national or public health is a provincial responsibility. Furthermore I have every reason to believe the province of Quebec has voiced the same rather strenuous objection to being told what to do—perhaps not exactly that—but to meeting the conditions as set out by the federal government.

Now surely we will have to determine where the responsibility for health lies and also where we are going to get the money to pay for it. If the provinces are to be responsible for public health and they do not have the fields of taxation necessary to take care of it, then they will have to come to the federal government. Of course I will agree that the federal government should be prepared to meet some of those costs, but on the other hand if they are going to insist that the details of administration in so far as items being included or excluded are concerned being a federal responsibility, then I suggest they are very definitely intruding on provincial jurisdiction.

There are perhaps some provinces who feel that their resources are just not sufficient to meet the conditions in Bill 320. If that is the case I think this department or this government should take another look and try to come up with something which will be acceptable to more of the provinces. Some of the richer provinces can probably meet these conditions and there are certain items, I understand, which are not contained in Bill No. 320 but which are already being looked after by certain provincial governments. It seems to me on the basis of what I have heard—and I am now asking the minister for clarification—that the provinces are not too satisfied with this bill and I would like to know specifically what objections have been raised.

Mr. Carter: I have two very brief questions which I think had best be asked on this item because I have not found any other items in the estimates to which they seem related. In my riding we have three travelling clinics. They are very small boats of about 50 feet in length with a crew of two in which a doctor travels around the territory allocated to him and visits the various settlements in his district on a regular schedule. Now these travelling clinics were provided by grants from the Department of National Health and Welfare. There is a need on these boats at the present time for the provision of radio telephones. These boats, as I said, have a crew of only two. Sometimes they have to carry a nurse, and at other times they have to take a patient to hospital, and they are powered by only a single engine. We have had one or two narrow escapes due to the engine giving out, and it was only by a miracle that the people on board saved their lives. This could have been avoided had the ships been equipped with a radio telephone service which would have enabled them to contact other ships lying in the harbours nearby. On one particular occasion a doctor and a nurse had to row several miles in a small boat in very rough seas before they could get aid. I have made some inquiries about this matter, and I understand the initiative in this respect must come from the provinces, and my first question to the minister is whether any representations have been made to his department by the provincial government of Newfoundland to have this equipment provided.

My second question has to do with a certificate necessary for boats sailing to foreign ports. I believe it is called a deratization certificate. That means it is a certificate which certifies that the ship is free from rodents, and ships without this certificate are not allowed to enter certain foreign ports. Prior to confederation the provincial authority provided this certificate at St. John's but when confederation took place the province was no longer able to supply it and our ships had to go to Halifax in order to get this certificate to enable them to sail to foreign ports. Sailing all the way from St. John's Newfoundland to Halifax just to get a certificate caused tremendous inconvenience as well as extra expense, as hon. members will realize. The matter was brought to the attention of the former government and steps were being taken to have the situation remedied. My second question to the minister is as to whether these steps have been finalized or, if not, what stage of progress has now been reached.

Mr. Ellis: Listening to the parliamentary assistant speak I wondered whether he had gone through Hansard for the last few years looking up some of the speeches by the former minister of health and welfare, because the remarks he made had a very familiar ring. They had been brought up to date a little but nevertheless they consisted of extolling the government for the amount of money it was spending on this department, just as the former minister would have done.

I suggest, as my colleague the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has done, that there have been no changes in policy as a result of the so-called change of government resulting from the election on June 10 last. We had hoped that with the replacement of the old government there might be some fresh approach to the question of health and welfare in Canada, but I notice that the estimates we are considering today remain unchanged; to the best of by knowledge I do not think there has been a single alteration in any one of the estimates drawn up by the minister of health in the former government.

I am particularly interested in the fate of the hospital plan. We have had provincial hospitalization in my own province for quite a number of years, and we are very proud of that plan—the first to be instituted by any government on the North American continent. We did not wait a long time after we took office, but we set out immediately to bring in the hospitalization plan at the earliest possible moment. That was done, and any pride which we have expressed, any boasting in which we might have been inclined to indulge, was done after the plan had been put into effect and after the people of the province had been enjoying its benefits. So I would suggest there is a great deal to be done by the present minister of health before he and his colleagues in the house can, for obvious political purposes, boast about what the present government is doing.

We are quite concerned about the question of tubercular sanatoria and mental hospitals, and we hope the government does not intend to proceed with the policy of giving with one hand and taking away with the other hand, and that any sums paid with respect to the hospital plan will in no way affect the general picture in so far as dominion-provincial fiscal relationships are concerned.

The hon. member for York South raised a point which I had long felt had been overlooked and ignored by the previous government, and apparently the present government is also turning a deaf ear to entreaties made in respect of it. I know the present regulations provide for a grant for capital construction of an active treatment bed of $1,000 per bed, and this grant is to be matched or exceeded by the provincial government, and in no circumstances shall the federal grant exceed one-third of the total over-all cost of capital construction. I ask the minister, since this proportion of one-third is involved, why he does not consider it advisable, and indeed necessary, to make a grant of one-third of the total over-all cost of a hospital bed? As the hon. member for York South pointed out, $1,000 per bed is a far cry from the type of assistance which the federal government ought to be granting. I have not with me at the moment the figures for the cost of construction per hospital bed in different parts of the country, but I know there are areas in Canada where it costs about $13,000 or $14,000 per bed.

In the circumstances a grant of one-third, which the regulations mention as being the maximum permissible amount which the federal government can provide, in other words a payment of some $4,000 a bed, would not be out of line, and I agree with one of the hon. minister's colleagues on his own side of the house who stated that it is nonsense to think the federal government is making any worth while contribution to hospital construction as long as it is limiting the grant per bed to a mere $1,000.

Hospital construction costs continue to rise. The former minister of health was quite prepared to turn a deaf ear to the entreaties we made over the years respecting this item, but I had hoped that the new minister would see fit to bring in increases with regard to this very important item of construction. The arguments which have frequently been made against a hospital plan for Canada are that there are not enough hospital beds to go around. We heard the same in Saskatchewan; the Liberal party in that province opposed the plan, and the most frequently used argument for doing so was that there were not enough hospital beds available to make it possible. If there are not enough beds, the obvious answer lies in hospital construction. If there are not enough beds in the provinces or in Canada we have to build them. That is the obvious answer and I presume the federal grant was designed to encourage hospital construction in Canada as the parliamentary assistant pointed out. Surely the minister is not going to suggest to hon. members of this committee that $1,000 out of a capital construction cost anywhere from 12 to 14 times that amount is a grant of a sufficient size to actively encourage hospital construction in Canada. I would hope that the minister would give serious consideration to the future program of activities to be carried on by his department.

I note that there has not been too much enthusiasm on the part of the government so a far as a national hospital plan is concerned and I think that is completely understandable. There has been a Conservative government in Ontario for a great number of years now and in spite of that fact there is no hospitalization plan in that province. I suggest that the reason the premier of Ontario decided to have his province become one of the six provinces to ask for inclusion in the national hospital plan was more out of a desire to put the former government on the spot than it was to actively promote the establishment of a hospitalization plan throughout this country. As long as the provinces of Quebec and Ontario would refuse to participate it gave the former minister of national health and welfare what he considered an excellent excuse for going up and down the country pointing out that the Liberal government wanted to bring in a hospital plan but was being thwarted in so doing by the two major provinces, Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Morton: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Does he not realize that Premier Frost had to build hospitals before he could make this announcement?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I will admit that hospitals are being built in every province in Canada but that has nothing to do with a national hospital plan. Hospitals are being built because they have to be built.

Mr. Morton: You cannot have a national health plan without hospitals.

Mr. Ellis: I realize that. I have read editorial opinions in newspapers in the province of Ontario by opponents of the hospital plan who argued that you cannot have a hospital plan because there are not enough hospital beds but I remind hon. gentlemen that that sort of reasoning did not prevail in my own province. We wanted to see a hospital plan in effect and so we proceeded to put one in effect. We did not talk about it or attempt to find excuses for not doing so. There is no reason why the province of Ontario, one of the wealthier provinces of Canada, could not have given the people who live in that province a hospital plan many years ago. When Premier Frost put the former government on the spot by saying, "Yes, we are prepared to go ahead," I am sure it caused the former minister of national health and welfare a great deal of acute embarrassment. Mr. Frost's attitude is illustrated by the fact that he put certain limitations on his acceptance. He did not want to bring it in right away and suggested it be done in 1959.

When the government changed I hoped that the new administration would accept the fact that there are two provinces in Canada which have had successful hospital plans in operation for a number of years and which have been urging year in and year out that the federal government fulfil its pledge by bringing in a national health insurance plan. In my own province we look upon our hospitalization plan as being the effort which the province is putting forward in order to encourage the development of a general health plan for all of Canada. We had hoped that when the federal government brought in a comprehensive national health plan we would be able to supply the people in our province with full medical health care, hospitalization, doctor care and the type of treatment all the people of Canada have a right to expect and enjoy but we have witnessed procrastination and stalling on the part of the present government. When we asked the minister whether the provinces of Saskatchewan and British Columbia which have plans in operation would be offered agreements and whether this government would make it possible for those provinces to enter the national scheme on January 1 next we received nothing but evasive answers. I suggest there is no good reason whatever why those two provinces should not be able to enjoy any benefit which might accrue from the hospital plan brought in by the former government and which, since the present government is simply continuing the policies adopted by the former administration, we presume the present government will carry through.

We in the C.C.F. look upon a hospital plan as being merely a part of a general over-all health plan to provide the Canadian people with the type of medical and health care necessary in this day and age. We Canadians boast about our wealth, our gross national product, about the number of automobiles we have and the material wealth that abounds in this country but I suggest that the real yardstick by which to measure a nation's wealth is the manner in which its federal government provides for the social welfare and health needs of the people of that country. It is not the number of people who drive big cars or the number who live in expensive homes that is important. The government must be judged on the basis of the provision of services to the people of Canada and particularly those services in the field of health and education which are so essential to our survival as a nation. I would urge upon the minister that he proceed as rapidly as possible with the implementation of the hospital plan and that he consider it as merely the first instalment on an over-all health plan to provide for the health needs of every man, woman and child in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the minister replies I would like to put one very brief question. When he speaks would the minister give us all the examples of waste and extravagance that the Minister of Finance has been boasting about so much that he has found in his department and would he indicate by how much he has already succeeded in reducing the estimates Mr. Harris placed before parliament earlier this year?

Mr. Monteith: The hon. member for Essex East asked that question this morning. Were you not here?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, when the minister replies I would like him to say if he intends to present additional estimates for the current year as did the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Peters: Just before the minister speaks, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on the need for further research in two important fields. One of the major health problems confronting Canadians and people everywhere today is cancer. All of us, I am sure, personally know people who have died of cancer and, as individuals, I am sure we continually worry about the question of lung cancer. I would like the minister to tell us what research has been done by the federal government into the question of lung cancer and what the results of that research have been.

Another illness into which some research should be conducted is silicosis. In my part of the country where miners are working in hard rock we are continually plagued with the problem of silicosis. No doubt some hon. members have read in recent months that the incidence of silicosis is dropping very rapidly. The Ontario provincial government on a number of occasions has been asked to investigate this situation and it has established clinics and hospitals capable of dealing with the illness but I do not think the question of basic research into the problem of silicosis has been touched.

In my own area a number of years ago the McIntyre mine established a medical foundation for investigating this condition and they experimented with the prevention of contagion through the inhalation of aluminum dust.

It is quite true that in the hard rock mining areas that have an incidence of silica dust the rate of known silicosis has dropped quite extensively; but the miners and the people in those communities are very fearful. We are told—and this comes not from the Canadian government but from governments across the world, including the governments of Australia, Germany, South Africa and many of the other federal and national governments which have done research into this situation—that the only cure for silicosis is the prevention of silica dust in the air and that can only be accomplished by proper ventilation. I am not suggesting that our people in Canada are not worth as much as people in some of the other countries where they have this problem but I do not think we have been facing up to it.

In the years they have been mining the mining communities have spent very little on ventilation. They have been told that the research work which the McIntyre foundation did on silicosis is preventing silicosis at the present time. The miners do not agree with that. You can go into Kirkland Lake, Timmins, Noranda, Val D'Or, or any of the northern mining communities, and you will see men 50 years of age who can hardly walk down the street because of the difficulties they have in getting their breath. I would suggest that part of this problem is due to the fact that we have added to the dust in their lungs the aluminum dust that is put into the air. You might say that this is not a matter that affects the Canadian government, but I suggest that research has to be done in this field because the same problem is affecting miners from the Yellowknife and Northwest Territories and every province in Canada where there is a silica problem.

The aluminum dust is added to the other dusts that we breathe both in the mines and on the streets of the towns and to that is added the industrial dusts. To these regular dusts, you add aluminum dust. It is true that when you examine the X-ray plates they do not show clear-cut silicosis. They may show an aggravation of tuberculosis, or they may show nothing at all, but we are finding that these people are having more and more difficulty year by year in breathing and in getting blood circulation to take its proper course. They are dying very young, but their death certificates do not say "silicosis" which is a compensatory disease; they show heart trouble or some of the other pulmonary diseases which are not compensatory. I am suggesting—and it has been suggested by people more capable than I—that the aluminum dust which these mining companies are adding is increasing the problem. It is not a case of whether you want to take the treatment; you have to take it if you work in those communities.

Some hon. members may not know how this is done. In a mining operation there will be a dry room. That is a place where you hang up your clothes. You take off your good clothes in one place and you go to another room where you put on your work clothes and in this room there are a number of air lines and in those air lines they insert a small can of aluminum powder. Under pressure this aluminum powder is blown into the air and anybody walking through that air absorbs into his lungs, a certain percentage of the aluminum dust.

When we have discussed this problem with doctors who are supposed to be experts in this field and have asked them to show us an X-ray plate which has such an accumulation of aluminum that it would be compensatory—and remember, in Germany aluminosis is a compensatory disease the same as silicosis is in our country—they have informed us they have never seen X-ray plates that had that amount of aluminum dust indicated on them. I suggest these people are taking this as a prophylactic treatment. Many of them are under the opinion that the incidence of silicosis in Canada has not decreased; it has been covered up. I think the federal government should spend more money and time on doing some research in this field. I am sure it would be possible to get X-ray plates from Germany and other countries that are paying compensation for aluminosis and in that way we could find out just what we are doing to the Canadian people when we fill their lungs full of aluminum dust rather than air. We find that the mortality rate among miners working in hard rock mines is probably just as high as it was a number of years ago. We are also finding, unfortunately, that these people are restricted in getting the compensation that would be their right under the treatment that they are now being compelled to take whether they wish to take it or not.

I also think the Canadian government should do some research into the matter of compulsory portable pensions, particularly for the basic industries of mining and lumbering. We know that the wealth of Canada probably depends to a much greater extent on the health and welfare of our Canadian people than it does on any other single commodity we have and therefore I think we should, if we can, implement an industrial type of pension plan which would allow those people to retire before they have reached the very end of the road. Then we would probably have something to help them along.

Another matter that should be studied very extensively by the Department of National Health and Welfare is nutrition. It is true that in Canada we eat as much as we wish. In the main we are not a hungry nation but we can all remember what happened at the beginning of the war. We were surprised at the vast number of people who tried to enlist for service in that war and were turned down because they were suffering from what the authorities at that time called malnutrition. In my part of the country, northern Ontario, we have both Indian and Eskimo populations. They do not live in my particular riding, but in the vicinity and they are undoubtedly suffering from malnutrition because their diets are not balanced by any stretch of the imagination. Something should be done to assist those people to get the right type of nutrition when they are young so that they will have better teeth and better health in later years.

A few minutes ago one hon. member said something about a health insurance program —the wish is father to the thought—a hospital insurance program in Ontario. From my own observations, since Premier Frost made the declaration that Ontario would embark on a hospitalization plan, I have not seen any great addition to hospitals taking place in the province of Ontario. I am sure the same thing will happen in Ontario that happened in other provinces. We do not need to wait until the hospitals are built. We need a hospitalization plan and once we get that, the hospitals will get built that much sooner. The sooner the federal government gives an impetus to the hospital insurance plan the sooner will it come to pass in Ontario.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks. I will be quite brief. Personally, I want to express my admiration and appreciation of the work done by the staff in this most important department. When my wife and I visited England last summer I had the opportunity to see some of this type of work being done by authorities under the municipal, county, and government of Great Britain. On a number of occasions people with knowledge of what was being done in Canada made very complimentary references to the work being done by the staff of the Department of National Health and Welfare in this country.

In order to save time may I say that I support wholeheartedly the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that great champion of health insurance, welfare and the needs of labouring people, the underprivileged and every underdog in the country. I also want to say that I think there is a great need for increased grants in aid for the construction of hospitals. The present grant of $1,000 a bed is completely insufficient under present conditions. I was very pleased to hear the hon. member for York South make some reference to the present situation being a betrayal of the needs of the people at this time. I urge that some consideration be given to this matter.

Prior to coming to this larger sphere of activity—I am not sure of whether it is of influence as far as I am concerned—I was for 20 years a member of a hospital board. I can remember that when we opened our hospital years ago I had the pleasure of taking the present prime minister of Great Britain through the hospital and showing him all its magnificent equipment and modern up-to-date arrangements. I think there were three bedrooms with three beds and six chairs. He was then Captain Harold Macmillan of the Grenadier or Coldstream Guards—I am not sure which—and he was military aide de camp to the Duke of Devonshire. Anyway I will not forget that on that occasion the Duke of Devonshire and Captain Macmillan had occasion to make short speeches and they really patted us on the back. Ever since that time I have been most interested in hospitals.

I do urge that serious consideration be given to increasing these grants. There is a growing need and increasing difficulties are being experienced by local hospital boards and authorities. I am confident that only through the government increasing the grant can we be assured of getting the hospital beds that are required.

I shall make a brief reference to another question. I had occasion recently to have two of the department's publications come over my desk and I was very pleased to get them both. One is a synopsis of the services for the aged in Canada, issued by the research division of the department. I think it is a most excellent synopsis of what is being done by the department and I suggest that any member who is interested in obtaining a good synopsis of the history of the matter and the legislation that the department administers should get a copy of the document. The other one is a synopsis of planning for the aged in Canada issued by the director of the research division of the department. I received it in response to a query as to what was being done with regard to studies in connection with the aged so far as the department is concerned. I would also recommend that members who are interested in this question secure a copy of the document from the research division of the department.

That brings me to another point. I noticed that recently the first Ontario conference on aging was held and I mention it because I have always been very interested in the question. I have seen so many people spend a good number of their latter years without any real enjoyment and in many cases quite unnecessarily because of lack of proper diet or in some cases minor medical or hospital treatment. I was very pleased to see that such a conference had been held and I just want to mention its two main objectives. They are set out in an article in the December issue of Canadian Labour published by the Canadian Labour Congress.

The two main objectives of the conference were: (1) to find out what the problems of the aging in Ontario actually were, and how to go about finding solutions for them, and (2) to provide an opportunity for those working in this field to learn of each other's activities and discuss coordinated plans for the future.

The program was designed to cover five main aspects of aging: (1) Cost of living and retirement income; (2) Housing and living arrangements; (3) Community services; (4) Employment, unemployment and retirement; and (5) Care, treatment and rehabilitation in hospitals and homes.

I think the agenda of the conference and its purposes were very well organized and I suggest that the Department of National Health and Welfare should use all its influence to get this sort of work going in other provinces and supply whatever assistance it can. I am sure if we get a sufficient number of people to understand the problem and secure co-operation at the local level our provincial and federal plans to assist our older folks, as I like to call them rather than senior citizens, will be very much advanced and improved.

I am tempted by the somewhat tempestuous remarks, shall I say, of the hon. member for London, on the occasion of his first speech in the house, to mention a letter that I received this morning indicating what needs to be done yet in order to care properly for the requirements of our older folks. Incidentally I thought the hon. member took a rather boastful approach to the situation. I believe in giving credit where it is due. The present government has done some worth-while things during its short time in office and I give them credit for it but it must be remembered that the work that has been done is laid on foundations established by the previous government over a great many years—

Mr. Hodgson: Too many years.

Mr. Herridge: —the mortar and bricks for which were largely supplied by the members of this group.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What about our Social Credit friends?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a little straw.

Mr. Herridge: I give them credit too. I think on occasion I have heard them say something on this subject throughout the years although it was so faint that my memory fails me at this time. The letter I received this morning comes from a gentleman in Port Hope who is very concerned about the conditions in some of the homes provided in Ontario for our older folks under a Conservative government. He refers to one home. I shall not mention the place but there has been an investigation and a report. He points out in his letter that the federal government provides $3 a day for the maintenance of immigrants, and no one is objecting to that because we have got to care for them, but only 17 cents per meal is provided for the care of these people in this home. He mentions that there are four to nine persons in a bedroom, that there is absolutely no privacy and that the $9 increase in old age security or old age assistance has been collared by the people who run the home with the result that the poor old folks have not benefited to any extent at all.

Mr. Beech: Is that a private home?

Mr. Herridge: I am not sure whether or not it is. I will show the hon. member the letter if he would like to see it. The writer does not say but he complains very bitterly about it. The letter comes from Port Hope. In another letter I have received he mentions the unfortunate conditions under which some of our old people have to live in the homes provided for them. A week or two ago I visited some friends who come from Russell, I think it is, and they were telling me of the situation in that county with respect to the care of older people and the things that need to be done before they are properly provided for.

I mention this just by way of illustration and rather as a counterbalance to the rather bumptious remarks of the parliamentary assistant and to show that there is a great deal more to be done. I urge the minister and his officers to do what they can to increase the study of the problems of the aging, to develop wider understanding and greater co-operation throughout the country with a view to getting the support of people and worthwhile organizations in the smaller communities for the efforts of provincial and federal governments to do something to improve the present situation and achieve the objectives that have been laid out by the first conference on aging held in Ontario.

Mr. Fisher: The first matter I wish to draw to the attention of the committee is in relation to the building in Ontario of a number of new homes for the aged and the difficulty these people have in recovering the sales tax refund through the channels, I believe, of the Department of National Revenue. I should like to put on the record an analysis of the situation made last January by the then hon. member for Port Arthur, Mr. Howe. In referring to this matter he said:

> The trouble seems to lie in the fact that section 47 of the Excise Tax Act was never really intended to apply to the construction of new institutions. It is worded in such a way as to make it clear that it is intended to deal essentially with institutions that are already in existence and that are operating on the basis of a clearly established policy.

Then Mr. Howe went on to state how the institution qualifies and he wound up with this statement:

> It would appear that the only solution to this problem may be to obtain an amendment to the Excise Tax Act. Changes in this act are now being considered—

And he completes the letter.

I understand from the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance that there has been no question of bringing in this amendment yet. I gather also from this file of correspondence that Mr. Cecile of the Ontario government has been in touch with the minister's department in connection with this matter. I just want to impress upon him that we should like to have that change made. What I mean is this. The sales tax for Port Arthur undoubtedly will be coming through. But there are going to be a number of these institutions. Our sister city is planning one. There is no reason at all why they should have to wait so long in order to get this refund and to have such difficulty about certification. This point needs to be especially made because at the present time our new home for the aged is embroiled in a controversy with our local council over this matter and it would have a much better financial position to express at the present time if it had had this sales tax refund in connection with building the institution.

The other two matters I wanted to speak about relate to physical fitness and to sport. As the minister is aware, I know, during the last war there was developed a tremendous concern about physical fitness in this country. An act was implemented that was under the jurisdiction of the former minister and there was a physical fitness division which was designed to give grants to the provinces and generally to stimulate physical fitness. A couple of years ago that just sort of petered out and as I understand it the physical fitness division in the old concept has gone. In looking at the debates at the time when the physical fitness division was disappearing, I find that the general attitude of the house seemed to be that this was legislation that did not work, that there did not seem to be any great need for it. In the interim we have had such series as a very responsible newspaper like the Montreal Gazette has been running recently on physical fitness of Canadians and analysing it from the point of view of the tremendous changes in our society that have created a softness and a slackness in us —through the motor car and other developments like that—that cry for a real physical fitness program in the nation.

We happen to have in Canada a great expert on physical fitness, namely Lloyd Percival, who every week for many years has put on a program on the C.B.C. I believe he has had over 500 programs now. It is designed for youngsters and young boys. There has been a tremendous response to that program. He has had several hundred thousand letters. There have been some disturbing conclusions from his correspondence and from his investigations. I would suggest that it might be a good idea if the minister in this particular regard consult with Mr. Percival and get some sort of assurance from him. After all, he is a man who is in touch with this particular field and we seem to be lagging behind.

From a personal point of view, my hobby happens to be the history of sports in Canada. In tracing through the trouble that sports such as hockey and lacrosse have fallen on in the last 25 or 30 years we see there has been a tremendous switch in our whole attitude toward leisure. While there are some magnificent developments in the field of hunting, fishing and that sort of thing that are giving our people a real opportunity to exploit the great out of doors that we have, the fact remains that in straight physical terms we do not seem to be developing enough tough and fit people. Perhaps we can look around the house and see examples of that. Perhaps we can look at ourselves. I know the Minister of Transport has a good idea of somehow creating a small gymnasium right in the House of Commons, on the theory that we are going to continue to have more and more young members, these young keen men especially on the far side. If we had a bicycle machine and some weight lifting equipment here we might stave off a few of these heart attacks and perhaps start at this problem right at the heart of the nation, or we like to think that it is the heart of it.

The problem of physical fitness is not one that you can legislate. It comes in from many directions. It is extremely complicated. But surely the national department that embraces this matter has a responsibility that the minister could well take an interest in. I know, as soon as he does begin to take an interest in it the kind of criticism he is going to encounter. So many people, conscious of the tax dollar, look at it as a very frivolous thing on which to spend money. It does not seem so frivolous if we are as conscious of the Russian threat as we like to think we are. There is a tremendous interest now in improving our educational set-up, especially in scientific fields. Yet if any of you have ever been associated with war you have to recognize that physical fitness is the final and deciding factor in so many cases, especially in any sort of war or struggle where you have to hold ground. At the present time our young people seem to be lacking in physical fitness and certainly our middleage people in many cases are not examples to them.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Moving on from that to another aspect of physical fitness brings me into the very touchy field of sport and international sport. In Canada there is a tremendous desire amongst the people as a whole that our sporting representatives at Olympic games, empire games and any sort of team sports with which we are associated with the rest of the world we should do better. There is almost an inferiority complex which has developed in relation to the United States in this regard. If one goes back in our Canadian sporting history to before the turn of the century he will find that Canadians can be extremely proud about their heritage in that regard. Up until the late 1890's Canada used to dominate most of the sporting relationships she had with the United States. Canadians took a great deal of pride in it. I believe over $50,000 were bet on Ned Hanlan back in the 1880's when he was rowing away over in Australia. There was great concern.

All these things go to build up national pride. We saw a reflection of this when our hockey team, several years ago, took a defeat and so many people throughout the country took it as a national disaster. You have seen the recent reaction to the rather victorious Russian hockey visit. We are hurt, although we try to be good sports about it, that this thing has developed. This may seem extraneous and far away from the minister's estimates. But sooner or later if we are going to take our position in the international sporting world there must be recognition by the national government that we have a greater responsibility than we have taken in the past. There is no reason why our lacrosse teams and our other teams going abroad should perform in such a slip-shod fashion, why we should send such unfit teams and why, in the training preparatory to the games at all times, our teams have to have such makeshift arrangements.

Now in Toronto, private enterprise—with which your party is so proud to identify itself—has been doing a good job, largely sparked by the people connected with the Canadian national exhibition and there are some very promising results, but there just is not sufficient interest developed until the games are actually taking place. I think that is another aspect which the officials and the minister might keep in mind. I am sure he is not planning and will not plan to do anything about it immediately, but it does seem to me that is worthy of consideration by his department and that strenuous effort should be made to improve the prestige of this nation which means so much to us all in the international sporting field by enlightened government support of the various facets of sport.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to join with all those who have said very kind words about the officials of this department. I walked into the office at the corner of Bank and Slater on the afternoon of August 22 and I had to inquire as to where those offices were. I had had no idea previously as I had never been in them before but I soon found myself being made feel very much at home and the assistance given to me at that time and which is still given to me today, for I am certainly very much in the learning stage, has been tremendous. I just could not have gone along without the excellent help of the splendid members of my staff.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Monteith: There are one or two questions which I think I might clear up as I go along. The hon. member for Port Arthur mentioned sales tax refunds to county homes. I would like to thank the hon. member for mentioning that subject. However, we do now certify to the Department of National Revenue on these sales tax refunds and I think it is on our certifications that action is taken. Now whether the delay is in our department or not I could not say, although I do not think it can be. When we are asked to certify, the information goes out immediately and I do not think we could be considered responsible for delay. I would also like to thank the hon. member for his remarks concerning physical fitness. I would point out that in my department we have a physical fitness consultant on the staff.

The member for Kootenay West also very kindly mentioned my staff. I might mention that the hospital construction grants, which have been mentioned by several members, are being studied, but that is all I can say in that connection.

With respect to the recent old age increase of $9, several members have mentioned that subject and I have seen newspaper items in this connection. I think all we can do is say that the cheque goes to the recipient. Certainly we give the increase to the beneficiary mentioned. While I am assuming it is the business of county home organizations, or whoever may be concerned with matters of this type, as to what they do about raising rents, at the same time I personally would be very disappointed if the beneficiary did not receive some additional amount as a result of the $9 increase.

The member for Timiskaming made some very helpful suggestions. I would point out to him with respect to cancer research, however, that prior to 1948-1949 the fundamental research on cancer was limited in Canada due to lack of facilities, senior research personnel and assured long-term support. Although national research council did allocate grants for short-term projects, applications received were not commensurate to the extent of the problem to stimulate and co-ordinate basic research. The national research council was established in 1947. Research increased rapidly and in 1948 to 1949 projects totalling 25 were started. In 1954 to 1955, 78 projects as well as 14 research fellowships were started. For 1956 to 1957 the total was 81 awards granted involving some $540,000 in addition to 17 research fellowships for a total value of $65,000. In 1956 to 1957 roughly 70 per cent of the money was provided by the Canadian cancer society and most of the remaining 30 per cent was provided by federal-provincial grants. In all, over the past nine years, a total of $900,000 has been provided in support of research through the health grants program, with an equal amount from provincial sources. It is quite an extensive program and it has been growing very rapidly.

The hon. member also mentioned silicosis and I understand that the provincial authorities actually do look after this matter but we have and will upon request make surveys. I also understand we have made a survey in Nova Scotia and I am not sure about the others but I will be happy to look into that question.

The member for Montmagny-L'Islet asked if I was going to have any increased or further supplementary estimates—

Mr. Lesage: Additional.

Mr. Monteith: Additional, yes. There will be some for Hungarian immigration medical and a transfer to do whatever is necessary for old age security.

Mr. Lesage: But not for family allowances.

Mr. Monteith: No transfer to the old age security fund.

There have been several suggestions about hospital insurance and I may come to them a little later—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister answer my brief question at this time?

Mr. Monteith: Yes, I am not proposing any reductions in the estimates at this time. I do not doubt that the department might be able to find some savings somewhere along the line and I am hoping to keep a close eye on that but I am not making any motion for reduction.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman did not quite understand my question. It was not what he thought but what the Minister of Finance thought. The minister boasted several times that he had found extravagances.

Mr. Monteith: Well, you ask the Minister of Finance about that, will you?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I will.

Mr. Monteith: The member for Medicine Hat inquired concerning certain matters which he considered were problems. Yes, there are some problems having to do with hospital insurance and I will come back to those in a moment.

The member for Burin-Burgeo inquired as to travelling clinics. I might mention that there has been $20,000 approved this year for a radio telephone service based on St. Anthony, Newfoundland, extending the service into Labrador. If an approach is received for a similar service on the four south coast boats already operating by the grant we will certainly be glad to look into the matter.

The hon. member also inquired as to deratization services. This matter has been brought to my attention and I will be happy to look into it and consider the matter further.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni felt that possibly I should have made an opening statement. I do not see any particular benefit which would have been derived by my doing that. I should like to point out that five pieces of legislation have gone through the house under my sponsorship, with one more at least to come, and these have provided a fairly busy period. He said that probably a new broom might sweep clean. I think I mentioned when I first stood up that I had a particularly good staff. I am certainly finding that the department is well run. There may be some changes; I mentioned in a previous debate I was going to give consideration to a lot of things, such as the regulations under the disability act—a more considered study than possibly has been made for some little time. I have a lot of these things to look into when the house rises and I find the odd moment in which to do it.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, when I referred to sweeping with a broom I was not referring to sweeping out some of the staff; I was referring to sweeping out some of the dusty policies of the previous administration.

Mr. Monteith: I intend to do some of that too. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned specifically the six provinces, and went on to inquire what we were going to do in this respect. All I can say is what the Prime Minister said at the opening of the dominion-provincial conference:

> Unless you express strong reasons to the contrary we are inclined now to recommend to parliament a change in the law to remove the "six provinces" clause and to substitute for it an earlier and more definite date for commencement of the plan.

That legislation is to go before the house as announced.

The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke was concerned about research, and mental health research particularly. Our total research program this year for mental research amounts to over $500,000. That figure has grown tremendously over the years.

I rather think, Mr. Chairman, that covers most of the specific questions asked, except that there were many statements and questions put with regard to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. I should like to assure the hon. member for Essex East that I am firmly of the belief that this act is going to be operative in Canada earlier than it would have been if he had still been holding this office. I believe that very definitely. We have been accused by several hon. members of delay. I do not feel there is any justification for that statement whatsoever. The act was passed—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then show us the evidence.

Mr. Monteith: It was the hon. member's opinion that there has been delay. It is my opinion that there has not been any delay.

Mr. Pickersgill: How about a few facts?

Mr. Monteith: I am going to give you a few facts. The act was passed in 1957—it was proclaimed on May 1—and the draft forms of agreement were circulated for study together with the draft regulations. Teams of officials visited all the provinces in the course of last summer expressing desire to discuss the bill.

The dominion-provincial conference was held late in November. In the meantime there was discussion back and forth between provincial and federal officials, and then a technical conference was called for December 11, 12 and 13. Technical officials were invited to this conference from all the provinces and I may point out that representatives came from all provinces with the exception of Alberta. By the way, during the dominion-provincial conference I had discussions with the minister from Manitoba, the minister from Alberta and the minister from British Columbia. I also had a short conversation with the premier of Saskatchewan. I have had conversations with representatives of Ontario, also, and I should like to point out that while Alberta was the only province refusing to come to the dominion-provincial technical conference early in December, I think possibly that province would have benefited if representatives had attended. At that time, many differences of opinion were ironed out, though there are one or two still outstanding. We think the act is administratively possible the way it is. I realize that there has possibly been some disagreement about that, but I do feel this last conference ironed out practically all the difficult points.

I should like to conclude at this point by stating that all the steps necessary toward the implementation of the hospital insurance act have been going forward. It is certainly going to be in operation and the provinces will be receiving federal grants, as the Prime Minister stated in the conference, "at an earlier and more definite date". I do not think I have anything further to say on the matter, but if there are any questions I shall be glad to deal with them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did the minister not take note of the remarks made regarding mental and tubercular hospitals?

Mr. Monteith: Yes, I have. I could say this. It stands exactly where it stood when I was asked a question a short time ago, I think. At any rate it is a matter of government policy and at this moment I am not stating what is going to happen.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister accept a question now on this point?

Mr. Monteith: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I may say that I do not have on my desk at the moment the record of the open session of the federal-provincial conference but as I recall it the Prime Minister made a statement that day with regard to mental and tubercular hospitals similar to the one he made about the six-province requirement. In other words, up until that time the government and the Conservative party seemed willing to go ahead with the idea of including mental and tubercular hospitals in this legislation but as the minister knows there is no record of what was said at the federal-provincial conference the next day.

Mr. Monteith: But there was quite a divergence of opinion later on the opening day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Was it a divergence of opinion that changed the government's mind on this matter?

Mr. Monteith: No, I would not say that. I would simply say there was not unanimity of opinion as there was regarding the six-provinces provision.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since the minister is talking about what happened on Monday, November 25—in other words I will not ask him what happened in the secret session—will he tell us which provinces expressed a desire for any change in the position?

Mr. Monteith: It is in the record of the proceedings of the open session of the conference.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister has his copy on his desk and I do not have mine here. He can answer the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the minister answers that question, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will permit my putting a further question, I would ask this. Is this not the situation: the Prime Minister at the dominion-provincial conference announced that the government proposed to include tuberculosis and mental illness in the hospital insurance act thereby committing the federal government to sharing with the provinces the cost of these two coverages under that act, but that the Prime Minister, in contradiction of what he had said during the course of the election and what he had urged along with others when they were in opposition, said that those inclusions would take place but that any money spent by the federal government with respect to these two inclusions representing an estimated expenditure of some $68 million would be deducted from any further grants made under the fiscal agreements. Some of the provinces who were anxious to have mental illness and tuberculosis included were not perpared to accept that particular proposal. Is that not the situation?

Mr. Monteith: I am sorry, but I was examining the record of the dominion-provincial conference to see what the Prime Minister actually said on that day. As I understand the hon. member for Essex East he is suggesting that the amount which might be required to implement the inclusion of mental and tubercular hospitals would be reduced from any additional amount which might be given to the provinces?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Monteith: I think it is only reasonable to expect that that would happen. An amount of $70 million or so cannot be tossed around casually, you know.

Mr. Marler: It was tossed around during the election, though.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But that was not the question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He simply asked if it was not a fact that the government had announced at the dominion-provincial conference a change of policy and that mental illness and tuberculosis would be included and that gave rise to much hope.

Mr. Monteith: If there was unanimity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think the Prime Minister said "if there was unanimity". I may be wrong in that particular but in that context I do not think he used those words. In any event if tuberculosis and mental illness were included the amount given by the federal government for those two coverages would be deducted from any increase in further grants made pursuant to the fiscal agreements.

That is not what the Prime Minister said during the course of the election. That is not what hon. gentlemen opposite when in opposition said should be done and said they would do if they were given a chance to bring forward legislation. What I am saying is that having given these assurances during the election and having made these demands when in opposition the government, apart altogether from what may be the financial merits in themselves, could not reasonably take the position which the Prime Minister did take and—

Mr. Monteith: You are so wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister tells me that I am wrong. He always says that but he does not indicate in what particular I am wrong.

Mr. Monteith: I will tell you in a moment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is going to happen? The province of Ontario is now making its preparations for its particular scheme and included in that is an insurance arrangement under its plan for tuberculosis and mental illness with a designated premium, I think, of 25 cents. Ontario does not want any change with regard to tuberculosis or mental illness. It wants to get all the money it can out of the federal government, something in the neighbourhood of $100 million. That will also be the attitude of the province of Quebec. And when Ontario gets that money in a subsequent period it will come back to the government and ask that the federal government provide grants under the hospital insurance act to cover those two illnesses. That is the position in which the government has put itself as a result of going back on the promise it made to the Canadian people.

Mr. Monteith: It has not gone back on it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that the government has not gone back on its promise.

Mr. Monteith: It has gone back on none of its promises.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would like to hear the minister explain in a reasonable manner that the government intends to include tuberculosis and mental illness without any conditions, and assure us that the conditions I have envisaged will not arise.

Mr. Monteith: I am not going to say what is definitely going to happen. I am only going to explain what the Prime Minister said at the conference. He used the following words on that occasion:

> My colleagues and I have no objection in principle to introducing amendments in parliament to provide for inclusion of mental hospitals and tuberculosis sanatoria which have been estimated will cost $68 million to begin with if all the provinces come in and the cost will mount year by year but we wish to make clear that whatever is offered to provincial treasurers in this matter cannot be provided in other forms, and in particular must be taken into consideration in any revision that takes place of the Tax Sharing Arrangements Act.

Mr. Chevrier: That is clear.

Mr. Monteith: Now, wait a minute. If there is going to be an adjustment in the tax sharing arrangements act the adjustment could involve $68 million. That is all it amounts to.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It could be that.

Mr. Monteith: That is all it is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But I say to my friend with great respect—and I quite appreciate the difficulties of his position—this could undoubtedly be the case but that is not what the Prime Minister of this country said in the election he would do. He said in Saskatoon on May 27, "the Conservative party still believes that hospital insurance should cover patients in mental and tuberculosis institutions". He said nothing whatever about deducting the amounts of money that this particular policy would involve from the fiscal grants. When he spoke in Massey Hall in Toronto in the presence of the premier of Ontario he indicated then his belief in hospital insurance. He said that those items should be included in that measure at the very meeting when Premier Frost himself, turning to the Prime Minister, said, "Ontario has not had a fair deal from the federal government in the matter of fiscal grants."

Mr. Monteith: Nor had it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There was the man pointing to the Prime Minister who would rectify this situation and give Ontario the $100 million to which he thought that province was entitled.

Mr. Monteith: The figure $100 million was not used.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was used by Mr. Frost not only at that meeting but at many meetings all over the province of Ontario including one held in the city of London not far from where the hon. gentleman and I live. The people of this country were led to believe that there would be these generous fiscal arrangements and that there would be no deductions from them for any purpose whatsoever. I say to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Monteith: You do not know what the ceiling is on fiscal arrangement adjustments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That may be. The ceiling is not the point.

Mr. Monteith: Yes, it is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, I say no. Suppose the ceiling is only $25 million, not $100 million.

Mr. Monteith: I am not going to get into that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can well understand why my hon. friend does not want to. Suppose the ceiling is $25 million. What we are saying is that we were told that tubercular and mental illness would be included—

Mr. Pickersgill: Without condition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —without any condition whatsoever, and the Prime Minister has placed my hon. friend in a very embarrassing and difficult position.

Mr. Monteith: Far from it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend can say "far from it", but the fact is that although his party advocated the inclusion of tubercular and mental illness, they are not now prepared to take that step in accordance with their promises made in the election campaign. They have added a reservation that was never present and which was offered, I am sure, after they were confronted with the financial situation in which they have got themselves and for which they must accept full responsibility.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the exchange between the hon. member for Essex East and the Minister of National Health and Welfare reminds me—and I mention it to make my point—of the reverse of the situation that we had here last spring. On that occasion it was the member for Essex East who was sitting over on the other side as the minister. He was annoyed at what he regarded as delay in connection with the passing of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

Mr. Monteith: Did you say the minister was annoyed? Oh, that one, yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The annoyance of the present minister reminds me of the annoyance of the former minister when the present Minister of Finance, as the member for Eglinton, moved an amendment to third reading of the bill calling for the inclusion of mental and tubercular hospitals.

Mr. Pickersgill: Without any deductions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Without any deductions; no strings attached. It was a matter of principle. Those who were here will recall the strong speech made by the present Prime Minister, who was then the leader of the opposition, and who urged that illness was illness whether it was physical or mental, and that it was a disgraceful thing the former Liberal government was doing by failing to include mental and tubercular hospitals within the four corners of this legislation. That was the position the Conservatives took. I realize that the minister did not take part in that debate—his interests were in other subjects in those days—but his colleagues did. They took the position very strongly that as a matter of right and as a matter of principle mental and tubercular illnesses should be included with other illnesses in this particular legislation.

My hon. friend, the hon. member for Essex East, has already referred to the stand taken in the campaign. He quoted from what the Prime Minister said at Saskatoon and referred to what he said at Toronto. Let us look at the report of his speech in another of our major cities which will make it clear. According to the Winnipeg Tribune of May 14, 1957, the Prime Minister said that:

> The Conservatives would repair a "serious omission" in the federal health plan which does not include tubercular and mental institutions.

There was no question about it last session; there was no question about it during the election campaign, where the Tories stood. They stood for the inclusion of mental and tubercular institutions. I go further, Mr. Chairman. Along with their stand on mental and tubercular institutions, they took a similar stand regarding the removal of the six-province requirement.

Let us get down to this present session. As has already been pointed out, at the start of the session there was silence on the part of the government regarding hospital insurance; but in response to questions on the orders of the day and in response to our presenting a motion of no confidence on this matter, statements got made. Mr. Chairman, up until Monday, November 25, statements made by the government on these two issues, the removal of the six-province requirement and the bringing in of mental and tuberculosis hospitals, were on the same plane. They were both matters that the government was prepared to consider; they were both matters the government was prepared to discuss with the provinces; they were both matters the government was prepared to put on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference that met on November 25 and 26.

I come now to November 25. The Prime Minister said to the federal-provincial conference that the government had no objection in principle to making these two changes, but as the hon. member for Essex East has pointed out, one of them that day for the first time had a string attached to it; namely the inclusion of mental and tubercular hospitals. Therefore, as has been pointed out, some difference of opinion arose amongst the provinces on that day. I confess some of us wonder whether the string was put there deliberately so that one or more of the provinces would take a second look at this proposition. As a result of that, as a result of what happened on Monday, November 25, we have had a different picture ever since. Since that time the willingness to withdraw the six-province requirement still stands. It gets mentioned every once in a while when we ask questions about it or have occasion to do so. But this matter of including mental and tubercular hospitals has now become one of those mysterious matters of government policy on which no statement can be made. Why the difference? Why is it that both of these matters were on the same plane and treated in the same way up to November 25, but since then, one of them is something about which there is going to be legislation, namely the removal of the six-province requirement, but the other is one of those mysterious matters about which there has to be an announcement of government policy if and when the government considers taking up the matter. Mr. Chairman, it looks very clear to some of us as though this whole idea that the Conservatives made the subject of an amendment to the third reading of the bill last spring, which the Conservatives made so much of during the election campaign, which the Conservatives took to the federal-provincial conference, has been droped so far as this government is concerned.

We contend, Mr. Chairman, that that is a betrayal of election promises, a betrayal of commitments made to the people and of the stand they took in this house during last spring and that they had better consider this very seriously before it breaks them altogether.

There has been an announcement made that there will be legislation to remove the six-province requirement. I do not know why this has not been introduced before this. Other items not as important have reached the order paper. Why has not this one been put on the order paper? But since it has not been put on the order paper it gives the government a chance, when it does bring down those proposed amendments to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, to include in the amendment two provisions, one the removal of the six-province requirement and the other the inclusion of mental and tubercular hospitals. I call upon this government, if it wants the Canadian people to have any confidence in the stand it took when it was in opposition, if it wants the people to have any confidence in its election promises, to get back on the rails so far as this important issue is concerned.

The Chairman: Is item 249 agreed to?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, there were some other questions that the minister did not have very much to say about. When he was speaking about the studying of the hospital grants, I believe he said in reply to one member that hospital grants were being studied. Did he mean by that that consideration was being given to increasing the amount of the grants?

Mr. Monteith: All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that consideration is being given to their adequacy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. Monteith: I said that consideration was being given to their adequacy; a study is being made.

Mr. Ellis: Has the minister personally considered the matter?

Mr. Monteith: I made my answer.

Mr. Peters: With regard to the aluminosis problem, would the minister have the research department obtain some X-ray plates which we understand can be obtained from places where payment is made for aluminosis so that they can be used as a basis of comparison in Canada? We understand that they are available in Germany and if they were obtained we could use them for purposes of comparison.

Mr. Monteith: I would certainly be very happy to look into the matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister repeated today the assertion that the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will be in operation sooner under this government than it would have been had the Liberals stayed in power. I suppose that is what one calls a moveable feast. Can he be more precise?

Mr. Monteith: Not at the moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: He means the 31st of December instead of the 1st of January.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, at last we know when the Liberals intended to have it in effect.

Mr. Pickersgill: You always knew that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What year?

Mr. Pickersgill: January 1, 1959.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have it on good authority now that the Liberals had planned to have it in effect by January 1, 1959.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I point out that the act is now in effect. The act is in the law. It rests with the government to implement it and to make agreements with the provinces.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was using the words "in effect" in the same connotation as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was using them. After all, he and I, like the hon. member for Essex East, know that the law is on the statute books and has been proclaimed but it is not in operation. No money is being paid out under it, and from what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says it was the intention of the Liberals that money would start to be paid out by January 1, 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: Provided six provinces had come in.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He did not say that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What did the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate say?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be delighted to repeat it. I said December 31 instead of January 1, and that is all I said.

An hon. Member: What year?

Mr. Ellis: 1970.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now that we have a precise answer from the Liberals I wonder whether we cannot have a more precise answer from the Conservatives. Surely it is not a responsible position for the government to tell us that they are willing to remove the six-province requirement, that they are willing to pay some of this federal money to some of the provinces before there are six of them with plans in actual operation, and not give us some idea whether that can be expected by January 1, 1958, July 1, 1958, January 1, 1959 or when.

Mr. Monteith: I have mentioned several times that it will certainly be earlier than January 1, 1959. I cannot specify any other date at this time. As I told the hon. member, and I have mentioned this before, there will be an amendment concerning the matter.

Mr. Winch: British Columbia now has a plan in operation. Is there any reason why British Columbia cannot get a contribution now? I believe the amount is $18 million.

Mr. Monteith: The present act calls for six provinces and six provinces have not actually got legislation in operation.

Mr. Winch: British Columbia has. How about paying British Columbia?

Mr. Ellis: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. Monteith: British Columbia will be able to collect earlier under the revised act than under the present act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I will not press the point as to what date is earlier than January 1, 1959. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate now says that the day before is earlier. I hope it will be a lot sooner than that. Can the minister tell us—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is interesting to hear these remarks from the other side of the house from members who were not here last spring and therefore are not in a position to recall how concerned their Conservative colleagues were about this legislation when the hon. member for Essex East was in charge of it. I should like to ask the minister this question. When the six-province requirement is altered, is it the intention of the government to remove it altogether or to reduce it to some lesser number of provinces?

Mr. Monteith: I think it certainly has been stated that it would be removed altogether. The Prime Minister said in his statement that it was proposed to substitute an earlier and more definite date for the commencement of the plan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May we take it then that if the act is amended by writing into it a definite date for the financial provisions to come into operation money will be available at that date to provinces that have plans in operation even if they are only one or two in number.

Mr. Monteith: Yes, that would be my interpretation.

Mr. Winch: Is it the intention to introduce the bill after the house reconvenes in January?

Mr. Monteith: I think I have made that statement.

Mr. Winch: Pardon?

Mr. Monteith: The statement has been made several times that it is the intention of the government to remove that clause.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: Can British Columbia get its payment starting on January 1?

Mr. Monteith: Can we carry the first item?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Carried.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall item 250 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is the status of item 249? There were several members who called six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: Before you rise, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: All I want to do is to say—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: —Merry Christmas and a happy new year. That is all I want to say.

Mr. Hees: We will let you say that.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, it will not be necessary for me to ask the house leader what the business is for the session when we reconvene because he has already given that, but I do want to take this opportunity to tell the house leader how happy I have been on this side of the house to be associated with him in the business of the house in the last two months. I assure him it has been a pleasure to me to work with him in this entirely new position so far as I am concerned, and I should like him to know that the relationship has been very pleasant.

I should also like to extend to him and those associated with him on the other side of the house our very best wishes for Christmas and the new year with the hope that in the new year he will be able to give us in advance at least one week's business. I should also like to add that I hope the new year for him and those associated with him will be a most happy one in all aspects save the field of public life. I venture to hope that during the course of 1958 it will be possible for the house leader and myself to exchange positions.

I would not want to leave this happy note without telling you, Mr. Speaker, how happy we on this side of the house have been to have you preside over the destinies of parliament. You have done a magnificent job. I am sure all of us on this side would want me to say that you have performed your duties fairly and equitably, always keeping in mind the decorum that should exist in the house, and particularly in presiding over the welfare of this assembly with great equity as you have done. I should like to repeat the sentiments I have expressed to the house leader and pass them on to you and wish you a very merry Christmas and the most happy new year.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I join with the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), speaking on behalf of the members of this group, in wishing the season's best greetings to all our colleagues in parliament, on all sides of the house. May I also have the very real pleasure of joining with the hon. member for Laurier in the expressions that he made to yourself, Mr. Speaker. He put it very well. We have enjoyed greatly your work as the presiding officer of this house. Your good sense and your sense of humour have been invaluable. It is indeed a pleasure for us to wish to you and Mrs. Michener a very merry Christmas and a happy new year.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I said on the first day of the session that your good self was a very proper person for the very exalted position you now occupy, very largely because you were born in Alberta where our people have all those qualities that make good Speakers. We have appreciated your fairness and the splendid way in which you have conducted the business of the house. We are not at all disappointed with what you have done. I want to join with all the others in wishing to all our colleagues a very merry Christmas and for the year 1958 an abundance of all those good things that human beings enjoy.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the events of the last five minutes have illustrated, more clearly than anything else could do, what a spirit of comradeship exists here in the House of Commons. Just before six o'clock we were all yelling and shouting at each other, and no doubt a spectator in the gallery would have thought that everybody was going to go home angry. Yet, thanks to the kind words of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), we are back again in our club where there really is such a wonderful feeling.

On behalf of the government may I join in the expressions of appreciation to Your Honour and wish you a very merry Christmas.

I should also like to thank the members of the three other parties for their kind remarks. In particular, I should like to thank those members of the other parties, who have been responsible for dealing with me in connection with the house business, for their co-operation. We are working here in this particular session under unusual circumstances. I feel sure that those circumstances will be brought to an end—

Mr. Lesage: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: —before very long—

Mr. Harkness: Hope springs eternal over there on the other side.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us the date of the election.

Mr. Green: —but perhaps not in the way the hon. member for Laurier would wish. However, after all, we are in the hands of the Canadian people.

Mr. Marler: And you have been in opposition previously.

Mr. Green: We have a good opposition across the way now. I think they are playing their proper role in public life in Canada at the moment. However, on behalf of the Prime Minister may I extend to you all very best wishes for a merry Christmas and a happy new year.

Mr. Speaker: I have always understood that remarks in the house about the conduct of the Speaker could only be advanced by way of substantive motion. I therefore must declare those remarks about myself to be out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are overruled.

Mr. Speaker: As all of the house is out of order at the moment, I may perhaps be permitted to step out of my role as chairman and say two things. First, I want to thank all hon. members, without exception, for their co-operation and indulgence which have made it possible for me to survive my first two months in the chair. Second, may I wish all a merry Christmas and a happy and healthful new year, without distinction as to party, race or creed. Those who are free to do so will be welcome in the Speaker's chambers after we adjourn.

It being eight minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, until Friday, January 3, 1958, at eleven a.m., pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 11, 1957.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.N.R. LAY-OFFS, ATLANTIC DIVISION

Question No. 141—Mr. Murphy (Westmorland):

1. How many men have been laid off in the Canadian National Railways Atlantic division since July 1, 1957?
2. How many men have received notice of lay-off since November 1, 1957?
3. Of the above number, how many men were laid off since July 1, in the Canadian National Railways shops in Moncton, New Brunswick?
4. How many men were laid off in what is known as running repairs?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

The management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The levels of employment for the period July to October for the Atlantic region are as follows:

July	17,377
August	17,431
September	17,173
October	16,549

2, 3 and 4. In a statement made in the house on behalf of the Canadian National Railways on November 4, 1957, at page 704 of Hansard, the management dealt fully with the matter of adjustments in the number of employees on the system as a whole, and this statement is explanatory of the situation at Moncton and on the Atlantic region generally. The statement emphasized that the management is making every effort to cushion the effect of staff reductions and to find alternative employment for those affected.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES, 1953-57

Question No. 196—Mr. Christian:

During each of the years 1953, 1954, 1955, 1956 and 1957 to date, what total capital moneys were spent by the dominion government in each of the provinces of Canada?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

Expenditures by fiscal years and provinces, in respect of buildings and works, including land—construction or acquisition

(In thousands of dollars)

Province	1952–53	1953–54	1954–55	1955–56	1956–57

RESEARCH INTO QUALITY OF DURABLE GOODS

Question No. 226—Mr. Zaplitny:

1. Has the national research council, or any department of the government, carried out any research into the quality of durable goods manufactured in Canada and/or offered for sale in Canada, since January 1, 1955?
2. If so, under whose direction was such research carried out?
3. Has any report been submitted to the government as a result of such research? If so, when and in what form?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. The national research council is doing research aimed at improving both processes and products for a wide variety of Canadian industries. No research is being carried out into consumer standards or questions of quality control.

2. Research of industrial interest is carried on in every division of the national research council and under the direction of virtually every senior officer.

3. Yes. The annual report of the national research council, which is tabled in parliament in accordance with the Research Council Act, and the "National Research Council Review", published annually.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

Question No. 299—Mr. MacEachen:

1. How many loans have been granted by (a) chartered banks; (b) credit unions, in each of provinces of Canada under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act?

2. Is there any record of the number of applications rejected?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1.

(a)	British Columbia	37
	Manitoba	1
	Ontario	11
	New Brunswick	87
	Nova Scotia	48
	Prince Edward Island	112
	Newfoundland	3
		333
(b)	British Columbia	52

2. No.

Questions

COAL—FEDERAL RESEARCH PROGRAMS

Question No. 300—Mr. MacEachen:

What programs of research, if any, are presently being conducted by any agency of the federal government into new uses for coal?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys):

A continuous review is made in the mines branch on the bulk use of coal. One of the most promising fields for the use of coal is in the metallurgical industry as a fuel and as a reductant in the pyro-metallurgical field. At the request of industry, briquetting tests of ore and concentrates with coal are aimed at developing intermediate or final reduction processes. Two other specific research projects have also been undertaken, one dealing with the smelting of fine particle iron ores in a cyclone furnace and the other with the evaluation of coal tar pitches for the aluminum industry.

With the future needs of Canada in mind, consideration is being given to the synthetic production of liquid fuels such as gasoline and diesel oil by the hydrogenation of coal. As part of the research program, equipment has been installed to explore the effect of radiation on the acceleration of the reaction of hydrogen and coal. This is a novel technique which has for its objective the cheapening of capital investment for hydrogenation plant by increasing the throughput of such a plant.

APPENDIX

NATO—Declaration and Communique

Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council, 16-19 December, 1957

I. declaration

We, the representatives of 15 nations of the North Atlantic Alliance, believing in the sanctity of those human rights which are guaranteed to all men of free nations by their constitutions, laws and customs, rededicate ourselves and our nations to the principles and purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty. This treaty has been in effect for nearly nine years. It was founded to protect the right of our peoples to live in peace and freedom under governments of their own choice. It has succeeded in protecting this right. Building on our experience and confident in the success already obtained, we have agreed together upon means to give added strength to our alliance.

At the end of the second world war, the armies of the west were largely disbanded. The Soviet union did not demobilize. Its expansionist policy impelled us to establish our treaty and to build up our armed forces.

We are an organization of free countries. We have learned to live and work together in the firm conviction that our fundamental unity and our combined strength are indispensable to our own security and to the peace of the world.

The meaning of our alliance is clear. We have given a solemn guarantee, each to the other, to regard an attack upon one as an attack upon all, to be resisted with all the forces at our command. Faithful to the charter of the UN we reaffirm that our alliance will never be used for aggressive purposes. We are always ready to settle international problems by negotiation, taking into account the legitimate interests of all. We seek an end to world tension. And intend to promote peace, economic prosperity and social progress throughout the world.

We continue firmly to stand for comprehensive and controlled disarmament, which we believe can be reached by stages. In spite of disappointments, we remain ready to discuss any reasonable proposal to reach this goal and to lay a solid foundation for a durable peace. This is the only way to dispel the anxieties arising from the armaments race.

The free world faces the mounting challenge of international communism backed by soviet power. Only last month in Moscow the communist rulers again gave clear warning of their determination to press on to domination over the entire world, if possible by subversion, if necessary by violence. Within the North Atlantic Treaty there is no place for the concept of world domination. Firmly believing in peaceful change through democratic means, cherishing the character of our peoples and vigilant to safeguard their freedom, we will never yield to such a threat.

For the entire world it is both a tragedy and a great danger that the peoples under international communist rule—their national independence, human liberties and their standard of living as well as their scientific and technological achievements—have been sacrificed to the purposes of world domination and military power. The suppression of their liberty will not last forever. Already in these countries there is evidence of the growing desire for intellectual and economic freedom. If the free nations are steadfast, the totalitarian menace that now confronts them will eventually recede.

Established to defend the peace, our alliance will also enble us to reach our objectives of economic and social progress. For this purpose we have agreed to cooperate closely to enable us to carry the necessary burden of defence without sacrificing the individual liberties or the welfare of our peoples. We shall reach this goal only by recognizing our interdependence and by combining our efforts and skills in order to make better use of our resources. Such efforts will now be applied particularly to the peaceful use of atomic energy and to the development and better organization of scientific cooperation.

To the many nations which have gained their independence since the end of the second world war and to all other peoples, who like ourselves, are dedicated to freedom in peace, we offer our cooperation on a basis of complete equality and in a spirit of fraternity.

Conscious of our intellectual and material resources, convinced of the value of our principles and of our way of life, without provocation but equally without fear, we have taken decisions to promote greater unity, greater strength and greater security not only for our own nations but also, we believe, for the world at large.

II. COMMUNIQUE

International Situation

1. The aim of the soviet bloc is to weaken and disrupt the free world. Its instruments are military, political and economic: and its activities are world wide. To meet this challenge the free world must organize its resources—moral, military, political and economic—and be ready to deploy them wherever the situation demands. Our alliance cannot therefore be concerned only with the north atlantic area or only with military defence. It must also organize its political and economic strength on the principle of interdependence, and must take account of developments outside its own area.

2. In the course of our meeting we have therefore reviewed the international situation, and, in particular, the dangers to world peace arising from soviet actions and threats. In spite of the dangers of the situation which are obvious to all, the USSR has made no real contribution to the solution of major problems causing international tension. We have especially in mind the problems of the reunification of Germany in freedom, and the continuing anomaly of the isolation of Berlin—the capital of Germany. We renew and reaffirm our declaration of October 23, 1954 which had in view the establishment on a firm basis of the security and freedom of Berlin. The perpetuation of injustice to the German people undermines international confidence and endangers peace. At the Geneva conference of heads of government in July, 1955, the USSR leaders took a solemn commitment that "the reunification of Germany by means of free elections shall be carried out in conformity with the national interests of European security'. We call upon the USSR government to honour this pledge.

3. We have reviewed the situation in the mideast. In line with the peaceful aims of our alliance, we confirm the support of our governments for the independence and sovereignty of the states in this region, and our interest in the economic well-being of their peoples. We believe that the stability of this important area is vital to world peace.

4. We express our interest in the maintenance of peace and the development of conditions of stability and economic and political well-being in the vitally important continent of Africa. We hope that the countries and peoples of that continent who are disposed to do so will co-operate within the free world in efforts to promote these purposes. We affirm the readiness of our countries to co-operate for our part with the countries and peoples of Africa to further these ends. Historic, economic and other friendly ties between certain European countries and Africa would make such co-operation particularly desirable and effective.

5. In the course of our review of the international situation we have given consideration to recent serious events in Indonesia. We view them with concern.

The Working of the Alliance

6. The strength of our alliance, freely concluded between independent nations, lies in our fundamental unity in the face of the danger which threatens us. Thanks to this fundamental unity, we can overcome our difficulties and bring into harmony our individual points of view. In contrast, as events in Hungary have shown, the soviet bloc is held together only by political and military coercion.

7. Although progress has been made, further improvement is needed in our political consultation. We are resolved to bring this about. Our permanent representatives will be kept fully informed of all government policies which materially affect the alliance and its members. In this way, we shall be able to draw fully on each other's political experience and to ensure a broad co-ordination of our policies in the interest, not only of the alliance, but of the free world as a whole.

In addition, to strengthen the cohesion of the alliance, the permanent council and the secretary general should ensure effective consultation, including, where necessary, procedures of conciliation at an early stage.

Disarmament.

8. We recall that in the course of this year, the western countries taking part in the London disarmament talks put forward to the USSR, with the unanimous agreement of NATO, a series of concrete proposals providing, subject to effective controls:

For reduction of all armaments and military forces;

For the cessation of the production of fissionable material for weapons purposes;

For the reduction of existing stocks of nuclear weapons;

For the suspension of nuclear weapons tests;

For measures to guard against the risk of surprise attack.

9. We note with regret that these various proposals, which would halt the armaments race and add to world security if they were accepted, were rejected en bloc by the USSR, although they had been approved by 56 members of the UN.

10. We regret that the USSR has brought about a deadlock in the disarmament negotiations by declaring their intention to boycott the UN disarmament commission which had been extended, by a strong majority of the general assembly, to include 25 nations.

11. We denounce soviet tactics of alternating between peace propaganda statements and attempted intimidation by the threat of nuclear attack.

12. We deplore, also, that the leaders of the USSR do not all the soviet populations to be impartially informed and enlightened by the services of the UN at the same time as the populations of other member countries, as to the danger of destruction to which all peoples would be exposed in the event of general war. A resolution to this effect was adopted in November, 1957, by the general assembly of the UN by 71 nations against 9 nations of the soviet bloc.

13. We emphasize that, in order to be effective, any disarmament agreement implies adequate international control, that the acceptance of such control is the test of a true desire for peace and that the USSR refuses to put this principle into practice.

14. We have decided to establish a technical group to advise on problems of arms control arising out of new technical developments.

15. In spite of the successive setbacks given by the USSR to the cause of controlled disarmament and of peace, the NATO council will neglect no possibility of restricting armaments within the limits imposed by security and will take all necessary action to this end.

16. We state our willingness to promote, preferably within the framework of the UN, any negotiations with the USSR likely to lead to the implementation of the proposals recalled above.

We are also prepared to examine any proposal, from whatever source, for general or partial disarmament, and any proposal enabling an agreement to be reached on the controlled reduction of armaments of all types.

17. Should the soviet government refuse to participate in the work of the new disarmament commission, we should welcome a meeting at foreign ministers' level to resolve the deadlock.

NATO Defence.

18. The soviet leaders, while preventing a general disarmament agreement, have made it clear that the most modern and destructive weapons, including missiles of all kinds, are being introduced in the USSR armed forces. In the USSR view, all European nations except the USSR should, without waiting for general disarmament, renounce nuclear weapons and missiles and rely on arms of the pre-atomic age.

19. As long as the USSR persists in this attitude, we have no alternative but to remain vigilant and to look to our defences. We are therefore resolved to achieve the most effective pattern of NATO military defensive strength, taking into account the most recent developments in weapons and techniques.

20. To this end, NATO has decided to establish stocks of nuclear warheads, which will be readily available for the defence of the alliance in case of need. In view of the present soviet policies in the field of new weapons the council has also decided that intermediate range ballistic missiles will have to be put at the disposal of the supreme allied commander Europe.

21. The deployment of these stocks and missiles and arrangements for their use will accordingly be decided in conformity with NATO's defence plans and in agreement with the states directly concerned. The NATO military authorities have been requested to submit to the council at an early date their recommendations on the introduction of these weapons in the common defence. The council in permanent session will consider the various questions involved.

22. Recognising the rapidly growing interdependence of the nations of the free world, we have, in organizing our forces, decided to bring about closer co-ordination with a view to ensuring that each NATO member country makes its most effective contribution to the requirements established by the alliance. Better use of the resources of the alliance and greater efficiency for its forces will be obtained through as high a degree of standardisation and integration as possible in all fields, particularly in certain aspects of air and naval defence, of logistic support and of the composition and equipment of forces. We have agreed that a military conference should be held at ministerial level in the early months of 1958 to discuss progress made in these fields in the light, in particular, of the results of the 1957 Annual Review.

23. As regards defence production, we have decided, in view of the progress already made, to take further measures within NATO to promote the co-ordination of research, development and manufacture of modern weapons including intermediate range ballistic missiles.

24. The best means of achieving co-ordinated production of advanced weapons needed by our forces will be studied as a matter of urgency. Those NATO countries whose programs have already reached a very advanced stage have offered to share with their allies significant production techniques and results of their research work in order to stimulate a truly productive effort in the defence production field.

Scientific and Technical Co-operation.

25. We recognise that in most of our countries more should be done to increase the supply of trained men in many branches of science and technology, the full development of our science and technology is essential to the culture, to the economy and to the political and military strength of the Atlantic community.

26. We realize that progress will depend on vigorous action within individual states and in particular on the devoted contribution of teachers and scientists. We must increase the provision for the training of young people in scientific and technical subjects and must also ensure that the free pursuit of fundamental research continues to flourish. Each of our governments will therefore reappraise the support being given to scientific and technical education and to fundamental research.

27. We seek to increase the effectiveness of national efforts through the pooling of scientific facilities and INFO and the sharing of tasks. We must build on the established tradition of the universality of true science. Our governments will support the international organizations doing work in this field.

28. We have decided to establish forthwith a science committee on which all of the NATO countries will be represented by men highly qualified to speak authoritatively on scientific policy. In addition, a scientist of outstanding qualifications will be appointed as science adviser to the secretary general of NATO.

29. The science committee will be responsible in particular for making specific recommendations to the council for action on a proposal by the French government for a western foundation for scientific research and on the many other valuable proposals which have been put forward by the NATO task force on scientific and technical cooperation and by the NATO parliamentarians conference.

Economic Co-operation.

30. We are united in our common purpose to promote the economic and social development of our peoples and to assist the peoples of other countries to achieve the same objective. We consider that the purpose of government in a free society is to enlarge the opportunity of the individual rather than to subordinate him to the state.

31. We will co-operate among ourselves and with other free governments to further the achievement of economic stability, a steady rate of economic growth, and the expansion of international trade through the further reduction of exchange and trade barriers.

32. We reaffirm the desirability of a closer economic association between the countries of western Europe, which we deem to be in the interest of all countries, and we will accordingly lend encouragement to the successful development of the European economic community and of a European free trade area in which full account would be taken of the interests of the less developed member countries. We attach particular importance to these initiatives being worked out in such a way as to strengthen not only the participating countries but also the relations within the Atlantic community and free world as a whole. We recognise the interdependence of the economies of the members of NATO and of the other countries of the free world.

33. We affirm the interest of our governments in an enlargement of the resources, both public and private, available for the purpose of accelerating the economic advancement of the less developed areas of the free world.

34. We have decided that the north Atlantic council, without duplicating the work of other agencies, shall from time to time, and in the spirit of Article 2 of the Treaty, review economic trends and assess economic progress, and may make suggestions for improvements either through existing organizations or by the efforts of individual countries, or in special cases by new initiatives.

35. Under present circumstances, our defensive alliance takes on a new significance. Only an intensified collective effort can safeguard our peoples and their liberties. We have, together, ample capacity in freedom to defend freedom.

36. We have taken a series of decisions which will promote greater strength and greater security not only for our own nations but also for the world at large.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 3, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

REFERENCE TO CELEBRATION OF CENTENNIAL

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is the first sitting of the house in the year 1958, which is the year in which the province from which I come is celebrating its centenary.

It just so happens that it was in the year 1778 that the first member of the white race arrived on the shore of what is now called British Columbia at a place known as Friendly Cove, on Nootka island, which is now in the constituency of Comox-Alberni. Therefore I thought it might be appropriate if I were to draw the attention of the house at this, its first sitting of this year, to the fact that this is the year in which British Columbia is celebrating its centenary.

And if I might, Mr. Speaker, I would also call the attention of hon. members to the fact that some of the high school students in my constituency have sent seasonal greetings to hon. members representing British Columbia constituencies. They were supposed to have arrived in time for Christmas, but because of delay in the mail they did not do so. So from the student council of Texada island high school we have received a greeting at the beginning of our centennial year to all members from that province, which I am sure we will all be glad to share with the other members of this house.

TRADE

OIL—RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS INTO UNITED STATES

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since parliament recessed, the United States has extended its import restrictions on oil in such a way that Canadian exports of oil to the United States will be directly affected. I should like to report to the house on what has happened.

The history of these so-called voluntary oil import restrictions is brief and relatively simple. Oil producers in the United States, particularly those which do not own oil in fields outside the United States, have for some years been campaigning for restrictions on the importation into the United States of foreign oils in competition with more costly domestic production. After the Suez crisis of last winter, when oil from abroad began to compete vigorously once again in United States markets, it became evident that the position of the domestic oil producers was strong enough to secure some form of restriction on imports.

The alternatives appeared to be restriction by special act of congress or by administrative action under section 7 of the trade agreements extension act of 1955, subsection (b) of section 7 of which reads as follows:

> (b) In order to further the policy and purpose of this section, whenever the director of the office of defence mobilization has reason to believe that any article is being imported into the United States in such quantities as to threaten to impair the national security, he shall so advise the President, and if the President agrees that there is reason for such belief, the President shall cause an immediate investigation to be made to determine the facts. If, on the basis of such investigation, and the report to him of the findings and recommendations made in connection therewith, the President finds that the article is being imported into the United States in such quantities as to threaten to impair the national security, he shall take such action as he deems necessary to adjust the imports of such article to a level that will not threaten to impair the national security.

It appears that since restrictions by act of congress tend to be rigid and hard to amend, and since world oil supply and demand are characterized by rapid changes of pace and direction, the case for a flexible program of administrative restriction commended itself to the United States government. Certainly it was under strong pressure to act under the statutory provision I have just quoted.

On June 26, 1957, pursuant to section 7(b) of the trade agreements extension act of 1955, the President established a special committee to investigate crude oil imports. It consists of six cabinet secretaries, with the secretary of commerce as chairman. The first report of the committee was approved by the President on July 29, 1957. That report called for voluntary restrictions on imports into four of the five districts into which the United States is divided for purposes of oil administration; that is, to all the states except those bordering on the Pacific ocean, which together constitute district V.

I shall not go into the details of the July restrictive formula. We examined it very closely, and indeed our officials had been very carefully analysing all the steps leading up to it. The formula did no immediate harm to Canadian oil sales. The only market which might have been affected was that in the middle western states which had developed following the construction of the Interprovincial pipe line through northern Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan. In fact the formula made some allowance for expansion of imports by the half dozen refineries using Canadian oil in that area, and also made some provision for new importers. We felt that while the program might restrict expansion of our sales there at some future time, it gave no cause for objection on grounds of immediate hardship. Two of our customer refineries in the area applied for and received increases in their quotas for imports, and we saw reason to believe that the program was being so administered as to avoid restriction of Canadian oil sales.

In the absence of hardship we did not protest on the principles involved, especially because it appeared that the practical alternative to this program might have been rigid statutory restriction related to an attack in congress on renewal of the reciprocal trade agreements act, which expires in 1958 and in which Canada is much concerned.

Now I turn to district V, the United States west coast. I should perhaps explain that of the three states involved, namely Washington, Oregon and California, Washington is the only one in which we have a firmly established oil market, although we did ship large quantities to California during the Suez emergency last year. The July report of the President's special committee had recommended as follows in respect of this district:

> Imports should be determined on a semi-annual basis. Pending a change in the deficit condition now pending in the area by, for example, the development of an economical means of interregional transportation, the level of imports must be such as to make up the difference between the demand and the quantity of domestic crude oil available to the area, as established by the Department of the Interior. The schedule of imports for the last half of 1957, as submitted by the companies to the director of defence mobilization appears to be slightly higher than would be called for by the foregoing formula.
> However, there is reason to believe that the imports for this period will not exceed 275,000 barrels per day and, consequently, no voluntary import limitations are proposed for this district at the present time. This situation should be reviewed, however, during the latter part of 1957 from the point of view of the plans of importers for the first half of 1958, in view of the fact that additional pipe-line capacity to the west coast is scheduled to become available during the first half of 1958.

In accordance with this recommendation the special committee on November 8 ordered a hearing on district V imports. The hearing was held by Captain Carson, the administrator of the voluntary oil import program, in Washington, D.C., on November 25 and 26. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) mentioned in the house at the time, observers for this government and for the government of Alberta were present at that hearing. Also, informal talks were held with appropriate United States officials before and after the hearing. Although the figures of proposed imports filed at the hearing made it evident that some degree of restriction on imports into at least the southern part of district V was likely, the knowledge and understanding of the Canadian position which was shown by the United States authorities led us to hope that any such restrictions would exempt Canadian shipments.

On December 13 our representatives in Washington were informed that the special committee would recommend that so-called voluntary import restrictions be extended to district V, and that the formula to be recommended to the President was such that the three refineries in the state of Washington, along with the other major refineries of district V, would be required to reduce their imports in the first half of 1958 to a level 15 per cent below their average imports over the 1956-57 period. The three Washington refineries are of course the ones which use the great bulk of the Canadian oil normally sold in district V. The source of imports is not prescribed by the formula, but two of the three refineries have voluntarily announced their intention to continue to use Canadian oil, subject to price considerations.

The Canadian government was disappointed to learn that our sales to refineries in this area, for which Canada is the only source of supply by pipe line, were to be restricted. By contrast may I remind the house, sir, that the voluntary import restrictions in the middle west, where our oil is in direct competition with United States domestic oils, do not impede our sales there, at least for the present.

The Canadian government immediately asked that the President defer the announcement of this restrictive program for district V until we had time to put forward our point of view. The United States government did delay the announcement at our request.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What date was that?

Mr. Fleming: It was immediately on receipt of the information, December 13, the date on which our representative at Washington received the information.

In the following week, as hon. members will recall, the Prime Minister and several members of the cabinet were in Paris for the NATO meetings, as were President Eisenhower and several members of his cabinet. Accordingly, we pressed our case in Paris. In particular I had two conversations with Mr. Anderson, the secretary of the treasury. During the second he was accompanied by Mr. Dillon, the deputy undersecretary of state for economic affairs, and other United States officials.

At that time I was able to learn in considerable detail the reasons lying behind the United States system of voluntary restrictions, and I was able to explain to them the harm that we had every reason to fear would follow if those proposed restrictions were applied to Canada. I pointed out the fact that in our trade relations with the United States at the present time there is a massive balance in favour of the United States, and that we had had other reasons to complain of the policy of the United States administration in marketing its agricultural surpluses. I expressed the hope that in the context of the NATO meeting, which was then proceeding in another building, and the emphasis there being laid on the elimination of economic conflict under article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty, the United States ministers would be able to accept our point of view.

In the discussions in Paris, which of course took place outside the NATO meetings, particular emphasis was laid on the difficulties already being experienced by Canadian oil producers. We pointed out that Alberta, like Texas but unlike California, has already been prorating its production so that no sudden flood of Canadian oil need be feared in the Pacific northwest of the United States. Those states were the natural and economic market for Canadian western oil and, in time of international emergency, those states would unquestionably depend to a very considerable degree on Canadian supplies of oil.

It seemed particularly appropriate, in the NATO context, to point out to the United States ministers the implications which seemed to us to flow from their decision to base their voluntary import program on grounds of national defence. We reminded them that in matters of defence the economic efforts of the two countries had been closely co-ordinated during world war II, and that such co-ordination had been confirmed as recently as October, 1950, at the time of the Korean incident, by a formal exchange of notes. These notes set forth certain "principles for economic co-operation", as they are called, in relation to defence; and it seemed, and still seems, to the Canadian government that the United States action in restricting imports of oil from Canada on grounds of defence runs counter to the whole tenor and purpose of these principles.

The United States ministers seemed to be impressed by the arguments we put forward. They promised to review the matter as soon as they returned to Washington later that week. However, they contended that under the plan proposed by the United States government the reduction of imports from Canada would be very small. At the same time the market situation on the Pacific coast was very precarious. They contended that prices might fall seriously at any time, and the effect would be to damage not only suppliers in the United States but suppliers in Canada and overseas. They argued that quick action might be in the interests of producers both at home and abroad.

On December 23 we learned that the United States administration was not prepared to depart from the recommendations of the special committee and felt it must announce the new import restrictions immediately. The announcement was in fact made from the White House on the morning of December 24. On behalf of the Canadian government I issued a simultaneous statement in which I said in part:

> The Canadian government cannot accept the view that there is any justification for United States limitations on oil coming from Canada either on economic or defence grounds. The Canadian government will continue to press its objections.

May I ask at this point, Mr. Speaker, for leave to table a copy of the statement that was issued at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: If it is the wish of hon. members it could be printed as part of the Hansard record.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. Will hon. members agree to the printing of the statement in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Do I understand that this statement was a note of protest to the United States government?

Mr. Fleming: No, it was not a note to the United States government. It was a statement issued to the press and public following a similar press statement issued at Washington. We had warning the day before that the United States statement was to be issued and made public, and we had our statement prepared and ready to be issued immediately theirs was issued. It was a public statement, not a note to the government.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Was there any note of protest sent to the government, or is this a new method of conducting diplomacy?

Mr. Fleming: This was the proper form, in view of the fact that parliament was not at that moment in session, of acquainting the public with the fact that the Canadian government had been in constant communication through the normal diplomatic channels with the United States administration. Those exchanges had been going on almost continuously day by day from December 13 to December 24.

The Canadian government has not lost sight of the fact, which has been plain to all who have been involved in the discussions, that the United States authorities have sought at all times to understand the problems faced by the Canadian government and the Canadian oil industry. They themselves are faced with delicate internal problems related to oil, and they do not wish to discriminate against those other friendly nations in South America and in the Middle East which have sold and desire to continue to sell oil to the United States.

However, this recent action and, indeed, the whole basis upon which the President's special committee was established, are hinged upon the proposition that oil if not restricted would, in the words of the trade agreements extension act of 1955, be "imported into the United States in such quantities as to ... impair the national security." This, in relation to our sales of oil in the state of Washington, is in the view of the Canadian government a wholly untenable proposition. The refineries in the state of Washington were established with the actual encouragement of the United States defence authorities on the grounds that there is no local production of crude oil there, that water transportation of crude or other products in wartime is vulnerable, and that the availability of an assured supply of Canadian crude to this area by pipe line is desirable for the security of supply of the petroleum requirements of the Pacific northwestern area.

Not only does the United States action in respect of our oil make no sense, as we see it, in relation to their actual security interests, but also it appears to the Canadian government to offend, as I have already pointed out, against the tenor and purpose of the principles for economic co-operation in defence matters that had been formally agreed in an exchange of notes between our two governments in 1950 and are recognized by both governments to be still valid and in effect. Here I quote from the notes:

> It is agreed that our two governments shall co-operate in all respects practicable, and to the extent of their respective executive powers, to the end that the economic efforts of the two countries be co-ordinated for the common defence and that the production and resources of both countries be used for the best combined results.

While this exchange of notes and the principles therein set forth are drafted primarily in terms of actual scarcities rather than apprehended scarcities, the general intent is clear enough. I think it might be a convenience to hon. members, Mr. Speaker, if these notes were printed in full as an appendix to Hansard, if that were the wish of hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Do hon. members agree to the printing of these notes in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of notes referred to above, see appendix "B", pages 2833-34.]

Mr. Fleming: Further, it seems—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, would the minister explain again about these notes? This is a diplomatic exchange between the two governments on this matter?

Mr. Fleming: Yes. The exchange of notes occurred at the time of the Korean incident. The excerpt I have read is from the text of the notes printed in a white paper issued in the Canada treaty series.

Mr. Coldwell: Is that 1950?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, 1950. The statement was effective October 26, 1950.

Further, it seems to the Canadian government that the United States action accords ill with the communique issued at the close of the Paris meetings by the heads of NATO governments. Indeed, they were deliberating on the text of the clause I am about to read at the very time that our meetings were proceeding in another building on this subject. I have in mind in particular this statement from the communique:

> We will co-operate among ourselves and with other free governments to further the achievement of economic stability, a steady rate of economic growth, and the expansion of international trade through a further reduction of exchange and trade barriers.

And another clause in the NATO statement reads as follows:

> We recognize the interdependence of the economies of the members of NATO and of the other countries of the free world.

We have not been able so far to persuade the United States government to exempt Canadian oil from its program. In the long run we are confident that the United States will be a willing market for our oil, since their demand for oil appears likely to outrun their reserves. It would be unfortunate, wasteful, and surely unnecessary to find both countries committing themselves in the short run to restrictive practices which would be uneconomic and harmful rather than helpful to effective co-operation in time of war. In this spirit we propose to continue to press our viewpoint most vigorously in our discussions with the United States authorities.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the minister if there has been any exchange of notes at this time over this oil question, or if the representations were confined to oral representations made through diplomatic channels?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me correctly all the communications were oral, in view of the urgent nature of the situation.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There are no notes similar to those of 1950 which could be tabled at this time?

Mr. Fleming: I think not, Mr. Speaker. I think there were no written communications. The communications were passing back and forth so quickly that they were conveyed by oral representation in every case.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a question. In view of the fact that the minister said the matter would be pressed vigorously with the United States, does he not think that notes should be sent which could be a record of the protests that are being made, rather than just press statements? I think this is a breach of the understanding at the NATO conference. We wish to maintain the friendliest relations with the United States and to co-operate in defence organization, but it seems to me that vigorous protests in writing by way of notes should be forwarded to the United States authorities.

Mr. Fleming: I think I can assure the house that is the intention of the government.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether it is correct, as was reported in a United States magazine, that Mr. Anderson told my hon. friend that the contemplated cut of 15 per cent represented the same figure which the Canadian government had in mind when it proposed that there should be a shift of Canadian purchases from the United States?

Mr. Fleming: There is not a word of truth in any such newspaper report.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance concerning his statement. In view of the fact that an order has been issued for a cut of 15 per cent on the so-called, and I use his own term, voluntary basis in district No. V in the importation of crude oil from Canada into the United States, has any consideration been given by the government to a restriction on the importation of refined petroleum products into Canada from the United States in order to give a greater market for our refineries in Canada, and in particular in district No. V in British Columbia?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that the government has given thought to that matter in particular. We hope the United States government will see fit to modify the policy it has announced. We would naturally much rather see that course followed than to seek to follow some other "beggar my neighbour" course.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, might I ask a supplementary question. Could I ask the hon. minister whether if further negotiations fail he will give consideration to the development of our own refineries in our own country for the supplying of our own needs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should go on into the hypothetical future in his question.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. Over and above the protests to which he has referred and which he proposes to make, does the government contemplate any other action to meet the situation as it now exists?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the government has not given thought to any other specific action. We do hope the United States government will modify its policy in the light of the protests which have been made and which will continue to be made. We would not wish to think that resort had to be had to some other type of action. The United States is our neighbour, and we have so many interests in common that we hope the viewpoint we have put before that country will be accepted.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): May I ask the minister if it is not a fact that the previous action taken by the United States administration, which had the effect of voluntarily restricting oil imports into that country, excluded from such restrictions oil exports from Canada?

Mr. Fleming: Is my hon. friend referring to the action taken last summer with regard to other districts, because on that occasion imports of Canadian oil were not affected? I described that in the statement I made this morning.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to action taken earlier. I am not sure of exactly the date but it was a year or two ago. Perhaps my hon. friend will look into that matter.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure precisely what my hon. friend is referring to. There was a discussion in this house, as hon. members will recall, about two years ago concerning proposals which were rumoured in the United States at that time with respect to possible action. Some strong comments were made at that time in this house, but no action then taken by the United States government had the effect that the rumoured action would have had on imports of Canadian oil.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. In view of the very great importance attached by everyone in this house, including my hon. friend, to this particular matter, is the hon. gentleman in a position to say whether or not he has been officially informed of certain other action contemplated by the government of the United States with regard to the importation of commodities from Canada?

Mr. Fleming: No, there has been no official communication of any kind corresponding to my hon. friend's question. I have already told the house, Mr. Speaker, on earlier occasions that when the four Canadian ministers were in Washington in October for the meeting of the continuing United States-Canadian committee on trade and economic matters there was discussion of the rumours of contemplated United States action to impose tariff restrictions against imports of Canadian lead and zinc. No action has yet been taken, but with this new year and the new session of congress we have no assurance that such action will not be taken to restrict imports of Canadian lead and zinc.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, was that not the subject of discussion between Mr. Anderson and my hon. friend in Paris, as reported in Newsweek?

Mr. Fleming: I mentioned on that occasion the rumours of contemplated action on the part of the United States with respect to our zinc and lead as an additional reason why there would be strong resentment in Canada at this time against any restriction on the part of the United States against importations of Canadian oil. I pointed out to Mr. Anderson in connection with that particular situation that there were massive advantages resting with the United States in the trade between these two countries, and I urged that the United States government should take these advantages into account before it proceeded any further in the direction of restricting imports of oil from Canada.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. I noted that he referred to the government making vigorous protests, and it reminded me so much of the statements of the former minister of trade and commerce in this respect. I am sure the Canadian people would be most happy if the minister could inform the house in what respect these vigorous protests are different from the vigorous protests of the previous minister of trade and commerce. I am asking for this information—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The tenor of the hon. member's question does not seem to indicate that he is seeking information but rather that he is attempting to present an argument. Perhaps we might hear the question of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate at this time.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Minister of Finance if, in view of these developments, the government has given consideration to abandoning its own 15 per cent diversion policy?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: No, Mr. Speaker, this has nothing whatever to do with the policy of the Canadian government to divert from the United States to commonwealth sources purchases now being made in that country which could just as well be made in the United Kingdom.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: It has nothing whatever to do with the other United States question, and there was not a breath of a suggestion on the part of the United States representatives at any stage of these discussions in regard to the action with respect to oil having anything whatsoever to do with the policy to which my hon. friend has made reference.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance with respect to this matter. Has any consideration been given to the possibility of testing the good faith of the United States government in respect to its continuous verbal assurances of willingness to co-operate with the Canadian people and government, by asking them if they are ready to negotiate a binding treaty to that effect?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, we already have trade and economic agreements with the United States, and we are engaged in negotiations at the present time and have been so engaged for the last two and a half months for the extension of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. These negotiations are proceeding between the United States and Canada at the present time.

Mr. Tucker: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I had in mind an agreement which would be approved by the Senate and would be agreed to as actually binding the United States people, government and nation to the carrying out of such agreement which has been made verbally respecting co-operation with the Canadian government and people.

An hon. Member: What kind of agreement?

Mr. Tucker: A treaty.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what more chance a treaty would have of passing the United States Senate, where treaties require a two-thirds majority, than would the request which the Canadian government has made that the United States should not take the action which it is taking against Canadian oil imports.

Mr. Speaker, whatever steps the United States administration has taken in recent years in entering into agreements with Canada and other countries with respect to trade have been taken under authority conferred by congress, and the trade agreements extension act to which I have referred, the act of 1955, is an act of congress. That act expires this year, 1958, and it will be a matter of very considerable concern to this country to know what action the United States congress is going to take with respect to the extension of that legislation and the power which it confers on the executive of the United States.

UNITED STATES—REPORTED INTENTION TO INCREASE GIVE-AWAY PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government taken note of the declared intention of United States agricultural secretary Benson of increasing by 50 per cent in 1958 the farm surplus give-away program of that country and has the government taken any steps to protest this decision?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would accept that as notice.

MISSION TO UNITED KINGDOM—INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT OF DIVERSION FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I reiterate a question that I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce some weeks ago. I would like to know whether he is in a position to say what amount of trade has been diverted from the United States to the United Kingdom because of the visit of the trade commission to the United Kingdom.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I appreciate the interest of the hon. member for Laurier in this matter of trade, but I am not yet in a position to answer his question.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister tell the house at a later date what amount of trade has been diverted?

Mr. Green: Don't you want any diverted?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McIlraith: We don't want the Tory reduction at all.

Mr. Churchill: I am quite prepared to give all the information with regard to trade when it becomes available to me, and I shall do so at the earliest possible moment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CEYLON—STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE GIVEN BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I desire to inform the house with respect to what we have been able to do in the past week to provide emergency relief supplies for Ceylon to help the victims of the recent floods in that country, which caused widespread suffering and destruction in large areas.

In response to an appeal by the Prime Minister of Ceylon last Saturday, December 28, arrangements were made immediately to send a shipment of more than four tons of medical and concentrated food supplies, contributed from government stocks, in an R.C.A.F. North Star. The aircraft left Montreal last Sunday and is scheduled to arrive in Colombo this morning.

We were fortunate in that a Canadian firm carrying out one of our Colombo plan projects in Ceylon had a Canso aircraft available in Colombo. It has proved useful, I understand, in flying supplies into, and evacuees out of, the flood area.

The government also offered to consider the provision of transport aircraft from R.C.A.F. stations in Europe. However, we have been informed that in view of the considerable number of transport aircraft and helicopters loaned to Ceylon by other countries, help of this sort is not required.

Early this week the Canadian Red Cross Society also received an appeal for assistance from the Ceylon Red Cross through the League of Red Cross Societies in Geneva, and has arranged to send more than $32,000 worth of medical supplies. These are being paid for out of the European flood relief fund to which the government contributed one-third, and which in 1956 was turned over to the Red Cross to administer. The Junior Red Cross is also contributing $5,000 worth of infant foods. In order to ensure that these urgently needed medical and food supplies reach the disaster areas with the least possible delay the government has made available a North Star aircraft of the R.C.A.F. which is scheduled to leave Montreal this afternoon with this shipment.

As to the possible need for further assistance, I shall, of course, inform the house in due course of whatever further action the government proposes to take, and I can give assurance to hon. members that further help to Ceylon is a matter to which we are prepared to devote urgent and careful consideration. We are following the situation closely through our acting high commissioner in Ceylon and through Ceylon's representatives here. When we have more information we will give sympathetic consideration to sending additional aid.

STATEMENT ON ALLEGED BREAKING OF DIPLOMATIC CODE BY VENEZUELA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to reply to a question which was addressed to me on December 10 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. On that occasion he asked me if I was in a position to make a report on the alleged breaking of the Canadian diplomatic code by the security police of Venezuela.

I have now received reports from our missions in the two countries concerned. We have investigated our security arrangements in Caracas, and I am satisfied that effective precautions to preserve the confidential character of our messages have been and are being taken, and I am happy to inform the house that I am satisfied that our code was not broken.

[Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac).]

FLOODS

BEAUCE, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government intends to supply aid to the region of Beauce in the province of Quebec following the disastrous floods which occurred there?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the procedure in cases of this kind is to act upon a request from the provincial government, and as yet I believe no request has been received in respect of this particular disaster. We did receive a wire from the hon. member for Beauce asking us to send an engineer to make an investigation, and this was done at once; we have the report in the Department of Public Works.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CONSTRUCTION OF FOREST ACCESS ROADS TO PROVIDE WINTER EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Speaker: Does the leader of the house wish to revert to motions?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, if we may go back to motions, may I recall that shortly before Christmas I announced that the government had decided to undertake during the course of this winter a number of projects in the national parks, and in the Nothwest Territories and Wood Buffalo park, that would provide employment for some 1,700 men during this season. I also stated that further studies were under way and that further announcements would be made. The government has now taken a further decision which, if the provinces wish to take advantage of it, will provide employment for an estimated 1,000 to 2,000 more men during this winter.

The government of Canada has for some time been providing assistance to the provinces on projects to improve forest conservation and forest management. In the course of the last few months, agreements have been entered into providing contributions toward capital expenditures for forest fire protection. While these agreements will be very helpful in meeting this menace to our forests, it has long been recognized that one of the primary necessities for this purpose is to provide more access roads. Access roads for fire protection would also have a substantial value for forest management. At the present juncture the construction of such roads would have a third and significant value in providing employment during this winter.

The government has therefore decided to offer to the provinces an arrangement under which it would be prepared to pay 50 per cent of the cost of construction of forest access roads where the construction is undertaken between the date of the offer and June 30, 1958. Letters were sent by me to the premiers of all the provinces yesterday outlining the terms of the proposed arrangement and asking whether they would be prepared to participate. The amount of employment involved will, of course, depend on the extent of the provincial response.

In order that there may be no delay in initiating the program, the government has decided that the supplementary estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for the fiscal year 1957-58 will include an additional amount of $1 million to meet expected federal costs in this regard.

For the convenience of hon. members might I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a copy of the letter I sent to the provincial premiers under date of January 2 be printed as an appendix to Hansard? By leave of the house I should like to table a copy of the letter and have it printed as an appendix.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member permission to have the letter printed as proposed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): May I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a question. In view of the fact that a limit of $1 million has been placed on this new program, will the minister tell the house what will be the limit for each province?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is almost impossible to estimate precisely the amount of money which will be required under this particular supplementary estimate. The figure of $1 million would most accurately be described as a guess. No attempt has been made to divide this money in proportion to the provinces, but we will do everything we can to encourage useful work on the construction of access roads. The decision lies largely with the provinces themselves, and there will be no question in the mind of the government of dividing up federal funds evenly, or anything of that kind. If the work is going to be useful we will accept the proposals.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask the minister how many provinces have not as yet signed an agreement with the federal government regarding forest fire protection?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is just one provincial government which has not signed an agreement with regard to fire protection.

Mr. Lesage: Is the signature of such an agreement a condition of the obtaining of a part of these funds for access roads for forest fire protection?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Well, under this particular program, yes; it will be part of the Canada Forestry Act.

Mr. Lesage: Which means, as I understand it, that if the province of Quebec, which is the only province which has not signed such an agreement, does not sign it will receive no share of that $1 million?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think that is a fair statement of the situation. I might point out in that regard that we are always willing to sign an agreement. There will be further programs announced, I hope, in the very near future affecting the province of Quebec and not under the Canada Forestry Act.

FORT WILLIAM—REPORTED SHUT-DOWN OF CANADA IRON FOUNDRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, but before I do so I would wish my hon. friend and baseball star a happy and useful new year. My question is the same as that contained in a letter I wrote him asking for information. In his absence I received a reply but no information.

The Canada Iron Foundries in Fort William, which supplies wheels for the Canadian National Railways, has been absolutely shut down because of a lack of orders. I just wish that the minister could have those orders restored and the men put back to work, for it is an old firm.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will give very serious consideration to the matter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF CONVERSION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent and welcome statement of vice president S. F. Dingle of the Canadian National Railways that a works program which would include the conversion of out-dated rolling stock into working equipment in the Canadian National Railways shops at Moncton, London and Port Mann, providing work for probably 110 men, can the minister indicate when this work may commence, as some of the men have been laid off for many months?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I do not know the exact date, Mr. Speaker, but I assume it will be in the very near future.

FREIGHT RATES

REQUEST FOR DISALLOWANCE OF RECENT INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. I am sure that in view of his interest in this subject over the years he does not require any notice.

Can the minister say whether the cabinet has given consideration to disallowing under section 53 of the Railway Act the 3.6 per cent horizontal and therefore discriminatory increase in freight rates recently allowed by the board of transport commissioners?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a petition under section 53 of the Railway Act was filed on behalf of the eight provinces on December 31, and as yet I am in no position to comment on that petition. The hon. member will realize that now that this step has been taken, which constitutes in effect an appeal from the board of transport commissioners, the whole question is sub judice, and I am sure he will agree with me that it would be highly improper for me to make any further comment at this time.

Mr. Argue: I do not think the minister is suggesting that an appeal to the cabinet makes this question sub judice. I wonder if the minister could say whether we may expect that any decision the cabinet will make will be made public before January 15, when the increase goes into effect, or before the effective date of the increase if that should be later?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, if and when a decision is made by the governor in council it will of course be made public. I cannot say at the moment when such a decision would be made.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether the government has under consideration any alternative policy to the horizontal increase in freight rates?

Mr. Green: That is another of these fish-hook questions from the hon. member, and I am afraid I have no comment to make on it.

[Mr. Murphy (Westmorland).]

[Later:]

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister inform us if when they petitioned for reconsideration of the 3.6 per cent freight rate increase the provinces asked that the coming into effect of that increase should be suspended until the governor in council had a chance to make a decision in the matter? If they asked for that, will the government give consideration to suspending the increase until a decision has been reached in the matter?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the petition does ask that the coming into effect of the increase be suspended until there has been an opportunity for the hearing to be held. What the decision of the governor in council may be I cannot tell the hon. member this morning.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE OF COASTAL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport; it is sort of a supplement to the question asked before the recess by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I wonder if the minister could advise what action has been taken over the Christmas recess to ensure that passenger and freight boat service to the communities along the coast of British Columbia will be maintained in the same degree as before Union Steamships Limited decided to discontinue its boat passenger service and drastically curtail its boat freight service to certain communities; and what is the situation at the present time?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, final arrangements are presently being made in this matter, and I expect to make a full statement in the house on Monday.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF RESUMPTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. Has any date been set for the resumption of the dominion-provincial conference? I ask this because of the approaching meetings of the various legislatures across Canada and the necessity of the provincial ministers of finance preparing their budgets and so on, which of course will be affected by any agreement made between the provinces and the dominion.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no date has been set as yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose that is a frivolous question.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The minister said no date has been set for the dominion-provincial conference. Is the Acting Prime Minister not in a position to say that there will be a resumption of the conference before the end of March this year?

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the hon. member was more concerned with January 16 than he is with the end of March.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, Mr. Speaker, when January 16 comes my hon. friend will then be concerned, but he must not dodge a very important question like that. I have asked if it is the intention of the government to call a conference with the provinces before March 31 of this year.

Mr. Argue: Before the election.

Mr. Green: I gave the answer that no date has as yet been set. When there is to be a conference called the house, if it is in session, will be given notice of it.

[Later:]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Essex East. Has the government received any communications since the last conference from any of the premiers of the provinces asking for an early resumption of the conference? If so, will the government table the communications and the replies?

Mr. Green: I will have to look into the situation. I cannot give an answer at the moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the correspondence be tabled?

Mr. Green: I cannot say that either at the moment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

MANITOBA—ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister recently received representations from the Manitoba wheat pool requesting immediate action to bring into effect a more equitable distribution of box cars? If so, what action has the minister taken?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, it has not come to my notice as yet. The communication may be in the office, but I have not seen it up to this moment.

WHEAT—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government given any further consideration to the making of a deficiency payment on the 1956-57 wheat crop?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that subject has been under study but no decision has been reached at the moment.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question. Does the minister feel a decision can be reached on this question of deficiency payments and made public before the wheat producers on the prairies commence to go forward with their now tentative decision to send a mass delegation to Ottawa to impress on the government the need for action?

Mr. Churchill: I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer all the subheadings in my hon. friend's question, but if a decision is reached of course it will be made public.

Mr. Argue: Has the minister been informed by the wheat pools of the prairie provinces that unless a favourable decision is forthcoming they will organize a mass delegation to come to Ottawa?

Mr. Churchill: No, I have not heard of any such action.

Mr. Argue: You will; you will.

Mr. Nesbitt: Are you organizing it?

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL LAW

CAPITAL AND CORPORAL PUNISHMENT—FAUTEUX REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of his statement prior to the holiday recess, is the minister now in a position to inform the house whether or not any date has been set for a meeting of the attorneys general of the provinces and his department on the report of the Fauteux commission having to do with capital and corporal punishment?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion that we have a meeting with the attorneys general was confined to the Fauteux commission report. No date has yet been set for that meeting.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the new West Indies federation comes into being officially today, I believe, and in view of the importance of transportation to the islands of the federation and to the trade between those islands and Canada, can the minister say whether there has been any change in the status of the Canadian National steamships since we last met? If not, is consideration being given to any change in their status?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can only add what the management of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships last informed me, namely that they are seriously considering all the implications of the restoration of the service.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether or not we are losing any trade with the West Indies as a result of the Canadian National steamships being immobilized, or is that trade being carried by ships of other countries?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not heard of any loss of trade because of that fact.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Acadia. The minister said he did not think we had lost any trade because of the immobilization of the Canadian National steamships. Can the minister tell the house whether, as a result of our not losing trade, other countries are carrying cargo for us which was formerly carried by the Canadian National steamships?

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. Churchill: Well, I will look into the matter and get a reply for my hon. friend. We are particularly interested in maintaining our trade relations with the West Indies.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The minister did not get my question. He said we had not lost any trade because of our ships being laid up. If we have not lost it, what country is carrying the cargo for us? Is it being carried by the Alcoa ships of the United States, which have been plying between the West Indies and the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is entering into a debate of this subject. As I understood the reply he got it was to the effect that the minister would look into the matter and give him an answer.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Can he make inquiries and inform the house as to what vessels with refrigerator accommodation are now available to carry the trade between Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic provinces and the Caribbean, which was formerly carried by the Canadian National West Indies steamships?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as I understand the question it is exactly the same as the one asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What ships—

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is not.

Mr. Hees: As I understand it, it is what ships are carrying the trade at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: No; refrigerator ships?

Mr. Hees: Well, I am not sure; I will be very glad to look into it.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

STEWART-CASSIAR ROAD, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. On November 25 an order for return was passed having to do with documents relating to the Stewart-Cassiar road. Will the minister inform me what has happened to them?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I will take the question as notice. Arrangements are being made through the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Howard: I asked the Minister of Public Works the question because he answered it in the first instance.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—PLANS FOR NEW FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say what is the present status of the plans for new airport facilities at Winnipeg? Are these plans being proceeded with? When may it be expected that the new airport will be completed?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice and get the information for the hon. member.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RESEARCH AND MANUFACTURE—REPORTED U.S. INFLUENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to inform the house as to the situation resulting from statements by a former high officer of the R.C.A.F., supported by a former chief of staff, that in Canada research and manufacture were being hog-tied because of the attitude taken by the United States of America?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the two gentlemen referred to are now in a civilian capacity. They were retired from the services over a year ago. I presume that perhaps the statements they made were based on the experience they might have had while in service under the regime of the previous government. Every effort is being made to ensure that such practices are not pursued.

Mr. Pickersgill: Pretty cheap.

IMMIGRATION

C. G. HANNA—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could direct a question to the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the minister bring us up to date on the status of Christian George Hanna, in whom he took a great interest just a year ago?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would have to get a review made of the files and see what information is on hand, but I might say that since we took what I think was the reasonable position of giving Mr. Hanna a chance to establish himself I am not aware that he has come officially to our notice in any adverse way.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the hon. gentleman not see the press report which appeared in the newspapers two or three days ago that this gentleman had surrendered—that is the word that was used in the press—to the department? Is that true or is it not?

Mr. Fulton: I have no official confirmation of that, Mr. Speaker. I will be glad to look into it and find out.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Fleming moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $257,324,674.84, being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958, except items 16, 52, 57, 69, 71, 100, 116, 117, 131, 132, 134, 153, 156, 158, 217, 218, 219, 227, 248, 252, 281, 307, 322, 324, 328, 333, 334, 335, 336, 355, 361, 364, 365, 367, 373, 389, 391, 397, 399, 422, 428, 432 and 460, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto a sum not exceeding $983,904.25, being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 148 and 301 of the said estimates; in addition thereto a sum not exceeding $1,393,571.59, being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958, except items 621, 626, 635, 640 and 654, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; in addition thereto a sum not exceeding $2,138,888.89, being one-ninth of the total of the amount of items 669 and 670 set forth in the further supplementary estimates (1) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and a sum not exceeding $125,000, being one-twelfth of the amount of item 668 of the said estimates; in addition thereto a sum not exceeding $7,338,888.17, being one-sixth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the further supplementary estimates (2) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958, except items 692, 729, 732, 737, 754 and 759, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition a sum not exceeding $3,067,583.34, being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 692, 729, 732 and 737 of the said estimates, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, we have now entered the tenth month of the present fiscal year. In general, apart from the exceptions named in the resolution, funds have been voted by parliament only for the first nine months of the year, to December 31. Perhaps it would be of assistance to the committee if I gave the committee certain figures at this point.

There are, as hon. members will recall, four groups of estimates now under consideration. They total in the aggregate $5,597,316,555. Of that total the statutory items amount to $2,172,621,097, and the total amount required to be voted at the outset was accordingly $3,424,695,458. Thus far in the present fiscal year parliament has voted on account of the appropriations for the current fiscal year a total of $2,631,646,330.52 in a total of five appropriation bills. This present measure, which contemplates the introduction of the sixth appropriation bill in respect of the estimates for the current fiscal year, asks a vote of a total of $272,372,511.08. If the bill is passed the total voted by parliament will aggregate $2,913,253,431.68.

May I express the hope, Mr. Chairman, that this will be the last time it will be necessary to ask for a vote of interim supply during the course of the present session. The present request would provide the funds required to meet the expenses of government to January 31, and it may be hoped that all the items will have been voted in full by that date so far as the house approves of them.

In the present resolution, Mr. Chairman, with regard to most of the items the proportion sought is one twelfth. In some cases, as on previous occasions when interim supply was asked for, one ninth is asked of those items that were introduced having effect from July 1 and applicable therefore only to the last nine months of the fiscal year. In some cases one sixth is the fraction required, as to those items which were introduced to have effect from October 1, 1957, and accordingly apply only to the last six months of the present fiscal year. With only two exceptions there is nothing more required than that particular fraction of one month. In the present resolution the two exceptions are of a nature that has been encountered in connection with previous votes of interim supply.

There are two items, numbers 148 and 301, where the amount required exceeds one twelfth for very good reasons. In the case of item 148 the amount now requested would bring the total not to ten twelfths but to eleven twelfths. It is one of those items in the fish culture and development branch where the expenditure does not correspond exactly with the progress of the year. More of the expenditure necessarily requires to be made before the late months of the fiscal year.

The other exception is in the case of item 301, where again the amount now requested would bring the total fraction voted not to ten twelfths but to eleven twelfths. The item relates to the national parks and historic sites service, construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, and the reason in that case is that construction in the parks is usually concentrated in the summer and fall months and good progress has been achieved this year, particularly with the road construction program.

Apart from the items in the Post Office Department which were voted in full last spring, in no case where parliament has not already approved the item in full will the total amount voted following the adoption of the bill exceed eleven twelfths.

The rights of the house are preserved, therefore, with respect to the discussion of such items because of the necessity of having approval given to the items, and by reason of that proportion of one twelfth remaining yet to be voted.

In accordance with the time honoured practice, Mr. Chairman, I assure the house of its rights; and to avoid duplication of debate I give the usual undertaking that the passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee of supply. The usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Marler: I should like first of all to say, on behalf of the official opposition, that we have no objection to voting the amount of supply which is provided for in the resolution now before the committee. The minister has assured us that in no case will the amount voted represent more in respect of any particular estimate than eleven twelfths, except for the few cases in which the estimate has been fully approved by parliament and funds voted accordingly.

I think the minister will agree that there are a large number of estimates that are affected by the various interim supply bills that have been passed. It is difficult for an opposition to follow the course of the votes in connection with each of the individual items, but so far as it is possible to tell, in no case covered by this resolution is more than eleven twelfths proposed to be voted.

I am sorry that the minister, in making some comments this morning regarding expenditures covered by this resolution, did not see fit to do more in the way of enlightening the committee with regard to the general program of expenditure than he has already done. He will probably recall that when we voted interim supply for the first time in the present parliament on October 17, he outlined—I think more particularly for the benefit of the new members of the house—the procedure that is ordinarily followed with respect to estimates. The explanation which he gave I thought made it quite clear that the tradition of the house is, and always has been, that the estimates are tabled early in the session and hon. members are therefore given an opportunity of reviewing them. There is, in fact, usually some lag in time between the date on which estimates are presented and the date when they are actually considered in the committee.

This year what we have is that despite the fact that the estimates were deposited on October 15, and despite the fact that the customary recommendation from His Excellency accompanied them—I might merely quote what was said by the minister in this connection on page 11 of Hansard of October 15, 1957:

> However, this is not to say that the present government will support all of the detailed programs contemplated when those estimates were originally prepared. Rather, such changes as this government proposes to make in the current year programs will be brought to parliament's attention when the individual items affected are being considered by the committee of supply.

On various occasions, Mr. Chairman, we have endeavoured to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that this was not in keeping with the tradition that had been followed in the past. I am sure the minister himself would agree that in the past when estimates have been tabled, hon. members of the house fully expected that the expenditures they covered would be discussed and justified when the individual items were considered in committee. I fully realize that in rather exceptional instances in the past the minister has proposed reductions in these estimates when an item has been before the committee. In those cases events transpired since the preparation of the estimate, and probably since the tabling of the estimates, which made it expedient to ask for less money than was covered in the printed book of estimates.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the procedure the minister followed in October was a rather radical departure from past practice. It did seem to me that there could be no real objection to the minister acquainting the members of this committee with the reductions it was proposed to make; in other words, to put all hon. members of this house on a plane of equality so that those who were considering the estimates would know what the government's intentions were with regard to the various expenditures. As hon. members will recall, although the matter has been raised on a number of occasions the minister has steadfastly refused to give us information in the form of a table so we could see in the case of each department what items were not to be voted as presented but were to be reduced in amount.

I still find it difficult, Mr. Chairman, to understand why the minister has not seen fit to table a statement of those reductions in expenditures for the various departments. I observed that when he made his speech on the first item of his estimates he then informed the house that there were to be savings and reductions amounting to some $64 million. It seemed to me at that time, and on reflection I am even more convinced of the fact, that quite obviously the minister is aware of the changes to be made in the expenditures and is therefore in a position to tell the members of this committee just where those reductions are to be made, and what is the nature of the savings and reductions that make up this figure of $64 million to which he referred in his remarks.

One realizes immediately that $64 million is no minor reduction of a single item in the estimates of a department. It represents some very considerable changes in the estimates as presented to this house by the previous government. It does seem to me that the minister should lose no further time in giving the members this information, which they are entitled to have, as to the reductions totalling $64 million.

I have not been able, in going through Hansard, to find any case in which the estimates of any department which has been considered by this committee have been reduced. I take it, therefore, that all this reduction of $64 million to which the minister referred must be in some other items. When I say there have been no reductions in any items before the committee, I am referring to the resolutions that have been voted. I am aware of the fact that the estimates of some departments have been given preliminary consideration without a vote or resolution having been passed in consequence. I believe, therefore, it is a fair statement to make that no member on the opposition side of this house has any idea whatever as to how this figure of $64 million is arrived at.

We are not in a position, therefore, to decide whether these are real reductions and savings; whether in effect they amount to anything more than a shortfall, a lapsing of part of the estimates, or where that lapsing has taken place.

Bearing in mind what the minister said a moment ago to the effect that we are now entering upon the tenth month of the present fiscal year, it seems to me that the minister ought to be in a position to acquaint us with the details of this item of $64 million so that we may form our opinion as to whether these are real savings or whether they are merely shortfalls in expenditure; whether because of one reason or another programs are not being carried out, and whether or not there is something significant about them.

Everybody realizes that by merely curtailing a program or by merely refusing to undertake the carrying out of public works in one form or another by one department or another it may reduce the amount to be expended under a budget, but I do not think any objective person would consider that such actions represented savings. It is no saving not to build a building that is needed. That is a lapse, if you like, of the estimate, but nobody should think it is an economy, if this ordinary meaning is to be given to the word "saving".

There is one other comment I would like to make on this particular occasion, and that is that the Minister of Finance, when he sat on this side of the house, continually referred to the subject of waste and extravagance on the part of the various government departments. I have recently had the opportunity of rereading some of his speeches. I would not say these were recommended reading for the Christmas season, but as a matter of duty I felt I should read some of his remarks as recorded in Hansard of former years.

I do not think in recent times there has been a single debate on the budget in which the present Minister of Finance did not use those very vigorous terms which he is accustomed to using—which in fact he was more accustomed to using when he sat on this side of the house than he is today—and I found that in almost every year we had at least one very formidable paragraph on the subject of waste and extravagance. Yet we have been through the No. 1 item of several departments and through nearly all the estimates of some of the other departments, and in not one single case has the minister, in presenting his estimates, been able to point to an example of waste and extravagance which he has found to be carried on in his department.

The Minister of Transport, my successor in that department, seemingly found that the department had been efficiently managed. The Minister of Public Works, who I see is just coming into the committee, has also spoken in the most glowing terms of his own department and those forming part of the permanent staff who assist in its administration. I think the last thing he would wish to imply is that this excellent staff of employees whom he has praised so highly would be guilty of such a thing as waste or extravagance.

The Secretary of State, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Minister of Veterans Affairs in almost every case have made, if not a positive statement, at least a statement by implication that their departments were well run and that there was no waste.

I think, Mr. Chairman, this does afford an excellent opportunity for the Minister of Finance to deal with the subject on a very general basis, and that before discussion of this resolution comes to an end he should give us some specific instances of this waste and extravagance to which he referred in such vigorous and vehement terms in the past. I think it would be very enlightening to those of us who have had the opportunity to be members of the treasury board if we could find out in what particular departments that waste and extravagance existed, because it was my own experience that all the recommendations of all the departments were given the most careful scrutiny, not only of course by the permanent officials of the treasury board with whom the present minister is now so closely associated, but also by the members of the treasury board itself. In fact, as the minister knows, meetings of the treasury board occupy a great deal of time, and I am sure that he and his colleagues, our successors on the treasury board, are just as vigilant today as we were in endeavouring to make sure that no money is spent wastefully or extravagantly.

I think the minister owes it to the permanent staff of the various departments to admit that since he has come to office he has not been able to find the waste and extravagance of which he spoke previously, not having access to all the facts.

I am not going to take any further time of the committee, but I would say that we desire to facilitate the passing of this resolution, and I hope that if other members take part in the discussion today and if they take advantage of this occasion to discuss other matters which are properly the subject of discussion at this time, the minister will not conclude the debate by scolding the members of the committee for taking so long in the discussion of the estimates. It seems to me he should realize that if scolding was in order, some such scolding could be administered retrospectively to the minister himself, as he was not always the most silent member of the opposition when it came to discussing interim supply.

I say this, Mr. Chairman, merely to make it perfectly clear that although we intend to support this resolution, that does not mean that other hon. members of the party to which I belong will not wish to participate in the general discussion.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, it goes without saying that we are going to support this resolution, but we are also going to take advantage of the opportunity which it gives us to discuss some matters which some of us think are very important.

One of the matters we want to bring out is that of governmental policy toward NATO. The committee will remember that on the day the house adjourned the Prime Minister came before us and gave us his agonizing reappraisal of what had taken place in Paris; and that right hon. gentleman had many words with which to disguise what he probably felt were the facts of the case. He subjected us to a torrent of words; he inundated us with a Niagara of words, and it has taken some time to get the spray out of our faces, but we have succeeded in doing that today, due in no small measure, of course, to the Minister of Finance.

The minister, however, leaves me wondering exactly how many voices there happen to be in his cabinet. There are so many voices that at times it sounds like a hydra-headed monster. The minister tells us that the position of the United States, for instance, with regard to the restriction on oil is wholly untenable. He tells us that the attitude of the United States does not at all concur with the communique. Then I read these words of the Prime Minister telling us that the atmosphere in Paris was certainly one which indicated a new spirit of unity among the nations, although I gathered the impression that perhaps the Minister of Finance did not share that feeling of unity which the Prime Minister obviously had. Or, as the Prime Minister went on to say later at page 2722:

> At the meeting this week the flowering of this concept of the Atlantic community was very much in evidence.

Sir, there are some weeds in this flower bed. The Prime Minister did not speak about them. The Minister of Finance does. How does he propose to eradicate these weeds? What course of action does he pursue? The hon. gentleman makes a press statement which he assumes that United States officials will read. I know the excuse which has constantly been put up by governments that nothing official has reached their ears. How do we know that this press statement put out by a member of the Canadian government has reached the ears of the state department?

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> There was not a great deal of divergence of view as to the necessity of greater and more expanding developments.

That is economic expansion. This, I say, does not agree—far from it—with what the Minister of Finance said today, and I think we have to get some clarification on this. I suggested earlier that the minister was conducting diplomacy by press statements. Perhaps I was not altogether right, because according to what he said he was having negotiations and discussions with the United States officials in Paris. So perhaps what we are being subjected to now is cocktail diplomacy.

But I do not think we should come to either the diplomacy of the cocktail party or the diplomacy of press statements. What this house would like to see is an official protest made to the government of the United States. It is no use having a minister of the government telling this parliament what he would like to say to the United States. Let him say it to the responsible people there, not to the opposition in the Canadian parliament.

When the Prime Minister made his statement on NATO my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, stated that there was not a concrete proposal in anything he had to say; in other words we were rehashing what had been said throughout the years with regard to NATO's hopes, aims and aspirations. We see now more than ever that those who are leading NATO have a Maginot mind complex, and we do not want minds like these in days such as we are going through now. I notice that the Prime Minister tried to defend himself from a very obvious charge, and I am going to say that the declaration from NATO, and his own speech, were a veritable mass and mess of clichés. The Prime Minister said:

> I know what the cynics will say. They have done it all down through the ages. They will contend that the declaration and the communique are simply the same old tired clichés strung together in a different arrangement but leaving the old patterns substantially unchanged.

Well, when it comes to the Atlantic community and the fundamental concept of NATO, I am not a cynic. Throughout the years in this parliament I have been one of the protagonists of an Atlantic community. I have gone even further and asked for an Atlantic federation. It is not a matter of cynicism with me; it is a matter of disgust at this brutal use of the English language. I think the NATO declaration ought to be sent to every high school and every university in Canada as a grim example of how not to use words. Let us examine this declaration and see how many clichés there are in it. It begins:

> We, the representatives of 15 nations of the North Atlantic alliance, believing in the sanctity of those human rights which are guaranteed to all men of free nations by their constitutions, laws and customs, rededicate ourselves and our nations to the principles and purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty.

Here is a startling new thought, something which must make us all shiver with expectation. The declaration goes on:

> We have agreed together upon means to give added strength to our alliance.

Here again is a brand new idea, something we have really never thought of before, and I am sure it excites us. And it continues:

> We are always ready to settle international problems by negotiation.

Surely that too is an exciting new discovery, and I am certain that the hon. member for Algoma East must be kicking himself because he never thought of that during all the time he was secretary of state for external affairs in this country. Then the document goes on:

> The free world faces the mounting challenge of international communism backed by Soviet power.

What an amazing piece of research. Who else could have discovered it? This is the sort of research which, perhaps, makes the friends of NATO tremble with apprehension while making its potential foes quiver with hope. The declaration goes on to say—and I hope the Minister of Finance is listening—"for this purpose we have agreed to co-operate closely." This is a magnificent new concept never revealed to this house before. All new ideas, and not a cliché amongst them.

And then:

> We shall reach this goal only by recognizing our interdependence.

Mr. Chairman, what a blinding vision has been given to men, something which has never been thought of before. To give another example:

> We are an organization of free countries.

Surely this is revelation according to St. John. Or let us look at something which, I am told, the Canadian government took pride in having inserted in the declaration:

> If the free nations are steadfast, the totalitarian menace that now confronts them will eventually recede.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

"If the free nations are steadfast", Mr. Chairman. They have been steadfast long enough; steadfast for doubt, steadfast for cross purposes, and steadfast for confusion. What we need now is to be steadfast for imagination and some leadership, and that certainly was not given in Paris by this Canadian delegation. "If the free nations are steadfast the totalitarian menace will eventually recede." What an example of pre-sputnik thinking. What an example of the Maginot mind which, I said earlier, was working in full force.

This declaration is an insult to the intelligence of the people of the western world. I say it is full of clichés. I could go on and quote more; I could quote as many from the speech of the Prime Minister himself. The relation between the Prime Minister and the cliché is not that of master and servant; it is that of master and slave because he beats these clichés and bruises them, sets them dangling before us, and then having bludgeoned them with such violence he buries their bleeding bodies in the pages of Hansard. If we want to find out what is happening we have to disinter these victims of verbosity, and when we conduct a post mortem we find that nothing has been happening.

But there are some statements in the communique with which we can agree. For example:

> The aim of the Soviet bloc is to weaken and disrupt the free world.

We are agreed on that. That menace confronts us. The Soviet union is the leader of one of the big power blocs, and as an individual I am supremely suspicious of great powers and power blocs. We in the western world have seen how power can be taken and abused, but there is always the safeguard of public opinion to act as a brake and put a stop to it. On the other hand, in totalitarian nations there is no such safeguard and no such brake, and so we are faced today with two great power blocs in a world of anarchy which may mean yet a world which is at war. The consequences of this situation can be tragic for people all over the world. The one thing that saves us is that both sides know that war would be a matter of mutual extermination and anihilation. And so it is possible that both blocs, or the peoples of both blocs, want to come to terms with each other.

There has been a certain disinclination on the part of the west to come to terms with the Soviet union for reasons which in the past were perhaps good. But the situation today is so precarious that we believe it is essential that another attempt be made to test the sincerity of Russian intentions. We know what has happened in the past; we know the disappointments we have encountered, but we still have to make another attempt. We have to be prepared to negotiate but not on the broadest basis, because that, I think, would mean failure. Rather we have to take two or perhaps three cases in which we can negotiate, those which are probably the most perilous to mankind. We have to see if we can come to some modus vivendi with the Soviet union in this connection. The following is mentioned in the communique:

> We have especially in mind the problems of the reunification of Germany in freedom—

Many are convinced that unless this problem in the centre of Europe is solved there will not be much hope for peace, and therefore it is essential that we try and have Germany reunited, not on the basis of western terms and not on the basis of Soviet terms but on the basis which perhaps the Germans themselves want. In other words there has to be a compromise between the two groups.

It might be worth while considering the suggestion that both East and West Germany and Poland and Czechoslovakia be to some extent neutralized in the hope that free elections can be held there, properly supervised, and Germany eventually united. I know there are many who oppose this. For instance, there is the pentagon type of mind. It was this group or clique, call it what you like, which was responsible for bringing Germany into the North Atlantic community. They argued that the defence of Germany and the creation in Germany of an army was essential to the safety of the west. Probably they were thinking in those days of the policy of containment, but surely the advent of the intercontinental ballistic missile has shown that containment can no longer work because we cannot contain those missiles.

On the other hand there is the economic argument, which may not be expressed but which I suppose is deeply felt in nations such as the United Kingdom; the fear that if Germany does not have to spend money on rearmament she may become a more intense competitor in the markets of the world, and the other fear that as the result of not spending money on rearmaments the standard of living of the Germans would so rise as to be an incentive to other nations to follow Germany's example. I recognize that these arguments have been made, and I think I know why they are being made. Yet I still insist that one of the most important things we must try and achieve is the reunification of that country.

There is another area and again the communique mentions it; that is the Middle East. The people of the United States had better realize quickly that Russia is in the Middle East and intends to stay there. To ignore that fact is to blind oneself to the true facts of the situation. If we are going to achieve peace in the Middle East, which I am sure is the wish and hope of all of us, then we cannot fail to recognize that Russia is a power in that area. Here again, I suggest, is another place or another area, if I may repeat the word, where possibly we can negotiate with some hope of success, but at least we will find out how serious the Russians are in their desire for peace.

I think in many ways they are sincere. I think the Russians realize the havoc which would be wreaked with all-out war as well as anybody else, but we face the problem that in the United States we have a secretary of state who I have no doubt in his private life is a very estimable gentleman but who as secretary of state for that country is nothing short of an international calamity. The Russians certainly do not trust Mr. Dulles, and the words he has used throughout the years perhaps might give the Russians some valid reason for distrust. Nevertheless this distrust to some extent has to be removed if it is humanly possible, and a fresh attempt made to bring peace to the Middle East.

Then there is a third area in which there seems to be an opportunity for agreement at least between the east and west, and that is in the cessation of the production of fissionable material for weapons purposes, the reduction of existing stocks of nuclear weapons and the suspension of nuclear weapons tests mentioned in the communique. Great numbers of people in the west want these things achieved and it is possible that the Russians want them achieved, but we can find out only by trying to negotiate with them just how far they are prepared to go.

Now, how do we undertake these negotiations? The communique is completely unrealistic, I think, when it says we should try to promote these negotiations through the framework of the United Nations, bearing in mind the committee which has already been set up in the United Nations and of which the Soviet union is going to have no part whatsoever. The communique was equally unrealistic, in my opinion, when it suggested that we should welcome meetings at the foreign ministers' level to resolve the deadlock. Whether the meetings be between the foreign ministers of the 15 NATO nations or of a few—and I do not care how few—Mr. Dulles will be there, and I think his use has long since passed.

But perhaps there is something else we could do. Possibly we can beat the Russians at their own game of propaganda if we have the intelligence and imagination to do so. Why should this matter not be referred to the United Nations as a whole? We know perfectly well that this large number of nations cannot settle problems such as these. They will have to delegate power and responsibility. Is it beyond the bounds of reason to suppose that power and responsibility could be delegated to a representative of the NATO powers such as Eisenhower, a representative of the Warsaw pact such as Khrushchev, and a representative of the uncommitted nations of the world such as Nehru? These three men would meet not with the intention of giving the world a blueprint as to what could be done but in order to explore a method in which diplomacy could carry these discussions even further.

The first meeting could be held. Of course there would be great fanfare, but it would be naive to expect any concrete results from such a meeting. However, it could pave the way to more harmonious relations. Afterwards discussions could be carried on, not necessarily at the foreign ministers' level but on a level appreciably below that so we could have open covenants discreetly arrived at. Perhaps there is a promise there, and we cannot tell how promising it may be until these meetings are held.

Another point where I again disagree quite strongly with the Prime Minister is with regard to the creation of a food bank through NATO. It is time we realized that although we regard NATO as a means for our defence and protection, it is regarded in the rest of the world as a tool of imperialistic powers. We may say that is not true and disagree completely with the idea, but this concept does exist and we cannot kill it.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, when the committee took recess I was discussing the suggestion of a NATO food bank and economic aid being given by the NATO countries to the less fortunate nations of the world, and I oppose it.

The reason for my opposition is this. No matter how highly NATO may be regarded as a means for our own defence, nevertheless in the underprivileged areas of the world it is regarded as an instrument of imperialistic powers, and I argue that if NATO is to administer aid that aid is going to be suspect. It would be far better if we intend to help the underprivileged countries of the world, as we should do, to do it through the United Nations and through the agencies which are already there.

But I would like to think that we would do it in a more generous way than has been indicated by the government this year in the increase it has made under the Colombo plan. The government may take some pride in the fact that it is giving another $600,000 or so, but nevertheless that merely means that one cent per capita of our population is to be given every 90 days for further economic assistance to those nations which could do with more help, and I and my party are convinced that we are not doing nearly enough in this form of aid to less fortunate countries of the world.

Then there was another matter the Prime Minister mentioned. He talked of those who were behind the iron curtain, and all of us sympathize with what he says. We are just as concerned about those people as he is. The Prime Minister said in his speech, as reported at page 2723 of Hansard:

> We thought of the people behind the iron curtain, people who believe in freedom as we do. Sometimes we are apt to forget them.

It is most unfortunate that the Prime Minister and the government apparently have already forgotten about many individuals who fought against communism, who left their homes and are now denied the right to come to this country. I refer, of course, to the Hungarians and to the orders which were issued this year preventing by and large any further entry into this country of Hungarian victims of communist persecution. The Prime Minister went on:

> When the declaration was being drafted I had the honour to move that there should be the inclusion of a paragraph to give to those people, whether in the Ukraine, in Hungary, in Poland . . . some hope.

I should like to give them hope; I am sure every hon. member would, but I would like to see something practical done so that hope can be translated into fact. After all, there are displaced persons in camps in Europe today who are the victims of communist persecution, Ukrainians and Poles who suffered under communism yet who, because they are ill or old, are not able to come to this country. If we feel so strongly about those people, those victims of communistic persecution, then we have to do something more than just more or less hold out hopes. We have to couple those hopes with action.

In the communique itself there are quite a number of points which demand answers. There are too many words in it and nothing much is at all clear. For instance, the communique contained the following:

> We are therefore resolved to achieve the most effective pattern of NATO military defensive strength, taking into account the most recent developments in weapons and techniques.

Let me ask the Minister of National Defence this question. How does the government propose to go about this? Later in the communique we find the following; we have—

> . . . decided to bring about closer co-ordination with a view to ensuring that each NATO member country makes its most effective contribution to the requirements established by the alliance.

But how are we to do so, Mr. Chairman? These are words. We want to have these words explained; we want to know what government policy is in this regard. Then later on we find the following:

> As regards defence production, we have decided, in view of the progress already made, to take further measures within NATO to promote the co-ordination of research, development and manufacture of modern weapons including intermediate range ballistic missiles.

There are many of us who have been asking for this close co-ordination for a long time, and we have been promised it for a long time, yet nothing has been produced which we can really get our teeth into. The government owes it to this house and to Canada to explain many of the questions which arise out of the words used in the communique.

Then there were the usual platitudes about economic collaboration and close co-operation among the countries of NATO, the need for greater unity, and so on. Yet, as the Minister of Finance pointed out, the United States is making a mockery of these high protestations which we hear and about which we read. What is the government doing to ensure closer economic co-operation with the nations of Europe? Well, there has been set up a European free trade area, and the government's only concern about it, apparently, is to see that we should not be excluded from its scope in regard to food, drink and tobacco. I would have thought, if the government was really desirous of improving the trade situation in this country, it would have made a much more decided attempt to get closer in an economic sense to the nations of Europe.

We have to do that for this reason if for no other. Earlier this session I spoke about the increasing United States economic domination of this country. We have to rectify this imbalance, and the only way we can do it is by trying to increase our trade, not with the United Kingdom only but substantially with this European free trade area. There there might be some hope for us; there, I am certain, will be the salvation of NATO. A lot of lip service has been given to article II throughout the years. But if there are doubts in Europe—and I at times share those doubts—I think they can be dissipated very rapidly by entering into the closest economic collaboration and co-operation with our European allies. When we do that, then I think we shall be much safer than by relying solely upon the words which we see in this communique.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up too much time of the committee; nevertheless I do want to follow up what the hon. member for Winnipeg North has been dealing with and deal with something which is of tremendous importance to the world at the present time.

On March 1, 1954, the Americans detonated their first hydrogen bomb near Bikini atoll, and for the first time the world was shocked into an awareness of the dangers of atomic radiation as it could affect the health and even the life and being of future generations. As we all remember, radioactive dust from that explosion settled on some Japanese fishermen who were fairly close by with terrible results.

We all know that we receive radiation to some extent anyway. It comes from the natural environment, and probably has always been there; and to some extent we get radiation poisoning when we subject ourselves to X-rays for diagnostic purposes. Now we have added a new and potentially vast source of radioactive poisoning as a result of the testing of nuclear weapons. Therefore we have entered into the fourth year of what might be called the age of radiation without representation. Without representation, I say, because the people of the world who are being subjected to these extra doses of radioactive poisoning have in no way given their consent or approval to or any voice in what is happening to them. Most of them have never had a chance through any kind of institution to say whether they approve or do not approve of the kind of danger with which they are now faced.

There are three questions that urgently require answers. First, is there a serious danger to the health and life of present and future generations as a result of the detonation of these nuclear weapons? Second, is it possible and practicable now to reach an agreement for the suspension of tests of these weapons? Third, is it necessary and desirable in the interests not only of health but of national security that we should reach an agreement to bring this process to an end? In my opinion the resounding answer to all these questions is yes.

Just how harmful to human beings the bomb particles are that come from the detonations, which from the mushroom clouds go into the atmosphere, into the soil, from the soil into plants and animals and from there to the human dinner table is at present a matter of doubt. But the Japanese people, an intelligent and aware people, have no doubt of the extent of the danger.

It was the Japanese fisherman, of course, who first felt that danger at close hand. The Japanese government has even gone to the extent of warning its people officially to boil all of their drinking water. They are, of course, perhaps more exposed than any other area of the world because they have on the one hand the south Pacific testing region and on the other hand Siberia where the Russians have been testing their megaton bombs. There is no doubt that public opinion in Japan is overwhelmingly in favour of the prompt stopping of these tests, and I do not think there is any doubt that this is the opinion at the present time of the vast majority of civilized and thoughtful mankind.

Speaking of Canada and the west, I think our failure to take an adequate lead in bringing a halt to these tests has gravely injured our position in the thoughts, hearts and minds of most of the people of the world. In 1956 Japan moved a resolution in the general assembly of the United Nations stating that we should deal with this question first, not as part of any package proposal mixed up with other things, but that we should first get over the hurdle of the suspension of nuclear tests and deal with that matter promptly in order to bring such tests to an end. Whatever the merits of the scientific controversy may be, it seems to me that the very least we can say is that, in the words of Earl Attlee, "humanity should be given the benefit of any doubt".

Various committees have discussed and studied the dangers of atomic radiation. The general assembly of the United Nations established such a committee in 1956 and it is continuing to observe and study in this field. But I wish to refer to one committee which has been at work more recently, namely the joint committee of the United States congress which, starting on May 27 of last year, received testimony from many experts in this field, from physicists and doctors, from soil analysts and meteorologists, from chemists, biologists and geneticists.

The committee heard 5,000 pages of testimony, and while it is not possible to summarize all the findings of the scientists who took part in the investigation I should like to read the question that the joint committee of the United States congress considered. It was this:

> How much radiation from cosmic rays, medical X-rays and weapons tests combined can man tolerate before this radiation does appreciable harm to the life span and health of the present generation, and brings about a significant increase in deformed children born in succeeding generations?

The committee were able to reach no clear answer to the question they propounded for themselves, and that in itself is a disquieting thing. We are dealing here with unknown, malignant forces about which there is no certainty of scientific knowledge. Nevertheless the evidence given before the committee was most important. Dr. Alvin Graves, an employee of the United States Los Alamos project, flatly stated, for example, that there was no such thing as a clean H-bomb. All of them, he said, gave out radioactive poisons, and it was just a matter of degree between what is called a clean bomb and a dirty bomb.

Another scientist carefully investigated the question of whether cow's milk is already hazardous to the health of children. His answer was no, that the chance was only about one in a million. But another scientist replied that even if the chance ratio were put that low, which he did not think it should be, 3,000 cases of cancer in young children would be apparent, spread across the whole population of the world at the present time.

The consensus of agreement—I am not dealing with points upon which there was disagreement—on the joint committee is summed up in an article by the scientific editor of New Republic magazine in its issue of July 1, 1957. The points on which there was substantial agreement among all the scientists taking part in the proceedings before the committee are summarized in that article in these words:

> 1. The fall-out of bomb particles from the stratosphere, which continues for 40 years after each big bomb tested, is not uniform around the world, as had previously been assumed by the government. It is concentrated in some areas by rainfall, and possibly by high altitude air currents. The northern hemisphere gets much more than the southern . . .

In other words, in the case of Canada we are more subject to this particular hazard than the world generally, and in my own province of British Columbia where there is heavy rainfall I dare say that the risk is greater still.

> 2. Geneticists agree there is no "safe" level of radiation. Even a small amount produces some adverse changes in future generations.

There is no safe level; in other words every bomb tested produces some undesirable changes in the human species.

3. As to the increase in bone cancer and leukemia in this generation from strontium-90, scientists do not know whether there is a "safe level", or a threshold, below which no damage occurs. The majority of experts assumed there is no safe level, even though the increased incidence of cancer cannot yet be proved . . .

4. The number of persons who could be damaged by increased radiation in this generation—either with cancer or with abnormal offspring—is "roughly calculable". Estimates by individual scientists using various hypotheses ranged from 50,000 to several million in a world population of 2.6 billion . . . The increase will be proportionate to the increase in total radiation: that is, if bomb testing has thus far raised total radiation one per cent, cancer and leukemia should go up one per cent.

5. A group of five scientists, including three atomic energy commission officials, concluded that once the atmosphere is saturated with bomb particles—a situation which one witness estimated would arrive in 10 years—the maximum rate of bomb testing without jeopardizing the entire race would be between 2 and 10 megatons of bomb materials blown annually into the stratosphere by all nations.

The upper limit—10 megatons—is the average rate at which the United States has been testing for the past five years.

The last point illustrates the fact that we are already testing—at least one nation, the United States alone, is already testing—at above what these scientists consider to be a safe rate of maximum radiation in the atmosphere.

The first question I propounded was, is there grave danger from radiation from bomb testing now, and I think the answer is unquestionably yes. How great that danger is we may not know, but that danger is there and the damage is being accomplished, as no one can seriously doubt. Already we have too much radiation in the atmosphere, and we have to consider this fact in the context of the world around us.

There was a time when only the United States had the bomb. In 1949 the Soviet union tested its first bomb. Now the United States, the Soviet union and the United Kingdom all have the bomb and are conducting tests. Does anyone seriously believe that the process will stop there? What country will be next? I presume it will be France, in the absence of international control. I presume that communist China will not be far from achieving its bomb and its series of tests. I would presume that with technological progress increasing from year to year and the techniques becoming simpler and better known, all military nations will one day have their bombs unless control is achieved.

Can you imagine what a world we would have if every South American dictator had at his disposal a hydrogen bomb with which to threaten annihilation of his adversaries unless they came to his terms? Is it going to be easier to control that situation now or when the bomb is already in the hands of half a dozen or a dozen more countries? Clearly the time to act is now, not only from the point of view of the dangerous increase in radiation in the atmosphere which is showing up in the bone tissue and blood stream of the people of the world, but from the point of view of a secure and peaceful world.

The objectives we should set for ourselves, Mr. Chairman, could be expressed simply in this way. First, we should seek to stop all further testing of nuclear weapons. Second, we should seek an agreement to prohibit the manufacture of nuclear fuel for military purposes. Third, we should seek ways of reducing the world's stockpile of atomic weapons, as a preliminary to full disarmament.

We cannot achieve all those objectives in the world as it is at the present time. I appreciate that, but I say we can now achieve the first one. On June 14, 1957, the Russians proposed or rather agreed before the London subcommittee on disarmament to the suspension of all testing of nuclear weapons, with control stations to be set up in Russia and other countries to make sure those countries would abide by the agreement. There were no conditions to that offer. The Russians were willing, and presumably still are willing, to treat that one point alone as something upon which agreement can be reached.

What was the answer of the west and in particular of Canada, which was one of the five nations represented on the disarmament subcommittee? Our reply was a package proposal on disarmament. We proposed four points and said we would accept the suspension of nuclear tests with control and inspection provided we reached agreement on the other three points. I agree that our package proposal was good. There was provision for a reduction of conventional armaments, for aerial inspection and for cessation of the manufacture of nuclear weapons, not just their testing. These things were good. But it has been clear that we cannot achieve agreement with the Russians on the package, so I say we should take out of that package point No. 1, the suspension of tests, and get agreement on that.

If we do that, Mr. Chairman, I do not see how it could be said that it would imperil our military security any more than the security of the Soviet union. It seems to me that once again we would have seized the initiative in these disarmament talks. We have lost that. Russia, to a very large extent, has captured the imagination of the world. She has presented herself as a nation pressing for disarmament and for peace. I know that to a large extent she has done that by presenting unacceptable proposals, but there is no doubt that the west has lost the initiative.

I believe that in the interests of human health as well as peace we should achieve control now before these nuclear weapons get out of hand. We should reach agreement on point No. 1 because agreement with Russia is possible now on that point, which involves the prohibition of further tests of nuclear weapons, with proper control and inspection to make sure that the agreement is carried out.

We are too apt to assume, as were the citizens of Rome, Carthage and Byzantium, those civilizations of the past, that our life will go on smoothly. We are smug about that. We do not seem to realize that the danger of mass destruction of the world in which we have been living is present and is becoming greater every day. Unless the two giants in this world today, the United States and Soviet Russia, can reach an effective agreement, the chances of this civilization surviving are very slight indeed.

It may be ironic that the great capitalist power of the world and the great communist power of the world must form an alliance and work out a settlement of their differences; must divide up their spheres of influence in the world, if this world is to survive. It is this point to which we have come at the beginning of 1958. The point is that the beginning of an agreement can be based on the ending of bomb tests.

I do urge this government, as one with great responsibility in the matter because of its membership on the United Nations disarmament subcommittee, to take the lead in pressing for the suspension of the testing of nuclear weapons. We have a chance for agreement now. The nations all over the world expect it of us. Let us take that chance. It is only a beginning, but once you have made a start then you can seize the initiative and press for other things such as the abolition of the manufacture of these weapons themselves.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I think I should say a few words on the very important matter about which we were informed, a few days before Christmas, through the press of the country. I refer to the decision of the United States to curtail oil imports from Canada, a decision about which we learned a great deal more this morning from the Minister of Finance when he made his important statement.

It is true that after his announcement there was an opportunity for some hon. members to put some questions, but because of the item in our deliberations under which the minister made his statement there was, under our rules, not the same opportunity for comment about the implications of what the minister had to relate.

It seems to me that this matter is of such great importance that the opposition would not be fully discharging its responsibilities if it did not make some comment, both on the position taken by the United States and what might be regarded as circumstances altogether apart from the internal situation in the United States which may have encouraged this very far-reaching action in so far as Canada is concerned.

I am sure all hon. members recognize the significance of the development and the discovery of oil in western Canada, notably in the province of Alberta. This discovery more and more affects the economic life of our country and, as the Minister of Finance quite properly said this morning, it is a discovery which can play a very important part in our own defence efforts and in the joint defence operations of our two countries and indeed of the free world.

Anyone who has perused one of the interim reports of the Gordon commission with respect to the potential long-term value of the United States market to Canadian trade, particularly in so far as it applies to our natural resources, will appreciate how significant is this curtailment of imports of oil by the government of the United States. It is significant that from time to time there have been indications, since this government has been in office and also while we were in office, that consideration had been given by legislative and other bodies in the United States to the kind of step announced by the United States government on December 24 last. It is also significant that Canada, until recent days, was excluded from the policy pursued by the United States government in the matter of the restriction of oil imports from other producing countries in the world. We have an obligation in this house to ask ourselves why, in this particular instance, this serious action has been taken by a friendly country.

I have made mention of the study by the Gordon commission of possible Canadian sales in the United States over the next quarter century. Anyone who examines that study will see how important the United States market could prove to be for Canadian natural products and how careful on that account any government of this country must be with respect to its trade policies with the United States, in order to safeguard this great potential for trade which is available to us if we act wisely in the conduct of our commercial relations with the United States.

This does not, of course, mean that we should not also have an appreciation of our trading relations with other countries. However, the Canadian government, both of the moment and of the morrow, should give the gravest consideration to the formulation of its economic and trade policies, having regard to our position as a country of some 16 million people, a neighbour to a country of almost 200 million people and one of the most powerful economic countries in the world.

My hon. friend said this morning that of course this government had taken steps to indicate to the United States government its strongest disapproval of and objection to the course taken. The minister reminded us that during the course of the summer, as a result of action being taken by what might, I suppose, be called an administrative tribunal, diplomatic representatives of Canada in the United States had been alert and had brought home to the United States government our concern in this matter. The minister further said that he himself, when recently attending the important North Atlantic Treaty Organization meeting in Paris, had taken advantage of the presence of Mr. Anderson, his opposite number in the United States government, to communicate to him on several occasions the importance of the possible step which he understood might be taken on the part of the United States government.

If my hon. friend engaged in that discussion with the secretary of the treasury, then he undoubtedly had strong reasons at that time for these private and informal discussions in which he expressed the concern and indicated the objections of the government of which he is a member; indeed he would be expressing in that case not only the concern of the Canadian government but that of all hon. members of this house and certainly of the people of Canada, particularly those people directly involved in terms of their own economic interest in oil production in various parts of our country.

It seems to me, however, that there is a significance in the decision taken by the government of the United States on December 24 which must not be lost to any of us. We are all aware that during the past few years, as the former secretary of state for external affairs and the former prime minister have repeatedly indicated, the economic and trade policies pursued by the government of the United States have been a source of much irritation in this country.

This is nothing new; indeed the very committee of ministers which met in Washington at the end of September—with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Fisheries all, I believe, in attendance—represented an organization which came into being, if my memory serves me correctly, as a result of a discussion which took place between the then prime minister of Canada, the present Leader of the Opposition, and the President of the United States several years ago when they met in the capital of the United States. The suggestion was made that because of these trade policies of the United States which were so disturbing to us, some mechanism should be set up for the purpose of enabling our two countries, at the top level, to discuss matters of serious economic concern to Canada and the United States.

So the very fact that the government of which the Leader of the Opposition was the head had something to do with the setting up of this body indicates in itself the concern the government of that time felt about some of the policies of the United States in the field of trade, as to the disposal of agricultural surplus products and the like. The significant thing, however, is this; that while the secretary of state for external affairs in the previous government did find occasion from time to time to make public pronouncements of Canadian policy in this respect, and while the former minister of trade and commerce likewise expressed the concern of the government, I think Canadians generally will now conclude that there has been a great difference between the particular diplomacy pursued by the present administration in this regard and the kind of diplomacy pursued by the previous administration.

It is certainly clear that not by loud speeches made at strategic points in the United States by ministers of the crown of this government, not by these single oratorical efforts can it be hoped that the United States government will be caused to change the course it has contemplated and embarked on. We have the statement of the Minister of Finance after he returned from his talks in Washington that he and his colleagues had received certain assurances from the United States government which gave the government of Canada reason for satisfaction. Then we were told a short time afterwards in a speech by the Minister of Finance in New York that he was far from satisfied with the assurances he had been given in Washington by officials of the United States government with regard to certain features of their trade and agricultural surplus disposal policies. Then we had the very strong speech made by the Minister of Finance in Florida, and we noted the speech made by the Prime Minister himself last summer at Dartmouth college, New Hampshire.

Then on top of all this, serving as a sort of background, we have the statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada himself within a few moments of his return from the United Kingdom that in Canada's economic interests and those of other friendly powers it was now desirable that Canada should shift 15 per cent of its purchases from the United States, from one friendly country to another.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says "hear, hear". This is an extremely important matter which affects the economic well-being of this country, and one which could in a very large measure have to do with the continuance of the high level of unemployment which now prevails in Canada. A shift of 15 per cent represents some $625 million; and while that may be a bagatelle in the combined dollar trading value which the United States has with other countries, and particularly with her best customer, is it not reasonable to conclude, Mr. Chairman, that such a deliberate policy on the part of one friendly government with regard to another may be considered as one of the reasons why the United States has deliberately resorted at this time to a 15 per cent cut in oil imports from this country?

Mr. Fleming: Utter nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know the Minister of Finance says "utter nonsense". This might not be an accurate statement because we do not know the full mind of the United States and, more regrettably, the hon. gentleman who is now in a position to have better information does not know much more about that mind than I do.

Mr. Fleming: I could not know less than the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This policy of shifting purchases from our best customer represents major departure on the part of this government, an act which may well have something to do with the important decision taken in this particular matter by the government of the United States. It is not that we are reluctant to see our trade with other countries improved. That is not the question. But I am sure events are going to prove before very long that this negative policy of shift, this policy not of trying to improve our total trade but of taking trade away from one area that means so much to Canada, will have very serious consequences not only for Canada but also for certain other countries in the commonwealth, particularly for the United Kingdom.

Is this the end? Are there to be further restrictions on Canadian exports to the United States? The Minister of Finance this morning mentioned the possibility of lead and zinc being affected. That, of course, has been mentioned from time to time. It may be that the method the United States will use in this particular will be the use of tariffs or some other instrumentality, but the result will be the same; and if and when that happens the Minister of Finance will undoubtedly say that the government of which he is a member has made strong protests.

I thought it was rather significant this morning that the document which the hon. gentleman tabled and asked to be made part of our verbatim proceedings were notes which had been exchanged not by this government but by the previous administration. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked this morning, are there no notes to be tabled and made part of the verbatim record which have been exchanged between this government and the government of the United States? The Minister of Finance cannot say there was no time, because he told us that in the month of July there were indications of what might happen—

Mr. Fleming: Oh, no; that was an entirely different situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, I thought it was part of this same process of study. The hon. gentleman says I am wrong and I accept his word at once; but the fact is that early in December he went to NATO. He discussed this matter with the United States secretary of the treasury at that time, and I am sure that with his great powers of perception he had a pretty good idea then what was going to happen the day before Christmas, a day when undoubtedly the United States thought the news would hurt and embarrass less.

Surely the government had every opportunity to draw up its note of protest. We are told by the Minister of Finance that the only kind of protest was an oral one. We should be very happy if we had seen the cogent, powerful language of the press release which the hon. gentleman gave out on December 24 couched in a diplomatic note exchanged between the government of the United States and the government of Canada. I well remember on another occasion, with regard to a decision made at that time by the government of the United States to limit the Canadian quota of rye and oats, the protest made by the hon. gentleman against the kind of objection taken by the government of Canada at that time—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What did he say?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member knows perfectly well what he said. He fumed and berated the government as perhaps it had not been berated before.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Except by him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The fact is that this government owes it to parliament and to the Canadian people to indicate now, or to indicate soon, whether it is persisting in this policy of a 15 per cent shift; because that policy is calculated in my judgment to bring about the very situation of which I am now complaining.

The Prime Minister has never talked about this proposal in the house. We have asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I have asked the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister himself to elaborate on this proposal. I asked the Prime Minister on one occasion if he would discuss this matter with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom when he came to Ottawa after seeing President Eisenhower, and if he had discussed it with Prime Minister Macmillan after the latter had spent a week end in Ottawa. The answer in both instances was no. We were told when my hon. friend went to Washington, if one can believe press reports, that my hon. friend and his colleagues indicated to the United States that they were not to take this 15 per cent proposal too seriously.

Mr. Fleming: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "nonsense". That means that this proposal is to be taken seriously.

Mr. Fleming: That is pretty wild reasoning.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the first real indication we have had in this house that it is the policy of the government to bring about a shift of Canadian purchases in the United States. I will be very interested to know, if that represents the policy of the government of this country, what effect it will have in quarters which must and do, I know, engage the very serious attention of my hon. friend.

The only reference I have seen until today with regard to this particular proposal of a 15 per cent shift was the statement made by the Prime Minister himself to the members of the press gallery on his return from the prime ministers' conference, and then in the city of Montreal on the day my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce departed with the trade mission for the United Kingdom.

The only other reference that has been made to it, other than that now made by the Minister of Finance, was by Mr. James Duncan, who said it was a desirable thing to do, it was a practical thing to do and it was the policy of the government of Canada. He was not a member of the government, and no remark of his can be construed as an official declaration. But I say to the Minister of Finance in all seriousness that he should read the editorial in the Ottawa Journal of December 28 on this very subject, a journal that does not support this administration—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A journal that does not support the former administration. It is a very objective editorial. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance laughs, but if he reads that editorial carefully he will find it no laughing matter. The editorial refers to the Prime Minister's efforts at NATO and to his report in this house about the importance of that meeting; and then after pointing out that the Prime Minister indicated that economic co-operation had been put forward as one of the foremost objectives of the conference the Journal asks:

> But what has happened; flowered?
> Well, President Eisenhower had barely had time to get back to the White House and say "hello" to his family before he approved a recommendation to place restrictions on Canadian oil entering the United States.
>
> And in the light of NATO's talk about "sharing" and "pooling" resources, this for defence primarily, consider the reasons given for such restrictions. They are being resorted to, says Washington, to permit greater development of the U.S.'s own oil resources, this to "maintain assured supplies" in the United States itself for emergency purposes.
>
> Clearly therefore the United States does not believe nor at least take too much stock in what was said at NATO.

I do not say that I agree with that point of view; I merely call my hon. friend's attention to this extremely important editorial, which goes on to say:

> And when we talk about buying more from Britain just how far do we go in the one direction that would make such a thing possible, namely, the lowering of our tariffs against British goods? Actually there are before our tariff board at this moment applications from powerful Canadian interests to increase tariffs against British goods.
> The truth is that when it comes to "pooling" resources, to the "sharing" that NATO talked about, our own hands are not so clean that we can afford to heap strictures upon the United States or upon any other country.

That editorial writer undoubtedly was thinking of the observations made by the Minister of Finance. My hon. friend today, in what was undoubtedly an effort on his part to minimize the seriousness of this particular action on the part of the government of the United States—

Mr. Fleming: Oh, my, no. I thought I was at pains to stress the importance that the Canadian government attaches to this action.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is exactly what I am saying.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: It is just the opposite to what you are saying.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought you boys went to the same school.

Mr. Martin (Essex East):—and in order to ease the blow that my hon. friend recognizes with regard to a matter which his government properly regards as important, my hon. friend this morning by a process of debating diversion sought to take the initiative and to indicate that his government had taken very strong steps in order to give to the United States a serious indication of this government's concern. I tell my hon. friend that having in mind the levels of unemployment we now have in this country, having in mind the economic disquietudes that prevail and which in large part are due to the discouraging effect which the policies of this government have had on the business community generally—

Mr. Fleming: That is not what you said last week.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the quicker this government recognizes that the most effective way of dealing with a friendly country is not to confine your diplomatic efforts entirely to wild and reckless speeches but by careful and quiet diplomacy, the kind of diplomacy that was carried on during the preceding period by my colleague the hon. member for Algoma East and the former prime minister and others—

An hon. Member: So quiet that nobody paid any attention.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and also pursuing policies that are recognized in most countries of the western world at this time as the kind of policies that are not only calculated to improve trade but are calculated at the same time to improve peaceful relations among friendly countries—

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): And increase the trade deficit.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "increase the trade balance". You are certainly not going to increase your trade balance by a deliberate policy of taking away business. The United States is a country which along with Britain and other countries is necessary for the maintenance of a high level of income from external trade in Canada.

I have said nothing, of course, about the corollary of this whole argument, the British proposal which the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not even discuss with his opposite number when he was in Great Britain for three weeks because he had no time. Apparently no member of this government has time to discuss with the British government its important proposal for some kind of arrangement which would make this 15 per cent shift possible under the terms of GATT.

Mr. Fleming: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Does he give his support to the proposal to which I take it he has just referred, that the United Kingdom and Canada should eliminate all trade barriers between them and form something of a free trade area?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am glad my hon. friend asked that question. First of all, my hon. friend has refused to give this house any information about the matter in spite of the fact that I asked him on two occasions for the details of the proposal. I say to my hon. friend, having in mind his repeated statements of loyalty to the commonwealth, as though he had a pre-emptive interest in that particular loyalty, that one of the most effective ways of showing one's friendship with Great Britain would not have been to brusquely dismiss that proposal as my hon. friend did at Mont Tremblant.

Mr. Fleming: That is not true, you know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that is not true. The only remarks that are known to have poured forth from this government with regard to the British free trade proposal were those remarks made by my hon. friend on a social occasion in the dying hours of the conference in the luxurious surroundings of Mont Tremblant.

Mr. Fleming: Wrong again.

An hon. Member: What is your attitude?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman asks what is my attitude. My attitude, and I am sure it would have been the attitude of most people, would have been that this was a proposal put forward by a friendly country, the United Kingdom. We should have said it is the kind of proposal that will engage our most sympathetic study and attention. I find in that proposal something which would be of great value to the automobile industry, for instance, an industry which means everything to the community in which I live where there are now 20,000 men out of work.

British cars enter Canada free of duty; Canadian cars enter Britain with duty. This proposal could conceivably have the result of providing reciprocal advantages to both countries. I say that this is a proposal to which the government of the day could at least say it was prepared to give sympathetic study and consideration; but we do not know down to this minute whether the government is even prepared to do that. But the important thing—and my hon. friend cannot divert my attention from it—is that the government of the United States—not the government of Great Britain—has taken an important step in regard to a basic industry in Canada, namely the oil industry, one of our developing great natural resources, I am not saying as a result of the policy announced by the Prime Minister but from the discussions in this house, it is reasonable to argue that the decision of the government of the United States was influenced at least in part by the proposal and by suggestions that have been made by other responsible people with regard to that proposal within the course of the last two months.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think I have made my point and I hope the Minister of Finance sees it.

Mr. Fleming: You did not answer my question.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I believe that all of us viewed with a great deal of concern the announcement by the United States that a 15 per cent restriction was being made on the export of Canadian oil into the western states of the United States. Certainly, it is one additional fact which casts a good deal of gloom over the whole oil industry in western Canada. Whether there is any connection between this 15 per cent shift and the other 15 per cent shift which this government has made so much of, of course we in this group have no means of knowing; but I do know that the action of the government, which seems to be one of diplomacy by insult, diplomacy by noise with the United States, has now for some months had a rather disturbing effect on the oil industry in western Canada.

This government was scarcely in office when, in the booming oil area of my constituency, reports were circulating that the attitude of the new government to United States capital coming into the oil industry of this country was adverse and certainly in—

Mr. Fleming: Where did you get that idea?

Mr. Argue: —Weyburn and district there were many reports from many people—

Mr. Fleming: A complete misconception!

Mr. Argue: —in the oil industry. Of course, the reference that the hon. member for Essex East made to speeches delivered in this house by the Minister of Finance when he was in opposition is probably one of the reasons the United States oil industry felt that the new Canadian government might not have the same general receptive attitude to United States capital coming into Canada to develop the oil industry as had the government of Saskatchewan or as was the general attitude of the previous administration.

Mr. Fleming: Will my hon. friend point to one speech that the present Minister of Finance made that tallies with the description he has given, because I can tell him that there never was any such speech and the statements made by the present Minister of Finance are quite to the contrary.

Mr. Argue: I have not said that this government at any time said it would not welcome United States capital but what I have said—and it is a statement of fact—is that the people connected with the oil industry in my constituency—and it is one of the booming new oil fields in Canada—felt that this government's general attitude to United States capital coming into this country was one which required a good deal of study and questioning.

I think that the general attitude of the government, not only in this field but in others, as far as the United States is concerned, is to make a lot of noise that apparently by results accomplishes nothing in a positive way and leads many of us to suspect that it merely makes it easier for people in the United States who would like to have restrictions imposed on Canadian products to accomplish their purpose. I have never agreed, either when the other administration was in office or since this administration took office, that all of this loud condemnation of the United States export program as far as grain is concerned was the answer or the solution of Canada's problems. Instead of making big noises to the United States I think the people of this country as well as the people of the United States, would have been much better impressed if this government had drawn up a program which would deal with the Canadian problem, instead of making so much noise to the Americans when they were effectively dealing with their own problems.

There may be great merit in a shift of trade, but I can see little merit in the government merely saying that the shift should be brought about. There is no evidence that the shift is being brought about or that the government is taking action to bring such a shift about. Statements without action by this government lead to very serious repercussions. I think much more has to be done to improve our trade generally with other countries of the world, to expand our trade with the United Kingdom, than just sending a delegation to the United Kingdom and throwing cold water, as the government has done, on the proposals of the United Kingdom for a free trade area. I am one of those who believe that this government and our economy have so much to gain from an expansion of world trade generally that they should look at every proposal that is made by any important trading country of the world to Canada that might lead to an expansion of trade with deep consideration, with sympathy and with an open mind, to see whether in fact concrete arrangements can be established which would improve Canada's trade, would increase our own standard of living and at the same time protect legitimate interests in our country that might be adversely affected in the short run if any precipitate action was taken as far as the immediately wiping out of trade barriers and so on is concerned. But in my opinion that in no way detracts from the long-term objective which should be to reduce trade barriers and to expand trade and by so doing to improve the general standard of living of the people of this country.

The attitude of this government in a great many fields leaves much to be desired. While the government has been very vocal in its statements on the 15 per cent curtailment of oil exports to the United States, I noticed that when the Minister of Public Works was asked questions this morning about the government's consideration of action to ban the announced 3.6 per cent increase in freight rates which are likely to come into effect on January 15 it was not nearly so definite. This government was not prepared to say this morning that it would give active consideration to the request that the 3.6 per cent increase in freight rates be disallowed.

When the country is faced with widespread unemployment, when many areas are already suffering from the very great burden of freight rates, it is at such a time that we should expect the government to look very seriously at the request that the 3.6 per cent increase be disallowed. I do not understand the government having no concrete answer to the question whether they would delay the coming into effect of the 3.6 per cent increase until the eight provinces who have appealed under section 53 of the Railway Act have had a chance to present their case to the government. Surely the very least we should expect the government to do is to say that no increase in freight rates will be allowed at least until the appeal by the eight provinces has been considered by the cabinet.

But apparently the government has not even considered whether or not such a short term delay might be imposed. Whenever the Prime Minister is away it seems that the cabinet is unable to act and make a decision. When one asks whether the cabinet is prepared to consider something that is very important to the welfare of the nation one finds that nothing is being considered because the Prime Minister is away. The people of the part of Canada from which I come are strongly opposed to the increase. They feel it is another indication that their costs are to be allowed to mount week by week and month by month without any action being taken to prevent further increases.

I asked the Acting Prime Minister this morning whether the government was considering any alternative policy to allowing further horizontal increases in freight rates. His answer was that I was on a fishing expedition and that it was not fair to ask the government whether it was considering any policy other than that of allowing further horizontal increases in freight rates. I am speaking this afternoon for the purpose of asking the government, of pleading with the government to prevent the coming into effect of the 3.6 per cent increase in freight rates. I am asking the government to disallow the increase because of the further adverse affect it is bound to have on employment, because of the further burden it will impose on freight shippers in at least eight of the ten provinces. I suggest to the government that it should not allow this further increase in the cost of doing business which will bring about eventually a further increase in the cost of living.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): What happens if the railways cannot meet their costs?

Mr. Argue: That is a very good question. We have to wait another few months until we receive their annual reports for 1957 but for the last year for which statistics are available, 1956, the Canadian Pacific railway made the largest profit it has ever made in its history. In 1956 the C.P.R. had net operating income after operating expenses had been deducted of over $71,300,000, which is $5 million or $6 million higher than in any other year in the history of the corporation.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Is that on the railway itself?

Mr. Argue: That is not on the railroad alone. I will answer my friend's further question. He must have my notes in front of him because he is keeping ahead of me a little. In 1956 its net earnings from railroad operations alone amounted to over $41,300,000, the highest figure in any year since 1944. 1956 was the best year for net railway earnings that the company has had since the end of the war. Yet it is given another 3.6 per cent increase in freight rates. On July 3, 1956, it received a 7 per cent increase and on January 1, 1957 it received an additional 4 per cent or a total of 11 per cent. Although it only received the 7 per cent increase for less than a six month period in 1956 the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had the highest net railway earnings since 1944.

I think the 3.6 per cent increase now allowed by the board is an abomination. I think it is a miscarriage of justice. I think it is a shame that in this period of widespread unemployment and distress in so many industries, at this time when thousands of people engaged in agriculture are considering whether they can remain in the business or whether they are going to have to close up shop and leave their farms, the Canadian Pacific railway, probably the wealthiest company in Canada, with a record of extremely high profits, should be handed a Christmas present in the form of a 3.6 per cent increase in freight rates.

The Conservative government, whose party a few months ago was going to do so much for the people of Canada if they would give them the chance to hold the reigns of government, is not prepared to tell parliament that it will postpone the coming into effect of the 3.6 per cent increase until the eight provinces have had a chance to meet the cabinet. In my opinion this is an abdication of responsibility or just a dodge and if it is just a dodge it means that the government is prepared to offer a slap in the face to the people of eight of the provinces of Canada by not being prepared to say that it will delay the coming into effect of the increase until the provincial governments have had a chance to be heard.

I could go over some of the points that were raised at the hearing before the board of transport commissioners. The proceedings there certainly lead me to believe that the C.P.R. was in no great immediate financial distress and would not have collapsed in 1958 if the 3.6 per cent increase had not been granted. The evidence before the board of transport commissioners shows that some of the very laudable modernization that is taking place on the C.P.R. has already resulted in tremendous savings. According to the evidence produced, dieselization on the C.P.R. will save the company $45 million. Passenger service changes in 1957 will save another $9½ million. Another item referred to as the adoption of numerous technological devices will save the company a further $32 million. This amounts to a total of $86½ million by way of saving through modernization up to 1957.

According to Vice-president Emerson of the C.P.R., the full effect of the current modernization program will not be felt for some years to come. In other words, in all probability modernization will show a greater return to the company in 1958. In the 3.6 per cent increase the board of transport commissioners allowed an item that I feel should not have been allowed. The board allowed as an item of expense an amount of $9½ million the C.P.R. estimated it would probably be charged for income tax. The possible income tax of the C.P.R. was considered as a cost item in the rate making decision of the board of transport commissioners. I do not know any other companies that are allowed to calculate their income tax as part of their costs. I have never heard of private citizens being able to charge income tax as an item of expense. I have always felt that income tax was something that was paid out of net revenue and was not supposed to be charged up. It was part of the contribution that a person with a profit or a company with a profit was able to make to the national treasury for the general good.

Another thing that the Canadian Pacific has been able to make stick with our board of transport commissioners is that they have been able to keep out of any consideration of the question of rate making for freight purposes the profits the company makes from other than their rail operation. In other words, this great economic empire, which was largely built up as a result of the huge grants of land made many years ago, and other grants from the federal treasury to the amount of $88 million; the profits from this empire will not be considered by the board of transport commissioners in deciding on the rates the board will allow for the carriage of freight in this country. All the country has done in the past for the Canadian Pacific is to be used to strike out into new enterprises to make huge profits, and the results from these enterprises which were established with these land grants and cash grants will not be considered by the board of transport commissioners when establishing the level of freight rates.

Worse than that, the Canadian Pacific is undertaking policies which result in the company competing with itself. These policies hurt the company's rail income. The Canadian Pacific has started a vast expansion into the trucking industry. The more successful this trucking subsidiary becomes, the more profit it takes from the Canadian Pacific. Then, the more successful the subsidiary becomes, according to the Canadian Pacific and also apparently according to the board of transport commissioners, the higher the freight rates that must be paid by a portion of the people of this country. The freight rates that are being increased are not the freight rates to which normal competition can be applied. The people who live in the outlying parts, the four western provinces and the four maritime provinces, have to bear the main burden of increased freight rates.

These people are coming to the conclusion that the attitude of this government is merely a continuation of the attitude of the previous administration in allowing such tremendous increases in freight rates and this is causing a severe strain on confederation itself. There is deep resentment in the maritime provinces and the prairies that action has not been taken to prevent further increases in the already disproportionate burden of freight rates that these people must bear.

The Canadian Pacific has its tentacles in many other things. It makes huge profits from things other than rail operations. The profit from sources other than rail operations amounted to over $33 million. The Canadian Pacific made almost as much in profit from non-rail operations as from rail operations. The company made around $800,000 from hotels: it earned $3.8 million from steamships. The company had dividends of just under $14 million from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, which it owns and controls. It had a net income from petroleum rents, royalties, reservation fees and land rents of $9.3 million. Although those lands were donated to the Canadian Pacific by the people of this country the board of transport commissioners refuses to take into account this $9.3 million of income which the Canadian Pacific is currently obtaining from the lands which were previously given.

As I have already said, Mr. Chairman, I should like to plead with the government to disallow the 3.6 per cent increase. I do not believe the Canadian Pacific has made a case which would justify such an increase. I believe it would have an adverse effect on the Canadian economy at the present time. It would almost certainly add to unemployment and make it more difficult for the people in eight of the provinces to make a living. The result will be a further burden on the primary producers of this country. If the government is not prepared to disallow the increase, I feel there must be some alternative policy. I am suggesting that the time may soon be approaching when the government should consider a policy of subsidies from the federal treasury to the railway companies of this country if they can prove that further additional income is necessary to provide the service.

This policy has already been inaugurated to a small degree. There is an annual subsidy of $7 million now paid to the railway companies to maintain the trackage of the Canadian Pacific between Sudbury and Fort William and a comparable mileage of the Canadian National in northern Ontario. This bridge subsidy, as it is termed, might be expanded. Whatever method is used, I believe the government must prevent any further increase in freight rates. The railway companies have important costs to meet. They are caught in the same inflationary conditions as every other industry. The people who work for the railroads should not be penalized because they work in an industry over which a federal board has some control. I do not believe that the freight rate level should be kept low at the expense of the people who work for the railways. I know many of them in my constituency are, even today, working at very low wages. I am referring to the maintenance people, the sectionmen and so on.

There must be an over-all national policy which will maintain freight rates at a level the people can bear, and which will allow those who are working in the industry to maintain the regular, Canadian standard of living. I say the very worst type of policy the government could follow would be to allow the further 3.6 per cent increase in freight rates. I do not believe any government in the history of this country has ever taken office with more sympathy from the ordinary Canadian than has this government. I do not believe any government in the history of this country has ever been elected from which the public hoped and were confident that more would be done than had been done by the previous administration. After having made a trip out west during the recess, I was astonished at the extent to which the popular support of this government has fallen. I met a great many people, supporters of every political party, as I always do when I make a visit to my constituency. I was amazed to hear so little said in a laudable fashion of this government.

The people who live on the prairies and who produce agriculture products looked with hope to this government when the house opened on October 14. They had faith in the government, they had faith in the Prime Minister and they had faith in a number of men in the cabinet whom they knew by reputation, but the faith they had in October is being dissipated at a very fast rate. They are saying: "The government has been in office since October 14; we are facing an agricultural depression which on a price-cost basis is just as bad as in the thirties and the government is not prepared to do anything about it; they are not even prepared to consider doing anything about it." I say that if the prairies areas of western Canada were to run into a series of crop failures as in the thirties, the conditions of the thirties, so far as agriculture is concerned, would in comparison look like a picnic. I say this because in the thirties the farmers might have been able to grow a few bushels of hay and a few bushels of oats to feed the horses and still have some money over, but today they have very costly equipment and every item that goes into their expenses on the farm at the present item is a cash item. Therefore they know if they had a series of crop failures in addition to the present situation they would be worse off than they were in the thirties.

I might tell the house that I was present at a meeting last Monday night in one of the larger centres in my constituency at which were representatives of farmers' unions, wheat pool organizations, local businessmen and housewives, a representative meeting which had been called as such. They invited me to give an account of some of the things I had been doing in this session so far.

An hon. Member: Did they invite Ross?

Mr. Argue: I heard he was invited at Moose Jaw and did not show up. They invited the sitting member of parliament. They discussed the economic situation; they discussed the lack of action in Ottawa and a man by the name of Clarence McKee, who is a director of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, stood up at the meeting and said that unless action was soon taken by the federal government to correct this cost-price squeeze Saskatchewan, Alberta and probably Manitoba would in the near future be organizing a mass delegation to come to Ottawa to wait on the government.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt a private member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, we had no intention of holding up the passage of interim supply, but in view of the fact that quite a bit has been said regarding the international trade situation I would like to make a few comments. The hon. member for Essex East tried, I think, to place the blame for the action by the United States of America in cutting her imports of Canadian oil on the propostion of the present government to try to divert some of our imports from the United States to Great Britain. I personally think you have to go back a bit further to find the reason for a good deal of the bitterness which does exist in the United States today. You have only to read the United States newspapers to find that that bitterness has been developing.

I first noticed it about a year ago during the time we were discussing the pipe line in this house when a number of very bitter statements were made in the course of debate regarding United States investment in this country. Such statements were made by members of the C.C.F. party opposite—and also by members of the party now forming the government. Many of the members of the Conservative party who made such statements are now cabinet ministers. They used extremely harsh language in describing the actions of United States capitalists who were investing money in this country and were obtaining a stranglehold on certain of our industries. As I say, I think that is when this feeling of bitterness first developed.

Since then, of course, there has been much criticism of the United States surplus disposal policy, a lot of which I think has been unjustified. As a matter of fact, I feel a lot of praise is due to the United States of America for dealing with a problem which needed to be dealt with, a problem of a surplus of food on the one hand and starving people on the other. At least that country has made it possible to get that surplus food to the hungry people.

Now in so far as the shifting of imports from the United States to Great Britain is concerned, I think everyone would have to agree that to a certain extent this is a logical procedure when you have a situation where one nation has an adverse balance of trade with another nation amounting to $1 billion on the one hand and a favourable balance of trade with another nation amounting to over $300 million on the other hand. Surely in such a case the logical thing is to try to reduce the imports from the nation with which you have an adverse balance of trade and to expand the imports from the nation with which you have a favourable balance of trade. That seems to me just plain common sense and I cannot believe for one moment that the people of the United States would resent action on the part of Canada to try to bring about a better balance of trade in that regard.

The United States of America could remedy that situation if they wanted to by buying more goods from Canada, thus enabling Canada to achieve a more favourable balance, but if the United States refuses to buy more Canadian goods then it seems to me that the logical thing for Canada to do is to try to reduce our imports from that country and to expand our imports from other countries which have an adverse balance of trade with us. I do not for one moment think the United States would resent such action because, after all, they are sound business people and realize that such action would be plain common sense and good business.

I think probably an even better way of trying to reduce our imbalance of trade with the United States, rather than diverting that trade to Great Britain, would be to expand the production in Canada of those goods which we are importing from the U.S.A. We have, after all, around 230,000 unemployed and we have had that average number of unemployed for the past year. If those men were employed they would be producing around $2,500 worth of goods and services each and we could expand our production by half a billion dollars. Increasing the domestic production of the commodities we are importing from the United States would be the most logical means of reducing our imbalance of trade. It would also bring greater wealth and prosperity to this country. I think we should be doing everything in our power to find ways and means of expanding the production in Canada of goods we are at present importing from the United States, and as we have a surplus of labour in this country it could be used for that purpose.

I would now like to say a few words with regard to finding new ways and means of expanding the markets for our agricultural produce. We in this group have for a number of years urged that where countries are unable to obtain farm products from us through the normal channels of trade, we should explore the possibility of accepting their currency or of making long-term loans to such countries so that they could buy our commodities. Provided we were willing to have a firm agreement with those countries that when we made them a loan we would accept payment of that loan in commodities and not demand payment in dollars I believe there would be a greater willingness on the part of other nations to obtain loans from us in order to buy our farm products.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the government was giving consideration to both these propositions; to the suggestion of accepting foreign currency and to the possibility of making long-term loans to nations who were not able to pay us in dollars. As I say, the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that just a few weeks ago. But I realize that no matter how much the Minister of Trade and Commerce might like to initiate action of that kind he would have to persuade his colleagues in the cabinet to agree with him on such a policy and I wonder if the Minister of Finance could tell us some time just what his attitude toward such a policy would be, that is toward the acceptance of foreign currency where nations are not able to pay us in dollars, or to making long-term loans on the definite understanding that we would accept payment of those loans in commodities.

The United States has been able to expand its sales tremendously along those lines. I understand that they intend to expand this program even further. I do not believe we will accomplish anything by continuing to criticize the United States for this policy. I think that country fully intends to continue it, and rather than just protest I think the best thing for Canada to do would be to do likewise; not to the same extent as the United States is doing, but at least to go far enough to make it possible for nations which have an adverse balance of trade with Canada to balance their trade with us by accepting their currency and then using that currency for the purchase of their goods.

I think it is always better to try to solve our own problems rather than to expect other nations to solve them for us as we seem to be trying to get the United States to do at the present time.

(Translation):

Mr. Breton: Mr. Chairman, the American government's decision to cut down by 15 per cent its imports of Canadian oil is so much on a par with the Canadian Prime Minister's decision to cut down by 15 per cent our United States purchases that we cannot help feeling that one is a direct consequence of the other. As I see it, this will go on and on and, as a result, Canadian trade will be increasingly reduced.

By inviting British industry to mix sentimentality with publicity in Anglo-Canadian relations, for the purpose of drumming up trade, the Minister of Trade and Commerce follows up the suggestion made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to shift to the United Kingdom 15 per cent of our American imports. Recent developments have shown what harm can be caused by mixing sentiment with business.

However, due to the strategy used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce during election time, Canada was already used to sentimentality. Time will show that the Conservative party lacks the objective approach and that, unfortunately, it has placed party interests above those of the country.

This visit in England, not to sell but to buy goods, proves it beyond doubt. It is not very often that commercial delegations are sent out to buy. If the mission was a success—and probably was for England—we are not so sure it was a success for Canada. We have many reasons to doubt the success of this mission which could hurt our trade with the United States and our export trade as a whole.

I should like to point out some of the reasons for doubting of the success of this mission from the point of view of Canada.

1. The United States being our main export outlet, anti-American propaganda might be rather harmful to our exporters particularly to those of our farmers whose sales to the American market reach $300 million annually.

2. Canada's foreign trade shows an unfavourable balance. Increasing our imports from the United Kingdom, even by shifting some of our trade from the United States, will be no solution at all to our trade deficit problem.

3. In wanting to increase by all means our purchases from the United Kingdom, the Canadian government runs the risk of adversely affecting Canadian industry.

4. Great Britain's policy is primarily to serve its own interests. We cannot blame her for it. But this fact should enlighten us on the prospects of a sentimental rapprochement with Great Britain. Even if the idea of diverting part of our trade is excellent, I do believe that this question of trade with Great Britain should be dealt with on a business basis. However, I blame the government for adopting a sentimental approach to this matter.

5. Canadian and British currencies are not interchangeable, whereas Canadian and American dollars are interchangeable. Mind you, the unconvertibility of sterling was decided by Great Britain to protect her own currency and her own trade, which put Canada in a very embarrassing situation and caused our getting closer to the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the former government was aware of our unfavourable trade balance with the United States, and it was just as resolved as the present administration to diversify our purchases and our sales. In any well organized country, that is a perfectly normal thing to do, but the only difference, I think, between the two governments is that the present one has approached this problem with a great deal of brutality and lack of diplomacy, whereas the Liberal party was trying to solve it through diplomatic channels. As a result we now have a commercial policy which tends to drive Canada and the United States farther apart, and which will provide arguments to American protectionists to use against us in Congress.

We know perfectly well that the Hyde Park agreements, signed a few years ago by the Canadian and American governments, were founded on understanding and cordial relations. In any event, that is the only way to solve our difficulties with the United States. We know too that those agreements provided a basis for the prosperity of this country and its wartime and postwar economic expansion.

Whether we like it or not, for geographic and economic reasons, we are called upon to deal increasingly with the United States. The present government's mistake—a mistake which has led us into our present difficulties and will make them worse in the future—was to forget about the time-honoured rule of diplomacy, which should apply not only in external affairs, but in the field of commerce as well.

I hope that an American government will come into power which, like its predecessor in 1939, will understand that economic problems cannot be divorced from political issues and that, if peace is to be made secure, economic, military and political matters must be given equal importance.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw a particular matter to the attention of the Minister of Transport and I do so even though I am aware that some arrangements are being made to attempt to overcome the problem which exists on the coast of British Columbia. I raise the matter at this time to make the minister more familiar with the problem that exists there so we can have the best possible arrangement made to meet the problem.

Yesterday the official stopping took place of the passenger service operated by Union Steamships Limited on the coast of British Columbia. We have had knowledge for some few weeks now of the intention of this company to stop its passenger service serving the entire coastal area of British Columbia and we also know that through the Canadian maritime commission some activity has taken place to do something about it. I do not know how many hon. members realize and indeed I do not know whether the Minister of Transport himself is familiar with the serious effect that this will have if it is allowed to continue on the many coastal communities that over the years have become dependent on Union Steamships Limited for both passenger and freight service.

This particular company has been in existence since 1889 and every year since then has been servicing the up-coast points with its terminus being in Vancouver. It affects so many communities to a greater or lesser degree that it would take up too much time of the committee to attempt to enumerate the various communities and describe the manner in which they would be affected and the number of people in each community who will be affected. However, I have received a number of telegrams from various community organizations and individuals in that part of British Columbia and I am sure other hon. members have received telegrams of a similar type. In order to give you a brief indication of the effect this stoppage and curtailment of service will have and the diversity of interests that are involved I would like to mention just one or two comments in the telegrams and relate the source of these wires.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if my hon. friend would permit me to bring to his attention some very recent developments of which he perhaps may not be aware. The government is well aware of this matter and negotiations are under way at the present time in the hope of providing a substitute service.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate the comments of the Minister of Finance in that regard, Mr. Chairman. You may recall that we inquired today of the Minister of Transport about this matter and received the answer that we would have a detailed statement on Monday about the result of the negotiations and what the status is at the present time and what the future type of service will be. As I mentioned earlier, I want to place these remarks on Hansard even though the Minister of Transport is not here so that he may be a little more familiar with the situation than he may be at the moment and therefore be in a position to make the best possible arrangements for the continuation and extension of the service that was in existence up until yesterday and I hope you will allow me to proceed in this fashion.

Mr. Fleming: There is evidently no possibility of persuading the present carrier to continue the service that has existed heretofore.

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I gathered that from private discussions. However, we are not too concerned with the present carrier providing service so long as the service is provided by someone else. If, as the minister says, the government has full knowledge of the situation undoubtedly the Minister of Transport has received similar telegrams and letters from individuals and communities and I expect I could dispense with that phase of it. I would go on to point out that these people are not particularly concerned with the present carrier continuing to provide this service but they are concerned that some service be made available to them so they will not become completely isolated as will be the case for many of them if something concrete and definite is not done.

At the moment we only know that some arrangements are being made. We do not know what those arrangements are and we will not know until Monday. We cannot know at the moment whether those arrangements will be suitable. I can guess that they will not be as extensive, on the same level or with the same regularity as the service that was provided previously by Union Steamships Limited.

I wish to draw attention to some of the other aspects of this question of transportation on the coast of British Columbia. My remarks in this regard are not confined to Union Steamships Limited or to some other company which might provide a similar type of service, that is a marine passenger service, to these communities, but are directed to the general question of transportation in the coastal area of British Columbia. Before going on to discuss this I think I am entitled to raise the question as to why Union Steamships Limited gave notice a few weeks ago of its intention to stop this service on January 2.

An interesting and lengthy advertisement was placed in the Prince Rupert Daily News on Saturday, December 21 announcing the curtailment of service and I wish to refer to one or two paragraphs rather than the complete context of the advertisement. The advertisement reads in part as follows:

> Our representations in this current situation have been in Ottawa in complete detail for some time, and Ottawa has been equally well informed for a number of years that the passenger services to coastal points were becoming increasingly costly to operate.

I assume that by "Ottawa" reference is made to the federal government. The following paragraph in the advertisement reads:

We are informed by Ottawa that subsidy sufficient to cover costs is not possible at this time and we are therefore regretfully forced to make this decision.

Knowing Union Steamships Limited as I do I know they have a "tongue in cheek" attitude when they say they are regretfully forced to to do something of this nature. The general thought behind the particular paragraph I read is designed to leave the impression that the federal government is at fault for the company having to curtail its freight service and stop its passenger service. It makes reference to subsidy. Other references have been made to this particular subsidy or subvention in this house in time past. As I understand it almost since the turn of the century the federal government has granted subsidies to this particular company to service some of the more remote parts of the coast of British Columbia. In my opinion the advertisement placed here by Union Steamships Limited, designed, as I am sure it is, to show that the present Conservative government rather than the company is at fault for the curtailment of service, is completely false and leaves an inaccurate impression in the minds of the people who are affected by this action. So far as I am concerned it is an attempt in the first instance by Union Steamships Limited to get a larger subsidy than it has been receiving in past years.

I am sure that this curtailment of their service was merely another little part of the game of attempting to blackmail the federal authorities into granting them a higher subsidy and in the process use the people in the various small and large communities on the coast of British Columbia as pawns in the game. I should like to make reference to another part of this advertisement which relates to the subsidy. It reads as follows:

The matter of Union Steamships' subsidy is public knowledge as the subject has been critically brought to the floor of the House of Commons by a British Columbia member on several occasions.

Of course, they do not do the hon. member the courtesy of mentioning his name but I am sure we all know to whom they refer. I do not think I would be going too far afield in saying that the hon. member is familiar to all of us. I am sure it is the hon. member for New Westminster to whom the Union Steamships refer in this particular advertisement who has, I understand from my reading of Hansard, raised the question of this subsidy critically and bitterly on the floor of the House of Commons while at the same time a navigation company, a competitor of the Union Steamships Company on the coast of British Columbia, was complaining just as bitterly to the Canadian maritime commission about the same subsidy. The name of that particular company is Northland Navigation Limited. This company has raised the greatest amount of fuss about this subsidy with the federal authorities and the maritime commission.

Suggestions have been made both in and out of the house that the granting of this subsidy by the previous administration to Union Steamships Limited had some political connotation. This undoubtedly arises from the fact that one of the hon. members in the other place is the president of Union Steamships Limited and has been so for probably two or three years. Whether there is any substance to the criticism that because the president of the company was of the same political complexion as the previous government he therefore was able to get more favourable consideration than other companies might get or not I do not know. Frankly, personally, I doubt very much whether that was the case. However, it has been raised; it has been questioned not by myself but by another member of this house that this is the reason why Union Steamships Limited have received this particular subsidy, and accordingly the service should be put on a competitive basis so that other companies who wanted to might be able to bid for that passenger subsidy.

As I said, one of the most vociferous companies was Northland Navigation which operate a freight service on the coast of British Columbia. It is perfectly fine to say that there must be bids and that people who can provide the best type of service should be the ones to get the subsidy on an open bid basis. That is a justifiable and a decent approach to the question of getting a subsidy. The only exception that one could take to that is that Northland Navigation Company, which raised all the fuss and the noise about the subsidy for passenger service, were themselves not able at that time, and are still not able, to provide any passenger service. They are in the freight service business. I feel justified in raising this question. There may be some political connotations to the fact that Northland Navigation has raised this issue and the fact that they were supported in their complaint by the hon. member for New Westminster. It is unfortunate that he is not in his place today because I am sure we would appreciate his thoughts and remarks on this matter.

There is a gentleman in the province of British Columbia by the name of Mr. Einar Gunderson who is known to some of us. Einar Gunderson was for one short period the minister of finance in the Social Credit administration in the province of British Columbia. Besides his many other private concerns, Mr. Gunderson is interested in and is also a director of Northland Navigation Limited, and is concerned probably from that point of view.

While we are talking about the question of Northland Navigation and one of its directors, Einar Gunderson, complaining about competition and not being able to bid for a subsidy granted by this federal government and the previous government for passenger service on the coast of British Columbia, we should have a brief look at some of the activities of the Northland Navigation Company as they apply to competition.

In British Columbia, as many people know, we have a liquor control board. From time to time beer and liquor are shipped through the liquor control board from the breweries or the distilleries to up-coast points for sale and distribution. Ever since Northland Navigation entered the picture of freight shipping, ever since Einar Gunderson became a director of the company, wherever Union Steamships—and I couple these two companies together because I am familiar with them—and Northland Navigation provided freight service to the same points, Northland Navigation now and ever since Mr. Gunderson became a director have the exclusive right to transport and ship and bring the liquor from the points in Vancouver up to the various up-coast points. Where Union Steamships used to transport some of this freight at one time they now are completely shut out and are not able to bid on the shipping of liquor to these particular spots. If the question of the free competitive spirit, as it is loosely referred to, applies in one instance, with respect to the payment of a subsidy, then certainly it should apply in the other field of shipments. Whether politics are being played there is for other people to speculate on and not for me.

The entire history of transportation services on the coast of British Columbia for many years now shows that every community—and there are many hundreds of them—every logging camp, every pulp mill, every small, isolated spot from the southern tip of British Columbia to the Alaska border, in every instance has been at the mercy of some fly-by-night corporation or company either in the air transport or the marine transport field. Anybody who has had any familiarity with it will know that that is the absolute truth. Over the years we have seen all sorts of small, two-bit airline companies with a couple of Seabees, trying to get into the show and make a few dollars by providing some sort of service. They have been providing a type of service which leaves much to be desired. We have seen on the coast of British Columbia, because some of those concerns were not able to give good, safe service, many air disasters. Many people have been killed because small air lines have been either unable or unwilling to provide a safe type of passenger service to some of those up-coast points.

We have also seen exactly the same thing taking place in the marine transporation field. Companies have started operations with a few small boats here and there and have attempted to provide some sort of service to the up-coast points but have met with the same disastrous results. People in small communities from one end of the country to the other have been subjected to the disastrous effects of the operations of these small concerns. Some years ago we could see the situation which now exists developing. Probably it will continue to exist to a lesser degree after we are informed on Monday about the arrangements which were mentioned today.

We have seen this situation coming even in the case of the large companies. People from one end of the coast to the other are at the mercy of private corporations who are more concerned about how many dollars they can milk from the people and stow away in their pockets than they are in providing service for the people who have to travel up and down the coast. It is time that we took a longer look at the question of transportation on the coast of British Columbia. The Union Steamships situation has merely brought the matter to a head. It is time that we established some sort of all-inclusive transportation system, some agency for co-ordinating all forms of transportation on the coast.

Probably the most effective way that could be done would be through a crown corporation in the transportation field on the coast of British Columbia. Such a corporation would provide air passenger and freight service and marine passenger and freight service. As a crown corporation dedicated to providing service primarily it would be in a position, depending on weather, economic and other factors, to alternate between air and marine service. There is some discussion at the present time about airline companies being able to move in where Union Steamships is moving out.

That is only possible to a limited degree. At this time of the year it is very hazardous to attempt to travel by air along the coast of British Columbia except in some of the larger aircraft that follow beams and land at adequate airports. Many times days and days are spent waiting for the weather to break so that people may get in or out.

On the other hand, marine transportation generally is not upset by weather conditions on the coast of British Columbia. I hope that by placing these suggestions on the record the Minister of Transport will be able to understand the situation a little better and will have the benefit of another point of view. In his endeavours to meet the situation I trust he will not be confined to making another deal with a private company which will have to be subsidized and I hope he will not leave the residents up and down the coast of British Columbia in the hands and at the mercy of another private corporation. It is time to co-ordinate and bring together the different forms of transportation so that the people will be provided with an adequate year round freight and passenger service by one form of transportation or another and will not be left, as they have been for the past 50 or 60 years, at the mercy of the immediate economic outlook of a private corporation.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join the hon. member for Skeena in saying a few words about the coastal transportation situation in the province of British Columbia. In view of the interjection by the Minister of Finance a few moments ago, I should like to say at the outset that this is a matter which should concern not only his colleague, the Minister of Transport, but every member of the government. Perhaps I should put the situation in such a manner that the Minister of Finance will appreciate its significance as far as the people of the coast of British Columbia are concerned.

I can well imagine that if the Canadian Pacific railway had made an announcement a few weeks ago that effective on January 2 it would discontinue its passenger services between Montreal and Vancouver a good many members of the house would have been expressing some concern about the situation and that even if an announcement was made by the Minister of Transport, as he did today with respect to the matter we are discussing, that negotiations were going on for the provision of an alternate service, the mere fact such a statement had been made would not set the minds of members of the house completely at ease. The fact remains that if the Minister of Transport had got up and told us that negotiations were being conducted with some other concern to provide an alternative service between Montreal and Vancouver such an announcement would have been greeted with a certain amount of understandable scepticism.

While the hon. member for Skeena and myself are undoubtedly awaiting with a good deal of interest the announcement which the Minister of Transport said he would make on Monday, nevertheless we are perfectly aware of the fact, in the light of our understanding of what he has been doing, that whatever the announcement may be it will not mean a complete solution of the problems that the hon. member for Skeena has been discussing. As the hon. member for Skeena said, this is not a matter which has cropped up suddenly overnight. The action of Union Steamships in discontinuing all passenger services has perhaps brought the matter to wider attention than was the case before because not only are most of the smaller communities on the coast affected but also a good many of the larger ones.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in order to give the Minister of Finance and the members of the present government some indication that this is a problem which has been in existence for some time and has been brought to the attention of the house from time to time, perhaps I might be permitted to refer to certain speeches on the subject which I have made in the house on former occasions. I have a few volumes of Hansard on my desk, and I find in checking back that on November 30, 1953, the occasion of the very first speech I ever made in the house, I had this to say as recorded on page 461 of Hansard:

> We have a situation now where, almost without notice, steamer services are being withdrawn or reduced. People are worrying. Those who have been on the islands for the last 30 years or more are suddenly left without the means of getting in their supplies.

I went on to say:

> Of course we cannot overlook the impact of air travel upon the facilities that can be provided by a coastal steamship service. Certainly no one would suggest that the advantages of air travel should be removed from those people. It seems to me a revolution is taking place in the whole transportation set-up in that coastal area . . . I believe it is a matter to which the government should be giving very careful study and attention at this time.
> There is a need for the development of an overall and co-ordinated policy in respect of the type of services that can be supplied to and maintained for the people on the coast. I think some study must be made as to how those services can be co-ordinated, keeping in mind possible highway developments . . .

I go on to explain that that of course would involve the authority and responsibility of the provincial government of British Columbia. I suggest there is a great deal of similarity between the remarks I made back in 1953 and the remarks that have just been made by the hon. member for Skeena. I, too, have had a great number of telegrams in the last week or so. I can only say this, in discussing them briefly, that they bear a remarkable similarity, except they may be coming from somewhat different communities, to the telegrams and letters I was receiving back in 1953 when I made that speech.

Later on in that session we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Transport, and when we were discussing provisions for subsidized services I had some remarks to make which I addressed to the then minister of transport, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier. I said then, as found at page 5866 of Hansard for June 11, 1954:

> So as to complete the general picture as I see it, calculations I make would indicate that for the Atlantic coast of Canada provisions in the estimates by way of operating deficits and subventions seem to total $7,810,725, whereas, so far as I have been able to discover, for the Pacific coast of Canada at the present time we are being asked to provide the modest sum of $345,000.
> I am not rising in my place to ask that the amount for the Pacific coast be increased to equal that for the Atlantic, or anything like that; but I do feel the situation is one concerning which the Department of Transport and the federal government could take effective action, if they would. If I were going to put my remarks in the form of a question to the minister I suppose I would ask him whether if Vancouver island were to revert to the status it once had, when it was a separate entity from British Columbia, the federal government would then be willing to consider accepting some of the responsibilities, which apparently they do accept in respect of another island described, so the easterners tell me, as "the island" on the Atlantic coast, just as we term Vancouver island "the island" on the Pacific coast.

The Minister of Transport, as so often happens, tried to prevent the development of an extended debate on this subject, and had this to say:

> I would not want my hon. friends from the west coast, or the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, to think that his area of the country is being overlooked. It is not. But the consideration has to be in one case by way of subsidy, and in the other by way of the fulfilment of a commitment. And I hope he will not take from that any suggestion that we are not anxious to give sympathetic consideration to any application made for additional transportation service on the west coast, or to and from Vancouver island.

At that point the member for Kamloops, now the Minister of Justice, entered the discussion and he had this to say:

> I have no desire to provoke a debate, but I could not allow the minister's remarks to go by without making the observation that the provision of transportation facilities was also a term of entering confederation at the time British Columbia entered. The minister will be aware that there has been a controversy, perhaps more of historical than of practical interest, over a great many years as to whether those terms were fulfilled with respect to the provision of transportation and communication with Vancouver island.

The hon. member goes on to discuss the matter of the agreement which implied the building of a railway to Esquimalt on the southern end of Vancouver island. I hope the present Minister of Justice will be prepared to put in an oar in any discussion the cabinet has of this situation, and to point out that there is this historic responsibility on the part of the federal government to see that the people of the west coast of British Columbia have a reasonable transportation service.

Now, I gather that the hour of five o'clock has arrived—

Mr. Fleming: No, you have three minutes yet.

Mr. Barnett: Well, that discussion took place in 1953-54, and I find that on May 27, 1954, this subject matter was again brought forward by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I had been discussing at some length the problems of the various communities along the coast, and at page 5169 I said:

> Then we come back again to Texada island which is in the gulf. There we find a situation arising out of the fact that the C.P.R. steamer service to Powell River, which had included this island as a port of call, was being withdrawn and that the residents not only of Powell River but of Texada island were not going to have any means whatever of getting their cars in and out of that area. It is perfectly true that plans had been made for the building of a road and the establishment of a car ferry which would make car and truck transport to Powell River a possibility. But we find there a situation where a service which has been provided for years is being arbitrarily withdrawn before any substitute is provided to take its place. In the last few years that sort of thing has been happening all over the coastal area.

I mention that, Mr. Chairman, to make it clear that so far as I am concerned the Canadian Pacific steamship company has had no greater degree of interest or responsibility in maintaining service than has Union Steamships or some of the other concerns to which my hon. friend the hon. member for Skeena referred in his remarks.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): It being five o'clock, I shall rise so the house may discuss private and public bills.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

EXTENSION OF RIGHT TO VOTE AT ADVANCE POLLS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Canada Elections Act (voting at advance polls).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, which I have had the privilege of presenting to the House of Commons on at least two previous occasions, is to extend the privilege of voting at the advance poll in connection with federal elections to any qualified voter who finds that he will have to be away from home on election day for any reason whatever. As hon. members are aware, there is at present in the Canada Elections Act a provision for the holding of a certain number of advance polls. However, the right to vote at those advance polls is limited to commercial travellers, fishermen, employees on railways, vessels and aircraft, together with members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Even in connection with these categories of voters permission to vote at the advance polls is allowed only if the voter is away from home in pursuit of his employment as defined in the Canada Elections Act.

I am sure that hon. members will agree with me that one of the rather common grievances at election time, and as candidates in elections we do pick up these grievances, is the fact that many people find that they have to be away from home at election time and cannot vote because their absence is not covered by the provisions in the act. It seems to me that we should take a new look at this question; that we should be thoroughly consistent with our belief that the right to vote is a privilege which belongs to every one of our citizens.

If, then, the right to vote is a privilege, I submit that we have no right to take that privilege away from any one of our citizens if, for example, he has to be away from home because he is on vacation. I mention that type of absence in particular because it is a most common one so far as the grievances brought to our attention are concerned and I think it brings into focus the problem presented by this particular shortcoming in the Canada Elections Act. Surely it is no crime to be away on holidays. Surely one is not committing some misdemeanour for which he should suffer a penalty such as the loss of his right to vote. Either a citizen has the right to vote or he does not have that right and if he has it it seems to me that our elections act should safeguard it in every possible way.

In a number of the provinces in this country there are provisions for the universal right to vote at advance polls. This is true in my own province of Manitoba as well as in some other provinces and I know that in the province of Manitoba the fact that any one who finds he will be away from home on election day may vote at the advance poll does not result in an avalanche of votes being cast in this way. People do not take undue advantage of the advance polls; it is still only a small percentage of the population which votes in this manner, but the right or the privilege is there and it does remove a very serious grievance which obtains at federal elections.

In at least two provinces of this country, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, there is a provision which I think is very commendable and which is even wider. I refer to the provision for absentee voting. In each of these provinces at general election time it is possible for a person to vote if he is away from home anywhere in the province. Arrangements are made for him to make his choice among the candidates of his own constituency and then, by the machinery which has been set up, these votes are counted and added to the total of votes for the candidates in the home constituency. In other words, what is done with regard to civilian absentees at provincial elections in Saskatchewan and British Columbia is the same as is done with regard to the service vote in our federal general elections. Our service personnel are in effect absent from their home constituencies but they are not denied their right to vote. Rather their votes are taken where they are and the totals for the various candidates are added to the totals of the civilian vote.

True, any arrangement of this kind involves extra machinery and involves some delay in the final totals being arrived at but surely it is of the essence of democracy that everyone who is a qualified voter—in other words everyone who is qualified by virtue of age, citizenship and residence in the country —should have the right to exercise that vote. Furthermore that vote should not be taken away from him because the election happens to fall at a time when he has to be away, whether it be on some kind of business not covered by the act or whether it be because he is on a holiday.

I have referred again to the question of holidays because, as I say, that is the cause of the greatest number of grievances in this field and I submit that since the time when the elections act was first drafted in this country there has been a great change both in the attitude towards the taking of holidays and in the number of people who are able to take holidays. Because of these changes I submit it is time for a change in the act itself.

My bill, since it is a bill, must therefore be a complete entity in itself and it goes into many details. However, most of those details —indeed all of them—are consequential upon the basic change which is proposed. That basic change—the principle of the bill and the only change which is now before the house for consideration—is the question as to whether voting at the advance polls should be limited to the few employment categories to which I have already referred or whether it should be made available to all those who are qualified voters. There is in the bill as I have had it drafted a provision that before a person could qualify to vote at an advance poll he would have to take an affidavit in which he would declare that he believes he will be away from home on election day. The reason does not have to be stated. In other words, any reason is sufficient so long as the voter is prepared to declare by way of an affidavit that he believes he will be away from home on election day.

This does not mean that it is a false affidavit if it turns out later that the voter is not away from home and I know that is the sort of thing that happens, for example in my province of Manitoba, where voting at advance polls is open to all qualified voters. I mention that detail just to make it clear that there is that one particular provision which imposes some limitation. In other words, a person has at least to be in the position of being able to give an affidavit to the effect that the believes he will be away from home on election day.

I hope the members who study this bill and speak to it will not get involved—first because it would be out of order to discuss the clauses of the bill in any case and, second, because these matters of detail do get away from the principle—in some of the consequential changes which are set out in the bill and which are necessary, either in the form in which they are spelled out in the bill or in some other form, on account of this principal change. In other words, if you are going to have the universal right to vote at advance polls it would follow that more people than at present will vote at these advance polls and, in the opinion of our election officials, that would seem to make necessary a longer lapse of time between the day when the advance polls close and the day when the general election is held. If there is going to have to be a longer lapse of time —not necessarily the length of time mentioned in my bill but some additional length of time—it may also be necessary to put the official nomination day a little further ahead of election day than is now the case.

However, Mr. Speaker, these are details which do not affect the basic principle of the bill; they can be changed one way or another, or the committee on privileges and elections to which I hope this bill will be referred after second reading might decide that these changes are not necessary at all and that it would be possible to carry out the idea of the universal right to vote at advance polls even with the other provisions of the act as they now stand.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

There has been a great deal of conjecture as to when the next election is coming. On a number of occasions, we have had it in the middle of the summer, right in the midst of the vacation period when the number of people who would have wished to vote at advance polls would, I believe, have been very large. Current rumour suggests that the election might not be held off until the summer, that it might be held on April 14 or during the third or fourth week in March. If it comes on dates of this description there would, of course, not be many people away on holiday, but there would still be people who would lose their right to vote because they would be absent from home, people in addition to those listed in the present act. But if there is to be an election in the early spring, that might give us a chance to try out this idea of giving a greater number of people the right to vote at advance polls before we experiment with the idea in the middle of summer, perhaps at the election after next, when the numbers away on vacation would be greater.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to argue further as to the merits of the principle of this bill. I urge hon. members not to become bogged down in details because none of the details is sacrosanct; any of them can be altered in the committee of privileges and elections. I recall the discussions that took place on the estimates of the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) earlier this session, and hon. members in many quarters of the house, fresh from the election of June 10, complained that nothing had yet been done about widening the privilege of voting at advance polls. Here is an opportunity to approve of the principle that any qualified voter should have the right to vote at an advance poll, and I say at this time that if this bill is given second reading I will not ask that it go immediately to the committee of the whole but will move that it be referred to the committee on privileges and elections so that it may be examined and changed if necessary to meet the wishes of members generally at that time.

Mr. Speaker, I hope it will not seem to be lacking in tact if as a clinching argument in support of my bill I refer once again to the fact that in the election campaign preceding the election of June 10 there was in one constituency of this country a most excellent piece of election literature. I refer to a well set-up four page leaflet put out in the constituency of St. Paul's by the Progressive Conservative association. I am not surprised that the candidate supported in this four-page election leaflet won his election, and indeed it gives me pleasure once again to refer to him with esteem as our first commoner. I will not refer to the other items which are mentioned in this excellent piece of literature distributed on your behalf, sir, but I should like to read this sentence which appears on page four:

> If you are a commercial traveller, an airline pilot or stewardess, a railway employee or a sailor you may vote in the advance poll from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m., Thursday, Friday and Saturday, June 6, 7 and 8.

Then I ask the house to note the next sentence which is in parenthesis:

> Sorry, but Liberal government regulations will not permit advance poll for vacationers.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that if you are a candidate, as I trust you will be, in the next election it will not be necessary for your campaign committee in the leaflet to be prepared at that time on your behalf to put in the same sentence changing the words to read: "Sorry, but Conservative government regulations will not permit advance poll for vacationers."

I admit this is bordering on something which perhaps should not be done, that is bringing Your Honour into a debate, but I tried to do it with somewhat the same sense of humour which Your Honour uses on occasions. In that spirit it has been a pleasure to quote that complaint against the former Liberal government for not having agreed to this change in the hope that this new House of Commons will look with favour on the principle of this bill.

I say again that though there may be details about which there could be argument, let us have those arguments in committee. The only question before us is whether or not the right to vote at advance polls should be limited to commercial travellers, fishermen, employees on railways, vessels, aircraft and so on and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or whether that right should be extended to any Canadian voter who finds that he or she will have to be away from home on election day for any reason whatsoever. After all, the right to vote is a privilege, and being away on holiday is not a crime for which any person should suffer any disability as far as his rights of citizenship are concerned. I feel that the right to vote at advance polls should be extended to all qualified voters, and it is on that basis that I present this bill to the house for second reading.

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, we listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to his suggestion that we should discuss the principle of extending the rights of voters to vote. It would seem to me that if we were to follow his argument to a logical conclusion we might say we all agree we should eliminate a cold or something of that sort, and according to that principle, that we should accept the first remedy offered. I suggest that that reasoning cannot very well be followed in dealing with a bill affecting so many people, introduced without the benefit of advice from those who are primarily concerned with the administration of the election act, and without the benefit of a much fuller discussion than would be possible during the time remaining in this session for the discussion of private members' bills.

I suggest to you, sir, that the hon. member who introduced this bill cannot have been too serious about what he actually did say, because he has introduced and put on the order paper so many other bills, and if one took seriously that he really means that this bill should be passed this session, then he would have put this bill on the order paper so that it could have come up the required number of times on private members' days and so that it could have had the full discussion it merits, instead of putting on the order paper a great many other bills which also must have full and proper discussion.

As to the principle of enlarging the franchise at the advance polls to all voters, I think that if the house will refer to the remarks of the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) when her estimates were under discussion hon. members will see that she agrees with the principle that it should be enlarged.

The bill goes a little further than the hon. member would suggest it goes. He said the amendments are merely consequential to the general principle. One small amendment he advocates is advancing the date of official nomination from two to three weeks. That could effectively eliminate certain candidates from elections. There are many people who for personal, financial or other reasons cannot be persuaded to enter the public field until a very short period of time immediately prior to election day and the adoption of the hon. member's amendment would eliminate that group from public service. I do not suppose the hon. member who introduced the bill considered for one moment that that would be the effect of it nor did he entertain any thought of having it achieve that effect but that is a consideration of which we must take note of in this house.

He suggested we do not read the bill before dealing with it. I admit I read the bill rather casually but one provision I observed suggests that the advance poll is going to be counted before the results of the general voting day are known. If those results are known to individuals they could have a serious effect on the general vote and not necessarily a proper one. It would be something like running an advance poll in each polling subdivision, and to have the vote counted some days ahead of time more than one person would know the result as they must because each candidate would be entitled to have his agent present at the count. This would result in an advance indication of the feeling of the people who voted which would in some way have an effect on the people who came to vote on election day. We must look at this bill. We must not take the medicine that is prescribed without examining what we are taking. This course of action is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests should be followed.

If a proper bill amending the Canada Elections Act were introduced and referred to a commitee another subject that might be discussed is the cost of advance polls. I do not think cost is of primary importance among the considerations to be discussed in determining whether or not advance polls should be held but since we are dealing with the public purse these days it might be interesting to hon. members to appreciate that if this bill is passed and advance polls are created we would be dealing with an expenditure of approximately $250,000. This is a matter we have to take under advisement with regard to the principle in question but there are other things with which I think we can agree.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests that all people entitled to the franchise should be allowed to vote. He neglected to include in his remarks consideration of the people who serve this country so well overseas in the foreign service. There is no provision in the bill for granting the right to vote to these people, the absentee votes such as he described in Saskatchewan and British Columbia. If the hon. member is sincere in saying he wants all Canadians who are entitled to vote to have a vote then this bill is singularly lacking in a provision for those who are serving this country in a civilian capacity outside the country. If we are going to deal with amendments to the Canada Elections Act then we should deal with them right across the board and not on a piecemeal basis.

There are several other things we might consider. In this short session we have experienced two by-elections and have sat looking at the seat of the hon. member to be wondering exactly what day he would appear. I think an amendment that would permit a member to take his seat immediately following the by-election subject to the formalities being completed after he has taken his seat would be desirable. I came to this house by a by-election in 1954. My riding was without a representative for some months before that election was called and it was some weeks after the election before I was able to take my seat here. I see that the hon. mem- for the Yukon is not yet with us. That riding has been without representation for some months. I suggest this is another thing that could be considered in a general review of the Canada Elections Act.

I have heard it said that we might become more realistic about the expenses of elections and that we should do as they do in England and set out that no more than a certain amount of money may be spent in a riding in the conduct of an election campaign. It has also been suggested that we should make some provision in the laws of the country so that financial contributions to the political life of the country, and after all that is a vibrant part of the country, should receive some consideration in the form of being allowable expenses or something of that sort. Would it be desirable to establish a maximum of a certain amount on the money that can be spent in an election in any given riding? These are things that a review of the act might well disclose.

If we want to follow the principle enunciated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of enlarging the scope of the act to extend the privilege of voting to all those who are entitled to vote we would have to consider the taking of votes in hospitals and allowing invalids certain privileges at the polls. There are many things we would have to consider if we are to extend the franchise and I think every hon. member of this house would agree that the right to vote should be made available to every Canadian both inside or outside the country.

In my own law office I have had the experience of taking the vote of United States citizens who were in this country. They were voting in Canada in elections which were taking place in the United States. They were absentee voters. They had forms which they filled out and affidavits which were sworn, and they were allowed to vote in Canada or, for that matter, anywhere in the world, in elections taking place in the United States. I think it is a very desirable thing. It gave them a pride in their country. It gave them an opportunity to participate in the events that were taking place on that day.

We agree, Mr. Speaker, with the general idea of enlarging the franchise. That has been done, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, in many provinces.

I do not agree with the suggestion that we can deal with this bill, which I am sure the hon. member knew full well could not have a full discussion because so many other bills have been placed on the order paper, and which, his plea notwithstanding, I have read and found to be lacking in many respects. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the proper course for this house to follow is the course followed in connection with the bill introduced by the government, when with the advice of those people who are handling the election machinery, with the advice of the committee on privileges and elections—on which I had the honour to sit along with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which dealt very fully with this problem in 1955 and which at that time, as matters were then explained to the committee, decided not to endorse this proposal. It may be, of course, that times have changed enough so that the committee might feel that it is now opportune to advance it. These are matters that the house should know. It should know that on a reference of this matter to the committee that was the conclusion that was reached.

We have to consider all these things, Mr. Speaker, and not just one member's remarks that this is the principle, that this is the sugar-coated candy that will cure the ailments. Let us take this sugar coat off the candy and examine it. When we do we shall find that it is not a bill that effectively does what the member wants it to do or what he hopes it will do. It is not a bill that the members of this house, I am sure, feel will enlarge the franchise to the extent that every member here wishes it to do. If we are to extend the vote to everyone—and that is a desirable thing, Mr. Speaker—I suggest we have the legislation set out in language that we can support.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill to amend the Canada Elections Act. I cannot help but admire the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and his persistence in year after year bringing this question of advance polls to our attention. The question of voting, whether it be at advance polls or at any other poll that takes place, or on the regular polling day, is of great importance to us in Canada. It is a privilege that was won for us with great eloquence and persistence by our forefathers and is something of which we should be justly proud. I believe that every Canadian is proud of that right, the right to take a part in the affairs of his country, through the medium of the ballot, the medium of being allowed to vote on election day.

When the question of advance polls was discussed on the estimates of the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) I made the statement that I was in favour of enlarging the scope of those who are permitted to vote at advance polls for the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that we are living in changing times, in times when transportation facilities have made it possible for people to live many miles away from their work. We have construction workers who, through skills that they have and positions that they occupy, do not work in the same municipality—some of them do not work in the same province—in which they live. Many of them have to leave home early on Monday morning and do not return home until late on Friday evening. The result is that when election day comes along they have their wages to make and even though they are allowed a short time in which to cast their ballots, many times they have to leave home before the polls open. The result is that they are not allowed to exercise their franchise. In fact there are people who drive 80 to 90 miles a day to their work, day in and day out, with the result that it is sometimes a tremendous hardship for them to exercise that franchise which is so important to the people of Canada. Consideration should be given to this.

When the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) was speaking he said many things about the election act which would bear investigation and revision. No doubt this question of advance polls is one that should be given considerable attention. We do know that in 1951 the act was amended and no doubt then and, as the hon. member for Peel indicated, in 1955 consideration was given to the question. However, this bill which indicates that practically anybody who for any reason whatsoever is away from home on election day, or intends to be away from home on election day, can vote gives a little too much scope to people. It would allow them to vote at whatever time they wished. I sometimes feel that in the last election we had enough indication of what could happen in the way of impersonation and unfair election practices during election day. If this amendment were made to the Canada Elections Act we would have instead of one election day probably three or four election days. What would be the result? This day is, as I indicated, so important to the people of Canada.

It is the day in which the individual citizen can take his part and his share in welding and developing the principles and the rules of law that are so important to this country. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated that there is a lot of discussion about the lack of interest on election day but if we had three or four election days on which practically anybody whose name was on the voter's list could vote I think the importance of election day would certainly be lessened. People would say, "well, I can vote on Thursday, Friday or Saturday of the week before." The result would be that more people would say, "Well, what is the use? It is not important." They would not bother to vote.

I think election day is too important from the point of view of Canada's welfare and history to alter the present situation too much and widen the scope to the extent that the bill before us does. If we are going to have several election days then, as the hon. member for Peel indicated, we would have a duplication of the services that are necessary on election day. Instead of having a few advance polls we would have many, with all the officers necessary to control those polls, and the result would be that expenses would mount and the cost to the country would be a great deal more than it is now. Goodness knows, we hear enough now about the tremendous cost of elections, and if we were to provide for additional days of voting at advance polls I think it would add tremendously to the cost of elections.

As I indicated, I believe that something should be done to widen the scope in order to make it possible for more people to vote who have to work away from home on election day. But I do not believe that people who want to go hunting or fishing on election day should be allowed to go to an advance poll a few days before, sign an affidavit and vote. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support the bill.

Mr. C. A. Cathers (York North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the bill may I say that I am very interested in it because there are some phases of it with respect to which I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) should be commended. However, I also think his approach to the bill is piecemeal and because I had so many experiences in the last election I think the whole election act should be given intensive study and properly revised. In my own riding we had one advance poll and some people who wished to vote at that poll had to make a round trip of 120 miles. I do not think any voter should be asked to do that. I made inquiries from the returning officer as to why there could not be more advance polls located in the different municipalities and he gave me the answer that in the previous election only a certain number had voted. If the establishment of an advance poll requires a certain number of people I can readily understand why more were not established in view of the distance that people have to travel in rural areas.

This is only one point where I think the act should be revised. There is also the method of enumeration. In the towns two enumerators go from door to door making their enumeration of the people who will be eligible to vote but in the rural areas only one enumerator is used. The question in my mind is why that is so. I think there should be some revision of the method of enumeration because the costs are terrific.

There is another feature which is very costly and which I fail to understand. The urban voter is provided with a complete list of names of all those eligible to vote together with the place at which he is to vote although the place to vote is usually put in such an obscure corner and in such small print that he never realizes where the polling station is and consequently is at a loss to know where to vote. But why does the rural voter not get the same treatment? He at least would be able to know that his name was on the list. Another proof that the election act should be overhauled—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will not mind my recalling his attention to the principle of the bill. Perhaps I allowed the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) a little too much latitude in discussing the advisability of other amendments to the election act. As I understand the bill before us, it relates precisely to one provision of the act, the provision for advance polls, and it seems to me that the principle under discussion is that of advance polls. If I am in error about that I can be corrected, but subject to that correction it seems to me it is not in order to discuss other desirable amendments to the election act on second reading of the bill now before us.

Mr. Cathers: Mr. Speaker, I was just trying to point out that this is only one part of the job that should be done.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that any reason for not doing this job?

Mr. Cathers: I would answer that in this way. As I said earlier, it is only doing a piece of a job and there is great urgency to do the whole job. I also agree with one of the former speakers that this is not the proper way to do the job that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is endeavouring to do.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he realize that if the bill had suggested three or four changes in the election act hon. members from his party would have stood up and said that they agreed with one or the other but could not vote for the bill because they did not agree with all the changes?

Mr. Hodgson: How do you know?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because I have been here for some time.

Mr. Cathers: That may be so. As a new member, I do not know what approach members on this side of the house would have made to such a bill, but I feel that the present bill is not doing the job it should be doing. If advance polls are provided as outlined in the bill I think there will be more discrepancies such as occurred in your own riding, Mr. Speaker, in the last election and also in other ridings, I believe. In my opinion the hon. member has drafted his bill in such a loose way as to provide an opportunity for dishonest practices to creep in. I should like to see some way found to have a compulsory vote. I believe they have tried this in Australia and it has worked fairly successfully. Such a plan might eliminate some of the difficulties we have had in previous elections.

In a modern country such as this every child is registered for the baby bonus, every worker is registered for unemployment insurance or for old age pensions so, in effect, we are really given a number. Although I do not like the idea of stamping everyone with a number, the presentation of a registration card such as people carried during the last war might be sufficient to qualify them to vote at any place in the country. I hesitate to criticize this bill presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has set himself up as, and possibly is, quite an authority on the rules of the house. I must say that the hon. member has been quite successful in the elections. I think I see in his bill the same lack of consistency which he has displayed in the house on many occasions during this session. He has criticized the government for delay in getting things done, and at the same time he has asked more questions and presented more bills which are of no consequence or of no immediate importance, than any other member in the house.

Now, the extension of the advance poll which the hon. member is suggesting has a good deal of merit. However, as has been suggested, I feel that a great deal more thought should be given to it, and to these other factors which I have endeavoured to outline. The advance poll is merely a small detail in a large project. I would strongly urge that during the next session, if there is no election as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has proclaimed, we should give this question proper study and consideration because I do not believe dealing with one point covers the subject in an adequate manner.

Mr. C. A. Milligan (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of making a few remarks in connection with this bill. I have listened with much interest to the comments on the bill, and I should like to commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his foresight in bringing this bill before the house and also upon his determination to do something about this situation. As the hon. member has said, he has brought this bill before the house on three former occasions but no action has been taken. I think the former government was a little lax in not doing something about the matter before now.

Probably I am a little more sympathetic to this cause than some other members because on one occasion I was deprived of my vote, not because I was on holiday but because I was absent on business. I find that has happened on a number of occasions. In my own riding during the last election there was considerable criticism because some people could not vote at the advance poll as they did not qualify. I feel something should be done about it because it is a privilege and everybody should have the right to vote. I cannot say I am going to support this bill because I do not think it goes quite far enough. I believe the subject should be given considerable study, and when the matter comes before the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) some action should be taken.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour for consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock I do leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, when the discussion was interrupted at five o'clock I had been drawing to the attention of the committee the fact that Canadian Pacific Steamships not so long ago had withdrawn the service from the Powell River area in British Columbia. I mentioned that to illustrate the fact that the wide emergency situation created by the complete withdrawal of the Union Steamships Company's passenger services is not something new or unique. On March 22, 1954 when I was speaking on this matter I summed up the situation as I then saw it and my remarks appear at pages 5170 and 5171 of Hansard. I said that the arbitrary manner in which the various steamer services were being withdrawn without any regard to whether a substitute was available was certainly not creating a satisfactory situation as far as the people in the coastal areas of British Columbia were concerned. I continued in the following words:

> When I say that I do not mean that I feel steamer services should have to continue to operate where their operation is completely uneconomic. It should be obvious that with the proper development of the road system, and the use that people are making of cars and trucks, this question of car ferry service is closely tied in with a proper solution of the transportation problem on the coast.

Then I added:

> Certainly the passing of responsibility from one level of government to another is not something that should continue.

In that connection I should like to make clear, as I have attempted to do in this house on other occasions, that one of the most important aspects of the transportation system, at least so far as north Vancouver island is concerned, is the question of the construction of a highway to the northern end of the island which would connect through to the larger centres of the southern island. In view of the fact that the hon. member for New Westminster seems to have taken some interest in this question I would like to suggest to him that he might approach the government of British Columbia with respect to the need for construction of that highway. I can only hope that his intervention in this matter will prove to be as successful as apparently his intervention has been in the question of a subsidy for Union Steamships.

I would like to suggest however that if he had taken pains to look into this situation a little more carefully and had taken some action to see that the highway construction program was completed before the steamships were withdrawn that would have met much more satisfactorily the needs of the people who dwell in the communities along the upper part of Vancouver island and the adjacent mainland coast. This is a very important matter to the people dwelling along the coast and is, as I tried to indicate earlier, just as important to those people as it would be to the people of the area between Montreal and Vancouver if the C.P.R. were to discontinue its train passenger service between those centres.

This is a matter which I have been attempting to follow through from session to session and coming to the session of 1955 I find that when we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Transport on July 20, 1955 I had this to say:

> Mr. Chairman, last year when the estimates of the Minister of Transport were before the house I raised certain matters with respect to transportation problems having particular reference to the coastal areas of British Columbia, a part of which are found within my constituency. Therefore I must say I am pleased to note that on the recommendation of the present minister a royal commission has been established which is charged with the responsibility of looking into some of the problems affecting the coastal trade of Canada.

The effective date of the appointment of that royal commission, as I recall it, was March 1, 1955. We are still awaiting the report of that royal commission and I have been pressing both the Minister of Transport and his predecessor for some action in bringing forth that report. I hope the present government is not going to rest content to merely rely on a royal commission report which is still not available, the findings of which were based on hearings conducted some two years ago, and merely let the matter rest at that because certainly we have had a pretty clear indication that the situation has been going from bad to worse.

The following year of 1956, when we still had no report from the royal commission, I thought the time had come when I should attempt to take the matter into my own hands as far as this house was concerned. Therefore in that year I introduced a bill to amend the Transport Act which would have had the effect, if it had met with the approval of the house, of bringing the coastal shipping companies of the British Columbia area under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners.

I pointed out in moving second reading of my bill that there are provisions in the Transport Act to cover just that point and that if it were not for a section of the act which specifically exempts ports or places in British Columbia from the operation of the act the board of transport commissioners could exercise effective jurisdiction and could have some control over the establishment and maintenance of services and the rates which were established. At the time I introduced my bill I was able to bring to the attention of the house that some of the companies were, without notice, arbitrarily raising their freight rates by as much as 33⅓ per cent in one lump sum on commodities moving up the coast. That was one of the reasons I introduced the bill at that time.

I am sure the house will be interested to recall that following my introduction of the bill, at second reading the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, now Minister of National Defence, rose to speak to my motion and I was very pleased when he said the following words which are to be found at page 3606 of Hansard for May 4, 1956:

> I am sure the house feels indebted to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni for having raised this important subject.

He went on to say that having thanked me for having raised the subject did not mean he was prepared to support my bill.

However he continued from his own knowledge to give some idea to the house of the type of situation existing along the coast and he described many small communities in the inlets and islands along the coast. After giving a review of some of the shipping operations he concluded his remarks by saying:

> In these circumstances I would suggest the mover of this bill consider the advisability of allowing it to stand until the report is received from the royal commission on shipping.

I am not prepared to say that I completely accepted the advice given to me at that time but the fact remains, as I said a few moments ago, that I am still waiting to see this much vaunted report of the royal commission on coastal shipping and to see what recommendations, if any, it will contain which will meet the kind of problem we are discussing here this evening. I will also, of course, be interested to see whether the present government is prepared to act upon this report. However, in view of the fact that the last time I asked the Minister of Transport about this matter he still, in effect, shrugged his shoulders and said he had no idea when the report was coming in, I would suggest that the government should, having had the situation drawn to their attention in a rather dramatic manner by the withdrawal of this service, get busy and take some constructive action on it. I think this is one of the fields of action where there must be complete co-operation between the responsible provincial and federal authorities. If the real problem is to be effectively met, there must be a co-operative effort which will consider in its planning the possibility of road construction as well as marine transport and transport by air.

Suggestions are being made in some quarters on the coast that this subsidy of $562,000 which was paid to Union Steamships last year could well have been diverted toward assisting the construction of a highway in the north Vancouver island. I remember suggesting a similar idea several years ago when I was reminding the house that the federal government used to pay a subsidy of $100,000 a year toward the operation of the steamship Maquinna. I believe this sort of co-operative effort and the application of a policy of proper participation in a highway program in this area would go a long way toward meeting the problem.

As I pointed out earlier this session, the Progressive Conservative candidate in my own constituency during the last election was advocating that there should be construction of a road to the north end of Vancouver island. He was suggesting at the time, erroneously, that this was something which could be done directly by the federal government by means of an extension of the trans-Canada highway. The record with regard to this was put right by the Minister of Public Works when he explained in answer to a question of mine that this was something which could only be undertaken in co-operation with the provincial government.

So, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the government that they should not consider that this job is done when some temporary arrangement has been worked out by the Minister of Transport with some other coastal transportation company for a partial restoration of the passenger service which has heretofore been provided by Union Steamships.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express a few thoughts before this resolution is carried. One of them has to do with the words the hon. minister used in making his announcement this afternoon when he explained to the house that he had registered a vigorous protest against the United States limitations on the import of oil to that country from Canada. I note, and I think all of us do, that this is not the first time in recent years that the United States government has placed limitations on the import of Canadian products, and the present Minister of Finance when he was in opposition listed these instances for us on July 14, 1955 where, according to page 6130 of Hansard, he said:

> In 1952 it took the form of restrictions on dairy imports from Canada; in 1953, more restrictions on dairy imports; in 1954, quotas on imports of Canadian oats b,arley and rye; and in 1955, steps to curtail imports on crude oil from Canada, and hardboard, and the issue there is still in the balance.

We have more recently had warning that there may be curtailment of Canadian exports of lead and zinc to the United States. This process has been going on for some time now and may become much more serious in the years ahead, and I feel that careful consideration by this committee of exactly what the minister meant when he spoke of a vigorous protest is very warranted. The former minister of trade and commerce made several replies as to what he was doing with regard to the situation. On July 14, 1955, in reply to the present Minister of Finance, Mr. Howe said on page 6166:

> Our representations have been made, and we are hopeful that there will be no change in the tariff on hardboard.

These words have a familiar ring when we think of the words of the Minister of Finance this afternoon. Then, on page 5621 on July 4, 1955, the present Minister of Finance gave some indication that he was not satisfied with the type of reply he was receiving, and he said:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what action the government proposes to take in view of the latest United States steps to exclude Canadian rye.

It is obvious that the present Minister of Finance was expecting the government of the day to inform the house as to what action it was intending to take. That is precisely what the Canadian people are now asking him to do. On another occasion the former minister of trade and commerce, Mr. C. D. Howe, made this statement as recorded in Hansard of December 14, 1953 at page 862:

> It has been the hope of the Canadian government that the United States government would in its own interest and in the interest of the free world decide not to impose any further restrictions on imports.

This was over four years ago, Mr. Chairman, but it seems by now to be obvious to all of us that the hopes which the Right Hon. C. D. Howe then entertained have not been borne out by the facts, because since then, as I mentioned previously, there have been limitations placed on the export of various Canadian products. As recorded on page 277 of Hansard of November 24, 1953, the hon. member for Middlesex East asked the government this:

> What about suggesting to the United States that they honour their signature to the Geneva and subsequent agreements? . . . Is the policy of the government again to be too little and too late?

We are now, in the light of our serious marketing difficulties, asking the hon. member for Eglinton, now that he is Minister of Finance and the man responsible, whether he is going to be responsible for a government policy which is going to do too little and be too late.

When I think of the nature of his reply this afternoon I cannot resist reading back to him something he had to say about another government some time ago on March 18, 1954, at which time the government of the day was not very clear in stating its intentions to parliament. He said on that occasion, as recorded at page 3130 of Hansard:

> The minister's answers were evasions; but the time for evasion has passed, the time for a statement of policy from the government has come—

I feel very keenly that simply registering a vigorous protest is not enough. I am not blaming the government of the United States for following the policies it is following. It has to listen to the voice of the people. It also has elections which it must face and the United States government, unless there are more powerful reasons for not doing so, will pay attention to the lobbyists in that country, will pay attention to the voters it has to face at election time. In fact some of the actions of the United States government which at times have not been very helpful to Canadian producers are not to be condemned at all. As the hon. member for Acadia pointed out so well this afternoon, and as he has pointed out on other occasions, the United States government at least has found a way of making surpluses available to those people in the world who require those things which that country has in surplus. The United States government is taking the action it has taken because of the weakness of the Canadian government both past and present.

If the Canadian government were able to convince the United States government that its vigorous protests were something more than mere words then the government of that country would consider the consequences. As it is the United States government does not have to pay any attention to us. It knows we will only continue to make vigorous protests. We will make representations, as the former minister of trade and commerce used to say, and we will let it go at that and our people are bound to suffer the hardship of unemployment that results when we lose markets.

The Canadian government has it within in its power to make the United States government pay attention to what it says. We have south of the border a customer that must have our asbestos, nickel and cobalt and that for defence purposes requires air fields in Canada. The United States requires various other concessions and certainly it needs our co-operation. The hon. member for Vancouver East pointed out this afternoon that one way in which the government could make a vigorous protest that would have some meaning would be to put severe limitations on the importation into Canada of United States refined petroleum products. I believe that even today we are importing more petroleum products than we are exporting and if I am not mistaken a very large portion comes to us from the United States. This is one way in which we could give the United States a very direct answer.

The other matter I wish to take up deals with nuclear bombs in the air over Canadian territory. I understood that the Minister of National Defence was going to answer the question I asked the other day of the acting minister. As yet I have not had an adequate answer to this problem which is of concern to the people of Canada. I should like to know if the government of the United States has asked the permission of the Canadian government to carry nuclear weapons across our territory and, if so, has our Canadian government given such permission? If it has given such permission what safety measures are there and what assurance have the Canadian people that a horrible accident will not take place? There can be no "maybe" in this matter. We simply cannot afford to have either a hydrogen or atomic bomb or any other nuclear weapon accidentally fall on any of our Canadian towns or cities. I understand from a fairly reliable authority that regardless of the precautions that may be taken the danger of accident exists and I feel the government owes the Canadian people an assurance in this respect.

I was very pleased to hear the announcement made this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we are giving some aid to Ceylon. In that connection I should like to quote again the remarks of the present Minister of Finance when he was in opposition on November 18, 1953, at page 139 of Hansard. Dealing with the subject of aid to the underdeveloped nations of the world the hon. member for Eglinton said there are areas in the world today where people are hungry and he went on to quote Mr. Trygve Lie who is supposed to have said:

> There is no fact in the world, in terms of humanity and in terms of politics, which is more important than this: The vast majority of the people of the world live in poverty and misery and they know it and they don't like it. Most human beings are hungry today most of the time; more than half the people in the world are illiterate; half of the world population is constantly ill, and expected to die before the age of 35.

The hon. member for Eglinton then went on at some length to impress upon the government the urgent need to supply such countries as India, Pakistan and Ceylon with some of their basic needs and he referred specifically to the large supply of surplus wheat we have. As reported at page 140 of Hansard of that date he went on to say:

> We should go forward and say, "We are going to help you; we are going to help to feed you, and we are going to do it in a way that will strike the imagination of the eastern world, we hope of the entire world."

Unfortunately for the poor people of Ceylon there has been presented to us a splendid chance for the Minister of Finance to show the people of Canada that he meant what he said on this matter back in 1953. To send just medicine and take other such measures in terms of assisting Ceylon is unworthy of the wealth of this nation. The government proposes sending merely one, two or three airplanes loaded with supplies for 300,000 homeless refugees. I should like to recommend that we send a shipload of lumber, lumber which is in excess supply on the west coast, in order to build some homes for these 300,000 refugees or homeless people and that we offer to the government of Ceylon, let us say, one million bushels of wheat of which we have so many millions of bushels in excess supply. Ceylon is a sister nation of the commonwealth, a democracy, a new nation. And Ceylon has a fairly powerful communist party. Let us not again sit back with a policy of too little and too late and wait until Soviet Russia has made an offer to the people of Ceylon.

We could make the offer this very evening that if they could use it we will supply them with enough lumber to build their houses and with enough wheat to feed those people until they are able to plant those fields again and raise their own food. It would help us in providing employment for all our people on the west coast and in other lumbering areas. It would help Canadian agriculture; it would help us in our ideological battle against communism.

However, I do not think we should be making the offer because of those reasons and they are valid reasons in themselves. It is only right that we who have more than we need should share with those who have met with this disaster. For this reason and this reason alone we should make the offer and I appeal to the government to make such an offer to the government of Ceylon before another 24 hours roll by. Let it for once be a democracy that is ahead of the game in this ideological war.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I am going to make the shortest speech in this debate. I would have been very happy if I could congratulate the Minister of Finance at this time on having included in his supply bill increased pensions for retired civil servants.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, this morning I intended to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question regarding the decision made by the government to aid Ceylon. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made a statement before I had a chance to ask him the question but, like the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, I was very disappointed that the national emergency in Ceylon should have been treated as it was this morning. I was sorry that the new Secretary of State for External Affairs was not able to announce that on hearing of this calamity he immediately cabled the prime minister of Ceylon offering assistance on behalf of the Canadian people. I feel very strongly about this question because I, along with 12 other Canadians, was the guest of the government of Ceylon a few weeks ago. At this point I should like to thank the hon. members of my own party and the Canadian Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association for making it possible for the Canadian delegation to attend the first commonwealth parliamentary conference that has ever been held in Asia. Three countries acted as hosts: Ceylon, Pakistan and India, and about 100 delegates from all parts of the commonwealth enjoyed the wonderful hospitality extended to us by our hosts in this important part of the world.

Naturally, on Christmas day, when I heard that Ceylon was experiencing the most serious floods that they had ever had in the 2,500 years of recorded history of that very beautiful island, I hoped that Canada would rise to the occasion in a generous way. The first day's reports indicated that 94 people had lost their lives. The next day the total was up to 130 and the last report I saw indicated that 288 had lost their lives and about half as many people as we have in the province of Saskatchewan are homeless, having lost their worldly possessions and their future is uncertain because of those terrible floods. The neighbouring countries have responded very generously, and I am glad that Canada has done something. But to draw from the defence stores medical supplies and foods in a crisis of this sort does not really represent the feelings of the majority of the Canadian people.

I share the view of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that the Minister of Finance, who expressed those very generous sentiments after he had attended a commonwealth parliamentary conference and got first-hand information regarding conditions in some parts of the commonwealth, would want to review the statement made by his colleague this morning and to have something more generous placed on the record tomorrow.

While I am on my feet I should like to take a few moments to report on the part that Canada is playing in this part of the world. In Ceylon we were told of the work that has been done in the co-operative movement by Canadians who received their training at St. Francis Xavier in Nova Scotia. There are six very important co-op centres that have been set up as a result of Canadian contributions under the Colombo plan. We heard a good deal of Mr. Gus. McDonald, who received his training at St. Francis Xavier. Although it is six or seven years since Mr. McDonald was there, for the next 25 years his name is going to be a name that will be highly regarded. When they have a difficult problem in the vegetable co-ops, for example, one of the members says: "Well, now, if Mr. McDonald was here he would suggest that we approach this problem in this way. He would not approve of the suggestions that have been made by one of the members," and whoever can express the considered opinion of what Mr. McDonald would do in a given situation carries a good deal of influence.

Naturally, we were pleased to hear of the part that the Canadian homemakers and women's institutes have played in improving the standard of living of their sister women in Ceylon. Lady Coomer Aswamy, the wife of the high commissioner designate from Ceylon to Canada, has been very active in organizing the country women of Ceylon. We saw her report and noted with some pride that Canada was right at the top of the list of contributors and had made a more generous contribution to the work of keeping the country women of Ceylon than rich countries such as the United States and Great Britain. I am sure that during the lifetime of all the people in Ceylon the fact that Canadian women who have never been to Ceylon have been willing to make investments in order that there might be nursery education, health centres, and classes in home management to make life a little more tolerable for the people of that area, will be greatly appreciated.

We did not see Professor Hardy, a very distinguished professor, from the University of Saskatchewan. He has been in Ceylon now for several years under F.A.O. When I learned that Canada contributes a little over two cents per person per year to the work of F.A.O. I realized that Professor Hardy has been able to go out there and spend six years to help introduce new methods of cultivation in that area. I feel that Canadians generally should have the opportunity to know more of the work that is being done by some of our Canadians who go out under schemes such as W.H.O. and F.A.O. and other schemes promoted by specialized agencies of the United Nations.

I realize that while we have so many unsolved problems in Canada, governments do receive criticism for spending any money outside the country; but when one realizes that for two cents per person per year a man with Professor Hardy's outlook on life, his background—he has been president of the trustees association of Saskatchewan; he was an outstanding rugby player when he was much younger than he is now—, with all his vast experience, can go to that part of the world and start life over again when he had an assured future in the province among his friends, is something for which Canadians have reason to be proud.

In Pakistan we had the good fortune to meet some of the Canadians who are working on the Warsak power project. Again, we were proud of the fact that these young engineers had gone out there with their wives and children in order to provide power and irrigation projects for the people in that area. We also met a group of engineers in Pakistan who had spent some months in Canada under the Colombo plan studying the operations of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. While they naturally appreciated the know-how they were able to obtain from their study of our railways, the thing I remember most is the tribute they paid to the rank and file of the Canadian people. They said they could not get over the fact that when they sat down in a restaurant in Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver, Moncton or wherever it might be, Canadians, recognizing that they were strangers, came to their table and said, "We see you are strangers. Where is your home and what are you doing here?" Before they knew what had happened they had formed new friends and Canadian people had taken them to their homes.

It does not require a great deal of effort to take a person from another country into your home once in one's lifetime but it does mean a great deal to people who are in a strange country and away from their friends to find that they are accepted, given a chance to meet our people and to see something of home life in Canada by visiting the homes of complete strangers. Naturally we were quite thrilled to have this tribute paid to the rank and file of Canadians. These engineers did not remember any names and we were not asked to bring messages to any people who had entertained them but they were greatly impressed by the generosity of complete strangers who did not want anything from them but merely wanted their stay to be as pleasant as possible.

Naturally we spent a major part of our time in India where the commonwealth parliamentary association met for the first time in the capital of that country. This is a very important part of the world. One cannot realize the problems that exist without actually going there. We had read about these countries during our school days, but it is hard for us to realize, for example, that a million babies are born every month and that in sixteen months time as many babies are born in India as the total population of Canada.

India is embarking on a program to provide education for all children between the ages of 6 and 14. How many children are there in this age group? There are over 60 million, nearly four times as many as the entire population of Canada. They are going to have a host of problems for years to come. I think it was two weeks ago yesterday that some of our delegates visited one of the villages where 100 children met in one school, half of them in the morning and half of them in the afternoon. In this school there are no doors, windows or floors. The children sit on sacks on the ground with their legs crossed and only have a very small blackboard, but in many of these villages the children are receiving an education for the first time in the history of the country.

In one of the schools the teacher explained that the school was being conducted on the parliamentary basis. They had a prime minister and ministers of agriculture, education and health. We asked to meet the prime minister. A little lad twelve years of age came to the side of the school where we stood and explained that it was his duty to see that his colleagues discharged their respective responsibilities. We asked to see the minister of health. He had to see that the children had their faces and hands washed before they came to school. We then asked to see the minister of education. She was the most beautiful minister of education I have ever seen, with jet black eyes and braids down her back. She was only ten years old but she was emphasizing the importance of having good books in the school, of having the blackboard cleaned every morning before school started and seeing that the school was as tidy and the children as orderly as possible. I am sure that in 10 or 15 years time these children, who have only known what school is like for two years, are going to be taking a very important part in the life of that country.

Two days previously we had gone to Agra to the Taj Mahal. Hundreds of years ago 20,000 people worked for nearly 20 years to construct one of the most beautiful buildings I have seen. It is truly one of the seven wonders of the world. The people who worked on the project travelled miles from their peasant homes and worked long hours. When they finished they did have one of the most beautiful buildings in the world but I am sure that the peasants of today who see their children having the chance to go to school are getting a great deal more satisfaction out of the achievements of modern India than their great grandfathers did years ago by participating in the building of this great structure.

In India and in China to the north important experiments are under way. Both countries are fighting the ancient enemies of mankind, ignorance, disease and poverty. China has adopted communist techniques and is following a totalitarian pattern but in India the people are determined to work out a solution of their problems by the parliamentary system and democratic methods. I think it is very important that those of us in more fortunate areas of the world should appreciate more fully the importance of the experiments in this part of the world. Since we pride ourselves on belonging to a commonwealth of nations concerned about the common good, I do not think we can indefinitely accept a situation where in a country like Canada we have an average income 40 or 50 times as high as the people of India. We accept the fact that a baby born in Canada can expect to live to be 65 or 70 but we have not accepted the responsibility of seeing that the know-how that has made it possible to extend our life expectancy is made available to other countries. The life expectancy in some of these areas in Asia is less than half what it is in Canada. Hollywood has been successful in conveying the impression to Asia and Africa that this is a fairyland and that on this side of the Atlantic we have very high standards of living. Actually the standards of living are not as high as the people who see Hollywood pictures conclude but the fact is that our health records and living standards are very high. We place second to the United States, being higher than Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand, and I think a contribution of two cents per person per year to F.A.O. is not good enough in a country as rich as Canada.

The hon. member for Lanark, the leader of our delegation, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and I had the pleasure to be present in Bombay when the first shipment of Canadian wheat was turned over to India. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek made a few brief remarks after the Canadian trade commissioner had spoken. Perhaps the Canadian people might appreciate how serious famine conditions are in that part of the world this year if they realized that rice, the staple food, cannot be used in Pakistan if more than 25 people are together at any one gathering. Rice is being rationed in parts of India. When you consider the very large supplies of wheat we have available in Canada, and the fact that Canadian wheat is prized very highly because it blends well with wheat in that part of the world, then you realize that our most recent contribution of $7 million worth of wheat is going to create a great deal of good will. It is going to make it possible for children to live through this winter, when death would have been the alternative.

Really, this $7 million does not put a great strain on Canadian resources. I understand that is less than we spend in two days on our defence program. However, there is a limit to what 16 million people can do towards solving the problem of 360 million in India, 80 million in Pakistan and 8 million in Ceylon. I believe we could be more generous than the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning would indicate in a situation where serious flood conditions have removed the life accumulations of 400,000 or 500,000 people and taken another large group to an early death. I think we could continue to participate more generously in supplying personnel to these countries.

In Bombay we met a young Canadian engineer who had only been in India for two months working on the atomic energy reactor. I was somewhat surprised to find that this young engineer said before he was in India for a week he decided he should know more about the country and its background. He decided a good book to start with would be Ghandi's autobiography. He had just finished reading over 1,000 pages and was greatly impressed by the contribution that Ghandi had made to India and to the world. Believe me, the people in India are greatly impressed by the fact that a young Canadian engineer, who has seen a great deal of the world and is not going to be in India for the rest of his life, settles down within two weeks of his arrival to try to understand more about the country and more about the people.

My last words before I sit down are to the effect that I believe we must find ways and means in the future of making it possible for more members of parliament to visit other parts of the commonwealth. I understand that since the last election two ministers have been around the world in a government plane. The former minister of national health and welfare went around the world about a year ago. He took some press correspondents with him, and I do not criticize that. I think the correspondents for Canadian newspapers should get a chance to see the world. We are living now in a very small world. I think it is unfortunate that of the 13 Canadians who went as delegates, not one had been outside Canada before on any mission of this sort.

Since we have had a large measure of agreement in parliament here over the years on the importance of the Colombo plan, and the role that Canada should play towards creating a better understanding, I think that when a government plane is flying all the way around the world it would not be unreasonable if the cabinet ministers concerned were to take a couple of private members from the government side and from the opposition and the Senate. We had two government members in our delegation, two members of the official opposition, one from the Social Credit and one from this party, and a member of the Senate. I believe a delegation of that size might reasonably be taken on these important trips to international meetings of the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, meetings of the Colombo plan, and so on.

As conditions in Canada become more difficult there is going to be more criticism about using funds outside of Canada while we have so many unsolved problems in this country. I do not believe, in this critical period of the world's history, any country can wait until all domestic problems are solved before participating more actively in solving the problems of the commonwealth and of the whole world. I make a special plea, therefore, to the Minister of Finance, who had the good fortune to go to Africa when he was a private member, to use his good offices to see that when government planes are flying around the world at public expense consideration is given to having an all-party delegation go along so that the elected representatives of the people will be able to give first-hand information to their people back home regarding the importance of Canada participating in solving these complicated national and international problems.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Marler: Is the Minister of Finance going to answer the request for information which I made this morning?

Mr. Fleming: The matter has been dealt with several times. I have indicated on several occasions the way in which that information would be given to the house in committee of supply as the estimates of each department are considered. I think that is the proper way to put the information before the house, so the minister concerned can, in each case, give all the information required by the committee.

Mr. Marler: This causes me to recall the days when I was minister of transport and the present Prime Minister used to ask questions about the internal operations of Canadian National railways. He used to refer constantly to the curtain of secrecy which surrounded the operations of Canadian National. I cannot help but think we are getting an actual iron curtain around this $64 million.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member does not think that at all.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Casselman in the chair.

Mr. Fleming moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958, the sum of $272,372,511.08, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this date in the committee of supply.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 242, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1958.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? Now?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave.

Mr. Fleming moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Casselman in the chair.

Sections 1 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the schedule carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the schedule carries may I ask the Minister of Finance if, in conformity with the statement made by one of the ministers this morning, it is intended to introduce further supplementary estimates at a later date?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, some time before the close of the present fiscal year there will, of course, have to be introduced further supplementary estimates. Precisely when they will be introduced I am not now in a position to say.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time? Now?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave.

Mr. Fleming moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Casselman in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

240. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including costs incurred in the participation of the Canadian forces in the United Nations emergency force and contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic treaty organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $130,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,338,164,131 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,521,731,982 will come due for payment in future years), $1,669,450,149.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Department of National Defence, Vote 240. The item will be found on page 47 of the Blue Book, details on page 313. On Thursday, December 5, last, when this matter was last under discussion by the committee, general discussion had been completed and the committee was considering the details under the various headings set out on pages 313 to 315. Discussion had been concluded on the heading "Departmental Administration" and was proceeding on the heading "Inspection Services", page 315, when the committee rose. Has discussion under this heading been concluded? If so, discussion of the next heading commencing at page 318 is in order.

Mr. Henderson: I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that we had completed this discussion. We were on inspection services and at that stage the minister rose to give a statement on certain savings which he had effected on various items and I was under the impression when we were drawing to a close on December 5 that the minister was to have a statement ready for the further discussion on the estimates with particular regard to those items on which such savings had been effected. I was wondering if the hon. minister would be prepared to open his discussion today on that basis.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Pearkes: In answer to the question which was asked on this particular item, Mr. Chairman, I was requested to state how much had been spent during the fiscal year of 1956 to 1957 on inspection services.

The amount spent was $8,088,389 out of an estimate of $10,105,000. This year, out of an estimate of $9,649,000, it is estimated that there will be an expenditure of $8,217,733. Thus in the year 1956 to 1957, there was a saving or money unspent totalling $2,016,611. This year, having taken into consideration when the estimates were prepared and the saving or the unspent money of last year, it is estimated there will be a saving of $1,431,-267. This estimate of the unspent money is due to the completion of much of the procurement program and, therefore, less money is required for the inspection services.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Henderson: Do you mean the item, Mr. Chairman, or the section of the item?

The Deputy Chairman: The section. Any discussion on the heading "Navy". Royal Canadian naval reserve on page 325.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question of the minister? What is the position with reference to the naval reserve; is it in the same position as the militia?

Mr. Pearkes: The role of the naval reserves in Canada is to provide personnel to complete the shore and ship establishments in the event of an emergency. They would only have a secondary role as an aid to the civil power. It is anticipated that if an emergency arose many of the regular personnel of the shore establishments would at once complete the ships' complement. The ships at the present time are manned at approximately 70 per cent of their wartime complement and the rest of the personnel are on training courses and at various shore establishments. Naval reserves in the event of an emergency would then take over those shore establishments and help to complete the establishments' complement.

Mr. Chevrier: What I had in mind, Mr. Chairman, was this: some weeks ago the minister made a statement with reference to the curtailment of activities of the militia reserves in Canada, and I wonder whether the same appertained to the naval reserve.

Mr. Pearkes: The naval reserves are kept at the establishment required to fulfil the function I have just mentioned.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no change?

Mr. Pearkes: There is no change in the functions of the naval reserve.

Mr. Bourget: Is it the intention of the minister to ask tenders for two, three or four destroyer escorts this year, or only for two this year and two next year?

Mr. Pearkes: Orders have been prepared for two replacement vessels, namely two destroyer escorts this year, and the long leads have been prepared for two more vessels which will probably be ordered a year hence.

Mr. Bourget: Was money included in this year's estimate for four destroyer escort vessels?

Mr. Pearkes: No—two this year and the long leads for two more—two this year, and to get ready two more in the immediate future.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question with reference to one of the naval ships which was built at considerable cost under the former administration, the H.M.C.S. Labrador, and which was equipped, in a special manner for defence in the northernmost parts of Canada. Was the transfer of the Labrador from the minister's department to the Department of Transport effected with his consent, and would the minister tell us why this ship, which to my mind, at least, appeared to be a naval vessel of a particular type for an area which was required to be patrolled by the navy, should have been transferred to what is a peacetime department?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, it was considered that the icebreaker, H.M.C.S. Labrador would be able to carry out more effective work under the Department of Transport than if it remained in the Royal Canadian Navy. There are other means of patrolling the northern waters and it was felt that more efficient and more general employment could be found for the Labrador under the Department of Transport.

Mr. Chevrier: I agree that it is probably the case that the Department of Transport would have a requirement and a need for additional icebreaking services as the Minister of Transport indicated to the house, but the point I am making is that the Labrador was equipped with special equipment for defence purposes. What is to become of that equipment which, I am sure, cannot be required for peacetime purposes and certainly cannot be required for icebreaking work in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Pearkes: The equipment which was on the Labrador and which will not be required by the Department of Transport will be held in naval stores in case at some future time a further requirement for it arises.

Mr. Pearson: Is it true that this equipment to which reference has been made is very expensive, very specialized and very valuable and intended for the important purpose of detecting underwater craft which might be in northern seas under the ice, and that there is no other similar equipment available in any other Canadian naval ship for use in those waters?

Mr. Pearkes: No, I can assure the hon. gentleman that that is not correct.

Mr. Henderson: Aside from the question of the ship itself, I understand there was accommodation provided on the Labrador for the training of about 210 naval personnel under Arctic conditions. I should like to ask the minister how he is providing now for the training of personnel in the specialized conditions which exist in the Arctic.

Mr. Pearkes: The naval personnel receive their training in the other vessels of the Royal Canadian Navy.

Mr. Chevrier: May I clear up a point with reference to the Labrador? I understood the minister to say a moment ago that much of the equipment was kept in naval stores and that it could be used for other purposes. However, my understanding is—and the minister will correct me if I am in error—that much of this equipment, indeed the larger part of it, is fixed to the ship, is part of the ship itself, and therefore is used and could be used for defence purposes in the far north. That being the case, what becomes of this valuable equipment, the cost of which runs, I am told, into millions of dollars?

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder if the hon. gentleman could tell me the nature of the equipment to which he is referring. As far as I know, what naval equipment is not required by H.M.C.S. Labrador by the Department of Transport has been removed or is in the process now of being removed and placed in store.

Mr. Pearson: Does the fact that it has been removed now and put into store mean that it was of no particular value when the Labrador was with the Royal Canadian Navy? And if it was of value, what is taking its place?

Mr. Pearkes: I understand it was mainly communication equipment which was on the Labrador and which has been removed. There was no major armament on the Labrador when she was used as an icebreaker.

Mr. Henderson: Getting back to the question of personnel, what other Canadian ships could offer the same training in the Arctic for naval personnel as the Labrador could?

Mr. Pearkes: The frigates and destroyers stationed on the Atlantic station.

Mr. Chevrier: What other naval ships are in Arctic waters?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think there are any Canadian ships in Arctic waters at the present time.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, does the minister know—perhaps he does not know offhand —whether there are United States naval vessels in Arctic waters.

Mr. Pearkes: I cannot tell the hon. gentleman the disposition of the United States naval vessels.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would be in the position, either now or at any future time before the consideration of his estimates is complete, to give us some information about H.M.C.S. Caribou at Corner Brook, Newfoundland and say, if it is proposed to have this unit carry on, what accommodation for this unit will be provided in the Corner Brook armouries.

Mr. Pearkes: That, I understand, is one of the reserve divisions of the Royal Canadian Navy and is stationed at Corner Brook. I am afraid I have not the information immediately available as to the type of accommodation it is using but I shall be very pleased to give the hon. member that information as soon as I have obtained it. I am told that the division is using the armoury which is located at Corner Brook at the present time.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister is quite right in saying they are using the armouries at Corner Brook but I understand the accommodation provided for that unit is not at all satisfactory under the circumstances and my question related to the fact that there was some talk of more money being spent on the armoury to provide for the unit accommodation more commensurate with the work they are trying to do.

Mr. Pearkes: I thank the hon. member for his interest in this unit and I will have the question of the accommodation looked into.

Mr. Pickersgill: While we are discussing Newfoundland I wonder if I could ask the minister what progress is being made with the armouries at St. John's. I understand a site was acquired and plans were in progress some time ago.

Mr. Pearkes: That is an army armouries, is it not?

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the minister's pardon.

[Mr. Henderson.]

Mr. Pearkes: If so, it will be more convenient to answer it when we are dealing with the army.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Algoma East. I appreciate the difficulty the minister is put in if he is asked about the disposition of the ships of another power such as those of the United States but if the question asked by the hon. member for Algoma East could be narrowed so that it reads, "Could we be told whether there are any United States naval ships in Canadian Arctic waters?" is that not a proper question to be answered in the Canadian House of Commons?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think there are at the present time any United States vessels in Canadian Arctic waters but I will have that checked and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could tell us how much of a saving he effected in the navy and how much was actually spent for the year 1956-57?

Mr. Pearkes: The estimates for the navy for 1956-57 were $325 million. Of that amount of money the actual expenditures were $326,684,471, an over-expenditure of $1,684,471. This year the estimate is for $272,798,000 of which it is expected at the present time to spend $271,821,800. That is an under-expenditure of $976,200.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, perhaps as this bureau covers the three forces under the department I might ask the minister whether or not the bureau of current affairs has been discontinued?

Mr. Pearkes: The bureau of current affairs has been discontinued but that does not come under this item.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to ask the minister what saving was achieved by the discontinuance of that bureau. Perhaps he would like to give the answer at a later time. I would also ask why the department saw fit to discontinue that form of education, recreation and enlightenment through the services and on what date that service was cut off?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, this item comes under departmental administration which has already been discussed. I do not have the actual officials here but speaking from memory I believe a saving of $300,000 was effected. The services carried out by the bureau of current affairs are now being carried out as they had been prior to the Korean war by the officers of the respective services.

The Deputy Chairman: Am I correct in assuming that we have now covered all the items with respect to the navy down to the heading "Army" on page 326?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question with regard to certain words which appear in the middle of page 326 just above the subheading "Army". I refer to the phrase:

Less—The estimated amount to be paid from the special account and the estimated credits from transfers of equipment charged to mutual aid.

Opposite that wording appears the figure $36,242,000. I note that there are similar entries in the details of the other services. I wonder if the minister could explain this novel bit of bookkeeping?

Mr. Pearkes: A special account is set up when equipment is transferred to Mutual Aid and that is reflected in this item to which the hon. member is referring. That is the amount of the equipment which has been transferred from the navy to Mutual Aid.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us on what basis the valuation of that equipment is made?

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that there is a regular scale of values set up which has been agreed to by the various countries and we work to a definite formula. I have not the actual formula before me at the moment but there is a formula and a regular scale of valuation.

Mr. Pearson: Did I understand the minister to say that that scale of values is agreed to with the government of the country receiving the mutual aid before it is charged to this special account?

Mr. Pearkes: No, it is not agreed to by the country receiving it but any old equipment which is disposed of is set at a certain valuation which will cover the cost of packing and shipping that equipment. New equipment is passed to the receiving country through the Mutual Aid organization at cost.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, could the minister explain how this item appears as though it were a cash credit? As I look at this page of the estimates it would appear that we are called upon to lay out the sum of $309 million to cover certain items but actually we have to lay out only $272 million because we get this $36 million back. Does that $36 million come in cash in some way or is it a bookkeeping entry? In any case where does it come from?

Mr. Pearkes: This is crediting to the navy certain naval equipment which has been given to the NATO countries as mutual aid. You will see it reflected in the details on page 347, transfers to NATO countries of equipment from service stocks.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this section carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: The next section starts with the heading "Army" at page 326. It would appear to run to page 334, and include the item of $444,467,000 at the top of the page. Is it satisfactory that the item be combined? Shall the item carry?

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, there is one aspect of the army that I should like to deal with at this time. Probably the minister can deal with it. Will the colleges operated by the services come under this item? I refer particularly to Royal Roads and the Royal Military College at Kingston. I understand the services are now in the position where an insufficient number of students with the high qualifications required are now applying in the ordinary way to enter these colleges and that more training could be conducted at these colleges than is being done at the present time. I think we might expand the entrance qualifications, not necessarily on the intellectual side, to include other groups of the services for admission as students to colleges such as the Royal Military College. I refer particularly to a group of applicants who might be included from the reserve forces of Canada. There are young men in those forces who might wish to continue their education and get it at the Royal Military College, at Royal Roads or at the other college. Has the minister given any consideration to expanding the groups who may enter those service colleges to include persons who are taking their reserve training at the present time?

There is one other point that I should like to mention and it has to do with the Royal Military College at Kingston. I hope the committee will forgive me for mentioning a local matter; but I believe the colleges are now in a position where they must compete with all other colleges of North America for their staff. Any college to have a good staff must compete in facilities, just as other colleges in Canada must do. It is not unusual for the colleges of Canada to be erecting more and larger buildings and providing more facilities for the staff to work in. We know that service colleges such as the Royal Military College have had their building programs restricted. I believe that if those programs are restricted we will not be able to compete and get as good professors, nor will we be in a position to provide an education for as many young Canadians. I must say that they do get a fine education at the Royal Military College. Will the minister tell us whether the buildings which were to be constructed, and which at the present time have been held up for one reason or another, will be constructed within the near future?

Mr. Pearkes: I have noticed the hon. member's interest in the Royal Military College at Kingston and it is very much appreciated. The Royal Military College is administered by the army. Royal Roads is administered by the navy. The Royal Military College now has the maximum number of cadets that can be accommodated at the college. It receives not only first year cadets but third and fourth year cadets from colleges such as Royal Roads and the College Militaire. It is not the intention to extend the number of cadets being trained at the Royal Military College, as the supply of officers from the service colleges, and from the other means by which men can qualify for a commission, is meeting the full requirements of the Canadian army at the present time.

The hon. gentleman asked about buildings. There is a plan at the present time for a new library, which I believe is to include certain laboratories as well as lecture rooms. There has been some difficulty in completing the design of the building and it is hoped that construction of the building will start in the next financial year.

Mr. Deniset: Have we reached the item "Canadian militia" or are we just getting to it?

The Deputy Chairman: We are just coming to it.

Mr. Nicholson: There is an item here for medical and dental consultants, $2,453,000. Can the minister give us a breakdown of this item and will he be good enough to say what progress is being made in eliminating the overlapping in the medical services of the navy, army and air force? I understand we are still maintaining three separate medical establishments for those services.

Mr. Pearkes: Serious study is being carried out now as to the advisability of amalgamating several of the administrative services such as the medical services of the navy, the army and the air force. Progress is being made along that line. There are certain specialists who are now tri-service in nature and, furthermore, in certain stations the medical staff of one service look after the medical and health requirements of the other services which are located at that particular station. For instance, at Esquimalt in British Columbia there is a hospital run by the navy. The navy medical personnel staff that hospital. Army personnel and air force personnel in the vicinity are sent to that navy hospital. We are taking every possible course open to us to eliminate any duplication in the services, but it is not an easy matter completely to integrate the three services and to have one medical service for all the three services, the navy, the army and the air force, but we are working in that direction.

Let me give the actual breakdown of the total of $2,453,000 which the hon. member is asking for. Hospitalization in the Department of Veterans Affairs hospitals—that is, for cases where there is no military hospital in the immediate vicinity—$1,750,000; for civilian hospitalization of service personnel, $160,000; for employment of civilian doctors and nurses either at military hospitals or at other hospitals, $235,000; civilian dentists' fees, $143,000; medical services overseas for Canadian personnel who are serving abroad, $90,000, and other items $75,000.

Mr. Nicholson: If I may return to the first subject the minister discussed, it seems to me it is probably 15 years ago that suggestions were first made that there was a good deal of additional costs and considerable waste of valuable personnel by maintaining medical establishments for the army, air force and navy. I would think that 12 years is a long time in which to settle the problem. Is there any better reason for maintaining separate establishments for medical personnel than for dental care? It is some years since we discontinued the provision of separate dental services for the army, navy and air force. At this time, when there is such a shortage of medical personnel in the country, it seems to me that we could effect quite a saving in personnel and dollars by having one medical service for all three services. Can the minister indicate how many more years it will likely be before any effective action may be taken?

Mr. Pearkes: I am afraid I cannot be responsible for the past 12 years. I have felt, as the hon. member does, that there should be progress made toward integration of the three services. If the present government remains in power I hope that may be accomplished before the end of another 12 years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman answer my question about the plans for an armoury at St. John's?

Mr. Pearkes: I understand there is no item in this estimate for an armoury at St. John's. Consideration is being given to the desirability of including an item in next year's estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is correct, is it not, that a site has been acquired?

Mr. Pearkes: I will have to have that checked. I will let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister advise the committee if any decision has been reached to provide armoury facilities for the New Brunswick North Shore Regiment in Bathurst?

Mr. Pearkes: I will have the officials look into that and I will let the hon. member know.

Mr. Barnett: On page 333, somewhat below the point where the hon. member for Mackenzie was asking questions, there is an item "exhibits advertising, films, broadcasting and displays, $1,060,000." Would the minister explain the purpose of that vote? Has it to do entirely with the recruiting activities of the army or is this money for some other purpose?

Mr. Pearkes: That item covers advertising for army recruiting purposes. I may say that is one of the items in which we have been able to effect some reduction. We were able to transfer money from that item in order to meet other expenses to which I referred in my opening remarks.

Mr. Barnett: The minister will realize that there are a good many pages listing various positions in the civil staff of the army. Is there any way, through an examination of the details of the estimates, by which one can ascertain which are civil service positions and which are prevailing rate positions?

Mr. Pearkes: Both civil service and prevailing rate employees are included here and no particular break-down is shown.

Mr. Haidasz: Can the minister tell the committee whether there is any truth in the rumour that the historic University avenue armouries in Toronto are to be abandoned?

Mr. Pearkes: Representations have been made by a number of organizations recommending that the armoury site be abandoned and there have been an equal number of recommendations that it be retained. The matter is under very careful review. No decision has been made nor will one be made for some time.

Mr. Nicholson: Again on page 333 there are two large items for travelling and removal expenses and telephones and telegrams. Does the minister have a break-down of the payments to the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways with respect to the item of $17 million odd for travelling and removal expenses and also the item for telephones and telegrams? Can he give us a break-down showing how the two companies fared?

Mr. Pearkes: I am having my officials look up the matter to see whether we have a break-down between the two railways. For Canadian National Railways the total was $2,988,507.16 and for Canadian Pacific $1,821,996.81.

Mr. Nicholson: I gather that is for travelling. Has the minister a break-down of the item for telegrams? There is nearly $2 million for telephones and telegrams.

Mr. Pearkes: We do not have a break-down of that figure.

Mr. Henderson: Can the minister tell us what proportion of the army construction program for the year 1957-58 was either deferred or not proceeded with?

Mr. Pearkes: I had a review made of the construction program of the army because it seemed to me that we were constructing accommodation for a very high percentage of the regular personnel. We have what may be a peak load of regular army personnel in that we have some 49,000 officers and men in the service. The buildings which have been constructed are of very excellent quality and are of a permanent character likely to last 50 or 75 years. It seemed to me it might be advisable not to construct that type of building for all our regular army personnel and that it would be better to have a certain proportion of the regular forces living in what might be called more temporary buildings because it is hard to foresee the future and one would not want to have a lot of permanent buildings constructed in out of the way places. Generally speaking, we are providing permanent accommodation for approximately 70 per cent of the regular army.

Mr. Henderson: Just how much would this deferment or erasure amount to in dollars in so far as the construction program for 1957-58 is concerned?

Mr. Pearkes: It is approximately $20 million. Some of that is deferred and may be deferred for a number of years. Some of it will certainly have to be proceeded with in the near future. I have had this review made. It is not quite completed yet, so I am not able to give a definite answer.

Mr. Zaplitny: On page 332 of the book of estimates there is a breakdown by occupations of various personnel. I notice that there are nine panel beaters. I wonder if the minister could tell the committee just what a panel beater is and what his functions are?

Mr. Pearkes: He is a man employed in the maintenance of automobiles, lorries and so forth and his duties are connected with the panelling or framework of the automobile. He is really an automobile repair mechanic.

Mr. Zaplitny: Is that what is ordinarily known as a body repair man?

Mr. Pearkes: I think that is the term used in civilian life.

Mr. Henderson: I wonder if the minister would make a statement concerning page 334 as to the amounts in the fiscal year 1956-57 which may not have been spent and what he expects might be underspent or overspent in this year?

Mr. Pearkes: Referring to the army estimates for 1956-57, the estimate was $384,822,000 and the amount spent was $388,673,195. In other words there was an over-expenditure of $3,851,195. In this year the estimate was $400,110,000, and it is estimated that $390,359,000 will be spent, which will be a saving of $9,751,000.

Mr. Henderson: The $20 million of construction has been taken into consideration?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, it is all taken into consideration.

Mr. Henderson: That has been deferred, so actually there would have been $11 million more spent if the construction program had been carried out this year than was estimated?

Mr. Pearkes: I have the answer now concerning the St. John's Newfoundland armoury. The land was bought on August 28, 1957.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall that section carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, there is a question of a general nature I should like to put to the minister. Perhaps I could indicate its terms now and he could consider and answer it tomorrow when we resume consideration of these estimates, as I believe is the intention.

When the minister introduced his estimates on December 5 he had something to say about the savings that had been effected in some branches of his department which made it possible to meet increased salaries and other items without having to ask for a supplementary estimate. I feel it is fair to say that the minister spoke as though further savings could be counted on. I have in mind in particular what he said as recorded on page 1903 of Hansard for December 5. I took it from the tenor of his remarks that one might look for a reduction in defence expenditures in the next fiscal year.

Since that time, however, there has been the NATO conference in Paris. We are conscious of some of the things the Prime Minister said when he came back from that conference. He referred to the possibility, under certain conditions, of defence expenditures having to be increased. He used words such as "colossal" and "gigantic". I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence has any comment to make as to which way we are going. Are we moving in the direction of reduced defence expenditures as I thought was forecast by the minister in the opening remarks on December 5, or are we moving in the direction of more gigantic expenditures as the Prime Minister indicated was a matter of apprehension when he spoke on December 21? Perhaps the minister could think about that overnight and give us a statement in the morning.

Mr. Pearkes: I could hardly be expected to discuss next year's estimates while we are still discussing this year's. I do not believe I could be expected to give an answer concerning the size of the estimates for next year. The Prime Minister indicated that there might be colossal expenditures unless certain steps were taken by the NATO countries as a whole. I hope, and I am sure the hon. member hopes as does every hon. member, that it will be possible to relieve the terrific burden which all countries are feeling so far as defence expenditures are concerned. But until there is some comprehensive disarmament plan worked out it would be foolish for one country to start paring down materially on expenditures on national defence.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this portion carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this portion carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with the estimates of the Department of National Defence; then the estimates of the Department of Finance, and then those of citizenship and immigration.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask whether the house leader can give any indication of the business for next week?

Mr. Green: Thus far I can only say the business on Monday. It will be a private members' day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader a question? I wonder if the government is giving any consideration to the suggestion that was made, I believe by the hon. member for Peace River, at the time when the house passed the motion extending our sitting hours to the six-day week on which we are now operating. I believe the suggestion was made across the way at that time that if we did not finish the business of the session before the Christmas recess this matter might be reconsidered on our return in January. I wonder whether any consideration has been given to more normal working hours, if not for the benefit of the members at least for the benefit of the staff of the House of Commons?

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Speaker, the house decided about these hours when the vote was taken some weeks ago. It must be remembered that we are only considering the estimates for the current fiscal year which were brought in by the former government. There has already been a great deal of time spent on them.

In addition to finishing up these estimates there remain a very few governmental measures and I feel it would be the wish of the vast majority of the members of the house to get the work of the session completed rather than letting it drag on for weeks and weeks and weeks. After all, there is the work of the new session to be done. The fiscal year will be ending in less than three months and there are new estimates under way. It should be possible to have them dealt with before much more time has expired and I really doubt whether there are very many members of this house who would like to see this present session just dawdling along without any consideration being given to doing the business of the country in a prompt and efficient manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

It being four minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

OGDENSBURG-PRESCOTT INTERNATIONAL BRIDGE

Question No. 202—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. What are the names and addresses of the Canadian representatives looking after Canadian interests in connection with the Ogdensburg-Prescott international bridge?
2. When the bridge is completed, who is to operate it and on what basis or terms?
3. Will the bridge be subject to tolls, and if so, who is to obtain the revenue after the costs of the bridge have been paid?
4. What are the names and addresses of the contractors now building the bridge? What are the total amounts of contracts awarded to each such contractor?
5. What portion of the work being done is now on the Canadian side?
6. What is the total number of Canadian workers now employed in the construction of the Canadian section of the bridge?
7. Have any complaints been received on behalf of Canadian workers not being able to obtain employment in connection with the construction of this bridge? If so, what has been done about such complaints?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State):

1. Information is contained in an act to incorporate Ogdensburg bridge authority, Ch. 57-1 Elizabeth II.

2. Information is contained in an act to incorporate Ogdensburg bridge authority, Ch. 57-1 Elizabeth II.

3. Information is contained in an act to incorporate Ogdensburg bridge authority, Ch. 57-1 Elizabeth II.

4 and 5. This information pertains to construction by a private bridge company; the government has no knowledge of the details. However, it is understood that almost all the construction has so far been done on the United States side and that two contracts have been let to the firm of Merritt, Chapman and Scott. The total amounts of the contracts awarded are not known to the Canadian government.

6 and 7. Some inquiries have been received as to the employment of Canadian workers on the bridge construction project. However, as recited in answers 4 and 5, work to date on the project has been almost all on the United States side and United States labour has been used therefor. The construction materials have been provided and supplied to the site from Canada. According to recent available information, construction on the project has been shut down until spring. Discussions have been carried on and are continuing with representatives of the New York state public works department and the Ogdensburg bridge authority for the purpose of working out appropriate arrangements for employment of Canadian labour in the further stages of the construction project.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—FORECLOSURE ACTIONS, ALTA.

Question No. 290—Mr. Johnston (Bow River):

1. How many foreclosure actions have been instituted by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Alberta up to December 1, 1957?
2. How many foreclosure actions have been instituted by lending agencies of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Alberta up to December 1, 1957?
3. What was the amount in arrears in each case when foreclosure action was commenced by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or their lending agencies?
4. How many quit claims were there in each case and how much was still owing on the mortgage?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has instituted seven foreclosure actions and three actions to cancel agreements for sale in the province of Alberta up to December 1, 1957.

2. Ten foreclosure actions were commenced on loans made under the national housing acts by approved lenders in the province of Alberta up to December 1, 1957.

3. The following schedule outlines the particulars of each action commenced under 1 and 2 above.

BEECHWOOD POWER COST

Question No. 301—Mr. MacEachen:

1. What is the estimated cost of the generation of electricity from Beechwood under present financing?

2. By what amount will the estimated per mill rate be reduced through loans at lower interest from federal government?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Assuming a production of 300 million k.w.h. annually and a borrowing rate of 6 per cent on the $29 million, the cost of power produced by the present Beechwood plant would be of the order of 7 to 7.5 mills per k.w.h.

2. This cost could be reduced by approximately 1.2 mills per k.w.h. by loans from the federal government at a lower interest rate.

PRINTING BUREAU CHARGES

Question No. 306—Mr. Fisher:

1. What criteria does the Queen's printer apply in deciding on the selling price of a publication sponsored by a department?

2. What criteria are used in deciding the charges made to such a department?

3. What arrangements are made with departments for rebates or alteration of price charged by the Queen's printer where publications have a larger sale than anticipated, through the Queen's printer?

4. If a publication does not sell up to its printing how is this failure reflected in charges to the department concerned?

5. What allowance on a government "best seller" is made to a department by the Queen's printer with regard to prepublication expenses such as writing, editing, photography, etc.?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State):

1. Cost of printing.

2. Cost of printing.

3. None.

4. None.

5. None.

PRINTING BUREAU CHECK-LIST

Question No. 307—Mr. Fisher:

1. What was the total cost of assembling, printing, and distribution of the daily check-list in the last financial year?

2. How many people and agencies outside parliament and the federal services have full selection privileges; how many have and take full repository rights to publications listed in the daily check-list?

3. What was the estimated value of such free distribution in the last financial year?

4. In the cost control of such free distribution is any allowance made to departments in lieu of the lack of income from such distribution?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State):

1. $4,760.78.

2. Libraries: 469; 32.

3. $35,000.

4. No.

APPENDIX "A"

PRESS STATEMENT RESPECTING OIL IMPORTS INTO U.S.

The Minister of Finance today released the following statement:

The government of the United States has just announced that the voluntary oil import program, which has been limiting imports of oil into most parts of the United States during the past five months, will immediately be extended to include the west coast area and will thus for the first time directly affect imports from Canada. In the view of the United States, these limitations are required in order to maintain assured supplies that might be required for national defence.

The Canadian government learned with great regret, some days ago, of the United States proposal to extend import limitations. Since that time the Canadian government has made the strongest possible representations to the United States administration and has urgently pressed them to reconsider and revise their proposals. However, in view of the mounting pressures on supply-price relationships the United States has decided that it must proceed with its plan immediately.

The United States administration has represented that the plan is not likely, in the coming months, to involve a very substantial reduction in U.S. imports from Canada below recent levels. Nevertheless the impact on Canadian interests may be expected to be adverse.

The Canadian government cannot accept the view that there is any justification for U.S. limitations on oil coming from Canada, either on economic or on defence grounds. The Canadian government will continue to press its objections.

APPENDIX "B"

EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Exchange of notes (October 26, 1950) between Canada and the United States of America giving formal effect to the statement of principles for economic cooperation.

I

The Secretary of State of the United States of America to the Canadian Ambassador in the United States of America

Department of State
Washington, October 26, 1950.

Excellency:

I have the honor to refer to recent discussions between representatives of our two governments for the general purpose of reaching an agreement to the end that the economic efforts of the two countries be coordinated for the common defense and that the production and resources of both countries be used for the best combined results. Their deliberations were based on concepts of economic cooperation which were inherent in the Hyde Park Agreement of 1941* and which are still valid today. They formulated and agreed to the "statement of Principles for Economic Cooperation" annexed hereto, which is intended to guide, in the light of these basic concepts, the activities of our respective governments.

If this attached statement is agreeable to your government, this note and your reply to that effect will constitute an agreement between our two governments on this subject.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

DEAN ACHESON.

Statement of Principles for Economic Cooperation

The United States and Canada have achieved a high degree of cooperation in the field of industrial mobilization during and since World War II through the operation of the principles embodied in the Hyde Park Agreement of 1941,* through the extension of its concepts in the post-war period and more recently through the work of the Joint Industrial Mobilization Planning Committee. In the interests of mutual security and to assist both governments to discharge their obligations under the United Nations Charter and the North Atlantic Treaty, it is believed that this field of common action should be further extended. It is agreed, therefore, that our two governments shall cooperate in all respects practicable, and to the extent of their respective executive powers, to the end that the economic efforts of the two countries be coordinated for the common defense and that the production and resources of both countries be used for the best combined results.

The following principles are established for the purpose of facilitating these objectives:

1. In order to achieve an optimum production of goods essential for the common defense, the two countries shall develop a coordinated program of requirements, production and procurement.

2. To this end, the two countries shall, as it becomes necessary, institute coordinated controls over the distribution of scarce raw materials and supplies.

3. Such United States and Canadian emergency controls shall be mutually consistent in their objectives, and shall be so designed and administered as to achieve comparable effects in each country. To the extent possible, there shall be consultation to this end prior to the institution of any system of controls in either country which affects the other.

4. In order to facilitate essential production, the technical knowledge and productive skills involved in such production within both countries shall, where feasible, be freely exchanged.

5. Barriers which impede the flow between Canada and the United States of goods essential for the common defense effort should be removed as far as possible.

6. The two governments, through their appropriate agencies, will consult concerning any financial or foreign exchange problems which may arise as a result of the implementation of this agreement.

* For the text of the agreement see Canada Treaty Series, 1941, No. 14 and Canada Treaty Series, 1948, No. 1.

Canada-U.S.—Economic Co-operation

II

The Canadian Ambassador in the United States of America to the Secretary of State of the United States of America

Canadian Embassy

Washington, October 26, 1950.

No. 619

Sir:

I have your note of today with regard to the recent discussions between representatives of our two governments for the purpose of reaching an agreement to the end that the economic efforts of the two countries be co-ordinated for the common defence and that the production and resources of both countries be used for the best combined results. I am glad to confirm that the "Statement of Principles for Economic Cooperation", which was annexed to your note, is acceptable to my government. Your note and this reply will, therefore, constitute an agreement between our two governments on this subject. Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

H. H. WRONG.

APPENDIX "C"

LETTER RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF FOREST ACCESS ROADS

Ottawa, January 2, 1958.

The Honourable W. A. C. Bennett,
Premier of the Province of British Columbia,
Victoria, British Columbia.

My dear Premier:

Under the Canada Forestry Act the government of Canada has offered financial assistance to all provinces with respect to the completion and maintenance of provincial inventories of forest resources, certain kinds of reforestation projects, and, more recently, capital expenditures required for forest fire protection. Agreements relating to one or more of these classes of forestry activity have been executed with nine of the provinces.

My colleagues and I feel that the protection of the forests against fire is a matter of particular importance. Although substantial improvements have been made in this field in recent years, forest fire losses are still excessive and constitute a major deterrent to the application of sound silvicultural practices in forest management.

Good access roads are essential to the attainment of adequate forest fire protection, as well as for other forest management requirements. The seventh British commonwealth forestry conference, which recently met in Australia and New Zealand, recommended that "road systems be developed wherever necessary to permit maximum efficiency and economy in the management and protection of the forests and in the utilization of their produce".

In view of the foregoing and also in view of the need to provide additional employment this winter and spring my colleagues and I are of the opinion that the time is now opportune, if the provinces are so disposed, to enter into further agreements under the Canada Forestry Act which would provide for additional federal financial aid to the provinces for the construction of forest access roads and trails. The agreement envisaged would be essentially along the following lines:

(a) The road and trail construction programs to which the federal government would contribute would be planned and executed by the provinces. The federal contribution would be 50 per cent of the cost, the remainder being paid by the province or by a forest protective association.

(b) Federal aid under this proposal would apply to expenditures incurred between the date of this letter and June 30, 1958, and the maintenance of roads and trails would be a provincial responsibility.

(c) The forest access roads and trails included in such programs would be those required for forest fire protection excluding, of course, county or municipal roads and provincial highways.

(d) Projects to which Canada would contribute under the proposed agreement would not be eligible for assistance under the present fire protection agreement with respect to costs incurred during the period referred to above. However, any unfinished work on such projects, on and after July 1, 1958, would be eligible for inclusion in programs under the present agreement. The latter provides for a federal share of road and trail construction costs amounting to 25 per cent, subject of course to a total yearly allotment.

(e) Provinces may include their share of the costs under the proposed agreement—to the extent properly chargeable to fire protection—in calculating their annual expenditures on fire protection for the purpose of arriving at allotments of federal contributions under the present agreement.

(f) Canada would not make any contribution with respect to the acquisition of any land or right of way.

I should be glad of your views on this proposal, and of your advice at the earliest possible date as to whether an agreement along the lines indicated above would be acceptable to the government of your province. In the event that it does prove acceptable, a preliminary estimate of the cost of the program you envisage would also be appreciated.

In the meantime, if you wish your officials to obtain further details as to the agreement we might propose, they might contact Mr. J. D. B. Harrison, director of the forestry branch of this department. I have asked him to work out the detailed terms of a possible agreement under the general terms mentioned above.

Yours sincerely,

Alvin Hamilton.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, January 4, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO RECESS FOR LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister and leader of the house whether it is the intention of the government to declare a parliamentary recess during the days when the Liberal convention is being held.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): I did not realize that the hon. member was so anxious to attend the Liberal convention. I am hoping it will be possible to make some arrangement among the parties so there will be no unnecessary interference with the business of the house or, for that matter, with the business of the convention.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

VANCOUVER—REPORTED INEFFICIENCY IN PROCESSING CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour but in his absence possibly his parliamentary assistant could deal with it. Has the minister received a request from the united fishermen and allied workers' union or from any other source for an investigation into the alleged inefficiency of the unemployment insurance offices at Vancouver in processing claims for benefits as reported in the Prince Rupert Daily News on December 23 and, if so, what action has been taken or is contemplated?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour and his parliamentary assistant I will take the question as notice and see that it is brought to the minister's attention for an early reply.

MATTAWA, ONT.—REQUEST FOR OPENING OF OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Labour this morning, but in his absence and also in the absence of his parliamentary assistant perhaps the Acting Prime Minister might take it as notice. In view of the recent sharp increase in unemployment in the town of Mattawa, and in view of the inconvenience that is being experienced there under the special circumstances that exist, I wonder whether the minister would give immediate consideration to the opening of an unemployment insurance commission office in that town?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): We shall be glad to take that question as notice.

TELEVISION

MARITIME PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR COVERAGE OF BOXING MATCH ON JANUARY 10

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister ask the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to arrange for the televising in the maritime provinces of the Yvon Durelle and Anthony boxing match to be held January 10 in the United States? Yvon Durelle is a New Brunswicker, and the people in the areas covered by television stations are most anxious to view this match.

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to draw the attention of the C.B.C. to the hon. gentleman's question, but in view of the fact that the microwave connection will not be completed until February 2 it may be that there would be some difficulty in arranging for an instantaneous broadcast of that fight.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Would the minister draw to the attention of the corporation the fact that the people in the maritimes received live television coverage of the world series and other events in Canada even though the microwave connection was not complete.

Mr. Nowlan: Certainly. I arranged for that to be done because it was a matter of national interest. If the microwave had been installed as soon as it should have been the maritimes would now be receiving such broadcasts, but in view of the fact that there has been some delay it will be impossible before February 2. Nevertheless I will certainly draw the attention of the corporation to the matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—OPERATION OF ICEBREAKERS NEAR THREE RIVERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport a question. Can the minister tell the house when the icebreakers of the Department of Transport will begin their usual course upstream from Three Rivers?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The three icebreakers at present operating in that area will operate north of Three Rivers as soon as ice conditions require their movement north. It is expected that at least one of them will be moving north in the very near future, but just exactly at what hour or on what day my department is not quite sure. However, I am assured that as soon as ice conditions warrant the icebreakers will move north of Three Rivers.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, might I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport. When he speaks of moving north of Three Rivers, is this a new form of alliance with the Union Nationale?

Mr. Hees: I do not get the joke, Mr. Speaker, although I am sure there must be one intended.

Mr. Pearson: It is no joke.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the hon. member for Laurier asked me a question with regard to icebreaking in the vicinity of Three Rivers. I have a little more information which might be of interest to him and to the house. The Lapointe is working in the vicinity of Three Rivers at the moment. The McLean and the d'Iberville are in Quebec. The McLean is coming up to Three Rivers within the next day or so. The Lapointe is available for any ferry assistance at Sorel until the ice road is formed. There is no ice of any consequence below Sorel. There is quite a bit of ice running at Sorel, and the new ferry is still in operation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether they are working eastward, westward or northward?

Mr. Hees: If the hon. member does not mind, I think after my last answer I had better consult my map.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FURTHER STATEMENT ON FOREST ACCESS ROADS TO PROVIDE WINTER EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, when I made a statement in the house yesterday, as recorded at page 2774 of Hansard of that date, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet asked the following supplementary question:

> Is the signature on that agreement—
>
> Meaning an agreement on forest fire protection signed pursuant to the Canada Forestry Act.
> —a condition of the obtaining of a part of those funds for access roads for forest fire protection?

I answered this question in the affirmative, but on reading Hansard I realize that the words "those funds" used by my hon. friend did not refer to funds under the forest fire protection agreements but to the new funds to be requested of parliament for forestry access roads; hence my subsequent reply to the hon. member's question may have been misleading.

It is clear, of course, that in order to obtain funds provided by parliament for the implementation of the forest fire protection agreements a province must have concluded such an agreement with the federal government.

It is equally clear that in order to get federal aid for the construction of forestry access roads under an agreement to cover the period of January 2 to June 30, 1958, a province must conclude an agreement with the federal government and funds must be provided by parliament. But it is not necessary for any province to participate in both agreements before deriving benefits under one agreement.

Naturally, some adjustments must be made with regard to provinces which participate in both agreements. The reason for this is that under the forest fire protection agreement the federal contribution for access roads is limited to 25 per cent. Under the short winter program, proposed especially for access roads, regardless of their purpose, be it for fire protection or for forest management, the contribution offered for this short period is 50 per cent. After June 30, 1958, those provinces which have signed the forest fire protection agreements can claim only 25 per cent.

As Quebec is the only province which has not concluded a forest fire protection agreement, Mr. Speaker, if it concludes an agreement on access roads valid until June 30, 1958, it cannot claim thereafter a 25 per cent contribution by virtue of another agreement which it has not signed. Both agreements are open to all provinces independently on an equal footing.

In a very clear story this morning in the Globe and Mail this winter works program is described accurately and fully. However, in one paragraph there is a misunderstanding which is probably my responsibility. This paragraph says:

> Quebec—the only one of ten provinces which has not signed a federal-provincial agreement on forest fire protection—will not be able to participate in the road project.

Therefore I would like to stress again that Quebec can participate in this new program without signing the forest fire protection agreement. To make this absolutely clear, and since there were small changes in the letter to Premier Duplessis in order to take account of the fact that Quebec has not signed a forest fire protection agreement, it might be useful, if the house agreed, for me to table this letter to Premier Duplessis in the original French and in the English version in order that it may be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask the minister a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have asked permission to have the letter included in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree to the letter being printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of letter referred to above, see appendix, page 2885.]

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): May I ask the minister whether it will be a condition of the 50 per cent participation by the government in the building of those access roads—I am talking about the winter program—that tenders be asked by the provinces for those works?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will have to look at the letter. My memory is that there is no such condition asked of any of the provinces in the letter.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask a supplementary question and preface it by saying that in the forest fire protection agreements there is a condition that tenders have to be called. Would not the same condition be in the agreements which will be signed for this short winter program?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member would realize that in making these announcements of policy you do not go into all the details. There will have to be an agreement drawn with each of the provinces, and I certainly think this question of tenders will be considered as part of the agreement.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Has he given any consideration to the possibility that making the terminal date of these agreements June 30 may be rather limiting it, on account of weather, in the Atlantic provinces and particularly in Newfoundland. If we should have a backward spring in 1958, such as we had in 1957, it would be physically impossible to get this work done by June 30. Would he consider the possibility, in those cases where weather would be a factor, of having the date somewhat later?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This matter was very carefully considered by the forestry branch of my department, and in some other works projects which we are announcing winter employment will end on May 31. For instance, in some that have already been announced employment will end sooner than that. But on this question of forestry access roads we recognize the necessity of being able to do the grading in the summer months. Therefore in deciding on June 30 we took that into consideration. In the first few months the clearing which can be done during the winter would be done to provide employment. Following the break-up period we would have the two months of May and June to do the grading, which would consummate the program.

In regard to the province of Newfoundland I will ask the officials to look into that point again, to make certain there is no hardship in completing the program in that province.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate the minister's attitude very much.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Has he been able to reach agreement with Saskatchewan with respect to whether or not the road from Flin Flon via Hanson lake to Prince Albert would qualify for participation under the scheme he outlined yesterday?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Under the criteria I have announced I think this road might be considered as part of this program, but actually the province of Saskatchewan has made representations to the government on different grounds with respect to the road. These representations are now being considered, and at this time I would rather that this matter be kept separate until we reach some final conclusion with the province of Saskatchewan with regard to the Hanson lake road.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the weather is not any more backward in Newfoundland than in the other Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Chevrier: Some members on the other side are.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO IMMIGRANTS ARRIVING AT HALIFAX IN JANUARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister give information as to the countries of origin of the 2,400 immigrants scheduled to arrive in Halifax this month, and also if employment is assured for all these immigrants?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I cannot give the countries of origin offhand but I will do my best to ascertain them and advise the hon. gentleman. I should also inform him, however, that the great bulk of these immigrants will be people who are sponsored by relatives already in Canada whose settlement arrangements and undertakings to look after these immigrants have been examined by the department and found to be satisfactory. Therefore there will be no question of finding employment for them. They are sponsored by their relatives and are going to be looked after by them so far as settlement is concerned. Any others who might be included in the 2,400 would be in the category of immigrants coming to Canada after careful examination and screening to take positions in fields where there is an actual shortage of employees at the present time. That would be a very small portion of the 2,400.

TRADE

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO RETALIATORY MEASURES AGAINST UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement he made yesterday indicating that the United States government had violated agreements with Canada in curbing crude oil imports from this country, will the minister tell the house whether or not any effective retaliatory action is anticipated?

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I was asked similar questions yesterday. We do not like to think in terms of retaliation at all.

LEAD AND ZINC—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO PROTECT CANADIAN INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In reading the statement he made yesterday regarding quotas on oil I note that the minister and the Prime Minister discussed this question with the heads of state while in Paris. Did the minister avail himself of that opportunity to again impress upon the President the very serious effect that increased tariffs on lead and zinc would have on the economy of Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): In my conversation with the President I did not refer to this subject. In my conversations with the secretary of the treasury I made reference to our previous discussion of the same subject in Washington. I have indicated to the house on previous occasions that this matter of the access of Canadian zinc and lead to the United States market had been discussed at the meeting of the continuing committee on United States-Canada trade and economic relations at Washington in October.

Mr. Chevrier: Was it one of those violent approaches?

Mr. Fleming: There were no violent approaches, nor have there been at any time. The approach at all times has been very friendly, but representations have been frank and vigorous.

Mr. Chevrier: One would not think they had been friendly.

Mr. Byrne: I am sorry, but I cannot hear very well. I have been on one of those Trans-Canada planes all night, and I did not hear what the minister said at the end of his statement. Did I understand the minister to say there had been some new developments in this matter?

Mr. Fleming: No new developments.

Mr. Byrne: Is the minister intending to protest vigorously against this action?

Mr. Fleming: Well, the Canadian point of view on this matter has been put before the representatives of the United States cabinet very clearly and firmly. They thoroughly understand our point of view. Under the United States system, of course, the cabinet cannot always answer for the actions of congress, or vice versa. What I said yesterday the hon. member will find in Hansard, and it was that we have no assurance that action will not be taken at Washington to impose barriers against the importation of Canadian zinc and lead.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Is it true, as reported over one of the radio stations this morning, that it is the intention of the Prime Minister of Canada to seek to discuss this matter personally with the President some day next week?

Mr. Fleming: I have not heard that report, Mr. Speaker, and I am not in a position to make any comment upon it.

WHEAT—PROVISION OF CREDIT FOR SPAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of a Canadian Press story originating in Winnipeg and dated December 28. Specifically, I should like to ask whether any consideration has been given to allowing long-term credit to countries which would purchase Canadian wheat but which are not in a position to purchase it on a short-term credit or cash basis. Can the minister add anything to this statement attributed to him in which he said that a short-term credit for Spain might be arranged in order that Canada might get into that market, and the question of a longer term studied later?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canada sold some wheat to Spain in 1951, and in 1952 I think, but not since. There is an opportunity for Spain to purchase wheat on short-term credit such as is applicable to Poland, which is the model we follow in that line of discussion. I have nothing to add to my statement with regard to long-term credit.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister confirm that negotiations are going on with Spain in the hope that wheat may be sold to that country, in this instance on a short-term credit basis?

Mr. Churchill: That is correct.

U.K. PROPOSAL—DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT OF BOARD OF TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the president of the board of trade of the United Kingdom is in the United States at the present time, according to the press, is it the intention of the government to invite him to come to Ottawa to discuss with the government here the United Kingdom free trade proposals?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My understanding is that this gentleman is leaving California for Venezuela and other places in South America before returning to the United Kingdom.

UNITED STATES—REPORTED INTENTION TO INCREASE GIVE-AWAY PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question. Has he taken cognizance of the decision of the United States announced during the recess of parliament to increase substantially in 1958 the surplus disposal program? If so, what action if any is the government taking to meet that situation?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the proposed action on the part of the United States. I do not think any action on our part is necessary. The United States surplus disposal program is not likely to interfere with the sale of wheat to our cash customers, and that is one of the main points about which we have been particularly concerned. Their surplus disposal program, to the extent that it aids underdeveloped countries, raises no objection on our part.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, it is an increase of 50 per cent, which is pretty substantial.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—STATEMENT ON PLANS FOR NEW FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me the following question:

> Can the minister say what is the present status of the plans for new airport facilities at Winnipeg? Are these plans being proceeded with? When may it be expected that the new airport will be completed?

The answer is that the major runway expansion program that has been under way for three or four years now should be completed during 1958, although some additional taxiway work will remain.

In the matter of terminal building facilities, a temporary extension to existing facilities has been completed this winter, and a firm of private consulting architects in Winnipeg has been working on plans for a completely new terminal building for some months now and is making satisfactory progress. When these plans are ready later this year tenders will be called, but I would hesitate to state how long it will take for the building to be erected, although a two to three year period will probably be required.

POWER

NOVA SCOTIA-NEW BRUNSWICK—STATUS OF AGREEMENTS ON THERMAL PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can the minister inform the house if agreements have been reached and signed between the federal government and the power commissions of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia with regard to the construction and operation of thermal plants in those two provinces?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer to that question is no, not yet.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have a copy of a resolution from the Nut Mountain local of the Saskatchewan farmers' union asking about deficiency payments on the 1955-56 crop of 35 cents a bushel on wheat, 25 cents a bushel on barley and 15 cents a bushel on oats. I wonder if the minister could state whether or not this request is receiving active consideration, and whether an announcement can be made at an early date on government policy on deficiency payments?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A similar question was asked yesterday and I gave an answer then. I doubt the value of repeated questions of this sort. I stated then that the matter was under study.

FREIGHT RATES

EFFECT OF EQUALIZATION INQUIRY ON RECENT INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of Transport a question. Can the minister tell us whether the inquiry undertaken by the board of transport commissioners into the equalization of freight rates across Canada was taken into consideration in the recent order of the board increasing freight rates by 3.6 per cent?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I should like to take that question as notice and give an answer on Monday.

TRANSPORT

FERRY "WILLIAM CARSON"—REQUEST FOR CARRIAGE OF MOTOR CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Now that it has been demonstrated that the facilities at Argentia are available for unloading motor cars from the ferry William Carson, will the minister now carry out his promise to have the William Carson carry motor cars?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not aware that it has been so demonstrated; and as I have advised the president of the Newfoundland board of trade, the Canadian National Railways have pointed out a number of other reasons which make it very difficult if not impossible to load and unload automobiles there.

SHIP CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. Smith (Simcoe North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Will he advise the house whether tenders have been called for the six ships which will be built for the transport department this year?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Tender calls were sent out by my department on December 30. The tenders are to be received by 3.30 p.m. on Friday, January 31. I would hope that construction of these ships would start very soon after that date.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

REFERENCE TO ACTION OF TORONTO WELFARE COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Trinity): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare what the attitude of his government is toward the action of the Toronto metropolitan welfare council which last June, already having deducted $5 out of the $6 old age pension increase—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Trinity will appreciate the fact that the actions of the Toronto welfare council are not the responsibility of this government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think Your Honour would possibly want to give consideration to that ruling, because the hon. gentleman has asked what is the attitude of this government with regard to the action taken by another government or another authority with regard to portions of money given to old age pensioners, part of which are provided for by the people of Canada through policies recommended to parliament by the present government. I would think it only right that this government and this parliament should have some concern in the matter covered by the question raised by the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Green: On this point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that there are many activities in which the three levels of government participate, and it would be quite improper to have discussions of the type which the hon. member for Essex East suggests should be undertaken here. Furthermore, quite apart from all other considerations, this is certainly not a question for orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it these funds are provided by parliament, but once they have been provided their administration is the responsibility of another body for which this government does not have responsibility. In line with the practice of the past, it has not been in order to ask the government questions on matters for which they are not responsible; and I regard this question as one of that type.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? In view of the hopeful statement that was made by his parliamentary assistant on December 16, while the minister was away, having to do with the government's attitude toward superannuated civil servants, can the minister say whether the government will soon be introducing some measure to provide an improvement in the pensions of retired civil servants?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have said at various times during the course of the session, this is one of the matters which is being given very careful consideration by the government. So far as the present session is concerned we thought it was going to close soon, and it will not be possible to place any legislation before this present session. As to later sessions, the government's program will be announced, of course, in the regular constitutional manner.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the minister's statement yesterday that there would be further supplementary estimates introduced before the end of this fiscal year, will the government consider including in those supplementary estimates an item to take care of those whose pensions are in the lower brackets?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I think my previous answer leaves no room for a question of this kind. Such a matter has to have very careful consideration; and while an item in the estimates would be required if such provision were made I doubt very much whether an item in the estimates would be sufficient for the purpose. It seems to me that what would be required would be legislation, if it were the decision of the government to recommend such action to parliament.

REQUEST FOR INCREASES FOR FORMER GOVERNMENT RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Does the answer just given by the Minister of Finance apply also to the pensions of former employees of Canadian government railways, such as the Grand Trunk Railway, whose pensions have been described by the present Prime Minister as thoroughly inadequate?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my answer should not be deemed to go beyond its content.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he say whether consideration is being given to increasing the pensions of retired C.N.R. employees? Is anything being done along the lines of the study referred to by the Minister of Finance with respect to superannuated civil servants?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I think I have indicated before in this house, these matters are always under consideration by the management of Canadian National Railways.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RECENT DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of Finance went abroad he told us he anticipated having discussions with United Kingdom ministers about the forthcoming commonwealth trade conference. Can he bring us up to date with regard to these discussions?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to do so. While in London I had a meeting with the chancellor of the exchequer, the president of the board of trade and their officials two weeks ago yesterday, December 20. In discussing this question we had the opportunity of reviewing the whole situation. The British government proposes to send out invitations to all the commonwealth governments to send their officials to London early in February for a meeting to make plans at the official level.

It is expected that there will be two stages to the official preparations for the conference. There will be this meeting of officials in February, and it is likely there will be a further meeting of officials in the spring at which detailed work will be done on the items to come before the conference.

The date of the conference has not yet been finally determined. There is some difference of view among some of the countries of the commonwealth as to which dates would suit their governments best; there have been changes of governments in two of the commonwealth countries. It is our hope, however, that the date and place of the conference can be decided soon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Did the minister make any progress during these talks in discussing the proposals which Mr. Thorneycroft made when he was here in September?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, that subject was not mentioned. Our concern and purpose were to make plans for the commonwealth trade and economic conference. The situation is precisely as it was reported to this house and to the public in the statement which was issued here in Ottawa following the meeting of the ministers of the United Kingdom government and ministers of the Canadian government in the first week of October of last year.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The governments of the commonwealth countries are concentrating on the plans for the commonwealth trade and economic conference and wish to make a thorough success of it, and any commonwealth country which wishes to bring forward any proposals in relation to trade within the commonwealth, or to economic questions arising within the commonwealth, or economic policies, will have full opportunity of putting them before the trade and economic conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister could give us any idea of the kind of proposals Canada intends to put forward at this conference. It is surely not going to be held in vacuo?

Mr. Fleming: I think the hon. gentleman will realize on reflection that his question is quite premature.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that the preparations for this conference are now in the hands of the British and not the Canadian government?

Mr. Fleming: No, the hon. gentleman is quite wrong. I think it is very likely that agreement will be reached to hold this conference in Canada, but it was considered by practically all the commonwealth ministers represented at Mont Tremblant—and the statements made there have been confirmed since—that London would be the most convenient place for holding the conferences of officials in preparation for the plenary conference. Consequently, in these circumstances, the British government offered to be host in London to the meetings of the officials. It is a matter for general arrangement, but I think I am warranted in saying that the invitation of the Canadian government to hold the plenary conference in Canada will be accepted by all countries.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the Minister of Finance said he had only heard up to that time from I think two commonwealth governments as to the recommendations made to them by their ministers of finance. Can my hon. friend now say if all commonwealth governments have accepted the recommendations of the ministers of finance?

Mr. Fleming: I do not think my hon. friend has correctly reported what I said. If he will look it up in Hansard I think he will see that he has not reported me correctly. There have been acceptances on behalf of practically all the commonwealth countries. There are, I think, only two or three from which we are awaiting final intimations, and there is no apprehension felt as to their eventual acceptance of the invitation and participation in the conference.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Have Pakistan and India accepted?

Mr. Fleming: Will my hon. friend allow me to check the details on that and give an answer on Monday?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It would be a good idea to give a complete report.

Mr. Fleming: There has been one recent message from the Indian government, but as there are eleven governments concerned perhaps my hon. friend would permit me to give him a precise answer on Monday.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

240. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including costs incurred in the participation of the Canadian forces in the United Nations emergency force and contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic treaty organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $130,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,338,164,131 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,521,731,982 will come due for payment in future years), $1,669,450,149.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening it was considering the details of item No. 240 under the various headings set out on pages 313 to 315. Discussion was proceeding on the items under the heading "Canadian army, regular and general" on pages 326 to 334. Has discussion under this heading been concluded?

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Chairman, it had not been concluded at ten o'clock last evening. I would like to ask permission of the Chair to raise a matter which I raised last evening but the answer to which I did not think was satisfactory. I am glad the Minister of Transport is here, because he is concerned with the matter as well.

Last evening I asked the Minister of National Defence what the position was with regard to the H.M.C.S. Labrador. As I said earlier I thought the answer was certainly lacking in information; and I say this respectfully to him, of course. What I have difficulty in understanding is this. The Department of National Defence had an icebreaker built for its own purposes at a substantial cost. My information is that it cost in the neighbourhood of some $25 million. The cost of an icebreaker for peacetime purposes is less than half that amount.

An icebreaker built for naval purposes is a vessel of an entirely different nature and equipment than that of a Department of Transport icebreaking vessel; and why H.M.C.S. Labrador would be assigned to a peacetime department when it was built for a different purpose is something that I think should be explained to the house more thoroughly than was done last night. In other words, I think the minister should tell us why it is that the Department of National Defence, which required this icebreaker for a definite purpose, now says it is no longer necessary for that purpose. There must be a reason for the change.

The other thing which I think should be explained to the house is why this vessel which was built for a specific purpose is no longer being used for that purpose but is being turned over to a peacetime department exclusively for icebreaking purposes. I hope the minister will come to the conclusion that I am seeking information. I think the committee is entitled to an explanation as to why this has been done.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, reverting to the item under the heading "Navy" under which the hon. gentleman raised his question, my understanding is that the Labrador was built as an icebreaker and that there was very little difference in the construction of the Labrador from that of the ordinary icebreaker. It was of rather heavier construction for the more northern waters, and will be available for that work under the Department of Transport if work of that nature is again required. She carried out certain exploratory work which was more of a civilian nature than technically a naval matter. After careful consideration and following consultation with the officials of the Department of Transport, we felt that the Labrador could be used to better advantage under the Department of Transport than under the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not have these officials at my disposal who know, I am sure, far more about the position than I do; but I have been aboard both the Labrador and the C. D. Howe, the two most up to date icebreakers of the Department of Transport, and I say to the minister in deference that they are like night and day as to the equipment that is on board each. The proof of that lies in the cost. Surely an icebreaker which costs in the neighbourhood of $25 million must have something in it that is far superior to one that cost $5 million or $6 million; and comparing their value and cost my impression is that one must have been built for a specific purpose, namely the purpose of defence in the Arctic waters as well as icebreaking, of course, which was incidental, and the Department of Transport icebreaker which is entirely a peacetime vessel. However, I do not intend to pursue it unnecessarily and unduly, though I say with respect that I am not satisfied with the answer I have received.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, I should like to follow up what the hon. member for Laurier has said. I am rather concerned about the Labrador being transferred from the navy to the Department of Transport. I understood when this ship was built that the navy required the ship for Arctic work. The minister said she would be available, of course, in case of necessity. What does this mean? It means that if hostilities broke out she would be transferred back to the navy. Has the minister any figures on the actual operating cost of the Labrador by the navy? What is it going to cost now to refit this ship for the Department of Transport?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, since we passed this naval item yesterday I have not the naval advisers here, so I cannot possibly give an answer to that question; but I can obtain it and let the hon. member have it at the beginning of the week.

Mr. Haidasz: Can the minister tell me whether in the item dealing with professors there are included the salaries for professors who teach the Russian language to Canadian army personnel? How many professors are engaged in teaching the Russian language, and what are their respective salaries? How many Canadian army personnel are studying the Russian language?

Mr. Pearkes: I have not that information immediately available, but I will get it and report back in a short time.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Henderson: Since you were not in the chair last night, Mr. Chairman, and so there will be no mistake about it, when you say "shall the item carry?" you mean the heading of the detail?

The Chairman: The heading of the detail.

Mr. Henderson: While we were on the army details last night the minister told me that he had either cancelled or deferred a building construction program of $20 million for the army; that although the saving had been $9 million, actually there had been a deferment or cancellation of a $20 million building construction program. Can the minister give me now in dollars the amount of the deferment or cancellation of contracts other than the construction program which he effected in the army?

Mr. Pearkes: There is an item of $150,000 for engineering, land valuation and legal fees. That is rather connected with the construction item. Then there is $146,000 for advertising; acquisition of miscellaneous materials and supplies, $1,399,000; repair and upkeep of equipment, $1,205,000. These are the main items in connection with the army.

Mr. Henderson: I presume these were cancellations of contracts, or were they deferments?

Mr. Pearkes: In some cases they were cancellations of contracts and in other cases deferments.

Mr. Henderson: Were the contracts with Canadian producers?

Mr. Pearkes: In some cases they were with Canadian producers and in some cases with foreign producers.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Has the army area headquarters located in Fredericton been transferred to any other location?

Mr. Pearkes: No; the area headquarters is at Fredericton.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): There are one or two questions in my mind emanating from the communique of the NATO powers in Paris. Perhaps the minister would care to explain this statement:

> As regards defence production, we have decided, in view of the progress already made, to take further measures within NATO to promote the co-ordination of research, development and manufacture of modern weapons including intermediate range ballistic missiles.

Will the minister please tell us what is being done to promote this co-ordination in these fields of research and development and in the manufacture of weapons? What is actually being done?

Mr. Pearkes: That question could better be put when we come to the item for the defence research board, but there is co-ordination going on. There have been a number of exchanges of visits between senior officials of the United States forces and of the British forces. As the hon. gentleman knows, there were set up at the NATO conference certain advisers on the scientific and research staff, and it is hoped that there will be frequent and regular consultations among the representatives of all NATO countries on the matter of research and development.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister outline, perhaps briefly, what plans his department has for improving the property known as Camp Chippewa during 1958?

Mr. Pearkes: Did the hon. gentleman say "Camp Chippewa"?

Mr. Garland: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: There are no immediate plans for any changes in that camp.

Mr. Garland: Do I understand that there will be no improvement in that property in this calendar year?

Mr. Pearkes: There are no plans for extensive improvement. The ordinary maintenance will be kept up.

Mr. Garland: In other words it is intended to drop the plans that were scheduled for improving the property?

Mr. Pearkes: I am advised that there are no special plans for any further construction at Chippewa. The ordinary maintenance will be kept up, but no expansion is planned for that camp.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Since the minister has informed me that the army area headquarters have not been moved from Fredericton, can he explain why army camps in other areas a long distance from Gagetown have been closed? I am informed that the camp at Fredericton has a very high maintenance cost. It is located in a very beautiful part of the city which perhaps could be used to much better advantage. Those working at the army area headquarters in Fredericton would be inconvenienced very little by a move of 12 or 14 miles to Gagetown.

Can the minister explain why a camp such as Camp Utopia in Charlotte county would be closed and a camp in the city of Fredericton would be maintained? I have been asked this question by many people, and I can assure the minister that there is a great interest in the province of New Brunswick concerning this matter as it is felt that army headquarters in Fredericton could have been moved and the Utopia camp maintained at very little cost to the government.

Mr. Pearkes: As the hon. member knows, Camp Gagetown has been under construction for a number of years. The intention was that the training of all the units in the Atlantic provinces would take place at Gagetown, and that the regular army units would be stationed there as soon as the accommodation was completed.

The hon. member asked me whether the headquarters were still at Fredericton. My answer was that the headquarters are still at Fredericton. There is no camp at Fredericton, but at the present moment there is no spare accommodation at Gagetown. Units are moving into Gagetown as soon as accommodation is made available. It is under consideration whether at some future date, when the accommodation question is adjusted, the headquarters for that area might not be moved from Fredericton to Gagetown, but the accommodation is not available at the present time.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Did the minister say there were no personnel at army headquarters in Fredericton? Did he say that the personnel there had been moved?

Mr. Pearkes: I said there was no camp at Fredericton, but the headquarters are still retained in the administration building there.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, the answer the minister gave to my last question was completely unsatisfactory and thoroughly disheartening. The only reason I excuse him is that, as he said and probably legitimately so, he was not dealing with his own department and this was really a matter for defence production. Nevertheless, when the Minister of National Defence tells me that the degree of co-ordination we have achieved after all these years is limited to the exchange of visits, the setting up of a group of advisers and frequent consultations, I should like to know what is the meaning of the word "co-ordination". However, I will ask him another question which I think he possibly can answer in view of the fact that we have in Europe a brigade and an air division. This arises again out of this awful communique from Paris.

> Recognizing the rapidly growing interdependence of the nations of the free world—

These clichés are not mine, Mr. Chairman.

> —we have, in organizing our forces, decided to bring about closer co-ordination with a view to ensuring that each NATO member country makes its most effective contribution . . .

Will the minister please translate those words into something tangible? Will he tell us what is actually happening in the way of co-ordination of the armed forces of NATO?

Mr. Pearkes: Co-ordination of the armed forces of NATO will be discussed in detail when the meeting of the defence ministers of the NATO countries takes place next March. The communique to which the hon. member refers was really an outline of the principles agreed upon by the heads of states. The details will have to be worked out at the subsequent meeting which, as I have said, has been called for early in the year, March or April, I believe.

There is one point on which the hon. member misunderstood my remarks. I did not say that this was a matter for defence production. I referred to the defence research board, which is a later item in this estimate.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Am I to accept the minister's statement that despite the many speeches that have been made by ministers since NATO was founded, we are only going to start to co-ordinate our forces this year? Has there been no attempt at co-ordination in the past, or have we been deceived throughout all these years by these vague and pious statements emanating from men whose minds are still in the Maginot era?

Mr. Pearkes: That is a most ridiculous statement. Long before the present government came into power meetings were held. Ever since the NATO organization was established there have been meetings of the defence ministers every year, and there is a very high measure of co-ordination now among the NATO countries. That co-ordination will continue, and the next meeting of the defence ministers is in March.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): In that case why is this particular paragraph included in the communique? Second, when I asked for some information about co-ordination why did the minister tell me that this would be decided at the next meeting of defence ministers? On that basis one can assume legitimately that nothing much had been done about it before. What I want to know is not about the next meeting of ministers and the hopes that may be raised as a result of that meeting, but what has actually happened in the field of co-ordination up to the present. How efficiently co-ordinated are the forces or, indeed, is there co-ordination in any sense of the word?

Mr. Cameron: Unfortunately I was not here yesterday, but I noticed in Hansard that there was an exchange between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the minister with regard to the apparent conflict between statements made by the minister before the NATO conference and statements made by the Prime Minister after the conference, in that the minister had indicated earlier that it was the hope of the government to be able to curtail and economize on defence expenditures and the Prime Minister indicated that colossal further spending would be necessary.

I quite understand the logic of the minister's suggestion that he cannot discuss next year's estimates while we are still discussing the current estimates, but I would suggest that the defence expenditures we are making today cannot be considered in a vacuum and as purely concerned with the year that ends on March 31, 1958. Surely they must have some relationship to future plans of the government with regard to defence spending.

Therefore I think we are entitled to at least some indication from the minister with respect to whether or not the government is still of the mind which he expressed earlier, that it will be possible to reduce the colossal spendings that are going on at the present time; or do we have to contemplate even greater ones as suggested by the Prime Minister? It seems to me that the government should tell us quite frankly whether or not they are still of the opinion that in the present circumstances the type of defence spending that has been going on in Canada is really of any relevance in the world of modern warfare.

Mr. Pearkes: All these expenditures have been very carefully considered, and we believe that the amount of money allocated for defence as reflected in these estimates is very definitely related to the commitments we have to make both for the defence of this country and our obligations under our NATO and United Nations commitments. It is impossible at this time to give any indication as to the extent of next year's estimates.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister inform the house whether, as a result of the annual review of the NATO authorities which must have been discussed at the last council meeting, any requests were made of the Canadian government which would require any modification of our military contribution to NATO?

Mr. Pearkes: As the hon. member knows, there is an annual review which is submitted to the different countries and which will be discussed at the March meeting. My recollection is that no substantial change in the size of the forces Canada is contributing has been recommended.

Mr. Pearson: I understand that in addition to the annual review which is part of NATO's normal procedure a reassessment of NATO's military planning, tactics and strategy has been made or is being made by the NATO military authorities. Can the minister say whether or not that reassessment has been completed, or whether it remains to be discussed at the March meeting to which he has referred?

Mr. Pearkes: That remains to be discussed at the March meeting. Our commitments are constantly under review. Certain recommendations have been made by the commander, General Norstad, and those are receiving consideration of the department now.

Mr. Raymond: Will the minister tell the committee if his department has considered the offer of the city of St. Jerome to buy the drill hall in that city, which has not been in use for quite a long time?

Mr. Pearkes: I shall have to check that. If the hon. member would not mind, I will get the information later this day.

Mr. Nicholson: I have before me Hansard for July 19, 1956. Hon. members will recall that the Minister of National Defence had been over to Europe to receive honours along with other Victoria Cross holders, including the former minister of veterans affairs. While overseas he visited the Canadian forces in Europe. On his return we were discussing national defence estimates for that year, and after reviewing his visit to the troops on the continent he had some comments to make which were rather critical in tone, although he did not make any specific suggestions. He said, as reported at page 6205 of Hansard of that date:

Regarding the actual quarters and camps in which these men are located, these camps have been constructed, I think I can say, without regard for cost.

Later on, after paying tribute to the fine qualities of the troops, he said:

The only thing I question and call attention to is the fact that if you pay the price you can have practically the best of anything in this world, and Canada has been paying a heavy price for providing the excellent type of troops we have with the splendid facilities they now enjoy.

How long we should continue to keep up this great national effort is something I think the government must take into very serious consideration. There are great expenses connected with the maintenance of that brigade. Not only have we provided excellent unit camps but perhaps I might say extravagant unit camps, extravagant in the extent of ground that the various hutments occupy.

Then the minister elaborated upon what he had in mind by saying:

The married quarters are spacious and the average man in the ranks probably never before lived in such spacious accommodation as he enjoys there. I talked to the wives of some of the private soldiers and they were most enthusiastic regarding the accommodation. They only have to keep their homes clean. There are no chores to be done around the house, and that presents a little difficulty in connection with some of the growing children, who in Canada would be required to perform certain chores around the house. Those chores are not available to them in Germany because they are all performed by civilian help.

Quarters are provided for the majority of the families and there is an increasing number—one might almost say an incredible number—of children attached to all the various units. Remember, those families and those children are transported from Canada over to Germany and are brought back again. While they are in Germany special arrangements are made to provide them with the kind of food they have here in Canada. Special arrangements are made to import pasteurized milk rather than being required to use the milk which is available locally. Schools are provided, and school teachers are sent to Germany from Canada.

The present minister then asked for information as to the cost to Canada of providing these educational services. He said:

—I am going to ask the minister if he will supply this committee with accurate figures regarding the cost of transportation not only of the men, the units and their equipment from Canada to Europe, but also the cost of transporting the families from Canada to West Germany and bringing them back.

I am also going to ask the minister if he can give the committee the figures regarding the cost of either the construction or rental of these various camps—

Then later on the present minister said:

I feel that in the light of the changed circumstances it is imperative that this government review its defence policy. The emphasis is being changed from a war of arms to a war of trade. Whilst it is essential that we keep up defences in this country and in western Europe, I feel that we have to be quite certain that we are not over-insuring at the present time.

I am not suggesting that there should be any cuts or reductions made in this year's estimates, but I think between now and the time the minister presents his estimates a year hence he must review the whole situation in a most thorough and comprehensive manner. That will have its reactions on the overhead and general structure of our forces in this country. If it is desirable to make changes, then we must be quite certain that we are not spending large sums of money in providing permanent establishments for units of various forces which perhaps a year or even five years hence may not be required under the changing conditions.

He mentioned that Great Britain had made reductions of about £50 million, and certainly the present minister expressed the hope that something could be done—this was two years ago—to reduce Canada's commitments. I wonder if the minister would be good enough to bring this statement up to date and give his opinion regarding these questions he discussed so carefully two years ago. Would he be good enough to give the committee the information as to what it cost last year, say, to maintain the army establishments in Europe? Perhaps at the same time he could give the cost of the air force, because if we have the two figures together it would be helpful.

Has the minister been able to reach firm conclusions regarding the whole question as to whether the Canadian economy is able to stand the very heavy drain that disturbed the minister when he visited Germany two years ago? I wonder if he could bring those figures up to date?

Mr. Pearkes: I have visited the Canadian brigade camp in Germany since I became Minister of National Defence. I paid a short visit to the camp again in July of this year.

I can support the statements I made previously that the buildings and camps are of a very high order. Our troops are well accommodated in Germany, and I think it is necessary that they should be well accommodated in order that their morale may be retained. It is not an easy task for any troops to be stationed in a foreign country, surrounded by people who speak a different language and who, while friendly, cannot be entirely intimate; the same relationship cannot exist as if those troops were stationed in their own land.

Certain amenities have to be provided, as I indicated in the remarks the hon. member read, in the way of providing special food, special schools and that sort of thing. Those are being maintained and will be maintained as long as we keep troops in western Europe. We have a commitment with NATO that we will maintain one brigade group in Europe. Until we are relieved of that commitment I do not believe Canada would think of making a unilateral decision to withdraw those troops. In fact, I believe it is essential for the preservation of peace and for the maintenance of that unity which was shown at this last NATO meeting among all NATO countries, that we have a contingent in Europe for the time being.

It is to be hoped that when the forces of West Germany are reorganized and their training has been completed, and they have in existence the number of troops contemplated, there may then be an opportunity of reducing our commitment in Europe. I will admit it is a heavy drain on the economy, but it is an international agreement which we have made. Until it is agreed by our allies that our forces should be withdrawn, I do not see how we can make any material reduction in those forces.

Mr. Nicholson: Two years ago I think the fact that the minister referred to the flying of pasteurized milk to Germany implied that he thought, in view of the importance of the dairy industry in that part of the world, that was a type of economy that might be contemplated. Can the minister indicate whether any change has been made? Is milk still being flown from Canada to Germany? I gather that was the criticism he intended to make two years ago when he raised the question.

Mr. Pearkes: Milk is at present being obtained from Denmark under contract.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has talked about our NATO commitment, and has said that it would be inappropriate to modify that commitment without the approval of our fellow members of NATO. As he knows, of course, that commitment we share with other NATO members. Perhaps it is worth putting on the record that certain other members of NATO—and I am not criticizing them for this—by unilateral action have already modified their commitments in that regard.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think the hon. member is suggesting that Canada should make a unilateral change, is he?

Mr. Pearson: No, I am not; but I do not think we should take on commitments of a different kind or of a different nature than those which are undertaken by the other members of NATO. We are all in exactly the same position. Inasmuch as other members of NATO, for reasons which may be very good both for them and for NATO, have by their own decision found it necessary to modify their commitments, I just question the minister's categorical statement that it would be impossible or inappropriate for us to alter our commitment in any regard except after agreement with all the NATO members. I think that statement just should be put on the record.

Mr. Pearkes: I think it would be inappropriate for Canada to change her commitment without discussing it with her allies.

Mr. Pearson: Discussion is one thing; agreement is another.

Mr. Garland: I was greatly disappointed to hear the Minister of National Defence say that he knew of no plans for improving the property known as the Camp Chippewa site at North Bay during 1958. Perhaps he is not aware of the fact that his department acquired this property from the city of North Bay on the distinct understanding that they would improve it. I certainly know the people of North Bay will be greatly disappointed to learn that the new government does not intend to go ahead with that proposal or with that definite, firm understanding. I wonder whether the minister would look into this matter and attempt to give me some kind of satisfactory answer.

Mr. Pearkes: I will look into that detail and let the hon. member know; but as far as I know at the present time there is no intention of extending that project. However, I will check on the matter, make certain and let the hon. member know this afternoon.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps I might explain that when they acquired the property from the city there was a firm undertaking by his department that they would improve and clean up that area. We are building a beautiful new high school directly across the street and there is substantial housing in that area. There must be improvement in that property. I certainly hope it will be proceeded with.

Mr. Pearkes: I will look into the matter and let the hon. member know this afternoon.

Mr. Cameron: I wonder whether the minister can give us any sort of rough estimate as to what proportion of our total defence spending is involved in our NATO commitments. I realize it will be difficult to do, but perhaps we might be able to get some idea of how much is involved in the NATO commitments.

Mr. Pearkes: In round figures the cost of maintaining the air division in Europe is $90 million and the cost of maintaining the brigade is $30 million. That refers to that portion of our NATO commitments which is in Europe. Of course we have our commitments as far as NATO is concerned in connection with the navy and in connection with the air force in the defence of this North American continent, all of which are part of the general scheme for the prevention of war.

Mr. Cameron: By the minister's answer am I to understand that all Canada's defence spendings are in effect NATO commitments either in North America or in Europe?

Mr. Pearkes: Our whole defence policy is based on the deterrent against and the prevention of war, linked up with our NATO allies. We are not operating as a single country trying to provide for the defence of Canada. Our whole defence policy is related to the general NATO policy for the prevention of war.

Mr. Cameron: The minister has mentioned the portion of our defence policy which he referred to as the deterrent power. Can he tell us whether the Canadian government has at its disposal any weapon or deterrent power for the protection of North America?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Chairman. "Deterrent", did the hon. member say?

Mr. Cameron: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, certainly. I think all our forces contribute in some measure or another to the deterrent against war.

Mr. Cameron: Are there deterrents against guided missiles? Have we any deterrent against those?

Mr. Pearkes: We have no direct defence against the guided missile at the present time; that is as to a missile launched,—if it was possible, from some foreign country against this continent. There would be no direct defence against that. I do not think any direct defence exists at the present time. If the hon. member is thinking of the possibility of guided missiles being launched from ships at sea, of course we have a deterrent in our navy which would keep the launching ship, we hope, far away from our shores.

Mr. Cameron: The minister was speaking of defence, and he was speaking earlier of deterrent power which I have always understood to be the power to pursue a policy of what Mr. Dulles called massive retaliation in order to prevent an attack rather than defend against it. Have we in our possession or is there in the government's possession any method of deterrent in that form? Is it possible for us to deter a missile attack against Canadian territory?

Mr. Pearkes: The power of retaliation is in the main based with the strategic air force of the United States and with the bomber forces and the rocket forces now being developed in the United Kingdom and in western Europe. We have no part in that phase of the deterrent, namely the power of retaliation.

Mr. Cameron: Then do I take it, Mr. Chairman, that Canada is not able to play any part in the defence which is dependent on the power of retaliation to deter attacks: that we are dependent entirely on the United States and Britain. Is that correct?

Mr. Pearkes: Canada is a member of the NATO organization. We have tried to coordinate and assign to the different countries the part they are best able to play in the whole defence scheme. We have a very important part to play as far as the defence of this North American continent is concerned. We have not taken on any part with regard to the forces of retaliation other than to provide protection for those forces of retaliation by our warning system, our air defence command here on the North American continent, and naval patrols which would prevent enemy submarines from interfering with the powers of retaliation. Also there is our contribution in Europe, which acts as a shield and protection to the forces which are established in Europe and which can take part in measures of retaliation.

Mr. Cameron: Well, Mr. Chairman, I understood the minister to say that the power of deterrent by means of possible retaliation lies with the strategic air command. That does not agree with his statement that our contribution to NATO is a contribution to power, because the strategic air command is not, I understand, under the command of NATO at all but entirely under the command of the United States administration. Is that not true?

Mr. Pearkes: The deterrent must be viewed as a whole. It is in two parts. One is the defensive measures which protect the powers of retaliation and prevent the possibility of the enemy gaining successes, and the second is the power of retaliation. The launching of that retaliation is, as I think the hon. member said, a matter for decision by the President of the United States.

Mr. Cameron: And can the minister tell us in view of that fact—it would be a matter of interest to Canadians—if the United States has at its command the necessary weapons now to produce massive retaliation in the event of a guided missile attack?

Mr. Pearkes: From the information which I received at NATO I am convinced that NATO is strong today.

As to the details regarding United States plans for retaliation, that is another country and it is not for me to answer or to give details regarding that matter.

Mr. Cameron: But I must remind the minister that he has already told us in effect that we rely on the United States strategic air command for the power of retaliation as an instrument in our defence, and I do not think he can very well slide back into NATO again when he has told us that. I think it is of importance to us to know whether the strategic air command of the United States upon which we apparently rely is now in possession of weapons able to supply that protection.

Mr. Pearkes: I am confident that the United States and other NATO countries have a power of retaliation which will be very effective.

Mr. Pearson: On the point we have been discussing, Mr. Chairman, the committee will of course be aware that a great deal of detailed information on this very matter has recently been given during congressional investigations in Washington by Americans in charge of national defence. The information is all on the record there now, so there is nothing very secret about it.

I want to ask the minister whether he has any comment to make on a story which appeared in the London Free Press of December 27, and which is reported to have been based on information supplied by the directorate of public relations for the army in Ottawa. The nature of the story will be indicated by the first paragraph of this report, which I will read. It is as follows:

Second battalion, the Royal Canadian regiment, now in Wolseley barracks, (London), has been placed on constant stand-by alert to move into any trouble spot in the world if necessary, as Canada's contribution to a United Nations or NATO emergency force, it was learned today.

Mr. Pearkes: After the experience which was acquired when there came a demand to send a Canadian unit to Suez, the decision was reached to have one stand-by battalion ready for any emergency, not earmarked necessarily for the United Nations, but for any emergency.

I can give an example of the changes which are brought about by that decision. In a good many of the units—and this applied particularly when the Queen's Own was ordered to go to Suez—it was found that there were a number of men who were under the age when it was desirable that men should leave this country on active service. By earmarking one battalion for immediate readiness we have eliminated the younger men from that battalion and created a unit which would be ready for any emergency which might occur.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, the minister has made striking changes in the militia—I notice this matter may be discussed under a subheading the details of which we are now discussing—but in spite of the statements the minister has made I am convinced there is still a great deal of doubt in the minds of members of the militia as to when their units might lose their identity.

The minister has explained about the various columns into which the militia would be divided for civil defence purposes, but I still find there is doubt in the minds of the people of Canada as to which body would be replacing the militia in case of infiltration by enemy troops or the infiltration of agents into certain districts. Considering also the fact that the military training given to militia units is now greatly reduced compared with what it formerly was, I wonder if the minister would make a statement bringing us up to date on the militia today, and whether he would also give us a forecast as to future unit recognition, telling us what body he thinks would replace the militia in the event, for instance, of local skirmishes in the absence of the permanent forces.

Mr. Pearkes: There is no force contemplated to take the place of the militia. The militia has a very important role to play in the general defence program. Emphasis is being placed this year on the ability of the militia to play its part in aid of the civil power if a disaster should occur here in Canada. They are being trained especially this year in order to maintain the ability of this nation to survive if this country should come under attack. It is a realistic role, and one which can be allocated to a force which is composed of citizen soldiers many of whom are closely in touch with the civil authorities by the very nature of their civilian employment.

This does not mean they are not to continue their training in the other roles in which they might possibly be employed. All the advice I received from the best military judgment indicates that if there is another major war it will start with a period of intense nuclear activity, and this continent and this country might well be a target for hostile bombers or even for missiles if our deterrent fails. In order to be able to play their part in those preliminary phases of another war the militia are concentrating on their role in aid to the civilian power, and it is being organized so that each militia unit will be able to make a definite contribution in that regard.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, I notice that on three occasions the minister was at pains to lay emphasis on the statement that the training was for this year. I was wondering if he could forecast if this civil defence training was merely for this year, and if he was going to revert next year to the training the militia previously had?

Mr. Pearkes: No. The militia will always, as far as I can see, have a very definite role to play in the first battle for survival in this country, and we will continue to emphasize the importance of that; but we will not overlook other possible future roles, and so the know-how of the ordinary military training will have to be maintained. I must emphasize the fact that I believe military training, disciplined troops, would have a tremendous effect in restoring order in an area which had been under attack or which had met with some catastrophe. The appearance of an organized, disciplined, uniformed body would do more to restore morale than almost anything else. Therefore we must concentrate part of the militia's training toward the relief of such a catastrophe on the importance of discipline and military training as such.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that when I had the responsibility for civil defence I always found my hon. friend very objective and responsible with regard to the very difficult problem involved in trying to provide for the defence of the civilian population against modern potential warfare. While I realize that civil defence does not come under the purview of the Minister of National Defence, the responsibility of the two departments in this particular is so related that I do not think it inappropriate to ask the Minister of National Defence one or two questions having to do directly with civil defence. I would hope certainly that before the conclusion of this session we could anticipate some statement by the responsible minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, with respect to this difficult question of civil defence.

The suggestion has been made, of course, that the only effective way of providing for civil defence is through the use of mobile columns provided largely from the militia itself. This view is predicated upon an alleged practice that has been embarked upon in the United Kingdom. As I am sure my hon. friend knows, the extent of the use of these mobile columns in the United Kingdom has been greatly exaggerated. I think it would be well, if the minister feels that is the case, if he would indicate this; because there are many thousands of people in Canada interested in civil defence who are somewhat frustrated and who are influenced to some degree by the suggestion that the proper way to provide for civil defence is through the use of the militia.

I think it is a well known fact that it had been rather well established at least a year before the previous government vacated office that the militia, the reserve forces and the armed forces generally would be indoctrinated to a much greater extent than heretofore in the matter of civil defence. It would be useful for the minister to indicate what increased use is being made by the armed forces, for instance, of the civil defence college, of the training received there; what additional civil defence training is afforded the armed forces at the Royal Military College or elsewhere, to indicate an increasing realization by the armed forces of the responsibility for civil defence and the part the armed forces can play in this very difficult matter.

It might also be useful for the minister to indicate his views, if he is now in a position to do so—and I am not pressing him because I know the difficulty—about the practicality of evacuation as a defence against atomic and thermonuclear warfare. He might indicate, too, what is the view of the Department of National Defence with regard to civil defence in so far as it has to do with the intercontinental ballistic missile, and what is the latest thinking.

I raise these questions not in a critical way, because this is too important a matter to raise for the purpose of political embarrassment. This is an extremely difficult problem, and I know it perhaps as well as anyone in this house. It seems to me that the government does have a direct responsibility if we are spending these huge sums of money for the maintenance of our freedom and integrity—and I see no alternative to our so doing—as an insurance premium, as the leader of the opposition often used to say about the cost of NATO. By the same process of reasoning it must be presumed that the civilian population of the country must be afforded some measure of defence against the terrible potential that could exist in modern warfare.

Does the minister think that the basic lines of civilian defence pursued in this country by the provinces, the federal government and the municipalities, relying upon the municipalities, relying upon the municipality as the main arm with the co-ordinated effort of government is the right course? If it is not, do my hon. friends have some changes in mind? Perhaps this would be the appropriate moment for the Minister of National Defence to give us the benefit of his thinking and of his assessment since he became the minister responsible for national defence.

Mr. Pearkes: I have always emphasized the fact that the role which the militia is to play in civil defence is that of aid to the civil power. I take exception to the remark —perhaps it was not intentional—made by the hon. member that mobile columns were the only form of defence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the United Kingdom. I was referring to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the situation is quite different here owing to the distance between cities. I can see a great value in having an organized body of militiamen capable of moving into an adjacent area which has been destroyed by enemy action or by some act of God. We are organizing those columns, of which there will be approximately 50 distributed across the country, consisting of reconnaissance companies, rescue companies, communications companies, traffic control companies and that sort of thing. Each militia unit will be given a definite quota of sub-units ready to move into any adjacent area which has had the misfortune of being attacked or, if there are any survivors after an attack in their own particular area, to be there to give aid.

But there is no basic change in the concept of the role of the militia to aid the civil power. I want to emphasize that point. The militia is not taking over civil defence. The responsibility for civil defence still rests with the provinces and the municipalities. I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare will support that contention when he speaks.

We are stepping up the training of the militia and the regular army in their duties in connection with civil defence, and we are increasing the attendance at courses at the Arnprior civil defence college. There is to be a staff course conducted there, a sort of staff study, between the senior militia officers and the senior officials of civil defence in order to ensure that the two organizations work in the closest possible harmony.

The Chairman: Before we proceed further to consider the heading "Canadian army, militia" may I assume that the discussion under the heading "Canadian army, regular" has been concluded.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: If not, shall we consider both headings together?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Which two headings?

The Chairman: Militia and Canadian army, regular.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, the minister indicated in his reply a few moments ago that he recognized the real importance of the reserve units as they are spread out across the country. I am sure the minister is aware of the very excellent unit of the Royal Canadian Engineers established in the town of Kimberley. It is a mining community where a large percentage of the employees are engineers and others with mechanical training.

This unit is up to full strength but has completely inadequate facilities. They are renting an old hall which, while it has been of some use, has got well beyond its usefulness. For some time we have been pressing for an armoury. In addition, the unit has to pay high rent for storage of the equipment, trucks and the various armaments.

I was assured by the former minister that plans were well in hand for the establishment of an armoury in Kimberley for this very important unit. I have not seen any evidence of any progress. Can the minister tell me what the position is today?

Mr. Pearkes: The whole question of the construction of new armouries is under review at the present time, and the desirability of constructing an armoury at Kimberley is part of that review.

Mr. Byrne: I am sure the minister will agree that it is important to maintain such a unit as this, which is highly trained in engineering, and that he should give primary consideration to an armoury there.

The Chairman: Shall the headings "Canadian army, regular and militia" carry?

Mr. Nicholson: It is one o'clock.

Mr. Deniset: I have one or two questions to ask on the militia heading but I am sure it will take more than one minute to answer them. Will you call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Deniset: Mr. Chairman, I have several questions to ask the Minister of National Defence, particularly with regard to the militia. Some of them were already answered this morning in reply to questions asked by various members on this side of the house. I was very much interested in hearing the comments of the minister this morning on the role of the militia. Before I proceed to ask questions I should like to give my understanding of what the minister said this morning in order that we will be able to proceed on a firm basis. I believe the minister stated that the militia is to continue in its role of an aid to the civil power. He stated further that the militia is not taking over civil defence but that because of its role as an aid to the civil power it is necessary for the militia to step up its training in civil defence and that this is actually being done. If I am wrong up to this point I should like the minister to correct me.

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct.

Mr. Deniset: On the other hand, the militia is not to continue its old role of providing reserves in time of war but is being reorganized into mobile columns.

Mr. Pearkes: No, that is not correct. I have said that the secondary or alternative role of the militia will be to be prepared to supply reinforcements if ever required in time of war.

Mr. Deniset: I thank the minister for the correction. I wanted to have the record straight. Is it correct that the purpose of the additional role of the militia involving reorganization into mobile columns is so that these columns can be shifted to adjacent theatres of action inside of Canada as those theatres may develop if war comes to Canada?

Mr. Pearkes: The militia is not being reorganized into support columns. The militia units are being called upon to earmark certain personnel in order to supply some units to the support columns. Let us take the Winnipeg unit. The Winnipeg Rifles might be asked to supply two rescue companies. The Fort Garry Horse might be asked to supply a reconnaissance company for the support column in Winnipeg. The support column in Winnipeg might be required to render aid, shall we say, to the northern part of Winnipeg which perhaps had suffered a disaster or might be moved to Port Arthur or anywhere else where their assistance might be required.

Mr. Deniset: I thank the minister very much for his explanation. I think the matter has been clarified. Would the minister also consider that these militia units, in addition to being mobile columns, might also become islands of resistance in case of Canada being overrun by an enemy? The immensity of this country makes it impossible for any enemy to overrun it everywhere at the same time. Having regard to the fact that the enemy might be subjected to attacks from our own bases or bases of our allies and might be subjected to being partially overrun, it would seem to me that by forming islands of resistance throughout the North American continent we could establish the core or the backbone, if you wish, of phase No. 2 in any world war. I am not one who believes in a war that will last only a few hours. The minister knows very well that unless you are dead they have to come and get you if you still want to fight. I should like to hear the opinion of the minister with regard to using the militia units as islands of resistance.

Mr. Pearkes: I am glad to say that the prospect of Canada or any part of Canada being overrun by invading forces is extremely remote. It would only occur after we had lost the battle of survival. Under those circumstances militia units and any other organized bodies would have to continue the struggle for survival and if any militia personnel were left they would be in a position to offer such centres of resistance as the hon. member has described. Therefore they are continuing their strictly military training as well as concentrating on training to render aid to the civil power during the first and what we believe is the crucial stage of the battle for survival.

Mr. Deniset: I thank the minister again for his clarification. Would the minister tell us whether the savings which were announced and which I understand are created by a reduction of militia activity appear anywhere in the estimates now under review?

Mr. Pearkes: They will be reflected in the estimates for next year. There is one point I should like to emphasize. Canada now has a regular force of 49,000 soldiers. These men are serving for periods of three years and are then returning to civilian life as trained men. One can imagine that in the event of an emergency large numbers of these men, particularly those who had left the service more recently, would return to their units. Therefore there is now a much greater reserve of trained men in Canada, exclusive of the militia, than there has ever been before.

Mr. Deniset: I would agree with the minister on that count as long as the militia units remain as active as possible wherever they are situated. If these men coming out from the regular forces have nowhere to go they will return to their civilian occupations and what they have learned in the armed forces will be lost. I should like to comment on that particular subject. Great concern has been expressed throughout the country about the unknown or somewhat unstable policy of the government regarding the militia. We have had to ask many questions on the subject during the question period and we are still asking questions. To use the minister's words, the minister said that the role of the militia used to be glamorous, phony or impractical, and I feel that the house and the Canadian people are justified in requesting an explanation from the minister of these words which he himself used in the house.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister never said that the role of the militia had ever been glamorous or phony. There is no glamour about modern war, none whatever. It would be purely phony to hold out to the militia the prospect of going over in the early days of a conflict to supply reinforcements to a European theatre of war.

Mr. Deniset: I could not agree more with the last part of the minister's remarks. There could be nothing more phony than sending the militia abroad in time of war, unless it were a protracted war which we could not contemplate. I could not agree more with his earlier statements. However, I should like to quote from Hansard of October 16, 1957, page 38, when the minister was being asked a question about the militia. He said:

> That may not be as glamorous a role as some of the other ones which have in the past been carried out by the militia, but I am confident that the militia will render the same patriotic service in this role as it has always done, rather than seeking some phony, glamorous role which hardly exists.

Those are the words the minister pronounced in the house.

Mr. Pearkes: There is no suggestion in those words that the militia has ever been asked to carry out any phony role. There was a glamorous role. Certainly, there was a certain amount of glamour to war in bygone days. There is no glamour in war today.

Mr. Deniset: There again, I could not agree more with the minister. There is no glamour about war. Certainly nobody wants to go to war. If we are discussing this matter at the present time, it is because we do not want any war. After all, the whole Department of National Defence is insurance for peace. But the minister is back-tracking on this statement which I quoted from Hansard. I will give him credit for that.

An hon. Member: He did not back-track at all.

An hon. Member: If it was back-tracking.

Mr. Deniset: The minister said, again at page 38 of Hansard:

> There is no suggestion of the militia having carried out in the past any role that could be considered as phony or glamorous, but there might be roles carried out in the future which would not be practical.

Later on, the minister said—

Mr. Hodgson: The minister told us what he said.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): You get up and make a speech on this if you want to.

Mr. Hodgson: What he is reading is what the minister has said—

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): Oh, shut up.

Mr. Hodgson: You come over and try to make me shut up. I would like about two minutes with you—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Deniset: Mr. Chairman, on October 22 I quoted these remarks in the house, and then I said this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deniset: It would seem that I am hitting below the belt because I can hear noise from the other side. I said this as recorded at page 250 of Hansard for October 22, 1957:

> I feel that the thousands of Canadian people who have sacrificed so many evenings, so many weekends and so many vacations during the summer time, purely as a result of devotion to duty to carry out training with the militia, deserve an explanation, and I trust this explanation will be forthcoming sooner than in mere due course.

Now, today we are gradually getting some explanation.

Mr. Cameron: I wonder if the minister had an opportunity during the luncheon recess to look at today's copy of the Ottawa Citizen? If so, did he see in it a letter by Major General W. H. S. Macklin, retired, who is discussing a panel discussion which had taken place on T.V., and said:

> My own wish, which wasn't debated either, was for a new and realistic defence policy for 1958.
> In pursuit of our present sterile policy we have blown in billions on defence year after year. And yet as of new year's 1958, we are defenceless. We have no defence whatever against the only direct attack that can be delivered on us—a nuclear attack.

We have only a deterrent, to maintain which we have already sacrificed every vestige of sovereign power to stay neutral as Dr. Whitton suggested we should do. Even the deterrent is now disastrously weakened by the Russian rocket.

For my part, in the absence of a new, and more objective defence policy, I should be delighted to take on the job of keeping Canada in her present helpless state for only nine hundred million per year, instead of the eighteen hundred millions or more that we have been dumping into the quicksands of the defence department year by year in the past.

I imagine, Mr. Chairman, that the minister will have a better estimate than I have of the authority with which General Macklin speaks. Both of them being major generals they should have a fair estimate of each other's ability. I should like to ask the minister if he agrees, in the first place, with General Macklin's statement that:

We have no defence whatever against the only direct attack that can be delivered on us—a nuclear attack.

I should like to ask him if he agrees that is the only sort of attack to which we could be subjected. If so, does he seriously contend that there is any method by which, at the present time, Canada or her allies could have a deterrent which might prevent such an attack. I know this morning he told me that they did have a means of protecting the bases from which deterrent attacks could be launched. I would think that is rather questionable in the light of his further statement that there is no defence against the intercontinental guided missile, no method by which the launching sites for deterrents against them could be protected. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the minister would care to comment on General Macklin's rather forthright statement that we have literally no defence, and at the moment we are dumping billions down the drain in pursuit of the same sterile policies?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I thought we were dealing with the details of the army estimates. This question gets back again into the realm of general policy. In so far as the statement of General Macklin is concerned, I did not have an opportunity of reading it during the luncheon hour. I have known General Macklin for a period of 30 years or more, and I think I am in a position to assess the reliability of the information that he sometimes gives to the general public through newspaper reports. I disagree entirely with him that we are in a helpless state. The whole tenor of the NATO conference was that we are speaking from a position of strength. NATO, of which Canada is a partner and an important partner, speaks not from weakness, not from craven fear, not with any idea of appeasement, but from strength and in the knowledge that Russia is fully aware of the strength that there is in the powers of retaliation. That is our hope for peace. So long as we keep up that strength I give the Russians sufficient credit for common sense that they are not going to attempt to attack this country. We count, for the preservation of peace, on the knowledge that we are prepared, if necessary and if Russia violates the present peace conditions—the west has no thought of offensive operations—we are yet in a position to strike back in a way that certainly would not make it worth Russia's while to do that.

I admit that we have no direct defence at the present time against the intercontinental missile, nor has Russia got any strength in intercontinental missiles at the present time. Perhaps by the time Russia has developed strength which might make her foolhardy enough to attack this country we shall have the answer to the intercontinental missile. But our hope for peace today rests on the power of our alliance, on the deterrent that that alliance is able to provide, and on the means of retaliation if Russia is so indiscreet as to start a war.

Mr. Nicholson: Earlier this morning the minister was kind enough to indicate that our expenditure to maintain the army in Europe was about $30 million and for the air force, $90 million. Again, if I may, I should like to refer him to the speech he delivered in July, 1956 in which he suggested, as recorded at the bottom of page 6207 of Hansard of that year:

I am not suggesting that there should be any cuts or reductions made in this year's estimates, but I think between now and the time the minister presents his estimates a year hence he must review the whole situation in a most thorough and comprehensive manner.

I would remind him that his colleagues the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Secretary of State supported him two years ago in expressing the hope at least that some relief could be seen in the future toward reducing these very heavy expenditures. Now that the minister has been in charge of the department for six months I wonder if he could indicate whether any effective savings have been made in connection with the retaining of the armed services in Europe. While we are not discussing the air force at the moment, these two items total $120 million. While the minister was very careful two years ago to indicate that no intelligent person would suggest that those who are serving Canada in Europe should have their pay and allowances or other services cut, the whole tenor of the minister's remarks two years ago indicated that $120 million a year was a very heavy drain on the Canadian economy and that something should be done to reduce this amount. Could the minister indicate what has happened in the last 12 months or in the year 1957? Has there been any effective reduction in our expenditure with respect to maintaining the army and the air force in Europe?

Mr. Pearkes: This applies to the air force. Quite recently arrangements have been made to extend the period of service of the personnel in Europe, thereby eliminating the amount of transportation and the cost of continually changing the personnel. They were on a basis of a two-year term of service. But now, where there is any desire on the part of an individual or if the individual has no objection, his period of service is to be extended to three or four years. We are considering the possibility of introducing a similar sort of rotation with respect to the army. Wherever possible we have been reducing administrative costs, which reductions have enabled us to cover the increases which it was desirable to pay to the troops in the way of pay and allowances. But I admit frankly that it is a heavy drain on the Canadian economy to keep these forces in Europe. However it is an obligation that we have assumed. We believe it is money well spent in order to preserve the peace of the world.

Mr. Nicholson: Two years ago the minister, as a private member and as an ex-soldier, expressed the considered opinion that these items should be carefully reviewed.

Mr. Pearkes: They have been carefully reviewed.

Mr. Nicholson: Can the minister indicate the percentage of the reduction in expenses? He has had six months as minister. He gave us roughly the figure of $120 million a year as what it has been costing. Could he indicate in percentages roughly the savings that are going to be effected as a result of the careful survey to which he has referred? Can he give us the total amount or the percentage of reduction that he anticipates?

Mr. Pearkes: We have not it in detail yet. The end of the year will reflect what savings we have been able to make. If it is possible to make any savings in that respect, they will be reflected in next year's estimates.

Mr. Garland: This morning when we were discussing the matter of improving the site at Camp Chippewa the minister indicated he might give me an answer after lunch.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. During the luncheon hour I was able to make some inquiries with regard to Chippewa. I understand that the buildings at that camp, which was established during the Korean crisis, are owned by the Department of National Defence but that the land is owned by the city of North Bay. It has been agreed that the Department of National Defence will return part of the land to the city and will purchase the remainder. It has also been agreed that there will be carried out certain improvements, which I have described this morning more or less as general maintenance, to the buildings and their surroundings. I am informed that the plans have not yet been finalized for these improvements but that as soon as they are finalized the necessary improvements and developments of the surroundings will be undertaken.

Mr. Garland: I should like to thank the minister for this information. With that thanks I should like also to couple the suggestion that perhaps he and his officials could expedite the matter. At the present time there are over 2,300 unemployed in our city. This figure is comparable to 900 unemployed exactly a year ago. My point in saying that is this. The majority of the people who are unemployed in our area at the present time are from the construction trades. If some of this work could be carried out at an early date I think it might be helpful.

Mr. Pearkes: I will certainly look into that matter and see whether we can start the work at an early date. We should like to take advantage of any possible opportunity to relieve unemployment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At the bottom of page 330 and at the top of page 331 there are listed a number of positions simply under the title "assistants". The salaries or wages paid to these assistants vary from about $1,100 at Belgrade to over $4,000 at Washington. Can the minister say what kind of assistants these persons are or what sort of work it is which they do for these varying rates of pay?

Mr. Pearkes: In the main they are civilian clerks and stenographers who are attached to the military attaches at these various stations. I believe that is correct.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What kind of a person would be working for $1,100 a year?

Mr. Pearkes: It would depend entirely on the country. In the main—I do not say exclusively—they are nationals of the countries in which they are employed.

Mr. Haidasz: I note that in the estimates for the navy there is listed an item "All other expenditures, $1,125,000" and for the army, $4,256,000.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he is now talking about a navy item which was passed yesterday.

Mr. Haidasz: Then I will restrict myself to the item for the army, "All other expenditures, $4,256,000". If possible, could the minister itemize this statement?

Mr. Pearkes: The main items under that heading are laundry and dry cleaning. There is an item for $1,069,000 under that. There is also photography and aerial mapping—a large program of mapping is carried out—and that is an item amounting to $1,070,000. There are special grants for uniforms, equipment for bands, compensation for loss of property and various miscellaneous items amounting to $584,730, making a total of $4,250,000. These are a large number of miscellaneous items not otherwise classified.

The Deputy Chairman: That brings us to the Northwest highway system on page 335, the last item under "Army". Is it agreed that we proceed on that basis?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder whether the minister could bring us up to date with regard to any recent developments in the Northwest highway system, particularly with regard to the matter of the bridge replacement.

Mr. Pearkes: Unfortunately the bridge over the Peace river between Dawson Creek and Fort St. John was washed out as a result of very heavy rains in the early fall and the general erosion of the north bank. This bridge, it will be recalled, was built by United States engineers during the war. It has been necessary to make temporary arrangements in order that the traffic in the area round Fort St. John and Dawson Creek might be continued. It is mainly civilian traffic; there is very little army traffic going over that portion of the highway at the present time. By various means and by making temporary arrangements for the P.G.E. bridge, thanks to the co-operation of the British Columbia government traffic has been resumed. A small additional bridge had to be built over the Pine river so that traffic could get to the south end of the P.G.E. bridge. A board of consultants has now been established under the chairmanship of Dr. P. L. Pratley, a well-known Montreal engineering consultant, Mr. H. H. Minshall, a Vancouver consultant, Mr. A. B. Sanderson of Victoria, and Mr. L. G. Grimble of Edmonton, all of whom are well known engineering consultants.

They have held one meeting already in Ottawa and the second meeting is to take place on January 8 in Vancouver. It is hoped they will produce a design for a more suitable type of bridge than the one which has been in existence, and as soon as a design has been produced it is the intention of the department to call for tenders and to restore the bridge at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have from time to time seen press reports about certain plans for hard surfacing of certain portions of the Alaska highway—

Mr. Pearkes: Tenders have been let for that portion of the highway between Dawson Creek and Fort St. John, and the work is now in progress.

Mr. Barnett: Has that portion of the highway been turned over to the province of British Columbia, or will it remain under the jurisdiction of the Northwest highway authorities?

Mr. Pearkes: It will remain under the jurisdiction of the federal government until it has been hard surfaced and then it is hoped that discussions will take place with the province of British Columbia to see whether the province would be willing to take over that portion of the highway, which is of very little defence value at the present time, it being used mainly for commercial operations.

Mr. Barnett: Is the Department of National Defence bearing the entire cost of the hard surfacing program?

Mr. Pearkes: The Department of National Defence is bearing the entire cost of the surfacing of the highway because it was in the original agreement that we had to maintain this highway and it has been found that owing to the very heavy wear and tear on the gravel highway the cost of keeping it gravelled, and repairing it, was more than the over-all cost of hard surfacing.

Mr. Barnett: Is there any study under way on the question of proceeding with a surfacing program farther north on the highway?

Mr. Pearkes: No, there is not the same heavy traffic north of Fort St. John as there is between Fort St. John and Dawson Creek.

The Deputy Chairman: We are now proceeding to the item concerning defence services, air, at the top of page 339, an item which continues until about half way down the page on page 346.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, perhaps this is the occasion on which to ask some questions in the hope of receiving some clarification in regard to North American air defence headquarters, on NORAD as it is more popularly known. Earlier questions on this matter, both in the house and in the committee on external affairs, have made it clear that there is no political agreement between the two governments laying down the principles upon which this headquarters should operate, and the relationship of the headquarters to the two governments, and that omission seems to us to be a very notable one because of the importance of this development, an importance which is perhaps as much political as it is military.

We did learn at one stage that the headquarters was operating under an interim arrangement. Then later on December 5 the minister pointed out, as recorded in Hansard at page 1941, that this was not even an interim arrangement in the sense that anything had been put down on paper to govern this matter. He said he would prefer to call the arrangement "interim discussions rather than notes" and he went on to say there had been no passing of any formal notes at all, but there had been visits to the government of the United States.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that steps are, however, being taken to work out a political arrangement which would govern this very important development, and I should like as my first question to ask the minister what progress has been made in regard to such a political arrangement and whether it has yet been concluded. The minister indicated at one stage, I believe, a hope that it would be concluded by the beginning of the year. Can he tell the committee what progress has been made in this matter?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. I saw Air Marshall Slemon who visited me in Ottawa a few days ago and he said that progress is being made in the working out of these notes. There has already been a draft note submitted which we have sent back to Washington with certain comments. The last information I received was that this matter would be discussed by the United States joint staffs not before January 10.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, is this intergovernmental agreement which by its very nature would have to be a political agreement being worked out merely by the two defence departments of the governments concerned?

Mr. Pearkes: No, no. They are drawing up first drafts which of course will be submitted to the governments. As the hon. gentleman knows these international agreements take a surprisingly long time.

Mr. Pearson: That is true, Mr. Chairman, but there has been a period of six months in which to conclude this agreement because the headquarters has been in operation for six months without any agreement interim or otherwise.

May I ask another question. It was stated in this house by the Prime Minister before the recess that as a result of the NATO council meeting in Paris "NORAD had become an integral part of the NATO military structure". Those were the words used. I would be grateful if the minister would explain how that has been done and what is the actual relationship then between NORAD and NATO which makes it an integral part of the NATO military structure which I must say was surprising news to me?

Mr. Pearkes: As the hon. gentleman will recall when the NATO organization was first set up there were I think five regional areas established one of which was the Canada-United States regional planning group. NORAD is definitely under that Canada-United States regional planning group. They report to that Canada-United States regional planning group. That regional planning group differs from the organization in Europe in that it does not have a supreme commander. It consists of the chiefs of staffs of the two countries, Canada and the United States. It has never been considered desirable either by this government or by the previous government to appoint a supreme commander of that particular area. Therefore you have this regional planning group consisting of the chiefs of staff of Canada and the chiefs of staff of the United States. They report to the military committee of NATO and they in turn report to their respective governments and in that way NORAD is definitely a part of the NATO structure.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, what the minister has stated and stated very clearly is of course not new. That has been the situation now for some years. But there is a very great difference as the minister will undoubtedly appreciate—and indeed he has already indicated that there is a difference—between a NATO command and the Canada-United States planning group. There is no similarity between the two except in the sense that the planning group, as the minister pointed out, does report annually its activities to the military committee of NATO, but to give the impression that the Canada-United States planning group and NORAD under that group is in the same relationship to NATO as a NATO command is of course misleading.

Only yesterday I received through the courtesy of the secretary general of NATO an end of the year publication called "Facts about NATO" in which the following paragraph occurs:

A Canada-United States regional planning group has existed ever since the signing of the Ogdensburg Agreement in 1940 by Canada and the United States. It was a consultative body which, after having functioned successfully during world war II, was asked in 1949 to put forward, within the framework of over-all NATO strategy, defence plans for the Canada-United States area. It is mainly concerned with questions of defence against air attack in the Arctic regions and with the establishment of a vast radar network stretching from Alaska to Newfoundland. The Arctic defence operation is a joint Canadian-United States effort, and the stations may be manned by Canadian or United States staff, or by combined Canadian-United States personnel.

The NATO report then goes on to say:

The Canada-United States regional planning group has no assigned forces and is not a command in the real sense of the word. Its primary task is to work out a common strategy for the North American area.

The NATO commands are definitely under the control of the NATO organization and not only report to but receive political and military guidance from the NATO organization, but NORAD of course has no relationship of that kind to NATO as I am sure my hon. friend will admit because he himself stated that in the house on December 5, 1957, as recorded at page 1899 of Hansard when he said:

The officer appointed to fill the position of commander in chief, North American air defence, was made responsible to the governments of both countries for the air defence of North America, and to report directly to the United States joint chiefs of staff and the Canadian chiefs of staff committee. All plans for the deployment and employment of air defence forces must be approved by the chiefs of staff and, when necessary, by the governments of both countries.

There is no reference, of course, to NATO in that paragraph and therefore the impression that may have been created by the words of the Prime Minister that NORAD is now an integral part of NATO seems to me to be an inaccurate one. The fact is, of course, that NORAD, as I understand it, does not derive its authority in any way, shape or form from NATO. To follow that up and arising out of the paragraph which I have just read from the statement the minister gave the house on December 5 I would like to ask him the following questions.

Does the commander or the deputy commander of NORAD receive his appointment from any NATO agency? The answer to this is obvious from what the minister has already said. Secondly, does the commander or the deputy commander of NORAD derive his authority from the NATO council or any other NATO agency? If the answers to those two questions are in the negative, as I am sure they are judging from the minister's previous statement, what then is the source of the authority and command of the NORAD commander and deputy commander? Perhaps the minister might reply to those questions.

Mr. Pearkes: The commander of NORAD, General Partridge, of course was appointed by the United States in exactly the same way as the deputy commander, Air Marshal Slemon, was appointed by this government. Both of them are working together at Colorado Springs. The concept of this North American defence command is very definitely part of the whole NATO attempt to prevent war developing.

I think it is utterly impossible to separate the defence of the North American continent from the rest of the NATO defence plan. This command has been set up under the general Canada-United States planning group. As the hon. gentleman said, that planning group has been set up ever since NATO was started and I understand that one of the objects of all of these planning groups and of all of these regional planning groups was the protection of the particular area with which they were concerned. It is only a later development that commanders-in-chief were appointed for some of the other commands. That did not exist, I believe, when the regional pacts were first started and they have gradually developed.

As I pointed out, there is no commander-in-chief of the Canada-United States pact, but the joint chiefs of staff of Canada and of the United States act in that capacity and refer not only to their own governments but to the military committees of NATO. I think the chain of command is identical with the chain of command of some subordinate commander in the European force who, instead of reporting to a committee, owing to the particular situation existing in the group, reports to the commander-in-chief, General Norstad, who in turn reports to the military committee. The chain of command is identical; the purposes are identical; but it has not yet been considered desirable to establish a supreme commander of the Canadian-United States regional pact.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I quite agree that these various aspects of defence are interdependent and indeed they are indivisible. One of my preoccupations with this matter is that action has not been taken to bring this particular command into closer relationship with the NATO command.

The minister had indicated that there is really no difference in essence between the NATO command as such and this North American air defence organization but he knows that in relation to the NATO command we in this parliament know exactly where we stand. There was a political agreement between governments establishing NATO and its commands. That agreement was discussed and approved in this house and as a result of that approval Canadian forces were allocated to a NATO commander appointed by NATO though on the recommendation, in so far as SACEUR is concerned, of the United States government. It was all done in a perfectly regular parliamentary way with a political foundation for the action which we took.

As I understand it, nothing like that has happened in so far as NORAD is concerned. It was taken by governmental action without any political agreement, though one is being worked out now. It was taken without bringing this particular command into any other relationship with NATO than that, and it is a very tenuous relationship, with all respect to the minister, which comes through its association with the United States-Canada planning group. I think it is quite misleading to give the impression that the same kind of action was taken in setting up NORAD as was taken in setting up SACEUR. We, of course, participate in both. We know where we stand in one; we do not know where we stand—at least, I do not know where we stand—in the other.

For instance, the minister has already said in this house that General Partridge, the commander of NORAD, a commander—I may be wrong in this—who I believe has no obligation whatever to report to any NATO agency as has general Norstad; and, whose deputy is a Canadian, has operational control over the air forces allocated for the defence of North America, whether they are United States or Canadian air forces. That being the case, surely it is important for us to know from what source this commander derives the authority which gives him operational command over Canadian forces. We know the source of that authority in the case of General Norstad and the NATO command; we do not know it in the case of NORAD.

General Partridge, however, seems himself to know the source of his own authority because he has stated that the President of the United States has given his approval to use, without reference to anybody, any weapons at his disposal if there is a hostile aircraft in the sky. That is what General Partridge said as I read it from an interview he gave a few weeks ago. One of the weapons that General Partridge has at his disposal is the Royal Canadian Air Force. Therefore I would like to know whether General Partridge has the same authority from the Canadian government and how he got it. Furthermore, I would like to know whether the deputy commander, Air Marshal Slemon, if he were in charge, and he would be in charge if General Partridge were away, has exactly the same authority and command over United States operational forces as has General Partridge.

Mr. Pearkes: I can assure the hon. member at once that Air Marshal Slemon is in every respect the deputy commander. If General Partridge is away Air Marshal Slemon has full control of the United States air force designed for the defence of the North American continent.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister answer my other question? What is the source of General Partridge's authority and his operational control over Canadian forces?

Mr. Pearkes: That will be laid out in detail in the formal note. At the present time we are operating, as the hon. member said, on an oral and verbal agreement. The two commanders are there. They are getting acquainted with each other and it is very important that these two staffs should work in together. There is, I am assured from what Air Marshal Slemon told me, the greatest possible harmony and co-operation between the two groups at Colorado Springs. If anything happened within the next day or two that headquarters would be in a position to render a defence of this country which could never have been achieved, the magnitude of it could never have been achieved, if there had not been an integrated command.

Mr. Pearson: I agree with the minister that it is of the very greatest importance that these two forces should work together in harmony and that they should be able to work swiftly in an emergency. I am sure there is no difference between us on that score. I do not necessarily agree with him, however, in his last observation that they are now in a position to act so much more swiftly and effectively than they were before NORAD was set up.

Mr. Pearkes: They are.

Mr. Pearson: As the minister knows, before NORAD was established there were very effective arrangements in connection with co-operation between the air defence forces of the two countries and I cannot follow the minister when he seems to indicate that all of this can be done—though it is very important that it should be done—merely by an oral or verbal arrangement between members of the two governments. That seems to me to be a very shaky basis for the kind of co-operation which is so important both militarily and politically.

Mr. Pearkes: As I have explained, those oral conversations and agreements will be confirmed by a formal note which will be placed before parliament in due course.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to indicate once again our support of the concern which has been expressed by the hon. member for Algoma East. We agree that it is desirable to have joint defence of these two countries and that the necessary arrangements should be worked out. But we also feel it is extremely important that the proper political basis be established for any action that might be taken by such a joint defence force. I too was interested in the words that the Prime Minister used in this connection on December 21 after his return from Paris, and I think it is worthwhile to place on the record what he said on that occasion. To do so is to point up the fact to which the hon. member for Algoma East has already referred, namely that in our view there is something a bit misleading in these remarks. This is what the Prime Minister said as found on page 2721 of Hansard:

> I refer to the arrangements we made with the United States government for the integrated air defence of North America under what is called NORAD. I want to re-emphasize that I pointed out there, and it was accepted as a fact, that these integrated forces are an integral part of the NATO military structure in the Canada-United States region; that there is a committee of NATO dealing with Canada-United States relations in this regard, and that anything we have done has been reported to the standing group and that course will be followed in the future. The NATO council will have full reports on everything we do, similar to the practice followed in all other NATO military commands.

These words, Mr. Chairman, suggest that there is a similarity between the control over NORAD and the control over other NATO commands such as SACEUR. Yet when one reads these words closely it is quite clear that there is a difference. The Prime Minister did not allege in his remarks that NORAD derives its authority from NATO as is the case with General Norstad who is in charge in Europe but merely that Canada and the United States had vis-a-vis NORAD reported to the Canada-United States political group and in turn reported to NATO. It is one thing to derive authority from a civilian body such as the NATO council and it is another thing simply to report the activities of a military group to such a body.

It seems to me that in this matter we are dealing with something that is extremely important and very basic to our whole democratic approach. Some of us have been in the house long enough to remember the days of the slogan that the parliament of Canada will decide what Canada will do so far as any outbreak of war is concerned. We remember how Mr. King used to give us that assurance very categorically. That, of course, was in the days when wars were launched or declared by nations as individuals. Nevertheless, so long as that was the situation we preserved parliamentary control over this country going to war by means of a section in the National Defence Act which requires that if the government of the day puts troops on active service outside of Canada parliament, if it is not then in session, must be called within a certain number of days. In other words, parliament must be given the opportunity to approve or otherwise of the action of the government which is superior to the armed forces.

We, of course, had that in the case of the outbreak of war in 1939. As a matter of fact, parliament was called within a day or so of the troops being put on active service. We also had it at the time troops were sent to Korea. An order in council was passed and parliament was summoned within the required length of time. Orders in council were passed when troups were sent to Europe under NATO, and so on. In other words, in these developing arrangements we have held to the principle that the civilian authority is superior to the military authority.

In the case of NATO we got away a bit from the necessity of parliament being called in the event that something should happen in Europe. Our troops are already there but they are over there under a political command to which parliament has agreed because we have had the NATO treaty before the House of Commons.

When we come to the situation we are now discussing, the possibility of joint operational activities on the part of the United States and Canadian air forces, these could happen by the decision of a United States general or a Canadian air marshal. They could happen because of discussions that have taken place not even at the departmental level but between military people in these two countries without parliament having agreed in advance to the necessary arrangements.

It seems to me that even the exchange of notes that the minister says will take place in due course is not sufficient. It seems to me that we must either have the situation that we had in years gone by whereby parliament is summoned if our forces have been put on active service or we must have an agreement in advance such as the approval by parliament of the North Atlantic treaty. In the light of the seriousness of this whole matter I feel that the assurances the minister has given still are not satisfactory. Like the hon. member for Algoma East, we agree that these arrangements have to be made. We agree as to the desirability of joint defence. But we also emphasize very strongly the need of maintaining civilian political authority over the military operations.

When General Norstad visited this country a few months ago and spoke both publicly and privately at various places in Ottawa he made it very clear that he has military authority only because he derives that authority from NATO. The minister has not yet demonstrated to us that General Partridge and Air Marshal Slemon draw their military authority from any civilian or political group. It is not satisfactory to say that they get their authority from the joint chiefs of staff of the two countries. The minister says that in the event of action there might be a telephone call to Washington or Ottawa but the basic requirement of establishing political authority over the military establishment has not yet been made clear.

As I say, it seems to us that even the exchange of notes between the two governments which is envisaged is not sufficient and that soon or later there should be either an agreement that somehow is within the framework of NATO in the same way as the other commands, so that authority is derived from the civilian side of NATO, or there should be something in the nature of a treaty between the United States and Canada which parliament will have the opportunity to consider in the same way that we have considered the North Atlantic treaty and other arrangements of this kind.

Let no one suggest that either the hon. member for Algoma East or we in this group are holding back so far as joint defence arrangements are concerned. But we do suggest most strongly that the proper political authority for such defence arrangements should be established and that parliament should have the chance to approve those arrangements.

Mr. Pearkes: I agree entirely with the hon. member that political authority must be established and it is established.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Pearkes: The chiefs of staff of Canada report to me as Minister of National Defence. I report to the cabinet defence committee or to the cabinet as a whole. That is where political authority is maintained in exactly the same way as the joint chiefs of staff of the United States report to their political authorities. In addition, the combined chiefs of staff report to the military committee of NATO which reports to the military council of NATO. Now, that is where the civilian control is maintained, and the plans which are made have to be examined and approved in principle by the civilian control side in the United States or in Canada.

I am afraid that the hon. member is picturing a possibility of these forces being sent away from this continent. These are the forces, the Canadian air force and the United States air force, specially earmarked for the defence of this North American continent. They are not going to move away from this North American continent, but they will go into action if at any time enemy bombers commit an overt act of war by flying through Canadian air space and giving indication they are about to commit a hostile act. They go into operation automatically. There would be no opportunity to call parliament together when enemy bombers were over our territory. You have to make these arrangements beforehand, and these arrangements are made beforehand. These forces are ready to go into action if any enemy bombers violate our air space and show a hostile intention against the North American continent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No one ever suggested that the phrase "Parliament will decide" meant that parliament had actually to be summoned between the time the enemy attacked and retaliation was commenced for the defence of Canada. The way in which the role of parliament to decide has been preserved is that within a certain period of time after the forces have been put on active service or given a job to do parliament must meet. But we have gone beyond that. We have now got to the point where we have made certain commitments, such as the North Atlantic Treaty, which would make it possible for forces responsible to NATO to go into action and parliament not be called because we have already agreed to the terms of the treaty.

But in this instance there is not anything to which the parliament of Canada has had any opportunity of agreeing so far as this joint defence of North America is concerned. The minister says I seem to be picturing these forces being used elsewhere than in North America. Well, at any rate a number of our personnel are outside of Canada right now. They are down at Colorado Springs. The minister might say it is only a handful, 35 or 40 service personnel, but whatever the number might be I would point out that they are outside of Canada. In any previous instance where troops have been put on active service outside of Canada there has been an order in council and that order in council has been tabled in parliament within the required number of days of the order in council being issued. So far we have been able to learn of only one order in council that has anything to do with the setup at Colorado Springs, and that is the order in council stipulating what Air Marshal Slemon's salary and allowances are to be.

In the very nature of the case defence could involve Canadian air force personnel in operations outside of the territorial limits of Canada. I am not objecting to that being done. I recognize a situation could arise in which that would be necessary, and in which it would be necessary for that action to be taken instantly without the opportunity for the parliamentary process. But it is because of the necessity for that that it seems to me a special decision should be made in advance and parliament should have an opportunity of making that decision.

There is one other question I should like to put to the minister. In view of the fact that General Partridge is in command of these tremendous forces which are based at Colorado Springs, and in view of the obvious interest of General Partridge and his associates in the defence of the position of the United States, what would happen if United States interests or forces in the Far East were attacked? What would happen, for example, if any trouble broke out between the mainland of China and Formosa and United States forces in Formosa were under attack and General Partridge felt it necessary to dispatch bombers from Colorado Springs?

Mr. Pearkes: General Partridge has no authority whatever outside of the defence of the North American continent. If there is action in Formosa it would not come under General Partridge.

Mr. Pearson: May I put the question this way? What would happen if there was action in Formosa or off Formosa between the United States and the communist regime in China, and as a result of that action in the Far East there were steps taken by the communist regime in China which indicated an air threat to this continent and General Partridge interpreted it as such? Would he then have authority to put the continental air defences into operation, including the Canadian element of his command?

Mr. Pearkes: I am quite certain that would be a point which would have to be covered by political agreement beforehand. The idea of General Partridge's command is for the defence of the North American continent. I suggest that if the North American continent is being attacked by anybody Canada is within that target area. We would have to have defensive measures taken in Canada as well as in the United States.

Mr. Pearson: I quite agree that we have to have these defensive measures, and of course we should take them on a continental basis. All we on this side are seeking to establish is the authority for action of this kind, the political authority. I agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. You have to have these political arrangements made in advance. In an emergency there will be no time for calling parliament, perhaps there will be no time for even making a telephone call, as was once suggested. But there are various ways of making these advance political arrangements. We did it one way in the case of NATO, not only by government decision but by parliamentary decision.

The political authority for the integration of the North American air command, it has been clearly established now, was a decision of the government which decision has not been approved or even discussed by parliament. We have nothing to discuss because the political arrangements covering that decision made by the government six months ago are still under negotiation. Until we have an opportunity to consider the results of the negotiation the action that has been taken has no parliamentary backing of any kind; that is obvious.

May I ask the minister, while I am on my feet, two questions. One is, when was the establishment of NORAD reported to NATO and, secondly, is it the intention of the government, when agreement has been reached with the United States on the political arrangements covering this defence organization, to submit that political agreement to the NATO council for discussion with the NATO partners in the hope perhaps that an agreement of this kind could be made an integral part of the NATO organization? Perhaps NORAD could be brought into closer relationship with NATO than seems at present to be the case.

Mr. Pearkes: NATO was informed prior to the publication or prior to the joint announcement made by myself and the defence secretary of the United States. I have not the exact date.

Mr. Pearson: Was it prior to the decision taken by the Canadian government?

Mr. Pearkes: No, it would not be prior to the decision made by the Canadian government but it would be prior to the statement which was given. As to the second part of the question, that matter of course would have to be discussed with the United States. I could not make any firm commitment. I could only express a personal opinion which it would not be wise for me to express here. It would have to be discussed, as the hon. gentleman knows, with the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are one or two questions that I should like to ask. It seems to me that some of the important questions put by the hon. member for Algoma East have not yet been answered. It is true that the hon. member for Algoma East said that the putting of the interrogations themselves likely reveals the answers. He asked two questions in this context. One was this. Do the commanders in question, namely General Partridge and Air Marshal Slemon, derive their authority from a NATO agency? There has been no answer to that question. He also asked this question: does their authority derive only, in so far as Canada is concerned, from an oral expression given by the minister or by the government itself? I think the Minister of National Defence is confronted with the necessity of answering those questions, even though their replies may be self-evident.

There is another question that arises out of a statement made by the Minister of National Defence in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Algoma East. The hon. member for Algoma East asked this question: in the absence of General Partridge, what authority will Air Marshal Slemon be capable of exercising? The Minister of National Defence at once rose and said, "Of course, in the absence of General Partridge, Air Marshal Slemon will have precisely the same authority that General Partridge himself would have".

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister now says, "That is correct". That creates a very serious situation, it seems to me, because of what we are advised by General Partridge himself in the interview which he gave on September 6, and which is contained in the U.S. News and World Report. In that article, as I reminded the minister on another occasion in this house, General Partridge said in effect that he had an understanding with the President of the United States to the effect that there likely being no time available in the event of an emergency he was not obligated before acting to receive the informal or formal approval of the President or of the government of the United States. When asked as to the authority of General Partridge vis-à-vis the Canadian government my hon. and gallant friend said that that kind of freedom of action in so far as Canada was concerned did not exist in so far as the NORAD commander was concerned, and that there would have to be consultation with Ottawa. We were never told who in Ottawa must be consulted. We were never told whether that was the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence or any combination of ministers of the crown. But in any event the point is that General Partridge, in so far as Canada is concerned, just could not on his own initiative and discretion push the button. I think I correctly state the situation as related by the Minister of National Defence to us some weeks ago.

If that is the case, what is the situation that now flows from the replies of my hon. friend? Air Marshal Slemon, a Canadian officer, No. 2 in command, will have in the United States and over United States air forces authority which he does not possess in Canada over Canadian air force officers and over the particular operation in the event of an emergency. This surely reveals the difficult position in which the minister finds himself and with which I think we all have much sympathy but I think it is largely based upon the character and the nature of the replies which he gave. Surely the situation in Canada with respect to this matter cannot be any different from the situation that prevails in the United States. This must, I would think, be conceived of as the same operation. Any decision taken by General Partridge or, in his absence, by Air Marshal Slemon must in the very nature of things apply to both countries. But it cannot do so, in so far as Canada is concerned, if what the minister said is to be taken as the correct procedural situation. I think the minister owes it to the country, to himself and to parliament to indicate whether or not the functions of General Partridge or, in his absence, of Air Marshal Slemon, are any different as between one country and another.

It surely must mean that General Partridge has in Canada precisely the same authority that he has in the United States. I think the minister also owes it to us to say whether or not the situation is as General Partridge revealed in this interview, namely that there would in all probability be no time for consultation; and if there is not time for consultation, does the minister still take the position that General Partridge, or in his absence, Air Marshal Slemon, must first of all contact someone in Ottawa? Also, as I say, the minister must tell us what particular authority in Ottawa.

All of this adds up to what the hon. member for Algoma East said, namely that these are matters that require precision of agreement. The minister said that Air Marshal Slemon had gone to the United States and was working out an interim arrangement. He has not yet indicated to us whether, as the result of that interim arrangement leading to some kind of formal agreement between the United States and Canada, that agreement will at some subsequent time be submitted to parliament for approval or ratification. I would think, however, in view of the discussion that has taken place here today and during the course of this present session of parliament this government would not make the mistake even at this date of failing to bring to parliament a treaty or a document which embodies the policy which the government is prepared to recommend to parliament.

The Minister of National Defence said that this was not a matter involving the dispatch of troops overseas. I suppose technically that is correct, although under certain conceivable circumstances it could be the case that men employed in the defence of the country in this particular arrangement might have to leave the shores of Canada. That may or may not be an academic question but that surely is not the issue. When in November of 1940 the then prime minister of Canada submitted the Ogdensburg agreement that set up a joint board for defence between the United States and Canada that was an instrument that had nothing at all to do with the dispatch of troops anywhere, either on this continent or in Europe. But the government of the day took the parliamentary step of submitting to parliament the policy of the government in asking for approval. That is what the hon. member for Algoma East, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others during the course of this particular discussion have insisted was a necessary thing to do within our parliamentary tradition.

In fact, our parliamentary tradition in Canada goes beyond that. Since 1926 there has grown up the custom, respected by every government, that any matters involving relations of this country, except commercial treaties, whether they include the dispatch of troops overseas or whether they are in the nature of commitments entered into by this country with other nations, should be submitted to parliament. We had a discussion in 1935 as to whether or not, for instance, the imposition of sanctions under the covenant of the League of Nations, if supported by Canada, would require first of all the consent, or the approval rather, of the Canadian parliament. If it is our tradition that this should be done in the case of non-military action such as the sanctions which were contemplated in the case of the Ethiopian-Italian dispute, then surely a matter of the greatest importance such as this, which is perhaps an agreement more important than any other agreement outside the NATO agreement that we have ever had to deal with, should be submitted to the parliament of Canada.

I think one could successfully argue that once a decision has been taken even in interim form—a decision which the Prime Minister said was a decision of the government as a whole—it should have been submitted to parliament. But it was not submitted to parliament. Even to this very day there has been no formal submission of the step taken, and now that the defence forces of the two countries are negotiating an agreement which will later be embodied, presumably as the hon. member for Algoma East has said in a political agreement—and the minister ought, I think, to give us an assurance about that—this surely will be submitted to parliament. Not that parliament objects to the objectives which the government has in mind, because it is elementary to observe that in this thermonuclear age it is essential for our continental defence that there should be the fullest co-operation between Canada and the United States, as the hon. member for Algoma East said. But nevertheless because of all the implications—implications which all of us appreciate without spelling them out—I think it is a desirable safeguard that, first of all, the government should have taken parliament into its confidence. This not having been done, we should at least be given an assurance that once a political document, whether in the form of an exchange of notes or a treaty is prepared, it will be submitted to parliament. The government will have decided its policy and I have no doubt what the result will be, but we will then be in a position to make an examination of all the factors involved.

But I think the minister will want to take this opportunity of acknowledging that the answers which General Partridge made are inconsistent with the replies he himself made a few weeks ago. Either General Partridge is right or the minister is wrong. Both cannot be right. I am sure the minister—and I say this to him knowing his heavy responsibility—must agree that this is the case. I understand that that interview between General Partridge and the interviewer was submitted after the end of June to either the minister, or if not to him, then to the Department of National Defence—I do not know whether I should say for approval. But I think that under the article there is a footnote—an asterisk on the first page—which says that the article, in so far as the Canadian references are concerned, was submitted to the Department of National Defence in Canada. If this is the case I think the minister owes it to the house and to himself to explain what is obviously, I think, an inconsistency between the two positions.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I will take this opportunity to reassure the hon. member immediately that when the formal note is ready it will be submitted to parliament. I have made that statement at least twice in this house, as has the Prime Minister, who has also given that assurance.

Regarding this interview to which reference has been made, let me say in the first place that I understand General Partridge was interviewed before he took over the command, before the integrated command was ever established. The second point is that the article was submitted to the R.C.A.F. for security clearance, because there was some references made in it to equipment which was then held by the R.C.A.F., and the United States authorities did not want to publish any information about Canadian equipment without getting clearance. But there was no question of the article being submitted to me; I never saw it until it appeared in print. There was no question of it being submitted to the department for a report on the general statements contained in it. It was submitted only with regard to the classified nature of the equipment of the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister noted the welcome the committee gave to his statement that any note finally agreed upon would be submitted to the house. He then said that he had made such a statement before. It was my recollection that he did not go that far, and perhaps it was for that reason that the committee was so glad to hear his categorical statement today. As a matter of fact, on a previous occasion when the estimates of the minister's department were being considered, on December 5, as recorded on page 1940 of Hansard, I put this question to the minister:

> Is it fair to assume then, in view of the importance of that formal note between the two governments that it will be drawn in such terms—in other words, leaving out the elements of security—so that the note may be tabled here and also tabled in the appropriate place in the United States?

To which the minister replied:

> I would hope that would be the case. I say I would hope, because naturally we are dealing with another government and we would have to get the consent of that government before tabling it. So I say I would hope it would be drawn up in such terms that there would be no doubt that it could be tabled.

Well, the minister has gone one step further today. If I understood him aright he said it would be tabled and that this house would have it. I am sure we welcome that and I hope it will be in such a form that an appropriate motion will be presented to parliament and parliament will have the opportunity to decide for or against this joint defence arrangement. May I say to the minister that in making these arrangements we hope he will bear in mind that there is a difference between an arrangement which provides merely for reports to a body such as NATO and a command which draws its authority from a civilian authority such as NATO.

While I am on my feet may I just spell out briefly what I referred to earlier today by directing the minister's attention to sections 32 and 33 of the National Defence Act. These are the sections I had in mind when I was speaking earlier, under which the governor in council does have authority at any time to place any component, unit or person in the forces on active service. This can be done in Canada or abroad. It can be done by reason of an emergency for the defence of Canada or in consequence of any action undertaken by Canada under the United Nations charter, the North Atlantic treaty or any other similar instrument for collective defence that may be entered into by Canada. However, Mr. Chairman, the point of section 33 of the National Defence Act is that if the government does exercise this authority which it has of putting any Canadian personnel on active service, if parliament is not in session at the time parliament must be called within ten days of that action having been taken. I suppose it is a question of whether or not these personnel at Colorado Springs today are on active service. Does the minister want to comment on that?

Mr. Pearkes: All the regular forces of Canada are on active service. They have never been taken off active service since the Korean war.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But, Mr. Chairman, when they were placed on active service for the purpose of the Korean war, if my memory serves me right, the order in council specifically referred to the operations in Korea. From time to time as our service personnel have been placed on active service in Europe under NATO there have been orders in council directly relating to that service. My question is the obvious one. Has there been any order in council providing for these personnel to be on active service at Colorado Springs? If they are not on what is active service now, what would happen if under the direction of General Partridge or Air Marshal Slemon they were put on active service?

These things are routine. We all agree that these are things that may have to be done on the basis of a split-second decision but we urge the minister not to think of them as such routine military measures that he or the government forgets the parliamentary requirements as spelled out in the act under which the minister's department operates.

Mr. McLeod: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this at the present time. I believe this is one of the most important acts that has taken place within our Department of National Defence since the time of Korea. From the interest shown by the speakers thus far I think the importance of this subject has been demonstrated to the house and the concern which most of us feel is over the possible surrendering of our sovereign rights or of the civil authority becoming secondary to military authority.

I do not believe that any of us is opposed to co-operation or integration if you want to call it that but we are fearful that co-operation may mean a surrender of our sovereign rights. However I was glad to hear the minister inform us that nothing like this will take place. He assures us that the chiefs of the general staff are reporting directly to him. On the basis of that statement I would assume that he has some knowledge of the progress that is being made. If such is the case I am wondering why a little more of that knowledge is not given to the house.

I must say I have listened to this discussion quite carefully and I do not know a great deal more about this question than I did on December 5 when it was first raised in this house. Surely the minister must have knowledge of some progress that has been made. He must know something about what is going on. I believe it is up to him to report to this parliament whatever accomplishments have occurred.

There was one other statement made by the minister and I do not know if I correctly understood him. I am under the impression he said that a draft note had been prepared by the military authority and had been submitted to Washington. If that is the case I would like to know why a similar action has not taken place so far as Canada is concerned. If this has transpired I think it is a serious matter and something of which we should be made aware.

One other question I have concerns finance. I should like to know what arrangements have been made or are being contemplated for the sharing of the costs of the operation of NORAD?

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I have a question I should like to ask the minister. So far the discussion has been about what could be done in the event of enemy bombers coming over but I am interested in knowing what is the situation regarding enemy submarines. How near could they come to the coast of North America before we would be in a position to take action against those submarines? We have been informed that Russia has 500 submarines and in a short space of time will have 1,200. We have also been informed that they are armed with rocket-launching devices so I think most of us would believe that in the event of war Russia would probably use them for the purpose of launching atomic missiles against towns in the United States. At what distance could they be attacked by our planes if they were spotted?

Mr. Pearkes: There is nothing to prevent any vessel coming through the territorial waters which area in general is three miles out. They could not possibly be attacked unless they committed some overt act of war. If a Russian submarine attacked a Canadian vessel then appropriate action could be taken by any Canadian naval vessel or any Canadian aircraft which was in the vicinity but as for merely cruising up to the territorial waters of Canada there is nothing to prevent a vessel of another country doing so.

Mr. Quelch: That is the point that concerns me. The leader of the C.C.F. mentioned the other day that he thought there was reason for Russia to be concerned due to the fact that she had been ringed around by bases of the western allies. Personally I think we are in a far more vulnerable position because we can be ringed around by a series of moving bases, looking upon these submarines as moving bases. I believe General Gruenther suggested that these submarines are equipped with rocket-launching devices and if this is so what is to prevent them at a certain specified time launching an attack on towns all around the American continent?

The minister says we could not take any action against them as long as they were cruising. Does that mean to say that if Russia did decide to make an attack upon this country she could send her submarine fleet out, put them at strategically located points around the continent, and at a given moment fire these rockets at targets on this continent and that we would not be in a position to take action against them until the rockets had been launched? It seems to me that we are in an extremely vulnerable position.

Mr. Pearkes: I will admit that we are in a vulnerable position and that is a threat which we have to face but as long as there are naval craft of another country cruising off our shores in a peaceful way we certainly cannot take any hostile action against those craft. We are not going to start a war. If they start launching rockets against us then of course we will take immediate action against the submarines. Let me stress the fact that it is the fear of retaliation which we hope will stop the foolhardiness of any country in attacking this continent by any means whatever.

Mr. Cameron: Can the minister tell us a little more about the status of the United States forces under General Partridge's command? As I recall it, he said a short while ago that General Partridge would have no authority whatever to commit the forces under his command to any action except that of defensive action of North America. Does that imply that the forces which the United States are placing under General Partridge and under Air Vice Marshal Slemon are to be under the complete control of a joint political group composed of the United States and Canada in the same way that the forces of NATO are under the NATO political organization, or would it be possible for the United States authority to decide that the forces under General Partridge were to be deployed in some such way as the hon. member for Algoma East suggested a few moments ago? Would that be possible because of the threat of an attack from the Chinese mainland forces on the communist government owing to some action they might have taken on Formosa? The point I want to get clear in my mind is this. Are the forces under this joint command going to be relinquished from purely national control and placed under the control of a political organization set up by Canada and the United States in the same way that NATO forces are under the NATO council?

Mr. Pearkes: General Partridge has operational control over the United States air forces allocated for the defence of the North American continent and operational control over the Canadian air forces allocated for the control of the North American continent. I sometimes wonder whether there is not some confusion amongst hon. members in believing that there is some relation between the strategic air command of the United States, which is a force of retaliation, and General Partridge's command. They are two entirely separate commands. General Partridge's command is purely a defence command of the North American continent. He has no offensive role whatsoever.

Mr. Cameron: No—

Mr. Pearkes: No offensive role.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Cameron: Mr. Chairman, it hinges, of course, on the definition that is given to the term "defensive". It might very well be that in the opinion of the strategists at the time the North American continent could only be defended in a certain instance by operations outside North America, and that is the point that we want to get clear and that, incidentally, is the point that this parliament should have clear and it would have it clear if this government had followed the normal procedure of presenting to this house a clearly outlined treaty which would outline and define the terms used. That has not been done, and so far we have only the suggestion of the minister that we shall have tabled in this house the notes which have been exchanged between the two governments. We do not know whether those notes are going to define clearly to us just what is considered to be defensive action, preventive action, if you like, for the defence of North America. I think we should have that clearly in our minds because otherwise we may find our forces involved in operations which the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament will not be prepared to consider as legitimate defensive action.

Mr. Henderson: I understood the minister's announced policy to be that the reserve training such as weekend flying, air force training of reserve officer flyers, is to be discontinued. Is that correct?

Mr. Pearkes: No, that is not correct. Some time before this government came into power difficulties were experienced in fitting the role of the auxiliary forces of the R.C.A.F. into a fighter role. It was thought before the jet aircraft age came in that they could have been utilized to supplement the fighter squadrons of the R.C.A.F. Experience is showing that that cannot be done, and more emphasis is being placed on the role of search and rescue and on transport which is being allotted to the various auxiliary squadrons. It is not intended in any way to disband the auxiliary squadrons of the R.C.A.F., but there will be some change of role.

Mr. Henderson: Has their flying time or their training time in that role been reduced?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think there has been any reduction in training time but it may be that they will have to adjust their type of training to the new role. I would like to say that many of the auxiliary squadrons are doing extremely valuable work in connection with the "Pinetree" line. Personnel have gone there and are capable of relieving regular personnel for quite long periods, and that seems to be a very suitable role indeed for the auxiliary squadrons.

Mr. Henderson: I mention this because I listened to the minister's reply this morning to the hon. member for Nanaimo about our dependence for the defence of Canada upon the United States air force. I notice that of late the United States forces, particularly the air force division, are advertising more and more the type of training that we give here. They are suggesting that retired airmen should take time at weekends to take this sort of training in the new planes. It is encouraging them. I wondered whether that would have any effect upon the minister's policy in Canada?

Will the minister do the same with this division of the service as he has done with the others and give us the figures of short spending for the years 1956 and 1957, and tell us whether the estimates are in line with his expenditures for the years 1957 and 1958?

Mr. Pearkes: Here are the figures for 1956-57. The estimate was $774,862,536. The amount spent was $774,953,444; in other words, there was an overexpenditure of $80,908. This year the estimate was $784,-173,000, of which it is now estimated $783,742,000 will be spent, which indicates an underexpenditure of $431,000 which is about as close estimating in both cases as I think it is humanly possible to get.

Mr. Henderson: Can the minister also tell us something about the deferments or the cancellations of contracts in the two categories, one, the building construction program and the other, supply contracts?

Mr. Pearkes: Under acquisition and construction of buildings, acquisition of lands, etc., there is an estimated saving of $5 million.

Mr. Henderson: Is this cancellation or deferment?

Mr. Pearkes: It includes both.

Mr. Henderson: Can the minister apportion the $5 million between cancellation and deferment?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not have the figure broken down in those categories.

Mr. Henderson: What about supplies?

Mr. Pearkes: With respect to aircraft, engines, and equipment there is a reduction of $20 million. A good deal of that has resulted from the cancellation of the Mark VI, CF-100.

Mr. Nicholson: Apparently the item we are now discussing is going to go through very shortly. I am sure there are very few men in public life who will get $2 million a day for seven days a week and 52 weeks in the year through parliament with as little trouble as the minister. Something over $784 million will be voted very shortly. I should like to ask a few questions about the mid-Canada line. Would the minister indicate what responsibility he now has for the mid-Canada line? Does he have any figures as to the total cost of the line? Could he also indicate what share of the cost is carried by the R.C.A.F. and what is non-R.C.A.F.?

I may say there are a couple of establishments in my constituency. During the recess I was somewhat embarrassed to find that it was very difficult for a member of parliament to see what was going on in his own constituency. During world war II the pass issued to all members of parliament by the Clerk of the house usually made it quite easy to see high ranking officers of the army, air force and navy anywhere in Canada. I was somewhat surprised to find that very strict regulations had been issued stating who could enter the premises but that there was no reference to members of parliament. I should say that I was not placed in the position of being turned away but it was a bit embarrassing for the officers in charge to find a member of parliament seeking to see something in his own constituency without having the proper credentials.

First of all, would the minister give me the information as to the total investment in the mid-Canada line? Then I should like to know the annual cost to the R.C.A.F. Would he also have orders issued that members of the Canadian parliament are to be included as persons who can visit any R.C.A.F. establishment anywhere in Canada?

Mr. Pearkes: The total cost of construction of the mid-Canada line to date is $112 million. The total cost to date is $215 million.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the minister give those two figures again?

Mr. Pearkes: The total cost of construction to date is approximately $112 million. The total cost is $215 million. It costs approximately $18 million a year to operate the line. As to the hon. member's other question, I think it would be desirable if members of parliament who wish to visit the mid-Canada line, which after all is in a rather remote part of the country, would ask for permission to make such visits. I am quite certain it would be granted readily, but rather than giving a general clearance I think it would be better from the point of view of security reasons for the air force to know who is going to visit.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sorry but I cannot agree with the minister.

An hon. Member: You cannot agree with anybody.

Mr. Nicholson: If during world war II it was taken for granted that members of the Canadian parliament should be encouraged to visit army, air force and navy establishments anywhere in Canada and the identification card issued by the Clerk of the house was considered as adequate, I see no reason why in peacetime a member elected by the people cannot go anywhere in his own constituency without submitting a request to the Minister of National Defence for a special dispensation. I submit that the minister should review this matter and have instructions issued authorizing all establishments in Canada to permit members of the Canadian parliament to visit them without any embarrassing questions being asked as to what their business is and why they should be making visits in their own constituency in connection with their own legitimate business.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the estimates but before I go on to the subject I want to discuss may I say to the minister that I appreciate his co-operation very much in connection with the submarine menace about which I spoke some time ago in parliament. The minister has been most kind and co-operative and I should like him and the house to know that I appreciate his co-operation.

To get back to the command of the North American continent, I mentioned before that we in Newfoundland are in a rather different position from the rest of Canada in that we have United States forces stationed on our soil, including United States air force personnel in goodly numbers. We know that we are dependent on them very largely for our defence.

Having regard to the discussion so far and the information the minister has been kind enough to give us, I think there is a bit of confusion in the minds of some of us, certainly in my mind. I am not concerned now with the political aspect of the North American command although I agree that the military should be subservient to the civil. But I am not clear in my mind yet and I am afraid that we may have a second edition of Pearl Harbour. Those of us who have read the report of what happened there know that at that time the United States commander was in a state of uncertainty with respect to where his authority began and where it ended. The consequence was that he hesitated to take command and to set forces in motion to offset the raid by the Japanese aircraft.

I am afraid that unless the command difficulty is settled once and for all so that we will know who is to give orders without consultations with anybody we may find ourselves, particularly in Newfoundland, involved in a second Pearl Harbour. I am not concerned who commands the air force, whether it is a United States general or a Canadian air marshal. We all agree that co-operation should exist from the highest to the lowest level if we are to have full co-ordination. I do not know yet whether General Partridge's appointment has been confirmed by the Canadian government or whether Air Marshal Slemon's appointment has been confirmed by the United States government, but I do know that the United States and Canada are in this thing together and we cannot be successful unless we have the fullest co-operation.

As I said a moment ago we have the United States air force in goodly numbers in Newfoundland. I want to be assured that General Partridge, or Air Marshal Slemon, whoever it may be, if an act of aggression is committed against our shores, either from submarines or from the air, will have full authority to take counter action immediately without any consultation whatever with this government or the United States government. I think that is necessary, that is vital if we are to have the protection which our people deserve. It is believed by military strategists and military tacticians that if an attack does come—God forbid that it should—it is going to come suddenly, without any warning. There will be no time for consultation with Ottawa or Washington. I trust that whoever is in command will have full authority to act immediately. Naturally he will have to tell the two governments what he has done, but whoever he may be he should have full authority to act immediately without any prior consultation.

I do ask the minister if he could, and if he would, assure me on this point. He has given me several answers before, but I do not think the answer is clear as to who has full authority to act at the moment. It may be that in this exchange of notes about which the minister has been speaking this afternoon, and which no doubt will be followed by a formal agreement between the two governments, this matter will be ironed out. But until that has happened, and until it is approved by both the United States and the Canadian government, I do believe these commanders should have that authority now. I do ask the minister if he has any comment to make upon it, and if he can give me that assurance.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to assure the hon. member that the United States squadrons now based in Newfoundland are under the operation control of the Canadian air defence commander at St. Hubert, and that he has authority at once to engage, according to the accepted terms of engagement, any hostile plane which is approaching Newfoundland, without reference any further because the terms of the agreement have already been accepted.

Mr. Stick: I should like to thank the minister for that explanation. It is information we have been trying to get for some time. If the arrangements are now made and that can happen I think that should satisfy our people. I thank him for the information.

Mr. Haidasz: I should like the minister to give us some details about item 22, page 344, concerning an expenditure of $1,754,000. I should like to ask him also whether in the case of the item for the air force this money was designated for the recreational branch of the Royal Canadian Air Force. An article written in the Ottawa Journal of Friday, October 25, suggests that the Royal Canadian Air Force recreational branch will receive a chop by national defence department.

Mr. Pearkes: The answer to the last question is that we recognize the importance of recreational facilities in the maintenance of morale of all the forces, perhaps particularly the R.C.A.F. in these northern stations where there are not the usual means for recreation. For instance, on the "Pinetree" line there are bowling alleys established at the stations. In some cases they have swimming pools, and every reasonable facility is given for recreation.

In so far as the question about the other items which appear at the bottom of page 344 is concerned, they cover the same sort of items as were covered by the other items for the army, such as laundry, grants to the band, physical fitness equipment and so on. There is an amount there of $127,000, giving an indication of the extent to which we are encouraging recreation. I notice that it is expected that amount will be overspent by $16,400 compared to 1956-57, which would certainly give an indication that we are encouraging recreation. There is another item for entertainment expenses. As I have already pointed out, in these northern areas we believe it is important to encourage that sort of thing. The item for this year was $18,500, and we expect that to be overspent to the extent of $2,000.

Mr. Caron: I should like to ask the minister whether or not it is true that after a man has served for 18 or 19 years in the air force, and he reaches the age of 50 he is told to take his pension or accept a reduction in rank? If he takes his pension, his pension will be much lower, and of course it is against the man's pride to accept a reduction in rank.

Mr. Pearkes: That certainly is not a general condition which exists, and if the hon. member has some particular instance in mind and would let me know of the case I will have it looked into and let him know exactly the reasons.

Mr. Caron: This was brought to my attention a little while ago, and I said I would bring it to the minister's attention. This man told me he was told that if any politics entered into it it would be worse for his case. It was for this reason I did not write the minister.

Mr. Pearkes: If the hon. member will let me know the details of that particular case I will certainly have it looked into. I can assure him that his friend or the person on behalf of whom he is speaking will suffer no adverse effects because he has spoken to his member and asked his member to mention the case.

Mr. Caron: I will do that, but I want to tell the minister that the man was told the order came from Ottawa.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, all members realize the estimates we are discussing are very large indeed. I imagine that no matter what the point of view we would hope these estimates in the future might be reduced. I am rather disturbed about a report in this evening's Ottawa Journal, a statement said to have been made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Edmonton West. I think the committee is entitled to know whether in making this statement he is in fact stating government policy or what government policy is likely to be. This is a Canadian Press dispatch from Calgary, dated January 4, and it reads:

> The parliamentary assistant to Defence Minister Pearkes said last night Canada may have to increase its defence expenditures beyond the 1957 budget of $1,750,000,000.

He is talking about the major changes that may be forthcoming, and he goes on to say, and this is in quotation marks:

> "Today it is tremendous; tomorrow it may even be greater. We are going to face increased responsibilities and must reorientate our thoughts."

In plain English that would suggest to me that the parliamentary assistant is saying that we are going to be asked to pass larger estimates for national defence in the coming fiscal year. I hope that the Minister of National Defence may be able to say that the expression of his parliamentary assistant is not correct as reported in the newspaper. We know that sometimes the reports in the press are not wholly accurate. I hope he is able to assure the committee that when the estimates are brought down for the new fiscal year in the matter of a short time they will not in fact contain substantial increases. We in this group feel that the estimates for national defence in the future should be reduced and that there are other ways by which the government can spend money to provide defence in a more secure manner than by continuing to spend the very large sum of $1¾ billion as a rather fixed amount for an indefinite period.

I think it would be an act of faith on the part of Canada if, in the coming fiscal year, we reduced the amount of money we are voting for national defence and used the resources of this country in other ways to assist people in underdeveloped countries and so on. However, I think the committee has a right to know whether or not the parliamentary assistant in fact is stating the government policy when he says that Canada may have to increase its defence expenditure in the coming year and then spells this statement out by referring to the increased responsibilities and so on.

Mr. Pearkes: I have not seen the article in question nor have I heard the remarks made by my parliamentary assistant who, I believe, is in Alberta today. Furthermore, as I stated earlier in this discussion, I cannot discuss next year's estimates while we are still considering the estimates of 1957.

Mr. Argue: With great respect to the minister, may I say that I do not think the statement that he has now made is an adequate one. Surely, in discussing the defence estimates for any given fiscal year, it is fair to ask what the government's continuing policy in this field is going to be. With the new fiscal year coming along in less than three months and with his parliamentary assistant being credited with making statements of government policy outside the house, I think the committee has a right to know whether those statements, as attributed to him in the press, are a correct statement of government policy. Of course the minister was not there. I am not asking the minister to say whether or not the parliamentary assistant in fact made those statements. But surely, when they appear in the press, it is fair to ask whether the statements as reported in the press are in fact a statement of the minister's own position and that of the government.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the Royal Canadian Air Force item carry?

Mr. Argue: Since the minister is not talking on this question we will have a chance to find out in the future whether the parliamentary assistant has been more appropriately speaking for the government at the political convention in Calgary than has the minister himself. I want to refer to another question. The matter of whether the continuing policy to produce substantial quantities of CF-105's is a correct one is, of course, rather controversial. But I should like to know from the minister what amount of money has already been spent in the development of the CF-105 and what commitment the government has made by way of policy that will result in future expenditures for the development of the CF-105.

Mr. Pearkes: The CF-105 is being developed as a supersonic interceptor. The start was made on this aircraft some few years ago and this year we decided to continue for one year or more the development of this aircraft. We are not committed any further than to continue the development for another year, with the right even then of discontinuing that development should the circumstances warrant taking such a step. I am told that the total amount spent so far on the development of this aircraft is $89,000,641.

Mr. Argue: Over what period of time?

Mr. Pearkes: This is up to the end of October, 1957 from the time when the initial research work started, which was two or three years ago.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder whether the minister could indicate what will be the total cost by the time it is off the line?

Mr. Pearkes: It will depend entirely on the number of aircraft, if any, which are ordered. I will frankly admit there is a very heavy expenditure in developing this particular type of aircraft. The demand at the present time is not large, as no other country is at present ordering this aircraft. We must develop it for ourselves, and the expense is heavy.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say when the one-year period ends for which the development has been continued?

Mr. Pearkes: I think it was the first of October of this year.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say what are the likely expenses that will be incurred during this further one-year period? The expense has been some $89 million up to now.

Mr. Pearkes: The whole situation will have to be reviewed in the light of the threat that there is of manned bombers. This is an aircraft designed to meet manned bombers. We know that Russia has considerable numbers of manned bombers capable of flying over this country. While the manned bomber, flying at great heights and at great speeds, is in the armament of a possible enemy, we must keep aircraft which are capable of meeting that threat. But as the bomber threat may decrease and the missile threat may become more definite the whole situation has to be reviewed. One of the difficulties is that we are not looking at the situation which will occur just a year hence, we must try to pierce the future for five years hence.

Mr. Argue: The minister has already informed the committee that the cost of development up to October 1, 1957, was some $89 million and that the program is being continued for another period of 12 months. Is the minister able to estimate the cost of continuing the program for the one-year period which I take it is from October 1, 1957 to October 1, 1958?

Mr. Pearkes: No, I have not a detailed estimate of that cost at all.

Mr. Nicholson: I think the minister's predecessor was able to give us some estimate a year ago. It is hard to understand why the minister now is not able to give the committee at least as much information as his predecessor gave. Surely before embarking on a program of this sort the government would want to have some idea as to what the target was going to be. Surely the minister can say something more than that the government has spent $89 million up to October of this year. Can the minister not say what the estimated cost to the treasury will be of completing the job undertaken?

Mr. Pearkes: The figures for next year will be included in next year's estimates.

Mr. Nicholson: But, Mr. Chairman, a year ago the minister's predecessor was able to give the committee some information. I have not got the figures before me, but it is hard to understand why the present minister is not able to give us as much information as we were able to have a year ago regarding what the total cost was going to be. I think he could bring this estimate up to date if he wishes to co-operate with the committee.

Mr. Pearkes: Up to November 30 the money which has already been spent on air frame development amounted to $11,038,376; on the Iroquois engine development, $7,951,487; and on the electronic development, $4,355,480. That is the total development for the year, $23,345,343.

Mr. Nicholson: That is helpful. The minister has the information up to the end of November. Surely he could make a forecast for the balance of the year. If this amount has been increased by $20 million for this period, surely some estimate has been made as to what will be the total amount involved for the rest of the 12-month period. Could the minister not give us that information?

Mr. Pearkes: I would have to get that information; the officials have not got it here.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister inform the committee how many CF-105 planes the department expects to have in the air at the end of this further continuing period of development? Will there be just a prototype, or will there be a number of planes in the air? How many do we expect to have after spending $89 million plus part of another $23 million plus an agreement on an undertaking to provide money for a further one-year period of development?

Mr. Pearkes: There are eight of the prototype planes being developed but all those eight will not be in the air by the end of this year.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): If the committee is agreeable we will now consider the item on page 346, defence research and development.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I did not realize the subject of air cadets or search and rescue was included under the title we have just been dealing with. I did not have any questions to ask under the heading of air cadets but I do have questions to ask under the heading of search and rescue.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Is it agreed that the hon. member may ask the questions he desires to ask?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Barnett: As the minister probably realizes, this is a question in which I have taken some little interest when the estimates of his department have been before the committee in previous years, and I was hoping the minister would be able to give us a brief resume of the development which has taken place in this field since he assumed office and tell the committee what he may have in mind for the revision or expansion of the work this branch of the service does. Has the minister any statement he can make to the committee?

Mr. Pearkes: There has been some reorganization in the air rescue and search command. There has been a concentration of resources at certain centres, and I think this has improved general efficiency. I know the hon. member is particularly interested in the west coast. The command there has carried out very active operations during the year, and in a number of instances it has rendered very valuable aid. There is another centre at Winnipeg from which the northern part of Canada is patrolled, and rescue teams are sent out as required. Canada generally is divided into four or five air rescue commands with a central organization where aircraft are available for these operations.

Mr. Barnett: As the minister says, the only centre of which I have any direct knowledge is that on the west coast, and I certainly agree with him that search and rescue units have been active there. I noticed that only a few days ago they were called out to look for a missing fishing vessel off the northeast coast of Vancouver island.

I see that the particular estimate under the heading of search and rescue appears to provide only for what I understand to be the operating account of search and rescue units. Do I take it that the equipment which they use comes under the general vote for procurement of equipment? Under the air force vote on the preceding page I notice an item "Procurement of equipment including aircraft and engines" and so on but there is no similar heading under search and rescue. I am wondering what arrangements exist for the provision of new aircraft for the search and rescue organization when required.

Mr. Pearkes: New aircraft, or any new equipment required, are procured under the general account of the air force. I may say that consideration is now being given to the advisability of replacing some of the Cansos which have carried out this operation successfully for a great many years.

Mr. Barnett: Do I understand that Cansos are to be replaced with a new type of plane, or are the Canso planes to be renewed?

Mr. Pearkes: The best type of new equipment for the search and rescue squadrons is a matter now under consideration, but there have been no new aircraft provided for in the estimates of this year.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder if the minister could tell us what the situation is with respect to helicopters attached to the search and rescue units on the Pacific coast at the present time. How many of those are available for search and rescue work?

Mr. Pearkes: I speak from recollection, but I think there are two on the west coast, and when additional helicopters are required they have to be hired from civilian firms.

Mr. Barnett: The minister may recall that last year his colleague the Minister of Transport announced that a new marine agency vessel under construction for the Prince Rupert agency was being fitted with a helicopter landing deck. I wonder if there will be a helicopter under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport attached to that vessel? Is this helicopter landing deck being provided for use by the search and rescue unit.

Mr. Pearkes: I am not sure about that. The Minister of Transport is going to make an announcement in the house early next week, I believe, about some new vessels of that type and perhaps he could answer that question.

Mr. Barnett: There is one other matter in connection with the search and rescue situation which I would like to put before the committee before this item carries. As the minister will recall, he and I have had some discussion about the situation with reference to the R.C.A.F. establishment at Tofino. Recently there came to my attention a suggestion that it might be to the general advantage of the search and rescue situation on the west coast if consideration were given by the minister's department to the establishment of a sub-base of the search and rescue section at Tofino. I understand there are some negotiations going on between his department and the Department of Transport in respect to the future of the Tofino airport. As the minister knows, the whole situation there is a matter of considerable concern to the west coast communities.

The idea of the need for units of search and rescue on the west coast of Vancouver island is not really a new one. I have had suggestions made to me before that there are occasions when rescue services may be required on the west coast when the sea island base may be fogged in and there might be a good many occasions when equipment based on the west coast would be fog free when such would not be the case at the existing establishment. I wonder if the minister can give any indication at the present time as to whether he might be prepared to give favourable consideration to the establishment of a search and rescue unit at the Tofino station.

Mr. Pearkes: We will be very pleased to give it consideration but I cannot guarantee that it will be favourable consideration to the establishment of a substation at Tofino. I know the Tofino airfield very well and I am not at all sure that that would be the best locality for a substation.

Mr. Barnett: I realize that there are many technical considerations involved in the question but I hope the minister will look into the matter further and I am glad to have his assurance that he will do so.

Mr. Pearkes: I shall do so.

Mr. Barnett: In that connection there recently came to my hand a communication arising out of the last annual meeting of the Prince Rupert fishermen's co-operative association. Apparently quite a number of their representatives, particularly those who live along the west coast of Vancouver island, are somewhat concerned over the possibility that with the change that is being made at Tofino the radio beacon on which they have apparently come to rely a great deal will no longer be operative. In view of the change that has taken place in the responsibility of his department in that area I realize that the minister may not be in a position to give me an answer to this quesiton but if he has any information as to whether or not it is planned to have the service of this radio beacon continued either under the auspices of his department or under other auspices I would be very glad to have that information at this time.

Mr. Pearkes: The area originally covered by the radio at Tofino is now covered by two larger stations, one at Holberg on the north of Vancouver island and the other in the state of Washington which made the necessity of maintaining the station at Tofino for defence purposes unnecessary, but Tofino airport is being transferred to the Department of Transport and I believe they will be making arrangements for the maintenance of that field in a rather less active state than has been the case in the past.

Mr. Barnett: I take it from what the minister said that the matter of the maintenance of this radio beacon is something that could be properly taken up with the Department of Transport?

Mr. Pearkes: That would be maintained, if maintained, by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Barnett: The case for its maintenance for the fishing fleet is something that could be presented to the Department of Transport?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the Royal Canadian Air Force item a carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Defence research and development, page 346.

Mr. Henderson: Under this item, Mr. Chairman, I might say to the minister and I am sure he will agree that in this particular year due to the great scientific advances made by countries probably not too friendly toward us, and I refer specifically to sputnik, the other earth satellites and advances in research, I wonder if the minister would like to make a statement today about what Canada is doing in respect of defence research and development in order to cope with the eventuality of nuclear weapons, ICBM's and others.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. Canada is concentrating on certain aspects of research and development, one of the main efforts being that connected with the location and detection of submarines, research in various branches of the detection of submarine craft and an extensive laboratory is maintained at Halifax for that purpose. There is another laboratory maintained at Esquimalt for the study of the detection of underwater noises and so forth. That is one of the main fields of endeavour. Another field of endeavour is that of the study of the effect of the auroral zone on missiles or other objects entering into that area.

Recently an agreement was made with the United States that we would establish a research station to be manned mainly by scientists from the University of Saskatchewan to operate certain equipment which is being given to Canada by the United States. There are, of course, a number of other research stations throughout the country. There is an important research station at Suffield in Alberta where bacteriological research is carried out as well as research on chemical warfare. There is another important station located at Shirley's Bay where radio propagation experiments are conducted. We have close association with the scientists of the United States and the United Kingdom. Within the last month there was a large gathering held here in the city of Ottawa. A symposium of scientists from all over the world who are interested in defence research was held and some 800 scientists attended those discussions.

A leading scientist from the United Kingdom, who is the director of missile research in connection with the British government, gave the main speech and introduced the subject.

I think I can say that our efforts are concentrated on perhaps a rather limited number of fields in which we are particularly well equipped to carry out research work. Of course, I must mention the research station at Churchill where there is an intensive study being carried on, and which is watched by the United States and the United Kingdom, into the effect of cold weather on personnel, on transport vehicles and on armament, including missiles, which the United States has there to test in order to see the effect of subzero temperatures.

Mr. Henderson: Were the expenditures less than those anticipated; that is, less than the ones mentioned on page 347, and will there be larger expenditures in the year 1957-58?

Mr. Pearkes: The expenditures budgeted for last year amounted to $79,032,389, of which $69,322,982 was actually spent; that is to say, $9,709,407 was underspent. This year we appreciate the importance of concentrating on research work and while the original estimate was $64,796,000 it is anticipated that $77,325,000 will be spent, which will be an overexpenditure of $12,549,000. I think that reflects the degree of importance which we are now placing on this research work in view of the developments which have taken place in the world during the last six months.

Mr. Nicholson: I am very glad to hear the statement by the minister. Before the election very extravagant claims were made as to the savings that could be effected, but when it comes down to the day-to-day decisions that must be made, instead of reducing anticipated expenditures planned by the previous government the minister has spent a good deal more. I wonder whether he can add to the statement made by the Prime Minister on his return from Paris, as reported at page 2723 of Hansard of December 21. This is what the Prime Minister said:

> In connection with scientific and technical matters within the alliance there was a general recognition of the need to increase the number of trained scientists and technicians in most of the countries. In Canada, as elsewhere, progress in this field will depend not only on the state contribution but also on the devoted contribution of teachers and scientists in our schools and universities. It will also depend on the support which governments will give to institutions which provide courses in scientific subjects, and this government intends shortly to give full reconsideration to its policy in this regard and have it placed before parliament.

Hon. members who heard Mr. James Duncan, president of the Massey-Harris Company, following his return from Russia, were impressed I am sure by his statement that in the U.S.S.R. they are turning out more scientists and engineers than the United States, Great Britain, Canada and many of the other western countries put together. Mr. Duncan said that those who think that our scientists are better trained had better review their thinking. He claimed that Russian engineers spent more years in the laboratory than Canadian engineers did. I think that when the minister is spending $5 million a day on defence it does not make sense to expect the municipalities, because of their very critical financial position, or the provinces, who have not the resources available, to be able to meet the challenge. Because of the paragraph in the Prime Minister's speech that I have read can the minister indicate that his department is prepared to give more concrete assistance in the training of scientists so that the Department of National Defence will have coming up in the high schools and universities more young Canadians who will be prepared to take their places in the scheme of things, in the light of the very critical international situation?

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Pearkes: In these estimates there is the amount of $1,100,000 for grants to universities. Those grants to universities are for university professors and others who are carrying out special research work. I feel sure that as far as this department is concerned, which of course is not a department primarily responsible for education, every encouragement will be given both now and in the future to further development work along those lines. Then, of course, at the service colleges emphasis is placed on the scientific and engineering aspects of the education of those cadets.

Mr. Haidasz: Last November Dr. Patterson, of the Downsview Aerophysics Institute in Toronto, expressed great apprehension during an interview with a reporter from the Toronto Star that further financial aid to his institute would not be forthcoming. Can the minister tell us whether the Downsview Aerophysics Institute will continue to operate and, if so, will it get more money than it got last year?

Mr. Pearkes: I am not forecasting next year's estimates. As I have said several times, there is no intention to cut grants to the universities. There seems to be a misapprehension somehow that there is going to be a reduction in grants to universities for this type of research work. That is not the fact.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): We now come to Mutual Aid. Shall this item carry?

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister tell us to what countries this aid was given?

Mr. Pearkes: The aid has been given to a number of NATO countries. The last instance took place about a month ago when five small naval vessels were given to Turkey. There are five more to go and four frigates. They were the minesweeper class of vessel. Turkish crews came on. Belgium has received aid; Greece has received aid. The policy is, as far as the department is concerned, to declare such equipment as is surplus to NATO and then NATO assigns the particular materials, arms, ships or vehicles, to the different countries. Canada does not allocate direct to any particular NATO country any particular arms. It is done through the NATO organization which says where the surplus equipment will be sent.

Mr. Quelch: Is this limited entirely to NATO?

Mr. Pearkes: It is limited entirely to NATO countries.

Mr. Low: Just how do you decide what Canada is going to supply? Is it on requisition from NATO headquarters?

Mr. Pearkes: No. We advise NATO of what equipment we have available. Sometimes requests come asking if we have certain types of equipment available but generally speaking we notify NATO headquarters of what equipment we have available and are prepared to dispose of. There is a very big demand for Canadian equipment.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What type of equipment do you declare to be surplus and what causes the equipment to become surplus? Is it because the equipment becomes obsolete and is of no further use to us or is it the case that we produce more of certain equipment than we can use thus creating a surplus involving over-spending?

Mr. Pearkes: It is equipment which we are prepared to make available. I referred to the coastal escort vessels which recently went to Turkey. They were vessels which we did not require particularly for our coastal patrol work now as we have replaced them with a superior type of naval craft such as the St. Laurent type of destroyer escort. Therefore we have been able to make these vessels available. They are of use in the rather narrow waters along the Turkish coast and the Turkish navy was delighted to have the opportunity to acquire them.

We have also made certain aircraft available which we did not need any longer in Canada for our particular conditions here because they were replaced by such aircraft as the CF-100. On the other hand, they would be very suitable to other NATO countries where distances are not so great and climatic conditions are different. We have also made available quite a quantity of vehicles of various types. I have a list here of some of the types of aircraft. We made 200 Harvard aircraft available together with spare parts. We made available 25 T-33 trainers with a good many spare parts.

We were fortunate in arranging a deal with the government of Belgium whereby they took some CF-100's and we also made spare parts available. Certain guns have been made available and certain air force clothing and that sort of thing. There is a whole host of articles which these other countries are delighted to receive and to utilize in their armed forces, thereby increasing the general deterrent.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Then actually it is material which has become obsolete for our purpose but might be useful to them?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. I am not quite certain that "obsolete" is the right word. I would say it is material that we are able to make available.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I take it that completes the details under resolution No. 240.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, I think there is a supplementary appropriation for the United Nations emergency force. A blank was left for the amount for 1957-1958. Perhaps the minister would like to fill that in. It is at the bottom of page 347.

Mr. Pearkes: That is UNEF. That was voted last November.

Mr. Henderson: Is there no estimate for 1957-58?

Mr. Pearkes: There is nothing in it for this year. There is no item in the present estimates for that. That was a year ago.

Mr. Marler: I should like to ask the minister where the money is coming from if there is no appropriation.

Mr. Pearkes: It comes out of pay and allowances for the troops who are employed in the United Nations force.

Mr. Marler: I am afraid that is merely repeating the question I have asked. What item includes the pay and allowances for the Canadian contribution to UNEF?

Mr. Pearkes: There was a supplementary appropriation in the 1956-57 estimates. Nothing is included in the estimates we are now discussing. There is no item for 1957-58.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, the point I was trying to elicit was this. As I see the situation, last year $1 was voted for 1956-57. Inasmuch as UNEF is still in being and the men are still serving where is the item which includes their pay and allowances?

Mr. Pearkes: That would be under the army estimates; it is included in the army estimates.

Mr. Marler: Under a preceding item we have already dealt with.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry. I was not clear about the question.

Mr. Henderson: Are there other expenses besides pay and allowances?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, there are other expenditures. There is transportation, food and that sort of thing. They are all absorbed in the army vote.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is it not the case that the item of $1 which was passed in the previous fiscal year was merely a form of legislation? It was authority to spend some of the money already included in the estimates in support of the troops assigned to UNEF.

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: I congratulate the minister on his new parliamentary assistant. At least he is in the house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was surprised that my hon. friends of the former cabinet, who put the item through, did not realize its significance.

Mr. Marler: I would say we got an assist from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—

243. Civil pension, as detailed in the estimates, $2,457.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister say a word about the pensions covered by this item? Could he tell us why they are covered by this particular item and in particular can he explain why the amounts are so small in some cases? We are being asked to vote pensions in some instances of $193, $420, $200 and so on which I take it are for a year.

Mr. Pearkes: These are all special cases. There is the pension award to the widow of a former minister of national defence which has been carired on for a number of years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The case of Mrs. Rogers is a statutory item but what we have before us now is item 243.

Mr. Pearkes: The other items are small pensions paid to three men and two women. There is one pension paid to Mr. Robert A. Allen who was employed as a civilian truck driver and suffered an accident which resulted in an injury to an ankle joint. A pension of $269 per annum was authorized in 1918, and has been included in the annual estimates ever since.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How much did the minister say it was?

Mr. Pearkes: The information here is that the pension is $269.52 per annum.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the details in the back of the book it is listed as $193.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry; it was originally that amount and has now been reduced to $193.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There has been a bit of inflation since that time. Surely the pension should have gone the other way.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Pearkes: The pension was reduced in 1946 and has been at that lower amount ever since. It is possible that the man may be overcoming his injury. It was an injury to his ankle, and perhaps he is getting better.

Mr. Marler: Is the minister paying this pension in 1946 dollars?

Mr. Pearkes: There is a pension listed here which was awarded in May, 1926 to Michael Joseph Mountain, a boilermaker, employed at the dockyard in Halifax, who sustained a fall resulting in both wrists being broken and other minor injuries. The medical reports indicated that the wrists were permanently disabled and a life pension of $420 per annum was awarded.

These are the sort of things which are covered where civilians working for the department suffer some injury. There is no provision to include them in the general pension scheme and special cases have been made. All of these pensions have been in existence for a number of years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the fact that other pensions have been increased to some extent because of changed conditions I wonder if the minister would not consider reviewing these pensions? If these people are still alive, with broken ankles and broken wrists, this amount of money seems rather small.

Mr. Pearkes: I shall be pleased to have them all reviewed. I am sure they are all alive, otherwise they would not be getting the pension.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Some people might need a pension where they go.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to ask the minister a question. It has been drawn to my attention now that under special circumstances you can get a pension. Some time ago I had a constituent of mine whose husband was killed in France while a member of the air force. He left a widow and two very small children. She could not get a pension. Would it be proper for me to bring this before the minister?

Mr. Pearkes: If the hon. member will bring the case to my attention I will have it thoroughly reviewed, and if it comes within the terms—

Mr. Bryce: I might say, in fairness to the minister, that I have been working on it from different angles without any success whatever. I will certainly give him the particulars of the case, because it is deplorable that Canada neglects a young widow in that way. This man was killed while he was serving with the air force, but she could not get a pension because he went on leave at six o'clock at night and was killed at eight.

Mr. Pearkes: I will be pleased to look into that. Considering the efforts I am sure the hon. member has made in the past it would appear to be a somewhat difficult case but I will do the best I can.

Item agreed to.

244. To authorize in respect of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force on leave without pay and serving as instructors with civilian training organizations operating under the British Commonwealth air training plan who were killed, payment to their dependents of amounts equal to the amounts such dependents would have received under the Pension Act, as amended, had such service as instructors been military service in the armed forces of Canada, less the value of any benefits received by such dependents under insurance contracts which were effected on the lives of such members of the Royal Canadian Air Force by or at the expense of the civilian organizations, $3,840.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to ask the minister what happens in the event of these men becoming injured instead of getting killed while flying? Are they covered under the Pension Act?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not know offhand whether they receive a pension if they are injured. I shall have to look that up.

Mr. Quelch: Since you are looking after the wives it seems to me there should be some provision to guarantee that if pilots are injured while flying they should be pensionable. They are performing a very necessary service.

Mr. Pearkes: So far as I can see, these pensions are given to the dependants of men who lost their lives. There is no indication that under this vote they receive anything for disability, but I should think that if they receive disabilities they would be given a pension by the Department of Veterans Affairs. However, I shall look into it further and let the hon. member know.

Item agreed to.

245. Government contributions to the permanent services pension account, $47,281,909.

Mr. Henderson: I notice that for 1957-58 the amount is $47,281,909. I should like to ask how much this has increased as a result of the increases in pay to service personnel this year? How much has the government's contribution to this item increased?

Mr. Pearkes: We have not got that information here. This is a pension fund which is contributory for personnel who are retiring, and it is the government's contribution to that?

Mr. Henderson: It is the government's contribution to the permanent pension account about which I was asking.

Mr. Marler: Is the minister not going to supply some information with regard to this question? It seems to me it is quite clear that this item of $47,281,909 was established at the time these estimates were prepared away back near the end of 1956. Of course, we know there have been increases in pay and allowances. Surely, that must be reflected by an increase in the government contribution to this permanent services pension account. I supposed, Mr. Chairman, that we would find something in the further supplementary estimates for this, but in looking through them I find no provision whatever.

I should like to ask the minister in what way is provision going to be made for this increased contribution which I take it the government will make in respect of the officers and men who are receiving higher pay and allowances as a result of the government decision taken late in June or early July of 1957?

Mr. Pearkes: I am told there will be about a 5 per cent increase in that amount.

Mr. Marler: So, Mr. Chairman, in round figures that would mean something a little under $2.5 million. The question I had really put to the minister was, when is provision being made for this $2.5 million?

Mr. Pearkes: I am not sure how it will be covered. We might have to bring in a supplementary estimate to cover that amount, or it might be possible to absorb it.

Mr. Marler: Quite frankly, I do not want to quarrel with the minister, but in view of the fact there is going to be an increase of nearly $2.5 million I find it difficult to see how that can be absorbed. I can see that it might be possible to absorb that within the total budget, but I cannot see that there is sufficient flexibility for funds available in some other part of the defence vote to be transferred to this vote No. 245.

Mr. Pearkes: If it is found necessary we will have to bring in a supplementary estimate before the end of the year to cover that increase in pensions.

Mr. Marler: So in effect, Mr. Chairman, there is really an increase in expenditure that is in prospect for this part of the budget?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. There is bound to be an increase in expenditure because of the increase in the pay.

Mr. Henderson: Before this item passes I wonder whether the minister will assure us that before the end of the fiscal year this credit will be made to this account so that the government will have fulfilled its pension arrangements with the service personnel and they will have made their contribution of approximately $2.5 million to this account.

Mr. Pearkes: If anybody goes out on pension before the end of the year most certainly it will be fulfilled. His pension will be based on the pay and allowances he received at the time of retirement.

Mr. Henderson: I do not just mean with respect to individuals. I mean with respect to over-all service personnel who are expecting that the government will make this contribution. I want the undertaking from the minister that this obligation will be fulfilled before the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. Pearkes: Certainly it will be fulfilled before the end of the fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

Loans, investments and advances—

527. To authorize loans to be made in the current and subsequent fiscal years in respect of housing projects constructed, pursuant to an agreement with the Minister of National Defence, for occupancy by members of the Canadian forces; such loans to be at interest rates and in accordance with such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, $5,000,000.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether the minister could indicate to us how many housing units have been constructed this year under the provisions of this item No. 527.

Mr. Pearkes: Which item is under discussion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Item No. 527. The chairman called it without telling us on what page it was to be found.

Mr. Pearkes: I could not give you the actual figure of the number of housing units which are going to be built. I do not think we have it here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the minister give us any indication as to whether this money is being used and, if so, to what extent? After all, we should not be asked to vote $5 million without some comment on it. I realize that it is only $5 million but still we should know something about it. Maybe the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount knows the answer.

Mr. Pearkes: I believe there are a number of housing schemes in connection with some of the camps in which the department is not actually building the houses but where the houses are being built on an agreed rental basis and the personnel of the services rent those houses where there are not military quarters provided. The exact number I do not know but I believe there is such a scheme on the outskirts of Winnipeg close to the air force station at Stevenson field.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I appreciate the fact that the minister does not have the type of information that I have been seeking but I would hope that in some way, without holding up this item, we might get information as to what has been done under this item during this year. His statement as to the purpose of the item accords with the information we have had.

Mr. Pearkes: I have just received a note which says that no housing units have been built under this item during the present year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then why are we voting the money?

Mr. Pickersgill: Just in case.

Mr. Pearkes: One thing is that the year is not yet over and we are hoping that we shall be able to get some houses built during the rest of the year.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Are any houses sold outright? I know there is provision for a loan which has to be at a given rate of interest.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not believe any of these houses are sold outright. That is the advice I have received.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do I understand from the minister that although this vote of $5 million is being sought none of it has been used thus far in this fiscal year?

Mr. Pearkes: That is the information I now have. None of this money has yet been spent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has there been any request for houses to be built under the provision of this legislation?

Mr. Pearkes: I am told that there have been no requests for the loan of this money. This is money made available for loans and there have been no requests made for such loans up to now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the minister might lend this money to his colleague the Minister of Public Works. I am sure there are many places where he can use it.

Item agreed to.

528. To authorize in the current and subsequent fiscal years, under such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, a capital assistance loan to the town of Oromocto, New Brunswick, to be covered by town debentures, for the purpose of assisting in the completion of the physical development of municipal works (revote), $1,500,000.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister whether anything is being done with this money in this fiscal year? I notice it is a revote of money that was voted in a previous year. Apparently there are a few places where money is being voted and not being spent.

Mr. Pearkes: I know something of this town of Oromocto which is on the outskirts of Gagetown. It is a very interesting experiment in which the military and civilian authorities are working together with the idea of trying to make a self-sustaining unit adjacent to Gagetown camp. The amount of $1,500,000 is authorized. I am told that money is expected to be spent before the end of the year. As to how much has been spent up to date, I have not that information.

Item agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): That completes the Department of National Defence.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether he can give any indication now as to what the business of the house will be on Tuesday?

Mr. Green: Yes. As I announced last night, Monday will be private members' day. Agreement has been reached between the parties that on Tuesday there will be a one-day supply motion, with a vote on any amendment taking place at 8.15 p.m.

Mr. Marler: Can the leader of the house project his mind forward past Tuesday and tell us what we are going to do during the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: No. I am very sorry but I cannot give that information.

It being four minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CHRYSLER CORPORATION—ROCKET PROJECT

Question No. 308—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the Minister of National Defence received representations for the extension of the rocket project contract with Chrysler Corporation of Canada?

2. If so, have steps been taken by the government to continue this project?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State):

1. Yes.

2. Future requirements for these rockets are being determined on an urgent basis by the Department of National Defence. Confirmation of the need for more rockets would allow procurement to proceed. Negotiations have already been commenced with Chrysler Corporation with a view to possible extension of the current contract.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

240. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including costs incurred in the participation of the Canadian forces in the United Nations emergency force and contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic treaty organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $130,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,338,164,131 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,521,731,982 will come due for payment in future years), $1,669,450,149.

General services—

241. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $259,175.

242. War museum, $26,970.

Pensions and other benefits—

243. Civil pensions, as detailed in the estimates, $2,457.

244. To authorize in respect of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force on leave without pay and serving as instructors with civilian training organizations operating under the British commonwealth air training plan who were killed, payment to their dependents of amounts equal to the amounts such dependents would have received under the Pension Act, as amended, had such service as instructors been military service in the armed forces of Canada, less the value of any benefits received by such dependents under insurance contracts which were effected on the lives of such members of the Royal Canadian Air Force by or at the expense of the civilian organizations, $3,840.

Defence Services Pension Act—

245. Government contribution to the permanent services pension account, $47,281,909.

Loans, investments and advances—

527. To authorize loans to be made in the current and subsequent fiscal years in respect of housing projects constructed, pursuant to an agreement with the Minister of National Defence, for occupancy by members of the Canadian forces; such loans to be at interest rates and in accordance with such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, $5,000,000

528. To authorize in the current and subsequent fiscal years, under such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, a capital assistance loan to the town of Oromocto, New Brunswick, to be covered by town debentures, for the purpose of assisting in the completion of the physical development of municipal works (revote), $1,500,000.

APPENDIX

LETTER TO PREMIER OF QUEBEC RESPECTING FOREST ACCESS ROADS

Ottawa, January 2, 1958.

The Honourable Maurice L. Duplessis,
Premier of the Province of Quebec,
Quebec, P.Q.

My dear Premier:

Under the Canada Forestry Act the government of Canada has offered financial assistance to all provinces with respect to the completion and maintenance of provincial inventories of forest resources, certain kinds of reforestation projects, and, more recently, capital expenditures required for forest fire protection.

My colleagues and I feel that the protection of the forests against fire is a matter of particular importance. Although substantial improvements have been made in this field in recent years, forest fire losses are still excessive and constitute a major deterrent to the application of sound silvicultural practices in forest management.

Good access roads are essential to the attainment of adequate forest fire protection, as well as for other forest management requirements. The seventh British commonwealth forestry conference, which recently met in Australia and New Zealand, recommended that "road systems be developed wherever necessary to permit maximum efficiency and economy in the management and protection of the forests and in the utilization of their produce".

In view of the foregoing and also in view of the need to provide additional employment this winter and spring my colleagues and I are of the opinion that the time is now opportune, if the provinces are so disposed, to enter into agreements under the Canada Forestry Act to provide for additional federal financial aid to the provinces for the construction of forest access roads and trails. The agreement envisaged would be essentially along the following lines:

(a) The road and trail construction programs to which the federal government would contribute would be planned and executed by the provinces. The federal contribution would be 50 per cent of the cost, the remainder being paid by the province or by a forest protective association.

(b) Federal aid under this proposal would apply to expenditures incurred between the date of this letter and June 30, 1958, and the maintenance of roads and trails would be a provincial responsibility.

(c) The forest access roads and trails included in such programs would be those required for forest fire protection excluding, of course, county or municipal roads and provincial highways.

(d) Canada would not make any contribution with respect to the acquisition of any land or right of way.

I should be glad of your views on this proposal, and of your advice at the earliest possible date as to whether an agreement along the lines indicated above would be acceptable to the government of your province. In the event that it does prove acceptable, a preliminary estimate of the cost of the program you envisage would also be appreciated.

In the meantime, if you wish your officials to obtain further details as to the agreement we might propose, they might contact Mr. J. D. B. Harrison, director of the forestry branch of this department. I have asked him to work out the detailed terms of a possible agreement under the general terms mentioned above.

Yours sincerely,
Alvin Hamilton.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 6, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEASURE TO ENSURE FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, consideration should be given to the advisability of taking whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein the following heading and sections:

"XII HUMAN RIGHTS

148. Notwithstanding anything in this act, it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to make laws:

(a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.

(b) Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbitrary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.

(c) Requiring or imposing excessive bail or cruel or unusual punishment or exiling Canadian citizens.

(d) Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence.

(e) Subjecting any person to arbitrary arrest or detention or denying to any person the right after arrest to be informed promptly of the charges against such person and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.

(f) Suspending the right of habeas corpus or depriving any person of a fair trial or the right to be represented by counsel.

149. The rights provided in section 148 shall be enjoyed without distinction of race, sex, religion or language and the right to vote in any election of members of the parliament of Canada or the legislative assembly of any province shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, religion, language or sex.

150. The rights conferred by sections 148 and 149 hereof of this act shall not be deemed to abridge any existing right of any person."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I may say at the outset that this resolution is being seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald). I do not propose to speak at any great length this afternoon on the resolution because I want the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway to deal with it more from the legalistic point of view than probably I am equipped to do.

This resolution has been introduced on several previous occasions, and I may say it is very similar to the proposals made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he moved a resolution in the house along similar lines in 1954. Consequently today I hope it will receive from the government in power at the present time, shall I say, a somewhat more sympathetic reception than it has received previously. I do not wish to imply that any members of the late government were opposed to the substance of the resolution or of the specific proposals, but the former minister of justice, Mr. Garson, took the position that an amendment of this description was unnecessary since in his view the preamble to the British North America Act carried into our own legislation or our own rights the rights that have been so well established over the centuries in Britain and through the parliament of Britain, it carried with it all the rights that are implied or expressed in a proposal of this description. But I believe the time has come, and in the circumstances in which we live, when we should have expressed the civil rights and freedoms of the Canadian citizen in our constitution and as an integral part of that constitution.

As a matter of fact, of course, this parliament, unlike the provincial legislatures, represents the whole of Canada; consequently when we suggest that this parliament should legislate in the manner proposed by the resolution it is not because we feel that there should be any interference with provincial rights and functions, comprising as they do specific rights regarding property and civil affairs. Yet we feel that written into our constitution there should be a statement of the rights of Canadian citizens generally as Canadians; and particularly now that we have a citizenship act under which the people of Canada are citizens of Canada as well as British subjects we think it would be well to have in our own constitution a bill of rights.

As I said a moment ago, I do not propose to go into all the arguments in favour of it, but we remember that in recent years there has been interference with fundamental rights from time to time. I do not want to raise any controversy regarding events which took place some years ago, but we do recollect that in one of our provinces legislation was proposed that would limit to some extent at least freedom of the press, the rights of certain employees of financial institutions, and so on. Another province had certain legislation on its statute books for some time which was not disallowed by the federal government but was subsequently thrown out by the Supreme Court of Canada.

May I say in passing that I think we all appreciate the manner in which the Supreme Court of Canada, when it has been called upon from time to time to consider matters of these descriptions, has protected some fundamental rights of Canadian citizenship, particularly in those respects I have already mentioned.

While the Supreme Court of Canada has from time to time protected the civil rights of Canadians, nevertheless it seems to us, as I said a few moments ago, that having regard to the circumstances and the times in which we live, the time has come when there should be a clear and explicit statement as to the civil rights of Canadians generally, and that such rights should be spelled out in definite legislation enacted by parliament in order to ensure that they shall not be improperly infringed.

The right of freedom of speech and expression is a right that from time to time has been interfered with, not only by legislative bodies but sometimes by private individuals. Then there is freedom of religion, and again in very recent times there have been cases before the Supreme Court of Canada in which the court was called upon to determine whether or not legislation in a province did interfere with the religious rights of Canadian citizens. Of course two of the most fundamental of all our rights are freedom of association and freedom of the press, and to our way of thinking these rights should be spelled out explicitly in an act of the Canadian parliament.

Then, of course, some of us also remember that a few years ago we had an unfortunate situation—and while the end was probably a good one we believe that the end never justifies the means—when certain citizens of Canada were picked up, held incommunicado, were not given any warning that anything they said at that time would or might be used against them subsequently, and had no access to legal advice.

This was done; and whether or not people believe that the government of the day was justified in some instances in doing what it did, I do not believe there was justification. Ultimately some of those who were charged were judged by the courts to be innocent, but they had been picked up and held in this manner. Consequently it cannot be said that provisions of this description are not necessary within our constitution to protect the civil and legal rights of our people. After all, our freedoms in these domocratic countries, and particularly countries with institutions like our own, are freedoms under the law. The law, of course, is made by this parliament, and in some respects by the legislatures.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

It seems to us, consequently, that the law should explicitly spell out what some of these fundamental freedoms really are, so there should be no doubt about them. Then, of course, there is the right of everybody to those things that are private, to a man and his family, which should be protected. There should be no arrest, no arbitrary detention by a government, a minister or any officer of the crown, of this parliament or of any authority, and we should have a provision in our legislation so this could not be done under any circumstances.

I have no doubt that this afternoon something will be said with regard to the centuries old right of habeas corpus, the right of a lawyer or someone to appear in court and demand that a person be produced so that he shall not be improperly detained for any length of time without being brought before a magistrate or other proper authority so he may be accused and at least given an opportunity to make his first plea. It seems to me this is fundamental to our basic rights under the law as we have known it for centuries. These rights should all be enjoyed by every citizen, at least, of Canada—I was going to say every resident, but at least every citizen without regard to race, creed, colour or religion. I need not add that in our own country such rights have been denied because of race, because of colour and sometimes of religion.

I recall very vividly the controversy during the years prior to the first world war when so many of our citizens of Asian origin on the Pacific coast were not treated as first-class Canadian citizens. I recall that because of their religious persuasion a body of people in this country were also denied the right of the franchise in one of our Canadian provinces. I am thinking particularly of the Doukhobors in British Columbia. This disability was, of course, removed later.

Sometimes it is said that Doukhobors have been a nuisance in Canada. I want to say immediately that is only partly correct, because the vast majority of these people professing that religion today are amongst our most law abiding citizens, at least in the province from which I come and to a very large extent in British Columbia. I think it is unfortunate that a whole group of people should be characterized as unlawful and disobedient to the laws of the land in which they live because a small percentage of them commit acts which none of us can condone. However, those disabilities have been removed but there are disabilities that still remain. It seems to me that we should legislate so that beyond peradventure the basic rights of Canadian citizenship should be guaranteed to all our people.

That, of course, is the purpose of this resolution. In former days the resolution was usually talked out. The resolution introduced by the present Prime Minister, I recollect, was talked out in 1954 and the resolution I moved as late as 1956 was also talked out. In a resolution of this description there is no question of confidence in the government. This is not a confidence measure, and I take it that all persons sitting in all quarters of the house would have the right to vote as they think fit, regardless of party affiliations.

I think it is a good thing that from time to time we are able to do this. In fact I am one of those who hold the view that unless a motion or an amendment is of such a nature that it involves an expressed want of confidence in a government it should not be so regarded, and that only when it is so stated as a confidence motion should members be governed by the party affiliations which they may have. In this case we are relieved of that obligation, so every member of the house is free to express himself and to vote according to the way he thinks and feels.

I do not propose to go into this matter to any extent, Mr. Speaker, because as I say I want my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway to have an opportunity of dealing with some of the problems. I have discussed this matter in the house so frequently in former years that I thought a fresh approach by one who has made something of a study of this matter would be acceptable to the house.

Before I sit down I want to say that of course I am not pretending that the spelling out of this amendment is entirely my own work. As a matter of fact, in writing this resolution I had the advice and assistance of some of the ablest constitutional lawyers in Canada whose names, if I mentioned them, would be familiar to hon. members and who are regarded as outstanding authorities in this particular field. They assisted me and advised me that this resolution as it stands is entirely within the right of this parliament, and that in their opinion its subject matter should be written into the constitution of Canada.

With those words, Mr. Speaker, I am going to invite the consideration of the hon. members of the house.

Mr. D. J. Walker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I first compliment, on behalf of the members of the house, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on his eloquent and at the same time succinct outline of this problem which faces all of us. I want to say what a pleasure it is to sit opposite the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He enunciates principles and he enunciates them well. While I seldom have been able to agree with him, on this occasion I think the majority of the members of the house do so. We respect him because of his parliamentary ability and also because he is a very kindly man.

May I say that it is very fitting that we should pause today in our mad rush of material thinking to consider matters which are far more important, matters of the spirit. Transcending all others is the question of our freedom. This is close to all our hearts and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that in this debate which takes place after all on private members' day, as suggested by my hon. friend everybody will express himself free of any party affiliations and free of any party duties.

I know the hon. gentleman will have no objection if I briefly trace—because he has taken the opportunity of doing so himself—the history of the proposed bill of rights in this house. Not today, not yesterday but almost 12 years ago a certain member of this house tried to get a bill of rights resolution on the order paper. Not being able to do that, he moved an amendment to the citizenship act in order to bring the matter before the house. Within a short time a petition signed by 500,000 or more Canadians insisted that a bill of rights should be passed by this house.

From that day to the present time, one resolution after another advocating a bill of rights has been placed on the order paper by this certain person. I need hardly identify the member of the house whom I have in mind because to the older members of this house his name is so well known. He is none other than the then member for Lake Centre who is now the Prime Minister of Canada.

The first time he raised this matter was in May, 1946. A year later he took part in a very important debate, the reading of which I commend to all members of this house. In 1947, as found at page 3149 of Hansard, he started the pilgrimage and, as you know so well, the matter has been taken up very ably by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as well as by many other hon. members.

As a result of the speech of 1947 tremendous interest was created in Canada with respect to a bill of rights. Not only did the speech catch the imagination of the Canadian people but it was cited in the United Nations and, I understand, was used when the United Nations was drafting its fundamental bill of rights, the universal bill of rights, a year later. Furthermore, one year after the speech of this hon. member the declaration of human rights was passed by the United Nations assembly, namely in December, 1948. In addition great interest was stirred in England. I found last summer during a visit to parliament at Westminster with some members of that house that our Prime Minister was recalled in one connection in particular, as the champion of the bill of rights.

In 1952 we had his resolution finally placed on the order paper and, his motion having been made and debated, three years later, in 1955, he again moved the same resolution in the same wording. On the same occasion he submitted to the hon. members of this house a draft bill for their consideration; a bill, Mr. Speaker, which was originally drafted by certain honourable members in the other place and amended at that time by the then member for Prince Albert.

May I today very briefly compare the resolution moved by the former member for Prince Albert, as a matter of fact the member for Lake Centre at that time, when that resolution was before the house. It is very short and I would like to read it into the record. It is to be found at page 714 of the 1952 debates, as follows:

> Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre) moved:
> That, in the opinion of this house, immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of introducing a bill or declaration of rights to assure amongst other rights:
> 1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of radio;
> 2. That habeas corpus shall not be abrogated or suspended except by parliament;
> 3. That no one shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, and in no case by order in council;
> 4. That no tribunal or commission shall have the power to compel the giving of evidence by anyone who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

And then, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to note the following in particular because it is most important and it always has been the view of the Prime Minister. It reads:

> And that as a preliminary step the government should consider the advisability of submitting for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to the degree to which fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual are matters of federal or provincial jurisdiction.

Without making any minute comparison of the two resolutions I think it can be said that clause (a) of the resolution presented by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is similar to clause 1 of the resolution presented by my leader on March 24, 1952, when he was the hon. member for Lake Centre; clause (b) is similar to clause 3, clause (e) is similar to clause 4 and clause (f) is similar to clause 2. There is of course a great deal of similarity between the two resolutions although there is a difference in implementation.

After reading over the freedoms enunciated in the resolution presented by the then hon. member for Lake Centre it occurred to me to wonder whether, if he had included another clause dealing with freedom of enterprise, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would have included that in the resolution before the house today.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not include economic freedom or freedom from monopoly; I should have done so.

Mr. Walker: I thank my hon. friend for that suggestion.

Mr. Coldwell: Which is quite different.

Mr. Walker: I had in mind giving my views on this very important subject, particularly on the principles involved which were so eloquently expressed today and which have been so expressed in the past by my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar; but I think it would be far better and would take far less time if I were to refer to a speech made by the leader of my party when he was the hon. member for Lake Centre in 1947. I shall do so briefly, referring only to a few excerpts from the remarks he made on that occasion as recorded at page 3152 of the debates of this house for May 16, 1947. At that time the then hon. member for Lake Centre stated:

> What would a bill of rights do? It would assert the right of the individual to go into the courts of this country, thereby assuring the preservation of his freedoms. These great traditional rights are merely pious ejaculations unless the individual has the right to assert them in the courts of law.

He then discussed the difference between democratic governments and authoritarian governments and stated:

> The difference between democratic government and authoritarian government is this, that, while democracy gives rights of the individual against the state, authoritarianism annihilates the rights of the individual. Democracy enthrones the sacredness of human dignity, while authoritarianism enthrones the power of the state.

He then went on to discuss what a bill of rights must declare, in these words:

> A bill of rights must declare for this country a government of laws, not of men. And only under a government of laws can there be a full development of the human personality.

He then discussed freedom:

> Freedom today must be fought for, as it was in the past. Freedom is indivisible; there cannot be fractional freedom in our country. When the state is supreme over the individual, then every person must be prepared to act on instructions from the state. Then personal freedom ends.

I wonder if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will agree with the following:

> History shows that if the state plans and provides for the individual, the state must have an unchallengeable right to direct the individual as to where he must go and what he must do. And when that is done, freedom ends.

My final reference is to be found at page 3158 of Hansard of May 16, 1947, where my leader discussed civil liberties in these words:

> What are civil liberties? The most sacred things of the human personality. They epitomize our belief in the dignity of the human being; they translate that dignity into rights which the individual can enjoy against the state or against other all-powerful individuals within the state. Civil liberties constitute the individual a sacred being. Civil liberties make him a sovereign in his dealings with the state, provided that he remains within the law.

There we have the situation succinctly and eloquently stated. I must say to my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that the expressions he used today and on previous occasions when discussing this matter are somewhat similar to those used by the then hon. member for Lake Centre. Year after year for almost 12 years the present Prime Minister has outlined a bill of rights to this house; and without detracting in any way from the honour and recognition due to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for having brought in the resolution before us today, and not only today but in 1955 and 1956, I have attempted to outline the history and background of a bill of rights.

I know the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not object to my doing so, and by the nodding of his head I took it that he encouraged me in my attempt to outline the history of what I consider to be a movement to ensure our freedom. As we look back over the long pilgrimage of the present Prime Minister in public life we can only conclude that this bill of rights, his brain child, will soon have its fruition and be realized.

It is true, and I say this without reference to politics, that the bill of rights is synonymous with the name Diefenbaker and the name Diefenbaker is inextricably bound up in the bill of human rights. The conception of the bill of rights held by my leader is that it is a great charter of human freedom. For the Canadian people, particularly in "Cabbagetown" in my constituency of Rosedale, their ideal of freedom is personified in the person of the Prime Minister. His life typifies it. He lives, breathes and has his being in freedom. I hope it will not sound or be considered political if I suggest that the present government typifies it also, because it is a government free of prejudice, free of fear, free of any outside interests which control it. The government of the day, with freedom and fearlessness, is attempting to put on the statute books those things which it feels the Canadian people are seeking at the present time.

Therefore when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar moves the resolution he has brought forward today I know he is doing so in the interests of the Canadian people. Because it is not in his nature, I know he is not attempting to substitute himself for the Prime Minister as the champion of this bill of rights, nor in his own mind was he thinking for one moment that the Prime Minister has forgotten the subject closest to his heart over the years. All the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is doing is helping us out and making his contribution to the fulfillment of the desire of so many millions of Canadians.

May I say that although the Prime Minister might be called the father of the bill of rights, I am sure no hon. member of this house would object to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar being known as one of the uncles of the bill of rights.

Mr. Coldwell: The uncle may be right, you know.

Mr. Walker: Thank you very much. Of course there is one great difference between the resolution presented today by my honourable and learned friend and that advocated by my leader over the years, but it is only a difference in the modus operandi, the way in which it will be worked out. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar proposes an amendment to the constitution, the British North America Act, and in that regard he has received certain assistance from constitutional lawyers. The Prime Minister on the other hand proposes, not that we should take that circuitous and lengthy way, but that the bill of rights should be enacted as a dominion statute.

Now may I say this lest there be any doubt about it. The government is in favour of a bill of rights, but it is a matter of such importance and of such far-reaching consequence, that when it is enacted it will rank with the important constitutional documents of western democracy. There is no question about that. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we must move cautiously. There is a great deal of homework to be done, because the Liberal government which occupied office for 22 years spent part of 11 years in opposing a bill of rights. Never did the opportunity really come for a vote on this important subject. Therefore for the first time the skilled law officers of the crown have had their attention turned to implementing a bill of rights and the working out of this problem.

I am delighted to learn from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that one of those who serve under him, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, I understand himself a lawyer, is going to expound to this house how we can bring a bill of rights into being. I would be delighted to have his assistance. Here are some of the problems which must face the government and hon. members before an act can be finally passed. I am not going to solve them at this time; I am going to outline them very briefly, and I would be glad to have the assistance of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

First, should a bill be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and, if so, how? Should it be a draft bill, with the question asked as to whether it is within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, keeping in mind, Mr. Speaker, that in constitutional law Canada is woefully lacking, as the hon. member I am sure will agree, in decisions on questions of this kind? In other words, where do the rights of the dominion cease under section 91 of the British North America Act and where do the rights of the provinces under section 92 begin, particularly when one discusses such abstract but very real values as freedom? Second, should we submit a series of questions to the supreme court? As my hon. friend no doubt is fully aware, to do so is very difficult because we must frame questions of law as distinct from questions of policy which latter, of course, the supreme court will not deal with.

Third, should we have a parliamentary committee to explore and agree on a draft that will be suitable to parliament when it finally reaches parliament? Fourth, would it be premature to submit a draft to the supreme court and then, having their approval, come back to the house to find that it is not acceptable to hon. members, or should the government by-pass the courts and reach rapport with the provinces by calling them into session, having a dominion-provincial conference on the question of a bill of rights, in which the property and civil rights of the provinces would be properly protected? Fifth, should the government itself draft a bill for the approval of and amendment by the provinces, send it to them and have them deal with it? Sixth, should we draft a strictly federal bill? Is this possible under the circumstances, in view of the property and civil rights of the provinces?

Then we must consider very carefully and with great respect the resolution of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who suggests that this legislation should be in the form of an amendment to the British North America Act. If the amendment concerns matters of purely federal jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker, it can be made without provincial consent; but if the matter concerns, as his resolution concerns, matters which are within the peculiar and distinct rights of the provinces then, Mr. Speaker, it is a very serious matter and, as my hon. friend so well knows, would involve its submission to the British House of Commons, but only after the amendment had been concurred in not only by the federal government but by each of the 10 provinces involved. And that, in the history at least of amendments to the British North America Act, is something which is not very often done.

Another problem on which my hon. friends who follow me might assist us is this. Would it be better to avoid an amendment to the British North America Act and substitute a statute instead, as suggested by the Prime Minister? The ninth question is this. Should a bill of rights exclude the application of the War Measures Act in time of emergency? Or how should the War Measures Act be handled in the circumstances if we are to have a bill of rights, as we most certainly hope we shall?

The tenth question is this. Could the whole thing be wrapped up and handled by a declaration of human rights passed by this parliament? I am giving no suggestions at this time for a solution; but I do ask the house to believe that the government has this matter in hand. It is being given very careful consideration by my chief, the distinguished Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), as well as by myself and the law officers in his department.

The question might be asked; why incorporate freedom in a statute? That question has often been asked and I am sure has been asked in this house. Have we freedom at this time? Yes, we have freedom at the present time; and, of course, although this may appear to my hon. friend to be partisan, we hope we shall continue to have freedom as long as a Conservative government is in power in this dominion. Of course that might be for the next 22 years, and this matter might not appear to be too urgent; but everyone knows —and no one knows this better than the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—that freedom has a habit of slipping very quickly away in crises and in changes. We know that eternal vigilance is always the price of freedom.

My suggestion to hon. members is this. We have freedom at the present time; but we should have an anchor to which the principles of freedom can be attached. That anchor is a statute, so that new Canadians and old Canadians can pick up that statute and say, "These are our freedoms; these are our rights."

May I give my French-speaking friends an illustration of the importance of incorporating freedom into law. In 1763, as a result of the treaty of Paris, 60,000 French-speaking Canadians were left in this country; and had it not been for statute and for law, including the Quebec Act of 1774 and subsequent acts, does one think for one moment that the great French Canadian race would have continued its freedom of language, its freedom of religion and its freedom of law? I think these freedoms might have been done away with. But almost 200 years later we find that as a result of incorporating those freedoms into law the 60,000 French Canadian population has increased to a population of almost 5 million, still French speaking, still practising their own religion and still practising their own civil law, a veritable island in a sea of 185 million English speaking citizens on the North American continent.

This is an example of how freedom incorporated into law can succeed. Louisiana, populated by French people, as a result of the Louisiana purchase became part of the United States, and did so without any statutory protection, to preserve their freedoms. Nothing was incorporated into law, with the result that what was once a great French culture and a delightful French people, are gone. They have disappeared; they have been swallowed up in the great American democracy. Why? Because there was no law to protect them.

Mr. Fulton: No anchor.

Mr. Walker: As the Minister of Justice points out, there was no anchor to which they could attach their freedoms, no place where they could turn to demand their freedoms. In this connection may I say that even with a law we are, of course, too well aware that our freedoms can disappear.

Russia has a bill of rights. In reading the debates of this house, I was interested to note that as the high-flown phrases of the Russian bill of rights were read to the house one member called out, "Is that the United Nations declaration"? That was a very interesting observation. Of course what a ridiculous situation! It is just as contradictory as bittersweet to have a Russian dictatorship enforcing a bill of rights. It just does not make sense.

Therefore that example is not one which should deter us in adopting a bill of rights; and in saying that I feel I have the backing of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. On the other hand, we in Canada are different. Our whole upbringing, our whole concept is democratic. May I quote once more from the speech made by the then member for Lake Centre, who expressed the concept very briefly in these words, as found at page 3150 of Hansard of May 16, 1947:

> As I agree that although parliament can make charters, the nation can only achieve what is in those charters, if the heart and soul of man demands the achievement of those ideals. I realize that you cannot make mankind good by legislation, but on the other hand, by legislation you can set out the ideals to which you wish men to attain.

May I adopt those words, Mr. Speaker, and the thoughts contained in them. May I take another example that is a symbol of our freedom. It has been my privilege as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice to work with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who come within the Department of Justice. In associating with them, I have been amazed and delighted at the manner in which they uphold the law. Their motto is "Maintiens le droit", "Uphold the law"; and, Mr. Speaker, they really do. So different are they from the Russian police who by harsh methods involving brutality and naked force are so well known. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police work through co-operation and good will with the citizens of Canada. Instead of being hard-boiled police officers they are in reality a body of professional men engaged in the work of peace officers, and a magnificent job they have done and are doing. Because we in this world need symbols as well as laws, may I say that in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, with their scarlet-coated tunics and that firm discipline which is their tradition, we have a symbol of freedom within the law.

There is one more matter I should like to discuss. Nothing worth while is ever achieved without a great deal of effort, but it is also true that all things are possible if the human spirit perists in making them possible. Nearly 12 years ago the then member for Lake Centre began his long crusade to obtain a bill of rights for Canada. We trust, Mr. Speaker, that the crusade is almost over, that the consummation of his hopes is almost realized.

In his journey he has been ably assisted by men and women in all walks of life and attached to every party, including the distinguished leader of the C.C.F. group who has moved the resolution we are discussing today. It is our hope that in the debate to follow members in every corner of the house will rise in their places and express their frank views, keeping in mind that this is a question which is above politics. Freedom transcends politics as it transcends almost all other things.

Human Rights

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, the world today is again threatened by a great dictatorship. We have been amazed by the scientific achievements of that dictatorship. Sputnik No. 1 and sputnik No. 2 have been launched. Sputnik No. 10 may in reality reach the moon. The dictatorship which threatens us may reach the moon, but, Mr. Speaker, it cannot reach God. It cannot reach God because here you have a dictatorship which has not only denied the deity but has irrevocably and ruthlessly crushed all human freedom. That dictatorship will be destroyed not from without but from within, because no civilization has long survived which has abolished any conception of human freedom and at the same time has turned its back on the deity.

By contrast here we are in this dominion, this democratic nation, with the opportunity to incorporate our present freedoms in a statute. My respectful submission to hon. members, Mr. Speaker, is this: May we enshrine freedom in our hearts and may we anchor freedom in our statutes in perpetuity just as securely as we can.

Mr. Alex. B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to have the opportunity to support the motion for a Canadian bill of rights placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and it is a pleasure to be able to follow the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice who has spoken fair words and generous sentiments.

Few matters can be of more importance to the true interests of the Canadian people. To be sure, we are not concerned here with the material standards and welfare of Canadians but with the spiritual foundations of our society. Man does not live by bread alone, and our society cannot flourish or even survive among the challenges and shocks of the modern world if we cannot restate, spell out and guarantee by law the basic human rights and freedoms of Canadians.

When Canada signed the charter of the United Nations at San Francisco in 1945 she accepted as one of the primary objectives of the United Nations "human rights and fundamental freedoms for all" as referred to in the preamble of the charter. Since 1945, of course, the United Nations has gone farther and under the inspired and inspiring leadership of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt has adopted without dissent the United Nations declaration of human rights.

Canada supported that declaration, but what have we done about implementing it? We have given to it the lip service of our political leaders. At the same time we have consigned it to a pigeonhole in one of the departments of government. The Prime Minister, then the member for Lake Centre, wrote these words in October, 1952, in a pamphlet series called "Food for Thought":

> The international declaration of human rights which was accepted by the United Nations should be placed before parliament for ratification and acceptance. Three years have gone by since it was accepted by the United Nations, but as yet Canada has not acted.

It is more than three years now, and six months have gone by since the Prime Minister assumed office. This is not a long time, to be sure, but we cannot help but be concerned. There is still no indication of any plan or intention of the government to lay the United Nations universal declaration before parliament for ratification and acceptance. We ask therefore in the course of this debate that the Prime Minister, if need be through one of his ministers, prove himself as good as these words he spoke in 1952 by making a simple statement that this will be done.

Of course the motion now before the house covers only part of the ground covered by the United Nations declaration. This motion calls for a bill of rights for Canada, for certain basic personal rights to be embodied in the British North America Act as part of our constitution. The United Nations declaration, on the other hand, went on to set forth certain economic and social rights and opportunities which should be the birthright of every child born into this world of potential abundance and freedom. The United Nations declaration mentioned economic rights and social opportunities such as the right to work, the right to shelter, medical care and education; the right to security in the event of sickness, widowhood, unemployment and so on.

We are not concerned with those opportunities in this motion. We are concerned only with the so-called civil and political rights, those liberties of the individual which should be marked out in the constitution itself as free from invasion by any government or agency, by any business or court, by any official or policeman.

It was these civil and political rights that the distinguished Dr. Charles Malik of Lebanon, then rapporteur of the human rights commission of the United Nations, had in mind when he addressed the Canadian institute at Lake Couchiching in 1950, I think it was. I should like to quote his inspiring words. He said:

> Today we find ourselves in a situation, all the world over, in which man's simple essential humanity—his power to laugh and love and think and change his mind, in freedom—is in mortal danger of extinction by reason of endless pressures from every side; governmental regulations and controls, social interferences the maddening noises of civilization, the sheer multiplicity and crowding in of events as a result of the contraction of the world, the dizziness of his mind from the infinity of material things to which he must attend.

I would add, by way of interpolation, in mortal danger of extinction, too, from the vast and anonymous aggregations of private capital, armed with the latest techniques of applied psychology, and ready to control, manipulate and erase the individuality of employees and consumers alike in their quest for greater profits and power. Dr. Malik went on to say:

> Under this external social and material pressure man is about to be completely lost. What is needful therefore is to reaffirm for him his essential humanity: to remind him that he is born free and equal in dignity and rights with his fellow men, that he is endowed by nature with reason and conscience, that he cannot be held in slavery or servitude, that he cannot be subjected to arbitrary arrest, that he is presumed innocent until proved guilty, that his person is inviolable, that he has the natural right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion and expression; and so down the list of proclaimed rights. It is this reaffirmation, if only he needs it, that might still save him from being dehumanized. For society and the state under modern conditions can take perfect care of themselves: they have advocates and sponsors on every side: their rights are in good hands. It is man, who is in danger of becoming extinct. It is man who is the unprotected orphan, the neglected ward, the forgotten treasure. And therefore it is good that the declaration has not lost sight of its main objective: to proclaim man's irreducible humanity, to the end that he may yet recover his creative sense of dignity and re-establish his faith in himself.

Of course, that is part of the process upon which we are embarked today in striving for a Canadian bill of rights. The need for that bill of rights is more compelling now than it has ever been. Past experience shows the need, and future trends even more underline that need. Who could read George Orwell's nightmarish vision of the world of the future as pictured in his novel "1984" without hoping that it was a warning rather than a prophecy of things to come? Who can put out of mind the telescreen that you cannot shut off, the telescreen that watches you even as you are watching it? Who could put out of mind the hidden microphone, the wiretapping, which can pick up every whispered intimate word? These things are scientifically possible now, and I venture to think that George Orwell, who wrote his book in 1948—the title is inverted, 1984—was describing trends, not only in Soviet Russia but trends about which we must be concerned here and now. Who can consider the prospect of an atomic arms race without feeling that in an atmosphere of insecurity, fear, suspicion and hatred our basic political rights would be in greater jeopardy in the next few years than ever before? Well, that is the future. Past experience, too, proves how precarious are the basic liberties we prize. It is true that the preamble to the British North America Act states that Canada shall have a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, and that should be a guarantee to our citizens of at least those rights of habeas corpus and Magna Carta which are part of our British heritage.

These words guarantee us nothing of the kind. They have no legal force. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to the order in council of October 6, 1945, which swept aside the centuries-old right of habeas corpus for those persons who had been implicated in the allegations made by Igor Gouzenko. They were seized and held incommunicado, held without a hearing or appeal and without benefit of legal counsel. We all breathed a sigh of relief in Canada when that star chamber proceeding had come to an end and those accused persons were put on trial in the ordinary criminal courts, with the safeguards and the rights and procedures of which they were then able to avail themselves.

Let us take another example. Legislation passed by this parliament in 1944 empowered the dominion government to seize and send to Japan numbers of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin, without charges, without trial, without any offence having been committed or alleged to have been committed by any of them. They were exiled to a foreign land by arbitrary government action. The privy council held this legislation to be perfectly valid. In the absence of a Canadian bill of rights they held properly, and had no alternative but to hold that this vicious legislation was valid. However, in this case public opinion, led I am proud to say by the members of this group, was able to prevent the act from being carried out. It was valid law in the absence of the kind of bill of rights as part of our constitution that we are now discussing.

These things can happen, have happened in the past and will happen in the future so long as, in the words of Jeremiah, "The heart of man is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." You cannot rely solely on public opinion to protect personal and minority rights. Indeed, these rights are as often as not threatened by the tyranny of the majority. You cannot rely on our courts because, barring some question of jurisdiction between the provinces and the dominion, the courts have no legal constitutional safeguards to apply and interpret in defence of personal rights.

We are often reminded in speeches on this subject of the threat to our democratic institutions posed by totalitarian tyrannies, whether of the communist or fascist variety. A distinguished writer and critic, the late Dr. B. K. Sandwell, pleading for a Canadian bill of rights as part of a delegation to parliament in 1951, said this:

> It is not enough to say that we are fighting for freedom against tyranny. We must provide man with a positive and specific dynamic faith in our way of life; one in which they believe.

We were reminded last month by George Kennan, former United States ambassador to Moscow, in one of his Reith lectures which are now being happily broadcast over the C.B.C., that the challenge of Soviet Russia today is primarily social, political and ideological. So this is no time to jettison those civil rights or indeed that striving after social equality which should be the first occupation of a democracy. These things are our secret weapons, more powerful in swaying men's minds and loyalties than all the stockpiles of nuclear bombs.

The Prime Minister has become known as the champion of a bill of rights, but I would remind the house, following what has been said by the hon. member for Rosedale—I should call him the parliamentary assistant—that the late J. S. Woodsworth fought a long and valiant fight against that iniquitous section of the Criminal Code known as section 98. I am also reminded that the record shows that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) in 1945 was the first member ever to put on the order paper of this house a resolution calling for a Canadian bill of rights, and that it was that hon. member and not the Prime Minister who in 1947 presented to this house a petition bearing 500,000 signatures in support of a bill of rights and a later petition in the following year bearing some 600,000 signatures.

However, I do not think we need to be invidious about who should get the credit for introducing the subject. We should treat it as the hon. member for Rosedale has done. He said the Prime Minister should be recognized as the father of the bill of rights and the hon. member for Rosetown Biggar as the uncle. If we go into this question at all of who the putative father is, I think we should describe the hon. member for Winnipeg North as the father so far as this house is concerned and the Prime Minister, who is a lawyer, could perhaps be described as the father in law. However, we regret that the Prime Minister, who has been a champion on this subject, has been putting off this matter since forming his government. For instance, on November 1 of last year, as reported at page 649 of Hansard, in answer to a question he said:

> The matter is still under advisement and consideration.
> [Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

I suggest that is a strange reply to come from one whose mind should have been made up on this question above all others, and I regret to say it was the tenor of the remarks of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice. I am afraid of fair words of support for a bill of rights and continued inaction. In order to secure a Canadian bill of rights we may be obliged to triumph over the friends of the bill rather than over its opponents. It would be a great pity if the matter continued to be put off by this house until say after just one more election, in the belief that perhaps one province of Canada is opposed to that bill of rights, a belief which I hold to be wholly erroneous.

As reported in Hansard of February 7, 1955, the present Prime Minister, in supporting the motion for a bill of rights, deplored the action of the Liberal government in not allowing the matter to come to a vote. They prevented a vote of the house, he said, in March of 1952 and again in December, 1953; and again, for that matter, a vote was prevented on the date in question. The Prime Minister said this about that conduct, as reported at page 895 of Hansard:

> I hope that a similar course will not be followed which simply has the effect of killing discussion and a vote, for the resolution then goes to the foot of the list and there is no possibility during the session of it coming up for further hearing.

What an ironic commentary on the conduct of public affairs if that were to be the fate of the present resolution; that is, if the government, expressing fair words for the principle, yet allowed the matter to be talked out today. Surely the time is ripe for a decision on a matter which receives the support, I am sure, of the vast majority of the members sitting in this house.

This is an urgent matter. The Prime Minister himself said so in 1952, so it can hardly be less urgent now. In the magazine Canadian Business of September, 1952, the then hon. member for Lake Centre wrote that he had—> —tried to add a bill of rights to the citizenship bill on March 7, 1946. "We still haven't a bill of rights, but I am still trying."

To which I might add in parenthesis, "So are we". He went on to say:

> I've believed in such a bill to act as an anchor of liberty all along, but now we are in urgent need of such protection.

But as I say, the passage of six years, the mounting challenge, in an age of conformity and anxiety, to man's precious right to be wrong, to be different, to be exasperating for the right as he sees it—these things add to the urgency the Prime Minister referred to in 1952.

What is the need that is so urgent? It is to write into our constitution certain common rights of Canadian citizenship which are recognized by no law today, such as free speech, freedom of assembly and the right to privacy. Note that this motion really grasps the nettle, for it asks that these civil rights be written into our constitution explicity by amending the British North America Act by adding as section 148 a binding declaration of the rights of the Canadian people. It proposes that, in Hotspur's words, "Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety".

The parliamentary assistant questioned whether this provision should be written into the constitution. I say it must be written into the constitution. This motion rejects the sufficiency of a declaration referred to by the parliamentary assistant, which would be merely an act of this parliament. It also rejects the notion that the civil rights of a Canadian should be looked for partly in the legislation of this parliament, partly in the legislation of the provinces, and partly in the common law as it is administered by the courts.

No; these rights must be embodied in the constitution itself, where alone they would be equally applicable to all Canadians in every province of Canada. We propose to build on hardpan, not upon sand. Common citizenship deserves common civil rights, immutable save by the difficult process of constitutional amendment.

The suggestion that we should rest content with a mere declaration of this parliament is not sufficient. Sometimes the call has been for a solemn declaration of rights in this parliament. At this session of the house we have been trying to find out the difference between solemn campaign promises and the ordinary kind, and we have found that both contain a great deal of air and water. Even a solemn declaration of rights by this parliament would be little better than a pious expression of good intentions, for what one parliament grants another parliament can take away.

Let us look at the experience of our great neighbour to the south. For 10 years the ugly, hysterical, vindictive clouds of McCarthyism darkened the liberties of the people of the United States. An ex-communist informer became a public hero. Teachers were dismissed if they did not extoll the materialist values of free enterprise. It was as much as your job was worth if you had been associated with a communist in your college days. But the United States supreme court slowly but consistently, in a series of decisions, reminded the people of the United States that they were born free. Men imprisoned not for what they did but for what they thought were set at liberty. Guilt by association was found to offend against the United States bill of rights. But no one seriously doubts that if those rights had not been embodied in the actual United States constitution itself they would have been swept away in those 10 years of fear and suspicion.

I appreciate that the Supreme Court of Canada has tried to protect the civil rights of Canadians in a number of noteworthy decisions. These rights were implicit in our law, but a reading of these cases shows that this is not enough. They must be made explicit in our constitution.

There is the well-known case of Saumur and the city of Quebec, which was reported in 1953. Since 1933 a by-law of the city of Quebec, supported by provincial legislation, was in effect as follows:

> It is by the present by-law forbidden to distribute in the streets of the city of Quebec any book, pamphlet, booklet, circular or tract whatever without having previously obtained for so doing the written permission of the chief of police.

Mr. Justice Rand, of our supreme court, a jurist with a refreshing and original gift for analysis and exposition, had this to say about that by-law:

> That public ways, in some circumstances the only practical ways available for any appeal to the community generally, have from the most ancient times been the avenues for such communications, is demonstrated by the Bible itself: In the sixth verse of chapter XI of Jeremiah these words appear: "Proclaim all these words in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem"; and a more objectionable interference, short of complete suppression, with that dissemination which is "the breath of life" of the political institutions of this country than that made possible by the by-law can scarcely be imagined.

In another part of the judgment of Mr. Justice Rand, he observes that:

> Despotism always views with fear and wrath the uncensored printed word.

Yet that by-law was in force in 1933 and has since been in force in one of the cities of Canada. How many like it are on the statute books? Saumur, a zealous Jehovah's witness, succeeded in having this by-law quashed in the Supreme Court of Canada after long litigation and no doubt great expense. But he won only by a decision of five judges as against four dissenting judges and he did not win on the ground of civil liberties but, almost by chance, on another point which swayed one judge. Five of the nine judges decided that the province and city did indeed have the power to enact that obnoxious by-law. Only four of the nine judges decided that a province had no power to trespass upon the civil rights such as freedom of religion, due to this being exclusively a matter of federal jurisdiction.

In a sense that case was a retreat from the decision of the majority of the judges in the Alberta press case of 1938. In that case the province of Alberta tried by law to compel newspapers to publish Social Credit doctrine and explanations. The court declared the law invalid. Perhaps that was a pity, because at long last we might have had a chance to find out what Social Credit is. But the court, led by the distinguished Chief Justice Sir Lyman Duff, held that a province could not interfere with the freedom of the press, or for that matter with other basic freedoms.

The last case decided by our own Supreme Court of Canada quashed the iniquitous Quebec padlock law. Under that law the attorney general of the province in his absolute discretion could close down for a period of one year premises suspected of being used to promote a particular political ideology. The Supreme Court of Canada had no difficulty in holding that law to be invalid, not because it trespassed on the civil rights of Canadians but because it was really a matter of criminal law upon which the dominion alone could legislate.

How do these decisions leave the state of our civil liberties? The answer, in my opinion, is in a very precarious state. As the Chief Justice of Canada said in the Saumur case:

> We have not a bill of rights such as is contained in the United States constitution.

I would add that we do not have a legal guarantee of free speech or assembly or privacy. We do not have a legal guarantee protecting Canadians from coast to coast against discrimination on account of race, colour or creed. It is time we had.

Therefore the motion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar proposes a constitutional amendment for a Canadian bill of rights. In reply to the parliamentary assistant, the provinces should be consulted and informed when an amendment to the constitution is involved; but as these rights are primarily matters of federal concern, in many cases though not necessarily wholly so, it is eminently proper that this parliament should take the initiative in securing speedy acceptance of the amendment through the process of adoption by the British parliament.

Some of the basic civil rights of the Canadian people referred in the motion may well be matters of provincial jurisdiction. The matter of discrimination on the ground of colour in the case of a man who tries to get a meal in a restaurant may be such a matter of provincial legislative jurisdiction. But I think it is up to this parliament to enact a constitutional amendment and forward it to the British parliament after full consultation with the provinces. I do not necessarily say that the full concurrence of all provinces should be obtained; I do not think that to be necessary for a constitutional amendment. I would add that if we at least take the initiative in doing our part I feel sure most of the provinces will concur, even though one or two may wish to abstain.

The house should be glad to note that the proposed amendment leaves out one little word, "property" and includes one other little word "privacy". This is as it should be. It is, after all, a charter of personal rights, not property rights.

The United States bill of rights has a due process clause dealing with property, and what a source of expensive, endless litigation it has been. At one time United States courts actually declared that laws prohibiting child labour in factories were invalid on the ground that this interfered with the right of the owners to do as they pleased with their own property. Industrial, financial and commercial property rights need no constitutional safeguards in Canada. Indeed, an enlightened and humane opinion increasingly regards this kind of property as a trust to be administered for the benefit of the whole community.

But privacy; that is essential. I was glad to see that a Dr. Robbins obtained $3,000 damages against the C.B.C. Chief Justice Scott in Quebec superior court is reported in the newspapers to have said that as the result of publicity on a television program "he was convinced that Dr. Robbins' privacy had been intruded upon."

It is news to me that this constituted a case for damages, but it should. The privacy, the soul, the individuality of people may be drowned in a sea of commercialism. What protection will Canadians have against subliminal advertising, where the advertising message strikes home in the subconscious mind of the individual who is unaware that he is being influenced?

What will be our protection against closed circuit TV, where every minute and movement of the employees' working day is spied upon by security guards or efficiency experts? What is our protection against wire-tapping and hidden microphones, not just in the hands of private eyes looking for divorce evidence but in the hands of police officers and government officials? What about the privacy of individuals hounded by collection agencies with letters and phone calls that sometimes lead to a nervous breakdown? The scientific invasion of the human personality is on. Let that little word "privacy" be one of our constitutional safeguards.

Freedom of speech and association? They are always in danger. We do not have to look beyond the present session of this house for examples. A foreman on the St. Lawrence seaway project was fired because he drove a car for a Liberal candidate on election day. It was his day off. It had nothing to do with his work as a foreman. But, we are told that a time-honoured—I would say time-dishonoured—practice of this house requires the automatic discharge of a government employee accused in a letter from a member of parliament of political partisanship. No hearing. No charges. What a gross disregard for the personal rights of the individual!

Or take the resolution placed on the order paper recently by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix). It was directed against vague, undefined subversive activities, and if made law would be a means of prosecuting individuals, not for what they did but for what they thought.

Another example can be found in some of the court decisions against picketing in the course of a strike. Some of them offend against the basic civil right of individuals to present their case by word and placard to passers-by and fellow-employees. Freedom of speech is curtailed when picketing is prohibited by court injunction.

Take another case reference to which can be found in Hansard of this session, that of Per Holting. This Canadian citizen was en route in a Scandinavian air lines plane to Los Angeles. He debarked at Winnipeg, left the depot, but was forcibly seized, put back on the plane, and deported to Los Angeles against his will. Of course the conditions of his ticket, and no doubt the air lines franchise, did not allow him to get off in Winnipeg. But these would not prevail over a bill of rights outlawing the forcible exile from Canadian soil of any Canadian citizen.

The examples I have mentioned have occurred within the last few months but let us take another dating back four or five years, the case of Martin, a law student in British Columbia who with the help of D.V.A. credits, qualified himself by taking the necessary examination to practice at the bar in British Columbia. After completing his course he was denied the right to practice by the law society of British Columbia because of his communist opinions. With all respect to the sincerity of those who made that decision, it was in my opinion an indefensible case of discrimination on account of creed or belief.

I think these examples serve to illustrate that these rights are always in danger. These examples may seem trivial but they are not. The fabric of a free society is woven from countless seemingly inconsequential strands. By so much as we deny civil rights to one individual in one particular case, our society as a whole is less free. Shakespeare wrote, "Sure he that made us with such large discourse, looking before and after, gave us not that capability and god-like reason to rust in us unused."

Let us remind ourselves that the full flowering of the human mind and spirit can take place only in a free society and buttress our liberties now by those constitutional safeguards set out in this motion.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that my colleagues and I agree wholeheartedly with the general principle of this resolution. One could hardly declare his belief in democracy without at the same time declaring his belief in the freedoms enunciated in the resolution sponsored by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). However, I feel we should remind ourselves at this time of the fact that there is probably no place in the world where the citizens of a nation enjoy the freedoms enumerated here more than we do in Canada.

I can well imagine that the press of certain countries knowing that we are debating a resolution of this kind might come forward in their pages tomorrow and declare that Canada does not have freedom of speech, freedom of expression, freedom of religion and the other freedoms because of the fact that only now are Canadian members of parliament demanding that we be given those things. Despite the fact that reference has been made, and quite properly so, to certain cases where the rights of individuals have been restricted or deprived nevertheless I think it bears repeating at this moment that there is no place in the world so far as I am aware where the citizens of a country enjoy a greater degree of these freedoms than we do right here in Canada.

May I say that I was rather amazed to hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald), who made a splendid address, refer to the year 1938 and a certain press bill which, as he said, would have compelled the press to print Social Credit doctrine. I defy him to produce the bill to which he referred and show me where any such provision was contained in the legislation. Mr. Speaker, I am not at the moment defending that legislation. I think it was probably a natural outcome of the climate of the times when tempers on all sides were frayed and doubtless many people said and did things for which they later felt rather sorry; but I do feel that if reference is going to be made to any particular piece of legislation the whole story should be told.

When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was speaking he referred to the fact that he had no desire in his resolution to interfere with the rights of the provinces. Frankly I find it quite impossible to believe that this parliament could ask for an amendment to the constitution on its own or pass legislation incorporating those things suggested in the resolution without doing that very thing. I am quite positive that any legislation drawn up and passed in that way would be thrown out by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I was quite impressed by the remarks of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Walker). I thought his approach was fair and quite realistic but I rather regretted that he ended with 10 or so questions and not 10 or so suggested answers. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker—I think I voice the views of my colleagues—there is only one logical and sensible approach to this whole thing. First, we would recommend that a joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be set up to, among other things, suggest the form which the proposed legislation should take and probably go so far as to draft a suggested bill of rights. Then we would urge that if the committee did not actually draft the bill, following their studies the law offices of the crown be asked to draw up such a bill and then the provinces be called together in order to consider the matter.

I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald) discarded the idea of calling the provinces in, but he certainly said he would proceed with the consent of some of them. To my way of thinking, especially since such a bill would deal with property and civil rights, it would be an infringement upon the rights of the provinces under the constitution to proceed in that manner. Therefore, I say, let us call the provinces in. I do not think it would be impossible to reach an agreement on some form of bill. We also believe, Mr. Speaker, that this should be a separate bill and not an amendment to the constitution. It should be a separate and distinct bill of rights.

In referring to this matter, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway suggested that if it were not an amendment to the constitution, then a succeeding government might alter it or throw it out. Of course, if it is an amendment to the constitution exactly that same thing could be brought about if a future government were determined that it was to be removed from the constitution of this country. I repeat, we believe it should be definitely a separate bill of rights and not an amendment to the British North America Act.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for one to say more than I have said at this time. We agree with the principle of the resolution. We have made a suggestion as to the way we think the whole thing should be dealt with, and I stop with the same thought with which I started, namely let us try not to give the impression to the world at large that we are people without freedom. I say we have as much freedom as, and probably more than any other country on the face of the earth.

Mr. F. C. McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my meagre contribution to this debate I should like to reply to some of the rather astonishing suggestions put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald). Unless I was very much mistaken I seemed to hear him asking other members to curtail their speaking activities. Am I correct?

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): No. I may have given such an impression but I did not mean to. I did not want the resolution to fail to come to a vote.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He merely quoted from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. McGee: The other suggestion he made was that since there was no mention in the speech from the throne that the government was to introduce a bill of rights it was an indication that no such bill will be forthcoming. I must say this is a curious statement indeed when one considers the performance of the group in that corner during the current session. We came to this house on October 14 to open an emergency session to implement certain promises and pledges made during the campaign which culminated on June 10 last year. I submit to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and to his colleagues that if over the past few months they had displayed a more co-operative attitude in the passage of legislation perhaps today we would be considering, not a private bill but a government motion to this effect.

Mr. Ellis: Don't you believe in opposition?

Mr. Castleden: Then put it on the order paper.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, in my preparation for this debate I went to the parliamentary library and read at length of the literature on freedom. It seems to me that the discussions on freedom boil down to two phases: one, that in man's original state he was free and all laws tend to reduce and limit that freedom. There are statements in support of this by Algernon Sydney, who said:

> The liberties of nations are from God and nature, not from kings.

Lord John Russell, indicated as probably the greatest apostle of liberty in many centuries, said:

> What is called love of liberty means the wish that a man feels to have a voice in the disposal of his own property and in the formation of the laws by which his natural freedom is to be restrained.

The second concept is that freedom exists today as a result of wresting away from dictatorial powers the authority they possessed. The milestones along that road to freedom are many: Magna Carta, the declaration of rights, the petition of right, the habeas corpus act, the United States bill of rights. These and others are representative of the magnificent effort of free men down through the centuries. I think in this debate it behooves us to pay grateful tribute to those champions of freedom to whom we owe so much.

I read in Hansards of years gone the debates on human rights and I hope the house will pardon me if I repeat in part what the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) said. In my reading I found that the words and phrases of one man stood head and shoulders above all others. What interested me even further were, in reading the comments of other hon. members of the house at that time, the flattering phrases and sincere statements concerning that man. Of course, I refer to the Prime Minister. In reading his words and the words of others in the house today as well as the words of others who have gone to the other place and some who have since died, I became more and more aware of the fact that any contribution I might make to this debate at this time would be meagre indeed.

My most outstanding personal experience with regard to the rights of man came some few years ago when I was called for jury duty in the city of Toronto and was selected as a juror on two successive murder cases. Those hon. members whose background is in the law and who deal with the law day by day perhaps do not appreciate as much as one whose day to day life has been concerned mainly with business and commerce that it was a tremendous experience and a revelation to me in serving in the capacity of a juror to achieve a fuller understanding of what the principle of law that a man is innocent until proven guilty really means. I came away from that experience with a tremendous respect for our system of justice.

I mentioned a moment ago that in my reading and perusal of debates of years gone by I had encountered significant words and phrases. I should like to quote one short passage from a speech made by the Prime Minister on March 24, 1952 in support of a motion moved by him similar to the one before us today. As found at page 716 of Hansard for that date he said:

> Great as is our inheritance, events in recent years demand that we review from time to time what is our inheritance, to ascertain whether any of our freedoms are being lost either intentionally or by default, and how far the principle of the heritage of freedom that is ours and that we take for granted is ours to enjoy.

In that same speech he quoted the Marquis of Reading, speaking in the British House of Lords on May 15, 1947, at which time the Marquis of Reading said:

> Personal freedom had for so long been the current coin of life in this country that we had been apt perhaps to forget that currency may be slowly and stealthily withdrawn from circulation, that coinage may be debased without any very evident outward signs and that it may even be deliberately counterfeited without immediate detection.
> It is no part of my case today to allege any malign conspiracy on the part of any one deliberately to attempt to overthrow the liberties of the subject. The process has been gradual, stealthy, haphazard, almost inadvertent, but unfortunately both insidious and menacing in its cumulative effect.

Further, he quoted from a speech by Viscount Samuel in the British House of Lords in 1951 in which Viscount Samuel said:

> During the last 30 or 40 years, imperceptibly, almost unconsciously, here a little and there a little, there have been encroachments upon that great and precious heritage.
> I do not suggest today that we have lost, or are in danger of losing, those liberties, but I do suggest that they have been again and again impaired, that that process is still continuing, and that it needs to be stopped and reversed.
> Even now, after the peace, or semi-peace, of the last five years, not all these liberties have been restored, and there is danger that some of these restrictions may be allowed unnecessarily to slip into our permanent system of governments.

Surely these remarks indicate the ultimate necessity for such a bill of rights. It is almost unnecessary to state that the necessity for such a bill will receive my whole and complete support. The hon. member for Rosedale expressed the hope that this discussion would not become political in its ramifications. I have prepared something which I suppose might be considered as being political, but unfortunately something as fundamental as appears in paragraph (a) of the resolution is inseparable from this discussion. I refer to the opening part of that paragraph beginning with the words, "abridging freedom of speech and expression". If there had not been abridgement of speech in the House of Commons in recent years, Mr. Speaker, I would not be sitting in this seat today nor, I suggest, would a great many of my colleagues on this side of the house.

The principle, as ennunciated by John Stuart Mill, to which certain members of one party in this country lay claim, is certainly sound today and points up what happened in the house. Mill said that if all the people in the world but one were of one opinion and only one opposed, the world would be no more justified in silencing that one man than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind.

If I may stray a little farther into the political field, I have a suggestion which I put forward in all humility to the political party which is about to hold its convention in the very near future, a party which last June 10 was tried and found guilty by the jury of public opinion of abridgement of freedom of speech, a party which gathered to beat its breast at Presqu'ile Point, to apologize to the people of Canada for its performance when in office. I suppose it can be likened to a situation where Al Capone, appearing in court for multiple murder, would apologize for taking a penny out of the collection plate. I hasten to assure my friends that I am by no means suggesting that they are political gangsters. That is not my intention at all. But gathering at Presqu'ile Point and confessing that a budget that was not politically attractive in the first instance and something about the brass and the grass in the second instance certainly did not atone in any way for the violence which was done to a fundamental principle in this house. As I say, if I, as one young in years and political experience, may give them one small piece of advice, may I suggest that when they again foregather in this city they admit to the Canadian people the great wrong which they perpetrated and apologize for it.

I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for straying somewhat from the principle before us today but as I said in the first instance human rights and the incident which occurred in this house are virtually inseparable. I think it behooves us, as has been very ably pointed out today, to be on guard at all times concerning our freedom.

The principle that a man is innocent until proven guilty is curiously reversed under our present system of government, particularly with regard to income tax, customs laws and certain other statutes. In matters of income tax, the individual is assumed to be guilty and the onus is upon the individual to establish his innocence. This is a reversal of an important principle of law. It is a reversal which works a particular hardship, it seems to me, on the ordinary individual who has to summon to his assistance a lawyer, when in many cases he has little or no means to do so, to present a case against a government department and the government lawyers.

I am not prepared to offer a solution to the matter of collecting taxes. However, I would suggest to the appropriate ministers that they re-examine the situation and perhaps with the co-operation of and suggestions from members of the house arrive at some more consistent method of collecting. Before I resume my seat, may I concur with what the hon. member for Rosedale has said concerning the sponsor of the bill, the spirit behind it, and I would say that it has my complete and unqualified support.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I greatly appreciate the opportunity of saying a few words in this debate. This is a subject which I have heard discussed as long as I can remember. I have spent a great many hours reading the very enlightening debate which took place in this house in 1955, when a similar resolution came before this house. There were three resolutions before the house at the same time covering this subject. On that occasion the Speaker ruled that there should be only one resolution covering the same subject before the house at one time. One was ruled in order, and therefore the other two were ruled out of order and were withdrawn by their sponsors. The one which was retained for discussion was sponsored by the hon. gentleman who is now our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). In so far as the other two are concerned, one was sponsored by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the other by the hon. member for Spadina, now Senator Croll.

The matter was discussed at great length and the various legal, moral and social implications were thoroughly canvassed. It was a great pleasure to me to read this discussion, dampened only by the fact that I was going to be placed today in a position where I would have to show my ignorance of the whole matter. However, there are several facets of this intriguing subject which will no doubt bear further discussion. First, I should like to take up, point by point, some of the suggestions made in the resolution which is sponsored as an amendment to the British North America Act. The resolution reads:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act, it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to make laws:
> (a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.

There are a number of things mentioned in that paragraph (a), including freedom of speech, freedom of religion and freedom of the press which I should like to take up in detail later on in this address.

Paragraph (b) reads:

Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbritary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.

As was pointed out by one of the members on the opposite side of the house, there is no mention of property rights. Most of these resolutions which are concerned with human rights and liberties also mention property rights. I feel that the explanation given as to why property rights were not included is inadequate. After all, our property rights and our human liberties are so bound together that I do not believe we can preserve the rights in one respect without preserving them in both respects. What good is life to a man who no longer has the means of livelihood? What good is life to a man deprived of food, clothing and shelter as well as these other material things which make life worth living? What good is life to a person suffering from disease if he has nothing with which to purchase medical services and the comforts of hospitalization? I submit to this house that to separate personal rights and property rights does not make sense.

Paragraph (c) reads:

Requiring or imposing excessive bail or cruel or unusual punishment or exiling Canadian citizens.

I must admit that I have never heard of anything of this kind being done in Canada. Perhaps there is a possibility of such things happening in the future, but I cannot conceive of that. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) mentioned that there is no country in the world today in which the people enjoy the same measure of liberty and freedom in every respect as do the people of this country. If one suggests such amendments to our legislation, it leaves the implication, not only with ourselves but with the world at large, that we are very fearful of the future or that we lack faith in ourselves as a nation.

I come now to paragraph (d):

Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence.

You will notice the wording carefully skirts around any reference to property rights, except the reference to a home. Being a farmer and having been a farmer most of my life it is natural for me to look at these questions from the point of view of one who has lived on the land and enjoyed that form of living. To a farmer home includes the whole farm from the front to the back, but there is something here which suggests that possibly the home is only a house or a house and lot. I think that indicates that the whole conception back of this proposed amendment to the British North America Act is drawn up, not from the point of view of a farmer's holdings or a fisherman's holdings but from the point of view of the person who is living in an urban centre, with a house and lot. The resolution reads:

(d) Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence.

Any one who has been closely associated with the developments in the political world over a great many years can almost pick out the incidents in our Canadian life which have inspired every one of these sections contained in this bill. For instance, we find this:

(a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion,—

I think there would be no doubt that would go back to certain activities in one of our provinces to curtail certain activities of a certain religious sect which has already been mentioned here in the Saumur case. Then we find:

(b) Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbitrary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.

I do not know about that one. That is so general that I could not ascribe any particular incidents which they had in mind. Again we find:

(c) Requiring or imposing excessive bail or cruel or unusual punishment or exiling Canadian citizens.

That, of course, might refer to a recent, shall I say, discrepancy in our legislation which permitted the deporting of those of our citizens who became citizens through the process of naturalization, something which I understand has since been rectified in our legislation. Then we find:

(d) Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence.

There is no doubt in my mind that that paragraph dates back 15 years or 20 years to the time between the two wars when a certain political party was being developed in this country against the wishes of a great many other people, when it was felt that there was evidence of sedition in their activities and when certain people were arrested their personal files were examined and their literature was taken for examination. Then we find:

(e) Subjecting any person to arbitrary arrest or detention or denying to any person the right after arrest to be informed promptly of the charges against such person and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.

I think there is no doubt that that paragraph probably dates back to the well known Gouzenko spy case. Then we find:

(f) Suspending the right of habeas corpus or depriving any person of a fair trial or the right to be represented by counsel.

I think that paragraph would probably refer to the same incident. Then we find:

149. The rights provided in section 148 shall be enjoyed without distinction of race, sex, religion or language and the right to vote in any election of members of the parliament of Canada or the legislative assembly of any province shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, religion, language or sex.

That is a very general statement. Aside from our Indian population or some of our Indian people who do not yet enjoy the franchise, I am not just clear to whom it would apply. Then we find:

150. The rights conferred by sections 148 and 149 hereof of this act shall not be deemed to abridge any existing right of any person.

In the debate two years ago to which I referred, the resolution at that time was slightly different. The Prime Minister, at that time the hon. member for Prince Albert, moved the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of introducing a bill or declaration of rights to assure amongst other rights:

1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of radio;

2. That habeas corpus shall not be abrogated or suspended except by parliament;

3. That no one shall be deprived of liberty or property—

It will be noted that we come back to that word "property".

—without due process of law, and in no case by order in council;

4. That no tribunal or commission shall have the power to compel the giving of evidence by any one who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

Again that sounds like a reference to the Gouzenko case.

And that as a preliminary step the government should consider the advisability of submitting for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to the degree to which fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual are matters of federal or provincial jurisdiction.

At the same time the hon. member submitted to the house a draft bill of rights which he suggested should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for their consideration and advice. It reads as follows:

Article 1

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and the security of person.

That is slightly different from the one in the United States.

Article 2

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to recognition throughout Canada as a person before the law.

[Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West).]

Article 4

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law.

Article 5

Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.

Article 6

(1) No person shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

(2) Any person who is arrested or detained shall be promptly informed of the reasons for the arrest or detention and be entitled to a fair hearing within a reasonable time or to release.

(3) No one shall be denied the right to reasonable bail without just cause.

(4) No tribunal, royal commission, board or state official shall have the right to compel anyone to give evidence who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

Article 7

Every person who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall have an effective remedy in the nature of habeas corpus by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful. Habeas corpus shall not be abridged, suspended or abrogated except by parliament.

Article 8

Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

Article 9

Every person is entitled to all the rights and freedoms herein set forth without distinction of any kind such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

Article 10

Any person whose rights or freedoms as herein set forth have been violated may apply for relief on notice of motion to the supreme or superior court of the province in which the violation occurred.

Article 11

The above articles shall not be deemed to abridge or exclude any rights or freedoms to which any person is otherwise entitled.

Both in the resolution now before us and in this draft bill of rights submitted two years ago we have that same concluding thought that the "above articles or amendments shall not be deemed to abridge or exclude any rights or freedoms to which any person is otherwise entitled". I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that final thought, that final idea, is an admission that over, above and beyond any written statute which we might have or any written constitution which might be prepared, there are rights and privileges which it is the intention to safeguard in this manner—that the "above articles" or any laws which might be written shall not be deemed to abridge or exclude any rights or freedoms to which any person is otherwise entitled.

The question might be asked, and I know this is a matter which has been before parliament and has been in the minds of the public, but it is the first question which came to my own mind in connection with this subject. Just how much agitation is there for such a bill of rights? How many people want this thing done? How many people want a bill of rights? I was surprised at the mass of public opinion, at the quantity of public opinion, of the numbers of our people who have in the past advocated the preparation and putting into legislative form a bill of rights such as is proposed. I gathered from a reading of the debate of two years ago that there were two petitions signed. I believe an hon. member on the other side of the house mentioned these petitions, one having 5,000 names attached to it—

An hon. Member: 500,000.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): 500,000, thank you, and the other having some 600,000 names attached to it. I would now like to quote from the Prime Minister's speech a few remarks which were apparently accepted at that time since no objection was taken.

People say to me, what interest is there in the country in this subject? More than 800,000 Canadians have signed petitions on two occasions asking that Canada have the same protection for its rights and fundamental freedoms that 30 other countries with a federal system have, including India. The Canadian Daily Newspapers Association, a body with a membership of 86 of the 89 English and French language daily newspapers in Canada, representing 99.4 per cent of the circulation of all Canadian dailies,—

That is almost a clean sweep of our Canadian dailies, and this association of daily newspapers passed resolutions and submitted a brief to the government. Mr. Diefenbaker goes on to say:

I quote from the brief of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association:

". . . the daily newspapers of Canada urge that consideration be given to a constitutional guarantee of fundamental human rights, it is because they are convinced these rights are insecure. They know that threats have been made to freedom of speech, freedom of the press and other freedoms in the past. They feel sure that threats will be made in the future".

Then, again, from the same brief:

"The Canadian Daily Newspapers Association submits that . . . constitutional safeguards . . . not only prove that freedom of speech and freedom of the press lack adequate safeguards in Canada, but place the representatives of this country in a weak position, open to destructive attack, in implementing the obligations of this country as a member of the United Nations in respect to human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The board of directors of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association at a special general meeting in October, 1945 and in October, 1947, unanimously resolved that a statutory guarantee of essential freedoms might be covered in the following terms:"

The amendment suggested by the daily newspapers association are as follows:

"No act of the parliament of Canada nor of the legislature of any province shall abridge the freedom of speech, of the press or of assembly or of worship or the right to petition the parliament of Canada or the legislature of any province for the redress of grievances."

The Prime Minister goes on to say:

I believe that an amendment in that form might invade the powers of provincial legislatures under the British North America Act. Therefore I would not approve of such a course being followed until, as I intend to suggest later on, a submission is made to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In this brief of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association the following appeared:

"In Canada we have been coasting insecurely upon British precedents and sometimes violating them—"

I think that is very important to note and I will repeat that brief statement.

"—in Canada we have been coasting insecurely upon British precedents and sometimes violating them, and in the light of Canada's membership in the United Nations and its responsibility as a member, the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association urges that the parliamentary committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms give favourable consideration to a constitutional amendment guaranteeing these fundamental freedoms."

Now in addition to the newspaper people an association of church organizations also prepared a brief. This association of churches included the Church of England in Canada, the Baptist Federation of Canada, the Churches of Christ, the Evangelical United Brethren, the Presbyterian Church, the Reformed Episcopal Church, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, the United Church of Canada, the Salvation Army, the Society of Friends, the affiliated members of the Canadian Council of Churches, the national council of the Y.M.C.A., the National Council of the Y.W.-C.A. and the Student Christian Movement of Canada. I submit that when you consider the membership of these churches and organizations you must conclude that they represent a broad section of Canadian opinion. I continue:

On June 6, 1950, they set forth their views in their joint brief at page 341 of the proceedings of the Senate committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms:

We are prepared to support every honest endeavour to secure a Canadian bill of rights which will adequately safeguard the personal, social, economic and political rights of every citizen. We seek after and pray for a society in which freedom is the freedom of men who acknowledge responsibility to justice and public order, and where those who hold political authority or economic power are responsible for its exercise to God and to the people whose welfare is affected by it. We do not feel that it is the duty of our council to propose the practical measures which might or should be taken to establish a bill of rights. Nor do we suggest that the wording of this brief is the final language which should be used to describe these human rights and fundamental freedoms in a legal document. We are convinced, however, that it is our duty and responsibility to declare that man, because of his worth in the sight of God, has rights which should be respected by all and safeguarded by law.

The Prime Minister then submitted the names of a number of clergymen, editors, university presidents and other educators who had presented the brief asking for the inclusion in our statutes of a bill of rights for Canadian citizens. All of this would, I think, indicate that there has been no lack of public pressure for such a bill to be included in our statutes.

Turning to the legal side of the matter this is, of course, where I run into difficulty because I have not been trained in the law. Because I am a farmer it has been my experience to be associated and work in conjunction with the laws of nature rather than with the laws of men.

It has been pointed out during this debate that there are two ways of guaranteeing human rights and freedom. One is the British system where for the most part the guarantee of human freedoms and rights is contained in the precedents and practices that have been established over the years in their legal activities. On the other hand we have the United States system where an effort is made to document and codify or spell out in words the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals to the fullest extent which the legal fraternity can do. I have reached the point in my own thinking where I am not prepared to wholeheartedly endorse this effort to set out in words the guarantee of these rights and freedoms for the reason that merely writing these down and placing them on our statute books is no guarantee that they will be respected. Parliament is all-powerful and I am inclined to agree with the statement made by some of those who have discussed the effort to establish a bill of rights that it might not accomplish all that it intends to accomplish.

I draw the attention of the house to the last idea contained in these proposals. Those who are sponsoring such resolutions are extremely careful to point out that anything that is written in a proposed bill of rights must not curtail the rights which we already enjoy which is in itself an indication that any effort to put into words a bill of rights has inherent dangers and might weaken the position we already enjoy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you still quoting the Prime Minister?

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Not in my last remarks, no, but I am going to quote the Prime Minister again.

[Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West).]

Mr. Nicholson: It is the third time he has been quoted.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): I know of no one whom I would prefer to quote.

Mr. Byrne: Unless it is scripture.

Mr. Castleden: The gospel according to St. John.

Mr. Herridge: It is the wrong bible.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): The legal difficulty seems to be centred around the old and much discussed problem of provincial rights versus federal rights. When Canada was established as a nation certain rights were assigned to the provinces and certain rights were assigned to the federal government and I know of no responsible political leader at any level of government who suggests that we should forget this fact.

The Supreme Court of Canada which is the highest tribunal in this land had occasion to try a case in which this question was involved. I refer of course to the Saumur case. There was no great degree of unanimity of opinion in the highest court of our land in that regard which points up the difficulty we would have in undertaking to set out a bill of rights in the form of words. The Prime Minister referred to this case in the speech he made in this house on February 7, 1955 as recorded at page 902 of Hansard of that date, in these words:

I am not going into the judgment except to refer to the Queen's Quarterly, winter 1955, in which there is an article by Mr. Bora Laskin, professor of law in Toronto. It deals with the whole subject of civil liberties, and it summarizes the Saumur case in these words:

Three of the nine judges (Chief Justice Rinfret and Justices Kerwin and Taschereau) appeared to support this position.

The position was that the jurisdiction in this particular case, the Saumur case, was a matter of provincial authority. I continue with the quotation:

"Six judges may be said to have adopted this view". That civil liberties were outside of provincial competence.

"Of these, four (Justices Rand, Kellock, Estey and Locke) took the position that freedom of religious or other expression was outside of provincial power, and of the four, only two (Justices Estey and Locke) made categorical assertions in favour of exclusive federal power; the other two (Justices Rand and Kellock) left open the possibility that perhaps the dominion too could not, in certain circumstances, interfere with civil liberties. Two of the six judges (Justices Cartwright and Fauteux) took the position that such freedom (and more particularly freedom of the press) does not belong exclusively either to the dominion or to the provinces.

This extraordinary division of opinion creates a result which is as curious as it is unsatisfactory. A majority of the court holds that the provinces have some legislative competence in the matter of freedom of religious expression. Two-thirds of the court hold that the provinces do not, at least in some circumstances, have such legislative competence. Only one-third of the court denies federal legislative competence on religious freedom. Yet less than a majority affirmed federal legislative competence on the matter."

This is an indication of the difficulty we would have in drawing up a bill of rights.

It is admitted that in recent years, in the lifetime of hon. members, our personal rights have been gradually eroded.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Minister Without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, this debate so far has hardly been a debate at all; it has been a kind of competition in blessing the resolution and I in my way shall bless the resolution, but I hope to introduce an element of controversy because I am going to argue that our socialist friends, however highly we respect them, cannot possibly be in favour of freedom because they believe in absolute controls. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member keep a straight face when he says that.

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall prove it. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre takes that without getting on his feet he is not the man I take him for.

Now, as I said, there has been an apparent unanimity, and I shall go so far as to say that I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who is a very sincere man, when he proposed this felt that he was in favour of it, too. I shall satisfy him before I sit down, by reminding him of certain things he said in this session too, that he believes in controls to the extent that he is bound to interfere with the freedom which he blesses in this resolution. Now, of course, it is possible to define freedom in various ways and I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who I am sure will follow me, that he give us his definition of freedom and try to square it with the controls which he and his colleagues so ardently desire.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker), who is a very old friend of mine, and I think he covered this subject in an interesting and comprehensive way. I liked the history of the debates on this resolution which he gave us, I wish also to refer quite briefly to the speech made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on March 24, 1952, because in his opening words he gave us an objective which everyone in every debate might very well take as his objective. He said, as reported at page 714 of Hansard:

> I hope that I and those who follow me may discuss this subject with those qualities which Mr. Gladstone so much admired in Lord Aberdeen when he said in effect that: Whatever he discusses, he discusses with calmness, judgment, knowledge and moderation.

It is difficult for me to suggest that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar lacked any of these things, and yet I am going to suggest later on that somehow or other there was a slip and that he is professing things today which do not square with some of these basic principles. I wish to quote further briefly from the speech made by the then member for Lake Centre in 1952. He said, as reported at page 715 of Hansard:

> The quest for freedom and the desire to maintain freedom and to assure freedom is not the monopoly of any political party—and it is in that spirit I speak. Internationally a declaration of great principles was made in 1945 when the preamble of the United Nations charter was drafted in San Francisco. The statesman who drafted that preamble was Jan Christiaan Smuts who some 30 years before had drafted article X of the league of nations.
> I saw him draft that preamble, the first rough draft, on the back of a cigarette box, in the memorial hall in San Francisco. His life was a revelation of the meaning of British freedom. He had devoted his early life to fighting against everything for which the British commonwealth stands and, in his latter years, became the mouthpiece of the finest principles of our commonwealth and of democracy.

Again I quote briefly from page 716:

> Two world wars in one generation have created conditions perilous to the preservation of civil liberty. Indeed, the continuing world emergency since 1945 has been no less perilous to civil liberty. And Canadians, as well as peoples in other parts of the British commonwealth, must be assured that human rights and fundamental freedoms, placed in pawn as security for victory, or lost temporarily as a result of design by parliament, shall not be lost permanently because of the apathy or the failure of the people to demand their restoration.

It is a matter of interest and perhaps of something more, for us to recall this scene as described by the Prime Minister and the part played in it by Smuts, who had such an extraordinary career in so many ways; soldier, politician, philosopher, and other things as well.

I think we cannot consider freedom at home without considering freedom abroad. It is interesting to recall that as this century opened I suppose the general feeling of educated men was that freedom was going to expand and cover the whole earth. I think it can be said of the British in the 19th century, that they went about the world trying to give everyone what they at any rate thought was the greatest thing in the world namely, individual freedom and political liberty. At the beginning of this century it seemed that the battle had been won and that freedom was going to spread over the earth.

I sometimes think that an incident, famous at the time, which happened in 1913, may be taken as the summit of human freedom, international freedom, freedom at any rate so far as what we call the western nations—by that I include the British commonwealth of nations everywhere—were concerned. It was an incident which some here will remember and some will have read about. It happened in Alsace. A little cobbler walking along the street was rudely thrust off the sidewalk and wounded by a Prussian officer. One cobbler, one officer, in the year 1913! A competent writer at that time said that this incident had shaken the chancellories of Europe. This offense to individual liberty and human freedom resounded throughout the whole world. It is almost impossible to believe that that happened but if you go back to the history of 1913 you will find that it did happen and that the man who used those words that shook the chancellories of Europe was hardly exaggerating. Since then millions of people have been treated far, far worse than was even dreamed of in the case of that cobbler.

I like to look back rather nostalgically to that time. The period of 1913 was just one year before the first world war. We all remember what has happened since. Now the United Nations is trying in the international sphere to give back to us some of that freedom that we lost—we all know only too well how it has disappeared in large parts of the world. I suggest that puts a special responsibilty on those who still have it to hold the banner high, to make it appear to those in the rest of the world that it is worth having. That comes very close home because it means that our representatives in every part of the world must so conduct themselves that people will feel that this freedom, this free way of life, means something in respect of our whole lives, particularly in respect of our behaviour and consideration towards other people. In effect, we have to be an example.

Some months ago I had the good fortune to be in the far east, in Malaya when the people were receiving their independence and becoming the tenth member of the commonwealth. I had never really paused to reflect before that four members out of the ten in the commonwealth are from Asia, and of course when you consider population the vast majority of individuals are from Asia. I was greatly struck with the fact that in Malaya they had a high regard for Canada. They told me it was very important that a Canadian ambassador should be sent to Malaya because he could help and be of use, and I am glad to say that has been done.

They thought that they detected in us a certain resemblance. They realized that we had two races and two languages. They realized that we too had asserted ourselves and won liberties from the British, from the centre of the commonwealth. They thought, as I say, that there was a certain resemblance to us. They made me feel again the importance of our example to these people who are trying to follow in the path we have trod for so long.

I had the good fortune to meet the members of their cabinet. As I thought of the task they faced, taking over as a going concern the full apparatus of parliamentary government without the background of the generations, yes, the centuries that we have had to learn how to make it work, I had the greatest admiration for them and I felt that they were facing a terrific challenge. Again I say that when such people are looking to us it seems to me that is all the more reason why we should cherish more and more the freedom with which we have been blessed and make it appear attractive to other people.

When I was thinking of these Asian peoples joining the commonwealth I asked myself this question: What is it that brings them into the commonwealth? A few years ago I would have found it difficult to believe that India, a republic, Pakistan, a republic, would wish to be comprised in the commonwealth of nations. We do not call it the British commonwealth of nations any more but just the commonwealth of nations. I was not able to think of any answer to my question except that these people felt deep down that we had certain spiritual things in common. Freedom, the dignity and the importance of the individual, which as we know mean nothing in totalitarian countries, mean something to us, and that was the only explanation I could find as to why these peoples cared to remain associated with the commonwealth. I think it is a great tribute to the British that they have been able to exercise rule for decades, in some cases centuries, and have so conducted themselves that when they left they did so with the good will of those they had governed, as I believe to have been the case.

I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Rosedale say one thing. He pointed out that what we are proposing to do is not easy. He advised caution and he posed certain questions which I thought were important. As a constitutional lawyer he would realize the importance of that better than I do, but even a reformed lawyer like myself realizes that these questions are difficult and that when you begin to put things into writing you have to watch your step. It is one thing to have principles which you can argue and to which able judges can give effect, but it is another thing when you begin to write things out.

I was struck, for example, with the fact that in the declaration of human rights of the United Nations there are 30 articles. If I remember rightly, there are six paragraphs in the resolution now before us. They may be more comprehensive than the United Nations articles but these make a last formidable list. Lawyers will know that when you write things out, if you put down "a", "b", "c", "d", and do not mention "e", high priced counsel can argue various results from the fact that "e" is not in there and was not intended to be in there, and I am glad for that reason that there is going to be caution and that the matter will be approached not only with caution but with recognition of the difficulties.

On the other hand, the hon. member for Rosedale pointed out, and I think quite correctly, that there is a difference in our country from Britain. In Britain, with their long tradition, their homogeneous population and their single government, they have steered away from a written constitution. As we know, they have left a good many things unwritten. That has not been so possible here. The hon. member for Rosedale pointed out that at the time of the Quebec Act, the Constitutional Act, the Act of Union and the British North America Act it had been very important to put everything down in writing and it was very important to all concerned that everything should be in writing.

Something else has also happened. I think that a good many of our new Canadians who have come here and are living happily under our system are given a feeling of security by being able to point to things in writing. They cannot be expected to have the same great respect for tradition and custom as we have. Therefore it is not surprising that they may prefer to have things in writing. That is another consideration that I think we should have in mind when we approach this task.

However much we legislate, I think we will all agree that we cannot pass a law and then say that is that and forget all about it. It is just as true as it ever was, and it will be just as true no matter how much legislation we pass, that, to use a famous phrase, eternal vigilance is the price of freedom. Freedom can only be maintained by eternal vigilance. It will not be enough to say that the law has been passed and that that ends the matter, like the man who signed a note, and said, "thank heaven that is paid".

It may sound somewhat doctrinaire but I had a little experience which I think will bear out what I say. During the war I belonged to a civil liberties association, and it was very interesting to see the attitude towards that organization. We were regarded as very queer people, rather open to suspicion in belonging to any such organization. I remember going to a friend of mine, a highly respected citizen, and asking him if he would join. He said, "The first thing you know you will have the communists in there." I said, "My dear fellow, they are in there already". He said, "What are you going to do about it?" I said, "Well, all we can do about it is to get enough sensible fellows like you to come in and vote them down."

He did not think very much of that reasoning, and I might say he did not come in.

However, that was true during the war, and when the chips are down, when difficulties arise, the number of people who are really ready to dictate to others is surprising. The number of people who are ready to dictate what is and what is not to be taught in universities is surprising. I think a certain number of people whom I have met in the course of my life would be quite ready to dictate in that matter and say that certain economic views should be taught, while others should not be taught. My own feeling about that is that young people should be allowed to know what other people are thinking, and as long as those in professorial chairs do not become propagandists they should be allowed the maximum of freedom.

I said at the outset that I was going to consider myself charged with the duty of pointing out certain things to our socialist friends. I have great difficulty in understanding how they are able to subscribe to the text of a resolution of this kind. As I said before, it seems to me they believe in a doctrine which is quite contrary to the text of the resolution. They seem to me to believe in a doctrine which, so far as I can understand it, will involve definite controls. I recall, particularly in the debate on the address, that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, whom I respect, made the suggestion that we might have some wartime controls back. I rather think he may have repented of that later, but I am not authorized to say that. I looked up a list of the wartime controls and found they were very formidable. I feel that perhaps he had forgotten how many there were.

At any rate, as I understand it, our socialist friends do believe in a measure of control. They believe in socialist democracy, but frankly I have always thought that to be a contradiction in terms. I have never been able to see how you could have the amount of control which they want to have without controlling people, far beyond what we do now. I am interested to observe that in England, so far as I can understand what is happening there, the view of the Labour party there is changing. Just three or four years ago, a meeting of the Labour party in Margate voted down a whole series of resolutions for further nationalization of industry. I have been interested to observe, that recently their new program has shifted from public ownership to public investment; that is to say, they are investing in the shares of companies so the public will have an interest in them. This seems to me to be very different from public ownership. I believe the Labour people in England have come to that conclusion.

This has been an entirely non-partisan debate so far, and I do not want to become partisan, certainly not in an acrimonious way. I thought perhaps I might arouse some comment on the other side, so we would not have a dead level of agreement on every point as we went along. I do not believe I have anything to add. I should like to go back and remind hon. members that the passing of legislation, if and when it comes, does not relieve us from the duty laid on each one of us in a democracy of pursuing the free way of life; supporting our laws which maintain it, and considering it our duty, in the phrase that I used before, to be eternally vigilant. As was so well said earlier, there are no people in the world more envied than we are, living as we do in comfort and whatever small measure of security there is in this world at the moment. I suggest very strongly indeed that many people are looking to us for an example in the ways of the west, and that in this matter of true freedom, liberty, we have a great opportunity and I hope we will live up to it.

Mr. R. M. T. McDonald (Hamilton South): I should like to take a few minutes to present some of the views I have gathered on this subject from talking to various people in my riding. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has proposed a bill of rights, and possibly such a bill will come at some future time. However, I really do not believe one member of this house, no matter how smart he may be, should have the right to propose a bill of rights to govern the Canadian people, because it may infringe upon the rights of the provinces which are guaranteed in the British North America Act.

I believe we are all taking part in this battle for human rights which probably has continued since the time of Adam and Eve, man fighting for his own rights.

In 1215, when Magna Carta was signed, groups of men went to the king to get him to write down on paper what the rights of the people were. During the time of William and Mary, in 1689, a committee of the British House of Commons was set up to look into the matter of writing a bill of rights. Then, coming to the reform bill, a time when all the reforms were going through, we find that man kept on striving to get a better way of life for himself. Even at the time of the Napoleonic revolution people put down this revolution because Napoleon, a dictator, had his Napoleonic code which the people did not believe was right. Then, we go on to the American revolution, the declaration of independence and the civil war. The civil war was fought to give Negroes freedom from slavery, and was probably the greatest fight man has ever had to keep a certain race from being enslaved.

These were all phases in man's fight for human rights. The communist bill of human rights sounds very well when it is written down. The first section states:

> All court cases are heard in public and the accused is guaranteed the right to be defended by counsel.

This, I believe, is probably one of the biggest laughs of the century. I do not believe Cardinal Mindszenty, who was persecuted for many years when the communists took over his land, was given the right to be represented by counsel. This attitude shows that it is not the words on the paper that are important, it is the interpretation of the words. The second clause in this communist constitution reads:

> Judges are independent and subject only to the law.

I think the judges are puppets in the hands of dictators who are pulling strings for their own political gain. The next clause reads:

> Citizens have the right to rest and leisure.

I feel it is very good of them to grant the people some time for rest and leisure, some of the time anyway. The next clause reads:

> Citizens are guaranteed by law: (a) freedom of speech; (b) freedom of the press; (c) freedom of assembly, including the holding of mass meetings; (d) freedom of street processions and demonstrations.

Freedom of speech is something you just do not have in Russia. If you whisper a little bit, the informer next to you will probably be telling on you. When it comes to freedom of the press, they have freedom of the press because they have only one press. When it comes to freedom of assembly, they have their big meetings but if three or four people sit down to talk that meeting is broken up and the people are arrested. There is freedom of election by secret ballot in Russia, but in the constitution they forgot to mention that there would be only one set of people for whom to vote so whether or not the ballot is secret I do not believe that is the democratic way. So far as I am concerned, the Russian bill of rights is just a farce.

The British North America Act was first enacted to protect the provinces against federal interference. I think the federal government and the provinces have been striving for the betterment of human rights. I am not at all convinced at the moment that a section dealing with human rights should be placed in the British North America Act. If certain acts have been committed against individuals or groups of people, and they have not been corrected, I think it is up to any member in this house to go to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and have the Criminal Code rectified before we start tampering with the British North America Act.

I personally believe—although I am not a lawyer but in talking to some lawyers this is the opinion I have formed—that a bill of rights should not be included in the British North America Act but should be a statute of Canada. In Great Britain they do not have a proper constitution. They have probably four main acts written down on pieces of paper that put together form a constitution. That shows the way in which a free democracy can go ahead and work out things without properly written down acts within one piece of paper.

It might also be pointed out that in 1940 at a meeting on the Atlantic ocean Roosevelt and Churchill drew up the Atlantic charter and put forth the principles in the free world that I think it will be well for us to reminisce on just for a moment or two. If those principles were followed in, let us say, a bill of rights for the whole world, I feel sure we would progress a little further in our striving for peace. They stated that countries should not take any territory from any person that they did not have before the war. That is the first thing that is wrong; Russia has so many satellites now that she did not have before. They were not even looking to a future of peace; they were looking for a political communistic grab.

One principle was: no territorial changes that do not accord with the wishes of the people involved. The millions of people that the Russians have under their thumb today show anyone in this house that the Russians are not interested, I do not think, completely in peace. Perhaps some of the Russian people are interested but the dictators who are at the top want power.

Another principle was: the right of all peoples to choose their own form of government. I feel that democracy is the greatest thing which we have today. It has been stated that there are free elections in Russia. It is quite true they have free elections because they have only one party to vote for.

Another principle was: the enjoyment by all states of access to trade and raw materials. I sincerely hope that this will be kept in mind by the United Kingdom and the United States along with Canada so that we shall open up this market of trade to keep within the bounds so that no one will be economically strangled.

Another principle was: economic collaboration between nations. That probably refers to the amendment I just read.

Another principle was: freedom of the seas. I think that fairly well explains itself. This is only one set of rules or regulations or rights in which two great men were looking to the future of the world and its protection. I think if we take a little bit of heed of these few amendments or resolutions which they put forward it might be better for all of us.

I should also like to take this opportunity of asking the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in closing this debate if he would answer a couple of questions which I think will probably need answering. In section (a) he refers to abridging freedom of speech and expression. I wonder whether he is thinking about freedom of speech in case of war. I feel that in all this bill of rights people must be responsible. We must have a keen sense of responsibility towards the nation. When he wrote this resolution out I wonder whether he gave any thought to any deterrent to freedom of speech in the case of war or in the case of top secrecy.

In section (c) he referred to excessive bail. I do not quite understand what is meant by excessive bail. Do you mean that if a man is making $60 per week and another man is making $200 per week and they are tried for some crime you become discriminatory about bail just because the other man is at a lower wage? I should like the hon. member to explain that matter briefly.

Also in section (c) reference is made to cruel or unusual punishment. Surely, if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has any knowledge of this in Canada, he should immediately inform the Minister of Justice so that this situation could be rectified and then put into a bill of rights.

The word "unreasonable" used in section (d) is I think an incorrect one. "Unreasonable" to different people means many different things and you are leaving it too much to the discretion of the person who might be prosecuting as to what the word "unreasonable" means rather than putting it on the basis of law. These are only some of the things that I feel should be looked into very assiduously.

I should like to come back to the British North America Act for just a moment. I do not feel that this should be put into the British North America Act. I believe that the British North America Act is there to protect the provinces against the federal government. This House of Commons would have to go to the British House of Commons for permission to make any change in the British North America Act. If we are to change this British North America Act now we are going to have to go and ask their permission.

I believe we are a country which stands on its own two feet with the basic principles of British democratic government. If we go ahead and have a bill of rights as a statute of Canada, and if we do this standing on our own two feet and not having to go and ask anyone's permission, I think it will be better for ourselves and for the Canadian people.

I also feel that a formal committee should be set up to look into this matter, not perhaps of politicians of the provinces or politicians of the federal government but of law officers representing all the provinces across Canada and the federal government so that when this bill is drafted we are not going to have 100 amendments in the second year but are going to have a piece of paper that contains words that achieve the objective for which we are striving, namely to protect the people with regard to all the freedoms they have. We probably have four basic freedoms, namely freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom from fear. I hope that in Canada today we shall look to these four freedoms as the basis of a charter for the whole world and that some day, maybe even before we are all gone, the whole world will be joined together recognizing the four freedoms basically laid down and will get together for peace.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to participate in this particularly important debate. The subject matter is one which has been close to my heart for a good many years. Before taking my seat in parliament I occupied one of the chairs to which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) referred some time ago, and these principles and ideals that are being discussed today were very much part of the subject matter which occupied my mind for a good many years.

It is also a distinct pleasure for me to participate in a discussion of this subject as I am a member of a party which is led by the outstanding Canadian in this field of thinking and in this ideal. I may also say that it was my experience to witness an extremely important epoch in the history of Canadian politics and in the life of Canadian parliamentary institutions. Some months ago I sat in the gallery of the House of Commons of Canada throughout the so-called pipe line debate. Surely this was a question which dealt with one of the fundamental political freedoms in this nation of ours. I am sure that no one could witness that episode and be unaffected. I can say, as did the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee), that that episode is linked very intimately, directly and definitely, with my presence in this assembly today. I may say that while I have been most moved and impressed by the references which have been made to it, I am somewhat surprised—and indeed I think a bit shocked—that no voice has been heard from the party which calls itself the Liberal party.

Even the root meaning of the word "liberal" and the relationship of that word to freedom would surely prompt anyone to believe that this party, of all parties, would be fundamentally interested in such a matter, if not as large "L" Liberals surely as small "l" liberals. We have heard recent suggestions and post mortems indicating that there is a difference between the large "L" and the small "l" variety.

It is most encouraging to have a day devoted to such a topic as this. Canadians have not been much given to discussion on such questions. We have heard reference today to the fact that this matter has been discussed for 12 years or so, yet we have been a nation much longer than that and this is surely a fundamental question. We Canadians are a pragmatic people given to empiricism rather than idealism. We are not strong on consideration of such abstract questions as the nature of liberty and the underlying bases of freedom. Our history and our tradition seems to reveal this pragmatic and practical approach. It is therefore, I think, extremely uplifting and altogether satisfying for a representative of the Canadian people to see that the attention of the national legislature has been focussed on this question upon such a high plane as it has been today.

Some nations delight in high-sounding principles about the rights of man and of the citizen. In the written constitutions of many countries of the world there are a long series of grandiose statements dealing with lofty theories and high-sounding principles. The United States constitution, which is certainly not by any means an elaborate or extravagant document—indeed it is in comparison with many others short, brief, concise and succinct—begins like this:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America.

One finds throughout that document similar references to the ideals of liberty and the rights of the citizens—indeed, in the United States it is possible for people to become quite lyrical in their emotional attachment to their constitution.

In Canada there is very little of that attitude towards the British North America Act. Of course it would be unfair and improper to regard the British North America Act as the constitution of Canada, for it is not. It is merely a part of the constitution of this country; an important part, albeit, but certainly not the constitution in toto. We would look long in the British North America Act for anything to parallel the brief preamble I have just read from the United States constitution. We would look even longer if we sought such a glowing expression as that which opened the Declaration of Independence as follows:

> When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.
> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed,—

Of course we have in that document a reflection of the classic statement of eighteenth century liberalism, with a small "l". While we perhaps in our history and tradition lack the embellishments and decorations which adorn the written expression of political theory in other countries, no one would think we in this country are any less free than are the citizens of the great republic to the south or any of the other republics which have at one time in their national careers expressed their aspirations and their longings and their political points of view in the high-sounding principles of a constitution.

During the years our citizens have enjoyed all the civil and political rights just as fully as have the people of the United States. We have drawn our heritage of freedom from Great Britain, where much—not all but much —of the constitution is of the unwritten type, coming down from precedent to precedent through the ages marking the evolving struggle for political liberty. I think it is quite true, as was once expressed in this house, that the essence of Canadian constitutionalism may be found in the preamble of the British North America Act wherein the provinces named have expressed the desire to be federally united with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. By invoking that ancient and honourable constitution we have underwritten our own political liberty and have established the foundation upon which to develop a Canadian democracy.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house met at eight o'clock.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was discussing the fundamental aspect of the Canadian constitution as being that which derives from the ancient and honourable constitution of the United Kingdom, a large part of which is in the unwritten tradition. But of course behind the British constitution there is much in the record of democratic development which carries us back to the earlier days of western liberal society. The Greek concept of law, the Hebraic ideal of morality, the ethic of Christianity, the ceaseless struggles of the intellectually emancipated. All of these have contributed to the mosaic of political and civil liberty which was well developed when Canada was born and from which we have derived so much. Those imperishable charters of English liberty, the Magna Carta of 1215, the petition of right of 1628, the bill of rights which came 60 years later, the habeas corpus act, the various electoral acts and franchise acts, Lockes' criterion of the consent of the governed; Rousseau's theory that the will of those who are governed must be expressed and reflected in the laws under which they live and under which society is operated, all of these things and many more are our ancestors in the development of political democracy and civil liberty.

Always, however, there has been a struggle between freedom and tyranny. The stream of political liberty has never flowed easily nor swiftly. The divine monarch, the absolute despotic tyrant of one age is replaced by the demagogic dictator of another. The police state or the dictatorship of an omniscient and omnipotent party are modern manifestations of the old aspect of tyranny with which those who loved and fought for freedom down through the ages have had to contend.

Happily we in this land have a heritage of political and civil liberty which we must and do cherish and yet while we are a democracy and have strong institutions it would be unwise to take those institutions or our form of government for granted. "It cannot happen here" is the foolish platitude of the unthinking and democracy is never preserved by unthinking people. We must re-examine and re-assess our political structure from time to time. That is why I say it is valuable for the legislators of this country to spend their time as they have spent it today.

Things have happened in our age in various countries which should disturb us. Sometimes these things have happened in our own land. One cannot view with equanimity the whole story of the famous spy trials in Canada however justifiable the ultimate end may have been. Nor can our conscience as Canadians be altogether clear when we recall the whole story of the treatment of Japanese Canadians. There are a number of other instances of the improper use of power against individuals which should be pricks to our conscience and spurs to our thinking as democratic people. The fact that we may not have been personally involved in such instances is all the more reason why we should be vitally concerned and disturbed. It is wise and necessary to do what we are doing today and I congratulate most heartily the mover of this resolution as one who has followed others in this house in bringing forward a review of these important matters.

We are in the tradition of the unwritten constitution. Much has been told and said about that. The unwritten constitution with its flexibility has much to commend it. Yet sometimes I fear that perhaps in our genuine respect and reverence for the unwritten constitution we occasionally may be somewhat loath to commit to a document some especially valued principle of government. I therefore do not take the view that written constitutions are always necessarily less satisfying than unwritten constitutions.

The role of written law has been profound in the history of man's political development. A great step was taken in western society when law became written, indeed when it became known. In the earlier days the law was known only to a very few, to the wielders of political power; the rank and file of the citizenry knew it not. When the 12 tables were made available to the public, when the commandments were made known, when the work of Draco and Solon in Greece became available to the citizenry one of the first and greatest steps was taken towards the development of a democratic society that was that the laws which affect all should be made known to all. This was a tremendous step forward, a great advance. It represented something to which a citizen could appeal, a body of knowledge with which he could become acquainted.

It may indeed be that we have reached a stage where some of our fundamental principles of government, some of our civil and political liberties might well be inscribed in some form and defined, perhaps in the way suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar or in some other manner previously suggested. Therefore I think there is much reason in the suggestion that has been put forward today. I would even say that there are things in the spirit and temper of our time which give some urgency to this matter. It seems to me that we live in an era which is marked by the atomization of the individual. We live in a world of great agglomerations of power whether it be in the business field or the great federations of unions or what have you. There is the tremendous aggregation of power in contrast with the puny individual which is indeed a shocking contrast and one which cannot fail to stir and disturb us. We live in a society, too, in which the mechanizations and devices of mass coercion and regimentation have been advanced to a degree of technological excellence never before attained. We speak of living in an age of mass culture when it is so easy to get across to the mass the ideas, the devices, the techniques, the habits and even the slogans of those who are able to control the media of mass communication. There is then, I say, a tremendous challenge to the individuality of the person.

Then, too, there is another aspect which I think adds urgency to this suggestion, that because of certain things in the international field there are reasons for feeling fear. Fear breeds irrationality and quite often under the stress and strain generated by fear and uncertainty some things which in more normal times we cherish and prize may elude us, may pass out of the picture. I think we can recall in recent years that in the western world there occasionally have been manifestations of exactly this kind of irrationality which erodes some of the fundamental liberties of the people in a democratic state.

Yet I think it is important to look at this whole matter very carefully and very realistically. I am tremendously impressed with the idea. However, there are certain cautions which we must not overlook. Perhaps it is unfortunate that we in this country have not yet attained that status whereby we can amend our fundamental organ of government, our constitution. We have not yet been able to find a very satisfactory or workable way of doing that.

It is difficult to know just how this resolution could be made operative in relation to the present status of the British North America Act and the somewhat divided amending process which we now have. I would certainly not hazard the suggestion that what is involved here comes purely under the federal area of jurisdiction. I think I might find others supporting my doubts in this matter.

I have mentioned the idea that certainly one cannot place full confidence in the written law. There is the danger, too, of overemphasizing the importance of a written law because sometimes when we designate, record, set out section by section, laws, aspects of our freedoms, liberties, or what have you, it often happens that we are really limiting our freedom in that through the process of time those things which are set out in the words have gradually become the sum total of that freedom. If we were discussing section 91 of the British North America Act I am sure we would find ample justification for this line of thinking. Then, of course—and I think this must always be considered whenever legislators, or anyone else, talk about amending laws—behind the law there is the spirit. The letter of the law, in Montesquieu's great words, is not enough. His "The Spirit of the Law" is, of course, a classic in this field. We speak of law and order. Actually, as society develops, the order should be reversed to read "order" and then "law".

We have many examples of countries which have the most elaborate and seemingly foolproof statements of civil liberties, and yet look at the functioning of political society in those countries. We find that those liberties are not guaranteed and they are not operative. I think we might see that in the United States which has a magnificent constitution and a splendid statement of the liberties of the subject. We have found many times that those liberties are not real for certain sections of their society. One can think of recent incidents which would underwrite that line of thinking. They have amendments galore, well thought out amendments, but the curtailment of liberty still exists and often the law enforced by the power of the state does not at a given time effectually guarantee that these are in reality effective for the people of the country. However, I do not fear the spirit of our democracy, but merely caution that laws alone are not enough.

I agree with the excellent suggestions put forward by the preceding speakers. I was much impressed with the statement of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Walker) and I might say of him, as of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald), that the contention that is sometimes made that there is a distinct difference between legal English and good English does not apply in this case at all. I certainly enjoyed their excellent discussions of the subject. I am happy, and sincerely happy, that the government of this country is headed by an outstanding exponent of what is sought in this resolution and what has been advanced by the speakers today. I think the idea which is sought here is nearer fruition and realization at this time than at any previous time it has been discussed in this house. I think the procedure which has been outlined by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice shows a realistic appraisal of, as well as a sincere dedication to the essential subject matter of this resolution, and I am delighted that such a statement has been made. I am very happy to congratulate all those who have put themselves behind it so magnificently as they have done.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, as one of the representatives of the province of Quebec, I wish to take part in this debate. Ever since I have been a member of this house, I have read and reread the resolutions on human rights introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and also by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was a member of the opposition. I thought that the introduction of such resolutions afforded hon. members a marvellous opportunity to deliver a few flamboyant speeches to make themselves out as the genuine defenders of the human race.

It is all very well to talk about freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, the right of free association, the protection under the law of all our fellow citizens, white, black, yellow, Catholic, Protestant or Jewish; or to object to excessive bails or even to prohibit exile; or to fight against unjustified interference in family affairs, in private correspondence and many other things which are found in this resolution. But is it really necessary to include in our statutes a new resolution when everything has already been provided for since confederation, and even before that?

Some of our rights were guaranteed by the treaty of Paris as far back as 1763; unfortunately, those rights were not always respected. While this treaty guaranteed to minorities the right to speak their language, to practise their religion, to teach their language not only in one part of this country but in the whole British colony of that time where human beings speaking either French or English were living, we know what happened. It is only in the province of Quebec that those rights were respected, not because they were recognized by the British North America Act, but only because, with their sense of justice, the people of the province of Quebec wanted all those who live within our borders to enjoy equal rights. As a matter of fact, in spite of the guarantees which we were given by the 1867 constitution, as well as by the treaty of Paris, did we not see, a few years after confederation, the Catholics of New Brunswick deprived of the right to teach their religion? The case went before the courts. The courts decided then that those rights were guaranteed by the constitution, in so far as they existed before the adoption of the act of 1867. However that right not having been recognized in New Brunswick where, up to that time, it had been enjoyed only in a spirit of kindly tolerance, the courts decided that Catholics were not entitled to their schools or even to religious instruction in them. Sir Georges Etienne Cartier did not wish to intervene to impose the federal government's views, in spite of the fact that the federal government still enjoyed the right of veto. He did not wish the federal government to interfere in a field which up to that time, had been considered as exclusively provincial.

Then we have witnessed the struggle of those who, not because of laws or because of treaties, but only because of their inner convictions, fought for those rights which were theirs by natural birthright.

In 1871, when Manitoba became a province of Canada, Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, who remembered the error made in New Brunswick, had written into the constitution of that province the same principles that existed in Quebec with regard to minorities. That was all right at that time. However, in spite of Sir Georges' goodwill, the existing law was ignored in 1891. The case was brought before the courts. The decision of the lower court having been reversed by the court of appeal, it was confirmed by the privy council. Nevertheless, although the minorities had won their case before the law, even with the treaties, this law was disregarded and the rights of the French-speaking Catholic minority of Manitoba have been curtailed.

Was it intended that the federal government raise an army and invade the province to apply the law? That was impossible and impracticable. There were representations and parleys for the purpose of obtaining a few concessions, but without much success.

In 1897, following numerous negotiations, Sir Wilfrid Laurier managed to obtain very minor concessions. It was, however, a beginning.

In 1913, in spite of the law and treaties, the province of Ontario adopted its famous Regulation XVII, barring the teaching of religion and of the French language from the school program. I still remember this famous struggle where we saw Ottawa mothers joining forces at Guigues school to prevent female teachers from Toronto from invading our schools, and when some teachers worked two years without a salary in order to preserve a natural right. Well, it was only by dint of struggling, and struggling again that our people secured certain concessions with the result that today, in the province of Ontario, the situation is getting better and better.

Later on, in 1928, Mr. Anderson, leader of the Conservative party in Saskatchewan, denounced the Gardiner government for tolerating the teaching of the Catholic religion in schools. Through unremitting work Mr. Anderson succeeded—and the present Prime Minister of Canada knows something about it—in poisoning public opinion. There again, in spite of the rights of people and of treaties, they succeeded in having the crucifix —not a Roman Catholic but a Christian symbol—banished from the schools as well as in having the religious orders prohibited from wearing their uniforms. Fortunately, once again, thanks to the energetic protests of our people, ground was gained gradually and our people obtained some concessions which they now enjoy in Saskatchewan.

Today the same situation is found in British Columbia. We have heard of what has happened at Maillardville. In spite of laws and treaties, when goodwill is lacking, a way is always found to circumvent them.

Mr. Speaker, I claim that if we were to add to our statutes the proposal brought before the house today by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, we would in no wise be improving matters. It would merely clutter up our statutes with laws which would be respected only when the majority in a province or in this country as a whole will have acquired an instinctive respect for the minorities. It is the mentality which is bad, and there is no shortage of legislation. All the necessary laws are there in our statutes. It is only a matter of enforcing them. And when they are not clear they can be referred to the courts which generally interpret them properly.

To return once more to the treaty of Paris, as I was saying at the beginning of my remarks, there was only a small number of French Canadians at the time, only about 60,000 of them who had remained after the conquest. History records that the rich and the noblemen had left Canada to return to France, leaving behind 60,000 subjects, 90 per cent of whom did not know how to read or write, though among them were a few priests. In spite of that, with the tolerance of the British government, a tolerance which we are pleased to recognize and for which we are thankful, they managed to maintain their natural rights. Today there are about 5,000,000 of us. Though we still meet with difficulties, we manage to surmount them, not by revolution, not by open battle, but by a constant constitutional struggle to safeguard rights which are ours and which we must cause to be respected in spite of everything, since the treaty of Paris applied not only to the province of Quebec, to Lower Canada but to the entire territory controlled by England at the time, that is from the Atlantic ocean to the Pacific ocean.

In my opinion, those difficulties arose because this is a young country and, in a young country like Canada, there are always, on the side of the majority as well as on the side of the minority, in any English province as well as in the French province of Quebec, certain elements of fanaticism which try to achieve prominence in the political field or elsewhere by stirring the passions of the masses, and to set themselves up on a pedestal while trodding upon others.

Well, this situation will continue for a few years and I am convinced that even if we inserted in our statute books the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, nothing worthwhile would be accomplished. Moreover, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), said the other day, this resolution is but a cliché, because it is only a repetition of what has been adopted by the United Nations, a repetition of what already exists in the constitution of the United States. Yet in spite of that document, in spite of that guarantee of human rights in the United States, we saw a short time ago how the Negro minority is being dealt with there. Because some men were born of a different colour, they had to fight for their natural rights. We saw what happened a short time ago at Little Rock, in spite of the fact that the United Nations had accepted to guarantee human rights, and that Soviet Russia had recognized that same principle, because we know that the freedom to teach does exist in Soviet Russia in so far as the professors teach marxism all day long and nothing else.

Mr. Speaker, in my remarks, I wanted to avoid the approach of some members who today attempted to make political capital out of this debate.

Someone inquired, this afternoon, why we on this side of the house did not take part in the debate. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is what prompted me to take part in it.

(Text):

May I be permitted to answer the member who, if he did not say so clearly, seemed to claim that those to your left, Mr. Speaker, were not participating in the debate. The reason for that is we have our own views. We have discussed the subject before in previous parliaments, and we know what we think about it, and about having numerous laws that are not really necessary. I am reminded of certain facts which came to light at a press conference on January 27, 1955, the chairman of which was Blair Fraser and the members were George Bain, Toronto Globe and Mail; George Langlois, Montreal La Presse and Stanley Burke, Vancouver Sun. At that time the panel was asking the present Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) what he thought of a resolution brought forward by his chief, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). I quote:

> Mr. Langlois: Coming to another subject. Your colleague, John Diefenbaker, has been trying for years to have a bill of rights written into our statutes or our constitution to protect individual citizens' rights and prevent them from being infringed upon by any government including provincial governments. What is your opinion on that?
> Mr. Balcer: Well, I think, I mean there is a lot to be said, I mean; I agree with what Mr. Diefenbaker has in mind, I mean.
>
> Mr. Burke: You do not think a federal bill of rights would be an invasion of the provincial field?
>
> Mr. Balcer: Oh, yes, I mean I wouldn't like, I mean, to use a federal bill of rights to infringe on the provincial rights.
>
> Mr. Langlois: Could we have ten or eleven bills of rights?

Mr. Balcer: It might be the answer, I mean.

Mr. Burke: But if they differed then you would have different civil rights on one bank of the Ottawa river to what you had on the other bank. Is that what you would advocate?

Mr. Balcer: No, I don't think, I mean, they would be so different, one from the other, if they were provincial civil rights, I mean. I doubt very much—I think what you have in mind is that, I mean, Quebec for instance might—I think these laws, I mean, the effect of these laws have been exaggerated.

Mr. Langlois: If you are in favour of a bill of rights don't you think we should have one bill of rights that could suit all Canadians?

Mr. Balcer: As long as it doesn't infringe on provincial rights.

Mr. Fraser: Who is to decide that? That is the point at the moment. Mr. Duplessis has a law restricting the rights of Witnesses of Jehovah to proselytize; what do you think of that?

Mr. Balcer: Well, that is, you see, I mean the Witnesses of Jehovah were, I mean, as far as Quebec is concerned, I mean they were really embarrassing people and so forth.

I believe that I said what I thought in French, and with or without civil rights being guaranteed in this country I was clearer than the Solicitor General was in answering those questions. If there is a vote on the matter, I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. Jack Wratten (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this proposed bill of rights this evening I should like to express my congratulations to the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) who gave us a splendid explanation of this measure this afternoon when we first started this debate. I must confess that I spent considerable time yesterday afternoon and last night reading the various things that have already been said here in this house.

In speaking to this motion about human rights I find that this subject has been the source of long debate in years gone by. I find that similar motions have been sponsored by our own Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on more than one occasion. I find also that the sponsor of this resolution, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), supported proposed bills of rights on former occasions when they were before the house. I find also, by reading back issues of Hansard, that our Prime Minister, then the hon. member for Lake Centre, first brought to the attention of this house the need for a bill of rights on March 7, 1946, in the form of an amendment to the citizenship bill that was before the house at that time. Throughout subsequent sessions this subject has been repeatedly brought forward.

In one previous debate on this measure, on December 4, 1951, at page 1561 of Hansard, our present Prime Minister gave another very effective speech on the need for a bill of rights. The minister of justice at that time, Mr. Garson, made a statement on the same issue and said:

If, as he contends,—

Referring to the present Prime Minister.

—the law of Canada is at present defective in the matter of protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms, what is required is something which he himself has advocated on a number of occasions—a bill of rights.

I find also that on March 24, 1952 a considerable debate took place again on a proposed bill of human rights, and quite a number of members from all parties took part. Again our present Prime Minister led off in the debate, and I should like to quote some parts of his speech which I believe will be of great interest, not only to myself but to all new members in the house. On page 715 of Hansard for March 24, 1952, I find this:

I am not going to review in detail the historical development within our country of the concept of freedom. It is represented by those great charters—Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, the Petition of Right, Habeas Corpus, and the Quebec Act and the British North America Act, peculiar to our country; and by the Statute of Westminster, whereby all dominions of the British commonwealth became equals with the United Kingdom.

Then, he goes on to say:

The quest for freedom and the desire to maintain freedom and to assure freedom is not the monopoly of any political party—and it is in that spirit I speak.

Then, he goes on to describe the contents of the bill of human rights as passed by the United Nations at San Francisco and subscribed to by the government of Canada. There is no doubt that we in Canada enjoy a true sense of liberty that is unequalled in any part of the world. This makes it imperative that all our freedoms be preserved.

Farther on in this address I found a few lines that explained the fundamentals of just what this bill meant to us, and I quote again from page 720:

Someone may ask what a bill of rights would do. A bill of rights would deny the right of any majority to interfere with my serving God as my conscience demands. It would deny the right of any government to interfere with my right to speak or write so long as I did so within the law. It would deny discrimination against any person because of his race or colour.

Farther down, he said:

A bill of rights would re-define the landmarks of liberty, which are almost erased as a result of the pathways of war becoming the permanent highroads of peace. It would give positive evidence that when Canada, at the United Nations assembly two years ago, accepted the universal declaration of human rights, that acceptance was a dedication of the Canadian people not only internationally but nationally as well. It would make parliament more careful before passing laws that would have the effect of suspending or interfering with freedom. It would mobilize the spiritual things of life without which neither nations nor men can live a full and abundant life. Above everything else, it would make Canadians freedom conscious. As Canadians we pride ourselves on our Canadianism and how full, ample and free we are. Why is it that Canadians have not been given the equality with British subjects in the United Kingdom, in relation to actions against the crown in the courts of law? The time has come to raise the right of Canadian citizenship, and to place Canadians on equal footing with the Queen in courts of law, with the right to take any proceeding against the crown without consent of the crown, other than proceedings in respect of the armed forces, or under the Post Office Act.

Several other hon. members spoke that day in favour of this bill, including the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who is sponsoring this present bill today. Some spoke against it, as is always the case. It seemed that the chief criticism of this bill was the infringing on rights of provincial and municipal governments. I was quite intrigued by one hon. member's objection in that while he wanted all the freedom possible for the press with which he was closely associated, he wanted the radio and the C.B.C. to be very closely censored as to what they broadcast.

I was interested to read the text of the resolution passed by the United Nations, so I procured a copy of it from the library. I should like to thank publicly the staff of the library for the fine help and co-operation which they always so cheerfully give to the members of this house. I presume that the preamble to this declaration has been quoted often in this house but it is so important that I feel it would do no harm to have it on record once again. The declaration to which we as Canadian people subscribed and which was passed by the United Nations reads as follows:

Human Rights

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people,

Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law,

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations among nations,

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Whereas member states have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now therefore

The General Assembly Proclaims

This universal declaration of human rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of member states themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

The declaration has some thirty articles in it for the full context but it has been summarized very well in the bill by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I should like to comment on some of the paragraphs in this bill. We in this country have the widest latitude possible in freedom of speech. In fact, I do not believe there are any objections to people holding forth on whatever views they have so long as it is not advocating the overthrow of our democratic government or libelling some other person. I believe this is as it should be. They tell me that in London, England, in Hyde Park, you can walk around and hear numerous speakers talk on practically every subject imaginable and that also they have the protection of the police from being molested while doing so. This gives the individual a chance to let off pent-up feelings. If he has listeners, that is all well and good. If not, he can soon shut up and go home, but at least he has had the opportunity to voice his ideas to the general public.

Freedom of the press is another privilege which we have and which we should cherish and jealously guard. When I mention the press, I mean any means of giving or distributing news to the general public. I believe the general public are well aware that the press should have access to the news in order to distribute it to the people. This was amply demonstrated, in my opinion, by the people of London, Ontario when, even after a judge had ruled that certain civic information could be withheld from the press, the electors defeated the sitting mayor who supported this way of doing things, I understand, and withheld the information, and returned a man who advocated free access to civic information as the people's right.

This curbing of our right sometimes creeps in in the censorship of books and articles that are considered by certain individuals to be unfit for Canadians to read. In my opinion, this matter needs very careful consideration because what offends one does not offend another. No true free Canadian likes to feel that somebody has the right to say "You shall read this" or "You shall not read that". I believe that the curbing of obscene books and literature lies right in our own hands. If the public would not buy them, the books would soon be off the stands and out of the stores. But it seems that the best way to promote the sale of this trash is for the announcement to be made that it is banned and is unfit to read. When this happens the sales soon soar. We know there are numbers of books that we as parents do not want our children to read. If the parents take an interest in their children's reading habits I believe this could be avoided.

Freedom of religion is another right that has been fought for over a long period of years. I believe that nothing touches a person quicker than to try to force him or her to change his or her religion. We in Canada are supposed to have this freedom, the right to worship whom we please and in whatever way we please. We do not have the violent open opposition that some denominations have had to endure but it shows up in some sections of our country in more subtle ways. While we all do not think alike along this line and while we have different ideas as to the right way to worship, we should respect the other person's point of view and they should not be denied their right to worship in their own way.

I believe, in looking back over history, that it has been the persecution endured by the different denominations which has made them strong and great. We have only to read of these persecutions to see how strong they have become today. One denomination about which I know a great deal has grown to international proportions in the last 75 years and that is the Salvation Army. That organization endured terrific violence and punishment when it first started, not only from lay people but from churchmen as well. This aroused the sympathies of some and the manner and loyalty of the followers in the Salvation Army to the ideals to which they subscribe have built them to the place which they hold today as an international organization.

We could also read, and I personally know, of some Baptist missionaries who endured very great hardships in promoting what they felt to be their right to worship. There is another denomination or sect which has endured persecution in recent times and that is the Jehovah's Witnesses. They are still persecuted in certain places today and it is for that reason, in my opinion, that they are growing as fast as they are. I read an article in the press not too long ago in which the writer claimed this sect was growing faster and making more converts than any other church group today. I am not a member of the Jehovah's Witnesses nor am I in sympathy with some of their methods or beliefs but, in my opinion, it is just a case of history repeating itself. To persecute is to make strong.

Let us give each individual the right to worship as he pleases without any fear of persecution.

Sometimes we read of the rights of people being trampled upon then their being summarily arrested or held without communication with the outside world. This happened in Toronto not long ago. The police entered a private home without a warrant; they broke into a home in dead of night upsetting the occupants. I believe the authorities cannot be too careful in such cases to preserve the rights of the people.

There are many other rights that we as Canadians enjoy and which we must hold very dear; the right to work anywhere we can obtain employment and not to be in a position where we cannot leave a job and seek employment elsewhere; the right of the employer, which I believe should be in effect the same right, that is to employ whomever he sees fit. I believe the employers are more interested in a person's ability to do an honest day's work for an honest day's pay than in his colour or the nationality of that person.

There are other aspects of this bill which we could discuss tonight but I am sure that we as true Canadians and citizens of a country composed of many different nationalities are concerned with only one high ideal and that is to protect our freedom and to respect each other's rights and freedoms.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this resolution. I believe it is a good thing for all of us in this house to take the time occasionally to contemplate, to assess and to evaluate the freedoms that we are prepared to fight and die for when they are threatened but tend to neglect in more serene times.

I think in our minds and hearts and in our way of life we do have a bill of rights in this country, but it is not spelled out in our constitution and this resolution puts it down in black and white. As the hon. minister from Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) said today, when our forefathers drafted the British North America Act they did not visualize and they did not believe that the fundamental principles at that time could be in danger or could be undermined. Since that time the world has changed and it has become divided. Two world wars and one continuous cold war had sparked fear in the hearts of men, and freedom and fear do not go hand in hand.

The December copy of the Royal Bank of Canada Monthly Letter has a thoughtful essay on this very subject. The title is "Preserving Freedom" and there is this warning which I would like to put on Hansard:

> Democratic freedom has failed in some countries because their people slept. It is commonplace for people who were fighting against us in recent wars to excuse themselves on two grounds—that they did not realize what was happening to their government and there was nothing they could do but obey orders. Tyranny degrades both those who exercise it and those who allow it.

The letter goes on to warn that perhaps we have lost some of our freedoms. We may have taken freedom too much for granted; we may have been silent in the face of some injustice; we may have fallen in love with security, which can jeopardize freedom.

Perhaps one reason why I feel compelled to speak on this resolution is that I have seen with my own eyes in recent months what happens when men dominate through fear. I have seen the people of Russia; I have seen that they have so-called material security but no freedom whatsoever. Behind the Iron Curtain there are none of the freedoms that we cherish and about which we have been talking throughout this day. There is no freedom of speech or expression; there is no freedom of press or other means of communication; there is no freedom from exile; there is no freedom in privacy or in correspondence. Once these freedoms are gone it is a long and tortuous path which we must tread in order to regain them. This, surely, is one of the lessons we learned on this side of the world while watching the Hungarian uprising last October and the pain and torture undergone in that country.

The communist doctrine was once very clearly set down by Lenin when he said: "Why should freedom of speech and freedom of the press be allowed? Why should a government which is doing what it believes to be right allow itself to be criticized?"

As the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) and the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) pointed out this afternoon, we came all too close to that dangerous doctrine last year when the government of that day gagged debate and criticism by introducing closure. Mr. Lenin said: "Why should a government which is doing what it believes to be right allow itself to be criticized?" A former cabinet minister in this house said: "Who is to stop us?" Well the people of Canada answered that question on June 10th.

That brings me to another reason why I am interested in this bill of rights. The freedom of the press is something which I believe every Canadian, not just the publishers and the journalists, but every Canadian should guard and protect. It is one of the first freedoms which is taken away when totalitarianism moves in. The reason it has to be throttled, the reason it has to be taken away is because freedom of the press is a bulwark for so many other freedoms and rights. The right to criticize and the right to praise, the right to disagree and the right to agree, freedom of thought, freedom of expression and freedom from censorship, all these things are protected by those four little words "freedom of the press". As long as a country has freedom of the press it is free.

In the memory of all of us here we have seen freedom-loving countries like Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary gripped in the vise of totalitarianism. I am sure many of us ask ourselves, "Can it happen here?" Well, it can happen. It can happen in any country and it can happen through carelessness, smugness and, as I said before, because we take these freedoms too much for granted.

On numerous occasions this afternoon in this debate Sir Wilfrid Laurier's famous phrase has been quoted, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty". That is a very true statement. Eternal vigilance is even more vital today because of the kind of world in which we live, a divided world, one in which the word "security" looms large. When I refer to "security" I mean personal security not merely material security. It is an age of fear. Sir Winston Churchill once described the condition that exists today as "peace through terror".

The other day in the external affairs committee Mr. Nik Cavell, who is the Canadian Colombo plan administrator, said that communism in southeast Asia is gaining in influence because it is a positive force. I think it is true that totalitarianism is a positive force—it is both positive and force—and democracy is not. Democracy and compromise have to go hand in hand, compromise between individual liberty, personal freedom and the liberty of society, of all of us. I think that by including this bill of rights in our constitution perhaps we are doing something to make democracy a positive force. In such a world of wars and threatened wars it is almost inevitable that security must take its toll from our fundamental freedoms.

In 1955 when a somewhat similar resolution was before this house the present Prime Minister spoke. This debate has been referred to on a number of occasions today but I have taken another excerpt from the Prime Minister's speech in which he claimed that we in Canada have fewer rights today in the preservation of our fundamental freedoms than we had before abolishing appeals to the privy council. As recorded at page 902 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> As long as the privy council was our court of last resort, in actuality the foot of the throne, an individual in this country whose fundamental freedoms were interfered with directly or indirectly had a right of appeal to that court.

In that debate two years ago hon. members of the legal profession and especially the then minister of justice had a great deal to say about the legal aspects of introducing a bill of rights into our constitution. I read that debate fully and I must say that to a layman it was extremely technical and equally confusing.

That brings me to my final point as to why I feel I should speak tonight in support of this resolution and why it appeals to me. It is a relatively short time since a wrong was righted in this house in regard to the human rights of women. It is an even shorter time since an injustice was corrected at what the present Prime Minister called the court of last resort, the foot of the throne, the privy council. Until 1917 not only could Canadian women not vote but they were not even regarded as persons and therefore could not be members of the House of Commons as I am today or members of the Senate.

I have read over some of the debates that took place in the House of Commons prior to the passing of the act which gave the vote to women and I must say they make quaint reading today. In that long debate the lawyers again had a heyday. In fact, after the minister of justice of that day, the Hon. Charles Doherty, had held forth at considerable length one hon. member got up and rather plaintively expressed himself in this way:

> As to the legal arguments we heard this afternoon from the hon. Minister of Justice, if he had anything clear in his mind, or if he was able to make anything clear to the other legal lights in this house, he certainly was not able to make anything clear to the ordinary layman because when the hon. minister was through, it seemed to me that the matter was more muddled up than when he started.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of the lawyers and in spite of the fact that some hon. members claimed that the franchise would "depoetize" women, "degrade" women, "remove her bashfulness, sweetness and charm;" despite all this eloquence the Canadian woman got her human rights. In 1917, women received the vote and in 1929 they were declared to be persons.

I have mentioned this particular phase of human rights from the past because the freedoms that we enjoy today did not just happen and they will not just happen in the future. I think we must strive continually to preserve the precious freedoms we have and that is why I support this resolution on human rights.

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I note that the mover of this resolution is not in the house.

Some hon. Members: Yes he is.

Mr. Nicholson: If you cannot read better than you see you would do well to sit down.

Mr. McPhillips: I was rather interested that he should have been the mover of this resolution because I always thought that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) represented a group that favoured a police state. At least that was the impression I gained in British Columbia many years ago.

Mr. Nicholson: What are you reading from?

Mr. McPhillips: I am not reading from anything.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes you are.

Mr. McPhillips: I also note that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) is not in his seat. He was quite a proponent, you know, of the—

Mr. Coldwell: Let the hon. gentleman look around his own group and see who are not in their seats.

Mr. Nicholson: Where is the Prime Minister?

Mr. McPhillips: I can, if necessary, appeal for the protection of the chair but I am not going to do it. I notice that the hon. member for Vancouver East is not in his seat.

Mr. Nicholson: Where is the Prime Minister?

Mr. McPhillips: He, of course, was one who definitely suggested that if his group ever got into power—which thank heaven they did not—they were going to have a police state.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cameron: That is a lie. That is a deliberate lie.

Mr. McPhillips: This is something he said when he was the leader of the opposition in the legislature of British Columbia.

Mr. Cameron: That is a deliberate lie. Did you hear me? That is a deliberate lie.

Mr. McPhillips: Where is the old mailed fist? Has it gone down the drain? Where is the regimentation and the absolute obedience they were going to demand from the public if they ever got into power? Apparently it has all gone down the drain. Now we find this group is deteriorating. No more is there the mailed fist. We have a mealy-mouthed resolution. It is in the velvet glove. I am just wondering whether—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How about the civil servants you do not trust?

Mr. McPhillips: —there is any mailed fist in the velvet glove, or whether it is all mealy-mouthed nonsense. Who are they trying to fool? They talk of excessive bail in this resolution, which means high bail granted by a judge. Why if you chaps were in office there would not be any bail; a man would simply be put in jail and that would be the end of it.

Another thing I notice is conspicuously absent in this resolution. There is no mention of the old song that you used to sing, namely that every citizen is entitled to gainful employment. There is no mention of that here. That was one of your old principles. Why is it not mentioned here, Mr. Speaker? I suggest that the boys sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, love unemployment. That is what they work for. They were born and nurtured on unemployment. Unemployment is their stock in trade and that is what they are hoping for now.

I must say I approach this resolution with mixed feelings. I approve of much of it but I see its danger. I see the danger of circumscribing our liberties with pious language. That is the way to get your tail in the gate. Look at the United States amendment having to do with carrying weapons. That has been one of the curses of the United States, Mr. Speaker. One of the early amendments to the United States constitution says that every American citizen can bear weapons. What does that mean? And what has it meant? Well, I will tell you what it has meant. It has meant that they have had lawlessness and ruthlessness in that nation for many years but they cannot do away with it because it is an amendment to the constitution. Admittedly, they can license them.

In the beautiful riding from which I come we have thousands of tourists from the United states. The fellows who come up from Texas drive up in their big Lincolns. They have a six-gun mounted on the footboard. They call it a footboard. I do not know just what the term is but anyway there is a spike placed out from the footboard with a washer so many inches down. You can put the six-gun down there in such a way that you can make a quick draw. Of course our immigration officials will not allow them into the country. Most of them agree to it, but some of them say no, they will not give up their guns and they will not even come into the country because they will not travel without a six-gun. That is an amazing situation. It is true that in Canada it is possible to have a revolver if you can prove to the local chief of police, under the Criminal Code, that you need one, but that does not entitle you to walk down Wellington street with a gun in your hip pocket; but there is the situation. The right to carry a gun was given to the people of the United States by an amendment to the constitution. Now they are stuck with it. Actually, in point of fact it is a monster on their backs.

Let us look at prohibition. In 1917, the people of Canada by and large went for prohibition, but, Mr. Speaker, they were sensible. They went at it by provinces, and I think every province in Canada with the exception of Quebec—they were too old in wisdom and too smart to fool with it—went for prohibition. We did not invoke any federal legislation on this question; but what did the United States do? With a similar emotionalism but with an unwise enthusiasm they decided that they would fix the thing for all time. They passed an amendment to the constitution, the Volstead Act. Not all of you remember it because some of you were too young. It was the 19th amendment to the constitution of the United States and there was to be no liquor. What happened?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Was it not the 18th amendment?

Mr. McPhillips: Unfortunately they went through that regrettable period when they developed the beer barons. One of my hon. friends here mentioned such individuals as Al Capone, and that brought on the development of bath-tub gin and jackass brandy, and so forth, and the whole moral fibre of the young people of the United States has been undermined by it. Therefore, they decided eventually to end it. The provinces, incidentally, had gone about it in a different way. They brought in such reforms as liquor control boards and so on. What did the United States do? Because they had this monster on their backs they could not do anything about it. In 1932 there was a democratic convention and the question of whether they would elect Smith or Roosevelt came up. Al Smith looked as if he simply could not make it. You remember such slogans as "cut down on the dries and have your wet dreams come true", and that sort of thing. When it came to the final analysis McAdoo of California controlled 110 votes and Larsen from Texas controlled 55 votes, and they decided they would put this proposition up to Roosevelt. They did and he agreed that there would be a change in the liquor laws and he went in.

What happened was that through a laborious process they changed the constitution. They had to get 75 per cent of the states to agree, and that sort of thing, and it was a very difficult thing to do. That leads me, Mr. Speaker, to say this. So far as the resolution is concerned I know the words are good. I agree with them but we have all these things now. If we get to the place where we try to circumscribe the rights we have by words we are going to get into difficulty.

I would like to say this, Mr. Speaker. Where else in the world except under British jurisdiction can a subject invoke the sovereign? In such matters as prerogative, motion of mandamus, habeas corpus, certiorari, the subject can institute an action and it is maintained in the name of Her Majesty the Queen; John Smith, or whoever he is, versus the registrar of a court or the superintendent of brokers, or even the Attorney General of Canada himself. In no other nation can that be done.

I am in sympathy with the resolution but what I say is this. Why go to work and foul our nest with a mess of pottage? We do not need it. We have got it now. Let us not take a chance. We have inherited the best from our British institutions. We have it. Let us not make a mistake; let us not goof on the question and we could very easily. I suggest that we just string along with what we have now.

Incidentally, I am quite satisfied. I have to take cognizance of the fact that the members from the province of Quebec on both sides of the house will agree with me that it is a dangerous thing to tamper with existing institutions. I know that in the first week of the session one or two of them made rather impassioned speeches and said that they must insist upon the basic rights, religious freedom, and so forth. They have had that for two hundred years and there is no suggestion that it would be taken from them under our system. In fact, far from being taken from them, it has been extended thousands of miles because in my riding of Victoria we have two magnificent Roman Catholic institutions. The good Sisters of St. Ann have an immense convent in the city of Victoria which is the main focal point of my riding. It was instituted by them as far back as 1859. Across the street they have one of the finest hospitals in British Columbia, St. Joseph's Hospital. They have gone up the coast and have hospitals in Juneau and Skagway, Alaska. This sort of thing is done but to my mind this discussion is like flogging a dead horse. There is no question about depriving anybody of their rights. Those rights exist, always will exist, and we will fight for them if we have to.

[Mr. McPhillips.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to follow the arguments of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Already at this session it has been demonstrated that he does not speak for his party. The Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), made that clear on at least one occasion.

An hon. Member: It is a good thing he does not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I suggest that when he now says that it is not necessary to have a bill of rights such as my leader has proposed he is flying in the face of the record of his own Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who has contended for years that Canada should have a bill of rights.

A good deal has been said today about the long struggle that many members have put forth in an effort to win a bill of rights for the people of Canada. My hon. friends on the government side of the house have sung the praises of their Prime Minister. They have been good enough to admit that my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), Senator Croll, the former member for Spadina, and others in the house have also fought across the years for the establishment in Canada of a bill of rights.

To me it is a matter of regret that the house seems to be passing up the opportunity to take a significant step in that battle this very day. I concede to every member, particularly because of the importance of the subject, the right to speak to it, but when members of the same party speak in succession one after another as they have done today it does lend credence to the suggestion that the resolution is being talked out. Many Canadians will regard this as unfortunate.

Let it be perfectly clear that if the resolution in the terms in which it is drafted is passed by the house it will not have immediate legislative effect. The passing of the resolution would merely be a declaration of the opinion of the house that consideration should be given to taking whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to write into it a bill of rights for all Canadians. I confess that if the resolution were passed tonight it might be a long time, even a matter of years, before its terms could be fully implemented. I agree with those on the other side of the house, such as the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie), who expressed the hope that the time will soon come when we will be able to amend our own constitution in Canada in all respects without having to go to Westminster for an amendment to the British North America Act. It may be that it will not be until we have in Canada the power to amend our own constitution that we will write into that constitution a bill of rights.

But this house has the opportunity tonight to go on record as expressing its opinion that it should be done. That, I submit, would be a declaration that would have value in this effort that has been made across the years to win a bill of rights for Canadians. Apart from a few hon. members such as the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McPhillips), who took his seat a moment ago, there is general approval of the proposition that we should have a bill of rights. Some have suggested that it should not be in the British North America Act, that it should not be in our constitution but rather should be just a statute of the federal parliament. We take the view, and I think on reflection most hon. members will agree with us, that if a bill of rights is to have any value to Canadians as a whole it must be written somewhere in such a manner that it has a bearing on legislation that can be passed both by the parliament of Canada and by the legislatures of the various provinces.

The parliament of Canada cannot by itself pass something that has control over the rights of the provinces. It is only in something of a constitutional nature that principles can be laid down that will govern both the parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the various provinces. I believe that any who give study to the question will realize that in the end if we are going to achieve a written bill of rights, and I suggest most of us agree on the desirability of that aim, it will have to be an act of a constitutional nature. That means either an amendment to the British North America Act itself or some constitutional piece of legislation arrived at after we have established a means of amending or writing our constitution here in this country.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, all that my leader's motion calls for today is for the house to declare itself in favour of steps being taken to achieve this desirable end, and I hope that even yet the house may be willing tonight to let the motion come to a vote so that the opinion of the members of the House of Commons in this twenty-third parliament may be made a matter of record.

There is just one other point I should like to make. One does not need to add to the arguments in support of a bill of rights because they have been made and made quite well from both sides of the house. But it has been a matter of interest to note the number of members who have done a good deal of reading in this field. In particular they have read the debates on this resolution when it has been before the house on previous occasions and on resolutions introduced by the present Prime Minister when he was in days gone by the private member for Lake Centre.

But I want to suggest to hon. members that in their attempt to ascertain who was the father or stepfather or father-in-law of a bill of rights in Canada they have not gone far enough back in their reading. I suggest that for an interesting speech members might read the contribution that Senator Power made in 1919 when he was the member for Quebec South in the House of Commons during the time of the general strike in the city of Winnipeg. Back in those days and despite the sense of panic that was abroad there was at least one Liberal who called for a recognition of the rights of the working men of this country, and I pay tribute still today to Senator Power for the speech he made on that occasion in 1919.

If anyone is interested in the first time when legislation was introduced that foreshadowed the idea of a bill of rights, I suggest he should turn to Hansard of March 24, 1922. He will find that on that day my predecessor as member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, introduced two private bills. One was an amendment to the Immigration Act and the other was an amendment to the Criminal Code. In introducing these bills, Mr. Woodsworth said with respect to the first one, and a similar thought applied to the second one:

> The purpose of this bill is to repeal those sections of the act, so that every man in this country, whether a Canadian by birth or one who has lived in Canada, will be assured of the right of trial by jury.

Why did Mr. Woodsworth have to introduce these two bills? He did so because in the hysteria of 1919 a Conservative government had rushed through amendments to the Immigration Act and the Criminal Code, and I believe to one other statute, which took away the opportunity of trial by jury in certain instances and made pronouncements with respect to what was defined as sedition, which were clearly against the traditions and civil liberties of this country as they were understood. Later in speaking to one of these bills Mr. Woodsworth said this as recorded at page 1388 of Hansard for May 3, 1922:

> The effect of the existing amendment to the Immigration Act is really to deprive a very large section of our people of the right to trial by jury—a very serious consideration. It is unnecessary for me to review the history of the claims put forth by the British people, from the time of the Magna

Carta and the Bill of Rights, to the right of trial by jury. That great document—the Magna Carta —was effective in restricting the arbitrary power of kings and ministers, but we have today, in this legislation which has been placed on the statute book—

He was referring to the legislation placed on the statute book by a Conservative government.

—a reversion, if I may call it so, to the condition of affairs which prevailed before the time of the Magna Carta.

Mr. Woodsworth went on to point out that the purpose of the bills which he had introduced was to re-establish certain civil liberties, certain basic rights in this country. So Mr. Speaker, in these measures introduced by Mr. Woodsworth back in 1922 you have what might be called the forerunner of the motions that have come later calling for establishment by legislation of a bill of rights for Canadians.

We in this group welcome the debate that has taken place today. We welcome the interest that has been shown in this measure. We would have liked to have had a speech from the Prime Minister. He used to speak on this measure when he was on the opposition side of the house. He used to press the immediacy of the matter, the need for action. He complained when the Liberal government talked out his resolution, or when the Liberal government refused to refer the matter to the supreme court. He complained when a committee was set up as a means of shelving the issue. We are sorry he is not here today to make one more of those speeches urging that this resolution be passed. We believe it would be a significant milestone in the struggle for a bill of rights if the house would tonight agree to the passing of this resolution. We admit it would not have immediate legislative effect, but it would be a declaration of this parliament that a bill of rights should be written into the law of this land.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I believe it is desirable that I should say a few words at this stage to indicate the attitude of the government towards this subject. I recognize at once that this is a private member's resolution. It is true that it is a resolution that has all the weight of having been introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who in addition to being an authority on parliament has the additional weight of being the leader of a party in this house. However, it is still, in its essence and as he put it forward a private member's resolution. It is, therefore, I feel, not desirable that there should be a party stand with respect to it, and I am not rising at this point to indicate to anyone in the house that the government wishes them to take a certain position on it, but it is in my view, and I am sure it is in the view of all hon. members, a subject of such importance that it does warrant that the government should indicate in a general way its attitude to the subject and to the suggestion that is made.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Ellis: Let us have a vote.

Mr. Fulton: The government welcomes the principle behind this resolution. There should be no doubt about that, because for very obvious reasons there are, to put it at its mildest, men of influence in the government who are committed to the idea of a bill of rights. There is no backing away from the attitude of the past or from any undertaking that may have been given on this subject. But we believe that it is essential that any enactment of a bill or declaration of rights, no matter what may be the legislative form, should carry the judgment of the Canadian people as a whole and should be in a form which will be acceptable to the Canadian people.

It is obvious from what we have heard in the house today, as well as what we have heard on the subject when it has been debated inside and outside parliament in the past, that there is a very wide divergence of opinion as to how we should proceed, if we proceed at all. When I say "if we proceed at all", I am referring to the opinions of others, because there are some who think we should not proceed. There is a very wide divergence of opinion, even amongst those who believe we should proceed, as to just how it should be done.

It is obvious, therefore, that the very greatest care must be taken to ensure that any such legislative enactment shall be in a form, and of effect, which will ensure that not only does it embody those rights which Canadians wish us to preserve, but also that it does not infringe on the rights or freedoms which others hold dear. And in this field we must recognize that we are up against a question, not only of individual rights but of provincial and constitutional rights.

It was for this reason that at the very outset, immediately after the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had introduced the resolution, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker), my parliamentary assistant as Minister of Justice, made his very excellent and comprehensive as well as moving speech outlining the problems which must be faced and solved before any bill or declaration of rights can be introduced by any government that claims to be responsible.

But when we make reference to the difficulties and problems that must be met, Mr.

Speaker, again I wish to emphasize that we do not need to hide behind these difficulties, and we do not intend to do so. We are in favour of the principle which is sought to be carried forward by this resolution, although we have very grave misgivings as to the particular method suggested.

To the same extent, indeed even to a greater extent, as we recognize the difficulty we also recognize the desirability, I might say the essential requirement, of some such provision being enacted. The needs for a bill of rights have been outlined by many speakers in the past, and by none with more force or detail than the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). These needs have been put on Hansard on many occasions and can be found there, so I am not going to attempt to enumerate them here tonight.

But it is because we recognize the difficulties that confront us that we are now working as a government, and in the Department of Justice, as has been stated by the Prime Minister and myself, to find what is the soundest approach to this problem of putting into legislative form the delineation of the rights and freedoms that are fundamental and must be preserved in Canada.

There are two views as to how this could be done. There is the view put forward by my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that it should be by way of amendment to the British North America Act. There is the other view that it should be simply by a federal statute, whether it be in the form of a detailed statute or merely in the form of a declaration of fundamental principles. Those are the two views—on the one hand a constitutional amendment and on the other a simple statute of this parliament.

We do not reject out of hand the idea of a constitutional amendment as suggested in this resolution. However, I suggest to my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and to my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald) that we must, especially when we are talking about freedom, recognize the fact that there is one great bastion, respect for which is essential if freedom itself is to be maintained, and that is the constitution of this country. If you take an attitude that the constitution is to be amended to this extent by this parliament whether or not the provinces consent—that the constitution can be amended and that if there is no other way of doing this thing than by a constitutional amendment with or without consent, then let us amend the constitution—I say, Mr. Speaker, that if you do that then in the name of freedom you are making an assault upon the bastion of freedom itself; and that is something which this government will not commit itself to doing.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: If he thinks of what I said I do not think he will find that I suggested that we do this over the objection of the provinces. My resolution clearly states that we take whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I fully recognize the fact that in the speech made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar this afternoon he made no suggestion of going as far as I have just now indicated.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: But while his resolution is carefully worded, nevertheless in the very first section which it proposes to enact it proposes to place restrictions or duties, whichever approach you want, upon the legislatures of the provinces.

Mr. Coldwell: The parliament of Canada or the legislatures.

Mr. Fulton: The parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces. The resolution itself proposes that. But in what I was saying I had particular reference to the speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway this afternoon. As I took down his words, he made it clear that this parliament, in his view, should take the initiative in forwarding to Westminster an amendment for acceptance. He said that we should enact and forward an amendment.

An hon. Member: After consultation.

Mr. Fulton: Yes; he said after full consultation but not necessarily full concurrence. He said that this parliament should take the initiative. I give him credit for sincerity. He apparently holds the view strongly that whether or not we can get consent, nevertheless we should go ahead and amend the constitution. If I carry his point too far or if I do him an injustice, I regret it; but that is certainly the inference that I took from his words this afternoon.

The point I make here, Mr. Speaker, is that we as a government cannot accept that position.

Mr. Ellis: What did the Prime Minister say?

Mr. Fulton: The Prime Minister at no time when he spoke ever suggested that we force such a constitutional amendment through whether or not the provinces consent. This present resolution, especially in the terms in which it is drafted, contemplates legislation in what is exclusively a provincial field because it proposes to enact that it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to do certain things, whether or not they have the right to do them.

Mr. Coldwell: That does not preclude negotiation with the provinces.

Mr. Fulton: What the hon. gentleman now says is perfectly correct, namely that it does not preclude negotiation. But I think we must recognize that the first essential is a respect for the fundamental bastion of freedom itself, namely the constitution; and unless we are prepared to accept that control absolutely then we are in the name of freedom doing what I believe would be the greatest disservice to the cause of freedom itself.

Mr. Ellis: What did the Prime Minister say?

Mr. Fulton: I have said that there are two methods. One is a bill of rights enacted as a federal statute and the other is a constitutional amendment. I have been outlining some of the difficulties and considerations that must be borne in mind in respect of the second method. It is an approach that may be capable of being worked out. Then you are left in this position. That constitutional amendment could take two forms. But when there are two approaches to the problem of acting by way of a constitutional amendment, there could be a conference with the provinces to see whether it is possible to arrive at an agreement on an over-all amendment to the constitution both in the fields which are federal and the fields which are provincial. That, as I say, is the only method which we could contemplate as being a satisfactory method of arriving at such an over-all amendment. The other approach.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: May I just finish my thought. We reject the idea of such an over-all amendment without agreement of the provinces.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister this question? Does he not feel that the method that the government would accept is provided for in the opening words of this motion wherein my leader asks that consideration be given to taking whatever steps are necessary?

Mr. Fulton: Of course the moment one says that a constitutional amendment might be possible one recognizes that what is suggested is a possibility. But anything might be decided as a possibility; and it seems to me that this one is so fraught with difficulty and danger that we should have to look at other methods and solutions first.

The other approach to the question of a constitutional amendment would be one which is confined, in so far as the ability of constitutional lawyers is able to do it, to areas of the constitution which might be agreed are exclusively within federal jurisdiction, and to say that, having confined it to areas of exclusive federal authority, we do not require a conference with or consent by the provinces. But the difficulty here would be that there are still large and important areas of conflict of opinion as to what are the subjects exclusively assigned to dominion jurisdiction and what are the subjects exclusively assigned to provincial jurisdiction. I think there is fairly general agreement that in many of those areas there is overlapping, hence there is in many areas some form of dual responsibility and it would not be possible or at the very best it would be exceedingly difficult—so exceedingly difficult that it would take the wisdom of a Solomon, and I do not think there is anyone in this house who claims that degree of wisdom, not even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—to work out that type of amendment which would have absolute acceptance by all the people of Canada.

Mr. Ellis: Would the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. gentleman will forgive me I do not wish to carry this over any longer than is necessary and I wish to make a presentation in whole of the position of the government, so perhaps he would be kind enough to defer his question until I have concluded.

The other approach, Mr. Speaker,—and this is the approach that has been in essence advocated by the Prime Minister in all of the resolutions that he has moved in connection with this subject—is the enactment of a federal statute which would make it clear that in so far as any federal legislation is concerned there must be observed certain fundamental principles so that there will be preserved to every Canadian his fundamental rights and freedoms.

Here again there are several approaches or several methods which could be followed and several questions which arise. Should such a bill or declaration be specific in nature? That is, should it attempt to specify what are the limits in each case—the details of the limits of the freedoms and rights to be protected—or should it be simply in the form of a general declaration? Should it be introduced by the government and presented to parliament, as it were, on our own motion or should it first of all be referred as a draft bill to the Supreme Court of Canada for the opinion of that court as to whether it lies within the federal competence to enact? Or should we alternatively simply refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the general question of how far does it lie within the competence of this parliament to introduce a bill dealing with the question of fundamental human rights and freedoms in so far as they affect freedom of speech, freedom of religion and the other subjects which are outlined in this resolution and in other resolutions which have been suggested to this parliament.

These then are the problems, Mr. Speaker, and I think it must be obvious to all hon. gentlemen that this statement of the problems as well as the statement made in more detail earlier by the hon. member for Rosedale, indicate that it would not be the act of a responsible government to introduce legislation on this subject in a hurry as we would be doing if we introduced it at the present time. I think it will also be obvious that until these difficulties are thoroughly analysed and analysed with a care which we have not yet been in a position to devote to them we as a government should not introduce a proposal in specific form for a bill of rights.

By the same token I may say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that we feel that at this stage we could not accept this proposal for a constitutional amendment as it is presented to us for the reasons I have attempted to outline earlier. I have said that we do not reject outright the proposal of a constitutional amendment but that we cannot accept their proposal as a feasible, practical and acceptable method at this time. We may be able to work out some such method, but for the reasons I have stated, the Prime Minister if he were here would not, and I am not going to and indeed will not state here tonight that we can accept the resolution as it is presently drawn.

However, I come back to where I began. This party which now forms the government, through its leader who is now Prime Minister and through other spokesmen, is on record in favour of, and he and other members of the party are the advocates of the principle of, a bill of rights. The Prime Minister's record in this house and his commitment to this ideal has been well and fully stated here today. It is our intention to continue to work on this problem so that at the earliest possible moment we can do it as a responsible government, we will be able to present some concrete proposal to parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ellis: Talk it out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCleave: The members and backbenchers in this parliament have some human rights as well.

Mr. Coldwell: You did not say that when the Liberals were in power.

Mr. Ellis: Who gave you orders to do this?

Mr. McCleave: It has been a fascinating experience to sit here today and to take part in this momentous debate on human rights. To trace this story from the time when King John got his come-uppance from the barons in 1215 to an explanation for the reason why our television screens are dotted with Wyatt Earp and his ilk through the past century of the United States midwest. My understanding of that situation is that there is a United States amendment to the constitution which allows everyone there to carry a gun.

I think in the concluding moments of this debate we have perhaps narrowed down this whole subject to the main question in the resolution presented by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and that is, what will happen if this resolution should not be adopted. In answering that question I do not inquire, at least for the time being, into the merits of the language of the resolution. It is, I think, a bold attempt to capture in words the rights which we feel we have in a democracy. I think the main point is this—it has been brought out several times before, particularly by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton)—that having passed this resolution we can do nothing further as a house. The other place would still have to approve this resolution and then they too could do nothing further. Nor could this resolution ever become law or be signed by Her Majesty's representative in Canada. We could not by adopting this resolution turn it into a measure which would come before us again for study in committee or for scrutiny under debate.

Mr. Ellis: Because you are talking it out.

Mr. McCleave: If we pass this resolution and if it is passed in the other place the only other step is to dispatch it to Westminster where the British parliament will determine its future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is not drafted in that form at all.

Mr. McCleave: We are not, I say, in the final analysis able to amend our most important constitutional document. Another point that was particularly well brought out by the Minister of Justice deals with the rights of the provinces in these matters—

Mr. Ellis: One minute to go.

Mr. Fulton: Are you coaching him?

Mr. Benidickson: He came down to see you to get some coaching.

Mr. McCleave: There are 10 provinces in this dominion—and we might conduct ourselves in a spirit of collective egotism—and that collective egotism is manifested on the other side of this house—and say that not a word or punctuation mark should be changed in this excellent document presented by the member for Rosetown-Biggar, but that, Mr. Speaker, is not in my estimation a spirit of true partnership.

Some hon. Members: You made it!

Mr. McCleave: We cannot send this resolution to any province and say: "This is it, this is what we are looking for." They have a perfect right to answer: "Slow down; you let us take a look at it. Let us consider it and let us see whether it is what we want."

Mr. Ellis: You have talked it out. You have done a good job.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the business for tomorrow will be as stated, that we will take a motion to go into supply, but can the minister now tell us what business we will have for the rest of the week beginning on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, as I announced on Saturday it is the intention to move to go into supply tomorrow there being an arrangement between the parties that at 8.15 the vote on any amendment would take place.

I can only give the hon. member the business for Wednesday. It will be, first, No. 28 on today's order paper, a resolution preceding a bill to provide for a loan to the government of New Brunswick; then item 30 on today's order paper, a resolution preceding a bill having to do with power in the Atlantic provinces; next there will be No. 21, a continuation of the second reading of a bill to provide annual vacations with pay; then No. 23, second reading of a bill to implement an agreement between Canada and Australia in respect of income tax; then No. 22, second reading of a bill in respect of a boundary between Alberta and the Northwest Territories; No. 20, second reading of Bill No. 15, an act to amend the Criminal Code; then No. 27, a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The way you can skip No. 24 is marvellous; can you not read No. 24?

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister not give some indication as to what estimates are likely to be taken up this week?

Mr. Green: Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 7, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, January 7, 1958

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Mr. Justice Robert Taschereau, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 7th January, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute
Secretary to the Governor General
(Administrative)

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBICHAUD—ALLEGED INCOMPLETENESS OF SESSIONAL PAPER

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege is based on sessional paper No. 117-B which was tabled in the house on Friday, January 3. This sessional paper followed a return to an address of the House of Commons dated November 6, 1957, for a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the federal government or any of its departments and the governments of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia or their respective power commissions, from April 1, 1957, to date, regarding the development of electrical energy.

Page 94 of the said sessional paper contains a copy of a letter from Premier Hugh John Flemming addressed to Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada. This letter says:

I am enclosing a copy of my comment on the memorandum of Hon. Alvin Hamilton dated September 30 in connection with power problems in the Atlantic provinces, which I trust will be helpful to you in presenting our point of view.

My question of privilege is that the document mentioned in the letter is not included in the sessional paper and I state that it is part of the documents which were asked for and tabled in the house on Friday, January 3. I therefore ask that it be supplied and attached to the document.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the document referred to by the hon. member for Gloucester is a private document that was circulated to certain of my colleagues. It was concerned with basic Conservative policy on development, with application to the Atlantic provinces. A copy was shown to the premier of the province of New Brunswick. My department advises me that they did not consider it as part of their records, and since it was not used in the department it is not part of the documents requested by the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's remarks, I may state that the comments—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not the time for a statement. If the hon. member has any motion to make I would think he could do so. I am doubtful that it is a proper question of privilege. I would think the hon. member can secure relief by moving a motion for the production of the missing paper. In that way it would be settled whether or not the document ought to be produced.

FREIGHT RATES

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUSPENSION OF INCREASE UNTIL MARCH 1, 1958

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, the governor in council has received a petition from the Atlantic provinces, the prairie provinces and British Columbia invoking the provisions of section 53 of the Railway Act and asking that the recent decision of the board of transport commissioners authorizing an increase in freight rates of 3.6 per cent effective from January 15 next be rescinded. The provinces also submitted that the governor in council should in any event suspend the freight rate increase until their petition had been heard by the governor in council.

In the time that has been available to consider this matter, and having regard to the principles involved and to the complexities of the problem, the government has come to the conclusion that the provinces' case is of sufficient importance to warrant a hearing by the governor in council. The question arises immediately as to when such a hearing might be held to make sure that the provinces, and I presume the railways as well, have sufficient time to prepare to present their cases and to give the governor in council adequate opportunity to consider the facts and reach a decision. The order of the board is due to become effective on January 15, that is about a week away; and having regard to the necessity for adequate preparation on the part of the petitioners and the answer of the railways, and to the situation in which we find ourselves at the moment in connection with the business and sittings of the house, it would hardly be possible to arrange for a proper hearing between now and January 15. Accordingly the government decided this morning, in the light of these circumstances and the case made by the provinces, that the application of the order of the board of transport commissioners for the increase in question be suspended until March 1. By that time it is hoped that it will be possible to hold a hearing, and for the governor in council to reach his decision.

I wish, sir, to table a copy of the order in council suspending the order of the board to which I have just made reference.

STATEMENT ON EFFECT OF EQUALIZATION INQUIRY ON RECENT INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): On Saturday the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) asked me the following question, as reported at page 2842 of Hansard:

> Can the minister tell us whether the inquiry undertaken by the board of transport commissioners into the equalization of freight rates across Canada was taken into consideration in the recent order of the board increasing freight rates by 3.6 per cent?

The board of transport commissioners has advised me that the inquiry into the equalization of freight rates was taken into consideration in its judgment and order dated December 27, 1957, authorizing increases in freight rates.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question arising out of the minister's statement regarding the equalization of freight rates. Can the minister give the house some idea of when we may expect this important study to be completed since, as the minister knows, it will soon be six years since the board was instructed or advised by the royal commission on freight rates to instigate such a study?

Mr. Hees: No, I do not know when the study will be completed.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Argue: Would the minister be prepared to make inquiry and let the public of this country know whether or not within a few months the inquiry can be completed, or whether it may take another six years?

Mr. Hees: I shall be very glad to do that.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to redirect to the Prime Minister a question I asked the Acting Prime Minister on Friday. Has there been any correspondence with any of the provincial governments about the federal-provincial conference or the matters discussed at that conference, since the conference adjourned?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, and I hope to be able to table that correspondence at the earliest possible date.

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF RESUMPTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question which I asked the Acting Prime Minister last Friday but which I probably should have delayed until his return. When does he contemplate the calling together of the dominion-provincial conference, particularly in view of the fact that the legislatures are about to meet and the provincial treasurers must prepare their budgets, and that this conference may adopt some agreement which may involve budgetary considerations on the part of the provinces?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the uncertain duration of this parliamentary session it is impossible yet to say with any definiteness when the dominion-provincial conference will be reconvened. However, the matter is receiving consideration, and as soon as a decision is made it will be communicated.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister know whether on any other occasion the government has used as an alibi the fact of the house being in session, when parliament and the conference can be in session at the same time?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CONSTRUCTION AND IMPROVEMENT OF CAMP AND PICNIC AREAS TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I announced that the government had decided to offer to the provinces an arrangement under which it would be prepared to pay 50 per cent of the cost of construction of forest access roads where the construction is undertaken between the date of the offer and June 30, 1958.

I now wish to announce that the federal government has also decided to offer to the provinces 50 per cent participation in a program for the construction and improvement of camp grounds and picnic areas that would be of benefit to the very important tourist industry in this country.

Last October I was chairman of the annual federal-provincial tourist conference. During that meeting there was much discussion of the importance of expanding camp grounds and other tourist facilities along the highways of Canada and in the provincial parks. These recreation developments would complement the very extensive facilities that are now available in the national and provincial parks of Canada. All the provincial representatives indicated interest in doing something along these lines.

On the authority of the government I have written the premiers of the provinces to advise them that the federal government will be prepared to reimburse the provincial governments for 50 per cent of expenditures made on camp grounds and picnic area developments between the date of my letter and May 31, 1958. The letter makes it clear that the developments can be constructed anywhere in the province, and that the offer is made on the basis that not less than 50 per cent of all expenditures would be for the payment of wages of persons employed on the work.

As in the case of the offer on forest access roads, the amount of expenditure and the number of jobs that will be provided will, of course, depend on the extent of provincial participation. The supplementary estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for the fiscal year 1957-58 will include an amount of $1 million for this purpose in order that funds may be immediately available.

It is my hope that the letters I have sent to the provincial premiers outlining the federal offer for participation will produce an enthusiastic and immediate response. I think the program contemplated is a far-seeing one that will result in projects that will have continuing recreation value for Canada.

It will also have the added value of providing a larger number of employment opportunities in all parts of the country during this winter season if the provinces act at once to implement the program.

For the convenience of hon. members might I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a copy of the letter I sent to the provincial premiers under date of January 2 be printed as an appendix to Hansard? By leave of the house I should like to table a copy of the letter and have it printed as an appendix.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave of the house to have this letter to which he has referred printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of letter referred to above, see appendix, pages 2977-78.]

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources arising out of his earlier statement today about the joint program of park development with the provinces. My question is as follows. Would the terms of the offer made to the provinces include the development of seaside parks for boating tourists, something which I understand the government of British Columbia has had under consideration?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am not just quite sure of the implications of the question of the hon. member. The offer we have just made was on the subject that was raised at the dominion-provincial tourist conference and dealt primarily with picnic sites and camp sites along the sides of highways. It was on that particular subject that we made this offer. As to the question raised by the hon. member, I am unable to state whether that will be included because I do not know all it implies.

Mr. Barnett: Will the minister look into the matter?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINE—INVESTIGATION OF WALK-OUT EAST OF PORT ARTHUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Would the Minister of Labour give the house a brief statement on the effort being made by his officials to settle the walk-out on the trans-Canada pipe line project east of Port Arthur, Ontario?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): In answer to the hon. member's question I wish to state that the federal government is in no position to intervene in this strike. However, the action we have taken is to have one of our industrial relations officers from Winnipeg look into the matter. He is at present in Port Arthur. We are awaiting a report from him, and our actions will be determined by that report.

[Later:]

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce of which I have sent him notice. Can the minister inform the house whether officials of Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation have acted in any way to resolve the walk-out on the trans-Canada pipe line east of Port Arthur, Ontario?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The walk-out referred to by the hon. member involves contractors to the crown corporation, and not the crown corporation itself. However, since the clearing of the crown's section is being affected the president of the crown corporation, in order to inform himself as to the issues involved, will be visiting Port Arthur during the next few days.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, but before doing so may I express our best wishes to him, to the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Holowach) and to all other members with similar traditions and all other Canadians to whom today and this week have a special holiday significance such as we others enjoyed during our parliamentary recess.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benidickson: I want to supplement a question which I asked the minister on December 4 last, respecting the report expected from the royal commission investigating the labour dispute on the C.P.R. with respect to diesel firemen.

Has any member of the government yet received this report? I draw to the hon. minister's attention the fact that on October 15 he indicated that the government expected this report before the end of November and, on December 4, when I asked him a question he said that he was doing his best to expedite the submission of this report.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for the good wishes he expressed prior to his question. We did expect that we would receive this report on dieselization toward the end of November. Unfortunately Mr. Justice Kellock became ill, and this, of course, has prolonged the time taken. As yet I am unaware when we will be receiving this report. As to whether any other member of the government has received it, I cannot say, but I do not think this has been the case. No doubt the report will come to me direct, first of all. I will, however, make some inquiries in the course of the next few days to see how soon we may expect this report.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister assure the house that he is aware of the keen desire on the part of railway employees that this report should be submitted before the conclusion of this session, and would he assure us that no suggestion or hint from the government is delaying the submission of this report?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, everyone is desirous of obtaining this report in order that this matter may be cleared up; everyone is as anxious to receive it as are the employees of the railway. Most certainly and emphatically I may say that the government is not taking any steps to delay this report.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REPORTED SALE OF STRIKE-BOUND VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister tell the house whether the government has under consideration the sale of the Canadian National steamships that have been under strike for some time, and whether or not a report on the economic and financial implications of sale has been before him for consideration, as stated in a report in a recent issue of the Montreal Star?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. The answer to both parts of it, Mr. Speaker, is no.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the reply the minister has made, can he tell the house whether anything has been accomplished during the six months' period that the strike has been going on by the transfer of the flag from Canada to Trinidad?

Mr. Hees: That would be a matter of opinion.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount asked if I could make inquiries as to what vessels with refrigerator accommodation are now available to carry cargo between the Atlantic provinces and the Caribbean. As the question relates to private shipping operators my department has no official information with regard to the actual refrigerator space on vessels in the Canada-West Indies service, but I understand that refrigerator space is available on a number of ships engaged in that trade, as can be noted from advertisements published in the press from time to time.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): While we are on maritime problems, Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member for Acadia asked whether we had lost any trade with the West Indies as a result of the cessation of the Canadian National Steamships service. I took the question as notice. There appears to have been no loss of trade. During the period from July to the end of October, 1957, our export trade to the West Indies and Bermuda amounted to $17,772,000 as compared with $15,961,000 in the same period in 1956.

The hon. member for Bow River asked whether any other country was carrying the cargo formerly transported by these vessels. Our information is that Saguenay Shipping Limited, a Canadian company operating owned vessels under United Kingdom registry and chartered foreign flag vessels, together with Lamport and Holt, a British shipping line, schedule regular shipping services from eastern Canadian ports to the Caribbean, and are carrying the greater proportion of our general cargo export trade to the West Indies. Both these lines operate vessels which have refrigerated space. No statistics are available at this time to show what volume of our export trade is carried by Alcoa and other shipping lines operating out of the United States to the West Indies.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NORTH SYDNEY—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN METHOD OF HANDLING FREIGHT IN YARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I wish to direct to the Minister of Transport a question of which I have not had an opportunity to give him notice. In any event, I should like to have a reply as soon as possible. Is the Canadian National Railways contemplating any change in the method of handling freight at the North Sydney yards? In other words, are the members of the Canadian brotherhood of railway employees and other transport workers going to continue to do this work or is it going to be given to a private company? That is in reference to the loading of the William Carson and other work pertaining thereto in those yards.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of any change in plan which the Canadian National Railways might have in contemplation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CEYLON—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF FLOOD RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the serious situation in Ceylon, where half a million people are without food and shelter, will the government consider making a substantial donation to the relief of those people in addition to that under the Colombo plan? I am thinking particularly of supplies of wheat and lumber, which are in surplus supply in Canada. Will the government consider making available in addition to the Colombo plan aid some further aid of this nature?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The subject matter of the question asked by the hon. gentleman is one that is before the government at the present moment and is being considered. Assistance apparently should be given having regard to all the circumstances. What the form of that assistance is to be will have to be determined on the basis of need, and in particular on those needs which, in the opinion of the government of Ceylon, are of the utmost importance. The matter is receiving immediate and continuing attention.

[Later:]

Mr. A. P. Lavigne (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, further to the question asked by the member for Rosetown-Biggar, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if when his government considers giving further assistance to Ceylon it will not include in the shipments of food some of our surplus cheddar cheese, which is the best in the world?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whatever is needed, within reasonable limitations, will be sent; and if the people of Ceylon in their needs require cheese, cheese will be given.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUGGESTED HOLDING OF SUMMIT MEETING IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In the light of the statements made over the week end by Prime Minister Macmillan and ex-President Truman about the urgency of convening another summit meeting, would the Prime Minister consider issuing an invitation to the leaders of the countries represented at the Geneva conference, and Prime Minister Nehru, to a summit meeting in Canada at an early date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was courteous enough to give me notice of his question.

I wish to say, as I stated the other day, that the government welcomed Prime Minister Macmillan's proposal for an east-west non-aggression pact as a forward-looking suggestion. In speaking at NATO and in my report to the house on December 21 I advised that we attach the greatest importance to the reopening of negotiations, and agree to examine any proposal, from whatever source, for general or partial disarmament and any proposal enabling agreement to be arrived at as between the Soviet and the free world.

The suggestion, however, that the Canadian government take the initiative in inviting the leaders of the countries represented at the Geneva conference, and Prime Minister Nehru, to a summit meeting in Canada at an early date is one that I am sure the house will realize would be inappropriate for us to make without consultation with our western allies. I would add, however, that during the past few weeks we have repeatedly demonstrated our willingness to discuss with the Soviet union matters of common concern, if such discussions can be productive. To that end we must seek futher clarification of their views through normal diplomatic channels. This is now being done.

Until there has been some measure of consultation between our allies and ourselves we would not wish to extend an invitation unless we were reasonably sure, in any event, that the invitation would meet with general acceptance, and that the result of any such conference would be generally beneficial.

NATO—INQUIRY AS TO INSTITUTION OF FOOD BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of a Canadian Press report dated January 5 which states that Dr. Smith said NATO was now considering a food bank to assist underdeveloped nations. Would the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us what Canada is contemplating in this regard? I may say I am very happy to see this action being taken.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the questioner for the honour he has conferred upon me; it puts me in a good frame of mind to answer the question. I did make that statement, and I was referring to the imaginative proposal which was made by the Prime Minister of Canada earlier at NATO with respect to the establishment of a food bank. That was in line with the discussions at the meeting of the NATO council in relation to article 2 of the treaty. Interest has been shown by other members of NATO, and we have had inquiries. All I can say at this time is that the possibility and feasibility of implementing that proposal is being studied by the NATO council.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs based on the very important statement which has now been made. Can the minister inform the house as to what would be the size of the food bank which the government has proposed? Is it something imaginative in size? What has the minister in mind regarding the total value of the food bank?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in reply to that supplementary question, I can state that I have heard no discussion with respect to the size of the food bank, but, having in mind the needs of many underdeveloped countries, I still crave the privilege of repeating my adjective "imaginative".

[Later:]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the important statement just made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs respecting Canadian initiative in regard to a food bank which is now before the NATO council, can he assure the house that the Canadian delegation to that council is now taking the further initiative in pushing that matter before the permanent council, and can he give us any indication of the instructions that have been sent to our delegation to that effect?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question I can state that our permanent representative on the NATO council has informed us that he has been asked many questions with respect to that matter. The instruction to Mr. Wilgress is that he should endeavour to forward the discussion in every way possible with the representatives of other member nations of NATO in the council.

Mr. Benidickson: With or without instructions from his government?

UNITED KINGDOM—RESIGNATION OF CHANCELLOR OF EXCHEQUER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government received any information respecting the resignation of the British chancellor of the exchequer, and is it true that he resigned because his free trade proposals were ignored by the Canadian government?

Mr. Speaker: I take it that is an April 1 question, and was not put forward seriously.

REQUEST FOR AID FOR DISPLACED PERSONS IN EUROPEAN CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the Prime Minister's desire to give encouragement to those behind the iron curtain, can the minister tell the house what is being done, in a substantial way, by this government to help the tens of thousands of victims of communist persecution who are now in displaced persons' camps in Europe?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I cannot reply to that question in detail. In the declaration, of which the hon. member who has asked me this question does not think very highly, there was a statement with respect to the subjugated countries. I would be bound to say this, Mr. Speaker, however, in reply to the question: that great care should be taken not to make any statement or start any negotiations that would impair the safety or the health or imperil the very lives of these people.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask a supplementary question. If it is a fact that I do not think very highly of the Prime Minister's statement, can the minister be really surprised in view of his answer?

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a supplementary question. I think the question really involves the international refugee organization rather than the people who are now behind the iron curtain. May I ask what contribution, if any, Canada is making to this organization at the present time, and whether any steps are being taken by Canada to relieve the situation of those people?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I will take that question as notice. I cannot recall the facts at the present time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Could he tell the house when he intends to table the further supplementary estimates which have been mentioned again today by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say precisely. Work is being done on these estimates but it will be some time before they are ready.

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Middlesex East in his capacity as chairman of the standing committee on external affairs. Can he say when that committee will meet again in order to hear statements by Hon. Ray Lawson and Mr. Zeckendorf, as decided at the last meeting of the committee?

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the government or the cabinet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On previous occasions when we have asked questions about committees and have addressed our questions to members of the cabinet, we have been referred by the cabinet to the chairman of the committee in question. That is the reason I addressed my question properly to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Fleming: Not on orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether or not any hon. member wishes to address himself to this question, but it seems to me that arrangements of the house are discussed before orders of the day when questions are being asked. While it is an arrangement with respect to a committee, I think it is probably a matter that could be inquired into in the house. If the chairman can give any information he might do so.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, correspondence is going on in an endeavour to arrange dates that are mutually agreeable. We hope the end of next week will be the probable date, but it is not definitely set yet.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Before the orders of the day are called may I say this with reference to my previous statement about the inquiry of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to the meeting of the committee. Rule 39 reads in part as follows:

39. (1) Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; and from other members, relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house—

I am not sure whether that would extend to the question that was asked, but I shall look into the matter against a future occasion when the same point may arise.

REQUEST FOR MEETING OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that officials of farm organizations are presently in the city, and reports indicate that more representations of farm organizations will be in during the coming week, will the minister instruct that the committee on agriculture and colonization be called into session so the various farm organizations may make representations to that committee concerning agricultural problems.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no power whatever to call the committee. However, I will look into the implications incident to the question, and if in my opinion consideration should be given to the request, I will give it that consideration which it deserves.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROVISION FOR FLIGHT ENGINEERS ON NEW JET TRANSPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a brief from the Canada chapter of the flight engineers' international association which states that of the 300 commercial jet transports of the DC-8 type already ordered by the air lines of the world, the Trans-Canada Air Lines cockpit design indicates that it will be the only air line in the world planning to operate these 144 passenger planes without the services of a flight engineer?

If so, would the minister look into the matter to determine whether or not any public safety factor is being overlooked?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such document, but I will certainly look into the matter.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport supplementary to the question asked him by the member for Kootenay East. Is the minister not in a position to make a statement to the house concerning the meeting which was supposed to have been held yesterday between the flight engineers' international association and the air services branch of the department with respect to the crew complement of the new DC-8 jet aircraft?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister look into the matter and make a statement tomorrow?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INVESTIGATION INTO HELICOPTER CRASH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the house what was the passenger-carrying capacity of the Bell helicopter which figured in an accident recently, and whether a public inquiry will be held into this unfortunate tragedy?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I believe the carrying capacity of that particular helicopter is three. A press release was issued by my department yesterday regarding this very unfortunate crash, and for the information of the hon. member and the house perhaps I might read it.

A technical board of inquiry has been convened to investigate the circumstances surrounding the crash of a departmental helicopter at Shirley's Bay on Friday afternoon, it has been announced by the Department of Transport. Chairman of the board is A. J. Burleton, Toronto, and member is W. Gadzos, Ottawa. Both are departmental officials.

The transport department brought in two specialists from the Bell Helicopter headquarters at Fort Worth, Texas, to assist the department's team investigating the accident in which three were killed. The Bell representatives arrived on Saturday night and on Sunday morning were at the site of the wreckage with transport department personnel. Two additional experts from the plane manufacturing company arrived in Ottawa today. Plans are under way to bring the wreckage of the helicopter from the Davidson farm machinery shed, in which it was housed over the weekend, into the Department of Transport hangar at Uplands some time today.

The board of inquiry will use the services of the visiting experts and collect evidence from eye-witnesses and others in its attempt to determine the cause of the accident. At the conclusion of the investigation, the board will submit its findings to the Minister of Transport and a summary report will be made public.

Mr. Chevrier: The question I asked was, will it be a public inquiry?

Mr. Hees: If it appears, following the departmental inquiry, that some useful purpose will be served by holding a public inquiry, then a public inquiry will be held.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the inquiry be held under the Department of Transport Act or under the air regulations; and if under the latter, will the minister table the air regulations in question?

Mr. Hees: I am afraid I cannot answer that question. I will check into it and give the hon. member an answer tomorrow.

FLOODS

BEAUCE, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO ENGINEERING REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister given consideration to the report received by his department from the engineer who has made an investigation into recent floods in Beauce county, according to his declaration in this house on January 3?

If so, has the hon. minister reached a preliminary conclusion?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Beauce for having given me notice of this question. The report received from the engineers of the Department of Public Works has been considered. The situation with regard to this unfortunate disaster is, of course, as I pointed out last week, that any request for help must come from the provincial government.

BLIND PERSONS

REPORTED REQUEST FOR SPECIAL COST OF BLINDNESS ALLOWANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the government received recently a request for a special cost of blindness allowance to be paid for life without a means test to all blind adults over the age of 18 years? If so, what consideration has been given to this request?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I made inquiries of my staff this morning on this very matter and actually I have not as yet received any such request although, as indicated in reply to a question by another hon. member some time ago, frankly I am expecting it.

THE SENATE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF MEASURES FOR REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I apologize for not having given notice of it, but I was prevented from doing so by circumstances entirely beyond my control. I ask the question in view of numerous inquiries from people who know the Prime Minister's long interest in this matter. Can he inform the house whether he has under consideration any measures required for the reformation of the other place?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the good humour in which the question was asked, and I assure my hon. friend that his touch of humour would certainly bring about a measure of reformation in any house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You cannot get rid of him that way.

HOUSING

ASSUMPTION UNIVERSITY, WINDSOR—CONSTRUCTION OF DORMITORY AND OTHER FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Have representations been made by Assumption University of Windsor for amendment of regulations under the National Housing Act to permit a loan at a low rate of interest, as is the practice in the United States, for the purpose of enabling the university to provide dormitory and attendant facilities at that university at a time when assistance in aid of employment is urgently needed? If so, what have been the results?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe any such representations have been received. Such a change would not be a matter of amending regulations; I think it would require legislation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Brown (Essex West): May I be permitted to forward to the minister the representations which I think have been made?

CIVIL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CO-ORDINATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is he aware that the position of chief co-ordinator of civil defence has been vacant for five months, owing to the resignation of Major General Worthington? Has he any intention of replacing him?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I might point out to the hon. member that the post has not actually been vacant for five months. In due course the government will make known its intention in this respect.

SHIPPING

C.G.S. "LABRADOR"—STATEMENT ON PRESENT STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer another series of questions put by the hon. member for Laurier during the examination of the estimates of the Department of National Defence regarding the ship Labrador, which is coming under the authority of the Department of Transport.

The Labrador is undergoing naval refit at the present time, following which certain additional work will be necessary for Department of Transport purposes. Details of this are not fully available yet but it is expected that this will involve such items as interior layout, in view of the fact that my department will be operating this ship with a crew of about 85 instead of a naval crew of well over 200; modifications to make the ship conform with safety requirements of the board of steamship inspection, which are somewhat different from those of the military; and possibly certain other technical modifications in view of the expected new winter role of the Labrador in icebreaking.

My department already operates a major fleet in the eastern Arctic each summer, composed of icebreakers and supply ships, and the Labrador will be added to this operation, which performs extensive military and civil duties. The main function of the Labrador in the last couple of years has been in connection with assistance to the U.S. fleet entering Foxe basin for purposes of D.E.W. line supply, a function which is being taken over entirely by my department commencing this year, in so far as provision of ships and organization of supply is concerned. The Labrador may be used again in connection with this work, or may alternatively be used on other Arctic exploration convoy and supply work in connection with our general duties, but in any case I am satisfied that her responsibilities in the eastern Arctic are going to increase in the future rather than diminish.

Arrangements are also in hand for the other departments of government to carry on the research work in connection with the use of the Labrador which has been customary hitherto. She will also be added to the departmental fleet for winter icebreaking operations, and is expected to serve the gulf and Atlantic area in this role.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I be permitted to ask a supplementary question. If I understood the statement, although I could not follow it because it was read quickly, I believe the minister said that H.M.C.S. Labrador will be used for both military and civil purposes. The question I am prompted to ask is this. In view of the statement made by the Minister of National Defence that all the naval equipment, defence equipment, had been taken from her, I wonder just how it is going to be used for other than civil purposes?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I used the word "military". What I intended to say, and I thought I did, was that the ship will be performing the same type of tasks in the summertime in the future as it has performed in the past.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport concerning H.M.C.S. Labrador. As I understood the statement he made just a moment ago it is the intention of his department that the Labrador shall carry out in the Arctic the same function as she formerly did when she was a part of the Royal Canadian Navy.

The question I should like to ask the minister is how it would be possible for the Labrador with a civilian crew to carry out the very important functions that the Labrador discharged when she formed part of the Canadian navy?

Mr. Hees: Perhaps if the former minister and I could get together with the officials of my department we could settle the whole thing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely this is of public interest.

Mr. Marler: I would have hoped the minister would have been able to deal with the question more specifically. I should like to ask him if he does not appreciate that the Canadian public is very much interested in the functions to be carried out by the Labrador and the question of how the role she formerly exercised in the Arctic is going to be discharged by a civilian department.

Mr. Hees: In the report I gave to the house I described the work the Labrador performed in the past. My department advises me that it is our intention that it will perform the same type of operation in the future. I do not think I can be any more specific than that.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT AS TO MAINTENANCE OF COASTAL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question asked last Friday by the hon. member for Skeena, one in which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has expressed a great deal of interest. With regard to the withdrawal of the coastal shipping services in British Columbia hitherto operated by Union Steamships Limited, I am glad to announce that an arrangement has been concluded with Canadian Pacific Steamships under which that company will provide a regular service from Vancouver to Alert Bay, Ocean Falls, Kitimat, Prince Rupert, Port Simcoe, Kincolith, Stewart and Alice Arm. The service will be on a weekly basis, though this may have to be modified at some points if it becomes necessary to provide for additional points of call in the northern area, since only one vessel is available.

It will provide reasonable and adequate transportation for the coastal communities in line with their requirements. Certain other points which are not directly served will receive service by water taxi distribution from the main point of call, or are already receiving regular air service. To the extent that this may not prove adequate, additional arrangements either with Canadian Pacific Steamships or other sources will be considered if this should be necessary.

[Later:]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of his statement with respect to arrangements with Canadian Pacific Steamships to provide service on the Pacific coast. Is there any question of subsidy involved in this arrangement? If so, can the minister say how much?

Mr. Hees: Yes; at a rate of approximately $82,000 for the first three months of the year, compared to $300,000 which it would have been necessary to pay to the Union Steamships company.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS—REQUESTED USE OF ICEBREAKERS TO KEEP NAVIGATION OPEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. A. Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Some time ago the minister made a statement in the house in which he said that instructions were being given to his department to use icebreakers and any other means necessary to keep navigation open along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. At that time I asked him whether he would see that those instructions were enlarged, I might say, so they would include the Magdalen islands, to see what could be done to keep navigation open there. The minister was kind enough to tell me that he would look into the matter, but I have not heard from him since. I was wondering whether or not he could give me an answer at this time.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I do not recall that particular exchange, but I will be glad to look into the matter for the hon. member and report to him right away.

Mr. Cannon: If the minister will look up Hansard he will refresh his memory.

Mr. Hees: I do not deny that the exchange took place, but it must have been some time ago. However, it will not slow me down at all in looking into the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: You cannot slow down a stop.

HARBOURS

LOWER ST. LAWRENCE—INQUIRY AS TO IMPROVEMENTS IN PORT FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. The Financial Post of January 4 carries an article entitled, "Ottawa Wants to Improve Four Lake 'Seaway' Ports". The article, if I may just read the first paragraph, says:

> Plans for improving four upper lakes ports in time for the opening of the seaway are now before the government. They concern the lakehead, Sault Ste. Marie, Sarnia and Windsor.

The biggest changes and the most extensive works will be required at Port Arthur and Fort William.

Then the article goes on to say that a very comprehensive plan has been submitted to the Minister of Public Works. If this is the case, I commend the government and the minister upon this forward-looking plan. My question is, has the government given any consideration to or has it any plans in mind for the improvement of lower St. Lawrence ports from, say, Seven Islands right up to Montreal in the province of Quebec where, according to seaway economists, more than 50 per cent of the traffic will emanate?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, wherever there is a request for a survey of potential developments in a port, the Department of Transport and the Department of Public Works co-operate to have a survey made by their economic branches. Requests of this type have come from the lakehead cities, from Sault Ste. Marie and Windsor, and investigations have been made by the officials of the two departments. We also are looking into the situation at Father Point on the lower St. Lawrence, but I do not believe there has been any request from other centres on the St. Lawrence for an investigation.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand there have been from Three Rivers and Seven Islands. Does the minister say no?

Mr. Green: Not to my knowledge.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO FIRES ON RESERVATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, but in his absence perhaps his parliamentary assistant can take it as notice. Has the department yet had a report on the disastrous fires on two Indian reservations during the Christmas holidays, one near Duncan and one near Vancouver, which caused considerable loss of life? Is the department making an inquiry into the living conditions on those reservations to which the fires are attributable?

Mr. D. J. Walker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Justice): I shall be very happy to accept the question as notice.

TRADE

OIL—RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS INTO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether a note of protest has yet been sent to the United States government in respect of the action taken by that government restricting oil imports into the United States.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. It has not been prepared yet. It is in the process of being drafted.

UNITED STATES—STATEMENT ON REPORTED INTENTION TO INCREASE GIVE-AWAY PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I desire to reply to a question addressed to me last Friday, January 3, by the right hon. member for Melville. The question was:

Has the government taken note of the declared intention of United States agricultural secretary Benson of increasing by 50 per cent in 1958 the farm surplus give-away program of that country and has the government taken any steps to protest this decision?

I took the question as notice. On the next day, January 4, an almost identical question was addressed by the hon. member for Laurier to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I can best answer the question that was addressed to me by giving the reply made by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce last Saturday. We are aware of the proposed action on the part of the United States. I do not think any action on our part is necessary. The United States surplus disposal program is not likely to interfere with the sale of wheat to our cash customers, and that is one of the main points about which we have been particularly concerned.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISMISSAL OF J. GEORGE NEUSPIEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State, but in her absence perhaps I may direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Mr. J. George Neuspiel, who was discharged by the undersecretary of state last October 10, has been reinstated with his status unimpaired and his salary paid back to the time he was dismissed, could we now be told what were the reasons for his dismissal?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have no information sufficient to answer the question, but I shall give it to the Secretary of State for her consideration on her return to the house.

TELEVISION

MARITIME PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR COVERAGE OF BOXING MATCH ON JANUARY 10

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue arising out of his answer on January 4 in which he stated that the microwave connection would not be completed in the maritime provinces until February 2. This question can be taken as notice, and the minister can draw it to the attention of the C.B.C. Can the minister report to the house what progress is being made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to have the Durelle-Anthony fight televised live in the maritime provinces? I may state that I have received about 50 telegrams from people and organizations in the Westmorland county area concerning this matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

VANCOUVER—REPORTED INEFFICIENCY IN PROCESSING CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): On Saturday last I directed a question to the Minister of Labour relating to alleged inefficiency in the processing of claims in the Vancouver unemployment insurance office. I wonder if he is in a position to give an answer at this time?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): In answer to the hon. member's question about the alleged inefficiency of the unemployment insurance office in Vancouver, I should like to inform the hon. member that while I have received a number of inquiries from the united fishermen and allied workers on a number of subjects, I have not as yet heard from them on the point he raised. When and if I do hear from them, appropriate action will be taken.

MATTAWA, ONT.—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR OPENING OF OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): On Saturday last the hon. member for Nipissing asked a question concerning the opening of an unemployment insurance office in Mattawa. I should like to inform the hon. member that I have asked my officials for a report on the situation in that area, and I shall be glad to make it available to him as soon as I have received it.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RECOVERY OF ALLEGED OVERPAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware that some old age pensioners are receiving as little as $21 a month as a result of the department collecting up to $34 a month to recover alleged overpayments of old age assistance? If so, is the minister contemplating any arrangement to alleviate this abominable and heartless situation?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I am unable to determine exactly whether the overpayment referred to is being recovered from current old age assistance or old age security payments. This makes a considerable difference, since in the former case it is the province which effects the recovery, while in the latter case it is the federal authority. If the hon. member will give me the details of the case or cases he has in mind I shall be glad to look into them and let him have a reply as soon as possible.

GRAIN

MANITOBA—ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Last Friday I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether or not he had received a brief from the co-operative elevator association of Manitoba requesting action on his part to bring about a more equitable distribution of box cars. At that time he indicated that he had not seen the brief. I wonder if he has seen it since, and if so what action he has taken to meet that request?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have received the brief and I have it under study. I am giving full attention to it. I hope to have some satisfactory—I was going to say solution, but I am not sure whether or not you can get a solution to these problems, but some satisfactory proposal to make very soon.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

BURLINGTON, ONT.—ALLEGED INFRINGEMENT OF MUNICIPAL BY-LAWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General.

Is the minister aware that the postal department has been involved in the infringement of two municipal by-laws in Burlington, Ontario, in regard to rented premises, as to which it is reported charges are to be laid? If so, is he in a position now to give the house any details on this matter?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I have no personal knowledge of the subject and would not expect to have, since matters of this kind come under the Minister of Public Works.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I do not know whether the Postmaster General or myself or both will have to go to jail over this alleged breach of the law, Mr. Speaker; but if it is a responsibility of the Department of Public Works I shall be glad to have the matter looked into at once.

POSTAGE STAMPS—METHOD OF BUYING TO OBTAIN CORNER BLOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Lewry (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General, based on the announcement he made in this house on Friday, December 20, of interest to stamp collectors. He announced that there was a change made by the previous government in connection with the cessation of plate numbers on sheets of stamps. I am wondering as a matter of clarification if he can say now whether it is necessary for stamp collectors to buy entire sheets in order to obtain new blocks of four, under the new policy of the government.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it has always been necessary for stamp collectors purchasing from the philatelic section, in order to acquire a block of four stamps, to purchase either the entire sheet or a portion of the entire sheet, depending on the value of the stamp. That policy will be continued in the future.

NATIONAL PARKS

GARIBALDI, B.C.—REQUEST FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In the light of the minister's announcement indicating an active interest on his part in the development of Canadian parks and in the tourist business, will the federal government reopen negotiations with the government of British Columbia to make a national park out of Garibaldi park so the citizens of the lower mainland may at an early date enjoy the blessings of Canada's greatest and most magnificent but as yet undeveloped playground?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The minister will take this matter under advisement.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PAYMENTS TO QUALIFYING FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Agriculture. Have the payments under P.F.A.A. been made to qualified producers in the prairie provinces?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Minister of Agriculture): We will take that question as notice.

Mr. Speaker: I think that question might well have been put on the order paper.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I want to introduce discussion of a matter which I think is of fundamental importance not only to the whole of Canada but to all those countries which are linked together in an attempt to protect our democratic institutions and our way of life, and also to strengthen and develop our resources in view of what is being done in the several countries behind the iron curtain.

Two days ago we adopted the estimates of the Department of National Defence in an amount of approximately one and three-quarter billion dollars. I suppose hon. members felt that amount was essential in view of representations made by the government and in light of the agreements made by the government of Canada with our NATO allies and other countries across the world, but I want to submit that there is something of equal importance which we should reconsider. That is the manner in which we can promote the welfare of our educational institutions and how we can build up within our country a corps of people, not only those who are educated and who understand the implications of our society and of the culture of the country in which we live, but also a people who will understand the necessity of improving our educational facilities in order that we shall not be left behind on an international basis in the development of our culture and our scientific and technical resources.

Over the past few years various Canadian citizens occupying positions of some importance in many parts of our country have visited iron curtain countries. I am not going to quote them again but I am merely going to refer to people whose words I have quoted recently; Mr. I. Norman Smith of the Ottawa Journal; Mr. James Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada; Mr. James S. Duncan; the former president of Massey-Harris of Canada and now chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, who was also the gentleman who, apart from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, led the recent delegation of Canadian businessmen and others to the United Kingdom.

From time to time I have also had the opportunity of speaking to ladies and gentlemen—of various viewpoint, I might add—who over the last year or two have visited some of these iron curtain countries and have seen what is going on in them. I have mentioned the statements of the gentlemen I have named, but there is also a long list of those whom I have not named, all of whom have outlined the tremendous expansion of educational facilities, scientific research and technical advances made in Russia.

To my mind if we are going to, shall I say compete, though perhaps that is not the right word to use, in the world in which we live, not only for the minds of men but also in order to impress upon all peoples, particularly those in underprivileged areas, that the manner in which we develop our educational institutions and our scientific and technical resources is in the end going to bring a better result than the perhaps more regimented system of Soviet Russia and the iron curtain countries, then I think we have to do a great deal more than we are doing to improve facilities of this nature in Canada.

I do not think we are doing enough. I would like, indeed, to transfer from the military commitments and expenditures that we are making, a substantial number of dollars to be used in Canada for purposes of education; because I believe that in the long run the struggle that is going on in the world will not be settled on the field of battle, will not be settled by missiles, will not be settled by sputniks, will not be settled by planes or any of those things about which people are talking so much today, but will ultimately be settled by the peoples of the world when they understand one another and when they understand the condition in the countries in which they live.

Because I believe that, Mr. Speaker, I think the taking of this opportunity this afternoon is well worth while. So far this session no opportunities have been afforded for a discussion of this description. Usually we rely on private members' resolutions regarding federal aid to education, but quite obviously we are now so far advanced in the session, with so few private members' days remaining, that if there were resolutions of this description on the order paper it is unlikely that they would be reached.

So I say that the problems of education and research have become of such critical importance as to merit top priority in government planning. We have been giving top priority to military equipment and so on. Now I believe we should be giving top priority to the planning of education and to the planning of research.

As I indicated a few moments ago, visitors to Russia, papers in scientific journals, and other reports coming from the Soviet union indicate the spectacular successes which have been made in recent years; and if this needs to be underlined it has been underlined by the appearance of the sputnik which was launched in October. Maybe it is just a rumour that a rocket has been launched carrying a man; maybe it is not true; none the less the very fact that scientists have stated they would not be surprised if it were true indicates the extent to which scientists throughout the world believe that great progress has been made in this field in that country.

And so I say that our very survival as a nation would seem to require an unprecedented effort in the field of education; unprecedented effort in bringing our educational system up to a level much higher than it is at the present time. I am not belittling what is being done in our schools and colleges. I am not belittling our system which has evolved over the years, but I say we have to vastly increase the educational facilities of this country and vastly increase the funds available for our educational system.

Not only that, but I believe our ability to maintain the prosperity of our country at a high level depends, in the age in which we live, very largely upon the education and training of those who are connected with every field of human endeavour within our country.

We know perfectly well, looking back over the years, that among nations which some years ago had populations which were more or less illiterate, standards of progress were much lower than among those who had more literate populations. We know that with the coming of the great machines in the last half century particularly there has been an ever-increasing need for persons better qualified educationally than their forefathers were, in order to operate those machines. Consequently, not only in the field of culture, in the field of national defence and in the field of research, as I have indicated, we need, in order to maintain a level of prosperity in our country, an educated and well trained population.

May I add that I believe the better educated people are, the more likely they are to be democratic in their approach to problems, the more likely they are to resist the teaching of totalitarians, whether those totalitarians are fascists or whether they are communists, because we have found over and over again that the more backward the peoples of the world are, the more likely they are to be led into totalitarian forms of rule.

I know it may be said that some of the leaders were highly educated people; that Lenin, Trotsky and some of the others who led the Russian revolution were highly educated people. So they were. But the power which they had through their own personal education over the peoples of the countries in which they lived was due in large measure to the fact that the people they controlled were so largely illiterate, so largely uneducated and so largely untrained. Consequently the more education we have, in my opinion, the more likely people are to be free of totalitarian inclinations.

In recent years we have scarcely managed to maintain the personnel in our schools and colleges and in our scientific endeavours. We have seen many young men and many middle-aged men who should be teaching mathematics, chemistry and physics leaving our universities and schools and going into private business in different fields, joining companies to take up certain lines of research, with the result that they have been largely lost to the training of the younger people who must replace them not only in industry but as university leaders in the days to come.

As a matter of fact I think this country has lagged behind in the field of research. It is true that some of our industrial organizations have set up research laboratories, but these private organizations set up by industry have a definite aim, the aim of improving the output or product of that particular industry; in other words, their research is directed to a given end. Yet the significant research which has been done in the world in the last 25, 30 or 50 years is not of that type. The type of research we need is what is sometimes called pure research, pure science, where the scientists are not engaged in looking toward a particular end but are, rather, following a path in order that they may find new paths, new goals, new ends.

In our own country, of course, the one exception is our national research council, yet those who were on the committee dealing with the national research council two years ago will recollect that while we found it was doing a magnificent job, the encouragement given with regard to salaries, with regard to tenure and to some degree, perhaps, with regard to equipment, was not all that might have been expected of Canada under the present circumstances.

Of course we have the defence research board. But the defence research board cannot be compared with the national research board, because no matter how efficient the defence research board may be it is conducting research toward a particular end, namely the equipment and improvement of our means of defence. The national research council on the other hand is directing its attention to pure science, and in my opinion we are not doing enough in that field; we are not giving enough encouragement to the national research organization. To my mind we should be emphasizing to a greater extent than in the past the facilities of the national research council and building up a corps of pure scientists who can be working to achieve the kind of results which pure science investigation will give. After that the other research organizations can take the results of the pure research and use them in the narrower channels of applied research which industry encourages.

Recently I read the Atlantic Monthly of January, 1958. I am not going to quote from it at length. It said that in the United States, for example—and I think about the same proportion applies to Canada—five times as much is spent on chewing gum alone as on the basic, pure or theoretical as distinct from applied research. And yet it is the pure research that leads us into the applied and to the new knowledge upon which further human advances can be made.

Therefore, the first point I want to make is that within our educational system this parliament of Canada, within its own field, —I am not going outside that field at the moment—should be spending far more than it is spending on pure research; in other words, on an organization like the national research council. Or it should be expanding the national research council because of the tremendous contribution it has made to the life and welfare of Canada already.

This is the first point I would make because we have it within our own jurisdiction. It is not a question of interfering with provincial jurisdiction in that type of facility and that type of education. Under the national research council we might establish scholarships. I think they have some scholarships now. We learned that, as a matter of fact, when we were on that committee. But we should expand those scholarships and bursaries in order that more young men and young women should be encouraged to go into the field of pure science, the science which is the basis of all other scientific research.

I am working down to the university level. When we think of the university facilities in Canada and what was said by the presidents of the universities—and I am very happy to see that we have the former president of the University of Toronto in the house this afternoon as the Secretary of State for External Affairs—we find that they have been warning us that the facilities are inadequate and that we need to make quite a tremendous expansion of university facilities if we are to accommodate the young men and women who will be not only desirous but who will have the ability to benefit from a university education. Therefore we say that not only in the Canada Council, through which we are providing some scholarships, but in a much larger way we should be providing scholarships for our young men and women in our universities and expanding the facilities of those universities in order that they may be available to the young men and women of ability who might wish to enter those universities.

May I say that I think the time has come when we in this country should establish a system for our young people so that every young man and woman, every adolescent every boy and girl, if you like, beginning at the bottom, who shows ability to benefit from a university education should be able to go into science and so on without regard to the level of the parents' purse or the economic circumstances of that young person. He or she should be enabled to go right through without any individual payment from the family or from himself or herself. Of course, if the young man or woman can earn a little on the side that is all to the good, but as a rule they cannot earn enough to put themselves through, although in the last year or so I am free to confess more young men and women have been perhaps able to earn in the summer much more than they could 10 years ago and certainly more than they could 20 years ago in order to assist their university courses. Yet even then they cannot provide for themselves because the cost of university training and of living is so high.

When I look back over the years when I was a student and realize in those days how difficult it was to find the comparatively small amount that was required I wonder how many parents of the students who are at university today manage to put their young people through university. Therefore, we have to build an educational system, and I think it is the duty of this parliament to consider ways and means, to consider how we can assist the provinces without interfering with their constitutional rights to control their educational system, to bring our university levels up, to promote scholarships and to make it possible for every boy and girl of ability to receive the best education that this country can give them.

When I was overseas in 1956 I was most interested to see how that was being worked out in the country where I was born and where I began school over 60 years ago; how they are endeavouring, and successfully, to promote the idea that boys and girls of ability, from the humblest homes, should get an education that will equip them in every possible way, both culturally and scientifically, to assist in the development of their country. Mr. Speaker, I said deliberately "culturally and scientifically" because I am not one of those who believe that—while this afternoon I have advocated and shall continue to advocate that we should do what we can to encourage pure science—we should turn out merely people who are scientists and neglect the cultural side of their education. I think there is a danger in that, as there are dangers in most things if you overemphasize one side of a problem or the other.

A year ago last September there was a conference on engineering, scientific and technical manpower at St. Andrews by the sea. It was held from September 9 to September 11, 1956. What did that conference say? I am not going to read the entire brief, I am just going to put some extracts on the record. First of all, the brief said, that by 1980 to remain competitive with other industrial nations, on the basis of the projected increases in output per capita and projections of other fundamental factors, Canada will need—these are the rather startling things that those people engaged in those fields put before the conference—to at least triple and probably quadruple her currently employed total of some 40,000 engineers.

When I listened the other afternoon to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) talking about the new equipment, and so on, it was again brought home to me that no longer is manpower the essential thing even in an army, a navy or an air force, though it is very important; the essential thing is that that manpower shall be of a particular type; that manpower shall be trained in all kinds of technical and modern fields. This brief says that in industry alone we need to triple and probably quadruple the currently employed total of some 40,000 engineers in our own country and to triple and probably more than quadruple today's scientist force of 20,000. As a matter of fact, our scientific forces are not increasing at the rate that is essential if we are to keep up with what is going on in other countries in the world, and when we think of Canada as a country with vast resources still to be developed we must realize that scientists, engineers and technicians are going to play an essential part in the development of those resources if they are to be developed either in the interests of private enterprise or in the interests of public enterprise. Of course, I should like to see our resources developed instead of exploited and therefore developed under public enterprise but I am leaving that out of the question because I am not dealing with that particular phase this afternoon.

The brief goes on to say that we need to have almost ten times as many technicians assisting our scientists and engineers as are employed today. When I was in Europe in 1956 I found—I am not sure that they are altogether wise in doing this—that there was a disposition at a comparatively early age, around the age of 12 in most instances, to try to divide the students in the schools into two groups, those who would go on to technical education and those who would go on to scientific and cultural education. They were not divided according to the types of homes from which they came; they were divided, as far as their teachers could judge them, on the abilities they showed and their aptitudes. Those who showed aptitudes indicating that they had the ability to absorb a higher education in the cultural or scientific fields were led along through the universities where they could take not only the usual degrees but could afterwards continue with postgraduate work.

These young people are sometimes picked off. I am thinking of a young man whom I know very well and who graduated in chemistry in 1956. He ranked very high in his class and shortly afterwards he received a letter from Harwell, where the main United Kingdom atomic energy research plant is located, inviting him to submit an application to Harwell. Evidently the standards of the various students who graduated in 1956 were reported to Harwell by the board of examiners of the university. I may say I was astounded to learn that the young man had been called up for military service. In spite of the fact that Harwell invited him to submit an application, today he is commissioned in one of the armed forces of the United Kingdom and instead of teaching applied chemistry or pure chemistry he is teaching radar about which, until he was sworn into the armed forces, he had known nothing at all. What a waste of ability!

I rather suspect that if we examined our armed forces, be it the air force, the army or the navy, we should find in the ranks young men who have ability in the fields I am discussing this afternoon but who have been sidetracked into the armed forces because the armed forces have been offering the bright young men of our country educational opportunities and careers and have enticed into the armed forces young men who perhaps might have been better utilized outside the armed forces. However, in order to obtain an education these young men have joined our armed forces. I, of course, compliment the Department of National Defence on giving them this opportunity which we refuse to give in other and more productive parts of our society.

The brief says that we need to provide ten times as many technicians as are employed today. We are told that the existing capacity of our colleges, universities and technical schools is producing one-twentieth of this requirement, and to provide for our requirements for technicians would absorb about 10 per cent of our matriculation graduates who do not go on to or complete university training. We say that the needs cannot be met from either the existing rate of university enrolment or from a continuation of the current rate of increase in enrolment, and if we have the enrolment we have not got the facilities. Over the last year or two we have been seeing our great universities endeavouring to raise money from private corporations and private citizens, and to some extent some of them have done very well. But we cannot rely on that source even if these funds are deductible for income tax purposes in one way or another. As a matter of fact, I often think that their deductibility for income tax purposes is really an indirect way in which the country itself is providing funds. I say we should be providing funds in a direct way through the parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces.

We are falling far short of exploiting the full potential of those capable of assimilating higher education and utilizing it to maximum effectiveness. I might add that undoubtedly we have some young men and women in our universities and high schools who should not be there but because their parents are well enough off to keep them there they are kept there. On the other hand, many young men and women have the ability but their parents do not have the funds and these young people are not able to take advantage of our educational system.
