FISHERIES ACT

REQUEST LEGISLATION BE AMENDED TO PREVENT POLLUTION OF WATERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing importance.

In view of this week's controversial ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada that section 33(3) of the federal Fisheries Act is unconstitutional, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That the government be directed to immediately prepare legislation to amend the federal Fisheries Act in such a way as to prevent the dumping of logging wastes directly into streams frequented by fish, provided that biological damage to fish stocks can be predicted in advance, and provided also that such authority will respect the constitutional right of the provinces to authorize and regulate logging operations on adjacent watershed areas.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED NATIONS—GLOBAL REFERENDUM ON DISARMAMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of House of Commons Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the federal government recently created the position of ambassador for disarmament, and that Canada supported in principle the final document of the United Nations special session on disarmament in 1978 and also endorsed, with all other UN member states, the goal of general disarmament in 1961, and in view of the fact that disarmament must be achieved by the efforts of all governments negotiating through gradual and balanced steps, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House support a proposal for a global referendum on disarmament at the thirty-fifth session of the UN General Assembly, to be sponsored by the government of Canada, so that humanity can participate in the historic choice for a disarmed world.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONVENTION CENTRES

FUNDING OF CENTRE IN EDMONTON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent consideration under Standing Order 43.

The government has acted preferentially and with political overtones with regard to its policy of funding assistance for convention centres. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That the federal government readjust its convention centre funding policy and announce immediately a grant for construction of the Edmonton convention centre.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LANGUAGE TRAINING FOR EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, last week I proposed a motion under Standing Order 43 which gained near unanimous approval, and Your Honour stated I might move it later. I wish to do so today.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the House leader of the Conservative party:

That this House urges the Committee on Members' Services to give positive consideration to making the language training presently available to members of Parliament available to employees of members of Parliament.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS ON INCREASED USE OF COAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has stated that coal is an important part of the government's energy program, and whereas both western and eastern Canada have large deposits of coal, much of it being sulphur-free, and whereas central Canada is importing large volumes of coal, therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House urge the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and other ministers in the Government of Canada to initiate discussions with their provincial counterparts in the provinces of central Canada with a view to working out a program to use more Canadian coal and thus keep the jobs and money involved in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

CALL FOR EQUALITY BETWEEN MEN AND WOMEN IN JOB OPPORTUNITIES AND PENSION PLANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House, noting the fine statements which have been made about the rights of women, statements which have not been followed by the taking of positive steps to establish and protect those rights, calls on the government to take affirmative action to establish equality for women in all phases of our economy, particulary in employment opportunities, access to adequate training and upgrading, equal pay for work of equal value, and equality between men and women in all pension plans.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF MARIN COMMISSION—CASE OF CONSTABLE BATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, in view of the admitted need for rationalization and reform of RCMP internal regulations and procedures, the dissatisfaction being expressed by force members from different areas of the country concerning the lack of natural justice for members, and the four-year delay in doing anything of substance with the Marin commission recommendations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Solicitor General personally examine the circumstances surrounding the background of a board hearing which took place in Halifax, Nova Scotia, yesterday involving Constable Donald A. Bates, who appears to be another of several members from that area arbitrarily selected for dismissal over a period of time and, more importantly, that he expedite the type of procedures and actions recommended by Mr. Justice Marin in his report of January, 1976.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

ADEQUATE SUPPLIES OF PETROLEUM AT EQUITABLE PRICES FOR INDEPENDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Having regard to the special vulnerability of Canadian small businessmen who compose the independent fuel marketers of Canada, particularly those of Ontario and Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That the government issue, forthwith, a policy statement setting forth those measures which will be used to guarantee these independents access to adequate supplies of petroleum products at equitable prices.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SAFETY STANDARDS FOR CHILDREN'S BICYCLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), on a matter of pressing necessity to Canada's pediatricians, I move:

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs investigate the escalating use of rear-fender bicycle seats for children, and that his department issue safety standards because of an alarming increase in serious accidents to these tots who are now largely unprotected.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

COST-SHARING OF TIDAL POWER PROJECT AT ANNAPOLIS RIVER CAUSEWAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the governments of Canada and Nova Scotia have concluded an agreement sharing the cost of the development of a tidal power project at the Annapolis River causeway in Nova Scotia—on which the official sod-turning ceremony will take place tomorrow—whereas this site is near the cradle of civilization on the North American shore, and whereas the potential of this pilot project could be Canada's cradle for world leadership in the development of tidal power, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this House extend congratulations to the political leaders and officials who have made possible this demonstration of working federalism.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RATIFICATION OF CANADA-U.S. EAST COAST FISHING AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given that the Prime Minister will be meeting President Carter next week in Venice to discuss a number of bilateral issues, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to put forcefully Canada's case on the east coast fishing dispute so that the president can use his good offices to impress upon the United States Senate the need to ratify the fishing agreement with Canada as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES CHARGED BY COMMERCIAL BANKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, the Bank of Canada interest rates have again fallen and the gap widens between what the commercial banks are charging their customers and the Bank of Canada rate. When going in the opposite direction, the commercial banks are very quick to respond. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to contact his cronies in the banking community and instruct them to clean up their act.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

OIL PRICING AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of serious and urgent concern.

Whereas the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has failed to finalize an energy pricing agreement with Alberta, and whereas this could well mean a full year's delay in the development of the Alsands project at Fort McMurray and the Imperial Oil project at Cold Lake, at horrendous cost to the Canadian economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to finalize by June 30 a pricing agreement with Alberta, the Alsands consortium and Imperial Oil for the production of synthetic crude, to allow these two huge developments to proceed on schedule.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CONSTRUCTION OF ALASKA HIGHWAY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, in the absence of both ministers responsible for answering questions relating to the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline, I shall direct my question to the Minister of Finance whom I know to be completely knowledgeable and familiar with pipeline-related matters.

The government has taken the position that there must be firm guarantees that the whole of the line will be built by 1985 before it gives approval to the construction of any of the Canadian portion. Can the minister tell the House, in addition to the existing legislation and the international agreement now in place what further assurances the government requires in order to permit the Canadian portions of the line to go ahead?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, at this point I am not in a position to advise the hon. member what further detailed assurances may have been requested by the minister responsible for the northern pipeline, but obviously, as the hon. member is aware, one of the necessities of the Government of Canada is to ensure the completion of the total line, as has been our objective from the beginning.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, the government must surely be aware of the nature and extent of the assurances it is going to require before permitting the construction of the Canadian portions of the line. Has the government communicated the nature and extent of those assurances it requires to the United States government, in order to put them in the position of being able to acquiesce or otherwise to those assurances required by this government?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that from the very beginning it had been the determination both of the United States government and the Canadian government to secure the completion of the gas pipeline. As my hon. friend knows, the Canadian government and the Parliament of Canada put this country in a position to have that line completed expeditiously.

Since that time, the arrangements, particularly the financing of the line, have not been completed in the United States. That certainly is at the very heart of the continuing assurances that are required and understood in the United States of the completion of this line.

Mr. Nielsen: The United States sponsors of the line issued a statement of intentions yesterday with respect to partial financing of the line. Do those assurances go to the extent of meeting the Canadian requirements? If not, should it not be the government's position to spell out the assurances required, in order to give approval to the Canadian sections of the line before the deadline expressed by the Canadian sponsors, who said yesterday that unless cabinet came down with a position the western leg of the line would be abandoned at the end of August?

Surely it is time for the government to stop groping and fumbling around on this issue and come out with a firm statement of the requirements in order that the Canadian sponsors can go ahead with the job.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, there has been no groping on the part of the Government of Canada on this particular project from the original negotiations, from the passage of the law and from the setting up of the Northern Pipeline Agency. The Government of Canada has been in a position from the very beginning to accelerate the expeditious construction of the line.

I want to make it absolutely clear that there is no default on the part of the Government of Canada in the construction of the line, as inferred by the hon. member. The contrary is the case. We have been urging the United States government for quite some time to put itself in a position for this line to be built. May I tell my hon. friend, as I understand it, that the statement of intention made yesterday by the parties mentioned had to do, not with the over-all financing of the line itself but with the design of the line, which is quite a different matter.

ALASKA HIGHWAY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE—OIL PRICING AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my questions are supplementary to those which the hon. member for Yukon asked. They are also directed to the Minister of Finance because of his special knowledge in this area.

The minister indicated there has been no groping with regard to this natural gas pipeline. If there has been no groping, there certainly appears to be foot-dragging or at least some new conditions imposed by the federal government. It has been suggested that perhaps these new conditions, or this foot-dragging have to do with the oil pricing agreement.

With the government's desire to get its own way in the oil pricing agreement, would the minister assure the House that the government is in no way utilizing its regulatory authority over the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline as a club or to get its own way in terms of an oil pricing agreement with the producing provinces?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the determination of the Government of Canada to get ahead with this project stands apart from the current oil price negotiations. I do not think the hon. member is doing the project any service by inferring that foot-dragging is taking place on the Canadian side.

Mr. Nielsen: The ball is in your court.

Mr. MacEachen: There is absolutely no foot-dragging on the Canadian side. I think the company involved in the project would be the first to admit that there has been absolutely no default or failure on the part of the Government of Canada or the Northern Pipeline Agency. I do not think that our determination to have this line constructed enters into the current negotiations. One does not affect the other, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Andre: The president of Foothills Pipelines (Yukon) Ltd. indicated that unless the cabinet responds with a positive decision by July 15, there will be at least a year's delay. If nothing is done by the end of August, there could be a delay longer than that.

Mr. Nielsen: Abandonment.

Mr. Andre: Abandonment, perhaps. Also, the cabinet has recently imposed conditions which the American sponsors of the line do not understand; they do not know how to respond to them. This is leading, naturally, to a conclusion that perhaps the federal government has some new strategy in mind.

If the minister is assuring the House that it is still progressively pursuing this pipeline, and the government is not linking it to oil pricing or to a gas export tax—which is something else that has been suggested—would the minister assure the House that there will be a favourable decision made prior to July 15, the deadline for commencement of work this winter?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member has introduced a new element into his questioning. Instead of talking about over-all construction of the line, he is now presumably asking us under what conditions we would authorize the pre-build.

The answer to that is quite simple, it seems to me. It is that the pre-build could only be authorized if the Canadian government were satisfied that the total line itself were to be constructed. It does not seem to be in the interests of Canada to construct the pre-build pipeline in order to push Canadian gas into the American market without any assurance that in the future American gas from Alaska will go into that market. That is totally in contradiction with the initial conception of this particular project.

● (1125)

Mr. Andre: Perhaps the minister could do everybody, including himself, a favour and indicate to the House what additional conditions are required above and beyond those in the act in order to complete the whole line. Perhaps we could commence work this afternoon.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, that is a simple question to answer. When the Americans show the financeability of the line, which they have not been able to do, that would be the assurance required.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

HIGH INTEREST RATES CHARGED BY BANKS—GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the successive decreases in the bank in Canada and the fact that the banks have been reluctant to bring down the prime rate, especially for consumer lending and small business loans, and recognizing the fact that the interest rate spread is the highest it has been in recent history, can the minister explain why he has failed to act to prevent the banks from gouging the consumers the way they have been doing, as reflected by the very high profit pictures over the last little while, especially in view of the fact he made commitments in this House previously concerning this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I do not agree at all with the premises of the hon. member's question.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, the minister may not agree, but many other authorities do. Can he say why he has failed to act on a matter that he discussed previously and made commitments on in this House with regard to bringing down interest rates charged by credit card issuers in this country, such as Chargex, Master Charge and the multinational oil companies which have all substantially increased their credit card interest rates?

In view of the falling cost of money now, does the minister agree the consumers are being exploited? Does he agree he made commitments previously, and what is he going to do to deliver some action?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, surely the hon. member knows that the use of a credit card is an option which is offered to those who buy products; consequently, there is no interest incurred if the user of that credit card pays his bill within 30 days. It is only when the bill is paid late that interest begins to be added. Consequently, if the consumer finds that the charge for use of the credit card is too high, there is a very straightforward solution, which is to avoid using the credit card.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary is addressed to the Minister of Finance, who certainly cannot concur with the previous answer. Since, obviously, Consumer and Corporate Affairs will not be protecting the consumer, can the Minister of Finance explain his reluctance to build protective provisions into the Bank Act by which they would monitor and attempt to control these unjust and exploitive interest rate situations in Canada? Will he explain his reluctance in this matter?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there are at present before the standing committee the clauses affecting this particular proposal. I do not intend to repeat in the House the discussions that are going on in the standing committee on the Bank Act. I did depart from that position a short time last week, but I do not think it is good practice for us to repeat in the House what is going on in the standing committee.

Mr. Knowles: There is nothing going on.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF FORUM FOR YOUNG CANADIANS

Madam Speaker: I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in our gallery of members of the Forum for Young Canadians which is today celebrating its fifth anniversary. I thought hon. members would like to wish them well in their endeavours.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SAFETY STANDARDS FOR CHILDREN'S BICYCLES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It concerns a matter of great importance to Canadian pediatricians, namely, the increasing use of unsafe rear-fender bicycle seats for children which is resulting in serious injuries to tiny tots who are completely unprotected should the rider lose control of the bicycle or should the bicycle be rammed from behind. Has the minister's department carried out any testing of these rear-fender seats to assess their safety?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to note the hon. member's interest in this matter. He has already informed the officials of my department of the urgency of looking into this and if possible to set standards with a view to better protecting children who go bike riding with their parents. I find the hon. member's concerns to be founded and I can assure him that the officials of my department will immediately undertake studies aimed at better informing parents who take their children with them on bicycle rides of the dangers inherent in such excursions and that they will try to set minimum standards of protection for children.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Far be it from me to suggest unwarranted interference by the government in people's lives, but I really do believe the state in this case has a role to play in the bicycles of the nation.

For the sake of our children, I wonder whether the minister would suggest to his departmental officials the possibility of making mandatory the fitting of guards to prevent children's legs being caught in the spokes, and the wearing of little helmets, if necessary, to reduce the likelihood of head injury to these children.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I share the hon. member's concerns and I can assure him that I will transmit his proposals and recommendations to the officials of my department who will certainly follow them up.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURES TO PREVENT POLLUTION OF WATERS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and is related to this week's ruling by Mr. Justice Martland that section 33(3) of the federal Fisheries Act is unconstitutional.

What steps has the minister taken in response to this Supreme Court ruling? How will the minister prevent the dumping of slash, stumps and other debris into streams frequented by fish while at the same time respecting the provincial right to make laws relating to logging operations in adjacent watershed areas?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I have not received a formal analysis of the consequences of the decision of the Supreme Court in this matter which was given this week. I might say that the provision which was rejected was voted unanimously by Parliament; it may have been drafted a little too broadly.

I will await the advice of the lawyers. Meanwhile, there are other provisions of the Fisheries Act which allow us to prevent serious damage to the habitat and to the environment, and we shall continue to use those powers. In my view, this situation probably underlines the need for a more rational approach to the competitive use of resources such as water—a policy I have advocated all along.

Mr. Siddon: I should like to pursue further the final remarks of the minister. It seems to me that by now the hon. gentleman will have fully reviewed the reasons for judgment and will have consulted with his colleague, the Minister of Justice, who is sitting to his left. So will the minister tell us whether the problem with section 33(3) arises from the principle of the powers as set out therein, apparently in conflict with section 92 of the British North America Act, or whether it arises merely because of the choice of phraseology in section 33(3) which, as the minister has indicated, appears to give very broad powers to federal fisheries officers without placing upon them the responsibility of proving the likelihood of damage to fish habitat?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, the presence of the Minister of Justice in his seat very close to me at the moment was about to allow me to have a word with him concerning this question. I have asked the legal officers of my department about it but, of course, I will want to hear the views of the Minister of Justice and have his co-operation also in his other role as minister responsible for federal-provincial relations.

I do not have the advantage enjoyed by the hon. member, that of having a nicely-written question before him, but I can tell him that my interest in this matter is no less than his.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON RIVER DIVERSION PROJECT—MONITORING OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In January of this year I received assurances from officials of Environment Canada in Regina that our consular officials would be on site to monitor engineering studies and land acquisitions in the New Rockford section of Garrison. Has the hon. gentleman been assured by his consular officials that there is no Garrison diversion construction under way which will affect Canadian waters?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have not yet received such an assurance from my officials, but I can tell the House that further to our discussion of this matter in the House yesterday, our ambassador in Washington sent a letter to the subcommittee dealing with the appropriations rider and enclosed a copy of our tone to the United States government.

Mr. McKenzie: The minister said he has received no assurance from his officials. Can he tell the House whether there are any of our consular officials down in North Dakota now, monitoring construction work? I should also like to point out that Governor Link, of North Dakota, a Garrison supporter and friend of President Carter, has been calling for more funding for the project. Would the minister comment on the likelihood that the U.S. elections are coming into play on the Garrison issue?

Mr. MacGuigan: I would not want to comment on the U.S. elections, but obviously that is a factor. I will have to get the information the hon. member asks for and report to him.

ILLEGAL BOARDING OF "RAINBOW WARRIOR" AND ARREST OF CANADIANS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of press reports of the apprehension of Greenpeace anti-whaling vessel Rainbow Warrior in international waters yesterday and the holding at gunpoint and interrogation of a CBC cameraman and reporter, I should like to ask the minister whether he has yet received official reports of this incident and whether he has protested the illegal boarding of the vessel and the arrest of Canadian citizens.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that the report is true. According to the information we have received, the Greenpeace ship has been taken to the Spanish harbour of El Farol. We are endeavouring to get further information. It is too soon to make a protest, but if a protest is appropriate we will make it in due course.

Mr. Rose: Since this latest incident involving a Greenpeace vessel amounts to piracy on the high seas and is reminiscent of Captain David McTaggart's experience during the French nuclear tests when his vessel, Greenpeace II, was boarded by the French navy in the South Pacific about ten years ago, and bearing in mind the length of time it took Canada to finally espouse his cause, as was done belatedly, will the minister on this occasion, if the facts warrant it, protest immediately in the strongest terms to the government of Spain about this very grave matter?

Mr. Nielsen: Olé!

Mr. MacGuigan: I can assure the hon. member we shall certainly do what the facts warrant. It is not yet clear to us whether the seizure was made on the high seas; it may well have been made in Spanish territorial waters.

NEGOTIATIONS ON REDUCTION OF CRUDE OIL IMPORTS

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last year, in Tokyo, Canada committed itself to take all necessary steps to limit its oil import level to 150,000 barrels a day. Next week, in Venice, will the Prime Minister be able to announce that Canada has met its commitment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member for Shefford and the House that Canada has fulfilled its commitment in 1979 and that, on the basis of currently available figures, we expect to be able to adhere to it again in 1980.

METRIC CONVERSION

EFFECT ON AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Small Business. It relates to the metric changeover issue in the agricultural sector and particularly the mandatory aspects relating to cattle producers, who are deeply concerned about the impact of this metric policy as it affects our beef and live cattle trade with the United States.

In view of the fact that all such export cattle trade begins at our country auction markets, and that those are sales on a weight basis, will the minister give serious consideration to allowing the cattle sector to remain on a voluntary basis with respect to the metric conversion policy?

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, as far as I know, the cattle sector of the agricultural community is still on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Hargrave: Madam Speaker, that of course applies to most of the sectors which have not changed yet. I am sure the minister is aware of that. Would the minister responsible for metric conversion support an approach to the United States which would establish an agreement or treaty which would allow for metric conversion only when both countries agree to proceed together?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Madam Speaker, I feel that the hon. member's suggestion is excellent. It is essential that our effort to convert to the metric system be as much as possible in line with what is being done in the United States.

USE OF DOGS TO DETECT OIL AND GAS LEAKS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I am going to say a few words and then excuse myself from asking a supplementary question.

Madam Speaker: That just will not do. The idea is to ask brief questions at all times.

Mr. Taylor: We have some 200,000 miles of pipelines and we are losing a lot of gas and oil through leaks. Dogs from the Avery Kennels in Alberta were able to detect ten leaks in 30 miles of gas line after a helicopter and electronic flamepacks failed to find these leaks. I think there is a tremendous chance for conservation of gas and oil.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I sense that the hon. member is just about to ask his question. I think he should do so.

Mr. Taylor: Yes, I am Madam Speaker. There is a tremendous chance for the conservation of gas and oil through the use of dogs. Will the government consider giving some help to the development of the adequacy of dogs to detect gas and oil leaks?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, now that I have the assurance that there will not be a supplementary, I would say that is a "doggone" good question.

FISHERIES

PROTECTION OF FISH HABITAT

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It relates to Tuesday's Supreme Court decision which ruled that parts of the Fisheries Act regarding the protection of fish habitat were ultra vires, a decision based on infringement of provincial rights.

In light of the threat which now exists to fish habitat in estuarine areas of British Columbia which are under federal jurisdiction, I ask the minister what plans he has to protect fish habitat in estuaries.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, as I indicated to the previous questioner on this issue, the change in the legislation was brought about some three years ago. It was felt that it strengthened the Fisheries Act and that it added more clout to it. But I have to tell the hon. member that even with that section being taken away, the Fisheries Act still remains a very powerful piece of legislation to protect fish. It was really the other provisions which were used by my predecessors to effect some rather important decisions. There are other sections which are open to us.

We are now waiting to see if the section being redrafted could, in fact, be reintroduced in this House. I am getting legal advice from my colleague and from the legal people in my own department. But I assure the hon. member, and, through him, the fishermen of this country, that the habitat of fish is not totally threatened. Perhaps the protection is a little weaker than the protection we had, but we will use the other provisions and await the judgment of the courts on those items which can be used.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, in light of strong evidence indicating that the Cowichan estuary task force will recommend increased industrialization of the Cowichan estuary, will the minister table the submissions and recommendations his department made to the Cowichan estuary task force, and will he act now to reassure the people of Vancouver Island that he will protect the Cowichan estuary from further degradation by industry?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I will certainly make available any documentation I have on this issue, as we did in the case of the McGregor diversion, where the evidence produced by the experts from my department and the Department of the Environment was so impressive that the project was abandoned without further hearing because it was seen that the negative aspects were absolutely obvious and overwhelming.

I have not yet seen the final report on the Cowichan estuary. I hope to discuss this matter when I am out in British Columbia next week, but obviously I will make public any document we have which supports the case of good conservation and good habitat protection.

LAY-OFFS IN CRAB INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION BY MINISTER

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The minister is doubtless aware that the Quebec and maritimes crab industry is going through a severe crisis and that some plants will have to close down within coming weeks. Can he tell the House whether he will intervene personally to prevent lays-offs in processing plants and ensure an adequate income to the crab fishermen of eastern Canada?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am aware of two problems at this time which are perhaps less dramatic than the hon. member seems to indicate. In some cases the quality of crabs known as white crabs poses a problem to the rate of production of some plants. There is also a slight softening of the American market as a result of the slow-down in the American economy. At this point, the situation does not seem to be as critical as some newspapers would have us believe. In any event, the Fisheries Prices Support Board is now examining that file and I shall report to the hon. member in due course.

MINES

TAX INCENTIVES FOR USE OF COAL IN POWER GENERATION

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for an attractive minister, and it is not the Minister of Finance. My question is for the Minister of State for Mines. Canada now imports 20 million tons of coal annually—that is, coal and metallurgical coke—worth approximately $1 billion every year. This is having severe and adverse effects on Canada's balance of payments. The minister has said that she was evolving new policy in connection with the mining industry. When will the minister and the government evolve and announce a package of tax incentives to increase the competitiveness of using Canadian coal in Canada, and particularly central Canada, for power generation and for Canadian industry in total and, therefore, consume less oil in central Canada?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He appreciates, of course, the fact that this is a very complex issue and that it will take a considerable amount of time to complete the package. I assure him, however, that we are working in our department on this very issue and we hope within approximately six to seven months to have some idea as to the direction in which we are heading.

I should like to add that we are meeting with members of the mining industry next Tuesday and expect to have considerable input from the industry then.

Mr. Yurko: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to assure the minister that it is not totally complicated. Indeed, all it takes is political will and courage to do something about the situation in Canada with respect to the importation of coal.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Right on.

Mr. Yurko: When will the minister prevail upon her fellow ministers in government to initiate and/or increase the transportation subsidies to increase the use of Canadian coal from eastern and western Canada for power generation in the province of Ontario? Can she give us an idea when she will tackle this particular problem?

Mrs. Erola: Again, Madam Speaker, this is a very complex issue because, as the hon. member knows, the burning of coal has the side effect of acid rain, which is something we must all consider very carefully. Indeed, we must question whether the increase of coal-burning generating stations is advisable in this particular region. So that is also under question.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—TRANSMISSION OF HYDROELECTRIC POWER THROUGH QUEBEC

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, earlier this week the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources met with his Quebec counterpart. My question is for the Prime Minister and it is a "doggone" good one.

Following that meeting, the Minister of Energy indicated that he favoured a reopening of talks between Newfoundland and Quebec with respect to the transmission of Labrador hydroelectric power through Quebec. Yet the government of Quebec placed conditions on the reopening of these talks which are totally unacceptable to Newfoundland. Therefore, my question to the Prime Minister is this: is the government prepared to recognize the constitutional rights of the province of Newfoundland to transmit its hydroelectric power through the province of Quebec, just as western provinces have the right to transmit their gas energy by pipeline through the province of Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it has always appeared to me that such a right existed, that it is part of the so-called trade and commerce powers of Canada being one economic country, and that provinces cannot be inhibited from selling their produce in other parts of the country. That is the constitutional doctrine in which I have always believed. But for greater assurance, the hon. member is aware we are proposing amendments to the constitution which will guarantee, as a basic right in a declaration of rights, the free movement of not only people and ideas across provincial borders but goods and services. So this is the constitution as we think it is now, but for greater assurance we are hoping it can be amended in the way he indicated.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I am glad to hear the reassurance of the Prime Minister that the present constitution provides the federal government with the power to allow for the building of a corridor through a province for the transmission of hydroelectric power to another province. Therefore, I have a supplementary question.

In view of the fact that talks have broken off, why has the Prime Minister not acted upon the formal requests of the Premier of Newfoundland on April 16, advising him that these talks have broken off, to exercise his authority on behalf of the province of Newfoundland to provide for a corridor through Quebec for the transmission and potential sale of Newfoundland hydroelectric power to customers in New York and Ontario?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I would think that such action would only be possible if Newfoundland had the contract for the sale of its power to some other part of the country, and if Quebec were imposing unreasonable charges in the transfer of that power in the sense that it would constitute some kind of tariff or barrier which would be constitutionally inadmissible. I have had no evidence as yet of either of those two conditions being met.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE OF BARLEY

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration in his capacity as spokesman for the Minister of Transport who is not in the House today.

I am sure the minister is aware of the actions taken by the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board authorizing the issuance of permits for the importation of feed grains. This has caused some concern to the Western Barley Growers' Association because of the fact the prevailing Canadian Wheat Board initial price for barley is $1.95 per bushel, while the market price is in the order of $3 per bushel, thus discouraging deliveries to the Canadian Wheat Board.

Would the minister undertake to recommend to his colleague in the other place the immediate upward adjustment of the initial price of barley, to encourage deliveries from farms and barley held in storage into the system so that these supplies could be met? My understanding is that statistics of the Canadian Wheat Board reveal that there are some 2.5 million tonnes of barley on the farms. This would help alleviate the situation and the hard-pressed financial position of producers.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would be very pleased to communicate that message to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. As the hon. member knows, at the present moment the decision by the Wheat Board is to permit barley to be sold out of country elevators at going competitive prices. If there is further upward adjustment, that will be considered by the Wheat Board, and I will make sure the minister responsible knows about it right away.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister is well aware that many farmers wish to sell to the Canadian Wheat Board. Because of the low initial price vis-à-vis the actual current prevailing price, it discourages these producers from moving. Would the minister impress upon his colleague in the other place the importance of that, particularly now, so that our supplies are in order?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member probably knows, this is a matter of ongoing concern to the government. A cabinet committee is meeting constantly to revise and adjust its programs relating to drought conditions in western Canada. At the first opportunity at that meeting I will transmit his concerns to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

ENERGY

TRANS MOUNTAIN PIPELINE—TRANSPORTATION OF ALASKAN CRUDE OIL—ENVIRONMENTAL SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In the talks and correspondence with Trans Mountain Pipe Line officials regarding the use of their facilities to transport Alaskan crude, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what environmental safeguards have been discussed in relation to this project.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any recent talks. I have not been informed of any recent exchanges on this particular point. As the hon. member knows, this government has always expressed the hope that Trans Mountain would not be the preferred route, but a parallel line along the Foothills line for gas would be built to transmit oil from Prudhoe Bay to the United States. That is still our preferred course.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The Prime Minister seems clueless about it now, but he certainly talked a lot about it during the campaign. For my constituency, this proposal would be an improvement over some of the other proposals that have been talked about, because it would get ships out of the inland waters. It would mean that not only tankers but supertankers would come down the coast. In light of what the Prime Minister said during the election campaign, what is the level of commitment of the Liberal government toward stopping the tankers coming down the west coast?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is agreeing with the position we took during the campaign. It was to the effect that the all overland route should have been pushed by the Conservative government as it was pushed by our government.

Mr. Nielsen: Which is what we did.

Mr. Trudeau: It is still our hope that this will be the route which will succeed. I am just informing the hon. member that I am not aware of any current information on that matter. I would have to defer to the minister.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACTS WITH SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I should like to continue my questioning of Tuesday concerning the Space Research Corporation with the Minister of Supply and Services and the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development. The Space Research Corporation is the body that is pushing its wares at the secret armaments conference being hosted by the Canadian Government next week at the Government Conference Centre.

I would like to ask the Minister of Supply and Services, since he said he would look into the matter for me when he replied on Tuesday, whether there are any government agencies or departments currently holding contracts with Space Research Corporation.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, there are indeed a number of agencies which are dealing with Space Research. Canadian Arsenals Limited, which is responsible to Parliament through me, has been dealing with Space Research in the past. I might indicate to the hon. lady that I have already asked for the preparation of a written reply for her, which should be coming to her within two or three days. Because the list is quite detailed, I think it would be more informative through that means of communication.

Madam Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for a short supplementary question.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, I would say to the minister that I hope the list will be available soon, as the secret conference begins on Tuesday.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Miss Jewett: The Conservatives are not concerned about Space Research Corporation, but we are.

An hon. Member: You are a day late. We asked about it yesterday.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RCMP REPORT ON SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, if I may, why it is that the report of the RCMP, long since done, concerning Space Research Corporation which as the minister knows has been convicted in the United States of illegally shipping arms to South Africa, has not been produced. I would ask whether he intends to keep this report of the RCMP secret and, if not, when he will release it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, according to the information I was able to obtain in that regard, the case of that company is now before Canadian courts. It therefore would not be in the interest of justice to table, at this time, the police report which led to legal proceedings.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but perhaps I will ask it on Monday.

SPORTS

DISBURSING OF FUNDS FROM LOTTERIES

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of sport. I think he is still the minister of sport, though we have not seen him here for about a week. It is my understanding that the sport department is virtually bankrupt, and the cultural and artistic communities seriously require money for symphonies and little theatres.

Would the minister advise the House whether he is going to deposit the provincial government cheque he has received from the lotteries and disburse the funds accordingly? Since he is going to be getting another cheque on June 29 which will amount to $12 million, plus the incremental $250,000, will he please see that these communities get the moneys accordingly?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his keen interest in the financial welfare of sport in this country, though I think sport would have been in a much better situation financially if he had not become party to the most disastrous piece of negotiation since the Brooklyn Bridge was sold.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Regan: I want to remind the hon. member that Loto Canada was netting $80 million a year, and he became a party with two other ministers in signing an incomplete agreement that has no time limit at all—so it may not be an agreement at all—whereby he gave away Loto Canada to the provinces and in return we received $24 million. That is a great piece of bargaining. I would say! If we are in any difficulty in relation to the flow of cash at the moment—

An hon. Member: You cut it all off.

Mr. Regan: —in supporting athletic events in this country, then I say the responsibility lies very close to the hon. gentleman who is asking the questions.

An hon. Member: Of the $24 million, you haven't spent a nickel. You cut everybody off and that is giving them concern.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DEFINITION OF "AMATEUR SPORT" AND "FITNESS"

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-607, to amend the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act (definition of amateur sport and fitness).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, the present act and regulations thereunder unduly restrict governmental encouragement of fitness and amateur sport in Canada to athletic activity, which connotes physical exertion as opposed to mental skill. Activities combining mental skill with a degree of physical effort should be included within the ambit of the act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 155, 208, 255, 771, 819, 820, 894 and 896.

I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

MAJOR GENERAL DONALD McNICHOL

Question No. 155—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware that Major General Donald McNichol, Commander of Canada's Air Defence Group, was quoted in news reports on Thursday, March 27, 1980 to the effect, that a war with the Soviet Union seems imminent and, if so, does this represent the policy approach of the government and, if not, does the government intend to ask Major General McNichol for full information illustrating his conclusion?

2. Is the government aware that Major General McNichol was quoted in part as saying that "our air defence system is at least 25 years old. We're working in the 1980s with 1950 equipment" and, if so, does such a statement represent government policy and what steps will the government take to update equipment for the Armed Forces?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. The government is aware of the news reports which quoted Major General McNichol. Neither the government nor the Department of National Defence believe that a war with the Soviet Union is imminent. The matter has been discussed with Major General McNichol and the Minister of National Defence considers it to be closed.

2. The quote "our air defence system is at least 25 years old. We're working in the 1980s with 1950 equipment" is inaccurate and misleading. The continental air defence system is composed of various sub-systems and components: e.g. radars for warning, surveillance and control purposes; interceptor aircraft; and command, control and communications facilities. Some of the equipment is relatively modern and efficient, but some is indeed more than 25 years old. The Department of National Defence will continue to implement the government's policy of replacing and modernizing the equipment of the Canadian forces to maintain and, where necessary, enhance capabilities needed for national and collective defence, and will, in accordance with this policy, develop jointly with the United States appropriate programs for modernization of the North American Air Defence System.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION—SALE OF SURPLUS EQUIPMENT

Question No. 208—Mr. Herbert:

What was the total amount recovered by (a) Canadian National Railways (b) Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for the sale of surplus equipment in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976 (iii) 1977?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Supply and Services and Transport as follows; in so far as Canadian National Railways is concerned:

(a) The best estimate of these amounts is:

(i) $13,313,622

(ii) $14,647,961

(iii) $15,755,938

The major cash recoveries in this respect are from sales of ferrous and non-ferrous scrap generated at our reclamation yards through the dismantling of retired property and equipment, and from unusable components scrapped at maintenance shops. These sales, together with the proceeds of sales or retired rolling stock, aggregate the following amounts in the years in question:

$11,913,622 in 1975

Of these latter amounts about 90 per cent is derived from sales of scrap. Those figures do not include proceeds from other miscellaneous sales, such as retired highway vehicles, scrap office furniture and equipment, waste paper, other properties, etc. System summaries of data relative to such sales are not readily available; however, on the basis of an analysis of a representative sample of such data, it appears that the addition of about $1.4 million per year should be made on those accounts.

In so far as the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is concerned:

(b) The following amounts include aircraft, ships, automotive vehicles, spares, major equipment and sundry merchandise.

(i) $ 7,259,069

(ii) $ 8,531,494

(iii) $10,789,903

MR. RALPH STEWART—CONSUL GENERAL IN ATLANTA

Question No. 255—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the government appoint Mr. Ralph Stewart as Consul General in Atlanta and, if so (a) on what date (b) what was the term of the appointment (c) what is the salary of the position?

2. What was the cost of maintaining the Consul General's office in Atlanta in each of the past five years?

3. What are the principal functions performed by the personnel in the office?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Mr. Stewart was appointed as consul general in Atlanta by the previous government:

(a) September 6, 1979;

(b) Undefined period;

(c) The salary of the position is within the range of $42,800 to $49,800.

2. In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned the cost of maintaining the consul general's office in Atlanta over the past five years is as follows:

Fiscal Year	Cost
1978-79	$1,402,839*
1977-78	562,365
1976-77	496,753

*Figure includes purchase of properties to house consul general and 5 other Canada-based employees at a cost of $731,170.

3. The 30 personnel of the consulate general in Atlanta are responsible for implementing the Canadian Government's programs in the fields of: trade and industrial development; tourism; consular affairs, and general relations in a territory comprised of Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands and the states of Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississipi and Florida. They are also responsible for implementing the immigration program in all of the above territory except for Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

FERTILIZER COMBINES HEARING—PRICE FIXING

Question No. 771—Mr. Thomson:

1. In the Fertilizer Combines Hearing carried out in 1979, how many manufacturers were involved in the accusation of price fixing?

2. How many days did the (a) preliminary hearings (b) trial take and, what was the total cost in each case?

Order Paper Questions

3. What basis did the Combines Branch have for the accusation of price fixing?

4. On whose advice and on whose authority does the Combines branch bring a case to trial, such as the Fertilizer Combines Hearing of 1979?

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): 1. Six manufacturers of fertilizer were charged. In addition, there were 12 unindicted co-conspirators named in the charge.

2. (a) 48 days, $180,705.57 (incl. necessary preparation)

(b) 150 days, $522,537.60 (incl. necessary preparation).

3. The director of investigation and research conducted a lengthy and detailed inquiry under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act resulting in the seizure of over 15,000 documents, the taking of sworn oral evidence from employees and officers of the firms involved, and the securing of market share and production data in the form of sworn returns of information from the manufacturers. Based on an analysis of all of the evidence, the director referred the inquiry to the Attorney General of Canada, pursuant to section 15(1) of the Combines Investigation Act, with a recommendation that a prosecution be undertaken.

4. Once the results of an inquiry have been referred to the Attorney General by the director of investigation and research, it is the Attorney General's responsibility to independently assess all of the evidence and, having done so, to make a decision as to whether or not a prosecution may be warranted. The result of the Attorney General's review in the fertilizer case was a decision to prosecute. All cases referred to the Attorney General by the director follow this pattern.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—STUDIES RELATED TO MARIJUANA

Question No. 819—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1975, what amount was spent on studies related to marijuana by the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): None.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Question No. 820—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1975, what amount was spent on studies related to marijuana by the Department of Employment and Immigration?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): None.

CANADA PENSION PLAN FUND—LOANS

Question No. 894—Mr. Cossitt:

1. (a) What is a list of all loans made from the Canada Pension Plan Fund in each of the past five years (b) what is the total for the five years (c) in each case, to whom was the loan made, what was the interest rate and how did it differ from the average interest rate in existence at the time?

2. Is it, or has it been, the policy of the government to allow borrowing from the fund at interest rates much lower than in the private market?

Hon. Pierre Bussières, Minister of State (Finance): 1. The information sought by the hon. member is equally accessible to him, being reported annually in the Public Accounts of Canada. Various investment dealers provide data on market yields of federal, provincial and corporate bonds.

2. Section 113 (2) of the Canada Pension Plan prescribes the interest to be paid on funds loaned from the Canada Pension Plan. The amount of interest received and the weighted average rates are reported in the Public Accounts of Canada.

AIR CARRIERS—ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 896—Mr. Howie:

Was a subsidy paid to air carriers operating in the Atlantic provinces in the fiscal year (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79 (c) 1979-80 and, if so, in what amount and to whom?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

(a) yes	Eastern Provincial Airways (1963) Limited $1,700,000
(b) yes	Eastern Provincial Airways (1963) Limited $1,700,000
(c) yes	Eastern Provincial Airways (1963) Limited $1,510,148

NOTE: Included in the above figures are amounts pertaining to services between Iles-de-la-Madeleine, P.Q. and Charlottetown, P.E.I.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Yvon Pinard (for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion) moved that Bill C-35, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege and the honour to represent the minister in the introduction of Bill C-35 this afternoon for second reading. As the parliamentary secretary, I wish to indicate in respect of Bill C-35 that I will be brief in my remarks as I know full well how pressed we are for time in this House. I also know that the act before us is not strange to most hon. members. It, therefore, needs little introduction on my part. However, I would like to explain why the government is seeking an extension to the Regional Development Incentives Act at this time.

While I suggested that most of you are familiar with the program of incentives to industry of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, applicable in the slow growth regions of Canada, I am equally sure many of you are less familiar with the fact that there is an expiry date to the legislation covering this program. Under the current legislation, assistance is limited to projects which go into commercial production by December 31, 1981. The fact that the current legislation will expire in 18 months, unless we do something about it, is already having an adverse effect on DREE's industrial incentives program.

Large scale projects take time to develop, time to plan, as they involve millions of dollars, time to build facilities and time to reach commercial production. We are running out of time. DREE officials already are having to reject applications because proposed projects will not come into production by the end of the year 1981. I need not tell any of my colleagues in this House what this means to those parts of Canada where this development would have taken place. These areas of our country need the kind of industrial development this program has brought about. That is why you are being asked to extend the Regional Development Incentives Act for five years.

In the past ten years the industrial incentives program has generated more than $2 billion of development by private enterprise, and is expected to generate another $2 billion from projects still under way. Some $4.3 billion worth of development has been brought about, or will occur, through $800 million in federal government incentives.

With these incentives the Government of Canada has brought investment dollars to those parts of the country where they are really needed. And, probably more importantly, we have created jobs with these incentives. Almost 150,000 actual or projected long-term jobs can be attributed to projects supported by DREE's industrial incentives program. That is to say nothing of the many thousand of jobs indirectly created or maintained which, while they cannot be calculated, are nevertheless equally real.

This legislation cannot wait until the comprehensive review of DREE is completed and a legislative package can be placed before the House for consideration. As I said earlier, we cannot wait until then. The new DREE legislation may be introduced some time in the autumn of this year. I can tell hon. members that the minister and the ministry are working diligently to fine tune with precision the new legislative program and that we will all have an opportunity to debate the proposed legislation for the over-all operation of DREE when it is introduced.

However, with respect to Bill C-35, we have a successful program with proven effectiveness, but unless we act swiftly, it will quickly cease to be so. The reason that it is necessary to extend the act for five years can be briefly explained by illustrating some of the requirements. As I mentioned earlier, the planning of a project, including a feasibility analysis and location studies, can take one year or two. Construction of the plants and installation of the equipment can take another 18 months to two years. Add to this a further three or four months of running until commercial production is reached, and I am sure that all hon. members will agree with the reasons for which we are requesting an extension of time.

The passage of the amendment to the Regional Development Incentives Act which is before us at this time will permit the continuation of a program that is a powerful weapon in the government's arsenal for the fight against regional disparity. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I know from my work with the department how effective the regional development incentives program has been in promoting regional development in those parts of Canada where it is most needed.

As a representative in this House of one of these areas, I know from first-hand experience the impact this program can and does have. I have seen that it does help to create job opportunities and encourage capital investment. In my province of New Brunswick alone, more than 10,000 jobs can be directly related to RDIP assisted projects. In addition, the program has generated investments of almost $290 million, investments by private industry which can help maintain the viability of our communities. This last point is an important one to me: this program has meant that there are both jobs and economic development where they are needed, at home. People do not have to go down the road to some industrial metropolis to find work.

Regional development and the reduction of economic and social disparities are the goals of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Through the regional development incentives program and the cost-shared, federal-provincial activities under the general development agreement, as well as other programs, DREE is working to meet these objectives.

The regional development incentives program is, as I have said, but one of the instruments at DREE's disposal for fighting regional disparities. However, it is an important one, for through it the department can work directly with private enterprise and promote development which can have meaningful results for the millions of Canadians living in those parts of the country that are designated as requiring special assistance—meaningful results such as those I mentioned when I spoke of the program's achievements in my home province of New Brunswick.

These kinds of results can be seen all across our country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In the Atlantic region more than 29,000 jobs are expected from the RDIP assisted projects with investments totalling almost $790 million. In Quebec 85,000 jobs and investments of $2.3 billion have been created. In northern Ontario, almost 12,000 jobs have been created with investments of $468 million. In western Canada and the north there have been almost 25,000 jobs created with investments of $815 million. Altogether, more than 150,000 jobs have been created and $4.3 billion has been invested by private industry. These are jobs and industrial development in those parts of Canada where it really matters, its regions. Strengthened regions mean a stronger Canada.

Too often we forget that regional development programs must be seen in broad terms. The whole country benefits when Canada is made stronger through its regions. It is to this strengthening of Canada's economic base in those areas where it is needed that DREE's industrial incentives program is dedicated. Together, they form DREE's regional development incentives program, a program which has, in my opinion, a remarkable success record. Some 90 per cent of the projects undertaken through the program are successfully completed. To me this shows a good use of taxpayers' dollars.

In the past ten years some 6,000 projects have been assisted under the regional development incentives program. These are projects in a wide variety of industrial sectors, ranging from the food industry to textiles and clothing, from fish processing to metal fabricating, and from the chemical industry to the furniture industry. More than 80 per cent of these projects have been with small businesses, businesses that needed financial assistance in the form most often provided by the program. These grants provided funding when it was most needed and helped many worth-while projects get off the ground.

In many cases these projects did more than merely get off the ground; they achieved results that were even better than first projected. I have already indicated that more than 80 per cent of the projects have involved investment costs of less than $2 million or 100 jobs. These are projects which are approved locally and which are often initiated by local entrepreneurs. In western Canada one will find that this program has had the same effect. I think that all hon. members will clearly agree that this is a program which is attuned to regional needs and designated to attract successful and viable industries, that it is administered by people who are good judges of the kinds of projects which will be successful.

However, I am sure that these people will be the first ones to agree the DREE cannot rest on its present performance to date, albeit a department which is celebrating its tenth anniversary as a department this year. In order for the regional development incentives program to be as effective as possible, it will be necessary for DREE to work even more closely with industry and tailor its programs to those industries which have not been attracted by the program to Canada's slow growth regions. Increased flexibility and a more active approach will, no doubt, be essential considerations for the minister as he puts together the broader department-wide legislative package he proposes to place before the House at a later date.

As hon. members know, the minister recently tabled regional objective working papers in the standing committee and, indeed, has commenced in a very serious way the preparation of the broader legislative package to introduce to this House which I referred to earlier. However, today we must consider the amendment to the Regional Development Incentives Act which is before us. As it has been said, we cannot wait for the introduction of the proposed legislation. In order for the regional development incentives program to continue its contribution to reducing regional disparities, we must act now.

I would like to point out to the House a number of factors which should permit DREE's industrial incentive program to be especially effective at this time. These are: one, the increased climate of stability in Canada; two, the edge in foreign markets provided by the value of the Canadian dollar; three, the availability of Canada's energy and natural resources; four, the improvement of Canada's labour force in terms of its skills and expertise; and five, the spill-over expected from major undertakings in the 1980s in various parts of Canada in energy and resource development, aircraft and electronics, and so on.

Furthermore, given the construction periods required, some of the projects funded under RDIA will be coming into commercial production just in time to take advantage of the economic recovery and growth in demand forecast for the world market. As a consequence, Mr. Speaker, Canada has some very attractive opportunities to put before entrepreneurs from both inside our borders and beyond. Mr. Speaker, I would therefore ask this House to give its wholehearted support to Bill C-35. The speedy passage of this amendment will permit the government to continue a program which is making a very real and worth-while contribution to the reduction of economic and social disparities in Canada today.

With the help of each and every member of this assembly—each working as a minister of regional economic expansion in his or her own constituency—we will be able to make this country of ours a better place to live and a better place to work, no matter what part of Canada we call home.

I should like to conclude by expressing our appreciation for the co-operation of members in committee as well as their consideration of and support for passage of this amendment, the much needed time increase set out in Bill C-35.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have the distinct pleasure, albeit unexpected, of responding to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Harquail) in regard to the passage of this bill. I should like to say to the parliamentary secretary at the outset that, as far as we are concerned, we have no objection to co-operating so that the legislation may be handled expeditiously.

I think we should take this opportunity, however, to reflect briefly on some of the things that must be done fairly soon in more comprehensive legislation in order to revise the concept of regional economic development in this country.

As the parliamentary secretary said, the department was created about ten years ago. Sad to say, in the intervening decade, although the department has accomplished much, there is a great deal it has not been able to do. It would appear that it has gone from what was a very high priority and expansionary type of department to what is now becoming an "also ran".

I think the minister appreciates, as I did, that there is an enormous amount of failure in co-ordination between this department, which is by its nature horizontal and crosses the efforts of many line departments, and other departments which could do so much to help DREE in a common purpose to develop parts of this country that have steadily been falling farther behind.

When the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was created, a greater proportion of its effort and funding was targeted toward Atlantic Canada than is the case today. As I understand it, about 53 per cent of its budget was allocated to Atlantic Canada ten years ago; today about 37 per cent of its budget is targeted to that region.

Another phenomenon that has occurred, of course, is that in the western part of our country an enormous expansion has been taking place in some provinces. This is something about which we all rejoice, but it has made it very difficult to continue to target on the traditional role of DREE, which has been one of equalizing the standard of living.

When a province like Alberta makes such enormous progress that it becomes, in effect, a miniature Saudi Arabia in our country, it is then difficult to say realistically that Nova Scotia, for example, will have a comparable standard of living through the efforts of a department such as DREE. What DREE must do is try to lessen the tremendous dependence of parts of this country on transfer and equalization payments.

The phenomenon is that as the DREE budget has fallen proportionately, and therefore so has its capacity to develop the economies of the regions of the country that need their economies developed, there has been a great increase in transfer payments. In other words, there has been a far greater emphasis by this government on distributing the wealth of the country than there has been on trying to create the wealth which must be distributed.

I mentioned that factor in a speech I made not long ago so I do not want to chew my cabbage twice, as they say. But I do want to emphasize, however, that there should be greater co-operation between line departments and DREE if we are to accomplish anything; I am sure that the parliamentary secretary and the minister would agree with this. We tried to promote this approach in our government and I believe that the present minister intends to continue the thrust.

I want to repeat the point that I made earlier but make it more specific. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is one of those line departments that is doing the least to expend its resources in a co-operative way—in Atlantic Canada, for example—to help DREE accomplish some of the things that all members of this House want to see done.

I have done some research since last week—and I stand to be corrected if my figures are not correct—which appears to show that through the enterprise development program, EDP, in fiscal 1979 the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce only allocated 0.66 per cent of its budget, an amount of $1.4 million, to promote industry in the Atlantic region. For 1980 this has been raised to about 5.3 per cent of its budget, or over $12 million. I hope that the minister will continue this trend with particular emphasis on IT and C.

I should like to share with the House an example of the lack of co-operation that is particularly noticeable to me because it occurred in my constituency. The Electrohome enterprise which took over a building in my constituency got into difficulty. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion very properly tried to recover a substantial amount of money, while at the same time the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, through the EDP, was trying to straighten out the company. One department concerned with promoting economic development was in conflict with another department that really had the same objective. They were fighting over who was going to get money and who was going to reorganize the company, when there should not have been a problem at all. As a matter of fact we were able to work out a satisfactory arrangement which, to the best of my knowledge, still exists.

Agriculture is another area of concern. I hope the minister will look into matters and see what can be done with the PFRA program in western Canada. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) is an expert on PFRA. At the Standing Committee on Regional Development in the last session of Parliament he and other members were designated to look into the question of whether PFRA should remain with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or whether it should come under the Department of Agriculture and, if this were the case, whether the program could be extended right across the country.

Atlantic Canada at one time had a similar program called the Maritimes Marshland Rehabilitation Act. I am sure the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) and other members from New Brunswick would remember very well the good work once done by that program, but somehow or other it was discontinued. While the problems in Atlantic Canada are different, generally having more emphasis on drainage and rehabilitation of marshland as opposed to relieving drought as in western Canada, help is nonetheless required.

I hope that when considering more comprehensive legislation—this is only an interim measure—the minister will continue this study and will consult the hon. member for Medicine Hat and others to see whether something can be done to utilize DREE or the Department of Agriculture, whichever is most appropriate, to extend the economic development stimulus into the area of agriculture as well.

One of the things that should be done in order to support DREE, apart from increasing its budget to some extent—not that we should give it more money than it can intelligently use, but there is certainly a need for an increased budget—would be to consider some fiscal and financial measures.

● (1230)

Again, I do not want to hearken back and say that we had the only answer. We thought we had something in our budget that was helpful to DREE, that is to say, a provision for a tax contract which could be used to supplement the existing DREE incentives. I still continue to believe that that is needed, and I hope the minister will continue to look at this option.

I suggest another thing that has to be done is to make more flexible the procedures involved for advancing money. It may well be under the changed economic circumstances that to withhold funds to the extent that they are now withheld from applicants, before they are finally paid upon reaching commercial production is no longer appropriate, and that there should be more front-end money advanced sooner, particularly to small prospective industries or industries which do not have the cash flow and are seriously impeded by the lack of working capital.

In addition, there should be a hard look taken at the kind of special grants that are given to large corporations. Some of them have worked out very well, such as the one to Michelin in Nova Scotia. Others have not. But it makes far more sense to me to allow large profitable enterprises who have cash flow and who are able to finance, by definition, their own expansion, to make funds available through tax concessions after the fact so that taxpayers only pay for what they get, rather than passing money out to large corporations in an attempt to induce them to do what in some cases they were about to do in any event.

There is quite a paradox involved in regional economic expansion. Sometimes the industries who receive grants will only line up to get the grants simply because they are there and because their competitors got them. This is why I believe that if more provision were made to make certain that corporations having undertaken marketing studies, and all of the other details they need, decide on their own to go ahead with these particular projects, then let them finance their expansions by means of income tax concessions, and do not induce them to line up just for the sake of getting the grants because their competitors happen to get them.

There are many improvements which the minister knows have to be negotiated and brought this House. One of the problems, however, is that in a bill such as this, as is the case with the Bank Act, the more we delay passage of legislation by putting forward suggestions and prospective amendments, the more we hinder some of the things that have to be done.

I am happy that the minister brought this bill in at this time, but I am not too happy that he saw fit to put a five-year period on the time he indicated that it should be extended. I would have thought it better to say a period of three years which would be, by definition, within the period that this Parliament would last, and which would in effect be an added incentive to go ahead and bring forward the kind of comprehensive legislation that we are assured will be brought forward. If this is not done, we will get into the situation in which we now find ourselves with respect to the Bank Act. It becomes an exercise in absurdity whereby we cannot seem to come to grips with doing something that has to be done within legislative timeframe and we have to keep on changing and extending measures. I sincerely hope that that will not happen with respect to the regional development legislation. This will be coming forward I trust, according to the parliamentary secretary, in a reasonably short time. I hope he will be able to give us his undertaking, or a reasonable assurance, that this legislation, which I know the Department of Justice has been working on for some time, will come forward into the House in the fall so that we can go into much greater detail in considering and bringing in appropriate amendments as well as discussing it in committee.

In the meantime, through the parliamentary secretary I want to wish the minister every success in trying to impress upon his colleagues in the departments of Fisheries and Oceans, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Transport and many other departments that what he needs is not competition from them for the DREE budget. He does not need them to be making demands on him for funds to relocate rails or to build airports, which should be the responsibility of the Department of Transport. What he really needs is an indication from them that they are prepared to set aside some of their own budgets and work more closely with him. Therefore, when there is a project that requires joint effort by departments, they will be there contributing, not simply taking advantage of DREE's position to say that it is up to DREE, or let DREE do it. Nor do we want to hear it said that, while they have their own empires, after all, DREE is charged with economic development; that even if they do not have enough money, it is DREE's responsibility and let DREE do it.

The minister knows the problem. I hope that he will get the kind of co-operation and good will that accrued to me from my cabinet colleagues. On that basis I will watch with a great deal of interest and a lot of good will what is going on in this very important department.

I hope that in the not too distant future all members of this House will be able to join in a more detailed and extensive debate over this important aspect of developing our country.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to say a few words in this debate. However, I want to say at the outset that I am not the critic for our party when it comes to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Our critic is the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy), who is in western Canada today and has been doing a very good job of watching the department's activities over the last few months.

I was very happy to hear the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), the former minister in the Conservative government, say that he will oppose the five-year extension and that he would sooner see a three-year extension. Our critic, the hon. member for Churchill, has suggested a two-year extension, which is in the same ball park. This would put the incentive on this Parliament to come up with some major revisions to the act, rather than passing it on to some other Parliament five or more years down the road. I want to say that both parties on this side of the House support that intent. I hope the government will take that under advisement and perhaps amend the legislation when it is before the parliamentary committee relevant to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

At a time like this we should look at some of the successes and failures of DREE. I want to go back to 1968 when I was first elected to serve here. I think that since then, 12 years ago, we have seen possibly two major economic innovations by the government which sits across the way. One of them was PetroCan, the establishment of a publicly-owned oil company. The second structural innovation was the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which was established to alleviate some of the inequities in this country. I believe that to be very important.

Like other members in this House, I am very concerned about the future of Canada, about the constitutional talks that are now taking place and about future economic and social development plans. One thing that is imperative is that all regions of this country feel equal, that they have equal opportunities to develop and that one region will not be favoured over another. I think there should be co-operation among all the regions and that the basic philosophy of equality be supreme. In my opinion, this department can go a long way in trying to meet some of those objectives that we have as Canadians.

The particular act that we are talking about today, the Regional Development Incentives Act, is really the program that hands out forms of grants and loans and guarantees to business and to industry which is willing to establish, to expand or modernize facilities in certain designated regions of the country.

Let us take a look at that. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was created some 11 years ago. Since its inception, the proportion of the national budget allocated to DREE has declined from 2.1 per cent in 1970-71 to 1.1 per cent in 1977-78. This is a drop of 52 per cent in the national budget in that seven-year period. The proportion of the department's budget in Atlantic Canada, the region that needs more assistance than any other, has dropped by 42 per cent in that same period of time. Not only has the budget gone down by 52 per cent over seven years, but with what little money is available, the amount in the Atlantic provinces has dropped by 42 per cent.

No wonder the minister got up in this House and did something I have never seen in my 12 years in Parliament. He made a public plea to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to Treasury Board and to other ministers of the cabinet to provide more money for his department because it does not have the funds it needs in order to alleviate some of the regional inequities that are so apparent today.

I want to look at some of those regional inequities. In many areas they have increased rather than lessened in the past ten years.

[Translation]

For instance, from 1968 to 1978, the four Atlantic provinces, which represent 10 per cent of the total Canadian population, benefited from only 6.1 per cent of new investments in the country, and only 6.6 per cent of all new jobs. The rate of unemployment in the four Atlantic provinces is 37.5 per cent higher than the average rate for Canada. The same goes for the province of Quebec. Quebeckers represent 27 per cent of the Canadian population but, between 1968 and 1978, they got only 18.1 per cent of all new jobs in Canada and only 22 per cent of new investments. In Quebec, the unemployment rate is much higher than the average Canadian rate. The rate in Quebec is 34.4 per cent higher than the average for Canada.

[English]

As can be seen from some of those figures, there is still a tremendous amount of inequity in this country. In the last ten years, for example, the unemployment rate in Canada has increased by 72 per cent. However, in the Atlantic provinces it went up by 161 per cent. The cost of electricity in Nova Scotia is 50 per cent higher than the Canadian average. All of this has occurred despite the fact that we have a department that is supposed to be lessening the inequities between one region and another. Therefore, when looking at an act of this sort we have to question whether it and the department are doing all that can be done or whether there are some other tools we can use to lessen regional grievances in this country.

Statistics released by DREE at the standing committee this week showed that large DREE expenditures are creating proportionally fewer jobs than small expenditures. The hon. member from Nova Scotia who spoke for the Conservatives questioned the wisdom of some of the grants given to large corporations. I want to reinforce that assertion and the fear and concern that he has.

Projects with the largest approved capital costs create only marginally more jobs than those with the smallest approved capital costs. In 1978-79, 4,680 direct jobs were created with an expenditure of $21.5 million on the smallest approved capital cost projects. During the same period, 4,690 direct jobs were created with an expenditure of $72.3 million in the largest approved capital cost group. Therefore, only 10 more jobs were created by the larger companies despite the fact they received an extra $50.8 million.

This is the figure we should look at. This is the reason I do not want the act extended for another five years. My impression is that what is happening is not right. It is not creating enough jobs in the areas it should. When you spend three and a half times more money to create only ten more jobs, something is wrong.

There are a number of other items which should be looked at. When you see statistics like that, you wonder whether the Regional Development Incentives Act and the program that gives grants, and so on, to companies to establish in a certain area is in many ways a glorified Santa Claus handing out gifts and financial rewards to companies to locate in a particular area. It hands out a lot of carrots. Maybe it is the carrot act. Once the incentives are gone, the company is not going to expand. Perhaps the company will withdraw, move its plant elsewhere and expand because it is more profitable.

We cannot have a Department of Regional Economic Expansion in isolation. There are other government programs. We need structural changes in this country. For example, freight rates discriminate more in the Atlantic provinces than in southern Ontario. Therefore, it is more expensive to establish a plant in the Atlantic provinces. Even though you give large concessions and grants to people to establish an enterprise there, it still may not compensate for the freight rate inequities.

We have a tariff structure that has protected central Canada more than some other regions, such as the Atlantic provinces. As I said previously, energy costs are very high in the Atlantic provinces, much higher than the Canadian average. If the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is to really have an impact, there has to be an over-all, co-ordinated government policy or plan to ensure that the Atlantic provinces, parts of Quebec and other parts of the country that need DREE moneys do not get them in one hand while through other programs they are losing more than they receive from DREE.

I think of the Export Development Corporation which we debate in this House from time to time. It gives out all kinds of money to Canadian corporations as insurance when they are investing or selling abroad in Africa, Asia or South America. It so happens that the majority of these companies are located in the wealthier areas of Canada which get money from the Export Development Corporation. That again tips the balance away from the effect that DREE is having in some of the lesser developed areas.

The minister in charge of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion needs more clout. He needs more power to plan the economy of this country to ensure that the have-not regions get their fair share and the have regions do not get as much as they do today.

These are some of the matters that concern me. I say to the parliamentary secretary and the minister that for these reasons we want to see this bill go to committee where we will have an opportunity to ask questions, get more information and try to persuade the minister and his officials to extend this bill by only two years instead of five.

Another idea I want to throw out today is that when the government are handing out tens of millions of dollars, and not just under DREE but under various government programs, it would be appropriate to take equity in the company for the amount we are investing in that company. If we are giving taxpayers' money to a private company, it seems appropriate to take a proportionate equity equivalent to the investment. Perhaps that can be considered by the minister as we go to committee stage and back to the House for third reading.

That is really all I want to say today. This is a very important department and it is doing some good work, but this is one of the programs of the department that we question. We question whether so much money should be given to the larger companies that are not creating as many jobs as smaller companies in proportion to the funds they receive. We also put questions to the government as a whole urging them to plan their other departments so that they would be complementary instead of contradictory, and help the Department of Regional Economic Expansion instead of hinder it.

If we can bring the standard of living and the standard of development in the Atlantic provinces, in the north and in other regions up toward the national average or even above the national average, we would perhaps be doing more to unify the country in the years ahead than anything else the House could do.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-35, to extend the Regional Development Incentives Act for an additional five-year period. The parliamentary secretary has mentioned the number of jobs which have been created under this act in the last 10 years—some 150,000 across the country with an accompanying investment of roughly $3 billion. Those of us who were here when the original bill was passed and when the department was created have seen a number of successes and a number of disappointments in the department, and I believe the review which the minister is carrying out at the present time and the legislation he is proposing for later this year will be welcomed with a great deal of anticipation and interest, especially among those of us who come from slow-growth areas.

Certainly, the Regional Development Incentives Act, although not completely successful in all parts of the country in terms of diversifying and widening their economies, has been a very constructive instrument for regional development. I think of the number of new industries and plants which have located in the Algoma-Manitoulin area which I represent. It is hard to know whether we would have been successful in securing many of those industries without the help of this legislation.

We have one of the largest sawmill operations in northern Ontario capable of producing 100 million board feet of lumber a year, and I understand there are plans to increase output to 150 million board feet of lumber a year. This is really a very large operation and the project got started through assistance from the Regional Development Incentives Act. Of course, a large number of other projects have been established, including a veneer mill, a barrel factory related to our mining industry, concrete manufacturing plants, meat-packing plants, a fish processing plant, sawmills, bakeries and so on, industries which have benefited directly from the existing legislation. Without this kind of incentive and determination on the part of the government to assist these industries, many of them would not have located in the north.

The one thing we have really learned from this legislation is that, even on the basis of very strong financial incentives, it is still incredibly difficult to persuade industries to locate in the slow-growth areas; they seem to want to locate within a few miles of their markets, so naturally they try to locate near the large metropolitan areas. To draw them away from that natural desire requires a very strong incentive. One condition of success often appears to be principals who, for one reason or another, are interested in the north, or interested in one of the slow-growth areas as well as benefiting from the incentives. There usually has to be some natural advantage—good transportation, the location of the resource close by or other favourable factors in addition to the incentive provided by legislation.

I hope that during the next few weeks the minister will give priority to reviewing the proposal to establish a new rural development agreement for northern Ontario with the provincial government. This agreement has been awaiting action for the past year during two changes of government and it is urgent that it should be signed now. It involves a relatively modest demand on the public treasury, yet its impact on literally dozens of rural communities will be very great. So I hope the minister will move ahead to sign that agreement because, as I say, its impact on rural communities will be very great in terms of economic development affecting the agricultural sector, small forestry and woodlot operations, small mining operations, Indian bands, the tourist industry and developments related thereto.

It is terribly important in fashioning rural development policies that we should not only use incentives such as the act we are being asked to extend today, but that government policy come down squarely on the side of locating industries in slow-growth areas. In this context I think of the decision by the federal government a few weeks ago to establish the Eldorado uranium refinery in the Algoma district close to the source of uranium there. This decision flowed from a policy commitment made by the Liberal party during the general election to process energy resources close to the source of supply. For us, it meant processing uranium and the refining of uranium in the Algoma district. For people in western Canada it would mean seeing the future development of the petrochemical industry located in Alberta and Saskatchewan and those parts of the country where the petroleum and natural gas reserves are to be found. Ultimately, of course, if the finds off Sable Island and the east coast offshore of Newfoundland are successful, it would mean the same there.

This is a policy which, in a conceptual way, I believe most Canadians support, though when one gets down to the nitty-gritty of moving a refinery from one part of the country to another it is more difficult to get unanimous support. But a policy decision of that kind, set out ahead of time, has a great impact and would save millions of dollars in the avoidance of push-pull from various communities. It is most important there should be a policy decision of that kind taken well in advance of major Crown corporation decisions as to the location of processing industries.

I want to compliment the government on the pulp and paper industry agreement in Ontario. There is no doubt that this agreement is resulting in major revitalization and retooling of the pulp and paper industry. In my own constituency in Espanola and Sault Ste. Marie, it is resulting in a major redevelopment of the entire industry. In the case of Espanola, something like $25 million in incentive grants is involved in a major effort to modernize and improve the environmental facilities as part of a capital investment of around $225 million. The result will be a much more modern and environmentally acceptable operation.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m. this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the House interrupted its proceedings at one o'clock, the motion for second reading of Bill C-35, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, was before the House, and the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) had the floor.

[English]

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned at the lunch break our consideration of Bill C-35, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, I was speaking about the importance to northern Ontario of the pulp and paper industry agreements with the province of Ontario which will be so instrumental in ensuring the long-term viability of this industry, let alone the improvements to the environmental operation of this very important industry. It employs some 30 per cent or 32 per cent of the people in northeastern Ontario engaged in the manufacturing and processing sector. However, companion to that agreement is the arrangement for a forest management agreement, which is providing improved access, renewal of our forest resources and building up access to forest management areas.

Combined with that I think is an important program which is being implemented at the present time by the provincial government to have the pulp and paper companies carry out much of their own reforestation, and surely that can be done more efficiently that way because there is nobody with a greater incentive to see the forest management areas reforested than the pulp and paper companies themselves.

In the case of the example, which I quoted before lunch, of the Eddy forest products plant in Espanola, it is expanding its capacity from 700 tons a day to close to 1,000 tons a day, so that it has the incentive to ensure the long-term viability of its forest reserves. Those three things go hand in hand. Through its agreements the federal government is rightly involved in two of them which are very important to northern Ontario.

I have been encouraging the establishment of a program in two rural areas of Algoma-Manitoulin. I am referring to the local economic development assistance program of the Department of Employment and Immigration. That department will be providing funding for some 18 local projects across the country. It will set up local economic development corporations to provide funding for administration assistance for researching, new industries locating in the area and new economic opportunities. Also it will provide funding for equity investment and loans of assistance as an incentive to industries wanting to locate in slow-growth areas.

Some experimental projects have been very successful in the United States in such areas as Kentucky and others with slow-growth problems such as those faced in northern Ontario. It will be interesting to see how successful this approach will be during the next few years. Certainly the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) favours local involvement and initiative in creating, developing and exploiting local economic opportunities.

Earlier this morning I mentioned the importance of policy decisions in ensuring that we direct to slow-growth areas industries which have a natural affinity or advantage in locating in what are often resource areas. It is important to clear the way through the DREE program, which has been done in many areas, by providing assistance in infrastructure. I am thinking of a number of communities in eastern Canada and northern Ontario where assistance has been provided for major sewage and water treatment facilities or industrial parks where local communities had an opportunity to move ahead with economic development but did not have the wherewithal to do it.

Surely Sault Ste. Marie, at this juncture in its development, has reached the total capacity that existing sewer and water treatment facilities can accommodate. The community does not have the financial wherewithal to expand those, so there must be assistance from the federal and provincial governments. It seems to me the natural way to do that is through a federal-provincial subsidiary agreement under DREE. That will make it possible for the community to expand in terms of new industry and residential accommodation.

In that case the preliminary estimates show a cost of something like $26 million for the required facilities. The proposal has been before the federal and provincial governments for the past year or almost that long. The proposal is that some $18 million would be shared equally between the two senior levels of government and some $7 million would be contributed by the city. If we want to see industrial activity taking place there, we must assist in providing the infrastructure for massive facilities in order to have facilities not only for industries to utilize but also the residential part of the community, let alone the need for industrial parks which often is essential if new industry is to be attracted to a community of that type. The community has a natural advantage in that many people want to live there. It is the right size of city. It has many recreational and other aspects which people are looking for today, but it requires assistance for infrastructure.

I want to indicate my support for this bill. I am sympathetic to the need to amend the bill in a more substantial way to make it more flexible in the future, as other members have mentioned.

The parliamentary secretary, speaking on behalf of the minister, mentioned the review which is taking place and the plan to put more extensive legislation before this House later this year or early next year. I hope we will have that flexibility because sometimes industries want to locate in slow-growth areas and the present act does not have the flexibility to provide assistance in that regard. I like the concept of a previous bill relating to tax incentives for industries to locate in slow-growth areas. Unfortunately that tax bill the former government had before the House did not apply to northern Ontario. It was recommended by the present minister for DREE to the then minister responsible for regional economic expansion in the standing committee last fall. If a bill of that nature is brought before the House again, certainly I hope it will provide that incentive for industries in northern Ontario.

I indicate my support of this bill to extend the Regional Development Incentives Act. Surely a program which has created some 12,000 new jobs in northern Ontario, resulting in some $468 million of investment to that part of the country, is very important and deserves our support.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we are debating Bill C-35 to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act. I received a copy of the speaking notes of the parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible for DREE. He said that the minister will be speaking later on this afternoon. There are a number of questions I want to pose to the minister to clear up a lot of the confusion he and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) have caused by their statements about DREE funds now being available for rail relocation in Winnipeg. This is a totally new concept. There have been a number of conflicting statements as to how and when they will be able to obtain this funding. I hope the minister will clear up that matter when he speaks on this bill.

The Ministry of Transport indicated that it will have no funds for rail relocation other than the UTAP funds provided to each province. When the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) questioned the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) last May regarding funding for rail relocation in Winnipeg, the President of the Treasury Board made it perfectly clear that he would be providing no funding whatsoever for rail relocation and that the moneys would have to come from some other minister's envelope. If the city of Winnipeg conducts a study on rail relocation and rehabilitation in the downtown area of that city and applies for DREE funds, what guarantee will they receive from the government as to which minister will provide funds out of his envelope? Will he have $10 million or $15 million in his envelope to hand out to the city of Winnipeg? That is a totally new concept, and we are entitled to some kind of explanation.

To further confuse the issue, on May 2 the minister for DREE said he had barely enough money to meet his existing commitments. We want to know whether the President of the Treasury Board is going to provide him with any additional funding, because if he is having trouble now, how are we going to get funds out of this supposed new formula for rail relocation or rehabilitation in downtown Winnipeg? The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has already made it perfectly clear to me when I questioned him on this funding for rail relocation in Winnipeg that he could not give me any assurance at all that he would be providing funding for rail relocation. That is why we want the minister for DREE to explain this new formula in detail.

There is no point in the city of Winnipeg, the province of Manitoba, or any other body, spending a lot of time and money on a study for rail relocation or rehabilitation when there is absolutely no guarantee from any minister that there will be $5 million or $10 million saved from an envelope for Winnipeg at any given time.

To further confuse the situation, on June 2 the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) stated, as reported at page 1627 of Hansard:

—the government as a whole is offering the province of Manitoba funds otherwise available, from DREE particularly, in order to effect the relocation program.

The government as a whole is going to provide these funds. I am just not clear in my mind whether, when the study is completed and an application is made for the money to the federal government, the money will be available immediately, or whether the city and the province will have to wait a year or two until the minister gets a little more money in his envelope. These are the things the minister should clear up for us.

I have had a series of starred questions on the order paper since May 12 in an effort to clear up some of the confusion. I have asked that these questions be answered but the government is stalling, causing further suspicion.

Just to give the House an idea of what I am trying to find out from the government about this new formula, let me read one of my questions as follows:

What was the rationale used by the government when it arrived at the "5 million a year for five years" formula suggested by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in the House on May 7, 1980, and what escalation formula will be adopted to allow for inflation over the five-year period?

Once we get this formula established and a guarantee that the moneys will be available, we will then know what we are talking about. Because some cities have spent a lot of time and money carrying out studies.

Another of my questions is as follows:

Would the DREE grant be made available under the condition that the full Winnipeg rail relocation project is adopted?

That is something the city of Winnipeg as well as the province will have to know.

Another of my starred questions is:

Would the DREE grant be made available under the condition that the Winnipeg grade separation project is adopted?

That is something else we will have to know, because it takes time and money for the city and province to do these studies initially.

I think what is of concern to most members in the House is whether DREE funds will be taken from Nova Scotia, Newfoundland or British Columbia for this rail relocation. Surely they are entitled to an explanation too.

My starred question No. 12 is:

Will the funds for the CPR rail relocation in Winnipeg be diverted from (a) provincial (b) federal DREE programs and, if so, from which programs?

We want to know if these funds are to be supplied by cutting into other projects which are being planned in any of the provinces.

On June 2 in Winnipeg the minister for DREE and the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), the Minister of Employment and Immigration, held a press conference to announce this new formula. The Minister for Employment and Immigration stated that:

A federal promise of $50 to $60 million for inner city revitalization in Winnipeg is "new money", not a smokescreen for Ottawa's failure to commit money for rail relocation—

I hope the minister for DREE will be able to remove the smokescreen that exists right now by informing us where this $50 million to $60 million is to come from and at what time it will be available. I hope he will tell us what the time lapse will be between the time the city of Winnipeg and the province apply and receipt of the money. This is the sort of thing we want to find out. We have been led down the garden path before and that has cost the city of Winnipeg an additional $2 million cost overrun, because of delays caused by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry and the federal government in carrying out a study on rail relocation. They did not come up with the money, and I suggest once bitten, twice shy.

The minister went on to say in Winnipeg:

—neither he nor Department of Regional Economic Expansion minister Pierre DeBané was dictating priorities to the city, "and at this point we're the only level of government to put our money on the table."

That is what we want to clear up. Is the money on the table, and which federal government department has taken the money out of the envelope to put on the table for Winnipeg?

In that news release they went on to say:

The funding package, which will not be tapped until 1981, comes largely from DREE, and Mr. De Bané said the $25 million available for capital projects and $7 million for economic and social development would be over and above contributions already committed to Manitoba.

This statement has been challenged by officials in the minister's office. The Winnipeg Tribune reported on June 2:

However, an official in the minister's office said last month that DREE funding to the province had been scheduled to drop from $40 million to about $20 million in 1982.

As hon. members can see, there is further confusion along the line.

I mentioned earlier the delay of 14 to 15 months in the city of Winnipeg obtaining permit to build the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass at the CPR yards. This delay was due to the federal government insisting on another study. This cost the city of Winnipeg $2 million in cost overrun. The federal government is obligated to make up that $2 million, since the city of Winnipeg did not ask for a study or cause the delay. It asked for the permit about 15 months ago and it was stopped by the federal government. This cost overrun is a direct responsibility of the federal government because of the delaying tactics in which it indulged. I want it on record again this afternoon that there will be a formal application coming from the city calling for the federal government to reimburse the city for this $2 million cost overrun. I hope ministers are looking in their envelopes right now to find this $2 million in order to reimburse the city of Winnipeg.

This type of confusion and delaying tactic, calling for more studies, has caused nothing but confusion. The city of Winnipeg has co-operated over the years in these studies, but that has got it no place. There has been $1.1 million spent on studies for rail relocation. The city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba do not want any more money spent on studies in respect of applications for funds, particularly if we find that the money is not available.

When the minister gets on his feet to speak on this bill we want him to explain this envelope system and to tell us what kind of firm commitment he can make that the money will be available when the government receives an application. The province and the city are entitled to this explanation. I am sure hon. members will agree with me in this regard. This is the kind of firm commitment all of the provinces, not just Manitoba, will need. I hope the minister will go into some detail when he debates this matter, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure this afternoon in joining the debate on Bill C-35 to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act. Given the present economic situation in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and most particularly in eastern Canada where people are experiencing enormous difficulties, these subsidies will have a tremendous impact.

During the last few weeks, I heard the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), especially in committees, explain the openness he intends to show towards the committee members and also towards the other parties in the House. He mentioned his intention of acting outside the bounds of this House to get closer to the people and the various economic agents that we find in that environment. I could only but be pleased by such an attitude of openmindedness on the part of the minister.

Mr. Speaker, when one lives in peripheral areas, in remote centres where people find it difficult to be in daily contact with the different levels of government, and when one sees that in a particular department, beginning with the minister and on down the ladder through all the echelons of the administration, there is indeed a desire to get closer to the people by providing more information and ready access to the different systems of governments one finds cause for rejoicing.

This bill, which aims at extending the time limit for the provision of development incentives, is extremely important. I mentioned earlier a certain openness of mind and better communications with the population. In eastern Quebec, and especially in Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, we have witnessed a great experiment on the part of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which started with the desire of the minister to delegate a few officers to examine on site, with the people, the industrialists and the economic development officers, what type of development could be achieved through the department and what type of projects could benefit from the bill now under consideration.

After departmental officials returned from a three-day visit to the Magdalen Islands, they were able to pinpoint projects which would be eligible under the RDIA and would cost $8 million. As I said, Mr. Speaker, it is a good thing to go to the people, especially those in areas remote from centres like Quebec City, Montreal, St. John's, Halifax, or other major Canadian centres to explain what the government can do, because we can have very positive results since businessmen in these areas are aware of the various programs, but unfortunately they often do not know how they can apply or how to get through all the red tape to get what they want.

Admittedly, Mr. Speaker, we can only support the new policy that the minister wants to implement in his department, especially as concerns this bill since, because of this spirit of openness, our businessmen will be able to benefit from the programs placed at their disposal. Because of this experience which I mentioned in the Magdalen Islands, the minister during his last visit was able to announce incentives of $237,000 which will create 50 jobs within a small area. Mr. Speaker, this shows the importance of this bill and the importance of extending admissibility to this program for another five years. When we note that such a small amount will create 50 jobs, it is easy to imagine what we can achieve with grants of $1 million or $1.5 million in a region where unemployment reaches 40 per cent and sometimes 60 per cent. Indeed, this extension of five years will enable various industrialists to become more familiar with this legislation and to make applications which can promote economic development.

Also this morning I listened to my colleague from Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) refer to the role of DREE and the only way that department's role could be envisioned in relation to the others. I am in total agreement with his suggestions in that respect, and I could tell him that we are now proceeding on Magdalen Islands with an experiment that hopefully can illustrate what has been said on that subject.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that on June 8 last the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion announced on Magdalen Islands an economic priming program with a minimum $15 million funding. Clearly that can only be achieved with the co-operation of every federal department involved on the islands. I think we now have an opportunity for a pilot experiment to convince and show every other department of the federal government how DREE, in areas where there exist unthinkable and unacceptable rates of unemployment, could co-ordinate the work of all the various economic agents at the federal level.

We have DREE on the Magdalen Islands, and we will have the co-operation of the four departments directly involved, namely the Department of Fisheries and Oceans that account for 60 per cent of the livelihood of the people; the Department of Transport that is directly involved in air and marine transportation, which is the only raison d'être and the only possibility for the people to get out of the islands; the Department of Agriculture, through which we will be able to see what the possibilities are to try and reach self-sufficiency in certain crops; and finally, the Department of the Environment, which will have to look after the co-ordination of these various departments in order to protect the marine subsoil and the balance that should exist.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have five departments directly involved and they will have to work together to ensure a harmonious economic development on the Magdalen Islands. From the various comments we heard in the Magdalen Islands following the announcement by the minister, I think those people are truly determined to prove to the federal government that we can work in co-operation and that when it comes to economic development all departments can readily co-ordinate their efforts and succeed in reducing the rate of unemployment in our region of Quebec where, as I suggested earlier, we have at certain times of the year unacceptable rates of unemployment.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am sure our colleague from Central Nova, when in three or four years he can see the results we got with that endeavour and that pilot experiment we are doing on a piece of land which he knows very well and which is not very far from his own riding, will be able to see indeed the enormous efforts we made and how we succeeded in co-ordinating the actions of different federal departments to spur economic development.

Mr. Speaker, this leads me to relate the regional development incentives program to other agreements within the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I praised earlier the benefits of such agreements but I also believe the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should orient its policy in certain areas, as it has already done in the past, towards comprehensive agreements. Once again, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion proposed to the government of Quebec a comprehensive agreement for the development of eastern Quebec. I believe we have to go beyond the experience we had from 1968 to 1976 in this area where we managed to set up and put in place administrative structures, road and maritime infrastructures, and we need to go beyond that and a little further in the advancement of economic development.

Obviously, if the Quebec government decides—and I hope it will take this suggestion very seriously—to accept such an agreement, we in eastern Quebec will be really able to develop our economy and raise the standard of living in that area to the same level as in the rest of the country. We simply cannot hope to raise the standard of living of a region facing tremendous unemployment problems and where most jobs are seasonal and to reach a decent standard of living only through measures that may be good but that are too often mere bandaids applied to chronic problems.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, we and the minister get tremendous support in that part of Quebec and again I hope that the government of the province of Quebec will respond to the desire of the people to conclude such an agreement. And again, to come back to the bill, as I said earlier the industrialists of that region who are facing tremendous difficulties are in favour of such legislation.

When you realize that at this time of the year people become aware of the importance of economic development, we should not penalize them by not passing a bill that would extend the program for at least five years. I talk about a five-year period. This morning I heard my colleagues suggest a shorter time period. I do not need to say, Mr. Speaker, that I fully agree on a five-year period because, as I said earlier, remoteness from large centres is a good reason to maintain that five-year period. Given the many administrative delays that those industrialists have to overcome to get their projects approved, that five-year period is not too long. When you consider the date of the application for a grant and the date of its approval you realize that there is a waiting period of 18 months to two years before a project is approved, so I do not believe that a five-year period is too long. This is why we should provide that time period for this bill.

Obviously, businessmen who rub shoulders with decision makers may think that five years is too long. But we must remember that those who live in isolated areas have to keep distances in mind and face other problems as well, so are not these incentives precisely aimed at helping Canadians who live in those areas? I think that was the initial aim of the program and that is why we want to keep those incentives and that five-year period.

There is another issue that I would like to touch upon, Mr. Speaker, and which is related to what I was mentioning earlier about the relationship between the various federal departments, and that is that DREE should play the role it was created for as far as the other departments are concerned. In those regions, and I will never say it often enough, where disparities exist, the regulations and legislation administered by most departments, and which are made at a national level, can hardly be applied, or if they are it is not in the interest of the local population. So why could the Department of Regional Economic Expansion not serve as some kind of bridge for national legislation in order to correct these inequalities? For example, in the field of transportation, every user of an airport must pay the rental cost of the space used, but how can an airline do this in areas like the Gaspé peninsula, the lower north shore in northeast New Brunswick where passenger traffic is certainly not as heavy as in Montreal, Quebec City, Toronto or Winnipeg? How can the users absorb in their costs that price difference? Now why should the Department of Regional Economic Expansion not be used specifically to bridge that gap?

That, Mr. Speaker, is a real problem of regional disparity and the department should indeed be used to help solve it. Knowing that the minister is broadminded and that he would like to alleviate regional disparities, I am sure he will find out how he could act in co-operation with other departments to make up those deficits. Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that this bill is very important. I hope the three parties in the House will pass it as quickly as possible so that we can maintain that five-year period to enable industrialists in remote places to take advantage of the legislation in all fairness and obtain as much as possible for the economic development of our regions.

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-35. While all hon. members who have spoken on the bill so far have a disposition to move it along, that should not detract from the fundamental importance of the bill. It gives me some concern that it is being debated on a quiet Friday afternoon just before the long St. Jean Baptiste weekend when many members are absent, some of whom may have different thoughts about DREE. Questions have been raised in this House about DREE grants to industries in certain parts of the country. This is, therefore, a subject which deserves a very full and substantive debate, and in the circumstances that may not take place this afternoon.

It would appear that the treasury benches are contemplating a new bill and when that is presented it might present the best opportunity to discuss these measures.

I must say that I share the concern of several hon. members, including the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), the very distinguished former minister of this department, and also the member of the NDP who spoke earlier today. Both members questioned the five-year extension clause. We all know that syndrome—indeed, it might be called "parliamentary constipation". The Bank Act, for instance, is extended every five years or every ten years. We never review it; we just give it another year's boost.

I do not know how many members appreciate the fact that while DREE was created in 1969 the act has, in effect, already been extended for a five-year period. I think if the proposed extension were for two or three years, we would be forced to come to grips with some of the fundamental principles involved in the whole policy of DREE. As I said earlier, those principles are so fundamental to helping the regions of this country and/or giving balance to the central portion of the country—which feels a little threatened at times in view of the economic changes taking place in the world and in Canada—that this shorter intention would give members a chance to debate the philosophy behind DREE.

I think you were in the House, Mr. Speaker, when the first minister of DREE, Mr. Marchand, said—or perhaps it was said in the Speech from the Throne in 1969—that this was a bold new adventure. The actual quotation is "—a bold new instrument for combating regional disparities in Canada."

A strong effort has certainly been made in this direction and people in the department have sincerely tried to implement this policy. DREE is better than some departments in that its very composition is more decentralized than others that seem to "grow like Topsy" in Ottawa or in the central area of the country. In that sense DREE has a good history of trying to decentralize its staff, its officials and its operation to the areas most directly affected by its policy. That is a very positive matter.

Before I get into the substance of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I should perhaps first devote a short sentence or two—which might be highly provocative if certain members were in the House—to paying my respects to and congratulating the former minister, the hon. member for Central Nova, and the present minister, the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane (Mr. De Bané). In private discussions with the minister, both before and after his appointment, he indicated that he wants to carry on the good work started by the hon. member for Central Nova.

In particular, I single out those two members. I suppose I could have singled out others, but I single out those two because they were directly involved with the most recent announcement of substance from DREE. This involved the extension and grant to enable Michelin to set up a large operation and develop it in Nova Scotia. This plant just happens to be in my riding. It will have an immense and substantive effect on the economy of Atlantic Canada, Nova Scotia and particularly the Annapolis Valley. Therefore, for what it is worth—of course, words are free so perhaps they are not worth that much—I want to extend publicly my thanks to the ministers responsible for DREE, together with their provincial counterparts, for bringing to a conclusion an agreement which involved many sensitive cross currents in view of the many problems which this country faces.

Having said that, I would like to comment on the substance of the bill and talk about the whole question of regional disparity. I am not trying to diminish the philosophy which both governments would like to follow since this department has been established, but the fact is that while large grants of money have been directed, pumped in and sent under transfer payments to areas of regional economic disparity to help living standards and the rate of personal income, the actual reality is that in terms of changes in basic economic structures there has not been that change in the five provinces most affected by DREE, namely Quebec, the three Atlantic provinces and Manitoba.

Speaking of Atlantic Canada, there has not been that fundamental shift in the economic structure even with the massive inputs from transfer payments and other types of payments from the federal treasury. This is the reason why the whole subject matter of DREE policy should be debated either in this House or before the responsible committee. I suggest that to eliminate any conflict of interest that any member could have and yet still allow him to have input, now that we are ten years down the road from the inception and development of DREE, serious consideration should be given, even before the new bill is brought in, to opening up a forum to assess the whole philosophy of DREE in terms of the ten years' experience we have had. Therefore, there could be more solid guidelines formulated to point to the future in a new comprehensive bill.

DREE got under way in the budget of 1970-71. It is so easy to shove everything off into studies, commissions and inquiries. Sometimes large amounts of money have been spent to help parts of the country that feel aggrieved at not sharing some of the economic benefits that natural resources and history are presently helping them enjoy. Hopefully the minister will read my suggestion in Hansard or his officials will tell him that something sensible has been said in this debate, assuming any remarks are sensible.

Perhaps it is ironic or paradoxical that since we have had DREE and moneys have been going into DREE policy, other parts of the country—primarily the west because of energy and natural resources which are more accessible to the large markets of the United States—have been booming while we in the east have been going through a static period. We have not had any real growth in terms of the rest of the country, although obviously there has been growth there. Along with the oil problem and the loss of some of our markets because firms are moving out of the northeastern United States, some of our resource-based industries, be they textiles, pulp and paper, or even a shoe industry in Quebec, are all going through extra stress and strain. This stress and strain is not just a result of conditions in Canada but is created by the international trading picture and trading blocks that have been formed. As I say, in one sense it is a juxtaposition to natural growth. No one is taking away the natural growth in the west, but there are natural ingredients that are making the west grow. In the east, almost at the Ottawa River line, which was the gas policy line, there are problems within Atlantic Canada and eastern Canada that accentuate the need for a vibrant DREE policy to help that area rather than just making transfer payments.

I am going to cite a few figures in terms of transfer of payments which are rather horrendous, even with DREE, which, while it has helped maintain the standard of living, has not been the great incentive for new and vibrant economic growth. Some of us will remember the then premier of British Columbia, Mr. Bennett, who at one federal-provincial conference made the proposal that while we might have the best intentions to help those in Atlantic Canada with the administrative structure under DREE and other types of payments, hand-outs and/or transfer payments, perhaps the best way would be to have a more direct payment to everyone, either in the country or in Atlantic Canada. I do not want this to be misconstrued as an unnecessary suggestion of direct payment under some income level, a negative income tax or even an income incentive program. But there is no doubt that in a lot of the transfer payments to Atlantic Canada the dollar is eaten up in administration and bureaucracy. The actual productive dollar that gets down into the plant is actually even less than some of the figures show. I am going to quote some startling figures which show that while the budget in dollars may be going up, from $330 million in 1970-71 to over $500 million in 1979-80, in real terms, because of the inflation factor, the amount spent has actually gone down in Atlantic Canada.

I would like to refer directly to an interesting speech given by Judith Maxwell of the C. D. Howe Research Institute. This is printed in booklet form, dated April, 1978. Her speech was given before the Canadian Club in Toronto in April, 1978. She points out some interesting things in terms of development and refers specifically to Atlantic Canada. At page 4 of her speech she says this:

> Basically, the four Atlantic provinces have become government dependencies. In 1974, about 86 per cent of economic activity (total final expenditure) in the Atlantic region flowed through the government sector. The comparable figure for Ontario was 41 per cent. This is the broadest measure of government activity, since it includes family allowances, unemployment insurance, and interest payments on the public debt as well as government investment activity.

That is a pretty horrendous figure. I venture to suggest that the situation has not changed that much fundamentally or substantively in 1980, but in 1974, 86 per cent of economic activity—that is the total final expenditure in the Atlantic region—flowed through the government sector, compared to 41 per cent in Ontario.

Another interesting statistic which I was aware of, though I was not sure of the percentage, is this. Judith Maxwell says this:

> Another critical indication of the economic health of the Atlantic region is that net imports (that is, total exports minus total imports) accounted for 43 per cent of provincial product in 1974. The Atlantic provinces were therefore spending 43 per cent more than they earned and were creating a market for far more goods and services than they could produce locally.

Not only do we have this massive inflow of government payments under all its headings—family allowances, unemployment insurance pay-outs, transfer payments, post-secondary education and DREE—to the tune of 86 per cent, but in the Atlantic area itself we are bringing in more goods and thus shipping out money and importing 43 per cent, most of which we could produce ourselves with proper help. This is why DREE is so fundamental. When you look at DREE, this is what gives me concern on this Friday afternoon. I am not trying to cast stones because the trends have been there since the policy was developed. In the first full year of DREE operation in 1970-71, DREE development expenditures had accounted for 2.1 per cent of total federal expenditures, $330.8 million out of a budget of $15.8 billion. Let us look at each year thereafter. In 1971-72 it went up slightly, to $349 million. In 1972-73 it went to $364.9 million. In 1973-74, $424.3 million and 1974-75, $438.6 million. When you get to 1977-78, it was $562.2 million against a budget of $45.2 billion.

By that time the total expenditures related to government expenditures were 1.2 per cent. In the figures from this public accounts table, which at that time were estimates prepared for 1979-80, the estimated DREE expenditure was $592.8 million, almost $600 million of a budget of $52 billion, for a DREE expenditure of 1.1 per cent of total government spending.

In capsule form, if the figure of 2.1 per cent was agreed when the program was set up to be a reasonable figure for expenditures under DREE to help the areas of regional economic expansion, why have we not had more debate on that ten years later, and why it is only 1.1 per cent of the budget. What is more significant is relating the actual dollars to the inflationary factor that has affected all government programs. There you reach a horrendous conclusion. If you relate the budget of DREE to the inflationary factor, the economic impact of DREE on Atlantic Canada is substantially less relative to ten years ago when the program began. It has been decreasing every year in terms of constant dollars.

Since 1970-71 there has been a steady downward trend in the percentage of federal effort available to DREE. In 1978-79 DREE's share of the $50.3 billion had fallen to 1.1 per cent of the budget. I am looking for the figures I have on the real value in terms of the constant dollar. The real value of the DREE program to Atlantic Canada has dropped. Of course, we all know you can do anything with figures, but these figures are from the public records of Canada.

The real value of Atlantic Canada's DREE budget plummeted to 41.2 per cent. In 1970-71 in constant 1971 dollars, the region received $184 million for development. This is Atlantic Canada. In 1977-78 it had dropped to $108.3 million. While the Atlantic region received 41.2 per cent less, the rest of Canada was receiving a 5.9 per cent real increase in DREE spending over the same period.

I am not going to cloud the record with a lot of tables, but in terms of constant dollars, going back to the total program and not just Atlantic Canada, the total program of $330.8 million in 1970-71 in terms of the time when you get to 1978-79, in constant 1971 dollars only had a dollar impact of $294.5 million.

In terms of the problems affecting Canada, let alone the impact and the negative things affecting Atlantic Canada, I suggest that these figures in terms of the DREE budget and the inflationary factor, which is almost cut in half, require even a better look to see where we go in Atlantic Canada and the direction for the whole DREE program. Because there are influences, and members can raise legitimate complaints about DREE, any economist looking at government legislation and the history of government in this country would say there have been policies which tended to centralize the development of industry in the central portion of this region.

The Bank Act, which is now being considered in committee before coming back to this House, is an instrument of financial policy which does not help the areas of regional economic disparity. In fact it helps the centralist impact. We also have a tariff policy and, as I said before, a transportation policy. Unless we somehow get a handle on these various instruments of government, be they transportation, banking or energy, we can talk all we want in this House of Commons and in committees in terms of the philosophy of DREE.

Most members agree that you help your neighbour. It is almost a Christian ethic, an ethic that came down through the ages in almost every religion. You help your neighbour who does not have as much as you. That philosophy would find support in this House. However, in terms of pragmatics and practicality in government, you must co-ordinate these various agencies and instruments of government. No matter if you double the DREE contribution and/or expenditure estimates, ten years later you might look at Atlantic Canada, or in fact we can look at it today, and say that there have been some specific successes that have helped people get jobs.

In terms of a fundamental change in economic structure in developing industries that are compatible with their region, we should not try to transfer economic clones that cannot survive in a climate which is not compatible with their growth. Once you take away the prop of a DREE grant, such as a no-interest loan, ten years later we could be saying that we not only spent the millions that the minister mentioned in his opening statement. It was a sizeable figure. As we all know, it was seed money. I think it was $600 million. It must be more than that really. That was seed money to help stimulate the expenditure of over $4.3 billion.

All that is to the good. However, I suggest that in this review of DREE there should be an opportunity to review it rather than just get caught with the act on a Friday afternoon. It may be all right for the parliamentary committee when it gets the new bill, but we all know the problems of parliamentary committees. They are swamped with work. Members are trying to cover two or three bases. You do not have the expertise to give you objective, independent advice. I am not casting stones, but by necessity you cut off a number of witnesses in order to get on with the business. You may have estimates of the department or any number of things.

I wonder if a parliamentary committee, even with the new bill that may be on the docket, is the forum to make an objective review of the whole philosophy of DREE. As I pointed out, in terms of massive government expenditure in Atlantic Canada, we tried to shift from that and develop our own private sector into a healthier community than it is today.

I tried to quote figures today in an unbiased, objective way. Ten years after starting the program, the actual expenditure of DREE in terms of total dollars is 1.1 per cent of the total budget compared to 2.1 per cent ten years ago. That is further reduced by the impact of inflation. You find that the $600 million is really only worth half of that because of inflation. We have other policies and instruments of government that work counter to development of some of these areas of regional disparity.

I am starting to repeat myself, so I am going to conclude. We cannot have an effective, viable DREE policy by just transferring payments, helping a basic standard of living and not directing the policy to changing economic structures. Even though every effort is made, and officials work hard, you cannot have a change in the economic structure unless you co-ordinate that policy of grants, low interest bearing loans and that type of thing, with action in other areas. Look at what you have on the opposite side—the Bank Act, transportation policy, energy policy, to name only three of the basic policies which cover the country; I do not even need to talk about such things as the Canada-U.S. auto pact and other policies of that kind which are more specific to the central area. Then there is tariff policy.

These are four major areas which must be co-ordinated with DREE if we really want to achieve real growth based on a solid structure in Atlantic Canada. I am talking about Atlantic Canada because I know it better than the Interlake region of Manitoba or, obviously, parts of Quebec, although Quebec in terms of its future, I say with respect, is not as positive when one thinks of the future, bearing in mind that some of its industries, the textile industry and the furniture industry in particular, are under pressure. At least in Atlantic Canada we have the fisheries which, now, with the 200-mile limit are the base for real growth. We have a potential for gas and oil which obviously will be a base for growth, and if we can develop these potentials on the basis of a viable DREE policy which tries to rationalize the conflicts in other areas then, I think, we could be on a new path, and perhaps ten years down the road this House in terms of Atlantic Canada might not even have to debate DREE.

In conclusion, a word as to the forum. If it is just going to be a parliamentary forum, a parliamentary committee, there is not likely to be substantive input or a worthwhile assessment of the experience of the last ten years. Some professors hold the view that rather than having an absolute policy, a department of regional economic expansion, the most effective way to help areas which are less fortunate than others would be to set up what I gather we were being asked to do in connection with the social development bill we passed the other day, that is, in effect, an over-all secretariat which would have a direct input into and direct power over some of the line departments so as to lessen the influence of competing bureaucracies working for their own interests and exercising indirectly an adverse effect on the development of the regions. This is an idea which, perhaps, might be considered if there were a proper forum in which to go into the whole question.

While this is a quiet afternoon, the measure before us is certainly one of fundamental importance for areas where there is regional disparity, and certainly Atlantic Canada is one of them. I believe that after ten years of experience it is time to assess what has been done because there have been some bad strike-outs in regional development, as we all know. I do not need to read the litany of plants that grabbed some money and then went belly-up. In addition, there are obviously conflicts of interest which have found expression in this chamber in the last two or three weeks. Some have wondered why there should even be a DREE policy at all. I believe it is better to face the issue rather than defer it for another five years, so that ten years down the road we might have a better economy in all parts of Canada with the help of the present act.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on this bill because, as the minister has indicated, it is his intention to review the operations of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and perhaps come up with another bill with an entirely different approach. In any event he intends to take a careful look at the operations of the department.

Sometimes a bill is presented to us as a fait accompli, by which time it is almost too late to influence its contents although, of course, we are given an opportunity to express our views. By that time the minds of the civil servants concerned have been made up; they have drafted the bill and the minister has shown his support. Members have an opportunity to comment and are in a position to say, later, "I made my speech but you didn't listen." The best time to talk about these things is while ideas are being exchanged and different approaches are being considered. The one which is finally settled upon is probably the one which satisfies most of the people in the department—the minister naturally puts in his political input. So I welcome the opportunity to make a few comments.

I am one of the fortunate few in the House of Commons who were here when the concept of DREE was originally introduced. I know that some hon. members, including the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan), have the impression that it goes back to 1969. Mr. Speaker, that is not the year in which the idea originated. The original concept goes back to 1957 with the equalization concept. This did not mean there was any kind of fund or any kind of department established to operate in a particular region.

In 1961 the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) was minister of northern affairs. He introduced a measure which was known as the ARDA bill—the initials stand for Agricultural and Rural Development Act. I heard his speech at the time and I recall the comment that this was a new approach which would assist communities to instal sewers and a variety of other necessary works. They could even plant trees. I found it difficult to relate sewers and trees at that time; I could not understand how one bill could be so encompassing. But, as my hon. friend explained at that time, the idea was derived from a bill which had its origin in the United States. I can recall my hon. friend talking about reforestation in Minnesota. We have to remember that in those days the total budget of the federal government was something like $5 billion; today the budget is about ten times that amount.

Ever since those days the concept has been expanded. There was FRED, the Fund for Rural Economic Development. This encompassed areas such as the Interlake region of Manitoba, and afforded an opportunity to try out experiments. Hon. members must bear in mind that these were all experimental programs. Then there was establishment of the Atlantic Development Board which, I am sure, must have embarked on a considerable number of experiments. Then there was ARDA, the Area Regional Development Act, and the regional development legislation as it presently exists. My point is that the concept goes back a long way.

The impression I got from the Liberals was that while the Conservative government under Mr. Diefenbaker from 1958 to 1962 had introduced it, they were somehow going to erase history and remove any reference to a Conservative concept. So they came out with the idea of a department of regional economic expansion. From there on it was going to be a Liberal idea.

Regardless of whose idea it was, I want to trace some of that history for one specific reason. The point of it all was that this type of legislation was necessary. We could not keep running back to the government. All of us understand how cumbersome government can be. Every time we had a project we wanted to undertake we could not come back and ask for funds. We would wait for one department to move and then another department to move, and we really could not do anything. As a result this type of department was set up, but in setting it up it became very powerful, and it could grow to be very powerful and become a monster unless we have these periodic reviews. The former minister in the previous administration commented on that very aspect. Funds grow, requirements are always there, we do have regional disparities, there is a desire among civil servants to try to do their best, and there is no doubt in my mind that there is competition between provincial authorities and federal authorities.

In the province of Saskatchewan we have another type of competition. The department of northern affairs of Saskatchewan takes funds from the federal government and tries to tell everybody that all the funds, all the work and all the goodies come compliments of the province. They even moved a whole department of government into my area. They fan out in all directions; and there are people who work in every community. From original applications to final payments, matters are handled by the provincial administration, but 60 per cent of the funds come from the federal government. Regardless of whether there is a Conservative administration or a Liberal administration, the federal government is not given any credit, at least in the province of Saskatchewan, and regardless of whether the federal government is Conservative, under which this concept originated, or Liberal, I feel that they deserve a considerable amount of credit.

Mr. Cosgrove: Hear, hear!

Mr. Korchinski: There is no way that there would be any funds without federal participation, because there is no money to be made in many instances. It is a matter of providing opportunities for employment in areas where there are no opportunities.

This world is very competitive and there is a natural tendency to gravitate to central Canada and to ignore other areas. Central Canada is in competition with other countries so it has to be competitive, but that leaves out the regions, and forever and a day they were left in limbo, until there was an operation such as this.

There is a tendency to grow, and there is a danger that the department could become too powerful. There could be a few people in the department who could wield tremendous powers, if one community or a group of communities wants a certain project. Where are most of the projects undertaken in my constituency? They are undertaken immediately around La Ronge. La Ronge is a growing community, and it needs many of these projects, but beyond La Ronge there are many small communities. It is easy for administrators to take an hour's drive to look at a project, but to go out into outlying areas might require flying. One might have to take a day or two, so therefore there is not that same type of pressure from within the communities. There are pressure groups and people within the department who see an obvious need for certain types of programs. There are pockets where there is greater growth, even though it is all within the operation of the department.

The entire department fans out, and only a few areas are not included under this particular operation. The NDP says that it is great that we pour money into this. I remember in 1972 when "corporate welfare bums" was the expression being used. They fanned out across the country and campaigned, and all they said, was "corporate welfare bums". That was wrong. Because of the fact that there was some big industry involved, the idea of helping industries which were in difficulty was all wrong. Now all of a sudden Chrysler or Michelin can be assisted, and that is good. It is good to assist Chrysler because it happens to be close to the heart of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), but move into another area where there is a bigger company, and suddenly it is not good.

The danger—and this is why a periodic review is necessary—as I see it is that as this kind of philosophy grows, every party says that that is fine, but who is to apply the brakes? From here on in, one after the other they will be lining up because grants are available. There has to be some braking mechanism because funds are limited. The original estimates prepared by the previous administration were $562 million in the blue book. I asked the minister in committee whether that was the original amount proposed by the previous administration, and he said yes.

With the transition from the previous Conservative administration to the present Liberal administration not a single extra dollar has gone into the regional development department. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tells us that the Conservatives have a fetish for cutting down on the deficit. When $3.5 billion was added to the deficit, not one dollar went into this department. Where is money needed the most if not in this department? This is the type of department which helps depressed areas. Something somewhere is all wrong. Today we are subsidizing the price of oil to the tune of $10 million a day. Not one extra cent has gone to this department, but with the increase in the price of oil from $35 a barrel to $40 $1 million a day was added. If some of that money had been put into the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, jobs might have been created.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) tells us there is enough incentive. I heard the Prime Minister tell us the other day that there is enough incentive because we have a $14 billion deficit, but not one dollar was added to the budget of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The Liberal party and the New Democratic Party said in the last election campaign that the previous administration had cut down funds. I can tell hon. members about community after community where I hardly got a vote because of that type of political campaigning. Yet the administration now sitting opposite will not allow one dollar to be added for the benefit of depressed areas, and they come out smelling like roses. The previous speaker, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants, said that because of inflation we have less money in real terms. It was interesting to listen to his comment on that score because, in a sense, he is right.

There might be a way around this. There will be a parade to the public trough. This is a growing thing. Our society just cannot seem to move without some kind of incentive. "Everybody else gets a grant, so therefore we are entitled to a grant". If that is the way we train the people, I suppose that is the way they will act. It is one thing to train the people that way, but when we have corporations and businesses operating that way, we are in real trouble.

While there might be a need for direct grants, I suggest that perhaps there is a greater need for capital at reduced interest rates. That will cause these corporations or operators to stop and think that perhaps they do not need that much of a grant. If they even have to pay interest at a reduced rate, it will cause them to think perhaps they do not require that much money. Therefore there will be a braking mechanism.

I have another idea. The federal government contributes, for example, 60 per cent of the funds to the province of Saskatchewan. The philosophy is that it is necessary to have a co-operative or a department of government operating something or other. They are operating everything as long as there is money coming from the federal government. They could not move up north without the federal government handing out money first.

In committee I suggest that there should be an audit, but I believe I used the wrong word. We do have audits, but they are after the fact to ensure the right amount of money was spent. We must have a monitoring system which oversees the operations being conducted, because there can be waste upon waste. In years to come in many instances funds will go into areas which do not have the necessary technology, and are working with raw labour that is not trained in a particular field. Therefore they are bound to make a few errors, and a monitoring device will be necessary. If we enter into such a monitoring system, then there are always accusations that we are interfering with the provincial operation. So, how does one get around this problem? I do not see any other way. The taxpayers are entitled to get their money's worth.

I have received reports from my constituency on various operations. They asked what I can do about it. I cannot even go to the government or the minister to tell them about what is going on, because the operation is conducted by a provincial government. They have a line beyond which they cannot go. They are merely handed a bill, but they cannot say anything about how the money is being wasted in the operation. It is not too good to talk to them after the agreement has been signed. Originally everyone signs with good intention. Yes, they get together and plan. In fact the planning stage is great, and co-operation is great at both levels. The co-operation between the federal and provincial governments is great. The community is involved, and so on. Everything is go, go, go. However, once the agreement is signed, is in operation and is turned over to the provincial government, the federal government steps aside and says, "They know what is best; they can operate it."

What I am suggesting is that we require a monitoring system. It does not mean that the system will interfere with the operations of the provincial government. The monitoring system should not be conducted by the people who originally worked on the idea. It should be conducted by someone who is totally divorced from the idea. He or she can come in as an observer from another area, not knowing the people involved and perhaps not developing a close relationship. But he or she can report back to the minister who, in turn, simply identifies the areas where there seems to be waste. Then the minister can report back to the provincial authority. If they do not want to correct the situation, then we have a mechanism to make it public.

I am referring to the press and opposition political parties who are willing to make it public. The report should be public. It should not go to the minister so that he can put it under a table somewhere. It should be a public report. The monitoring system should be made public so that if the government does not get the message back to the provincial authorities, then the opposition will certainly do it. The opposition will play its role and expose it. Politicians being what they are do not like embarrassment any more than anyone else. I am sure provincial authorities do not like embarrassment either. That could be one method of getting around it. Without interfering with the provincial authorities, the political system could take over.

In many instances the NDP seem to draw a line at a certain point when they consider that it is too big. One can help organizations, companies, and groups of people, as long as one does not get big.

But I do not know at which point it become too big. Perhaps it is great to have big government, but one cannot have big organizations and so on. The NDP seem to draw the line. Some sort of criterion should be established because there is a danger in the funds being lapped up very quickly by these big corporations. They can lap up a huge amount of funds very quickly. Perhaps they will show in terms of the number of people employed that we are genuinely getting value for our money. The fact is that all the employment might be in one area. While one little pocket may be satisfied, countless numbers of small communities may not benefit. One operation may be a small one.

The number of small manufacturers springing up is rather fantastic. Somebody out there is building cupboards or little rock pickers; somebody out there has a new idea for a lift. Ideas are springing up in the minds of people who have creative imaginations but no capital. Perhaps they do not have too much business training, but they know their idea will sell, and eventually they prove themselves. There are many such enterprises across the country. It does not matter if one goes from east to west, from Quebec to Saskatchewan, I am sure there are such enterprises that are good for small communities.

I know of what I speak because I come from a very small community which had no opportunity, so to speak. Just a few miles down the road people started enterprises which really built up the town. Their first concern was how they could do something for the little community. That is good for the country and good for the community. There is local spirit. As these enterprises get bigger and bigger, especially those related to housing, schools and hospitals with their growing staffs, unfortunately they move on to larger areas. But many still remain and will remain, and they are the only things which keep a lot of these small communities alive.

As long as we do not lose sight of the original intent of the bill, to develop areas that do not have opportunities, everything will work out. If we lose sight of it, we will never get any opportunities from private enterprise because there is not a dollar to be made. I do not mind that type of assistance. It is the same as not minding it when we assist the lame or sick. Surely we all have that in our hearts, but we object to money being spent on enterprises which are sometimes questionable. We must have some satisfactory answers.

Another comment I want to make relates to a few enterprises that have been undertaken but sadly have folded. In fact, I could point to a smoked fish operation in my own area. Everything was fine. They had the co-operative fisheries, the fish, and they were right beside the lake. Also they had the great idea that there would be a market. Everything was satisfactory. They had a big opening of the plant. I suppose the "who's who" of the community came in, had a few drinks, made a few speeches, and everything was go. Approximately two weeks later the place folded up because somebody forgot to do a little research on the market possibilities. To this day I am sure one can find operation after operation similar to that.

I can think of a macaroni plant in Saskatchewan which was just another example of failure because of lack of research. I will not dwell on these failures because they will happen; there will always be failures. One can attempt something one thought was a great idea. One can try as one might, and it just turns out to be a dud in spite of all the planning, thinking, and so on. I am sure the best intentions were there, but when the departments of two levels of government, provincial and federal, are involved, you should have some expertise in order to do better research. I am not going to dwell on this. I will accept that there are failures, but when you do not have satisfactory answers people are turned off.

People are turned off by that type of bureaucracy, if I can call it that. As a result they become cynical, and when they know this department is involved in any program they are inclined to say it is just another one of its operations. This does not mean there are not people involved who are well intentioned and well meaning, but somewhere along the line they get bogged down.

In some of these projects there was probably a certain amount of risk involved. As I have said, I am quite prepared to accept that there are a few failures. I do not want to have to apologize for what has taken place, or for mistakes that have been made, because there have been many successes. One can pick up a newspaper and read all kinds of rumours and speculations about this fellow and that fellow involved in a scandal here and a scandal there. They are scandal sheets, you see, but there are many good things happening in this world that do not make news. The good things are accepted, but if you have a nice talking point for conversation down the corridor or over a coffee roll, and that sort of thing, you can attract people. That sort of thing certainly attracts all the newspapermen because that is what they live on. People being what they are, I suppose they will be making comments along that line from time to time.

I do not want to continue, but I hope that before we get too far into rethinking the whole operation of the department we will have another opportunity to debate this so that other members can bring forward their ideas. I have just put forward a few ideas in the time allotted to me. I am sure there are many others who can put forward examples of things that have occurred in their own areas, and I hope they can present them before we have concluded consideration of this measure. This is a very good department and I wish the minister every success, but I hope the government will find a few more bucks to put into this fund so the department can do everything possible for depressed areas. Anyone who wants to check the books will find that there has not been a single cent put in since the last administration left office.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I believe members of the House are of one mind in wanting to conclude this debate prior to four o'clock and give second reading to the bill. Just let me make one suggestion to the minister, and this suggestion comes from having seen things as they have happened over the years during which DREE has been in operation.

In most cases under the Regional Development Incentives Act, as in the province of Alberta, the designated area line is drawn across the province. In Alberta everything above or north of that line falls within the DREE designated area, while everything south or below falls within a prohibited area. As a result it does not matter how worth while a project may be, it cannot be assisted through DREE if it is south of that line.

As a matter of fact I know of one project that DREE officials said would qualify in every respect except for location. I do not think we should tie the minister's hands in that way. The minister should have enough flexibility so that he can consider a project and decide on its worthiness other than on the basis of its location. When a project must take place within a certain area, the purpose of the act is defeated. For instance, Fort McMurray lies north of that line in Alberta and there is no need for DREE assistance there. There is ample employment for thousands of people there, and things are going along fine. Perhaps we might find the same thing in other parts of northern Alberta, yet there have been projects suggested in areas south of the line which really would have increased production and provided employment, but the minister could not approve them because of that part which says projects must be in designated areas.

I would strongly suggest to the minister that in establishing these areas or regions, the provinces should be designated, perhaps with much stricter criteria. In this way it is more likely we would assist the most worthy of the projects, and I am thinking of those projects which would create the greatest amount of employment and contribute increased production. Those are two of the major criteria that should be established, the provision of jobs and increased production. When we increase production we add buoyancy to the economy and make things better for everybody. Every endeavour should be made to designate areas so that we do not bar worth-while projects, but rather accept projects on the basis of worthiness rather than location.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, like others, I am committed to allowing the bill to pass second reading before four o'clock. I know it is the disposition of hon. members that this bill be referred to the committee today. However, I want to make a few short remarks. I make a special plea to the minister that at committee stage he give some thought to one problem in relation to the DREE program. This has already been alluded to by my good friend, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). This problem arises from the fact that those of us in the province of Alberta live in a situation where DREE operates in the northern part but cannot operate in towns and communities in the south. Many of those southern communities should not be receiving DREE grants, but they should not be robbed because of criteria in the DREE program. This is the basis of the appeal I make to members of all parties today.

Let me give an example of what happened in my constituency. A company in the city of Saskatoon wanted to relocate a sodium chloride plant in Camrose, Alberta. Officials of the company assessed this beautiful prairie city for their purposes. They found there was an ample water supply, two railway services with all the amenities required. However, they found that if they located the plant in Grande Prairie, a rather booming and prosperous community at this time, they could get a $3 million write-off. Obviously, Camrose, Alberta was not to become the location of this plant when the company found it could write off several millions by locating somewhere else. What happened was that the plant was to be located there, rather than in an area where there is not particularly rapid growth, but can be described as fairly stagnant. Because of DREE incentives the company located in an area other than the natural location for that industry.

My appeal to the minister and to the hon. members who will be sitting on the committee is that they attempt to arrive at some mechanism through which DREE grants are given to industries which wish to locate in areas that are naturally compatible with their operations. Certainly it is logical that we should provide incentives to the pulp and paper industry locating mills in Whitecourt, Alberta. Certainly that is not the case in respect of a sodium chloride plant being located in a place quite removed from a network for shipment to the prairie farming area, because a sodium chloride plant essentially serves the farm industry. Such a location is a false location, and I think these things should be taken into consideration.

I hope that all hon. members will recognize the importance of ensuring that we use DREE as an incentive, not as a disincentive. I also hope that that particular point will be taken into mind by the committee and that it will attempt to do something to ensure that the dispatch of DREE money is done in an equitable fashion so that regions do not become angry, not so much at the fact that they will not be included in the project, but because a project hijacks businesses off to other parts of the country, leaving these regions void of the natural incentives that would have come their way had they not been syphoned off by DREE.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take only a minute or two. A number of members have referred to the disposition of the House to give this bill second reading this afternoon and send it to committee. We share in that disposition, but I would like to emphasize the point made by my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), and by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), that we think that the bill should be amended in committee so that the extension will be just for two years, not for five years.

It is very clear that if the program is extended for five years, the pressure would be off the government to rewrite the legislation and meet the various points which have been made today. If it is a two-year limitation, then we think that there will be more chance of the revisions which are necessary being made in the act. It is on that understanding that we are prepared to let second reading carry this afternoon so that the bill may go to the standing committee.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that I will respect the time remaining this afternoon so that this bill may go to committee. As I have sat here and listened to the remarks of my colleagues, and as I have realized that I am not on the committee which will receive this bill, I thought I should make just a few remarks in the few minutes that are remaining to debate Bill C-35 "An act to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act."

There are no regional incentives available in my area in British Columbia. I believe that the westernmost limit of the DREE boundary is Revelstoke, British Columbia, although perhaps that booming town of Kelowna was once considered a part of the DREE area.

It is probably a good idea to extend this act because there are needs in many areas of the country, particularly in Atlantic Canada which relies a great deal on DREE. I suppose that the extension of five years, or as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has suggested, two years, will give the government an opportunity to redraft the legislation. However, there are one or two points which I would like to stress to the government at this time.

Like all government programs which involve handouts, the DREE program is subject to a number and variety of abuses. It also produces a number of bad effects in some of the areas in which it does not exist. There are many stories which hon. members can relate, and I will not go into the details although I have heard them, where in effect a particular business in a particular area receives the benefit of a DREE grant and, as a result, a short while later a perfectly viable competitor of that business in a non-DREE area is forced to close down because of the competitive advantage created by the DREE grant to the business which received it. The grants are usually used to extend, expand, or even commence a business.

There is a need for the extension of the program in the business field, but I think that the fact there is a need for this extension indicates, or should indicate, to the government that its policies for industrial stimulation are inadequate in the areas where this help is needed and that the program itself must be tightened up to prevent the kinds of abuses which exist. There should also be measures to prevent the inequities where an area is being helped, while another area is being hurt.

What should be learnt from the fact that DREE has had to be created and extended is that the government should have a better look at its over-all industrial strategy so that programs such as this can be eliminated and business can be left to expand on its own without the use of taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their co-operation this afternoon in getting Bill C-35 to committee. We do have a few extra minutes, and I assume that we will move immediately to private members' hour. I would just state before some hon. members leave that next Wednesday we will be dealing with the Committee of the Whole stage of Bill C-19 which, I understand, is close to being wrapped up.

Mr. Knowles: Not next Wednesday.

Mr. Collenette: Pardon me, it is not next Wednesday, but next Thursday.

Mr. Knowles: Then I do not need to correct you.

Mr. Collenette: Then we will go on to Bill C-3, "An act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act". Of course next Wednesday, as my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was most agitated to tell us, is an opposition day in the name of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council realizes that next Wednesday we are giving the Liberals the opportunity to vote for the same motion which they voted for last December 13.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, could the parliamentary secretary indicate when Bill S-6 will come before the House? Will it be next week?

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, it was our intention to bring Bill S-6 before the House this afternoon, but there was so much discussion on Bill C-35. We were also intending to call Bill C-22, for which the President of the Treasury Board was present most of the afternoon. Bill C-22 was ahead of Bill S-6. I cannot give the hon. member a commitment, but it will be soon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall order No. 7, standing in the name of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING OPINION POLLS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca) moved that Bill C-208, to amend the Canada Elections Act (publication of results of opinion polls), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise and present this bill, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, respecting public opinion polls, to prohibit the publication of polls during the final 14 days of an election campaign. I am sure that all hon. members present will recognize that during the last two weeks of a campaign there is usually a barrage of polls. They come out of our ears. The weekend before election day in the last campaign there was a spat of polls by the Toronto Star, FP Publications, CBC and CTV, all with different predictions. The most respectable poll of them all, the Gallup poll, overestimated by 9 percent the Liberal vote in the last election.

I would submit that these polls create confusion among voters and demoralize party workers, candidates, and volunteers. They not only have an effect on the parties and the electorate, but perhaps they also interfere with our democratic process. I appeal to hon. members of this House to be open-minded about polls and about my proposal. I would like very much to see this bill go to committee for further study.

There is a greater deal of interest in whether or not polls create unrealistic voting patterns. The purpose of this bill is to protect the freedom of information available to the voter and to protect our electoral democratic process. It is not censorship. Many journalists and social scientists share the concern that I am expressing today.

● (1600)

I believe in polls but I am concerned about the misleading emphasis that they create, particularly during an election and more particularly during the last two weeks of an election.

I believe in polls but I am concerned about the pretence of the pollsters. Do they really know what they are doing? Sometimes I wonder what they are dreaming of. I think we must put polls in their proper perspective. I am concerned about too much emphasis and the wrong emphasis on polls.

Recent findings published on the "Watson Report" on March 17, 1980, showed that 92 per cent of the people interviewed who voted said they were not influenced by the polls. Eight per cent said they were influenced by the polls. I should like to remind the House that just five per cent may swing an election result one way or the other.

The program also stated that 66 per cent of those who voted and were interviewed believe that others were influenced by the results of the polls. But most people never read the results of polls; all they read are the newspaper headlines which, I submit, highlight the findings and predictions.

I have a very strong belief in our electoral process, Mr. Speaker. General elections are held to elect 282 members of Parliament from 282 different ridings. Elections are a process of our parliamentary system, but polls focus attention on party leaders, not the individuals who are running for election to Parliament. By asking questions such as "which leader would you vote for?", polls may contribute—although unconsciously—to another form of democracy, namely, leadership democracy or leadership by the one strong man.

Perhaps the leader of this party was the victim of this kind of polling in the last election, and I would even suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suffered the adverse effect of polls in the May, 1979, campaign. If that is so, the poll or pollsters may be misleading the public as to what an election is all about, and influencing them in deciding for whom they should vote. I should like to remind hon. members that only the people of Mount Royal, Oshawa, and Yellowhead can vote for the respective party leaders when they vote for a member to represent those ridings. To ask all respondents which of the three they would vote for is to place emphasis on a false concept of democracy. Ours is a parliamentary democracy in which 282 members are elected. That is what determines the democratic process, not a misleading question about an unwarranted concept of democracy.

Rather than reflecting the results of our parliamentary elections I believe that pollsters pretend or dream of direct democracy, electronic democracy, or instant democracy, like instant coffee. I think they would like to announce the results and predict the outcome of the elections prior to the writs being issued; I think they would like to predict the results and to indicate the results before they are in, say on the weekend before election day. I think they secretly dream that some day, with more sophisticated technology, it will be possible to poll everyone so that we will not even have to go to the polls on election day although, of course, that is the only poll that counts.

The relationship between polls and our parliamentary democracy should interest all members out of a public concern, if not out of personal interest. We must face the question of possible direct interference in the future of parliamentary democracy.

Ivor Thompson of Thompson, Lightstone and Company, a marketing research firm, made the following admission:

These polls would be more accurate in the American system, but in a parliamentary system, they don't really reflect who will end up in Ottawa.

Pollsters may perceive and conduct interviews during an election as if it were a presidential election race rather than a parliamentary election. The newspapers that buy these polls and headline the results may contribute to the selling of a presidential candidate rather than informing the voter about the nationwide election. I think they do a disservice and actually create news rather than reporting it.

I should like to comment on the measure and meaning of polls, Mr. Speaker. I contend that they misplace emphasis and mislead the public by putting measurement before meaning, by putting quantity before quality. We must question whether pollsters know what they measure. It should be kept in mind that polls do not measure the electorate. At best they only measure a random sample of all Canadians, not a random sample of all Canadian voters. The undecided are distributed among the parties as if decided.

I say that polls cannot predict election results even though they pretend, confidentially, that they can, days or weeks before an election. The margin of error in polls is too wide. Depending on the size of the sample, the margin of error may vary from 2 per cent to 4 per cent and the sample has to be doubled in order to reduce this. Gallup cautions that with the margin of error at 4 per cent the poll will be accurate 19 out of 20 times. I would point out, however, that they are not measuring 282 ridings so it does not give a clear indication of what is going to happen. Apart from the margin of error or accuracy, the polls do not translate these percentages into the number of seats for each party.

My point is, Mr. Speaker, that pollsters may not know what they measure. They may measure or question an individual in his role as consumer rather than as citizen or informed voter. I think polls have some real impact upon voters. Voters may decide to stay at home, for instance, if one party is shown to have a very significant lead. A voter may be of the opinion that there is no use voting because the other side is going to win anyway. Volunteers working for parties, whether they be Liberal, New Democratic or Conservative, may be buoyed by the results of the polls or they may be deflated. This may affect the strategy of that campaign organization. It may make them focus on different things. That, in turn, does affect the voter. As a direct result that can happen.

With respect to third parties, a poll which indicates an increase in opinion for a third party—in this case it would be the New Democratic Party—would have a negative effect on that very third party because the polls would indicate that a minority government would be elected. Therefore voters would decide they were not going to vote for the third party but would rather vote for the one that has a chance of forming the majority government. I think that is wrong.

Clearly I think we have to limit the polls and their influence on the electorate in Canada. I submit that polls influence the journalist, the man who is interviewing the various candidates. If there is a poor showing in the polls, the journalist will lose interest because he knows that when he writes the copy that that copy will not be printed in the newspaper under his byline. What he wants is his byline, and he does not then focus on the issues but on the polling results. In my opinion that is detrimental to the democratic process and the system under which we operate in Canada. There is already a real danger that newsmen and newspapers cover our parliamentary election as if it were a presidential race.

I submit also that polls are inaccurate because they only reflect a moment in time. They are like a snapshot. In the meantime, between the measuring and the taking of the polls, other greater events may have outdated the results.

During the May, 1979, election a CBC poll was conducted by Carleton University in which interviews took place between April 30 and May 10. They were published on May 15, but the TV debate among the leaders occurred in between. This then would not have given an accurate picture of what the polls were actually saying. I am not against polls if there were time to validate the methodology of polls. A last weekend blitz or barrage of polls is dangerous because no one can check the validity or the accuracy of these polls. Instead this would allow everyone time to concentrate on the issues, on the policies and on what the candidate is saying rather than on the polls. That would be what the news is, not the poll itself.

I am not against polls, just the publication during the final two weeks. My Polish friend is going to speak on this subject and that is why I say I am not against Poles. I would like him to know that. I am not against polls, just the publication during the final two weeks. I am not advocating censorship or a board of censors. What I propose is not something new, it has been proposed before. There is a lot of support for this. It warrants a discussion and it warrants a committee looking at the issues. The present Canada Elections Act already prohibits publication of advertising and polls on election day or even the day before an election.

I would like to see the results of public opinion polls banned for 14 days prior to election day. I am suggesting that it be done to safeguard the democratic process, and to permit the electorate a free, unhindered choice. I am proposing that this prohibition be extended to two weeks, or 14 days, for polls in the light of potential interference in our parliamentary democratic electoral process.

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, thank you for providing me with the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-208 sponsored by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields). The purpose of his proposed amendment to the Canada Elections Act is to prohibit the publication in any manner, during the 14 clear days preceding the time that polls are closed in an electoral district in which an election is being held, of the result or purported result of a poll of the political opinions of electors in relation to the election. This is totally unacceptable. It is an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian electorate, and is a denial of their right to information about themselves.

At first glance it seems rather shocking to see such a proposal to muzzle the press, and to deny information to people, coming from a member of the Conservative party, a party which has been an energetic champion of the cause of freedom of information. It is interesting that this comes when that party is out of office, and it is apparently now in the best interests of the country. However, members of that party have not been known for their consistency.

I note that the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester (Mr. Coates), who is quite a guiding light in his party, and one who is trying to assist his leader in many ways, has sponsored Bill C-262 which would prohibit the publication of the results of opinion polls for the entire election period. That may be a little sterner stuff, but I think the real problem of what we are talking about here is that such a bill really does not treat the Canadian people with much respect. I think it more or less implies that they are like lemmings, that they are like sheep, or like buffalo out on the prairies stampeding in one direction, and that direction is whichever way the polls seem to be blowing.

These fears for the ignorance and gullibility of the electorate for only two weeks do not make much sense to me. I am reminded of the phrase by Franklin D. Roosevelt that fear is nothing but fear for themselves, and he should have known. In 1936 there was a very famous poll conducted during the U.S. presidential election, which showed that Alf Landon would thump Franklin Roosevelt. What in fact happened was that Roosevelt thumped Landon, but the Literary Digest only consulted people who subscribed to the magazine, and in the middle of the depression the only people who could afford magazine subscriptions were all Republicans. Not too long after that the Literary Digest went out of business.

One can only hope that this House will give this bill the treatment it so richly deserves which was meted out to similar bills sponsored by the hon. gentlemen from Cumberland-Colchester North and Burnaby-Richmond-Delta in the first session of the Thirtieth Parliament. Both bills, C-213 and C-404 respectively, would have prohibited the publication of the results of opinion polls during an election, as is proposed by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester in this session.

I might note that a very distinguished member of this House, no less a distinguished member than yourself, Mr. Speaker, said, and I will quote from the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for Tuesday, April 13, 1976, as follows:

MR. FRANCIS: Well, if you were to try to do it on a national basis, you would have the kind of thing where the Detroit paper would do a poll on Canada and publish it in Detroit. The United Kingdom tried to do this and they had it from Radio Luxembourg, beamed at the United Kingdom, back and forth. I just do not think it is enforceable. And, while I do not like opinion polls, and while I understand why someone presented the bill, and I wish I could think of a good, legitimate, valid reason why I could achieve the same result, I have to say, deep in my heart, I think it is wrong.

● (1620)

That is the end of the quote from yourself, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it is in order to bring the occupant of the chair into the debate.

Mr. Smith: The point is well taken. I was just reading from the minutes of a committte. The point that was raised in that committee is a good point. What would happen if a Detroit radio station decided to make public the results of a poll done in Canada? With the techniques we now have, with these discs you could have an Atlanta television station braodcast the results of a poll. People all across Canada could have their discs aimed at some satellite and get the results. Are we going to try to stop this? It raises rather horrendous scenes.

You can picture people in eastern Europe huddled beside their radio with the lights out, or turned down very low, listening to the "Voice of America", waiting for the police to break down the door. I can think of many movies of the second world war where the Gestapo would storm in and find somebody with the earphones on. Is that the sort of thing we are going to do?

Once we start muzzling the press and denying the press the right to publish information, where do you stop?

I understand the motivation behind the bill presented by the hon. member, but it is a very slippery slope. Once you start that sort of process, I do not think there is any guarantee that it will not creep away and creep away and eat into very fundamental and precious rights. We have always had a free press in this country.

What would happen if somebody took a poll and we had a version of a Hyde Park corner in this country? Sometimes if you go to Toronto City Hall on a Sunday afternoon you see somebody on a soap box. You see the same at Allen Gardens and a few places in Toronto where there are corner orators. Are you going to extend the bill to preclude somebody from taking a poll himself and standing up on a soap box to announce it?

Where do you draw the line? The final week ban on publication of poll results involves a clear and obvious abridgement of freedom of expression. It would restrict individuals, the press, magazines, radio and television, for a crucial seven-day period. In the language of journalistic ethics it would flagrantly and without any question abridge the public's right to know. If a late change in public sentiment were under way, this rule would require that knowledge of the change be withheld from the general population. The bill's sweeping demand, it should be noted, would withhold all polls, those accurately reflecting the trend as well as those that might in one way or another be seriously misleading.

Look at the results of the last election. Does anyone think that the results were seriously affected by the polls? Certainly the polls were broadcast far and wide. The voters in western Canada were not influenced very much by them if they believed the polls which indicated that the Liberal party would do well in eastern Canada. It did not cause a stampede toward the Liberals on the prairies.

Mr. Knowles: It caused a stampede the other way.

Mr. Smith: Perhaps if anything it did cause some weakening of our support. Look at the polls. They were not all saying the same thing. The CTV poll, the CBC poll, Carleton university poll, and the Toronto Star polls were not giving the same amounts, but they were all indicating the same direction, and the direction was that the Liberals were going to win. In fact they did win.

What would happen, for example, if we were to ban polls just during the last two weeks? The Ken Taylor "Iran incident" caused the Tories to think that this might be their salvation, that it might turn things around. Anyone working in the campaign in Toronto during that election who talked to a Conservative worker knows that this gave them a real shot in the arm, a real flow of adrenalin. They could hardly wait for the next poll to come out. They felt that somehow a twist or a change in their fortunes would be indicated as a result of that Iranian incident.

Would we deny them the hype or the adrenalin or the good morale that would result from an incident that might happen toward the end? Are we to say that during the first part of the election when something great happens, the polls will reflect it and you can let the effect of that be indicated on the electorate and allow them like lemmings to go in that direction, but that cannot happen in the last two weeks? If that were the case they probably would have asked Ken Taylor to get out of there two or three weeks earlier so that there would be time for the polls to reflect the upsurge in their fortunes. This is the ridiculous sort of thing this legislation could trigger.

One point that was raised by the hon. member for Athabasca was the way in which knowledge of how the mood of the country was going would affect the decision of a voter. Somebody who may feel strongly about a majority government might like to know if one of the two major parties had a better chance to form a majority government than the other. Somebody might prefer one of the two major parties, but actually liked minority governments. If he thought the NDP had a chance of holding the balance of power, he would vote for them, but only if they were going to hold the balance of power. I do not see anything wrong with that. That is valid is informaton. Why should we deny the electorate that information?

The electorate, if anything, in terms of knowledge of politics, elections and the issues, are increasingly becoming more sophisticated. I do not think we need to stop up their ears so they cannot hear information they always had a right to have because somehow their minds are going to be tainted and they will go off and do something they would not otherwise do.

If somebody was very concerned about having majority government and wanted to know which party had the best chance of forming one, he could do his own poll. However, the results would only be relevant in his own riding, and his riding might be going in the direct opposite direction of the rest of the country. When we have such a spread-out country, almost 5,000 miles long, it is valid for a person in one part of the country to want to know how people in the other parts of the country feel. That is valid.

Our party will take its chances on the impact that such information will have on the electorate. I do not think the possibility that somebody's vote, and I do not think it is very many people, may in fact be determined on how the mood of the rest of the country is going, and cause everyone to react in the same way. The results, particularly in the area of the country west of Winnipeg, in the last election will indicate that. If there was a buffalo stampede out there, it was not in our direction. It was in the opposite direction, notwithstanding the fact that the polls and the direction of the polls were well known.

Another interesting question that arises is the difference between the work of a political commentator, of a syndicated columnist, of a magazine writer, and the work of a pollster. Let's assume a rough equivalence in terms of talent and sensitivity on the part of the two. Are we going to say that a political commentator with a column in newspapers across the country, who can say he has been talking to a lot of people and it is pretty clear what the mood of this country is, and the Liberals are going to win this election or the Conservatives are going to win this election, cannot do that? People respect his judgment. They say that if Lynch, Fisher, Fotherington, Regenstreif say that, and he goes up on the mountain and gets it in tablets of stone, it must be true. If that is the information they are looking for, they certainly will believe Mr. Lynch or Mr. Fisher. Are we going to say to them they cannot be writing columns like that in the last two weeks of an election campaign? The bill does not purport to do that. But what is the difference?

If people are so easily influenced by what authoritative people may say about the mood of the country, rather than read polls by Martin Goldfarb or Peter Reigenstrief they will just read columns by Charles Lynch and Doug Fisher. And we all know how authoritative they are. They may differ from time to time, but so do the opinions of the pollsters. They are not always identical. That is another problem you get into if you follow this route.

I would like to refer to a statement by Mr. Lynch in a column he wrote on March 18 of this year. It was entitled "Effects of Polls Overshadow Roles." One sentence in that column really says it all:

> Polls convey accurate information. Hence, those of us who are committed to freedom of information must support publication of the polls.

Such is clearly not the position of the sponsor of the bill before us, a member of the Conservative party, the party which is well known for its championship of freedom of information. We certainly find them in a paradoxical situation here with all the polls which have come out, particularly in the last election. I am sure there were many more polls taken in that election than in any previous election in Canadian history.

The New Democratic Party, the third party in the House, has more members than it ever had before, and I am sure it was never more clear to the Canadian public that the NDP had no chance whatsoever of becoming the government. However, the polls did not, unfortunately, stop the people of this country from returning that party with more members than it has ever had. So there is no statistical evidence to show that the people are fooled by polls.

Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the party which champions freedom of information should suddenly want to muzzle the press and deny the Canadian people the information they have always had. They want to put us all into the situation of people behind the Iron Curtain; we should huddle beside our radios late at night, turn on the news from Detroit, turn off the lights so the RCMP will not break down the doors, and get the news of the latest polls to find out what is happening in Canada. As sure as I stand here today, that is what would happen if this bill were to pass. For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the measure will not pass.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the measure and I congratulate the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) for bringing the bill forward and for the very responsible position he has taken in the contents of the bill, as well for his very well-reasoned speech.

I must say I was disappointed with the previous speaker who attempted to suggest, within the context of the motion, that it is a denial of freedom of speech. It is not a case of muzzling the press at all. As a matter of fact there are many journalists who have reservations about the way in which polls are conducted in this country and the degree of accuracy they reflect. The difference between reporting polls and talking about a person who wants to express an opinion on the outcome of an election is that polls are perceived to have some scientific or technical connotation to them, something done in a professional and scientific manner in which an adequate and accurate expression of opinion has evolved through the process of a survey. But we know, Mr. Speaker, that many of these surveys are quite inaccurate.

I certainly support the measure and I hope hon. members will see fit to send this proposal to committee for consideration. The member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) forgot to mention that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when the Speech from the Throne was introduced, said we would be looking at ways and means of improving the electoral process. Surely this is one area of reform which should be considered by a committee of this House, because there are different views held. As a matter of fact there are members on the other side of the House who share the views of my hon. friend from Athabasca. In The Citizen of June 20, 1980, there is an article entitled "MP Against Polls During Elections". It says:

> A Liberal member of Parliament has called for a ban on the publication of public opinion polls during election campaigns.
> Gilbert Parent, MP for the Ontario riding of Welland told the annual meeting of Central Canada's radio and television journalists Thursday that polls shouldn't be published in the month before voting day. He said during a panel discussion polls adversely influence voters and can be manipulated.

The man across the way who has just spoken with all the wisdom and expertise of the collective view of that group over there has certainly not polled his members, because there are many members on that side with whom I have discussed this question personally who have reservations about polls.

It is really unfair for a member, in spite of his strong position on any particular issue, to suggest that the collective wisdom of this House is not a better balance than the collective wisdom of a few of his cohorts for whom he speaks. Nevertheless I share the view of my hon. friend from Athabasca and of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent) that polls can interfere with the orderly democratic process.

One of the reasons we have polls—and this was alluded to by the member for Athabasca—is that there are some people who are over-anxious and who want to know beforehand what the outcome of an election will be. The journalists and pollsters take great pleasure in attempting to predict the outcome of an election beforehand, and I think that in the process they can distort voting patterns of individuals and of groups of individuals.

What is more disconcerting is that we are increasingly being bombarded by various types of polls, conducted with varying degrees of expertise; indeed, some lack any scientific method in the approach taken. As a result there is, I think, an increasing tendency for greater inaccuracy. This can cause confusion in the minds of the electorate, and I certainly find this to be unhealthy. As hon. members know, politics these days is a pretty complex game without making it more confusing by carrying out surveys of opinion which may or may not reflect what is actually factual.

The point I want to make is that when there is doubt as to the accuracy of a professional group of pollsters there is certainly even more room for doubt with regard to surveys and polls conducted by those who are not classified as professionals—I would classify them as amateurs. For example, we only have to look at the last election. A Gallup poll published just prior to the election indicated 48 per cent would vote Liberal, 28 per cent would vote Conservative, 23 per cent would vote NDP, and 2 per cent would vote otherwise. Well, that indicated there would be a 20-point spread between the Conservatives and the Liberals on the basis of the poll findings. The final result showed there was only a ten-point spread. That is a tremendous and gaping inaccuracy, Mr. Speaker. The final result was 43.9 per cent Liberal, 33 per cent Conservative, 19.8 per cent NDP, and 1.6 per cent Social Credit. I submit that this is a tremendous inaccuracy, Mr. Speaker, in terms of the reading of a survey such as this which is done in a very professional way, I am told.

There is no question, as has been pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Athabasca, that there is room for doctoring and manipulation, and I suggest that that constitutes a very unhealthy intrusion into the democratic process. My friend across the way quoted Charles Lynch. He quoted a section which would bolster his argument, but I believe as well—and this is the other point I want to make—that there can be a built-in bias in any poll that is taken. Mr. Lynch makes reference to that fact—and I quote from the Montreal Gazette of March 18, 1980—when he states:

In their efforts to convey information, the pollsters frequently oversimplify and create at least the impression of prior bias.

Prior bias is an essential ingredient in opinion journalism, and as a political columnist I'd be lost without it. But the polls have developed to a point where they have more influence than those of us who seek to provoke interest and discussion by offering comment on political events.

Of course if there is a bias and an inaccuracy—and as the hon. member for Athabasca indicated, there is really no way of checking that three or four days before an election is held—there can be a disruptive effect upon the outcome of an election, and I believe that is wrong and does constitute an infringement upon the orderly process of parliamentary democracy.

In an article on Tuesday, May 6, 1980, in The Globe and Mail the very famous Goldfarb talked about the ability to manipulate. He used the word "massage", and I quote:

We ask people questions, then we take the data and massage it to make it mean a lot more than they intended. We are looking for insights or clues. We supply the figures, but we also come up with . . . interpretation—

That really suggests to me that it is not an exact science. It is a science which can be misleading and manipulative. As far as I am concerned, it does not and should not have a place in our parliamentary process during a time when people want to assess and judge the pros and cons of political parties, leaders or positions.

The hon. member for Athabasca also pointed out the fact that in polls there is a tendency to single out leaders, individuals, or certain issues and that in the whole process the individual member of Parliament who is running for office in a given constituency is nothing but a glorified door-knocker. I think it does tend to take away from the importance of the individual member of Parliament.

I suppose it is fair to say that, if we were to believe the polls, the late right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert would never have been the prime minister because the polls said he could never win. Of course I can only conclude by saying that the late and great Mr. Diefenbaker, who was a great friend of this House, had an opinion of polls. He suggested that only dogs knew how to treat "poles" at election time. In many respects there are some of us in this House who share that view because of their record in the past. We believe that this measure and this issue should be brought to the attention of the House and considered by a committee. I was very surprised that the spokesman for the Liberal party pretty well closed the door on that opportunity, because if we are looking for a process of electoral reform and improving the election process, this surely is a measure we should look at very carefully and seriously.

Let us at least analyse it. Let us not just close the door and suggest that what we are doing and what we are allowing to happen is right. Let us at least be bold enough to say that there are some concerns and some expressions of opinion both in favour and against the issuance of polls just prior to an election. Let us look at this. Let us have some expert witnesses put forward their cases, and then we could have a clear and informed hearing on the issue. Members of Parliament could debate the pros and cons. This bill would provide the opportunity and avenue for that to occur, and I earnestly solicit the support of all hon. members to ensure that that process takes place.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take very long, but I want to place on the record the fact that I dislike very much the conditions of this bill. I listened to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields), and as he spoke I had the impression that he had considered his arguments seriously and developed them well, but I think he missed the point.

I do not like the underlying suspicion of voters which rests behind this bill, and I do not like the underlying attack on the freedom of our press.

I would like to express my opinions a little more positively, if I may. I believe that voters form their opinions logically and that voters have their reasons for forming their opinions, and I believe that polls tell us the score. They are not the score itself. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) spent a little time talking about the accuracy of these devices and about their reliability, and I toss back at him the idea that, if the scoreboard is wrong, that does not change the score.

I would like to quote, if I may, from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of April 1, 1980. I think the paper put the issue into some perspective. It said:

That issue is the control of information—

The issue in this kind of bill.

—which should be shunned by Parliament as an invasion of citizens' rights. The public is entitled to have all information possible about public affairs and, if a difference can be made, it is above all entitled to that information at election time . . . What is the issue here is an attempt to have Parliament decide what is accurate and what is inaccurate in the field of public information. The taking of this step would be very dangerous interference with the normal flow of such information. The decision as to accuracy can properly only belong to the public.

A leading Montreal pollster, Yvon Corbeil, has said that studies have shown time after time that polls have almost no net effect on voting patterns, and I agree with that.

I would like to try to put this bill into a little bit of perspective. Please note that it does not try to stop polls, simply their publication. If polls are so pernicious, why would we want them to continue in the midst of an election when our party planners and our leading politicians would have access to the information and would be forming decisions, but the public would be denied that information? Allan Frizzell of Carleton University raised an interesting point along this line. I will quote him directly:

What they are saying is "We want to know what is going on but we don't want you to know what is going on."

Stifling polls limits our freedom to take a look at ourselves and to understand how we collectively make a decision. It curtails the proper process of an election. It does not help the understanding of an election; it clouds it. The assumption that we are operating on with this bill is that polls change the vote totals through some kind of bandwagon effect instead of simply reflecting popular sentiment.

Any pollster will tell us that his poll is an historic document. It takes one dot in time and measures public opinion at that time. It does not try to project or, as was stated earlier, to massage unreasonably. I think elections are decided by very different forces—by tradition and party loyalty, by region, by leadership and, above all, by the issues of the day. I think these are the real motivations.

I think 1980 was a typical election in that respect. In my riding opinion polls did not change the dislike of my voters for the 18-cent oil excise tax. It did not change the dislike of the voters in my riding for the failure of the government of the day to provide the mortgage tax credit scheme or the failure of the government of the day to provide some kind of new economic order. It was the government of the day that failed, not the opinion polls.

I suggest to the author of the bill that he has thought out his ideas carefully, but he should go back to them. If he does not like polls, perhaps he does not like their results. The simple answer for all of us is that perhaps we should do a better job and change the results. If the author of the bill considers this an abuse of the system, perhaps he should reconsider and examine whether we are afraid of a technique which tells us about ourselves and because of that fear he is ready to stifle a more fundamental liberty. In my judgment the best road to follow is to expand our information, to let this bill disappear without any further discussion, and to keep on with our efforts to broaden our understanding of ourselves instead of trying to stifle our understanding of ourselves.

[Translation]

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon on this abomination now before the House. It is an abomination, Mr. Speaker, that one should have the gall to introduce Bill C-208 sponsored by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields). This bill will prevent the publication of the results of opinion polls during the 14 days prior to a vote in any riding where an election is being held. The introduction of this bill, Mr. Speaker, shows a lack of respect for our democratic process and the Canadian electorate.

[English]

The usual reason given in defence of attempting to deny the public access to information which may be of interest, if not of assistance to them, is that the publication of the results of opinion polls, either at any time during an election period or during the last week or two before polling day, unduly influences the voting behaviour of the electorate. It is argued that the publication of the result of an opinion poll showing one party with a substantial lead will create a bandwagon effect in which the voters will flock to the leading party in a desire to be on the side of the eventual winner. That is nonsense. It is an argument usually made by parties and candidates who have lost elections. If they had won, there would be no mention of undue influences, only of how accurate the poll was and how perceptive the electorate were. Therefore it comes as no surprise that it has usually been Conservative members of this House who have introduced bills proposing the prohibition of the publication of the results of opinion polls.

[Translation]

But where were all those voices last year and after May 22, 1979; where were those voices during the Thirty-first Parliament? They were all silent, Mr. Speaker. We did not hear any Conservative members talk about that, there were no motions or similar bills introduced.

[English]

The next argument of the supporters of bills such as Bill C-208 is that polls are inaccurate and therefore misleading, and that results should not be published in order to prevent the misleading of the electorate. I should like to refer to an article "Can We Believe the Polls?" It appeared in the February 13, 1980, issue of the Toronto Star and read as follows:

> While as a nation we are not as poll happy as Great Britain, clearly the polls are becoming an increasingly important part of our political life. Although there are those who would like to ban or control the use of public opinion polls in election campaigns, political realists recognize that they are here to stay and that their use by politicians, journalists and academics alike is likely to continue to increase.
> This raises the fundamental question: Can we believe what the polls tell us? The answer would seem to be a qualified "Yes".
> Those who use (or misuse) the information provided by the polls often overlook the fact that all polls, regardless of how carefully they may be done, are subject to error. But unlike other types of "error" that we make in forecasting trends in the weather, the stockmarket, etc., the error in polls is precise, predictable and based on sound mathematical probabilities.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion issues a comment at the end of every report and points out that the figures given are not accurate and there is a margin of error of 4 per cent more or less in 19 out of 20 surveys it makes.

[English]

However, because a given poll is based on only one sample, there is no way to determine whether it is that one "bad" sample in 20. Therefore the probability of it being off by more than a certain percentage can only be estimated and the appropriate caution introduced in its interpretation, hence the standard Gallup statement. But how far out must an estimate be in order to be "bad"? This is determined by such things as the sample size, the methods used in organizing the survey, and the level of possible inaccuracy a client is willing to accept. The common Gallup level of plus or minus 4 per cent is quite commonly accepted and occurs frequently in nationwide random samples of about 1,000 respondents. While it is possible to reduce this somewhat by using larger samples, this is seldom done because it is simply too costly to justify the small gains in accuracy that are made. Conversely, very small samples become highly inaccurate and therefore are seldom used by reliable firms.

For these reasons most samples commonly used in Canadian polling have between 700 and 1,200 respondents. Larger samples are generally used only when more detailed regional breakdowns are required as in the recent CBC poll. While the probable accuracy of a given poll is easily stated, the true meaning of the notion of accuracy is often overlooked once the appropriate disclaimer has been made. We can take, for example, the Gallup poll of last November which showed the Liberals jumping to a 19 per cent lead over the Conservatives and the NDP rising to 23 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cousineau: That makes the member happy.

Mr. Knowles: That is a good note on which to end.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

SHORTAGE OF CATTLE FEED—CONTINGENCY PLAN TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the lack of pasture and shortage of cattle feed that is prevalent in several areas of the prairies, in view of the fact that a contingency plan was put in place in 1977 to allow hay to be cut in Riding Mountain National Park and Prince Albert National Park, and in view of the fact that limited grazing in Riding Mountain National Park would cause no appreciable or lasting damage to the wild life habitat, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of the Environment move immediately to allow cattle to graze, and feed to be harvested in Riding Mountain National Park and Prince Albert National Park where it is feasible.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PRIORITIES AND PROGRAMS FOR 1980s—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency under Standing Order 43. In view of a Department of Indian Affairs report which restates what we already know, that Indians on reserves still are struggling to feed their families, acquire an education, find adequate jobs, stay off alcohol and keep out of jail, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development immediately state on motions his priorities and programs for the 1980s to begin remedying this urgent situation.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMMITTEE STUDY OF CONDITIONS ON RESERVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas in a recent report the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has again admitted to very serious problems on reserves relating to crowded living conditions, and whereas infections, respiratory diseases, suicides and violence on reserves are four to five times higher than national levels, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the government House leader direct the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development to leave their committee rooms and go out as a group to at least 12 reserves, six in western Canada and six in eastern Canada, to gain first-hand knowledge of these deplorable conditions.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—CANADA-U.S. DISCUSSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In light of the fact that it is expected the United States Senate will give consideration to an emergency appropriations bill that would provide $9.7 million in additional funding to the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota on Friday of this week, and in light of the fact that personal representation to U.S. senators on the part of Manitoba members of Parliament during this past week proved valuable in establishing Canada's case against the Garrison diversion unit and the environmental disaster it could bring to Manitoba, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That this House authorize an all-party delegation to be sent this week to Washington, D.C., to meet with U.S. senators to discuss the grave implications for Canada of a Garrison diversion plan that allows the transfer of Missouri River biota into the Hudson Bay basin.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

OIL SUPPLIES FOR ATLANTIC CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Premier Lougheed of Alberta has at his disposal some $6 billion in the Alberta Heritage Fund, in view of the fact that Premier Lougheed during a recent visit to Atlantic Canada discussed lending some $100 million to Newfoundland's Premier Peckford, in view of the fact that during the same Atlantic visit Premier Lougheed discussed investing Alberta Heritage money in Cape Breton's mines with Premier Buchanan, in view of the fact that Premier Lougheed also talked with Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick about loans and investment dollars, and in view of the fact that all three aforementioned premiers have developed a sudden need to restate their support for Premier Lougheed's demand for the world price for oil produced in Alberta, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall):

● (1410)

That this House of Commons affirms its desire to provide Atlantic Canadians with oil as cheaply as possible, despite what the premiers of Atlantic Canada are saying.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

INDUSTRIAL BENEFITS STEMMING FROM NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT CONTRACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In the recent contract signed between the federal government and McDonnell Douglas for the new fighter aircraft, the only province mentioned to receive industrial spin-off benefits is Quebec.

Given the fact that Canadians were led to believe the industrial spin-off benefits stemming from that contract would be spread equitably across Canada when, in fact, the ministers involved have stated on a number of occasions that Quebec will receive 48 per cent of the benefits from the contract, while Ontario will receive 39 per cent and the rest of Canada will receive only 12 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Supply and Services make an immediate statement on motions with regard to what Manitoba will receive in industrial benefits stemming from the McDonnell Douglas contract, and that the government call an immediate meeting with the Manitoba aerospace industry to secure adequate industrial benefits for the province of Manitoba.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MODERN TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is responsible for development programs in the Atlantic region and is insufficiently funded for this purpose, and whereas transportation disparities are a deterrent to development in Atlantic Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion be directed to prepare and lay before this House a blueprint to put in place a badly needed modern transportation system in the Atlantic provinces as a major measure to enable the Atlantic provinces to help themselves.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

NUCLEAR DEVELOPMENT

CALL FOR FORUM FOR PUBLIC DEBATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and I shall limit myself to two "whereases."

Since the government does not appear anxious to provide an especially wide scope for public involvement in the review of Canadian nuclear policy now under way within the bureaucracy, and because what the country needs is a full public airing of all the issues and side issues touching on nuclear development, including the crucially important question of Canadian nuclear reactor exports. I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That the government expand the current inhouse review and establish instead a forum for the widest possible public debate on this extremely important question along the lines of that contemplated by the previous Conservative administration.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL ARMED FORCES DAY

TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43.

Since today is National Armed Forces Day and the Canadian Armed Forces have received tributes from the Governor General, the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House recognize, with respect and gratitude, the contributions of the Canadian Armed Forces to Canada in war and in peace, and extend its congratulations to the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces for their effectiveness and dedication.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

AIR TRANSPORT

AIR SAFETY REGULATIONS—REQUEST FOR INTERIM REPORT OF DUBIN INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent importance.

In view of the startling testimony in recent weeks by many witnesses appearing before the Dubin Royal Commission on Aviation safety which all points to a general lack of effectiveness in the administration of air safety regulations in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Transport be directed to make a statement on motions before this House explaining the measures he has already taken to eliminate the many unsafe practices which have been documented before the Dubin inquiry and, further, that the minister be directed to request an interim report from Mr. Justice Dubin on his findings to date.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

DROUGHT IN WEST—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture my question is to the acting minister. The minister knows that the drought in western Canada is now an acute threat to western farmers and, indeed, to the general economy of Saskatchewan and of Manitoba.

On Monday, the government of Manitoba indicated that it could wait no longer for Ottawa's approval and it went ahead and announced its own program of assistance to the extent of $44 million. Even the railways have acted to help the farmers of Manitoba in working to move feed back to Manitoba where it is needed.

Will the minister tell the House of Commons why the Government of Canada is moving more slowly than the railways in responding to the drought crisis in Manitoba, and will he tell us when the federal government intends to accept its responsibility to show leadership in helping Manitoba deal with the drought problem?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They are waiting for double-tracking.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture has already indicated a number of things that are being done with respect to alleviating the drought situation. The Minister of State for the Wheat Board has also indicated a number of decisions; for example, the allowance of feed barley from the United States under import permits. So all these measures are in hand now.

There are different views on the situation itself. Some people believe there are sufficient quantities of feed on the farms. The problem is that it does not come to the elevators as rapidly as one might like. But that is a normal situation because the farmer is trying to protect himself also in this difficult situation. To conclude, it is a very difficult balancing act and the three members of the government involved are monitoring the situation very closely.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the fact, which apparently escapes the notice of the acting minister, is precisely that it is not a normal situation. It is not a normal situation when the economy of Manitoba is threatened to the extent of perhaps half a billion dollars because of a drought crisis that only this minister would regard as being normal.

The minister said—and I quote him exactly; I noted his words down—"all those measures are in hand". Does that mean that the Government of Canada intends no further action? The railways are acting and the government of Manitoba has acted. Indeed, the government of Manitoba acted on Monday because it stated it could wait no longer for the federal Treasury Board to act.

Is the Government of Canada not planning more action? Why did the federal Treasury Board not act? What is this government going to do, and what can it tell the farmers of Manitoba and the members of this House of Commons about the plan of action it has to deal with the situation that is most certainly not normal to the farmers, who are suffering a crisis of drought in western Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, to a certain extent, the Leader of the Opposition is describing the situation well. The CN is acting, the governments of the provinces are acting and the federal government is acting. That is the way to deal with that particular situation.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, let me deal with one aspect of the federal government's action. This minister will know that the government has established an advisory group to the task force on the drought. Will the minister confirm that there is not one single Manitoban on that advisory group, and will he give us an immediate commitment, now, to establish a mechanism on behalf of the Government of Canada which will bring together, under federal leadership, municipal and provincial representation and ensure co-ordination in dealing with the devastating effects of the drought in Manitoba?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I will certainly bring these suggestions to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, who has the main responsibility in this area.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I will direct this question to the same minister, even though he may try to shove it off on someone else. The Premier of Manitoba indicated that his province is assuming there will be forthcoming from Ottawa a $14.3 million contribution by the Government of Canada as Ottawa's full share in dealing with the drought. That is $14.3 million that has not yet come. Will the minister now give this House and the farmers and people of Manitoba a clear commitment that Ottawa will honour at least that contribution of $14.3 million?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition indicated in previous questions, it is not only a matter of money: it is mainly a question of putting into motion the necessary instruments to cope with this drought situation. For example, when the Minister of State for the Wheat Board allowed imports of feed grain from the United States, that was an important move.

It is not only a matter of saying we have allowed $14 million, more or less. Government action should not be judged exclusively on that basis, although I recognize it is one of the factors in this equation. The government has indeed put a number of millions of dollars into this process.

DROUGHT IN WEST—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS IN MEETING LOAN PAYMENTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. People in Manitoba and Saskatchewan will be trying to salvage what little is left of the agricultural economies of both provinces.

We have a situation in which farmers, young farmers in particular, and businesses which depend on agriculture have expanded. In many cases they will face severe economic crisis and possibly bankruptcy. Will the government consider some type of moratorium on debt in those two provinces, in terms of working with the credit unions and banks to try to stretch the loan payment that will be coming due in the next few months over a longer period of time, so that we do not have bankruptcies caused by an act of God in those two provinces?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not considered the question of a moratorium. The hon. member has indicated the difficulties which those who have loans may face in the future. Drawing upon the experience we have had with individual home owners who were renegotiating their mortgages with lending institutions, it was possible in that case to work out suitable arrangements which got those affected over the situation. It may be possible in these circumstances to do something similar. I thank the hon. member for his representations and will consider whether anything can be done short of a moratorium.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, I assume the minister is indicating to the House he will give this request some attention and urgency because it is very serious. My supplementary is to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as acting minister responsible for the Wheat Board. He mentioned the fact that permits have been issued to allow barley and oats into Canada for feed supplies. Incidentally, there will not be enough feed for western cattle unless more is found.

My question is this: duty is still imposed by the federal government on grain coming into Canada, specifically barley, oats and alfalfa pellets. Will the government give consideration to taking off the duty? In the case of barley, it is about seven cents a bushel. Will the government give consideration to doing this because of the emergency situation that has developed?

● (1425)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): My information is that the problem is not one of cost but of availability, so in this instance the Minister of State for the Wheat Board moved at the request of the livestock feeders to make sure that the feed barley would be available. I have not heard that this is a financial matter; I have heard the situation described as one of increasing the quantities on the market.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

STEPS TO IMPROVE CONDITIONS ON RESERVES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Over the weekend, the hon. gentleman's department issued yet another report on the condition of Canada's Indians, which is deeply disturbing. It reveals that in almost every aspect of life, whether we are talking about housing, educational opportunities, violence or health conditions, Canada's Indians live in a state which can only be described in general terms as deplorable.

Since the hon. gentleman's party has governed Canada almost non-stop since 1963—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: With your help.

Mr. Broadbent: —I should like to ask him when it intends to come to grips with its responsibility for Canada's original inhabitants.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I hope we can come to grips with it as quickly as possible. It is a disturbing report, there is no doubt about that. The fact of the matter is we have initiated an improvement in housing policy, we are getting the co-operation of DREE and we are also getting assistance from employment programs.

As the Leader of the New Democratic Party may remember, my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced that increased funding would be targeted to native groups. In addition, we are meeting with the Indian community with respect to increased funding for self-government, hoping to come forward with legislation in that regard perhaps in the fall. This could deal with one of the underlying causes of which many of the other items are symptoms.

We are giving our utmost attention to a mix of policies of this kind as a means of coping with a situation which is an unhappy one; there is no question about it. It may be small consolation but I would point out that the report did say that conditions, bad as they are, have improved over the last two decades.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I do not think anyone in this House can take any pride in the statement that conditions have improved for Canada's Indians, when 30 per cent die through violent means, a percentage which I suspect is higher than before the white man appeared on this continent, and when 50 per cent of the homes are without water.

In this context I would like to ask the minister: since the proportion of the funds allocated to social programs by this government has actually declined in the last ten years, contrary to what he implied in his answer, will he make a commitment this afternoon that the amount set aside in his budget for Canada's Indians will be substantially increased?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I have already indicated that the government has under active consideration, right now, substantial increases in funding for houses which will be incremental, over and above the present commitment to all our programs. This report will undeniably have some impact on the thinking of the government and we shall certainly be looking into the areas to which the hon. member has drawn attention.

Mr. Broadbent: The House knows very well there is a distinction between the government considering something and the government committing itself to doing something. What we are calling for is action, not just thinking about the problem. In this context, the government has appointed a number of special commissions which have made sense, and obtained the support of all parties to deal with aspects of other problems in Canada.

I would like to ask the minister if the government will appoint, now, a special commission on Canada's Indians—which would have a deadline; it would terminate with the calling back of Parliament in the fall—to study past reports and to come back to Parliament in the fall with specific recommendations which should be acted upon before Christmas.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party is suggesting a special type of legislative body to look into this question. I am prepared to consider it. I will say right now that we will give it consideration, but I point out to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that there is a standing committee of the House—one of the most active standing committees that we have—dealing with Indian questions.

That committee has been meeting regularly over the last several weeks. The hearings have been going on and a good deal of evidence has been received. All parties are participating. It could be an example of one of the most effective standing committees that we have. That standing committee has all the latitude it wishes in terms of going into this report and requesting further information.

I might say that the National Indian Brotherhood and others are in the audience. They are equipped to brief both New Democratic Party members of the committee and official opposition members. Again I suggest that the Leader of the New Democratic Party might take a hard look at the standing committee in terms of its being a worth-while instrument to achieve this objective.

SELF-DETERMINATION FOR INDIAN PEOPLE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister not agree that little meaningful progress will be made on these terrible problems until the Indian people are allowed to control and run their own lives, rather than having solutions handed down to them from government officials?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: In this respect, would the minister take out many of the reports which have been prepared by the National Indian Brotherhood and some of the provincial federations and consult those reports, which propose solutions, and not just look at the reports prepared by his own department?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I have been doing for several months, looking at the reports which have come in from the National Indian Brotherhood and other provincial associations and Indian bands. That is why I have been going across the country talking to the Indian leadership and bands with respect to the government's priority for Indian self-government, with the hope that we could bring in legislation as early as possible identifying this very area, Indian self-government, to rebut once and for all the paternalism which has been such a degrading influence on the Indian people.

Such a new bill would establish Indian self-government at the option of the Indian people themselves. I am hoping I can get the co-operation not only of the hon. member—I am sure I will—but also that of all the opposition parties in achieving this objective.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF SPEAKER AND DELEGATION FROM SWEDEN

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of the distinguished Speaker of the Parliament of Sweden, Mr. Ingemund Bengtsson, who is accompanied by parliamentarians from that country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

VENICE SUMMIT—MEASURES TO BREAK INFLATIONARY EXPECTATIONS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, whom I welcome back from being at sea in the lagoons of Venice.

At the economic summit in Venice it was agreed, and I quote, "that inflation should be given immediate top priority". The seven leaders agreed, and I quote, "that determined fiscal and monetary restraint is required to break inflationary expectations".

Could the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what measures are going to be taken by his government to carry out determined fiscal and monetary restraint to break inflationary expectations? Are there measures other than those now in effect? If so, what are they?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite right that this was underlined as the top priority for all the industrialized countries.

Before replying directly to his question, I might say that I did hear a number of favourable comments on the performance of the hon. member's leader at the last summit at Tokyo, and I pass them along with sincerity. The compliments did not include the hon. member for St. John's West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We are, in a sense, anticipating the debate this afternoon in this question and answer, but I tell the hon. member that there are no new measures contemplated at the present time beyond the fiscal and monetary restraint which is in effect.

We have already indicated our intention to restrain government expenditures and certainly not to add to the deficit, and until the budget comes down it is not my intention to indicate any additional measures. I believe that maybe the principal job will be to resist the demands which undoubtedly will be made to increase spending and to relax monetary restraint in the face of the onset of the recession.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I am glad there was a frank expression of views and that the minister was informed that the quality of this year's delegation was not up to last year's.

The communiqué could have been written by governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada, who said on May 29 that we have to stick with the monetary and fiscal policy approach and limit aggregate demand.

In view of the fact that the minister and the government have now agreed at the Summit with the approach suggested by governor Bouey and that they should limit aggregate demand, that the minister said in this House that his policy and governor Bouey's are similar and that they are heart to heart and toe to toe, would the minister tell us how he intends to limit further aggregate demand, particularly in view of the fact that there are now 904,000 unemployed as of May and the unemployment rate is forecast to increase? How is he going to carry out his and governor Bouey's policy and that of the seven samurai?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the communique at Venice stated that determined fiscal and monetary restraint is required to break inflationary expectations. That is the commitment that all of the seven made at Venice and with which Canada concurs.

At the present time, as the hon. member knows, the Bank of Canada is operating under a system of monetary restraint within a range of monetary targets. That certainly is monetary restraint, and I have indicated the intention of the government to restrain spending and to avoid adding to the deficit. That, in my view, is the reverse side of stimulating aggregate demand.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—MEASURES TO STIMULATE CANADIAN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As he knows, one of the more damaging aspects of our over-all economy is the deteriorating auto industry, which has a $4 billion Canadian trade deficit with the United States, which is growing. Reports from Washington indicate that this deficit is largely of our own making and that the United States is not prepared to alter the auto pact in our favour at this time.

Could the minister now tell this House and, in fact, the 22,000 unemployed auto workers—not to mention the hundreds of thousands in the related ailing secondary manufacturing sector—when he intends to take made-in-Canada action in order to stimulate the auto industry in this country? For example, would he now be prepared to take our repeated suggestion and impose quotas on offshore vehicles?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the possibility of having a harmonized response to the problem of offshore vehicles is one of the priority issues for our discussions in Washington this Friday. I do not think I have to respond to unidentified comments on the front page of a newspaper, even one as important as The Globe and Mail.

We are going to have our discussions around the table with identified senior American authorities. In these discussions we are going to seek common ground on matters of mutual concern and, in doing so, I will be pursuing my objective for Canadian workers of obtaining a fair share for Canada of North American automotive activity.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, I naturally wish the minister well in his deliberations in Washington this weekend. But there are other options which in the past the minister has sloughed off to the Minister of Finance. My supplementary question is therefore to the Minister of Finance.

Could he tell us whether or not his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has asked him or his department to consider implementing some much needed stimulative measures for the automotive industry in Canada, such as temporarily removing the 9 per cent federal excise tax on North American-built vehicles in Canada, or any other measures which would give the auto industry a much needed stimulative boost?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is in constant communication with me and with other members of the economic ministry, not only with respect to actions to assist the automotive industry but to assist other industries in Canada. His leadership has already had a beneficial influence on the future development of that industry.

TRANSPORT

ENFORCEMENT OF AIR SAFETY REGULATIONS—NUMBER OF INSPECTORS FOR AIR AND RAIL SAFETY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport some questions. Since the Parliament of Canada over a number of years, and successive governments, have passed various laws and regulations regarding maintenance and safety procedures for the operation of commercial aircraft, I should like to ask the minister the following question.

In light of the evidence given by employees of the government at the air safety inquiry in Thunder Bay of planes being flown that are overloaded and poorly maintained—one of them crashing on March 24, when six people were killed—will the minister advise the House whether or not he intends to increase the number of safety inspectors and, more important, will the minister assure the House that he will not allow his officials, and he himself will not take part in or condone any action which undermines the recommendations of the safety inspectors regarding penalties or suspension of licences because of some possible political embarrassment to the minister?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I presume it is always a temptation, when a commission is created and evidence is brought to that commission, to act upon the evidence that is brought forward. But the purpose of the commission, obviously, is to come up with recommendations after evidence is presented. I consider that to be the normal way of proceeding. In the case of the Dubin commission, as in others, it would be wise to wait until the judge has assessed all the evidence and is in a position to bring forward his recommendations.

With regard to the number of inspectors, it is a major preoccupation of mine, obviously. In recent days I have made a number of moves to strengthen the capacity, particularly of the CTC in this regard.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, can we take it from the minister's response that he will now succeed with the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board in securing restoration of the number of air safety inspectors and rail transport inspectors?

Can we take it that the reduction in man-years of the Canadian Transport Commission will not occur, and can the minister assure the House that he will now insist on full enforcement of the present laws and regulations, in light of the experience of lack of enforcement long before the present safety inquiry took place?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am quite sure that there is hardly any limitation in the number of inspectors that might be needed if one is to cover the whole of the land.

One of the purposes of Bill C-18, which is presently in committee, is to make the maximum use of inspectors at other levels of government than the central one, that is, at the provincial and municipal levels. When this bill is passed, a major effort in this direction will be made.

MINES

REQUEST TASK FORCE INVESTIGATE MINING ACCIDENTS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I will direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the tragic mine accident last Friday in Elliot Lake, Ontario, in which three miners were killed—I am sure every member in the House would want to join me in expressing sympathy to the bereaved families—and also in view of the dramatic increase in mine accidents in Ontario in which some 17 miners and surface workers have been killed in the last six months, I should like to ask the minister if the government is prepared to take action to see a task force established, in co-operation with the province, to investigate this alarming increase in fatal mine accidents.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I understand that the Minister of State for Mines and the Minister of Labour have been studying this situation with great attention recently. I understand they are considering a proposal like the one suggested by the hon. member. I hope that both ministers will be in a position to give a definite answer to the hon. member very soon.

DROUGHT IN WEST—ON-SITE COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister or to the government House leader. It has to do with the very serious situation in western Canada which has come about as a result of lack of rainfall and very high temperatures over the past few months.

I wonder if either of the two hon. gentlemen would consider the suggestion that the Standing Committee on Agriculture be given a reference to travel to western Canada to view at first-hand some of the problems we have there, and also to listen to the producers' suggestions on some solutions that might be forthcoming from the government.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, a while ago the Minister of Transport in his answer to the Leader of the Opposition indicated that the government was taking effective steps under the circumstances. The hon. member has now made a suggestion which seems interesting. I can assure him that I will take it into serious consideration.

[English]

HARVESTING OF CATTLE FEED IN NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I appreciate that answer and I urge the House leader to take a serious look at the problem.

I have a supplementary question which I should like to direct to the minister responsible for Parks Canada. It refers to a topic on which I have had discussion with him concerning both the grazing of cattle and the harvesting of cattle feed in Riding Mountain National Park and to some extent in Prince Albert National Park. Let me point out that I have done some investigation into this matter. I should like to ask the minister if he is prepared to give that suggestion his serious consideration.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Yes, Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman spoke to me about this question last week, and as a result I have been able to make some inquiries specifically as regards Riding Mountain park.

There are, I am told, about 2,000 acres which could be used potentially. There are estimates that over 5,000 elk and deer would be using that forage in the Riding Mountain park. Given past park policy, we do not open up the parks for grazing to outside animals. It would be contrary to the presently established policy to meet the kinds of concerns the hon. member has expressed to me. I would, therefore, be reluctant to recommend that to the House.

It may be that the hon. member would have further information which he would like to give to me which would give me the basis to make further inquiries. I would be extremely happy to undertake to do that if he would do so.

IMPROVEMENTS IN SAINT JOHN HARBOUR DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since the government has abandoned the exciting new programs for Atlantic Canada which were in place before the last election, in the same way that they have abandoned the entire Atlantic region, I should like to ask the minister when he is going to implement a program to replace the fishing fleet; and what will it be?

How can he justify his and his government's neglect of the Saint John harbour development and the Saint John dry dock? In other words, when is he and his government going to stop raping Atlantic Canada without so much as a squeeze, let alone a kiss?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I should ask the hon. member a question as to who does his writing, so that I will avoid using the same person.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: The only programs we have abandoned for Atlantic Canada are programs like the 18 cents a gallon gas tax.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: That tax would have driven the Atlantic economy into the ground. That step alone has provided the basis for a healthy and progressive move forward of the Atlantic economy.

• (1450)

We are working on the kinds of programs which will encourage further progress for Atlantic Canada, including programs for the fishing industry and the area of Saint John, New Brunswick.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, we did not receive so much as a kiss: apparently not even so much as a smooch.

An hon. Member: Just a kiss-off.

Mr. Corbett: Under the previous administration we met with the Atlantic premiers to have their input. Has the minister asked the Atlantic premiers to meet collectively with him or his colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance; and, if not, why not?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, my officials are in regular contact with their equivalents in provincial government departments; and in terms of regular contact with the Atlantic provinces, we have outstanding members of Parliament and outstanding ministers from there to provide the necessary input.

INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED PRICE-FIXING BY MAJOR OIL COMPANIES—TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development, if I can have his attention for just a moment.

My question concerns the seven-year inquiry into alleged price-fixing by the major oil companies in Canada—an alleged multimillion dollar rip-off of Canadian consumers. Well over a year ago, the director of investigation and research for Consumer Affairs asked the Justice Ministry to provide certain legal advice on the mass of evidence that has been accumulated in this particular case for possible prosecution.

The Justice Ministry went through a whole series of lawyers, and Consumer Affairs is now getting fed-up and is insisting upon action by the Ministry of Justice. My question for the Minister of Justice is this: first of all, I understand that Consumer Affairs have now exhausted their patience and are demanding a report by the end of this month on the matter. Is Justice prepared to make this report at the end of the month; and, secondly, what is the reason for the lengthy delay in this investigation of interest to all Canadian consumers?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, it is true that the director of investigations, Mr. Bertrand, asked the Minister of Justice in April of last year to appoint attorneys to study the file. Unfortunately, there have been delays and the attorneys were appointed only on November 13. Since then, one of them was able to make his report; the other one should be completed before the end of the month and if not, the director concerned will continue his investigation with the means at his disposal.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ALLEGATION OF PRICE-FIXING BY OIL COMPANIES TO RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General. It follows along the same lines the Minister of Justice has just presented.

This long delay is completely unacceptable. I should like to ask the minister if he would make the information public again. We have spent six long years on this. Will he also give us his assurance that he will refer this question to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission? If he is not prepared to do that, would he explain to the House why we should pass his estimates in committee, estimates which are being considered this afternoon, if we are not going to get action in respect of the taxpayers' dollars on this question and on many other important issues which we have passed on to him but have seen no results?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that the director of investigations is taking steps to hasten the completion of the investigation and I think that we will be obtaining his report during the next few weeks.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LATE DISTRIBUTION OF FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, it is estimated that approximately one and one-quarter million family allowance cheques were not distributed on time toward the end of last week, therefore causing severe hardship to the many needy families involved.

My question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the fact that Mr. Joung, a Post Office spokesman, has publicly stated the cheques were delivered to the Post Office two days late by Supply and Services, will the minister confirm whether this indeed did happen, was his department late in delivering the cheques and, in any event, will he give an explanation on exactly what happened?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, first of all permit me to congratulate my friend, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, on his appointment as official critic for the Department of Supply and Services. This is the first opportunity I have had to offer him that congratulation.

I would also like to point out, Madam Speaker, that indeed the number of cheques which were delivered late was in the vicinity of 4,000 to 5,000. I want to assure the hon. gentleman that it was not in any way due to any error on the part of the Department of Supply and Services. The cheques were delivered to the Post Office in accordance with the predetermined schedule.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his complimentary remarks at the start, but I cannot agree with him when he refers to 4,000 to 5,000 cheques, when it is reported that 45,000 alone were in the city of Ottawa. Therefore, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General.

An official of Supply and Services, head of the Supply and Services office in the city of Toronto, has blamed the Post Office, and I would like to ask him whether he is prepared to blame Supply and Services, or accept the blame for his department? In any event, will he tell us what he knows about the situation?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to tell the hon. member that in fact the Post Office Department, as it does every month, delivered over 1,270,000 cheques. Unfortunately, of those 1,270,000 cheques, about 7,500 were late in being delivered. My department assumes full responsibility for that delay. We apologize for the fact that those 7,500 cheques were not delivered on time. I am advised, however, that there was only a one-day delay so that, considering the fact that out of a total 1,270,000 cheques delivered only 7,500 were late, the average is still quite good.

APPLICATION TO FIRA BY FINNISH TIRE COMPANY—REASON FOR GOVERNMENT APPROVAL

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will he advise the House why the government has approved the application to FIRA by a tire company from Finland, which will import and subsequently produce tires in this country, at a time when the government has authorized a $50 million DREE grant to the Michelin Tire Company?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the law in the form it was passed by Parliament does not permit me to provide the kind of information sought by my hon. friend.

I hope the House will be supporting me before too long in legislation which, among other things, will enable the act to operate with more openness. I am afraid that is about all the information I can provide, except to add that if the application was approved, as he says, it was because the test of significant benefit in the terms of the act was met.

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, in light of the serious effect on the tire companies that are now producing, and in light of the financial implications on the part of the people of Canada involved in recent negotiations, will the minister make the commitment that no government grants will be made to assist this Finnish company while the existing industry is operating so far below its capacity?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to speak for each and every department on each and every one of the range of programs of the government, but I am sure if applications are received—and I have no indication or reason to believe they will be—they will not be accepted unless the conditions are met which were set originally in respect of benefits to Canada.

ENERGY

VENICE SUMMIT—COMMITMENTS ON INCREASED USE OF COAL—ACID RAIN

Mr. Doug Frith (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Summit conference in Venice during last weekend resulted in a commitment by the participating countries to increase their coal production, using coal as an energy resource in order to reduce their energy consumption of oil.

What commitments were made by the participating countries which will ensure that the increased use of coal will not aggravate the acid rain problem?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, at the Summit in Venice all heads of states recognized the importance of increasing very substantially the production of coal over the next decade if we are to meet the needs of the industrialized world.

● (1500)

The Prime Minister and the Canadian delegation insisted very strongly upon the necessity of making sure that the environmental concerns be respected and that all necessary steps be taken to protect the environment. There was a special reference to this subject included in the final communiqué of the conference.

I am also happy to report that my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, has been in extensive consultations with his American counterpart over the past few weeks on the whole issue of acid rain. If the hon. member wishes to ask the minister about his discussions, I am sure he would be very happy to inform the House of developments in this regard.

BANKRUPTCIES

MARITIME AGENCIES LTD., VANCOUVER—DEBTS OWED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services. It relates to a question and a motion under Standing Order 43 put last week by my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano.

Can the minister report to the House, in view of his consultation with his colleagues, on the matter of the bankruptcy of Maritime Agencies Limited, Vancouver, which was suffering from bad bebts that it was unable to collect from the government with regard to shipments of Canadian wheat to Bangladesh?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position at this time to furnish any further information relating to MAL. I would be pleased to discuss the matter with the hon. gentleman.

I have been in touch with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Justice to hasten a resolution of this most disturbing difficulty. I recognize, as does the hon. gentleman, that we are dealing here with food aid that is much needed by Bangladesh. I hope the problem will be solved within the very near future.

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROVISIONS OF HELSINKI FINAL ACT—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Government Notice of Motions

June 20, 1980—The President of the Privy Council:

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to examine the implementation of the provisions of the three baskets of the Helsinki Final Act by Canada and other participating states and consider Canada's participation in the Madrid follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) and report to the House; and

That the committee be empowered for this purpose to retain the services of advisers to assist in its work and that it also be empowered to retain such professional, clerical and stenographic help as may be required and that it also be empowered to advertise invitations to the public to submit opinions on the aforementioned matter.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 21(2), this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the House.

HEALTH—ONTARIO COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS—INTERIM REPORT ON VITAMINS

Question No. 54—Mr. Cossitt:

Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware of an interim report released on Tuesday, November 6, 1979, by the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons on the subject of the consumption of vitamins and, if so (a) what are the conclusions of the department in regard to the value or otherwise of each vitamin to the human body (b) specifically, has the department any evidence to support the theory that (i) vitamin C is effective against the common cold (ii) vitamin E is useful in heart disease treatment (iii) various vitamins in the B group are helpful in certain types of mental illness, etc.?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The department has received and studied the interim report on vitamins from the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons. Vitamins are essential nutrients for the proper functioning and control of a wide variety of biochemical processes in body cells. Severe disease conditions result from vitamin deficiencies. The department has not received any evidence from properly constituted and controlled clinical trials which would demonstrate that vitamin C affords protection against the common cold. No appropriate evidence has been received which would demonstrate the safety or effectiveness of vitamin E in the treatment of heart disease, nor for the B vitamins in the treatment of mental disorders.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICIAL RESIDENCES—FLOWERS AND PLANTS

Question No. 85—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Between April 20, 1968 and May 22, 1979, what was the total amount of public funds spent on flowers, plants, etc., of any kind for the Prime Minister's (a) official residence at 24 Sussex Drive (b) summer residence at Harrington Lake (c) offices?

2. What is the combined total for the locations mentioned in part 1?

3. Were any of the flowers worn by the Prime Minister in his lapel between April 20, 1968 and May 22, 1979 paid for by government funds and (a) if so (i) how many were used (ii) what was the total cost (b) if not, were such lapel flowers provided free of charge by any florist doing business with the government?

4. What are the names of all florists supplying any goods mentioned in parts 1 and 3 and which ones supplied roses and/or carnations for the use of the Prime Minister, if such were indeed supplied?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1 and 2. The Official Residences Act covering the Prime Minister's residences (24 Sussex and Harrington Lake), the residence of the Leader of the Opposition (Stornoway) and the residence of the Speaker of the House of Commons states in part that the National Capital Commission shall maintain and improve from time to time as required such lands. During the time the residences have existed, the National Capital Commission has maintained the exterior landscaping on the lands involved and in so doing has provided certain plants, the costs of which are set out in Lists "A" and "B" below. These costs are not available prior to the 1975-76 fiscal year. The NCC maintains shrub nurseries as well as greenhouses and it is from such installations that plants are utilized in maintaining exterior landscaping as required. The Department of Public Works greenhouse provides potted plants and cut flowers for the residences and offices of the Prime Minister. This has been the routine for at least 28 years.

3 and 4. Other than supplies mentioned above, public funds were not spent.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—AMOUNT SPENT FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 98—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was the total amount of money allocated for professional services in the budget of the Prime Minister's office during the 1979-80 fiscal year in the amount of $270,000 and, if not, what was the total amount?

2. Did the Prime Minister spend $115,000 for professional services during the first few months of the fiscal year and, if so (a) what percentage does this represent of the annual budget (b) exactly how was the money spent, including the names of all persons receiving it, the amounts received in each case, the services performed in each case, and the date such services were performed, in each case?

3. Did any of the expenditures whatsoever have anything directly or indirectly to do with the federal election campaign in the months of April and May 1979 during which money was spent and, if so, what are the exact details?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. Yes.

2. Total expenditure—$119,756.83.

(a) 44 per cent approximately.

INDIAN PEOPLE—ENGLISH-WABIGOON RIVER, ONTARIO—TESTS ON MERCURY CONTAMINATION

Question No. 792—Mr. de Jong:

1. Were tests conducted on the mercury contamination of Indian people in the English-Wabigoon River area of Ontario and, if so, what were the results?

2. Were the results kept from the public and, if so, for what reason?

3. Will they be released and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes.

Total results of mercury levels to December 31, 1978 are as follows:

	Total tests	Tests < 20 ppb	Tests 20-99 ppb	Tests > 100 ppb	Individuals > 100 ppb
Grassy Narrows	1,607	1,102	380	125	59
Whitedog	1,653	1,242	344	67	39

< 20 ppb is an acceptable level
> 100 ppb is regarded as being "at risk" ppb (parts per billion)

2. No.

3. All results from the mercury program across Canada, including those from the English-Wabigoon River area, were released in National Health and Welfare news releases between September, 1976, and May, 1979. At that time, work commenced on a major review document which consolidated the results of all mercury testing carried out by, or on the behalf of, the department from 1971 until December 31, 1978. The document entitled Methylmercury in Canada—Exposure of Indian and Inuit Residents to Methylmercury in the Canadian Environment, was released to the public on March 17, 1980. A follow-up to this report, reviewing the 1979 data, is now being prepared.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—VICTORIA HEALTH CENTRE, N.B.—BEDS FOR DISABLED VETERANS

Since January 1978, was consideration given, by the Department of Veterans Affairs, to acquiring more beds to supplement the beds presently used for disabled veterans in the Victoria Health Centre, Fredericton, New Brunswick?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No. There has been no change in the total number of beds negotiated at the time of the transfer of the then Lancaster Hospital to the Province of New Brunswick. 57 beds were acquired by the Victoria Health Centre in Fredericton, New Brunswick. Geographical distribution of the remaining beds is Saint John—83; Campbellton—25; Moncton—35.

TRAINING ON THE JOB PROGRAM—FREDERICTON, N.B.

Since January 1, 1978, how many persons have benefited from on-the-job training under the manpower training programmes in Fredericton, New Brunswick?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): The Training-on-the-Job Program and the Training-in-Industry Program were combined in June 1974 to form the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program. Training under this program may be given on the job, in a classroom or special training area, or as a combination of the two. From January 1, 1978 to December 31, 1979, 1,935 trainees received training under the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program in Fredericton, New Brunswick.

U.I.C.—FREDERICTON, N.B.—BILINGUAL REQUIREMENTS FOR EMPLOYEES

Question No. 838—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1978, did a change take place in respect to bilingual requirements for employees at the Fredericton, New Brunswick office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes. Since integration of the Canada Employment Centre in Fredericton, N.B., (January 1979) two additional bilingual positions have been created.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—VICTORIA HEALTH CENTRE—FREDERICTON, N.B.—CHAPEL

Since January 1978, was consideration given by the Department of Veterans Affairs to the establishment of a chapel for use by veterans in the Victoria Health Centre in Fredericton, New Brunswick and, if not, will consideration be given?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Provision of a chapel was not included in the conversion of the Victoria Health Centre for use as a long-term care unit for veterans. A room is available in the veterans unit of the centre for quiet meditation, and religious services are conducted there by pastors from the Everett Chalmers Hospital, on request.

PROPOSED LABOUR INFORMATION BUREAU

Question No. 948—Mr. MacKay:

1. Does the Department of Labour's proposed bureau of labour information plan to give access to income tax records held by National Revenue or give access to Statistics Canada's data base which has already used National Revenue income tax data and, if not, what would be the effect on the maintenance of its data base?

2. Will the new bureau use Social Insurance Numbers (SIN) to give access or to link with records of other departments, especially National Revenue?

3. Does the new bureau plan to assume responsibility for the administration of that part of the Corporation and Labour Unions Returns Act (CALURA) relating to labour unions, that part of Statistics Canada's labour division responsible for the monthly employment and payroll survey, and all the activities of the pay research bureau and, if so, what would be the effect of such a move on Statistics Canada's gross national product (GNP) data and other essential components of its system of national accounts?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): 1. The proposed labour information bureau will not give access to Income Tax records.

2. No. Given the nature and use of the collective bargaining and labour-related data that the labour information bureau will be disseminating, it will not require social insurance numbers.

3. No. In December, 1979, an interdepartmental labour statistics committee comprising major federal data producers and under the chairmanship of Labour Canada, was set up. Its goals are to review federal labour data activity and to make recommendations for better co-ordination in federal labour data production and efficiency.

The areas within the federal government that this committee's study may affect are labour data branch of Labour Canada, labour division of Statistics Canada, Corporation and Labour Unions Returns Act (CALURA) at Statisti Canada and the pay research bureau.

The committee's report is not due until the fall of 1980. However, as the focus of the committee is on improving data collection and production, it is very unlikely that their report will affect the functions of the proposed labour information bureau which would perform a data dissemination service, only.

DATA ENCRYPTION EQUIPMENT

Question No. 950—Mr. Beatty:

As of May 5, 1980, did government regulations require that all computers connected as hosts to the (a) Datapac network of TCTS (b) Infoswitch network of CN/CP Telecommunications encrypt any information provided for their databanks and, if so, in each case (i) did the host computers automatically encrypt the information (ii) what company manufactured the encryption equipment and what model of equipment was employed?

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): No. The government has no such regulation. Data encryption devices are mandatory only when classified information involving national security matters is transmitted over telecommunications facilities, including cases where computers are involved. As of May 5, 1980, these devices were not used on the Datapac or Infoswitch networks.

COMPUTER DATABANKS—INFORMATION

Question No. 951—Mr. Beatty:

As of May 5, 1980, did any central authority within the government audit the information contained in computer databanks connected to Infoswitch or Datapac to ensure compliance with Treasury Board regulations concerning sensitive information contained in such databanks and, if so, which databanks, if any, contained information not permitted under the regulation?

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): No, as of May 5, 1980, no central authority within the government audited the information contained in computer data banks connected to Infoswitch or Datapac.

The Security Evaluation and Inspection Team (SEIT) of the RCMP is responsible for conducting, upon request from departments, inspections and evaluations of government EDP facilities as well as private sector facilities engaged in processing government information under contract.

The RCMP makes recommendations to deputy ministers, who are responsible for determining within general government policies and procedures, the level of security required by EDP services employed to process the work of their department. The RCMP follows up on the results of inspections and deputy ministers must report back to the RCMP on actions taken on the recommendations that were made.

The RCMP is responsible for reporting to the Treasury Board secretariat on the over-all status of EDP security in the government. Although from time to time the SEIT finds situations which need improvement, these are not reported individually to Treasury Board but are reported to deputy ministers who must take action on these recommendations.

EDP security, including aspects dealing with telecommunications, is considered an integral part of management responsibilities and is not singled out for special audits by a central agency. The Treasury Board directs departments to perform periodic independent audits of the financial, operational and security aspects of departmental EDP activities.

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—CONSTITUENCY OF PEMBINA

Question No. 956—Mr. Elzinga:

1. What was the amount spent in the constituency of Pembina by the Young Canada Works Program in (a) 1974 (b) 1975 (c) 1976 (d) 1977 (e) 1978 (f) 1979 and, in each case, what was the (i) name of the project (ii) total contribution by the government?

2. Are there any projects planned for the near future and, if so, what is the (a) name of the project (b) estimated amount to be spent by the government?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. The Young Canada Works program began in 1977.

PRIME MINISTER FIDEL CASTRO—MEETING WITH PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 989—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Since April 20, 1968, did the Prime Minister meet with Prime Minister Fidel Castro of Cuba and, if so (a) in which locations and on what dates (b) for what purpose?

2. Did the Prime Minister meet together with the Prime Minister of Jamaica and the Prime Minister of Cuba at any time at a meeting publicly known or otherwise and, if so (a) in which locations and on what dates (b) for what purpose?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. Yes.

(a) Havana, Cuba, January, 1976.

(b) During an official visit to Cuba, Venezuela and Mexico.

2. No.

(a) and (b) Not applicable.

TRANSPORT—BRAKE FAILINGS ON CERTAIN MOTOR VEHICLES

Question No. 1,018—Mr. Siddon:

1. In (a) 1977 (b) 1978 (c) 1979 (d) 1980 to date, did the Department of Transport receive complaints concerning partial or complete brake failings in Volkswagen Rabbits, Sciroccos, Audi Foxes and Dashers and, if so (i) how many (ii) how many involved a motor vehicle accident?

2. How many reported accidents (a) involved personal injury (b) led to one or more fatalities?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Transport Canada has received 70 complaints up to May 31, 1980 about brake failures on VW Rabbits, Sciroccos, and Dashers and Audi Foxes. The following is the chronological order of receipt:

1980 (to May 31)	57	0

2. No injuries or fatalities have been attributed to these failures.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—EMPLOYEES TRANSFERRED

Question No. 1,056—Mr. Herbert:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 273, how many of the forty employees indicating their willingness to be transferred to Charlottetown, P.E.I., in 1980, have (a) French (b) English as their mother tongue?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): (a) 12; (b) 28.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I have a point of order that I would like to raise with the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council. On May 12 I placed a starred question on the order paper with regard to the formula for DREE grants for revitalizing rail relocation in Winnipeg. I raised this matter two weeks ago in the House to ask what has caused the delay in answering this starred question. Could the parliamentary secretary inform me today what is the problem with regard to answering this question?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, it is very difficult to determine how fast the various questions will be answered. There are over 1,000 questions on the order paper this year. I believe that we have answered about 280 of those questions, which is a very good record.

Mr. Paproski: No, it is not.

Mr. Collenette: I think that it is quite a good record. It is certainly better than the record of the last government.

Mr. Paproski: Now, don't procrastinate.

Mr. Collenette: My friend from Edmonton North would like to debate the matter. I shall inform the House tomorrow of the exact number of questions which have been answered.

With regard to the hon. member's particular question, I have made note of the number and I shall pursue the matter. I might say to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) that he brought up many of the same concerns during debate on Bill C-35 last Friday. These concerns are on the record and can be found in Hansard. That bill is now before committee, and I hope that the hon. member will explore those questions further with the minister with regard to anything that he might like to know about DREE as it relates to Winnipeg. The minister will be before the committee on Bill C-35 over the next two weeks.

Mr. Paproski: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, I would like to say to the parliamentary secretary that we during our short period of time in power did not have time to answer any of these questions.

Mr. MacEachen: An honest admission.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, I have two questions on the order paper to which I would like answers. They deal with the Metric Commission and are very important to me. The questions are Nos. 810 and 811, and I simply want to bring them to the attention of the parliamentary secretary.

DISBURSING OF FUNDS FROM LOTTERIES

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to stand in the House after reviewing a question that I posed on Friday to the minister of sport and his subsequent answer. I know that the minister would not want to mislead the House in any way. He said in part on Friday that in return Loto Canada will receive $24 million from the provinces. That $24 million is geared to the CPI. There is also the fact that we had to look after a promise made by the previous government with regard to two NHL hockey arenas. We also looked after the arena in Olds, Alberta. I am sure that the minister, when he comes into the House, will be able to rectify that particular error in his reply.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member should know that he has obviously raised a point of debate. If he is not satisfied with the answer that he has received, he should take advantage of other procedures to make his point in front of the House.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Madam Speaker: Shall all motions for the production of papers stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise with regard to notices of motions for the production of papers. I understand that the parliamentary secretary has said that there are none to be produced today. I would refer him to motion No. 2 which I put on the paper at the beginning of this session. I will not take the time of the House to outline all the detail therein. The question concerns the Taschereau papers which deal with matters of national security. These papers were sent back to the National Archives by Mr. Michael Pitfield after the usual time at which they would have been made public, namely 30 years. Presumably they were sent back on the orders of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the security committee of the cabinet.

I have asked that all copies of documents, letters, conversations and so on between the Prime Minister or the Privy Council office and the archives be produced to show why this was done. In other words, I want to know exactly what Mr. Pitfield said in his letter to the National Archives. I should think that it would be very simple for the government to say, "Yes, we are going to do it" or "No, we are not going to do it". However, nothing has happened.

This is a matter which concerns in particular Canadian historians, if no one else. The importance of this question is to learn the espionage history as to what has been going on in this country, the knowledge of which this government has continually attempted to block from Canadians. By hiding the Taschereau papers and not enlightening us, the government is obviously hiding the names of some people of prominence. Some of us have knowledge of who those people are.

I believe that it is a disgrace that the government will not say one way or the other what it intends to do. If it does not intend to produce these papers then it should say so, so that the matter can be transferred for debate; then those of us on this side of the House who wish to pursue the matter would be able to do so. Rather, the government is trying to hide the situation by saying nothing at all. Could the parliamentary secretary tell the House when notices of motion for production of papers No. 2 will be answered?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I stand to be corrected but I believe this matter was debated in the House last Thursday evening. Under the rules, I believe that there are 130 minutes or 140 minutes for such a debate. I understand there are 90 minutes for debate. If indeed we did deal with the matter last Thursday evening, and I think we did, then I find it somewhat impertinent of the hon. member to try to ask a question of me when he should be posing it to the President of the Privy Council during the question period.

If he wants to use the route provided by the rules, which is to lay down a motion for the production of papers, he should follow it through to its logical extension. It would then be debated and come to a division at the appropriate time.

That is all I have to say on this particular matter, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Cossitt: Yes, Madam Speaker. The parliamentary secretary has made a statement which I think is a reflection on me as a member of the House, and I must correct it.

Nothing of the sort happened last Thursday. He may not have been in the House. The debate at that time dealt with moving the Department of Veterans Affairs to the maritime provinces, to Prince Edward Island in particular, and had nothing whatsoever to do with the Taschereau papers. The notice of motion I am referring to has never been answered.

The parliamentary secretary has said that I should put the question to the President of the Privy Council and not to him, but he is here representing the President of the Privy Council. If he cannot answer it, will he guarantee that he will ask the President of the Privy Council to make clear what is going to happen at the next sitting of the House?

Mr. Paproski: Or resign.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, this is getting into something of a debate. I apologize for my error. I was around last Thursday but I did not pay attention to what was being debated on private members' hour.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Cousineau: The hon. member opposite was not interested; he asked for a quorum!

Mr. Collenette: That is a good point. My colleague mentions that the hon. member was so interested in the order of business that he was playing games with the rules, being very mischievous and calling for a quorum last Thursday when other members on that side of the House and on this side wanted to debate and get along with the government's legislation.

I will look into this matter, Madam Speaker. It is my understanding that notice of motion for the production of papers No. 2 should come up for debate tomorrow or perhaps in the next couple of weeks. The hon. member can then make his case with respect to the production of these papers.

Madam Speaker: Orders of the day. I am sorry, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette).

Mr. Collenette: I am sorry to interrupt you, Madam Speaker, but you did not call for the production of papers today. I think perhaps the conversation—

An hon. Member: She did.

An hon. Member: We said stand.

Madam Speaker: I did, but the House was interrupted.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GOURD—RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN BACKBENCHERS

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning the geographic arrangement of the House. Even though I cannot speak on behalf of all hon. members, I have the impression at least that I am expressing the opinion of several of my backbencher colleagues on both sides of the House and certainly that of my colleagues who sit in the south-west corner of the House. My question concerns an old problem caused by the geographic position, and more specifically the gap which separates members in the southwest corner, historically known as the "Little Chicago" in the House, from the Chair. Out of sight, out of mind, as the proverb goes. Because of this, Madam Speaker, members who sit in this corner have some difficulty in being seen, which inevitably makes it more difficult for them to express their opinions and ideas. This is unfortunate since very profound and wise thoughts cannot be heard and must remain untold.

Madam Speaker, since this gap cannot be closed, would it not be possible to reduce its consequences with certain tools or arrangements so that if south-western backbenchers must remain out of your sight, they will not remain out of your mind.

Madam Speaker: Am I to understand that the hon. member is complaining that members who sit in the southwest part of the House are not recognized as often as the others? I should remind him that only today I recognized the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin), the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins), and that I also recognized certain other members last Friday, if I am not mistaken. In fact, I have the impression that most members who have been recognized on this side of the House sit in that area. I believe that they often rise because they are afraid that I shall not see them, but they have provided me with instruments which will enable me to bring them closer to the proceedings, so to speak, and I shall certainly use them on occasion. However, I do not believe that the hon. member is justified in raising the question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—BETRAYAL OF ELECTION PROMISES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa) moved:

That this House unreservedly condemns the government for its outright betrayal of its election promises to lower interest rates, to cut taxes and to stimulate the growth of the Canadian economy, without a mandate from the Canadian people for such a reversal.

He said: Madam Speaker, the motion before the House does three things. It points out that, completely contrary to the promises made during the recent election campaign, completely contrary to the way the government in power voted in December, they have not lowered taxes as they promised, they have not taken action directly to control the level of interest rates in Canada and they certainly have done nothing to stimulate the Canadian economy.

As all members of the House will recognize, Madam Speaker, this is precisely the same motion that was presented to the House before Christmas and for which the government in power voted in order to bring down the Conservative government of the day.

As I indicated both on that occasion and in the subsequent election campaign, several members who are now ministers of the Crown supported this course of action, namely, to control our own interest rates and particularly to lower them in order to stimulate the economy and reduce taxes. The government has done none of these things.

You may ask why we present this motion today. It is not done in jest, Mr. Speaker; it is not done to be glib; it is done because all the circumstances that warranted the motion in December have compounded in their nature, have worsened in their circumstance, so that today the motion is even more warranted than it was before Christmas.

We have massive unemployment. According to Statistics Canada there are over 900,000 unemployed men and women. In real figures, if we include all those, young and old, who would like to work but are not counted in the statistics, there would be more than one million unemployed.

Plants are closing down in almost every part of Canada but particularly in the province of Ontario. Nine out of ten recently unemployed Canadians are in that province alone. Farm incomes were earlier predicted to decline by some 11 per cent in 1980 but more recent predictions suggest that they will be worse than that.

In the first quarter of 1980 there was a record number of bankruptcies of small businesses. In terms of economic indicators, there was negative growth in the first quarter of 1980. Forecasts by observers, both inside and outside government, are that the final results for 1980 will show a negative growth as well.

Finally, and of great importance to Canadians wherever they may live, there is what even the United States government is now recognizing as the most serious recession in the United States since World War II. This is bound to have a profound impact on Canada in the months ahead. So I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that what we called for in December and what the Liberals voted for then is required even more today.

What options does the government have? First, they can choose the one which is appropriate for the Liberal party which I shall call the Mackenzie King option—that is, to do nothing and hope and pray that the problem will somehow disappear on its own.

The second option is to worsen the recession by intensifying the Canadian Conservative party policy which is being so ruthlessly and foolishly applied by Margaret Thatcher in England more systematically than even was called for by the Conservatives here. We have seen the results in England—an increase in inflation and, according to figures that were just published today, the highest level of unemployment in Great Britain since World War II. That is the result of option two. So we could opt for the Mackenzie King solution, or the Tory approach which takes us back to the 1920s.

Third, we might recognize the real nature of the Canadian economy and take some constructive, positive government action. It is the latter that we recommend. We say that we should do the following, and I want to justify it both in social and economic terms today. I hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will reply and deal with both arguments.

We say we should cut taxes. We should take other direct stimulative measures and should establish a government controlled low interest rate policy, which I say in this context would ensure that the banks, the oil companies and the department stores pass on those officially established low interest rates.

What kind of action is the government taking. Or, more correctly, what kind of action does it seem to be taking, because it is hard to tell precisely what this government is doing? I think that the government is likely to take the "MacEachen muddle through" approach. This means two steps to the side and one step backwards. In other words, two doses of John Crosbie, on the one hand, and one of Margaret Thatcher, on the other. This is an unbeatable combination if we want to make a bad economic situation even worse.

In this context I would like to say that at least the Tories are honest about their conservatism. The Liberals like to pretend that they are progressive when, in reality, they inflict upon us conservative policy.

If the government takes this approach in everything, including what the minister has said in the House of Commons—he indicated that is what the government is going to do—as surely as we are sitting in this chamber today, the following will be the result in 1980; the economy will get worse, not better; we will have more shutdowns, not fewer; the thousands of young people who will be leaving school—many of them this week—will not be able to find jobs; and the incomes of the farmers of Canada, as the business section of The Globe and Mail pointed out yesterday, will take a further "steep decline".

That is the situation we are headed for in 1980 if the government pursues the policy it has indicated is likely ever since it was restored to office. What is the alternative? The alternative we in this party say is, first of all, to be honest with the people of Canada and to say: "Yes, there are no palliatives in the short run that are going to restore completely full employment, to restore completely the expectations for young men and women that they will get jobs in the short run". Anyone who is saying anything like that is either dreaming or lying, one or the other.

A long-range solution is required in this country. We are saying that with shutdowns of branch plant industries all across our land, the long-range solution has to be to get Canadian control of Canadian industry. Having said that, and having said that there is a necessity to level with the people of Canada about that kind of industrial strategy that is required here, the like of which has been applied in other industrial nations, I would also say that in the immediate context there are certain important things that can and ought to be done to improve the situation.

First, tax cuts. We are advocating a cost of living tax credit, a form of indexing aimed at those who need it; that is to say, the average income earner and the poor. In our judgment, this would be both more expansionary and equitable in its effects than the Conservative-Liberal form of indexation, which we would abolish. The current indexation costs the treasury of Canada $1.4 billion. Our proposal for tax reform and tax cuts would cost some $2 billion. This is a next increase in cost to the treasury of some $600 million.

Consider the consequences, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I want to compare our suggestion with the Liberal-Conservative indexation that we now have in Canada, which as I have said we would abolish. Under it, a man or woman earning less than $5,000 a year gets nothing. Someone earning $7,000 a year would get $63 in tax benefits. But if a person is earning $50,000 a year, that person gets $763 with indexation. If you are really "poor", earning $75,000 a year, with this Liberal-Tory kind of tax measure you would save in the present tax year some $948.

The principle, as the financial critic for our party has pointed out a number of times in recent weeks, is very clear. With this kind of indexation, those who have most get the most, and those who have nothing get nothing. That sort of sums up Liberal and Conservative economic policy in terms of the tax field.

I want to contrast that with what we would put in its place, and put in its place tomorrow if we had the authority. Our cost of living tax credit form of indexation would provide the following kind of benefits. For a married taxpayer with two dependants, a man or woman earning $5,000 a year or less, instead of getting nothing as they do with indexation, would get $358. Someone earning $7,000 would get $357. Those who earn $50,000 or $75,000 a year, instead of getting much more, as is the case under the Liberals and the Tories indexation proposals, under our proposal would get not a cent in terms of tax reduction because they do not need it. The turning point for us and our tax proposal would be a family whose income is $35,000 a year. Those earning $35,000 or less would get a tax benefit. The lower the income, the greater the benefit. For a person earning more than $35,000, there is no tax benefit at all.

Under our proposal, an average family with two dependants earning $18,000 a year—and that is the average family income in Canada—would get some $258 in tax benefits. The net effect of such a proposal is as follows. First, it would be more just, and surely in a tax system justice ought to count for something. In the last ten years the rich in Canada have got relatively richer and the poor have got relatively poorer. Overnight, if we brought in this kind of tax measure, that kind of pattern would be turned around, and it is that kind of action which this party favours.

Second, because we are talking about the over-all effect on the economy, our proposal would in fact be more stimulative because the tax benefit is going to low and middle-income people. As a result, more purchases would be made, because unlike upper-income people, the middle and low-income people spend most of their money. Therefore, the effect on the economy, quite apart from the justice argument, would be much more positive than the present tax system.

Mr. Paproski: Make the rich pay?

Mr. Broadbent: I will not even comment on that.

The second part of our proposal is a regionally-oriented capital development expenditure program spread over two years. By means of this we are advocating spending some $400 million to provide needed facilities in a number of cities across Canada. Our estimate is that this would provide an additional 60,000 jobs. The tax proposal which I mentioned a moment ago would produce some 100,000 additional jobs, according to our estimate. We also advocate spending some $500 million on railway upgrading as recommended by the Hall commission. This would be good not only for the farmers in the west but would also provide employment for some 70,000 Canadians.

Third, we say $300 million in urban transit should be spent. Again this is good for a variety of reasons. It is good to stimulate the economy, but also it is an important means of conserving energy. As everyone knows, urban transit is the best form of transportation for our cities in terms of conserving energy. That program would produce some 40,000 jobs.

Finally, $500 million would go into a special housing program to reverse the recent pattern of CMHC, which has been underspending its own capital budget. We would concentrate on non-profit and co-operative housing, housing for the people who need it most. Again, two needs are met. Canadians who need housing would get it and there would be 70,000 new jobs produced. That is some 240,000 jobs in all.

I want to stress that this four-part capital works program would be worked out in conjunction with the provinces and the priority targets would be those parts of Canada which have the highest unemployment levels.

The combined package of this capital investment program plus the cut in taxes over two years would provide in the public and private sectors a total of 400,000 additional jobs. In suggesting these ideas, I am sure the Minister of Finance will say they are not new. I say to him in passing that good ideas do not necessarily have to be new. I just wish the Liberals would pick up on some of our old ideas and apply them. If they did, the country would be in a lot better shape.

I want to deal with two important points that have been raised by the Minister of Finance, who has suddenly officially acquired his conservative clothing. They have also been raised by the official opposition and by a number of newspaper editorial writers across the country. They attack the kind of program that I am now outlining. They do so on the basis of a profound mythology that is being re-established in Canada, something that I thought came to its final and crushing end after World War II. Evidently it has not.

What are the aspects of this mythology? First, we should not have such a program because, myth number one, we have a terrible record already in terms of our deficit. How does the level of our deficit fit in with the reality of other industrial countries? If you look at the seven major OECD countries and compare their deficit as a pecentage of their GNP, how does Canada fare? Germany, which is not doing badly in the economy—and I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had a useful chat with Helmut Schmidt—has a larger deficit. Japan, which has also not done badly in recent times, has a larger deficit, as does Italy and the United Kingdom. There are only two countries among the major seven whose deficit is somewhat "better"—and I put that in quotation marks—than ours, and they are France and the United States.

If you look at our record of deficit as a percentage of our GNP and compare it with other industrial countries, Mr. Speaker, we are doing very well indeed. We should get rid of this myth, and myth it is, that we are much too much in debt already as a nation. I have said in the past, and I repeat today, that the private sector, large corporations and small, borrow money and go into debt for future expansion and development. No one criticizes that. It is time we recognized that if it is appropriate for the private sector to go into debt for some period of time, if it is using those funds for investment to create jobs, it is damned well appropriate for the government sector to do the same. It makes economic sense in both cases.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Myth number two; government expenditures have been running wild. That is the other cliché we have heard from both the Conservative and Liberal parties. What is the reality? There have been some relative increases in our debt, even if it is not nearly the same level which exists in the majority of other OECD countries. What has been the reason for the debt? Has it been that government expenditures have been running wild? Of course not. The most recent figures available, 1977, indicate the contrary. Of the 14 selected OECD countries, average government expenditure as a percentage of GNP was 44.1 per cent. In Canada, it was 41 per cent, substantially below the average. That is a good comparison for us.

The reason we have gone into debt is for quite different considerations, and I now want to address those. Any party or government has to be concerned about the long-range implications of its level of debt, just as in the private sector a small or large corporation cannot go on with a debt piling up indefinitely. The question is a serious one. It must be answered at any given time with regard to the level of debt, how it is being used and how it compares with the situation in other industrial countries.

Why have we been increasing our deficit since 1975? Has it been because of the great so-called increase in expenditure by the government? Contrary to mythology, it has not. The main reason for the increase in our deficit since 1975 has been the increase in costs that have had to be borne. Tax revenues have gone down, higher unemployment insurance payments have been made and a high level of debt charges because of the high interest rate policy pursued by this and the preceding government has been forced upon the people of Canada.

Those are the main reasons for the increase in the debt of the people of Canada. It has almost nothing to do with the level of government expenditures as such. The reason we are having a decline in revenue coming from individual taxpayers and a decline in tax revenues from corporations is that the Government of Canada has not managed the economy well. We have had an increase in debt because of the incompetence of the Liberals who have governed this country for so long.

An hon. Member: And you propped them up.

Mr. Broadbent: We will hear from our friends who sit literally and metaphorically on our right in just a minute.

The solution is to turn this rundown economy around and get it moving in another direction. If our policy suggestions were implemented tomorrow, the following results would occur. More taxes would be paid by individuals who would be working instead of collecting unemployment insurance. Businessmen would pay higher taxes to the government instead of going out of business. Farmers would pay more taxes instead of losing income on their farming operations. There would be fewer payouts from the public treasury for unemployment insurance and welfare. Those would be the results of the kind of program we have advocated.

I want to say quite frankly that our package would constitute a $2.3 billion stimulus and would indeed increase the deficit by $800 million to $900 million in the current year. However, because of the stimulus provided in this year, we have calculated that the net effect within a couple of years' time would be a net reduction of $3 billion to $4 billion. It is that kind of planning which this party believes in, and it is precisely that kind of planning which is rejected by the two old-line parties.

I want to deal with another concern which has been expressed in editorials and elsewhere, which is that such a program at this time would be inflationary. But would it? I should like to suggest the contrary. Consider the following. We have a million unemployed; fact one. Fact two, the most recent capacity-utilization figures offered by the government itself for the first quarter of this year show that manufacturing in Canada is running at only 84.6 per cent of capacity and that in the important durable goods sector it is operating at only 80.4 per cent of capacity. These factors taken together mean that the economy should be able to take a lot of stimulus at this time without resulting in an increase in inflation.

However, just to hedge our bet and, what is more important, to qualify the judgment, we make an additional proposal. One of the important characteristics of modern western economies, one of the essential features of what has come to be known as stagflation, is that corporations, particularly large ones, do not respond to market conditions, even guided market conditions of the kind we are proposing.

It might well be the case that, if the government were to produce a package of stimulation of the kind I have been advocating, a number of corporations would use the opportunity to jack up their prices in an unwarranted way. That is precisely what has come to be known as stagflation in other countries. They would jack up their prices not because their costs went up, not because they were obliged to, but because they saw an opportunity to make greater profits.

In the face of this reality we are also saying that it makes economic sense to produce, concurrently with this kind of stimulative package, a fair prices commission which would be able to monitor what went on in the economy and would have authority to order a roll-back of every unjustified price increase. If this were to take place, if the government had enough innovative imagination to produce such a commission, two things would follow: many companies which otherwise would have boosted their prices would decide not do so because if they did they would be caught; second, those which did so would have their prices rolled back unless the increase could be justified.

Then there is the question of wage settlements, a very important factor in a modern economy. Wage and salary settlements in the rest of 1980 and in 1981 would be much more reasonable, because if workers believed the government was serious about dealing with prices and inflation they would be more reasonable in their wage demands. But as surely as we are sitting here, Mr. Speaker, if the government does nothing about unjustified price increases workers will be demanding, and deserving, much higher wage and salary increases.

The next subject I want to talk about is interest rates. I have no doubt the Minister of Finance is going to claim that he and his party have delivered the goods on interest rates. I say in advance that this is a phony claim and the Minister of Finance knows it.

Why do I say this? First, although rates have indeed dropped—and every Canadian has to be pleased that they have moved in the right direction—the reality is that, contrary to what the Liberals promised, they went up four times right after the election. But, more substantially, the method the government has used to establish interest rates is simply to link them in a fixed way to continental trends. The minister knows as well as anyone in this chamber that the reason rates have gone down in Canada is that they have gone down in the United States. And as surely as they will go back up in the United States, as they will at some point, they will again go up in Canada. We want an independently established, government-ordained interest rate policy.

The other point I would make is this. While the prime rate established by the Bank of Canada has gone down to 10.67 per cent, all those rates which affect Canadians directly, whether they are consumers, small businessmen or farmers, have remained virtually unchanged since the Liberals came to power. Consider the chartered banks. The prime rate is 13.5 per cent but the rate for consumer and small business loans remains at 16 per cent, the area they were in when the Liberals came to office.

Second, consider the retail implications of what the oil companies, the banks and other major retail concerns are doing. Chargex and Master Charge have not reduced their interest rate but have boosted it from 18 per cent to 21 per cent. We see all the commercials urging us to shop at the Bay. I can understand why; they are going to increase interest charges on their accounts to 23 per cent from October 1. Shell recently increased the interest charge on its credit cards to 21 per cent, Gulf is going up to 21 per cent on September 1 and dear old Esso, the largest in the field, not content with 21 per cent has announced it will increase its interest charges to 24 per cent on August 1 of this year.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Broadbent: The point I am making, Mr. Speaker, is that if you consider the impact of interest rates on small businessmen, farmers or consumers generally, quite apart from the fact that the prime rate, the Government of Canada rate, has gone down, the rate where it counts in the economy has remained virtually unchanged. It is the responsibility of the government to ensure that changes in the private rate are passed on to the ordinary people where they will do the most good.

I conclude by saying that the Liberals promised action on all these fronts. They promised a Canadian-controlled, low interest rate policy, they promised tax cuts and they promised stimulation of the economy. They have failed to deliver on any of those promises. The approach taken by my party would, in our judgment, produce jobs, reduce unemployment insurance pay-outs, lead to increased government revenue and within two years reduce the level of the public debt. The alternative, the course being pursued by the government—witness the "MacEachen side-step", the master of inaction—will produce continued stagnation in the economy, higher unemployment, increased business failures and a continued rise in the public debt. I have not the slightest doubt that, if the people of Canada were aware of the arguments involved and of their consequences, they would opt for our program any day of the week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will surprise no one in this House to learn that I am unusually interested in the motion before us, in its subject, in its source and in its history. I would like to deal with these, if I might, in reverse order. After all, this is the motion which ended the life of the last Parliament and stopped progress on many important changes which the nation needed.

The motion is introduced today by the New Democratic Party and I found it interesting that the leader of that party found it necessary to half-apologize for its introduction. It was introduced by the NDP to demonstrate that, while other parties might have failings, the NDP stands in a place apart—for NORAD and against it, for the Olympic boycott and against it, for the Parti Québécois and against it, for free speech, except when Paul MacEwan speaks freely of Marxists in the New Democratic Party in the province of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The CCF began as a party which was populist and a party that was principled. It became the NDP, controlled by the Canadian Labour Congress. And, Mr. Speaker, if there is a heaven for hypocrites, that will be the next stop for the members of Parliament sitting to the left of my party.

● (1550)

Mr. Clark: It is not surprising that they should propose motions. Motions are what the New Democratic Party is all about. Always motions, never action. Indeed, it is interesting to look at what happens to their leaders when some kind of action is available. I think of the Hon. Hazen Argue, that Les Benjamin of a decade ago, the man who railed in this House against wheat sales to China and who railed against the Senate, and who is now sitting in that hot bed of socialism, the Senate of Canada.

I think of the Hon. Tommy Douglas sitting now on the board of directors of Husky Oil. The question we have to ask ourselves is, what is in the works for Ed? What haven of socialism awaits him? Will it be Husky Oil? Will it be the Senate of Canada? What corporate welfare bum awaits the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent)?

I want to return shortly to the very creative approach to principle of the New Democratic Party, but first let us look at the cost to Canada of this motion the last time it was introduced in this Parliament. Thanks to this motion and the NDP's sponsorship of it last December, Canadians were denied a budget which set clear economic directions for Canada and laid down a firm plan which would cut the federal deficit in half within four years.

Thanks to this motion and the NDP's sponsorship of it last December, we now have a government which refuses to bring in a budget and which has already added more than $3 billion to the Canadian deficit. Thanks to this motion and the sponsorship of it by the NDP, the freedom of information legislation which my government introduced is being amended now to close the public of Canada out. Thanks to this motion and the NDP's sponsorship of it, the nuclear inquiry which was sought earlier this very day by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) has been shoved aside and shrouded in secrecy so that the people will be shut out and only the bureaucrats will take part. Thanks to this motion and the NDP's support of it, Canada has no energy agreement and no energy policy.

An hon. Member: Would you have provided us with one?

Mr. Clark: I hear the voice of the new Hazen Argue booming from the background asking if we would have provided one. Of course we would have, and he knows it. We would have provided a program which would have set this country clearly and emphatically on the road to energy self-sufficiency within this decade. The government opposite says it cannot be done. We know it could be done by following the policies which were set forward in the budget and in the proposals that the motion introduced by the New Democratic Party brought to a halt in this Parliament.

That proposal would have provided orderly and staged price increases to more realistic levels. It would have produced more than $6 billion in new federal tax revenues from the large corporations for energy investment by Canadians in Canada. It would have funded new supply programs, new conservation policies and a major effort to switch Canadians from scarce oil to more plentiful natural gas and other energy forms. It would have guaranteed lower income Canadians tax credits to adjust to higher energy costs. The New Democratic Party voted against that. It would have given farmers, fishermen and public transit special energy rebates. The New Democratic Party voted against that. The NDP motion wiped all of that out.

And for what? Today we have no energy agreement. We have no energy policy. Instead, we have a government with a revenue-grabbing policy intent on imposing a new tax on gas exports to push up energy costs for consumers, particularly in the province of British Columbia and the province of Saskatchewan, provinces which the New Democratic Party should be standing here defending. Instead, by their motion last December they imposed new and special burdens upon the people of Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

What else have we? We have in this energy program put forward by the Liberal party as a result of the Liberal-NDP coalition proposals for new refinery taxes which could add 27 cents a gallon to gasoline prices and an equivalent amount to home heating oil costs.

Thanks to this NDP motion Canadians were denied mortgage interest and property tax credits to help meet the high cost of home ownership. Farmers were denied a chance to turn the proceeds from the sale of farms into retirement income free of capital gains taxes. The Atlantic provinces lost the benefits of special tax contracts for new investments and new incentives for Canadian fishing vessel construction. Instead, we now have a government bent on punishing the poor through the de-indexation of personal income taxes. The New Democratic Party says it is happy about that. The Leader of the New Democratic Party says he wants to abolish indexing. He supports the proposal to punish the poor in Canada which is being put forward by the Liberal party. Together this Liberal-NDP coalition wants, over the next five years, to raise taxes by 180 per cent for families with taxable incomes of $10,000 and to bring back on to the tax rolls thousands of Canadians who are now too poor to pay any tax at all.

That is what this motion did for Canadians the first time around, and I am pleased that the New Democratic Party has agreed to recycle it this afternoon so that the people of Canada can be vividly reminded of just what the New Democratic Party has done for them lately.

There are a few other things Canadians should know about the New Democratic Party and its carefully cultivated image of consistency. Members of the New Democratic Party are as consistent as a rag in the wind, shifting with every breeze. On foreign policy, the hon. member for Oshawa said during the election campaign that he was 100 per cent behind President Carter's policy on Afghanistan. Then we heard from the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett). She condemned her leader for that statement, so the Leader of the New Democratic Party turned around and said he was not 100 per cent behind Mr. Carter.

The New Democratic Party is on record against participation in both NORAD and NATO. Then the Leader of the NDP in the election campaign said that he wanted to review that position. After the campaign his Ontario council passed a resolution accusing him of flagrant disregard of party policy. So, with the election safely behind him, the Leader of the NDP said that he still might have a review but that it would not change the position. The New Democrats are still against NORAD. The New Democrats are still against NATO, regardless of any contrary impression which might unfortunately accidentally have been left during the election campaign.

On national unity, the Leader of the New Democratic Party gave a speech in this House in which he praised everything about the Parti Québécois except its raison d'être, sovereignty-association. Then he refused to participate in the No campaign in the Quebec referendum. I can understand that. Since their Quebec leader was an active member of the Yes campaign, I suppose they did not want to divide their energies.

Then at the first ministers' conference the NDP asked for a voice without a vote. They wanted to be heard, but they did not want to be counted. That was the first time they had been quite so straightforward about defining their role. They want to be kibitzers at the card game and to tell other people how to play but not to get into the action themselves. That proposal was rejected by all of the premiers, including the NDP premier of the province of Saskatchewan.

I point out that that is not the first time the NDP in office has disagreed with the NDP in motion. The party to my left opposed tax credits for mortgage interest. Allan Blakeney made them the law of the province of Saskatchewan. The party to my left said it would support only minor increases in oil prices. Premier Blakeney said, and I quote him exactly: "Prices should increase in regular steps and move toward the Chicago price".

Speaking of energy, the federal New Democratic Party produced in the last election campaign a campaign document advocating making the petroleum industry a regulated utility similar to Hydro. But that meant a federal bureaucracy would have to control provincial royalties, and they were not going to say that in the province of Saskatchewan. In fact, they were not prepared to discuss federal control of resources in Saskatchewan at all. It becomes a little embarrassing when your own premier has gone all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada to protect the provincial jurisdiction that you want to destroy.

The NDP talk about small business, and then they advocate taxes which would wipe out many family enterprises. They declare themselves in favour of freedom of speech and freedom of information, and their Nova Scotia party evicts an elected member who had the temerity to speak out against what he regards as Marxist elements in the party in that province.

That is the New Democratic Party, the most unprincipled and inconsistent party in this Parliament, and I want on my behalf and on behalf of other hon. members to thank them for introducting a motion which gave us the opportunity to put their position on the record.

Now, if I might, I would like to turn to the government.

[Translation]

The Grits always boasted they were the low-income people's party. Isn't that beautiful! The truth of the matter is, Liberals have but contempt for those who can hardly make ends meet. There is ample proof of this. Who else but a party with contempt for low-income people could consider de-indexing personal income tax, as Liberals propose to do? Clearly the hardest hit Canadians will not be the high-income people. Indeed, the hardest hit by that barbaric step will be the citizens who have a hard time under the current inflationary period earning $10,000 of taxable yearly income.

These Canadians will have their personal income tax increased 180 per cent over a five-year period. Moreover, thousands of Canadians who are not paying any income tax now will become taxable as soon as de-indexing is effective. They will have to pay because of the incompetence of a government that inflicted on us a deficit that is now standing at the $14 billion level.

My party will not let such a mean and unjust proposal hit small wage earners, and I warn the government that we will be putting up a constant fight to prevent them from de-indexing personal income tax.

Mr. Speaker, you have there an example of the contempt felt by this government for small wage earners. It is not the only one. The Liberals are charlatans and their word is not worth more today than it was in 1974, when they fought price controls. Something similar is now happening in the energy area. Throughout the election campaign they fought the 18 cents tax on gasoline. But what are they now proposing, Mr. Speaker? They are considering a tax on oil sold to refineries. And the rate of that new tax will be 27 cents a gallon at the end of 1982. There is worse, however. As opposed to our tax, that only applied to gas used for transportation, the Liberal 27-cent-a-gallon tax will also apply to heating fuel. This means Quebeckers, whether rich or poor, will spend some $200 more on heating over the 1982-83 winter.

[English]

I want to speak for a moment more about indexation. I noted earlier that the leader of the NDP indicated again today that he wants to abolish the proposal for indexation; he wants to impose upon Canadians earning $10,000 a year a 180 per cent tax increase over the next five years. That is what the NDP believes in, that kind of abolition of the indexing proposal. He spoke of it in Vancouver in October of 1976. His finance critic spoke in August of 1979 about their plan to do away with indexing and to put that kind of burden on the poor of Canada. We do not know, naturally, if they spoke for all in their party. We have not heard the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam or others who normally take issue with the positions which the party spokesmen take. We do not know if she will prevail or they will prevail, but that at least is their position on the record. They want to attack the principle of indexing. They want to impose that kind of burden upon the poor of the country.

I say that it was this party, under the leadership of my distinguished predecessor, the Hon. Bob Stanfield, which pioneered the concept of indexation and finally forced a former Liberal government to enact that concept. This party has no intention of allowing the present government to proceed with their plan to take away that benefit from the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Government of Canada has the responsibility to lead the fight against inflation. Without indexation the government has a vested interest in profiting from inflation. That is unacceptable to this party, unacceptable to the people of Canada, and it should be unacceptable to this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The government has a responsibility, if it wants to increase its revenue, to put tax proposals openly and—although I find it difficult to associate this word with the government—honestly before Parliament and before the people. De-indexation is a back door tax increase. That is unacceptable to the people of this country, it is unacceptable to this party, and it should be unacceptable to this Parliament. I say to the government, and especially to the Minister of Finance: If you need more tax revenues, deal with that need honestly, openly and responsibly. I say to him that tax revenues to help reduce the deficit are one matter; tax revenues simply to feed the appetite of this government to spend the public's money is something else. We on this side of the House will oppose any budget which seeks to inflict upon Canadians higher taxes and higher deficits.

This motion today allows us the opportunity not only to draw to the attention of Parliament and of the public the record of inconsistency of the New Democratic Party, but also allows us, through an amendment, to have the House of Commons express its position on the question of indexation. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the motion be amended by adding the following: "and in particular rejects the plan to de-index the personal income taxes of Canadians."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House has heard the motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). While I am on my feet, may I bring something to the attention of hon. members. The Chair was in some confusion about whether or not Standing Order 58(13) applied. Having consulted the Standing Orders, I want to indicate that if it is the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who is next to take the floor, he will have 30 minutes in which to speak.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in a sense the debate this afternoon reproduces the amendment which led to the defeat of the former government last December. I was somewhat amused when the New Democratic Party revived this amendment. I thought they wanted to recapture, for even a brief few hours, their moment of glory of last December when they drafted an amendment upon which we voted and brought down the government. They should not take too much pride in their craftmanship because I would tell them that the words may not have been very important in reaching that particular decision.

An hon. Member: You are right.

An hon. Member: Marriage breakups are always messy.

Mr. MacEachen: The occasion has been used by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to recount the alleged losses experienced by the Canadian people since last December. From my point of view, the recreation of the amendment allows us to reflect upon the number of positive things which have happened since last December and, more particularly, to discuss some of the economic problems which face the country at present.

● (1610)

I welcome the views expressed by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the Leader of the Opposition, and I assure them I will reflect a great deal upon the advice they have presented this afternoon.

If hon. members look back at the motion moved by the Liberal party last December, they will see the reason we voted to get rid of the Tory government and what has influenced our thinking since returning to office. Obviously the Liberal party, at that time the official opposition, had the opportunity to move the main motion, which was amended by the New Democratic Party, and it was upon the vote on the amendment that the government was defeated.

The motion moved by the hon. member for Windsor West, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), was:

—this House condemns the government for its budget which will place an unfair and unnecessary burden of higher gasoline prices, higher fuel oil prices, and higher taxes on middle and lower-income Canadians.

At a time when Canadians were faced with higher energy prices because of the actions of the OPEC countries, we believed that to add 18 cents a gallon to the cost of gasoline was unfair and would be damaging to the Canadian economy. That tax is gone. We believed that during a period of high energy crisis and difficult inflation, to ask low and middle-income earners to pay to subsidize those Canadians who are at least well off enough to afford a home was unfair. That program has also disappeared.

We felt that the limited spending resources of the federal government should be aimed first at helping those who need help most. One of our first steps after forming the government was to increase the guaranteed income supplement by $35 a month. We have taken action that removes the unfair measures proposed in the Conservative budget, and within the available resources of the government to help those who are hardest hit by inflation.

On energy, we are working as a government to bring about an energy package which can be presented to the House of Commons and which will be the basis upon which to provide a budget. I want to say a word or two about that later.

I want to share the view of the Leader of the Opposition in respect of the New Democratic Party, at least in one aspect, and that is its failure, in fact its repudiation of past efforts, at intellectual honesty. At one time the precursor of the New Democratic Party set a standard for at least intellectual honesty, if not political judgment. The Leader of the New Democratic Party has, I believe, the effrontery to come before the House presenting a motion and saying that in the last election campaign the Liberal party promised to reduce interest rates, promised to reduce taxes, and promised to produce a stimulative budget.

There is a word for that statement, and the word is simply that the statement is a lie. The NDP possibly will have another speaker during this debate and I challenge the next speaker to produce a statement from the leader of our party during the election campaign saying we would reduce taxes. On the contrary, the leader of our party on taxation said there would be review of the taxation system to ensure that it be fair and equitable, that no new taxes would be introduced or, contrarywise, that no new programs would be introduced in the House of Commons unless those programs were financed by new taxation or from savings from current programs. That is what was said on taxation.

On the stimulative deficit which the leader of the New Democratic Party has mentioned, he can search forever and a day and find no support for his allegation this afternoon. On the question of interest rates, he will search the speeches of the leader of our party to find a promise that we would reduce interest rates. I happen to be chairman of the platform committee and I know the sequence of events. I know the consideration given to that problem, and there was no commitment to lower interest rates. We did not make the commitment, but interest rates came down, and that is the main point I want to make.

The leader of the New Democratic Party ought to be more careful in searching out his facts and telling the House of Commons and the Canadian people the truth, because there is absolutely no statement made by the leader of our party, who was establishing the party platform during the campaign, to support any of his allegations.

We had a speech this afternoon from the Leader of the New Democratic Party which was extremely interesting. He has prescribed a fiscal and monetary policy for Canada that nobody in any other industrial country will support. I attended the meeting at the Summit recently. The seven main industrialized countries were represented there and not a single leader, not even Helmut Schmidt, would support the line put forward today by the leader of the New Democratic Party.

I remember one or two times in the House when the Leader of the New Democratic Party described or held Helmut Schmidt up as a soul-mate, a model of socialism in action that might be emulated by other countries; but no leader among the seven would subscribe to the economic policy put forward today by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, and that includes Japan, West Germany, the United Kingdom, the United States and all the others.

In fact, what the communiqué stated was that "determined fiscal and monetary restraint is required to break inflationary expectations". Earlier in that paragraph the communiqué stated that "the reduction of inflation is our immediate top priority and will benefit all nations. Inflation retards growth and harms all sectors of our societies". Even though I have committed myself to reflect upon the views of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, I will have to do so in the context of the prevailing opinion in all industrialized countries of the west that the immediate top priority is the battle against inflation, and that at this stage it would be unwise to change that fiscal and monetary stance in order to reflate the economy, and to reflate it in the extravagant way suggested by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the failure of the government, up to the present time, to bring in a budget. I find it passing strange that he would raise that subject in view of the long period which his minister of finance took before presenting a budget to the House of Commons. The former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), knows how fundamental energy policy is to the development of a budget or a fiscal plan. The hon. member has taken to using that more sophisticated phrase, "fiscal plan", and I use it in my vocabulary now following the usage by the hon. member.

The hon. member for St. John's West knows that an energy policy has immense implications for revenues, expenditures, and the deficit. He delayed his own budget until December, and even at that time his government had not succeeded in finalizing an energy agreement with the provinces. We are in the process of finalizing or seeking an energy policy now which will be more acceptable to all Canadians than the policy of the former government. As all hon. members know, negotiations with the producing provinces are proceeding at the present time with all possible dispatch.

The existing pricing agreement has been extended for one month. The ministers of energy of the various governments are at work and later, no doubt, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Premier of Alberta may be required to meet in order to finalize an agreement.

Mr. Clark: When the Prime Minister can fit it in.

Mr. MacEachen: Until that happens, the same reasons which prevented the former minister of finance from bringing in a budget apply in my case. I would also add that at the present time we are carrying further the expenditure planning system which was introduced by my predecessor on this side of the House and later developed by the former government.

Mr. Clark: That was something else your public servants overlooked.

Mr. MacEachen: Until our expenditure plan is fully developed, it would be better to delay a budget, though I am not using that as a particular reason. However, the fiscal plan would be more complete with a fully developed expenditure plan.

I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, that I wanted to talk about the economic situation. I shall begin by saying a few words about the economic situation of the United States. These are clearly difficult times in the United States. The economy has slid into the long awaited recession, and there is no doubt about that. The key uncertainty at the present time for forecasters is the severity of the recession and the strength of the recovery. That, of course, is a fact that is of great significance to Canada because there is no doubt that the U.S. recession will spill over into this country.

As a result, 1980 will be a year of very slow growth. In April, I forecast real growth of one-half per cent. The actual outcome could turn out to be much worse for this year. We have already begun to see some of the manifestations of the slow-down. According to the recently released national accounts, real GNE fell by one-half per cent in the first quarter of this year. The main sources of weakness were residential construction, inventories and exports. Unemployment climbed to 7.8 per cent in May. My forecast in April was that unemployment would average 8 per cent for the year. Consequently, the unemployment rate would have to rise above 8 per cent for the rest of the year. Also, I cannot rule out the possibility that the unemployment rate may rise even faster than this figure would imply.

The weakness in the growth of output is not the only problem. Inflation continues at a high level. The consumer price index in May was running about 9.5 per cent above the figure of one year ago. I expect inflation to average 10 per cent for the year. As I mentioned earlier, inflation is an international problem that has been refueled and fueled again by the absorption of hefty oil price increases. The prices of the goods which we import is helping to sustain inflation. Domestic forces contributing to inflation have been moderate and it is important that this continue.

There is no getting around the fact that we will go through a difficult period. In going through this difficult period, it is of the utmost importance that we retain a sense of perspective about the fundamental strengths of the Canadian economy. We are going into this period with an external value of the Canadian dollar and relatively moderate increases in domestic costs, all of which has put our manufacturing sector on a sound, competitive footing.

Canada is unique among industrial countries because of the opportunities offered by our energy sector. We must seize upon these opportunities and make the best of them. Our energy strategy is being developed with this objective foremost in mind. The greater certainty that will flow from a new energy policy framework will provide the basis for major economic developments in Canada, including oil sands plants, heavy oil production, Atlantic shelf exploration and development, new pipelines and gas conversion, all of which are in the offing and can be moved ahead. These developments will provide much of the driving force behind the economy in the 1980s.

The debate up to the moment has, in a sense, outlined the difficult choices which are facing the government and myself as Minister of Finance. Pressures are mounting to stimulate the economy with more expansionary fiscal and monetary policies.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party has called for large tax cuts and for massive expenditure increases. He has also urged the government to lower interest rates and to speed up or commence the process of rapid monetary expansion.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I assume that the hon. member understands the implications of his forced draft interest rate policy on the money supply. However, these are the views of the New Democratic Party which, in a sense, is the new New Democratic Party. Or perhaps it is the old New Democratic Party, because increasingly the views of the New Democratic Party are becoming somewhat old-fashioned. They present views which do not take into account the realities of the world. The Leader of the New Democratic Party paid slight attention to the question of inflation which is engulfing the world and threatening Canada. He has overlooked other countries which have followed his strategy and which have brought themselves to the brink of ruin today.

• (1630)

I think it is irresponsible to call for more expansionary fiscal and monetary policies in the present circumstances, as the Leader of the New Democratic Party has done today. He has obviously not taken into account a number of very important factors, such as, first of all, the very large stimulus provided by the large deficit we are running at the present time. The Leader of the Official Opposition talked about the four or five-year plan of his government to cut the deficit in half. What he had in mind, I believe, was their objective of cutting in half the financial requirements of the government and to cut the deficit by $2 billion.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party ought to keep in mind the fact that we are providing a very large stimulus to the economy at the present time.

Mr. Broadbent: How does the deficit compare with that of Germany?

Mr. MacEachen: I believe the Leader of the New Democratic Party has swept aside totally the difficult fiscal position of the Government of Canada at the present time. He has declined to consider the position of the federal government in comparison to that of the provinces, the relative situation of the five eastern provinces with respect to the federal treasury, and the relative situation of the largest oil producing province with respect to the federal deficit.

The fact of the matter is that the federal government is expected, presumably, to bear the main brunt of economic stabilization in Canada. It will be quite difficult for the federal government to discharge that responsibility unless it has access to more revenues that can come and ought to come from a new pricing arrangement.

As I said, the Leader of the New Democratic Party has overlooked a number of these important factors. He is asking me to administer a "quick fix" to the Canadian economy through massive new expenditures, through massive tax cuts and to administer lower interest rates. If I thought that recipe would solve the long-term problems facing the country, then I might be tempted to use it; but I believe that what that policy seems to recommend is the curing of short-term symptoms which in the long run make our situation worse.

Surely the objective of the Leader of the New Democratic Party and that of myself is precisely the same: to bring about increased productivity and a resumption of growth in the economy. I doubt whether, in the long term, that resumption of growth and increased productivity—new real investment—will occur if we put into place the policies recommended by the hon. member for Oshawa.

As I said earlier, my attitude in that respect was influenced by my attendance at the meeting of OECD ministers and by the discussions at the Summit. The consensus was that it would be desirable to maintain the battle against inflation and not to risk a renewed outbreak of inflationary expectations by an attempt to deflate at the present time.

The hon. member for Oshawa made another important point. He said that there is no difference between the fiscal stance of the former Conservative government and that of the present government. In that he made a very basic mistake. If the fiscal plan of the former minister of finance had been allowed to reach fruition, or if, indeed, we look at the predictions he gave us in his December budget, we see that his financial requirements for 1980-81 were stated as $8.2 billion and his deficit would be $11.7 billion.

The hon. member for Oshawa has obviously failed to take into account the new projections given in my April statement, which indicated that the financial requirements for 1980-81 had increased to $11.7 billion and that the deficit had increased from $11.7 billion to $14.2 billion. I regard this as a very considerable deficit and a very considerable stimulus to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Crosbie: Come off it!

Mr. MacEachen: I would differentiate my posture from that of the hon. member for St. John's West in that respect. The Leader of the Opposition identified the difference. The fact of the matter is that the policy which I have been pursuing leaves more in the economy and provides more stimulus of the economy than did the December budget. To put it another way, if the policies of the former minister had been allowed to come into effect, the economy would lose a considerable amount of this particular stimulus.

Mr. Clark: Hogwash.

Mr. MacEachen: If the Leader of the Opposition wants to consult the statistics he will find that the figures are perfectly correct.

This afternoon I have been asked, on the one hand, by the hon. member for Oshawa to undertake massive deflation, and I have been asked by the Leader of the Opposition, on the other hand, to revert to the deficit reduction policy of his government which would take place over a four-year period regardless of the impact of expenditure and the deficit on output, growth and employment. I have taken a course in between, Mr. Speaker. I have not followed the extremism of the former minister of finance nor the extremism of the Leader of the New Democractic Party.

Mr. Clark: In fact, you have done nothing at all.

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition is wrong again in saying that we have done nothing at all. What we have done is to avoid a deflationary net impact upon the economy of the $2.3 billion which his minister of finance would have extracted in the form of the excise gasoline tax. After he had paid for the mortgage tax credit program, he would have deflated the economy through that particular tax measure by $2.3 billion.

Mr. Crosbie: Where is your housing program? Where is the one you promised?

Mr. MacEachen: I want to make it very clear where we stand at the present time.

Mr. Crosbie: You are not standing, you are crawling.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to make it very clear where we stand at the present time.

Mr. Broadbent: Inertia has become the principle.

Mr. MacEachen: I am delighted at what has happened. I have deserved the opposition of both opposition parties. It gives me some comfort that I am following a more moderate course. What I am saying is that both fiscal and monetary policy at the present time is set to maintain sustainable growth at declining rates of inflation.

Mr. Crosbie: Decline in the GNP, that is great growth!

Mr. MacEachen: The onset of the recession will not lead me to adopt the very massive tax cuts and the very massive expenditure proposals of the Leader of the New Democratic Party. The onset of the recession will not lead me to balloon up the deficit as he has prescribed this afternoon. On the other hand, the prescriptions of the Leader of the Opposition will not be followed either; that is, to follow a four-year program of deficit reduction regardless of the impact on growth, employment and jobs. It seems to me that what is required at the present time is a more moderate course—

Mr. Clark: Of doing nothing at all?

Mr. MacEachen: —a course that will continue until an energy program is put in place and it is possible to bring down a budget to address the total problems in the way we would all want.

Mr. Clark: This year, Allan?

Mr. Kempling: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. MacEachen: Finally, may I say a word about the amendment moved by the Leader of the Conservative party, an amendment which in its dishonesty is rather apparent. He refers to a plan—

Mr. Clark: Your plan.

An hon. Member: Ask Ian Stewart.

Mr. MacEachen: —to de-index the tax system.

Mr. Clark: It is on the record.

Mr. MacEachen: There is no such plan. The fact that the Leader of the Opposition puts it in a motion will give it no more dignity than the allegations made by the hon. member for Oshawa which were so severely castigated by the Leader of the Opposition because they appeared in the amendment last week.

Mr. Clark: Then you can vote for the amendment.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, let me just deal with the point made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that there is no plan to de-index the income tax. How can he say that after what he has said here in this House? I refer to Hansard for June 17, 1980, at page 2176, where the Minister of Finance, in his usual and obscure way, finally makes a definite statement about something. In response to a question put by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), our critic on industry, trade and commerce, the Minister of Finance said this:

Election Promises

But I would say that just recently the financial critic for the NDP, I believe just a moment ago, referred me to the institute on public policy, suggesting that I should read its publication for my instruction. I understand that that body, as one example, has recommended certain changes in the index system in order to deal with the current situation. I make that point simply to tell the hon. member that it is not something one ought to drive out of one's mind as being totally unworthy of consideration.

For that minister, this is a definite, explicit statement; it is not something one ought to drive out of one's mind as being totally unworthy of consideration. Our amendment says: "Mr. Minister, drive it out of your mind as being totally unworthy of consideration". That is the effect of our amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister of Finance went on to say this:

Even his colleague, the former minister of finance, told us that he had considered the proposal: that is what I am doing at the present time.

This is what the Minister of Finance said in this House on June 17, 1980. Today is June 25. He said that eight days ago and today he says there is no need for our amendment.

Mr. MacEachen: There was no plan. There never was a plan.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister said he is considering the proposal. This amendment says: "Mr. Minister, do not bother considering it any longer; do not put the blocks to the poor innocent taxpayers of Canada who voted for you on February 18, little knowing that you were going to de-index the income tax system so that you could put a crown of thorns around their brow without any notice to them if you got the chance." He certainly never campaigned on that proposition.

While I am on the point of de-indexing, let me give some impartial opinions. Dian Cohen, not known to be a great supporter of our party, wrote in the Ottawa Citizen on Monday, June 9, 1980:

The recent Liberal suggestions concerning income tax increases and the end of indexing are at best cowardly, at worst despicable and dishonest.

So we ask government members to support our amendment so that the minister will not go forth with this cowardly, despicable and dishonest matter that he is now considering, which he admitted himself on June 17 he is considering. I tell him to get it out of his mind.

Further on in the article written by Dian Cohen, she says, that it "goes against the grain of everything that is honest and fair". Where are the honest and fair fighters that we had on the other side when we were in office for some short period of time? Where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray)? One would have thought he would have growled his way from Ottawa to Vancouver fighting this proposal if we had listened to what he said when he was in opposition last fall. Where is he?

What did Mr. John Bossons, a professor at the University of Toronto, say? He said this:

It would hit low-income people the hardest. It would hit them even harder next year and harder yet the year after that.

Mr. Bossons went on to say that the taxes of a one-income family with two children, in which the father earns $10,000 a year, would go up 30 per cent in 1980 if the government drops indexing. But if the father's income does not go up, and assuming an inflation rate of 9 per cent a year for five years, the cumulative effect would be for his taxes to go up 180 per cent by 1985. That is the little present which the Minister of Finance wants to give to the low income taxpayers of this country. I could give a lot more examples, but I will not.

One of our newspaper columnists, a great Canadian national statesman named Charlie Lynch, wrote a column which made a lot of sense in the Montreal Gazette for June 25. Mr. Lynch came to the conclusion that the NDP's motion seemed preposterous. That is just what it is. He says to the Leader of the NDP that he should cease to be Georgie Porgie who hits the girls and runs away. He is Georgie Porgie, pudding and pie, who kissed the girls and ran away.

An hon. Member: "Made them cry".

Mr. Crosbie: All right, "made them cry". The Minister of Finance has been asked to kiss a few people here today, or was it the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? A kiss from him would certainly make you cry. So I say, cease being Georgie Porgie. Never mind these irresponsible motions which the NDP are bringing in which they think are so clever, because this one was a motion which the Liberals voted with the NDP on last December 13, and that the same motion will be embarrassing to the government.

It so happens that the motion this time is relevant, and one can vote for it with a good heart and in all clear conscience. Because if there ever was a group that should be unreservedly condemned for their outright betrayal of election promises to lower interest rates, cut taxes and stimulate the growth of the Canadian economy, this is the group.

What were some of their promises? Even the guru who recently left the gondolas will have to admit that there were some promises. What are they? Here is a CP dispatch from Toronto dated January 12 which reads as follows:

A Liberal government would hold down government expenditures—

We have just had a $2 billion increase in government expenditures to $60.4 billion. The then leader of the opposition in Toronto said that a Liberal government would hold down government expenditures. It is out of the window with that promise; that was discarded immediately. The CP dispatch continued by reporting that the Liberals would:

—reduce the budgetary deficit and make the tax system more equitable, Liberal leader Pierre Trudeau promised Saturday.

The deficit has gone up $3.7 billion so far to in excess of $14 billion. So much for that promise.

Now I will deal with the phrase "make the tax system more equitable". Yes, this can be done by de-indexing the income tax system or by imposing an oil refinery tax at the refinery level so that every consumer of products from a barrel of oil in this country will have to pay higher taxes, including those who heat their homes in the maritime provinces and elsewhere in Canada. That is the more equitable tax system which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that Saturday in Toronto.

What else did he promise? He promised a made-in-Canada oil price that is fairer to all Canadians. When will that materialize? We were defeated 194 days ago, on December 13, yet this government which defeated us has not yet brought down a budget. It has no alternative proposals and it has no oil price agreement. Where is the made-in-Canada oil price agreement? Where is the double-tracking? The Liberals were going to double-track the railway tracks from Winnipeg to Vancouver. They have not double-tracked the railway tracks. All they have done is double-cross the country. They have given up. The only pledge they made that they are keeping is to double-cross this country. That is what this motion is about. That is why we will support the main motion once our own amendment is carried.

• (1650)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: We won't get to the main motion; we will be having a summer election.

Mr. Crosbie: A summer election, I would welcome that. We would be over there with about 250 members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is what you said last December.

Mr. Crosbie: At the same meeting in Toronto, the Prime Minister said a Liberal government would reduce the deficit. Then he made a qualification, but not at the expense of jobs, growth and the attack on inflation. He has not reduced the deficit. He has increased it $3.7 billion. He has increased unemployment. He has reduced growth, and he has not attacked inflation. Therefore, he has done none of this.

This is what the great man promised in Toronto. He said that new government programs would be financed by reallocating existing expenditures or by increasing taxes. Yes, the minister has increased taxes, the taxes he voted against in my budget of December 11. With the exception of the excise tax on gasoline, he has brought them back into the House or he is putting them through the House now. That is how he is increasing taxes.

He promised not to add to the deficit. The Prime Minister said he is going to review the tax system to ensure that all corporations and individuals will make their fair contribution. Isn't that pretty? Already the Minister of Finance has done that and he is going to do away with indexing.

Mr. MacEachen: Don't be like the NDP, John, be honest.

Mr. Crosbie: In that way we will all make our fair contribution. The Prime Minister said they would not make many promises during this campaign. I am glad that they did not because they have broken every one they did make.

Then they were going to develop industrial policies to stimulate economic growth. That was a promise of the Prime Minister. What happened? We all know that in the first quarter our real gross product here in Canada declined one half of 1 per cent. Can anybody stretch their imagination to say that they have stimulated economic growth?

They are going to create jobs. How many were unemployed in May in Canada? There were 904,000. The rate is up to 7.8 per cent, yet the Prime Minister is going to create jobs. He is going to increase Canadian ownership and control the economy. A fat chance! Nobody will want to own this economy if this government continues with its lack of policy and lack of thrust for the next four years.

He was going to protect poor and middle income Canadians by helping first those who most need assistance. Yes, by taking away the indexing, with the results I have already explained. He is going to do away with the mortgage interest and property tax credit scheme. He did do that. Where is the great scheme to help renters and home owners that we used to hear about from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he was in opposition? There is not a word about that.

What happened to interest rates? Interest rates went up to 16.2 per cent during the period this government has been in office. They are down again now, but we know that has nothing to do whatsoever with the Minister of Finance because he himself was good enough to admit that in one of his few frank moments. In fact, he has few moments, frank or otherwise, as far as I can see. On June 13, as quoted in the Ottawa Journal, he said in all modesty, and I quote:

—there is no way we can insulate ourselves totally from the U.S. recession.

He made that admission. On April 18, he said lower interest rates were welcome news, but it is worth pointing out that the high interest rates we have had and the very rapid increases in these rates recently have been the direct result of action taken in the United States. He admits he cannot affect interest rates one way or the other. They go up, they go down. They follow the United States kangaroo. When the kangaroo in the United States jumps up, up comes the little pup from down in the belly and the interest rates go up here in Canada. The Minister of Finance is like a little kangaroo pup in the belly of the United States kangaroo. Up, down, up, down. The Minister just went to Venice. There the little kangaroo had a ride with the big kangaroo in a gondola.

What else did they want to do with the tax system? On March 24, only a month after coming into power, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) came out with this. I quote from the Ottawa Journal:

Included in the minister's list of tax exemptions which she would like to be re-examined were the exemptions for the aged, the married and for children, as well as those offered corporations.

The minsiter wants to do away with tax exemptions for the aged. She wants to do away with tax exemptions for the married and for children. Well, if you are not married and you are not aged and you are not a child, who are you? She wants to do away with exemptions for everyone. That is the new, equitable policy of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, wanting to put her foot right on the neck of the aged taxpayers of Canada as well as the married and the children. This is the great new equitable tax policy that this government is coming forth with. I should say coming forth because it is not coming forthwith.

The minister mentioned the 18-cent excise tax. The suggested 18-cent excise tax on gasoline is going to be far less than the minister is going to be introducing this year and next in his refinery tax at the refinery gate level. That will be on gasoline and on heating fuel. It is going to be far less for the Canadian taxpayer than the de-indexing of the income tax and the other tax increases he is going to make.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party mentioned the level of the deficit of Germany. He keeps yelling, "What about Germany? What about Germany? Well, Germany has tremendous exports. It has tremendous credit in its current account with the rest of the world. It is a strong country. It does not have one drop of oil internally; it imports all its oil. However, it is doing well in the world. If they have a larger internal deficit than we, they can well afford it. They have not had those kinds of internal deficits for the last seven or eight years as we have.

It is not the deficit in any one year that is causing the difficulty today. It is the fact that we have had them for seven or eight years, culminating this year in a deficit in excess of $14 billion. That is what the trouble is. The minister has admitted that his hands are tied in trying to grapple with the recession starting in the United States because of that. He described in his remarks in this House the fact that the large budgetary deficit in the current account means he has little room to manoeuvre. That is the effect of the deficit.

We are not against deficits per se. Nobody suggests that they can be done away with immediately. However, one way to stimulate this country's economy is to start reducing the deficit over a period of three or four years and give the private sector some hope that they are going to be allowed to expand and create jobs. Give them some encouragement, not have them compete with the government for every dollar that they borrow or every dollar that they want invested in them.

The minister and his party did untold damage to this country by defeating us last December 13. Then we just about reached our oil agreement with Alberta. We had the deficit under control. We had an energy tax ready to go ahead in the oil and gas industry, so as to get necessary money to finance energy related projects throughout this country, including helping the taxpayers and the home owners of eastern Canada. All of these things were in place. We had suggested an energy tax credit to help lower and middle income people here in Canada. All of that has been stopped for the last six or seven months by the action taken last December 13.

What good is being done? There is no good being done except to put the minister's party back in power. We have had nothing but indications from the minister and different colleagues of his as to what their course is going to be. They have just been to Venice. What does the communiqué say? Inflation is to be given immediate top priority. There is going to be determined fiscal and monetary restraint to break inflationary expectations. That is the agreement reached in Venice.

How is the minister going to enforce that? He got up here today and said it is entirely meaningless, that he does not propose to do anything more. Why did they make this agreement in Venice? When the minister said that he supports governor Bouey's policy, the governor said on May 29 to the Senate that he thinks you really do have to stick with the monetary and fiscal policy approach limiting aggregate demand. The minister will not even tell us whether he plans to limit aggregate demand in this country even further, despite the 904,000 unemployed and despite the 0.5 per cent drop of the GNP in the first quarter.

We were in office and put forward detailed proposals for solving the economic problems of this country, we were defeated by the Liberals and the NDP and not put back in office by the people. Now the onus is on the people who put us out to come forward with their proposals and plans. But they are afraid to do so. Having defeated us, they have nothing to substitute for themselves.

On the tax question, the hon. member for Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette), in a 74-page platform paper for the Winnipeg meeting next week, says this. She noted in passing that Canadians are undertaxed compared with people in many countries. The Liberal MPs on the other side of the House think the Canadian people are undertaxed. Well, the MP for Mercier did not campaign on that basis; she did not rampage through Quebec before February 18 telling the people there they were undertaxed. But now she has prepared a discussion paper for the Liberal party in Winnipeg in which she suggests that the Canadian people are undertaxed compared with people in many other countries. What countries? How are we undertaxed? Who is she comparing us with?

The minister says it is terrible to propose this amendment because he would not dream of indexing the income tax. Well, his deputy minister of finance said to the Senate committee that they require more finances and taxes will have to go up. Who is the deputy minister of finance? The same man who was deputy minister of energy, mines and resources a few short months ago.

What have the seven Summiteers accomplished? They have accomplished nothing except this: the Prime Minister has agreed—he is agreed, now, with us, he has made full circle—that the maximum reliance should be placed on the price mechanism in restraining energy demands. This is what he admitted to at the Summit.

An hon. Member: What do you know?

Mr. Crosbie: What did they agree on? That is exactly what they agreed upon. They changed some wording so that they could pretend that world oil prices had nothing to do with it. We read this:

> Yesterday's communiqué says that in order to conserve oil and increase the use of alternative energy sources "maximum reliance should be placed on the price mechanism and domestic prices for oil should take into account representative oil prices".

So the government opposite is taking into account representative oil prices and it is going to put maximum reliance on the price mechanism. To do what? To conserve oil and increase the use of alternate energy sources. Well, to do that the price of oil has to go up. That is the policy of the government. They try to persuade the people of Canada that when prices go up they haven't gone up, they have gone down. And when the minister talks about his burgeoning deficit, it is not because he is stimulating the economy, it is because he is paying the money to foreign oil producers for the oil import subsidy. Because the cost of that has gone up, from $1.6 billion to $4 billion, as a result of the dishonest policy the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister put to the country just before the February 18 election. Four billion dollars is going right out of this country to foreigners—to the Mexicans, the Venezuelans. The Venezuelans are putting their prices up by another $2 a barrel in the next few days. All of that money is leaving Canada. And who pays the bill? The income tax payers pay it, not the person using the gasoline to drive his car. It is being borrowed now but the taxpayer will have to pay it back. The government has put a $4 billion burden on the taxpayers this year. The government has given the consumers of gasoline a break of a couple of billion dollars, but they have given the Canadian taxpayers a $4 billion blow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his time has expired. He can continue, however, if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: If there is not unanimous consent, I will retire, simply saying we intend to vote for the motion.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are debating today the motion proposed by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) asking the government to lower taxes, increase government expenditures in order to stimulate the economy, and to—

Mr. Clark: Who is this guy?

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has already spoken. As usual, he seems to be muttering. He could show the same courtesy as other members and listen attentively to another member's speech.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party also asks the government to control interest rates and to ensure that the banks and the large corporations which will benefit from a drop in interest rate pass this on to Canadian taxpayers and consumers.

For his part, the leader of the Progressive Conservative opposition mumbled, as he did earlier, that he blamed the government for considering de-indexation of the income tax system. Mr. Speaker, this debate is very interesting for Canadians. It is interesting because it shows two positions, the restricting position of the Progressive Conservatives, and the irresponsible position of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Speaker, this debate shows why the voters chose the Liberal party recently. They did so because the Liberal party holds the middle position between these two extremes. As we said during the last campaign, the Liberal party is the party of good sense, and the Liberal party, which heads this government, has a policy of good sense. In his statement of April 21, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said to Canadians that we were going through a difficult period. There are still inflationary pressures in Canada, and the Leader of the New Democratic Party would want us, as the government, to add fuel to the flames. He would want the government to take expansionist measures by, as stated in the motion, cutting taxes, increasing government expenditures, and so on. The Minister of Finance stated that he wanted to continue to fight vigorously against inflation because he and the government are convinced that, in the middle and long term, this is the best way to provide all Canadians with a healthier economy. That is therefore our objective. It is quite obvious that the Minister of Finance regrets that there is a $14.2 billion deficit but if he has to tolerate this large deficit, it is because the present slowdown of the economy must be attended to and the deficit will enable Canadian society to come through this difficult time with as little unfavourable consequences as possible.

The Minister of Finance does not want to implement the suggestions of the New Democratic Party because, as I said earlier, he finds these suggestions irresponsible and he believes that they would promote inflation and that it would once again be the most needy in our society who would suffer the most.

In his amendment, the Progressive Conservative leader continues to fight against windmills. In fact, he is fighting against rumours. When he says that he is completely opposed to a measure which would remove indexation, the Progressive Conservative leader is fighting against a rumour; he is not fighting against something that the government has done or even against something that the government has announced that it might do. He is fighting against a rumour going around before a budget is brought down.

Now, the Canadians who have well understood the concerns of this government and this party in the last several years, instead of believing rumours, will choose to believe this party and they can rest assured that the Minister of Finance, when he brings down his budget, will also introduce such measures as will be of benefit to all Canadians.

When the Leader of the Opposition speaks of a 27-cent tax at the refinery, once again he is fighting against a rumour. He knows full well, as do all Canadians, that the government, at a time when it is negotiating an oil price agreement, has to consider all sorts of possibilities; when the right hon. member argues against such a measure, he is struggling with Mother Rumour. He is not criticizing a measure announced by the government, but is dealing merely with speculations. That attitude is certainly not what one would expect from a realistic leader of an opposition party. The policy of this government is to face up to reality and to present, in the face of that difficult reality, the measures best able to bring some relief to the Canadian people as a whole.

I shall refrain, Mr. Speaker, from using up any more of the time of the House to deal with this motion. I wish to give other colleagues, other hon. members, the opportunity to address the subject.

● (1710)

[English]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in putting this motion before the House this afternoon, the New Democratic Party is really raising two questions. The first question is the direction of our economic policy. The second question is the integrity of governments and, indeed, the integrity of the political process itself.

I might just say in response to the comments of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that I can honestly say that before I heard him speak this afternoon I, and I know many of my colleagues, had a great deal of respect for his sense of decency in fairness of debate, but I am sorry to say that any respect I may have had before today I have lost completely.

The statements he made with respect to our party's policy were inaccurate and unfair, and in my view they did not contribute anything to a discussion of the motion before us with regard to the direction of the government's economic policy. For a while our economic policy has not really changed, and this is something which I am sure has been felt very deeply by the average citizen over the past few years. We have in fact had a bewildering revolving door performance from governments and oppositions since the earlier Trudeau administration.

The late 1970s saw the Liberal government embracing monetarist doctrines, like an aging widow suddenly lovestruck in her autumn years. The Conservatives, in opposition at that time, combined opportunism and complete confusion in an amazing, and, indeed, confusing blend of policies which included, for example, lower taxes, less government spending, tighter money and lower interest rates. The deficit in one version might be increased.

That was the period when the former member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. de Cotret) was talking about a stimulative deficit, but this policy was not carried through by the party when it took power. The Conservatives in power increased government spending, raised taxes, raised interest rates and made lower deficits a matter of sacred principle.

Both speakers for the Conservative party today, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), in discussing their tragic loss of power in December, failed to mention one thing in this conspiracy view of history with which the Conservative party has attempted to comfort itself, and that is the simple fact that between December and the formation of the new government there was something called an election. It was not simply that this House spoke on December 13. It was the people of Canada who spoke in a democratic election on February 18 and rejected the policies of the hon. member for St. John's West, rejected the budget of December 12 and called for change. I think it is all very well to concentrate on what may have happened here in December, but what happened here in December is less important than what happened in the country from December to February.

I want to talk briefly about the position that the Liberal party took when it was in opposition during that Conservative government period. The Liberals in opposition favoured stimulus. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has denied it today, but I refer him to speeches made by the Liberal finance critic at that time in the finance committee, in which, regrettably, the Minister of Finance has not yet appeared, but he will. He was not there during the period we were discussing interest rates. In speeches in the House made by the financial critic for the Liberal party he called for a new budget, and a stimulative budget. I refer the minister in particular to Hansard of October 29, 1979. I think it is outrageous for the Minister of Finance to come here and pretend something which everybody knows, and that is that while the Liberals were in opposition they were calling for stimulus. They were criticizing the Conservatives for their policies, and they were criticizing them precisely because the Conservative budget focused exclusively on the deficit and did not deal with the problems of jobs, inflation and growth. That is precisely the reason given by the financial critic in his speech when he spoke in the budget debate, in which I had occasion to speak myself.

The Minister of Finance says today that the Liberal party was never in favour of lower interest rates. Where was he when members from his caucus not only in this House but also in the finance committee discussed for two months the monetary policies of governor Bouey and the policies of the minister of finance at that time? If they were not calling for lower interest rates, the minister and I were in two completely different places last fall, because that is precisely what his party was calling for. His party was criticizing the Tories because they tied interest rates directly to United States rates. If the minister were to look through Hansard or the reports of the committee, he would find that that is precisely the position the Liberal party took at that time.

Now the Liberals are in power again. That is a verdict of the people. It is not a verdict with which I was happy at all, but nevertheless it is a verdict one has to accept. I think any theory that there was some kind of conspiracy at work or that the Tory party was robbed unfairly or prevented by some nasty conspiracy from carrying out something the Canadian people wanted it to do is such a fatuous and absurd theory that it hardly deserves refutation. The fact is that those kinds of policies and that message of meanness which was associated with that budget was something which rankled the Canadian public. It stuck in people's throats, and they rejected it. That is a hard fact. I know it is not easy to accept. It is not easy to accept the judgment of a people on an administration which must have been one of the most incompetent, inept, unfair and stupid administrations we have had for many years. The fact that the people rejected that administration, just as they rejected the Liberal administration in May, is not something which can be blamed on the New Democratic Party. I know that is the theory that the Leader of the Opposition would like to espouse. He would like to say that somehow the New Democratic Party—he has conjured up a genie—is somehow responsible for this terribly unfair act and that if the Conservatives had been allowed to carry on in power, everything would have been different and everything would have been all right. The theory, as I say, is so fatuous as hardly to be worthy of refutation.

However, the Liberals are back in power again. Interest rates have gone through the roof. The bank rates charged by the Bank of Canada have floated down, but I think it is important to remember that it is what the consumer and the small businessman pays that really counts. As the Minister of Finance will know, the consumer is paying for his car at over 16 per cent. The small businessman is frequently paying even more than that, depending on his credit rating, on a demand loan. That is the rate that matters to the Canadian people. It is not the treasury bill rate or even the rate that is charged by the Bank of Canada that is the effective interest rate. The effective interest rate, the one that matters and the one over which this government has no control because they have rejected the very idea that they should be investigating them, is the rate which goes to the consumer, the rate which goes to the person who is buying a house or a car. That is the rate which matters.

Tax increases are being considered in order to reduce the deficit. It is quite the contrary of stimulus, quite the contrary of the position which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) took when he was in the opposition. I am so sorry that today he is not participating in this debate because it would have been a delight to hear from the minister how he feels about the policies which are now being followed by the Liberal government. He has been notoriously silent on these issues. He promised us he would resign when the rates went up. He then found it in himself to change his mind. I am sure he has changed his mind on many other things too.

The minister has rejected stimulus and, if I understood him correctly today, he has rejected it again, although he now admits that the growth forecast of 0.5 per cent for 1980 is too optimistic. It is too optimistic when we know that real income is falling and fell in 1979; when we know that more and more Canadians—over one million Canadians—are out of work; when we know that sales are down, that retail sales are falling dramatically in Canada just as they are in the United States; when we know that capacity-utilization is dramatically down to 80 per cent in some industries and down to nearly 65 per cent in the construction industry; when we know that inventories are up, and we are, in short, in a recession.

There is an economic consensus which has developed, and the minister has referred to it. He finds comfort in numbers. Indeed, in the 1930s his predecessors found the same comfort in the same numbers. All the great geniuses who were in power in the 1930s were of the same mind; they had the same point of view. They went to conferences and agreed that there was nothing they could do. There is no tremendous difference now. We find there are conferences, that Margaret Thatcher agrees with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about what economic policies should be followed and that the Prime Minister agrees with Margaret Thatcher. The minister may find some comfort in the fact that Sir Geoffrey Howe, Chancellor of the Exchequer in England, is in agreement on what the economic policies should be. He may find some comfort in that as the inflation rate in Britain goes up to 20 per cent and as unemployment reaches the highest point since 1948. That may be the recipe which the minister wants to provide for the Canadian people. But I do not think there is any comfort to the Canadian people in that consensus of economic Liberal conservatism, or Conservative liberalism, whatever one wants to call it.

That consensus has basically five elements to it. The first element, and we are applying it to Canadian conditions, is that government's borrowing—in short, budgetary deficits—is already too high and causes inflation. I think that that is the first assumption which I would categorize as a mythological assumption. The assumption is that the way to reduce the budgetary deficit and the borrowing is by raising taxes, which is why the minister and many of his colleagues have been referring to it in the various interviews which they give from time to time—which is the only way we have of discovering what their policy is. In fact, one can say that the minister has raised inaction and lethargy to art forms in terms of his economic statements and policy.

The second assumption is that the budgetary deficit, the borrowing problem, is the real problem and that the current account deficit is secondary to that.

The third assumption is that tight monetary and fiscal policies are the best way to fight inflation.

The fourth assumption, stated by governor Bouey a couple of weeks ago in the Senate, is that unemployment is not as serious as it used to be and is not a major problem to those people who are out of work.

The fifth assumption, which the minister stated beautifully here today, is that there is really nothing he can do and that in fact, faced with a party like this one which is preaching economic ruin and catastrophe, which would cause dramatic inflation and a decline of the western world, the Liberal policy of inaction makes perfect sense, and that is the policy which the minister has put before us.

Let me state briefly the five central myths of policy which the minister recited here today. The first is, I think, the essential one about the size of the deficit. Whether a deficit is stimulative or not depends on what is going on in the rest of the economy and, in the case of the Canadian economy, depends on what the provinces are doing. The minister said that we did not talk about the provinces.

Well, I quite agree with the concern which he expressed and I nodded agreement to it when he said the federal government should be providing for its own revenues and should be concerned about its revenue base in its negotiations with the oil producing provinces. Of course, we agree with that, that is the central problem. In fact, it is one of the reasons why public ownership in the energy field is so crucial. But whether a deficit is stimulative or not at the federal level depends on what is happening at the provincial level. So it is quite artificial to refer to federal deficits of $13 billion, $14 billion or $15 billion, when we know at the same time that projected revenues in some of the provinces are such that they will be running substantial surpluses.

What is important is the net effect of all levels of government spending on the whole of the economy. I think most economists would agree that the net effect of all deficits and all borrowing by provincial, municipal and federal governments has not contributed to Canada's inflation, is not inflationary at present, and in fact all the figures indicate that aggregate demand is down.

When we talk about aggregate demand, the hon. member for St. John's West asks what we are talking about. We are talking about whether or not the individual in the street has enough money to buy a car, and we know that his real disposable income is falling and that what he is paying for the car is more. So a basic and fundamental point which has to be brought out is, what is the net effect of all borrowing and is it inflationary? I do not know of one economist whom I would respect, not necessarily one who would be a member of my party, who honestly thinks that the net effect of federal policies at the moment is inflationary. It is not inflationary. It is designed, according to the minister and according to governor Bouey, to restrict aggregate demand, to cause unemployment. That is what the word means. It means you will force people out of work.

The second myth is that a budgetary deficit is more serious than a current account deficit. It is a simple thing. The budgetary deficit or borrowing is what the Canadian government borrows, from its own citizens in most cases. The current account deficit is the deficit which we run in all our economic relations with the rest of the world. An interesting fact which is not widely known is that since 1947 Canada has spent over $48 billion in interest payments and dividends out of the country. In the last year, the deficit on interest rates and dividends was $9 billion. This is what makes us poor as a nation. It is tied up with the foreign ownership question; it is tied up with our unwillingness as a nation to borrow from ourselves in order to invest in our own country. In my view and in the view of our party, you cannot solve the current account problem without temporarily increasing the budgetary deficit.

There was an exchange the other day between my leader and the Prime Minister about the new oil projects in the west and in the east. Where is all this money going to go? The fact of the matter is that every time we allow Exxon, Mobil Oil or Shell Oil to take over these projects—and that is really what we are doing—every time we increase the price of oil and natural gas, we are ensuring that revenue flows out of the country. We might as well pour it right across the border. I say to the minister that if he thinks he can solve the conundrum of pricing and revenue sharing without public ownership, he is sadly mistaken, because you cannot ask the Canadian public to accept the unfairness of these dramatic increases in the price of oil and gas when they know it is going to maximize the profits of foreign, multinational corporations. That is precisely what we are being asked to do.

The third myth is that tight monetary policies are an effective way to fight inflation. We have had five years of monetarism, five years of the highest inflation we have ever had. We have had five years of monetary restraint from the Bank of Canada, and we have had five years of the worst inflation in our history. The fact is that aggregate demand can fall, and has been falling. That is why unemployment has gone so far up. We can still have inflation and we are going to have even more inflation, as the minister is telling us.

I do not know what kind of discussions took place in Venice, but I would like to have been a fly on the wall. Did they discuss the fact that for five, six or a number of years we have been following policies of very tight restraint and yet we have still had inflation? Did they discuss that in Venice? Did they try to figure that out?

An hon. Member: They talked about oil.

Mr. Rae: They referred to oil and that is a very good example, but there are others. Demand has been falling dramatically in the auto industry. They are producing 20 per cent to 30 per cent fewer cars. Has the price of cars gone down? I suggest it has not dramatically. They have occasionally offered rebates in the United States, but not in Canada. Has the pricing or market mechanism worked? I suggest it has not. The nature of our economy is changing dramatically, and the way in which we deal with it is totally inadequate.

People are walking around on that side of the House and in the Tory party with a picture in their heads which would indicate the economy is like some kind of a bazaar at which consumers and producers compete, and at which the pricing mechanism plays some kind of a role in allocating resources. The hard fact of the matter is that these decisions are made by people in powerful positions who can administer prices. Until we deal with that problem in our increasingly concentrated economy where businesses eat businesses alive, we will not solve the problem of inflation.

I would like to know how restricting supply helps to fight inflation. How does capacity-utilization at 80 per cent help fight inflation? What this means is that supply will be down and demand will be down too. I would like the minister to explain how that is going to help fight inflation. It will not have that effect, it will have the reverse effect, just as high interest rates have the reverse effect.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he might continue if there is unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rae: I appreciate the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker, and I will take one minute more to talk about the last few points.

Unemployment is not as serious as it used to be; that is a statement made the other day in committee by governor Bouey. I wish governor Bouey would come into my office, and I am sure the offices of my colleagues here today, indeed the office of any member of Parliament, on a Friday night, a Saturday or a Sunday to see the tragedies and the lost hope of people who are 50 or 55 years old and cannot find work, of people coming out of university who cannot find work, and then say in all seriousness that unemployment is not as serious as it used to be. That point of view belongs to those people who have never faced or have had to face the difficult reality that unemployment is in human terms—houses lost, dreams shattered, homes divided and divorce. Send governor Bouey to Windsor and tell him to go to the people of Windsor and say unemployment is not as serious as it used to be. It is a disgrace that someone who is running the economic policies of this country has that point of view.

Finally we have the weatherman's point of view as expressed beautifully by the minister today. The weatherman's point of view is that "there is really nothing we can do; I am only the forecaster and my forecast may have been wrong. I may have been a couple of percentage points out. I am coming back and telling you I thought there would be .5 per cent growth, but I am sorry the weather maps have changed, the storms in the United States are much stronger so you better batten down your hatches."

We do not elect governments to be weathermen; we elect governments to give leadership, to show compassion and strength, to say to the Canadian people that there is something we can do about our economy because we can take control of our economy; to say to the Canadian people there is hope and there is light because there is leadership. Of all the pathos that has been expressed today, nothing has been more pathetic than the statement of the Minister of Finance that there is nothing he can do. That is a statement of intellectual bankruptcy which we in this party are not yet prepared to declare on behalf of our country and on behalf of our party.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words today during this debate on the motion put forward by the New Democratic Party because there are some basic fallacies in their economic reasoning, to say the least; as well, there are some basic flaws in the facts they put forward to this House today that deserve to be brought before the public eye.

First of all I should like to refer to the plan put forward by the leader of the New Democratic Party for the economic prosperity and health of this country. That plan, as put forward earlier in this debate, would result in tax cuts, increased expenditures and new programs by the federal government, and finally in regulating interest rates substantially below the market level or the level that would be determined in the market place.

If I could I would like to analyse what the likely effects of this kind of program would be in this day and age and in today's economic situation. First of all with regard to the tax cuts and the increased expenditures, all objective observers—all observers—would indicate that this would lead directly to two things. First, it would lead to an increase in the rate of inflation in this country, the rate of inflation being what all surveys indicate is the number one concern of the Canadian public. Secondly, it would lead to a drop in the value of the Canadian dollar which would, in turn, lead to further pressure on the inflation rate. This would put extreme pressure on Canadian capital markets, particularly if the federal government were to go into the capital market with greater strength, borrowing additional funds.

That could be resolved in one of two ways. The Canadian government could borrow more externally in foreign countries, something about which the NDP rails continuously. That is one alternative. The second alternative is for the federal government to turn the Bank of Canada loose to print more money. This would increase the money supply and the growth rate, but would again exacerbate the rate of inflation.

At the same time as this scenario is taking place, the NDP would want us to hold interest rates below the market level. Any student of elementary economics understands what the interest rate is. The interest rate is the price charged for money loaned by individuals. It is the price paid by individuals who borrow.

The other half of the scenario the NDP do not seem to realize is that when you lower interest rates to help borrowers you also lower interest rates at the expense of savers. In this country we have an exceptionally high savings rate, somewhere in the range of 10 per cent of our disposable income. If you lower the interest rate to a point below the inflation rate, individuals will stop saving. They will slow their savings down dramatically because they know the money they save today will be worth less tomorrow, and as a result they will be able to buy less when those savings come back to them. We have a reduction in saving at the same time as we have an increase in borrowing and we wind up in the consumer markets with increased inflationary pressures.

The effect of all of this, and the effect of the NDP program, would be reduced interest rates leading to an increase in borrowing demand, at the same time as we have a reduced amount of funds savers would be willing to make available to the Canadian government and borrowers in the marketplace. In addition, the effects of increased expenditures and reduced taxes would be inflationary pressure.

Interest rates are related to inflation. Obviously individuals wish to get a rate of return that is real—in other words, one that is higher than the rate of inflation. As inflation increases, the pressure on interest rates is upwards. If the NDP program were adopted, the government would be forced to maintain interest rates below the level the market dictates. As a result we would have a never-ending vicious cycle of either increased government borrowing to finance that additional borrowing which the private sector will not accommodate, or an increase in the money supply by the Bank of Canada. You would then have a non-ending vicious cycle which fuels inflation, and a runaway situation would result. That is what the NDP program would lead to.

The effect of that program, then, is total fiscal and monetary irresponsibility. It is the commitment of this government to restore to this country some stability to our economic system which will allow the business community, the investors, to invest and become the creators of jobs in the future, making our lives better through a more productive economy.

Clearly, the program put forward by the NDP at the beginning of this debate indicates that they do not understand, and I believe that they never have understood, the fundamental economic facts of life. The NDP makes large of the figures of deficits as percentages of GNPs of western countries. Again, the leader of the NDP was totally wrong. Throughout this debate we have heard heckling from the other side: "What about Germany and Helmut Schmidt?" We were told that Germany's deficit as a percentage of the gross national product was much higher than Canada's percentage. In fact, the situation is just the opposite.

Not only does the NDP not understand economics, but they do not even understand figures. According to the figures of the international monetary fund, Germany's deficit as a percentage of its GNP has been between 1.5 per cent and 2 per cent over the past three years. Our rate is between 4 per cent and 4.5 per cent of the GNP over the past three years. Germany's total debt as a percentage of its GNP is between 13 per cent and 15 per cent. In Canada the rate is between 21 per cent and 22 per cent of the GNP. Therefore, not only is the theory which is being put forward by the members of the NDP wrong, by their facts are wrong as well.

Again, with regard to the control of interest rates we on this side believe that the marketplace is the best arbiter of interest rates. It is the way in which interest rates are best set in this country. The best way to determine interest rates is not to have them set by bureaucratic decree. Such a situation, of course, requires strong and effective competition. The new Bank Act is before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs right now. Within it are provisions to help stimulate competition in our financial markets, which will result in more efficient competition.

One such way the act will help stimulate competition is by allowing the entry of foreign banks into this country on a limited basis. This will provide additional access to funds for Canadian small and medium-sized enterprises. The NDP opposes that policy. There is also means within the act to provide for the easier entry of banks into the banking system. Once again, the NDP opposes that policy. The NDP would like to have the government take control of the banking system and run it in a bureaucratic fashion. I suggest that is totally wrong.

In addition, the government has promised to bring forward in the fall or during the next session a new savings, trust and loans act to allow other institutions to enter the field. This will expand the activities of these institutions and bring more competition to bear on the banks, thereby providing a more competitive market.

The government has tabled amendments which go very far toward meeting all the reasonable arguments that have been put forward with regard to the Bank Act. I will be very interested in the future committee meetings to see whether in fact, considering that the government has brought forward these amendments, there will be a change of heart on the other side of the House and whether the Bank Act will be brought forward post haste and passed without further delay.

Over the past few weeks the NDP have railed time and again against chartered banks. I will not apologize for the chartered banks. I would welcome from the NDP one shred of hard, objective information which indicates that they are right. They do not have that information. They rail but they do not give the evidence. They cast innuendoes and aspersions on the chartered banking system. If what they say is true, then let us see the hard evidence and the analysis.

The NDP talks about the difference between the bank rate or the discount rate in the United States and in Canada. The fact is that in the United States right now the federal reserve discount rate is 6.5 per cent and the bank prime rate is between 12 per cent and 12.5 per cent. Canada's prime rate is 10.5 per cent and our bank prime rate is between 13.25 per cent and 13.5 per cent. The spread is much lower in Canada.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the debate and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings now before the House in accordance with Standing Order 58(9).

[English]

Therefore, the question is on the amendment (Mr. Clark). All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Clark), which was negatived on the following division:

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

CORPORAL JAMES WOOD—RIGHT TO COUNSEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, most hon. members no doubt recall the announcement by the Hon. Don Jamieson a couple of years ago of the biggest expulsion of Soviet spies in the most significant espionage case revealed since the Igor Gouzenko affair after the war.

What most hon. members do not know is that the key figure involved, an RCMP agent, has been refused the right to have his own independent counsel, with no expense to himself, when testifying about matters which he considers important before the McDonald commission. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That the Solicitor General arrange immediately to provide Corporal James Wood with counsel of his choice in the same way as ministers of the Crown or, for example, the RCMP agent Warren Hart, were provided with counsel paid for by the government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

INSPECTION OF CONTAINERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On Friday, June 20, 1980, at Toronto international airport, a spill of radioactive uranium dust was found in the hold of Air Canada flight 108 from Saskatoon, which was carrying 118 passengers. The dust was being shipped to France by Amok Limited of Saskatoon, a French-owned mining company.

In view of the enviable safety record of our airline, and in order to avert the possibility of future disasters such as that which occurred at Mississauga, Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That a complete inspection system of containers carrying hazardous goods such as radioactive material, toxic isotopes, etc., be implemented immediately.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CONTROLS AGAINST ACID RAIN-CAUSING EMISSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the fact that the United States Senate has passed a bill requiring 80 oil-fired power plants in the northeastern United States to convert to coal, and given the fact that the United States Senate has refused to ensure that these power plants will reduce or at least maintain current levels of acid rain-causing emissions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That the Canadian government send the strongest diplomatic protest possible to the Carter Administration stating that this move, without tough environmental controls limiting the amount of acid rain-causing emissions, is an unprecedented threat to the total Canadian environment and is completely and totally unacceptable to this country.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONDEMNATION OF INVASION OF THAILAND BY VIETNAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

S.O. 43

In view of the danger that the invasion of Thailand by Vietnamese forces operating out of Kampuchea could all too easily escalate into a major regional conflict, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House express its outrage at the Vietnamese invasion of an independent neighbour, Thailand, inflicting heavy loss of life on the refugees being sheltered in that country, condemns the Soviet Union for its continued support of the Vietnamese forces in Kampuchea, and urges the Secretary of State for External Affairs to convey Canada's deep concern to the ministers gathering in Malaysia for the ASEAN meeting later this week.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—POLLUTION FROM U.S. SOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I also rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity in connection with a proposal for which there may be a favourable attitude in this House. It has to do with the decision made yesterday by the United States Senate approving a bill requiring 80 power plants in the northeastern United States to shift from oil to coal, with the resulting considerable increase in acid rainfall. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the Minister of State for the Environment renew his efforts in putting pressure on the U.S. government so as to prevent the implementation of this project which will seriously damage the environment north and south of the border.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

CONSTRUCTION OF ALASKA HIGHWAY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, Canada is importing $3 billion to $4 billion worth of oil and $1 billion worth of coal per year. Canada's unemployment rate is rising rapidly, and its balance of payments is rapidly deteriorating.

The pre-build section of the Alaska highway gas pipeline will provide 150,000 man-years of employment, a favourable balance of payments of $1 billion per year, and investment in Canada of $1.6 billion with $360 million in Ontario and Quebec. Therefore, under Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Vankoughnet):

That the federal government immediately approve all Canadian aspects of the pre-build Alaska highway gas pipeline while concurrently continuing negotiations with the United States of America for guarantees in regard to construction of the northern and Alaska sections of the gas line.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HISTORIC SITES

RIGHT HON. J. G. DIEFENBAKER—DESIGNATION OF RESIDENCES—STATUE ON PARLIAMENT HILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. If Canadians are to understand and take pride in our country, we must learn to preserve and honour our history and the spirit that made this land.

In view of the fact that the historic sites branch of Parks Canada has postponed any decision about what is to become of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker's home in Rockcliffe or whether or not to give official recognition to his birthplace in Neustadt, Ontario, and given the fact that as each day passes the possibility of saving these homes for future generations becomes more remote. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That this House instructs the Minister of the Environment: (1) to take immediate action on establishing both the Diefenbaker birthplace in Neustadt and his residence in Ottawa as national historic sites; and (2) to have a statue of the late Prime Minister commissioned and erected upon Parliament Hill.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

PARLIAMENTARY MISSION TO INVESTIGATE VIOLATIONS IN CENTRAL AMERICA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Yesterday, the Associated Press carried a story on the statement by a group of 40 catholic priests in El Salvador documenting the massacre there in May of 600 peasants by Salvadoran troops and members of a far right paramilitary organization. About the same time, some of us in this House were being briefed by a delegation from the Guatemalan Democratic Front Against Repression about gross violations of human rights in their country.

In view of the extreme violence and repression which has become a fact of daily life in El Salvador and Guatemala, and the urgent representations of the Guatemalan Democratic Front to members of this House, and taking into account the hopeful revolution in Nicaragua against this spiral of violence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the Government of Canada give serious consideration to establishing a parliamentary fact-finding mission to go to Central America in the near future to investigate conditions there first-hand, so that the report of such a group can provide a better basis for reviewing and renewing our aid and other bilateral relations with the countries of this region.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH HAZARD OF 2, 4-D TO FARMERS AND FAMILIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of an article in today's Ottawa Citizen which indicates that the herbicide 2, 4-D may pose a health hazard to farmers and their families, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson):

That the Minister of Agriculture immediately look into this problem and assure the people of Canada about the dangers which may be inherent in the use of this herbicide.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT'S INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY ON RUBBER INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of Canada's depressed rubber industry, the resulting unemployment as illustrated by the termination of 650 workers at Firestone in Whitby, the lay-off of 55 at General Tire in Barrie, and the possible ultimate lay-off of up to 2,000 at Goodrich and Uniroyal in Kitchener-Waterloo, and in light of the commitment made several years ago by the Liberal government to prepare an industrial strategy, on a sectoral basis, which certainly now must be completed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That in order that this House and Canadians may understand the government's position regarding the manufacture and distribution of new tires, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce make a statement on motions regarding the Liberal government's industrial strategy as it relates to production and employment in the rubber industry.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL ADVISER ON DEFENCE—ROLE OF MINISTER

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The Prime Minister recently appointed a very senior serving officer as his special adviser on defence matters.

Disregarding the crushing insult this lack of confidence in the advice of the minister indicates, can the minister explain if he will have any way of discovering what matters are discussed and what decisions are taken in defence matters between the Prime Minister and his new special adviser on defence?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, if I understand the question put by the hon. member and if I am not mistaken, I am being asked whether the Prime Minister has appointed a defence expert to advise him about defence problems. I think that the Prime Minister's office, even under previous governments, has always had advisers who acted as liaison between the Department of National Defence and the PMO in special cases and when foreign governments were involved. So I do not feel there is anything unusual about the fact that there is someone in the Prime Minister's office who can advise him and the Minister of National Defence.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, the minister indicates a little uncertainty as to the location of this special adviser. Could the minister advise the House if our NATO allies were apprized of the apparent fact that their new chairman of the military committee will be attempting to serve two masters,

Dr. Luns of NATO and the Prime Minister of Canada, at the same time and as well will have the most basic conflict of interest imaginable?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think we have to clear up the matter in this case. The appointment of the chairman of the military committee of NATO was recommended by the Prime Minister's office on the suggestion of the minister and the Department of National Defence. I think that Admiral Falls who is now chairman is a very lucky man and we are also lucky to have such a man to represent us at NATO. For the first time, Madam Speaker, it is a Canadian.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: I wonder if the minister can tell us approximately how many hours each week this senior, distinguished officer will work in his role as special adviser to the Prime Minister, what advice it is that Admiral Falls can provide which collectively neither the minister, the present Chief of the Defence Staff, nor other senior officers can offer; and, finally, what is his annual salary as an adviser, which we presume will be in addition to his military salary or pension?

• (1420)

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I do not see what benefit the hon. member opposite expects to gain by criticizing such an eminent man as Admiral Falls who serves with dignity the interests of Canadians within NATO. I can say that Admiral Falls is available to NATO 24 hours a day, and that whatever the needs and information may be, he is there to defend our interests 24 hours a day.

[English]

BIDS ON FRIGATE PROGRAM

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, on June 13 the Minister of National Defence may have contradicted, by press release, his pledge of fairness in dealing made in committee. I should like to ask him whether he considers he has contradicted his pledge of fairness by arbitrarily excluding two of five consortia from making a second bid on the $3.2 billion frigate program.

Can the minister clarify this situation, particularly in view of the almost defenceless position of our navy which was so graphically illustrated in the recent exercise in the Bay of Biscay, and the obvious need to strengthen our navy as soon as possible?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Apparently, Madam Speaker, today is my day. In reply to the hon. member, may I suggest that he direct his question to the Minister of Supply and Services whose officials are dealing with the main parties involved in the frigate program.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer and I will ask him this question; or perhaps the Minister of Supply and Services might care to answer it.

As I understand it, this vital program is approximately 18 months behind schedule. Since it appears that the government has broken its own rules as stated in the "Request for proposals" which indicated that proposals received after 1200 EST on November 30, 1978, would be rejected, is there any indication that legal action will be taken by those who have been discriminated against? Further, can the minister explain or justify this extra delay in a program which seems to have slipped another 18 months today?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I should like to say that there has been no discrimination. Both corporations had sent in tenders which have been turned down in the normal way, because their respective tenders did not meet the requirements of the call for tenders. We have asked the other three corporations who had submitted tenders to "correct", so to speak, their tenders to meet the Canadian content requirement in the three tenders and the Canadian capacity in a new technology, and I am sure the hon. member supports this policy put forward by this side of the House.

TERMS OF LOAN TO VALLEYFIELD CHEMICAL PRODUCTS CORPORATION—INVESTIGATION OF SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning capital assistance grants and loans currently being given to Valleyfield Chemical Products Corporation, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Space Research Corporation.

Was the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce not aware of the RCMP investigation into Space Research Corporation's activities in illegally shipping arms to South Africa at the time it made its $5.3 million loan and its $3 million grant to SRC's Valleyfield operation? Can the minister tell us, further, whether the loan is still outstanding and whether the grant has been terminated?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I will get the information for the hon. lady and inform her as soon as possible.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, I have been giving notice of this question in one way or another for the last week, and I am shocked that the minister is not aware of the grants and loans which have been given to SRC by his own department. I take it, then, he also has no knowledge of the—Madam Speaker: Order. Ask the question, please.

Miss Jewett: I am asking it.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Miss Jewett: I take it, then, that the minister has no knowledge of the $1 million grant which was also given by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Gray: No, I do not, Madam Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SPECIAL ADVISER ON DEFENCE—REASON ADMIRAL FALLS APPOINTED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and it flows from the answers he gave to my hon. friend from Victoria.

● (1425)

Will the Minister of National Defence tell us the exact circumstances under which Admiral Falls was named as a special adviser on defence matters to the Prime Minister of Canada? Will he tell the House of Commons the terms of reference, or are we to believe—as the minister's earlier answer suggested—that the Minister of National Defence did not know that Admiral Falls had been appointed by the Prime Minister as a special adviser on defence?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, if I am well informed, the appointment of Admiral Falls as chairman of the NATO military committee was suggested when the Liberal government was in power and later during the nine months of Progressive Conservative administration. At that time no decision whatsoever was taken by the Progressive Conservatives, including no decision against that move. We approved Admiral Falls' appointment when we were expected to staff that position on June 1.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what is painfully evident here is that the Prime Minister of Canada has nominated a serving military officer, Admiral Falls as a special adviser on defence to the Prime Minister, and he has not told the Minister of National Defence. That is what is evident here. We have been putting questions to the minister asking why that appointment was made. He has been answering in relation to the appointment to NATO, not to the Prime Minister's office, and my question is why—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry, but I have to ask the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to put his question, too.

Mr. Clark: You will understand, Madam Speaker, how startled we are to find this minister did not know about the appointment.

An hon. Member: You are stunned.

Mr. Clark: My question to the minister is twofold. First, when was the minister first advised of the appointment of Admiral Falls as a special adviser on defence matters to the Prime Minister of Canada? Second, what are the terms of reference of Admiral Falls, and how do his duties relate to those of the minister?

In my government, it was the minister who was responsible for defence policy, and when there were appointments made in the domain of national defence, the minister was at least advised: the minister knew. What is shocking here is that the minister apparently does not know.

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, in our government, defence policy is not only the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence: it is a collective responsibility of the whole cabinet, the Prime Minister as well as the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Let's pray for the country.

Mr. Lamontagne: When the nomination of Admiral Falls as president of the military committee of NATO was made by the Prime Minister, I had a talk with him, and it was understood that Admiral Falls was, of course, an adviser to the Prime Minister and an adviser to the Minister of National Defence on all defence matters.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, there has been a formal order in council passed designating Admiral Falls to a special advisory—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I ask the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to ask his question.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that there has been an order in council passed appointing Admiral Falls, not to NATO but as a special adviser to the Prime Minister of Canada on defence matters—a new appointment and an appointment without precedent—will the Minister of National Defence tell us when he was first advised, if he was advised at all, and what are the terms of reference on this appointment?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, the former prime minister should know that all ministers are informed when an order in council is issued by cabinet. I knew at the time that Admiral Falls was going to be appointed and although this did happen while I was away the procedure is not unusual.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe I should have allowed a third question to the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam. I apologize to her and I will allow that question now. I suppose I must have become flustered by the fact that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was rising at a time when I was not expecting it.

INDUSTRY

SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION—POSSIBLE PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. My third question is also for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the fact that the government is seriously considering buying part or all of Space Research Corporation—and, indeed, is discussing it today, I believe—would the minister be good enough to tell the House whether he thinks that the Valleyfield Chemical operation will likely be part of the SRC that is purchased?

• (1430)

Will he also give us some assurance that until the RCMP report is made public and charges are laid, there will not be any further grants or loans to SRC or its fully-owned subsidiary?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the question as to whether Valleyfield will be part of a purchase of Space Research by the government is just one of the aspects of this matter that we are still considering and on which we still have to reach a decision.

With respect to the second part of the question, I think the Minister of Justice said in the House the other day that it is not part of the practice of law enforcement activities in Canada for police reports to be made public, certainly not before decisions are taken with respect to the laying of charges. Certainly, until the matter is resolved by the courts one cannot presume that the parties will be ineligible for further assistance based on economic development aspects.

ESTABLISHMENT OF ANTI-TERRORIST SQUAD

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. On May 6, this House unanimously accepted a motion congratulating the British government and its Special Air Service commandos on the successful rescue operation of hostages from the Iranian embassy in London.

Given that Mr. Danson, the minister's predecessor, announced on November 7, 1977, that the cabinet had just approved the creation of a Canadian anti-terrorist squad, would the minister report what progress his government has made in its efforts to create such a group?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, I do not have any precise details on that particular unit of the armed forces. However, I will inquire on the state of the matter and be sure to convey that information to the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Perhaps the minister should ask Admiral Falls. Will the minister confirm that the special service force at Petawawa has neither specific orders nor any of the specialized equipment necessary to train for this important task, that Canada has not such unit which can compare with the "Pagoda" units of the British forces, and that if hostage incidents should occur in this country our forces would be sadly unprepared?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I cannot deny or confirm the existence of such a specialized unit, but I can say that whatever events may occur in Canada, the armed forces are ready to face the situation.

[English]

REPORTED TECHNICAL PROBLEMS WITH F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—COST OF POSSIBLE REDESIGN

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Defence. There have been distressing reports that the whole wing of the F-18 fighter aircraft which Canada is committed to buy may have to be redesigned because of technical problems in meeting the specifications laid down by the U.S. navy.

Will the minister tell the House if a proportion of the extra design or development cost of this work will have to be paid for by Canada over and above the some $4 billion we have already agreed to pay?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): I feel, Madam Speaker, that perhaps the hon. member should not believe everything he sees in the media or magazines. There are conflicting opinions concerning those matters. I can say that I had a discussion with the Minister of Supply and Services who recently spent three days in St. Louis where the F-18 is being manufactured. The minister came back with the unquestionable assurance that McDonnell Douglas will satisfy all contract conditions.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question for the minister. Can the minister tell the House if it is true that the F-18 is now up to two years behind schedule on the critical milestone for production go-ahead, and that it is now planned that the United States Defence Systems Acquisitions Review Council will not give that clearance until some time in the spring of 1982?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any delays in the manufacture or delivery of the F-18 aircraft. I want to assure the hon. member that I will personally go to the United States at an early date to check it out. I repeat once again that the Minister of Supply and Services has spent three days there and that our information is that everything is going according to schedule. Whatever the circumstances, we have a contract which is quite firm and the terms and conditions will be met.

DROUGHT IN WEST—ASSISTANCE IN CREDIT SITUATION OF FARMERS

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. There are measures, we believe, which would be available to the government to lessen the impact of the drought on prairie farmers.

Farmers have been approaching me because the banks are threatening foreclosure action. Furthermore, farmers are saying it would alleviate their situation somewhat if currently insured crops could be written off now and used for green feed. Could the minister please inform the House of the plans he might have for alleviating the drought-stricken farmers' credit situation, and whether the minister could discuss with provincial officials some leniency with regard to crop write-offs?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that the provinces administer crop insurance under the crop insurance agreements we have with them. Producers and farmers pay half the premiums and the federal government pays the other half of the premium, which this year will cost us about $90 million. The reinsurance program, if the weather stays the way it has been, can cost the federal government in total well over $500 million in payments to farmers.

Some of the crop insurance people at present are making the kinds of arrangements to which the hon. member has referred, evaluating the crops and letting the farmers harvest them for green feed, which we think is the proper thing to do. That kind of product can be salvaged to be used later in the year or it can be used at present.

I want to add the following to what the minister of agriculture from Manitoba has said in proposing to us a green feed program which he is going to institute and in which he wants us to participate. I think it is a very good program under which farmers will be paid $15 an acre to seed. I hope there will be enough moisture so that they can harvest more green feed in the areas of need. Some of the suggestions have been very good and positive, in my view, with a view to maintaining the livestock industry in that area.

With regard to interest rates, so far as we have anything to do with the Farm Credit Corporation we have said there should be no demand for payment from those farmers who are hit in a hard way.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, members of the official opposition have decided not to ask me any questions on drought today, so I am happy that the hon. member has done so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK—AVAILABILITY OF FEED HAY

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. I am receiving daily representations by way of resolutions, telephone calls and telegrams from western constituents. This week, for example, the northern district of the Union of Manitoba Municipalities passed a resolution requesting that the federal government permit farmers to enter the Riding National Park to secure the feed hay which is available in the park.

Considering the fact that farmers have been previously able to do this, and notwithstanding the minister's response in the House yesterday but recognizing the emergency situation, I should like to ask the Minister of the Environment to tell the House what plans he has to open up the parks, and will he consider the fact that farmers need to be allowed haying operations to help sustain cattle herds within Manitoba and Saskatchewan?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as I indicated to the House yesterday, I have no such plan at present. In response to questions, I indicated that to do so would be clearly contrary to long-established national parks' policy.

I did indicate that if members on the far side of the House could provide me with more information on the situation than I have so far received, I would be happy to explore the question again. But up to the present time I must reiterate what I said in the House yesterday, that is, that there are no present plans to follow the course of action which the hon. member recommends.

Oral Questions

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—POLLUTION FROM U.S. SOURCES

Mr. Norman Kelly (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. The United States has just approved a bill which will replace oil by coal in 80 power plants throughout the northeastern states.

Since this bill has the potential to increase the acid rain content in parts of southern Ontario and the maritimes by nearly 16 per cent, I ask the minister whether he would inform the House of his reaction to the bill and outline the course of action he might pursue to protect the Canadian environment.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: This question was asked yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, this is an extremely serious situation and we are very concerned about it. The legislative proposals have not passed through the entire legislative system of the U.S. government. They have, however, passed the Senate, which is one step toward their completion.

We have expressed on many occasions our concern to the U.S. government, on my own part as recently as last Monday when I met with Mr. Costle, the director of the Environmental Protection Agency of the U.S. We are renewing our expressions of concern to the United States. The legislative proposals still have to go through the House of Representatives. I expect that in the process of undertaking that path they will be substantially modified.

But I share the concern expressed by the hon. member. It is an extremely serious situation. We have made our views on this matter clearly known to the Americans on many occasions. We will not in any way diminish our efforts but will, rather, redouble our efforts to ensure that the American Congress, the Administration and the American public are conscious of the very grave dangers which these proposals imply not only for Canada but for the United States as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Another admission of ineffectiveness.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NAVAL DESTROYERS—SECOND PHASE OF UPGRADING PROGRAM

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Defence is undoubtedly aware of the advanced age of our 16 steam destroyers and, therefore, that their equipment is subject to unpredictable breakdowns and failures. Could the minister inform the House whether he is planning to announce the second phase of the upgrading program, Delex?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am fully aware of the Delex program. The first phase is practically over and I believe we will try, depending on available resources, to launch the second phase as soon as possible. I agree with my colleague opposite that this program is of extreme urgency and we will do our utmost to complete it as quickly as possible.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I was wondering whether the minister would be able to tell us the cost of the second phase of the program, and what action he is taking to have his officials prepare for the day when the Delex program comes to an end in 1990 to replace the destroyers which are now being upgraded?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, everyone knows full well that there is a program to replace the six frigates. As was recently mentioned, there is no undue delay in the implementation of this program. Obviously, as soon as the decision is made to replace these six frigates, we will have to consider the study which will be submitted to us at the end of this month on the possibility of building smaller ships, which incidentally was a suggestion made by the official opposition, and to try and continue upgrading our destroyer fleet.

[English]

EQUIPMENT AND MORALE OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The minister told the news media that he does not want to talk about a defence white paper because it bores him, and that we should read the speeches of the defence staff to know what is going on.

Considering there has been no defence white paper for ten years and defence costs are about $5 billion per year, does the minister not think it is time the people of Canada had the right to know the present equipment and morale status of our forces and the exact plans of the government for the future, especially in view of critical statements on these matters made by some of the very same persons on the defence staff he told us to listen to?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I hope that the series of questions that is being directed at me today does not undermine the excellent resolution which was taken unanimously by the House yesterday in recognition of the efficiency and the commitment of the armed forces, a resolution which I fully endorse, of course, and for which I thank all my colleagues.

An hon. Member: When will insults cease to be hurled at our armed forces?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question, I must say that instead of wasting his time preparing endless questions as he does, he should attend the sittings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. At the committee's last sitting, I tabled a brief stating and explaining our past, present and future defence policy, which I think would have answered all his questions.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Rather than answer that nonsense, may I ask this: the minister answered my question last week by saying that Major General McNichol was "inaccurate and misleading" when he stated that we were working in the 1980s with 1950 equipment, and the minister said that the matter was closed. Since then Major General McNichol confirmed his statements, showing the matter is not closed.

Will the minister tell the House what steps the government will take to increase manpower and update outmoded equipment, particularly such things as what is reportedly the world's oldest-living computer used by the air defence group at North Bay, radar equipment in certain places with outdated valves, irreplaceable in the western world and only available from behind the Iron Curtain? In general, will he tell us what he will do about the armed forces operating in a completely undermanned and sadly ill-equipped state?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I find it rather difficult to answer this whole series of questions, but as I said, if the opposition would take the trouble to read my brief to the committee they would find that all the answers are also in that brief. They explain quite well the positive steps taken by this government to modernize the equipment and thereby boost morale in our armed forces and, in the final analysis, make them more efficient.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT "FEDERAL POLICIES FOR EMERGENCIES—A PLANNING REVIEW"

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wenman: In view of the recent call by the central committee of the Soviet Union for a further build-up of that country's armed forces, the recognition of the growing Soviet threat in recent statements by the Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary General of NATO, the reflection of this concern in President Carter's call for reinstating the draft and in Congressional demands for increasing military spending, and in view of the lack of planning—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Wenman: In view of the—

An hon. Member: He cannot even read his question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should have followed his intuition and gone right to his question.

Mr. Wenman: In view of the lack of planning and policy in the civil defence of Canada—

Madam Speaker: Order. When I call a member to order because I want him to go immediately to his question, I do not mean that he should repeat that paragraph. He should go right away to his question, if he would, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: Has the minister read the civil defence report waiting on his desk entitled: "Federal Policies For Emergencies—A Planning Review"? Will he table that report in the House before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence discusses this issue at its July 8 meeting?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think the answer to this question is quite simple. If the hon. member wants to obtain all the information he is seeking, he can come to the standing committee's next meeting and ask the question, and we will then be in a position to provide him with all pertinent information.

Madam Speaker, it must be realized, after all, the way the opposition lead their questions they are making a speech almost every time. Let hon. members put a precise question, and we will answer precisely.

[English]

Mr. Wenman: I would assume, then, that the minister has not read the report.

Mr. Clark: He has never heard of it. He has never heard of his department; he thinks it is the Post Office.

Mr. Wenman: His particular emphasis in civil defence must relate to emergency warning. If the minister has read the report, will he inform the House whether he has communicated to the department his personal preference for either the national emergency alarm repeater, a warning system attached to any electrical outlet, or the crisis home alert technique, a system operating through radio or television sets?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, one thing has to be recognized: the questions I am now asked are excessively technical. I do not think the Minister of National Defence should be expected to give explicit answers to every question of this type. But if hon. members want answers—

An hon. Member: Answers is not what they are after!

[English]

Mr. Clark: Trudeau needs Falls.

Mr. Lamontagne: Do you want an answer, or not?

Mr. Clark: Yes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Go ahead, give us an answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, if they want real, complete and evolved answers to their questions, I do not think the question period is the only forum. I can supply them in other ways, either in written form or otherwise.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST SLIDESHOW "ALICE IN ADDITIVE LAND" BE TAKEN OUT OF CIRCULATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Recently, the educational services section of the health protection branch began distributing to the public a slideshow called "Alice in Additive Land". In my view, this show is sexist in nature and tends to have a very uncritical attitude toward the whole food additive industry.

I gave the minister notice that I intended to raise this matter in the House two weeks ago, so that she would have an opportunity to view the slideshow herself. I ask the minister now whether or not she has had a chance to view the slideshow called "Alice in Additive Land", and whether or not she is prepared to pull it out of circulation and have it redone so that it is a much more balanced presentation than it is at present.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I saw the show the evening of the day the hon. member gave me notice. I thank the hon. member for having mentioned this particular slideshow to me. I did not find it sexist at all, nor did I find it biased toward the industry. On the other hand, it is not a show that will win an Oscar.

This slideshow was done, as I understand it, just before I came back to the department. It was ready for distribution in March. It is obvious that it was done with very little money: the style of cartoon is around the 1955 era of the film industry.

Other than that criticism of the style of delivery of the show, I did not detect—and I read the script twice— any other criticisms. I have asked my officials to review it once more with regard to possible industry bias. However, I saw no such bias. That is all I can tell the House at this point.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the slideshow is not the only act which is not deserving of an Oscar.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blaikie: I find it very difficult to believe that the Minister of National Health and Welfare—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think we need a little more silence in the House today: it is very hard for me to follow what is going on.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I find it difficult to believe that the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not find that slideshow insulting to women. Can the minister tell the House when the Department of Health and Welfare became a public relations agency for the food additive industry?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I am going to answer in French as it is obvious that my message did not get through. I thought I had explained to the hon. member that the two allegations he made against me, first, that the slideshow is sexist and, second, that it gave a biased image in favour of industry, were completely wrong. If he has any evidence whatsoever of sexism, well, my God, let him educate me because I fail to grasp it.

As concerns the only problem which I consider to have any gravity—

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: Now I must check the translation.

[Translation]

As concerns the only problem which might be serious, even if it did not appear as such to me, that of a possible distortion in favour of industry, I do not believe that it is true. I would point out to the hon. member that we made a survey on food additives among Canadians. When I made that study public, Canadians showed that they were very concerned about food additives and yet they did not know exactly what they were. The role of my department is certainly to inform the public and I might say in passing that we intend to play a more active role in that area.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX REMISSIONS TO ASSIST NORTHERNERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue. Because it is generally recognized that living expenses in the north are higher than in other parts of Canada, has the minister considered tax remission proposals to assist northerners in certain areas, a move which will compensate for their higher cost of living?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He read it very well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Indeed, Treasury Board and cabinet have authorized me to remit taxes to those people in certain areas of the north on certain benefits which they now pay. The areas to be covered will be north of the sixtieth parallel as well as other areas which are identified as isolated posts by Treasury Board regulations. The areas of remission will be subsidized housing, low cost housing, and travel for vacation and medical purposes. The cheques will be made directly available to the employees.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COST OVERRUNS OF LONG-RANGE PATROL AIRCRAFT AND HELICOPTER RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: The minister recently announced that the Aurora long-range patrol aircraft, LRPA, was delivered on time and within budget. At the same time, the President of the Treasury Board tabled in this House a list of cost overruns showing the Aurora project as having an overrun of $98,735,000. Will the minister kindly explain this $100 million difference of opinion?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, what we call an overrun in English is an unforeseen expense or an expense caused by unforeseen surpluses. However, I believe that this increase of $98 million is due to inflationary costs and could not have been foreseen because of the economic situation. It is not an overrun, it is simply an increase of expenditures—

[English]

An hon. Member: That is not an overrun.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: That is true—

—due to the economic situation at the time.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I agree that this government appears to have little control over anything financial. My supplementary question refers to another cost overrun. Can the minister explain how his department fell into the book of records for cost overruns when a research and development project concerning helicopters, with an approved cost of $150,000, ended up costing $1,484,000, an overrun of approximately 1,000 per cent?

An hon. Member: It is just inflation.

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for introducing this question during the occasion of Armed Forces Day. I think it is a demonstration of the respect the opposite side shows for the armed forces.

An hon. Member: But not for you.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I have no detailed information on the case mentioned by the hon. member. If he wishes, I shall provide him with an accurate reply and relevant explanations.

TASK FORCE REPORT ON UNIFICATION

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, surprisingly, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Unlike the more difficult questions the minister has been called upon to answer, it is a very simple question. It concerns the Fyffe task force report on unification.

On May 18 the minister was quoted as saying that the task force report was "a superficial thing containing hardly anything of substance". Does the minister disagree with the majority of the 135 serving generals and colonels who appeared before the task force and who gave as their opinion that they preferred a joint chiefs of staff system to the current unified one?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, when the unification task force presented its report, I said at the time that one of its recommendations had already been implemented, namely the one to include in the defence council the three commanders of the armed forces, that of the army, the air force and the navy. This is a recommendation that we had already accepted. As for the other allegations that the hon. member has just made, I would say that they do not necessarily reflect what I said. I do not recall ever having said that this report was not important, but I did say that the other recommendations should be re-evaluated since the report made no mention of the cost of implementation or non-implementation of these recommendations. When the task force that I have established to re-evaluate this whole issue has made its report, a decision will be made. However, I would not want to express any opinion at this time before those who are now examining the report now so that they can express their own views.

• (1500)

Mr. Howie: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Given that one of the stated objectives of the Liberal government of the day which forced the unified system on the Canadian forces was to cut back on the high number of senior officers caused by the triplication of posts on account of having three services, could the minister explain to the House why in 1969, prior to unification, there were 109 serving generals for a total force of 100,000 men, while in 1979 there were 108 generals for a force of 79,000 men and women?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think it is rather difficult to compare the pre-unified system with the present unified system because nowadays all major generals, lieutenant generals and brigadier generals are known as generals. In the past, for example, we had air marshals, admirals and generals, a completely different system. At that time, I think we had as many generals, marshals or admirals as we have today, if not more, because the qualifications and the evaluation were not the same.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S. ON ALASKA HIGHWAY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Moncton): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given conflicting reports on the progress of negotiations concerning the Alaska Highway natural gas pipeline, can the minister clarify the position of the United States government, in light of the apparently encouraging reports emanating from the minister's discussions with the United States officials in Venice?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had the advantage of extensive discussions with the Secretary of Energy for the United States during the Summit. We had a lengthy exploration of improvements that should be made in the position of the United States and also clarification of their position. We stated very clearly our view as a government speaking for the people of Canada.

I expect an answer from the United States Secretary of Energy within the next few days. In particular, we made it plain that we want a very clear indication from the United States government and the United States Congress that they are still in full support of building the full Alaska gas pipeline.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VENICE SUMMIT—WITHDRAWAL OF SOVIET TROOPS FROM AFGHANISTAN

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Defence. Reports from Venice indicate that the Prime Minister supported the Summit demand for a total withdrawal of Russian troops from Afghanistan. We are pleased to see such a show of unity.

Could the minister tell us if he believes the government's aims in this regard are helped at all when two Canadian parliamentary delegates to a NATO meeting in Luxembourg two weeks ago abstained from voting on a resolution condemning the Russian invasion?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I know that. I think that two members of that committee abstained from voting. I would not say that they voted against the resolution, but they wanted to maintain a personal opinion.

If the hon. member wants to know what I think of the meeting which took place in Venice or what is my perception of the international situation at the moment, he simply has to read the article published in yesterday's edition of the Journal.

Mr. Darling: Can the minister give us any assurance that Liberal delegates will not embarrass us in future by going against government and Canadian policy?

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the government House leader what business he intends to put before us today, tomorrow and next week.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we had a fruitful meeting of the House leaders this morning. There is agreement that we proceed with debate on motion No. 11 later today; that we proceed also to report stage and third reading of Bill C-28 without debate, except for perhaps one short comment from each party, if necessary; then later today we will proceed to Bill C-19 in Committee of the Whole; and, if possible, to second reading stage of Bill C-3, the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Subject to further talks at our scheduled House leaders' meeting tomorrow, we might deal with all stages of Bill C-36, the "O Canada" bill, if possible. I understand that later today Bill C-35 will be reported from committee, and if there is unanimous consent we shall deal with that bill tomorrow also; then Bills C-5, S-6, C-13 and C-22.

[Translation]

Next week, depending of course on the progress of business both in the House and in committees, we could complete consideration of the following bills: C-30, on the borrowing authority for the year 1980-81, C-6, the Bank Act revision, S-2, concerning tax agreements, and C-4 respecting grants to municipalities, 1980.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I confirm that there have been discussions about a number of the items mentioned by the government House leader. In doing so, I can say we are prepared to agree that motion No. 11 should pass without debate. The chairman of the committee referred to in the motion is grateful for that. We are also prepared to give third reading to Bill C-28 without debate. I notice that a spokesman for the official opposition wishes to have a minute or two on that. We would claim the same amount of time only if he says something provocative. If what he says is inane, we will let it go without further debate. We shall proceed with Bill C-19 and C-3 for the rest of the day.

I may say also with respect to the order of business for tomorrow that when Bill C-35 comes back for report stage and third reading, we feel it has been adequately dealt with in committee and so it can be passed without further debate.

I confirm the minister's statement that there have been discussions about the "O Canada" bill and the possibility of dealing with it tomorrow. We are prepared to co-operate and it is hoped that something might be achieved at our meeting tomorrow morning.

The minister can tell me later if he included the Small Loans Act in the plan for the next little while.

With respect to next week, I suggest that it is a little way off and things do get changed, so we will accept the suggestion about the number of bills and deal with them when they come up.

I am still annoyed, Madam Speaker, that we have gone this long without the bill respecting veterans and their survivors appearing on the order paper. We have been told repeatedly, since the first week of this session, that there would be such legislation. The minister told us in the standing committee that it will be brought foward in time for us to deal with it before we recess. It seems to me, if that commitment is to be kept, that the bill ought to be on the order paper now. We have given a commitment in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs that when the legislation comes before us, we will deal with it quickly.

I think without any further playing around the government House leader should assure us that the bill will be on the order paper before we recess and that time will be given for the bill to be passed, so that the veterans and the widows covered by that bill will receive its benefits. I am told now—I regret this—that the bill will not have any retroactivity in it. That means that every week of delay in passing, it delays getting those benefits to the people concerned. I put it to the minister as strongly as I can that this House must not break for a summer recess until we have done the right thing by our veterans.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, we are going to have a House leaders' meeting tomorrow and we can discuss a number of the things that have been raised here today. But I just want to remind my friend the government House leader that we indicated to him that if the Minister of Veterans Affairs would bring back the bill which had been placed on the order paper in the Thirty-first Parliament by the former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Victoria, with respect to pensions, we would be grateful.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has indicated that he has some improvements to that bill. He said so in his speech to the Royal Canadian Legion. If that is the case and there are such improvements to be brought forward, then I would think that it would be appropriate and a matter of priority that that bill be prepared and cleared through the cabinet.

I just want to tell my friend through you, Madam Speaker, that if that bill does come forward, we are prepared to live up to the undertaking. Assuming it is a bill that is at least as propitious and beneficial as the bill put in by the member for Victoria, we are prepared to give that bill three readings and get it out of the House of Commons and over to the other place to be dealt with. In this way it can become law very quickly, in fact, in one day. If that can have some effect upon my friend the government House leader and his colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to speed up the process with respect to that bill, then I want to assure him of our co-operation in that endeavour.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on this piece of veterans legislation. I would like to point out to the government House leader that in a statement by the Minister of Veterans to members of the standing committee, he stated that in all probability they would table Bill C-28, with minor changes or no changes. A similar bill to Bill C-28 was introduced by the last government. If the minister is making the statement that he is prepared to table the previous bill, I really do not understand why we are having this delay. Everything is right in the bill. It only has to be tabled. We want to make one brief speech and the NDP will make one brief speech. The bill will go to committee and it will be all over in a half a day. Let us do it before we recess at the end of July.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, could I ask the government House leader whether it is the intention of the government to bring in an act to repeal the Small Loans Act prior to the end of this session. There have been discussions. We have stated for the record that we are in favour of repeal of the Small Loans Act and that we will be in favour of speedy passage of that bill. I understand that similar points of view have been expressed by the Conservative party. Does the government intend to bring that measure forward before the recess?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, to alleviate the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre over the veterans legislation, I want to assure him that I will consult the Minister of Veterans Affairs to see if his concerns are founded. Some suggested that the Minister of Veterans Affairs made certain statements before the Royal Canadian Legion and the standing committee, but as I said last week, the minister said the truth and I do not want to come back to the matter. The hon. member who was wondering about the minister's statement before the committee wanted to know if we were going to introduce the bill before the summer recess, at the end of July.

Allow me to say that I never mentioned the end of July. Those are his words. As for the hon. member who has just referred to the Small Loans Act and who has asked me to introduce a bill to repeal it before the recess at the end of July, I would like to say to him that we have still some 20 urgent and important bills which should be passed before the recess. The veterans bill could be included but I do not want at this stage to make any promise about a specific date for the summer recess.

Now if in fact my colleagues would like to know the date of the summer recess, I would suggest the question is quite premature. The veterans bills are now being drafted. As for the Small Loans Act, the bill is obviously not yet on the order paper. It is a matter which I will take into consideration. As for the other matters mentioned by the House leader of the official opposition, I agree with him that we should complete the discussion during our meeting tomorrow morning before question period.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council concerning another bill, namely Bill C-26. There have been some discussions. It is a very minor matter, that is to say, ratification of an agreement entered into between Canada and the province of British Columbia, which will require half an hour. I know that the House leader of my party has discussed this matter with him. Could the President of the Privy Council give us some indication today when he intends to bring this bill in so that we can be assured it will be dealt with before the recess?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we have indeed to discuss it and I intend to reconsider it with the minister as well as with the parliamentary leaders at the meeting tomorrow.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. SHIELDS—REPLY OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In the question period today the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne), in reply to a question, imputed motives to this side of the House to which I take great exception. To quote him, I believe he said that "it showed the respect for our Armed Forces held by members on this side of the House". We asked a number of questions from this side of the House, and I believe he clearly inferred that we do not respect the Armed Forces.

I would like to say that this is imputing motives to people on this side of the House which I take serious exception to. I was a member of the Armed Forces. I would like him to withdraw that statement or to stand up now and apologize to members of this House, because I think that it was the most deplorable kind of accusation that he could make.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, obviously there are no grounds for a question of privilege. Most of the questions which were asked could well have been put on the order paper and I think that the House should proceed with its regular course of business if there is any real desire for an adjournment before August.

Madam Speaker: Indeed I must tell the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) that there is no ground there for a question of privilege. In my opinion it was not a question of privilege but rather a point of order. I understand the hon. member did not appreciate the interpretation given by the minister regarding the questions asked by the opposition. The hon. member has made his remark. He rose on a point of order. Still I cannot really accept it as a valid point of order. I can understand the fact that the hon. member did not appreciate this comment but anyway these are things that can happen during question period.

[English]

MR. MACKAY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF REMARKS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I want to raise a brief point of order which has reference to what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) said. Perhaps you can look at the blues and check what the minister said tomorrow. Maybe the minister did not mean it the way it came over, and perhaps there was so much noise, as you have pointed out, and if I contributed to it, my apologies. But I understood the minister to say, in effect, that if members wanted questions, the place to ask them might not be during the question period.

I can understand, depending on which side of the House one sits, that sometimes questions can be embarrassing. If that proposition is allowed to stand without being underlined or clarified, that is to say, that the question period in the House of Commons is not a very suitable or the most appropriate place to ask questions, then that is a very marked departure from parliamentary tradition.

I just want to ask you, Madam Speaker, to check the blues and perhaps ask the minister to check his answer, because as I understood him the effect was that if members wished to have answers to questions, the question period may not be the best place. If that is not the best place, I would like to know what is the best place.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member misunderstood the answer. What the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) said was that he was not referring to all the questions in general but to one specific question that was asked of him, and that it should have been put on the order paper. I think he was right in saying so. I also think that on the principle, as the hon. member well knows, he did not have to answer any of the questions, but he did answer in the best way he could.

Obviously there is no point of order in what the hon. member has just raised. Ministers are free to answer and the minister did answer well. When he stated that some of the questions should not have been asked during question period, he was right in saying that because most of the questions asked of him should have been placed on the order paper.

Madam Speaker: I believe that I was able to follow adequately what went on during this exchange in question period. I can check Hansard as the hon. member has requested, but it seems to me that the hon. minister said about one, or perhaps even two of the questions, that he needed additional information since the issue was rather complex and he would rather reply at another time than during question period.

I do not have to remind the hon. member that, in any case, the minister can choose not to reply to any question. He answered in his own way today. The hon. member may not be satisfied, but I cannot force the hon. minister to give another answer.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ANGUISH—REMISSION OF TAXES TO NORTHERN RESIDENTS—QUESTION ASKED BY MEMBER FOR THUNDER BAY-NIPIGON

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege regarding certain behaviour during the question period this afternoon. The question asked by the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters) was obviously a set-up. It was read from a piece of paper, and when responding the minister read the reply.

I have here a copy of a press release issued by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey). On it is stated "Not to be released before 3 p.m. Thursday, June 26, 1980". Therefore, it was a direct cover-up by the Minister of National Revenue. The minister did not want those in the opposition parties to respond to the announcement he made about remitting taxes to residents in isolated northern areas. There are many concerns we would like to raise about that. Therefore, the government are covering up and taking away our privilege as members of Parliament to act on behalf of our constituents and express our concerns about measures imposed by the government which directly concern us.

In connection with that, I also notice that according to the House plan, members opposite do not sit in their proper places. Therefore, either the House plan should be changed or members should sit in their proper seats. The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon sits in the wrong place, as does the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain), making it hard to identify them.

That is the first question of privilege. The second is that we should have an opportunity to respond to ministerial statements.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member admits that he is dealing with two questions of privilege at the same time. I can only entertain one.

Mr. Anguish: The question of privilege, if I only have the opportunity to raise one, is the fact that we should not have set-up questions in this House, even though the Conservatives obviously agree with that by what the members here are saying. I disagree with that. It impedes my ability to act as a member of Parliament in the interests of my constituents on statements that should be made as ministerial statements.

Set-up questions by the Liberal government impede my ability to act as a member of Parliament and respond to a very important concern whereby people are being affected by a tax remittance. This remission is only effective to the end of 1980. What happens then to these taxable benefits? The oil companies which many of these people work for had profits in excess of 108 per cent in the first quarter compared to what they had last year.

Madam Speaker: Order. I know the rule of relevancy is not often invoked in this chamber, but I am afraid I must invoke it at this point. Has the hon. member completed his question of privilege? If so, I am ready to rule on it.

The hon. member is discussing a grievance he has regarding what happened earlier in the question period. I would say to the hon. member that the member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters) is not the only member who reads his questions. That is acceptable in this House. I found the question acceptable. It is not unparliamentary. On the contrary, it is a custom which is prevalent in many parliaments, including this Parliament, whereby members give prior notice of a question to a minister. I do not know whether prior notice had been given in this case. However, that is not unparliamentary; it is quite acceptable.

The hon. member himself may do that if he wishes in order to receive a more complete answer to one of his questions. He could give notice to a minister of a question that he wants to ask. I do not see how the privileges of the hon. member have been breached by this. It is perfectly acceptable procedure during question period.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not think it is a matter of the notice from the hon. member to the minister of the question that is going to be asked. It is the growing suspicion in this House that there is notice by a minister to a member to ask a question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have just ruled on this question of privilege, and, therefore, cannot allow the hon. member to comment on it.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising from what was said at one point yesterday by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) when, as he does each day, he announces the order paper questions to be answered. On Wednesdays he announces—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Since the hon. member is referring to something that took place yesterday, I would require notice in order to entertain his question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: The reason I could not give you notice, Madam Speaker, is that the gentleman he mentioned—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member might—

Mr. Cossitt: I think I should have the privilege of explaining while I am on my feet and then you could rule.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member might have a lot of good reasons for not giving notice, but I must apply the rules. I require notice if the hon. member wants me to entertain a question of privilege on something that happened yesterday.

Mr. Cossitt: May I ask you to clarify, Madam Speaker. I may have mentioned something, but if something occurs right now across the floor of the House, why can I not raise it as a point of order? The situation did not exist yesterday. It began yesterday but the entire situation exists right now. The two members are here. I feel I have a perfect right to proceed on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member is speaking of something which flows from the deliberations of today, I can entertain his point of order.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I just want to make a brief comment on the previous point of order relating to the—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I made a ruling on the previous points of order raised in this chamber and I cannot entertain further comments on them. I do not know what is wrong with members this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I have not yet had a chance to go outside to see what the weather is like, but it must be the weather! I would ask hon. members to restrain themselves and raise only legitimate points of order, if they have any.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, it is a point of order relating to a reply that the deputy House leader gave with respect to the answers given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) during question period. It is not a matter on which Your Honour made a ruling.

Madam Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member is referring to something on which I have ruled. That was his introductory statement. I have to take it that he wishes to comment on a ruling I have just made. Therefore, I cannot give him the floor.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 100, 164, 245, 332, 334, 611, 634, 683, 690, 722, 767, 796, 828, 843 and 897.

MACDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION—FEATHERBED FILE

Question No. 100—Mr. Cossitt:

Will the government consider referring the Featherbed File to the McDonald royal commission for examination and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): The commission of inquiry concerning certain activities of the RCMP reviewed the Featherbed File in 1978.

CANADIAN EMBASSY IN MOSCOW—LOCAL STAFF

Question No. 164—Mr. Cossitt:

Have Russian citizens serving as maintenance staff or in any other post resigned from the staff of the Canadian Embassy in Moscow and, if so (a) what problems has this caused (b) how many left their jobs and, in each case, what was their (i) name (ii) address (iii) job designation (iv) salary (v) reason for leaving such employment?

2. (a) Is the government considering dismissing all remaining Russian citizens at the embassy and filling such positions with Canadian citizens (b) does the government of the Soviet Union use this system and, if so, is there any reason that Canada hesitates to use such a system?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. A number of Russian citizens have resigned from the staff of the Canadian Embassy in Moscow recently. This has meant cutting back on certain services and redistributing the duties amongst the remaining staff. Information on those employees who have left jobs is attached.

2. (a) The government is not considering dismissing all remaining Soviet citizens at the embassy and filling such positions with Canadian citizens.

(b) The Soviet Union to our knowledge employs mainly Russian citizens at its missions abroad. Canada employs a system whereby, in addition to the necessary complement of Canadian employees, it hires citizens of the country where its embassies are located to perform certain non-sensitive duties, such as drivers, gardeners, translators, customs clearance clerks, etc. This system which is used by Canada in Moscow, is similar to the one used by most other western countries there. In the government's view the adoption of the Soviet system at the Canadian Embassy in Moscow would be very costly, inefficient and unnecessary since it would require the posting and maintenance in Moscow of several more Canadians than is now the case, and many of the duties such Canadians would perform could be adequately performed by Soviet citizens.

Order Paper Questions

VETERANS AFFAIRS—HOSPITALS

Question No. 245—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many veterans presently in hospitals administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs are not considered the responsibility of the government?

2. What is the cost to the government to look after them and what amount does each provincial government contribue toward the cost?

3. Does the government permit the inclusion of such provincial contributions for the calculation of the federal-provincial medical cost-sharing program?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. 899.

2. Ste. Anne's Hospital, Province of Quebec

Cost to Government	—	$ 70.00 per diem
Recoveries (Provincial)	—	$ 35.00 per diem—Active $ 25.00 per diem—Chronic

Deer Lodge Hospital, Province of Manitoba

Cost to Government	—	$143.10 per diem—Active $ 73.45 per diem—Chronic
Recoveries (Provincial)	—	$127.55 per diem—Active Nil —Chronic

3. No. The federal-provincial medical cost-sharing system has been superseded by a system of block payments to the provinces.

SECOND OFFICIAL LANGUAGE EDUCATION

Question No. 332—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government intend to conclude an interim funding arrangement for the fiscal year 1979-80 for minority and second official language education and, if so, will the terms and conditions of the agreement be made public?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Arrangements for providing financial assistance on a interim basis for the 1979-80 fiscal year for non-formula programs and for formula funding were concluded with the provinces. The interim arrangements basically constituted a continuation of programs provided under previous agreements and therefore were governed by the same terms and conditions, subject to arrangements limiting total funding for formula programs to $140 million and for non-formula programs to $30.4 million. The terms and conditions governing former agreements, which had been made public previously, were therefore still applicable.

MINORITY OFFICIAL LANGUAGE GROUP

Question No. 334—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is it the government's intention to support the opportunities for Canadians of the minority official language group in each province (English in Quebec, French in other provinces) to be educated in their own language and, if so, by what means?

2. Will conditions apply to any new agreement and will it be possible to terminate the agreement, at any time, if the conditions are not fulfilled?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): 1. The federal government has provided financial assistance to provinces since 1970-71 with the objective of supporting opportunities for Canadians of the minority official language group in each province to be educated in their own language. The assistance has been provided under two successive federal-provincial agreements on official languages in education, the latter of which expired March 31, 1979. Funds for the 1979-80 fiscal year were provided under an interim arrangement, and funding on an interim basis has also been agreed to for certain programs in 1980-81. Negotiations to conclude new long term agreements, commencing 1980-81 are currently underway.

2. As the new agreement has not yet been finalized, it is not possible at this time, to comment on any particular conditions that it may contain.

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—LAWYERS ON STAFF

Question No. 611—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows:

There are no lawyers employed on staff in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. However, the Department of Justice has assigned six lawyers to provide the day to day legal counsel required by the department.

ENVIRONMENT—PUBLIC RELATIONS

Question No. 634—Mr. Howie:

How many persons engaged in public relations, publicity or media relations, are employed on staff in the Department of the Environment?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment):

Headquarters:	43

CRTC—BROCKVILLE, ONTARIO

Question No. 683—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission receive a resolution under cover of a letter from the city council of Brockville, Ontario approximately five months ago on the subject of service etc. rendered by Brockville Amusements Limited and some times known as Brockville Cable Limited and, if so (a) what was the date of the letter (b) was the letter answered or acknowledged and, if not, for what reason?

2. Did Vincent Lee Chong of the CRTC receive an inquiry within the last several weeks from a member of the Brockville city council asking why the commission had not had the courtesy to reply and, if so, was the answer given that Brockville Cable Limited had yet to reply to the commission's representations made as a result of Brockville city council's resolution?

3. If the CRTC does not receive replies to its mail within a reasonable time is it customary to wait five months or more to follow matters up and, if so, for what reason?

4. Will the commission reply to the Brockville city council and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission that the reply to the above question is as follows:

1. A letter dealing with this matter was received in the commission, December 17, 1979.

(a) The date as typed in the letter was "1979 12 13".

(b) An interim response to this letter was sent to Mr. A. J. Miles, city clerk of Brockville, on January 30, 1980. This letter informed Mr. Miles that the city's resolution had been brought to the attention of Brockville Cable.

2. Mr. Vincent Lee-Chong, an employee of the commission, did receive a telephone inquiry from Mr. Bob Runciman, member of the Brockville city council, re the resolution of the Brockville city council. This inquiry was received in late March 1980.

The answer given was that no reply had yet been received from Brockville Cable regarding the city council's resolution. Brockville Cable was subsequently contacted and questioned about this and other complaints re cable service. Copies of 13 responses to complainants were forwarded by Brockville Cable to the commission in a letter dated April 14, 1980. These responses did not include any concerning Brockville city council. A special letter dated April 24, received by the commission April 27, contained a copy of a response to the Brockville city council resolution. This response was dated April 3, and apparently had been sent directly to Mr. A. J. Miles, city clerk of Brockville. Brockville Cable had been advised in the commission's letter of January 30, that in addition to communicating with the commission, it could get in touch with the complainants directly.

3. It is customary to issue follow-up communications if response to commission mail is not received within reasonable time. In this case this follow-up communication was sent approximately two months after the original CRTC letter to Brockville Cable.

4. The commission has replied to the city of Brockville. In that letter the commission, after outlining earlier inquiries into the matter, undertook for senior staff to visit Brockville, meet Brockville city council representatives and inspect the cable television operations. Further action will depend on the findings of that visit.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 690—Mr. Clarke:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, how many contracts were let by the Department of External Affairs for professional services, to persons who at any time within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission?

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the national capital region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Five.

2. (a) Four; (b) one; (c) none.

3. None.

4. $31,260.69.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—LOSS OF VEHICLES

Question No. 722—Mr. Clarke:

1. With reference to the uninsured losses of more than $1,000 of vehicles recorded by the Department of External Affairs in footnote number 7 at page 12.62, Volume I of the 1978-79 Public Accounts of Canada, for what reason was the loss of $21,450 unexplained?

2. Did the department undertake steps to ascertain the whereabouts of the two vehicles and, if so, what were they?

3. Was the thief apprehended?

4. In what locations did the losses occur?

5. Did the department undertake steps to ensure that such losses do not recur and, if so, what were they?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The descriptive title of the Public Accounts statement in question is considered to be self-explanatory (i.e., losses due to destruction or damage), and no further explanation appears necessary as in accordance with relevant instructions from the Receiver General, the footnote identifies those losses which occurred other than by destruction or damage.

2. The vehicles concerned were utilized by our embassy in Beirut, Lebanon. Their loss due to theft was reported to the civil authorities. The vehicles were a 1972 Landrover and a 1975 Peugeot 504 Sedan.

3. No, the vehicles were taken during time of civil uprising. Local authorities attempted to investigate, however, results were negative.

4. The losses occurred in Beirut, Lebanon.

5. The department always ensures that maximum protection is afforded to all public assets.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE—ADMINISTRATIVE AND POLICY CONSULTANTS UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 767—Mr. Shields:

Since August 1, 1978, how many (a) administrative (b) policy consultants were under contract to the Prime Minister's office and Privy Council office and/or any boards, commissions or corporations reporting to the Prime Minister and, in each case, what amount was paid to them?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Prime Minister and Privy Council offices are concerned: (a) and (b) none.

In so far as the Economic Council of Canada is concerned:

Order Paper Questions

(a) 3—$14,980.87

Mr. Norman Lafrance	$ 6,570.00
Mrs. Eileen Pruden	$ 1,190.00
CEGIR Company	$ 7,220.87
	$14,980.87

(b) 1—$31,083.48

Mrs. Gail C. A. Cook	$31,083.48

In so far as the Chief Electoral Office is concerned: (a) and (b) none.

In so far as the Public Service Staff Relations Board is concerned:

(a) 2—$24,884.81

Data Crown	$21,384.81
Pouliot, Guerard & Associates	$ 3,500.00
	$24,884.81

(b) None.

NATIONAL FORESTRY POLICY

Question No. 796—Mr. de Jong:

Does Canada have a national forestry policy and, if not, is it the government's intention to develop such a policy?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Although each province has jurisdiction over the forest resources within its own boundaries, there is need for agreement on basic goals and principles in the management of our forests. The Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers has addressed this matter. As a result, all the provinces and the federal government have agreed that Canada should try to increase the flow of benefits from the forest resource and eleven basic principles which each jurisdiction will take into account in developing its own forest policy have been identified. A discussion paper on federal policy on the forestry sector was released by the federal government on January 15. Environment Minister John Roberts outlined the federal policy on March 25 (Environment Canada Press Release, Montreal, March 25, 1980).

ENERGY DERIVED FROM RENEWABLE RESOURCES

Question No. 828—Mr. Howie:

For the fiscal year ended March 31 (a) 1978 (b) 1979, what amount was spent by the government with respect to energy derived from renewable resources on (i) in-house (ii) outside research and development?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): In so far as the National Research Council is concerned, the reply is as follows:

For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978

		By NRC	By other federal departments and agencies and coordinated by NRC	Total
(i)	in-house	$ 915,000	$410,000	$1,325,000
(ii)	outside R and D	1,900,000	755,000	2,655,000

For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979

(i)	in-house	$2,832,000	$2,351,000	$5,183,000
(ii)	outside R and D	4,970,000	2,638,000	7,608,000

BAY OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER—ECONOMIC FEASIBILITY

Question No. 843—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1978, what amount was spent by the government on studying the economic feasibility of Bay of Fundy tidal power?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: $79,190.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PUBLISHING OF "INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVES"

Question No. 897—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the announcement made on May 9, 1980, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that International Perspectives and its French counterpart Perspectives internationales will no longer be published by the government but by Alex Inglis, 150 Wellington Street, Ottawa (a) were tenders called for the publishing of this material and, if so (i) on what date (ii) from whom were they received and for what amounts (b) if not, for what reason was Alex Inglis awarded the contract without tenders?

2. Was Louis Balthazar of Quebec City selected to edit the French language version and, if so (a) for what reason (b) were others considered as well?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. With reference to International Perspectives and Perspectives internationales:

(a) No.

(b) The Department of External Affairs was aiming to have the private sector publish the journal(s), preferably without public subsidy but with limited subsidy if necessary; therefore, the department had nothing to sell and thus nothing on which to call tenders; instead, the department—on the advice of the Canadian Government Publishing Centre—let it be known in the international relations community in Canada that proposals for the takeover of the journal(s) at the lowest possible cost to the public would be welcome; of the proposals received (three), Mr. Alex Inglis asked for the lowest amount of public subsidy.

2. Mr. Louis Balthazar, as editor of Perspectives internationales, is in a business relationship with the publisher of that journal; questions having to do with his selection for the job would have to be directed to Mr. Alex Inglis.

Mr. Collenette: While I am on my feet I should like to take the opportunity to refer to questions addressed to me yesterday by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) with reference to order paper questions Nos. 810 and 811. I can inform the hon. member that, as of a couple of days ago, these answers were still being prepared. I will do my best to follow the matter up for him.

Reference was also made yesterday to starred question No. 876 by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie). I can tell the hon. member that, as of yesterday, part of the answer had been compiled. I am awaiting the other part and I will do my best to bring it to the House as soon as possible.

I would ask that all the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cossitt: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has just referred to points of order raised in the House concerning delays in replying to questions on the order paper, and he has indicated, roughly, when answers might be expected. In these circumstances I feel justified in asking when I might expect an answer to a question of mine which is on the order paper which inquires as to the amount of government business received by Martin Goldfarb and Goldfarb Associates.

I would say I have raised the point of order about this unanswered question six times in the last three years. The hon. gentleman's predecessor said it would be answered "soon". I asked the present parliamentary secretary two years later how soon is "soon", and he said "eventually". Now, if the hon. member has been so kind as to tell other members when questions are going to be answered, would he now tell the House when this one is going to be answered?

While I am at it, might I make one further inquiry concerning another matter—I do not have the number of the question in front of me, but it is easy to locate. A year or so ago I asked for a list of Soviet diplomats who had applied to travel outside the restrictive limits placed on them by the government. That is simply a matter of the Department of External Affairs consulting their records. Something has gone wrong if it takes them two years to do that.

Mr. Collenette: In answer to the hon. member's questions I should point out that there are more than 1,200 questions on the order paper. Many of them have been placed there by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt). Answering such questions involves considerable expense and I sometimes wonder whether or not the hon. member is perhaps abusing his position by such questions and putting the government, the taxpayers of Canada, to such inordinate expense in answering what appear to be trivial questions. Be that as it may, I assure the hon. member that there are questions he has asked that I signed recently. Not a day goes by without a couple of his questions being answered. There are three or four today, perhaps five, in the group I have just mentioned. So I would ask him to be patient.

He did misquote me when he referred to my reply a couple of weeks ago to the question concerning Goldfarb Consultants. I defined "soon" as being "some point in the future". Obviously we have not reached that point yet.

Mr. Cossitt: A question of privilege, Madam Speaker. If I understood the parliamentary secretary correctly, he said I was abusing my privileges by asking questions in this House. If I understood him correctly, that was roughly the tone of his remarks. Madam Speaker, when the day comes on which a member of the government can tell the opposition or a member of the opposition that they do not have the privilege of questioning the government, then we will have a dictatorship in Canada, not a democratic government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: I ask the hon. member to stand in his place and withdraw that remark. And let him not say he was misquoted, as he did a minute ago, because he was not misquoted.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I did not accuse the hon. member of abusing the rules of the House; I was wondering whether or not some of his questions perhaps constituted abuse. Perhaps there is a fine line there; I was expressing a personal view. When I look at these questions day after day and when I think of the expense the government has to go to to answer them, I feel a legitimate concern. Perhaps I should not voice this concern in the chamber and I would ask Your Honour to rule.

If I have offended the hon. member through failing to follow the Standing Orders, then obviously I would apologize. But I certainly have a legitimate right, as have all hon. members, to express reservations I may have about any procedure going on in the House or on any bill which is before the House.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) has given explanations which perhaps will satisfy the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt). There is a different interpretation of the sense in which a certain word was used. I do not think it was unparliamentary, but this clarification will probably satisfy everybody.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROVISIONS OF HELSINKI FINAL ACT—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to examine the implementation of the provisions of the three baskets of the Helsinki Final Act by Canada and other participating states and consider Canada's participation in the Madrid follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) and report to the House; and

That the committee be empowered for this purpose to retain the services of advisers to assist in its work and that it also be empowered to retain such professional, clerical and stenographic help as may be required and that it also be empowered to advertise invitations to the public to submit opinions on the aforementioned matter.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

EXTENSION OF AND INCREASE IN GUARANTEED LOANS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved that Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[English]

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, members on this side of the House recognize and accept the need for urgency in passing this bill. It is imperative that Bill C-28 be passed before July 1 since the fishermen are dependent upon the continuance of the fisheries improvement loans program.

Our party is somewhat disappointed that Bill C-28 was not brought before us earlier so that better discussion of the program could have taken place. However, upon consideration, Madam Speaker, we have decided to allow the bill to be passed without further debate so that any fisherman desiring credit shall not be denied consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed, from Wednesday, June 11, consideration in committee of Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act—Mr. Axworthy—Mr. Blaker in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose on Wednesday, June 11, 1980, clause 1 of the bill was under consideration. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta had the floor. In his absence I will recognize the next hon. member who wishes to address himself to the bill. The hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I would like to indicate to the minister opposite how much we appreciate the availability today of information. I hope we can proceed quickly because there certainly is a growing number of unemployed in this country, and the faster we can get on with the passage of this bill the better off I think those unemployed might be.

I would like to begin by reviewing with the minister the announcement he made in this House some two and one-half weeks ago about other alternative ways of creating employment. I wonder if we might begin with the community services program. I think the amount mentioned by the minister was in the order of $11 million for that purpose. I wonder if the minister might tell us how many man-weeks of employment that program might create in this fiscal year and what the dollar cost per week of that employment might be.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the invitation of the hon. member for Calgary West to dispatch this particular bill, which has been with us a good long time. I certainly do agree with him that there have been many unemployed people awaiting its passage with some degree of interest, and it is useful to know that in fact members of the opposition will now accord it the proper treatment which we had suggested earlier on.

As far as the participants are concerned, in terms of community service projects the total number of participants estimated this year is 1,100.

Mr. Hawkes: I am pleased to know that there are 1,100 participants, but my question was how many man-weeks of employment are involved in the current fiscal year, and what is the dollar cost per week of employment for this community services program?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out to the hon. member before, the measurement we use to determine the nature of the program is participants. The other form of measurement he uses is not one we apply, and therefore we cannot give him an answer.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, let us go to the bill before us, the employment tax credit bill. Could the minister indicate to us—and we will try to keep the questions simple and perhaps work up to something a little more complex—the average cost per week of the employment tax credit program?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I think we gave the hon. member answers to that question before, but we estimated that the average cost for the place or position created by tax credit is about $3,300 to $3,500. It is difficult to estimate because sometimes there are different numbers of weeks applied to the program. They do not all operate on a 12-month basis. There is some variance, but that is about the average cost of the program over all.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, perhaps we could narrow it down, but what is the cost to the government of the employment tax credit program per participant per week?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, about $65.

Mr. Hawkes: We have a number of $65 for the employment tax credit program. Could the minister indicate why we do not have a similar cost per week per participant for the community services program?

Mr. Axworthy: Because, Mr. Chairman, at this point in time the program is not in effect, and we can only use judgmental factors. Until the program actually has some operational time in which to see how it is working, we cannot provide that measurement.

Mr. Hawkes: Could the minister tell us, in terms of the community services program, on what basis he is going to determine the wage rate that people who work under that program will get, and what portion of that wage rate will the federal government pay? Could someone be paid $5,000 a week under that program, or is there a maximum or a minimum? There is no sense of average, obviously, but could he give us some of the parameters of the cost per week per employee for the community services program?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out when we announced the program, the basis upon which the salaries will be paid is that the federal government contribution would be related to the minimum wage paid in respect of provinces, with some discretion in the program to add to that. However, that does not necessarily relate to the total wage which would be paid to the participant because organizations would have the capacity to top up those salaries if they so desire.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, there is a much larger program which the minister announced costing $72 million, which is getting into the neighbourhood of the cost of the employment tax credit program. On the $72 million program, the community development program, does the minister have an estimate of the cost per week per employee of the community development program?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out in a similar answer, the program is not yet operative. We have estimated what the cost might be in terms of participants on the basis of a fiscal year of the government, and that is the measurement we will use. Again, until we have some operational criteria or data, it is difficult to pinpoint that. The same formula will be used in terms of using the minimum wage as the base line for the cost of each participant in the program, but with an ability to add approximately an additional 20 per cent, depending on the nature of the project, the skills involved and so forth; so there are a number of variables involved. We can actually pinpoint that, and we will be glad to provide that information once we have some experience with the program.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, can the minister give us an estimate of the number of participants in the community development program?

Mr. Axworthy: We are estimating about 20,000 participants this year.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, the budget figure is $72 million and the minister is estimating 20,000 participants. Somehow there must be some relationship between the number of people who participate and the dollar cost. How did the minister arrive at the estimate of $72 million and/or how did the minister arrive at the estimate of 20,000 participants? Can 20,000 people be hired for $72 million and, if so, what is the cost per week?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the allocation was based on what kind of money we thought we would be able to put together as a consequence of the estimates which had been established for spending programs or guidelines which were already in place. Needless to say, we would have liked to have provided a great deal more, but those were the parameters within which we worked. The estimate of participants is, of course, related to the estimate of the total sum of money available but, as I pointed out, there are variations.

At this stage in time when we are simply preparing the actual operational features of the program, which we hope to be active by this fall, it is difficult to make any clear estimates because we are putting the program into effect. Until we are actually able to put the machinery into motion, we will not be able to give a clear estimate, but I think 20,000 is the basis for subdividing now the money we will have available in this fiscal year.

I should point out to the hon. member that he made a substantial misjudgment in one of his earlier statements when he did his own division work and did not take into account the fact that, because many of these jobs are committed for the fiscal year 1981 and go into the next fiscal year, we have to put money aside to make sure that we can fulfil our commitments. So it does range over into the next fiscal year when we sign agreements under the community development program.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, now I am becoming confused. Can we go right back to basics? Is the minister spending $137 million this year to create the employment program which he announced in the House? Is that $137 million to be spent this year or is he telling us now that it is an expenditure which ranges over more than one fiscal year?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will obviously be able to understand that if we are putting a program into place beginning this fall but which has the ability to work for a year or, in the case of the community services program, over a three-year period, we obviously must be prepared to commit ourselves to spend that money to create that situation. So we are spending $137 million in this fiscal year in terms of the commitments that we are prepared to make in job creation. In many of those cases those positions will run over beyond the end of the fiscal year in April for 1981-82, so obviously we must have the money because it has already been committed to be spent. But the positions will be created.

Mr. Hawkes: Let us stay right here, Mr. Chairman. The amount of $72 million is budgeted for the community development program which is the three-year program to which the minister refers.

Mr. Axworthy: It is a one-year program.

Mr. Hawkes: Okay, a one year program. Let us stay with the community development program which is a one-year program. Does one year mean 12 months, and therefore the $72 million will be spread over two fiscal years and, if so, in what proportion? Or does the minister intend to spend $72 million in this fiscal year?

Mr. Axworthy: As we explained to the hon. member several times, it may be for a year or it may not be for a year. It depends on the applications we receive from the various sponsoring groups. The minimum requirement for job creation under the program is eight weeks. It may go for 25 weeks, for 40 weeks, or even beyond that.

The fact of the matter is that the community development program, in terms of its initial outline, was to be a program that could run for a year, and if the program had merit it could go beyond a year, but that would require further negotiation and application. But the minimum requirement under the program is for an eight-week employment package. Anything between that is available. However, the program was late getting started because of the election and the change in government. Since there were no direct job-creation programs available for us to use because they had all been cancelled, the program will not be started until this fall. Therefore, if a sponsor puts in an application to create employment for a full year period and the program does not get started until November, by simple mathematics it will obviously carry over until the next fiscal year.

Mr. Hawkes: Does the minister have any kind of estimate of how much of the $72 million will be spent in this fiscal year and how much will be spent in subsequent fiscal years?

Mr. Axworthy: I will answer the same question but perhaps in a different way to try to expand the explanation further. The money is being committed this year for all those jobs. I think the hon. member would recognize that it would be highly irresponsible for us to invite people to apply for jobs and then not have the money to pay for them. But at this point, until we actually have the applications in our hands, we cannot determine what the full length of those job tenures will be under the community development program. So the $72 million which we are committing this year is for jobs which will be started this year. They will be in effect and in operation this year. They may carry over into the next fiscal year, but we have to keep paying the salaries regardless.

Mr. Hawkes: So there is an indeterminate portion of the $72 million which will be spent this year and an indeterminate portion which will be spent next year.

Let us go back for a second to the community services program which is the minister's three year program. The amount announced to this House for this program was $11 million. Does the minister have an estimate of the proportion of that $11 million which will create jobs for this fiscal year, the proportion for next year and the proportion for the third year?

Mr. Axworthy: Again, the $11 million is committed for actual positions that will be created this year.

Mr. Hawkes: So for the community services program we have $11 million for this year, and for the community development program we have $72 million, some portion of it to be used this year and some portion next year. Let us run through the other parts of the $137 million. There is the local economic development assistance which, it was announced to the House, would cost $3 million. What portion of that sum will create jobs this year?

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member might want to refer back to my statement. He will recognize that the local economic development program is a pilot project and its major objective is long-term job creation, enabling communities to establish a firm economic base in the community so that the jobs created will not be of a short-term nature and have to be renewed.

Economic factors will be taken into account to allow small businesses to develop. Under that program what we are offering to a number of pilot projects, most of which we hope will be established over the summer and the fall of this year, is front end money for organizational work, marketing work, developmental work, and the establishment of a corporate structure in these communities. Then, if they are operative by that time, the rest of the funds will be available for equity financing. But no one could begin to speculate on how quickly that will happen or how many actual jobs will be created out of it. The objective of that program, as I explained in the House, is to be an innovative program which attempts to develop longer-term assistance to communities where there are not many employment prospects but where, with government assistance, they might be able to organize themselves. So I cannot give the hon. member an actual estimate of jobs at this time until the program comes into operation.

Mr. Hawkes: The next program is the new technology program at $7 million. Is all of it to be spent this year or part of it next year?

Mr. Axworthy: Again, it is committed for this year.

Mr. Hawkes: How about the program for the disadvantaged people at $15 million?

Mr. Axworthy: As I explained in my statement to the House, that $15 million was set aside in our budget for a new program dealing with the disadvantaged people. There are no employees as yet because we are still working on it. We hope to be able to bring in legislation, if necessary, this fall to provide that kind of incentive to the private sector to hire severely disadvantaged people. So the $15 million at this point is just a reserve in our budget until we are able to arrive at the details of that program.

Mr. Hawkes: The next program is the native training program at $10 million. Is it all to be spent this year or will some be spent next year?

Mr. Axworthy: This year, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hawkes: The next one is the critical skills training program at $10 million.

Mr. Axworthy: It will be spent this year, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hawkes: The next one is the non-traditional training for women at $2 million.

Mr. Axworthy: It is for this year, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hawkes: The next one is the language training for refugees at $7 million.

Mr. Axworthy: It is for this year, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Let us come back to the community services program. The minister has told us the following facts about it, that there is an $11 million budget which will be spent this year. I believe the original announcement was that there would be 1,000 participants. If those 1,000 participants participate for the length of time available to them this year—I think it has the starting date of October 1 and the fiscal year ends on March 31—if one does a little rough calculation, it comes to 26 weeks of employment for 1,000 people at $11 million; and the cost of that job-creation program comes to $423 worth of taxpayers' money each week. Can the minister confirm those mathematics?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I did not hear those mathematics.

Mr. Hawkes: I will be only too happy to repeat them in the hope they might stick. The minister has announced a budget of $11 million. He has confirmed in this House today that that $11 million is to be spent this year. The starting date of the program is October 1. If we are talking about this fiscal year, which the minister has confirmed, then the program would terminate March 31. If those 1,000 people work in that entire 26-week period, then the cost will be $423 per week. If any of them work a shorter period of time, the cost would go up. In the case of the community services program, we are talking about a cost to taxpayers of $423 per week per job. Are those mathematics correct?

• (1600)

Mr. Axworthy: Again, Mr. Chairman, I should like to correct the hon. member's mathematics. I think he is a much better sociologist than a mathematician. As I explained earlier, a commitment is made this year of $11 million. It is made to projects to pay for the estimated 1,000 participants. They will be given the funds to use, but those jobs may carry over into the next fiscal year. Therefore, that is the basis upon which he should add in several additional weeks; it will substantially lower the cost per week.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, this is becoming extremely difficult. In the beginning we went very slowly. We went through every program. We asked the minister whether the budget would be spent this year or spread over two years. I think the Hansard record will show very clearly that the minister corrected me in terms of the community services program. He indicated that the entire $11 million for employment creation would be spent in this fiscal year for that program. Using the minister's own figures, the mathematics of the situation come to $423. Surely it is a simple calculation.

This line of questioning began with an attempt to ascertain the number of man-weeks of employment created and the cost per week. Those figures are in the bill before us. I suggest it is completely irresponsible to propose any employment-creation program without some estimate of the cost per week per job. Surely the minister or his department has those figures. He has one of the largest research departments and perhaps the largest budget in government for this purpose. We cannot continue to have it both ways. Either the $11 million is spent this year or not. If it is, the cost per week is $423 minimum, and it may be more.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I would not want to disabuse the hon. member of his own opinions, but I suggest that he should re-examine his calculations. We indicated to him that our form of measurement, which I think is a responsible one, was to take a sum of money and subdivide it in terms of what we think will be the potential pay-out per participant. We have indicated that we estimate there will be some 1,100 participants. He insists upon using only that portion of time remaining within this fiscal year. I have indicated that it could extend beyond this fiscal year, even though the moneys are advanced this year to pay for the project.

I think it is a reasonably simple concept to understand because the work has been created this year. If it is a 12-month program, obviously it will extend beyond April. Therefore, the money is in the project to pay for the continuation of that work. Then we will renew it and bring in another level of programs in the following fiscal year. The hon. member can redo his calculations based upon that if he wants, but he cannot estimate it because we do not have the evidence in front of us since the program obviously is not in place yet. We can do it more easily with the tax credit program because we have the experience of that program to base it upon. It is simply a continuation of an existing program as opposed to a new program. Therefore, obviously the range of figures is somewhat different.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, first of all I have a couple of statements to make before I begin to question the minister in a more specific manner. I have some concerns about Bill C-19 to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, along with other measures the minister announced a couple of weeks ago to create new jobs to try to reduce unemployment in the country, which is reaching critical proportions, even though in my judgment most of the jobs created will be of a short-term nature. It is a make-work, kind of patchwork approach to employment in the country from which a very large segment of our work force has been suffering throughout the entire Liberal period of the 1970s. A major national industrial strategy has not been established to look at the total employment problem in the country. It should be put into place so that people are not entering, re-entering, moving into and removing themselves from the work force in a patchwork manner year in and year out, as we have seen in the past decade.

We on this side of the House, particularly in the New Democratic Party, hoped that the new minister, as young and vigorous as he is, would have brought in new and vigorous policies to cope with this patchwork approach about which his predecessors were complacent.

Mr. Axworthy: Aging rapidly.

Mr. Blackburn: I said the minister was young and vigorous; I presume he is. Anyway, he is a little younger than I.

In the short time allotted to me this afternoon, I should like to focus more specifically on one of the cruelest and saddest aspects of unemployment and on the almost total failure of job creation either through tax credits or other mechanisms. Of course, I am referring to 300,000 native North Americans, our Indian population, whether or not they live on reserves.

I think it was yesterday that a booklet came out entitled: "Indian Conditions—A Survey". I have not read the entire report. I have not had a chance; it just came to my attention a few hours ago. Under the heading "Economic Conditions—labour force/employment" at page 59, it reads as follows:

> Recent estimates of Indian unemployment have ranged from 35 to 75 per cent of the labour force (proportion of working-age population—15-64 years—employed or actively seeking work). These estimates vary in part because of the absence of reliable surveys but largely because of varying assumptions about the labour force participation rate.
> There are a number of surveys suggesting that Indian labour force participation is about 40 per cent and employment rates about 32 per cent of the working-age population, compared to about 60 per cent and 56 per cent for the national population. Based on this information, Indian unemployment would be over 18 per cent compared to 8 per cent of the national labour force.

As we all know, there are some reserves or some pockets of Indian unemployment in the country which range as high as 70 per cent to 75 per cent to 80 per cent, yet the minister announced a $10 million program known as the native training program. I will deal with the tax credit aspect of this a little later, but when we consider that this is all the funding that we at the federal level can give to one of the most tragic areas of unemployment, it is not only revolting but disgusting.

I should like to know just how many jobs will be created. How many meaningful, long-term, skilled and semi-skilled jobs will be created? We must consider that there are thousands upon thousands of native North Americans out of work in this country who, through no fault of their own, are badly educated, undereducated or non-educated. How many of these people will find meaningful employment through the native training program? I will allow the minister to try to answer that question when I am finished.

I do not honestly think that the minister has the answer. Nor do I suggest for one moment that he has the money, because $10 million will go nowhere, as far as I am concerned, in creating permanent, long-term, meaningful jobs for our native North Americans. I am not just speaking for my constituency and the unemployed in the county of Brant in southwestern Ontario; I am speaking for all the unemployed in Canada, particularly the unemployed native North Americans. The Six Nations Mohawk Indian reserve can be found in Brant county. On that reserve there is some industry. But compared to smaller municipalities within the constituency, such as Paris, St. George and particularly the city of Brantford, economic activity on the reserve, except for agriculture, is almost non-existent. There may be a service station at a crossroads, a small restaurant or a pottery operation, but as far as industry is concerned, it is virtually non-existent. As a result, it is very difficult to find jobs on the reserves, particularly for the young people who are entering the work force.

In what way will the minister's tax credit program assist native employment and create jobs for native North Americans who live on reserves if virtually every impediment or obstacle is placed in the path of entrepreneurs or would-be entrepreneurs on reserves who cannot establish themselves in business in the first place? We can talk all we want about the tax credit for the creation of jobs, but if we do not have businessmen and women establishing businesses on Indian reserves in the first place, then how will this help in a positive way native North Americans living on reserves? That is my second question to the minister.

Does the minister have any solution? When will he get the FBDB off its backside and working in the interests of young Indians or, for that matter, middle-aged Indians on reserves to create viable corporations, companies, partnerships or private companies on reserves? This would create a healthier climate of business activity and employment activity so that younger and middle-aged native North Americans do not have to leave the reserve and enter the almost alien environment of large cities, where they in many cases fall by the wayside, end up without jobs, on welfare, or in the courts, suffering from alcoholism, drug abuse and so on. These are very serious matters.

I am, as I am sure is my party, terribly disappointed at the lack of understanding on the part of the government of the very legitimate needs of native North Americans, whether they live on or off the reserve, with respect to job creation and business enterprise. These two areas must go together in order that we may, first of all, make the reserves more viable economically, and secondly, but just as important, that we may make the reserves better areas of employment. This is what our native North Americans want. They do not want handouts; they want the same kind of entitlement and financial assistance which non-native North Americans are receiving off reserves in large and small communities.

I come back once again to this deplorably small sum of $10 million which is allocated to train natives. I have a third question which I would like to ask of the minister. What will the natives who are trained under this native training program be trained for? Are they being trained to be mechanics in the city of Toronto, or skilled workers in Vancouver, or are they being trained in native skills for native industry which should be developing and, indeed, mushrooming on reserves?

I am not saying that Indians should be held on the reserves or that they should be forced to live on the reserves and be limited to searching for jobs in reserve related economic activities. I am saying that they should have the choice. If the native North Americans wish to remain on the reserves, then the government should make every effort to promote industry, large or small, such as native crafts, non-native crafts, or any kind of entrepreneurial enterprise, so that the natives may be trained in their own skills, if need be, or other skills.

I am very dissatisfied with the government's total package, both in terms of what the minister announced a couple of weeks ago with respect to the native training program and with respect to the tax credit bill which we are discussing in Committee of the Whole this afternoon. Despite the $10 million which the minister is touting as a breakthrough in native North American training, I see virtually nothing in Bill C-19.

I have asked the minister several substantive questions. I shall not take up my full 20 minutes, but I anticipate that the minister will provide me with some substantive answers. I do not want the kind of answer in which he rattles on with a lot of figures, percentages, man-hours per year or woman-hours per year and so on. I want the minister to present his fundamental philosophy with respect to job creation and business development on Indian reserves and his basic philosophical approach to the very serious unemployment problems facing native people in Canada. What is his government prepared to do in a substantive way to alleviate these problems? Many of them are economic or material in origin. To what extent is the minister prepared to commit the government financially, over and beyond the $10 million for this fiscal year, so that we can begin at last to embark on a long-range, upgrading, retraining or training program for native North Americans, whether they be on or off the reserve, in conjunction with the development of industry, whether it be native craft or non-native craft industries on reserves.

I have posed at least half a dozen questions. I ask the minister to open up to this House and tell us what he really believes this legislation will and will not do. Will the minister commit himself in this House to going beyond the $10 million when it is financially possible—I hope that will be as soon as possible—so that we may finally put to an end the situation which exists on reserves or, at least, we can begin to see the end of the mass poverty and depression from which our native North Americans have suffered. This suffering is due primarily not only to the federal government's lack of compassion as shown through its pocketbook, but to its lack of compassion and understanding of the problems which face native North Americans in Canada.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I agree with some of the assessments made by the hon. member. There is no doubt that the condition of native people in this country is serious. I had an opportunity to begin reading the report mentioned by the hon. member just last night. It details many of the ongoing and continuing problems which native people face.

However, it would be wrong for the hon. member to state in this House, and I wish to correct the record, that the only program of the government is the $10 million native training program. This program is in addition to many other programs which are already in operation. If I may take a moment, I will outline those programs. For example, in my own department with regard to employment, we have the LEAP program which has a budget of over $70 million for this year, of which $30 million to $40 million is allocated to native employment programs throughout Canada. It is one of the most successful employment programs the federal government has introduced, and provides long-term employment and economic development for a great number of status and non-status communities in Canada. A large proportion of that money is allocated to development work among the native people.

In addition, my department has Outreach, the special employment counselling program where 40 per cent of the nearly $10 million budget is spent on enabling native people to develop their own employment services in order to help bring people into the work force. Within the training program that $10 million is simply a special increment. We spend well over $800 million on a wide variety of training programs in which the native people participate to a degree greater than the percentage they represent of the total population. Last year close to 10,800 native people were added to training programs across Canada. I do not say that is enough as, of course, there is never enough. In the department we do not speak of expenditures of $10 million but expenditures of well over $100 million, and perhaps beyond that, on training and job creation for native people.

There are also major commitments under the regional economic expansion programs. The Northlands agreements which are in place in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, parts of Alberta and the Northwest Territories have introduced major work programs for native people. Manitoba has spent close to $26 million per year under its Northlands agreement which is almost entirely allocated to economic development programs for native people. This is the case in the other provinces as well, so DREE has a major commitment to economic development for native people.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has also set funds aside, not only for support of the reserves but also for capital investment and economic development within the reserve structure.

A number of programs are available, but perhaps they have not been co-ordinated or focused on specific problems. We may need to take a different strategic approach to the problem. Perhaps it would be a good idea to consolidate the programs and concentrate large amounts of capital on specific economic development areas.

Two years ago the federal cabinet set up a consultative committee which has been meeting with the provinces and native organizations to develop new economic development approaches. I believe it is close to developing certain ideas which this government will implement.

Progress has been made in a number of areas but it cannot be expected that hundreds of years of abuse, grievance and neglect will be corrected in two, three or five years. It is necessary that this House agree that this is the number one priority for Canada. If that is agreed, then perhaps it is worth debating whether there should be a full-scale mobilization of our resources in that area. However, that would be telling other groups—young people and women, for example—that money cannot be put into their employment or economic development program. There is a wide variety of competing interests and groups which feel they have the right to special consideration, but with reasonably scarce resources and budgets, it is impossible to satisfy all needs at the same time.

I think the hon. member's sentiments are correct and his assessment of the condition of native people is accurate. It is something that I share but I think we need more dialogue about how to make use of resources in excess of $10 million—perhaps in terms of hundreds of millions of dollars. If we commit more resources to these programs, are we prepared to withdraw them from other people or interests? That is a topic which is worthy of debate but I would say this is not the time or place for that debate. It should be given more time than is available for debate on this bill.

I should like to say to the hon. member that I would welcome his comments when my estimates come before the committee. Also, his colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, is a member of a task force assigned to examine the new employment opportunities and demands for the next decade and ways in which the government should respond to them. I believe they will begin hearings shortly. Parliamentarians and interest groups may appear before them and I welcome their contributions so that we may have the benefit of their experience with this very critical problem. It is precisely to deal with this problem that the task force was established. For the same reason the department is undertaking an evaluation of its programs in order to ensure that they meet the severe and special needs which exist in the country. My department hopes to present a paper to Parliament in the late fall or early next year. I hope we can then have a full-scale debate on the questions which the hon. member has raised.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am sorry to have to advise the hon. member for Brant that his time has expired. Before I recognize the hon. member for Calgary West again, I have to see other hon. members who are seeking the floor. The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate on Bill C-19, to amend the employment tax credit program. I should like to refer to the minister's comments regarding LEAP funds and the Outreach program. These have been very effective in my area but when I have contacted the minister's office I have been advised that funds for my area have been depleted and that the program cannot continue. That is a very sad thing for a place like Golden where there is no Canada Manpower office. Ten or twelve volunteers must work with one Outreach applicant to help them get employment. I think that such a program should take preference over a tax credit program. I should like to hear the minister's comments on this matter, first of all.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's remarks confirm the success of the LEAP and Outreach programs. I regret that the funds for his province have already been committed but we have to work within budgetary limits. It must be recognized too that the spending estimates have been established by previous governments and that this government must live within those parameters. I would be prepared, however, to see whether the funding available to the British Columbia region specifically has been fully committed.

I would point out also that I have held commitments to the Outreach program in reserve, in part because I wanted to see whether there was a fair allocation of funds to other constituent groups such as women's organizations and handicapped groups. Some money may possibly be left in that part of the program.

I am not sure whether funds for the LEAP program for the hon. member's region have all been spent. The budget for this year was close to $70 million, which was a substantial increase over 1978-79 when I believe the budget was $5.8 million. If the member thinks this is a successful program, then we will examine it carefully when we make our forecast for next year.

Mr. Parker: Referring now to the tax credit program, Mr. Chairman, last week I presented the Minister of Communications with a petition listing 10,000 names protesting cutbacks in employment and the movement of telephone workers into other areas.

The government has spent a great deal of taxpayers' money putting satellites into the sky in order to bring about better communications. Business enterprises are making use of those instruments and I really do not have any reservations about that. But when it comes to a large company changing their administration in order to reduce the number of their employees and using the funds for other purposes than providing an approved service, then I am concerned.

I will recap what has happened in the past. I worked for the railway. In the 1950s the railway put in an application to do away with their firemen. I do not know if hon. members remember the issue; it was a hot issue across Canada. The firemen were forced back to work and the company was allowed to phase out the employment of the firemen. The words used were "phase out". They did not phase them out fast enough, and after a certain period of time the railway company came forward and tried to buy some of them out. In fact, some of them were bought out. The company literally paid the firemen to leave their jobs and to go elsewhere.

As we got into the 1970s, the railway needed railway engineers. The railway had no firemen who could become engineers. Instead, the railway started to train people from other classifications to become engineers. To my understanding, the railway was given funding to help train and create the engineer's position. Those are the kinds of programs in which we have been involved.

In July of last year the railway was given the opportunity of reducing the numbers of tail end brakemen. In my area, this is a very serious issue. Without the tail end brakemen, the railway has been allowed to increase the length of its trains. Tonnage is reaching exorbitant heights. We have railway conductors who have worked for 15 years and taken a reduction in salary of $100 per month. They went back to work as brakemen and now we are faced with the situation where we will have to start training other classifications.

With the tax credit program, such as the minister is bringing forward, are we going to allow companies of this size to be able to change their mode of transportation and come to the government for assistance to help train workers for other programs? I resent those kinds of programs taking place when large companies like that are allowed to phase out employees, especially when we have almost one million people unemployed in Canada.

I want to say to the government that we should be standing up to these companies and telling them that this is not the time to start reducing manpower unless it can be shown there is loss of revenue and a loss in the cutback in services.

I am not happy with the tax credit program that is being presented to this House. I think there are other ways of bringing about employment programs which will help to alleviate unemployment. I will be speaking on the unemployment bill later on, so I will leave it at that.

Employment Tax Credit Act

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Chairman, a couple of weeks ago, I believe it was June 11, when we were debating Bill C-19 in Committee of the Whole, I had just begun my remarks leading up to questions for the minister. I am pleased to be able to continue that intervention now.

I think the concern which the minister has been hearing from this side of the House is that, while the initiative of the extension of the employment tax credit measure is admirable and will be supported, at least by this party, we are genuinely concerned that real jobs will not be a long-term product of this legislation, particularly jobs and opportunities for young people.

This afternoon I want to hone in on a special category of jobs. These are jobs relating to the mushrooming demands that will be placed on our society by the energy developments of the 1980s. These are jobs in the high technology areas in particular. It is a fact that the unemployment rate among our young people is almost twice the national average. We will be requiring for every multi-billion dollar oil sands plant, heavy oils, coal or nuclear installation, thousands of skilled people, and young people. These young people are the ones who are coming up now through our high schools and junior schools. They will have to be trained with many specialized skills.

The solution to that problem is not merely going to involve government largesse, money and programs; it will have to be one involving attitude and long-range planning. We have to provide new types of incentive to technical training. As my colleague—the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River indicated a week or two ago, we have to start looking at the European model for vocational training. We have to look at the notion of having our young people study one day a week at a technical school while working four days a week at a plant side in industry developing on-the-job skills. This kind of thing will only come from a close relationship between the classroom and the work place environment. We will be requiring thousands upon thousands of young people to be trained as civil, electrical, and mechanical engineers. We will need physicists, heavy equipment operators, controllers, computer programmers, instrument mechanics and electronic technicians. This will be a special type of demand upon our society which will represent a change from the traditional pattern. It is no longer a time, I submit, for task forces, committees, further studies and reviews.

I hope the minister will tell us that the studies have been done within his department and that he is prepared now to implement the action required to deal with tremendous anomaly which will develop in Canada over the next ten years. Otherwise we could end up with the situation, as we once had, of importing large numbers of skilled and semi-skilled people from other countries to fill the demand when we suddenly have to fire up our steel and pipe mills and deal with heavy equipment for the purpose of removing overburden and mining coal in large quantities. We will need a large number of specially trained young people to meet the demands of the next decade. Therefore, I think the objectives of the employment tax credit program are not likely to provide the permanent jobs and skills that will be required to meet the special challenge of the 1980s.

A couple of weeks ago, speaking in Committee of the Whole, the Minister of Employment and Immigration said that he had no crystal ball. At page 1999 of Hansard the minister stated that his best forecast was the forecast of 8 per cent unemployment for next year, but he would not predict beyond that. He said:

I am not going to vault myself into crystal balling into 1983, 1984 or 1985.

The theme of what I am trying to say is that the minister must begin to plan, at least to 1985 and preferably to 1990, because our future development and security as a nation depends on our ability to harness our own energy resources and to develop energy related industries. Those demands will be inescapable if we are going to develop that tremendous resource potential that we have at our doorstep.

Alternatively, are we going to continue to incur deficits and court national bankruptcy to the detriment of our children by increasing our imports of foreign sources of energy, paying heavy subsidy costs to foreign governments and industries so that they might develop their own economies and provide employment for their people in the 1980s while massive numbers of young Canadians remain unemployed? Canada must be self-sufficient in energy by 1990. We can be if we use a little foresight and long-range planning instead of being short-sighted and politically opportunistic. We have to plan a long way down the road.

What do we need? What am I talking about? I think the minister has heard some of these suggestions before but I would like to state them again for emphasis. We need increased financial assistance for our universities. The minister, having come from an university environment, as have some others in this House, will appreciate the importance of additional financial assistance for universities. This assistance should be not merely in terms of more opportunities for research, but more support for classrooms, laboratories, equipment, and more capital assistance for the programs which the universities are going to need to mount in order to train these young people all across Canada. This opportunity will not merely reside in Alberta or British Columbia, but will develop all across Canada if the minister and the federal government provide some guidance in the planning and design of these programs. We have to provide capital funding for universities, trade schools and technical colleges. It is fair to suggest the federal government must accept some leadership, if not financial responsibility, in this matter.

We must provide financial incentives to keep young people in school. I was a product of the Canadian educational system, as were most members here. I was a product of Canadian graduate school programs, as was perhaps the minister and others. I know how difficult it is to attract graduate students to stay within Canadian universities. Perhaps it was because of our experience within the university environment—and this goes for the Minister of Employment and Immigration as well as his adversary, my colleague from Calgary West—the atmosphere in Canadian universities in the seventies, which brought us to this hallowed institution to practice this exercise of politics because of the frustrations we experienced in university.

At a time when the federal government was spending more and more in excess of its revenues by way of deficit and giving less and less to universities, in particular to faculty members and their graduate students, as well as meeting requirements for the purchase of equipment and apparatus, the government which gave less and less to supporting the basic underpinnings of our technological development as a nation was willing to spend profusely large amounts of money, wastefully, on alphabet soup programs and the like. Perhaps that is why some of us are in this House of Commons today. It is high time, and I hope the minister will respond, that the federal government exercised some leadership in these areas.

We have to provide more encouragement within the university environment. We have to make it worth while for professors to stay in universities and not enter politics, as well as for their students to stay in universities and obtain masters or perhaps doctoral degrees to enhance our centres of educational excellence all across Canada. If that had been occurring over the past ten years, perhaps I would not need to be here today making these comments.

It is very important that we recognize the support required for our educational system in all of our universities and trade schools. In addition, it is important that we recognize the shared responsibilities of labour and management to allow on-the-job training in technical and vocational schools. I wish the minister were listening. It is time we had a co-operative program which allowed our young people to be employed and learn at the same time; one day in school, four days in the work place, and not at union wage scales. The unions will also have to make compromises here and accept that these massive numbers of young people which we will need to support our energy-related industries, will have to be given opportunities to learn on the job and develop essential skills.

Coming to the point, I wish to ask the minister if it is expected by the year 1990 to have to resort to importing these very essential skills from the United States, Germany, Great Britain, Switzerland, France and many other countries, when we have the potential skills here. We have the young people, the resources and the opportunities. Will the minister tell us—because I expect he will be in his present position for a year or two at least—how he is going to plan to put this country on the right course in providing opportunities for young people?

If that has something to do with his new technology employment program, I hope this afternoon he will give some explanation to the people of Canada, particularly the young people, for whom we must all be very concerned.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member raises some all-encompassing questions. It taxes one's imagination to respond to them as fully as one would like. I would say to him that any limitations I might have in providing some deeply committed plan could be greatly alleviated if members would allow me to get out of the House so that I could have some time to do that. He might suggest to his colleagues, as one answer to one of the questions he poses, they allow the minister to go back and do the job he is suggesting we do. However, I want to give him some assurances within these areas. First, some things are taking place, and second, some things are in motion.

As the hon. member knows, the federal government already spends over $800 million on training programs. We are the largest educators in Canada. However, we are limited in the expenditure of that money to joint agreements with the provinces. The provinces have clear jurisdiction over education. We do buy a substantial number of places within community colleges and vocational schools, but that has to be based upon the agreement of the provinces themselves. The curricula established in those colleges are very much under provincial control. We are in a position where we have to renegotiate all the training agreements under the Occupational Training Act with the provinces in the next year or so.

The preliminary meetings I have had with provincial ministers indicate to me that they are prepared to start shifting substantial amounts of money into the industrial training area. We will be negotiating over the next several months how that can take place. Beyond that, I would point out to the hon. member that we do have the so-called critical skills training program which is designed to do on-the-job, on-site training. We did add an additional $10 million this year under our job creation package to bring the total expenditure in that area up to $30 million.

I would also like to tell the hon. member, because he did ask the question last time, that we are aware of the tremendous human resource requirement in the energy industry. I would report to him that I met with senior officials of the oil companies in Calgary last week where we discussed what their manpower or personpower requirements are. We have begun to take steps to do some joint planning in those kinds of areas.

The hon. member should recognize as someone interested in this area that the energy industry itself has been very negligent in its own planning for manpower requirements. Private industry in Canada has been accustomed to supplying its skilled needs by offshore recruitment. We are providing much tougher requirements now. If they want to bring people from offshore, they must also train people as part of the program. We are insisting upon that in a very direct way. Really what is required now is much closer co-operation between ourselves, industry and the unions to make sure we have those skills flowing through. Industry itself is now coming to a recognition of that fact. However, they have had it easy. We have all had it easy.

The hon. member properly identifies—and this is undoubtedly one of the critical issues of the eighties—that many major resource projects will not go ahead if we do not have the people in place or the skills necessary to make it happen. The great paradox on which he properly puts his finger is that we have increasing demands for new skills in the energy and resource areas, and at the same time we have a large pool of unemployment. The task of this government and industry will be to make the transition from that pool of unemployment to those job areas. That is something we identify. We hope to be able to borrow again from the experience of members of Parliament of the task force which has been established, which I hope will be able to pinpoint many of the difficulties and the solutions that we can use and utilize over the next years to come.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I did not want to let this opportunity pass without having regard to some of the concerns that have been expressed to me about this whole matter of unemployment and what it is likely to be in the eighties. I sometimes wonder whether somebody up there did not like the minister when he gave him that particular job. If the projections are anywhere near accurate, in spite of all his task forces, band-aid programs and $10 million programs, there has to be a much more fundamental kind of approach to this whole problem or else we are going to be defeated in this one as we have in many others.

Let me just give the committee a few statistics. In 1946, about 25 per cent of the work force was employed in agriculture, but only 5.2 per cent were so employed in 1975. In the same year, 1946, mining and forestry employed 4 per cent of the work force. Many of those in my province were unemployed but if they were working it is probable that by 1975 they would be employing possibly 2.4 per cent of the work force. It is the number one industry in my province and yet in terms of the total contribution to the work picture across Canada it is a very small amount. It is a very serious situation.

Similarly, manufacturing shows a terrific drop over the last 20 years, from 26 per cent to 21 per cent. That is a very serious matter.

What is an even more serious matter than it appears to be—and it is aside from the one mentioned by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta—is the one which concerns the ultimate future of the communications and telecommunications industry in this country. It appears there will be a great number of people unemployed. Formerly, as people were dropped from the agricultural, forestry and manufacturing industries, they found employment in the service sectors in the 1950s and 1960s. Nearly two million jobs were created between 1970 and 1979, mainly in the retail and trades services, and it is precisely those jobs which are now being threatened by the new micro-technological revolution we are embarking upon.

The Secretary of State and Minister of Communications appeared before the committee this morning and told us that he was deeply conscious of these problems. Perhaps he will take an interest—at least, I hope he will—in the task force having to do with new employment opportunities, because it is precisely in the field which he administers that the great shocks of unemployment are likely to come. All kinds of problems will be associated with it, especially those affecting women.

My hon. friend from Kootenay East-Revelstoke mentioned the problems attached to the centralized and computerized chip switching which is going on in British Columbia right now in many of the smaller communities he represents. The problem there is that women operators are being put out of work by new forms of technology. Nobody wants to be a Luddite about these things; we are not trying to hold back the clock. But we certainly want to make sure that the benefits of technology are at least distributed equally among the population. The benefits should not all go to those who happen to be captains of industry favoured by a number of other things—the tax system, import duties, tariffs, various things like that.

What has happened with centralized switching is that these people are being offered an opportunity to be retrained; the women will mainly be retrained into the jobs that are going to disappear. If they are going to be retrained into jobs such as clerking jobs or retail freight jobs, that is not going to be helpful.

During the fifties and sixties, as I and others have pointed out, the service trades and retail trades expanded. But it is precise by the clerking and the service trades that are going to disappear with the new technology, technology that hooks the computer to the fiber optics cable or the coaxial cable, and ultimately to the word-processor which can not only write letters but can do all the filing and the retrieval of information from storage. So it seems to me we have to consider alternative ways of placing the employees concerned. The telecommunications workers anyway estimate that approximately a million and a half women in the eighties have jobs which are going to be displaced by the new technology.

Let me give an example of the benefits. In 1976 computerized switching was introduced into Vancouver. After that, 22 per cent of the operators jobs disappeared! Computerized switching was introduced into New Westminster shortly after that—I think around 1978-79. What happened then? Forty per cent of the operators disappeared from that kind of employment. It is not laughable. The minister is smiling but it is a very serious matter if you happen to be the one who loses his job. And the minister is the one at whose desk the buck will stop, because he will be charged with creating a great number of new jobs in the eighties if his efforts are not co-ordinated with a government policy that includes an industrial strategy.

When the minister appeared before the committee this morning he talked about the increase in manufacturing in the communications industry in Canada. I will give the House an interesting statistic. As far as telecommunications is concerned, our imports in 1956 amounted to 46 per cent of all telecommunications equipment we used. In 1976 we imported 76 per cent. What this proves conclusively is that our manufacturing sector in telecommunications is shrinking. If our manufacturing is shrinking, presumably our employment is shrinking in those very sectors. The picture is something less than rosy, if I may be excused a terrible pun.

It is not just this particular member who is making these predictions. I do not think the public is aware of the extent of these things at the moment but certainly the ministry must be. And the ministry must be prepared to move actively toward an industrial strategy which will take care of these predictably displaced people, some one and a half to two million people, mainly women, in the next decade. The president or chief executive officer of Northern Telecommunications—which can hardly be called a radical outfit and is not usually quoted by the New Democratic Party—Walter Light, who was speaking before an audience at Concordia University, was kind enough to send me a copy of his speech. He was speaking to a group of engineers and had this to say:

> Canada imports 80 per cent of all the technology that it uses.

That includes all technology, including telecommunications technology. This means that as an industrialized country we are only 21 per cent better in the creation of technology and innovation than any non-industrialized Third World country that is totally dependent on others for its technology. So there is no point telling us that we are going to create a lot of jobs in the eighties if we have an industrial strategy that ignores the amount of imports and does nothing to encourage domestic production while allowing a flood of things to come in here. The minister is wasting money on these little penny-ante programs if the government has no policy for an industrial strategy which favours Canadian manufacturing over imports. Apparently we have not.

I gave two figures; we used to import 46 per cent of our telecommunications equipment but we now import 76 per cent. The Secretary of State this morning told us we are going to increase that percentage. I hope he is right. He suggested this morning that he would like to encourage the manufacturing and export of Canadian-produced telecommunications equipment. I am saying that the experience of the last 20 years flies in his face. If he can reverse that—

Mr. Fox: I was not here then.

Mr. Rose: He says he was not here then. May I carry on with a quote from the same speaker? I see the clock, Mr. Chairman, but if you give me one minute, I can conclude my remarks.

• (1700)

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Unfortunately, I have to advise the hon. member that he cannot carry on.

Mr. Rose: You will hear it at eight.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request leave to consider the bill again later this day.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Administration of Justice—Dealing with grievances of RCMP officers; the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright)—Post Office—Deplorable mail conditions in Calgary—Steps to improve; the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Alleged supply of weapons and explosives to native community in B.C.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers) and public bills.

There being no items on the order paper under the heading private bills, the House will proceed to notices of motions (papers).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Motion No. 19 in the name of the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

SPECIAL INDEX FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of a report on a special index for senior citizens prepared by the Treasury Board.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to pre-empt the hon. member from proceeding with his speech. I am sure there are matters he will in fact want to discuss. I just want all members of this House, and particularly the hon. member, to have the information which is available to me now.

Contrary to the answer given by myself in this House, I think some two weeks past, I think we have now been able to identify the report the hon. member has been seeking, and we are in a position to put that report forward. I want the hon. member to have that information before he makes his comments.

An hon. Member: Withdraw. Let's call it six o'clock.

Index for Senior Citizens

Mr. Daudlin: In the event that there is consent on all sides, I would have the document put forward.

Mr. Benjamin: In the first place, Mr. Speaker, that was not a point of order the hon. member raised, in my opinion. I knew earlier this day that the document we had asked for had been found. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), asked for it last December 10. For the sake of the record I would like to give the House a little resumé of occurrences since December 10. As recorded at page 2186 of Hansard, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, and I quote—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Just to be clear, the parliamentary secretary did rise on a point of order and, if I heard him correctly, I thought I heard him seeking unanimous consent in some manner which would have delayed the debate on this particular motion. I understand that in fact the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) is refusing unanimous consent and that private members' hour will proceed normally. Does the Chair understand the procedure we are following?

Mr. Knowles: He wants to speak to his motion.

Mr. Benjamin: Exactly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Precisely. The hon. member now wishes to speak to his motion, so unanimous consent has been denied, and we will proceed in that manner.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I did not even do that. I did not deny unanimous consent. I got up to speak to my motion. I did not hear the hon. member say he wanted to table anything.

May I continue with my motion for the production of papers, which have not yet been produced officially?

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, I regret that my hon. friend did not understand or hear what it was I wanted to put forward. It is quite correct that the Chair heard me seeking unanimous consent to table a document which I understood was the document the hon. member was seeking. If he prefers not to give his consent or to delay that consent, so be it; but I do not want him to labour under the misapprehension that I was not seeking consent so to table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The parliamentary secretary seeks unanimous consent to table the document to which he has referred. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: Table it, fine.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, what I think my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Daudlin), is getting at is that it has now been determined that the said document is available, and he is prepared to table it, which makes the debate for the next hour unnecessary.

If the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) prefers to speak anyway—and perhaps my colleague will table the document at the end of the debate—that is up to him. I think there is a way by which we can give hon. members an extra hour for dinner by tabling this document and by ending the debate. If that is done, I would be prepared to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, tabling it before or afterward evades a little matter in issue which has been apparent for a number of months. I could care less whether the parliamentary secretary tables it now, after I sit down or tomorrow. I do not know if he has the authority to do so. I think a cabinet minister would have to do that.

In any event, if I may continue, last December 10 the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, and I quote:

As the President of the Treasury Board will recall—

It was then the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens).

—in October I raised with the Prime Minister the question of a special index for senior citizens related to the things they have to buy. Outside the House that day the President of the Treasury Board said he would give serious consideration to that proposal. May I ask if any action has yet been taken on that?

The then president of the Treasury Board replied:

—I am pleased to reply to that question. I did follow it up and a report has been prepared. If the hon. member feels that it would be helpful, I could either deliver it to him personally for his consideration or I could table the report in the House.

I put a motion for the production of papers on the order paper. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board said on June 11:

Madam Speaker, since the Treasury Board did not prepare any report on a special index for senior citizens, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

I suppose in the height of technicality he was right, but since Statistics Canada was under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board at that time and at the time the hon. member for York-Peel was in office, the parliamentary secretary was inadvertently and probably unavoidably in error, because he did not know that Statistics Canada, under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board, had prepared the report.

The whole issue of special indexing for senior citizens for the things they have to buy in relation to their cost of living, in relation to the poverty line and in relation to increasing standards of living for the rest of society requires that there be thorough, authoritative and competent inquiries, investigations and studies into what it costs senior citizens to live and what it would cost to increase their standard of living in direct relationship to all other sectors of society, and if an index produced by Statistics Canada or any other agency of the government is insufficient, then there are many other sources to get such indices from. There are a number of social agencies in Canada outside government which have already done extensive work on this. This has been totally ignored by successive governments.

The OAS and the GIS were designed to ensure that retired Canadians would not fall below the poverty line, and even using the Statistics Canada poverty line, which is drawn much lower than the poverty lines of social agencies, OAS and the GIS are not meeting this goal.

● (1710)

In fact, Mr. Speaker, when the minister introduced Bill C-16, she admitted that even with the additional $35 increase in the guaranteed income supplement, some pensioners' incomes would only reach 80 per cent over the poverty line. There is no doubt that she said that——an income which is slightly lower than 80 per cent of the poverty line is not acceptable in a country as rich as ours and is certainly not enough to live on decently.

Most of us who are now working can expect a substantial decrease in our standard of living when we reach retirement. Our retirement income is so inadequate that half of all our senior citizens qualify for the guaranteed income supplement benefits, which has to tell you something about the old age security pension, the Canada pension and a host of private pensions.

More than six out of ten Canadians over the age of 65 have incomes under $5,000, and three out of four women over the age of 65 are poor. Because of the ineffectiveness of the present indexing system, the Liberals have been forced to increase GIS payments twice in the last 18 months, by $20 in January, 1979, and by $35 in July of 1980. This piecemeal, band-aid approach to a program of economic survival for our elderly citizens condemns 60 per cent of them to "golden years" of bleak existence. Surely the OAS and GIS must be revised so they fulfil their original intention. I am confident that my good friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board and my colleagues in the official opposition, will agree that that goal must be reached.

Mr. Paproski: Right.

Mr. Benjamin: It must be reached to ensure that all senior citizens remain above the poverty line, and preferably a standard of living above the poverty line which is designed by our social service agencies, which are more realistic and practical than the ones devised by government agencies have been to date.

On Bill C-16, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested a goal of 25 per cent above the poverty line, which one could hardly call overly generous. This would assure senior citizens of a standard of living which would allow a measure of comfort rather than mere survival. This, first and foremost, should be the basic goal of every member in this House.

Once that level is achieved, how should the pension be indexed? The current method of indexing quarterly to the CPI does not represent an increase. It merely keeps the pension up to date and provides some semblance of protection of the purchasing power of the dollar that senior citizens receive. The cost price index relates to the urban population of Canada and does not reflect the experience of any particular family or individual or of other segments of the population such as, would you believe, senior citizens.

Two other types of indexing possibilities should be explored. One is the creation of a special senior citizens' index which would reflect the spending patterns characteristic of this particular population group. This index should be formulated around the cluster method, derived by isolating the age, labour force status and number of people in the family unit. Some studies which have been done on special groups, such as low income populations, have shown that there was not much difference between a special CPI and the regular CPI and, in fact, in some cases the special CPI was lower. Other economists have pointed out that these studies were not sufficiently sophisticated and that in fact a comprehensive special CPI has not been properly done in Canada. A senior citizens' index, taking into account the cluster characteristics identified earlier, must be explored.

A second possibility is to compare increases in the cost price index and guaranteed income supplement with the average wage and salary in Canada. When the old age supplement was first introduced in 1952, until 1964 it was equivalent to approximately 17 per cent of the earnings of the average worker. Since 1964 its value has been allowed to fall so that the OAS is now equivalent to only 13.5 per cent of the average wage and salary earnings. During the last 15 years, therefore, the old age supplement has failed to keep pace with the growth of incomes of other Canadians.

May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and StatsCanada might consider some other solutions. First, pensioners should immediately have an income of at least 25 per cent above the poverty line. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the cries for restraint and government cutbacks, no country that has any self-respect or measure of decency and which is as rich as ours can stand for anything less than that. If we can afford several billion dollars for fighter planes, most of which we do not need or cannot use, surely we have money for this.

Mr. Benjamin: Pensioners should be fully guaranteed and protected against inflation after they have arrived at a basic 25 per cent above the poverty line, and this would allow them a little more measure of decency. These people could then take equal part with the rest of the people in Canada in a rising standard of living that the average worker and employee in the country attains over a period of years in his lifetime at work.

My final point, Mr. Speaker, is that the OAS and GIS pension systems are a transfer payment. That means that money for this system comes from a big pot from which it can be distributed any number of ways to any number of programs. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) when she was speaking on Bill C-16 insisted that there was not enough money. Her solution was to pump more money in as soon as the economy expands.

That solution of hers is a neat sidestep. The money is there for the asking if the income distribution system is made to work the way it was intended when Parliament passed those laws, money given to groups which need it the most. Surely no one will doubt or argue that our senior citizens qualify for that dubious honour. The profits of our corporations, the salaries and wages of our working people, have been rising, in the case of corporations too much, and in the case of our wage and salary earners sometimes enough, sometimes not enough. Surely if that can occur in our society, it can automatically occur in lock step for our senior citizens.

I am happy that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board has located in that department the document for which we asked on the order paper under our motion for the production of papers and that it will now be provided to the House after I sit down, tomorrow or whenever. We will be pleased to have it. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will want to examine it extremely carefully and he may want to raise the matter later.

Mr. Knowles: I have had it since December.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly in support of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin). I realize that some procedural difficulty has been occasioned by the fact that the report which the hon. member seeks is now in the hands of the parliamentary secretary and can be tabled in the House. But I think the motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina West goes beyond the mere mechanics of tabling the report at this stage and points up the special circumstances under which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised the matter in the first case last December in the House. I think what was in the minds of those members, and indeed in my own mind and in the minds of many members on this side of the House, was the very special needs of senior citizens. So this report was a start in dealing with those special needs and a recognition of the very difficult situation in which senior citizens find themselves in this day and age.

• (1720)

As I travel throughout my constituency and across Canada, I am very mindful of the fact that senior citizens are more affected by the inflationary costs we see about us than other citizens. Particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is very mindful of this. It has been raised time and time again in the House. It was in response to those kinds of concerns that the special index idea was promoted.

As I understand it, the special index would take into account the goods, materials and services senior citizens must have in order to survive which in relation to senior citizens are quite different. For example, they may be less concerned with the cost of motor vehicles and appliances, but very much concerned with the cost of food, home heating fuels and the very basic necessities of life. I do not think anyone in the House or elsewhere would deny the special status senior citizens ought to have in a wealthy economy such as our own. I do not think anyone would deny to those in their golden years the right to live out their time with a high degree of happiness and free from some of the cares which beset those of younger years.

As parliamentarians and legislators we have a very special duty to senior citizens to examine their special needs and react to them. Earlier I mentioned the effect of inflation upon our senior citizens. I repeat that the items of very great need for all citizens but particularly senior citizens are increasing daily in cost. This has a very adverse effect upon people with fixed incomes. For the most part, with some very minor exceptions in terms of numbers, it is senior citizens who are on fixed incomes and cannot absorb these costs. One feature of a special index would be that any governmental assistance for senior citizens in the form of the old age security program with the guaranteed income supplement would be related and adjusted to the very basic needs of food, clothing and shelter. At times we have recognized the needs of senior citizens, but always in a very stop-gap way.

Many times during the election campaign and since I was asked whether I favoured the increase in the guaranteed income supplement because it was put forward by what is now the government party as its proposal for senior citizens. I always said that, of course, I favour any increase in the amount of money the government makes available to senior citizens, but I fear that when the money is put forward in the form of just another dollar increase, it will not be spent wisely. As I recall it, the estimated cost of increasing the guaranteed income supplement to all senior citizens who qualified would be in the area of $500 million. It occurred to me that this $500 million spent in another way could relieve a great many of the problems so many senior citizens experience. For example, there is the matter of increased home heating costs. I am sure $500 million applied to supplement senior citizens who incur increases in their home heating costs would almost eliminate that as a problem. I and many members on my side of the House feel that some very special examination is needed of the needs and problems of senior citizens, so that we can formulate plans and programs directed at our senior citizens which will get at the real problems they have.

As I have said, I am not against increases in the dollar value of the aid now provided, but I think the money could be better spent. One thing we should ask ourselves to consider is the manner in which senior citizens live, their actual mode of survival. I am mindful of the fact that a great many senior citizens are now housed across the country in institutions of a nursing care or home care nature. Certainly in the province of Nova Scotia, which I represent, in many cases some of these institutions are supported by funds provided at municipal and provincial levels.

As a result of the programs undertaken by many provincial governments, in some cases with assistance from the Government of Canada, we have a number of institutions which are healthy, clean, observe high standards and in which a great many of our senior citizens are now housed. As I visit these senior citizens' homes, I never cease to marvel at what wonderful institutions they are. I feel senior citizens housed in these institutions are well taken care of. It does not mean that they cannot use extra funds for a comfort fund or that each and every one of their needs is met, but basically they are in situations where their needs are taken care of and are not in situations which require instant aid.

Having regard to senior citizens living in such circumstances, I want to point out and underline the situations of senior citizens who are attempting to maintain themselves in their own homes. These senior citizens are the ones who are really hit by inflation and the problem of coping with the 1980 situation. Because many of these senior citizens own their homes, they are able to subsist on the basis of the guaranteed income supplement together with the old age security pension, particularly in the case of couples whose combined incomes allow them sufficient funds to maintain themselves. But the senior citizens in this situation are hit with a number of increases which are not taken into account in the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement. I have in mind municipal tax increases. Although some municipalities make allowances for senior citizens, I do not know of any that do not require senior citizens who own their own homes to pay some form of tax.

The cost of fuel oil is an increasing expense and an essential one, particularly since senior citizens more than others require their homes heated to reasonable standards and have no alternative in that respect. We now know that again these costs will escalate as soon as the government establishes its made-in-Canada price for oil. I predict this particular cost will be increased by as much as 20 or 25 per cent. In the case of an average home where a person may spend $800 a year for heating costs and hot water, it would mean an additional expenditure of $200 a year. So one can see that the increase available to a married couple in the guaranteed income supplement of $35 is immediately eaten away by the projected increase in the cost of fuel oil in the case of senior citizens living in their own homes and incurring such expenses.

I could go on with the many expenses incurred by senior citizens of a similar kind. Food costs are escalating on a daily basis. Senior citizens experience a similar difficulty and any attempt to provide additional dollars through the guaranteed income supplement is immediately eaten away. There is no question in my mind that senior citizens require special attention in the form of an index which is applicable to them and takes into account the impact of increases in very basic living costs as they apply to persons on fixed incomes or whose earning power is diminished as their years advance.

We have in this country over two million senior citizens, persons who are 65 years and over. The number, because of our health care program and better attitudes toward longevity in terms of health care facilities, is increasing at a more rapid rate. I am sure that we would not want, both in this House and throughout Canada, to condemn those citizens who attain those golden years to a life of poverty. We should take every step we can to ensure that they are able to live out their golden years, as they have been described, in a situation which is enjoyable, worthwhile, and a credit to the whole Canadian community.

I agree with the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), who brought this matter to the attention of the House, that we ought to have a special index. I am happy that the parliamentary secretary has indicated that the report is available. I hope that it will be the beginning of consideration, in this House and elsewhere in the halls of government, of our senior citizens so that they may look forward to a new age.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the earlier suggestion that we do not need to spend this full hour on this motion, my remarks will be very brief. I thank the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) for the statement he just made on behalf of senior citizens, and I welcome him to the team. I hope, however, that one of the byproducts of this debate will be a slight improvement in the filing system in the office of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston).

When the motion by my friend, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), was called on June 11, as it is noted at page 1996 of Hansard, he was away ill. He does not look it now, but he was ill then. As a result it became my responsibility to move the motion on his behalf. I confess I was quite surprised when the parliamentary secretary stood up and said that the Treasury Board had not prepared any report on special indexing for senior citizens. Accordingly, he asked that the motion be withdrawn. At that point I asked that it be transferred for debate.

I knew that the report existed, because I had a copy of it in my office. I wondered how it was that the parliamentary secretary could say that there was no such report. I first asked for the report on October 19, 1979, of the then prime minister, the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), who said that his government would go ahead with the idea. Then on December 10 I asked the then president of the treasury board, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), where the report was, and he said that it was being prepared and that he would be glad to send a copy to me shortly. Two or three days after that, something happened that has not been forgotten, but on December 21 the then president of the treasury board wrote me a letter and sent me a copy of the document.

When the parliamentary secretary said that he did not have the report, I began to wonder if it was a case of grand larceny and whether the hon. member for York-Peel had run away with the document, and to think that maybe we had better put the RCMP onto the matter. The hon. member for York-Peel is not guilty at all. The report was left in the files, but somehow or other the staff in the office of the President of the Treasury Board could not find it. It has been found. All is well that ends well, and we are glad that the document can now be tabled.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, on a damp day such as this, with the thunder rolling outside, it is always pleasant to have the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) putting the needle in just a little bit—

Mr. Paproski: "Mr. Thunder" himself.

Mr. Daudlin: —and trying to demonstrate that it is always required once in a while to prod the government to test and determine that in fact it is operating, and operating well.

Mr. Paproski: We call him Thor.

Mr. Daudlin: While I have not had the opportunity to review the question when it was originally put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I wonder if, at the time he put the question, the hon. member saw fit to ask that it be sought from Statistics Canada, or whether indeed he put the question directly to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). In this particular instance the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) is asking whether or not a report was prepared by the Treasury Board.

An examination was made of the records at Treasury Board and, indeed, it was determined that they had prepared no such report. Subsequently we determined that Statistics Canada had prepared the report. It is true that, at the time the report was prepared, the minister responsible for reporting to the House on Statistics Canada was the President of the Treasury Board. All hon. members know that since that time the responsibility has been delegated to the Minister of Supply and Services.

Be that as it may, I do have a report which, fortunately for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is not the exact report which he was given on December 21. The passage of time has afforded the opportunity of updating the report and to annex to it. When I table that report, I think that the hon. member will find it even more informative than the original report.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I might now be afforded the opportunity to reverse the needle just a little bit and inquire of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre why it was that he did not share the letter and the information that he received from the former president of the Treasury Board with his colleague, the hon. member for Regina West. I am sure that the hon. member for Regina West would have appreciated having at least a look at the report as it was originally prepared. I suppose we will all wonder forever what exactly went on as to why in fact there was not that kind of sharing of information. Whatever the reason, it did not happen. I shall now table the report which will afford them both the opportunity to look at it.

I am a little concerned, and I will accept the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with respect to tabling this report. I recognize that to table the report in the place of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), I would require the unanimous consent of the House. However, I wonder if we could also have something on the record that would indicate that the hon. member for Regina West is now withdrawing his motion for production of papers, so that I might be allowed to table the report with consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The parliamentary secretary can proceed in that fashion if he so wishes. However, I have before me a notice of motion for papers by the hon. member for Regina West. If that motion stands with the consent of the House, then it constitutes an order of the House to table the report to which it refers.

Mr. Knowles: Let's pass it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I shall simply ask hon. members to adopt the motion, and the order will issue. The parliamentary secretary will then be entitled to table the report or document referred to in the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, I submit, in both official languages, the report requested by the hon. member for Regina West. I ask all hon. members to take a look particularly at the item indicating the implications of such a special index and the fact that, notwithstanding that we are looking at special items, it does not become the panacea which we would all hope it to be for senior citizens. Indeed, it raises another set of questions which must be considered.

Mr. Benjamin: Which is exactly what I said.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I hear the call for six o'clock, and the Chair will recognize it is six o'clock. Accordingly, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.40 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act—Mr. Axworthy—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the House rose at 5 p.m. clause 1 of the bill was under consideration, and the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody had the floor.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I was in full flight when the five o'clock whistle brought me down. I was quoting that great socialist, Walter F. Light, president of Northern Telecom Limited and his expression of concern about the fact that we import about 80 per cent of our technology. He commented that we are just like a developing country, except for that 20 per cent. He said:

I simply want to demonstrate that political sovereignty without technological sovereignty is a chimera—

I was a little doubtful about what a chimera actually was, but I found it was a mythical beast of antiquity.

Mr. Knowles: Don't look at me!

Mr. Rose: I am sorry; I did not mean to nod toward the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when I mentioned a mythical beast of antiquity. Mr. Light suggested that other countries had operated more loyally, perhaps, toward their own workers and their own industries. He went on to say:

Our second great vulnerability is the massive subsidization of innovation and research that is under way in competitive industrial countries in Europe and Asia and, to a lesser degree, in the United States. Much of this subsidization is in the electronics industry and in the key technologies of semiconductors and software.

If we are to be faced with a technological revolution that will displace massive numbers of workers, then we must build a closer relationship with industry. Finally, Mr. Light said:

What is required is an investment by industry and government in innovation, in research and development, of sums of money never before contemplated in Canada.

I am inclined to agree with him on that point. We must determine what we are going to do about new technologies, where the pressures will occur, and where the incentives will come from that will change that 80 per cent importation of technology that replaces and displaces our workers. I think it has to come from government, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it can come from any other source.

The government tends to object to or shrink from direct intervention in industry and, of course, industry also shrinks from government. They do not want regulation; all they want is money—incentives, tax write-offs, various kinds of capital cost allowances and that sort of thing. The government has to deal with these problems because there is no one else to do it. That places a great load on the minister's shoulders. As I said in my opening remarks, I do not envy him, his task. It is an immense one and he cannot do it all himself even if he wanted to, or even if he thought he could, as the rest of us are inclined to think. He just could not.

We need long-term plans in order to look after those workers who are displaced, Mr. Chairman, and we need government plans for retraining, earlier retirement, shared work, an industrial strategy, and control of our own Canadian resources. While a comprehensive industrial strategy has been alluded to, it has never been revealed by this government which has been the government of the country for most of this century.

The minister seems reluctant, however, to do some of the things that he could do. A brief presented by the Canadian Committee on Learning Opportunities for Women sets out the following points in its preface:

> The brief concerns the impact on women of federal cutbacks to training allowances and Outreach programs. We predict two major outcomes for these cutbacks:
> (1) a decrease in access for women to vocational retraining programs—
> ● (2010)
> —academic upgrading and language classes.
> (2) as a result of decreased access to these learning opportunities, a decreased access to stable, well paid employment.

So it is a vicious circle. I know the minister is sincerely convinced that there should be more and better opportunities, but his acts do not always parallel his utterances. That concerns us in this party, as well as it must the minister and other people who are victims of these cutbacks. The last one was $62.5 million. That is not a small chunk at all, especially when you consider the cost of living going up. So the number of opportunities are reduced and the kinds of training offered or selected by the women, according to the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women in its brief dated June, 1980, are not always adequate nor necessarily suitable. This is what is reported in the brief:

> The majority of women work in relatively few poorly-paid sex-typed occupations. Ideally, training can be a vehicle to alter this pattern. However, training of women in the skill training program tended to follow the well-known pattern of occupational concentration and segregation. Eight occupational groups accounted for 85 per cent of all female skill trainees started in 1978-79, and these occupational groups consisted primarily of traditional female jobs. Over 50 per cent of the women were trained in two occupational groups alone—stenographic and typing occupations and other clerical and related occupations (despite the fact that only 14 per cent of female trainees gave these as their usual occupations.) Over 90 per cent of those trained in these two occupational groups were women. In comparison, the eight leading occupational groups for male skill trainees accounted for ony 56 per cent of these trainees.

What is even worse is that the kinds of jobs for which these women are trained, according to the experts, are trained under the investment by the Government of Canada, through the minister and the ministry, and are the ones that are most likely to disappear under the micro-technological kind of revolution we will experience in the 1980s and 1990s. I think that should give the minister and his very able staff members pause to consider some of the kinds of priorities which they are pursuing.

It is not a simple matter, and no one needs to gloss over it or point a finger of scorn at the minister as if he could wave a magic wand or a magic buck and solve it. No one is suggesting that. But I think the minister knows that the kinds of programs such as the one he is trying to get through here tonight are merely stop-gap programs. There are cutbacks in various other programs under his direction and responsibility which negate the laudable kind of objectives of the new plan of action that he has called for under the title Towards Equality for Women.

It is in his power to do something about these matters when we encourage him to do so. However, I think it would only be fair to get to some questions. I would like to give the minister an opportunity to answer some of them. They bear at least in some degree on the matters that I have raised. First, is the minister aware of the probable impact on employment of new technologies such as those already here in the telecommunications-computerization field, especially for women? What is the government's intentions to overcome these? I will try not to rush these questions, but I want to give the minister time to answer and therefore I will read them quickly.

Second, what is the government prepared to do to decrease the importation of 80 per cent of our technology? Of course that is a job associated question.

Third, what is the government going to do to encourage the manufacturing of high technology industries in Canada, as other countries are doing, by subsidy if necessary. In this connection, I would like to quote again, but I do not have the time.

Fourth, when is the government going to implement a comprehensive industrial strategy?

Fifth, when is the government going to insist that industry co-operate with the government in forward planning, domestic research and development, and job retraining, as government does in other countries?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member, as he is well known to do, has been able to cover a wide variety of topics in a very short time. I would not want to try to duplicate his efforts, his breadth of knowledge or experience, by trying to answer them, because he has raised a number of very important questions, questions which some of my colleagues are in a much better position to answer. Certainly this is true on the issue of industrial strategy, for which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a responsibility and on which I know he is working very diligently.

The hon. member has suggested that the government really must be responding to problems of high technology and how this will create dislocations in the work force. I think he is correct that there will be dislocation. But at the same time I think there is a tendency sometimes to be too Cassandra-like about these developments. We tend to be too pessimistic. I can recall several years ago when there was a great deal of moaning and groaning about how the advent of a computer was going to put all kinds of people out of work. In fact what we found is that new computer technology has created substantial new jobs and it has been a labour-saving device. In its own right it has spurred on a number of new activities and new technologies.

I think we have some degree of restraint in our pessimism about the future. We have a way of not being able to anticipate perhaps as clearly as we would like, and perhaps as others have to forecast the future clearly. Nevertheless, in saying that, I do not disavow the necessity to keep a careful watch on the future.

I would point out to the member that my colleague, the Minister of Labour, just announced in Toronto this past weekend that the government intends to hold a conference in the fall dealing exactly with the question he raised on the impact of the new micro-technology products and their impact on the employment of women.

I think there are a number of papers being prepared by the Department of Labour and other departments which will be utilized at that conference and where we will be able to consult with a broader range of public interest groups and women's organizations to look at the impact. I believe it is at that stage, Mr. Chairman, where we must first gather up the opinions of others, and the experts in this field, because it is a new field that is coming forward.

I accept his premise that government has a responsibility to take a lead in this area, to provide for some forward planning and direction, but it does have to take place at a fairly measured pace. By not rushing into these things hopefully we can avoid mistakes along the way.

The developments that are now going on are in new technology areas which are being examined in my department, in the Department of Labour, and in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We hope that we will be able continually to present to this House our resolutions to those issues.

On the other matter which the member raised, I would only caution him that again I work under certain limitations with the present stretch of programs that we have, namely that budgets and estimates were set and we could only work within those estimates in terms of re-orienting programs or re-establishing them. I would point out, however, that within those we did try some innovations. We did introduce a program of employment for young people in the new technology research field; we will provide incentives for employers to hire graduates of our professional and technical schools to bring them in and give them their jobs in research and development. That is based upon our analysis of the graduates coming out of our schools who did not get the opportunity to get their first job experience in a research-related activity. This will give them their first entry into those areas. Hopefully it will provide them with a continuing career in research and development. If the program seems to have some effectiveness, then we will be able to expand that program. But it is an innovation that we have tried under our job creation program.

Similarly, we are trying to induce employers to hire women in non-traditional fields by offering an incentive program to bring women into areas in which they would not normally work. The hon. member is quite right, women have been employed in the service industry and traditional areas and these may be more severely feeling the impact of changes in the economy. One of the answers to that is to enable women to move into areas where there will be an increasing demand for new skills, such as in resource and in high technology areas. Again, we are hoping this program that we have introduced this spring takes off and shows that it has some impact and effectiveness. We can then build upon that the year after and develop it as a broader skill program to enable women to go into areas of employment where they would not otherwise have the opportunity to go.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I would like to return to a subject which we opened this afternoon, and perhaps put it in a little different context. Part of the job of the opposition is to determine, when examining any piece of legislation, whether the taxpayers' dollars are being effectively spent. In the context of the employment tax credit bill, which is a method for the government to assist people to find employment in a time of high unemployment, we have an obligation to contrast the expenditure in that way with other possible expenditures.

The minister indicated earlier in the life of this Parliament an expenditure of $137 million for direct job creation. When my 20 minutes were up earlier today, we were exploring the costs of that form of employment creation versus the costs relative to this employment tax credit bill. I was left with some confusion. The minister indicated at one point that he did not have available the cost per week of a variety of job-creation measures which he has brought before Parliament at this point. I would like to clarify this so we might be very specific in terms of our background.

I ran over a number of programs with the minister. I inquired whether or not the amount that had been allocated in the budget was to be spent in this fiscal year. A definition of "spent" would be that it goes out of the hands of the government and into the hands of those people employed on the project. If I could come back to the community services program, a budgeted expenditure of $11 million, can the minister clarify whether that $11 million will be spent in this budget year or fiscal year?

Mr. Axworthy: As I pointed out, Mr. Chairman, several times to the hon. member, those are commitments that we make this year for the positions that are established. The expenditures will span the fiscal years because, under the guidelines of the community services project, the commitment, offering or invitation to prospective applicants is that they can commit themselves for a full year's employment and beyond that into two or three years.

In terms of our expenditure pattern, if the program is not operative until this fall and the applicant wants to maintain an employee from October-November to the next October-November, we commit the funds as part of our expenditure within that position. It will span the two fiscal years. We cannot fully estimate that because we have not seen the applications. We do not know what the average length of time will be within that program because, as I pointed out to the hon. member, it will span two fiscal years.

Mr. Hawkes: In summary, the $137 million program announced in this House is a program that covers at least two years, and maybe longer. That $137 million will be spent over a span of time rather than spent for the creation of employment in the current fiscal year. Is that an adequate summary of the position?

Mr. Axworthy: No, Mr. Chairman, that is not what I said. It is not a fair summary. What I said is that we are committing jobs for this year. Those jobs will cover the span of the next fiscal year and move into it, but they have to be committed now. Otherwise we would be in the ludicrous position of saying, "You can make an application in November, but we will cut you off on April 1". We want people to have some term of employment that would at least continue for a 12-month period. That is the basis upon which we have to commit the money during this fiscal year in order to realize our responsibilities to whomever makes an application for this program.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I continue to get somewhat confused. Let's go back to a specific, the community service program. The budgeted amount is $11 million. Will you spend—take out of the government's hands and put it into the hands of individuals—$11 million this year, or will you spend considerably less than that this year?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is confused, I suggest it may be of his own making. We have said very clearly that we would have to commit under a program such as this, and we are publicly responsible and accountable for the statement, that we are prepared to make an invitation to applicants to create jobs which we are prepared to pay for, or subsidize. Those jobs will obviously cover the span of two fiscal years. The $11 million is a commitment for those positions.

We have every opportunity, and I hope we will take advantage of it, in the next fiscal year to make a new offering and have a different kind of job program, after we have analysed it, which could add upon it or continue it. Perhaps I can use by way of an example the kind of situation that the hon. member's own government was into with the Canada Works program. They cancelled the Canada Works program, but they had ongoing commitments which run into this fiscal year which we are just now paying. Those programs are being phased out over the summer. I believe by September, October, the programs will be totally and completely wiped out. However, those Canada Works commitments that were made in the previous fiscal year must carry through this year. His government had to carry those expenditures as part of their estimates in order to cover all those Canada Works programs.

Mr. Hawkes: That is what I thought I heard the first time. Then I come to a conclusion. The minister has announced an expenditure package for employment creation purposes of $137 million. I simply ask him, is it fair comment and a good summary to say part of that $137 million will go from the government into people's pockets in this fiscal year prior to March, and the balance will go in the next fiscal year or subsequent years? In other words, part of the $137 million will be in this year and part will be in next year. Is that an appropriate summary comment?

Mr. Axworthy: No, Mr. Chairman. It will all be committed this year.

Mr. Hawkes: I am not anxious to get into a word game. I understand clearly that you make commitments that go beyond one fiscal year. I am asking the minister what portion of that $137 million will be spent in this fiscal year, will actually go from the government and into the pockets of those people who get those jobs.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the commitment will be made for all of the money to those sponsors, but the commitment that is made is that they may spend part of it going over the next fiscal year because they made commitments on those jobs. I have now said several times this evening that if someone is hired to begin work on November 1 and the community services program goes over until next August, September or November, obviously the money we have given to that group will be spent during that period of time. We are giving to that project group, whoever makes application, the money this year to be spent to create the job this year.

Mr. Hawkes: The job will start this year and it may continue into next year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: I think we should stay with the community services program for another second or two. In the back-up paper which the minister provided to the House of Commons, he says that that program will create 1,000 jobs. Can the minister tell us whether his departmental officials have estimated the average cost per week for one job within that specific program?

Mr. Axworthy: I would caution you, Mr. Chairman, that this is exactly the same question that was asked two or three times earlier. It has already been answered. I am quite prepared to answer it again to make sure that the hon. member is clear on it. It is a question that is becoming repetitive, and I think the Chair should recognize that fact.

The point is that we are simply saying that the program is not operative. Therefore, the guidelines of the program are very difficult to judge. We are saying within the parameters of what we can guesstimate in terms of when the program may get started, the length of time in which the community services may be operative in terms of the individual applications, which can go anywhere from eight weeks as a minimum to a full year, we have estimated that the cost per week would be in the range of about $200.

Mr. Hawkes: I am just busy writing down that figure. The minister indicates that the average cost per week for the community services program may be in the neighbourhood of $200. Could he give us the average cost per week of the community development program which involves an expenditure of $72 million?

● (2030)

Mr. Axworthy: It would be within the same range.

Mr. Hawkes: Could the minister give us the cost estimate as a cost per week of the new technology program?

Mr. Axworthy: In the order of $250 to $260.

Mr. Hawkes: It is wonderful to come back in the evening, Mr. Chairman. These questions were not getting the same response in the afternoon. Maybe people have looked a few things up. What about the native training program, the additional $10 million? What is the cost per week of native training?

Mr. Axworthy: Two hundred dollars, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hawkes: Those four examples are among the biggest allocations of money from the department and they run between three and four times as expensive for the creation of a week of work as does the employer tax credit program. What does the minister consider as being three or four times the value in these programs as compared with the employer tax credit program? We established earlier that under the employer tax credit program it cost around $65 to create a week's work. These other programs cost between $250 and $260. Why does the minister favour programs of that kind as opposed to the employer tax credit program?

Mr. Axworthy: If the hon. member had been listening to recommendations made by other hon. members of this House he would have his answer. We heard from his hon. friend from Richmond-South Delta a strong and persuasive case for establishing special programs to train young people and move them into new resource areas, as well as for helping native people and other groups with special needs. When we introduced the job-creation program our primary purpose was not to rely on any one technique but to have a variety of instruments at our disposal so that we could target in on hard core unemployment areas.

The employment tax credit plays a role in this general strategy and, as I said, we are prepared to spend close to $100 million on that program. It is designed to provide an incentive for an employer to bring in a worker he would otherwise not hire. Work of this kind tends to be created in areas where there is a fairly high frequency of manufacturing organizations and businesses which can take advantage of the tax credit. But there are many regions which do not have such an opportunity; the underpinning of small business does not exist. These are the areas we want to target in a geographic or regional way.

There also areas where special groups of people, the hard core unemployed, would not be affected by a tax credit program. We have introduced a direct job-creation program to assist in those circumstances. The underlying philosophy does not encourage one program to the exclusion of another but is an attempt to provide a balance of programs and find an equation applicable to each area. We have given our regional directors some degree of autonomy in choosing the mixture of programs which would be employed in each area. That is why we have restored direct job creation.

Mr. Hawkes: The minister has told us it takes direct job creation to reach some of the disadvantaged groups. There is some truth in that proposition, but it is not all truth. I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that one of the new programs he announced had to do with job training for women in non-traditional areas. This affects a group about which we are particularly concerned. The basic principle we follow when providing jobs of that kind is the tax credit principle. There is another supplementary and somewhat similar program which we have not seen. It is not in the legislation we are examining today and it is not in the $137 million program which the minister announced earlier. I refer to a wage subsidy program. Could the minister tell us whether or not we are likely to see a wage subsidy program in operation in the future? Can he give us his own analysis of what might be good about such a program and what might be not so good?

Mr. Axworthy: Again, I believe that if we look at the wide variety of employment incentives which might be offered we shall find that a wage subsidy is being used by certain jurisdictions. It was my hope that through discussions and debate in which the parliamentary committee will engage, and in which our own talk force will engage, we would be able to come up with a proper assessment and evaluation of those techniques as well as others. As the hon. member knows, because he is well versed in this field, there are a number of options available. What we have to do is determine the proper mixture of programs in the future; it is not enough to throw a smorgasbord of plans on the table and simply hope they will work. We now have a job program which is within the parameters of the money available to us to meet the short-term need and fill the vacuum which was created. We hope through the work of those two task forces to make an exact assessment of other techniques which are available, and determine which will best serve us. Wage subsidy programs will be examined as part of that process.

Mr. Hawkes: The data base relative to wage subsidy programs is growing, I believe, as more and more jurisdictions around the world have made use of this technique. One element of a data base which might be collected by the minister's department would include some idea of the cost vis-à-vis direct job creation and so on. Does the minister have any idea where wage subsidy programs might fit in this range from the cheaper employer tax credit program to the more expensive direct job-creation effort?

Mr. Axworthy: I do not have that information on hand at the moment but I know it is part of the data base being assembled by the task force in my department; figures of that kind on alternative job-creation options will be developed.

Mr. Hawkes: I would think such data already exists somewhere in the department given the number of people who are involved in research. One of the advantages of a wage subsidy program is that in the Canadian context it is estimated it would make the other 50 per cent of our businesses eligible to employ people. Once this legislation is passed, the richest 50 per cent of Canadian businesses will be in a position to use the employer tax credit program and hire people, receiving benefits, in a sense, from the other taxpayers of the country. That is because they make a profit and pay certain taxes. Unfortunately, we are in a period of the economy at which bankruptcies have risen by 15 per cent, 20 per cent or 25 per cent, depending on the month.

The fringe businesses in this country, the 50 per cent which have not been in business long enough to make profits, or which are experiencing particularly difficult times, cannot provide jobs. Every time a business goes bankrupt a certain number of jobs are lost. We lost 61,000 last month in Ontario alone. They disappeared from our economy. I wonder whether the minister might care to speak for a minute or two about the consideration he has given to wage subsidies relative to employment possibilities in fringe businesses which are barely profitable.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be wrong to assume that the employment tax credit is utilized only by large, rich corporations. It is actually quite the contrary. The major users of the employment tax credit program are small businessmen. Well over 70 per cent of the applications which come under this program are put forward by business organizations which employ fewer than 20 people, so the major recipients and users of this program are small business organizations.

As far as the other problem the hon. member puts forward is concerned, I agree with him. There is nothing that is giving me greater concern at this point than the major dislocations which are taking place in traditional industries which have been very strong and have not required support. The automobile industry is a prime example. However, I do not think a wage subsidy is necessarily the panacea for that problem. We are examining it very closely. We have had a series of meetings with the UAW. We are looking at different ways by which we can provide for transition in that major area but, as I tried to answer the hon. member who spoke before, we are really going to have to work jointly with business and unions to find a way to combine a number of programs to impact upon those areas where major industrial change or dislocation is taking place.

It could well be that a wage subsidy is one example, but I can also point out to the hon. member, for example, that in the American jurisdiction what they are using now is increasing the use of split work programs or work-sharing programs, which is another concept the Americans are beginning to employ with more frequency. The hon. member is probably aware of the experience in the state of California with the four-day week insurance programs that they are beginning to develop. Those are all options we are looking at, and I encourage the hon. member, as one of the representatives of his party in the parliamentary task force, to use his experience and his obvious interest and concern about wage subsidies and to bring that forward for examination by the parliamentary task force so that we can get the benefit of his wisdom.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The traditional 20 minutes allotted to each member of the committee has expired. However, if nobody else seeks the floor, the hon. member for Calgary West may be recognized for a second round.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss with the Minister of Employment and Immigration the industrial benefits from the new fighter aircraft contract which is in progress now.

To date we know that 49 per cent of the spin-off benefits will go to the province of Quebec, 37 per cent to Ontario, and 12 per cent to the rest of Canada. As the minister well knows, we have a very capable aerospace industry in the province of Manitoba. There are four firms there: Standard Aero, CAE, Boeing and Bristol. They are very concerned, and to date there have been only some minor contracts allotted to Bristol for the manufacture of but one part of the new fighter aircraft. Is the minister taking into consideration where the remaining 12 per cent is going to be allotted across Canada? If there are not going to be some industrial spin-offs and if at least 10 per cent of the remaining 12 per cent for eight provinces is not going into the province of Manitoba to these four aerospace firms, they could face very serious problems with lay-offs because, once the old fighter aircraft is finished, which is being worked on now, there will be nothing more for them. Can the minister explain what he is doing about getting part of the new fighter aircraft contracts into the four aerospace firms in Manitoba?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to answer that question. It is not exactly within the confines of a discussion of the employment tax credit, but because of our mutual interest in our home province I would be prepared to answer that.

I think it is fair to say at this point in time that the negotiations and discussions on the allocation of contracts for the aerospace industry are in process. The presentation by a number of the major contractors is just now going forward to the interdepartmental committee which has been put together to make assessments of different proposals. As the hon. member pointed out, both Bristol Aircraft and Standard Aero, which are well-founded and well-established companies, have made proposals in those areas. They are part of a number of proposals which are being considered by the major contractors and by the government itself.

I welcome the hon. member's support and encouragement. It is my intention to support and encourage the allocation of work where there is the beginning of an aerospace industry, and I think I can tell the hon. member that there is some progress in those negotiations, but I would not want to make any specific announcements because no decisions have yet been taken on much of that work.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, the minister does not have to worry about my concerns. This is something I have been working on since 1972. I met with these four members of the aerospace industry last Monday in Winnipeg, and they are very concerned about what work they are going to obtain from the new fighter aircraft industrial spin-offs. If they do not obtain some contracts in the very near future, they will be faced with lay-offs. Can the minister give us some assurance here tonight that the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Ministry of Supply and Services will be meeting with the four aerospace firms in the very near future to discuss what portion of the new fighter aircraft contract they can obtain? I asked them, "Are you concerned; are you worried?" They said, "Yes, we definitely are". I did not want to be raising the issue in the House if things were going along smoothly and they were getting assurances from Ottawa that they were going to be getting part of the contract. They have received no assurances at all.

I see that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is here. Maybe he would want to interject something here tonight about this.

Mr. Lalonde: Order.

Mr. Gauthier: This is not question period.

Mr. McKenzie: There is a little conversation going on here between two members, but I want to tell the minister that we are talking about employment here tonight as well as the different regions. If we do not get some assurance about the new fighter aircraft contract in Winnipeg, there will be many lay-offs, and the four firms in Winnipeg are very concerned. Will the minister give some firm commitment as to when he will arrange a meeting between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Supply and Services, the Minister of National Defence and the four aerospace firms in Winnipeg so that they can be given some confirmation as to when they will get a firm commitment with regard to building some parts—

Mr. Lalonde: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. With the greatest of respect, I must interject at this time and ask the hon. member to confine his questioning to the bill before us, namely, the tax credit bill, and certainly not to the creation of employment in other areas which do not concern this bill.

Mr. McKenzie: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, we are talking about employment and—

Mr. Lalonde: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. We are talking about tax credits.

Mr. McKenzie: Does the Minister of Employment and Immigration want to respond to what I said?

Mr. Dawson: Is this question period?

Mr. Lalonde: That is out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, I want to intervene just briefly regarding the employment tax credit bill and the employment program regarding native Canadians which was announced. Just yesterday or Tuesday a report was tabled. That report was rather astonishing, although I suspect most hon. members are aware of the employment conditions, shelter conditions, and some of the other problems which affect native people.

Under the employment tax credit bill, particularly at a time when we have high unemployment, employers generally seek people who are experienced. There are many people who do not have jobs but do have some work experience. Part of the problem with native Canadians is that most of them have never had the chance to get any experience in order to compete for these jobs. While I understand the technique of the employment tax credit, I do not feel it will assist native Canadians in any way. It might assist only a very few.

Because reserves are becoming crowded, many native Canadians are moving into urban centres. The problem then becomes worse because they are out of their culture. They are often driven to welfare, alcoholism or violence, as a result of living in urban areas. I understand that some $10 million was assessed to the other program which was announced. My question is on whether the minister believes that the employment tax credit will assist in any way native Canadians in solving their problems, particularly those who have left the reserves. Is the $10 million, under the program which has been announced, specifically designed for status Indians or will it relate to the 500,000 non-status Indians and the some 500,000 Metis people who sometimes are considered in the same group with native Canadians? If I can get an answer to those questions, it may relate to some others.

Mr. Axworthy: The employment tax credit program would only incidentally bring natives into the work force. It is not a program, as the hon. member properly describes it, which is designed to focus specifically on their concerns. As I pointed out in my answer to the hon. member for Calgary West, one of the reasons why we are trying to develop a balanced strategy is to have a range of options whereby we can allocate moneys to where they are most needed. That is why we introduced programs specifically designed to deal with employment difficulties faced by native people. I should say that there is not just a training program.

The community development program is one which will have a very heavy emphasis in those regions of the country where there is a high proportion of native people and, as I believe I indicated—I would like to check Hansard—I believe I said last time, that when we allocate money by constituency, there will be a weighing factor to provide additional funds in areas where there is a higher unemployment rate among native people. So it is that program plus the training program. The training program is available to the native people, both status and non-status, and it is designed to start some innovative programs in the training field.

The hon. member was probably not in the chamber this afternoon when a similar question was asked by another hon. member. We did point out that he should not assume that these are the only programs available for native people. LEAP, under my department, is a close to $70 million program and almost 50 per cent of that is allocated to work projects for native people.

Mr. Schellenberger: I have one other question regarding the program. In his press release the minister stated that it would enable them to take advantage of urban and remote resource development opportunities. I assume that as the moneys are allocated, many of the ridings do not have resource development opportunities. Would it be possible then, if there is a large resource development such as the tar sands plants, when moneys are allocated in ridings where there are not these kinds of developments, for jobs to be created and for people to have opportunities to move where the jobs are, even though the moneys are allocated specifically in one area?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to confuse the hon. member. The allocation by constituency is for the community development program. The training program is one under which we will respond to initiatives and primarily we have asked our regional directors in each of the provinces, particularly the western provinces, to develop for us in consultation with native organizations, how they would like to allocate that money and what is the best use for it. I can tell the hon. member that already we have had several meetings with native organizations in Alberta specifically directed at developing training programs relating to the major oil sands projects that are going ahead in that area.

Mr. Schellenberger: My final question relates to the number of jobs. If we refer to the statistic which was given to the hon. member for Calgary West we see that it would cost somewhere around $200 per job. Yet in the release the minister states that he will be assisting some 6,000 native participants. If we do some mathematics we find that at that level only some 1,400 permanent jobs would be created. So I assume that we are looking at temporary jobs for a brief period of time, hoping that they will develop into long-range employment. Given that we still have sometimes between 60 per cent to 80 per cent of the native people unemployed, I know that this program will assist them, but surely the minister should address himself to additional programs in this area, particularly in view of the reports that have come out in recent weeks. I assume that he will give some direction to the parliamentary committee and to his own committee to make efforts in this area, particularly directed to people living on reserves and those who have left the reserves and are trying to exist in large urban centres.

Mr. Axworthy: I would like to give some clarification. When we talked about 6,000 native participants, we talked about a combination of the training program and the job-creation program under the community development and community services.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairman, I would like to address a question to the minister in reference to something he mentioned earlier about the number of native people who have been helped by projects under LEAP. In the new measures that the minister has announced, will some priority be given to carry over from LEAP in the cases where people have not been able to finish their projects? Some of the specific projects I can think of would be the band of Canoes Narrows, the community of Beauval and several other places. If they apply under the new program, will they be given some priority to enable them to finish their project which was started under LEAP but for which there are no more funds under that program, so that the facilities there remain useless now and cannot function unless these people receive extra money to complete the project?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I should point out to the hon. member that LEAP has a specific date attached to it and if jobs end under the program, obviously there would have to be new funding. The people would certainly be eligible for application under the community development program if they so desire, but LEAP has its own terms of reference. I should point out also that LEAP will be continuing as well. Much of the funds that have been allocated this year has been spent, but LEAP is an ongoing, continuing part of our employment strategy. The community development program is in addition to LEAP which is already in place.

Mr. Anguish: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I understand that. What I am saying is that there are some projects, such as I mentioned, at Canoe Narrows and Beauval, which have been started under LEAP. They do not have adequate funds to finish their projects. Without additional funds the projects will be useless within the community. If they apply under the new program which the minister has announced for employment, will they be given priority as opposed to projects that are new and possibly more creative? Will the old projects that are not completed be given priority when they apply, as opposed to projects that are new?

Mr. Axworthy: What I would propose to the hon. member who has a very specific question, is that if he could give me a note on those projects to which he has referred, I would be very glad to talk to our regional director in Saskatchewan to see what can be done and to examine them more specifically. If he could give me a note to that effect, we could follow through and get an answer back to him.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to the minister who, I think, has referred to me two or three times as being a sociologist, that I am a psychologist by discipline. That is what my doctorate is in. My particular specialty has been statistics and research methods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: One of the commonly used text books at universities for that kind of course is a book called "How To Lie With Statistics". Perhaps we have spent a lot of time on this bill because we have had a shifting data base from time to time and it has been very difficult to pursue the issue and to have clear definitions, and that is part of understanding our world. I was reminded of that as my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, spoke about the native employment program.

I should like to bring to the minister's attention the fact that when today he stood in the House of Commons to announce his $137 million program, in my brief one or two minutes of questioning I asked him simply to define a job, because we cannot understand what our money is being spent on unless we have some definition of a job. In the data which have come out through the course of the day, we have the kind of example I mean about the difficulty of dealing with statistics. We have a program called the community services program. The minister's own officials told us that it will create approximately 1,000 jobs for an expenditure of $11 million, and the minister told us that the cost of those jobs is approximately $200 a week.

If we go down the list of measures announced in the House, we come to native training which is an expenditure of $10 million and the cost is about $200 a week. So, it is very similar—$11 million in one case and $10 million in the other, $200 a week in both cases. But we are told that 3,900 jobs are created for native people. How can that be with $200 a week for both programs and approximately the same expenditure? The answer is that native people are employed for one-quarter of the time other people in the community services project are employed. Can we call those equal jobs when native people in the country are employed for one-quarter of the time of the other group?

I suggest to the minister that we might be able to move more quickly to understand the legislation if we began to use numbers and figures which had a common definitional base so that we all knew with the same degree of understanding what we were talking about. I should like to continue on that vein for just a minute.

When I first got the minister's statement on his programs and the background pages, I had someone in my office add up the number of jobs supposedly created, and it came to 192,000. Then I went and looked into it a little more closely, and some were listed as new program, some were old program, and some were continuing program. We went to the minister's office and got a complete list of the new programs. In the meantime the minister was in a press conference and announced 81,000 jobs. Some diligent reporter continued to inquire, and officials said that it would be 31,000 jobs. After the inquiries here today, I think we now have the kind of very simple data base which most of us understand. If we have an employer tax credit program about which the parliamentary secretary told us, the data shows that it created about 45,000 jobs last year. The minister told us that those jobs were created on the basis of $65 a week. Approximately 45,000 jobs were created by the employer tax credit at $65 a week.

Now we have from the minister an indication that the bulk of the programs he announced in the House in terms of direct employment creation cost between $200 and $260 a week. They are at least three times as expensive as the employer tax credit. If that one creates 45,000 jobs, then using the same base, the minister's announcement in the House would have to be 15,000 jobs. It would not be 31,000, 81,000 or 192,000 jobs, but 15,000. But those 45,000 jobs created by the employer tax credit are within a defined fiscal year. In response to our questions today, the minister told us that his $137 million goes over two years. So, if we take the 15,000 jobs and divide it in half, because half will be this year and half will be next year, then the announcement dealt with 7,500 jobs. It will be 7,500 jobs for a $137 million announcement. It has taken us several days in the House of persistent inquiry to get answers to enough questions to be able to lay that out for the House of Commons and the Canadian people.

When we talk about employment creation, employer tax credits and things of that kind which come under the minister's purview, I hope he would tell us about the cost per week. I hope he would add up the number of weeks of work and the number of weeks of training, that he would report data, and put out his press announcements in that format. It would enable all of us to understand in a common way what is involved in the minister's program. There is a great deal of difference. In a time of unemployment that is well in excess of one million people in Canada today, it makes a great deal of difference whether the government is providing work for something like 200,000 people or 7,000 people. The problem is significantly reduced if we are providing work for 200,000 people. When we are providing work for 7,000 people, it is important to those 7,000 people, their families and the people dependent upon that income. But it tells us clearly in the House of Commons that we do not have a program in place which deals with the serious unemployment problems existing in Canada today.

I want one other indication from the minister about another number that is important to me. I have asked it in a variety of ways on three separate days. I will put it in the following context. Wood Gundy, a respected organization in Canada, indicated that in the next fiscal year its projection of unemployment on average will be in excess of 9 per cent. Last month in Canada it was 7.8 per cent. Does the minister have any information from the Minister of Finance, from his own officials or from any other source, which would enable him to stand in the House at this moment and tell us that there is good reason to believe unemployment will not get to that 9 per cent level and stay there pretty much in the next 18 months? Does he have good reason to suspect that we are not looking at the most severe unemployment problem this country has ever seen, and that we are looking at it for an extended period of time, at least 18 months and maybe longer? Does the minister have good reason to tell me not to accept that forecast?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as I told the member before, I am very reluctant to get into the art of black magic and start predicting all kinds of numbers. I would not want to claim the same degree of prescience Wood Gundy has attained in the past when it has been so accurate in its forecast of the stock market. But if the member is looking for some light at the end of the tunnel, some small glim of optimism, at least I would refer to the survey conducted by Manpower Temporary Services of Toronto. It did a very major survey of personnel managers across Canada. If I may, I should like to quote from the survey:

Despite worries about the depth of recession, employment prospects across Canada for the next three months are still fairly bright according to a national survey conducted by Manpower Temporary Services.

I hope that will allow the member to go to bed with some degree of calm and patience this evening, knowing that while Wood Gundy may be trying to plunge us into the depths of despair, Manpower Temporary Services still has a ringing note of optimism in its survey.

Mr. Hawkes: Would the minister comment on a quote of the Minister of Finance which was reported today? It is dealing with unemployment. He said that the actual outcome could turn out to be much worse for this year. In our previous discussions on this bill, the minister indicated that the average projection of 8 per cent of the Minister of Finance was allowed to stand. On the basis of the last couple of days, is he getting any indication from the Minister of Finance that perhaps the unemployment forecast should be revised upward? What does the Department of Finance indicate?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, simply I would refer the hon. member to page 2375 of Hansard where the statement of the Minister of Finance relating to his forecasts on employment and unemployment is very well set out and very precisely stated as only the Minister of Finance can do. I refer this for the member's information. If he wants the most accurate forecast, that is exactly from the mouth of the Minister of Finance. I would not even pretend to be able to equal his ability to make that kind of judgment.

Mr. Hawkes: I wonder if the minister read the statement made by the Minister of Finance today. I think that the statement he quoted in Hansard is an historical statement. The Minister of Finance is quoted as saying:

I cannot rule out the possibility that the unemployment rate may rise even faster than this figure would imply.

The figure he is referring to is the original estimate of 8 per cent.

Mr. Pinard: What page is that?

Mr. Hawkes: This is an article out of a newspaper.

Mr. Pinard: Oh, I see.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, in my short experience in political life I have learned to go to the official record rather than to rely upon press reports, which have been known at times to somewhat distort the remarks of politicians, particularly ministers of finance.

Mr. Hawkes: I would ask the minister the following: If in some magic way he could be provided with another $500 million, does he think that he has the kinds of programs in place which could absorb this kind of money and would produce useful employment for Canadians?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is suggesting that we have a kind of a Christmas grab bag of goodies, I would simply say to him that the kinds of requests and demands made on this government for a variety of expenditures in the job-creation field far exceed our money supply, It is one of those cases where, if there is an inflationary push, it is for government action and supply that we cannot match. Of course $500 million would be welcome at any time, if the hon. member is prepared to provide it.

Mr. Hawkes: This is my second occasion in Committee of the Whole on different bills. The other occasion concerned a bill to create a minister of social welfare. I would like to ask the minister a similar type of question. Given the minister's assertions about caring about the disadvantaged of the country, the need to help women and native people, is he satisfied representing a government that allows the importation of oil, and the subsequent subsidy, to rise? The original projected expenditure of $2.6 billion has now been revised to in excess of $4 billion. Given the nature of world price rises which are coming into the neighbourhood of $5 billion in subsidies, this brings us very close to 10 per cent of the total federal expenditures and well over 12 per cent or 13 per cent of the money which is raised. Certainly it is a sum which is considerably more than the $100 million which goes into the employment tax credit or the $137 million of the other program which is spread over two years.

Does the minister consider the subsidization of oil to be a greater social priority on which to use taxpayers' dollars than programs, for example, which help create jobs, and help create higher pensions for senior citizens? Is the minister satisfied with the direction in which the government is going? The minister is a member of that government and a member of cabinet.

Mr. Pinard: That is not relevant to the bill, my friend.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is straying into another area of debate. Personally, I believe that in this country there must be some fair degree of equalization of the costs which are borne. If one of the prices of being a Canadian is to ensure that the people in the maritimes are not required to pay far more exorbitant rates for their energy than the people in Alberta, then that is a fair price which I am prepared to pay as a Canadian.

With regard to the hon. member's comments about my feelings for the poor and disadvantaged, one of my motivations to work so hard for the defeat of his past government was the idea that the 18-cent increase on a gallon of gas would be borne most heavily by average Canadians, to the point of several hundreds of dollars per year. That was something which Canadians will simply not tolerate and which they cannot afford.

Mr. Hawkes: I cannot leave that pass, Mr. Chairman. The person who owns the Cadillac with the great big gas tank gets more benefit out of that subsidy than the senior citizen who does not have a car. That has always been true. It is the rich of this country who are being subsidized by the oil import pricing system. It is a different issue to equalize the pricing system across this country. The policy issue in terms of expenditure—

The Chairman: With all due respect to the hon. member, the debate seems to be straying from the bill which is before us. May I invite both the minister and the hon. member to confine their remarks to the bill.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Chairman, I find that I am intrigued by that shifting data base. In light of the information which the minister has provided to us today, and I thank him for it, I am persuaded that the bill which is before us needs amending. I think we are looking at a long-term unemployment problem. I would therefore move that:

1. Subsections 7(2) and (3) of the Employment Tax Credit Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), the "program period" commences on march 8, 1978, and ends on March 31, 1984.

(3) No agreement may be entered into under subsection (1) after March 31, 1983, and an agreement entered into in respect of eligible employment that commences after that day is of no force or effect."

(4) Notwithstanding subsections (2) and (3), before March 31, 1983, the dates referred to in subsections (1) and (2) may be replaced by such future dates as specified in a joint resolution of both Houses of Parliament.

The Chairman: Before ruling on the amendment, the Chair would call the attention of the committee to the fact that clause 1 is under discussion at this time. The Chair would like to defer ruling on the admissibility of the amendment and the form in which it came before us until it has had an opportunity to study the amendment in detail.

I would invite hon. members to consider the discussion of clause 1 which is before us. I propose not to rule on the admissibility of the amendment until I have had an opportunity to examine it.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carry.

The Chairman: For the purposes of proceeding, the Chair will accept the amendment placed before the House on clause 1. Shall I read the amendment?

Mr. Axworthy: Dispense.

Mr. Hawkes: May I speak to the amendment?

The Chairman: There has been a request that the amendment be read. It is moved by the hon. member for Calgary West, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington:

1. Subsections 7(2) and (3) of the Employment Tax Credit Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), the "program period" commences on March 8, 1978, and ends on March 31, 1984.

(3) No agreement may be entered into under subsection (1) after March 31, 1983, and an agreement entered into in respect of eligible employment that commences after that day is of no force or effect."

(4) Notwithstanding subsections (2) and (3), before March 31, 1983, the dates referred to in subsections (1) and (2) may be replaced by such future dates as specified in a joint resolution of both Houses of Parliament.

The Chair has ruled that the amendment is in order. The hon. member for Calgary West may speak to the amendment.

Mr. Hawkes: If I could just take a minute or two I will explain the intent of the amendment. Of course the government has a majority and so can pass or reject this amendment, but on this side of the House we are persuaded that the country is facing a fairly long and very severe period of unemployment. I think it is clear from the minister's own testimony that through an employer tax credit provision there will be a maximum increase in publicly supported employment for a minimal dollar cost.

The intent of my amendment is to extend that provision for an additional two years. I think this would probably see us through most of the unemployment crisis because it is an employer tax credit program and it could defer the expenditure to as late as 1989. Not every employer would claim the tax credit immediately and the budgetary situation might ease in the years ahead. That is one of the advantages.

The additional clause which I propose would provide maximum flexibility for change through a joint resolution of both Houses, and also, the date could be altered. I think the mechanism for altering the date would enable the government to provide the greatest possible number of jobs at the lowest possible cost. The official opposition is convinced that those jobs are needed today and that they will be needed in the future. We would like hon. members on the government side to give serious consideration to the amendments and to vote for them.

The Chairman: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 12; nays, 28.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Axworthy moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

The House resumed from Thursday, June 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-3, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief as I have a short time left to me from the last time we debated Bill C-3. At that time I referred to the reduction in the amount of time that is needed for someone to earn an unemployment insurance stamp. I noted that although the time period had been changed in a previous amendment, this year the Unemployment Insurance Commission had decided that a reduction in the length of time was required.

Before criticizing this particular regulation that was introduced recently in this House by the minister, I should like to point out that the existing regulation had also been changed to make the required period 20 weeks or 30 per cent of maximum insurable earnings. Now that is to be changed again, to 15 weeks or one-fifth of maximum insurable earnings as the time requirement to earn one stamp. This indicates to me that 20 hours of employment per week, or 30 per cent of maximum insurable earnings, cannot be provided to workers at all times. This hits very directly at one segment of society—part-time workers, and women in particular.

The last time the bill was before the House I pointed out this difficulty and commented that it would be very hard for this group to find employment. I have pointed out in committee and in the House that it might be better to combine two weeks in order to qualify for a stamp, but apparently the commission decided that there should be a regulation to reduce the period. This zig-zag from one year to the next is very unfair and it is difficult for people to know how much they must earn in order to qualify.

It seems to me it would be more advantageous in areas such as the one I represent if an employer were able to give a stamp for two weeks combined, rather than the period being reduced as is done by the regulation.

It is possible that the task force is considering this proposition, but at the present time the confusion that has been so much a part of unemployment insurance amendments and regulations in the past few years, still exists.

I would remind the minister that in the notes on the employment program and community development projects that he passed out to members of Parliament, he stated:

> Members of Parliament and local advisory groups will be consulted by the minister in the decision-making process and funds will be allocated to all constituencies on the basis of unemployment.

This is the reason I have raised the subject tonight as well as other occasions, and why I will raise it again in the future, until the basis of unemployment has been regulated by the minister and the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I should like to return to the question of the use of the variable entrance requirement based on the economic region. The last time I spoke, I mentioned the use of this factor which came into effect last July. It has led to confusion in those areas of the country where it is being administered. People do not know, from one month to the next, how many weeks of insurable earnings they need in order to qualify for benefits by next November, December or January.

I would like to reiterate that the economic region-unemployment insurance rates been used by unemployment insurance offices, and by that economic region rate I mean that employed by Statistics Canada and used by the unemployment insurance offices. The other night I tried to show to the House the difference and the handicap. It is not only under the variable entrance requirement or under the extended benefits or just in the ability to go into, let us say, the employment programs, it is the harshness that it brings about. Yet, if one looked at the labour surplus rate, which I defined earlier, as the number of regular beneficiaries as a proportion of the labour force, we would look at South West Nova and see that a difference existed between the labour surplus rate and the unemployment rate as indicated by Statistics Canada under the economic region. In fact, it shows such a different picture than the use of the Statistics economic region. The labour surplus rate in South West Nova last year was 13.3 per cent compared to a labour surplus rate of 12.8 per cent for the economic region unemployment insurance rate. The reason that the two sets of data are different, as I have said before, is probably the result of the statistical problem in estimating labour force and unemployed data from a sample that may be too small as used by Statistics Canada.

If we had true statistics, and if one used just the unemployment office in that area, the figures would probably show that in South West Nova the unemployment is as high and as severe as any other economic region in the province. I am substantiated in my theory by the benefits paid out. If one looks back to January, 1978, January, 1979, and January, 1980, by taking that particular month we find that in January, 1978, the total benefits paid in Yarmouth were 15 per cent of the total benefits paid for the whole province. If one looks at 1979, it was 16 per cent, and in 1980 the figure was again 15 per cent. That includes the fact that there were many people who qualified in 1979 who did not qualify in 1980 because of the use of the variable entrance requirement. It is a very severe handicap. It shows that there were 7,046 beneficiaries in January, 1980, at the Yarmouth unemployment office. This is out of a total of 44,552 beneficiaries in Nova Scotia.

That would be about 15.8 per cent of the total beneficiaries in Nova Scotia. Yet if we take a look at the figures for January, and by assuming that January has the highest number of unemployed, and by assuming that in South West Nova the critical unemployment period is in the winter from November to February, and by assuming the estimated impact of Bill C-13 in a district office area of Yarmouth in 1979-80, by taking the individuals who were prevented from establishing a claim either because they were a repeater or because of the new entrance provision, there were approximately 1,170 people affected.

By adding that figure to the 7,046 registered beneficiaries, we come up with about 8,216, which is approximately 18 per cent of the total for the province of Nova Scotia. We are looking at 18 per cent of the total beneficiaries in Nova Scotia, and one has to consider that in that area we have probably about 7 per cent of the total population of the province and probably some of the lowest salaries earned in Nova Scotia. If we look at the federal-regional rate scale, it shows that South West Nova has the lowest salary scale in Nova Scotia.

I reiterate this point, because I looked at Hansard the other night and perhaps I did not make it clear enough then as to the acute problem that the continued use of variable entrance requirement will create in South West Nova. I look at it again in light of the fact that I reviewed the projects under this bill, and I have to say that I am upset that we are continuing the use of the variable entrance requirement. First, people in South West Nova do not have a definite amount of time that they must work in order to qualify. Second, the use of the money under the new financing arrangement is not going into job creation.

I stop at that point because the use of the unemployment insurance rates based on economic regions in South West Nova has had a cruel effect in that area because of the amount of employment created by the employment programs. I say this because in the past under Canada Works it was based on the unemployment rate. If you go to employment strategies it was based on unemployment rates, based on an economic region which did not truly give a good sample of the population that was unemployed in that area at specific times in the year. It goes back to the need for all sorts of employment programs, such as the employment tax credit which does not apply directly. It has some application in the area but it perhaps created about $100,000 worth of job creation last year out of a total package of whatever was used in government tax credits. Yet, that type of employment incentive does not apply to a rural area where the business end of it cannot take that up as a program. They need economic employment stimulation.

I want to say again tonight that I look forward to this bill in committee. I look forward to pressing the minister to find a solution. I ask him not to wait for two years and have two winters of hard times where the unemployment rate for stamps in a given area is not known. I will continue to press this, particularly in light of this bill, and I look forward to seeing what happens in committee. I must say that I find it hard to think that the Unemployment Insurance Commission needs 18 months. I am glad that there is another study under way, but I hope that there will be lots of consultations with the members. Perhaps in the future some of the members will be listened to in terms of the problems which have been suggested to the minister in the past, here in this House and in committee.

I thank the House for the time allotted to me. I am sure there are many other speakers who wish to speak on this bill and I look forward to the bill coming to committee.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-3, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am disappointed that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) is not in the House. I realize that he has just had one bill passed. However, I feel that he will have difficulty in putting this one through.

I am very happy to follow the hon. member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell). I wish to comment briefly on an item which she overlooked. In the press release in which the minister announced Bill C-3, he noted that the government plans to introduce regulating changes that would alter the minimum insurability provision. Instead of being required to work 20 hours per week, it would be 15 hours per week.

There is a very serious discrimination against pregnant women who require unemployment insurance benefits. While the minister has looked at the part-time workers, he has discriminated against what is called the magic ten area of women in the work force.

I wish to relate some of my remarks this evening to problems in Kootenay East-Revelstoke, one of the highest unemployment areas in British Columbia. We have the problem of people having to drive between 90 and 100 miles to register for unemployment insurance. The office is so busy that their applications are sent to Terrace to be processed, approximately 1,100 miles away. These people who paid into the unemployment insurance program while in the work force, and through their employer and the government, have to wait through this procedure.

What I resent even more than that kind of procedure is the fact that I received a letter from the Minister of Employment and Immigration just recently telling me that he would prefer if I would deal with problems of unemployment in my riding because his ministry is too busy to deal with them personally. He tried to encourage me to deal with them in my own riding. How can I do that when applications are sent 1,100 miles away to be processed?

I want to deal further with what is happening in my riding. On January 3 there were seven explosive workers who worked on a contract in Fernie. The contract was in a special area of work. The Kaiser resource employees took a strike vote and went on strike January 3. Even though these seven explosive workers were not part of that contract, they were laid off. They received notification from their employer that they were being laid off because of a strike.

These workers applied for unemployment insurance. After driving 100 miles to apply and then back home, they were told they did not qualify and must therefore appear before a court of revision, although a court of revision had been held prior to that on a similar claim that year. The unanimous decision of that court of revision was that these employees would qualify and they were therefore paid.

The unique part of this is that of the seven employees, five were from British Columbia and two were from Alberta.

Therefore the five were heard in the province of British Columbia. It was the unanimous decision of that court of revision that they should be paid. The two who went to Alberta appeared before a board of referees. The Alberta decision was also unanimous that they should be paid.

Those seven employees are being subjected to something else. The Unemployment Insurance Commission is going to appeal that decision, taking it to a board of referees. Although this took place on January 3, those employees do not yet know when they will go before an umpire for a decision. This is a cowardly attitude on the part of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The situation in which these employees found themselves was unavoidable. They had no strike vote and no decision as to when they will return to work, yet they are compelled to go through this kind of procedure.

The decision of the umpire has not yet been finalized. However, if the decision is against those employees, it can be used in any similar incident. The employees do not have the resources to protect themselves. There are another 40 employees of Sawchuck Trucking involved in the same dispute. They, too, have been told they have to appear before a board of referees. After having been out since January 3, only half have been called in for the referee's decision and half are still waiting. They may have to go through the same procedure.

I think that before the minister and the government bring a bill into this House, they should clean up the act we now have. Let us begin to recognize the needs of these people. It is a tragedy that those who pay into the program have to wait for these kinds of decisions. The employee, the employer and the referees all agree, but they have to wait for the commission. That is very wrong. I agree with the process, but I disagree with what has happened in this case.

I wish to talk a bit about what we should be looking at in our unemployment insurance program. There are almost a million people unemployed, and we have an unemployment centre that does not have the true feeling of the people. That is of great concern. The attitude of the unemployment centre at this time is to try to deny the unemployed person the benefits, for which he has paid. It is time the Minister of Employment and Immigration called in the top union executives and business people to sit around the table and begin looking at where we are going in Canada today. What are we going to do about our problems? We have one million people unemployed. There are people not paying into the program. Possibly I should relate some of the revenue we are losing.

It is important to note in this connection that for every one job created in producing a resource, another six are created in processing it, and yet these are the jobs we export. Unemployment now costs us $5 billion annually in lost production of goods and services, $1 billion in federal tax revenues, $5 billion in unemployment insurance pay-outs. The pay-out for unemployment insurance in 1981-82 is estimated at $5.2 billion.

The minister comes in with a bill that will reduce the application date for part-time workers. The minister and the government should be ashamed with what is happening. The bank interest rate in Canada today has virtually closed down the housing industry in British Columbia. The lumber industry is almost at a standstill with regard to new development and so on. There are lay-offs in those industries. There is a need for housing yet we are paying out unemployment insurance—when the commission decides to do so. What are we doing?

I asked the minister about an Outreach program which would try to help some of these people. I travelled to Windsor with a delegation of our group and I saw some of the problems in the Windsor area, also. I witnessed the unification of that community in an effort to relieve some of those who are suffering because of lay-offs in the auto industry. If the minister does not realize the gravity of the situation, it is about time a delegation from his party began to travel the country to see at first hand what the needs of the people are.

I want to talk for a moment about the waiting period under the unemployment insurance regulations. Take the case of a man who has been working for a company and who is suddenly laid off. He is in serious trouble to begin with, but now he is confronted with a waiting period. It is as if a man found himself obliged to go to hospital only to be told he had to wait for two weeks for hospital benefits because he did not qualify for treatment. Assistance is needed right away.

In British Columbia, people come into my office in Cranbrook on an almost daily basis with grievances of this kind, and I am told to phone the social welfare office. I say to the minister that this is not a social problem, it is an employment problem, and we should be regarding it in that light. We should not be looking after people under social programs paid for by the taxpayers when the situation has clearly been brought about by a slowdown in industry.

I should like to refer to a communication dated June 26, 1980, which was sent to all members of Parliament by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Indeed, I should like to read it verbatim before commenting further. It states:

As you know, my portfolio embraces a number of important programs which are highly visible at the local level. Employment counselling, placement, unemployment insurance and immigrant settlement, to name but a few, are examples of the day to day services rendered in the community by officials of Employment and Immigration Canada.

The focal points for the delivery of these services are the local Canada Employment Centres—

In my area, it could be Cranbrook, or it could be Penticton, or it could be Terrace.

—and for immigration matters, the Canada Immigration Centres.

I would like to invite you and your staff to take full advantage of the expertise in the local offices of the commission when constituency needs arise in relation to any of the above programs. I am sure you will find the CEC and CIC managers to be knowledgeable, conscientious and responsive to the requirements of their clients.

While recommending that you bring constituency matters to the attention of my local office managers to better facilitate—

In Creston, which is about 65 miles away from Cranbrook, there is a suboffice, but the suboffice is only allowed to take in material and send it to the central office, and the central office sends it wherever it may be necessary. I believe that when there are problems of this magnitude it is the responsibility of the department to make sure there are staff who can attend to the needs of the people affected and give them the service to which they are entitled.

One of the main causes for complaint in my riding is the length of time taken to process claims. I believe responsibility rests squarely on the Government of Canada because the local offices do not have the staff to enable them to carry out the work which has to be done. I appeal to the minister to take a more serious view of the unemployment situation in Canada and to bring down a bill which will establish much better facilities than exist at the present time.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to share some of my thinking on this bill. To my mind it appears to be a chiselling bill from a chiselling government. It reminds me of the time I first became aware of some of the unfairness attached to unemployment insurance as it was first introduced, when I was growing up in the forties. I remember when my father paid into this program and then, when the time came for him to collect, he was not able to do so because of a technicality. Later he was a seasonal worker on construction and always he faced the question of whether or not he would have enough unemployment insurance stamps to enable him to collect insurance after he was laid off.

Unemployment insurance was not the icing on the cake for our family in those days. Rather, in times of unemployment it was our bread and butter. Thousands of workers across Canada and their families shared this reality. In my work with native Indian people on the north coast of British Columbia, I saw how important this same question was to seasonal fishermen and cannery workers. We have built the Canadian economy around the need for seasonal workers, but we have denied those workers all but a few crumbs from the table of Canada's plenty.

In 1971, with the passing of the Unemployment Insurance Act in its present form, we took a large step forward from the days back in 1940 when unemployment insurance was introduced for the first time. Unfortunately, 1971 was the high point. Since then the government's desire to provide a measure of economic security has been steadily weakened by a false set of priorities. Any commitment to economic justice has been over-shadowed by the cloud of unemployment which hangs over this country. Unemployment may not have been what the government wished for the Canadian people, but it is what the government has brought about as a result of its mismanagement of the economy.

The government has failed to deal with the need to provide jobs for Canadians. Instead, it has looked at the growing amount of money needed to finance the unemployment insurance fund and has found ways to chisel out of its commitments. Bill C-3 is only the latest in a depressing series of bills which have chiselled away at the 1971 program. The government goes backwards instead of forwards.

In his speech introducing the bill the minister said the amendment would lower the government's share of the cost of unemployment insurance. In 1979 the government's share of the cost amounted to 31 per cent. Under the new regulations it will drop to 20 per cent. The extra costs will be shifted on to the backs of employers and workers, a most regressive move. However, this allows the government to weasel out of its earlier commitment. We all know that unemployment insurance is expensive—too expensive to the tune of $5 billion a year.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[English]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—DEALING WITH GRIEVANCES OF RCMP OFFICERS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to express my appreciation to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) for being here tonight. He will remember that on May 30 he indicated to me that he hoped to bring in some legislation to deal with some of the inequities which presently affect members of the RCMP and that he might answer some questions about individual grievances.

I see that two of the outstanding grievances involving former members McCleery and Brunet have been dealt with. I am sorry to say that they have been dealt with in a very summary way because it appears that the Solicitor General did not even bother to intervene himself but turned it right back to the commissioner again. I would like to ask the minister tonight to explain his philosophy about his ministry and whether he is content to leave not just the management and control of the force to the commissioner but also the guidance and direction with which he, as minister, is charged under the act.

We do not have much time this evening to discuss the issues very fully, but I do want to take the opportunity to ask the minister if he will deal with another grievance which has been long outstanding, that of a member named Danch in Nova Scotia, whom one of his predecessors indicated he would view sympathetically in that the man won his case in the Federal Court but was left with a fairly large legal bill which neither he nor his solicitor has been able to persuade the government to pay.

There are also grievances which are not long-standing, but they are current, and one might say they are pending. I was disappointed that the Solicitor General did not answer my letter which I wrote to him over a month ago involving a man named Robert McGarry, an informer of the force. I explained to the minister that I thought it was something he should look at personally, and I gave him some names. I am reminded of the time when I wrote to a former solicitor general about Warren Hart. I got no answer then either until I raised the matter in the House of Commons, so I reluctantly ask the minister tonight, would he please—and I will put it on the record—interview some of the people about whom I told him in my letter of May 22, to see what the situation is?

It appears to me—I may be wrong, and only a proper investigation can tell—that this man McGarry has been subjected to extreme pressures by one or more members of the force and perhaps has been asked to perjure himself in the process. Some of the spin-offs are going to be before the criminal courts. I do not want to be too specific, but I do ask the minister again to look into the matter and to interview people like Superintendent Yelle and Inspector Boivin. I have reason to believe he would get good, reliable information from Sargeant Gilles Boudreau and Corporal Mineault. I also ask him that these men be given every courtesy and not in any way be discriminated against or affected because of circumstances which may or may not exist here.

It seems that every time that one brings out a grievance—and there are many involving someone in the force—that there are unfortunate repercussions, and I hope the minister will be able to confirm tonight, speaking of that, that the matter involving the Association of 17 Divisions is not controversial any more and that members of the force are perfectly free to talk about it and to be active in it, because the minister well knows that it has been four years since the Marin commission of inquiry recommended certain changes, and to this date nothing significant has been done.

I take the minister at his word that he will do something before the summer, if at all possible, to bring in some changes.

This brings me to the last point, which I think is very important, because this is something which ought to be a high profile matter of concern to the Solicitor General. I will refer him to an article by Nick Auf der Maur in the Montreal Gazette of Wednesday, April 9, 1980, in which this columnist raises a point about one man, although he does not know the name of the corporal, whose name is James Wood, whom I have known for some years. This is the man who was widely credited with much of the good work which resulted in the expulsion of 11 Soviet spies not too long ago. This man has not been treated properly, and I think Nick Auf der Maur has summed it up fairly accurately, according to my knowledge of the matter. I will read briefly from his column, as follows:

● (2205)

It has been a little over two years since Jamieson and the RCMP justly and proudly revealed their coup. There has been no further word.

Meanwhile the agent who could be touted as a genuine Canadian hero ready to risk his life, has been languishing in Ottawa.

He has received no promotion, no bonus, not even a token little medal in recognition of his services.

There are rumours he is under heavy pressure to accept an RCMP transfer to oblivion. Why wasn't he given the hero treatment lavished on Ken Taylor? Why was he never given any credit, even in private, let alone in public? Why does the RCMP treat its heroes as suspects?

This is an extreme case. Corporal Wood does not feel comfortable going before the McDonald commission, without his own independent counsel. In the past the government has paid independent counsel's fees. They have paid the fees of Warren Hart's counsel. They have paid the fees for McCleery and Brunet's counsel, as well they should. They have paid counsel fees for one of the minister's predecessors, the Hon. J. P. Goyer, and I have no quarrel with that. But why do we have these instances where there is so much apparent injustice?

I am asking the Solicitor General to take seriously the powers that he has to guide and direct the force, not to interfere but to look into some of these things personally. It can be done, it is not difficult. By way of example, let me point out the case which you might remember, Mr. Speaker, of a lady who practically used to freeze herself to death outside the House of Commons for months looking for redress. It was possible to do something for her, not a great deal, but something to relieve her. You need not tell me that the minister cannot do these things if he wants to.

I hope my friend the Solicitor General will look into some of these grievances, and there are many of them, and that he will do something to identify with some of the rank and file, to use a labour expression in the force. I do not doubt his good will but I expect he is under enormous pressure from those people who are close to him, and I urge him to take a more humanitarian and direct interest in some of these cases. If he errs in judgment, he will only earn respect for it because, if he is not right, he will be on the side of right.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the spirit in which the hon. member made his remarks, and I want to assure him that I do move beyond what he tonight called a closed circle, or the upper echelons of the RCMP, in trying to make the right decision in exercising direction over the RCMP, because I recognize fully that it is my responsibility to provide direction to the RCMP under their statute. I am aware of my responsibilities, and I believe I do exercise them.

However, that is not to say that I necessarily agree with the positions that are put to me by a variety of people, including the hon. member. He mentioned and I have mentioned before, the long over due RCMP act based on the recommendation of the Marin commission. This commission reported four years ago, as the hon. member said, and, by rights, legislation should have been brought in immediately following reception of that report because it contained very good advice to the government, and it will definitely make many of the internal procedures of the RCMP more fair and equitable. I think that the best way for me to deal with some of the matters to which the hon. member has referred and called inequitable is to do my best to bring that legislation forward rapidly, and that is exactly what I intend to do.

I want to deal with some of the specific cases to which the hon. member referred. He referred to the cases of McCleery and Brunet and argued that I have done nothing. In fact I made the same decision as his own government did when they were in charge of the matter and when my predecessor, Allan Lawrence, was directing the RCMP, which was not do anything for Brunet and McCleery. That was the conscious decision which my precedessor made, I assume, and I have made the same decision. I made it after asking for legal advice from the law officers of the Crown about what options I had.

I learned that I could not directly reinstate an officer of the RCMP even if I had wanted to, but I did not have that authority. While the commissioner had the authority to do it, under those circumstances the legal opinion was that he could only do it if he felt, on review of the situation and of the past circumstances, that natural justice had been denied to the individuals concerned. I bluntly asked him that question in a formal way. I asked him to review the circumstances and, since he has the discretion, I asked him to let me know whether, in his view, natural justice had been denied to Brunet and McCleery. He informed me in due course that it had not, and therefore he was not prepared to take action. I have not been ignoring the matter. I have addressed it, and I decided to do what my predecessor did, which was not to take any action on their behalf.

I could refer as well to Danch, McGarry and the Association of 17 Divisions and the efforts that I made to establish good relations with the Div-Reps who are the recognized group through whom I operate in trying to deal with the concerns of the rank and file of the RCMP.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ALLEGED SUPPLY OF WEAPONS AND EXPLOSIVES TO NATIVE COMMUNITY IN B.C.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself briefly with the remarks of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) who has been doing an excellent job in this House for some years now in raising concerns about the questions of discipline and the lack of natural justice in the disciplinary process of the RCMP. I assure the hon. member for Central Nova that we in this party fully support the efforts which have been made and will continue to be made to bring some natural justice to this process.

My remarks tonight are a follow-up to questions I raised with the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) on May 26 concerning the report of the McDonald commission. I should say that since my question on that date the commission itself has made a ruling which certainly affects substantially the question I asked and, indeed, the answer the Solicitor General gave to my supplementary question.

The concern which we on this side of the House have in dealing with the McDonald commission report is that there was a series of allegations made throughout the course of the hearings of the McDonald commission. Some of those allegations were made in private, behind closed doors, and others were in the public eye about wrong doing. That doing consisted of any number of criminal activities. It included forgery, theft, illegal opening of mail, violations of the Income Tax Act, arson, impersonation, breaking and entry, and a number of other similar offences.

In addition we are quite frankly concerned about the level of knowledge of the political masters of the RCMP before and during this particular period of time. We are concerned to know to what extent the political master of the RCMP at the time, the solicitor general, turned a blind eye to the illegal actions which were being taken by members of the RCMP. We are concerned to ensure that it will not just be members of the force at the junior levels against whom criminal charges are laid. If there has been evidence of illegalities, certainly criminal charges should be laid. But it is not only those persons who should carry the can, in effect. Indeed if there was knowledge and acquiescence on the part of their political masters, they too should accept responsibility and that responsibility should be carried out, where necessary, in the form of a sanction under the laws of this country.

The concern we have is that the evidence of wrongdoing, according to the commission, will not be made public. The evidence of individual actions of wrongdoing will not be made public. The legal conclusions which are drawn by the commission in examining evidence of wrongdoing will not be made public. The submissions on that question are to be made privately. The Solicitor General assured the House that, in particular, references to individuals in connection with various allegations will be made public. I certainly hope the Solicitor General intends to carry out this particular mandate.

The concern we have is that because of suggestions of involvement at some fairly senior levels on the part of former colleagues of the Solicitor General, it is not good enough to tell the House and people of Canada that this report on wrongdoings by the security service of the RCMP will be compiled, that the submissions with respect to individual wrongdoing will be kept secret, and then it will be up to the government of the day to decide what to do with those particular recommendations and, indeed, decide whether or not to make those recommendations public.

We have seen too many instances in the past of the disrespect on the part of the government and members of the government opposite for the law and for judges in this country. I need only refer to a few instances over the past several years. There was the Sky Shops affair involving influence peddling. There was a former public works minister who picked up the telephone and called a judge, when one of his colleagues was cited for contempt by that judge. I refer to Mr. Drury. Indeed, his colleague, Mr. Ouellet, was cited for contempt and convicted of contempt of court in the province of Quebec. Francis Fox was not convicted, but he was forced to resign because of an improper signature on a form with which he was involved in his past. John Munro picked up the telephone to call a judge on behalf of one of his constituents. He is the hon. member for Hamilton East. I see that my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), is looking around. I realize that I should be naming ridings instead of names, and I apologize for straying from that formality.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The concern that we have—and I hope to have an assurance from the minister on it—is that any evidence not only with respect to violations of criminal law but which might lead to disciplinary action on the part of the RCMP, and evidence which might point to acquiescence or to actual knowledge on the part of former solicitors general, will be made public.

My final point is that I would like to hear a comment from the Solicitor General with respect to the suggestion which I made in committee and in this House, that the full report of the McDonald commission be considered, if necessary—and, indeed, it would be necessary when dealing with certain aspects of the report—in an in-camera session of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in order that members of Parliament, on all sides of the House, may have an opportunity to provide input into the very important questions of the accountability of the RCMP and the political accountability of the people who govern the RCMP.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have been accused by the hon. member from time to time of hiding behind the McDonald commission and wanting to delay everything until the report is completed. Since that is the subject of tonight's question, I would remind the hon. member that before he came to this House his party was certainly as active as any other party in pressing that this commission be established, that it be given broad powers and that it not be limited in any way.

The commission was set up in response to that type of representation, which, as I say, came not from only his party. Now that it is established and taking a long time in doing its work—longer perhaps than anyone expected—but doing a very thorough job and demonstrating daily its independence—it is a luxury which only the opposition can have, to turn on the commission and argue that, without waiting for it to complete the job for which it was set up, we should begin to expect the Attorney General (Mr. Chrétien) and the attorneys general of the provinces to be laying charges.

Only the opposition can have it both ways and argue that an independent commission be set up, that it be given full powers, and then that it be ignored and overruled when the evidence which it may turn up from day to day suggests to the opposition that someone should be laying charges against someone. I am not taking that position, and neither is the government. We support the commission. We are complying with all it requests, we are appearing weekly before it in its hearings, and we are waiting, as the Attorney General of Canada has indicated, for its recommendations before deciding whether or not action should be taken and, if so, what action should be taken within the federal jurisdiction with respect to any unauthorized acts against our laws which are mentioned by the commission.

Of course our view does not apply to the provincial attorneys general. If they decide that they would like to conduct investigations and lay charges now, then that is within their jurisdiction. I would co-operate with them fully so that they could exercise their jurisdiction. However, when the McDonald commission made the decision to which the hon. member has referred, to hold hearings in camera in connection with individuals and their behaviour, I agree with that decision.

I think that the commission is demonstrating basic fairness and decency because, after all, hearings by the McDonald commission into this matter could be going on while the provincial attorneys general are laying charges and holding hearings. What could be more unfair to individuals than to be tried in two places and to be subject to examination before the McDonald commission in what the hon. member would like to be a public forum on the one hand, and on the other hand, if the hon. member's advice were taken by the attorneys general, an individual could be facing charges in another court on the very same day and at the very same time as he is appearing before the McDonald commission. I do not think the procedure he recommends is fair in any way to any of the individuals concerned, and I am surprised that he would seriously argue both those positions at the same time.

I have indicated that when the report of the McDonald commission is delivered to the government the recommendations which deal with individuals and findings which deal with individuals, will be referred to my colleague, the Attorney General. I shall recommend to him that all such findings be made public.

The hon. member has now asked, as he did when I appeared before the justice committee on estimates, that the entire report be made public or, if it is not made public, that it be brought before an in-camera meeting of the justice committee. That is an excellent suggestion, Mr. Speaker, which other people have also made, but whether the government could comply with that request will depend on the nature of the report.

POST OFFICE—DEPLORABLE MAIL CONDITIONS IN CALGARY—STEPS TO IMPROVE

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, on May 16 I presented a motion under Standing Order 43 asking the government to direct the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) to correct the deplorable postal conditions in Calgary North. The motion was not adopted.

On June 5 I asked the Postmaster General whether he would direct the Post Office to correct the problem in Calgary North which is not only deplorable but is inexcusable.

Calgary North is one of the fastest growing urban areas in Canada, but it has 4,000 homes without any type of mail delivery. Residents have to drive as far as ten miles in order to collect their mail, which most of them do at 7 a.m. The postal depot is closed at 3.30 p.m. Because it is a new area and usually both parents work, there is no other time they can pick up their mail.

I know of a case of senior citizens who moved into a retirement home and who will be compelled to move again because they do not have mail delivery and, of course, they cannot go out every day to collect it. Many of these people were not told there would be no mail delivery. They expected it, and are paying for it.

I know of another couple who moved to Calgary North from Montreal. They simply cannot believe the government would behave in this manner.

Businesses in my riding suffer tremendous pressure because of this situation. Just a week ago one couple wrote telling me that they were in some financial difficulty because of the problem. I know that the Post Office is doing the best it can, but there is extreme pressure at the depot and the mail cannot be handled there. It just sits there and sometimes people cannot get in every day to collect it.

In my question to the minister I referred to the ridiculous cost of all this. An analysis has shown that if all those people affected were to drive that ten miles every day the cost would be around $2 million per year. The Post Office has agreed that $200,000 per year would correct the situation. If we take that to the ridiculous, then on a national scale, with 200,000 homes in Canada without any type of mail delivery—70 per cent of which are in western Canada—it would equal approximately 2.5 million barrels of oil per year. So the Post Office itself could save approximately 50,000 barrels of oil per year, at a much lower cost to the taxpayer, if it established a proper postal service.

In Calgary North the averages are not national averages on mail delivery. Business is up 12 per cent over last year at the central postal station at the airport, and it was 12 per cent the year before. In Calgary the number of people who come to the various post offices is up 37 per cent. We have an average of 2,500 people moving to Calgary each month. In Calgary North we have an average of 200 homes going up per month. These people have nowhere else to go. They have to use this postal service, and yet they are paying for something which they do not have.

I asked the Postmaster General to do something about this. In his answer to me on June 5 he said that he is actively considering this. I am also in touch with the Post Office. I know where he sits on the matter. I know he has problems out there, and I will not make any more for him. Nevertheless, I must say to him that if he does not act soon, then I am prepared to stand up here and give him some facts which may not be so agreeable. I know where the Post Office is sitting on this question. I know where the problems are, but the people in the riding do not understand the problems of the Post Office. All they understand is that they are paying for a service which they are not getting.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to answer the hon. member on behalf of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). The Postmaster General has noted that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright) has raised by question, motion, and now in adjournment debate, the problem of letter carrier extensions for his constituents. It is a problem that the Postmaster General is quite aware of, and I understand the Postmaster General told the hon. member last week in the House that this matter has been preoccupying him and is under constant discussion.

I am sure he knows, and I am glad to note the fact that he is not going to add to the department's problems in dealing with Calgary, that the problem is a direct result of the tremendous growth in the Calgary area. An average of 2,000 people are arriving in Calgary each month and mail service must be provided to match such unprecedented growth. The number of points of call for letter carrier delivery has already exceeded by 255 the figure projected for March 31, 1981, in last year's business plans. The obvious solution is to increase the staff of the Post Office and add more letter carriers, but Canada Post has been called upon by both Conservative and Liberal governments in the past two or three years to do the opposite, in other words, to reduce person years. The effect of this person-year restraint is to achieve and maintain zero growth for letter carrier person years. I would ask the hon. member to keep in mind the government's restraint program which the hon. member's party also followed while it was in office.

The Post Office has not been idle in coping with the expansion in Calgary, however, and people without home delivery have been coming to the post office for regular pick up. At last count there were 3,403 customers calling for their mail, 1,000 of them at one depot alone. This adds to the work load of the counter personnel, and it has been brought to the attention of the Postmaster General that the crew at depot No. 10 now open its doors at 6.15 a.m. rather than 8 a.m. in order to accommodate their customers.

I might also tell the hon. member that the Post Office has been experiencing staffing problems with inside workers—but of a different nature. The post office has been experiencing problems in attracting and maintaining workers. In fact there is a turnover rate of 65 per cent to 70 per cent in Calgary alone. The new collective agreement criticized by some, including some of the member's own party, as giving an excessive wage settlement, is what is needed to achieve stability in this sector according to the government.

Canada Post has several methods of getting the mail to the public. One of the most common methods is that of the individual picking up his mail from a post office box in a small town post office, in his apartment building or in a large business complex. Another is by general delivery over the counter. Still another is by rural route delivery. In the cities, both business and residences have been provided with door to door service. While this method of delivery is relatively efficient in business areas, the cost per item of mail delivered in the residential areas is relatively high. It is significant to note that the milkman, the breadman and the dry cleaner have cut back or eliminated entirely daily service to residential areas. Obviously, they are faced with the same high costs.

I notice that my time for the answer is almost up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

NATIONAL UNITY

APPRECIATION OF ACHIEVEMENTS OF FATHERS OF CONFEDERATION—FAITH IN CANADA'S FUTURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing importance under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas Canada and Canadians in the course of the next year will focus their attention on a renewed constitution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead):

That the House of Commons of Canada, approaching its 113th year, place on record its deep appreciation of the achievements of the Fathers of Confederation, and with a united voice express its faith and confidence in the future of this great country, and that this act of faith in our future will lead to a renewed inspiration of the patriotic fervour of Canadians and afford a clear vision of our aspirations and ideals so that in this coming year from sea to sea, we may develop a robust Canadian spirit of renewed national unity.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

CALL FOR INFORMATION ON SALARIES OF ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency stemming from the arrogant refusal of the government—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cossitt: Perhaps you could wait until you hear it.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: —to reveal the salaries of over 2,000 order in council appointments, such refusal providing sharp contrast to the open disclosure policy of the previous Progressive Conservative government, and positions consisting mostly of awards to Liberal party sacred cows. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House expresses extreme condemnation of government action in hiding from the Canadian people what they are paying through their taxes in salaries for over 2,000 high-ranking public servants, which provides a complete mockery of the government's declaration of support for more freedom of information to the public; and, finally, this House requests the Prime Minister to reveal complete details immediately of all such salaries, and that the blocking of such information be no longer permitted by the undue influence and advice of such persons as Michael Pitfield, a servant and not the master of the Canadian people.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE DANGER OF RADIATION FROM U.S. EMISSIONS—GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of reports from Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, to the effect that the accident prone Three Mile Island nuclear power installation is to be vented of its contaminants into the atmosphere, perhaps as early as this weekend, and since the prevailing winds could carry this emission into Ontario and Canada's Atlantic region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs investigate these reports and, if they are accurate, demand a halt to this potentially dangerous practice until we can be assured that no Canadian man, woman or child is exposed to the dangers of radiation.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

ENTRY VISA REQUIREMENTS—CASE OF DR. MOROZ—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Ukrainian dissident, Valentyn Moroz, was detained by the immigration officials at Toronto international airport last weekend, causing him to miss speaking engagements in the city of Toronto. Dr. Moroz has entered Canada on 14 or 15 previous occasions without incident or delay. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House direct the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, who is also the minister responsible for communicating a better understanding of government actions and policies, to communicate with the Minister of Immigration to clarify entry visa requirements to avoid further delays and inconvenience to legitimate visitors to Canada and at least the equal treatment afforded Dr. Timothy Leary or Guiseppe Calamusa.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HARBOURS

IMPROVEMENTS TO LADNER HARBOUR—REQUEST CONSTRUCTION BEGIN IMMEDIATELY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the former Liberal government, in the 1979-80 blue book of estimates, committed itself to funding phase II of the Ladner harbour project in Ladner, British Columbia, and whereas the previous Progressive Conservative minister of fisheries recognized the urgency of completing this important project and directed his deputy minister to include Ladner in the 1980 small craft harbours program, yet the Department of Fisheries has failed to act on that directive, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans be directed to initiate construction of phase II of the Ladner harbour project immediately, in order to eliminate further inconvenience to the fishermen of Ladner due to the lack of adequate servicing at the present facility.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARKS CANADA

REMOVAL OF TIMBER AND TREES FROM RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In fact, this matter is so urgent that the northern district of the Union of Manitoba Municipalities passed resolutions concerning it.

In light of the fact that local residents recently came to the aid of Riding Mountain National Park, and due to the drought resulting in poor prospects for grain, beef or dairy production, and considering that a large number of trees left standing in the burnt-out area could be salvaged by local people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the Minister of the Environment, responsible for Parks Canada, take direct and immediate action by exercising his authority and allowing local residents to have access to the park and to carry out selective removal of timber and trees from burnt-out areas; and, furthermore, that the minister implement this program immediately in order for work to begin this year.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

Mr. Crosby: Excuse me, Madam Speaker; Halifax West is my constituency. This is interesting, in view of Your Honour's remarks the other day with respect to knowing all the members of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

OFFSHORE RESOURCES

FEDERAL CLAIM OF OWNERSHIP—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LEGAL OPINION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43. Ownership and control of offshore resources is vital to the development of Nova Scotia and other coastal provinces, but is now enmeshed in a legal wrangle involving federal and provincial claims.

• (1115)

In order to expedite settlement of matters in dispute, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House direct the Minister of Justice to table the legal opinion upon which the federal claim of ownership is based, so that the opinion can be assessed by the provinces.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SPORTS

DEFEAT OF MPs BY PARLIAMENTARY PRESS GALLERY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I rise to move what I consider a very tragic motion. It arises out of a very tragic occurrence on the Hill last Wednesday night, namely, for the second time in 12 years the parliamentary press gallery ball team clobbered the members of Parliament. In fact, they absolutely decimated and totally outclassed the members of Parliament.

Therefore, I want to move a motion which I moved two years ago, but to rearrange some of the words to make the motion more appropriate. I move, seconded by the nine other victims of last Wednesday night:

That this House instruct the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport to summon immediately all his top advisers from across the land for the purpose of devising a foolproof emergency program with the very difficult, but not impossible, objective of upgrading the fitness of the average 30-year old member of Parliament to that of the average 60-year old member of the parliamentary press gallery.

Madam Speaker: Oral questions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOYCOTT OF MOSCOW OLYMPIC GAMES—CARRYING OF OLYMPIC FLAG DURING OPENING CEREMONIES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns Canada's presumed boycott of the Olympic Games.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he will confirm for the House that the government and, indeed, the Prime Minister personally, approved a decision to send two young Canadians to Moscow with the Olympic flag, thereby creating a situation in which Canada would have to participate officially in the opening ceremonies of the Olympic Games, which is surely contradictory to the Olympic boycott.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, to the best of our knowledge there was no contact with anyone in government before the decision was made to send the two teenagers. The mayor of the city of Montreal, as the mayor of the host city of the 1976 Olympics, has the normal responsibility of handing over the Olympic flag to the new host city.

Mayor Drapeau's decision whether to go to Moscow or not was one which was entirely for him to make, and the government has not been involved in that decision. My department has had no contacts with the mayor in relation to the idea of sending two teenagers to carry the flag.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I asked whether or not the government had approved of the decision and the minister is now stating that it was in no way involved, which is contradictory to newspaper reports in which an official of the Department of External Affairs said that the decision was approved Wednesday. I presume, then, that the minister is saying there was no one from the Department of External Affairs involved and, indeed, no one from the Prime Minister's office involved in discussing this matter with Mayor Drapeau.

I would like to ask the minister if he is prepared to make that statement very explicitly. Second, I woud like to ask him if in the discussion which took place between the Prime Minister's office and Mayor Drapeau's office—which I am sure he will find out took place—any other suggestion was made as to how the flag could be taken to Moscow. For instance, was it suggested that the flag be delivered to the Soviet embassy here, in Moscow, or was it suggested that it be delivered personally to Lord Killanin?

An hon. Member: This is Ottawa.

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I have to assure the hon. member that this is Ottawa, not Moscow, so it could not be handed over "here, in Moscow" as she stated.

An hon. Member: We are not all perfect like you.

Mr. Regan: I am not aware of any permission being granted by the government in this regard. Canadians are free to travel abroad to any country which has diplomatic relations with Canada, as the hon. member knows better than I.

In relation to the question of the boycott, again the government's position was that the COA was requested to refuse the invitation for our athletes to go and participate. The question of whether the mayor decided to go—and apparently he has decided not to go—is a matter purely for the mayor to decide, and not a matter for this government. The question of what representatives he might choose to carry the Olympic flag is, again, a question for Mayor Drapeau to decide, and not for this government. I am unaware of any conversations involving a department of this government and the mayor as to who would be appropriate to carry the flag tomorrow.

• (1120)

Miss MacDonald: I will direct my supplementary question to the acting prime minister, who at least might be able to address the point that I am raising, and that is the contradiction of Canadians taking part in the official opening ceremony of the Olympic Games when at the same time the government says that we are boycotting the Olympic Games. That is the contradiction, and I want the government to face up to it.

What I want to know is whether or not there is a boycott; it is that simple. If Canadians take the flag and participate in the opening ceremonies of the Olympic Games, then surely we are not participating in a boycott in the same way that we are asking the farmers to participate in a boycott, or the businessmen or, indeed, the athletes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that indeed we are supporting the boycott. It has been declared to be our policy and the evidence of that is the fact that Canadian athletes, in terms of the government, have decided not to participate.

As the Minister of Labour has stated, I am not aware of conversations between any governmental officials and the mayor of Montreal. I will check into that, but I would suggest to the hon. lady that perhaps it is overkill to protest as vigorously as she has to the transmission of the flag in the way that is proposed.

TESTING BY FRANCE OF NEUTRON BOMB WARHEAD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the acting prime minister. It relates to international affairs and perhaps the potential of another boycott or at least severe sanctions.

Within the last 24 hours the government of France, normally a civilized country, a member of the western family of nations and a close ally of Canada, has gloatingly announced that it has perfected the capability of exploding a neutron bomb warhead, an announcement that could only be made after extensive field tests and extensive field explosions.

My question to the acting prime minister, is what exactly does the Government of Canada hope and expect to do in the face of such an announcement, especially when Canada is a signatory to the non-proliferation treaty, a signatory to the test ban treaty, and when Canada in many other ways has taken a belated lead against such a development as that?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have noticed the press reports to which the hon. member has referred in his question. Obviously, if they are confirmed to be true, the development is very serious indeed. The Prime Minister today, in Sweden, has stated that if these reports are held to be authentic, Canada indeed would be very much opposed and would protest vigorously against this policy of the French government.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I am not getting through to the acting prime Minister. I am not talking about the usual mild, obviously ineffectual, mealy-mouthed protests which come from this government in matters such as this.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lawrence: I am asking the acting prime minister, if he is not in a position today to make an announcement, will he give serious consideration to very real sanctions against the government of France? Some of us believe that this is a greater threat to the security and future of the world than even the Afghanistan invasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am not sure that the hon. member understands what he is saying when he is proposing at the present stage that Canada announce a policy of economic sanctions against France. I think he would want to consider that a little more carefully before he repeats it.

• (1125)

Mr. Lawrence: Not in this case.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INTEREST RATES—PRIME RATE OF CHARTERED BANKS HIGHER THAN BANK OF CANADA—EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister will know that the Bank of Canada rate is now 10.63 per cent. However, the prime rate charged by the chartered banks of Canada is almost a full two percentage points above that, in complete contrast to the situation which prevailed two years ago with a reflected drop in the chartered bank rate corresponding to the Bank of Canada rate.

Since this means the banks are making higher profits and are not passing on to the people of Canada the economic benefits which should come from a lower Bank of Canada rate, I should like to ask the minister what he is doing about this.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member direct his question to the Minister of Finance.

* * *

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES—DISPARITY BETWEEN CHARTERED BANKS AND BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I made the mistake of assuming that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was interested in what was happening to consumers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We will see if the Minister of Finance demonstrates any more concern. Since it is clear that the chartered banks are not now passing on to the people of Canada the benefits of the lower rate charged by the Bank of Canada, could the minister tell the House what the government plans to do about this extraordinary, unfortunate situation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member that the chartered banks have to take responsibility for their own conduct and will have to justify it before the hon. member and before the Canadian people. There is no power within the Government of Canada or within the Bank of Canada to dictate and establish interest rates by the banks or any other financial institution in Canada. I think he is as aware of that as I am.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the banks are not only doing that with the prime rate on the loans they pass out to their special customers. It could benefit the economy if they were passing on the lower rates, thereby stimulating the economy and producing more jobs. They are doing the same thing with mortgages, which remain a full two percentage points higher today than they were two years ago, when the Bank of Canada rate was approximately the same as it is today.

Would the Minister of Finance confirm this point? Is he saying that the Government of Canada does not plan to take any action to ensure that the economic benefits of the lower official Bank of Canada rate are passed on to the economy and home owners in Canada? Will he stand by and let the banks of Canada rip off the people of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada has been intensely concerned throughout the course of this year with the very high level of interest rates, beginning with the high level of the bank rate. As the hon. member knows, the bank rate has experienced a very significant drop from a high of more than 16 per cent to less than 11 per cent now. That is to be welcomed. Obviously, the rates in the economy to some extent will be influenced by the bank rate.

Mr. Broadbent: They have not been; that is the point.

Mr. MacEachen: But the hon. member will realize there is a certain lag between the action taken by the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks. The government is not indifferent to this situation: it will be monitored very carefully. At the present time it is not the intention of the government to seek legislation to establish rates for all financial institutions in Canada, which is what is implied by the hon. member's question.

• (1130)

INVASION OF THAILAND BY VIETNAM—CONDEMNATION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the acting prime minister and it stems from my proposed motion under Standing Order 43 of yesterday concerning the situation in Southeast Asia.

Will the acting prime minister indicate what instructions were carried by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in relation to his attendance at the ASEAN meeting in Kuala Lumpur, and will he say whether there will be a condemnation of this further incursion into another country in Southeast Asia by Vietnam?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not ready to tell the hon. member what detailed instructions have been given to the minister, or what instructions he has given himself, as to his conduct at the meeting. I will take the hon. member's question as notice and attempt to advise him later.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, when we consider that thousands of refugees who have escaped from Vietnamese atrocities in Kampuchea are now being threatened again as a result of these incursions into a neighbouring sovereign state, surely at this time the government should be prepared to stand up, be counted and say what it is prepared to do in the way of condemnation, and in support of Thailand. Is this government just going to sit here and do nothing? That is my question, Madam Speaker.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is very strong on words. He has used quite a number of words, with which I totally agree, in description of the present situation.

GRAIN

SHIPMENT OF GRAIN DELAYED BY WILDCAT STRIKE OF WEST COAST LONGSHOREMEN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have a question which perhaps should be directed to the Minister of Labour, but I think I should like to address it to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board in that it relates to the orderly movement of grain.

In view of the fact that one-third of the west coast longshoremen went out on a wildcat strike yesterday, immediately slowing down the movement of grain, and in view of the fact that farmers cannot at this time tolerate any additional problems associated with difficulties resulting from inclement weather and the high cost of production, is the minister aware of the situation and what is he going to do about it?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Yes, Madam Speaker, I was made aware of that situation this morning, but details were very few. I will become involved in this matter as soon as I can, to see whether something can be done from the point of view of the federal government.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, could we have the assurance of the minister that this will be done today, in that it is my understanding a two-day delay in taking action will result in the backing-up of grain on the west coast, creating problems in movement and increasing the cost of farm operations?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, within the limitations of my powers I will make sure that we become fully informed on that matter this afternoon.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SAFETY OF CERTAIN PESTICIDES—GENERIC AND TRADE NAMES OF CHEMICALS INVOLVED

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning the Industrial Biotest Laboratories' results and I wish to assure her that I, also, am not interested in unduly alarming Canadians. However, I am concerned that Canadians are not being told everything about the safety of certain pesticides.

The Saskatchewan minister for the environment is quoted as saying there was nothing substantially new in the letter he received from the minister. Could the minister inform the House if and when she will make public the generic names of the chemicals involved and the trade name of any product they might be found in, and will the minister assure us that the list of chemicals she released in her press release outlined exactly the same chemicals the United States government acknowledged are the ones under question?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not want to act as a scientific expert but it seems to me that if the hon. member, for safety purposes, is asking for the generic names of a specific series of 97 pesticides whose tests have not been validated and on which we are now working, he is jumping to conclusions, because it would involve many other products whose proportion of constituents is not the same. I am not quite sure whether his question is acceptable. The House will understand why I would want to check with my officials to see whether that specific aspect of his question is acceptable.

He has not given me enough information. He refers to a letter to a minister. I am constantly in communication with them. I do not remember such a letter. I will check. I hope I have answered his question, to wit what additional information can be added to the letter.

[English]

Mr. de Jong: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. In view of the extra concern, anxiety, money and time involved in allowing these chemicals on the Canadian market because we are dependent upon the results of laboratories which are foreign-owned, like IBT, will the minister assure us that she will impress upon her colleague in Treasury Board the need to approve the establishment in Canada of a public toxicology lab in order that Canadians will be assured that the chemicals they are using and eating are indeed safe, and in that way will not have to wait eight years before getting that assurance?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, that second question nurtures Canadian nationalism which exists everywhere. At times that is good, and at times it is bad. The hon. member's suggestion seems to me to be a dream. I am sorry to be that blunt and that frank, but we have a population of 22 million or 23 million, not 230 million. In any case when we can benefit from the exchange of information between countries, particularly the United States, instead of duplicating services, I am in favour of it, especially when it provides us with information we cannot obtain in our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INCREASE IN DISABILITY BENEFITS AND CORRESPONDING DECREASE IN PROVINCIAL SOCIAL ASSISTANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I also have a question addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has to do with the despicable practice on the part of some provincial governments, notably Ontario, whereby every time disability benefits under the Canada Pension Plan are increased, there is a corresponding decrease in provincial social assistance benefits, thus cancelling any possibility for the people affected to keep up with inflation.

Will the minister inform this House whether she intends to raise this matter forcefully with her provincial counterparts in order that this gross injustice is brought to an end?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I know of this unfortunate practice in several provinces. If my colleague refers to the $35 increase which will not be fully passed on, I can assure him that I think we have reached the point where we must put that matter on the agenda of the national conference on pensions so that it can be discussed in the open by all Canadians.

Unfortunately, this practice may become a deterrent in respect of future increases required to the GIS to take everyone out of the poverty level. As to those below 65, what happens when provinces unfortunately divert funds is that the lag, l'écart between people below 65 and over 65 is intolerable to Canadians.

AIR SAFETY

ENFORCEMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING AIRCRAFT AND PILOTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Dubin inquiry into air safety is being told practically on a daily basis that safeguards and information which could prevent air accidents are being ignored. As this situation has existed for years, will the minister now call for the resignation of his aeronautics director, Mr. Walter McLeish, and give us some assurance that corrective measures are being taken now, and will he assure us that he will not wait until next October for his department to enforce safety standards in respect of aircraft and pilots?

● (1140)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will not accommodate my hon. friend. Measures have been taken over a period of time to improve the safety control capacity of the department: for example, regional offices have been created in order to be closer to the scene of accidents, and things of this kind.

I answered the question in a more general tone the other day when I said that, of course, testimony is given to the Dubin commission. The judge has the responsibility to filter the material received and to bring forward recommendations. I think we have to wait until he does so before implementing any recommendations which he might make.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. In view of the serious charges being made at the inquiry, will the minister consider asking Mr. Justice Dubin to give an interim report? A number of years ago a directive went out from the aeronautical licence inspection branch of the department, not to enforce safety regulations because that might embarrass the minister. Is this directive still in force, and will the minister call for an interim report from the judge?

Mr. Pepin: It is not, Madam Speaker. It has often been said by my predecessors that this directive, as the hon. member termed it, is not to be implemented. This has been made very clear.

On the subject of the Dubin inquiry, I should like to emphasize the fact that it is not only a question of the number of inspectors. There are things that have to be changed in the law itself, there are things that have to be changed in the penalties that exist in the law, and there are things that have to be changed in the implementation of that law in terms for example of the court not being severe enough. It is a multifaceted problem. That is why I think it is desirable to wait for the Dubin report before taking action.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

SALARIES PAID TO ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTEES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the impending freedom of information legislation, and the government's supposed commitment to the policy of openness initiated by the Leader of the Opposition when he was prime minister, could the minister tell the House why salaries of senior public officials appointed by order in council are now to be kept so unspecific as to amount to keeping the public in the dark as to how much the salaries are that are being paid?

An hon. Member: We know what you make, Allan.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if I may reply to the question presented by the hon. member, I would tell him that when it came to my attention that this information on salary ranges had not been included in the lists, I undertook to ensure that in future when these salary ranges have been established as the result of a current review they will be included as part of the information.

INCLUSION IN LEGISLATION OF PROVISIONS FOR INFORMATION ON SALARIES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I take that as an undertaking by the acting prime minister, although he has not indicated why they were excluded in the first place.

May I ask the Secretary of State to assure the House that the proposed freedom of information bill which he is about to present to the House, or will present very shortly, will be so drafted that the information which the acting prime minister has said will become available will, in fact, be available under that bill?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, we are presently in the drafting stages of the information bill to which the hon. member refers. I believe that the hon. member will find, in that bill, that we are trying to be as open as possible and to make as much government information available to the public as is possible. In that sense, we have been to a great extent inspired by the bill introduced by the hon. member.

I hope he will await the tabling of the bill which, as I indicated before, I hope will be, at the very latest, in the last week of the sitting of this House. Anyway, I hope to table it before the House adjourns for the summer recess.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if we are that close to finality with respect to the drafting processes within cabinet—I asked the minister this question before, but he could not answer so precisely—could he tell the House today whether the bill contains provision for an independent judicial review of the decisions of ministers or others who withhold information?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I always heed the advice I receive from the hon. member. Just a week ago he advised me, in very strong terms, not to tell tales out of school. I would ask him, therefore, simply to wait for the bill to be tabled. I can assure him that there will be in the bill not only a commitment to freedom of information but a commitment to an independent form of review.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN CONSUL GENERAL IN NEW YORK

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs perhaps I could put my question to the acting minister, the Minister of National Defence. My question centres on Ken Taylor and it is a very simple one.

As it has been reported that there is a possible posting for Mr. Taylor as consul general in New York, would the minister indicate if this is under consideration? If so, why cannot it be announced without any further delay?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have great admiration for Mr. Taylor and what he has done in the name of Canada. As acting secretary of state for external affairs, I think I can tell the hon. member that there has been some discussion about this but no decision has yet been taken. I think Mr. Taylor is capable of going to New York or any other place suitable to his qualifications: he is a good man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, we certainly agree with the minister that Ken Taylor is a good man. In view of his immense good will in the United States, I will put my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for Trade.

Would the minister agree that if Mr. Taylor had a suitable appointment, say that of consul general in New York, it would have an immense bearing on some of the negotiations now taking place in the United States and, in particular, on the auto pact negotiations that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is now engaged in?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is very knowledgeable about the qualifications of Mr. Taylor. I think wherever Mr. Taylor is posted will be of benefit to Canada.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DANGER OF NUCLEAR WASTE DUMPED BY UNITED STATES—EFFECT ON CANADIAN WATERS

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment, but in his absence I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary. Is he aware that two nuclear waste dumps have been recently identified in New York state in the immediate vicinity of the Niagara River? If so, would he assure this House that steps are being taken by Environment Canada to ascertain whether the presence of such dumps poses a further threat to the water supply of Niagara on the Lake, in particular, and in general to the quality of life in my riding arising from possible air pollution from such dumps?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I am aware of the press reports on the existence of this second nuclear waste dump. Our officials are presently checking the accuracy of the reports. The information on the existence of this site comes to light now, I understand, as a result of the declassification in the United States yesterday of a report on the subject dated 1949.

The important question which this raises in so far as Canada's concerns are involved is the implications for water quality in the Niagara area and, in particular, the implications this information may have for two agreements between Canada and the United States, namely, the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement and the Boundary Waters Treaty. We have these matters under advisement.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

METHANOL SPILL IN WINNIPEG—CALL FOR CTC INQUIRY

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On Easter Sunday, April 6, a methanol spill occurred in the CPR yards in Winnipeg. This spill, along with similar spills in Mississauga and Macgregor, Manitoba, has raised serious questions about the continued safety of all residents of Winnipeg.

Given the impossibility of evacuating the whole of the city of Winnipeg, and the call on June 4 by Winnipeg city council for a Canadian Transport Commission formal inquiry, will the minister direct the CTC to hold an inquiry, with full subpoena powers, so as to ensure the continued safety of the people of Winnipeg?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the CTC has inquired about this spill. I shall make sure that my hon. friend receives a copy of their views as soon as I get them myself.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, I hope the minister will make that inquiry soon. Not only the safety of the residents of the city of Winnipeg is at issue, but there is also the question of the social and economic conditions of that city.

● (1150)

I would like to know, by way of a supplementary question, whether the minister would be willing to make a commitment to railway relocation in Winnipeg, which would remove the safety question, by way of dollars so that the DREE funds for revitalization in that city are not wasted.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, this decision has been made as far as the Department of Transport is concerned. We are providing for grade adjustments in Winnipeg by way of the Urban Transportation Assistance Program. The value of our contribution is in excess of $7 million.

HOG PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR SUBSIDIES ON PIGLETS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Some time ago the minister announced certain subsidies to provide financial assistance to hog producers who are currently experiencing difficulties.

Now, according to certain representations which were made to me, I am informed that one category, also nicknamed the "nurseries"—that is, piglet producers—seems to have been forgotten by the minister in his generous initiative. Could the minister tell the House whether he is examining the situation of these piglet producers and whether he intends eventually and as soon as possible to announce adequate subsidies for that category of producers as well?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I say to the hon. member through you that many people have made representations along the same lines the hon. member is making at the present time. These have come from both sides of the House and from all parts of Canada where piglet producers are operating. We had meetings as recently as two weeks ago with some of them because they have no over-all, national organization. We are putting a submission together which I hope will be considered in the next few days.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In order for me to know just what to say to those who ask, would the minister tell us whether these producers will be helped eventually or whether we will have to tell them that the government is not prepared to do that?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, under the Stabilization Act the finished pork product is named, so by law you have to make a stabilization payment. When the price is below the cost of production you use the five-year averaging plan. In the current year the input is costed, and you come up with a figure. We shall be spending on that program between $45 million and $50 million; that is for the finished product.

There is no such thing as a named product for the piglets, the weaner pigs that are produced by the people who are finishing the product. Therefore, those people are suffering terrible economic hardships: we know that, Madam Speaker. I have to put forward a new submission to cabinet for consideration. We are in the throes of doing that at the present time.

AIR TRANSPORT

DECISION ON TORONTO-HALIFAX ROUTE

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the Minister of Transport advise the House whether a decision has been made regarding the appeal to cabinet on the route between Toronto and Halifax?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I know a number of members of the House want the answer to this question now. I can see some on the other side too. Yes, indeed a decision has been made. The gist of it is that Eastern Provincial Airways will fly direct, non-stop from Toronto to Halifax and return.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: EPA will abandon its direct Halifax to Montreal route, obviously maintaining other routes where there are intermediate points, such as Charlottetown, Fredericton and Saint John.

Canadian Pacific Airlines could fly non-stop from Montreal to Halifax and from other points, for example, Ottawa and Winnipeg. After long reflection and discussion on this matter, we think this is a compromise which is very much in the interest of all of Canada, particularly of the Atlantic region. In this way, the regional air carrier, namely, EPA, has a chance to demonstrate its capacity to serve adequately the Toronto-Halifax route and to strengthen itself also economically as a regional carrier. At the same time, the Atlantic provinces could receive travellers, particularly tourists from western Canada flying via CP Air.

Oral Questions

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF FREIGHT THROUGH METROPOLITAN TORONTO—DISCUSSIONS WITH M-TRAC

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. About two months ago I wrote to the Minister of Transport inquiring whether he would be prepared to meet with representatives of a new organization in Toronto called M-TRAC, which is the Metropolitan Toronto Railway Action Committee, with regard to their very real concerns about the movement of freight through metropolitan Toronto to non-metropolitan Toronto destinations.

I also raised this matter about a month ago by way of a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. To date, I have not received a response. Could the minister state today whether he is prepared to meet with representatives of M-TRAC; and, if so, when he would be able to do that?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I try as hard as I can, within a 27-hour day regime, to meet as many groups as I possibly can. I am sorry if I did not accommodate this one. I will see to it immediately.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, we are asking the minister to try just a little harder. Possibly he could answer his mail. Is the minister aware that chemicals are being shipped from Sarnia to points north and east of metropolitan Toronto and are being moved directly through residential areas of metropolitan Toronto.

In addition, is the minister aware that CP Rail is soliciting freight business from the Michigan area in the United States which is destined for the New England states but will be shipped through Canada, specifically through the residential areas of metropolitan Toronto? This is the reason for the concern of the residents of the area. I ask the minister whether he is aware of this and whether anything is being done about it.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am very much aware that many municipalities in Canada are concerned with the transportation of dangerous goods. It is a growing preoccupation in Canada. That is exactly why we have Bill C-18 presently in committee, to develop criteria to streamline the regulations on the subject and, in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities, to develop a much needed safety control system. The bill really begins to answer that concern which is obviously a growing one in the country.

AIR TRANSPORT

DECISION ON TORONTO-HALIFAX ROUTE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which is supplementary to a question asked concerning the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission. As I understood what the minister said in this House, Eastern Provincial Airways will be permitted to fly direct from Halifax to Toronto and return, and CP Air will not be in competition with them.

Will the minister, first of all, indicate when the full text of his decision will be available, and will he indicate when we can have it so that we can study it? Will he, at the same time, confirm the basics of the decision with respect to the Toronto-Halifax flight?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, a communique is available now. I will see to it that my hon. friend gets a copy of it.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, as a supplementary to the minister, I hope he will bear in mind that the reason for this horrible decision of the Canadian Transport Commission was, in the first place, confusion over regional air policy. I would like the minister to undertake, now, to review the regional air policy so that Crown agencies and commissions, such as the Canadian Transport Commission, will not make this kind of mistake in the future.

An hon. Member: Make it in the House.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, in my rather professorial approach to these questions, that review of policy has been going on.

An hon. Member: That is a terrible insult to professors.

Mr. Pepin: The decision is in accordance with that review. One of the main aspects of it has to do with the possibility of regional carriers serving an adjacent area. In this instance, the adjacent area is jumped one notch in order to include Toronto.

Mr. Lawrence: Why insult the academic community?

CITIZENSHIP ACT

SIGNATURES ON APPLICATIONS FOR CITIZENSHIP

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. I wonder if the minister will inquire into the practice under the Citizenship Act whereby Canadian residents applying for Canadian citizenship may be required to sign their applications in the script in use in their country of origin, not the script used prevalently in Canada.

Would he confirm which natives of which countries are required to sign in their original native script, or does this apply only to Chinese, whether they are of long residence in this country or of fairly short residence?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for drawing this concern to my attention. It is the first time it has been brought to my attention. I will be pleased to look into the matter for the hon. member and get back to him. The point is indeed an interesting one and probably well taken. I will be delighted to look into the matter further on his behalf.

Mr. Lambert: Will the minister indicate in his reply, whether it be by letter or in the House, at the earliest opportunity what rationale there is for the discrimination which exists against applicants of Chinese origin signing not only their application forms but also possibly signing their citizenship forms in Chinese script?

Mr. Fox: Yes, Madam Speaker. It is quite clear that we would not want to be in the position of discriminating against any Canadian citizens, whether new Canadian citizens or those who have been citizens of this country for a long time. Once again, I will be delighted to look into the matter, on behalf of the hon. member, in the spirit in which he has indicated.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF SUGAR—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF NO PROFITEERING BY SUGAR COMPANIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, giving him an opportunity to do something now for consumers. As the minister knows, the Agriculture Canada food price index came out yesterday, showing that food prices have increased by 2.3 per cent, May 15 to June 15. Sugar prices, in particular, went up by some 7 per cent, reflecting an increase of 200 per cent to 300 per cent over the last few months.

Can the minister assure the House that there has been no profiteering by sugar companies in this country, or can he tell the House that he is contemplating an investigation into the sugar companies of this country because of the tremendous price increases we have seen in the last few months?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): It is obvious, Madam Speaker, that in reply to the first part of the question, I cannot give that assurance.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: The minister replied in a very sugary way to the first part of my question, but he cannot give an assurance that there has not been profiteering by the sugar companies and speculators in this country, despite an increase of 200 per cent to 300 per cent in a few months.

In view of his admission, will the minister now consider launching an investigation into whether there has been some price-fixing or profiteering by sugar companies in this country? If he cannot give the assurance that there has not been profiteering, will he at least give us an assurance that he will launch an investigation to see whether there has been profiteering or price-fixing?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, of course we are aware of the recent sugar price increases. The officials of my department are watching the matter with the same traditional and proverbial interest.

BOYCOTT OF MOSCOW OLYMPIC GAMES—CARRYING OF OLYMPIC FLAG DURING OPENING CEREMONIES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to clarify the situation for the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I want to tell her that I have checked further into the situation and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was consulted in London about the intention to send two representatives with the flag, and he concurred in that proposal.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker. That, of course, is the question I was presenting initially. The minister responsible for sport said that there had been no communication. Therefore, it makes the point that I was raising all the more relevant, namely whether the Prime Minister, when he was consulted, pointed out the very real contradiction in Canada's position in that now we are officially supporting a boycott, according to the Prime Minister and this government, but at the same time we have two Canadians officially taking part in the opening ceremonies of the Olympic Games. It does not seem that you can have it both ways. I wanted to know if the Prime Minister communicated with Mayor Drapeau when he was consulted about this decision.

DISPOSITION OF BILL C-36

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, further to consultations I had earlier today with the other House leaders, I am pleased to confirm that, with regard to Bill C-36 respecting the national anthem of Canada, we have come to an agreement pursuant to Standing Order 75A, in order to dispose of this legislation in a very short and specified length of time.

Therefore, pursuant to Standing Order 75A, I move:

That Bill C-36 go through each and every stage as follows and without interruption:

1. On second reading, after one spokesman per party has been heard;

2. In Committee of the Whole House, without debate, and with only one amendment pertaining to the coming into force of the said bill, such amendment being also passed without debate as proposed by the President of the Privy Council;

3. At the report stage and on third reading, without debate.

THE OFFICIAL REPORT

INCORRECT TRANSLATION OF HEADING RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF MINISTRY OF STATE FOR SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order related to the use of unacceptable terminology in Hansard. It has been brought to my attention by that eminent watchdog of Canadian Parliamentary practice and procedure, our former colleague in the other place, Eugene Forsey, that some unparliamentary, if not indeed unconstitutional, language has appeared in Hansard, not, we hope, as a means of marking the centenary of that publication in Canada.

It is my understanding, Madam Speaker, that Mr. Forsey has also communicated with you on this matter, but it seems to me that the matter is of such importance that there ought to be a record in Hansard of this serious transgression of the linguistic bounds that no Canadian Parliament can accept. In this way, hopefully, the error will not be repeated.

On April 24 of this year, and again on June 16 and 17, Hansard records an element of the day's proceedings in this manner at pages 368, 2153 and 2187 respectively:

Government Administration—Decree Respecting Establishment of Department of Social Development

This term was repeated in the index of each of the days in question. It is the word "decree" that exceeds the bounds, I contend, of parliamentary acceptability in English. What follows this heading deals with a proposed text of an order in council tabled in the House of Commons on April 21, at which time, as reported on page 206, incidentally, the term "decree" does not appear in the English version of Hansard. It is obvious that on the three or four occasions when the matter appeared as government business, it was an order in council that was at issue.

● (1210)

Having compared the English and French versions of Hansard in which this terminology occurs, I reach the conclusion that the English word "decree" has been employed as an all too obvious translation of the French word décret, because the original version was placed in French. Décréter may be an acceptable parliamentary word in the French language, but "decree" in English conjures up semantic vibrations which Mr. Forsey has said are altogether too reminiscent of imperial Rome and even imperial Russia.

Your Honour will permit me to reveal a bias at this point when I add that these sorts of vibrations connected with words such as "decree" are to be avoided at all costs when this present government is in power. This government needs no encouragement to proceed along those lines, and all the paraphernalia and baggage—as well as the terminology—of rule by divine right have got to be kept well beyond its reach.

Power, it has been said, does strange things to those who exercise it. It does even stranger things to those who exercise it for unusually prolonged periods of time; they get to like it and are prone to abuse it.

For this reason, if for no other, I urge that before the definitive version of Hansard recording the proceedings of the first session of Canada's Thirty-second Parliament is issued the offending term "decree" be expunged and replaced with the more acceptable English equivalent of décret, that is, "order in council".

A second matter related to this deserves comment. The so-called "decree"—or, as we now agree, I think, order in council—was said to deal with the establishment of a department of social development. It is clear, both from the form in which the order in council was drawn as well as from the discussion which centred around that particular order of business, that what was at issue was in fact the establishment of a ministry of state for social development, not a department, which is quite another matter. It is not a full operating department but a co-ordinating office.

I hope, therefore, having had earlier notice of this matter, that your Honour will ensure that the appropriate corrections appear in the definitive version of Hansard and in the index and, further, that your Honour will place an embargo on the use of the word "decree" in English as an acceptable translation of the word "décret" in French. Your Honour might even wish to rule that it be added to the list of unparliamentary expressions set out in section 320(2) of Beauchesne's fifth edition.

Madam Speaker: I do want to say to the hon. member that we have received this communication, and the fact that he is now raising this point of order is very helpful.

The matter, I want to tell him, is already in hand, and the Editor of Hansard is going to see that these changes are made in the bound volume of Hansard.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): There is no aspersion on the Editor of Hansard; I want to make that clear.

Madam Speaker: That point, too, is taken.

WESTERN CNR ROUTE

Question No. 51—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. R. A. Bandeen, President and Chief Executive Officer of the CNR, state on or about Thursday, March 27, 1980, that the entire western CNR route could be double-tracked by the end of the decade in accordance with traffic demands and, if so, what is the estimate of double-tracking to the extent mentioned by Mr. Bandeen?

2. Did the Minister of Transport state on Wednesday, March 26, 1980, that he had anticipated that the double-tracking proposal would be 975 kilometres in length and, if so, will this become government policy?

3. Was the minister quoted by the news media to the effect that 40 per cent of the CNR mainline from Winnipeg to Vancouver would be double-tracked by 1988 and, if so, is the minister stating government policy?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Within the context of remarks made at the press conference called by the Minister of Transport in Winnipeg on March 26, Mr. Bandeen referred to an earlier company statement on the subject of double-tracking by saying:

> "Speaking to WESTAC here just two weeks ago, Ron Lawless, president of CN Rail, said that the ultimate in capacity would be a transcontinental railway. Referring specifically to double-tracking west of Winnipeg, he (Lawless) said that if traffic growth continued as at present, this might be both necessary, in terms of volume, and justifiable due to increasing revenues, but that it's not likely to happen in the 1980s."

Mr. Bandeen said that traffic projections showed that the major growth will be primarily west of Edmonton. He described the various sections of double-tracking planned and said that by 1988 CN expects to have completed double-tracking between Edmonton and Valemount, a distance of 308 miles, and about 35 per cent to 50 per cent of the line between Valemount and Vancouver, representing a further 160-230 miles.

2 and 3. To be answered elsewhere.

Transport Canada advises as follows: 1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. (a) The minister stated on March 26, 1980, that: "The present outlook is that by 1988 nearly 40 per cent of CN's main line between Winnipeg and Vancouver will be double-tracked." However, the minister was reported as having stated at the press conference that "the percentage of double-tracking proposed represents about 975 kilometres (605 miles)".

(b) The minister also stated that: "To the extent that double-tracking was needed to ensure that an adequate level of capacity was provided to meet growing Western needs during the 1980s, the government would ensure that CN took the necessary steps and had the resources to do it."

3. The following, with respect to question 3, were quoted in the newspapers:

> "40 per cent of the Winnipeg-Vancouver line could be double-tracked by 1988."
> "CNR will double-track 40 per cent of its mainline between Winnipeg and Vancouver probably by 1988."
> "The railway will double-track at least 40 per cent of the line by 1988."
> "The railway already has realized that its plans to double-track up to 40 per cent of the Winnipeg-Vancouver run wasn't enough for expected demand by 1983 so that an increase over 40 per cent by then is inevitable."

PUBLIC SERVANTS WORKING IN HULL

Question No. 116 (Corrected)—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In each of the past six years, what was the total number of public servants working in the Hull, Quebec area?

2. What is the total at the present time?

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): 1. During the last six years, the number of public servants working in the Hull area (Quebec) was as follows:

December	1974:	3,988
	1975:	4,812
	1976:	5,341
	1977:	5,709
	1978:	14,511

2. In March, 1980, the number of employees working in the Hull area (Quebec) was 16,214.

NOTE: (1) The data reflect the number of employees on strength reported by departments and agencies in respect of which Treasury Board is the employer—Part I, Schedule I of the Public Service Staff Relations Act—and who are working in the greater Hull area defined at this date as comprising: Aylmer, Lucerne, Deschênes, Gatineau, Templeton Ouest, Village de Templeton, Pointe-Gatineau, Hull, Buckingham, Buckingham Sud-Est, Masson, Hull, Municipalité d'Hull Ouest, Pontiac, Eardly, Onslow Sud, Quyon, Val des Monts, Portland, Wakefield Est, Perkins, La Pêche, Municipalité de Wakefield, Village de Wakefield, Ste Cécile de Masham and Masham Nord.

(2) Reason for the corrected reply: The Treasury Board Secretariat obtains its data from a central information system. At the time the first reply was prepared the change of work location from Ottawa to Hull had not been reported for 2,000 employees for the period March 19-December 31, 1979 and for 392 employees in January, 1980.

NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 149—Mr. Cossitt:

What is a list of all grants made under the Neighbourhood Improvement Programme since October 31, 1972 up to the date that this question is answered, that was given to municipalities within the former Constituency of Leeds and the present constituency of Leeds-Grenville and what was the total amount granted under the program?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: federal contributions to municipalities in the former constituency of Leeds and the present constituency of Leeds-Grenville are as follows:

Constituency	Municipality	Contribution Amount	Year Committed
Leeds	Perth	$ 400,000	1977
Leeds-Grenville	Brockville	2,122,026	1974,1975, 1976 and 1977 (for 4 NIP areas)
	Gananoque	200,000	1976
	Prescott	1,125,750	1976
	Total	$ 3,847,776

Federal contributions under NIP were committed only between June, 1973 and March 31, 1978, the expiry date of the program. On a national scale during the same period the federal contributions committed total $199.3 million.

RCMP—COST OF OPERATIONS

Question No. 304—Mr. Herbert:

1. During each of the past five years, what amount was charged to the province of (a) British Columbia (b) Alberta (c) Manitoba (d) Saskatchewan (e) New Brunswick (f) Nova Scotia (g) Newfoundland (h) Prince Edward Island for the operation of the RCMP within the province?

2. What is the estimated additional cost to the government of maintaining the RCMP for federal responsibilities in the event that no future police force sharing or cost-sharing agreement is possible with the province where an agreement is presently in force?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1.

2. None.

CMHC EMPLOYEES

Question No. 323—Mr. Herbert:

How many (a) permanent (b) other employees were on the payroll of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as at March 31, 1979?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised as follows by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation: CMHC had (a) 3,393 permanent employees and (b) 455 contract employees on the payroll as at March 31, 1979.

DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Question No. 609—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has no lawyers on its staff. Lawyers assigned to the department (13) are employees of the Department of Justice.

MILK IN NEW FORM

Question No. 772—Mr. Cossitt:

To the knowledge of the government, when will the new form of milk which does not require refrigeration and which will keep in sealed containers for at least six months be available to the general public and will the Department of Agriculture do anything to help promote the sale of such milk in order to assist the dairy industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Currently, the ultra high temperature (UHT) milk is produced in Quebec and Alberta and distributed in Newfoundland and British Columbia.

In the near future, it will be produced and distributed in Ontario and, later this year, production will commence in British Columbia.

Agriculture Canada has helped to promote its production by providing technical expertise in the evaluation of applications for DREE grants for production facilities and by supplying the trade and public with information relating to the new product.

CANADIAN EMBASSY IN TOKYO

Question No. 805—Mr. Clarke:

Has the Department of External Affairs undertaken any construction during the past three fiscal years at the Canadian Embassy in Tokyo and, if so (a) for what purpose (b) at what cost (c) is the construction completed at present?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Department of External Affairs has not undertaken any construction during the last three fiscal years at the Canadian embassy in Tokyo.

QUEBEC IMMIGRATION OFFICIALS

Question No. 911—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is it necessary to have federal and provincial approval to admit to Canada, as an immigrant, the spouse of a Quebec resident?

2. In each of the past three years, how many such sponsorship undertakings has the Department of Employment and Immigration been unable to process because of a failure to obtain approval from the Government of Quebec?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. No. While the admission of an independent immigrant to Quebec requires approval from that province, the admission of a spouse, i.e. member of the family class, does not. This approach is consistent with the federal government's commitment to family reunification which is one of the objectives of the Immigration Act.

2. N/A.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 148 could be made an order for return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 148 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL ANTHEM ACT

DESIGNATION OF WORDS AND MUSIC OF "O CANADA"

On the order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture of Bill C-26, an act respecting the national anthem of Canada—the Secretary of State.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in accordance with the order of the House, the motion previously passed will have to be amended so that the bill can be referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-36, respecting the national anthem of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a real honour for me today in this House to propose the second reading of the bill respecting the national anthem of Canada. I acknowledge that it is only through the unanimous consent of all parties that it is possible for us to proceed today to the consideration and, I hope, passage of the bill.

Madam Speaker, "O Canada" is considered by all Canadians as the national anthem of their country but it has never been proclaimed as such by Parliament. I therefore ask the House today to catch up with history and to grant legal status to a heartfelt tradition.

Before outlining the circumstances surrounding the writing of this anthem, I would like to go further back in history, to the origins of the word "Canada". Among the possible explanations of this name, one is that in the sixteenth century, the Indians extended a warm welcome to explorer Jacques Cartier with demonstrations of joy, repeating the Algonquian word "Cantata", which meant "Welcome". Another explanation, quite as plausible, is that our country has been named after the Spanish words "Aca nada", which mean "There is nothing there". The Spaniards at the time kept repeating those words while sailing up the St. Lawrence because they could not see any sign of wealth. The situation has changed somewhat since then, and time has probably come, four centuries later, to replace the term "Aca nada", meaning "There is nothing there", by the words "O Canada", which mean "Here, there is something, starting with tolerance and richness of the mind".

For every Canadian, Canada is a huge land whose outline is indefinable, whose centre is everywhere, a land already rich with traditions and still full of promises, a country blessed with human and material resources.

[English]

Sir Wilfrid Laurier expressed the same idea in the following terms:

To those who have life before them, let my prayer be this: Remember from this day forth never to look simply at the horizon as it may be limited by the limits of the province, but look abroad over all the continent.

In June, 1967, a joint committee of the House and Senate was formed and given a mandate to study the question of the national anthem of Canada. This committee issued its report in February, 1968, and unanimously recommended that the government immediately adopt "O Canada" as the national anthem of our country. The committee recommended that the slightly modified version of Judge Robert Stanley Weir's text and the original of Sir Adolphe Basile Routhier's French text be adopted together with the music of Calixa Lavallée. This is the recommended version that I have the honour to propose to the House of Commons today.

Madam Speaker, a number of members on both sides of the House have expressed concern over some of the wording of the version recommended unanimously by the 1968 joint committee of the House and Senate. The Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), members on this side of the House and, I am sure, on the other side of the House among all parties feel that some of the wording should be changed. Many would like to see the words "sons" and "native land" replaced—in the case of "native land" by the words "cherished land"—to better reflect the reality of Canada. I believe all members are sympathetic to these concerns. I would therefore like to assure hon. members that in the course of the next session the government would be more than willing to see the subject matter of a private member's bill on this question—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Or bills.

Mr. Fox: —or bills, as indicated by the House leader of the official opposition, referred to the appropriate committee of the House for consideration.

At this point I should like to go back in time to present a brief history of "O Canada", to recount briefly the story of its origin and development over the years. Because this subject is of direct, even personal interest to Canadians across the land, I believe many will want to trace the progress of the events which have led to the tabling of the proposal before us today.

Let us, first of all, journey back to the years shortly after confederation—back to the preparations for a great coming together in Quebec City in 1880 on the day of the feast of Saint-Jean-Baptiste. This was heralded, and rightly so, as a great occasion. The program included a grand banquet attended by the Governor General of the day, the Marquis of Lorne, and his wife, the Princess Louise. Not only was the occasion to involve the highest leaders of state and church but it was expected to attract visitors from the already sizeable French community in the United States as well as participants from many distant parts of Canada.

It would appear from the records that the committee arranging the convention had plans for commissioning a patriotic song to mark the occasion and a competition was to be held. The winning entry would make its debut on June 24, 1880. But time went by and the group responsible for finding a patriotic song realized that it was too late to launch the competition. This turn of events resulted in the involvement of Theodore Robitaille, Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He was a man who must have combined a good deal of perception and inventiveness. He took the matter of the patriotic song into his own hands and approached Calixa Lavallée, one of the leading musical figures of his day, who had received recognition both at home and abroad. Lavallée seems to have accepted the assignment eagerly; he had sketched out the music on paper within a week.

Next, Lieutenant-Governor Robitaille approached a judge of the Quebec Superior Court, Adolphe Basile Routhier, who was well known as an orator and man of letters. Mr. Justice Routhier met the challenge with enthusiasm and produced the French lyrics of "O Canada" which have reverberated unchanged for almost a full century.

And so the song "O Canada" had its "coming out", so to speak, during the banquet attended by the Governor General of Canada and by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. The now well-known anthem thrilled the audience when first played on June 24, 1880. Surprisingly, though, nothing much was heard of "O Canada" for more than 20 years. Then, for some unexplained reason, it surfaced again.

In 1915, the newspaper Le Devoir published an article by Mr. Arthur Letondal which read in part as follows:

One cannot introduce in the vocabulary a new word or impose a patriotic song on the people. There has to be the right timing, and a set of circumstances which can stir the national spirit and gain its favour. This song, which certain people held in the recesses of their memory, took another 20 years to surface. For what reason? We cannot say. What we do know is that around 1900, by some sort of mysterious agreement, the groups with whom we came to be associated, started a propaganda in favour of what we then called Lavallée's anthem. Our concerts and our ceremonies ended with this song and enthusiasm for it increased every day. Things were in motion. Some editions were then published with English words and were spread across the country, where its adoption is now a certainty and its popularity well recognized.

● (1230)

What we might call its first formal or official exposure in a purely English-speaking situation seems to have occurred at the military camp at Niagara in 1900 during a tattoo.

Five years later a Toronto company published the music with Sir Adolphe Basile Routhier's original French words and an English version by a Toronto physician, Dr. Thomas Bedford Richardson.

In fact, during those early years, a whole catalogue of English lyrics was proposed to accompany Lavallee's music. The height of this flurry of poetic activity was related to the 1908 celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of Quebec City. It was around that time that the English version by Judge Weir was written and it is this version that generations of Canadians have adopted as our national anthem.

To me the Hon. Stanley Weir is representative of the culture of this country: born and raised in Ontario, he obtained his higher education in Quebec. During his career he served both as minister and speaker of the Quebec legislature and also as a judge of the Exchequer court.

"Lavallee's splendid melody", was the way Stanley Weir spoke of the music. Weir's lyrics and Lavallee's music struck a responsive chord in the hearts of a rapidly expanding cross-section of English-speaking Canadians. By the time our country entered the First World War, "O Canada" had become our best known patriotic song, even surpassing "The Maple Leaf Forever" in popularity.

During the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation, in 1927, the committee co-ordinating the national celebration published the music together with the words of Stanley Weir and Sir Adolphe Routhier. Again in 1938, "O Canada" was published and distributed for use at public functions and in the schools on the occasion of the visit of Their Highnesses, King George VI and Queen Elizabeth.

The words of our national anthem, Madam Speaker, are important in both languages, and the bill before the House recognizes that importance. However, we know that an anthem is more than the sum total of its words. Does the feeling that grips us in the midst of a crowd as it starts to sing the national anthem stem only from the words? For my part, I feel it is rooted in a universal phenomenon: the manifestation of a need, as well as the will to belong to a group that is larger than the family cell or particular groups. It is also the manifestation of personal belief in values that are held as fundamental, such as our homes and our rights.

What is being asked of Parliament today is that it give a symbolic affirmation of national importance. Certain values are the very cornerstone of societies; they are expressed through signs and symbols that prove their everlastingness. The symbol doubtless does not give birth to the sense of belonging to a country, but it does contribute in no small measure to its collective demonstration and gives us a means of expressing very simply our shared beliefs and emotions.

The question of a Canadian identity lies at the centre of our debate. To some, it is but a myth. To others, it is an indisputable fact.

As I said, Madam Speaker, Canadians already consider "O Canada" their national anthem. By giving force of law to that fact through a unanimous vote, the House of Commons will show, unequivocally, that certain values stand above current dissensions and political allegiances. In so doing, the House will set the example by enshrining one of the most unifying realities of our young collective history, "O Canada".

Constitutional reform will probably keep us busy in the next few months by requiring us once again to go beyond our daily concerns, since while having to see to the difficult job of governing a vast country, we shall also have to meet the urgent need to redefine this country so that it may reflect a reality which is already more than 100 years old.

Madam Speaker, I believe that the greatest temptation would be to take Canada for granted, to suppose that this great ship berthed on three oceans has lowered anchor for all times, to consider our privileged situation in the world as owed to us, and to allow our immediate problems to take precedence over our ideals.

[English]

As the historian Arthur Lower wrote more than 30 years ago:

> In every generation Canadians have had to rework the miracle of their political existence. Canada has been created because there has existed within the hearts of its people, a determination to build for themselves an enduring home. Canada is a supreme act of faith.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, beyond the simplicity of the melody, and in the inspiration which carries it, the anthem "O Canada" can be for the majority of Canadians the symbolic confirmation of this determination.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before the minister sits down, I wonder if he would accept one question for clarification. In the course of his statement he referred to the commitment which the government has made to the effect that in the next session any private members' public bills having to do with the wording of "O Canada" would be permitted to go to a committee for study. That commitment, of course, was part of the agreement arrived at this morning by the House leaders.

This is my question for clarification: Is it clear that that applies to any and all private members' bills put down in the next session, whether or not they are among those that are drawn at the top of the list?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm to the hon. member that I agree with his suggestion that these bills be included whether or not they are in the first 50 to be tabled. We have no objection to the subject of these bills being referred to the appropriate committees for study and consideration.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, just so that the consent will be unanimous and silence will not be taken as a question, let me confirm that that was indeed the discussion we had, and I am delighted that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised the point.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank my leader, our House leader and then the members of our caucus for giving me, a relatively new member, the opportunity of being the speaker on behalf of my party in supporting this legislation. I should also like to congratulate the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) for his very fine remarks.

The national anthem is a matter that is very near to my heart, as I am sure all members realize. As I intimated before, I intended to raise the matter in the Thirty-first Parliament when I learned that all copyrights of the Routhier-Lavallée-Weir version of "O Canada" expired on January 4, 1980, and at last rested in the public domain.

I should like to ask how many countries in the world today have no official anthem. There are very few. However, we in this great nation of Canada are in that unique position. "O Canada" is not officially ours and the song that our children proudly sing in school is not official.

In this august chamber, 282 members are dedicated to the principle of national unity and many moving speeches have been dedicated to that end recently. I ask, is it not sensible to begin a new spirit of unity, a spirit of confederation, by officially embracing the national anthem "O Canada"?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stewart: On June 6 the Post Office Department issued a pair of commemorative stamps, the subjects of which were the music and stylized portraits of the composers of "O Canada". On each miniature pane was the message, "Issued to celebrate Canada Day 1980". Yet that anthem is still not official.

Can you picture the United States without the official "Star Spangled Banner"? Can you imagine the stirring "La Marseillaise" not being the official French anthem? We have "O Canada", a moving anthem in both languages but never recognized by Parliament in a statute. I believe this to be tantamount to sacrilege.

On May 23, 1980, during the debate on my private member's bill to designate "O Canada" as the national anthem of this land, the Secretary of State committed the government to the introduction of legislation which would accomplish this deed. Today this has come to pass. While the bill before us is not the same one I introduced as Bill C-220, I would hope hon. members might leave this chamber today with "O Canada' declared our official national anthem.

• (1240)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stewart: I have received many telephone calls and letters from people all across this nation who are astounded to learn that the Weir version of "O Canada", which has been in common usage in English for nearly 100 years, is not official. We as members of this House would be derelict in our duty if we do not leave this chamber today with "O Canada" enshrined as part of our country's heritage.

I must state categorically at the outset that I champion the complete English words of Weir which we all know by rote and of which we are so proud. I should like to add that the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) has his own opinion as to the word "native" which has been mentioned. I should like that to be in the record.

Also, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Gamble) is very keen on what was discussed by House leaders here today and the fact that the subject matter would be dealt with in private members' bills. I think the whole matter has been commendable and highly above board. I think we can all be proud of what is going on here today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stewart: Continuity with the familiar and well-loved words is essential. Tradition is more essential than quibbling over just a few words. We are all aware that there is not one national anthem which will satisfy all people, be it the sentiments, the words or the music.

The Weir version of "O Canada" is Canada's anthem in the hearts of Canadians. It has been sung and played too often in the past 100 years to be neglected. Using the Weir words would be by far the most realistic and simplistic approach, in my view. However, the government's Bill C-36 changes only nine of the original Weir version words. I hope the NDP members to my left will not be sanctimonious in their obstruction by being picayune in their interpretation of just a few words. I want it placed on record that the Conservative party is unanimous in its support that "O Canada" be declared our official national anthem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stewart: The French words and music remain the same. I think it apropos at this time to mention that Bill C-36 corresponds, as the minister of state pointed out, identically to the report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons of May 19, 1967. I might add that the committee held 12 meetings. It listened to many representative groups and perused more than 1,000 proposed lyrics. The unanimous recommendation of that committee was the version now before us as Bill C-36.

A nation's destiny is not in its learning or the amount of information it acquires; it is in its character. Mankind has found that feelings and convictions are conveyed more effectively in symbolic acts long understood and accepted, and that is "O Canada". A national anthem is the expression in words and music of the very essence of the patriotic fervour of a people. As eternal is the yearning for the peace in all civilized nations, it is perils confronted, the sufferings endured and the heroic sacrifices made in the time of war which intensify those feelings mankind from time immemorial has termed patriotism. Thus it is that almost all national anthems are martial songs.

Many national anthems began as popular songs which became favourites of the soldiers because their stirring rhythms made them ideal marching tunes, and suitable words were often added later. Other anthems are based on folk songs whose origins are lost in the mists of time. But not we Canadians; we went so far as to issue commemorative stamps on our supposed national anthem and its composers on June 6, 1980, long before the date of this bill, June 18. So I feel proud to have brought it to the attention of the government.

Rudyard Kipling stated:

> Take 'old of the wings of morning,
> And flop round the earth til you're dead;
> But you won't get away from the tune that they play.
> To the bloomin' old rag over'ead.

All these patriotic songs express feelings of deepest loyalty to the traditions, the ideals, the aspirations, to the very heart and soul of the lands in which they are sung. Such is "O Canada".

Custom and tradition are very real aspects of life but are hard to define precisely. Customs and traditions are living things. They reflect moral values and social conditions, and that is why "O Canada" must live. Custom may be said to be a long-established practice, an unwritten rule, dependent for its continued usage on long consent of society. Such is "O Canada". Tradition is the process of passing from one generation to another beliefs, feelings, codes of behaviour, a philosophy of life. Tradition is symbolism, for most people find it difficult to express spiritual and abstract ideas in a few words.

"O Canada" has its roots in the formation and development of this great nation. Its genesis goes back to the year 1880 when it was suggested that a competition be held for the composition of a national anthem. Some of the principals involved in the evolution of "O Canada" were Mr. Justice Routhier; the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, Dr. Theodore Robitaille; the famous French Canadian composer, Calixa Lavallee; music editor, Arthur Lavigne. It had its prime roots in French Canada. It was not until the turn of the century in 1908 that an English version composed by Robert Stanley Weir gradually came into use.

In 1924 the Association of Canadian Clubs endorsed Weir's version as a suitable anthem to be sung at all Canadian Club meetings. At the same time the Weir version was printed in many school readers in several provinces and was given official recognition by the federal and provincial governments on many important occasions. The Weir version was used to mark the fiftieth anniversary of confederation on July 1, 1917.

As stated previously, the words in my private member's bill were those in common usage in both English and French. In 1948, by order in council it became the anthem of Canada's Armed Forces, and they were required to salute it. Similarly, the Department of External Affairs provided that "O Canada" be afforded the recognition of the national anthem of Canada. Also as stated earlier, in 1967 the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons recommended that the government be authorized to adopt the music of "O Canada" as composed by Calixa Lavallee as the music for the national anthem.

The original Weir version would be best but let us not prevaricate. At the present time there are records and printed cards in both official languages. Probaby many members are aware of them; I have them here. I would urge, whatever happens to this bill in the new version we come out with or if it remains the same, by private member's bill, that cards and records be printed immediately and that by working with the department of education in each province they are placed in every school in the land. We could educate at the television level also. I would recommend the national anthem be played for one year following the date of its acceptance at the end of the CBC newscast, superimposing the words on the television screen. I recommend that we use this opportunity of a broadcast publicity campaign for national unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stewart: Canada's present has not arisen because of some strange miracle, as was pointed out across the floor as well, but because generations of men and women have been ready to stand for freedom, the rule of law, and to work with courage and dedication. Our hope must be that Canadians of today and of tomorrow will not forsake the idealism that inspired our forefathers and strengthened the purpose of the brave men and women who forged us a new country in a new world. The so-called old-fashioned virtues are as essential today as they ever were to the formation of a new generation worthy of our pride. Nothing can change the need in our national life for people who have industry, courage, charity, patriotism, loyalty and honour.

The designation of "O Canada" as our official national anthem will have symbolic significance and perhaps make a worth-while contribution to the cause of national unity. It may bring to all of us a deeper appreciation of our national heritage and a common feeling of national pride—pride in our forefathers, in their visions and indomitable courage; pride in a rich and generous land; pride in the growth and development of our country; pride in the Canadian people. Perhaps this pride can be expressed appropriately in the words of J. A. Ritchie when he said:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

Then is it strange that we should love
This land, our land, the best?

I would like members to zero in on the nine word changes and to think in terms of what happens in the House from then on. The original Weir version of "O Canada" reads as follows:

● (1250)

O Canada! Our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
O Canada, Glorious and free,
We stand on guard, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The version in Bill C-36 is as follows:

O Canada! Our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

This great nation needs and deserves an official national anthem. Whatever the decision is, we are looking at a change of only nine words. We are also looking at an enlightened group in this House, the members of which will discuss the subject matter in private members' bills. I take great pride in supporting Bill C-36.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in a few days Canadians will celebrate the anniversary of confederation. After 113 years, Canada still has no official national anthem. It is more than time, Mr. Speaker, for this House to adopt "O Canada" as our official anthem. For several generations, millions of Canadians have recognized the work of Calixa Lavallée in the national anthem. It would therefore be appropriate, Mr. Speaker, for us to do the same on the eve of Canada Day.

[English]

I therefore bring the views of my colleagues very much in support of the action the government has taken today, and I want in that context to compliment the hon. member, who has just spoken for the Conservative party, for his important initiative on the same subject. I fully support both actions and, indeed, the mandate expressed by all members of the House in the motion passed on May 21 calling for this action.

Canadians from coast to coast on Canada Day of this year will at long last be rising to sing the song as their official national anthem, a song which most of them thought for years already had been established as such. As I said a few minutes ago, it is an appropriate action to take at this time and is long overdue.

I want to say in this context that part of the understanding expressed by the minister in introducing the subject today is that a committee will be struck during the next session to deal with some important changes in the wording. I want to underline two of them only; the expression "our home and native land" is one the minister has already indicated is of concern to the government. We have to recognize the fact that, apart from the important original people of this land, the rest of us are immigrants in our ancestry, as well as many immigrants who will become Canadians before very long, all of whom, I think would appreciate terminology other than "our home and native land".

Secondly, in this period of the evolution, slowly but importantly, of equality between the sexes, the line in the song "all thy sons command" should clearly be changed, to remove the obvious masculine bias, in favour of some alternative.

Those are two concerns members in all parties have which can be dealt with by the committee to which the minister has referred. Other members will then have the opportunity to express their concern about other specific words.

I want to conclude my comments by indicating that however one may differ, and whatever suggestions might be made about changes in the wording, some of which are important, the main point to be recognized today is that at long last we in this land will have our own national anthem. I think it is symbolically important that the anthem happens to have been written by a Quebecker. Particularly at this point in our history that is worth noting and worth stressing. It is something all of us in our land, whether we are from Francophone heritage or not, should be proud of. It is a good day for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Francis in the chair.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On Clause 3—Public domain.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest the following amendment pursuant to the order of the House made earlier today.

[English]

Therefore, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton:

That Bill C-36 be amended by adding thereto, after clause 3 on page 1, the following:

"4. This act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation."

The Chairman: Hon. members have heard the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

● (1300)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be quite appropriate if at this time the House sang the national anthem.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: At this point hon. members stood and sang the national anthem.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At 1.02 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE AMOUNT OF SPECIAL DRAWING RIGHTS

The House resumed from Friday, June 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières that Bill C-5, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, the House had a wonderful hour between twelve o'clock and one o'clock p.m. today when all of us felt very good indeed in coming together in a moment of great symbolism for our country. This is excellent beginning to our celebration of July 1, the birthday of our country.

For the next little while in the House we will be plunged into the depths of the international financial arena. This is not as an emotional subject to be sure, but one that I submit is of importance to our country and to the role Canada plays in the important subject of world development.

As hon. members know, this debate was commenced on June 13 when the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) introduced Bill C-5 with a brief speech which I found acceptable and which, indeed, I support.

● (1410)

His speech was followed by that of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who made some observations on the use of the international monetary fund. He was speaking in his capacity as a former minister. At that time he said that, with regard to the whole subject of north-south dialogue, the hon. member for Edmonton South would be speaking later in the debate. Now, sir, we have arrived at that point.

It is very timely and instructive for us to consider that we are resuming our discussion on the amendments to the Bretton Woods Agreement Act following the Venice Summit last week. The Venice Summit issued a very important communiqué dealing with the whole subject of economic relations around the world. A section had to do with relations with developing countries, particularly their monetary problems. If we refer in this debate to the Venice Summit as a launching point, we bring very sharply into focus what this bill is asking us to do.

As I say, I support the general increase in quotas for IMF members. That is a good step toward the creation of a more stable world monetary system. I am buttressed in that comment when I read from the Venice communiqué issued earlier this week paragraph 28, which I now wish to put on record as it is central to the direction of this bill. What this bill is asking us to consider is very neatly conveyed to us in paragraph 28 which states, and I quote:

> Private lending will need to be supplemented by an expanded role for international institutions, especially the International Monetary Fund. We are committed to implementing the agreed increase in the IMF quotas and to supporting appropriate borrowing by the fund, if needed to meet financing requirements of its members. We encourage the IMF to seek ways in which it could, within its guidelines or conditionally, make it more attractive for countries with financing problems to use its resources. In particular, we support the IMF's examination of possible ways to reduce charges on credits to low-income developing countries. The IMF and the World Bank should work closely together in responding to these problems. We welcome the bank's innovative lending scheme for structural adjustment. We urge oil-exporting countries to increase their direct lending to countries with financial problems, thus reducing the strain on other recycling mechanisms.

That is the end of paragraph 28 of the Venice communiqué. I have put it on record so that all those assiduous readers of Hansard, whose number is legion, will know what the Venice seven said, since it is very difficult from following the Canadian media to know with precision what happened in Venice. Very little attention was given in the media in Canada to that section dealing with developing countries, and indeed the section I have just read is taken from The New York Times.

Along with the Venice Summit, there is another document I wish to refer to which puts our debate in very sharp focus, the Brandt report. It was compiled by a distinguished group of 18 leading world citizens headed by the former chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Nobel peace laureate. Following some two years study, they issued a report entitled "North-South, A Program for Survival". It is an extremely important report. One of its recommendations deals with the reform of the monetary system. The recommendation of the Brandt committee is as follows:

> A key element in international policies to increase monetary stability is to relate the distribution of Special Drawing Rights (SDRs) to the financial requirements of developing countries.

Our debate this afternoon could not come at a better time, not only in light of the Venice communiqué and the publication of the Brandt report, which the London Times has called "the book of the year". It has not yet received sufficient attention or notice in our country. It is a report now published as a book. For the information of the readers of Hansard, I will mention that it is published by the MIT Press, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Press, in paperback, for $5.95. In my judgment, it is the single best exposition of the global condition that we face today with respect to economic and social development. This subject is of central concern at the United Nations, which is going to hold a special session on development beginning August 25. This is the first special session of the United Nations on development since 1975.

Another reason for the timeliness of the debate is the proposed north-south summit which will bring together some 25 world leaders from northern and southern countries. Discussions are now going forward to bring these 25 world leaders together in 1981. That is a principal recommendation of Brandt.

The Summit of the western seven which just met in Venice will meet again next year in Canada. There is every indication that the north-south question will be central to the summit at which Canada will be host. This must be taken together with the creation of a parliamentary task force on north-south relations, one of the special task forces established by this House some time ago. When we put all that together, we see the urgency of Canada responding to the challenges that we face as we enter the next development decade, the 1980s. A round of global economic negotiations will begin following the special session of the United Nations general assembly on development.

From a bird's eye view, one can see the urgency of Canada formulating a position to be announced at the special session on how to break the north-south log jam that has developed over the last few years. I pay my compliments to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) who was a co-chairman of the forerunner to what will be north-south conferences throughout the 1980s, and a forerunner to the conference of economic co-operation otherwise known as the Paris conference of 1975-76. The Deputy Prime Minister was co-chairman along with his colleague from Venezuela. That was an important milestone in bringing together for high level discussions what can practically be done and where are the areas of priority. I will return in a moment or two to these special areas of priority.

With this sense of urgency I have outlined, I make my plea that Canada establish realistic, sensible policies with respect to food, energy, trade and monetary finance. Monetary finance is the centrepiece of the bill we are now debating. We have to consider the present state of the world. Why is this an urgent situation for Canada among its industrial partners, otherwise known as the north? Why is it important?

There again, if we look into the Brandt report we can see some very succinct summaries of the grave conditions which the world faces. In fact, Brandt says the world faces much greater dangers than at any time since the Second World War. The world economy is functioning so badly that it damages both immediate and long run interests of all nations. The problems of poverty and hunger are becoming more serious and, as we know, there are already some 800 million people living in extreme poverty and their numbers are rising. Shortages of grain and other foods are increasing the prospect of hunger and starvation.

We have also to consider that over the next few decades the addition of two billion people to the population of the world will cause much greater strain on the world's resources. The industrial capacity of the north is underused, causing high unemployment, while the south, that is to say, the developing nations, are in urgent need of goods which the north can produce. Rapid inflation, erratic exchange rates and unpredictable interventions by governments are seriously disrupting international trade and investment.

We have had discussions in the external affairs committee particularly on this subject from time to time. I must say in passing that I find it disgusting that the House of Commons so seldom debates questions of world economics bearing in mind the great importance of this subject. Nonetheless, we have an opportunity today to note that closing the gap between rich and poor is no longer just a matter of striving for social justice, though that goal is still paramount.

It is also essential to the continued development of the industrialized north. The north itself has more interest in common than is generally recognized, and this is what Brandt is trying to tell us. Energy, commodities and trade, food and agriculture, monetary solutions and inflation control, technological innovations, ground and space communications—these are some of the areas which are drawing us together whether or not we live in the industrial nations or in the developing nations.

I believe that what we have learned as we go into the third development decade is the need for a two-pronged approach in order to make progress in north-south relations, to ensure a better exchange of trade, a pace of development quicker than is presently taking place throughout Third World countries. There must be a renewed emphasis on basic human needs. That is the first element and that is where, in my view, official development systems programs administered by the Canadian International Development Agency have gone astray in the seventies.

I say this because the agency emphasized projects of a very large nature often to the neglect of the human needs of countries in great distress. Even at this moment, though we recognize there is great need today in countries like Zimbabwe, Uganda, Nicaragua and Kampuchea, the inflexibility of Canada's aid program prohibits us from dispatching money quickly to areas of great distress which the people of Canada would, I believe, be greatly concerned about assisting. For greater detail on this particular aspect, the inflexibility of Canada's aid program, I would draw the attention of hon. members to minutes of recent meetings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

In any event, the first element of the two-pronged approach is greater emphasis on basic human needs within our aid program. The second is the reform of international institutions. Improvements must be made in the trade and monetary systems of the world which were set up, in particular, at Bretton Woods. The bill we are debating today is to make amendments to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

We must understand that an approach by these two avenues is at the heart of a realistic response by Canada to the needs of developing nations and one which ought to be advanced at the special session on development. We now have a better understanding of development than we did in those earlier years and I am not overcritical of what Canada has done. Indeed, I have great respect for many of the programs which have been undertaken and for many of the people who have been involved. I have great respect for them, indeed. But, as I say, I believe we have reached a better understanding as a result of our experience and that it ought to be applied as we consider this bill and attempt to advance a better policy for the 1980s.

The goal of development is now clear. It is to lead to self-fulfilment and creative partnership in the use of a nation's productive forces and to full human potential. This means adopting strategies and emphasizing improvements in the quality of life, not just in GNP statistics. Scientific, technological and economic opportunities should be developed to allow a more humane and social economic order for all people.

That is a little of the background to our present situation. Now, Mr. Speaker, along with the better understanding of development which we now possess, along with an emphasis on this two-pronged approach, we must consider that there is a mutuality of interests. We must consider that it is in the interest of the northern countries to participate more vigorously in exchanges with developing nations. It is certainly in Canada's interests.

The Harvard Business Review recently reported that 34 of the 500 largest international companies are now based in developing countries. This gives us cause for thought. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we often think of Third World countries as aid clients where the situation is one of unrelieved gloom and despair. While we must not underestimate the amount of suffering which still prevails in many countries, nonetheless—I speak from my own experience at having visited many of these countries in Asia, in Africa and in South America—a process of industrial development is taking place which is of great interest to Canada.

So far, though, our economic links with developing countries remain weak. Only 8 per cent of Canadian exports, including those financed by the aid programs, go to the Third World, yet 37 per cent of United States exports go to developing countries, 45 per cent of Japan's and 18 per cent of the European Community's. Similarly, only 12 per cent of Canada's imports come from developing countries as compared with 35 per cent for the United States, 53 per cent for Japan and 20 per cent for the European Community.

The overriding importance of the influence of the United States on Canada's trade pattern is well known and it cannot be overlooked. There is, nonetheless, a great potential for expanding Canadian trade and economic links with the Third World. This is a point which is developed at great length in the 1978 study of the Economic Council entitled "For a Common Future—A Study of Canada's Relations with Developing Countries", in which we find advanced a very strong argument centred upon the fact that, if many foreign corporations are investing in the developing world, it is likely that Canada would suffer loss of markets and, consequently, of employment and profits if its firms do not do likewise. I quote, now, from the report:

> We believe that the benefits to Canada from direct investment in the developing countries by Canadian firms most often clearly outweigh the cost.

There has been the creation of some committees recently at the business level. The business community is showing some signs of increased attention and interest in relating, in joint ventures, to the needs of the developing countries on a commercial basis. I think that is a good thing because, as the business community becomes increasingly aware of the trade potential with those newly industrialized countries, and as the business community becomes more convinced that it is in its interest to relate to developing world markets in the way that the United States, Japan and the EEC are relating, that will help to give Canadian business a wider view. CIDA has an industrial program in which it is putting seed money into starter studies, feasibility studies and so forth. That is also a good move, but much more is needed if Canada is to reach its full potential in relating to those vast, vast markets which are at the point of opening up for our country.

I think Canada is well placed to assist developing nations in utilizing computers, satellite monitoring and genetics to improve the world's food supply, in adapting microelectronic technology and decentralized production so that new manufacturing techniques can be integrated into rural societies and in dividing limited resources between telecommunications and transport which would enable villages and small industries to derive more benefits from new developments in communications technology.

That is just a highlight of the things that can be done and are being done by other countries and to which Canada must relate. I would say, in short, that the Canadian private sector, with expertise, technology and capital at its disposal, has a vital role to play in international economic development.

In large measure development is management. It is the management of the development of people and social and economic systems within a country. The spread of management techniques can be a critical factor in determining the course of world development over the remainder of this century. A man who is very familiar to members of this House and who is a very distinguished citizen and one of the architects of the Brandt report, Mr. Shridath Ramphal, Secretary-General of the Commonwealth, said recently, and I quote: "There is a management role of massive proportions in shaping the kind of world that will greet the twenty-first century."

That brings me now to the essence of the Brandt proposals. I have said that I would like in the final moments I have here today to relate the Brandt recommendations to this larger framework of mutuality of north-south interest. We have to look at Brandt in a very sweeping way at this moment, but again I say that the depth of his studies and of his recommendations merits very close attention by hon. members. Of course, it is now being given close attention by the parliamentary task force, but I speak at this moment to those officials of the government who are in the process right now of drafting statements and policies and I ask them to consider a way by which Canada can make a realistic statement of intention on how we are going to relate to this program of priorities set out by Brandt.

First, the priority needs of the poorest: that is to say, a major initiative in favour of the poverty belts of Africa and Asia is needed. Then the abolition of hunger, with more systematic food production programs. Attention must be paid to commodities. The proposed common fund to stabilize prices of primary commodity exports at a remunerative level needs adequate support. Manufactures, trans-nationals, technology in mineral development are major themes which need to be given our attention.

A new approach to development finance: Because in Brandt's analysis there is such a tremendous sense of urgency in the program, he has come down to suggesting four emergency programs which we ought to consider seriously. We should give our immediate attention to them.

Let us try to cut through this immensely complicated subject which is full of what I often call magnificent abstractions. Let us try to cut through and recognize that there are four essential things that can be done. They can be started. Canada can take leadership in building bridge. Canada can take leadership in advancing these programs at the special session on development.

The first is resource transfers. A total of an extra $4 billion from donor countries—all the donor countries of the OECD—should be directed to the poorest countries and regions most seriously threatened by the current economic crisis and provision should be made for financing the deficits of middle income countries.

Second is energy. There should be an international energy strategy to ensure more secure supplies, more vigorous conservation, more predictable changes in prices and the posturing of the development of alternative sources of energy.

Third is a broad program of food production and agricultural development to overcome food deficits in poor countries and to ease inflationary pressures in the world food market.

The fourth emergency provision is an immediate start on broadening the base of international financial institutions. In the industrialized countries there should be greater access to the processed primary products from developing countries, and serious steps should be taken to stabilize commodity prices. In developing countries expanded food production, decreased inequalities, increased internal co-operation, efficient and equitable use of transferred financial resources and the encouragement of a positive international investment climate are needed.

In that fourth category of an emergency program which Brandt asks be advanced by the industrial countries immediately, we find this present bill this afternoon inserted because we are asked to consider the enlargement of our quota to the IMF. This stability that an enlarged IMF would obtain would not only help Canada with its international transactions but also would help the developing countries take advantage of prospects in world trade and investments. The increase in quotas is but one step in the reform of the monetary system that is needed.

What are some of the precise things that need to be done to make some improvements in the IMF? The Society for International Development, the largest private, non-governmental organization in the development field in the world, has recently considered this situation in some depth. What that society is recommending is that the existing international financial institutions and regional banks be considerably expanded by increasing their capital base. We are beginning to do that this afternoon with this bill, but their operational policies and structures should be thoroughly reviewed and reformed along with the expansion. In particular, the World Bank should increase its lending program from the current 2 per cent of the total to at least 10 per cent.

Second, the conditions of IMF loans should be intensively reviewed and revised in consultation with developing countries to ensure that an inappropriate and unfair burden of adjustments is not imposed on the developing countries in a short period of time.

Third, the voting structure and management of the Bretton Woods institutions should reflect much greater and more effective participation by developing countries in actual decision-making because, as we know, the Bretton Woods Agreements were set up in the late forties following World War II. Most of the countries which are now trying to develop their own economies were not countries at that time, they were colonies. They came to their political liberation throughout the fifties and sixties, and now we are faced with this international crisis in which countries do not have the financial or industrial capacity to meet the need for imports at high prices from the industrialized nations and cannot receive sufficient prices for the export of their primary commodities. I refer to those 18 principal primary commodities the prices of which are generally controlled by the consuming industrialized nations.

An accommodation must be made. That is the essence of the work of the United Nations, the Brandt report and of all those institutions that are now studying the heart of the economic condition of the world. It is sensible and practical to do that. I believe there is a very specific role for Canada to play. We have signed that Venice communiqué. I read paragraph 28 earlier. Canada is a signatory to that communiqué. I expect the Canadian government to live up to the implications of paragraph 28. I expect the Canadian government to take it seriously and not treat this in a rhetorical way. It is not rhetoric that is needed in the 1980s, it is not more studies and more analyses. It is some practical programs, and in my speech this afternoon I have given some specific suggestions with respect to the improvement of the International Monetary Fund in a way that will relate to the intent of this bill for enlargement of our quota.

● (1440)

I believe that Canada must give a signal to its partners in the OECD. The signals which we are now giving in which we see that ODA will be reduced to 0.37 per cent in the CIDA estimates for the year 1981-82, falling below 0.43 per cent, where it now is, when the international target is 0.7 per cent, are going in the wrong direction. I appeal to those who formulate policy in this country and I ask members in the House to think seriously about ways in which Canada must, realistically and sensibly, respond to the international crisis about which every informed observer today is becoming greatly concerned. We are not in a hopeless condition; in my view, the glass is half full, not half empty. But we must take some steps of a concrete nature to reform the international financial institutions in ways which will benefit both the north and the south, because when we do that, we will improve the economic and social condition for humanity as a whole.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy today to follow my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), on Bill C-5 which has to do with an amendment to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

I would like to begin by saying that this morning I was here in the House when we as the House of Commons adopted "O Canada" as our national anthem. It was a very historic moment in the sense that after 100 years we finally said we had a national anthem. When we stood as a group here to sing our anthem I felt that the way in which we sang it reflected what we are in Canada. It was almost humorous in the sense that people were singing different words, not just in French and English, which is the way the hymn is written, but using different words to our own national anthem.

I think in a sense the fact that members of Parliament were not sure of the words to their own national anthem is symbolic of the way we face the whole question of international development and what is happening around us in the world in general, because our national anthem is a symbol, and it is very important, to be certain what that symbol is, to know what we are.

When we move into the world of international life and, in particular, international development, we are often confused for various reasons. It is somewhat like the situation this morning when we did not all know the new words to our national anthem; but at other times it might simply be because the problem is so immense that we have forgotten how to look at it and how to be part of it.

As the former speaker has said, I feel that today is the appropriate and symbolic time to look seriously at what we are doing with regard to the rest of the world. We have finally put our own House in order so far as our national anthem is concerned, and now let us seriously look at the whole world and how people would view the situation of a country where not having a national anthem is a problem. They probably wish they had only the problem of not having a national anthem. Most people in the world could not even imagine a country which would have that as a problem.

Another point which I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, is that I believe it is symbolic that we are considering this question on a Friday afternoon. From the short experience I have had in the House of Commons, I would say that Friday afternoons are generally not considered to be prime time for discussing something of importance.

An hon. Member: It is if you have a prime speaker.

An hon. Member: Why not? Stanley is here.

Mr. Ogle: Generally, many of the folks have already gone home because they do not think Friday afternoon is that important a time to be here.

An hon. Member: Shame on all those members.

Mr. Ogle: The fact that this bill has been scheduled for a Friday afternoon when all those members have gone home is significant. So far as I know, it has always been scheduled for a Friday afternoon. In spite of the fact that this bill, which is of such profound importance to people all over the world, has again been scheduled for a Friday afternoon is saying something other than what the bill is saying, because symbolically this bill is a big bill. Bill C-5, or the amendment to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act reads:

> The Minister of Finance may provide for payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the International Monetary Fund in the manner and at the times provided for by the agreement therefor set out in the first schedule, of a sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole an amount equivalent to the subscription required from Canada, that is to say, two billion, thirty-five million, five hundred thousand Special Drawing Rights.

That is a lot of money when we realize that a special drawing right is now valued at about $1.20. The difference that this amendment makes, I have figured out from what was previously in the bill, amounts to $678,500,000. I think that is a lot of money to be talking about on a Friday afternoon.

What I am trying to say is that we should approach in a more serious way the question of poor people in the world. When I say serious, I do not mean only that we should play a greater role in the International Monetary Fund, but that we should look on the whole question of international development as an ultra important issue at this time in our life.

We are talking here about a bill that is an amendment to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. I expect that most members in the House have a knowledge of what the Bretton Woods Agreements Act is, but as I was coming to the House today and I told someone that I would be speaking on the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, he asked me: "What is the Bretton Woods Agreements Act? Is it a housing development?" It could be; that is what it sounds like. Another person smartly asked: "Maybe it is the name of a new movie star?" Well, that was not said maliciously, but I think names like Bretton Woods cover up many sins and it is important for us to understand this and to go back in history.

I should like to tell the House where the name Bretton Woods came from. During the Second World War people were facing a crisis of a magnitude never faced before. Those who believed that they were the winners before the war actually finished realized after the war that there was a great deal of destruction in Europe, Japan and other countries which had been enemies, destruction so great there was no possibility for the economic life which had stirred the world prior to the war to be recovered. In a little place called Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, people representing Canada, the United States, Britain and so forth came together to see how they would run the economic game of the world after the war was over and there was no more fighting. They realized it was going to be necessary somehow to rebuild the world which had been destroyed during the war.

From that meeting in 1944 at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, two ideas evolved. One was that there would be a world bank of some sort, a place where funds would be available for this rebuilding. At the same time it was decided there should be an International Monetary Fund to safeguard the funds and ensure they maintained value in one way or another, by adjustment around the world, in order that trading arrangements which had been made prior, and would be made later, could continue.

As a result of that meeting, following the total destruction of Europe, Japan and many other countries during the Second World War the world began to revolve again in an economic way. The Germans, Japanese and so on not only regained a level of economic and social security in the world but actually went further ahead.

Let me present a little story to illustrate what happened. The whole thing that began at the Bretton Woods meeting was not unlike a poker game. I am not a poker player—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ogle: —but I know there are some hon. members in this House who are and will be able to understand the situation better than myself. They will understand the idea I intend to propose.

Mr. Whelan: Is Stanley one? Are you a poker player, Stanley?

Mr. Ogle: My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) does not know what poker is, so I will explain it for the benefit of other hon. members who do not know. In a poker game each player starts with chips which represent wealth. As you start to play the game the chips begin to move from one player to another, depending upon luck, skill and a lot of other things—cheating maybe at times. In any event, the chips begin to move. Those who enter the game with the most chips, not always but almost always have the best chance to win. Those who enter the game with the least number of chips, or next to none, have the greatest chance of losing all, or at least of not being able to stay in the game very long.

After the Bretton Woods Agreements of 1944 there were certain players in the game who had a lot of chips. The United States had never been richer and it was able to put in a great quantity of chips. Canada put in an amount proportionate to its population. Other countries were able to put in only a very few.

I have heard there is a rule in poker that you never lend money to any player during the game because it is possible that individual could play you out of all your money in the end. In a sort of a way that same rule applied after the Bretton Woods arrangement. The countries which had to be loaned great quantities of money, Germany and Japan, did not lose the game but, as it turned out, became the winners. That was the result of many things. One of those aspects which had a great deal to do with this outcome was that those countries did not have to pay for armies any more and did not have to buy weapons, as they had been doing prior to that time.

As time went on and more players got into the game, or into the monetary fund arrangement—and there are now 138 players, I believe—many of them had very small stacks of chips. Those countries still have a very small stack of chips, and they do not have much chance to make any of the rules of the game. Because they are unable to do that their chances of winning are very small.

One of those countries is Turkey, a country which just recently ran out of chips. Jamaica also ran out of chips. Other countries have been in a bad position in relation to the International Monetary Fund in recent years, including Britain and France. Even Canada at one time not too long ago was looking at the idea of getting involved in the monetary fund, or taking a loan from the banker in the game, but the banker came in and decided we would have to play the game in a certain way.

One thing about the International Monetary Fund we have to remember is that when money goes into that fund the bankers, those in charge of the fund who work out of a big office in Washington, are responsible for how the money is to be used. The question I ask the government, and I support the idea as outlined by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton South, is: should we put more money into the bank as long as we can be assured that those funds will be used to help those who are in need? At this time I would like to come back to the very simple and basic question, and that is, what is the whole International Development Fund all about?

As far as I can see, the whole idea of international development basically means that every single human being on the face of the earth, no matter what age, sex, colour, religion, background, language, or whatever else distinguishes that individual as a human being, will be able to live in such a way that their individual dignity is maintained, just as the dignity of you and I and everybody in this House, Mr. Speaker, is maintained. The idea is that such a possibility will exist.

It is interesting that we should constantly remind ourselves that the poor, wherever they are, are not poor because they want to be poor. If you happen to be born in Somalia, Cambodia or in one of the Central American countries, and you look like this and you speak like this, being a little different from us, you are not in financial and social straits because you want to be but because, with the breaks of the so-called game I have been talking about, your particular part of the world did not reach the level of development where the human element was constantly considered. I believe this is something we have to take very seriously to heart as we look at the whole question in this bill before us today regarding the international monetary fund and how it will effect the lives of the poor people.

I think it is important that we look at this bill in the context of why it is so difficult for this to be a popular idea; popular in the sense that we are willing to try to solve the world's difficulties with will, desire, hope and joy. Why is that? Perhaps it is because the problem has become so great that we are very happy as Canadians to recall our own serious problems. I believe it is more difficult in this country of ours today to approach this problem than it was five years ago. Certainly it is more difficult than it was ten years ago. Perhaps I am afraid, perhaps other members are afraid, but generally people are afraid to face what is going on outside. I can understand that because it is a fearful idea.

I should like to relate another little story concerning how I see the particular situation that is happening in Canada. As Canadians we are one of the most privileged people on the face of the earth. It is simply a fact. It is partly due to our history and a lot of things with which we did not have anything to do.

Mr. Whelan: Partly it is due to the Liberal government.

Mr. Ogle: Very little of it is due to the Liberal government. However, our problems may be coming from that source. We live on one of the great parts of the world's surface. We have natural resources to no end in the ground, on top of the ground, and everywhere. There is still a small population related to our resources. People came to our country, brought great talents and all things necessary to put together a homogeneous group of people. Nevertheless, they cannot sing "O Canada" as a group very well.

We have a lot of privileges. I have never seen a single person die of starvation in this country. I have never seen a dead person as a result of starvation. There have been some, but I have never seen one. I have seen thousands of people dead from starvation in other parts of the world. They did not want to die like that. It was not their basic fault that they died like that. We have privileges, but somehow or other we have to relate to those people. As I said just a moment ago, I should like to relate just a little example.

The planet and all that is involved in its life is going at a speed which we have never experienced before. I will explain that in just a moment. Right now Canadians are something like a family inside a stateroom on a sinking ship. The family is arguing about who is going to sleep where, who is going to get up first and who is going to get breakfast. They are wondering about all the important things which keep a family alive. But outside the ship has hit an iceberg. It is the Titanic and it is on the way down, unless something drastic is done quickly. The only way this family will become aware of what is taking place outside is by opening the door to the stateroom. When they open the stateroom door, the room will fill with icy water and it will hurt. As long as we sort of keep the door closed, it is like saying to ourselves, "Let us not worry about what is going on out there". The former speaker referred to the Brandt report which dealt with a similar scenario. This is not just a story to talk about. The report indicated that now we are faced with a situation which requires a program for survival. It referred to not only the poor people but to all people on the face of the globe.

The sooner we can get our family affairs in order, the better. I appreciate the fact that the constitution is very important; I have no difficulty with that. It is equally important for the family to decide how it will live and work as a family. I would like to see this kind of thinking. I would like to see this kind of action taken as quickly as possible so that we can be part of the greater community. I believe our country has a great deal to offer to the greater community. We have more to offer than just the fact that we will take a bigger part in the International Monetary Fund because of the bill being discussed at this time. In order to put this into perspective, at this time in our Canadian history and of world history in general, drastic changes have taken place in the last ten or 20 years which have never taken place before. These changes demand some of the things recommended in the Brandt report.

I should like to relate another story. I realize that all the people in the world cannot get on one train, but let us imagine that all the people in the world are on a passenger train. The train is going down the track of history. Now, I know many people in this chamber have ridden on trains. Interestingly enough, a lot of young people today have never been on trains, but members of the chamber are old enough to have been on trains. When people travel on trains they are sitting, and the world is going past them as they pass by. As a rule they are comfortable, but if they go to the back of the train and look down what I would call history, they can see the tracks, ditches and telegraph lines. It is all there, it is perfect. It looks as if they are safe because they have come thus far. However, very few people see what is going on in front of the train. That is what I am trying to speak about today.

The front of the train is not like the back of the train. Up in front new components have been brought into the situation that were not there before. For instance, let us imagine that the train carrying the world population is coming to a bridge which has a series of pillars holding it up. None of us really understand the pillars completely, but they are very different from the tracks we have crossed. I never thought some of these pillars even existed 25 years ago, but now they have become the key pillars in the whole matter of holding up the train and giving the passengers the possibility to live as human beings.

One pillar which I did not even think about 25 years ago was that some natural resources would run out. Natural resources are one of the pillars holding up the track as the train passes over. It is not as solid as it was 25 years ago. Twenty-five years ago I never heard a single person speaking about the fact that there would be an energy crisis because we would run out of petroleum in my lifetime. They talked about 400 years, 500 years, unlimited quantities. But the pillar we did not even think about years ago has now become a key pillar to keep the train on the tracks. If we look at that energy pillar, at this particular time it is one that is keeping the poor poorer because they cannot afford energy as they could ten or 20 years ago. It is a new piece of track which must be crossed.

I should like to refer to another idea which is another pillar. I do not think I even heard the word "pollution" when I was in high school, but now it is used by grade one students. Pollution is what we leave around as garbage and trash in the air, on the ground, and in the water, which make up our planet. That is what we leave around as human beings, particularly if we continue to develop in the manner we have. We leave garbage and trash around to the extent that we are destroying the planet. That particular pillar will be crucial if our train is to get across. Anyone who has listened to the questions in the House concerning acid rain, the death of lakes, and atomic waste dumps, realizes that is another pillar that is necessary for us to cross.

Another real factor in the whole situation is the pillar of population. If my statistics are correct, Mr. Speaker, half the people who have ever lived on the planet will be alive in my lifetime. The third pillar is population. For centuries the population of this planet was stable and low, but suddenly it has spiralled. That is a pillar that reflects part of our expectation for the future.

Brandt indicates some other things in his program for survival that are essential to the whole question. Naturally, when discussing survival, he deals with food. This is an easy subject to discuss when one is satisfied and not hungry. I doubt if anyone in this House or in the gallery today is really hungry, and I am sure no one is starving, so it is very difficult to put into perspective the tremendous importance of the food pillar and the production of food.

Another pillar we have to cross with our train carrying the human population of the world is the transfer of resources — how to sustain life over there. How is this going to work in this poker game? Until now we have not been able to find a way to fix that pillar.

In the context of the Bretton Woods Agreements and the International Monetary Fund, we must find a way to build the final pillar so that not only will it bear just the first two or three coaches that go over, but so that all the people of the world will be able to cross that bridge to the future.

Until now most people have been afraid to look ahead. There is now a greater awareness of the future, I believe. It may have a very real impact upon us in ways that we may not want but will not be able to stop because of the interrelationship that now exists between all the peoples of the world.

This little book, "North-South, A Program for Survival", is published as a result of the findings of an independent commission chaired by Willy Brandt. Why was it not given another title? What does that title mean? It is not north-west or north-east. It is north-south. It is as if north-south were an impossible direction, as if you cannot move that way. Of course it does not mean that is the direction we are going, but rather it presents the idea that two sides have to get together that do not normally do so.

Where do these words come from? We get into the habit of using words and terms that do not mean anything to others, so I do not think it would be out of line to explain how these terms originated and how I believe they were addressed at the Venice Summit last week in a way that I do not think they have been addressed before by the international community.

The first thing to consider is the direction—east-west. Following the Second World War the term east-west came to mean the west, referring to the capitalistic countries of western Europe, the Americas, Japan and Australia, and the east, referring to the communist bloc, Russia, China and other iron curtain countries. Following World War II the confrontation that came at various levels of détente became known as east-west.

In the 30 or 35 years since World War II another movement of people was taking place. This was not because of a political affiliation to the capitalistic or communist systems, but came about because of differences between those who had and those who had not. In general those who had were part of the northern part of the globe, not always, of course, but in general those who had lived in the northern part of the globe; and in general, those who had not lived in the southern part of the globe. In the last ten years or so countries in the poor areas of the world, those that have not developed an economy sufficient to sustain them, became known as the south, and those in the area of the world that has goods became known as the north.

The new terminology that Willy Brandt has used in his dialogue refers to the new tension that exists between those who have and those who have not.

At the Summit in Venice last week the part of the meeting which dealt with international aid, international exchange and so on, was unfortunately not reported in the Canadian media, as far as I could see.

Last night I was informed by the president of the Canadian International Development Agency that after the committees had prepared the document and handed the work over to the leaders in Venice, the leaders wanted to add another paragraph. I believe that paragraph relates to what I have spoken about here—east-west, north-south. Apparently it indicates that this question of development is no longer a question of the rich west dealing with the underdeveloped countries. It indicates that planetary development will not happen now unless those countries that are also in the eastern bloc, and particularly those that belong to OPEC, are called to the table where international monetary questions are settled. We have to "disentangle" is the way I would put it, this confrontation, and make our priority a new kind of war on misery in the world community. That is not going to be easy, but it is a great step forward to bring the whole world community into that.

I should like to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that if we can put our heads together and consider the future of humankind, perhaps we could see to it that the funds now going into military hardware, some $450 billion per year directed to the destruction of people and countries, could instead be directed into a war against misery in the world. If we could do that, then this symbolic thing we are doing today of approving this exchange in the International Monetary Fund would show that we are ready to make the decisions that will save this planet for future generations of humankind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on second reading of Bill C-5, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) raised a number of points concerning the problem of recycling the OPEC countries' surplus dollars to oil importing countries having balance of payment deficits on a current basis. The following notes suggest elements of answer to the hon. gentleman.

One of the greatest challenges facing the international financial system in the near term is ensuring that burgeoning surpluses in OPEC countries will be used to finance without undue stresses the deficits in oil importing countries, especially the underdeveloped countries that are hardest hit. The latter are faced with a major deterioration of their current accounts, by reason not only of increased prices for their crude oil imports, but also a recent decrease in economic growth in industrialized nations.

In respect of difficulties experienced by underdeveloped countries—UDC—in financing their external deficits, Canada among industrialized nations supported the principles established in April at the meeting of the IMF interim committee in Hamburg, and more recently at the OECD ministerial council. Private financial institutions no doubt will still be playing a key role in the recycling process. However, in view of sizeable commitments by many banks and the difficulties experienced by some UDC to borrow on the markets because of their debt problems, international financial institutions such as the IMF and World Bank probably will have an increasing role to play.

These institutions will be in a position to make available to their member nations financial help that is both adequate and capable of promoting the adjustments that already appear necessary and inescapable. The ability of international financial institutions to meet theses challenges will have to be frequently reviewed. The quota increase that is now at the ratification stage, in Canada for instance through Bill C-5, will make a significant contribution.

It is also in that spirit that the IMF interim committee authorized the fund's general director to initiate discussions with countries with surpluses on the terms and conditions under which the fund could borrow to increase its liquidity, were the need to arise. These efforts may prove to be not entirely adequate in the case of a limited number of countries that could face extremely acute problems. In those cases, the international community might have to create temporary and special assistance mechanisms.

The situation of the poorer countries is particularly alarming because several of them have few opportunities to implement the readjustment policies required to restore balance to their external accounts. It should be mentioned that each increase in crude oil prices by OPEC strikes a serious blow to the economic viability of those poorer countries. The continuation of development programs, even at a reduced pace, will depend mostly on the privileged assistance efforts of the international community. Canada's assistance program is based on those needs and we have already increased the funds allotted to that group of countries. However, their problems will be solved only if OPEC countries with a surplus agree to increase the amounts allotted for public assistance to development or avoid sudden and repeated increases in oil prices.

In general, the problems I just mentioned clearly show that industrialized countries and oil producing countries should start a dialogue as soon as possible to try to bring a larger measure of common sense and direction to the present situation, as stated recently by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) before his OECD colleagues.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take very much time of the House, but listening to the presentations made by some members, I would be remiss if I did not say a few words.

I have just attended the World Food Council meeting in Arusha, Tanzania. I listened to representatives of some countries who were there bragging that they would have balanced budgets in 1981. This happened in East Africa where we know millions will starve to death this year. I do not know how Canada or any other country could say that we must have a balanced budget knowing full well that our duty is to our fellow man. No matter in what part of the world people live, our duty to them must come first and foremost. I was astounded when I heard some people mentioning balanced budgets. I was also alarmed when I heard representatives of some of the developing countries criticize the World Bank for its attitude on providing money for them. I reported this to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on my return to Canada.

I am happy that the Prime Minister of Canada has taken part in discussions just recently in Venice with other world leaders, offering his participation in a Summit meeting in accordance with the Brandt report. This will involve approximately 25 countries, including OPEC and other industrialized and developed countries of the world. I think this is an urgent matter which cannot wait any longer. I am proud that our Prime Minister has taken a stand on behalf of Canada, and the sooner we get on with that, the better.

However, I want to say that I saw something of a project which Canada, our government and my department of Agriculture, are sponsoring in Tanzania. We are showing young Africans how to become self-sufficient in food. Sure, it costs us some money, but these are people who need the technology and scientific information. I realize that we have need for some of these things in our own country. But we will be funding outside of the city of Arusha, $6 million for an agricultural scientific laboratory. We are spending millions of dollars showing these young farmers how to produce wheat in their own country. They are being shown how to become self-sufficient. They are being taught how to work with their hands, rather than holding out their hands, asking someone to feed them. These young Africans were proud and happy to learn how to be productive.

● (1530)

Who was working with them? Farmers, husband and wife teams from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba were living and working in the same environment with these young Africans. Some of these people originally signed two or three-year contracts. Some have now been there over five years, going on six. They say they must stay longer to ensure that these young people grasp the technology to be able to operate the huge diesel tractors, grain swathers and cultivators that are being used. Most of this equipment, although not all, comes from Canada. It is provided by Canadian taxpayers' dollars.

Many times we hear criticisms about some of the world projects to assist people, in which we are involved. It is wonderful to see these people become self-sufficient. Dignity is being provided to these young people. The President of Tanzania was very proud of the effort of this government working in close co-operation with his government, doing some of those things talked about earlier by members of this House.

More of this kind of action is necessary. There is urgent need to assist many millions of people in that and other parts of the world now. We cannot haggle and argue about such things as the economy, balanced budgets, and so on. I for one could not live with my conscience if I pitted the economy of one country against the death of another.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, June 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill S-6, to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of being able to speak on this bill regarding the Two-Price Wheat Act. There are a number of points I want to make because, like everything else in politics, there are a number of myths that float around this statute, as with everything else that occurs here.

First, it is interesting to note that the only reason we are debating this bill is to protect the government retroactively from a lawsuit that it will face if the act is not passed. It is interesting that the Liberal Government of Canada let it ride for all these many years and now, in order to save its own skin, is retroactively passing a bill which will save several hundred millions of dollars. In effect it is another case of a government having its people bear the cost of a statute that it itself passed and took the benefit of, for several years.

There is another myth that often gets play in the media. I believe most consumers in the nation think that this statute is on the books in order to subsidize producers. Some ministers have indicated that it is not a producer subsidy. It is a consumer subsidy. The point has to be made that the government, as part of an over-all cheap food policy, has subsidized the consumers of bread in this nation to the extent of some $396 million.

It is true that originally there was a floor price for the producers of $3.25. It is true that that floor price was increased on a couple of occasions and now sits at $5. The point that needs to be made about that is that the floor price was always increased behind the actual world price for grain. It has been a sham. The government has been taking the benefit of an alleged increase in the floor price when, in fact, the world price has been much higher.

The maximum price paid by the millers of bread grain was to be $5. The result of that was that if the world price of grain were more than $3.25, the taxpayers of Canada, regardless of whether they ate bread, pasta, or whatever, would be paying a subsidy to those who ate bread. At that price the maximum subsidy by the taxpayers would be $1.75 a bushel.

When and if—and in fact it did—the world price of grain goes above $5 a bushel, the consumers of bread are still being subsidized, but no longer is that payment being made by the taxpayers of Canada generally. That payment is being made by the farmers of this country, and basically those are the farmers of western Canada. There are some 150,000 active producers. How could we ever have put a bill through this House that would force 150,000 producers of bread wheat in Canada to subsidize the consumers of bread across the entire nation? It is absurd. I am amazed that the government would have put in such a provision in the first place.

The farmers are probably losing $1 million a week at this point as a result of the world price of bread grain being much above $5. They only receive the maximum $5. That point is not lost in the west.

This is another example of western raw resources being sold in the rest of Canada at much less than world prices. In a few minutes I will speak about oil being another example. Never in the entire history of this land have the farmers of the west paid less than full world price for combines, tractors and trucks. Never have they paid less than world prices for asbestos, or the electricity that goes into the manufacture of equipment, yet there seems to be this tendency to freeze the price of goods coming out of the west.

It is so inherently unfair that I must say, from the depths of my heart, that it is that feeling of unfairness that is going to take the west out of this country. In that vein, I must say that one of my own riding executive members has left my executive in order to join the western separatist party. Advertisements are in the western media calling for people to join. Over 200 memberships in the western separatist party have been sold in the Lethbridge-Foothills constituency. It is a very serious matter. I know those on the other side may laugh from time to time, but western separatism is in the same boat today that the PQ was in ten to 11 years ago. It hardly seems to be real Canadian justice.

The government proposed that under its new policy effective August 1, 1980, the minimum price will be $5 and the maximum price will be $7. It is no longer to be done by statute, but by regulation under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. Why is there a delay until August 1? Why not immediately? During the election the government led the farmers to believe it would be done instantaneously.

Why August 1? We have some eight to ten weeks to go. It is costing the western farmers over $1 million a week, which will amount to $8 million to $10 million. The western farmers are faced with an enormous drought that is taking on truly catastrophic proportions in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The federal government's response is to give support to the extent of $5 million, which is but a drop in the budget. The amount that western farmers are losing on this subsidy alone will be $8 million to $10 million. So the government in giving $5 million is still not doing anything significant. Another hon. member pointed out to me a few moments ago that we spent, as a nation, between $4 million and $5 million on a one-day Canada Day celebration. Surely that cannot be any more important than the needs of more than 100,000 producers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan who are really hurting under this drought.

I should also like to know why this bill was brought in through the Senate. I know that the minister who is formally in charge of the Wheat Board comes from the Senate, but we do have a minister sitting in this House who purports to have responsibility, and it seems to me the bill should have been introduced in the House of Commons because it is the members of the House of Commons who are elected by their constituents and who must respond to their needs. Neither is it lost on me that the minister who is supposed to be responsible for the Wheat Board never even took the time to make the major speech when the bill was brought forward. It was the parliamentary secretary who did that.

Under the new policy, the floor price would be five dollars. That simply is not good enough. If there is to be a floor price at all, or a maximum price at all, it needs to be tied to the cost of production. The hard reality the western producer faces today is that the cost of production is rising enormously, and the most significant increase among the elements which make up his cost of production is interest on operating loans. We know that this high interest cost is simply the result of the federal Liberal government taking this nation from the point of balanced budgets to a national deficit of between $70 billion and $80 billion, and a yearly deficit of $14 billion.

We all know that the amount paid today in interest is greater than the entire federal budget of less than ten years ago. We know, too, that of every dollar paid in taxes, some 20 to 25 cents go to service debt without reducing the principal of that debt one bit. Meanwhile, the government is out borrowing more billions of dollars.

We recently passed a bill under a form of closure providing the government with a $12 billion borrowing authority. When the government is out in the market place competing with producers for money, with no limit on the amount of interest it can pay, as compared with a farming or business unit which has to tie interest payments to the ultimate price of its products, the ordinary farmer cannot compete. Of course the government gets the money, but it hurts the farmer. As a result, the farmer is paying much more by way of interest than he can really handle, and this should be factored into the flexibility for which we are asking should the floor price be indexed. It is not lost on the farmers of western Canada that the price of grain has to go up some 40 cents before the price of a loaf of bread goes up one penny.

There is a further point I should like to make. Surely the government could not have intended this to happen, but its policies on meat, on wheat, and on oil, have genuinely hurt the west for the benefit of central Canada. You know, Mr. Speaker, from your experience in the House, what happened to beef producers as a result of the LIFT program brought in by an all-knowing Liberal government believing it could advise farmers on what to produce, and paying them $10 to take their land out of grain production and put it into grass. The effect was to increase the beef herd enormously; we therefore had calves coming out of our ears and the price, naturally, fell. What did the government do? Nothing? No, that is not fair. It did do something. It opened up the import market so that millions of tons of beef could come in from Australia and New Zealand further depressing prices. Hundreds and hundreds of beef producers went out of business. How can it be said that in these circumstances the government was responding to the needs of the west?

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), completed a very complicated negotiation on the Prince Rupert grain terminal. This agreement called for negotiation with the grain producers, the grain producers co-operative organizations, with railway companies, terminal elevator companies and others. The unions were involved, as were arrangements for international shipping. All this was put to bed in an agreement. But when the government changed, within a matter of days the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) caused great uncertainty with regard to that agreement all because of a mere $12 million.

Mr. Pepin: You should consult with your own colleague.

Mr. Thacker: What is not lost in the west, perhaps because they are farmers and have time in the winter to read, is that on practically the same day as the minister was reneging on that agreement, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) was awarding a $4 billion contract the benefits of which were divided almost totally and equally between Ontario and Quebec. The implications are not lost on the people in the west where these things mean a great deal to us.

Mr. Pepin: I will invite you to the opening.

Mr. Thacker: I could go into the history of oil, and perhaps I should because of the presence of the minister of energy in the House today. On energy alone, the west has paid a huge price since 1974.

Mr. Lalonde: Not Manitoba.

Mr. Thacker: It has done that by agreement, by being very generous as Albertans are in their capacity as Canadians.

Mr. Lalonde: You are talking of Alberta.

Mr. Thacker: Well, in terms of oil, if the minister of energy insists, 80 per cent of the benefit really does come from Alberta and something less from Saskatchewan. But look at the figures. For Alberta, at last count it was $17 billion—it would be much closer to $18 billion now—and the Saskatchewan figure was over $3 billion; it is probably $3.5 billion now. Never in the history of this nation has one region been called upon to subsidize the rest to such an extent. It was done by agreement, an agreement into which the west entered. But what does Alberta receive for this unprecedented contribution? It certainly has not received any appreciation. Every article I read contains criticism. Whenever the minister of energy makes a speech, does he ever say to the people of Alberta; "You have been generous and we appreciate your contribution, and we are going to ask you for more?"

Mr. Lalonde: Yes. Read the speeches.

Mr. Thacker: I have never seen it in a speech. It has always been talk about greed and selfishness.

Mr. Lalonde: I rise on a point of order—perhaps I should raise the matter as a question of privilege. I am sure the hon. member would not wish to mislead the people of this country by making a completely false and erroneous statement—not the first he has made in his speech up to now. But I refer him to my repeated speeches; they are on record; he has copies in his office. In speech after speech I have stated that Alberta has made a tremendous contribution to this country and that we should be thankful for the contribution made by the people of Alberta and by the oil industry to the development of this country. I also pointed out, however, that Canadian taxpayers generally and the Government of Canada—

● (1550)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker).

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) should stand in this House and tell the people of Alberta how generous they have been, because that is not the message that is getting through to the people of Alberta, and even in this—

An hon. Member: You are distorting it.

Mr. Lalonde: You are misleading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Thacker: Perhaps the problem lies with what the minister goes on to say in those speeches, because in those speeches he always goes on to tie in the fact that section 109 of the constitution is not going to be honoured in this respect, and to leave the impression that the people of Alberta are somehow being unreasonable in wanting to tie their price to 85 per cent of the Chicago price.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister is rising on a question of privilege, I hope it is more valid than the last one.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member again is committing a serious breach, I submit, of the rules of this House by accusing another member of breaching the constitution. I have stated that this government was going to respect every aspect of the BNA Act—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. minister, it appears to be a point of debate and hardly a matter of parliamentary privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thacker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that this is a sensitive point for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources because his appointment as minister has caused great distress throughout the west.

This brings me to another point, however. This country operates under an accepted order of law, and that order of law is the British North America Act, our constitution. Our constitution provides that resources belong to the provinces. Ontario confirmed that point approximately 50 years ago by taking that section to the Supreme Court of Canada.

We in the west have always paid the world price for Ontario's resources because that is what the constitution says. That is what the Supreme Court of Canada says. Now with respect to oil they seem to be backing down. I say to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that he has a constitutional duty to uphold the constitution. He should be defending Alberta and its ownership of that resource, and not attacking it.

Both Germany and Japan went immediately to world prices and, of course, they have the strongest world economies. We could do the same.

In terms of history, hon. members will recall that in 1905 when Alberta was created it was given all the powers of a province except control of its natural resources. The reason seemed to be a central Liberal government thinking that colonialists could not truly run their own affairs, an attitude which this Liberal government still reflects.

Alberta was governed by a Liberal provincial government from 1905 to 1921, and throughout that period it pressed the central Liberal government for control of resources. The central government refused. In 1921 the United Farmers of Alberta were elected as the provincial government, and they continued to press for return of the resources. The result was that in 1930 we achieved a transfer agreement, and we took control of resources. However, interestingly enough, the issue was so difficult and so heated that at the 1924 annual convention of the UFA party a resolution providing that Alberta separate from the union was debated. This shows the depth of feeling, and I must say in all good faith that Albertans have that same capacity and that same depth of feeling about their energy resources today.

We then entered into the thirties and the horrible depression. It took a decade or more out of the lives of people like my parents and the generation just before mine. The people of western Canada did not have the support of the central government, and they made necessary and hard adjustments to their lives. They abandoned their homesteads. Three out of every four had to leave their homesteads. They lost their homes and their dreams. As a result, in 1935 the Social Credit Party came to power. They were a government which tried solutions. They were again, however, frustrated by the central government. There were some ten statutes or amendments which were struck down by the federal power of disallowance or by the Supreme Court of Canada.

The point is that it was a government which was trying to address the problems of people who were suffering and starving on their lands and having to abandon their farms. The BNA Act in that case was used against the people of Alberta when they were trying to get their electricity and their manufactured goods from central Canada at less than world price.

An hon. Member: Talk about the bill.

Mr. Lalonde: The bill is about wheat.

Mr. Thacker: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources really seems upset today, and that is very interesting. He is usually pretty cool, but I think we have hit a soft spot with him.

Mr. Lalonde: What about the bill?

Mr. Thacker: What I am explaining with regard to this Two-Price Wheat Act is how it ties in with a broad spectrum of actions by the central government which is leading to a tremendous potential for separation in western Canada. It is important that these points be made.

It is not that the west has not tried. In 1937 William Aberhart as premier of Alberta presented "The Case for Alberta". That brief covered our concerns about freight rates, tariff rates, transportation and marketing of western products. There was no meaningful response.

This bill could have been discussed in 1937. We have been saying exactly the same things. There has been no change since.

During the forties when we were trying to develop the oil industry, central Canada had an opportunity to invest. It refused. Hon. members should listen to Senator Manning. He gives a very emotional speech about his personal efforts to raise money in central Canada to develop the oil industry, but none was available. It was all kept for central Canada. That is the only reason that the oil industry is so heavily owned now by Americans, Dutch, and British. It is ironic that central Canadians would not put their money into their own country and that people from the United Kingdom, the United States and Holland did. Now that they own the business, central Canada is crying in its beer.

Time again passed. In 1969, 22 years after Aberhart had presented "The Case for Alberta", another premier, Premier Strom, came here and dealt again with exactly the same things: freight rates, tariff inequities, transportation problems and marketing problems. The result was exactly the same—nothing.

Then we come to 1973. At the Western Economic Opportunity Conference in Calgary the same issues again were discussed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came with solemn promises of a meaningful response. The results were simply platitudes, and at the end of that conference the premier of Alberta, Premier Lougheed, was moved to say, and I quote:

> Obviously we failed to get through to you the spirit and potential of western Canada. We would have traded all the specific policies you announced here just for that understanding alone.

That is what I am saying today on the Two-Price Wheat Act. It is again a reflection of the majority being elected from central Canada and, even giving them the very best of good faith, they did not genuinely understand what we in the west were and are saying.

I could go on and talk more about what has happened with respect to OPEC prices, but getting back to this bill I hope the minister will read this speech. I hope he will address his mind to the points raised, because I think if he were to address his mind to the indexation of the $5 floor price and if he were to address his mind to making it retroactive from even June 1 rather than August 1, that would go a long way toward being a sign of good faith by this big institution in Ottawa toward the small producers of western Canada.

I believe I can call it four o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 4 p.m., the House will proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, you will remember that last Friday I informed the House that it would be my intention at four o'clock today to seek unanimous consent to proceed with all stages of a number of private bills to effect name changes in constituencies. This will be done very quickly and should not impinge too much on the time of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) with his motion, and I ask leave of the House to proceed in that manner with all those bills, including the bill which was introduced today, by leave, in the name of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger).

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions, and we are prepared to consent.

Mr. Knowles: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. We too are party to the agreement. I hope it will be possible to give second reading to several bills on one motion to save a little more time that way as well.

PRODUCTION COSTS SUGGESTED AS BASIS FOR FLOOR PRICES

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of setting floor prices related to costs of production for cereal and oilseed crops one month before planting in order that farmers may be provided adequate returns to ensure sufficient production to meet Canada's domestic and export needs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, with the spirit of co-operation in the House today, I was almost willing to forgo my speech in anticipation of acceptance of this motion; we have been doing so well today.

Mr. Knowles: Carried.

Mr. Schellenberger: Also I am most pleased that the motion has caused both the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board to be present today. I am very pleased, because I know it is an important motion in which both of these ministers are very interested. As I speak briefly and take them through the statistical and logical reasons why the setting of an initial price should have some base rather than the Wheat Board pool account, I hope they will agree this is a reasonable motion and something the Standing Committee on Agriculture should study very thoroughly.

At the present time each year the minister responsible for the Wheat Board sets an initial price. That initial price is the price which farmers receive for deliveries to the elevator. I am sure that price is based upon last year's pooling account and not upon any other reason, particularly the most important one, which is the cost of production a farmer must face in order to produce wheat.

Let us have a look at the statistics. I hope the House will bear with me because often statistics are not the most pleasurable in speeches, but they are very important to this motion. Farm input costs have grown much faster than the consumer price index. In 1979 the farm input price index was 12.5 per cent and the consumer price index was 9 per cent. If we look back at the 1960s, both of these indexes were very similar. They both rose at rates of about 3 per cent per year. But that changed very rapidly in the 1970s.

If we look at 1979 over 1978, fertilizer costs have gone up 18 per cent, machinery costs up 14 per cent, labour up 7.3 per cent, and since 1971 petroleum has gone up 100 per cent. What has really happened? From 1971 to 1979 the consumer price index rose 90 per cent, but the farm price index has risen 130 per cent. This is a tremendous difference.

If we look again at the statistics I quoted in relation to 1979 over 1978, between 1971 and 1979 fertilizer prices have risen 150 per cent, machinery 195 per cent, farm labour 140 per cent, pesticides 176 per cent, and diesel fuel 130 per cent. All those were much greater than the consumer price index of 90 per cent on which we based most of our calculations for other things in the consumer economy.

I did some calculations. As we look at the basis for increases in labour contracts, pensions, and family allowances, we realize they are all based upon the consumer price index. That generally ties the dollar value to the 1961 or 1971 level. In our calculations we used 1961 as a base year and indexed that at 100. Then we deflated the actual prices for barley, wheat, hogs and cattle back to the year 1930, and inflated forward to the year 1980. We used the base of 100 for the costs. If we deflate it and go backwards, we find in 1930 a bushel of barley, which was worth 80 cents in 1961, based on 100 would have been worth $1.42 at that time, even though the actual price was only 59 cents. If we carry that ahead to 1980, we find for the same bushel of barley the Wheat Board is now paying $1.71 at the farm gate, or $2.57 at Thunder Bay and that the actual value based on 1961 is only 63 cents. We can make the same calculation with respect to wheat, hogs and beef cattle.

In 1979 the actual price for wheat at Thunder Bay was $6.09, but based upon a 1961 index of 100 the actual price would be only $1.48; for hogs the actual price in 1979 was $64.25, but based upon the 1961 index it would be $21.45; for beef cattle the actual price was $78.38, but on that basis it would be $28.82.

So what does this show us? It shows us that the only way farmers have been able to exist over the past number of years—because the actual price of grain has not risen to any extent, one year it is up, the next year it is lower than 1960 prices—is through enlarging their farming operations and increasing the volume of production and the use of new technology. So, as we do with everything else such as indexing contracts for labour unions, indexing family allowances and indexing our pensions, we do nothing when we establish the initial price for wheat, barley and rapeseed for farmers so far as indexing that price is concerned, or basing it on the cost of production.

As we look at the statistics, we find that the number of farms each year decreases by 4 per cent, and the large decrease in numbers had been in effect before that period of time, and the average age of farmers is increasing rapidly. The Minister of Agriculture has brought in many programs which he hopes will keep young farmers on the farms or which will entice them to become involved in farming. But it is literally impossible for that to happen as land prices continue to go up, as input costs continue to rise and the level of price that the farmer receives remains the same year after year. So more and more farmers have increasingly large debt loads and their average age is increasing.

Why should we accept a motion such as this under which we base the initial price on the cost of production? First, it would provide a reasonable price for the labour of farmers, because there would be some reasonable base on which we would establish grain prices. Second, it would mean a stronger agricultural economy. Look at what has happened with the drought situation in Manitoba. That province expects to lose $500 million this year. So by establishing a reasonable price based on the cost of production, we would have a stronger agricultural economy.

Farmers would then be able to look at the floor price and ask, "Can I produce grain on my land at that price?" If they could do so for wheat, they would produce it, if they could not for barley, they would not produce barley. That is an advantage for the Canadian Wheat Board because the Canadian Wheat Board should have knowledge of which grain they can sell in 1981, for example. Therefore, in establishing a floor price, let us use this crop year as an example.

We have oversold barley in export markets, and there are two reasons for that. The first is that farmers are not delivering because the initial price is too low, and the other is that there was a feeling in western Canada that they should grow more oilseeds because its initial price was substantially higher and the cash in hand was generally more than for growing barley and wheat. If the Wheat Board knew they would have large sales for feed grains in the international market, they could raise the support or the floor price a little higher than they would, say, for oilseeds. That would then be an incentive for farmers to plant a certain percentage more of their lands to that crop rather than another crop.

This method is used by other countries in the world, and the one closest to us is the United States. They have a program that has been in place for many years, and it is under their food and agricultural act. They call it the target price system. On August 15 of the previous year they announced the support or the floor prices for agricultural commodities in the United States. They used to base the target price on a system they called parity, which was the same as many of our stabilization programs where an average for five years is taken to establish the price. But they have changed that now. They base their floor price now on the cost of production, and that is of tremendous advantage to the U.S. farmers. Also as I have suggested the Wheat Board should do here in Canada, they encourage farmers to produce certain crops or discourage them from producing other crops. We could use that as an example here for our Canadian Wheat Board.

What is the target price in the United States for barley and wheat? For barley it is $2.55 a bushel. Our producers are getting $1.71 a bushel today, and if we look at the actual cost of production in Canada it is over $2.55 a bushel. So farmers are really producing at about 90 cents a bushel below the cost of production. Most farmers do not consider the price of their labour and the price of their land, because in many instances they own the land, and often they do not consider the great advantage of advanced technology. So they are hanging on at this price of $1.71 a bushel. The price for wheat is $3.63 per bushel, while in Canada we are paying to the farmer, depending on the grade, between $3.50 and $4 a bushel.

Here is a specific example of a country which has used a system for a long time and based the price they pay to farmers on the cost of production, given him that price before he starts to plant the crop so that he can make the proper decision, not only for himself but also to meet the international demand for a commodity which we have the wonderful ability to produce in excess of our domestic demands.

The use of this basis for the cost production is not new in Canadian programs. We have it in our stabilization act which was amended a few years ago. It was established in our Western Grain Stabilization Act. When Alberta brought in its stop loss program a few months ago for hogs, it established this basis in the program. When producers and the government of Alberta went over to Japan to sell hogs because there was a surplus, the Japanese government was convinced to buy hogs based on the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. So even though at that time the price of hogs in Alberta was greater than the one in the contract with Japan, many farmers grabbed the contract because they knew that in the long run they would be better off, and they signed contracts on that basis.

This is not a new proposal. It is one that has been tried in other countries, one that we have put in our programs here in Canada and one that we could easily adopt by basing the initial price which the Wheat Board announces not on some figures that are pulled out of the hat based on a pool account, but rather based on the cost of production which statisticians are now gathering for us under the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

I will conclude my remarks on this motion by saying that it is important to western farmers that we do not continue to allow them to produce almost every commodity that they produce at less than the cost of production. They cannot continue to do that for much longer. They must get adequate prices, otherwise we will have continued consolidation and upward mobility by large corporations buying land and processing goods so that they can make profits here and there through the system. So I commend this motion to the House of Commons and I hope hon. members will see fit to send it to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

● (1620)

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of the resolution before the House, and to commend the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) for introducing this idea for consideration. I want to mention five or six different points which I think members should take note of and perhaps reflect upon.

The first is the point he ended off with regarding farmers and their cost of production, pointing out that so many of their commodities are sold at less than the cost of production. He talked about the price of barley and what has happened to that in the last 40 or so years, as I recall.

The point I want to start off with is the whole idea of planning. I think all of us like to plan our lives as much as we can, and in politics that is often very difficult. Whether it is in business or working in a plant, no matter what, people need and want to plan their lives in terms of their families, the houses they want to build, the cars they want to buy, and all this is based on the incomes they receive from their jobs—their remuneration. This is one thing that many farmers cannot do. Many farmers do not know in the spring what they are going to receive in the fall for the grain they have planted. The resolution before the House today is one that tries to rectify that situation so farmers can do a bit of planning.

I remember my 18 years on a farm as a child, growing up. In the spring we had no idea what we could do in the fall, what we could purchase or how much money there would be available, because all this depended on the weather and international prices for various commodities. This depended on factors that were totally beyond the control of the individual farmer.

That is a situation people in other occupations will not tolerate. I think the time for farmers tolerating that situation has ended as well. I want to suggest one thing to the hon. member who moved this resolution today, and that is that we have floor prices. I think what should go hand in hand with that, unless we run the risk of tremendous over-supply of products, is a system of orderly marketing, with marketing boards and marketing agencies. The hon. member smiles, but I know he supports the concept of orderly marketing for some commodities, but perhaps not for others.

In this country we have five national marketing boards for products; I think of industrial milk, turkeys, broilers, and I think of CEMA. I said there were perhaps five, but maybe there are only four. There are literally dozens of marketing boards for commodities which come under provincial regulations. I think we have to combine a marketing agency with planned and orderly marketing, along with minimum prices, because if you have floor prices based on the cost of production, with a depression of prices elsewhere in the world you can easily understand that there might be an over-supply of certain commodities in this country. We have to combine this with as many import controls as possible through GATT to protect our Canadian producers. For proper import production we again need national marketing on a national level. I want to suggest that we should have a combination of minimum prices and orderly marketing.

One need only think of beef, for example, to know that if we raise the price of beef in this country through subsidies and guarantees, which I think we need, we may end up with an over-supply, unless we have some kind of marketing agency so we can plan production to meet consumption in this country. I can say as a person who comes from a riding where there are literally hundreds of cow-calf producers, I am informed that the overwhelming majority want a marketing agency or board for their product.

The second thing I wanted to mention was the need in our country now for the promotion of international price agreements, or international commodity agreements. I think that is what we should be striving for around the world today.

One of the problems we have in respect of wheat today is the result of the old international wheat agreement falling apart a number of years ago. We should have an international agreement under which consuming and producing countries sit down together to hammer out an agreement that is fair to both the producer and the consumer.

We do not have an agreement in respect of oil. What we have is a cartel. The OPEC nations have formed a cartel. The producers get together and fix a price. I am not talking about a cartel, I am talking about commodity agreements, as a result of the producers and consumers sitting down negotiating a price that is fair to all, based on the cost of production.

Mr. Whelan: You are reading one of Whelan's old speeches.

Mr. Nystrom: The minister suggests I am reading one of his old speeches.

Mr. Knowles: There are lots of them around.

Mr. Nystrom: I hope I am not that boring to the House.

Mr. Whelan: You are doing right well.

Mr. Nystrom: I remember going to Africa four years ago to a United Nations conference on trade and development, the whole purpose of which was to try to hammer out international commodity agreements, whether they be in respect of bananas, tin, cotton, food products or what have you. If we had international commodity agreements we might lose a bit on some commodities, yet on some we would gain a bit, but this would be fair to all; it would be fair to the entire world. I know the member for Wetaskiwin agrees with me in that regard.

I put a question today to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) about the price of sugar which has gone up by 200 per cent to 300 per cent in a few months. That price has not gone up as a result of a drastic shortage of sugar, but because of problems of supply, supply being curtailed a bit, yet not to the point there was a shortage. As a result speculators moved in. This is a commodity on the open market with no planning, no agreement, nothing at all. Speculators moved in to the futures market and drove the price of sugar sky high. It is the ordinary consumer who suffers, and I maintain the same thing is true with other commodities as well.

In the absence of international commodity agreements we should be looking at two-price systems for a number of commodities, so at least the domestic Canadian price would be based on a cost of production formula. A few minutes ago we were discussing two-price wheat. One of the things I wanted to say then was that I think the Canadian price for wheat we consume in the bread we eat, which represents a tiny minority of the wheat we produce, should be based on the cost of production. In this way the farmer would get back what he puts into the production, plus a decent salary for his family to survive on.

The third point I want to mention is one that has been referred to by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, the whole matter of input costs. I do not have to repeat much of what he has said because he has given us figures showing that the farm price index has gone up much more rapidly than the consumer price index. The amount a farmer is paying for farm machinery, for fuel, for fertilizers and for everything to produce a bushel of wheat, has really skyrocketed, while the price of the bushel of wheat or, for that matter, the price of a hog, livestock or other commodity, in many cases, has not really gone up at all, or very little in the last few years. As a result we in this country, the consumers, have received the benefit recently of fairly cheap food. I know that is a difficult thing to say because food prices went up 12 per cent this year, but we must keep this in perspective.

Food prices in other parts of the world are much higher than in Canada, with the exception of the United States. We and the people in the United States are very fortunate that we have, in comparison to our incomes, the lowest food prices in the world. All one has to do is go to Europe, Japan, or any country in the Third World, comparing the incomes with what the people are paying for food, to find that the proportion spent on food is much greater than is the case in Canada and the United States.

I am not saying we should experience a tremendous increase in the price of food. All I am saying is that if, by giving the farmer a fair deal, making sure he gets back his cost of production, this means a minor increase in the price of food, then that is a worth-while investment for each and every one of us.

The fourth point I want to make is that where the increase in the price of food is causing hardships, and where it is causing malnutrition—malnutrition does exist among Canadians in some parts of this country today, and I can give you many statistics about calcium deficiency, protein deficiency and deficiencies in many other basic vitamins and minerals—we as a public have an obligation to bring in a nutrition program under which we susidize some basic foods such as milk and bread.

I want to remind the House again that recently we had subsidies on milk and bread, but the Minister of Agriculture and other ministers decided in their wisdom to remove those subsidies. I do not think that was very wise. Perhaps the minister will tell us today why he has removed the subsidies on basic foods like bread and milk. I should like to hear him quote from some of his speeches on this topic because I do not think he is very proud of what the government has done. We could have a school milk program which would take care of some of the basic nutritional needs of the children of this country.

When we speak of a cost of production formula and a basic floor price, Mr. Speaker, we are only stating something that is a fact for many other people in our society. Many pension plans are now indexed to the cost of living—our salaries as parliamentarians are indexed to the cost of living, and most trade unions have a COLA clause in their contracts to increase salaries according to the cost of living. I think the same thing should be done for farmers. Their income ought to be increased according to their cost of living, which is the cost of production. That is a basic philosophy of equity with which I think everyone in this House could agree.

If it should create hardships in some areas, then as a collective society we should be willing to spend as much as $200 or $300 million perhaps to subsidize two or three basic foods in order to provide Canadians with proper nutrition. That would be a tremendous investment. One can cite study after study to endorse the proposition that good food means good health. The Food Prices Review Board pointed out that the need for 40 per cent of our hospital beds could be tied in to improper diet and improper nutrition. It would be a worthwhile investment to spend a few hundred million dollars to educate people on the importance of proper nutrition and to subsidize production of some of the basic foods.

It might be a good idea to impose a higher tax on some junk foods as a means of persuading people not to drink Coca Cola or some of the heavily salted chips or heavily sugared cereals. These are abundant in the marketplace and widely advertised in magazines, and their appeal is directed mainly to children. This makes me, as the parent of a six-year old, very angry. When children go to a store they want to pick up a breakfast cereal which is almost 60 per cent sugar.

I think it would be an excellent idea to tax these junk foods very heavily. I am in favour of heavy taxes on tobacco and alcohol. A tax on junk food could provide a hefty subsidy for milk, bread, and one or two other basic foods. It is the pocketbook that motivates most people, and in this way they could be motivated to purchase the basic foods instead of cokes, salted chips, and sugared breakfast cereals.

Mr. Knowles: Like my arrowroot biscuits!

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, like my friend's arrowroot biscuits.

These are a few ideas that I think the House should consider, Mr. Speaker, that would help farmers and consumers and protect the health of Canadians. The consumer and the farmer are not enemies; they are not contradictions. I think we can help both and at the same time build a nation that is physically healthy and more productive. People would pay more taxes. The cost of unemployment insurance benefits, welfare and medicare would be less, so they would make a better contribution to society.

If we were to ensure sufficient income for our farmers it would be one way to entice young people back to the land. This would in turn ensure a viable rural community with towns and villages to serve it. I think all of that can be done through proper planning.

In ridings such as my own or that of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, farmhouse after farmhouse stands abandoned. There are many cases like those he told me about, where a farmer may have two or three or four quarters of land and old equipment that needs replacing. But with such a small holding there is no way he can earn enough to buy new equipment. What usually happens is that he sells out to a bigger farmer who can afford to purchase larger equipment. Eventually he too sells out to an even larger farmer. The time comes, then, when there are only a few farmers in the neighbourhood and they are not enough to support a farm machinery dealer, a general store or co-op, so they start consolidationg. The result is fewer communities, fewer services, fewer people, and we find that control rests with those few people.

What is the logical consequence of all this? Perhaps our rural communities will become like those in Colorado where a few large farms take in townships, or perhaps a few large corporations will eventually control farming as they do the farm machinery business, the auto business, the oil business and many others. That is neither healthy nor desirable in terms of giving people meaningful jobs and a decent life in a rural society.

Those are the things that I want to say, Mr. Speaker. I hope hon. members will think about some of them and that we can make substantial changes to our society and our lifestyle and reflect on where we are going. These alternatives would not cost the government any more money or build up larger deficits. They would be a real investment in a better and more decent way of life for all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak on this motion which deals with setting a floor price for cereal and other oil seed crops. This floor price will be based on the cost of production. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) indicated that his objective is to ensure that Canada has enough of these crops to meet its domestic needs first of all, and secondly, enough to meet our export obligations.

I do not think any member of the House would disagree with these objectives. We want to have sufficient production and we want to ensure that our western farmers remain viable and healthy. We listened with interest when he outlined a number of problems. One which he outlined very dramatically, and which the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) also referred to, is the difficulty of the cost-price squeeze which affects all farmers in Canada. So there is no question about the objectives and no question about what he wanted to achieve for farmers in Canada.

I should like to ask why this should be limited to wheat farmers and oil seed farmers, however. Why should it not be extended to everyone in the farming community? The principle is established.

As practical politicians we have to use the means at our disposal to deal with this very difficult and important topic. We might consider the status of the grain industry in Canada at the present time, for instance. Grain ranks third in production amongst our industries today. We stand second to the United States in terms of international grain trade and, of course, the United States has more arable land than we do. That does not mean that in the decades ahead we should not make every effort to create more arable land in Canada. A multitude of problems face the world in terms of agriculture. And, as one of the most fertile countries in the world, we have a responsibility not only to help people at home but also in other countries that have demonstrated they cannot produce enough foodstuffs to feed themselves.

This brings me to another point, Mr. Speaker. I think a major part of our foreign aid program should be aimed at helping Third World countries become self-sufficient in food production.

● (1640)

In many of our foreign aid projects we have in the past concentrated through CIDA on the giant dams and mega projects of an industrial nature. We are supporting now the United Nations Industrial Development Organization as one of our multilateral agencies which is aimed at industrializing the Third World. But is this really our first priority? Should this be the first priority when two-thirds of the people in this world do not get adequate food?

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has bemoaned the fact that children eat candy and drink coke here in Canada. I agree this is a problem. But there is a far greater problem which faces us as citizens in this world, and that is the number of people who are starving. So the great thrust of our program, along with the spirit which the hon. member has proposed in his bill is that of helping other nations with their food needs. Certainly exporting food is a good idea. But let us remember the adage of foreign aid: if you give a person a fish he will eat for a day. If you teach him how to fish, he will eat for a lifetime. That should be one of our fundamental premises when we come to deal with this aspect of helping to increase our exports.

What has happened in this motion I perceive is that we are setting a floor price. What will happen to the supply of these products when we set a floor price but do not set any type of marketing agency over the supply which will regulate it? Are we going to get into the quota problem? Do we want more and more government regulations, as the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has indicated? Is that the intent of the hon. member who has proposed this bill? Are we going to need more and more instrumentality to deal with this type of problem? I am not sure exactly what he has in mind in that area.

We heard a suggestion today from a member opposite in which he praised a two-price system for wheat. In a debate on a previous bill this afternoon we heard another member opposite condemning the two-price system for wheat. We heard a strong condemnation of the two-price system for oil. We have heard a lot of talk about the areas which deal with whether Canadians will act for their own benefit in a mutually co-operative way. These are questions which are fundamental to our existence as a nation, to our existence as a country, Madam Speaker.

I do not want to prejudge the answer, but I believe we will all have to take a look at the community of interest we have as Canadians working together. Rather than concentrating on petty differences, we will have to take a spirit of open mindedness. Rather than focusing on the problems, why do we not look at the tremendous potential that we have as a nation, a nation blessed with the richest resources and with the most highly educated people, with evidence of human rights and freedoms,. and with good neighbours in most sections of the world? Why do we not take these great strengths, this potential that we have, and look on the bright side of things, rather than focusing on the petty and narrow differences which are separating us? That is why I disapprove.

In conclusion, let me add the philosophy of this motion. Perhaps setting a minimum price is one way to help the farmers. My parents are farmers. They had to flee Saskatchewan when the droughts of the depression wiped them out. My parents are now farmers here in Ontario. I am looking forward to the recess this weekend so that I can go to our farm and help get in our first crop of hay. We are fortunate that it is not a bad crop this year in Ontario. I wish the crops were as good every place in Canada.

In setting a floor price perhaps this motion does not take into consideration that pioneering philosophy, that free enterprise philosophy of a lot of our farmers. Our farmers are some of the most enterprising, hard working people that we have ever seen. These are the people, the farmers, who get up at any time of the night when a calf is being born. They anticipate it, they go out and work with the cow to make sure that the calf is born and is healthy. These are the people who are in the fields just as soon as the weather permits in the spring. These people invest in tiles and their drains so they can get into the fields sooner and get their crops off sooner. These are the people who are investing great amounts in the mechanics of farming, in the new technologies in order that they can be more productive farmers.

Sure, we can bemoan the fact that there are fewer and fewer farmers in the west today and that the average size of the farm in the west is now 800 acres. Maybe this does cause disruptions in the life of people in the west. Yes, people are fleeing from the farms. But this is one of the unfortunate realities that efficiency and modernization have brought upon us. With mechanization we have been able to produce more and more. I do not think any of us bemoan the fact that a farmer can produce a lot more now because he has a tractor than during the time when he had a horse and before that when he had to use very simple hand implements in order to till his land.

Yes, there is a disruption of life to the farmer and there is a consolidation of land. But do any of us bemoan the new technologies that have made the individual farmer more productive? It is this productivity, it is utilizing these modern techniques, it is being a free enterpriser and taking risks, and these are the things that farmers have always been prepared to do. They are some of the strongest people in society in terms of the free enterprise spirit. This does not mean that we want to ignore the aspect of the government co-operating with our farmers. But before we start to guarantee everything, before we look at a guaranteed minimum price based on cost for wheat and for oil seeds, before we start to extend that to hog producers, to dairy farmers, to cattle farmers, to all producers of agricultural products here in Canada, I think we have to look at the implications of this from a financial point of view and from the basic philosophical point of view of what our agricultural people mean to us here in Canada.

For that reason I think that we should consider very seriously the spirit in which this motion has been presented to this House. We want to help our farmers. We want to do something to make sure that the drought we are experiencing in the west will not unduly impact on our agricultural producers. That is the way to do it. It is not to set in motion a bureaucracy whereby prices are always guaranteed unrelated to international realities.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has talked about the need for international commodity prices. I wish it were as simple as saying to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), "Go and negotiate for us an international price that will be sustained." We have seen what has happened. For example, look at the international cocoa prices, the international oil prices, the international commodity prices on all the foodstuffs, and the coffee prices. For a time these agencies may have served, but they break down and become victims of their own bigness. They become cartels unto themselves which in many cases preclude other people from getting into the business.

In considering the aspects of this motion before us, let us consider the changes that have been made in Canada in agriculture over the past few years. I am speaking about the new technologies that have been brought about, the use of fertilizers, herbicides, new types of plants and new types of wheat. I am proud to say that the most rust resistant and hardiest brand of wheat was developed here in Canada by a Canadian. This is something of which we can be very proud.

Second is this trend toward consolidation. Consolidation may be harmful in some respects. It may require dramatic changes. It may drive people off the farms, but it is also efficient. There are two sides of the coin.

Third, let us look at what we have been doing for the wheat farmers in terms of the new institutions that we have in Canada. We have the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Transport, and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. They are involved in production and transportation. We have the Canadian Grain Commission. We have the Canada Grains Council. We have the International Grains Institute. We have the Grain Transportation Co-Ordinator's office which is based in Winnipeg.

We have also undertaken to help farmers through new technologies of forecasting our agricultural needs. This goes into the aspect of what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville was talking about in terms of what we do about planning. We have undertaken a means by which we can project fairly accurately what our grain production is going to be on a five-year cycle. The first projections related to the years 1971-1975. They are now being forecast up to the year 2000. We also have the operations of the United States department of agriculture, the World Bank, the Canadian Wheat Board, the Canadian Grains Council, all involved in helping to make the forecasts.

There is one aspect of this which I feel is very important. That is the symposium being sponsored by the Canadian Wheat Board on the future capacity of western Canada's grain producing aspects—what are they going to be able to produce? I quote from The Globe and Mail on this. "There is going to be a symposium in which our object will be to assess the current productive capacity of the prairies in grains and oil seeds."

It would be premature for us immediately to introduce a motion like this which guarantees a floor price without having the benefit of what this symposium is going to bring to us. What they are also going to be looking at is how we can reach our projection of 30 million tonnes by 1985 and 36 million by 1990. How can we increase exports to those levels? These are the targets that have been set in the Booze-Allen study. How can we identify a necessary strategy for short and long-term action to ensure that these production targets are met?

We recognize that we have problems in the area of transportation. The minister brought these to our attention. I am happy to say that we are doing something about it. Maybe some of this policy has been targeted as being double tracking. We call it upgrading of existing rail facilities to help that export. We are also dealing with the procurement of a number of new hopper cars. There are 2,000 new cars that have recently been put in service by the Canadian Wheat Board. Another 650 have been leased for the year by the Manitoba government. There are outstanding orders for 1,000 from Alberta and Saskatchewan. These will bring to 16,000 the number of available cars.

Mr. Knowles: Go back to the first part of your speech. It was the best part.

Mr. Peterson: This is a part that I took from an old speech that was given by you, good sir, in this House a long time ago. It came from somewhere anyway, some source of which I am equally proud if it did not come from you. It was certainly post-depression in terms of the quality of debate that has been going on in this House.

Let me conclude. While all of us support this type of thrust, let us proceed to do the further studying that is necessary. Let us proceed with the symposium that is coming up, which can help us assess our real needs. Let us realize the differences that are taking place in the international community. Let us recognize the needs that we are going to have to meet in helping other people become self-sufficient as well.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Peterson: I would be happy to have a question from members opposite. I would be happy to have the support of my colleagues in continuing what I think is a very important debate in this House this afternoon.

In conclusion, let me say I have appreciated the opportunity of listening to the remarks of hon. members opposite. I hope that the spirit of this bill will always be before this House as we are considering important issues of this nature.

Grain Prices

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Kempling: He cuts his lawn every weekend.

Mr. Evans: Yes I do. I am proud to do it. If those clippings could be brought together in one place, I would be glad to make them available to feed cattle.

Hon. members today have put forward a motion that has to do with a floor price for grain and oil seeds. I would like to say a few words about the problems that I see in establishing such a floor price and some of the difficulties that we would face if such a program were to be brought forward. Some of these difficulties deal with the estimation of farm production costs.

Mr. Knowles: Look to the Speaker. Don't look to the door.

Mr. Kempling: Black Rod is going to get you.

Mr. Evans: I was not referring to the door. I was referring to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to whom I always look for wisdom and advice.

Unfortunately there are major difficulties in estimating the production costs that would be necessary to establish a meaningful floor price for these grains and oil seeds. First, there is a lack of determined price information for the farmer's own labour and management, which are major inputs into the cost of production. Second, there are problems of computing an opportunity cost for the use of crop land. Finally, there is the extremely wide variability for the cost of producing a farm commodity such as grain in different parts of the prairie provinces.

Madam Speaker, if we had more time this afternoon I would like to go into detail in all of these areas and indicate the economics of establishing a minimum price for grains and oil seeds and why I would not think it would be a wise thing for us to do at this time.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, there have been some discussions in the House with respect to the availability to members of Parliament for their use, of copies of Bill C-36. The bill is in great demand by all members. I wonder if it might facilitate things, particularly for the printing and distribution branch and for the operation of the House of Commons, not to mention the members, if the House could agree to an order to have extra copies of Bill C-36 printed for the use of members of Parliament in a quantity that would be acceptable to the Clerk of the House of Commons. I put it as precisely as that to assist you and hon. members in understanding the purport of what I ask.

Madam Speaker: I suppose the House has no objection. In fact we are overwhelmed with requests for this bill. If the House agrees, we will see to it that supplementary copies are printed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill C-28, an act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act; and Bill C-36, an act respecting the national anthem of Canada.

• (1700)

ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1710)

And being returned:

Madam Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-36, an act respecting the national anthem of Canada—Chapter No. 5.

Bill C-17, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act—Chapter No. 6.

Bill C-27, an act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act—Chapter No. 7.

Bill S-3, an act to amend an act to provide for the appointment of a Port Warden for the harbour of Quebec and to amend an act to amend and consolidate the acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the harbour of Montreal—Chapter No. 8.

Bill C-21, an act to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers—Chapter No. 9.

Bill C-20, an act to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act—Chapter No. 10.

Bill C-28, an act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act—Chapter No. 11.

Madam Speaker: It being five o'clock, pursuant to the provisions of subsections 1 and 3 of Standing Order 2, the House stands adjourned until Wednesday, July 2, 1980, at 2 p.m.

[English]

I invite all hon. members to come and celebrate this great event for Canada and its people in my chambers.

At 5.13 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INCLUSION OF ALLEGED PROPAGANDA PAMPHLETS WITH PAY CHEQUES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency concerning the very worthy campaign for funds being conducted by the University of Ottawa, headed by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), but concerning collection activities within the public service that are serious breaches of the law and regulations. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the House requests three ministers of the Crown to give full explanations in regard to coercing public servants and the breaking of laws and regulations, namely, the President of the Treasury Board authorizing, on request of the Minister of Transport, the soliciting of 60,000 public servants at work, inclusion of propaganda pamphlets with June pay cheques, contrary to chapter 328 of Treasury Board charitable campaigns manual, the Minister of National Revenue for allowing charitable donation tax receipts involving gifts to donors, contrary to the Income Tax Act and, finally, the Minister of Supply and Services for permitting the coercive letter dated May 21, signed by his deputy minister, G. R. D'Avignon, and addressed to all employees of supply administration.

Copies of both documents I have with me.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INCREASE IN GIS PAYMENTS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

The super minister of social development has not yet had an opportunity to draft guidelines for junior ministers and, as a result, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in a publicity-seeking public statement—presumably made without clearance—said that the Ontario government intends to pocket the increase in the guaranteed annual income supplement effective July 1, 1980. Since the minister failed to produce any tangible proof of her allegations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare table written proof of her allegations or resign.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF RAPE VICTIMS—SUPREME COURT RULING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada ruled on Friday last that women who are victims of alleged rapes must be subjected during a voir dire to the trauma and the humiliation of cross-examination about their previous sexual history, and in view of the fact that rape is a crime of violence and evidence of previous sexual conduct, either with the accused or others, is totally irrelevant, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House call upon the Minister of Justice to take immediate steps to enact promised and long overdue amendments to Canada's archaic and sexist rape laws, including amendments to deny absolutely any right to cross-examine the rape complainant on previous sexual activities either with the accused or with other persons.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HIGH LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43.

Whereas Canada has one million people unemployed, whereas the federal government is still overspending, and whereas we are paying millions of dollars for imported oil, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House urge Prime Minister to give these problems more attention and spend less time playing with his yo-yo.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

EROSION PROBLEMS IN SCARBOROUGH, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering the plight of many home owners in Scarborough who stand to lose their homes because of severe erosion problems to the Scarborough bluffs, caused in part by the St. Lawrence Seaway Power Authority adjusting Lake Ontario water levels, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Minister of Public Works, a resident of the area, be requested to immediately commence discussion with the metro Toronto regional conservation authority as to a course of action and suitable funding to secure the base of the bluffs before more homes are lost over the 115 metres drop into Lake Ontario.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ISSUANCE OF FOREIGN WORK VISAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in connection with the urgent need to prevent Canadian jobs being given away through the issuance of foreign work visas.

Foreign crews have been given visas for jobs which should have gone to unemployed Canadians to work on ships in the Arctic; unemployed Canadian union workers have been disregarded while non-union American workers were hired for work on the Whistler Mountain development in British Columbia, also, foreign iron workers have been brought in to Kelowna to build a fruit plant. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration launch an immediate inquiry to determine who made these decisions and inform this House what steps he has taken to stop such union-busting tactics, and ensure that in future no work visas will be issued to foreign workers while Canadian workers remain unemployed.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion would require unanimous consent before it could be put to the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HARBOURS

HALIFAX HARBOUR—BRIDGE PIER PROTECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to propose a motion which I wish could have been seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan); it will be seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby).

Given the almost tenfold increase in ship traffic under the MacKay and MacDonald bridges spanning Halifax harbour expected with the completion with the second container pier, and noting that the two bridges accommodated a traffic volume in excess of two million vehicles in the first four or five months of this year alone, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West:

That the federal government take immediate action to set up measures to instal bridge pier protection in order to reduce the possibility of a major catastrophe resulting in extensive loss of life should such action not be taken in the near future.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE PENSIONS BEFORE SUMMER RECESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House agrees not to adjourn for a summer recess until the promised legislation respecting veterans and their survivors has been introduced, passed by both Houses, and given royal assent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

DELAY IN FEDERAL FUNDING OF PROJECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

In light of this government's stated commitment to put people first and to expand its employment program for young people, and because at least five summer youth employment programs in the Peterborough riding have not received their promised federal funding six weeks after their programs began—a delay that is causing great financial difficulty for many young people and has greatly diminished the effectiveness of these programs—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott):

That this government be condemned for its tardiness in meeting payroll commitments, and that the minister responsible for employment and immigration immediately implement a system that will guarantee the issuance of cheques for future student employment projects within a reasonable length of time.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA DAY

PERSONS REQUIRED TO WORK ON JULY 1—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. A number of companies and businesses disregarded our national holiday yesterday and showed disrespect for Canada and Dominion Day by giving their employees Monday, June 30, as a holiday and expecting them to work on July 1. No other nation in the world would permit such disrespect for its heritage.

● (1415)

While it may be convenient for some just to have another long weekend, surely Canada is more important than a Monday off. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

That this House express its total dissatisfaction with those companies and businesses which elected to operate and carry on as usual on July 1, and that this House direct the government to alter the provisions of Bill C-37 to make employment of persons other than those in absolutely essential businesses illegal on Canada Day as expressed in that bill.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

VENICE SUMMIT—DISCUSSIONS WITH PRESIDENT CARTER

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It relates to the Venice Summit discussions. I presume that the Prime Minister will be making a statement on motions some time later, but pending that I wish to put a question to him relating to the Venice meetings.

During the Summit the Prime Minister had the opportunity to meet with President Carter, at which time he undoubtedly discussed some of the important problems of a bilateral nature between our two countries. One of these of considerable concern is the Buy America program. The problems in this particular area have been compounded recently by the announcement by New York state authorities imposing controls on imports of steel.

In view of the substantial trade deficit between Canada and the United States, did the Prime Minister seek and receive any assurance from the president that Canadian exporters might receive some relief from the provisions of the Buy America regulations? I ask this question particularly because of the substantial increase in the trade deficit between our two countries in the first four months of this year.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in the meeting I had with President Carter I discussed several subjects of bilateral concern, but I did not raise this one.

Mr. Wilson: That really does surprise me, Madam Speaker, in view of the number of times the Prime Minister's party raised questions in the House last year, with me in particular, as to the importance that his party placed on the effect that Buy America has on particular industries, and more particularly the surface transportation industry.

Pursuant to that, did the Prime Minister ask for assurances from President Carter that new initiatives would be taken by the administration to press for early ratification by the Senate of the Canada-U.S. east coast fisheries treaty and, in particular, initiatives to counter the proposed amendments of senators Pell and Kennedy?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker, that was one of the subjects I discussed with President Carter, and that took some time.

Mr. Nowlan: What assurances did you get?

Mr. Wilson: I hope that in his statement on motions the Prime Minister will be somewhat more forthcoming in the event that he did not forget these important discussions on his trip to the northern part of that continent.

Did the Prime Minister discuss with the president the possibility of any joint initiatives, including import restrictions, by the U.S. and Canada designed to lessen the impact of the import of foreign cars on the severe unemployment problems being experienced by workers in the automobile industry? If so, could he today elaborate on these discussions for the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, perhaps I should save the hon. member some time by indicating that I did not raise all the outstanding bilateral questions between the United States and Canada. I did discuss the fisheries problem; I did discuss the territorial sea boundaries; I did discuss the Garrison subject; and I also discussed the pre-build problem.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—DISCUSSIONS WITH PRESIDENT CARTER—INCREASED USE OF COAL

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given that the United States Senate has passed a bill to convert some 80 power plants from oil to acid rain-producing coal, when the Prime Minister met with President Carter last week in Europe, among the urgent bilateral matters he discussed with the president did he urge the United States government not to proceed with the power plant conversions; or did he at least express to the president Canada's hope that these conversions would include technological provisions to guarantee that pollution will not be increased in either Canada or the United States?

• (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member refers to the communiqué he will see that this matter was included in the multilateral agreements between the seven members of the Summit. Therefore, President Carter is perfectly aware of the requirements of Canada and other states with regard to environmental pollution crossing boundaries.

I might add, for the hon. member's information, that I did discuss this question again in the northern countries because they, too, are faced with a similar type of problem with acid rain and problems from parts of Europe south of them. We agreed to exchange further information on this subject in the hope that we might establish some international regime dealing with this kind of matter.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has referred to the Venice Summit communiqué. As he knows, that particular communiqué commits Canada and the other six countries to doubling coal production and use by early 1990. How does the Prime Minister reconcile that particular goal, since he mentioned it, with Canada's goal to reduce acid rain pollution caused by that very source?

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member refers to the communiqué he will see that this provision on increasing the use of coal was stated along with an indication that environmental questions should be taken into account in proceeding in that direction.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

CONSTRUCTION OF ALASKA HIGHWAY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. About ten days ago the senator who is in charge of the northern pipeline headed a delegation to Washington on behalf of Canada to obtain, as I understand it, agreement on two important points to Canadians. The first was to obtain assurances from the United States government that they would fulfil their obligations under the agreement to build the pipeline and, second, to obtain from private sources in the Unites States their assurances that they would provide the necessary financing.

Would the minister, in light of the motion which was passed in the United States Senate just before the weekend, and in light of the failure to obtain guarantees for financing from private sources, confirm to the House that Senator Olson's trip was a complete disaster in terms of Canadians interests?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, not only did Senator Olson go to the United States ten days ago but he also went last Friday, accompanied by officials, for meetings with spokesmen from both minority and majority parties in Congress.

The purpose of Senator Olson's trip was not to get assurances of financing from the private consortium involved; it was to get assurances from the U.S. authorities, both the administration and the legislative branch, that they were fully behind the Alaska gas pipeline, and they were committed to see its construction and completion by 1985. In that respect, the trips by Senator Olson proved to be outstanding successes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, since the resolution—I have a copy of it before me—makes no reference at all to U.S. Congress providing the guarantees that are necessary to complete the project by 1985, guarantees which are absolutely crucial for the resolution to have any meaning in terms of law, I would repeat my assertion at the outset, that what the senator went for was not successfully completed. A pious expression of wishes is one thing; signing on the dotted line, as the minister knows, is quite another.

I should like to ask the minister, since in the bill which was passed by Parliament two years ago it specifically asserted that—I quote from section 12—the pipeline would not be proceeded with unless "financing has been obtained for the pipeline", and since the minister himself said last December that, to use his phrase, ironclad guarantees had to be obtained before any part of the pipeline would be proceeded with, does the Government of Canada today stand by these commitments?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, it is thanks to the very firm stand taken by this government that we have succeeded in obtaining very strong additional guarantees from the U.S. authorities. In addition, now there is a firm contract signed between the producers and distributors in the United States by which those companies will spend $500 million for the engineering and design of the pipeline. That was signed last week, or a couple of weeks ago.

● (1425)

Last Friday, the Senate passed the resolution to which the hon. member referred, and I believe yesterday the House of Representatives passed a similar resolution. The fact that we have those large commitments from the private sector and also that we have such clear and strong assurances—stronger than we ever had in the past—from the American authorities, both on the administrative and the legislative side, I think, is a pretty good achievement on the part of this government.

As to the specific question raised by the hon. member, the National Energy Board also is considering reviewing the four conditions which it has put forward before considering approval of the pre-build. We will hear the conclusions of the National Energy Board and the government, the cabinet, will consider the whole issue once we have reports to that effect.

Also, I might mention to the hon. member that the government has requested the American authorities to give quick approval to four gas export licences which are still in suspense.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I have a final supplementary question on this very important matter which the minister recognizes. Last week, before the committee of the House looking into the pipeline, Mr. Edge said—and I do not know if it was a slip of the tongue or not—that what was now being discussed in terms of the southern portion under discussion for pre-building was really a "different project", not the same pipeline.

I should like to ask the minister the following question: does he disagree that what is now being discussed is a different project? Does he think it is the same, or different? If he thinks it is the same, will he stand by the original guarantees in the act to which he committed himself last December? If he is now agreeing that it should be defined as a different project, will he assure the House that before pre-building starts, that measure will be brought before Parliament for agreement?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. member that we share his concern about this whole project, and that this government has given a great deal of time and attention to this issue since we took office. Our purpose is to see to it that the whole Alaska gas pipeline is built. The pre-build aspect must be looked at only in the context of the completion of the whole line. This is the policy of this government, and this is the policy we will stand by.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of recent announcements by Petro-Canada concerning the supply of gas from the High Arctic to Quebec and eastern Canada, and the favourable results being obtained from Beaufort Sea oil and gas exploration which would do much to improve Canada's energy self-sufficiency, could the minister please advise the House what response the government will make with respect to the resolution passed last weekend at the Inuit Circumpolar Conference in Greenland which called for a moratorium on economic development in the Canadian north until Inuit land claims are settled?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I did not have the opportunity to read the text of those resolutions. I heard about them on the radio. I must assure the hon. member that the cabinet will thoroughly consider the representations made by the spokesmen for the Inuit. It is clear, however, that we must take into consideration the general interests of all Canadians as pointed out by the hon. member, especially the importance for Canada to attain energy self-sufficiency as soon as possible, especially as far as oil supplies are concerned.

● (1430)

Mr. Nickerson: I must say, Madam Speaker, I find that an eminently sensible reply, considering where it came from. I would like to address my supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

At that Circumpolar Conference, the spokesman for the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada said that in his opinion the outstanding land claims could be settled in about a year. I should like to know whether the minister is of the same opinion, whether he supports the position of the ITC spokesman that there should be a moratorium, and if this matter is not able to be reconciled within a year will he allow the hopes of Petro-Canada—that great hope of the Liberal party—to be jeopardized on that account?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that the Inuit leader was quite correct in that we are going to have a negotiator appointed, probably in mid-August. That is the time the Inuit indicated they would be ready to start negotiations. This depends entirely on how well negotiations go. I sense that both parties want a settlement quickly, so that augurs well for settlement within a year.

As I responded to the hon. member before, there has been—this deals with the latter part of the hon. member's question—absolutely no decision on creating a moratorium in the north at this time. I informed the hon. member of that earlier.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DREE GRANTS FOR DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and I have given him notice. Will he confirm that New Brunswick will receive $10 million to $15 million less than anticipated from DREE for development programs, and that he has so informed the Premier of New Brunswick?

Is it possible that these funds be reallocated so that the thrust of the good work DREE does in New Brunswick is not diminished?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I have read Mr. Hatfield's statement and I think that essentially he is asking that the budget of my department be substantially increased. I concur of course with Mr. Hatfield's appeal. On the other hand, the budget of my department earmarked for New Brunswick this year will indeed be lower than last year. I think it will be about $50 million. It will be lower, it is true, but I would remind the hon. member that I am operating under a budget set up by the previous government which deemed it advisable to reduce it.

[English]

Mr. Howie: Madam Speaker, I agree with the minister that his department is badly underfunded, and I hope he instituted remedial measures on taking office several months ago. Can the minister assure me, where DREE is obviously underfunded, that DREE funds will not be used for projects other departments should be undertaking, like the Toronto waterfront development, railway relocations and extensions of transportation facilities?

May I repeat my question? I am sorry I went too fast. Can the minister assure me that where, as he has indicated, DREE is obviously underfunded, DREE funds will not be used for projects which are really the obligation of other departments, like transport facility extensions, the Toronto waterfront development, railway relocations and things of that nature?

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, naturally, as a matter of principle, I do not finance projects that can be undertaken by other departments. However, it often happens that with the help of DREE some projects can be completed much more quickly than if they had been left entirely to the sole resources of other departments. So, in that sense, we sometimes finance operations jointly with other departments. Still, as the Prime Minister pointed out during the throne speech debate, the policy of our department is to make sure that all Canadians have bread before some of them have cake.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

VENICE SUMMIT—REQUEST PRIME MINISTER MAKE STATEMENT ON MOTIONS—ENERGY NEGOTIATIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have some questions regarding the Prime Minister's timetable. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could tell us when he expects to make a statement on motions in this House on the results of the bilateral and multilateral discussions he had in Venice.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I had not intended making a statement, Madam Speaker, and I thought the Leader of the Opposition's office had been advised to that effect. My willingness to answer questions on the subject, of course, is as great as it ever was.

Mr. Clark: That, Madam Speaker, is precisely what troubles us. I find it unacceptable that the Prime Minister should come back to a Parliament which is sitting, after being involved in discussions of great import to the country, and refuse to come before us with a statement on motions. I hope he will reconsider.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I should like to ask him another question regarding his timetable. Now that the Prime Minister has had to take over the energy negotiations because of the failure of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, can he tell us what dates have been established—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: There is some shouting from the Liberal backbenchers. Can the Prime Minister tell us what date or dates have been established for the meeting between the Prime Minister, the Premier of Alberta, and no doubt subsequently with other premiers, so we can have a permanent agreement after the temporary extension expires at the end of this month?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, regarding statements on motions, I am sure various views can be entertained as to their usefulness, but my recollection is that when a statement on motions is made, it is generally said it does not answer the questions the opposition had in mind. For that reason opposition leaders find reason and justification to make long statements of their own, all of which takes the time of Parliament at a time when urgent legislation is necessary.

To avoid all this I thought it equally useful to indicate my willingness to answer questions. I have already answered several questions today on the subject of the Summit and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will be able to ask a few questions.

There was a second part of the question, Madam Speaker, concerning energy negotiations. I want to tell the Leader of the Opposition that I have not, to use his words, taken over the energy negotiations. I have just returned from the Venice Summit and other meetings and I have not yet had an opportunity to discuss with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the future timetable of these discussions.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has been so long out of practice in making statements on motions in this House that I gather he has forgotten their utility to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would remind him that we now have 29 days before the expiry of the second agreement on energy pricing. The country cannot wait forever for the Prime Minister to arrange his itinerary in order to fit in this little matter.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister could simply indicate that he understands the severity of the failure to agree, and can he confirm that unless there is agreement on a comprehensive energy program by the first of August, the development of a new oil sands plant, the Alsands plant, will be delayed by at least a year, at a cost of some 55,000 jobs right across this country.

• (1440)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, on the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition, I would suggest it is not quite fair to say that it is a matter of practice. Just a couple of weeks ago, after the first ministers' conference here in Ottawa I made a statement on motions, which was followed by statements on motions by the leaders of the opposition parties. I answered questions for over an hour! I believe that the whole process took close to two hours.

Therefore, it is possible to take this time in Parliament; but I hoped that, as some of the hon. member's colleagues did today, I would be asked to answer specific areas of concern to the opposition parties. I indicated that I was prepared to answer such questions.

With regard to the second part of the question, I would appreciate it if it were addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who is handling this matter.

TRADE IMBALANCE WITH UNITED STATES—EFFECT ON STEEL AND AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister no doubt heard the Prime Minister indicate that in discussions with the President of the United States, the matter of the recent action by New York state as it affects the steel industry was not raised.

Is the minister aware that 16 states now have Buy American policies which detrimentally affect Canada; that 35 states have policies, legislative or otherwise, which detrimentally affect the purchase of Canadian products; that the Steel Company of Canada now suffers a deficit with regard to the purchase of raw materials as against the sale of finished products to the United States, and that we suffer from a $1.3 billion deficit?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deans: Are you finished?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deans: Is it the intention of the minister to make representation to the U.S. governments, both state and federal, in an effort to correct the imbalances which presently exist and which cost Canadians jobs?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, as usual, my hon. friend is rather late in raising this important subject: we have already been making such representations, and we will continue to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: It has not had a lot of effect.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, the minister has indicated that we are late. Can I assume that he will have the same degree of success in raising this matter as the minister had with the auto industry, mining industry, natural gas industry and pipeline industry in attempting to guarantee Canadians that their economy will be put first?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am optimistic that our efforts will have the same results as the efforts of the Liberal party did in northern Ontario when the New Democratic Party was wiped out because they were not able to serve the interests of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY CONCERNING DECISION ON SALE OF NORDAIR

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It deals with the sale of Nordair. Can the Minister of Transport first tell the House what factors are now delaying a decision with regard to that file and, secondly, when does he intend to reach a final decision with regard to the effective sale of Nordair?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we are now putting the final touch to the terms and conditions of sale; in a few days, these will be made known to one of the possible buyers and if the latter meets those conditions, he can then buy Nordair.

AGRICULTURE

INFECTIOUS DISEASES IN IMPORTED SHEEP—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ERADICATE

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It involves a serious problem regarding the importation of sheep into Canada. Documented cases indicated that sheep imported from Great Britain have been infected with highly infectious diseases, one being enzootic abortion and the other being pulmonary adenomatosis. During the three-year quarantine period the sheep were not checked for these diseases.

Can the minister assure this House that further importations will be checked more closely for these and other diseases that may be common only in their place of origin? For example, sheep are soon to be imported from France: will these sheep be checked more closely while in quarantine, or will some other infectious disease be confirmed after the sheep are dispersed to the public?

An hon. Member: He has pulled the wool over our eyes.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, that such a thing as the hon. member has described could happen is of great concern to my department. We regard the Canadian quarantine system as the best in the world. However, that does not mean that it does not have some problems, or that it will not make mistakes. This problem which seems to exist in some of the flocks which have been imported has been double-checked. I am sure the hon. member is aware that the only way to check the sheep for disease is by slaughtering them.

Miss MacDonald: That is pretty final.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member has also mentioned sheep which will be imported from France. Every precautionary measure known will be taken when these sheep are put into quarantine at the Grosse Isle quarantine station.

Mr. Gass: Madam Speaker, contrary to what is said, there is a way of checking for enzootic abortion, and it is not by slaughtering the ewe. It can be done by checking the foetus after it has been aborted. This method was not practiced during the three years of quarantine in Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton.

Is the minister considering compensating farmers who have purchased these diseased sheep from government-run importation groups for the purpose of improving their flocks? If so, what form will the compensation take?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, if proof can be shown that the problem was due to some neglect on the part of the officers in charge of the quarantine, then proper compensation will be made to the people who purchased these sheep. We value very highly the record which we have because, as I have said, it is one of the best records in the world. Because of our ability to provide disease-free sheep, we have a great export business.

What the hon. member has said about enzootic abortion is true, but I understand that it was not brought to the attention of our veterinarians, otherwise tests could have been carried out much sooner than they were.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

OPP INVESTIGATION INTO "OPERATION CHECKMATE"

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Solicitor General. According to a report in The Globe and Mail last week, the attorney general of Ontario has alleged that the RCMP is withholding documentation requested by the Ontario Provincial Police in their investigation into Operation Checkmate. Will the minister advise the House if any documentation or information is being withheld and, if so, whether or not it will be released?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I read the report in The Globe and Mail to which the hon. member has referred. I can assure the House that there is no foundation to the statements attributed to the attorney general of Ontario. Shortly after becoming Solicitor General, I offered to provide him and other attorneys general with all the information which I had on Operation Checkmate. I have provided that information to the attorney general of the province of Ontario.

I think that he has a tough decision to make as to how to proceed with the information he has, but I think he should stop passing the buck to me and make his own decision on the matter.

RAILWAYS

CANADIAN NATIONAL TAKEOVER OF NORTHERN ALBERTA RAILWAY—EFFECT ON WORKERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise me of any changes affecting workers on the Northern Alberta Railway as a result of the CN takeover of the NAR in Alberta?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not have the details on the matter, but I am told that this is not the first time a railway has been taken over by another railway, and that there are procedures to be followed. The decision as to the acceptability or otherwise of the takeover is presently in the hands of the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, can the minister assure me, in light of this change, that the 65 people in Roma Junction, northern Alberta, who are employed by this railway will not lose their jobs because of the change of office, which is being moved to the city of Edmonton some 300 miles away?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I am told that workers in such instances are protected by their terms of employment. However, I will pay particular attention to the case raised by the hon. member.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The conclusion of the American delegation on the auto pact negotiations is reported in the press as follows:

> Gray was more interested in playing out a political charade for his Canadian audience, than in specific negotiations.

Mr. Deans: As usual.

Mr. Paproski: Same old Gray.

Mr. Rae: Can the minister tell us with regard to the auto pact the specific proposal he made to the Americans?

• (1450)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I do not think I have to respond to unattributed comments in press reports. But I do want to place before the House of Commons—I would be happy to table it—the joint press release made by myself and Governor Askew which concludes that "both sides felt the meeting was useful and constructive, and agreed to hold further discussions."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: If there is any charade involved here, it is with my hon. friend's attempt to show concern about this matter beyond other people who have equal and greater concern.

Mr. Clark: Equal and greater?

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, we have not had an answer to the specific question.

Mr. Clark: It is tough to be arrogant and a clown.

Mr. Rae: The reports that say that an American bureaucrat who was at the meeting said that absolutely nothing happened. Someone else said that he was still waiting for the Canadian proposals, and that no specific Canadian proposals were made. My question to the minister is this: did he make any specific proposals with regard to a fair share of investment in engineering, design, research and development, small cars and after-parts? Did the minister specifically raise any of these issues in the discussion on the auto pact last week?

Mr. Gray: Yes, Madam Speaker, I raised each and every one of them. I put our case very forcefully. We are going to continue the discussions until we get the results that we are seeking in the interests of Canadian workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: I am surprised that my hon. friend puts the weight he does on the unattributed statements of unidentified American officials; he is quite a nationalist!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOYCOTTING OF MOSCOW OLYMPIC GAMES—GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. In defence of the principles of freedom, the Conservative party has since January last stood for the boycott of the Moscow Olympics. Are the government and the Olympic committee finally going to announce that we are not officially competing, and will the government tell this to Moscow? Will it renounce Canadian officials in attendance at Canadian Olympic expense?

Will the government reconsider the presenting of the Olympic flag, which is a political contradiction, mentioned on Friday, June 27, by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands? Will the government immediately reinstate Bruce Simpson on the Canadian Olympic team who was sacked for his support of the boycott, and will it call for the resignation of Dick Pound, COA president, for his open support of the games and the firing of a great Canadian, Bruce Simpson?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there are at least ten questions in that question. Under the rules of the House, I will take them one at a time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: As a supplementary, perhaps one of the questions could be raised.

Mr. Stewart: May I put it very simply, Madam Speaker? Is the Olympic committee finally going to announce that it is not officially competing, and tell Moscow that it is not?

An hon. Member: That is one question.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, in answer to the question asked by the hon. member, may I say that the question of action by the Canadian Olympic Committee is one for it to determine. The Government of Canada has requested the Canadian Olympic Association to refuse the invitation to participate in the games in Moscow. At a subsequent meeting, the Canadian Olympic Association voted that it would accept that request of the government and that it would not participate.

The question as to whether it has formally or in any particular manner communicated its decision to Moscow is one that could be directed to the Canadian Olympic Association. It is not an affair of the government, since the association is a private sector organization.

ENERGY

OIL DEVELOPMENT OFF NEWFOUNDLAND—AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that recent results from extensive testing of the Hibernia well off Newfoundland show that potential for massive oil development is becoming more certain every day, and in view of the fact that industry and market analysts are concerned that a jurisdictional dispute between the federal and provincial governments could delay such potential development, could the minister tell us what steps he has taken to ensure that if necessary an interim agreement can be worked out with the province of Newfoundland, so as not to delay the potential development off the shores of Newfoundland?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, obviously there is considerable speculation about development in the Hibernia fields. I am afraid those speculations will continue for some time until the developers have scientifically assessed the value of those fields.

I might assure the hon. member that I have already had a meeting with my colleague from Newfoundland. At that time I indicated to him that we were eager to discuss with the government of Newfoundland any administrative arrangement that would be satisfactory to both parties and to the private sector involved in order to ensure the orderly and speedy development of those resources which I am sure will be of great benefit to all Canadians.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL—HARMFUL FUMES AFFECTING EMPLOYEES

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. My concern is with problems that have arisen recently at gates 78-80 at the Toronto international airport.

Is the minister aware that several employees at the Air Canada-Rapidair station have been taken to hospital for treatment of unidentified ailments rumoured to be caused by fumes in this one area of the airport? Will the minister investigate this matter immediately and make his findings public?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I will, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, when the minister conducts his investigation, will he inform the Air Canada employees who work in this area, so as to alleviate their fears; and will he also assure the employees who were affected by this mysterious ailment that all workmen's benefits will be available to them?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I cannot promise something before making a proper inquiry. If the ailment is so mysterious, maybe it will be mysterious to me also.

Mr. Clark: Most things are.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: But I will do my utmost to find out the causes and advise my hon. friend accordingly.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

APPLICATION FOR GAS PIPELINE TO NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister of energy. Since the government has shown some flexibility lately with respect to regional air policy, I want to ask the minister if in his field he will review most seriously the application of Q and M Pipe Lines for a gas pipeline to Nova Scotia which was rejected by the National Energy Board recently.

It is a very important matter, and I would like the minister's assurance that he is not going to let the matter lie dormant when it can do so much good for the region.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have already had two meetings with the promoters of the Q and M project and I have indicated to them that the government is still interested in seeing this project through. I have also asked them to continue their study on the environmental aspects brought up by the National Energy Board. I want to say to the hon. member that I hope he will take the same action not only with the Nova Scotia government but also, and especially, with the New Brunswick government, which has indicated some reservations as regards the rapid completion of this project. I hope to have the opportunity to discuss this again in the near future with my provincial colleagues.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, very briefly, I think I can assure the minister that the government of Nova Scotia fully supports this. I cannot speak for the government of New Brunswick. But I would remind him that there are great economic benefits as well as increased security of supply inherent in this application. Will the minister at least encourage the NEB to reopen the application?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I cannot force the NEB to reopen the application. The application can be looked at again only on the initiative of the sponsors of the project: this is where the next step or action could come from.

Again I would like to point out to the hon. member that I hope he is not suggesting we should ignore the reservations expressed by the government of New Brunswick. We should get the co-operation of all governments concerned in the maritimes before we can proceed with this particular project.

THE CONSTITUTION

DISCUSSIONS IN GREAT BRITAIN ON PATRIATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In his discussions with Prime Minister Thatcher of Britain, as well as with the leaders of the other political parties in Britain, and in view of those discussions with the three leaders in Britain, did he receive assurances from all of them that there would be quick passage of patriation of the Canadian Constitution once all steps were completed in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): What were the last three words—once what?

Mr. Epp: Once all steps were completed in Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker, I received general assurances along those lines.

Mr. Epp: Those are general assurances. I am really asking the Prime Minister whether in those discussions there were any specifics raised as to the timetable. There have been some press stories. Were timetables discussed with the three leaders? Were any timetables agreed to between the Prime Minister and those three leaders?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Madam Speaker. The only way in which the problem of timing arose was when I indicated to Prime Minister Thatcher, and perhaps one or two of the other leaders, that we had a commitment in Canada to ensure renewal of the federation in all due haste. When I say we, I mean the Parliament of Canada and every provincial premier.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY RESPECTING PRINTING OF OLYMPIC STAMP

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General. The Postmaster General reported to this House some time ago that if the Soviet Union is not out of Afghanistan by July 4, 1980, Canada will not issue an Olympic stamp.

Would the minister consider printing the stamp as originally planned, but having the word "Boycotted" imprinted across each stamp? Would this not act as a more effective symbolic reminder to people in Canada and throughout the world that Canada is still boycotting the Moscow Olympic Games?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, that is indeed a very interesting suggestion. Unfortunately, at this stage in the production of the stamps anything superimposed could damage the original stamp. Rather than that, I will announce tomorrow, in a press release, that this issue has been destroyed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—LETTER FROM OFFICE OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I thank you, Madam Speaker, for allowing me to bring this up. I would have given longer notice had it been possible.

About an hour ago I received an envelope bearing the heading "Health and Welfare Canada", originating in the office of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), addressed to Tom Cossitt, MP, House of Commons, Ottawa. I feel it is absolutely pertinent to my question of privilege that I read the two short paragraphs that are contained in this letter or document along with the heading above. It reads as follows:

To: All Liberal Members of Parliament:

From: Sheila Zimmerman, Special Assistant

Date: July 1, 1980

Subject: New Horizons

You will find enclosed description of New Horizons projects submitted by groups in your riding which have been recommended in the most recent series.

The names of these projects will be announced to the press on July 9, 1980, by the Minister of Health and Welfare. If you have any objections to make about projects selected from your riding, please let us know before that date.

I feel it leads to this question which is a matter of privilege: do Liberal members have the right to veto New Horizons applications by groups of senior citizens in this country? After all, that is what it says right here. If it is true, it is a shocking breach of the privileges of this House and another travesty of justice respecting hundreds of senior citizens and groups of senior citizens from one end of Canada to the other.

This letter also indicates that the government does not consider all members of this House equal. In other words, although we are all members of Parliament duly elected by the people, over there there are privileges that we do not have. In this particular case I feel sure there is no one on this side who would want the privileges they have over there, namely, the right to rebuke and veto the legitimate applications of senior citizens.

The letter also contains more than just a mild and nasty implication that the government is using New Horizons grants for political purposes on behalf of the Liberal members of this House, which I contend is a breach of parliamentary privilege. According to this letter, they are given eight days to say, "Yes", or "No"; "We will permit this grant," or "We will not permit this grant," as the case may be. One can also wonder whether this same system that they have now applied to the New Horizons grants applies to all other grants this government is involved in when it comes to dealing with other types of things and other groups across this country.

In conclusion, I believe this shameful matter is definitely a matter of privilege. It should be investigated by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I would like to reserve my right to move that it be referred to that committee if such appears to be appropriate in due course.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I suggest that the most serious mistake which this question of privilege has brought to light is to have considered the hon. member as a Liberal. Besides that, I should think that it would be elementary for the House to permit me to have a look at the letter or memorandum and to check its content. I saw this memorandum at the beginning of my tenure. As far as I can remember, it does not deal with a veto of any sort. This is an ordinary sort of memorandum which is sent to government members just like those which were sent by the previous government when they wanted to get an input from their own people about many community programs. It is clear and it is the basis for this whole argument, that if the hon. member prepared a list of all the New Horizon projects which have been approved in Canada, he would realize that all ridings get their fair share under this program, no matter their political affiliation, the political party of their elected members or their geographical situation in Canada. That is what matters. This is clear, and I have always encouraged hon. members to do this. I take this opportunity again to tell the hon. member directly who took offence and who raised this question of privilege, to contact the local office of the New Horizons program if he has representations to make. Sometimes, a number of hon. members may indicate to the minister's staff or the official in charge of the decentralized administration of this program, that such or such a group of senior citizens does not seem to submit a legitimate project. We would discuss the issue with hon. members and clear the air. There have been times even when projects were consolidated, that boards of directors were replaced by a more structured one, and other similar things. Therefore, I do not quite see the point of the hon. member's question of privilege, but I ask to reserve the elementary right to examine again the memorandum.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is asking for the right to reserve this matter so he can bring a question of privilege later, after the minister has had a chance to review this very selective letter inviting a secret veto on various government programs, extending that right exclusively to members of Parliament on one side of the House, Liberal members of Parliament, and not to others. What is important to underline here is that in the initial remarks made by the minister, remarks based upon what she admits was a lack of information, the minister suggested that there was—

Miss Bégin: No.

Mr. Clark: —the minister tells me she did not say that, but she has not seen the memorandum.

Miss Bégin: I do not have it in my hand.

Mr. Clark: It is among the things that she does not have in her hand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1510)

Mr. Clark: Two points arise here. One has to do with the fact that there appears to be an established practice within this government of consulting not with all members of the House of Commons but simply with Liberal members of the House of Commons regarding policies and practices which affect the citizens represented in this chamber not simply by Liberals but by members from all political parties. That is one aspect, and that practice is clearly wrong on the face of it; it is a matter which, in my judgment, deserves serious consideration as a question of privilege by a committee of the House.

The other matter, almost as dangerous, as was indicated by my hon. friend when he raised this point, is that we appear to have here, over the authority of the signature of a minister of the Crown, a secret veto system which allows Liberal members, presumably for Liberal party purposes, since it was sent only to Liberal members, to veto, to cancel, and to undermine New Horizons programs, grants which might have been made on the basis of merit, because they might not accord with the partisan interests of the Liberal Party of Canada. That is a totally unacceptable procedure and we should not allow the Minister of National Health and Welfare to suggest that this is a practice which could somehow be condoned because there have been other instances in which there has been open consultation with members on both sides of the House. This is a case which is clearly distinct from those other instances. It is distinct because the opportunity for consultation was confined to members of the Liberal party, and it is distinct because there is a clear request, a clear invitation from the minister's officials to Liberal members of Parliament, to have decisions which might have been made for reasons of merit undercut and undermined for reasons of Liberal partisan politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I should like to add one point to this discussion and suggest it would be even more a question of privilege if this veto is to be applied by the Liberal twin members of members who are elected by the people to the Progressive Conservative Party or the New Democratic Party. The Liberal party has taken upon itself the totalitarian concept of appointing a member to represent a constituency in western Canada, and if that member is now going to be able to veto applications from senior citizens in the twin ridings it would, indeed, be a catastrophe.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the critical question, it seems to me, is not that members of Parliament have been advised that New Horizons projects were taking place in their ridings or that projects would be approved on a certain date; the critical question is that members on the government side are given an advantage, or appear to be given an advantage, or may have been given an advantage which other members have not.

May I refer you, Madam Speaker, to a precedent in the last Parliament? My hon. friend from Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) raised the question of partisan political committees formed by the party which was then in power to study particular questions, committees to which a budget was allocated by the government of that day and to which members of opposition parties had no access.

As I say, the critical question seems to be whether advantages are being given to Liberal members of Parliament which are not open to other members. If so, precisely what are they? If they are being given an advantage, I would suggest that on the precedent of a ruling given in that case by Mr. Speaker Jerome, it appears to me the privileges or rights of members on this side are being prejudiced in their ability to represent their constituents in the same way as Liberal members are able to do so.

Quite apart from partisan bickering back and forth, if there is an advantage being given to Liberal members which is not given to others, there is unfairness involved and it is a practice which should stop—not by cutting off information from members of Parliament but by saying to all members, "If you have a reasoned objection to a particular proposal, the minister would like to discuss it with you in a reasoned way". It would not be a case of a member having an absolute veto over something which does, or does not go on, in his or her riding. I should like to hear from the minister on this question because it seems to me we all need to be enlightened as to exactly what is the government's practice.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, when ruling on this question of privilege I should like you to take into consideration a matter which has been brought to my attention in the riding of Peterborough recently. It has long been the practice among all members of Parliament to send out congratulatory letters to new Canadian citizens as they receive their citizenship certificates. I should like to bring it to the attention of the House that a directive went out two weeks ago—and I would remind you, Madam Speaker, that Peterborough is no longer represented by a Liberal—to the citizenship office opened by the former Liberal member and minister in Peterborough advising the office of citizenship that it was no longer to send a list of new Canadians who received their citizenship in Peterborough to the present Conservative member of Parliament in the city of Peterborough.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I find it amazing that the opposition is criticizing the minister for consulting members of her own party without, of course, shirking in any way the responsibility for making all her own decisions. Criticizing the minister for consulting her colleagues seems to me not only unacceptable, but most amazing if we consider how the Conservatives administered the Local Initiatives Program during their brief stay in power.

Madam Speaker, you will recall how the program has been administered for about ten years, when the member concerned, whatever his party, made his recommendations to the minister. However, during the few months that the Conservatives were in power—and I am thinking about the region that I represented, the Gaspé peninsula, where no Conservative member was elected—the then minister, Mr. Atkey, ignored the recommendations of elected members and consulted defeated candidates of the Progressive Conservative Party. And I still recall hearing Mr. Atkey explain in the House why, contrary to the previous Liberal government, he would consult defeated Conservative candidates.

Therefore, criticizing the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) for consulting certain members of Parliament without evading her own responsibilities seems to me completely unjustified, especially coming from a party which, during its brief stay in power, ignored this basic rule of consulting the elected members of Parliament.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I would only like to add a comment about the question of privilege. I believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) indicated a moment ago that she was not aware of this letter which is said to have been sent—

Miss Bégin: No, I never said that.

Mr. La Salle: I believe the minister has asked to read the letter mentioned by the hon. member. It seems clear to me, after hearing the question of privilege, that a letter allegedly has been sent to Liberal members so that they may object to a New Horizons project. I suggest that is what my colleague has said.

I know from past experience, and I appreciate very much the services of this department, that we are advised of the fact that a project will eventually be announced, and we are asked not to announce it because it is still at the development stage, so in the end we are advised a few days in advance about a given project. That is established practice. However, if it is true that Liberal members of Parliament are invited, on a particular matter, to object to a project, this is obviously inadmissible. In the circumstances, it seems that the minister wishes to have a closer look at the document mentioned today. And, with this in mind, I do hope she will correct this additional privilege which is obviously unacceptable.

As for the remarks made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) concerning our approach to the distribution of local initiative projects, Madam Speaker, a serious evaluation of the existing system since the inception of the program woud reveal there was need for corrective measures and that still holds true.

• (1520)

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, it was not my intention to intervene in the debate, but there were some queries raised by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) which I think took the matter away from the appropriate matter before you.

The question raised is the privileges which affect members of this House in relation to their work and in relation to their constituents regarding the New Horizons program, and I think we should confine our concerns to that. The program which this question can affect, the New Horizons program, is probably one of the most enlightened programs this federal government offers.

As the minister knows, there is an incredible number of applications which come in, and the criteria for selection have to be so fair, open, and above board that people will trust the selection system. This is absolutely crucial, particularly in this program—almost above any other—and it seems to me that it is incumbent upon the Chair, and certainly upon the minister, by statement or by whatever appropriate procedure that you, Madam Speaker, have at your disposal, to make sure that the credibility of the selection process is restored. It is therefore absolutely essential that the minister make that statement or, it seems to me, that you should allow for a procedure which would make sure that every senior citizen organization in this country can again trust the system of selection, now that the matter has been raised.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: At the outset, I would say that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was probably misled by the interpretation. My understanding of what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said is that she was replying with reservation as she had not recently read the memorandum in question. I think the right hon. Leader of the Opposition understood something entirely different, to the effect that she had never seen this memorandum. But, if my understanding is correct, she was expressing herself with reservation because the memorandum had been written, it seems, some time ago.

On the question of privilege, I must advise the hon. member that I was somewhat lenient with him since this question did not arise out of today's proceedings. But, as he sent me a little note during question period, I decided to hear him. Be that as it may, though I did not receive as much of an advance notice as I would have wished, I will nevertheless decide on the question of privilege. I do not think there is substance here for a question of privilege. As hon. members know, the question of privilege is very restricted. A member's privilege is usually an action of some nature which prevents him from fulfilling his duties as a member. Now, I am under the impression that all hon. members who took part in the debate today were able to fulfil their duties as members for they were able to protest against a matter which they deemed not well taken care of by the government.

As for the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), I think it is important that he distinguish between rights and privileges given to members and rights and privileges which political parties may extend to them. There is a very important distinction to be made, for the existence of parties is one thing and the existence and procedures of the House of Commons is quite another. I am referring to all the definitions given for a question of privilege. The hon. member will realize that it is extremely restricted, extremely limited and that today, in any case, there was not a question of privilege in the matter raised by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt).

Quite obviously the explanation given by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare was not satisfactory to those who took part in the discussion. But that is no concern of the Chair. I only have to decide whether there is a question of privilege or not and, in my opinion, there is not.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I may have misunderstood what you said or perhaps I was wrongly interpreted, but I want to be sure about the decision you have just rendered. There are two matters and to avoid any mistakes in French, my second language—

[English]

I will put the questions to you in English, if I might, Madam Speaker. Am I correct in my interpretation that you have now indicated that even though the hon. member had asked for the right to reserve a question, you are deciding on the question now?

Second—

Mr. Pinard: Right on.

Mr. Clark: I am told by the government House leader, who is in the habit of coaching on these questions, that we are right on. But simply for the purpose of clarification I would also like to know whether it is the ruling of Your Honour that the privileges of the House are not affected when a right is given to members of the House who are here as Liberal members of Parliament but that that right is denied members of the House who are here as Progressive Conservative and New Democratic members of Parliament.

Mr. Andre: That is the question.

Mr. Clark: Simply for certitude, in case I may have misinterpreted the statement made in a language which is my second, I would like to know if my rendition of my interpretation of those two decisions by Your Honour is the correct one.

Mr. Pinard: Ask you advisers. You are wasting our time.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I shall repeat in French to make sure I make no mistakes. I said to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that it was quite clear to me that the minister had not asked for the matter to stand. She simply said she was responding with reservations. She was giving an explanation with reservations considering it has been a while since she has seen the memo. She did not ask the Chair to reserve the matter.

[English]

Concerning the second part of the right hon. member's intervention, I have ruled on this question that there is no privilege. I have given the grounds on which my ruling is based, and therefore I have to maintain my ruling. There is no privilege in this question, and I regret to say that I cannot entertain further discussions on that ruling.

Mr. Cossitt: I have just one short point of order, Madam Speaker. Without questioning your ruling, of course, may I ask that you clarify for the House whether it is now a declared necessity that a senior citizen or a senior citizen group must cosy up to a Liberal member who, in turn, must cosy up to the minister in order to get a grant from this government?

An hon. Member: That is not what she said.

Mr. Cossitt: If that is not a question of privilege, I do not know what is.

Mr. Andre: That is the implication of that decision.

Madam Speaker: I think I can clarify that quite rapidly. It is not for the Chair to make any kind of commentary or any evaluation or appreciation on whether the actions performed by this government or by this minister are adequate or not. That was the essence of the hon. member's question of privilege. It is the hon. member's privilege to discuss the actions of the government if he wishes to do so, as long as he follows the rules of this House.

Mr. Andre: Liberals can do anything?

Madam Speaker: My ruling is based solely on the fact that the actions referred to did not prevent the member from performing his functions as a member of Parliament.

Mr. Paproski: That is exactly what happened.

• (1530)

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, following your ruling, may I say that you did not deal with one point—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I cannot entertain any further discussion on that ruling.

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, will Liberal members who have been appointed twins of other party members now have the right to veto Horizon projects in a riding? I think that is vital to this whole thing.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member must understand that I have made no judgment on the question he is now putting. If the hon. member has questions concerning that precise point, he can put them to ministers at question period, or he can debate them at other times in the course of deliberations in the House. I have not ruled on the substance of that question.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. STEWART—NOTICE OF QUESTIONS TO BE RAISED DURING ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, a few moments ago I asked of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a composite question dealing with the Olympic Games and the boycott. The right hon. gentleman asked that I put the questions one after the other. I was not given that opportunity, so I should like to request that I be given a chance to put them in the late show, with the right hon. Prime Minister or his appointee to answer them.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member can have that opportunity if he sends me a written note. His question will be put down for the late debate whenever his turn comes.

ACID RAIN POLLUTION—STUDY OF INCO FEASIBLE EMISSION REDUCTIONS

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in response to a question from the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) on June 5, my department has conducted a preliminary assessment of technically and economically feasible emission reductions for Inco's Sudbury operations. I should like to table, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), copies in both official languages of the assessment report and the executive summary of the nickel industry report.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—RELOCATION TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Question No. 82—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware that the District G Convention of the Royal Canadian Legion held in Pembroke, Ontario, discussed the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs from Ottawa to Prince Edward Island and that the branches present were not in favour of the plan?

2. Are estimates of moving costs between forty and eighty million dollars accurate and, if so, how can this expense be justified considering all of the circumstances?

3. (a) What is the total number of persons employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs (b) what was the total number (i) one (ii) two (iii) three (iv) four (v) five years ago?

4. To date, what is the number or estimated number of DVA personnel who have indicated that they are not prepared to move, do not intend to move or who have not yet given a definite answer?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. The subjects discussed at the district G convention of the Royal Canadian Legion held in Pembroke have not been brought to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. However, the government is aware that the Royal Canadian Legion opposes the relocation of the Canadian Pension Commission to Prince Edward Island.

2. The total approved funding for the relocation of Veterans Affairs is $23.6 million. This does not include costs for building and land which are under negotiation and may not be borne by the federal government.

3. (a) 1979/80 Head Office Staff—936;

(b) (i) 967, (ii) 887, (iii) 853, (iv) 841, (v) 794 (Head Office Staff).

4. Figures unknown in light of revised relocation phasing which now extends into 1983. Employees are required to make a binding decision whether or not to relocate nine months before the new date of relocation.

NUCLEAR WASTE MATERIAL—TRANSPORTATION

Question No. 134—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is nuclear waste material being transported through areas of Canada and, if so (a) since what date (b) what are the points of (i) origin (ii) destination in Canada and in the United States?

2. Is such material transported from Chalk River southward to the American border and specifically through the Constituency of Leeds-Grenville and, if so, how many times on the average per week or month?

3. What ports of access to the United States are used and do these include the Prescott-Ogdensburg Bridge at Johnstown, Ontario and the Thousand Islands Bridge at Lansdowne, Ontario?

4. What is the safety record of such transportation including the number of accidents that have happened since transportation commenced and how many of the accidents could be classified as being in any way potentially dangerous whatsoever?

5. What tests, if any, have been taken by any branch of government or Crown corporation to determine the dangers involved and what precautionary measures should be taken as a result?

6. Is it the government's intention to continue the transportation of such material and, if so, for what reason?

7. What is the purpose of the transportation of such material from Canada and what is it used for at its destination?

8. Is the government remunerated for such nuclear waste material by recipients and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and Atomic Energy Control Board report as follows:

1. (a) and (b) It is assumed that the term "nuclear waste material" is a reference to irradiated nuclear reactor fuel discharged from reactors and which contains radioactive fission products and activation products. In the nuclear power program most irradiated fuel produced in CANDU power reactors has been stored on the site of power plants. However, for experimental purposes small quantities of spent fuel have been transported from the Chalk River Nuclear Laboratories—CRNL—since the early 1950s. Such shipments have been made to and from the Whiteshell Nuclear Research Establishment—WNRE—at Pinawa, Manitoba and from the Nuclear Power Development—NPD— reactor at Rolphton, Ontario to CRNL. In addition, shipments have been made from CRNL to the Savannah River Plant of the United States' Department of Energy in South Carolina and irradiated fuel has been sent from the McMaster University research reactor in Hamilton, Ontario to the United States for reprocessing.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s a substantial number of Candu power reactor fuel bundles were shipped to Europe from the NPD, Douglas Point and Pickering reactors.

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

2. On average there are about 20 spent fuel shipments per year from CRNL of research reactor fuel. Approximately 6-7 per year are made from CRNL to the Savannah River Plant, South Carolina. In some years, no shipments are made with a commensurate increase in subsequent years. As regards the shipping routes of the spent fuel from CRNL, shipments are made in accordance with security plans approved by AECB. In order for these plans to be effective, the information in the plans and details of the actual shipments must be withheld from public exposure.

3. See answer to part 7. Any available port of access to the U.S. could be used for shipments.

4. Since 1964 when shipments by the current transport contractor commenced and a different type of container was introduced for shipping spent fuel, there have been no accidents or accidents involving the shipment of spent fuel from CRNL. However, prior to this date there were five cases involving the release of radioactive material. Three of these shipments were by rail and two by road. Four of these incidents resulted in contamination of the trailer or railway car which were then decontaminated. In one instance, there was leakage onto six square metres of ground outside the railway car. The ground was decontaminated by removing 3°°-6°° of the soil. In no case was there any personnel overexposure. None of these incidents exposed the public to any danger.

6. It is AECL's intention to continue the transportation of spent fuel from Chalk River to the USDOE Savannah River Plant as long as the current fuelling arrangement is used for the research reactors at Chalk River. Some of the reasons for this policy are:

(a) A significant amount of enrichment still remains in the spent fuel after it is no longer usable in the reactor. It is economically advantageous to recover this material.

(b) Canada does not have an operational plant capable of processing irradiated uranium fuel.

(c) Part of the current non-proliferation policy of the United States Government encourages the return of enriched uranium spent fuel to the United States for reprocessing on a timely basis.

It should be noted that the research reactors at Chalk River are used for research and development in support of the Canadian nuclear power program and also to provide isotopes for medical use in Canada and throughout the world.

7. The spent fuel from the research reactors at Chalk River is transported to a reprocessing plant in the United States for the purpose of recovering valuable unused enriched uranium. This recovered material is fed back into the United States government's enriching facilities for re-enrichment. AECL is credited the value of the recovered material. A quantity of enriched uranium, equal in value to the recovered material, is returned to AECL for use in making new fuel for use in its research reactors.

8. See answer to part 7.

Atomic Energy Control Board reports as follows:

5. Shipping containers for irradiated nuclear fuel are certified by AECB to meet internationally recognized standards for safety set by the International Atomic Energy Agency. Some containers of older design are certified with additional administrative precautions being specified if the international standards are not fully met. Such administrative precautions ensure that the same level of safety is achieved. Shipping containers originating outside Canada are certified by the national authority for that country. The foreign-origin containers are reviewed by AECB and the certificate endorsed for use in Canada. The international standards ensure that packages built to those standards are safe for shipment with minimal administrative control and precautions. The use of international standards and the certification procedures permit safe and free international shipment of radioactive material, including irradiated nuclear fuel.

Order Paper Questions

KENT INSTITUTION—RIOT

Question No. 180—Mr. Friesen:

1. (a) How many cells were damaged as a result of the riot at Kent institution, on October 28-29, 1979, (b) how many cell blocks were involved (c) what was the extent of the damage in dollars (d) how many inmates were involved in the riot (e) how many security personnel officers were involved to subdue the riot?

2. (a) How many trips did the regional director of the Pacific Centre Regional Headquarters, office of the Solicitor General, take to Ottawa, as well as to other destinations in (i) 1977 (ii) 1978 (iii) 1979 and what were the locations (b) what was the total cost of the trips (c) what was the total amount paid to the regional director for mileage expenses he incurred in (i) 1977 (ii) 1978 (iii) 1979?

3. (a) What was the total amount paid to personnel, under the authority of the Pacific Centre Regional Headquarters, to cover moving expenses which they incurred as a result of being transferred to another location (b) how many times has the government paid for the brokerage fees of an individual who was obliged to sell his home as a result of being transferred to another location, in the Pacific regional district?

4. (a) How many individuals, now employed as security personnel at the Kent Institution, have had previous experience in a (i) maximum (ii) medium security institution (b) how many are retired armed forces personnel?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): In so far as the Correctional Service of Canada is concerned:

1. (a) Fifty-two cells;

   (b) Four blocks;

   (c)$17,000;

   (d) Forty-two inmates;

   (e) None. All inmates were already locked in their cells, and once having damaged the contents of his cells, each individual stopped. In light of this, the incident was not regarded as a riot but rather a disturbance.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Question No. 198—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write-off?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

		Fiscal year results expressed in thousands of dollars 1978	1977
1.	Total revenue	$ 804,069	$ 750,838
	Net earnings	$ 6,402	$ 10,767
2. (a)	Total direct subsidies conferred by the government on the corporation	$ 46,759	$ 40,879
(b)	Loans extended by the government to the corporation	$ 1,223,500	$ 912,500

	Fiscal year results expressed in thousands of dollars
	1978	1977
(c) Investment by the government in the corporation at fiscal year end.	$ 9,844,912	$ 9,659,700

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC—COMMUNITY SERVICES PROGRAM

Question No. 261—Mr. Herbert:

Did the government sign an agreement with the government of the province of Quebec on community services similar to the two year agreement signed on March 15, 1979, by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and the Ontario housing minister and (a) if so, what are the terms and conditions of the agreement (b) if not, have any discussions been held with a view to concluding an agreement and, if so, on what date did the discussions take place?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

The Government of Canada signed an agreement on the Community Services Contribution Program with the government of Quebec on May 18, 1979. This agreement was signed by the Minister of Public Works and is similar to the agreement on the Community Services Contribution Program signed with the other provinces. The ministers of municipal affairs and intergovernmental affairs signed on behalf of the government of Quebec. In February, 1980, amendments to the agreement were negotiated to simplify operating procedures.

Under the two year agreements, the Government of Canada will provide up to $47.1 million for the 1979 program year and $78.45 million for the 1980 program year to assist Quebec municipalities in the provision of needed community services. Canada will transfer these funds to the province in the fiscal year following each program year, upon receipt of certified statements of account. The first payment to Quebec respecting claims in the first program year will be made shortly. The province, in turn, will reimburse the municipalities for eligible expenditures incurred as per the certified statements of account.

The province is responsible for the administration of the program to municipalities, and, within broad limits, has full flexibility in determining the use and allocation of funds within the province. However, the agreement ensures that the Government of Canada receives full recognition and publicity for its efforts in providing funding assistance.

POST OFFICE—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 543—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, what contracts for professional services were let for studies, surveys and analyses into (a) present or future policies, programs or information analysis and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Post Office Department?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General):

1. (a) (i) Study of absenteeism encompassing policies and system, development and implementation of an absentee control system

(ii) Absenteeism in Post Office facilities study

(iii) Feasibility study—new service concepts

(iv) Standing offer agreement for the provision of comprehensive consulting services in the field of marketing research.

(b) (i) Feasibility study of maintenance training facilities

(ii) Engineering and property management study

(iii) Marketing courier services by the private sector

(iv) To provide professional communication resources, to produce audio-visual presentations, illustrating major elements in the Post Office's thrust to improve organizational effectiveness, increase job satisfaction and enhance the working environment

(v) To provide special expertise to the public affairs branch in preparing information for communication within the postal headquarters executive community

2. (a) (i)	Industrial Health Assistance Ltd.	$11,326.42
(ii)	Industrial Health Assistance Ltd.	$22,500.00
(iii)	Ducros, Meilleur, Roy & Associates Ltd.	$ 3,945.78
(iv)	Mr. Paul R. Croker & Associates	$32,000.00
(b) (i)	ARA Consultants Ltd.	$16,300.00
(ii)	Hickling-Johnston Ltd.	$ 4,500.00
(iii)	Mr. William V. Baker	$ 2,500.00
(iv)	Towers, Perrin, Forster and Crosby	$10,000.00
(v)	Eric Miller Consulting Group Ltd.	$21,474.17

FARMERS—N.B.—ASSISTANCE IN DAIRY PRODUCTION

Question No. 599—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1977, what amount was paid to farmers in New Brunswick to assist with dairy production?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): A total of $7,192,641 in subsidies was paid by the Canadian Dairy Commission to dairy farmers in New Brunswick.

ENVIRONMENT—UNIROYAL PLANT—EDMONTON—PLANT EFFLUENT INTO SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Question No. 793—Mr. de Jong:

1. Did the Department of the Environment take any action with regard to the discharge of plant effluent from the Uniroyal plant in Edmonton into the Saskatchewan River and, if so, what action was taken?

2. What were the readings of the chemical contents of such effluent?

3. Does the government feel it has jurisdiction to act on such environmental matters where interprovincial movement of pollutants is concerned?

4. Were any charges laid and, if not, are charges to be laid?

5. What are the long term ramifications of such carelessness?

6. What steps have been taken to ensure that this will not occur again?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. Uniroyal is licensed under the Clean Water Act of the province of Alberta, licence No. 78-WL-037, which allows non-process wastewater to be discharged to the North Saskatchewan River at a rate not exceeding 68.2 cubic metres per day. The effluent consists of steam condensate, cooling jacket wastewater and overflow from the septic tank. The licence was prepared by Environment Alberta in consultation with Environment Canada.

2. Analysis of the effluent sampled October 15, 1979, yielded the following results.

Parameter	Mg/l	Parameter	Mg/l
pH	7.7	Conductivity	492. ms/cm
Iron	0.88	TDS	254.
Calcium	47.	Magnesium	18.
Hardness T	192.	Sodium	14.
Potassium	1.0	Silica	3.5
NO2 + NO3	3.26	Nitrate	0.05*
Fluoride	0.22	Chloride	53.
Sulfate	50.	Bicarbonate	114.
Alkalinity T	94.	Oil and grease	2.6
COD	43.0	TOC	16.
Carbon T	38.	TIC	22.

Nickel	0.023	Cadmium	0.001*
Lead	0.015	Zinc	0.417
Manganese	0.182	Chromium	0.030
2,4,D	14.9

*Indicates concentration less than conductivity reported in microsiemens cm. pH in pH units. Alkalinity and hardness expressed as calcium carbonate. Nitrate + Nitrate expressed as N.

3. The federal government has constitutional jurisdiction to control the interprovincial movement of pollutants. Although specific federal legislation dealing with the interprovincial movement of waterborne pollutants does not now exist, the water pollution provisions of sections 33 to 33.4 of the Canada Fisheries Act could be applied when such pollutants are deleterious to fish. The government is developing proposals for new legislation that would include authority to control certain interprovincial movement of pollutants as part of an over-all federal environmental protection policy. (The development of the policy requires further consultation with the provinces).

4. No charges have been laid. No charges are contemplated at this time.

5. The excursion of concentrations of 2,4,D and total carbon beyond the licensed limits is considered to be only temporary. Because of the small discharge to the river, the impacts of these constituents are not considered to be significant.

6. Alberta Environment, water quality control branch, are currently working with the company to determine the reason for the excursion and correct it.

CMHC—RENTAL UNITS

Question No. 825—Mr. Howie:

In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1979, for how many rental units was CMHC mortgage financing provided in (a) Fredericton (b) Toronto (c) Vancouver (d) New Brunswick (e) Quebec (f) Ontario?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

Rental Units Approved by CMHC in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979 for Selected Cities/Provinces

City/Province	Units	Hostel Beds	$000
Fredericton	—	—	—
Toronto	1,156	34	34,877
Vancouver	96	231	7,821
New Brunswick	64	100	3,831
Quebec	3,905	1,543	109,934
Ontario	3,906	413	108,116

CFB—GAGETOWN—DELETION OF PERMANENT CIVILIAN POSITIONS

Question No. 827—Mr. Howie:

1. Are any permanent civilian positions at CFB Gagetown being deleted from the plan or organization within the next year and, if so, how many?

2. What is the total annual payment in salaries for such positions?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. Twenty-four existing established positions are expected to be deleted.

2. Due to the uncertainty in timing of positions which may be deleted, the total salary situation cannot be estimated accurately at this time.

CANADIAN ARSENALS LTD.—CONTRACT FOR AMMUNITIONS

Question No. 934—Mr. McKinnon:

Did DND let a contract for $6,002,887 worth of ammunition from Canadian Arsenals Ltd. and, if so, for what type and for how many rounds?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes. This contract is for 16,100 rounds of 105mm squash head practice tank training ammunition.

DIEMACO—KITCHENER, ONTARIO—CONTRACT—SMALL ARMS ANALYSIS AND EVALUATION

Question No. 973—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the Department of National Defence let a contract with Diemaco of Kitchener, Ontario, for technical services for small arms analysis and evaluation for $93,477 and, if so, is this in connection with the future family of small arms for the Canadian Armed Forces?

2. On what date will a future family of small arms be purchased for the Forces?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

2. It is the intention to introduce new small arms weapons in the mid-eighties.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PURCHASE OF MICE

Question No. 974—Mr. McKinnon:

Is the Department of National Defence buying $15,402 worth of mice and, if so (a) how many mice (b) is this as a result of a request by NDMC and, if not, how was this need established?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

Yes. (a) Forty to sixty male mice three times a month for a period of 12 months for a total of approximately 1,800 mice.

(b) No. A supply of a special strain of mice is required in support of a research project in operational medicine at a Defence Research Establishment.

DIEMACO INC.—KITCHENER—CONTRACT—SPARE PARTS FOR SMALL ARMS

Question No. 1,052—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence let a contract with Diemaco Inc. of Kitchener, Ontario, concerning spare parts for small arms for $154,653 and, if so, for which types of small arms?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes. The contract is for spares in support of 9mm pistols and 7.62mm rifles.

CARLETON UNIVERSITY—CONTRACT—OFF-ROAD PERFORMANCE OF TRACKED VEHICLES

Question No. 1,053—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence let a contract with Carleton University for the development of a method for predicting the off-road performance of tracked vehicles for $363,408 and, if so (a) which off-road tracked vehicles are being studied (b) does the Department have a DRB or DRE section which is capable of performing this work (c) does the university have a department or research unit experienced in this field and, if so, what is its name?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes. (a) No specific vehicle. The method studied is for generic tracked vehicles. (b) No. (c) Yes. Transport Technology Research Laboratory.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. Collenette: I would ask that all stand, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Stand. Orders of the day.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, June 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-3, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I should like to take part in the debate on Bill C-3, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971. The concerns I have regarding this bill are twofold; first, that it places the full onus for recovery of the benefits on the premium payers, those who suffer the effects of unemployment; and second, that it extends to 1982 the variable qualifications, and whether or not you qualify for unemployment depends on where you live in Canada.

The real concern I have is with regard to the placement of the total onus upon the premium payers, the people who are suffering the effects of unemployment, when it is actually the responsibility of the government. Locked into the legislation which was brought in in 1971 was a clause stating that once unemployment grows over 4 per cent it would be the full responsibility of the government to absorb the costs borne by people who suffer from unemployment. I think that that clause should still remain the same today. Unemployment of up to 4 per cent is reasonable, but responsibility for anything over that should be accepted by the government.

I do not know whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) should be blamed for his ineffectiveness in dealing with the Canadian public and his inability to bring in an industrial strategy or some kind of an economic policy to keep people working, or the cabinet should be blamed for not allowing him to proceed with measures which would create work for the Canadian people or, at least, if not to create work, to allow people to hold on to jobs which they have right now. We are looking at higher and higher rates of unemployment each day as the auto industry is sliding into the greatest depression it has ever experienced. We see the ineffective measures of the government and the inability of the government to take action in western Canada where not only jobs are not created but jobs are taken away.

I think it is the responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to put the country back to work. We should not be looking to the lonely ministers in the west, such as the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr.

Axworthy), to bring in band-aid measures to help overcome some of the small problems, such as the four programs which he recently announced.

In the throne speech we were told that two main principles would guide us into the 1980s. One of them would be that Canadians would have to live within their means. I submit to you that we can accept that principle if Canadians have the means within which to live. If you look at people in Oshawa and Windsor, however, you find that they no longer have those means. They typify people in many other areas in Canada employed in other than the auto industry. I think that as Canadians we should try to live within our means, but only if we have those means. We do not need band-aid measures such as those brought in by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is incapable of bringing in effective programs to help keep Canadians working so that rates of unemployment can be kept below 4 per cent. In areas of the country where unemployment is below 4 per cent, both workers and employers should be responsible for keeping that figure low, but in areas where unemployment reaches up to 30 per cent, there are other ways to provide employment.

What we were also told in the throne speech as being the main core of the Liberal government's program was that Canadians would have to accept the sacrifice of meeting the challenges of the 1980s. I think it is terrible that we in a country such as Canada have to make sacrifices. We have very much in terms of intelligent people who have a high degree of education. Also we can produce the necessary technology in order to have secondary industries owned by Canadians, and to process our resources. We are rich in resources as well. For those reasons, why should Canadians have to accept sacrifices? There is the sacrifice in terms of this bill which relates to high unemployment in Canada. High unemployment causes a lot of stress among families and the single unemployed person. The lack of income generated affects people with fixed incomes such as those on unemployment insurance and pensions. We should not have to accept sacrifices during the 1980s. We should have a high standard of living second to none anywhere in the world.

I think we will have to accept sacrifices because of people like the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is totally ineffective in answering questions sincerely directed to him in the House. Perhaps this forces the Liberal cabinet member from the west to cover the tracks of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commmerce by bringing in temporary, short-term measures to give Canadians some sort of means within which to live.

We will have to make sacrifices because of foreign ownership in the country which takes away from Canadians, which has been condoned by Liberals and Conservatives in the House for many, many years.

Mr. Young: And the huge deficit.

Mr. Anguish: Foreign ownership amounts to over $75 billion. There is the huge deficit to which the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young) referred. Last year there was a spending deficit of $16,185 million. Going back to foreign ownership, it results in profits of over $4 billion leaving this country every year. If that $4 billion was kept in Canada by Canadian ownership, it could produce a lot of jobs so that maybe our unemployment rate would be held to 4 per cent or less, and then likely the employees and employers would be happy to contribute that amount in UIC premiums. I do not think the working public should have to contribute enough to make up for the incompetence of this government and its inability to meet the needs of Canadian people. Indeed, the sacrifices in the eighties which Canadians will have to face are very vast.

I should like to compare the plight of the Canadian worker to that of the Canadian farmer. The government has driven people from their jobs because the jobs cease to exist as a result of the poor economic planning of the government. The same thing is happening in western Canada, and perhaps in many parts of eastern Canada, but I am more familiar with the west. Farmers and people in the agricultural industry are being driven off the land. We talk about removing the Crows-nest rate. It is very crucial to Canadian farmers so that they can move their products from their farms to the markets at a reasonable and statutory cost that was locked in many, many years ago. It was to provide farmers and people in agriculture with a break.

The Crow rate has been paid to the railroads many, many times. The railroads have received concessions in terms of rolling stock and actual lines being paid for in subsidies from the government. As well, they received large holdings of lands, and now at least Canadian Pacific is a company which does not really care about moving the products of farmers to the markets. It cares more about the lands it received in concessions to keep the Crow rate. It has built huge real estate firms and travel agencies at a cost to the Canadian taxpayer and Canadian farmer. It no longer wants to accept its responsibility, in terms of the Crow rate, to move products to the markets.

Some say that if the Crow rate were removed it would help farmers because the rail companies would be more in tune with moving the product and would be paid a fair consideration for it. We in the New Democratic Party say that the rail companies have been already paid a fair price for moving the products of farmers. In fact currently they are paid subsidies from the Canadian government to move that product.

If the Crow rate were removed, there is no assurance at all that the product would be moved any more effectively than in the past and than in fact it is being moved today. For example, in the Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency, to move a hundredweight of wheat to the ports would cost a farmer about 26 cents. For a comparable distance in the United States it would be six times that amount. It would cost farmers in the United States six times that amount to move it from their farms to the ports, and they do not have any better movement of grain or products to the coast. As we are driving workers from their jobs in many parts of Canada, also we are driving farmers and people in agriculture off the land. The government will not give them the concessions and the fair breaks they should receive.

I should like to draw some parallels between the unemployed wage earners in Canada and the rapidly increasing unemployed from the farms. If we go back to the Speech from the Throne, it does not say anything about helping Canadian farmers or the transportation problem other than the fact that transportation is a vital part of the industrial strategy. There is one line about transportation in the Speech from the Throne. It is irrelevant because no one can really say what is the industrial strategy of this government. Although transportation might be a vital part of it, we would like to know the industrial strategy and how it ties to keeping people employed, so that the employment rate which is affected by this bill does not rise over 4 per cent as it is doing now. It should remain under 4 per cent because of the resources we have in the country.

In the throne speech, as well, there is reference to an agricultural export commission to expand Canadian markets, but we are not dealing with this now to keep farmers on the land, to generate income, and to have the spin-off of employing people across the country. Also it referred to a meat import act. Where is that meat import act now? What is it doing to protect the markets which are being flooded by beef? Those markets were threatened by the drought in western Canada not so long ago. It is already too late in some areas because the markets are being flooded by livestock, thereby driving the prices down low.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. With great respect, I have listened to the hon. member for some moments and I have heard him talk about freight rates, the Crowsnest rate, and livestock. I realize one of the most difficult rules of the House of Commons is the rule of relevancy, but even though the current bill is an amendment to an existing act, and even though the subject of unemployment insurance is a very broad one—and I recognize the fact that occasionally the hon. member refers to unemployed— I still think it is in order for the Chair to ask him to direct his attention to Bill C-3.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1550)

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect I disagree with you. I am trying to draw a parallel between what this government is doing, what the Conservative party advocates and agrees with, and the farm population that I am familiar with as a member of Parliament who represents an agricultural constituency. The parallel is being drawn as to how this government and the Conservatives treat wage earners in this country, and I disagree with you, with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, that what I am saying is irrelevant to this bill. It is relevant to this bill in the parallel I am trying to draw, and at the conclusion of my speech I think the relevance of what I say will be obvious to you. I would ask you to let me proceed with the line I have been going on. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. There is no problem in respect of the hon. member proceeding. The Chair is simply making the request that the hon. member give some consideration to the rule of relevance.

Mr. Anguish: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I plan on making it very relevant at the conclusion of the parallel between the farming population, the things that affect them, and the working population. I will proceed with that and try to tie my remarks as closely as possible to Bill C-3, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

As I mentioned at the beginning, the two things I disagree with are that the bill places the onus for recovery of benefits on the premium payers and, secondly, it extends the variable qualifications across Canada as to how many weeks one has to work to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, depending upon the area in which you live, within Canada.

Before I was interrupted, when you called me to order, I was trying to respond by drawing a parallel between agriculture, how farmers are being driven off the land by the policies of this government, as advocated by the Conservative opposition, and how in fact people are being driven out of jobs by these people moving in off the farm, so that even fewer are able to earn an income to provide a living with some dignity. I used examples of the auto industry and how that industry was failing, as is this government, to support people in agriculture. There are quite a bunch of failures, as the hon. member for Beaches has indicated.

There was very little in the throne speech under the first topic which was designed to respond to individual needs. In this regard we feel the government should have brought in long-term job-creation measures in order to employ Canadian people, thus reducing unemployment. There should be a policy and a program on the part of this government to reduce unemployment, working toward full employment, rather than having true unemployment figures in some areas as high as 30 per cent. We think it is realistic to hold the unemployment rate at 4 per cent or less.

What has this government done in responding to individual needs? It has raised the guaranteed income supplement to old age security by $35 a month per household. Indeed, this is a noble gesture and it will put some money into the economy, but it does not respond to wage earners in the country in terms of creating jobs. All this does provide is the means within which people must live. Even at that, many old age pensioners and others receiving benefits from the guaranteed income supplement still live well below the poverty level. I think it is disgraceful that this government cannot enact policies and programs to put these people at a decent standard of living.

Having regard to the affirmative action talked about in the throne speech, that is all good and well, but the affirmative action on the part of this government in terms of giving women their rightful place in the private and public sectors has not been accomplished. Many studies have been conducted which have looked at the need for women to play a meaningful role in the work force, but no significant improvements have been made. We have had calls in this party to compile the results of all those studies directed at increasing employment for women in the work force, and we have concluded that this has not happened.

Certainly the first part of the throne speech, which refers to a response to individual needs, has not in fact responded to the individual needs in the area of unemployment, to which Bill C-3 is addressed. One area to which the government should be responding in order to provide employment for people is that area involving energy supply. That is the second subject talked about in the throne speech, specifically the achievement of security of supply at a fair price for all Canadians. If this in fact were accomplished we could employ many more Canadians, many of whom are left in the ranks of the unemployed as a result of the failing auto industry and the timber industry in many parts of the west, to say nothing of those people who are being driven off the farms.

Petroleum product costs have been raised to such a high level that farmers are now receiving in some cases less for their products than it costs to produce them. As a result we are putting them in the ranks of the unemployed as well. I think this area of energy supply must be developed.

Members of the Liberal party have talked in this House about a made-in-Canada price. What they refer to is not really a made-in-Canada price. What has been talked about in this House by members of the Liberal government is a subsidy price, a price at which we sell our products in the west with no real recognition by the federal government of fairness. We import petroleum products in the east, therefore subsidizing the cost. This is not a made-in-Canada price, it is a subsidized cost to those in the east, and a rip-off price to many of those people in the west.

For example, in Saskatchewan we could create many more jobs and virtually have an unemployment rate of zero, if only the federal government would look at a true made-in-Canada price. This could be achieved by putting in a heavy crude upgrading station somewhere in northwestern Saskatchewan. This is something I have worked on with the Northwest Economic Development Council and the Saskatchewan Oil and Gas Corporation. We have attempted to produce a program whereby we could process heavy crude in northwest Saskatchewan.

Perhaps many members of this House do not realize that at the present time western Canada has to export heavy crude oil, particularly in Saskatchewan, because there is no upgrading station there. This heavy crude crosses the border into the United States where it is processed and brought up to a grade we can use. As a result, the government of Saskatchewan has to pay an export tax of $500 million per year to the federal government. If this upgrading station were put into place in northwestern Saskatchewan we would not have to export this heavy crude. It could be processed in northwestern Saskatchewan, creating many more jobs in that area, virtually eliminating unemployment, or maintaining unemployment at a rate below 4 per cent.

Unemployment is very low now in Saskatchewan because of the sound management of Premier Allan Blakeney and the NDP in that province. With unemployment remaining below 4 per cent this would help the rest of Canada. I do not think employers and employees would then mind absorbing the total cost of benefits to the unemployed becaused they would be very low.

We could create jobs in this country by doing something the NDP advocated during the recent election campaign. We said a pipeline should be built from western Canada to eastern Canada, at least to Quebec City where refining facilities already exist. There are pumping facilities in place there as a result of the importation of petroleum products. This was talked about in the throne speech, but where is the action? This would also create many jobs, not only in Saskatchewan, Alberta and western Canada, but for people throughout Canada. This could be done by building the pipeline in all those provinces it would cross, as well as in the area of the distribution in eastern Canada of the oil and gas now being produced in western Canada.

• (1600)

We would begin to establish a made-in-Canada price when we stop Alberta from exporting its trillions of cubic feet of natural gas to the United States, which could be used by Canadians first. Let us take an inventory of our energy supplies, whether it be nuclear power, hydro power or power produced by petroleum products, such as natural gas or heavy crude, and see what we have. We must look to our own needs first, and export what we have left over. Such a move would create jobs and help to keep the rate of unemployment down, and it would help to replace the jobs which are rapidly leaving because of the auto industry closing down.

As was outlined in the throne speech, we should be moving more homes to natural gas heating. Such a conversion in itself would create jobs. Most important, we must look at the role that Petro-Canada should play in the petroleum industry of this country. The government stated in the throne speach under the second item that it wanted to achieve energy supply at a fair cost to all Canadians and that Petro-Canada should be maintained and expanded as a Crown corporation.

The New Democratic Party agrees with the government on its approach to Petro-Canada. We, in fact, forced the Liberal government in 1972 to establish Petro-Canada. We agree with the Liberal government that Petro-Canada should be expanded and that it should be retained as a Crown corporation. However, the government is not moving totally in the right direction with regard to Petro-Canada. The government said in the throne speech that Canada should gain 50 per cent ownership of the petroleum industry by the year 1990. This is not enough now, nor was it enough in the past. It is better than it was, but it is not good enough.

For example, in 1978 we owned 1 per cent of the petroleum refining industry in Canada. When you only own 1 per cent of something and 99 per cent is owned by industry outside our borders, it is hard for the government to plan jobs for Canadians in an industry over which it has no control. Foreign companies take advantage of our people and resources and export our jobs, because if the money leaves our country then the jobs will leave our country.

We feel that in order to have a program to increase employment and decrease unemployment, the government must look at all the areas of the petroleum industry and increase the Canadian content therein. It must look at exploration, refining, and wholesale and retail sale of petroleum products within the country. In the area of exploration of petroleum products, Canadians must be involved in the industry, because we cannot rely on the information which is presently available.

What I am about to say may deviate somewhat from the bill, but it is a very important part of the economic and industrial strategy that should be used to overcome the unemployment problem. In the past the information we received was not relevant to our planning needs to keep Canadians working. For example, I believe it was the annual report of Esso in 1973 which said, "Don't worry, Canadians; we have enough gas and oil to last us for hundreds of years". I believe that the figure used was 298 years. However, in 1975 the same company told us that we are in an energy crisis, that it must be given more money so that it can go out and look for more gas and oil. Is that the kind of information we need?

If what Imperial Oil said in 1975 was truer than what it said in 1973, then the company miscalculated by 296 years. We cannot plan jobs for Canadian people if we must rely on poor information such as Imperial Oil gave us. As I mentioned earlier, Petro-Canada should be involved in the area of refining. We should gain some control over the refining industry, which was 99 per cent foreign owned in 1978, and the ratio is not much better now. Such a move would create hundreds of thousands of jobs for Canadians. We must get Petro-Canada involved in the refining industry.

We also feel that the wholesale sale of petroleum products is a very important part of Petro-Canada's role in providing jobs for Canadians. This can only be done by a Canadian company which has the interest of Canadians at heart and does not operate on the profit motive alone. The reason we think that wholesale sales are very important is that when the true energy crunch comes, which will in fact come some day—we do not know when because we do not have that sound information yet—the foreign owned multinationals will not sell to the little service stations at Uranium City, Beauval, Canoe Narrows, Meadow Lake or Burnaby. They will sell where they can get maximum profits, such as their own service stations in the larger centres or, even worse, to other countries which have no gas and oil left.

These oil companies will sell to these countries for the highest possible dollar which these countries will be willing to pay, because they have no remaining gas and oil, and they will distribute their petroleum products in an inequitable fashion. It is necessary for Petro-Canada to become involved in the wholesale sale of petroleum products, so that we can assure Canadians of a supply of petroleum in the future as long as the supply lasts. With such control we could also assure Canadians in remote areas of the country or even in the metropolitan areas, that they will in fact have energy supplies to get to their jobs and to keep them under the 4 per cent unemployment rate that should be available to Canadians, not rates which run up to 30 per cent.

The final item I would like to mention with regard to Petro-Canada is involvment in the petroleum industry retail sector. The reason that Petro-Canada should be involved in this sector is because when Canadians pull up to the pumps on the way to the jobs which they should have they would have a choice to buy either Canadian and keep their money within Canada, or to buy from one of the large multinational corporations and have their money leave the country, which amounts to the exporting of jobs.

When the money is sent out of the country, instead of being kept here, it is the same as sending jobs outside Canada, jobs which we need here at home to keep us under the 4 per cent employment rate. I am sure that the employers and the employees would be happy to pay for it. The choice is very clear. Canadians should be able to buy from Petro-Canada, a Canadian owned Crown corporation established in the interests of the Canadian people, the Co-op Stations which are currently 100 per cent Canadian owned, or from a multinational, but in doing the latter they will only help to worsen the economy of this country. That should be the choice. That is the area on which I want to talk with regard to the energy supplies of this country. Unemployment in this country is a disgrace. People who have the ability to pay are not the ones who pay. The rich should pay, not the poor small business people who are the backbone of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Paproski: A Marxist-Leninist.

Mr. Anguish: I was looking for some attention from the Conservatives, Mr. Speaker, so it would give some stimulation and allow me to go on to make the full thrust of my speech meaningful.

Mr. Collenette: Speak to the bill.

Mr. Anguish: The small business people are the backbone of this country. It is the working people or the wage earners who make them a viable operation. The NDP is the only sound spokesmen, spokespeople or spokespersons for the small business of this country.

Mr. Paproski: A Marxist-Leninist.

Mr. Anguish: The hon. member for the Conservative party is making remarks which I believe are unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker. Will you not call to order the three members of that party who are sitting in the House and using slanderous language, and who do not know what they are talking about? They are much closer to the Communist party than the Marxist-Leninist are to the NDP. I have explained that in previous speeches I have made to this House. I am glad that the Conservative member brought the matter up. I would like to say that it should be the rich who should pay for the unemployment which they create.

If hon. members would like the article that I have here—

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would hope that the hon. member would attempt to be a little more relevant in his remarks. He has used a slogan which was used in the last election, that is, "Make the rich pay". That was a slogan of the Marxist-Leninist party. If he wishes to use it that is okay. However, I do not like to be called a Communist. We must draw the line there because I do not think the hon. member knows the difference between a Communist, a Marxist-Leninist, the CCF or the NDP. I think they are all the same.

• (1610)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): On the latter part of the hon. member's point of order, I am sure we agree that it probably does not qualify as a point of order.

On the former part in which he expressed the hope that the hon. member be more relevant, I have already drawn that point to the attention of the hon. member. He does have a relatively short time left, and perhaps he might like to remind himself of the rule of relevance again.

Mr. Anguish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was sure that I was not out of order.

I think that the people with the ability to pay should be the ones to pay. I have before me a copy of a list of directors of Canadian Pacific Limited. The chairman and the chief executive officer of Canadian Pacific Limited is Ian D. Sinclair who receives, in his capacity as the chief executive officer of that large corporation, in excess of $600,000 per year. That is shameful, Mr. Speaker. People like that have the ability to pay. The poor small business people of this country who I mentioned are the backbone to the success of our economy, and the wage earners who work for them do not. Not only is that shameful, but Mr. Sinclair is also the chairman and chief executive officer of two other companies. He is the president of another company; he is the vice-president and director of three other large multinationals, and he is the director of 18 others. He receives remuneration for all of those positions. It is unbelievable that one person could earn so much. Most of it comes from political patronage, but that is irrelevant. Those are the people who should pay for the high cost of Canadians being unemployed.

I would like now to return to Bill C-3 and refer to the Speech from the Throne. The third item talks about Canadian ownership and control of the Canadian economy. We do not have much Canadian control or ownership of our economy because of the current policies of the Liberal government and the former policies of the Conservative government. There have been no attempts made to get control of the Canadian economy. There has been no attempt to do that, just as there has been no attempt to gain control of the spending that has gone wild under this Liberal government, together with the spending deficits which have increased for many years now.

This government will choose to talk about something called the Foreign Investment Review Act. How is this going to help Canadians gain control of the economy? Those Canadians such as members of the New Democratic Party who have a sincere interest in keeping Canadian people employed and not varying their benefits when they become unemployed in such high numbers across Canada want to know how this bill will help. These people do not know what their qualifications are from month to month to qualify for a program that an individual pays into and subsidizes totally, which is what this government advocates.

Small business has trouble dealing with this government. Many small businesses go bankrupt, just as many farmers have been driven off their land. We think that that is disgraceful. The government would rather place its priorities on a spending deficit in excess of $16 billion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have only three points to make in regard to Bill C-3. I wish to make these because I was unable to be in the House during the past debate. At that time I was conducting a housing tour in the maritime provinces where, as hon. members know, unemployment is at an all-time high.

My colleagues have said in other speeches that we reject this bill out of hand. It does nothing to help the whole problem of unemployed or the plight of the unemployed in Canada. It shifts the cost of unemployment insurance from government to employers and to employees. Indeed, it shifts the cost of unemployment insurance on to the backs of working people instead of dealing with the problem from the point of view of government, which is largely responsible for the massive unemployment that we have in Canada today.

The three points that I wish to refer to have to do particularly with the way this bill and the general unemployment insurance program affect women and young people in Canada. First is the whole question of the rights of part-time workers to unemployment insurance. Second is the question of workers, particularly women, who often work as partners in family businesses with their spouse. Third, I would like to refer to the scandalous revelation by the former minister of employment who is now the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), which I read about in the Vancouver Sun for June 18.

First of all, I shall deal with coverage of unemployment insurance benefits for part-time workers. Apparently from the debate on this bill we have seen a change that would reduce the coverage of unemployment insurance benefits from a requirement of 20 hours of work to 15 hours of work. If I may use the term it is a rather pointless reduction because it does not get at the main issue. If this is an insurance scheme paid into by employers and employees as well as government, surely the benefits should be available regardless of the number of hours that a worker works? What difference does it make whether a worker works ten hours, 15 hours or 20 hours a month if the worker has paid into the scheme? Surely if the workers are unable to find further work for the full amount of time—and unfortunately this is the case in so many instances today—they are entitled to the benefits to which they have contributed?

In addition, if we are looking at this from a humanitarian point of view, it would seem to me that persons who are unable to find full-time work and who can only work part time must have a much harder economic situation than those who have full-time work.

I would like to mention also that part-time workers in Canada today are more often than not women and young people, and are usually the last hired and the first fired. Many women who have not been in the work force and who perhaps have children at home are only able to get part-time work. They need employment in order to survive. I know of many women workers in my riding who are raising children on their own and have perhaps been on welfare for a number of years because they have had no other choice at a time when their children are young. Their first step back into the labour market is to find part-time work. They are lucky if they can find it. But if they do, surely they should have the right to unemployment insurance for that work? This is an extremely important point, and I hope hon. members who represent the other sex in this House will listen, because it is very difficult for many women who have not had much work history to gain confidence and skills, and find the opportunities to get back into the work force.

● (1620)

While on the question of part-time work, I want to stress that wages for part-time work should be union wages. There is no way that women and young people should be exploited, receiving less than union wages, simply because they are unable to find full-time work. In my riding, the following kinds of workers can only find work part of the year: construction workers, painters working outside, many of whom I know personally, sales persons, many of whom are women and young people, only able to get jobs on a part-time basis. Some young people are lucky enough, if you can call it lucky, to get a job at McDonald's, dishwashing or doing something like that for certain periods of time.

These people pay unemployment insurance. Why should they not be able to collect? There are also the farm workers, the many seasonal workers at this time of the year. Fisher people are hit very hard this year by the lack of hours and days for fishing and the drastic problem of the reduction in fishing stocks.

In times of high unemployment, and unfortunately it is increasing year after year rather than being reduced, part-time jobs take on a special significance. It is really the only thing that many people are able to get. Surely that is better than being on welfare, the payments that many people have no other choice but to receive. However, most people on social assistance, and I know many of them, would far rather be working. They would consider part-time jobs at a decent rate of pay if they were able to get unemployment insurance benefits when those jobs were phased out. With regard to Bill C-3, I hope the minister will take another look at the whole question of coverage of part-time and seasonal workers and ensure that they have their just right to unemployment insurance benefits.

There is a second group I want to mention, and here again this often concerns women. I refer to spouses who work with their mates or partners, be they husbands or wives, who are not eligible for unemployment insurance. I wish to cite the example of five fisherwomen who had a very painful but interesting experience when challenging their right to be covered by unemployment insurance.

These five fisherwomen, with the support of their union in British Columbia, challenged in court in 1979 their right to be covered by unemployment insurance benefits. These are women who go out with their husbands in any kind of weather. They work very hard as equal partners on fish boats. They were denied the right to unemployment insurance, and challenged this in the courts.

It is interesting to note that these women won their case the first time round. They won their right to unemployment insurance in their own name as workers who worked very hard in the fish boat industry. What happened? The very organization that should have been trying to protect their rights and ensure that they received unemployment insurance benefits, moved to challenge this legal decision. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), interestingly enough, is also the minister responsible for the status of women. It was his department that challenged this legal question and brought it back into the courts, in effect saying that these women should not have the right to unemployment insurance.

We feel very strongly about fisherwomen and others who work together in businesses. We know that tax exemptions were brought in initially by the Conservatives, and more recently by the Liberals, to allow tax exemptions for those wives who work with their husbands. Why not have adequate coverage for unemployment insurance benefits for those spouses who work as equal partners in family businesses, including the fishing business? We should ensure that definitions under the act include such workers, so that they should not be excluded under the act for unemployment insurance benefits.

Finally, I wish to refer to the very scandalous revelation made in this House on June 18 and June 19, as reported in the Vancouver Sun. The revelation was made by a former Liberal manpower minister, the hon. member for Lincoln. According to those I have heard from in my constituency, this was a shocking and scandalous revelation. It is a reflection on the hon. member when he was minister. I wish to quote three or four paragraphs from the June 20 edition of the Vancouver Sun. The article is headed "Mackasey Reveals Old Jobless Plot In UIC". I quote:

Former Liberal manpower minister Bryce Mackasey revealed in the Commons Thursday that during the 1970s the government orchestrated a campaign to highlight alleged abuses of the unemployment insurance program so it could justify a crackdown on UIC benefits.

Here we have the minister admitting that the government orchestrated a deliberate campaign to scapegoat unemployment people.

The campaign was launched after federal officials badly miscalculated unemployment levels, Mackasey said, and it made scapegoats out of thousands of people who were out of work through no fault of their own.

Imagine the former minister admitting this to the House of Commons.

Mackasey, who was responsible for the unemployment insurance program at the time, said his senior civil servants predicted an unemployment rate of 4 per cent when he brought significant changes to the system in the early 1970s.

But when unemployment began to climb well beyond that point, officials scrambled to find ways of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act to shift more of the financial burden of the program to employers and employees.

Referring to his own officials, employees, civil servants of Canada, he said:

"They were not honest enough to admit they had miscalculated and had not anticipated a long period of five, six, seven or eight per cent unemployment in the country," he said.

"Instead, they set out to condition the people by telling them that the changes were needed because of abuse in the system."

These were our young people, sons and daughters of the people sitting in this House. These young people were trying to get work, they were probably only able to get occasional jobs, had to go on unemployment insurance, and became the scapegoat. A national tradition was set up which established for a whole generation of young people that they were shiftless, lazy, no good, and did not want to work. This is a federal department, headed by a minister who knew about this, actually creating this condition in Canada. It is absolutely shocking.

The former minister went on to say:

"It was difficult for me to accept the fact that in preparing the groundwork for their amendments they had to stigmatize hundreds of thousands of people by suggesting they would prefer to draw unemployment insurance rather than work."

That is absolutely shocking. Every Canadian would be ashamed that their government would do this. At least it is now being admitted by the former minister. It is proof that there were cut-offs, injustices, deliberate exploitation and scapegoating of unemployed workers, many of them women and young people, during the period 1972 to 1978 in particular. These people were cut off unemployment insurance benefits wholesale. They had a right to receive these benefits. They were cut off and told that they were lazy and no good, merely to cover up the civil servants' inaccurate prediction, and because of the budget restrictions that the commission was facing.

We have heard of unemployed people who could not find enough money to buy bread for their children, and of ex-policemen, employed as benefit control officers, going into their homes and conducting interviews in a way similar to Gestapo tactics. I am ashamed, Mr. Speaker, and I would hope that most members of this House would be ashamed, to think we ever went through that kind of an era. I stress once again that the people who were most victimized, who could not find full time work, were women, married women, immigrant women, single women and, as well, many young people. These were the people who were told they had no rights as Canadians to employment and that they had no right to unemployment insurance. They were told they were a bunch of lazy no-gooders. We are not going to allow this kind of crack-down to take place in the future. I say again that the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act by this government must make very sure that this kind of thing does not happen again.

● (1630)

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we say that the bill is not adequate. It should provide for universality. The plan should cover all workers regardless of occupation, whether they are employed by someone else or self-employed, and regardless of income. Entitlement should depend solely on meeting the requirements of a person having worked—not even having worked the number of weeks as now stated. They should have worked enough to have justified the money they put into the scheme, being currently able to work. There should be no special requirements used to discriminate against certain groups. My colleagues have spoken before on this point, but I remind the House again that women who are pregnant have every right to unemployment insurance which they have paid for through their own contribution.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-3 which is before the House today for second reading, to discuss some of the principles which lie behind this bill and to explain some of the reasons why we in the New Democratic Party are strongly opposed to those principles.

The bill itself is a deceptively small and simple one. I believe it contains some two pages, and if we look at it quickly we might think, as the minister suggested, that we should just let it go through quickly. But we believe it is important that Canadians be aware of exactly what it is this government is attempting to do with unemployment insurance, and that they be made aware of the fact that this is but one in a series of steps in an attempt to justify the bankruptcy of Liberal economic policy.

If we look at the principle of this particular bill, and if we look back at the original legislation which was passed in 1971 which established the principles upon which our present unemployment insurance system is based, we see the following. We see that in 1971 the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) was the minister of employment and immigration. He identified certain principles which he believed were important and which, presumably, the Liberal party believed were important, in setting up a fair and equitable system of unemployment insurance. What was that system, Mr. Speaker, and how far have we come since that original system of unemployment insurance was implemented back in the Liberal heyday of 1971?

The original figure was established at 4 per cent. Beyond the level of 4 per cent unemployment the government accepted that it had certain responsibilities; that it was not the responsibility of workers and employers to pay the costs of an economic system which tolerated unemployment beyond the 4 per cent level, but that the government surely had some responsibility also. The government have the tools to control the economy at its disposal and, presumably, with unemployment beyond 4 per cent, had failed to bring in measures which would deal adequately with a very serious crisis.

I would like to quote from the speech made by the then minister of employment, now the hon. member for Lincoln, in dealing with the establishment of this 4 per cent ceiling. He said this, Mr. Speaker:

> Since the figure of 4 per cent has attracted a good deal of attention I imagine somebody is going to suggest that the government has determined 4 per cent to be an acceptable rate of unemployment in Canada. Well, it is not my criterion. Like everybody else I believe the acceptable rate of unemployment is the least possible rate. This is what we should be working toward. This should be our goal as a country.

The hon. member for Lincoln went on to say this:

> Our system is really on trial if we cannot operate on the basis of lower rates of unemployment than have been traditional, particularly in the light of the fact that the working force is growing at a tremendous rate.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, our system was on trial at the implementation of this unemployment insurance scheme in 1971, and we have seen beyond doubt that our economic system which was on trial then has failed miserably to meet the needs of Canadians, to meet the needs of women and men, of young and old in this country. The great economic system which was said to be on trial in 1971 has been a dismal failure. We have seen, for example, rates of unemployment increasing in every year since those glowing words of the hon. member for Lincoln.

That was not all the hon. member for Lincoln has had to say on the subject of unemployment. From the safety, perhaps, of the government's back benches and since he apparently no longer has any aspiration for a cabinet portfolio, the hon. member has "come clean"; we have seen him attempting to atone for his guilt over the disgraceful way in which working people in this country have been made victims of an attempt to tighten up the unemployment insurance. The hon. member for Lincoln has indicated that it was the working people of this country who had no jobs who were being blamed for their own situation. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, blaming the unemployed for their own plight. We have seen the hon. member for Lincoln admitting that while he was minister this was indeed the case.

In that moment of truth, that moment of guilt which occasionally hits even members on the opposite side of the House, the hon. member said this, on June 19, referring to the Liberal party and the official opposition:

> Either by coincidence or design, prior to every one of these amendments we had a well-orchestrated campaign based on the alleged abuse of the plan thus preparing and conditioning people for the amendment and supposedly aimed at reducing the abuse or tightening the regulations when in fact the main purpose of most of the amendments was to shift the financial burden from the government because of unemployment in this country to the employer and the employee.

As an example of this kind of cynical attack on the unemployed in this country we need look no further than the remarks, for example, of the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen), who has referred in the past to the unemployed people in this country perhaps needing a "kick in the gut"—a kick in the gut—as a means of awakening them to the realities of unemployment. Then there are references to "the many people who make unemployment a way of life". Well, Mr. Speaker, even if there undoubtedly are some individuals who abuse our system, for every person who abuses the system there are ten or 20 or 50 who genuinely and desperately are seeking employment, and to single out the very small number of people who are abusing our unemployment insurance system in an attempt to make those who are genuinely in need feel guilty, is a disgraceful attack upon people who cannot possibly fight back.

Those were the principles which were established in 1971. The government accepted that it had a responsibility for the running of the economy and that any unemployment beyond the 4 per cent level would be paid for by the public purse. There would then be some incentive, Mr. Speaker, for the government to lower rates of unemployment or attempt to deal with the rates of unemployment that were created. What we have seen since 1971, culminating in this bill today, is a progressive erosion of the principles of unemployment insurance the likes of which have not been seen in any other western industrialized country in the world. Of course, we hear the party to my right, the Conservative party, saying, "Carry on with this; continue to attack those people who can least afford to fight back; continue to attack women and young people who are trying to find jobs but have no jobs to find."

Both the Liberals and Conservatives speak about some concept known as moral hazard. We often hear comments from certain members on the benches to my right about the moral hazard element of unemployment. It is suggested that beyond a certain level of unemployment insurance benefits, somehow people will come flocking, that there are jobs which are going begging and that people are gladly and voluntarily taking their places in the indignity of the unemployment insurance lines. We reject that, and we say that the economy has failed the people of Canada to the tune of some one million people who desperately want to work and cannot find jobs.

What kind of cynical shell game has been played since 1971 with the people of Canada? The original level of "acceptable" unemployment was 4 per cent of the work force. In 1976, when unemployment rates were increasing dramatically as a direct result of the failure of Liberal economic policies, there was a redefinition of this "acceptable" level. Canadians were told that working men and women would have to pay even more, from their own pockets, of the costs of the bankruptcy of Liberal economic policies, to the extent that now something in excess of 7 per cent unemployment is paid for by the people of Canada.

It is very easy to say, in the case of big business, that they can pass their costs on. Indeed, big businesses do pass their costs on. When premiums are increased, big businesses have no difficulty, in their quasi monopolistic position, in passing these on, so that once again it is the worker or the consumer who must bear the brunt of Liberal economic policies.

In the case of smaller businesses it is much more difficult. In many cases they are simply not able to increase their prices, and what this means is that smaller businesses are going bankrupt to a much greater degree than they have been for many years.

In 1978 the Liberal party continued this policy of shifting the costs of the burden of unemployment to the unemployed and to working people by making workers pay the second phase, the labour extended benefits. What do we have today? What do we see before us in this apparently innocuous two-page bill? We see an admission on the part of this government that it has no responsibility. We see a declaration that this government refuses to accept responsibility for levels of unemployment at any level—not 4 per cent, not 6 per cent, and not 8 per cent.

What this government is telling working people, the poor, women and young people, is that they have to pay the costs of the government's bankrupt economic policies. As the hon. member for Lincoln said, this system was on trial in 1971. Well, as we have seen, the system has failed to meet the needs of Canadians, to the point that now the government is rolling over telling working people that it has no responsibility for unemployment.

The real reason for this bill was stated by the minister in a few words, namely, that in the spirit of restraint it is to save some $378 million. While this may save $378 million from the general revenues of Canada—perhaps to enable us to buy one or two more fighter aircraft—what is happening is that working Canadians are being forced through increases in their premiums to pick up the difference.

Mr. Young: Hidden taxes.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): It is a hidden form of taxation, as the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young) rightly points out.

The extent of unemployment is very great indeed, even in the official figures. The most recent figures are from May of this year, and they show that in Canada there were an estimated 904,000 Canadians out of work. That is the official figure.

Some 431,000 Canadians between the ages of 15 and 24, and some 145,000 Canadians over 45 years of age, want to work but cannot find jobs. Of these 904,000 workers there were some 399,000 women, including 186,000 under the age of 24 years. The unemployment rate for the whole of Canada was some 7.8 per cent by official figures, 13.9 per cent for those between 15 and 24. The rate for those between 20 and 24—and in many cases these are students who are entering the labour force for the first time and cannot find work—was 12.9 per cent and, as we know, these students are entering the labour force for the first time and in many cases are not eligible for unemployment insurance. They are caught in that vicious trap. They have been to school. They have gone out to the work force to try to find work. They have been unable to do so, and they have had to suffer the degradation of being forced to go down and get into the welfare lines.

What kind of treatment is it to say to young people, after their having gone through a number of years of training, which in many cases has involved considerable sacrifice on the part of parents or relatives in putting these students through school, "Sorry about that, boys and girls, but this economic system has no place for you"? We tell them that the appropriate place for them is on the welfare rolls, and for how long one can only speculate.

One million plus Canadians are out of work, but I believe it is important that we not forget that there is a very strong personal dimension in these figures. I know that all members of Parliament have seen many cases in their own constituency offices. Every time I go back to my riding of Burnaby, I find that people telephone my constituency office. We hear from women, young people, and heads of households. We hear from the man who has just been told that he is being laid off after 20 years of work.

We must also be aware of the personal sacrifice and the personal toll taken as a result of unemployment. We have heard the eloquent words of Gerry Yetman of the province of Nova Scotia, for example. He is the leader of the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour, and at a recent federation convention he read out the suicide note left by a man in his fifties who had been laid off from his job and who had searched desperately for some alternate employment. He had eight children, and one day those children came home and found a note left on the kitchen table by their father, who said he felt he was a burden, he felt humiliated and that he could no longer go on because he could not find a job.

How many other tragedies are there? How many other personal tolls are there as a result of the failure of Liberal economic policy over the years to deal with this tragedy of unemployment, which surely must rank number one in this country? Inflation is a serious problem, of course, but if we are to identify above all one symptom of the economic crisis which members of the Liberal party, followed by members of the Conservative party, have foisted upon the people of Canada, that problem must surely be the fact that over a million Canadians who want to work cannot find jobs.

We see the crippling effects of unemployment on the morale of the individual, the effects of sending out letters day after day to various employers, of attempting to answer ads in the newspaper and of the letters which come back, those anonymous letters sometimes addressed politely "To whom it may concern". Occasionally there will be a letter addressed to whomever has applied for a job, informing him that, "Thank you very much, but your services are not required". These letters come in day in and day out. What effect does this have on the morale of a man or woman who has been working for many years and who has a family to support but whose unemployment insurance has run out? What effect does this have on the morale of the family of that individual as well? Too many of these people have given up all hope of finding work, and the blame for that rests squarely on a succession of Liberal and Conservative governments, both federally and provincially.

What about the young people in this country? What about university students, students at technical institutes and vocational institutes who were promised when they finished high school, "Well, John or Jane, what you have to do is go to university and get a degree, and if you get a degree there will be a job for you"? There is a very fine university in my constituency. Simon Fraser University has some 9,000 students. The B.C. Institute of Technology is in my constituency, as is the Pacific Vocational Institute, so I have had much personal experience with some of the problems that young people who have graduated from university are encountering.

I want to say that recently I attended the convocation ceremonies at Simon Fraser University and I had the opportunity then to speak with many of the students graduating from that fine university. Too many of those students, when I asked them what their plans were for the future, shrugged their shoulders and, in many cases, with an air of despair, said they simply did not know. In many cases not only students but, as I indicated earlier, their parents have sacrificed a great deal to put their children through university or through another educational institution, and they find that there is no pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, there is nothing to the great myth of a job at the end of the road. After those sacrifices are made and the education is completed, we tell them there is nothing for them. We tell these people who have skills to offer and who desperately want to work that we have no place for them in this society.

I tell these graduates of the Simon Fraser University, of the B.C. Institute of Technology, and of the Pacific Vocational Institute, to ask Liberal cabinet ministers and Liberal members of Parliament what their policies have done for those young people, how their policies have assisted those young people in finding jobs. Let them ask what kind of disgraceful policy it is to uncover, as we have now learned through the hon. member for Lincoln that, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Sarnia and others, people who have somehow taken advantage of the unemployment insurance program need, perhaps, a kick in the gut.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member does not honestly wish to mislead the House, but let me say to him that that statement was never made by me about youth or about anybody in Canada. I indicated in an interview that Canadians had not had a kick in the gut the way the Americans had, who had to line up for gasoline. At no time did I make that reference to the youth or to Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I recall vividly the incident to which the hon. member referred. Indeed he did refer to the fact that Canadians have not had a kick in the gut, the inference being that perhaps that was what we needed. I say to Liberal members opposite that that is the only reasonable inference that can be drawn by the unemployed. When the former minister of employment and immigration said that Canadians have not had a kick in the gut like the Americans have had, what kind of inference can be drawn in this context by the people about whom we are talking, people who are out of work? Whether or not he intended that, I can tell the former minister that it was certainly the implication which was drawn by many people who were in the unfortunate situation of being out of work. If Liberal members opposite, who are laughing in glee at this situation, can stand up and explain how Liberal economic policies have done anything whatsoever to alleviate unemployment in the country, I would be delighted to hear them at the conclusion of my speech.

As I said, the election in the future will tell a different story. Canadians see very clearly that there is no difference between the economic policies of the Liberals and the Conservatives. I have a very interesting document here—

An hon. Member: Next time Burnaby.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): There is a suggestion made by an hon. member opposite. I invite the hon. member with an open mind to run in my constituency in the next election campaign.

I have an interesting document which I would like to draw to the attention of the House since we are talking about economic Liberal and Conservative policies, and once again I would welcome comments from Liberal members in particular at the conclusion of my speech on any differences there might be between the two. This is a document which has been circulating recently among caucus members of the Liberal party which is intended to be a policy statement at the Liberal party convention which is to be held in Winnipeg. Of course we know that the Liberal party has always been somewhat short on policy, and we see that the authors of this Liberal document have expressed some concern about the fact that at this point the Liberal party has no policy. For example, at page three of the document—I say this in the context of this important bill on unemployment, Bill C-3—it is stated:

> As Liberals, we have a feeling for who we are and what we stand for, but we have often been hard put to describe it.

Surprise, surprise! It goes on to state:

> A statement of the Liberal philosophy in one document, together with the application of the philosophy to the central issues facing Canadians today and the years ahead, would be of great value.

We have here an admission that there is no Liberal policy in this country so far. Instead, we have what I, as well as others, called on occasions a finger-in-the-wind policy. In other words, a good Liberal sticks one finger up in the air and feels for the prevailing winds, and from whence those winds come so also come the policies of the Liberal party. So when the winds shift slightly in direction, we see the Liberals shifting in their policies. That would be fine if, as one hon. member is feebly yelling from the back, it were the will of the people. The problem is we have seen far too often that the winds which we are talking about are the winds of the establishment, the winds of the corporate elite, the winds of those people who financed the party opposite, because we have seen all too often that he who pays the piper calls the tune, and those who pay the Liberal piper are none other than that corporate establishment which blows the winds which are then transmitted into Liberal policy, or lack thereof. The winds of change are coming, as my good friend, the hon. member for Beaches, has said.

Further in this great Liberal policy document to be discussed on the weekend, and in the context of Bill C-3, we find the following statement at page 33:

> We frequently live up to our reformist tradition by putting forward progressive proposals only to give way, perhaps too often, as a government, to other pressures.

This is a very interesting admission on the part of the drafters of this document, an admission of failure on the part of the Liberal party, an admission that the Liberal party has given way to pressures from unstated pressure groups, very likely the corporate establishment, those people who traditionally have loud voices in the corridors of the Liberal government.

The document goes on to read:

> Yet we as a party must share in the responsibility of what is accomplished and what is left undone.

I should like to state again the concern which is expressed in this document which is very likely to become the policy of the Liberal party, namely, that the Liberal party itself is giving way to pressure groups and yielding on important social programs.

The document goes on to talk about the fact that there are too many Canadians who experience unemployment, poor wages, job insecurity, unnecessarily tedious or dangerous work. In some cases this document has analysed the problems correctly. It has pointed out correctly that the Liberal party for too long has listened to the voices of the privileged, comfortable few, and one can only hope that instead of listening to this latter day attempt at conversion, Canadians will reject it for what it is and will seek to join the party which has traditionally been speaking on behalf of the concerns of the ordinary people.

As I indicated, we have a crisis in this country in terms of unemployment, a crisis with which this bill has not dealt, a crisis which this bill will make more severe. The problem of unemployment must be dealt with on two fronts. First, we have to deal with the effects of unemployment, and we must recognize the reality that there are some one million people who must survive, who must have a source of income and who have no work. To suggest that somehow those people are responsible for their own plight, as has been suggested in the past by members on my right and members on the opposite side of the House, is blaming the victims of the government's economic policies.

We say that all those persons in this country who want to work and cannot find work are entitled to a decent and humane standard of living for themselves and their families.

Furthermore, we say that there is work to be done in this country, both in the short-term and in the longer term. In the short term it is absolutely scandalous that there is a severe problem in the provision of housing. In my own constituency of Burnaby, for example, there are far too many people who want to find housing and cannot find it. In many cases these are single parents. We have a desperate need for housing in communities all across the country.

We have building trade workers who want to work. We have carpenters, painters, electricians and many other tradesmen who would like to put their skills to good use and who have been trained to build housing. Yet we have a government that cannot put the two together. Although there is a crisis in housing and a surplus of people who want to build housing in this country, we have a Liberal government that has failed to put the need together with those resources. Surely it is a rather searing indictment of the failure of the government to deal with one of the most fundamental rights of all Canadians, that is, the right to decent housing.

There are many other jobs which could be done in the country that are not being done in areas such as the provision of rapid transit facilities. For example, in the lower mainland of British Columbia they are in desperate need of decent rapid transit to move people from community to community. Hundreds of people could be put to work there building rapid transit facilities, not only there but elsewhere in the country. There are many energy conservation projects which could be undertaken that would put Canadians, young and old, men and women, to work.

We should be listening to the voices of hundreds of municipalities across the land. They have called upon the federal government to listen to their concerns. They have said that there are certain programs which they believe should be implemented and for which surely the federal government should have some responsibility by assisting them perhaps on a cost-sharing basis. Let us listen for a change to the concerns of the people of the country through their municipal representatives. There is work to be done in the municipalities, and there are people who would like to do that work.

There are environmental problems in the country. There is much clean-up to be done. Again this is an area in which many people could be employed in the short term.

But it is clear that in the long term only a fundamental change in the economic system of this country will result in the kind of economy in which we as New Democrats believe, an economy in which all those Canadians who wish to work will be able to work. We believe only in an economy which is not based upon the pursuit of greed and the pursuit of corporate profit. Rather, it should be an economy based upon serving human needs, not deciding upon what the maximum profit can be or what the maximum return can be on a given investment, with all the destructive effects that kind of economy has in terms of the degradation of our environment and its pollution, and in terms of the health and safety of working people. Of course in maximizing profit we minimize the money spent on the health and safety of workers and on improving hazardous and substandard products. We spend billions on wasteful advertising promoting consumer greed. Instead of that we seek an economy which identifies our resources as a nation.

We have great wealth; we have unparalled resources. We have energy resources of which most countries are envious and would be proud to have. We have minerals; we have great oceans. Yet we have a Liberal government which does not put these resources to the service of Canadians. We have a government which has tolerated hundreds of thousands of children living in poverty at the same time as these resources are being ripped off to serve our foreign masters.

As I say, we seek an industrial strategy. Many have talked in terms of an industrial strategy, but we seek one in which the wealth of the country will serve all the people of the country. We seek an end to the domination and exploitation of Canadians by outsiders. We seek an end to the system in which we are tenants in our own land, sending dividends year after year to our foreign masters and increasing our current account deficit.

In seeking this longer term strategy in which all Canadians will have jobs, it is important to recognize that it is not good enough simply to substitute Canadian seekers after greed and Canadians who search for corporate profit for foreign searchers of profit. It is important to have an economic system based on co-operatives and the creative role of public ownership in which serving the needs of Canadians is dominant.

In conclusion I say that fundamentally we reject the principles in Bill C-3 as being an abrogation of the responsibility of the government toward all Canadians in creating a decent society and a society in which all Canadians have work. We will continue to speak out at every opportunity on behalf of those Canadians, many of whom are voiceless, young and old, men and women, who are concerned about the erosion of the principles of unemployment insurance in the country and believe it is time for a real change. In the very near future I am confident they will reject once and for all the bankrupt Liberal economic policies in favour of a strong, decent, and compassionate New Democratic Party government.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to address some remarks to the principles involved in Bill C-3. But more important I want to rise to reject out of hand the remarks made by members of the New Democratic Party to my left, that they and only they have a monopoly on the concerns of the unemployed in this country. There are many of us—and particularly members from my area of the Atlantic provinces—who are well aware of the problems of the one million unemployed in Canada, particularly those unemployed in the Atlantic area. We deal with those problems on a day to day basis. I think of the speeches made in the House over the years by members such as the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and other members from the Atlantic area. They brought to the attention of the House time and time again their concerns for the unemployed people of that area and of Canada.

I was concerned that those who listened to the speeches earlier made in the House would get the impression that we, particularly the members from Atlantic Canada, are not concerned with the plight of the unemployed. I underline for all members of the House and all interested persons that it is one of our greatest concerns.

We stand for legislation which will assist unemployed persons to gain the necessities of life. That is what we believe is the important feature of an unemployment insurance system. It is not to encourage idleness and refusal to work at whatever jobs are available. We recognize and realize that there are defects in the unemployment insurance plan which ought to be remedied for the benefit of honest workers who utilize the plan for the purpose for which it was intended, namely, to provide for the needs of life during those periods when a person is unemployed. I want to say categorically that I for one am most interested in the problems of the Canadian unemployed. I reject any suggestion on the part of any hon. member in the House that all of us do not stand together in that concern.

I want to direct my attention to the provisions of the bill, but more particularly to the remarks made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) when he introduced it. One point he made clear at that time was that the provisions of this bill were only an interim measure and that he had in mind a general review and reassessment of the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Indeed, when he made his remarks on the occasion of the introduction of this bill on June 18, 1980, he said that he recognized the question of unemployment insurance was one that occupied a great deal of time in this House over the years. He said that he thought it was important we consider the relevancy and importance of unemployment insurance as it applies to the changing employment conditions in this country.

I for one welcome a general review of the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. We hope such a review would bring about a balance of the legitimate needs of those people who find themselves from time to time unemployed and in need of assistance through a government-sponsored program. At the same time we hope any revision to the Unemployment Insurance Act will ensure that those who do not wish to work and participate in the economy of the nation through the effort of hard work will not benefit under this plan, and that sloth and idleness will not be encouraged. That is the point on which I take issue with my friends.

● (1710)

We do not want in this country an unemployment insurance program which will encourage people not to work. We want incentives to people to work, and we want to ensure that every person in this country recognizes the value and the benefits of hard work. At the same time, and I repeat this without shame, we have to protect those persons who are unable to find employment, particularly in those provinces and regions of this country where employment is not as easily found as it may be in the province of British Columbia, and other areas where, for the moment, they are enjoying the wealth of the nation.

An hon. Member: You better learn about British Columbia.

Mr. Crosby: I would respond to the hon. member who suggests that I learn about British Columbia by saying I have just listened to a member from British Columbia, and if that is the way to learn then I do not think I am any further advanced having listened to his speech than I was at the beginning.

Let me say this in respect of the nearly one million people across this nation who are unemployed; we want to help those in that group who cannot find employment after an honest effort, but we do not want a program which encourages those in that group who simply refuse to work and who are unwilling to take the kind of work available. We do not want to encourage them by providing benefits which are unnecessary and not in the interest of the nation as a whole, including the unemployed.

Let me say one or two additional things on the specifics of this bill and the act it proposes to amend. Over the last few years we have had several amendments to the unemployment insurance program, leading to great confusion on the part of those affected by it. I have particularly in mind the limitation of the 20-hour week proposal being the basis for eligibility, along with the secondary test of a flexible ten to 14-week requirement for benefits. This has caused a great deal of difficulty and confusion to the unemployed, and I know in my own constituency office the question of eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits is a day to day concern. Literally hundereds of constituents inquire as to eligibility, and there is confusion not only on the part of recipients but in the minds of some who administer the unemployment insurance law.

We have to be very careful when we make these changes because of the widespread effect they have on those in communities who find themselves from time to time unemployed. I for one felt that the 20-hour per week work requirement was onerous and difficult in my area of Atlantic Canada, where people find themselves unemployed seasonally and periodically.

One of the groups which has been adversely affected by this requirement is that group of marine workers including longshoremen and stevedores working in the port of Halifax and elsewhere along the eastern seaboard and, indeed, in other parts of Canada. As part of the normal work routine of these people they are required to stand by waiting for employment. Indeed, if they did not stand by waiting for the opportunity to be employed the whole marine transportation system would break down. Indeed, if they sought employment which would allow for steady work over a time period and did not make themselves available for periodic employment on the waterfront, on the piers and wharves in the coastal parts of Canada, the marine transportation system would grind to a halt. These people are performing an essential and necessary service in the interests of all Canadians, yet this is a kind of employment where 20 hours work during a week is a substantial amount. Many of them are unable to supplement their earnings from employment as marine workers with unemployment insurance payments because of this eligibility requirement.

I should point out that in years prior to this requirement it was the practice of many marine workers to engage in their own kind of work during periods of unemployment, particularly during the winter shipping season on the east coast, periods when work was not available at all or available for very limited periods of time, and they could supplement their earnings with unemployment insurance benefits. When the 20-hour week requirement was introduced it had a very adverse effect on this particular group. Even though their earnings on a yearly basis were relatively high, they found themselves without income for periods of time when employment was not available.

The minister in addressing his remarks to this bill indicated he is now proposing that an individual who earns either one fifth of the maximum weekly insurable earnings or works 15 hours a week, will be eligible for coverage, and that kind of coverage will commence January 1, 1981. This measure, which I welcome, goes a long way toward remedying this problem in respect of marine workers.

I might mention that such a change is not without very considerable cost. It affects apparently 300,000 workers across Canada and will represent an additional cost approaching $100 million. As you can see, we pay very dearly for an extension of benefits of that kind. It is nonetheless one which I think is needed, and I hope the minister will carry through with his promise, ensuring that this benefit is available by reducing the requirement to 15 hours a week or one-fifth of insurable earnings. This will benefit not only marine workers but other groups who require assistance. I have in mind particularly substitute school teachers who are again required to stand by waiting for employment and who, for many weeks during the period they are employed, do not attain the required 20 hours, yet their earnings are substantial enough, even with a much lesser period of work, to qualify them for benefits. These are changes we welcome, along with the actual changes contained in Bill C-3 in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Let me add very generally that we are concerned with the plight of the unemployed across this country. We welcome any changes which will benefit those people who need them, but at the same time we do not want the unemployment insurance plan subjected to the abuses of the past. The only solution is that indicated by the previous Progressive Conservative government which embarked upon a study of the Unemployment Insurance Act with a view to correcting those abuses occurring in the past, while at the same time providing reasonable benefits which the country can afford. We welcome any continuation of that period and technique of reform which will bring about an unemployment insurance program beneficial to those who require assistance, without encouraging those who do not need assistance but who remain unemployed simply to collect benefits. I close on that note by saying we welcome changes which assist the unemployed, but we recognize there is a need for changes in the legislation to correct abuses. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on the motion by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA ACT

RELOCATION OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-13, respecting the relocation of government agencies, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that has been of major concern to the people of Canada is the history of the performance of the Liberal government as it has proceeded to enact legislation affecting relocation of government agencies in Canada. This concern rose out of a suspicion that the relocation of government offices in Canada has been used as a means of pork-barrelling, should the opportunity arise; that is, it would serve a political advantage for the government of the time to suggest a relocation of a government agency or a regional office to a Liberal riding. The record speaks for itself on a number of occasions.

● (1720)

I could mention to the House the recent fiasco in the riding of Durham-Northumberland with regard to the relocation of Eldorado Nuclear. Eldorado, a Crown corporation with its head office in the area of Port Hope and with directors appointed by a Liberal government, suggested that it would be advisable to put a refinery in Hope township. I remind hon. members that this occurred during a Liberal government. No action was taken, but commitments were inferred during the election campaign.

Immediately following the election campaign, the Conservative government came into power and a decision was made to act. Eldorado acted, and they located, with intent, on property in Hope township. Another election came along and the Liberals were returned to office, and the decision was made to move Eldorado out of a Conservative riding to a Liberal riding in the north.

That is not the only case. There are a number of cases in history. We do not need to go back very far, just to 1977 at which time there were 13 proposed relocations of government offices, all but one to Liberal ridings. We can come closer to today's date and discuss what was recommended first in 1973 by a Liberal government, that the regional office of Parks Canada located at that time in Cornwall, which was serving the province of Quebec, would move to a Liberal seat in Quebec. At the same time it was proposed by a Liberal government that the Ontario regional office would be moved out of Cornwall into a then Liberal riding, Peterborough.

Only one thing went wrong with those plans. The Liberal regained his seat in Quebec and the regional office was moved from Cornwall to Quebec City, a more central location for serving the needs of Quebec. This was a commendable move which was thoroughly studied. The proposal to move the Ontario regional office of Parks Canada from Cornwall to Peterborough was also thoroughly studied. The move was first studied by hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan) who was then a Liberal minister of the Crown. It was recommended by the minister that the regional office should be more centrally located in order to serve Ontario best. The two locations under consideration were Guelph and Peterborough, both ridings were held by Liberals.

The only thing that went wrong with the move of Parks Canada from Cornwall to central Ontario, where it could best do the job for the most people in Ontario, was that the Liberals were unsuccessful in holding on to the seat held by a then cabinet minister in Peterborough in the 1979 election. It became politically astute to call the move off when they regained power in the current government. That is just one more case of the proposed centralized legislation which we are reviewing today, as it affects Hull and other regional offices.

Such questions should be carefully studied and reviewed with a great deal of concern as to whether these moves, in terms of history of performance, have been moves to satisfy the desires of Liberal members of government or whether the moves have been made to best serve the people of Canada. To be more specific, during the election campaign of 1980 it was claimed by the then member of Parliament for Cornwall, a Liberal, that the regional office would go to Peterborough, to use the member's exact words, "Over my dead body".

I would remind the people of Canada that to keep that same cabinet minister alive, it will cost them some $2 million or $3 million to call off the move of Parks Canada to Peterborough and to move the regional office back to Cornwall, after the premises had been rented in Peterborough. The premises are a large facility of two storeys and many thousands of square feet. It is located on the main intersection of Charlotte Street and George Street in Peterborough, and it is now vacant. The facility was leased at a cost of $160,000 a year for a period of five years. The merchants located in that building were evicted to make room for Parks Canada. The keys were turned over to the government.

However, the new Liberal government decided to bring everything back to Cornwall where it still enjoys a Liberal seat. The reason given to the employees of Parks Canada for keeping the office in Cornwall was because it would be in the best interest of the morale of the employees. I can tell hon. members how enthusiastic the employees of Parks Canada in Cornwall are at the move being called off. Since the move was called off a few short weeks ago, there has been a mass grievance by the employees in Cornwall to the Civil Service Alliance complaining about the cancellation of the long awaited move to where it could serve Canada best, Peterborough.

A petition has been presented to this House containing 51 signatures, including all the management staff of Parks Canada who could sign the petition, except for three who would lose their jobs if they were to sign it. The petition stated that it would be best for Ontario and the citizens of Canada with regard to heritage research work in Ontario if the regional office were located in Peterborough. The problem is that there is not a Liberal member in the riding of Peterborough. The petition which was duly signed asked this House to reconsider the cancellation of that move.

There have been over 20 litigations brought against this government by employees objecting to the cancellation of that move. Thirty-five management staff of Parks Canada in Cornwall, who have been expecting the move since 1975, when it was announced that the move would be made to either Guelph or Peterborough, as recently as two weeks ago served notice of requests for transfers. These are not lateral transfers within the department, but transfers right out of the Ministry of the Environment. Some employees have terminated their employment because of this bad management decision made by the new Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) who cancelled the move.

The principal reason for cancelling the move is that it would be best for the morale of the employees. Having substantiated that it was adversely affecting the morale, as a result of these three instances over the last month, I would like to remind the citizens of Canada of what it is costing them to call off this move of Parks Canada from Cornwall to Peterborough. The cost is well documented in Hansard and in committee meetings. It would cost $900,000 to move all the employees to Peterborough and $91,000 to move the office equipment to that city where Parks Canada could serve Ontario best due to the central location on the Trent-Severn Waterways, which is part of the Parks Canada portfolio.

What is it costing to move those employees and that office facility back to Cornwall? It is costing the taxpayers of Canada $1,250,000 in payments to employees as they buy back their good will. I can hear people say "$1,250,000 to the employees, how will that be paid and what for?" Those employees are going to be reimbursed by having their homes in Peterborough purchased by the government. That contract was signed today in Peterborough with A.E. LePage. The Government of Canada is going to buy back all the private homes of all the employees of Parks Canada. This government is then going to go back to Cornwall and buy the same homes formerly owned by those employees. Three cases have already been settled. One particular person in Cornwall, a citizen not to be named, was paid $14,000 cash over and above the price he paid for that home in Cornwall in order that we, the government, the taxpayers of Canada could get that home back, and put the home in Peterborough on sale at a reported commission of 6 per cent for handling to get that employee back.

I have taken the liberty of compounding the figures involved. I have taken the number of employees involved and the number of homes purchased in Peterborough, and to purchase like residences in Cornwall again we are looking at something like $1.5 million. Very quickly we are now up to almost $3 million. That is the kind of decentralization policy which this present government is enacting.

Eldorado Nuclear was cancelled in Hope township and moved to a Liberal riding in the north from a Conservative riding in the south. Next is Parks Canada in Peterborough. Parks Canada was put in place by two former Liberal cabinet ministers who lost their seats in the 1979 election. Subsequently, Parks Canada was moved back to Cornwall, now a cabinet minister's seat, because he said that if the Liberals formed the government in 1980 he would reverse that move to Peterborough and it would be over his dead body that it stayed on track. I want the citizens of Canada to know how much it is costing them to keep that cabinet minister's body warm and alive in Cornwall.

Forgetting all of the political pork-barrelling, forgetting about moving up to the trough as every dollar is sucked from the Canadian taxpayers in order to satisfy government members' own political motivations in their own ridings, let us take a look at what it has done to Ontario. Peterborough is an area I represent. A regional office of Parks Canada has been taken away from the Trent-Severn waterway. This government has moved it to Cornwall in the southeast corner of Ontario. It is well documented that it is costing Canadian taxpayers $260,000 a year more to operate there than it could be operated in Peterborough. That is documented by the deputy minister of the environment in this present government, and by the Minister of the Environment through cross-examination by myself in committee hearings, and by questions asked in this House. Taxpayers are going on and on paying and forgetting about inflation. They are paying $260,000 more a year to operate Parks Canada in Cornwall where it cannot operate effectively, efficiently, and with the best interests of Ontario in mind.

Second, by operating in Cornwall the government is forgetting one point. In its decentralization policy the government says that it will move offices around where they can best serve their purpose. I ask why did the government leave the Quebec regional office in Quebec? Why did the government not move that office from Quebec City to Cornwall where it was when the government announced that it would break up the regional office and put it in the centre of provinces, namely, central Ontario and central Quebec? I will tell you why the government did not move it back from Quebec to Cornwall—because there was a Liberal member of parliament representing the constituents in Quebec.

What is this present government proposing to do with its relocation policy? It will do nothing different from what it has done in the past. If there is a Liberal member serving the constituents in a particular riding, that is where offices will be proposed, regardless of what is best for Canada, what is best for the office, or what is best for the citizens in that area. If this government does not soon start realizing that it has to take into consideration what is best for Canada and not what is best for government members personally, then we will have bad government. We have bad government today because of pork-barrelling and the decentralization of offices all over the Dominion.

I cannot support this bill because this bill is incurring more expense in the area of political patronage. I hope that the people of Canada are well aware of those three points, namely the history of these relocation moves, the costs involved in picking up the tab and the ulterior motive that motivates this government into making every decision. I say that is crass politics. Until we realize that and until we respect what is best for Canada as a government, then we lose credibility in Parliament as we carry out our duties.

This government that we have today is fully responsible for the millions of dollars wasted in the cancellation of Eldorado in Hope township and in the cancellation of Parks Canada in Peterborough just so it could serve its own needs and desires as it endeavours to serve one purpose, and that is to get re-elected individually regardless of the cost to the Canadian taxpayers.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this bill that is before us today has as its basic purpose the legislation of something which was done without authority in the mid-1970s. What was done without authority was not the building of the buildings in Hull, Quebec, which someone described as Fort Fullerton, it was the movement of certain government offices out of the capital of Canada which, under the British North America Act, is Ottawa, into another part of the national capital region, that is to say the city of Hull. That is the purpose of the bill.

If members want to look at it, they will see that it deals with headquarters of the Economic Council of Canada, the land titles department, provisions with respect to the National Transportation Act, the Public Archives Act, the headquarters of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, matters with respect to the Pension Act, and so on.

This bill first saw the light of day in the Thirtieth Parliament. Despite the fact that we are now in the Thirty-second Parliament, that is not too long ago. When the government of which I had the honour to be a member came to office we had to take a look at this bill because the same illegal situation which had existed at the outset, existed for our government. We had to include this bill in our work program. It was included in the work program for the Thirty-first Parliament. But as everyone knows, that Parliament did not last long enough for this bill to be dealt with. Now we see it again in the Thirty-second Parliament. We are again trying to legalize something which occurred a long time ago.

This is a very symbolic bill, aside from its ramifications in law. It is very symbolic because it pinpoints something which occurred in the national capital area. It pinpoints the headlong dash, without consultation with local government or even provincial government, to move departments of government from where they were and had been for some period of time within the city of Ottawa over to the city of Hull.

So that members of Parliament will have no doubt about my feelings with respect to the matter, let me say quite frankly that I do not begrudge the good fortune of the city of Hull with regard to this development. However, I say to the House that the government handled it in a very ham-handed, unconsultative way. As a result of how it was handled, a great deal of misunderstanding developed in the national capital area. An opportunity for consultation which should have taken place with the provincial authorities, regional government and others, did not take place until after those moves were made.

Even when there was some discussion after the fact with local government officials as to the pace of the movement of public servants to Hull into those tremendous buildings across the river, tremendous in size, and some agreement had been reached between the federal government and the local governments, that agreement was broken as well. If anyone has any doubt about that, let him speak to Dennis Coolican, then chairman of the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton. He indicated the government was years ahead in terms of the movement. I do not have to tell hon. members how important that was, or about the disruption it meant to this area.

It is symbolic because it pinpoints what has been wrong for some period of time in relationships between the federal government and local governments in this area. The national capital area and the municipalities surrounding it are many things. One thing they are is a group of municipalities which gather their authority under the Ontario municipal act and related statutes. They have mandates to plan. There is land use planning to take into account, as well as demographic changes that occur, and population changes. They have the jurisdictional responsibility as to how the local municipality will develop. That is the law of the province of Ontario. I dare say it is the law of the province of Quebec as well.

The clash in this area has been that the federal government with its immense land holdings, immense financial capability, and through a combination of those things, has been able to do its own thing without consultation. This relocation occurred and we are now legalizing it. We are cleaning up the act, much as the little man who runs behind the circus parade with bucket and shovel to clean up the act after the parade has passed. This is an indication of just how wrong the government's approach has been to this whole matter.

I do not want to leave the impression that as between the staff level of the National Capital Commission and the staff level of the federal government there is no discussion that takes place, that each works in a vacuum. Within the limits of the mandate that is imposed on the respective governments, at staff level there has always been a certain amount of give and take and understanding. Somehow that has not reached the political level. Perhaps one of the reasons for that, and I am glad to see some ministers in the House—

Mr. Knowles: Two.

Mr. Lapointe: And two NDP.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —is that there has not been for some period of time a representation from the local government, nominees of the regional government of Ottawa-Carleton on one hand and the Outaouais government on the other, as members of the National Capital Commission. There could then be some meeting of minds and understanding on what is happening at the policy level, where these snowballs are made before they are thrown. It did not happen in this case. The snowball was made and it was thrown long before there was any real consultation as to what occurred. I hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) will take the debate on this bill as rather important in dealing with the relationships that must occur between the two levels of government.

I am not the only one who has been quarrelling about this and worrying about the way this government has proceeded. There are members in this House of Commons, and I respect their view, who feel that the decentralization program which was embarked upon by the Liberal government was a good thing. I want to make the record clear again. As a principle, decentralization is a solid principle. However, what happened here was that decentralization was taking place at the same time that a massive relocation was going on within the national capital area in terms of Hull.

It was the lack of consultation on the one hand and the fact that these things were running side by side which caused a tremendous number of problems. I am not the only one who has concerned himself with that. I have here a report to the voters of Ottawa West by the present Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis). It is his "Report to Voters" No. 8, January 1977. You will recall from your geographical location in the electoral map, Mr. Speaker, this was a matter of some concern, even in your own area. This is what he said, and I quote from his report:

> The Government of Canada, as an employer, has the right to decide where work in the Public Service is to be performed. If the government decides that the Fisheries Department is to be moved to the Atlantic or Pacific coast, then I think few people could object. If the government decides that a number of services such as the Mint have to be moved, as part of a philosophy of making government closer to the people in this vast land of ours, then I think most of us accept it. If the government decides that this policy is an essential instrument of national unity and making the federal presence felt through all the ten provinces and in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, then I think the overwhelming number of voters in Ottawa West would accept it without question.

I think that if it were proven, they would accept it without question. The problem is that the propaganda has never been proven. That is beside the point. He goes on to say:

> The problem arises, however, when the decision to decentralize is combined with a major relocation of government departments to Hull at the same time. The issue here relates to the timing of moves and measures taken to co-ordinate them in such a way that the impact on the residents of Ottawa will be the least serious possible.

What happened with respect to timing and co-ordination? There literally was not any. As a result, there was and still is a serious impact on the Ottawa side of the Ottawa River, this part of the national capital. If hon. members want visual confirmation of that, I invite them to join with the Minister of Public Works, who is in the chamber, and drive up Kent Street some morning on their way to the House of Commons. Look at the signs that are two or three storeys high about office space to lease. Talk to dentists, restaurateurs and others who occupy space in public buildings in anticipation that the relocation would not take place or, if it did, that some common sense would have been applied to it. That is a visual impact of it all.

● (1750)

Walk down Sparks Street, as I did today, and take a look at the number of vacant stores in what is regarded as the most prestigious shopping area in the national capital. Yet those stores, all of them providing service, some of them having been there for years, have decided to move elsewhere. There may be other reasons which combine, but I say to the Minister of Public Works—he cannot be blamed for it personally because he was not the minister of public works when these things occurred—that lack of planning and lack of foresight certainly had something to do with the vacancy of those stores, and prompts a real concern about the future of Sparks Street and the future of Bank Street.

I do not represent Sparks Street and I do not represent Bank Street, but in a commercial area, especially in that kind of small business commercial area, every pebble which is dropped into the pond of business welfare causes ripples which spread out and affect everyone else. I think bad planning has had a good deal of adverse effect in the national capital area and I intend to speak about some other aspects while the minister is in the House.

If members want further proof, let them talk to professional people—I am not thinking about members of the legal profession which draws people from all over; I am thinking of the dentists, the doctors and others who have tried to establish practices. All those people I have referred to, the restaurateurs and others, are small business people and they are the victims not of a move to Hull but of an ill-planned relocation to Hull, a relocation which took place at speeds which were unprecedented, unexpected and unheralded by anything which was said by the government which sits across the way.

That is what is happening to this area, and that is why I speak on this bill. When we became a government we took a look at the decentralization plan, particularly with respect to relocation. We considered it from the point of view of the ability to provide service, to provide a modicum of administrative efficiency to the operations of the government and service to the public generally. Generally speaking, we decided that some of these plans should go forward and that 19—I think that was the number—should be stopped. We were advised as a government that in no way could those we decided to stop—and some which we decided to allow to proceed because they were well advanced—could there be anything other than political expendiency—the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) has used the phrase "pork-barrelling"—but in terms of service to the public of Canada, which must be a consideration, particularly in a time of restraint, that that kind of service could not be given in the relocated areas. And that is a criterion which naturally has to be applied not only with respect to the areas to which the government organizations are moving but also having to do with the over-all effectiveness of delivery of service to the public. This was the dilemma we faced, and we measured our decisions against those criteria.

With regard to decentralization projects which had been physically advanced to the point at which the commitment had been made to the extent that we could not back away with honesty as a government, we did not back away from them but we were placed in a dilemma as a government: we suspected there was some reason for which these should not go forward but we could not pinpoint the reason until we came to office. When we did, we had the benefit of the advice of the public service and, as a result, we made the decisions which had to be made.

I said to the Minister of Public Works that I would be dealing with another matter. I think there is a potential for real conflict in the national capital area with respect to its planning. One has to take a look at the official plan of the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton which is the duly authorized planning authority for this area, and at the proposals for the development of the national capital. One sees that those plans meet head on. In the plan for the National Capital Commission there is concentration upon development in the core of Ottawa-Hull, the Ottawa River being a bridge between the two—I use the word "bridge" rather than the word "barrier". That is the concentration of the federal plan, whereas the municipal plan—and under the act the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton has pre-eminence in planning officially for the area—under the municipal plan there is a provision for the placing of government buildings, federal installations, within the national capital area in the area municipalities.

As the minister knows, I live in Nepean, and in that municipality there is provision as it affects that municipality. In the city of Kanata they would be delighted to augment what it has in terms of government installations. The official plan of the township of Goulburn—perhaps I should say the plan of the region as it affects Goulburn—provision is made and space set aside for the development of federal institutions. Take a look at the official plan as it affects the township of Osgoode. The same applies in the case of Rideau township.

I realize that buildings cannot be torn down and I understand that because of the investment involved public servants cannot be brought back, but I want the minister to take a look at this proposal. If there is to be relocation from time to time out of Ottawa where heretofore head offices were to be, into the national capital area as Bill C-13 contemplates, the Government of Canada should regard the national capital area not just with respect to Hull, however worthy its desire for expansion is, but regard the whole of the national capital area as worthy of consideration because it is important that there be a balanced development within the national capital region. I also think it is important with respect to public servants that there be consultation as to moves and that there should be consultation with local governments. Failing this, a conflict of development priorities is likely to arise which could do nothing but harm to the relationship between the federal government and local government.

May I call it six o'clock?

● (1800)

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I might be a little off base here, but I understood that perhaps there was some disposition to seeing this bill passed. I am not sure whether my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), had finished his remarks or whether there were other speakers. I understood that there were just two speakers from the official opposition, and if we could have the indulgence of the House for a couple of minutes the minister might want to reply before this bill goes to committee, if that is the agreement of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): This can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would mind getting to his feet again and telling us the order for tomorrow.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, we had hoped to have Bill C-13 disposed of today, but we plan to bring that tomorrow afternoon right after question period to finish it off, and then we will proceed with Bill C-22. Should we dispose of Bill C-22, then we will bring back Bill S-6.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

JURISDICTION OF MINISTER IN LIGHT OF SUPREME COURT JUDGMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity having to do with a recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of a British Columbia logger by the name of Dan Fowler.

The judgment challenges the jurisdiction and renders the operative use of the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) useless. Accordingly, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That the House instruct the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to set out forthwith to examine his jurisdiction in areas where legitimate interests of his department are in conflict with competing interests, as was the case with respect to matters leading to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Fowler case, and to include in such examination discussions with provincial officials and leaders of industry as requested by the Council of Forest Industries in British Columbia.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

CONSTRUCTION OF ALASKA HIGHWAY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I wish to follow up my motion of June 26 under Standing Order 43. Canada is importing approximately $4 billion of oil and $1 billion of coal annually, causing a severe adverse balance of payments problem.

As the pre-build section of the Alaska highway gas pipeline will provide 150,000 man-years of employment and will permit the export of Canadian surplus natural gas, resulting in a favourable balance of payments of approximately $2 billion per year, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the federal government immediately approve all Canadian aspects of the pre-build Alaska highway natural gas pipeline while concurrently continuing negotiations with the United States of America for acceptable guarantees in regard to construction of the northern and Alaska sections of the natural gas line.

Approval is needed now.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

NEED FOR IMPROVED FACILITIES ON WEST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas another British Columbian has died because of the federal government's failure to provide adequate search and rescue facilities on the west coast, and whereas this death occurred a short distance from CFB Comox and resulted, in all probability, from the fact that all four helicopters were down for maintenance, and whereas the rescue co-ordination centre failed to provide helicopter service and a competent medical team, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the Prime Minister of Canada apologize to the family and to the people of British Columbia for failure to provide service and, further, that he make a statement in this House explaining how much longer the people of western Canada must put up with this inexcusable service.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ACID RAIN POLLUTION FROM U.S. POWER PLANTS' CONVERSION FROM OIL TO COAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I am confident that hon. members on both sides of the House will provide the unanimous consent required.

In view of the fact that the United States has passed a bill to convert 80 power plants in the northeastern states from oil to coal, which will cause a disastrous increase in acid rain in both the United States and Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House urge the United States House of Representatives to modify the power plant conversion bill while there is still time, in order to restrict increased acid rain pollution from the conversions.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

HIRING OF WOMEN FOR ALASKA HIGHWAY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that this government has not yet signed an Affirmative Action agreement with Foothills Pipe Lines Ltd., and in view of the fact that the president and chief executive officer of Foothills, Mr. R. L. Pierce, stated to the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines on June 19, 1980, that women possess 75 per cent of the brains of the population, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House instructs the government to negotiate an Affirmative Action program with Foothills before pre-building is even considered, and ensure that this agreement includes a hiring quota of 75 per cent women.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

NOTIFICATION OF GRANTS TO ALL MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) yesterday indicated in a standing committee that all members of the House of Commons should be treated equally with respect to the administration of New Horizons grants, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House support the Minister of National Health and Welfare's commitment that all Progressive Conservative and New Democratic Party members of Parliament receive the same communications on and notification of New Horizons grants as Liberal members of Parliament do.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Who said "No"?

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. There were "Noes" and that is why I did not put this motion to the House.

Mr. Clark: Which minister said "No"?

CP AIR

CRITICISM OF CABINET REVERSAL OF CTC DECISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to propose a motion of urgent and pressing importance.

In the light of last week's cabinet ruling which overturned a decision by the Canadian Transport Commission, a decision which had granted CP Air the right to provide one-stop transcontinental air service from Vancouver to Halifax via Toronto, and as this cabinet action contradicts commitment by a previous minister of transport, the Hon. Otto Lang, as reported in Hansard for November 8, 1978—

An hon. Member: Otto who?

Mr. Siddon: —that the Liberal government would not interfere with the authority of the CTC to make such decisions, based on careful consideration of all factors pertaining to the public interest, I move, seconded by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook):

That the Liberal government be severely censured for its despicable treatment of CP Air, which is Canada's only privately-owned transcontinental airline, and that the government be required to reimburse CP Air for up to $1 million of costs incurred by CP Air in preparing for the Toronto-Halifax service.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF DEVELOPMENT BONDS PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the dramatic announcement in Fredericton several weeks ago by the Minister of State (Small Businesses) (Mr. Lapointe) that his government was going to implement the small business development bond which was the creation of the previous administration, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the House instruct the Minister of Finance to bring in immediately amendments to the Income Tax Act to establish the small business development bond.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO CERTAIN ELDERLY PERSONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada recently handed down its judgment that some 13,500 elderly people were incorrectly cut off unemployment insurance benefits in 1976, and said this was an obvious injustice which should be corrected by Parliament, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

● (1415)

That this House calls on the Minister of Employment and Immigration to bring before the House such measures as would remedy this obvious injustice as quickly as possible, so that these senior citizens will finally receive the benefits to which they are justly entitled.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT IN WEST—ASSISTANCE TO MANITOBA FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the very laudable announcement made today by the Minister of Agriculture, in Yorkton, Saskatchewan, of $60 million in assistance to prairie grain farmers affected by the drought, in addition to the $7 million for farm-well aid plan assistance already announced, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Bachand):

That this House urge the government of Manitoba to confirm that its $43 million in assistance to Manitoba farmers will be in addition to the federal programs.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INCOME TAX

INDEXATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. During the last election campaign, the Prime Minister promised that his party, if elected to government, would make the tax system in Canada more equitable and would protect poor and middle-income Canadians—and I quote him—"by helping first those who need that assistance".

The Prime Minister and his government are now considering ending indexation of the personal income tax system. That program, if they follow through, would hurt most those Canadians whom the Prime Minister has promised to help. I wonder if the Prime Minister will take the opportunity today to give me, the House of Commons and the people of Canada a direct assurance that the Government of Canada will not stop or tinker with the indexation of the personal income tax system in the country.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This matter has not been considered by the government as a whole, or by myself. I do know that the Minister of Finance and his officials are engaged in a long-term preparation of budgetary measures. They are considering all forms of budgetary matters, and they are doing what the Leader of the Opposition's minister did when he considered abolishing the indexing system.

What will be done with that consideration is something that the minister himself has not decided and certainly the government has not examined.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has just confirmed that the government is now actively considering ending the indexing system.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: May I remind the Prime Minister of the statement made by his then minister of finance, the Hon. John Turner, at the time of introducing the indexing system: Mr. Turner said:

—this new system will be recognized everywhere as a bold and sensitive response to a fundamental tax problem.

Having regard to the excessively high rates of inflation in the country, will the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons what circumstances have changed to lead his government and his Minister of Finance to consider, as the Prime Minister has just admitted they are, abandoning this, in the words of Mr. Turner, "bold and sensitive response to a fundamental tax problem"?

Mr. Trudeau: If the Leader of the Opposition is quoting authorities, he might ask himself why in the face of that eminent authority his own minister of finance examined the possibility of abolishing indexing.

I repeat, it is the duty of every minister of finance to look at the whole range of instruments that are at his disposal to arrive at a fair and equitable budgetary decision—and that is what he is doing, exactly as the Tory minister of finance did.

Mr. Clark: We would be very pleased if this government could do exactly what we did regarding indexing, because we considered it and we rejected the proposal absolutely. Since the Prime Minister is not prepared at this stage to follow our lead and reject a proposal—

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Listen to the howls over there; they sound dreadful.

Mr. Clark: Since the Prime Minister is not prepared to follow our lead and reject a proposal which would impose a very heavy burden upon the poor in Canada and upon low and middle-income Canadians, will he follow our lead in another respect? He knows that a year ago, when there was concern about the question of interest rates, the government of the day referred that question to a standing committee so that all aspects could be considered.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Clark: If the Prime Minister wants a serious consideration of indexing, will he refer the question of indexation to a standing committee of this House of Commons, so that members on this side of the House who believe that indexing should not be stopped and that the poor should be protected will have an opportunity to stop the Minister of Finance from ending indexing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The poor do not pay taxes.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I will gladly undertake to follow the lead of the hon. Leader of the Opposition at least part way if he could inform us when his minister stopped considering deindexation. We do not know that. We know that he considered it, we know that in the final result he did not adopt it; but how many weeks or months before budget night did he stop considering de-indexation? If we have that information, perhaps we can follow the lead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister of finance in my government stopped consideration of the ending of indexation moments, months, days after he began that consideration.

An hon. Member: Moments, months, days?

Mr. Clark: We now have an undertaking by the Prime Minister that they will follow that lead.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Clark: Will the Prime Minister of Canada—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. May I ask the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to put his question.

Mr. Andre: What? You should ask them to stop.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, my problem is that I am receiving questions and considerable heckling from the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: That is right.

Mr. Clark: Will the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Will the Prime Minister, knowing that our government rejected that proposal quickly, now instruct his Minister of Finance to reject immediately any consideration of the ending of indexing which would place an unpardonable heavy tax upon the poor and upon lower and middle-income Canadians?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has not given the information I asked for. How many months before budget night did his minister stop considering this fiscal instrument? How many months before?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Put it to a committee.

INDEXATION—RESPONSIBILITIES OF MINISTER FOR SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development. It relates to his new responsibilities for social development and, indeed, the well-being of all Canadians.

The minister might want to explain to the House, particularly in light of the comments of the Prime Minister, how deindexing of income tax deductions will assist his responsibilities with respect to low and moderate-income people in this country.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not have anything to add to what the Prime Minister said.

An hon. Member: I bet you don't.

Mr. Chrétien: The Minister of Finance is studying all aspects of fiscal policies before preparing a budget. We will know when he has a budget. At that time, with whatever moves he makes, I am sure it will be a good Liberal budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, my concern is with respect to the responsibilities of the minister. He is not responsible for the budget. In fact, it seems to me that his responsibility ought to deal with those persons who will be adversely affected by deindexing.

I should like to ask the minister whether he or anyone in his government has already made representations to the Minister of Finance with respect to how the measure to de-index will affect single parents on mother's allowance and, indeed, assist the Minister of National Health and Welfare to bring senior citizens up to the poverty line, which is her desire?

● (1425)

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, this House has already voted an increase of $35 to the benefit of people who are retired and on fixed incomes. We have acted to show our consideration for citizens of Canada in that way. When there is a real budget, I am sure it will be much more acceptable to Canadians than the budget presented last December.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

FINANCIAL GUARANTEES FOR ALASKA HIGHWAY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday, in the House, the minister told us the government had obtained assurances that some $500 million would be spent on the northern pipeline project. I should like to ask whether the minister will confirm today that, far from being the financial guarantees which are required by an act of this Parliament, this sum merely constitutes some 2 per cent of the $22 billion required for the whole project, and thus does not meet those guarantee requirements at all.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I certainly never stated that this constituted the full guarantee to which the hon. member was referring. I can understand his referring to the $500 million as a picayune amount.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not.

Mr. Lalonde: It is still a large amount committed to this very important project by private sponsors—$500 million. It is clear, when the hon. member refers to the full financial commitment by all the private sponsors as not being provided by this particular undertaking, that it is an undertaking, as I indicated yesterday in my answer. If my hon. friend refers to Hansard, he will see it clearly directed toward engineering and design, and it is not representative of the full cost of completion of the line. Some people have estimated the total cost as being as high as $20 billion.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, that is precisely the point; it is only 2 per cent of the amount which would be required by the act passed by this Parliament. As the minister knows, the cabinet has before it a proposal which, if anything, is more serious in its implications then the paltry, in a comparative sense, sum amounting to 2 per cent being put up as a guarantee for this pipeline, and that is the submission made by the National Energy Board that the act of Parliament be changed.

I would like to ask the minister whether he will assure the House that the proposal made by the National Energy Board, that the financial guarantee requirements to the people of Canada be taken out of the act, will be categorically rejected by the cabinet so that the people of Canada will be protected in respect of this important measure.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I can give the clear assurance to the hon. member that the government will respect the law and, secondly, that any step we take will be taken in the interests of the people of Canada, in order to protect the people of Canada as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, let us be perfectly clear about what the minister has now said. The minister has said that the government is prepared to change the Northern Pipeline Act by removing the guarantee put in at the request of Parliament.

If the government removes that guarantee, what we will have is a pipeline entirely different from the one approved by Parliament: we will have a pipeline designed to ship Canadian gas to United States markets, instead of a pipeline as approved by Canada to ship U.S. gas to U.S. markets. Is that what the minister is saying?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Madam Speaker.

ENERGY

SUBSTITUTION OF CANADIAN GAS FOR IMPORTED OIL—ENERGY SUBSTITUTION PROGRAM

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the speech entitled "Canadian Energy Efficiency" which he gave in Montreal on May 15, the minister said that it was—to use his words—a "strategic imperative" that Canada get off oil.

The minister set a goal of a 10 per cent decrease in our use of oil. He mentioned that 375,000 barrels per day would be cut out, and that this would be done through an energy substitution program which would largely substitute Canadian gas for imported oil. Did the minister's department calculate how much gas was needed to achieve that goal?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to correct the misreading of my speech by the hon. member. If he reads the text carefully, he will see it says that our commitment is much larger than the one to which he referred. Our commitment is, not to reduce the consumption of oil by 10 per cent but to reduce the consumption of oil used for residential, commercial and industrial purposes to 10 per cent of the energy needs for those specific purposes. Indeed, the commitment was very substantial. We are convinced that it can be, and will be achieved, during this decade.

With regard to the amount of gas that is required, my department has examined the implications of such a commitment. My officials have assured me that Canada has sufficient reserves to meet such a commitment and objective, which is very much in the interest of the country.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I note the commitment to change to Canadian gas from oil. Before the minister announced his May program in that speech, to substitute gas for oil and thus increase the demand for Canadian gas, the National Energy Board last December, I believe, calculated Canada's gas reserves and then allocated our entire surplus for export to the United States in order to finance the pre-building of the Alaska Highway natural gas pipeline. It is an either/or situation; the minister cannot have it both ways.

Will the minister approve the National Energy Board's gas exports to finance the pre-build, or will the minister keep the policy which he just outlined in the house and keep the gas in Canada to implement the policy which will allow Canadians to substitute gas for oil?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would like to make two comments in answer to the hon. member. First, if the hon. member would again refer to my speech, he would see that it does not refer exclusively to substitution of gas for oil: it refers to other forms of energy, particularly electricity. It is not the mere substitution of oil by gas. We hope that a large portion of the substitution will be gas, but the program is not based exclusively on gas. I made this quite clear in the speech, which refers to other possible sources of energy such as coal.

With regard to the second part of the hon. member's question, I can assure him that this government will do nothing to approve exports that would jeopardize the security of Canadian supply. Security of Canadian supply will always come first as far as this government is concerned.

OFFSHORE RESOURCES

INQUIRY TO WHOM ROYALTIES SHOULD BE PAID

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Council of Maritime Premiers meeting recently at Dalvay, Prince Edward Island, agreed that royalties from offshore mineral resources should go to the provinces, is the Prime Minister giving any thought to rethinking his position on this matter? If so, when can we expect a statement from him?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, my thinking on this matter has been made public many times, including during the last federal election. I would inform the hon. member that the subject of offshore mineral resources is one of those to be examined by the constitutional ministers in their meeting beginning next Tuesday. The federal position will be stated there and made known to the representatives of the provinces, and no doubt discussions will ensue.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, since the 75-25 royalty split proposed on offshore resources in 1977 is obviously unacceptable to Nova Scotia, I would like to know what steps the Prime Minister intends to take to resolve this problem before he meets for constitutional talks with the maritime premiers in September.

In the meantime, will he assure the House that my province will continue to receive subsidies on the crude oil which it must buy offshore in order to generate electricity?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member that the governments of those three provinces agreed to sign the agreement, I believe back in 1977, which seems to have settled the matter. Now they are reopening those agreements and they want a new discussion.

The Minister of Justice will be at the meeting on Tuesday to hear their points of view, because that is what the meeting is about. Much before September this matter will be discussed between the provinces and the federal government. However, I repeat: it is up to the provinces to say in what way they want the constitution changed, if at all, because they agreed a few years ago on the arrangements to which I have referred.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS PIPELINE TO MARITIMES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last December 6, the Minister of Energy stated in the House of Commons that the Atlantic provinces need more natural gas, and a gas pipeline to take gas to the homes and industries there.

Given the representation at that time by the minister in favour of the extension of the natural gas pipeline to the maritime region, the representations of myself, of the Liberal party of the province of New Brunswick, and of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, and given the fact the province of New Brunswick has stated that it favours the extension of the pipeline should the obstacles identified by the National Energy Board be removed, what will the minister and the government do to encourage the applicant to overcome these obstacles and to fulfil his own pledge that the pipeline extension to Atlantic Canada is a priority of his government?

Also, can the minister obtain a timetable from the applicant as soon as possible and table it in this House so that the extension of the pipeline will be shown as being a priority.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have already had occasion to indicate to this House that the construction of a gas pipeline to the maritime provinces is still the first choice of this government. As the hon. member indicated, some reservations have been expressed by the National Energy Board. I have also had discussions, on two occasions, about the matter with the promoters of the project.

The hon. member tells me the New Brunswick government has expressed an opinion other than that already on file, that is that it has considerable reservations about the project. I have received no information from that government to that effect and would be very happy to hear what the minister of energy, or any other spokesman for the government of that province, has to say about it.

[English]

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, the minister is fond of including New Brunswick as a partner in co-operation with the present government for restricting the pipeline to Quebec. In this same area of co-operation—which is contrary to representations made by most others, including the minister's colleague but which the minister seems to be so hung-up on—will he assure the province of New Brunswick and its people that he will not tamper or tinker with the contract between the province of New Brunswick and the state of Maine to purchase 400 megawatts of power annually from the oil-fired generating station in Saint John?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, far from opposing the construction of the pipeline, we have in fact indicated that it is our first option. I would remind the hon. member that the National Energy Board is an independent body, a quasi-judicial organization, and brought down a decision on the matter. If the hon. member gives himself the trouble of reading the ruling of the board, he will realize the board itself points out the reservations expressed by the New Brunswick government on the matter. We did not invent those reservations; they are on file, officially on the record and registered by the National Energy Board.

As for the matter of possible exports of electric power to the United States, there again, should the New Brunswick government reach an agreement with an American state, it will have to go before the board to plead its case; the board will make recommendations and draw conclusions to determine whether or not that energy can be exported to the States, after which a decision will be made.

INDUSTRY

RUBBER—ADVERSE EFFECT OF IMPORTING TIRES

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. When the minister approved the decision of FIRA to permit a Finnish company to import and distribute tires, did he take into account the fact that the government was already increasing competition in the rubber industry with a $50 million DREE grant to the Michelin tire company, and did he take into account that with the slowdown in the automotive industry, with which he is very familiar, there would be substantial lay-offs in the tire industry?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, when looking at these questions it is customary to examine all aspects connected with them. I should point out to the hon. member that the decision of the government on this matter was made in March, before a final decision was taken on the Michelin application.

Mr. McLean: Madam speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister, in light of his response. Is it part of the foreign investment policy of this government to let non-North American rubber companies establish in Canada at the expense of workers employed by North American-owned subsidiaries?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the purpose of the law is to provide significant benefit to Canada for transactions covered by it, and this is the way the law is applied by this government.

AGRICULTURE

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR HOG PRODUCERS

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence I will direct it to the parliamentary secretary.

With regard to hog producers who made representations through organizations such as the APU and the Federation of Pork Producers to the effect that they had problems due to the difference between the cost price and the real selling price, I would like him to tell us what is the situation of those people and what are the alternatives offered to them by the Department of Agriculture and the Agricultural Stabilization Board?

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the Department of Agriculture is now considering the data, that is, the number of hog producers throughout Canada, and as soon as those studies are completed, we will advise the House of its decision.

INDUSTRY

HAMILTON, ONT.—EXPANSION OF FIRESTONE TIRE AND RUBBER PLANT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce relates to the question put by my colleague. Was the minister aware that Firestone Tire and Rubber, of Hamilton, had committed $12 million to expansion of their facility to manufacture earthmover tires and other large tires of the same type as will be imported into Canada from Finland as a result of the approval by FIRA of the request by Nokia of Finland?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, unfortunately, I am inhibited by the present terms of the Foreign Investment Review Act from going into the details sought by my hon. friend. It is customary for the agency to seek the views of other departments which have knowledge of these matters, and these procedures were followed.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has on his desk a study prepared by the rubber industry of Canada, recommending that he allow the industry to rationalize production in order that it may develop economies of scale and so reduce its costs and receive the benefits of those economies of scale. The minister has had that study on his desk for several months. When is he going to reply to the Canadian rubber industry?

Mr. Gray: Very soon, Madam Speaker.

ENERGY

ROYALTIES ON OIL FROM CROWN LANDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION VIS-À-VIS ALBERTA

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but it could just as easily be answered by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice.

The minister knows that the government of Alberta passed legislation in 1974 to take its royalty share of oil in kind. Therefore, approximately 40 per cent of all oil from Crown leases leaving the Alberta border is royalty, or Crown-owned oil. May I ask the minister if the province of Alberta can legally and unilaterally establish the Alberta border price of the royalty share of the flowing oil and be within the constitutional correctness of the nation; that is, without circumventing the federal powers over interprovincial trade and commerce?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, in view of the hon. member's experience as a legislator, I am sure he knows that the rules of the House prohibit a minister giving a legal opinion on the floor of the House. There are paid lawyers who are trying to get clients to get this kind of information. But I think Beauchesne ruled a long time ago that this is unfair competition.

Mr. Yurko: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Has the minister, or has his colleague the Minister of Justice, done a major legal analysis of a province's constitutional right to establish the border price of the province's ownership share, or royalty share, or Crown share of a resource such as electricity, oil, natural gas, coal or other mineral resources? If he has done the study and analysis, would the minister table the complete analysis in this House at the earliest opportunity, and would the minister—I am not interested in the minister quoting the Cigol case because—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I can only tell the hon. member that a number of legal opinions have been prepared by ministers of justice over the years concerning energy and constitutional matters. I think the hon. member also knows that all such legal opinions are privileged and, according to Beauchesne, they are not of a nature to be tabled in the House. He knows that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFICACY OF F-18 FIGHTER PLANES

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Last week, United States congressman Bruce Vento, referring to the F-18 was quoted as saying, "there is something drastically wrong with this plane . . . the whole business is a boondoggle and it ought to be killed."

This week we have learned that President Carter is giving active, serious consideration to cancelling the entire project because of skyrocketing costs and performance problems. What action is the minister's department now taking to ensure that the Canadian government is not left with bills for an aircraft that the United States government may no longer want?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I would like to reassure hon. members about the F-18. The government has a team looking into the matter and we already have a test pilot who works with the U.S. marines to see if the prototype is working correctly. I shall meet next week with Secretary of Defence Brown and I intend to ask him a few questions about it. As far as I am concerned, however, every criticism about the F-18 now is strictly allegation.

Mr. Sargeant: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. The minister has said on too many occasions that the problems plaguing the F-18 program are routine and it is not possible for Canada to pay any amount for the CF-18 over and above the contract price, yet an official in his department has said:

> We have been relying on the U.S. navy for information about the progress of the F-18 and they have not informed us of any major problems. We have a fixed price incentive type of contract but there is obviously an escalator clause built into it.

In light of this and the pending decision from President Carter, is the minister prepared to turn over to the standing committee all pertinent information regarding costs, testing and performance for thorough review and investigation in order to assure the Canadian public that their government has not contracted to purchase an aircraft that may never see active duty?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think I have already answered that question but if the hon. member wants further information in this connection, I will point out to him that there will be a meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence next Thursday and I will then be ready to answer all the relevant questions of the hon. member.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

REVIEW OF FOREIGN-OWNED FIRMS IN CANADA—PURCHASES IN CANADA BY MULTINATIONALS

Mr. Ron Irwin (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business conducted a survey which showed that two-thirds of businessmen want a review of major foreign-owned firms in Canada. These multinationals tend to make most of their purchases in their own countries, at the same time avoiding Canadian customs duties through transfer pricing arrangements.

● (1450)

Can the minister assure the House that FIRA will be requested to encourage these companies to make their purchases in Canada in order to stimulate our own economy?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I am glad to have the support of the Canadian Federation of Small Business for the commitments of this government in the throne speech to amend the law on FIRA to, among other things, create a system of performance review for the larger multinational enterprises on such matters as the kind of activity mentioned by my hon. friend.

I can tell the House that the work on the necessary cabinet documents is quite far advanced. I hope with the support of members of this House we will have favourable approval of these proposals when the legislation is introduced, and I hope it will be possible to do so this fall.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ACTION TO ALLEVIATE HARDSHIP CONDITIONS ON RESERVES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, it has been a few days since the minister tabled, released and has been questioned on a report on Indian conditions in our country—a report which demonstrates in very graphic terms the incredible and unconscionable inhuman conditions and degradation our Indian people are suffering throughout the country.

Is the minister in a position today to enlighten the House as to what new initiatives he, his department and government are undertaking to respond to this incredible and unbelievable report?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I am sorry—

Madam Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would like to direct his question to another minister.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I wonder if the hon. member would please repeat his question.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I do not want to be unkind to the minister. I hope he pays a little more attention to the report that my question makes reference to than he is to what is going on in the House.

My question is: since the minister has now had a few days since tabling the report entitled "Indian Conditions", can he tell the House today what he, his department and government are undertaking? What new initiatives are they undertaking to correct some of these incredible and unconscionable situations of human degradation under which our Indian people are living?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. member that last week I answered an almost identical question from the previous minister of Indian affairs on this side of the House. I said at that time that we planned to bring in legislation in the fall, hopefully, that would set out a formula for the Indians, at their own option, to opt for Indian government to take over many of the responsibilities now being performed by the bureaucracy, which has contributed to a very high degree of debilitating dependence by Indian communities on the government and which has contributed to the poverty situation. That has been the feeling as expressed in the Beaver report and other studies undertaken by the Indian communities themselves. That seems to get to the root cause, rather than dealing with symptoms.

With regard to some of the other disturbing implications in the report to which the hon. member referred, there are proposals before the government now for increased expenditures in housing, which admittedly is in a sorry state: much more housing is required. I hope there will shortly be a decision with respect to the availability or otherwise of the funds. Certainly, if we get on with these measures, particularly the legislation in the fall, with the support of all opposition parties, we will go a long way to improving a situation that admittedly is very disturbing.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, it is not very often that a minister stands in the House and lays all the blame for the failures of his government on the bureaucracy and the department which he administers. The buck must stop some place.

I would like to ask the minister, since he does listen to the so-called, self-styled champion of Indian affairs who was the minister and did not do anything either, would he respond to a request by that hon. member and a request by myself in the standing committee to issue a special reference and provide the Indian Affairs committee with some kind of special status to give that committee the power and jurisdiction to travel around the country, write a report and make recommendations? Having received such recommendations, would he then relieve the country of this national disgrace?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It is very unfortunate, to the knowledge of every member of the House including opposition members, that the hon. member would choose in his comments, unless he did not listen to my answer at all, to intentionally misrepresent my answer.

Mr. Oberle: You said the bureaucracy is at fault; that is what you said.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I did not say that.

Mr. Oberle: You are at fault.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The blues will indicate, and Hansard tomorrow will clearly indicate what I did say, and I did not say that. What I did say was that if the Indian community took over functions that are now being performed by the bureaucracy—and, as the hon. member knows, this is an obligation on the bureaucracy under the Indian Act—and if we changed the Indian Act so that the bureaucracy would not have to perform these functions for the Indians, then the Indians would not be in a self-dependence state which is such a contributor to the problem. This point was made in the Beaver report. That certainly is not criticizing the bureaucracy, unless the hon. member totally lacks any comprehension of the problem.

With regard to the hon. member's reference to my predecessor in this portfolio, if he has any doubts all he need do is talk to any of the Indian leaders across this country: they will tell him some of the real accomplishments that minister made when he occupied this position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): If I may finish, Madam Speaker, in a more constructive vein—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

SALE OF NUCLEAR EQUIPMENT TO ARGENTINA—SAFEGUARDS IN CONNECTION THEREWITH

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will he tell the House whether there have been any discussions by him, or jointly with any of his colleagues, with any officials of the government of Argentina which would indicate that the Government of Canada is prepared to lessen its safeguards with regard to the sale of nuclear equipment of any kind in exchange for a write-off of further financial losses suffered by AECL on its 1974 nuclear reactor sale to Argentina?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, to my knowledge there was no discussion to lower the standards established by the Canadian government concerning the use of nuclear energy, be it with Argentina or any other country.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: My supplementary is to the same minister. Have there been any changes in the original arrangements with Argentina that would lead to a write-off of the losses suffered by AECL on the 1974 nuclear reactor sale and, as a condition of that, has the government in any way indicated that it would not be as insistent in pressing that Argentina sign the non-proliferation treaty?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, discussions were held with representatives of the government of Argentina when they came to Canada a few months ago. At that time, we were very happy to find out, on the one hand, that the government of Argentina was prepared to revise certain provisions contained in the previous contract in order to compensate Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. for a number of additional expenses incurred. On the other hand, we happily found out that Argentina had reaffirmed its interest in acquiring new Candu nuclear reactors in the future. Finally, I am not aware of any discussions which would have resulted in lowering the standards established by the Canadian government in this area. I must point out in particular that we are very happy that this government has succeeded in reinstating the good relationship that had been severely damaged by the hon. lady when she was minister.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO CORRECT UNFAIRNESS—RCMP PROVISIONS

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Paproski: Edmonton North?

Mr. Knowles: Winnipeg North Centre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Two members fighting it out.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please take the floor.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad I have you in my corner, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I put a question to the President of Treasury Board? In view of public concern expressed recently about the unfairness of the Public Service Superannuation Act in that it pays only a 50 per cent pension to a widow of a public servant and, also, in that it pays no pension at all to a widow who married a public servant after he retired, no matter how long the marriage might have lasted, has the hon. gentleman given consideration to correcting these unfairnesses in the act?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, we are currently reviewing all these superannuation provisions. In the course of this review we shall certainly address the issues which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raises.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he will consult with his colleague, the Solicitor General, who is in charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and with the Minister of National Defence, who is in charge of superannuation for the forces, in the hope that improvements to be made could apply to all these plans?

Mr. Johnston: It is our practice to consult on these matters. In fact, I have already had discussions with my colleague the Solicitor General with regard to certain aspects of the RCMP pension provisions, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that there will be complete and thorough consultation with all interested cabinet colleagues.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

DROUGHT IN WEST—ASSISTANCE FOR MANITOBA FARMERS

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport as spokesman for the Wheat Board. Can the minister confirm that financial assistance announced today in the amount of $60 million to grain farmers affected by drought will be in addition to the $43 million committed by the government of Manitoba under provincial programs already announced?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): It is an independent program. If the government of Manitoba wishes to add to it, they are quite free to do so.

GOVERNMENT CO-OPERATION IN ESTABLISHING LADA ASSEMBLY PLANT IN CANADA

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Three weeks ago, a Montreal daily announced that manufacturers of the Soviet car Lada intended to assemble auto parts in Canada for 4,000 cars in 1980, and eventually for 6,000 or 7,000, I believe. Is the minister aware of the intentions of this company and if so has he been asked to co-operate in any way in the establishment of an assembly plant for this Soviet car?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my officials have contacted the Canadian Lada Corporation in order to ascertain its intentions. We obviously intend, on behalf of and in the interests of Canadian workers, to increase the production of cars and auto parts in this country.

Mr. La Salle: In view of the very small role that Quebec plays in the auto industry, can the minister tell us whether he has had discussions with businessmen wishing to establish themselves in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, it is up to that company to consider all the good areas of the country, including Quebec. My department intends to facilitate the construction of such a plant in Canada, not only for Lada, but also for other foreign companies.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOMM—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY TREATMENT SUFFERED BY HON. MEMBER FOR PETERBOROUGH

Madam Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege by the hon. member for Peterborough. I assume, as might be inferred from his notice, that he is not questioning my ruling of yesterday. If he has a new question of privilege to raise, I will hear him.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is clearly not addressed to the matter on which you ruled yesterday. I should like to bring it to the attention of the House that three things are happening which are creating a difference between members of Parliament, whether they sit on the government side or on this side of the House.

Before making my main submission to you, Madam Speaker, I should like to summarize those three things. First, there appear to be very definitely two classes of members of Parliament—those in government, and others.

The second point I should like to make is that I was deliberately misled by officials of the Department of the Secretary of State and was personally supplied with false documents.

The third point I should like to make today is that it appears that the citizenship court which constitutionally should be independent of political pressure is being dragged into partisan favouritism.

It has been customary for many members of Parliament to send out congratulatory letters to persons granted certificates of Canadian citizenship on the basis of lists supplied to all hon. members regardless of where they sat in this chamber. These lists are first compiled by the clerks of the citizenship courts. In my riding of Peterborough the citizenship office is in the city of Peterborough. I might point out that the former Liberal cabinet minister who formerly represented Peterborough was the one who opened that citizenship office. Since then, that court has supplied lists of new Canadian citizens on a regular basis in order that I, as was the case with the former member of Parliament for Peterborough, might send out congratulatory letters to welcome these new Canadian citizens.

A short time ago I was advised by the citizenship office that these lists would no longer be made available according to their instructions received. On June 3, 1980, I received from the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) a reporting form, a copy of which I have here. There is clearly stamped on the face of this usual monthly reporting form "Nil Report for the Electoral District of Peterborough". I knew this was not true because a friend of mine, a member of the IODE, caters refreshments for new Canadians on these occasions and I was told that 53 persons had received citizenship certificates in that month. On June 26 I received a list of names only. Now, it must be obvious to all hon. members that names without addresses are of little use to a member of Parliament endeavouring to send out congratulatory letters.

I raised this problem in the House yesterday, July 2, since I felt my doing so would lend support to the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) in his submission, on a question of privilege, that members of Parliament were not treated equally vis-à-vis members of the government party. Since I feel that the discharge of my responsibility to my constituents is severely hampered by my not receiving these lists, it is evident that the raising of a question of privilege is in order.

I should like to recapitulate in two sentences. First, notification that the lists would not be made available to me was received and, second, a nil report for my electoral district was received from the Secretary of State, though I received a list of 53 persons who had obtained citizenship certificates in May—and I obtained that list through another means.

● (1510)

Here comes the moment of truth, Madam Speaker. Arriving at my office early this morning in an unstamped envelope was the list of new Canadians, received 17 hours after I raised this concern in the House. I ask you, Madam Speaker, what benefit is served by sending out congratulatory letters to new citizens, as other members of Parliament in this House did in June, for those receiving their citizenship in May? What benefit is it to me, a Conservative member of Parliament in Peterborough, to congratulate my new Canadian citizens three or four months after their receipt of citizenship?

The list which I received was received from the clerk of the citizenship court, and I have it to turn in to Hansard. It is a list of citizens, minus addresses, and it is of no use to me as a member of Parliament in sending out congratulatory messages.

The law of privilege in this regard is stated in Erskine May, the nineteenth edition, on page 136, and I quote:

> It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

More specifically, under the heading "Presenting Forged, Falsified or Fabricated Documents to either House or committees of either House", May goes on to say:

> It is a breach of privilege to present or cause to be presented to either House or to committees of either House forged, falsified or fabricated documents with intent to deceive such House or committees or to subscribe the names of other persons or fictitious names to documents intended to be presented to either House or committees of either House, or to be privy to, or cognizant of, such forgery or fraud.

That appears in the nineteenth edition at page 141. At the same page May deals with conspiracy to deceive either House or committees or members of either House as follows:

> It has already been seen that the giving of false evidence, prevarication or suppression of the truth by witnesses while under examination before either House or before committees of either House is punished as a contempt; and that persons who present false, forged or fabricated documents to either House or to committees of either House are guilty of a breach of privilege. Conspiracy to deceive either House or any committees of either House will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

A minister is expected either to assume responsibility for actions of his ministry or, alternatively, to advise the House of the appropriate disciplinary measure which has been taken.

On December 6, 1978, the former Speaker of the House, the Hon. James Jerome, as recorded at page 1856 of Hansard for that date, stated:

> Does that lead us to the conclusion that, by virtue of an act or omission, the House, or a member, has directly or indirectly been impeded in the performance of its functions or his duty, or that there has been a tendency to produce such result? If I so find, then I really have no choice but to find, prima facie, that a contempt has been committed.
> I can interpret that testimony in no other way than meaning that a deliberate attempt was made to obstruct the member in the performance of his duties and, consequently, to obstruct the House itself.

Speaker Jerome went on further to say, and I quote:

> Even beyond the precedents and the complex law of privilege, I cannot conceive that there is any one of us who would accept the argument that this House of Commons has no recourse in the face of such an attempt to obstruct by offering admittedly misleading information.
> I, therefore, find a prima facie case of contempt against the House of Commons.

It must be obvious as a result of the concession in committee by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), as referred to today in a motion under Standing Order 43, that all members should be treated equally. All members should receive notices of New Horizons grants at the time one side does. Not to have that motion passed in this House unanimously by both sides indicates that there is obviously an intention on the part of hon. members opposite to mislead, misrepresent and keep the opposition ill informed and unable properly to perform the duties which they were elected to perform.

I would further like to point out that rather suspiciously this morning a letter addressed to all Liberal members of Parliament arrived at my office. In that letter it says that as a Liberal member of Parliament I could object to any of the New Horizons programs approved for my area. Attached to that letter—which I have here—are two programs approved, and I assume that if I had been a Liberal member of Parliament, I might have received it at the same time as Liberal members opposite.

In conclusion, I would like to ask for one basic consideration. If Your Honour finds that I have a prima facie question of privilege, I would like to have the opportunity to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the following:

> That this matter of discriminatory treatment of a member of Parliament by the Department of the Secretary of State, through the issuance of false documents by the department to the member for Peterborough and through the misuse of the citizenship courts for political purposes, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Thank you for your kind consideration, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise to comment briefly on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm). I feel it can be said that this is a further shocking example of an arrogant government interfering with the privileges of a member of this House by rating members of Parliament who sit on the government side of the House as being in possession of more rights and privileges than hon. members who sit on the opposition side. It is a clear example of indulging in discrimination against hon. members on this side so that their duties are therefore interfered with and impeded when it comes to performing them.

In a ruling which you, Madam Speaker, made yesterday you declared, as recorded at page 2502 of Hansard:

A member's privilege is usually an action of some nature which prevents him from fulfilling his duties as a member.

I believe the meaning of your statement is very clear indeed and, if applied to the remarks made to us this afternoon and the case placed before us by the hon. member for Peterborough, I think it clearly reveals a case of his being prevented, to use Your Honour's words, "from fulfilling his duties as a member".

I think one of the customary and accepted duties of a member of Parliament, as mentioned by my colleague, is to welcome new Canadians who take out citizenship to his riding. That is a privilege we have all had. It is a privilege which has been extended to us by various governments over the years, and it has been withdrawn from one particular member of this House and, for that matter, perhaps others about whom we do not know.

In this case, for example, the hon. member has been told that there are no names or addresses because no one received citizenship. Then, if I understood the hon. member correctly, he managed to obtain a list of names. I naturally agree that they would be useless without addresses accompanying them. Then to recover from embarrassment over what happened in the House yesterday, some person, who must obviously have been dispatched by the office of the Secretary of State or someone acting on behalf of that office, sneakily, surreptitiously and in a somewhat slovenly way shoved under the door of the office of the hon. member for Peterborough the list of names and addresses which the government had previously declared to be non-existent. All of a sudden, after he mentioned this in the House yesterday, within a very few hours they appeared, shoved under his door.

This can scarcely be considered as anything else but a breach of the privileges of the hon. member for Peterborough and, indirectly, a breach of privilege of all members of the House who must be deeply concerned that such a thing has happened. It is another case of shockingly conclusive proof that the government, in a contemptuous fashion, is interfering with our privileges to carry out properly our duties.

I trust, Madam Speaker, that you will rule in a way to put an end to this disgusting charade that the government is carrying on. My colleague, the hon. member for Peterborough, has cited many of the background precedents to illustrate what is a clearcut breach of privilege. I hope that you will rule, as I said, to end the charade being committed by this government, which is definitely interfering with the rights of this particular member and of others to perform their duties as such, and again I am paraphrasing the words which you yourself gave in the ruling of yesterday.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, it was my intention to rise on a separate question of privilege on a matter that concerns me, but I think perhaps my remarks are appropriate on the question raised now by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm).

It seems to me that the question he raised, as well as the questions which have been raised in the immediate past, go to the heart, at least in my understanding, of what are the rights and privileges of members. Surely if these rights and privileges are extended to all members, they must be equal. I can put no other interpretation on the words "rights and privileges of members". That does not mean "some" members; presumably it means, or should mean, "all" members. That is why I was very happy yesterday when I heard your ruling, and indeed read it again in Hansard, in which you indicated that in future it will amount to an appropriate question of privilege when an action involves the stopping of a member from fulfilling his duties as a member. That is why, Madam Speaker, I recognize that I should not deal with the matter which was before the House in a motion under Standing Order 43, but it is in the spirit of your own ruling that I presented a motion that all members should be treated equally when it comes to the administration of New Horizons programs.

I have some difficulty with respect to where I stand as a member because it is now the House which has said in its majority that members are equal in the administration of that program; but Liberal members have said no to that. They said that members are not equal in the administration of that program and, presumably, that means of other programs.

I would like to know and I think all members need to know whether or not those in the minority in the House have less rights than members who are in the majority party. Clearly my rights as the member for Rosedale cannot be less than those of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), who seconded my motion, or indeed of the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan). Clearly that cannot be true. The hon. member for York Centre cannot have more rights than the hon. member for Rosedale or the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood; it is not possible. If that is true, then we have a difficulty. We now have the knot in the chain, if I recall the words of another hon. member. The difficulty we have is that, that action having been taken, I do not know what my rights are in relation to the general rights of all members. I think they should be equal.

That is why, rather than raise the question myself, I hope that the motion presented by the hon. member for Peterborough will go to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, because I do not know how else to explain to the people I represent that my rights and privileges as a member representing their interests are not equal to those of members in the Liberal party. That is unacceptable. I hope, therefore, that in moving the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections we will at least be dealing with the principle of whether or not the privileges and rights of all members are equal; because as it stands at this point, they have been recognized by this House as not being equal.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I should like to speak to the point raised by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) as well as to part of the alleged question of privilege regarding the program for senior citizens called New Horizons. As I told hon. members yesterday when the matter was raised for the first time, I had not recently seen the memo in question. Of course, I went to get a copy of it as soon as possible, and I should like to inform hon. members that memos giving a short description of each project go to every member of Parliament asking them, if they have any questions, to telephone my office. An identical memo which, instead of asking members whether they have any questions, asks them to give any comments they might have was always sent to Liberal members of Parliament—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to interrupt the minister but I think I have to interrupt her in view of your admonition at the outset of the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) that there could be no reference to your decision yesterday. Therefore, I rise to remind you that that also applies to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) as it did to the hon. member for Peterborough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is absolutely right. I was so preoccupied in listening to the minister's argumentation that his point just slipped my attention. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is absolutely right and I would ask the minister not to refer to my ruling of yesterday.

Miss Bégin: Needless to say, Madam Speaker, I am not referring to or questioning your decision of yesterday. I was speaking to what my predecessor in the portfolio has just raised and on which he was not ruled out of order by you, so far as I understand. I was also speaking to the question of privilege raised a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Peterborough, at the end of which he referred to a practice which he thinks exists in my department and in my office to which I must reply in the name of all Canadian seniors so as to do what the hon. member for Rosedale wants, namely, to restore integrity to that program. I am informing my colleagues—

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday when I attempted to pursue this matter you ruled then, as you have ruled again today, that it could not be pursued. Yet despite the fact that five or ten minutes ago you ruled that it could not be pursued—and this has been drawn to your attention by our House leader—the minister keeps on pursuing it. I think she should be stopped immediately; otherwise, if she is allowed to continue to do so, I think everyone else should be allowed to follow her and comment on her remarks. Because I have things that are left unsaid which I would have liked to say but did not do so because I abided by your ruling. Why should the minister be allowed to pursue this matter, thereby giving a privilege to Liberal members over members on this side of the House?

Madam Speaker: It is a matter of whether a member is debating my ruling. I do not feel the minister was debating it; she was making comments on or references to similar cases which were brought up today and to what happened yesterday in the House. I think it would be wiser if we heard at this point—if the Minister of National Health and Welfare would agree—the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), who will undoubtedly be able to address himself more directly to the point raised by the hon. member for Peterborough.

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Thank you, Madam Speaker. First I wish to say that although I was in the House yesterday, I was not in however when for the first time the hon. member raised this question of access to the lists of new citizens. The first time I heard anything about this matter was this afternoon when he raised it again in the House. The hon. member complains about the fact that he was not given a list of names of new citizens. With regard to this, Madam Speaker, I would like to reassure the House and inform all members that the policy of the Secretary of State is to give to all members, on one condition I shall explain later and regardless of their political affiliation, access to lists of names of new citizens who have just acquired their citizenship in the preceding months. Hon. members who have been in the house for some years know full well that their access to this list depends on a commitment they have made some years ago to the effect that they would use these lists of new citizens only to welcome them into the great Canadian family to which they belong hereafter.

Madam Speaker, at the beginning of this session the office of the Secretary of State sent the new members a new letter advising them that they could have access to the lists of new citizens on the condition, of course, that they use these names only to welcome new citizens in our country. Therefore, Madam Speaker, this is the policy and it applies to all members and all members who advised my department that they wished to receive the names have received them since that time.

The hon. member alleges in the House today that he has not received the name list, but I am not aware of these facts. I would like to ask questions and get to the bottom of this. The policy is clear and precise, it is well established and I think that if the hon. member had asked questions in the House and given me prior notice I could have given him an appropriate answer. Madam Speaker, I think we are simply and obviously dealing with a confusion on facts.

I am more than willing to look into the matter that the hon. member raises on the facts, because it is merely a question of facts, and not of principle. There is no deliberate attempt to prevent hon. members from either side of this House from doing what they wish to do for new citizens. On the contrary, we encourage this type of initiative by making the name lists available to them. The only condition attached to the publication of these lists, Madam Speaker, is that under part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act, this constitutes a use of names that are in a federal data bank and these names cannot be used for any purpose other than welcoming these people in the great Canadian community.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if this matter was only a confusion of facts, then it could be disposed of quite easily by the Chair. But there is no confusion as to the facts; that is the difficulty.

The first clear and most important fact is the matter of the fabricated documents that were given to the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm). The Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) did not answer this, and it goes right to the heart of the question of privilege. The hon. member of Peterborough said that for the month of May he, as a member of Parliament, was given a list by the department which indicated on its face that there were no new Canadians for that particular month. That is a fabrication; that is a falsehood.

Mr. Fox: Maybe it was a mistake.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It may or may not be a mistake.

Mr. Fox: We will look into it.

An hon. Member: You are making accusations.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): My friend cannot answer it today. As long as it is unanswered, then the citation on page 141 of May's still must be answered by Madam Speaker, that is, whether or not a member of the House was served with forged, falsified or fabricated documents. The minister did not answer it because he cannot. If he had said in certainty today that that was the case—

Mr. Fox: I have not seen the document.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): So that question is still outstanding. Of course, the rather unusual behaviour of suddenly finding the list under his door, which goes right to the heart of the truth of the statement, indicates shabby behaviour. I do not think the issue of privilege narrowly framed is with respect to shabby behaviour, but there is an issue with respect to whether or not that document was fabricated. If it was, then its presentation to a member of the House of Commons on the face of it raises a prima facie question of privilege, which is all Your Honour would be deciding now by agreeing to allow the hon. member to put his motion. If we are to discuss privilege in narrow terms, that is the issue of privilege.

There is another side to this that was discussed yesterday with which I cannot deal and involving the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). I do not know where members of Parliament are to turn if some assurance cannot be given to the House, through the first commoner of the House, that members of Parliament will be treated equally. The Secretary of State said that in so far as his department is concerned with respect to those citizenships, that is the policy of the department. Having given that undertaking, he is to see to its execution. I think someone over there who can speak for the government ought to give assurances on behalf of the government so that Madam Speaker can look after the rights and privileges of members of the House of Commons, as we look to you as the first commoner to do your job and to look after those rights. I hope I am speaking with respect when I say that it would not be inappropriate, even given Your Honour's ruling yesterday, to suggest that what occurred yesterday was out of keeping with the appropriate practice in the House of Commons and at the very least is something which should be frowned upon.

I do not want to detract from the question of privilege which I believe is still before Your Honour, that is, the whole matter of the truth and genuine quality of the documents received by the hon. member for Peterborough. That question has not been answered by the Secretary of State. I think the Secretary of State said he will look into it and he may look into it. If he is to look into it, then this whole matter should be reserved to let him do so. I say with respect that there ought to be no ruling today, while that investigation is proceeding, which would in any way take away the rights of the hon. member for Peterborough to have his question of privilege considered. Indeed it is not just a question for the hon. member for Peterborough, although it is framed in those terms; it is a question for every one of us.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make. There is much more than just the narrow question of privilege at stake. I say with respect that if ever there was a case for reservation, today is one case, simply for the sake of the Secretary of State and notwithstanding the interests of other members of this House.

Mr. Fox: You are all heart.

● (1540)

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I think you will allow me to speak on the question of privilege through which it has been suggested that members of Parliament are not all treated equally in their capacity to discharge their responsibility as members of Parliament. I think this is exactly the point that was made by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) and I do not understand why, when I rise to speak on the point which has been raised, the opposition is preventing me from expressing my opinion.

[English]

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, to those of us who have been in the House during the time this question of privilege has been debated it seems the hon. minister has already spoken to the question.

Miss Bégin: No, I have been interrupted each time.

Mr. Epp: You are not the Speaker. Madam Speaker, you have ruled that she has been heard. Are you now giving her a second opportunity, an opportunity that apparently does not exist for other members? Will that opportunity not be provided to others?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I had intervened in the remarks being made by the hon. minister and I thought I should let her pursue them now that we have heard from the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox). In the interest of elucidating this question I would appeal to the minister to speak very briefly in whatever refutation she wishes to make in relation to a point that needs to be clarified, but to be very careful not to refer to the ruling of yesterday.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I thank you for your advice. I will keep my remarks very short. The hon. member for Peterborough just questioned the possibility for every member of Parliament, of whatever political affiliation, to discharge dutifully his or her responsibility as a member of Parliament. He suggested that the practices of two departments, including mine, were going against that capacity every member must have. In that regard, I want to assure him as well as all members of the House that according to the practices in my own political office every member is considered equal and that no interference can be made in respect of a project slated for his riding. I think that—so I would like to—

[English]

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: I recognize the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) on a point of order.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order which has been raised before by members on this side. A question of privilege has been raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) dealing with the Department of the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in trying for the third or fourth time to bend the rules of the House, and thereby smuggle in a defence of her actions on a question decided yesterday, applies to her a special privilege that does not apply to members on this side of the House of Commons. I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that is absolutely out of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition will recognize that there was argumentation by analogy and I had to listen carefully to the conclusions of that argument. I feel the Chair is now sufficiently informed.

Let me say in respect of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peterborough that I should like to reserve my decision because of the single argument put forward by the hon. member in which he quoted a precedent of December 6, 1968 of one of my predecessors. I would want to look at the question raised in full light of that precedent. The hon. member did quote part of the decision of my predecessor, but I want to look at it more fully in order to rule on this question of privilege. I must determine how deliberate were the actions to which the hon. member referred. Certainly the documents were not official documents, that is to say, documents which were tabled in the House, and that certainly makes a difference in the argumentation which can be brought forward to prove a question of privilege.

Quite obviously, in the view of the hon. member for Peterborough the information he received was incomplete, to say the least, but no member has given me evidence that members of other parties in this House did not receive the same kind of list or documents. I have not been informed whether all hon. members received the incomplete list, or whether only the hon. member for Peterborough received that list, in which case there is no different treatment given to different members of the House. In any event, I should like to examine that situation.

I want also to look at the question whether it is part of the essential duties of members of Parliament to congratulate new Canadians upon receiving Canadian citizenship. I am sure that is a very useful thing and I am sure that new citizens of this country appreciate congratulations from their members of Parliament. However, one has to determine whether that is really an essential duty of a member of Parliament. One must decide if pursuant to the fact that he did not receive the lists on time or that they were incomplete whether the hon. member was in effect prevented from performing his function as a member of this House.

I need not remind hon. members that the duties of members of Parliament are to attend the House of Commons, express themselves freely and to vote. If an hon. member is menaced or prevented from attending the House of Commons by anyone that, of course, would be a breach of privilege. I am sure these three essential duties must be expanded to include other ancillary duties. I must look at the many precedents to see what can be interpreted as an essential duty of a member of the House of Commons, and in that way decide whether the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peterborough has established that he or other members have been prevented from fulfilling their duties.

On that basis I reserve the matter as I feel there may be some evidence of a question of privilege.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I do not know whether you have now ruled out the possibility of any further discussion on this point, but there is one thing which has not yet been elucidated in connection with this matter.

Madam Speaker: Yes, I have. I said the Chair was sufficiently informed on this question of privilege, that I reserve the matter, in order to examine it and make a ruling. I am afraid I cannot hear the hon. member on this same question.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I rise then on a new question of privilege. I will not even make reference to the document in respect of which you will make a ruling, the ruling that you made yesterday or the decision you have made today. My question of privilege is simply that I received through the mail today in the course of this afternoon a document addressed to my person at my office address, addressing me as a Liberal member of Parliament.

Mr. Fox: That is a privilege!

Mr. Kempling: That is an insult.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: If you have any difficulty in deciding this—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid if I listened to the hon. member on that kind of question of privilege I would be listening to a number of other members.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to thank you for reserving your decision on my question of privilege. I should like to record in Hansard that I have supplied all the staff documents stating that there were no citizenship certificates granted. I have turned that information over to Hansard. They have all the documents for your perusal.

MR. TAYLOR—APPOINTMENT OF "TWIN MEMBERS" IN CERTAIN WESTERN CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which is based on one of the axioms of democracy, namely, that when a member is elected he has a responsibility to all the people of his constituency, not just to those of his own political party persuasion. This is a very important matter. Once a member is elected and is responsible to all the people of his constituency, he is responsible also for making sure he does his utmost to see that their tax funds are not abused or wasted.

● (1550)

That is the basis of my question of privilege, and I would now like to give the reasons why I feel it is a point of privilege. In the first place, the constituency which I represent has now been informed that they have a second MP.

An hon. Member: That is a lot of rot.

Mr. Taylor: I can understand why the hon. member is getting nervous. That second MP was apparently appointed from the office of a minister, the Hon. Bud Olson. The Hon. Bud Olson also has a staff member in that office who is responsible for finding and appointing twin MPs to western constituencies. If the public is paying the Hon. Bud Olson to spend his time as a minister to twin MPs, it is an abuse and a usurping of the rights of the elected member and interferes with his work in the constituency.

Secondly, the office of the minister has been making a lot of statements on how wonderful it is that we have a helper in our constituency. The people of my constituency have not asked that their MP be given a helper. During the election they considered all candidates and they voted accordingly. They expect their member to be their member, irrespective of what party he or she may represent. Consequently, I suggest that this is a very serious matter of privilege.

The next point I would like to raise for your consideration, Madam Speaker, is with regard to whether or not public funds are being used for these twin MPs. I find that when I go to my constituency it costs me a considerable amount of money. I must use my car, take rooms in hotels and advertise that I will be in such and such a place in order that I may serve my constituents. I am asking whether or not the twin MP will be paying these expenses out of his own pocket as does the elected MP, or does the twinned MP have another source of funds?

I might say that if this was simply a matter of the Liberal Party of Canada appointing someone to help build up the Liberal cause in a constituency, I would have no objection. That is their proper right. But when a minister of the Crown uses public money to build up the image of a particular party, that is an abuse of the privileges. I would like to know who is paying the hotel, advertising and car transportation expenses for these twin MPs.

I understand that these twin MPs will send out a great many letters. Will they be able to use the frank, which is the privilege of the elected MP, in order that he may serve his constituents? I have never asked anybody in my 40 years in public life how they voted. If they come to me for service I endeavour to serve them to the best of my ability, knowing sometimes that they are not of my particular political stripe. However, they are Canadians and are entitled to service from their elected member. If the twin MP will have the same privilege as the elected MP, then I suggest it is an abuse of my privileges.

Also, I have no evidence of this but if the letters of my constituents or the letters which I send to ministers of the Crown, whom I respect as representatives of Her Majesty the Queen, are not respected as confidential, I would regard it as a very serious abuse if that information were to find a pipeline into a twin MP's office. That would be a serious abuse of democracy.

I will not enlarge on this matter, but I say that the appointment of twin MPs to an area is a totalitarian concept, a travesty of democratic principles and a betrayal of the rights in which we believe. I also request that the Liberal party is making a very serious mistake because it is driving a larger wedge into the division which they have already created in this country.

If you find, Madam Speaker, that the points which I have raised are indeed a prima facie case of privilege, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That the matter of twinning and the abuse of public funds, parliamentary benefits and the confidentiality of communications between MPs and their constituents be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I do not think that one on this side of the House could remain seated and listen to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) without making a comment in rebuttal. I submit that the matter that the hon. member has raised does not constitute a question of privilege. Perhaps the hon. member is somewhat hypersensitive about the normal democratic process operating within his riding; that is, the right of all Canadians to belong to whatever political party they choose, to attend meetings, to elicit information and to make public statements.

I can understand, considering that our party has not done too well in Alberta in the past, that the emerging Liberal presence and our reorganization there is somewhat of a shock to the hon. member for Bow River and some of his colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: Are you using a microscope?

Mr. Collenette: I submit that the hon. member for Bow River and his colleagues from Alberta will have to become more accustomed to a greater Liberal presence in that province.

With regard to the question of the hon. senator from Alberta, it is not for this House to interfere with the right of any minister to assign duties to his exempt staff. There is a long tradition of exempt staff taking on political activities so long as they fall within the bounds of normal propriety. I do not think there is anything wrong with that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What an answer!

Mr. Collenette: I would remind the members opposite that senators and MPs are paid indemnities. Indeed, we are given extra privileges for airplane and rail travel to serve all Canadians. I, being the representative of a particular constituency, am not prohibited from communicating with anybody in this country. In fact, I would seriously submit that the hon. member has really impinged on the concept of national unity as it has come to be adopted in this House and throughout the country by not wanting and resenting Canadians from other provinces getting to know the people of his province through twinning.

Mr. Kempling: What a silly argument.

Mr. Collenette: It is not a silly argument. I would submit that the opposition is being somewhat sensitive. The Canadian Council for National Unity wrote to me recently and suggested, if I was agreeable, that I be paired with the hon. member for Peace George-Prince River—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the attitude of the opposition is shown in the derision with which they greeted my comments on national unity.

An hon. Member: It is "Prince George-Peace River".

Mr. Collenette: Yes, it is Prince George-Peace River.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the brief point of order that I want to raise is that, quite apart from the personal qualities which invite derision from this side of the House, our response was to the hon. member's misnaming of the constituency to which he has been twinned. If the hon. member is to be twinned to that constituency, I would suggest that he get the name right.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I would think that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the former prime minister of this country, would have better things to do than sit here at four o'clock in the afternoon and make facile comments about particular things I am saying. Of course, Madam Speaker, this particular penchant of the right hon. member was recognized on February 18 and perhaps accounts for the fact that he is sitting on that side of the House today. I am sorry that I misnamed the hon. member's constituency, however.

● (1600)

I want to bring to the attention of the House that the Council for National Unity is trying to develop understanding across the country. They wrote to me as the member respresenting York East in Metropolitan Toronto and asked if I wanted to co-operate and be twinned with a constituency in British Columbia, the constituency of the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). I mentioned it to him in passing and I hope that the council will be in touch with him. Certainly I and my constituents would be most glad to share an understanding with the hon. member.

I would remind hon. members that there are cities throughout the country which are officially paired or twinned. It is a municipal practice. I understand that Hull is twinned with the city of Edmonton. Surely the hon. member for Bow River is not arguing against this laudable practice. What we have here, I think, is some hypersensitivity on the part of the hon. member for Bow River and a disregard, if you will, for national unity. I submit that no privileges of the House have been infringed.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I should like to state that the former Conservative candidate in my constituency who was nominated some two years prior to the 1979 election opened a constituency office in my constituency, had the nerve to call it the York East constituency office and purported to be the member of Parliament for that district. That gentleman subsequently sat in this House for a brief period. I did not complain about his conduct. I would say it is a democratic right of parties and individuals in this country to associate with whomever they please.

The hon. member spoke about press releases being issued but I submit that he is really talking about some censorship of the press and is denying the people of his constituency an alternative viewpoint from Ottawa than the one it receives from its current member of Parliament.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I want to deal with the quite important question of privilege raised by my colleague from Bow River (Mr. Taylor). In commencing my short remarks I want to say how much I regret that the spokesman for the government, the parliamentary secretary, treated so lightly a question which you may well find goes to the root of the privileges of members of this House of Commons.

I should say in passing that I find it alarming, although not strange in the mouth of a Liberal, that he should find it unusual that the leader of a party in a parliamentary system should be found sitting in the House of Commons of Canada at four o'clock in the afternoon. It is our judgment, as it was in government, that leaders of the opposition and prime ministers, have an obligation to sit in this House of Commons, to take part in the debates of this institution and to show a respect for this institution, rather than treating it as a place where no one congregates.

Let me come to some points at issue here. One important matter at issue is that the parliamentary secretary, speaking on behalf of the government, said that there is a long tradition of ministers of the Crown using their exempt staff for partisan political purposes. He obviously knows whereof he speaks. He is obviously much more aware of the details of that tradition than we on this side of the House. I think, particularly in the interst of ensuring that public funds are spent for public purposes and not simply for the purposes of the Liberal party, it would be useful for us to have laid upon the table of the House of Commons an elaboration of that tradition which the hon. member claims is so well known. If exempt staff are being used as a matter of practice, funded by the Crown of Canada, to advance the partisan interests of the Liberal Party of Canada, as the parlimentary secretary has just said, then it is important that this House of Commons and the public of Canada know the details of that practice and the extent of the subsidy by the Canadian taxpayer of the political operations of the Liberal Party of Canada.

Let me come to another question of cost raised by the hon. member for Bow River. It is a matter of some real substance and has to do with who pays the extra costs incurred by a so-called twin when that twin visits another constituency in the country. As the hon. member for Bow River said, if the individual member carries that cost himself, that is fine; if the Liberal Party of Canada carries that cost, that is fine. But if those costs are borne by the public purse, if the public purse is expected to subsidize the personal expenditures of a twinned constituency of a Liberal member of Parliament, then that is an extension of the practice of subsidy for partisan Liberal purposes by the public purse of Canada. That extension of that principle should be on the record. The fact of that subsidy and the extent of that subsidy should be well known and should be on the record of this House of Commons.

It is not something that is authorized by this Parliament in the way that the budgets of research offices of all parties are authorized. It is not something that is authorized in the way certain expenditures of leaders of various parties are authorized. It is a new expenditure and a new practice; it is a subsidy for clearly partisan purposes. If that is occurring, then the House of Commons and the public of Canada, the people who pay the bills, have a right to know that it is occurring. They have a right to know the costs involved. Since it is an unauthorized expenditure it may very well, as the hon. member for Bow river suggests, breach the privileges of members of this House.

The far more important question, however, that we have to deal with here, Madam Speaker, has to do with the treatment accorded documents conveyed in confidence to an elected member of Parliament by his constituents. The hon. member for Bow River represents, among others, a national parks community which has extensive and confidential relations with the Department of the Environment and a branch of Parks Canada. He represents various farmers and very many other individuals who, by the nature and extent of government involvement in our society, now have their private affairs very much intertwined with the activities and policies of the Government of Canada. Those citizens have a right to know that communications they have with their elected member of Parliament which he passes on to ministers of the Crown will be treated confidentially and will not be passed on to someone designated by a minister as a twin. They have a right to know that confidences passed to a member by his constituents and from that member to the Government of Canada will not be violated.

We have no guarantee that this is presently the case. Indeed, there is some suspicion that the very purpose of this twinning operation may be an attempt to have people not elected by the electors of the west, and by the electors of Bow River in this case, intruding and placing themselves between the electors of Bow River and the member of Parliament for Bow River and, consequently, being an instrument by which that intrusion might be realized. It could very well be that passage by a minister of the Crown of confidential information conveyed by a constituent or by the member of Parliament for Bow River to another member of Parliament could occur. That would be a very serious breach of the privileges of this House and it is one that is properly raised by the hon. member for Bow River. It is a matter that troubles all of us very deeply, Madam Speaker.

Twinning is a new practice; it has not been done before. Perhaps we have not had a situation before where there has been a Government of Canada without representation in three of the provinces and two territories of the country. This is a new situation and one which is bound to give rise to certain very real complexities. It is a situation which deserves to be treated more seriously than it has by the parliamentary secretary.

I hope that as a result of recognizing the importance of this matter, that it is a new development in the life and history of Parliament and that you have fundamental obligations to protect the privileges of members of Parliament, Madam Speaker, you will reserve judgment today in order to study all the implications of this new practice. It is a practice which may involve an extension beyond the accepted terms of the subsidy by the government of the Liberal party, and may very well involve an intrusion upon the confidentiality which Canadian citizens have a right to expect in communications passed by them to their member of Parliament and, consequently, to the Government of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I should like to make a statement on this particular question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). I do not like to accumulate questions of privilege and I feel that, if possible, I should rule upon them immediately so that the House can pursue its business.

● (1610)

In the beginning, I was quite sure that this whole matter was completely outside the competence of the Chair. I have heard representations from both sides, but the more recent arguments by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) will cause me to reserve on this question of privilege. I must say that many arguments have been offered and not too many facts. In any event, I wish to look into the matter a little more deeply and make a judgment on another day as to whether there is a prima facie case of privilege.

SPORTS

DISBURSING OF FUNDS FROM LOTTERIES

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a very important point of order. With due deference to the Chair, I am not a member of the New Democratic Party. I am still in the Conservative party, just in case Madam Speaker does not realize that.

Another Loto Canada cheque has been presented to the minister of sport, which means a total amount of $12,700,000 in money for culture and art. In view of the new face on federalism the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is trying to portray to Canada, surely the Prime Minister would like his ministers to recognize that such jurisdictional questions as resource taxation, offshore mineral rights, federal spending power, lotteries, federal trade and commerce, power and communications are as important and valid as patriation of the constitution. How can the Prime Minister allow a minister, an ex-premier, to procrastinate, to break an agreement with the provinces which was duly signed by the federal and provincial ministers under the guidance of the PCO and the Department of Justice, and deny the culture, arts and sports community the money that they need? They are bankrupt.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) told me personally he needs money for symphonies and cultural arts, and this minister is not cashing the cheques. This is important because they need the money.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is really engaging in debate. This is not a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—REQUEST THAT RULING OF MADAM SPEAKER BE RECONSIDERED

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a very brief point of order to ask for clarification from the Chair. If I understand correctly, Madam Speaker, you have reserved decisions on two matters of privilege raised today. If I heard correctly, you said there were many precedents to study, and I think rightly so. Therefore, I would ask this question for purposes of clarification. In view of these many precedents that need to be studied, would you undertake to reconsider the decision of yesterday against the same precedents to see whether it should be reversed?

Madam Speaker: I am afraid I could not do that. The precedent I wanted to look at was cited by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) on a different question of privilege. Therefore, I am afraid I cannot accommodate the hon. member on that point.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. Today being Thursday, I wonder if I could ask the government House leader what he intends for us for the rest of the day and next week. We understand there are two days he wishes to allot to the opposition as allotted days under the rules.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we will consider Bill C-39 and then Bill C-22.

[Translation]

As for next week's program, I can confirm that next Tuesday and Wednesday will be set aside for the opposition, more specifically for the Progressive Conservative Party. I hope that Monday we shall be able to complete third reading of Bill C-30 which is now in committee. I hope that it will be reported to the House so that we can complete consideration of this bill on Monday or as soon as possible next week. This is the bill to authorize additional government borrowing.

Committee Report

Moreover, Bills C-22, C-26 and C-7, as well as Bill C-34, could be dealt with next week. I believe that if we can deal with these bills before next Friday, we could provide another interesting list for the following week.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, because there are comments around about the possibility of a summer recess, I wonder if the President of the Privy Council has anything more he can say today with respect to the question that I believe I have asked him every Thursday for the last two or three months. Surely he would agree with me that it would be unthinkable for this House to recess without dealing with the promised legislation respecting veterans and widows of veterans. Can he today give me firm assurance that this matter will be dealt with before there is a summer recess?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I take it for granted that the request made by the hon. member concerns the bill on veterans' pensions and that he is much more interested in this than in the summer recess. If this is the case, I can confirm that his patience and confidence will be rewarded.

CRITICAL SKILLS FOR THE '80s

PRESENTATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Special Committee on Critical Skills for the '80s.

I have consulted with the House leaders of all parties and they are ready to grant immediate concurrence in this report without debate and formal vote.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, that is agreeable to us. It is exactly in keeping with the original announcement of the select parliamentary committee.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Madam Speaker, we too join in this agreement.

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved that the first report of the Special Committee on Critical Skills for the '80s be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I note that Hansard of yesterday, Wednesday, makes no mention at page 2509 of the usual notices of motions for the production of papers. As one who was at a meeting of a parliamentary committee at the time I do not know whether this was an error on the part of Hansard in failing to include the item as usual on a Wednesday or whether it was an error on the part of the government in not introducing the usual notices of motions for the production of papers, or asking that they stand, as the case might be. I rise simply for clarification and to ask that, if there is an error in Hansard, it be corrected. Could the parliamentary secretary, or the Chair, enlighten those of us who were attending parliamentary committees yesterday as to what happened?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, as sometimes happens I had nothing to report under this particular part of Routine Proceedings. I did ask that other notices of motions for the production of papers stand.

While I am on my feet, might I say that the delay in responding to some of these notices of motions for the production of papers has been of concern to me. I have been looking into the matter and I hope to have a little more to report in subsequent weeks.

BANK ACT AND QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

MEASURE TO EXTEND OPERATIONS UNTIL NOVEMBER 30, 1980

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved:

That Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, I will be very brief in my comments. Every member of the House is very much aware of the purpose of this bill which seeks to amend section 6 of the Bank Act and of the Quebec Savings Banks Act to allow Canadian chartered banks to extend their operations by virtue of these two acts until November 30, 1980. Without this bill, banks would not have the legal power to continue their operations beyond next July 14.

It now seems obvious that Parliament will not adopt the government proposals contained in this bill before July 14, proposals which would provide a ten-year revision of the Bank Act and related legislation. It is therefore necessary to extend once again the application of the current banking legislation. The section by section study of the Bank Act by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs is taking a bit more time than was planned even if the government has made known its intention to follow up on some very important proposals on matters of policy. Parliamentary committees have put in considerable time, effort and energy to study this important and complex legislation and it would seem that more time is needed for a more detailed study of some of the bill's clauses. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat disappointed that the House has not had the opportunity to study this bill earlier this afternoon either at the report stage or at the third reading stage; however, this bill will allow banks to operate at least for some time and allow us to continue the study of some of its clauses.

I believe that members of this House agree that we should proceed with dispatch this afternoon and I would be very happy if all members would co-operate so that we could go through all stages of the bill.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I offer no apology to anybody in the House that this bill should have been brought in. It is regrettable, I know, and I have some sympathy for the banking industry and others who feel that a new bank act, the Canadian payments association legislation, etc., should be in place by now. However, it is only because of a series of events in the past that time was unfortunately lost. I will not castigate anyone or try to say where the responsibility for the delay should lie, but during the Twenty-ninth or Thirtieth Parliament, when the committee had the contents of the banking bill before it, members had to spend a great deal of time wrestling with problems about which they had insufficient information. This has been clearly demonstrated with the presentation of Bill C-6 and with the composition of the House having so radically changed in terms of numbers, and, I may say, with some complexion.

In March of 1979 the former committee on finance, trade and economic affairs tabled its report with recommendations on the Bank Act legislation before it at that time. We have had to contend with a number of new problems, as well as with ongoing problems, and, frankly, the 80-minute sessions we normally have in practice for the committees are barely sufficient to allow a member to get started on the subject and for the minister to reply, as well as the Inspector General and other officials who may be required to do so. Incidentally, there is also the time taken up by hearing witnesses on often difficult questions. A great deal of time has been consumed. We have had a great number of meetings, so any delay is not by reason of the fact that the committee has dodged its job.

The finance committee is unfortunately beleaguered by all sorts of other legislation and some of it is required very promptly. So we are victims of a bad system of committees, as I have suggested many times in the past, and therefore this bill now faces a few matters of deep principle which, as the result of discussions, are being honed and I trust the legislation will be much better by the time the bill is passed by the committee. Once it has been concluded by the committee I think there still may be a few outstanding points but remarkably few.

I think also the ministry is learning something which is valuable in connection with legislation of this kind, namely, that the bureaucracy does not produce divine inspiration. Bills that are produced by the administration and which are fronted for by ministers are not necessarily the most appropriate. Opposition parties and outsiders might have some worth-while contributions to make. If we put forward amendments, they are not put forward cast in stone; they are put forward as a basis for discussion. I think the government has now learned that if it had been forthcoming with its version of amendments on certain points at an early date with the view that they were negotiable—in other words, that they were a basis for discussion—I think we would be clear now on a number of points. No, I will not say that the bill would have been through, I am not going to point the finger of blame for this particular situation; but I would say that this is a matter which should be learned by many ministers in this administration. It would have helped a great deal in the past.

It is one of the unfortunate characteristics of the Canadian parliamentary system that ministers come to committees, shall we say, to see to the passage of their bills, with closed minds. All too often they are closed because the bureaucracy behind them will not be flexible. This is a long story which I do not want to tell. I hope that we will now move on to Committee of the Whole, that this bill will pass and that we will get down to continued serious work on the bill in question, Bill C-6, which is really a complex bill, and have it in good position in time. It is easy to clear and burn a lot of the underbrush, and I hope we can do that. We have a responsibility to the banking industry and to the other financial interests in the country without which no one can function. Bank bashing is a useless and frantic procedure, and to me it has no place in the consideration of serious legislation of this kind, no more than mere bashing has in the consideration of other legislation.

Let us contribute to a good act, because much depends on it. We could have a better act, but at the present time we have to work. Let me reiterate again what I will say at another time: The sooner we get a royal commission on banking and financial institutions in this country to examine this matter in depth, the better. Hon. members of this House do not have the time—nor, frankly, if I may say so, the ability—to get to the bottom of things. Other examinations we have seen are far too incestuous; they are in-house affairs. We have the Federal Business Development Bank and many other aspects which should be dealt with, but we want to look at the whole picture so that the government may soon undertake to start proper commission hearings and arrive at recommended legislation in time for the next anniversary without any delays.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think the public and, indeed, hon. members who have not been in the committee should be aware of the fact that there have been lengthy discussions with respect to many of the provisions of this bill and that there are several matters which remain outstanding. There are proposals which have been made to the government by my party, as there have been by members of the Conservative party, including the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), concerning the Bank Act, and I think there are some remaining philosophical problems and very practical problems which I would like the minister to continue to consider as we approach the summer recess and before we return in September or October for the next stage of consideration of the Bank Act.

I remind the minister that my party has raised a number of questions, many of which have been dealt with by the minister, and I think the public should be aware of just how far we have come and, in our view, how far we have yet to go in order to have the kind of banking legislation which reflects the public interest.

There are a number of points I would like to raise. The first is the question of interest monitoring and the regulation of interest rates. The experience we have had over the last weeks and months indicates that there is a need for greater public presence. We have an extremely uncompetitive banking system and an extremely concentrated banking system in Canada. The banks have managed to accumulate tremendous marketing powers, even since the passage of the Bank Act in 1967. There is clearly a need for a greater public presence and a greater degree of monitoring and regulation by the government of the charges levied and services rendered by the banks to consumers, small businessmen and, indeed, not so small businessmen in the Canadian scene.

When a year ago one of the chartered banks decided it would go to 21 per cent, the other banks joined together and said, "No, we are not going to let the Toronto-Dominion Bank get away with that; we are going to hold the rate down to 18 per cent". The Toronto-Dominion Bank had to step back. Then all the banks took the decision that they would together go to 21 per cent on their credit card charges.

The question which has to be dealt with by the government—and there is yet to be a convincing answer from the minister—is why it is that we have such a lock-step development in all the interest rate charges which are levied on the consumer, on the small businessman and on all those people who use the services of the banks. What manipulation of differentials and spreads has there been, and is it not in the public interest, at a time when interest rates are going up and down at a tremendous pace and there is a great deal of residual manipulative power in the hands of financial institutions such as banks, to see that these rates are carefully monitored by the government? For example, today we noticed that there has been a marginal change in the bank rate charged by the Bank of Canada on its own treasury bill notes. Should we not also be monitoring and looking very carefully at what rates are being charged to the Canadian consumer for a car loan, a house improvement loan or in the area of consumer credit and small business credit? That is an issue which remains one of a difference of opinion between my party and the minister.

During question period the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is always prepared to say that the government is going to be vigilant in this area and is deeply concerned. Then when he is actually faced with amendments from our party, there is a totally negative response, and I find that ironic. I could understand if the minister said that a certain proposal is not exactly the way he would proceed and that we would want to proceed in another way, but that is not the response. The response has been just a blanket refusal to deal with the power of banks to set rates in a non-competitive way. Evidence is very hard to garner because one has to look from quarter to quarter, but there is very little doubt that the banks have survived the period of high interest rates with healthier profit ratings than anybody expected, and they appear to be surviving, if I may put it that way, the lowering of interest rates very well indeed. There certainly have been no bank losses over this time.

The hon. member for Edmonton West speaks of bank bashing. It is not a question of bashing any particular institution. It is a question of developing an understanding as to how our economic system in fact works rather than how it is supposed to work in theory. If the hon. member for Edmonton West and members of his party have a different view, that is fine, but I do not think he can charge that we have not done our homework or that we have failed to give detailed advice, offer amendments or express concerns to the minister, with as much precision as we have been capable of in a difficult area.

The second area is the area of foreign banks, and I think there is still a difference between us. We are not happy about it but we recognize the reality that there is a large majority of members in this House who are in favour of admitting foreign banks to Canada. We have suggested to the minister that there should be a mandatory hearing process which would require that the Inspector General of Banks carry out an investigation of the intention of foreign banks, and indeed of any new chartered bank, to guarantee that their being given letters patent is in the public interest.

I am sorry to say that the minister has thus far refused to grant more than a purely discretionary power to the Inspector General. I think the minister should really look at what has happened in all our jurisdictions in the provinces. For example, it is difficult to get many forms of licence without going through a hearing process. Our administrative law has developed right through the provincial jurisdictions, which gives a great deal of power to parties who previously would not have been regarded to have standing, and it has become far more sophisticated and far more, if I may use the word, liberal in its granting of the right of standing and the right to a hearing. For example, you cannot get a liquor licence in the province of Ontario unless there is a hearing, unless a notice is granted, and unless a process has been gone through. It is more difficult to get a liquor licence in Ontario than it is to become a bank under the current proposals of the government. Frankly, I think this is absurd. I think it is something that the minister should consider again in light of developments in other jurisdictions and in light of the concern that consumers have, legitimately I think, with respect to how it is that the Inspector General and the government intend to "divvy up" the $12 billion worth of assets amongst all the foreign banks that are coming into Canada.

I must also tell the minister that we are still not satisfied with the information we have as to the current activities of foreign banks in Canada. It is interesting, for example, that when the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) and I were asking questions concerning the activities of foreign banks in Canada, we were told that this information was confidential. We have yet to receive information on the three largest foreign banks in Canada. We know from the Inspector General that the three foreign banks have subsidiaries in Canada with assets of over $500 million, but we do not know which those subsidiaries are. We do not know the relative size of the others, and it is interesting to note that the largest banks have yet to respond to the letter which the committee has sent out. The committee has yet to receive that kind of information. I can tell the minister that if we do not have that information in October, he will have a hard time convincing me that we should be passing legislation calling for the incorporation of new institutions when we do not know what their activities are at present. It is absurd to ask a parliamentary committee to allow that kind of legislation to go through when we do not have that information.

On consumer protection, I am glad that the government has accepted our suggestions with respect to lack of penalties for prepayment, the amendments that were prepared by my colleagues and I. We regret that there is not as yet full protection for borrowers and depositors in a section in our banking legislation. We think it should be there. We proposed amendments that would have put it there and we think they were appropriate. We regret the fact that we are having to wait for further advances by a federal-provincial committee. We do not think that is necessary. We think the federal government could take the lead in this area. However, we recognize that the government has taken a small step in the right direction and we think it is an important step, both in respect of the lack of prepayment penalties and with respect to the abolition of the rule of 78.

I would point out to those people who think we should just have rubber stamped this Bank Act because it is a piece of technical legislation that no one can readily understand that we are dealing with an act which regulates activities which last year amounted to over $4.9 billion taken out in consumer loans in this country. It is an industry which affects virtually every consumer, and unless there is legislation protecting that consumer and guaranteeing that windfall profits are not made at the expense of the consumer, I do not think that legislation should be passed. Indeed that is a commitment which we will continue to make to the people of Canada.

With respect to directors, I think it is important that we notice that the government has changed its mind. It started with the principle in 1976 that those people who were bank employees should not be directors of other companies. they have reneged on that under pressures from the corporate elite, if I may use that word, and have decided that there will be no such protection.

I think the government has made a mistake. I have yet to hear a convincing response from the minister as to why the government has changed its mind in the area of intercorporate directorships. We feel it is extremely important that the Canadian consumer and the Canadian small businessman feel that they have as much access to the decision-making processes of our banks as do the directors of our largest and most powerful corporations.

In the area of leasing, I say to the minister that we think he has come part of the way in that the government has decided not to allow the banks to get into the area of car leasing. But we think that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), and indeed members of our party, have raised issues with respect to leasing that have still not been satisfied and still not been dealt with by the government. I hope again that the government will take the opportunity of the summer break to consider the leasing question. The leasing question concerns small business, it concerns capital cost allowance, and it concerns the very real question of who is going to take advantage of growth in a growing business—and there are many areas where we know the leasing business is going to grow. Will it be the subsidiaries of the banks or will it be smaller Canadian corporations which have, in many fields, particulary in the car leasing field, provided a service to the consumer? I think it is a very real philosophical question.

I know the views of the banks, of Mr. MacIntosh of the Canadian Bankers' Association and others, who have stated that for them leasing is just another form of financing and that therefore it is something to which the banks should have access. On the other hand, there are those who say this is a very important source of tax write-off revenue for the banking subsidiaries at which we should look very carefully. We should have information, it seems to me, or the rate of taxation that has been paid by the current bank subsidiaries, RoyLease for example, and see how much tax they are paying in comparison with other small businesses that are engaged in the same business. It seems to me to be a legitimate question to ask whether we are in fact establishing subsidiaries which will not be paying very much tax.

In the field of data processing, we still have concerns. Again the minister knows what they are with respect to the ability of the banks to engage in businesses which compete directly with services provided by existing corporations. The leverage of the banks is very great and the ability of the banks to compete with those industries to which they in turn are acting as bankers is a very serious question, one with which the committee is still wrestling and with which we still have to deal. It is a difficult problem and I am still not satisfied that we have sufficient information in that area.

In the field of financial disclosure, our party made a number of amendments, some of which were accepted by the government. We said to the government that we are incorporating banks into Canada under this legislation, yet we are allowing them to disclose less information than they are required to disclose in their own jurisdictions. There is a patent absurdity in passing that kind of legislation. I am glad to say that the government moved part way toward accepting the need for a little sunlight in understanding the affairs of our own chartered banks and newly incorporated institutions.

● (1650)

I should like to refer to one area where the minister did not move. We have had discussions about it but I remain unconvinced that there is any reason why the government should not require the banks to tell us, in terms of their foreign activities, how much money they are lending to particular countries and the agencies of those countries. Loans to foreign countries and their agencies is a vital question of interest to the Canadian public. It should be of interest to the Inspector General of Banks.

One area where the government is in danger of failing us and where our legislation may be very inadequate is the area of the power and ability of the Inspector General to acquire information and oversee the foreign activities of Canadian chartered banks. I have many concerns about the office of the Inspector General which I have expressed in committee. For example, I am concerned that most of the representations made by the Inspector General, in my view, were made on behalf of the banks. Also, for example, I am concerned that the budget of the office of the Inspector General is paid entirely by chartered banks in the form of a levy which is part and parcel of the Bank Act.

Just as much as I am concerned about those two matters, I think my party is deeply concerned about the fact that, if we look at the asset growth of the banks from 1967, the asset growth of the banks in Canada has been great, but the asset growth of the banks in foreign countries has been more than great. It has been quite extraordinary, to the extent that now the Bank of Nova Scotia has nearly 50 per cent of its assets overseas, the Royal Bank has 35 per cent and other banks are in the same vicinity. It is in that area that I think we are in danger of passing legislation which does not give us adequate information and adequate protection.

Why should we not know whether or not Canadian chartered banks have made extensive loans to a foreign country when the international relations between Canada and that country are of great concern? Why should we not know whether Canadian banks are exposed in Iran and to what extent they are exposed in Iran? If they are extensively exposed, should we not know that as Canadian consumers? Should I as a Canadian consumer not know that the bank to which I am lending money in the form of savings deposits has extensive interests in Chile, South Africa, Iran or any part of the world? For the life of me I cannot see why the old chestnut of the banks being required to disclose this information would be destroying the confidentiality of the client-banker relationship. How can we move from the comparison of an individual person and his bank, where the principle of confidentiality is admittedly important, to the relationship between a chartered bank and the government of a foreign country? It seems to me that extends the notion of confidentiality from one particular case to a very general, wide, political application. It seems to me at some point the principle of confidentiality is superseded by the principle of disclosure. I hope very much that the minister will reconsider that question, because I think it is an extremely important point.

I think we have made some progress in the area of section 178 where we discussed the priority which should be given to producers of agricultural products, including cattlemen. We put forward a proposal to the government which was accepted. Many members of the Conservative, Liberal and New Democratic parties spoke and participated. It seems to me that it was a very healthy discussion.

Finally, I should like to take advantage of the presence in the House today of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan). I have written twice to his colleague, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), indicating that our attitude toward the passage of the Bank Act must be affected by what is happening to labour relations in the banks and the activities of our chartered banks. The Minister of Labour will know that since the decision of the Canada labour relations board in the Bank of Nova Scotia's case, where it was decided that a single bank could be organized and was a satisfactory unit for the purpose of bargaining, there has been a drive conducted by different unions under different auspices in an attempt to organize various branches of different chartered banks.

Also the minister will be aware that in case after case, but particularly in cases involving the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, the Canada labour relations board has taken not simply a dim view of the activities of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, but has specifically gone through the activities of the chairman of the board, the president and the chief executive officer of that bank and indicated that there was a systematic attempt, on the part of the directing officials of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, to subvert the rights of employees as expressed in the Canada Labour Code.

I raise the same point which I raised at second reading. How can we in this House be expected to give what are essentially charters to these institutions which give them a licence to print money? I do not know of a chartered bank in Canada which has taken a loss recently. I do not know of one which expects its assets to grow less than phenomenally. I ask the minister to review not only the reports of the Canada labour relations board but also the recent report of the advisory committee on the status of women. I ask him to consider whether it would be advisable to establish a small specialized task force in his department to examine the question of labour relations in banks and whether he would deem it advisable to call in the chief executives of our chartered banks. He could say to them, "Look, this is not the NDP simply making a charge; this is the Canada labour relations board rendering a decision".

The minister well knows that while a quasi-judicial body like the Canada labour relations board is in a position to take certain decisions on the basis of organizing drives which come before it, it is not in a position to pass judgment on drives which never get off the ground because of the over-all attitudes expressed by chief executive officers of these banks in inter-bank memos. I think both those things are advisable. It is not being irresponsible; it is a question of doing something which responds to the needs of those employees which, in terms of numbers, is the largest potentially organizable group outstanding under federal jurisdiction. The minister does not have a responsibility to say that they are automatically unionized. That is not what we are saying, but I know the minister, with his experience in the labour relations field and as a labour relations lawyer, understands the importance of the government taking the lead by indicating that it wants to see the provisions of the Canada Labour Code lived up to. He should indicate that he intends to take some action to see that the chartered banks are not given tremendous security by the government while their employees are given none.

● (1700)

I want to indicate in closing that we support this bill, this extension, and that this is not an act of filibuster on our part. We are attempting to raise issues which are of real concern to us. I think the minister would agree we have had good discussions in committee and we look forward to further discussions to ensure that the legislation which is passed controlling our chartered banks is legislation reflecting the public interest and not simply the narrow interests of those people who happen to own our largest financial institutions.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I am told that the private members' hour will last 45 minutes; if I could have the unanimous consent of the House, we could, in accordance with the discussions we have had earlier, pursue the study of this measure at the committee and report stages and go on to third reading afterwards. If my colleagues would grant me the consent required, we could dispose of this bill very quickly and then proceed with the private members' hour which would last less than an hour.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has relieved the Chair of a difficulty in that there was some indication or some understanding on the part of the Chair that there might be consent to move into Committee of the Whole on this bill. I should dispose of matters relating to the adjournment motion, and perhaps while doing that hon. members can consider their decision in respect of the suggestion that we do move into Committee of the Whole on Bill C-39.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—National Energy Board—Application for gas pipeline to Nova Scotia; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Human Rights Act—Call for amendments to provide protection against discrimination of disabled citizens; the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett)—Industry—Terms of loan to Valleyfield Chemical Products Corporation—Investigation of Space Research Corporation.

BANK ACT AND QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

MEASURE TO EXTEND OPERATION UNTIL NOVEMBER 30, 1980

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for Mr. MacEachen) that Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): May I say that the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has indicated there is a motion before the House to refer Bill C-39 to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, but he has suggested the House might agree to referring the bill to Committee of the Whole. In essence he seeks the unanimous consent of the House in that regard.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to say that we are agreeable that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, could I inquire of the government House leader whether he intends that we deal with any other matter between quarter to six and six o'clock?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Mr. Speaker, as soon as we finish with the bill on banks.

[English]

As soon as we finish with that, and I am told that will be done very quickly, we will move to private members' business, which will take less than 45 minutes today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to the suggestion by the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), is it agreed that the bill now be read a second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blaker in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: By leave, now.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pinard: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I just want to express thanks to both opposition parties for their co-operation in respect of this bill. I wish to inform hon. members that tonight we will be studying Bill C-22 as the first item of business, followed by Bill C-13 which was discussed yesterday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to the motion made earlier by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), the House will now proceed to private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions for papers, private bills, public bills.

Item no. 19 in the name of the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon). Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House will now proceed to notices of motions for papers, item no. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

SALES OF CANDU REACTORS

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Herbert:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications between the government and senior officials of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited during the months of June, July, August and September 1979, that pertain to the negotiation of the sales of Candu reactors either by AECL or by any private company acting with the authority or knowledge of AECL.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it will not take me too long to conclude my remarks. I should just like to review very briefly the position of the Thirty-first Parliament on this issue, and the member's position in connection with this motion.

As I indicated before, the Thirty-first Parliament, under the guidance of the government of the day headed by the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), indicated the need for a very broad inquiry in this whole area of nuclear energy. At the same time that government indicated the need for some real reform in respect of freedom of information. It was intended through that broad inquiry to bring to the surface and expose to the people of Canada the ramifications, difficulties and implications, as well as the advantages, of the use of nuclear energy in Canada and in the world. That was the right approach to this terribly important issue; freedom of information, on the one hand, and an inquiry, on the other, to expose all the ramifications of nuclear energy to the people of Canada.

What we now have is an internal examination and review. The government seems to fear this issue, so it wants to hide it again. What do we have before us? We have a very narrow request for information, which is obviously a partisan political request for information covering a very short period of time. Instead of a broad inquiry to expose to the people of Canada all aspects of this industry, we have a very narrow and specific request for information as follows:

—His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications between the government and senior officials of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited during the months of June, July, August and September, 1979, that pertain to the negotiation of the sales of Candu reactors either by AECL or by any private company acting with the authority or knowledge of AECL.

• (1710)

That period of time is a very narrow period of time, and it is confined almost entirely to the period when the Progressive Conservatives were the government. It is a narrow and despicable approach to this massive problem. Surely the hon. member could have asked for information over a period of ten years, five years or even two years, but he has limited himself to a narrow period which is associated primarily with the tenure of the Progressive Conservative Party in government. This is a despicable action and a despicable motion on behalf of the governing side of this House. As a result it should be treated in that manner.

If members opposite want information gathered for a period of ten years, or five years, then let them ask for it. Let them ask for the information so that they may table it and all hon. members may have access to it. The hon. member has not taken a magnanimous position in this matter. He has taken a very narrow, partisan position, and it is on that note that I wish to end my remarks.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure as the seconder of the motion to speak on this important topic. I hope to highlight how Canada can achieve a secure energy future through the use of nuclear systems.

The development of our electrical resources in the latter part of this century will shape the future of Ontario as surely as did the efforts of Sir Adam Beck and his colleagues at its outset. In the early part of the century, it was hydroelectricity which gave Ontario its industrial strength. That water power, which gave the province abundant electricity, was an indigenous resource. By 1990 Ontario Hydro will be generating more than half of its electricity by nuclear energy, a source which will give us stable, economic energy from another indigenous source, uranium.

Canada, with 10 per cent of the world's uranium, is in a uniquely favourable position to exploit the potential of that resource. Substitution is the key to our way out of the oil dilemma and it will be our ingenuity and perseverance in finding methods of substitution which will determine our energy future. The use of uranium in electrical generating stations is an obvious form of substitution, and the economics of nuclear generation have already been established.

In Ontario, where the competition is imported coal, electricity is being produced by nuclear plants at half the cost of that produced by burning imported coal. I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) who said, as reported at page 2055 of Hansard for June 12:

> Canadians can be very proud that they have contributed to the development of nuclear energy.

He went on to say:

> I am convinced beyond a shadow of a doubt, as are many experts in this field, that mankind not only needs nuclear energy desperately in the evolving civilization, but knows how and has available at its fingertips the ability to cope with the problems resulting from this industry.

It is a very wise man who said those words. He should be sitting on this side of the House.

In France, a country entirely dependent on imports for its oil supply, a realistic, aggressive campaign is under way by the state electric utility, EDF, to seek ways in which industry can electrify its operations. A team of 100 specially trained young EDF engineers are working out in industry to promote the concept and educate industrial engineers. Fifty per cent of the new homes being built in France are equipped with electric heat. This, it should be appreciated, is taking place in a country where electricity is far more expensive than it is in Ontario where the combination of hydraulic and nuclear generation has kept costs down.

The key to France's bid for both self-sufficiency and a high energy society is the pursuit of a strong and highly advanced nuclear power program which will supply 50 per cent of that country's energy by the end of this century. The nuclear decision in France has meant that a secure and increasing supply of electricity can be made available, an attraction for many major industries. One result has been that the European aluminum industry will concentrate its plants in France, giving that country a new industry with an export market throughout Europe, while we sit and quibble over whether or not to sell our Candu reactors to this country or that one, or whether we are going to be in this market or not, or whether we should have these double standards which the mover of this motion talked about at the beginning of his remarks.

It is not only as an electricity producer that nuclear reactors can provide answers to our energy problems. The in situ extraction of oil from the tar sands calls for huge quantities of steam. A 125,000 barrel per day plant requires something like the entire steam output of one of the Pickering reactors. Cheap steam from nuclear reactors is nothing new. At the Bruce nuclear power development near Kincardine, the reactors supply steam to the chemical plant which makes heavy water as well as supplying electricity to the Ontario Hydro network. Last year the amount of heat supplied in this way was equivalent to the heating requirements of about half a million homes, and studies are in progress to see how other industries can be attracted to the area by such economical energy supplies.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) asked a question with regard to solving the problem of nuclear waste. I think we do have the technology to solve the problem of nuclear waste, but I will leave that topic to other speakers later on in the debate.

Another kind of waste is also very important, and that is the waste of heat escaping into the atmosphere from these nuclear reactors. In the future surplus heat from the Bruce reactors could be used in greenhouses, which is an idea suggested by one of my constituents, Mr. Czubak. The surplus heat could also be used in a fish farming project built near the plant. The Ontario Energy Corporation and a group of private investors already have a one acre experimental greenhouse in production to demonstrate the feasibility of such a project. This year they will add 14.4 hectares—for the hon. members of the Conservative party, that is 35 acres—of greenhouses in anticipation of the building of a hot water pipeline from Bruce. Eventual plans are for 60.6 hectares or 150 acres of greenhouses, all heated by surplus nuclear heat.

At the other end of the scale is the development of mini-reactors which could replace oil furnaces in factories, shopping complexes and large buildings. The University of Toronto, like a number of other large universities in Canada, operates a small research reactor on campus, a fact perhaps which is not known by hon. members opposite. It operates unattended, is self-regulating and produces only a few kilowatts of heat. It is this type of reactor which we believe can be developed into a replacement for the oil furnace.

This government is showing decisive leadership by encouraging such imaginative projects which are pointing the way to a future in which this country can secure real self-sufficiency in energy without incurring the drastic alterations of a lifestyle which hon. members of the NDP would have us believe are inevitable. The growing evidence around the world is that the economic structure of the advanced nations can survive the ratcheting of oil prices by OPEC and the far more severe disruptions which lie not too far down the road as oil supplies dwindle.

We are all too well aware of the disruptive effect which the uneven distribution of our natural energy resources has on provincial relations. The transportation of coal, gas or oil from our western provinces to the industries of the east represents a formidable challenge when compared with a nuclear economy in which a single truckload of fuel will keep a plant in operation for a whole year. Uranium not only is found in most parts of Canada but its ready transportability can assist us in moving towards equality of energy pricing across the country. The cost of a nuclear kilowatt differs very little whether it is generated in the maritimes or the heartland of Ontario. I hope hon. members on the Conservative side noticed the term "kilowatt"—it has always been the measurement in this industry.

The Candu nuclear power stations built by Ontario Hydro have already saved more than $1 billion in foreign exchange and by 1990 that figure will have grown to $16 billion.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway last week complained in this debate that Atomic Energy of Canada refuses to give out information. At page 2054 of Hansard for June 12, he is reported as follows:

> Atomic Energy of Canada seems to feel that it is above participation, that it is above inquiry. If anyone wants to ask a question of Atomic Energy of Canada, any interested groups of citizens, we hear the reply that Atomic Energy of Canada will not participate, nor will it give us information.

I would ask the hon. member where he was when AECL had a display in room 200 in the West Block. He could have got all the information he wanted there. I would also refer him to the annual report of AECL where he would have found the financial statement he asks for, as well as all the information on waste management, etc.

As an existing and proven alternate energy, nuclear power can make a significant contribution to the over-all energy supply which is a prerequisite for economic growth in Ontario and in Canada as a whole.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate for the production of papers from AECL with some degree of interest. I have read the motion, of course, and I want to say that not only do I agree with the call that all documents—notes, minutes, correspondence and other communications from AECL during the months of June, July, August, and September, 1979—be made available to the House of Commons, but I would call for all documents from AECL going back for a period of years and right up to the present time.

I should like to see the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) broaden his outlook a little and realize that this company, a Crown corporation, in the final analysis has to be answerable to this House of Commons through a minister of the Crown. It should be only too happy to make the documents available and the hon. member should be very forthright in encouraging it to do so.

I had the feeling, however, that in putting forward his motion the hon. member for Vaudreuil was doing more than just asking for the documents for a certain period of time. In reality I think he was indulging in that game that so many members of the government benches seem to be playing these days—that is, kite flying for the government. In his case it is a game of kite flying on behalf of the government to forward a policy—to endorse and push a policy of lowering the safeguards policy on sales abroad of nuclear equipment by AECL on behalf of Canada. That seems to be the goal that he and other members have in mind.

One has only to look at the current negotiations with Argentina for a good example of this. The hon. member for Vaudreuil raised that question when he spoke. He advocated, of course, further sales of Candu reactors to Argentina even though that country is not a member of the non-proliferation treaty nations, has not signed the non-proliferation treaty nor has it agreed to Canada's full scope safeguards. It is a country which is in no way prepared to meet the kinds of standards Canada has set for itself in trying to be an example to other countries of how to contain the proliferation of nuclear explosions around the world.

I imagine that if we were to get the papers from AECL down to the present day—and I hope the hon. member will endorse that suggestion—we might find that in the present deliberations between AECL, ministers of the Crown and government officials from Argentina somehow or other there will be a write-off of the mounting debt of AECL on its construction of the Embalso plant in Cordoba province. We have already absorbed a $130 million loss on that and now there is the potential of another $30 or $40 million loss. In order to get a write-off and relieve the Canadian government of that kind of additional debt, we have somehow or other fiddled around with the safeguards that the previous Liberal government had established and that the Conservative party had endorsed.

It was not always that way with the Liberal government. There were those previously who took a very strong and courageous stand—ministers who had the courage to introduce, defend and enlarge the number of countries who would abide by the standards of safeguards that we put into effect. When the Hon. Don Jamieson was secretary of state for external affairs, he introduced safeguards on December 27, 1976. At page 2256 of Hansard for that date, he said:

> While the Canadian government recognizes the legitimate energy requirements of its trading partners, it is determined to do everything within its power to avoid contributing to nuclear weapons proliferation. It is for this reason that the Government of Canada has unilaterally decided to strengthen further Canada's safeguards requirements.

Perhaps the hon. member for Vaudreuil would pay particular attention to the next passage. Mr. Jamieson said:

> As in the past we are prepared to accept the commercial consequences of being clearly ahead of other suppliers. This is the price we are prepared to pay to curb the threat to mankind of nuclear proliferation.

That was the kind of courageous stand that was taken by a former Liberal secretary of state for external affairs. I wonder how many on that side of the House take that stand today. Certainly when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) was in opposition he had some questions about such a stand, and now the hon. member for Vaudreuil questions it. He does not have the courage to stand up and defend the safeguards that are in place. These could be changed or downgraded.

● (1730)

Of course, Mr. Speaker, he did not have the courage either to stand in his place and make the charges against me personally that he made outside the House. That seems to indicate what he is all about. I found it rather interesting that he knew he could not make those kinds of allegations in the House and defend them under the rules. No. What happened was that in the CP story of June 13 this year it said:

> Herbert, MP for the Montreal riding of Vaudreuil, told the Commons yesterday afternoon that a former Progressive Conservative cabinet minister apparently interfered with Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd., the Crown agency that sells nuclear technology, and effectively ensured a breakdown in communications with Argentina.
> Herbert did not name MacDonald in the House but confirmed later she was the cabinet minister to whom he was referring.
> He said the charge was based on a complaint made by one of his constituents interested in the sale of reactors.

I find that to be one of the most invidious ways of going outside the House. The hon. member would not name the minister in the House of Commons, would not name the constituent, and would not name what the charges were that the constituent was upset about. None of this would he do in the House of Commons. Of course he would make all sorts of allegations outside. That is exactly what I expected from the hon. member for Vaudreuil.

It is rather interesting that we see more and more of this deterioration of Liberal concern for the maintenance of nuclear safeguards in this country and as we apply them to other countries. When you look at what the hon. member for Vaudreuil is doing, obviously he seemed to want to make sales of Candu reactors to Argentina under any conditions whatsoever, just accept anything. I say to him that this is not the same as going out and selling other commodities. The sale of a nuclear reactor or nuclear technology has within it the potential for destruction of people around the world in a way that no other commodity has. The hon. member for Vaudreuil should be prepared to face up to that, and face up to the responsibility that goes with being a member of the House, certainly the responsibility that being a member of the government carries with it on matters such as this.

This afternoon when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) was questioned about further sales to Argentina and under what conditions, he evaded giving direct answers. Of course he did. Even the hon. member for Vaudreuil must know that now we are getting into a series of discussions that are shrouded in secrecy between cabinet ministers, AECL, and officials from Argentina. They certainly could allow for our safeguard standards to be lowered. I hope that every concerned member in the House of Commons would fight against that, including even the hon. member for Vaudreuil.

It would be interesting if he would expand his motion to cover what was going on in April of this year when Admiral Madeira paid his visit to Ottawa to meet with ministers of the Crown and members of AECL, to conduct negotiations with regard to sales of Candu reactors. In that way he could find out exactly what was the quid pro quo for writing off the additional losses that AECL has had because of the bad business practices and maladministration of their work in Cordoba in the building of the Embalso plant. It would be interesting to know what the quid pro quo is. It would be interesting to know whether the hon. member for Vaudreuil is aware that his government is prepared to write off $30 million or more as a result of the way the whole enterprise has been mishandled from beginning to end, since the time it went into effect.

We had a situation where a reactor was sold by AECL to Argentina. That sale, through several renegotiations, cost the Canadian people $130 million. Already we have had to pay that amount for selling them this reactor. The cost has gone even higher, and discussions are now under way between our government and Argentina as to how to cover that loss. That is something that perhaps the hon. member for Vaudreuil will include in his motion so that we have all the material out on the table and under public scrutiny when we are looking at the question of AECL.

As a number of my colleagues have said, had we been able to pursue the public nuclear inquiry that the Clark government had set up, all of this would be common knowledge now. It would all be in the public domain. However, what happened to the government of which the hon. member is a part? Immediately it wraps a mantle of secrecy around everything it is doing.

Of course it is not what the government is doing that the hon. member really wants to know. It is not the current situation with regard to Argentina that he wants to know anything about. No, indeed. It is not the write off of $30 million, further losses, or anything of that nature. He really wants to duck the whole issue. That is what I find rather interesting in that he simply does not understand the situation. He does not want to know the facts, and certainly does not seem to care one little bit about Canada's maintenance of the safeguard policy.

It would be interesting if he would look at what went on last summer when some of us who felt strongly about safeguards argued that there should be no lessening of safeguards on the sale of nuclear equipment and nuclear technology, regardless of whether it is to Argentina, Pakistan, India, Brazil, South Africa, Israel or any other country that has not signed the non-proliferation treaty. We have already seen the kinds of damage, problems, and situations the world is placed in when those safeguards are not in place.

I would hope the hon. member for Vaudreuil would enlarge upon the motion he has put forward to include all of the documentation from AECL going back to 1974 when the Embalse plant first saw the light of day. If we have all of the documentation on the table, he can take a clear look at the difficulties caused by the procrastination and ill-founded documentation put forward by AECL.

AECL had to go back and renegotiate the agreement twice because it was not carried out properly. It was not written properly in the first place. Now they are trying a third renegotiation. I hope the hon. member will be honourable enough at least to ask for the whole story.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take a few minutes this afternoon to discuss the motion before the House and give my approval to what it asks for and bring a particular aspect to the whole question of information about the nuclear industry and what is taking place in that part of our present day world.

• (1740)

I bring to this debate a specific piece of information provided only recently in the course of the hearings on the subject of uranium refineries which were held in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. A large number of people appeared at these hearings and spoke with deep personal concern about the fact that they had in the past been, in a sense, whitewashed by the uranium industry—that they had not been told the truth about what had taken place. I have here a little booklet called "Why People say No". In it, Saskatchewan people, as well as people from all over Canada, express their concern about the fact that they have not been given up to date information about what is happening in the nuclear industry, and I should like to put a couple of short passages on record to indicate the broad spectrum of information which the people wanted but which did not appear to be found acceptable by the commission at that time. For instance, a student I know personally spoke of the inquiry—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but, according to Standing Order 48(2), after one hour and 30 minutes of debate, we have to end the debate and put the question. However, under the same order the mover of the motion is entitled to an additional five minutes if he wishes.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we had an interesting discussion on the last occasion when this subject was under consideration, and again this afternoon. The debate has brought out the role nuclear energy can play in meeting the energy needs of Canada in the years ahead. We have heard reference, also, to the role it can play in providing developing countries with a cheap and dependable source of energy. There has been some discussion of waste disposal, an area of concern, an area of interest to many both in Canada and abroad, but one in which significant progress has been made in meeting the challenges which that particular aspect of energy involves. The role which nuclear energy can play in assisting the developing countries in particular, the question of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons technology and ensuring it is not abused has also been discussed, most recently here this afternoon.

Canada's desire to share her peaceful nuclear technology with other countries which can put it to good use must be balanced by a perception of its potential danger. The Canadian people would not countenance the diversion of our nuclear exports for destructive purposes.

Proliferation is essentially a political problem among nations, rather than technical. Safeguards on civilian nuclear technology are only one aspect of the political problem. Countries wishing to obtain nuclear weapons can do so without recourse to civilian nuclear power technology. In any case, most would prefer to avoid complicating a weapons program by linking it to facilities intended for energy supply.

Policies which emphasize restriction of technology, without taking into account the legitimate energy needs of other countries, may push them toward self-sufficiency using unsafeguarded national facilities. The denial of technology can exacerbate the problem of achieving international consensus on a non-proliferation regime. At the same time importing countries must respect international concern about the risks of proliferation. The non-proliferation regime must devise ways of maintaining the technical and institutional barriers between civilian and military applications of nuclear energy.

The recent international nuclear fuel cycle evaluation (INFCE) in which Canada participated fully, has been useful in developing a common understanding of the technical base for future nuclear developments. INFCE concluded that there was no technical "fix" to the problem of proliferation. Basically, it requires political solutions. INFCE indicated that a number of countries will be proceeding with plans to reprocess their irradiated fuel and to recycle plutonium. From this arises the need for better institutional and technical arrangements to deal with the safeguards aspects of enrichment, reprocessing plants, and with advanced fuel cycles generally.

The basic policy issue in the post INFCE period is how to reconcile the needs of countries with nuclear programs for assurances of supply of technology and fuel with the need for a stable, effective non-proliferation regime. What is needed now are acceptable international agreements, which may help to do away with the need for extensive case by case bilateral negotiations. In particular, one difficult question which Canada must address is how it will exercise its right of prior consent over reprocessing. In international discussions which Canada hopes will take place in the near future, the government expects that its concerns over the proliferation risks associated with reprocessing can be reconciled with its nuclear partners regarding assured supply and use of uranium of Canadian origin.

The international nuclear market will continue to present difficulties in both the economic and political domains, but we are working to overcome them. The government is reviewing its policies with a view to deciding how the national interest can best be served in a way consistent with our responsibilities to the international community. We must now again work with others in directing our energies to the evolution of a sensible international non-proliferation regime. The most effective contribution we can make to that effort will be one which gives equal weight to the two sides of the nuclear dilemma—the quest for energy security and the quest for control over the spread of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, in my opening remarks I must express my pleasure that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) spoke this afternoon because it gives me the opportunity to underline the reason for the motion. I will begin by reading the relevant remark as it appears at page 2050 of Hansard. I said it appeared to me that a minister of the Crown at that time was interfering with the operation of a Crown corporation which should have been independent of government interference.

It is quite apparent from the remarks that were made on June 12 by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) that he thought I was trying to promote the sale of Candu reactors. I tried to make it clear that I was not expressing an opinion either for or against; I was simply saying that the expressed intent of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited was to make export sales and I was objecting to an apparent interference by an important minister of the Crown in the operation of a Crown corporation which was intended to be independent of government interference.

I raise this issue because it will come up later and in the future. If I could put my personal opinion on the record, though, I think there should be a lot more government interference in Crown corporations. Nevertheless, if they were set up to be independent they should remain independent.

There are two means of interference. One of them is, of course, by stopping communications between interested parties, which effectively puts an end to negotiations for a sale. If the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands feels any better about it, I may say I have good reason to believe that action of this kind was going on prior to the change of government by which the hon. lady became a member of the cabinet.

I have objected to the double standard. I want to see our standards clearly established and put on the record. I want to see us abide by our own standards, and I want those clearly established.

• (1750)

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order just so I have clarification from the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). He mentioned stopping. I think the words he used were "stopping of communications". I stand to be corrected, but it seemed to me that he was implying that I had stopped communications. It that is so, I would like him to spell out the exact details of what I was supposed to have done, because he is making a charge of which I know nothing.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I spoke of the stopping of communications between AECL and the representatives of another country who were interested in purchasing a Candu reactor. I make that very clear.

Miss MacDonald: By whom? Who stopped them?

Mr. Herbert: If it is the policy and the intention of this government, the past government or any other government, to sell Candu reactors or not to sell Candu reactors, I accept that decision. I was objecting strongly to any personal intervention which imposes the ideas of an individual on a supposedly independent Crown corporation.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member would not want to mislead the House on this question of the interruption of communications. I was the minister who went down to Argentina on this particular point, and I want to make it absolutely clear that the then secretary of state for external affairs did not in any way try to stop communications. In fact the point at issue was that there was no communication between the previous government and Argentina.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert).

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the work which was done by the hon. member who has just spoken. In fact that was the only bright light on the whole picture at that time.

We have sold a reactor to Argentina. That is a fact. I do not want to get into whether that was a good deal or not. That is another issue entirely. We could have concluded another sale to that country. However, as with any export business, aggressive salesmanship is necessary.

I am well aware that when I placed this motion on the order paper I was asking for the production of some documents which would not be made available to me, and it should be apparent that I do not have sufficient information to be able to ask for the specific communications to which I referred in my remarks in this House on June 12. Without going any further, then, I request that the motion be withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In accordance with Standing Order 50 the motion can be withdrawn only with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House give its unanimous consent for the withdrawal of the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I would like to serve notice that I want to reserve, for the period of time following question period next week, the right to raise a question of privilege regarding the charge laid against me in the House this afternoon by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) that I personally interfered by stopping communications between AECL and government officials of Argentina, and to demand that the hon. member produce evidence to that effect.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The remarks of the hon. member will be brought to the attention of Madam Speaker.

The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.54 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ADJUSTMENT OF ACCOUNTS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING ACCOUNTS OF CANADA

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-22, an act to adjust the Accounts of Canada and to make related amendments to certain acts be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the proposed bill is designed to implement many recommendations concerning technical improvements to be made to the Government of Canada's financial statements and to write off certain loans.

In 1973, the then secretary of the Treasury Board, Mr. Osbaldeston, undertook a study on the accounts of Canada with a view to resolving many accounting problems which, in the preceding years, had been studied by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts or raised by successive auditors general.

This task force was made up of representatives from the Department of Finance, the Department of Supply and Services and the Treasury Board Secretariat. Mr. Glenn Ross, a chartered accountant from Coopers and Lybrand, an accounting firm established here in Ottawa presided over the group and he acted as special accounting consultant to the secretary of the Treasury Board. The study was completed in October 1975. Its 41 recommendations were accepted by the Treasury Board and by cabinet, and in March of 1976 they were submitted to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which approved them.

Recommendations 10, 11 and 12 contained in the report summarize the main purpose of this legislation and they explain the concepts of assets and liabilities from the point of view of the Canadian government. To meet these new definitions, we will have to delete certain items which were previously registered as assets and recognize that in the future, these disbursements will be considered as expenses, not as assets.

In order to make these necessary changes, we have used a method which consisted of three steps. First, to indicate the changes brought to the financial statements of the government as of March 31, 1979, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) exercised the authority conferred to him by section 54(2) of the Financial Administration Act to provide, for the assets and liabilities, such reserves as he deems necessary in order to have an exact picture of Canada's financial situation. The second step consists of the application of part of the legislation which rescinds all legal powers with respect to various accounts, funds and loans to be deleted. The third step will consist of the application of part of this same legislation which provides for the deletion of outstanding amounts which are registered in the accounts of Canada as of March 31, 1980. Most of the deletions concern the Unemployment Insurance Fund and the Airport Revolving Fund.

[English]

The exact amount to be deleted will not be known until the actual balances at March 31, 1981, are established. The $3.8 billion estimate of the balance to be deleted that was quoted in our press release of April 28, 1980, was based on figures published in the public accounts for 1978-79. Since the press release, preliminary figures for the year 1979-80 have become available from the end year accounting records, and the estimate of the amount to be deleted can now be revised down to $3 billion. This change occurred because the government's cost of paying benefits to the unemployment insurance fund was reduced by about $1 billion in the fiscal year 1979-80 from what it was in 1978-79. This reduction in the government's cost of paying benefits was due to a new formula that increased the share of costs to employees and employers, reduced benefits paid because of some new rules, and a slight improvement of the rate of unemployment.

The objectives of this act could have been met through special supplementary estimates followed by a special appropriations act, but because they are accounting adjustments rather than spending initiatives, and because they represent a significant change in accounting policy, it was felt that they would be better explained through a separate act. In keeping with this philosophy, it was decided to include in this act only those items which has been previously agreed to and publicly acknowledged in the financial statements of Canada. Note three of the 1979 Public Accounts relates to recommendations 10, 11 and 12 of the study of the accounts, and to the write-off of certain loans which are also included in this bill. A more detailed explanation of the major items is provided in the following comments.

I should like to deal with unemployment insurance. The largest amount involved relates to the unemployment insurance account. At March 31, 1980, advances by the government and other current obligations to this fund were in the order of $1.6 billion. The following details will explain how that amount is determined. The unemployment insurance account is intended to be self-sufficient as long as unemployment remains below a specific rate. Until January, 1976, that rate was fixed at 4 per cent, but now it is calculated using an eight-year moving average of the unemployment rate. For example, the moving average rate used for 1979 was 6.6 per cent. The government is required to pay the fund for the cost of benefits attributable to unemployment higher than this rate.

The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission pays out benefits based on claims, but it has not been receiving the government's share of the cost until the calendar year has ended and the annual rate of unemployment becomes known. However, the commission requires funds to meet its interim needs. These needs have been met from the contributions of employers and employees and advances provided by the government against its eventual share of the cost of unemployment. These advances have been treated as an asset of the Government of Canada, and at the end of each fiscal year their total value has been reported in the Public Accounts and in the government's statement of assets and liabilities. The advances to the unemployment insurance account made by the government to meet the expected cash requirements of the account at March 31, 1980, totalled $1.025 billion.

A calculation was made of the government's cost of paying benefits for calendar year 1979 plus January to March, 1980. This total cost exceeded the advances by $574 million and is an obligation of the government to the unemployment insurance account. Therefore, the total amount of the required adjustment is $1.025 billion plus $574 million, for a total of $1.599 billion. This adjustment has the effect of recognizing the total government's cost of paying benefits to the unemployment insurance account up to March 31, 1980, and better disclosing the government's expenditures. Bill C-22 will obviate the need to make this kind of adjustment in the future, since the act to adjust the accounts of Canada will require that the government recognize as budgetary expenditures its cost of paying benefits to the unemployment insurance account on a monthly basis.

The next item of significance with which this bill deals is the subject of revolving funds. It is the next largest amount dealt with. It relates to revolving funds and working capital advances. In a separate decision in response to other recommendations of the study of the accounts of Canada to which I earlier made reference, the Treasury Board approved a change to the method used to control revolving funds and working capital advances to become effective April 1, 1980. Under the previous accounting method the additional moneys provided by appropriations over revenues collected were treated as loans or advances rather than expenditures of the government. Recommendations 28 through 39 of the study of the accounts dealt with improvements to the methods of accounting for and disclosing the activities of these funds.

The approved change will recognize advances as budgetary expenditures at the time at which they occur. This is instead of treating them as non-budgetary loans. If a fund generates an excess of revenue over the money advanced, this amount in turn will be treated as a reduction of expenditure. In conjunction with the implementation of this change, it will be necessary to delete the outstanding balances of all such accounts effective March 31, 1981, and that is one of the purposes of the bill. The total of these balances as at March 31, 1980, was $859 million and involved some 56 separate accounts belonging to 17 different departments. About $650 million of this sum is the result of loans made to the airports revolving fund, much of which was required to finance the construction of Mirabel airport and the Pickering land assembly.

The only significant addition to Bill C-22 from its predecessor Bill C-13 is the last part called "Authorizations for Certain Revolving Funds". These are set forth in clauses 22 to 33 of Bill C-22. Generally parliamentary authority for revolving funds not originally authorized in specific legislation would be approved or rescinded through supplementary estimates. However, because of difficulties associated with co-ordination and timing between supplementary estimates in fiscal year 1980-1981 and Bill C-22, it was considered appropriate to include the rescinding of all previous revolving fund authorities and establishing new revolving funds in this bill. It is intended that future amendments to the revolving fund authorities set up by this bill will receive parliamentary authority through supplementary estimates. Consequently a special clause is included in this bill to facilitate amendment by an appropriation act.

There are some miscellaneous changes as well. For example, another amount to be adjusted relates to unamortized bond flotation costs. Prior to 1977 the flotation or administrative costs of issuing government bonds were recorded as assets and then charged off to expenditures over the life of the related bond issue. However, since 1977 the government has recognized flotation costs on new issues as expenditures at the time the issues were made. The balance of unamortized flotation costs of $140 million for issues prior to 1977 needs to be deleted from the accounts of Canada.

A fourth major item to be adjusted arises from loans totalling $387 million made to finance certain types of capital expenditures for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Capital Commission, the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory. Payments of principal and interest on these loans have not been made since March 31, 1975, because commencing on that date any new capital expenditures have been treated as normal budgetary expenditures of the government. These old loan balances have continued to be carried as assets in the accounts of Canada, pending the granting of parliamentary authority to delete and recognize them as expenditures.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in addition to these assets, certain liabilities of the government have to be terminated to rectify the accounting and improve accountability to Parliament. These special accounts, until now designated as liabilities by the public accounts, basically constitute accounts which allow the agency involved to hide allocation of funds and revenue produced by sales so that these funds cannot be cancelled at the end of the fiscal year.

These accounts are as follows: the National Museums purchase account, the National Museums special account, the National Defence special liability account, the National Library purchase account, the Railway Relocation and Grade Crossing fund and the National Capital fund. I repeat that this bill proposes no new cash expenditure. It aims at implementing the recommendations included in the study of the accounts of Canada which were authorized by the Treasury Board and the cabinet of the former government and supported by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. Speaker, we are now working on a policy concerning the evaluation of the posted assets of the government. We expect this policy, which aims at developing procedure and methods for calculating and registering asset values, to be ready for the preparation of the public accounts of 1980. Mr. Speaker, basically, this policy will enable us to show more accurately the value of the posted assets of the government, that is, the sums that are expected to be collected or recovered through financial claims.

● (2020)

[English]

I should indicate, Mr. Speaker, that there will be several, very few in number, technical amendments which will be brought forward during the committee stage of this bill.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak first for our side on this long awaited Bill C-22, to adjust the accounts of Canada. As the minister knows, it has been a long time coming, and I think the House may well ask itself why the bill has come to us at this time and why the government all of a sudden felt moved to proceed with Bill C-22. The reason, I think, can be stated fairly easily.

The government has realized that the jig is up, or it has been caught with its hands in the till, if I can put it another way. It has been a long time that the House has been attuned to the fact that this bill was necessary. I, as a member of this House, and as a chartered accountant, have long been lamenting that the accounts of Canada were not presenting the facts in accounting language as they should for an enterprise of the size of the Government of Canada. I have not been alone in that kind of concern. Over the years the Auditor General, and more recently the Comptroller General, have expressed the concern that things are not described adequately or properly in the public accounts of Canada.

A result of the practice which has been followed by the government is that the expenditures of the government have been understated and the assets of the government have been overstated. We on this side agree with the proposals in Bill C-22, and that should be no surprise to the House since it is essentially the same bill as that proposed, Bill C-13, during the Thirty-first Parliament, introduced on October 19, 1979, barely one week into the administration of the Progressive Conservative government.

It is worthy of note that the press release put out by this new minister in April, 1980 is very similar to the press release put out by the former president of the Treasury Board, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). Only the names have been changed, and I do not know whether that is to protect the innocent, but the one release with the name which I will leave out, begins:

> —President of the Treasury Board, today announced major changes to the Accounts of Canada designed to improve financial control and accountability.

Our present President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) in his release has said:

> —President of the Treasury Board, today announced introduction of legislation to make major changes to the Accounts of Canada designed to improve financial control and accountability.

Is it not strange that the wording is exactly the same, just nine months later?

Mr. Knowles: It sounds like a carbon copy.

Mr. Clarke: It is all but a carbon copy. I could go on, but I think I have made my point. The releases are practically word for word the same.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clarke: I can hear some voices to the left suggesting it is because there is no difference in parties. If that were the case we would have had this bill years ago. Perhaps the present President of the Treasury Board would care to indicate whether he would like to have had the bill in shortly after he arrived in Parliament or a few years before he arrived in Parliament. In any event the record stands.

The Progressive Conservative government of the Thirty-first Parliament presented this bill barely a week after it met Parliament. Now we have the other side presenting almost verbatim the same bill, with almost verbatim the same press release. Perhaps I could just say that is a bit of a coincidence, but I think it is significant that the present government felt compelled, because of pressure undoubtedly brought by this side, to bring this bill along.

The House should be interested in looking at the history of events leading up to what made the Conservative government feel this bill was necessary. I do not have to go back too far, just to 1975. I think the minister alluded to the 1975 Report on the Study of the Accounts of Canada.

It is significant to observe that this study was the first of its kind since 1920. In other words, in this country where budgets have soared goodness knows how many times from 1920 to 1975, 55 years, there had not been any kind of study made of the accounts of Canada.

It is worth while, I think, to read three of the recommendations contained in that Study of the Accounts of Canada, released in 1975. Recommendation No. 10 found at page 5, says:

> Assets and liabilities of the Government of Canada should be defined as follows:
>
> assets are the financial claims acquired by the Government of Canada on outside organizations and individuals as a result of events and transactions prior to the accounting date; and > liabilities are its financial obligations to outside organizations and individuals as a result of events and transactions prior to the accounting date.

That is a fairly basic accounting definition to anyone with a modicum of accounting ability or business experience, but that is something which was not being followed by the Government of Canada in its accounts up until this point.

Recommendation No. 11 on page 6 of the report says this:

The Unemployment Insurance Commission should be reimbursed by the government on a monthly basis for all expenditures to be borne by the government. Such reimbursements should be recorded as budgetary expenditures of the period to which they pertain thus deleting non interest-bearing advances from the Statement of Assets and Liabilities.

Again that is a fairly simple observation, but what the government found it convenient to do over all these years was record the amount to be paid out on the excess expenditures on unemployment insurance as assets, and then after the fiscal year end they would be paid over to the fund and recorded as an expenditure. In other words, it was an understatement of the expenditures of the fiscal year just ended and an overstatement of the assets in the Statement of Assets and Liabilities of Canada as at the end of that fiscal period.

● (2030)

Recommendation No. 12 says this:

Consistent with the definition of assets and liabilities previously recommended, the following should be deleted from the Statement of Assets and Liabilities:

—working capital advances and revolving funds except for those primarily used to record financial claims on organizations and individuals outside the Government of Canada;

—undisturbed balances of appropriations to special accounts; and —deferred loan amortization costs and premiums.

The minister has made reference to that very matter in his remarks. I am glad to see that the Government of Canada is finally facing up to the accounting and business actualities and will now record things as they really are. The lament is that it took five years after the report was made for the present government to get around to doing anything. As I say, I doubt very much that this government would have been acting on it this soon if it had not been for the pressure brought by the introduction of Bill C-13 by the previous government.

The recommendations of the study were not the only source of ideas telling the government that it should now act and correct things. The Standing Committee on Public Accounts as long ago as 1976, after having reviewed the study, told the House of Commons in its report:

After careful examination of the study and having been assured by the Auditor General that the measures being proposed are sound and in accordance with current accounting standards and principles, your committee hereby endorses the 41 recommendations contained in the Study of the Accounts of Canada.

Your committee therefore recommends that the Treasury Board should implement these recommendations as soon as it is technically possible to do so.

I do not think that it would take four years before it would be technically possible to put these recommendations into effect. I have read three of the recommendations from the study, and I think that it is significant that there are actually 41 such recommendations. The fact that nothing happened as a result of those 41 recommendations as far as this bill is concerned, is also significant.

We had in the meantime other recommendations in connection with the form and content of estimates, because members of the House, particularly those with some business experience or accounting knowledge—knowledge which we badly need in this House—would try to compare the estimates as they were prepared with the Public Accounts produced at the end of the fiscal year. As is still largely the case, there was no comparison possible between the projected expenditures and the actual presentation of the expenditures which is made after the fact. The debate went on, and in 1978 the public accounts committee was again moved to observe, after reviewing the reservations of the Auditor General on the 1978 Public Accounts:

Your committee again recommends that legislative action be taken as soon as possible to delete from the Accounts of Canada the assets and liabilities identified in Notes 5 and 7 to the audited financial statements and to prevent similar balances from recurring in future years.

Notes 5 and 7 in the Public Accounts in 1978 should also be quoted for the benefit of the House. Note 5 to the audited financial statements of the Government of Canada on page 21 of the Public Accounts reads:

The loans described below are likely to require parliamentary appropriations for write-off in subsequent years; until such appropriations are obtained, the assets are overstated by the following amounts:

I do not think I need to go into the details, but the total of the amounts in that note of the financial statements is $384 million. I think all of them have been dealt with by the President of the Treasury Board tonight, but again I would make the point that this is 1980, not 1976, 1977 or 1978.

Note 7 in the 1978 financial statement had this to say:

Certain accounts reported as assets and liabilities do not meet the definitions stated in——the notes, the definition of which I read earlier. Note 7 goes on:

However these accounts will continue to be reported on the Statement of Assets and Liabilities until such time as parliamentary authority is obtained to delete them.

Accounts internal to the government reported as assets, represented deferred expenditures chargeable to subsequent years, in accordance with legislation, regulations or established practice. Those reported as liabilities represent spending authority carried forward to future years.

The balance of these accounts in the Statement of Assets and Liabilities as at March 31—

That is March 31, 1978. Note 7 goes on:

—have the effect of overstating the assets and liabilities by the following amounts:

Again, to avoid the detail, the total overstatement of assets is $3,097 million, over $3 billion, whereas the overstatement of liabilities is a mere $52 million. Those are notes to the financial statements contained in the Public Accounts of Canada. The House would probably be interested to know what the Auditor General had to say on the financial statements of the Government of Canada. In giving his opinion on the financial statements of the Government of Canada for the fiscal year 1977-78, the Auditor General stated:

I have the following reservations concerning certain of the stated accounting policies of the Government of Canada which, in my opinion, affect the fairness of the information presented in the financial statements. I have commented on the matters described in these reservations in previous Reports to the House of Commons.

The Auditor General was saying back in 1978 that this was not the first time he had mentioned these reservations. He went on to say:

Adjustment of Accounts Act

As a result of the inclusion of certain balances identified in Notes 5 and 7 to the financial statements and designated for deletion from the accounts, assets and liabilities are overstated by $3,481 million and $52 million respectively.

There is an allowance for losses on the realization of assets of $546 million. However, this is a general allowance against all classes of assets. I do not think that we need to go into detail on these reservations.

The Auditor General's second reservation was with regard to Crown corporations and how they are excluded from the accounting entity of the Government of Canada. His third reservation was also with regard to Crown corporations which have a history of deficits and lack sufficient revenues to repay their indebtedness to Canada. I will be dealing with those matters in a few minutes, so I will leave them for the moment.

I should now like to refer to the Auditor General's statement of 1979 because things had changed a little bit by then. The Auditor General in giving his opinion in 1979 said in part:

—The recorded value of special assistance loans to developing countries and subscriptions to international development associations, amounting to $2,977 million, is questionable since, by their terms these loans and subscriptions have characteristics of grants or contributions. These loans and subscriptions are recorded at cost in accordance with Note 1 . . . ; whereas grants and contributions are recorded as budgetary expenditure.

There were sufficient warnings all the way along for the government of the day to bring in a bill of this sort, but for whatever reasons governments use to pad their own way, these arguments or warning signs were not heeded. I would like to make reference at this point to the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability, which is commonly known as the Lambert commission. This commission supported the recommendations of the study of the accounts of Canada when that report was tabled in March, 1979, and in addition to the support of the recommendations of the study, it contained some 165 recommendations. Surely that number was large enough and serious enough that the government could have felt it should act.

After all these statements, the House may be asking what the problems really are, why it is important to have this bill, why all these alarms were sounded and why they were not heeded. I should like to use two examples to illustrate the problem, Mr. Speaker. The first is the $650 million that was paid into the airport revolving fund some time ago. Apparently the Auditor General believes that that amount will never be repaid. In this instance we had the government regarding an expenditure on the books as an asset. That money was gone from the treasury. It was used in the airport revolving fund where it was needed in order to operate the airports, but the government showed it as an asset, all the while knowing it was not going to get it back.

The other example concerns the roughly $2.600 million advances to the unemployment insurance fund and recorded as accounts receivable or assets, and not recorded as expenses until later years. The government may claim that it did not think it was necessary to act so quickly, but there is a precedent. I would refer hon. members to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. In the publication "Public Accounts of Canada 1978", volume III, page 148, paragraph 4, referring to the year ended March 31, 1978, there appears the following statement:

On April 1, 1977, loans from Canada of $624,950,000 were converted to equity by parliamentary appropriation.

With a flick of a pen the government can change a $625 million liability into an equity or into an expenditure! Later in the same paragraph appears the following:

Effective April 1, 1977, further accrual of interest on the deferred interest was cancelled by the governor in council.

In addition the Authority has also offset $120,986,136 of contributed capital against deficits incurred prior to March 31, 1978. It is also the intention of the Authority to seek approval from Parliament to have the remaining deferred interest payable cancelled and reversed.

To my knowledge, that step has not been taken, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the House wants to put its hands in its pockets in order to protect itself. Perhaps the President of the Treasury Board will seek that change before too many months pass.

The remaining part of the problem, as I see it, and something which the government still has to correct, is the nearly $3 billion of special assistance loans to developing countries and subscriptions to international development associations. In his 1979 report the Auditor General said that these loans were of questionable value since, by their terms, they have the characteristics of grants or contributions. They are not dealt with by the bill we are now considering but will have to be considered before too many months go by.

Since the government has now come clean and is willing to make these adjustments and have a balance sheet that will more fairly present the affairs of Canada at the end of any fiscal year, the House must now consider if the government will have the strength to stop using the old schemes to hide government spending, or if we will have another similar adjustment in a few years time. I do not expect the present President of the Treasury Board will be around at the time when this might happen. I think the House and the people of Canada can take solace from the fact that we have an effective watchdog, however, in the person of the Auditor General, and that we have a new watchdog before the fact, we hope, in the person of the Comptroller General of Canada, and of course there is always the long-term watchdog, the Public Accounts Committee which I am very happy to chair. That body will be watching out for the President of the Treasury Board if he wants to make any of these other adjustments.

There is another aspect of the accounts of Canada which I would urge the President of the Treasury Board to look at, Mr. Speaker, and I consider this aspect to be a serious problem. I refer to contingent liabilities which are not dealt with in Bill C-22. To be fair, they were not dealt with in Bill C-13 either, but for a new government Bill C-13 was a major step. I would urge the President of the Treasury Board to get after these contingent liabilities.

To illustrate the seriousness of the problem I would refer the House to "Public Accounts of Canada 1979", volume I, page 2:13. Paragraph four states as follows:

In addition to the financial obligations set out in the statement of assets and liabilities, there are contingent liabilities . . . These include borrowings by Crown corporations which are agents of the government. These borrowings are a direct charge against the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The total of these contingency liabilities is $28.5 billion, almost half the total expenditures of the government in a given fiscal year. Two and one half billion dollars is for borrowings by Crown corporations which are agents of the government; $500 million is guarantees of principal and interest of Crown corporations which are not agents of the government, and $25.5 billion is for other outstanding guarantees and contingent liabilities. No business that I know of, Mr. Speaker, could tolerate contingent liabilities of that size without making some further disclosure than is being made now by the government.

There are other Crown corporations which I have not dealt with in the foregoing comments. They are Crown corporations which borrow on their own. The corporations themselves would raise funds on capital markets. But funds so raised do not require a parliamentary appropriation. Funds so raised are not classified as government spending, and do not affect the federal cash requirement. These corporations have moved off the books of the federal government, and some of their borrowing no longer appears on federal accounts. I think that Petro-Canada would be one such corporation and the Export Development Corporation would probably be another. In any event, these corporations can borrow on their own in the capital markets.

Independent borrowings by these Crown corporations create considerable confusion in federal accounts. First, if they raise some funds through a parliamentary appropriation and some independently, then some appears on the federal accounts and some does not. This is hardly a coherent approach to accounting as both amounts were borrowed by a government-owned entity. Second, as the government guarantees the independent borrowing of the corporation, the government is liable to repay the full sum in the event of a default. Independent borrowings of Crown corporations are contingent liabilities of the federal government. The amounts are off the main books, but the ultimate responsibility for repayment rests with the government nonetheless. That is probably as much as I want to say on this subject at the moment.

There is one other area of contingent liability which has not been brought up in anything that has come before us today, or in anything that I have said up till now. In the "Public Accounts of Canada 1979" there is reference to unfunded pension liabilities. In volume I, at page 7.7, under the heading "Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account", there appears the following:

This account was established by the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act to provide for the payment of increased pension benefits resulting from indexation. No actuarial valuations are required to be made of the account. The chief actuary of the Department of Insurance has estimated that, if principles of actuarial funding were to be applied to the extent of determining the future cost of the benefits being paid to annuitants of the Public Service, Canadian Forces and Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation accounts as at March 31, 1979, an additional $2.6 billion would have to be credited to the account to reflect the present value of those benefits as at that date.

We are hearing a lot more about unfunded liabilities, especially in connection with pension funds. I say to the President of the Treasury Board, and his colleagues in government, that there are a good many more problems that he has not yet faced. Bill C-22 is a good step forward on the way we have to go, but as the President of the Treasury Board very well knows, as a past chairman of the public accounts committee, to borrow an expression that his leader used, he has a long way to travel before he rests and before the public accounts of Canada are in the state we think they should be.

We are looking forward to a short debate on this bill because we have been waiting for it for some time. I believe there will only be one more speaker from my party. We on this side have accepted with pleasure the suggestion of the government House leader that this bill be referred to Committee of the Whole. All members of the public accounts committee and the President of the Treasury Board well know that we have enough to do to keep ourselves occupied in the public accounts committee studying the report of the Auditor General, which is under permanent reference of the House to us, and the public accounts themselves. We do not need to have this bill referred to that committee for a lengthy study.

The minister has supplied me with some amendments that he is going to propose during the committee stage. I will take the intervening moments before we get to Committee of the Whole stage to look at these motions. We look forward to getting on with the job, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening as the Treasury Board critic for the New Democratic Party to comment on Bill C-22, an act to amend the accounts of Canada and make related amendments to certain acts. I was happy to hear the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), who is chairman of the public accounts committee of which I am a member, say that the bill which we are being asked to give second reading and hopefully third reading to this evening, is the same bill the Conservatives brought in a few short months ago. It exemplifies again that there is absolutely no difference between the Conservative party and the Liberal party.

An hon. Member: We brought the bill forward.

Mr. Anguish: They brought the bill forward. However, the people of Canada chose not to accept many of the other falsehoods presented by the Conservative party which led to their defeat at the polls on February 19.

An hon. Member: February 18.

Mr. Anguish: Although the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) can take a great deal of credit for this bill being introduced, and I commend him and his parliamentary secretary on that, the credit should not go to the Liberal party, because they have had years and years to bring in this bill to amend the public accounts of Canada to reflect fairly the spending position of the government. Certainly the credit goes somewhat to the Conservatives. Unfortunately, there were not too many other things they did that were acceptable to the people of Canada. I could go on with this, but it would not be addressing the bill. We will deal with that on another occasion.

I would like to describe a certain situation that this bill will overcome. I am not quite as eloquent in terms of generally accepted accounting principles as the previous speaker, but I think I have a fair grasp of the situation as to what this bill will do. As I mentioned, certain expenditures that are made by the federal government are not reflected as expenditures or spending. They are actually reflected as assets of the government.

Something I have talked about before in this House is that the federal spending deficit of the government for fiscal year 1978-79 was $16.185 billion. When I asked the President of the Treasury Board about this in the public accounts committee he said that is what it says but it is not really a true picture of what is happening within government. He said our deficit is not really $16.185 billion, it is actually less than that because we have an extraordinary spending item in there. That was an amount in excess of $4 billion that was a write-off of what the government had considered as loans to different government agencies and departments over previous years. Therefore, from years dating back possibly as far as a decade, maybe back to 1969, the public accounts did not fairly reflect the question of this government's spending. The actual liabilities were understated. Now, in the 1978-79 accounts, this had to catch up. It finally had to be reported.

This could not be hidden under the table any longer by the Liberal administration and the very short tenure of the Conservative government, which actually wanted to do something about it. Finally, an extraordinary item appeared on spending in excess of $4 billion. Although that $16.185 billion did not fairly reflect the spending of the government in the fiscal year 1978-79, it certainly reflected the spending of the government in other areas. It was not reported as spending, but as assets of the government.

I wish to go into some of the background as to the reasons why the Liberal party cannot be given credit for introduction of this bill at this time, although as I mentioned, we do respect the fact that the President of the Treasury Board has taken the initiative, along with his parliamentary secretary, to bring this bill before us.

It goes back, according to the admission of the President of the Treasury Board, as far as 1973, when there was a study of the accounts of Canada. At that time they were starting to look at ways of making government spending more accountable to Parliament and, through Parliament, more accountable to the people of Canada. After that study, nothing seemed to happen. There seemed to be a void for a few years until a report came down on October 7, 1975, on the study of the accounts of Canada, some two years later.

In 1976, or maybe even earlier than that, the public accounts committee reaffirmed that the government had to be more accountable to Parliament and parliamentarians in terms of the money they spend, and that the public accounts should fairly and justly reflect the financial position of the government. Still nothing happened until 1976.

Then there was the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability. Their findings were reinforced by the Auditor General, or maybe I should say affirmed the findings of the Auditor General. After they substantiated the claims of the Auditor General, the Auditor General reaffirmed his position in the fact that the spending of the government was totally out of control, that the spending of the Government of Canada was not accountable to Parliament and, therefore, the Canadian people were not being given a fair picture as to what was the financial situation of the government. As I mentioned, we do not feel that the Liberals should be given credit for this bill, although we, as the New Democratic Party, very much agree with the position and intent of this bill.

The bill, as I mentioned, will do two main things as we understand it. Certain expenditures will now be regarded as spending rather than as assets of the government. Second, and most important, the bill will help make government spending more accountable to Parliament. Although we support this measure and hope to see it pass this evening, we think the process of making the government more accountable for expenditure should not stop with Bill C-22. We think it should go on into other areas.

First, we should like to see some changes in the form of the estimates which come before the House so that the information in there is more usable by members of Parliament, enabling them to translate to their constituents and to the press a fair assessment of where the government stands. Second, we would like to see a freedom of information bill passed as set out in the Speech from the Throne, and, in that connection, to have open scrutiny of departments of government by members of Parliament so that again they can reflect to their constituents the true position of the government not only as to spending patterns but as to the effectiveness and efficiency of management in running programs for the Canadian people. Third, it is important the government take prompt action on the many recommendations of the Lambert commission and the D'Avignon report which it also talked about in the Speech from the Throne. We in the New Democratic Party will ensure that they follow this through and introduce many of the important recommendations made in those two reports.

Before ceasing what I have to say on Bill C-22 I should like to commend the government for taking action on setting up the office of the Comptroller General headed by Mr. Rogers, especially in the area of the impact program where they take specific departments of government and carry out an analysis or critique of those departments and actually study what the problems are. The second stage of those impact studies is to develop an action plan between responsible people in the Comptroller General's office and people in the department being studied. Then they come up with their action plan and implement whatever is arrived at, through a consensus of the Comptroller General's office and the department being studied. This does a great service to members of Parliament. Critics in certain areas for which they are responsible can obtain concrete direction as to the problems identified in the study. They can look at the action plan which has been set out and determine whether or not the procedure is having the desired effect, so members can do a good analysis of departments which have partaken in the impact study.

The second thing on which I should like to commend the government concerns the office of the Auditor General. I should like to rephrase that. I do not want to commend the government but to commend the Auditor General and his office in the area of the comprehensive audit which has taken place over the last two fiscal years where they carry out an analysis of a certain number of departments. They certainly do not have the manpower to do all the departments of government in one year but I believe they have examined six departments each year for the past two years, for a total of 12 departments. This comprehensive audit provides members of Parliament with information on the basis of which they can look at these departments to see whether they are efficient, accountable to the public, and serving the wishes of the Canadian people.

I will conclude by asking the government to cease blaming the public employees as they have so often done—the public employees who are bashed by members of the Tory party for much of the incompetence which occurs within government. It is quite easy to bash public employees, but really the blame does not rest with public employees in many of the areas where the government has fallen down in accountability and the effectiveness of delivery of programs. The real problem arises from incompetent politicians and poor management. I think this has been reconfirmed by the Auditor General in his last report.

The 1978-79 Report of the Auditor General was quite hard-hitting, asserting that management had lost control of government spending. These other things I mentioned, such as accountability, tie into that issue of poor management although the press did not report it as such—the press seemed to pick up the fact that it was the public employees who were inefficient, and for a while the Conservatives jumped on the band wagon trying to protect the public employees they bash on other occasions when it is more convenient to do so. Mr. Macdonell definitely points out there, and he has admitted in the public accounts committee, that it is not the public employees who are to blame, it is the government and poor management which guides them.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my concern that the Conservatives allow this bill to go on to Committee of the Whole this evening so that we can proceed with these long needed changes to the Public Accounts of Canada. I hope the next speaker from the Conservative party will not be carried away with the exuberance of his own verbosity and that we can get on with passing this needed legislation.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I promise the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) that I shall not be carried away by my own verbosity.

I do not know that it is significant to determine who should take credit for what is presented in this House as long as the end product is in the best interests of the public. Accordingly, the hon. member will not find me discussing who should take credit for bringing the bill forward. I hope this same attitude might prevail among members to my extreme left so that in the future, when bills are presented in the House, some regard might be paid to the merits rather than to verbose political rhetoric.

I do not intend to review the detailed analysis which has been so ably made of the consequences of this proposed legislation by my hon. friend from Vancouver Quadra. I will merely point out that as a consequence of the passage of this legislation, through the deletion of assets which were fictitious in nature, the net debt of the Government of Canada will increase, and increase substantially. As a matter of fact, it will increase by the amount of $4.478 billion.

It is my intention to deal with just one of the single items contained in the bill, that is, the item covered in clause 7 which relates to the aggregate amount of principal and interest oustanding as of March 31, 1981, in respect of loans made to the CBC. These loans were made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by Her Majesty pursuant to authority set out in schedule V. They are written off and deleted from the accounts of Canada and, in the words of the clause, any obligation of the Corporation to repay the principal and pay the interest is terminated. Clause 5 contains a rather lengthy list of loans made to the corporation, commencing with the first advance in June of 1964 and ending with the advance of March 19, 1974.

I was initially somewhat concerned about the prospect of writing off loans for a period which had not as yet expired. I think we are only saved by the filing of the schedules which, without an examination of the specific orders in council giving rise to those loans, I would presume were not open-ended, so that many hundreds of millions of dollars might yet be advanced and written off before the money actually reaches the treasury of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But it is interesting from an examination of the Public Accounts of Canada, 1979, at page 2.13, to examine the exact amount of the CBC write-off. It is in the amount of $198 million, which is not an insignificant amount by any means.

In determining whether write-offs of loans and obligations of Crown corporations and others as assets of the Government of Canada should be eliminated as assets, this House should ask itself whether it is appropriate to do so. I am not going to deal with the other specific issues and amounts which are covered in Bill C-22 but, rather, with this one only.

I think it is appropriate, accordingly, to ask the question: is it being written off—and I refer to the amount of $198 million—because the CBC is unable to pay the loan? The answer to that, unfortunately, I do not know, and I hope with a proper opportunity in the committees upon which I serve that we may determine exactly how the CBC manages to have accumulated a debt which, it hopes, will not be paid and at the same time run up an annual debt paid for by the taxpayers of Canada in the neighbourhood, certainly in 1979, of $450 million, an amount almost equivalent to half a billion dollars, at a time when a private enterprise competitor, without the advantage of having all CBC's equipment and its capital assets paid for and acquired at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada, is able not only to operate but also to operate without having that outstretched hand which is constantly being filled on an annual basis by the taxpayers of this country through the generosity of the Government of Canada.

I am inclined to question whether it might not be appropriate if we deferred a determination as to whether or not this amount should be written off and perhaps applied it either in whole or in part against the annual funds which are deposited to the credit of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Why would we take a position of that kind in this House with respect to this creature of the Government of Canada? Aside from the general observations which I made earlier to the effect that a competitor of this Crown corporation not only functions, but also functions profitably without requesting funds from this or former or future Governments of Canada and, not as a consequence of the fact that we are asking the privately-owned television network in Canada in fact to subscribe through its taxes to the well-being of its competitor, but because of the way in which that Crown corporation may well have failed to meet its obligations to the people of Canada, one might ask in the course of this examination how well the CBC has performed. The answer, in a word, might be badly, and I am charitable in using that word.

In 1979 the CRTC, in its endeavour to analyse the functioning of that jewel of Crown corporations, concluded that it had really failed dismally to meet its obligations to the public, and as a consequence of that CRTC analysis, an article appeared in one of the Toronto newspapers of March 15, 1979, making the following observations:

> The CRTC has discovered what every person who owns a TV set has known for years—that CBC-TV is doing a rotten job in appealing to Canadians.
>
> Given a choice, most Canadians prefer to watch American or private broadcasting. A CRTC report notes that in ten years between 1967 and 1976 the CBC and its affiliates lost 33 per cent of their audience while the private stations rose by almost 20 per cent. Can there be a greater indictment of CBC quality than the reality that it cannot stand competition and that citizens prefer foreign programming to domestic?
> In over-all percentages CBC-TV has 22.5 per cent of the viewing market against 52.3 per cent for private stations. The rest watch foreign stations. CBC is last in its own country!
> Yet the CBC, even now, refuses to acknowledge that it is horrendously costly, hugely wasteful, impossibly bureaucratic and, most damning, hopelessly dull, dull, dull!

Has it improved since then? I submit that it has not. In 1979 it cost every Canadian man, woman and child $22 to float the CBC. That was in 1979. However, because only 22.5 per cent actually use the service—and I am talking about the television service as opposed to the radio service—the cost was more in the neighbourhood of $90 per man, woman and child using that service, as opposed to nothing for those who watch the private broadcasting network in Canada.

Miss Jewett: What a laugh.

Mr. Gamble: As to performance, we are led to believe that this great public institution is the protector of the growth and development of the artistic community in Canada, and yet it was not but two years ago that CBC had a strike on its hands when staff and performers at the CBC rebelled at the fact that the CBC was hiring outside, foreign actors to perform.

In 1978 the CBC was accused by a former news broadcaster who said that the news was manipulated and that the CBC management was intimidated by the Prime Minister's office both in terms of covering events that management originally had decided to avoid and in terms of special coverage that the Prime Minister of the day desired to have filmed and broadcast.

However, one of the most heinous acts that the public broadcasting system has committed is with respect to the programming of a series referred to as "Connections". That series depicted the rather strange link between Canadians of Italian ancestry and organized crime in Canada. There was no doubt left in the minds of viewers, as they watched program after program in that series, that an Italian name should be linked somewhat with organized crime, to the effect that as a consequence of the uproar which occurred in the Italian-Canadian community and a specific protest which was lodged by Senator Peter Bosa, the office of the secretary of state commissioned a poll to determine whether watching that series had in fact influenced the decision-making process of the viewer in terms of the association between organized crime and Canadians of Italian heritage.

The conclusion of the poll, commissioned by the then secretary of state and performed by the Gallup organization, was to the effect that a full 40 per cent of those people who had seen the series believed that it was more likely that Italian-Canadians would be associated with organized crime than other groups in Canada, whereas of the group which had not watched the series the percentage was markedly lower, in the range of 25 per cent.

Mr. Anguish: Tories.

● (2120)

Mr. Gamble: Is it not strange that a serious matter of this nature, affecting the well-being of Canadians of a particular ethnic background, should be dealt with in this fashion by members of the NDP? I would have sincerely thought that serious matters dealing with the rights of all Canadians would be regarded by them in the same fashion that they are by other members in the House. But it appears I am not correct.

In the concluding paragraph of a press release, Senator Peter Bosa, on July 13, 1979, made the following plea:

> It is my belief that the media has an obligation to correct this false sterotype of the Italian-Canadian community that it has portrayed. Similarly, Italian-Canadians have a major undertaking ahead to bring to the attention of other Canadians the many significant contributions they have made throughout history from the discovery of this country by Giovanni Caboto to the present day.

He took that plea to the president of the CBC, Al Johnson, and of course received nothing in the way of the kind of programming that was required to rectify the horrible impression that had been fixed in the minds of some as a consequence of irresponsible programming by the network owned by the Government of Canada.

I communicated with Senator Peter Bosa upon receiving that press release of his, and I suggested to him that it would be most appropriate for the CBC to stage a series of programs dealing with the substantial contribution that had been made to Canadian life by Canadians of Italian heritage.

Perhaps the greatest injustice that has been perpetrated on the whole nation, however, arose recently in connection with the position taken by the CBC as it dealt with the referendum debate in the province of Quebec, and this matter of course has occupied the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) who recognized fully that in the course of balanced broadcasting it is not appropriate to balance one's judgment of the well-being of Canada against a desire to help a force which has, as its prime motive, the destruction of the entire nation, and yet that is exactly what occurred.

On April 13, 1980, Al Johnson, the president of the CBC, had occasion to make a speech to the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association. He was questioned about the odd situation that seemed to prevail in connection with the delivery of certain material within the province of Quebec disclosing some of the merits of separation from this nation as advocated by a government in that province dedicated to that separation. He said:

It is not for us in the CBC to use our position as the nation's broadcaster to seek to tilt the balance in the solemn decision Quebeckers are being called upon to make . . . so as ourselves to influence the results of the referendum, or so as ourselves to permit an undue influence to be brought to hear through the use of the airwaves entrusted to us.

What the short-minded president of the CBC has failed to do is to recognize that under the Broadcasting Act of 1968 the CBC has an obligation to provide a continuing expression of Canadian identity and to contribute to the development of national unity. How one does that by, at the same time, promoting separatism, is something that is completely beyond me.

I believe that further grants to this Crown corporation should be given the closest scrutiny in the House and that unless the CBC can in fact adhere to its mandate and speak as the national body for the benefit of all Canadians, it should cease to enjoy its privileged place in Canadian society.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Prior to your putting the question, I wonder if I might advise you, sir, and seek the consent of the House, that once the question is put the House then go to Committee of the Whole. It is my understanding that there has been some understanding among all members of the House to this effect. So I would ask that you seek that consent and that, following the question, the House go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Francis in the chair.

Clauses 2 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 32—

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to clause 32, which reads as follows:

That clause 32 be amended by adding thereto, immediately following line 44 on page 15, the following clause:

"All expenditures made under sections 22 to 31 and all revenues spent under those sections shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the Treasury Board may specify."

● (2130)

This motion to add a new clause 32 is required to provide greater certainty that all authorizations for the revolving fund are subject to any terms and conditions which may be approved by Treasury Board. Most legal advisers and other financial experts consider that the Treasury Board may already have this authority under section 5 of the Financial Administration Act. However, in past years some appropriation acts contained the specific phrase "subject to the terms and conditions as prescribed by the Treasury Board", while others did not contain that wording. It is in order to add clarity and to eliminate the possibility of uncertainty that we are making this particular amendment.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the parliamentary secretary and his explanation of the need for this amendment, but I wanted to ask the minister if he could explain. I understand the expenditures made, but how can revenues be spent under the same amendment when we are having expenditures made and revenues spent? I mean, it sounds like a fiddle, and I want to know if the President of the Treasury Board could explain that.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the explanation is that under a revolving fund, as the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra knows, revenues can be earned within the fund. That accounts for the two terms being used—expenditures made under the fund and revenues spent, which are revenues earned within the fund and then spent.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 32, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 32 as amended agreed to.

Mr. Daudlin: Following on that amendment, I move:

That Bill C-22 be amended by renumbering clauses 32 and 33 as clauses 33 and 34 respectively.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 33 agreed to.

On clause 34—

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, again I should like to call on the President of the Treasury Board to explain the need for the various dates of coming into force of the act.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the write-offs which we have discussed will be effective as of March 31, 1981, but the revolving funds which are provided for come into effect as of April 1, 1980. That accounts for the difference in dates with respect to the coming into force of the various provisions of the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 34 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 34 agreed to.

Schedule I agreed to.

On schedule II—

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That Bill C-22 be amended in item 3 of schedule II in column II thereof on page 24 by adding, immediately after "L26a Energy, Mines and Resources No. 3, 1978-79 Schedule", the following:

"L42a Energy, Mines and Resources No. 1, 1980-81 D".

Also I have a second amendment to schedule II that I would like to put. I move:

That Bill C-22 be amended in item 9 of schedule II in column II therof on page 25 by adding, immediately after "L31b Transport No. 4, 1974 Schedule", the following:

"L66a Transport No. 1, 1980-81 D."

These two amendments are required in order that votes which were included in supplementary estimates but were not approved until May 16 could be included inasmuch as this bill was introduced at a later date.

Amendments (Mr. Daudlin) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall schedule II as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Schedule II as amended agreed to.

Schedules III to VI inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

On clause 1—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise for only a minute before we conclude committee consideration of this bill. I noticed with interest that the hon. member for York North at second reading stage took the occasion of this bill to indulge in a bit of CBC bashing, which is something that happens around here from time to time. I do not intend to take his attack so seriously that I would launch into a full dress speech, but I should like to give one example to make the point that the CBC is not always bad.

A few weeks ago the House gave unanimous endorsation to a motion that I sought to move under Standing Order 43 which asked the CBC to make a certain change in its nightly news broadcast over television. I suggested that we from the west found it a bit awkward that the section "Across Canada" always started from the east and worked across to the west, and I suggested that the House ask the CBC to vary that, once in awhile, by starting from the west, sometimes from the prairies and sometimes from the north. I rise to remind hon. members, and I am sure they have all seen it, that one of the things we enjoy every night now is wondering where the "Across Canada" segment will start. In other words, at least on this occasion the CBC did pay attention to a constructive and respectful suggestion which was made by this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the bill, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I rise and report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: By leave now.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA ACT

RELOCATION OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, July 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-13, respecting the relocation of government agencies, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill but I would not want to disappoint those who want to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not know whether my colleague really wants to call it ten o'clock. He does not have to speak on the bill. We can call for the question. If he prefers we can call it ten o'clock, but we still have 15 minutes to go. He does not have to speak on the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Actually, Mr. Speaker, I was holding the fort for a moment until the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) arrived, since he was speaking on this bill the last time it was before us. Perhaps he would like to continue.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), as well as the officers of the House who were kind enough to warn me that this matter would be coming on. I am exceedingly grateful to them.

As we all know, this bill deals with the relocation which has taken place. Yesterday I spoke in the House indicating to the government the problems which had arisen as a result of the relocation handled rather hastily and without consultation at the same time that decentralization was taking place. As a result a great deal of distress occurred in the national capital area. The present member who occupies the chair, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), was involved in that and I quoted extensively from a booklet he sent to his constituents in 1977. I think it summed up the chagrin, anger and frustration as a result of this lack of consultation.

I did what I had to do in respect of the bill the last time I spoke. I want to speak now in respect of certain other matters which are important for us in this area as we consider what ought to be the appropriate relationship between the federal and local governments.

The situation in the national capital is this. Whether a Liberal or a Conservative government is in power there will be a tendency on the part of both, not to regard the public service as a place of ever-increasing opportunity for employment for the people who live in the national capital. I can tell you now, as a result of what has been said to me by people who have come to my office, that this is being felt. It is felt that the commitment of both the government and the official opposition has been and will be that the growth in the public service cannot be an untrammelled growth such as we enjoyed in the early 1970s. That is the position.

What that indicates to me is that if that is the attitude being expressed in this area by the single largest employer of people in the national capital area, then that single largest employer has a joint and mutual responsibility with other governments in the area to decide how we will, if we can, create a new kind of opportunity here. If the opportunity is not to be in government then it has to be in the private sector. If it is to be in the private sector then I think there is potential for growth in this area worthy of the best possible attitude of co-operation between the national government and local governments.

One of these areas, Mr. Speaker, is in the high technology field. I do not know whether the tremendous growth that has taken place in the high technology industry in this area has come to the attention of hon. members who do not have the privilege of living here, except temporarily. That growth is almost unbelievable and it has taken place at a time when the whole electronic field is perhaps pointing the way to a whole new era of opportunity for prosperity in the country. It is fortunate we have here in this area a high technology industry which can serve not just the country but the world. I believe there is potential here for co-operation between governments, federal, municipal and provincial, for the development of that technology and that industry. This industry has grown tremendously by itself without any of the nurturing which could take place.

One of the things that has marked the growth of the national capital area is the foresight many years ago of the planners who looked at the area and decided that if it was to develop into something distinctly and uniquely Canadian there had to be a long-range plan developed. That long-range plan for us in terms of land development and the development of communities was the Greber plan.

The development of Ottawa, the national capital area and the Gatineau park, that kind of thing which has occurred on both sides of the Ottawa River, occurred as a result of foresight of the government of W. L. Mackenzie King which retained the services of Greber and laid out a plan which has been followed, more or less. As a result, we have a uniquely beautiful capital.

If we in the national capital area intend to realize the kinds of benefits from high technology which we have realized in terms of land, that kind of long-range planning must take place. We must move in the direction of a Greber type of plan to develop the high technology industry. The potential is there for this area and for the country. Certainly in terms of this area, in terms of an alternate source of employment, an alternate source of tax revenue and an alternate source of wealth for this area and for the country, the potential is here.

I would like to see this government or another government some time soon take this matter in hand and decide that it is worth while to commence that long-range planning with respect to the development of high technology. We must begin to plan ahead in terms of the kinds of education we will give our young people. I hope that the select committee on the employment problems we face in the 1980s will have something to say on that matter. I am sure that hon. members can imagine the work which could be generated here for bricklayers, plumbers and other tradesmen, work which is badly needed in the development of the plant and the installing of the equipment, aside from the long-range markets.

This kind of planning is necessary to this area, and I do not believe that it would take very much effort. The electronic industry has said that for a small amount of money, $250,000, we could begin in the national capital area, on the basis of co-operation between all levels of government, that kind of long-range planning which would be good for this country in terms of its industry, good for the relationship of Canada to the world, because it is in this high technology field that we have been able to compete successfully with the Japanese and other industrial giants whom we regard as formidable adversaries in the world of trade. That opportunity is there for us.

Coupled with new kinds of development, we must consider whether it is appropriate now that the national capital of this country be connected directly to only one city in the United States, our largest trading partner. We are connected by an American airline, not a Canadian airline, with the city of Washington. When one speaks to people in the Commercial and Industrial Development Corporation and municipal Councillors in this area with respect to the kinds of air connections that are required, they say that if we intend to attract new industry, development and business to the national capital area, we must develop direct connections with Chicago, New York and Boston, to start with. Those are the kinds of air connections which are important.

The federal government has within its power and within the scope of its jurisdiction the authority to consider the creation of such air connections. There are businesses which are looking for places in Canada to set up, and they are looking at the area of the national capital. The key to these businesses coming here is quick and easy access to the United States. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne), the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) and the Minister of State (Mr. Lumley) are all here tonight, and I ask them to speak to their colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), and ask him to consider this proposal.

It is important that we have this development. I have not asked very many questions in the House of Commons on this matter because I am hopeful that the development will take place. It is important to the people of this area that sometime soon there will be an announcement made by the government with respect to the development of the convention centre here in Ottawa. It is extremely important that Ottawa have the ability to attract national and international groups, not only of the non-industrial type, but groups in the business sector. Such a development would give the ability to create in this capital of ours a window on the world in terms of international trade.

Naturally, such a development is important in terms of the jobs which it would create because of what occurred by relocation to Hull. There was a massive infusion of tradesmen and material into that area. Business was pumped up, but when the development was finished, it all fell down. As a result, the construction industry in Ottawa is in bad shape, despite the reputation which the area has generally of a relatively prosperous area. It is a prosperous area, but with respect to tradesmen and others who are not employed in government and some forms of business, there has been some difficulty. A convention centre which will put one crane in the air, or possibly two or three cranes, would also incite businessmen to carry out plans to reconstruct and develop and to put their own cranes in the air, all of which will be signals of prosperity.

Finally, I want to speak about the government's direct development in this area. The government is the biggest land owner we have. That is why the municipal grants act which is now in committee is an important statute for the national capital area and for other parts of Canada. As the largest developer and the largest employer, the government has the potential for development in this area. What I have in mind, as I close my speech, concerns the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), who was in the House when I began to speak on this bill yesterday.

I am referring to a proposal which I know is before the Department of National Revenue, of which I had the honour to be minister, and it is for the development of a taxation data centre in this area. It is important to the department. If the colleagues of the Minister of National Revenue would speak to him, he will tell you that the taxation data centre at Confederation Heights is overcrowded. People there are working under conditions which are not conducive to good work. There are limitations in size in terms of the equipment used.

I know that the minister has in hand, at least for the purposes of studying it, a proposal for the development of a taxation centre. The Government of Canada owns a prime piece of real estate in the national capital area, and I refer to the 400-acre parcel at the corner of Baseline Road and Woodroffe Avenue. It is a parcel of land which was to be part of a community program. It was an experimental program which was begun when the hon. Mr. Basford was the minister of state for urban affairs.

The regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton recently approved the concept of a transportation corridor to serve that area. It is an ideal spot for the government to make the commitment which is necessary to keep that piece of property within the public domain. It is a vital piece of property in terms of the westward and southward development and relocation of government installations within this area. I ask the colleagues of the Minister of Revenue and the Minister of Public Works to look very carefully at that particular piece of land. As a potential development, that land is a jewel. It ought not to be frittered away and go out of the public domain. It ought to be used for some public purpose. I suggest that public purpose to the government because it would be important in giving some commitment to the relocation of government services out of the central core and not just to Hull, but to elsewhere in the national capital area.

It is not my intention to hold this bill up any longer. I appreciate the indulgence of the House.

• (2200)

I want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for reserving this place for me in order that I might finish my speech in this debate.

Mr. Knowles: Now may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD—APPLICATION FOR GAS PIPELINE TO NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am here this evening hoping to receive a further assurance from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) or the government that it is truly committed to the construction of a natural gas pipeline to eastern Canada. The minister indicated yesterday that he was interested in this matter, and today, in response to a question by my colleague, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett), he said that it was a preferred option.

I want to remind the government of the specific commitment that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in Halifax on January 25, when he spoke to the Board of Trade. Showing his great concern for the maritimes on that occasion, and talking about the necessity of security of supply of energy, the Prime Minister made certain commitments. I will quote from his speech on that occasion—which is a difficult thing for me to do, but under these circumstances I shall even read from his speech, Mr. Speaker. He said:

> But in order to switch, people must have access to gas. Nowhere is access needed more than in eastern Canada. I am announcing today, as part of our program, that a Liberal government will take immediate action to ensure the full co-operation of all parties in the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec city and the maritimes. The pipeline will have reversible capacity so that maritimers will have the opportunity, both to use western natural gas now and to send offshore gas to central Canada later. Like the railroad in the 1880s, energy pipelines in the 1980s have the potential to be a steel link uniting the nation.

That was six months ago, Mr. Speaker.

The author, Elridge Cleaver, once said that when you "talk the talk you have to walk the walk". Much as I should like to see the Prime Minister take a walk, I will settle for him laying some pipe to the maritimes as he promised he would.

There are any number of reasons why the maritimes need a pipeline. We need the security of supply that the Prime Minister mentioned in his commitment; it would provide an additional energy source at lower cost to consumers; employment and general economic benefits which include benefits to an area of Quebec downstream of Quebec City; enable the development or production of the gas that might be found off Prince Edward Island and, most important, it would allow the Arctic liquid natural gas to land at Canso which is technically by far the best port for Arctic LNG.

The maritime provinces are heavily dependent on foreign imported oil, not only for home heating and use by industry, but also for thermal power generation. Large quantities of this oil are supplied from the Middle East, where current political tensions could quite easily erupt, resulting in major disruptions in the imported oil supply.

A gas pipeline would go a long way toward improving the security of the energy supply of the maritimes. Within five years it could be supplying 20 per cent or more of the current oil markets for heating, for industries, and for thermal power generation. Major disruptions in oil supply could be alleviated further by facility additions on the pipeline if there is a pipeline in existence.

The consumers in the Atlantic region will benefit from an additional supply of energy which will be priced to be competitive with foreign oil. For example, in Nova Scotia, in the residential market under the marketing strategy of ICG Scotia Gas Limited, gas would be priced 10 per cent lower than oil prices and 75 per cent to 100 per cent of the costs of converting from oil to natural gas would be paid on behalf of the consumer. The competition and lower prices would result in lower energy costs for the consumers in the maritime provinces.

The National Energy Board, in the "Reasons for Decision" in April, 1980, notes that in New Brunswick the population that the pipeline and laterals would reach would be in excess of 310,000 and in Nova Scotia in excess of 385,000. The following is quoted from page 8-51 of the "Reasons for Decision":

> The Board notes Q & M's policies on local employment and local purchasing and believes that these would afford local residents and businesses ample opportunity to benefit from the project. This could represent a significant positive impact for areas such as the maritimes where unemployment poses a serious economic problem. Of particular interest should be the ongoing jobs created in both the transmission and distribution systems.

It is natural for the province of New Brunswick, for example, to have some concern about the environmental impact of this, but the hon. member for Fundy-Royal pointed out today that the province basically supports this pipeline. In my opinion it would be folly for the province of New Brunswick not to support it.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal also pointed out that the minister of energy, mines and resources stated in this House on December 6 last year that the Atlantic provinces need more natural gas and that the gas pipeline would take gas to homes and industries there. It is very clear that the sponsors will take the initiative, obviously, to ask the NEB to reopen this application. But surely the minister will use his good offices to make this a simple procedure, and not cost millions of dollars, for example, which would be the case if a full-scale hearing had to take place.

Let me conclude by quoting a little poetry, as the Prime Minister did on the night of the election. He quoted Robert Frost. He said that the woods were "lovely, dark and deep," and he had "promises to keep and miles to go before I sleep." I could quote another poet whose name is Robert, Robert Service. In one of his poems about Canada's north, he said that "a promise made is a debt unpaid, and the law has its own stern code."

I remind the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Prime Minister that when you talk about having promises to keep and miles to go before you sleep, you better not fall asleep at the switch on this promise. It is not only in the interests of eastern Canada, but in the interests of the whole country that we have a secure and cheaper source of supply for a vitally needed commodity like natural gas. We are paying out far too much money now to eastern potentates and OPEC nations for oil. The cost is not only escalating, but it is a severe drain on this country's treasury, moneys that could be used for far more pressing needs at home and abroad than to import expensive oil when we could have natural gas of our own.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in responding to the statement by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) on July 2, and on other occasions in this House, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) assured the House that the government considers as a matter of highest priority the completion at an early date of the Q and M Pipe Lines proposal to the martime provinces. In this connection, he noted that he has had two meetings with the promoters of that project, and emphasized that the government is very much interested in seeing the pipeline completed through to the Atlantic coast.

Members will recall the fact that on May 15 of this year, the minister announced the National Energy Board's recommendation that a certificate be issued to TransCanada PipeLines to extend its natural gas transmission system to Quebec City. Steps are now being taken to settle right of way matters so that that project could be commenced early next year providing for an extension of natural gas service as far east as Quebec City. The NEB, however, was not satisfied that the Q and M Pipelines could be constructed and operated in an environmentally acceptable manner until further assessments of an environmental nature were completed by the sponsors.

The Board also was not convinced that full consideration had been given to the impact of east coast offshore oil and gas discoveries on the planning and design of the proposed maritime pipeline extension. Consequently the minister has urged the promoters of the project to complete their environmental studies and other assessments to provide information which would satisfy the NEB so that this project could be got under way as soon as possible. While the government would like to see the Q and M complete the environmental work identified by the Board as soon as possible, to date there has been no decision by the company involved to complete the necessary steps or to file a new application with the NEB.

The hon. member for Central Nova made reference during his statement of July 2 to the possible interest of the province of New Brunswick in this project. That province made known its views on energy supply before the National Energy Board in a hearing on the Q and M project. While it was certainly not opposed to the Q and M project, it was concerned that various energy options for the Atlantic region be considered before a final decision was taken on individual projects. It emphasized the importance of assessing the effects on area employment and economic development in reaching project decisions.

The federal government, of course, must have regard to the views of all governments directly affected in meeting the energy needs of the Atlantic region and this was well expressed by the minister when he addressed the Pipe Line Contractors Association of Canada in Montreal on May 15 of this year. At that time he emphasized that it was critical to choose the most efficient alternative energy sources for Atlantic Canada and that the federal government should proceed with the agreement of the provinces involved.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the government is committed to the reduction of oil dependence in the Atlantic region, and it believes that a gas pipeline affords one of the best approaches to this objective. The government will continue to press for a completion of the pipeline project but, of course, it cannot force the National Energy Board to reopen its application. We can be assured that the NEB will be prepared to deal expeditiously with a new application and, in the meantime, the federal government is continuing with other plans for meeting future energy needs of all areas of the Atlantic region.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT—CALL FOR AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE PROTECTION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION OF DISABLED CITIZENS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, last week in the city of Winnipeg a great event took place, the Rehabilitation International Congress, where 4,000 people gathered from around the world, indeed more than 100 countries, to consider the problems that are endured by disabled people, not only in Canada but throughout the world. It was a great success, I would say, in terms of input from the people in the non-governmental sector, because it was mostly made up of voluntary associations.

● (2210)

One discouraging and disappointing note is that in Canada governments are lagging behind in their attitudes, their programs and in their services to disabled citizens. This, of course, includes the federal government.

We had hoped that in preparation for the great event, the congress, the new social services legislation would have been in place. It had been talked about for many years—I was on the committee which travelled all the way to Tel Aviv in 1976 to make an appeal to bring the congress to Canada, and one of our strong appeals was that Canada was on the verge of making a breakthrough at the government level in programs and legislation for the handicapped. Of course this was not so; the social services legislation has gone down the drain and has been dropped completely.

We had also hoped to have a report from the Special Committee on the Handicapped which was set up last November. That, unfortunately, was delayed by the election, with which we are all quite familiar. As well, we had hoped that the organization committee for the handicapped which will be responsible for organizing the Canadian program for the Year of the Disabled in 1981 would be in place. Indeed, it is now in place—I think the announcement was made today—but this is after the fact.

Perhaps to pinpoint our delinquency in this regard, Mr. Speaker, I should point out that the House of Commons, Parliament Hill, is still not accessible to the handicapped even though we unanimously supported a certain motion a few months ago. If I may make the reference directly to Your Honour, we have, for example, been fighting for the designation of one single lone parking space on Parliament Hill allowing a severely handicapped person to park a car and have immediate access to the House of Commons. This is why I say governments are lagging behind.

● (2215)

But the attitudinal barriers are even greater than the problems of architectural accessibility. Someone has said that a change in law will never be able to rectify the shattering degradation that far too many physically disabled persons suffer. This is why I have been advocating since this new Parliament met that we should proceed immediately to introduce amendments to the Human Rights Act which would provide total protection against discrimination toward our disabled and handicapped citizens. I asked the minister on May 21 if she would proceed immediately to introduce this legislation as an act of good faith. Unfortunately, she replied, as reported in Hansard for that day:

I am aware, as I said, that the hon. member is particularly eager to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect all handicapped from discrimination. That is a matter which we have looked into ourselves in all the departments concerned and which, in turn, the committee will surely want to look into.

The point I wish to make is that we have looked into it. It is not necessary to look into it again, and the committee should not really have it as one of its points of reference because Canada's human rights commissioner himself, in a letter to me on October 29, said in reference to this matter, and I quote from the last paragraph of that letter:

We have evidence of very strong public support for ameliorating discriminatory practices against those who have a physical disability.

Then he added this significant phrase:

I think the time has come.

The former minister of justice, Senator Jacques Flynn, handed on the responsibility to the law officers of the Crown to prepare the drafting of legislation. I understand that this legislation is all ready to be presented to the House of Commons. I hope that in the government's response tonight it will tell us that it is going to bring in the legislation. Everyone wants the legislation. It is drafted, and we certainly want it to be in position before The Year of the Disabled, 1981. If we wait for the report of the committee—the committee now is not going to be able to report until the end of December—it will not be in place for the commencement for The Year of the Disabled.

There are two House leaders here tonight, the House leader for the official opposition and for the New Democratic Party. I am sure I could get their nods if I put the proposal that if the legislation were introduced it would get speedy passage. Let us proceed immediately.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to respond to my good friend, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). In his question he requested the assurance of the Government of Canada that it will proceed with amendments to the Human Rights Act in order to provide full protection for the disabled against discrimination. However, with respect, I point out that this is probably a question of a legal nature, and as such perhaps it should have been directed to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien).

I am certain that the hon. member is well aware that it was impossible to complete legislative changes of such importance by the time of the Fourteenth World Congress of Rehabilitation International, which he mentioned a little earlier and which was held in Winnipeg during the last week in June.

This is not to suggest that the Government of Canada is not active at the present time in ensuring the rights of disabled people in this country. As I previously informed the House, the government has established, as the hon. member said, an organizing committee for the International Year of the Disabled, which will be in 1981, as well as a parliamentary task force on the disabled and handicapped.

Mr. Dinsdale: You are way behind.

Mr. Parent: Unfortunately, discrimination against disabled persons is still too common in the workplace because of environmental barriers, administrative technicalities or, quite frankly and unfortunately, attitudes toward the disabled.

I believe the hon. member said that this chamber and the buildings here on the Hill are not accessible to disabled persons. I point out with respect that I know for a fact that at the Confederation Building there are facilities for the disabled. There is a ramp at the back in order to get in. There are ramps at the South Block and the West Block, and I was told a little earlier by my colleague, the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin) that there also is access through the doors at the rear of this building so that the disabled can get in.

Mr. Dinsdale: The freight entrance.

Mr. Parent: If the hon. member refers to the galleries here, yes, we do not have facilities there.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is no place to park.

Mr. Parent: Parking space is another thing we probably should be looking at.

Admittedly, the Human Rights Act is not perfect, but it is still an effective weapon in the battle against discrimination, and it is through the frank assertion of its enforcement powers that we shall work toward greater equality for all Canadians.

• (2220)

Mr. Dinsdale: It was in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Parent: Yes, it was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne.

I should like to conclude by saying that one challenge for the 1980s for both the federal and provincial governments will be to bring into line all existing human rights legislation so as to ensure there is more uniform protection from discrimination in all areas of interest to disabled Canadians.

INDUSTRY—TERMS OF LOAN TO VALLEYFIELD CHEMICAL PRODUCTS CORPORATION—INVESTIGATION OF SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I asked a number of questions on June 17, 20 and 26 concerning the government's hosting or, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) wrote in a letter to me the other day, co-hosting a secret armaments conference, providing the Government Conference Centre for this meeting and, as I have discovered also, providing some money to help support it.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), as reported in the Toronto Star of June 28, said that the government kicked in about $5,000, all of this being done basically to aid a corporation called the Space Research Corporation about which members of the House of Commons have been inquiring for over two years. Several members of the Conservative party asked questions in 1977-78, and the government has consistently been stonewalling. Obviously someone at the Space Research Corporation has a lot of friends in high places in the Liberal party and in the government. This is the same corporation that has long been under investigation. Indeed the investigation was completed by the RCMP. The same corporation was recently convicted in the United States of illegally shipping arms to South Africa.

All the questions that I have asked on these days have, with only one exception, not been answered. I realize that I cannot expect them all to be answered tonight in three minutes, so I will focus on the questions mentioned in the proceedings on the adjournment motion. The reference is to the specific questions put on June 26, 1980, and I hope the government is now prepared to answer them.

The first question, to remind whoever is speaking for the government, was whether the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was aware of the RCMP investigation of the Space Research Corporation when it authorized both a loan and a grant to a wholly-owned subsidiary of Space Research, namely, Valleyfield Chemicals. The minister replied:

Madam Speaker, I will get the information for the hon. lady and inform her as soon as possible.

So I am expecting this to take place tonight.

The second question I asked of the minister was whether he could tell us whether the loan to Valleyfield Chemicals is still outstanding and whether the grant has been terminated. He said again that I would be receiving answers to those questions.

• (2225)

In a supplementary question on June 26, which is apparently what we are focusing on tonight, I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce if he would give us some assurance that until the RCMP report is made public or at least until the investigation of the Space Research Corporation that is now going on in Quebec is completed, there would be no further grants or loans to SRC or its fully-owned subsidiary. I am looking forward to a clarification of the minister's reply. He said:

—until the matter is resolved by the courts one cannot presume that the parties will be ineligible for further assistance based on economic development aspects.

Particularly I should like to know what that means and how it ties in with the statement which appeared in the June 27, 1980 edition of The Globe and Mail the day after I asked my question. According to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the article indicated:

Space research will be ineligible for further aid until a decision had been made on whether charges will be laid, he added.

Those are the specific questions to which I was promised answers, and I look forward to hearing them now.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, Valleyfield Chemical Products Corporation was formed in 1977 by Canadian Technical Industries to purchase, rehabilitate and operate a military explosives and propellant manufacturing facility in Valleyfield, Quebec. It was and still is the only facility of this type in Canada. It was built originally by the Crown during World War II, and in the mid 1960s it was sold to CIL Inc. In 1976 a permanent shutdown of the facilities was announced by CIL.

Because Canadian Technical Industries is in the large calibre munitions business, it was a major customer of the CIL facility and therefore wanted the operation to be continued. As a result, the company approached the federal government for assistance to take over the operations and to carry out the required extensive rehabilitation of the facilities. At that time officials had no knowledge of the RCMP investigation of the sister company, Space Research Corporation (Quebec). For strategic and economic reasons, the government decided in the fall of 1977 to assist the company.

A non-repayable contribution of $3 million was provided under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce defence industry productivity program. In addition, a repayable contribution of $5.35 million was provided. The non-repayable contribution is being vested in the company at the rate of 10 per cent per year providing its agreement with the Crown remains in place. The repayable contribution is to be repaid by 1985. These funds were expended during 1977 and 1978. The department holds the assets of VCPC as security for the continued operation of the company under the 1977 agreement. In addition, a loan of $3.75 million through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was provided for the Valleyfield rehabilitation project.

The facility employed 250 people in 1977. Currently over 600 are working there. Export business amounts to nearly $20 million, of which almost the entire amount is to the United States. Sales in Canada are about $6 million. Since completing the rehabilitation program in 1978, the company has been profitable and is expected to continue to be profitable.

The question as to whether Valleyfield will be part of a purchase of SRCQ by the government is only one option under investigation. We still have to reach a decision and proceed to put our intentions in place. The intention is to maintain the munition capability in Canada and the many jobs that are involved if at all possible.

ENERGY TAX ON EXPORT OF SURPLUS ELECTRICITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, it was stated in today's edition of The Globe and Mail that over the weekend in Winnipeg, at the Liberal party policy convention, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) announced that his government is seriously considering imposing an energy tax on the export of surplus electrical energy to the United States.

There is no question that the imposition of such a tax would hit hardest at Ontario and Quebec. In view of the minister's announcement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make a statement on motions outlining the government's position with regard to the possible imposition of such a tax.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POSSIBLE EXPORT TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that last weekend the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) stated that the Liberal government is considering an export tax on all energy forms, including natural gas, to the United States, in view of the fact that this measure is obviously another attempt by his government to tax resource-based economies to pay for its own reckless and prodigal spending, and in view of the fact that an export tax on energy forms would have far-reaching implications for relations not only between the provinces and the federal government but also relations with the United States—especially since, for example, much of Ontario's electricity is generated from Pennsylvania coal—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has no conception of the problems and divisive results this proposal could produce, this House calls upon the minister to make a statement on motions in order to enable this House to obtain a clearer understanding of his lack of understanding of these implications, and to explain whether this measure represents the Liberal government's definition of sharing between the energetic economies of the regions and the spendthrift nature of his own government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR MEDICAL REVIEW PANEL TO INVESTIGATE FITNESS OF BOXERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43 which I have discussed with representatives of both other parties: I hope my motion is seen to be non-partisan in nature.

● (1410)

In light of the tragic death this morning of one of Canada's fine boxers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the federal government immediately establish a medical review panel for the purpose of examining procedures currently used to determine the medical fitness of persons about to engage in amateur and professional boxing matches in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Who said "No"?

Madam Speaker: Is the House in favour of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: There was unanimous consent to propose this motion. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. The motion is carried.

EQUALITY OF GOVERNMENT SERVICES FOR ALL CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) have all said recently that the federal government should maintain and even increase its economic powers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen):

That the House unanimously support a constitutional position enabling the Government of Canada to obtain greater economic powers so that all Canadians may benefit from equal opportunities and services.

Madam Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

DEVELOPMENT OF OIL SANDS PROJECTS IN ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, whereas unemployment in Canada is rising to extremely serious proportions, combined with a zero-growth rate, rising deficits, insecure oil supplies and a severe shortage in our balance of payments, and whereas $12 billion to $14 billion is at present waiting to be invested in two massive oil sands projects, namely, Alsands and Imperial Oil in northeastern Alberta, creating 97 million man-hours of employment across Canada which will not only contribute $3.6 billion to Canada's balance of payments but will help secure Canada's future energy supplies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House direct the present government to aggressively pursue the construction of the Alsands project at Fort McMurray and the Imperial Oil project at Cold Lake, and announce their approval by July 30, 1980.

SUMMER OLYMPIC GAMES AT PETERBOROUGH, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It concerns a matter which I am sure will receive the unanimous support of this House.

The Ontario Summer Olympic Games will open in Peterborough on August 22. In light of the necessary boycott of the international Olympics in Russia and the resulting disappointment to Canadian athletes, and in order that this Parliament may indicate its full support of Olympic competition in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell):

That should this Parliament still be in session on August 22, we would adjourn this House for a day in order that all members of Parliament from every province in Canada might attend the Ontario Summer Games in Peterborough on August 22 to show their support for the athletes of Canada.

AGRICULTURE

POLICY OF GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to bring to the attention of this House a matter of grave national importance.

At the recent consistory or conclave of Liberals held in Winnipeg, not one single resolution concerning agriculture was either introduced or discussed. Knowing of the government party's reluctance to freedom of information, could it be that the agricultural resolutions or platform were discussed in camera? Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis):

That the neglected, ignored and forgotten Minister of Agriculture give us his party's complete agricultural policy in the next 30 seconds, as that is all the time apparently required.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Having been informed by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers that local post office management in Winnipeg intends once again to discontinue counter service and close postal station D, 930 Portage Avenue, as early as September, and since this cutback in postal services undoubtedly will cause both inconvenience and hardship for local residents and businesses, especially for senior citizens, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House call upon the Postmaster General to intervene on behalf of this local Winnipeg neighbourhood by assuring the continuation of counter service and by keeping postal station D open.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

MEETING WITH PREMIER LOUGHEED—DEVELOPMENT OF OIL SANDS PROJECTS IN ALBERTA

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Will he inform the House as to whether arrangements have now been completed for his meeting with Premier Lougheed; and, if so, would he give us the date and the location of that meeting?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am told that the suggestion was made of a meeting on the twenty-fourth of this month to be held in Ottawa, but I am not quite certain that that is confirmed as an agreement yet. I am flexible; I believe there is—

An hon. Member: Did you say May 24?

Mr. Trudeau: July 24. Did I not say July? I am told that a variety of places have been looked at, and various locations. This seems to be the one we are working on now.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is direct to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister will be aware that in addition to the end of July deadline there is also a deadline with respect to the projects of heavy oil production in northern Alberta.

One of these projects is estimated at a direct investment of $7 billion. The minister will be aware of estimates, published over the weekend, of the spin-off or multiplier effect of that particular project, indicating that over $9 billion would flow into the provinces of Ontario and Quebec as a direct result of the commencement of that project. First, will the minister confirm the accuracy, if he is able, of that $9 billion economic boost to Ontario and Quebec? Second, can he now give us his estimate of the cost of delay should that project, in the absence of an agreement, be put off one full year?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I cannot deny or confirm the estimates put forward by the individual companies at the present time. These are company estimates and as such they are put out as estimates and should be taken as such.

I want to indicate to the hon. member that he is also aware Petro-Canada and Alberta Gas have offered to get into a fourth tar sands project which is estimated at around $10 billion. So the government is quite conscious of the great significance and great benefits for all parts of Canada of those projects. We hope an agreement is reached on oil pricing soon and that these projects will proceed.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I am pleased the minister acknowledges the importance of the economic effect of this, because consistently he has blamed the provinces for the failure of the start-up, whereas I am sure the minister will agree that in the absence of a pricing agreement no province or company will commence this very important construction.

An hon. Member: Why not?

• (1420)

Mr. Jarvis: Somebody asks, "Why not?" They certainly do not know the facts of life if they do not know why not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: The minister will have the information from his department and elsewhere as to the price per barrel at which commencement of these projects is viable. In that this is not confidential information, presumably, will he tell us at what price per barrel, according to the best information he has, these projects would be triggered in terms of their commencement?

Mr. Lalonde: On the first part of the question, Madam Speaker, I should like to stress to the hon. member that the federal government met its commitments vis-à-vis the Alsands project I think about two years ago. It was the difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory arrangement among the companies concerned and the government of Alberta which delayed the projects during that period: it was not the federal government, as the federal government met all its commitments a good while ago to allow the projects to proceed.

An hon. Member: Except pricing.

Mr. Lalonde: We had a pricing agreement over the last two years and the companies were ready to proceed on that pricing agreement, but the government of Alberta chose to delay an agreement with those companies because it wanted to further pursue certain negotiations with the companies. I do not blame the province for that; I am just reciting the facts.

An hon. Member: Some of them.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the question raised by the hon. member is concerned, I would say that obviously, again, the question as to what exact price would get those projects to proceed is a matter of argument. I can tell him the advice I have received is that those projects could proceed at a price well below the present international price.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The facts he alluded to in his reply a moment ago do not coincide with the facts of the oil companies which have said they want to proceed with the plants.

My question is: does the minister accept absolutely no responsibility for the aggressive development of the tar sands? Is this not the policy of the minister's government? Will he not accept aggressively the pursuit of the tar sands, or is he really leaving this to Alberta, saying in effect that Alberta is running the energy policy of this country?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: First of all, Madam Speaker, I certainly would not agree with the interpretation by the hon. member. It is thanks to the very generous fiscal incentives provided by the federal government, particularly Liberal governments of the past, that we have been able to get the tar sands projects in operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: However, it is being said that I would not want to take away some credit from the provincial governments as they have co-operated in the realization of these projects. Obviously, the provinces have control of these resources; they determine the rate of royalties and things like that, and they have received their share in the realization of those projects.

That is not to say the federal government has not been a major partner. As a matter of fact, if you look at the facts in terms of fiscal incentives and investments, you will find that the federal contribution on behalf of Canadian taxpayers all over Canada in the realization of these projects has been a very major factor.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Now that he has taken over the negotiations of an oil pricing agreement and obviously the responsibility for energy, mines and resources, will he pursue aggressively the development of synthetic crude in northeastern Alberta, particularly when Petro-Canada announced to the Alberta Energy Conservation Resources Board that by 1990 production of conventional crude in Alberta from existing pools will decline to 32 per cent of the present levels, and that by the year 2000 conventional crude production in Alberta will have declined to 10 per cent of present production?

Will the Prime Minister pursue aggressively the development of the tar sands industry in northeastern Alberta?

• (1425)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the answer given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to that question is the same answer which I would give, and that the minister is still responsible for the development of energy policy.

THE CONSTITUTION

LIBERAL CONVENTION, WINNIPEG—SPEECH OF PRIME MINISTER—ECONOMIC UNION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. On the weekend, in Winnipeg, the Prime Minister said, with regard to the provinces, they are creating a "garrison mentality" in Canada and they are "creating fences to keep" Canadians "apart".

Considering that right after the referendum, the vast majority of Canadian political leaders, including the premiers, indicated a co-operative attitude toward dealing quickly and seriously with constitutional reform, why is the Prime Minister now jeopardizing this very process by using such confrontationist language?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I was not at that point talking about the constitutional discussions; I was talking about the importance of preserving in Canada a strong economic union. The Leader of the New Democratic Party is certainly aware that there are certain practices in Canada which would not even be permitted in the European Common Market, in terms of mobility of labour and of capital. I would think I would have the support of at least his party on that subject.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the point at hand is not the substance of the matter of the negotiation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: There is the arrogant shrug once again, Madam Speaker. Why we have a problem with the majority of the premiers who represent all parties—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I cannot allow a long preamble by the hon. member for Oshawa, no more than I can allow it by other hon. members.

Mr. Broadbent: Since we are agreed, along with the Prime Minister and many people in the country, to speedy change on the constitution, would the Prime Minister not agree that it is essential to obtain speedy change and to take an attitude toward the leaders of the provinces which is civilized, decent and assumes the same good will which he claims to provide for himself?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I would think that any member of this chamber would know that in the past several months and several years the rhetoric of many provincial politicians has been precisely of the kind for which the hon. member is reproaching this government. For months we have been witnessing the spectacle of provincial politicians saying that Ottawa was this or that Ottawa was that, that we were too centralized, that we were not giving enough powers to the provinces, and so on.

I said it in this chamber in the Speech from the Throne, and I repeat again, that the case must be made for preserving the Canadian economic union strong.

Mr. Waddell: With all the power in your hands.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that on the substance the Leader of the New Democratic Party agrees with me. That is sufficient, and if he is offended at my rhetoric, then I apologize to him.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the point is—it is a serious point—not whether we happen to agree or disagree on rhetoric, but that a major first ministers' conference will take place for four days. I would like to ask the Prime Minister, in that context, since fully 80 per cent of the premiers—that is, eight of the ten premiers—since the referendum have had nothing but positive remarks to make about this process, does the Prime Minister not think that it would be appropriate for him to rise to their level, instead of descending to the level of the one or two premiers who have had confrontationist things to say about the process?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am always prepared to accept lessons in moderation from the Leader of the New Democratic Party and I accept the reproach.

HUMAN RIGHTS

EQUALITY OF INDIAN WOMEN UNDER LEGISLATION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He will be aware that within the next two weeks the United Nations Human Rights Committee will be ruling on a possible violation of human rights by Canada when the case of Sandra Lovelace, a status Indian woman seeking equality, is considered by the United Nations.

Given that this is the first time Canada's record of human rights has ever had to be questioned by the United Nations, and given that this matter will be considered by that body within the next few days, will the Prime Minister show his government's commitment to human rights by immediately taking steps to remove section 12(1)(b) from the Indian Act, thereby giving Indian women equality before the law, and at the same time removing any condemnation of Canada by the United Nations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sure, Madam Speaker, that the hon. lady would want to put this question in context. She knows, of course, that for several years this government has been attempting to achieve that amendment. The subtlety is that we do not want to impose a solution on the Indian people. We all recognize Indians as having a culture of their own and having a right to preserve that culture. I think the attempt of my government back in 1969 to not only delete that section but, perhaps, to abolish the Indian Act in its entirety was a lesson, for me at any rate, that it was not wise even to go in a progressive direction over the heads of the Indian leaders themselves.

Discussions have been going on for, I would say, a couple of years on that very subject with the Indian leaders. The present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is in discussion with them. We indicated, I believe it was in the Speech from the Throne, that we would eventually have to act even if they were not all prepared to agree.

I am certainly in agreement with the indications of the hon. lady. Perhaps the case being decided at the United Nations will help persuade the Indian leaders themselves that they should be moving in this direction. But I am satisfied that our minister is trying to do it with their consent, rather than ride roughshod over some of their traditions.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, somewhere in the last few days I heard it stated that human rights are not negotiable. I presume that was with other people, other individuals, other organizations or with anyone in the whole Dominion of Canada. I presumed that was what the Prime Minister meant, that human rights are not negotiable, including the human rights of Indian women.

Since the Prime Minister is not prepared to move in this particular area of removing section 12(1)(b) from the Indian Act, as the Clark government had indicated to the Indian leadership it was prepared to do, I ask him what will the explanation be that he asks the Canadian delegation to take to the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women, which is taking place in Denmark next month, to explain the unwillingness of the Canadian government to come to grips with this issue.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I believe the preamble was very important to the question, because the hon. lady indicated a position which I believe is right in saying that human rights are not negotiable. Notwithstanding that, she knows that for at least ten years I have been trying to negotiate with the provinces their acceptance. At some point I suppose you have to act unilaterally. I am glad I would have the support of the party opposite in—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): You are hoist by your own petard.

Mr. Trudeau: —acting unilaterally to impose human rights in a constitution if we cannot get agreement with the provinces. The process with the Indians is the same. The human right is as the lady stated, but we would prefer to do it with the Indians, as with the provinces, through persuasion and negotiation. That is what we have been attempting. But I accept the hon. lady's enjoiner to do it unilaterally at some point.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, just a very simple supplementary to the Prime Minister. How long is he prepared to make Indian women wait?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, in the case of unilateral action on constitutional matters we have been waiting for 53 years. I think it is time to get along with the subject. I hope we will have the support of the hon. lady for that.

Miss MacDonald: You won't answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: In the case of the Indians, the former minister responsible tells me we have been discussing it with them for seven years. I would say perhaps one or two years more should be the limit.

SPORTS

INJURIES SUFFERED IN BOXING—MEASURES TO REGULATE SPORT

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour as the minister responsible for sport. The death of Cleveland Denny in Montreal today raises the death total to 330 boxers who have died since 1945 from injuries suffered in the boxing ring. The Denny death is reported to have followed the use of a type of blood doping.

My question to the minister—and I noted his reaction to the motion put under Standing Order 43 earlier today—is that if boxing is to be continued as a sport in Canada, what action does he propose to take in regulating the promotion of boxing with the view to eliminating fatalities such as this, and particularly the injuries suffered in the ring?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for what I consider to be a very important question. In doing so, I want to compliment the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain for the resolution that he put before the House today.

There is the difficult question of jurisdiction, not only on an interdepartmental basis but in relation to the division of jurisdiction in such a matter between the federal and provincial governments. I spoke to the distinguished Minister of National Health and Welfare on this matter before coming into the House today. We are certainly going to investigate with the Department of Justice and, if necessary, with provincial authorities, exactly where the jurisdiction lies.

In view of the tragic death of Mr. Denny, which is the latest in a series of unfortunate events in the ring, I think it is most appropriate that those authorities who have jurisdiction carry out, medically and in other ways, a careful review of the practices and the precautions that presently exist to see if they can in one way or in many ways be improved. If they cannot, then I think we must give very serious consideration, as Canadians, to how long we can allow this toll of human life in the ring to continue.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ALLEGED USE OF DOPE BY BOXERS—EFFECT ON USERS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, since the blood doping seems to be an unfortunate factor in this matter, will address my supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Will the minister assure this House and the Canadian people that the type of blood doping alleged to have been used in this instance is not harmful to the user and that no harm can follow the combat that follows such a situation in the boxing ring?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, as just mentioned by my colleague the minister of amateur sport, we both consulted this morning our respective officials concerning the tragic death of Mr. Denny. The specific question on the quantity of dope in the blood of boxers is part of the problem we would like to have looked into. If I understand current procedures correctly, a medical examination on the eve of a fight is the only requirement at this time. We are not sure that is enough, which explains the unanimous consent of the House, including the government, to having a task force look into procedures in the future.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONFERENCE IN NOVA SCOTIA—REASON GOVERNMENT DID NOT ATTEND

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister, who is aware that an important conference on the constitution was held in Wolfville, Nova Scotia, last week. He is also aware that the leader of this party, two former ministers of the Conservative party and three premiers of the four Atlantic provinces were there.

The Prime Minister was invited and three ministers of his government were invited but did not attend. I should like to ask the Prime Minister why no one from the Government of Canada attended this important conference in the Atlantic provinces, which was an insult to the premiers of those provinces.

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am afraid I do not have an answer to that question. I understand the conference was some time last week—

Mr. Broadbent: It was Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Trudeau: —at a time when most ministers were either working here in the House or preparing for the convention on the weekend. The hon. member knows that the House has not been sitting very much the past two weeks because of the holidays, and I imagine that no minister was able to find himself free to be there. I realize it was an important conference, and I have a briefing note on it. I understand very important subjects were discussed, and in spite of the laughter from the NDP I will attempt—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, the NDP sure needs some publicity in the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You got too much on the weekend.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, it is the Prime Minister and his party who got the adverse publicity in the Atlantic provinces. Since three premiers were there, and several politicians from the opposition parties, I wonder whether the Prime Minister is now ready to apologize to the organizers of the conference and to the three premiers for not being there or having someone go on his behalf.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, that seems like a repetition of the same question. Maybe we have the same reason as Premier Peckford had for not being there. But I will find out.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT IN WEST—ASSISTANCE FOR GRAIN PRODUCERS

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the program announced in Yorkton last Thursday for cattle producers to help them cover the drought period, what does the federal government intend to do for the grain producers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the plans that the government has announced will not have anything extra over and above what crop insurance already allows for. Under the programs that we have for crop insurance, any crops that are insurable which farmers have not covered we have not made any other payment in the past. Under crop insurance it could cost the Government of Canada up to $400 million. Through the present programs we pay about $90 million in federal premiums and the producers pay about the same amount, and with the fund that has been built up it could cost us that much money and more. I might say that crop insurance is a federal program.

ENERGY

AIR CARRIERS FILLING UP WITH CANADIAN FUEL—PREVENTIVE MEASURES—EFFECT ON TOURISM

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister is aware, the low cost of aviation fuel in Canada is prompting many foreign-based air carriers to fill up their tanks to the limit in Canada, a practice which I believe is known as "tankering". It is my understanding that the government is considering ways of ending this giveaway.

Can the minister assure the House that if a program is implemented to stop "tankering", there will be no adverse affect on the tourist industry in Canada, keeping in mind the substantial deficit in Canada's international tourism account?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is surely aware that, in areas where the oil supplied to consumers, and particularly to airlines, is imported, we charge the actual price we pay for that oil when we sell it to airline companies. However, in other parts of the country, where domestic oil is sold, it is true that its price comprises an element of subsidy. The government is now in the process of looking into the matter, and I trust I shall soon be in a position to announce a decision on whether or not specific steps should be taken in that regard. As for the question of the hon. member concerning tourism, I should like to point out to him that subsidizing the cost of the fuel airlines use to fly to foreign points would result, in fact, in subsidizing tourism abroad. Therefore, any action that would lead to an increase in the cost of that fuel would tend to prevent, or decrease, tourism abroad and thus be of benefit to the Canadian tourist industry.

[English]

Mr. Fretz: Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Small Businesses I would like to direct my supplementary to the same minister. Will the minister assure us that he will encourage the Minister of State for Small Businesses to talk to tourist industry officials so as to co-ordinate this government's tinkering with tankering in order to come up with a resolution of this problem?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member that full consultations are taking place at the present time with the departments concerned—in particular, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—and with the tourist industry. Consultations with the provincial governments are taking place in connection with automobile gasoline subsidization, but not in connection with jet fuel. However, I can assure the hon. member that full consultations are taking place within the federal government on the issue he has raised.

REPORT ON VIROLOGY LABORATORY IN HULL—CRITICISM OF FACILITIES

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I am sure the minister is aware of Public Works' evaluation of his department's virology laboratory in Hull. This was a report prepared by J. Douglas Wilson and Associates, in which it was reported that the "facilities are archaic, inefficient and hazardous" and "represent a danger to the environment".

I would like to ask the minister what direction he has taken or given to his department to rectify this dangerous situation. He knows that this laboratory imports diseases from around the world to evaluate them in the event they occur in Canada. I understand that it is a very hazardous situation there.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I have some knowledge of what the hon. member talks about. I do not know if it is on schedule or not, but a whole new facility is to be built. We do have a quarantine facility, which I am sure the hon. member knows is in the outlying area of Ottawa. This facility does a lot of the work that used to be done in those laboratories. We also have scheduled plans for new laboratories to be built in the province of Alberta that will also be doing some of this work. I would have to check and get further information to be brought up to date about this in order to give the hon. member a more accurate answer to his question.

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate the minister's answer, Madam Speaker. I can tell him that as I understand it, it will be five years before any replacement can be built. In the meantime, and again to quote from the same report, "The possibility of disease transmission to humans is dangerously high". I understand, as well, that immediately adjacent to the laboratory is a children's playground. Therefore, can I have the minister's assurances that he will delay no further in checking into this situation to see if, indeed, something should be done quickly?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member can be given that assurance. The latest report that I saw some weeks ago showed that there could not be transfer of any disease to anyone in the immediate vicinity. Unless something has changed since that time—and I would not be aware of it—I would be as concerned as he is and probably even more alarmed than he is about it.

SHIPBUILDING

REDUCTION OF SUBSIDY—COMPARABLE PROGRAM OF ASSISTANCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It arises out of the government's decision, without comment, to allow the subsidy to Canadian shipbuilders to lapse on July 1. I wonder if the minister could tell us when the proposed comparable program of assistance might be completed and announced, so that Canadian shipyards can pursue investigation of contracts with offshore builders.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the program did not lapse entirely. The subsidy at the 20 per cent level went back to the former 9 per cent level. I am advised that most of the Canadian shipyards have relatively full order books to build ships that were eligible for the 20 per cent subsidy. This will give us time to actively and urgently carry out consultations with the industry in order to design a new cost-effective program that will be useful to the industry, the regions where the shipyards are found and the entire Canadian economy.

Mr. Forrestall: It is quite true that the 9 per cent subsidy does remain, and I accept that, but of course it is useless. The indication from the Minister of Transport and other government spokesmen is that the replacement program will be comparable with the 20 per cent arrangement in place up until the end of June.

I have one further supplementary: if this comparable program is imminent some time this fall—and the minister suggests there is some urgency attached to it—would it not have been in the best interests of shipyard employees, the 40,000 people involved directly or indirectly, to have left in place the 20 per cent subsidy until such time as the government was prepared to announce a substitute program?

Mr. Gray: That is a matter of debate; one could have different points of view on it. I believe it is a fact that most, if not all, Canadian shipyards have relatively full order books providing them with work until 1982, in some cases, and in others well into 1981, enabling us to consider in cabinet, on the basis of consultation with the industry, a program carrying forward what has already been accomplished but in a way which would be recognized as being cost-effective and in the best interests of the industry, its workers and the entire economy.

TRANSPORT

CARRIAGE OF GRAIN—RECOMMENDATIONS OF HALL COMMISSION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Low stocks of grain on the prairies this year have resulted in elevators on the CN line to Churchill holding insufficient grain to meet the needs of the port of Churchill.

Since the Hall commission report recommended three years ago that grain be transferred from the CP and the CN line where possible, will the minister now implement that strategy to make sure there is enough grain supplied to meet the needs of the port of Churchill?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member is aware that on Friday the Canadian Wheat Board made a very important announcement. It is in three parts. It opens all quotas to all CN lines. It allows producers on CP lines to deliver to CN points without quotas. There is also a Canadian Wheat Board program of trucking from elevators on CP to elevators on CN. So this is an effort to remedy the situation which presently confronts the port of Churchill.

The subject of promoting interchange between CN and CP facilities has been debated before. It is being debated again under the chairmanship, if you wish, of Dr. Horner, the grain co-ordinator, and the two railways would apparently be ready now to make accommodations.

Mr. Murphy: I am aware of the announcement of the Wheat Board, Madam Speaker. But that statement pointed out the problem, rather than the answer. The point is this: since no interchange is presently in place there is insufficient wheat for the CN line and the farmer has no means of making a profit. What does the minister intend to do about this? It is not enough to say the Wheat Board has made an announcement. Hall made his recommendation three years ago: do something now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: As to the importance of the interchange, I said very clearly that there had been a debate on the subject, how important it is, and so on. But I thought I was very specific in saying that Dr. Horner is conducting negotiations between the two railways at the present time. I went further and indicated that the atmosphere at these negotiations is very good.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISPOSITION OF LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in the absence, due to illness, of the Minister of Veterans Affairs I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister relating to veterans legislation which was introduced by our government in Bill C-28.

The right hon. gentleman will know that Wednesday is an allotted day for the official opposition. It is a day which we would be prepared to postpone until the fall if there were all-party agreement to pass the veterans legislation in all its stages on that day, Wednesday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I have consulted with representatives of the New Democratic Party. The parties on this side of the House are prepared to proceed in that way—all-stage passage of the veterans legislation on Wednesday of this week. Would the Prime Minister tell us whether the legislation is ready, and whether the government is prepared to introduce it on Wednesday for passage through all stages?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I did not quite understand the offer made by the Leader of the official Opposition. Does he wish to postpone the opposition day or sacrifice it for the benefit of veterans? I wonder about the authenticity of his generosity. In any event, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has insisted several times in the House that this bill be introduced in Parliament as soon as possible, especially before the summer recess. And on every occasion the Minister of Veterans Affairs gave him the assurance that the government wanted to have this legislation prepared, introduced and passed as quickly as possible. So I will offer the Leader of the Opposition the same assurance that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has always offered the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that is, we will do everything necessary so that the appropriate piece of legislation will be brought before Parliament in the very near future. I thank in advance the opposition parties for their offer to allow us to have it passed as quickly as possible, that is, in less than one day.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister has talked his way around the question.

[English]

I indicated to him that this party is prepared to postpone an allotted day which is ours by right so that the veterans of Canada need wait no longer for legislation which was prepared, printed and ready for passage under our government and which should be ready under this government. With the agreement of the New Democratic Party, I have been able to offer him an assurance that the bill will be passed through all stages on Wednesday.

[Translation]

My question for the government is as follows: Is the legislation which our government had prepared now ready with the Liberal government and, if so, is the government prepared to introduce it this Wednesday so that Parliament can pass at all stages this important piece of legislation for the veterans of Canada?

[English]

Mr. Pinard: I would have liked to have heard the Leader of the Opposition say he was prepared to give up the day, not postpone it. That, of course, would be real generosity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pinard: In any case, this legislation is under preparation and I am willing, in the name of the government, to introduce it next Wednesday if I have the agreement of the opposition parties to dispose of it in one day. I would appreciate it, though if the Leader of the Opposition would be serious and give up the allotted day he is talking about.

Mr. Clark: Just so we are clear about this, we on this side were so prepared to give the veterans of Canada their legislation that a bill was on the order paper, ready for debate and passage, when the party opposite brought our government down. That was our priority. Knowing the pressures under which Parliament sits during the summer, we are now prepared to postpone until the fall an allotted day, this Wednesday—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the Leader of the Opposition have a further question?

Mr. Clark: I have many, Madam Speaker. The minister, in delaying further the passage of this legislation, spoke about next Wednesday: "this Wednesday", he is now saying. So he is accepting our offer to introduce the bill that day and to have the allotted day postponed until the fall; is that correct?

Mr. Pinard: I always had the impression during the previous government that they were more interested in income tax credit on mortgages than in veterans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I made myself very clear. I said that on Wednesday we would be introducing the bill in question and that the opposition parties had assured us we could put it through all stages. That is what we shall do this week, and I said to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that I was disappointed he kept asking that the day allotted to the Progressive Conservative Party be postponed rather than given to the House to enable us to look after veterans. So this is very clear, Madam Speaker. We shall be introducing the bill on Wednesday. The opposition parties have assured us that we would deal with the bill through all stages and, in my opinion, it is regrettable that the Leader of the Opposition would not change his mind and still insist he wants the allotted day postponed instead of giving it for the benefit of war veterans.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCREASE IN GIS—PLANS TO ENSURE PAYMENT DIRECTLY TO SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Given the questionable attitude of the Ontario government in the matter of the $35 GIS pension increase recently unanimously approved by the House, can the minister inform the House of any action she has taken or intends to take to ensure that this increase is not misused by changes in the comforts allowances paid to persons in nursing homes or other institutions, and can she tell the House what she plans to do to make sure that this money goes directly to the senior citizens who need it desperately?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, very unfortunately, our direct power is limited, although that is not to say non-existent. The only thing we could have done would have been to exempt from the increase pensioners living in institutions, anticipating negative attitudes in some provinces. We did not do that, and I am still hopeful that the government of Ontario, whatever the strange language of Mr. Norton and Mr. Miller, will pass on the full $35. I sent a telex again on Wednesday of last week to Mr. Norton asking if, yes or no, the $35 will be passed on to seniors, but unfortunately I have not yet received an answer.

ENERGY

REPORTED TAX ON PRODUCTION OF GASOHOL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In statements made by him at the weekend he mentioned that he was considering a tax on the Minnedosa plant for the production of gasohol. We on the prairies believe that gasohol is a viable fuel alternative. Is the federal government planning any additional taxation on the production of gasohol at this time?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the report to which the hon. member refers, but I would be very happy to give him the assurance that we are not considering any tax on the production of gasohol. This is the first time I have heard about this. This matter has never been brought to my attention even for consideration, so I do not know where the report would have come from.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether he has recommended to his cabinet colleagues that the surety bond, especially for co-ops and farmers who want to get into the production of gasohol, be removed or at least reduced substantially so that co-ops and small farmer groups can in fact get into the production of gasohol, not at a later date but within this same crop year.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am glad to see that the hon. member is talking about helping rather than hindering the development of gasohol production. I can tell him that indeed this is a matter I am considering, but I have not yet reached the stage of making a specific recommendation to cabinet. However, in the process of a general review on energy which we are carrying on at the present time, this very subject is being examined.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

AIR POLLUTION—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT OF ONTARIO

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment or, in his absence, his parliamentary secretary. Recently, the government of the province of Ontario established certain pollution control standards which Inco must meet in the battle against acid rain. However, the June, 1980, press release regarding the report of the IJC states that the province of Ontario itself has failed to meet deadlines for complying with air pollution control objectives in the Sarnia-Port Huron area and in the Windsor-Detroit area, and that SO_2 emissions have actually increased. Locally, the Lambton Industrial Society has actually reduced SO_2 emissions from industry.

Will the minister or the parliamentary secretary confirm that the province of Ontario is taking steps to meet these standards and, in particular, require the hydro-generating station in Lambton County to take the action necessary to reduce SO_2 emissions?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GAMBLE—PROCEDURE ON PASSAGE OF S.O. 43 MOTIONS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, when the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) introduced his motion under Standing Order 43, I very clearly and in a loud and audible voice indicated that I was opposed to the motion.

Mr. Cousineau: You were not even here.

Mr. Gamble: The circumstances which followed my opposition to that motion were as follows. Your Honour gave no recognition of having heard me, which might well be a consequence of simply not having heard me. Your Honour then took some instructions from an officer of the House and read the written motion, after which I once again in a clear and audible fashion indicated that I was opposed to the motion. After further consultation with an officer of the House, Madam Speaker, you then departed from the regular practice which you have followed since I have been in the House and since you have acted as Speaker.

Mr. Chénier: You are challenging the Chair.

Mr. Gamble: Having concluded that you interpreted that there were more yeas than nays with regard to the motion, Your Honour concluded that the motion had indeed passed. This is not the first such circumstance. In the past, after having asked for a voice call on a first reading of a Standing Order 43 motion and having heard a negative response upon reading the motion, Your Honour has decided that the motion indeed had been lost. What I fear you have done, Madam Speaker, is changed the meaning and interpreted differently the words of Standing Order 43, which now should read: "A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made so long as there are no more than four negative opposition voices to that motion".

What concerns me is exactly what is transpiring. There is no doubt but that each individual member of Parliament has the right, in dealing with a motion under Standing Order 43, to indicate clearly whether he is opposed or whether he supports the motion.

In this case we have a circumstance in which clearly under the criminal law of Canada this Parliament has ample jurisdiction to prohibit professional boxing in Canada; but when it comes to regulating for health reasons the manner in which a boxing match may take place, one should have regard to the various doubts which are expressed by the law officers of both the minister responsible for amateur sport and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). There is no clearly defined decision which has yet been rendered as to whether this matter is within the purview of the Government of Canada. It is, however, an illustration of a mad precipitation of regulation by this House without knowing whether it is a matter which should indeed be dealt with by the provinces.

I submit that just because a member stands in his place in making a motion under Standing Order 43 and indicates that he may have spoken to other members of other parties, does not mean that all members of this House agree. That, unfortunately, may well be the inclination to which Your Honour is drawn when you hear those opening words.

There is a member of the government who regularly takes it upon himself to say "no" to a great number of motions which are brought under Standing Order 43. Madam Speaker, I think that one might well cast one's eye across other benches on this side of the House in order to determine whether, at first instance, there are some who are opposed to a motion which may, at first blush, appear to have the consent of all members of the House. The essential issue is whether, having failed to hear a negative response, we are now to interpret your ruling to mean that so long as there is not a greater number of members opposed than five, the motion will be put again, and if five members do not rise to challenge your ruling the motion is passed by unanimous consent.

I now go on to deal with an additional matter. If indeed the motion is to be passed under Standing Order 43, does it matter whether it is at the first reading of the motion by a member of the House when it is determined whether there is unanimous consent, or is it when the motion is handed to you, Madam Speaker, to be read that it is determined that it is unanimously passed? I submit that it is on both occasions. When you read the motion which is presented to you in writing, if you fail to receive unanimous consent, then the motion cannot pass under Standing Order 43.

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. member for the notice he gave me during the question period that he would raise this matter as a question of privilege, but I must tell him that the Chair is the only one competent to determine whether or not nays are heard in the House. In this particular instance, I asked whether there was unanimous consent for this motion. I did not hear—I repeat that I did not hear—any nays from either side of the House. May I just say, for the information of hon. members, that I listen with my ears rather than with my eyes. I think hon. members might have noticed that often I look at the floor in order to concentrate better and to hear whether or not there are any nays, whether they come from one side of the House or the other. I do that usually because sometimes there is a lot of noise in the House and it is difficult for me to hear any nays.

The hon. member says he had said nays at the time I asked whether the House would give unanimous consent to have this motion put to the House. I did not hear him. When I did put the motion to the House, I heard a nay. It is at that point that I asked for the advice of the Clerk of the House in order to ascertain the procedure. Therefore, I followed the regular course in the case of motions under Standing Order 43. The hon. member would have had another chance at that point, because I asked the House whether it gave consent to the motion. Having heard some hon. members on this side say nay, I asked for yeas and I heard some yeas and then some nays. I said I felt the yeas had it and the motion was carried at that point. The hon. member could then have used some procedure in order to make a point concerning this motion.

So I have to tell the hon. member that I feel I have followed the normal procedure. I am the only one competent to hear the nays in this House. There might have been some confusion, I do not deny that, but the fact is that on the first instance I heard no nays and on the second instance I heard nays, and then I proceeded to ask for the yeas and nays. I have heard the hon. member on this question of privilege but I think he will admit that I followed the regular procedure.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the business of the House. I wonder if it could be made very clear as to what the intention is for Wednesday. I welcomed the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), but to me there is still some doubt. Is it now clear that the bill respecting veterans will be brought in on Wednesday provided that there is agreement to put it through all stages, whether or not the Conservative opposition day is given up for that purpose?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: The hon. member does not miss a thing.

[English]

Some hon. Members: We did not hear.

Mr. Pinard: My answer to the hon. member's question was "Yes".

Mr. Knowles: Thank you.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—RECOGNITION OF GOVERNMENT MEMBERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I gave notice earlier at the conclusion of the question period. As some hon. members will have noted, a number of members on this side of the House in this party walked out prematurely immediately prior to the conclusion of the question period. The reason for this and the reason I raise this question of privilege is to express what has been a concern, which has been growing over the course of recent question periods, about the conduct of the question period in the recognition of government members by Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The reason that this affects the privileges of all members of the House, and in particular of members of the opposition, is that—could I have some order from the opposite side, Madam Speaker? Today in the House there were at least three government members who were recognized on questions which basically—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —gave ministers of the Crown opportunities to make announcements. I submit, with respect, that that is an abuse of the process of this House and of the privileges of members of this House. The only opportunity that we as members of the opposition have, in many instances, to have access to cabinet ministers is through the forum of the question period. You, Madam Speaker, will be aware of the fact that the number of questions which have been accorded to government members in this Parliament is significantly greater than the number of questions which were accorded by your predecessor.

I note also that there appears to be a practice developing by you, Madam Speaker, of recognizing government members on a question at the conclusion of each question period, of recognizing government members for perhaps two or three questions in addition. We have this opportunity only to pose questions to cabinet ministers, and I suggest, with respect, that there must be a change in this practice if we are to be able to perform our jobs as members of Parliament on behalf of our constituents, particularly as members of the opposition to be able to ask the kinds of questions which should be asked of ministers of the Crown.

I should like to say in conclusion that it is an abuse for members of the government to take this opportunity to set up a cabinet minister to give an answer to a question which in some cases is either being read or is an announcement made by that cabinet minister.

So I hope, Madam Speaker, that you will review the record of your predecessor in this matter. I hope that you will perhaps recognize, more than you have in the past—I say this with respect—the critical importance of the question period to the opposition, that you will recognize that members of the government have many more opportunities, in their caucus and elsewhere, to raise these kinds of concerns, and that ministers of the Crown have many other opportunities to make the kinds of announcements which are made in response to set-up questions by government members.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, it had not been my intention to rise because I am well aware that you are able to defend yourself, but since a motive was imputed by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) to members on this side, I should like to remind him that Liberal members have the same rights in this chamber as all other hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: I resent the tone used by the hon. member for Burnaby. I sat in this House during the Thirtieth Parliament and I noted that Mr. Speaker Jerome varied from day to day, as you do, Madam Speaker, the number of people he recognized from each party. I remember that at one point six members on this side of the House were recognized on a particular day—this was a couple of years ago—and there were no objections at the time. I have looked around and I have seen a number of members on our side wishing to ask questions, yet only one or two of them are recognized. We do not complain; it is the luck of the draw. For the hon. member to say that members on this side of the House are setting up ministers only shows that obviously he is not listening to some of the questions asked, because some of the questions that are asked of ministers of the Crown are very pointed, as are the replies.

So I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his insinuation or his imputation of a motive, which I believe is unparliamentary.

Madam Speaker: I should like to close the discussion because obviously no question of privilege is involved. I want to remind the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) that the Chair cannot get involved in the quality of a question nor in the intent of a question. If it appears to the hon. member that the question has been set up, this is a matter which must be dealt with between hon. members in the House, certainly not by the Chair.

● (1520)

As for the number of members on my right-hand side of the House that I have recognized, if I gave the hon. member the statistics on the numbers of questions which have been allowed by members on the government side, he would see that in fact they have had a chance to ask very few questions, although they have the same rights as other members of Parliament and have preoccupations concerning their constituents regarding which they like to have questions answered in the House.

Out of 15 or 16 questions today, Liberal members had three questions and no supplementaries, which they never have. I feel members on the government side have more opportunities to meet members of the government in order to discuss some of their matters. Therefore, I have followed the practice of my predecessors of never allowing them to ask supplementary questions. The hon. member must recognize that on some days members on the government side have had no questions at all; most of the time they are allowed two, sometimes three, and I am sorry to say that some days they might be allowed even more than three questions. The allocation of questions must be done fairly, but if some members have sacrificed questions, I do not think they are on my left-hand side of the House; on the contrary they are on the other side.

THE LATE JOE SPONARSKI

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point which is of a rather personal nature. I realize the House does not allow for this, but in this case I should like to refer to the tragic death yesterday of Mr. Joe Sponarski of Winnipeg. Mr. Sponarski was a resident of Portage la Prairie and I knew him over the last two federal elections because he was my opponent. I came to know and respect him as an opponent, and also to know his family and consider them as friends. It was with a sense of sadness that I learned this morning of his death yesterday. I should like to express my condolences, and I know members on all sides of the House would want to join with me in expressing sincere condolences for the tragic bereavement of the Sponarski family.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to House business. Is it the intention of the government to introduce the bill on veterans' pensions later today and, if so, I want the minister to know now that he has our consent to do so. We would take the appropriate steps to change the order to allow that to be done, if he wants to do that. I wanted to ask him his intention and indicate our intention with respect to the veterans' bill.

The second matter concerns the saltfish bill which is second on the order of priorities for today. My understanding is that there may be some feeling in the House that we could proceed with that bill through Committee of the Whole today as it is rather short. I think that would be agreeable as well, if my friend would consider it at the outset.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the agreement made on the first point is very clear. I do not know if the Tory party will give up the day next Wednesday or only postpone it, but whatever they do, we will bring the veterans' bill in for discussion. It is understood among parties that it will be adopted through all stages next Wednesday. This bill will not be introduced today, but as soon as we are in a position to give copies of the bill to hon. members, we will do so. It could be at the end of the day tomorrow or early Wednesday morning.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Fair enough.

Mr. Pinard: On the second point, the Saltfish Act, it is true we have an agreement that, after a speech by each party today, we will go into Committee of the Whole and through third reading also.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, there are two points before us at the moment. With respect to the bill concerning veterans, I hardly need to repeat the offer I have made a good many times, in so far as this party is concerned, to put that bill through quickly. If it is introduced some time tomorrow or even Wednesday morning—so long as we have it by Wednesday—we will see to it that it gets through all stages that day.

With respect to Bill C-7, the saltfish bill, we are prepared for the second reading motion to be altered so that the bill goes into Committee of the Whole. Also we are prepared to see that bill through all stages today.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have just one point. Before calling Bill C-7, the Saltfish Act, there is an agreement that when Bill C-26 is called the bill will be referred to the appropriate standing committee of the House without any debate. I would like Bill C-26 to be called before Bill C-7.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I had intended to say that the bill second in priority today would be Bill C-7. Indeed it is the intention to deal with Bill C-26 very quickly.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Madam Speaker, we are also prepared to deal with Bill C-26 at second reading without debate. We have offered that agreement because it has been made clear to us that, when the bill goes before the standing committee, certain groups that wish to appear before that committee will be given the right to do so. It is on that basis that we are prepared to give second reading to Bill C-26 without debate today.

SMALL LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO REPEAL

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-610, to repeal the Small Loans Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, this bill has been agreed to by members on all sides of the House. Earlier last month there was a negotiation whereby this party and the New Democratic Party agreed with members of the government that we would pass a bill of this nature immediately through all stages. I suggest to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) that we might be prepared to go through all readings of this bill right now.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I would have liked to be consulted first. I should like to look into the matter; I am not in a position to agree today.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PERSONS OF IRANIAN ORIGIN IN CANADA

Question No. 19—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many persons of Iranian origin are in Canada (a) on a visitor's visa (b) on a student's visa (c) on a working visa (d) by landed immigrant status as of the date the answer to this question is prepared?

2. How many applications for visas or landed immigrant status, by Iranians, have been received since the current crisis in Iran has occurred and how many were (a) accepted (b) rejected?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration):

1. (a) 2,538

(b) 1,974 of these are in Canada with authorization to study at a Canadian educational or training institution, and

(c) 273 have authorization to accept specified employment in Canada.

(d) 4,949 Iranian citizens were landed in Canada between 1946 and 1979 inclusive.

Notes: I (a), (b) and (c) show preliminary figures as of April 1, 1980,

II included in the 4,949 in (d) is a preliminary figure of 1,063 Iranian citizens for 1979. In reference to (d), it is impossible to estimate how many of those landed during that period may have since left, since there are no exit controls. 1946 was the first year Iran was treated as a separate country.

2. Total applications received abroad from November 4, 1979 to April 1, 1980—339.

SECRETARY OF STATE—NUMBER OF PERSONS IN THE SX CLASSIFICATION

Question No. 353—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of March 31, 1979 (a) how many persons in the SX classification were employed by the Department of the Secretary of State (b) how many were (i) francophones (ii) females?

2. What are the present totals?

3. Was there a structural change in the department since March 31, 1979, and, if so, what effect did such a change have on the number of SXs employed?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

1. (a) Twenty-two
(b) (i) Thirteen
(ii) None

2. Twenty
(i) Eleven
(ii) None

3. The transfer of Fitness and Amateur Sport to Labour Canada has reduced the number of persons employed in the SX classification.

ENVIRONMENT—EFFLUENT DISCHARGE TO THE NIAGARA RIVER—SCA SERVICES OF LEWISTON, N.Y.

Question No. 800—Mr. de Jong:

1. Did the Department of the Environment take any action with regard to the proposal by S.C.A. Services of Lewiston, New York to dump 2,000,000 gallons of effluent into the Niagara River and, if so, what action was taken?

2. Were representations made to the American government or the state of New York and, if so, to what extent?

3. Is the Minister aware of the plans to dump 2,000,000 gallons of effluent daily into the Niagara River which then flows into Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River?

4. Is the department aware that over 100,000,000 gallons of dangerous wastes are already in storage very near to the Canadian border?

5. Are steps being taken to ensure that Canada's environment is protected from such waste disposal methods and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. Environment Canada officials have been closely following public hearings which are being held in New York State into the proposed discharge of 1,000,000 gallons (U.S.) of treated liquid industrial effluent to the Niagara River. These hearings commenced June 25, 1979, and the department is closely following proceedings as they continue almost one year later.

2. Concerns of the Government of Canada regarding water quality of the Niagara River have been formally presented to the United States Government on three occasions. In the latest of those communications (April 15, 1980), assurances have been sought of the government of the United States that in any and all regulatory activities, including those associated with SCA, United States jurisdictions will respect the obligations undertaken in the Boundary Treaty of 1909 and in the 1978 Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. In addition, on April 18, 1980, the Minister of the Environment met with the administrator of the United States Environmental Protection Agency to urge him to seek a re-examination of the SCA project, in light of the continuing concerns of Canadians and the fact that the Niagara River already carries a substantial pollution load.

3. The Minister of the Environment is aware of plans of SCA Chemical Waste Services Inc. of New York state, to discharge up to 1,000,000 gallons (U.S.) of treated liquid industrial waste to the Niagara River.

4. The department is aware that about 105,000,000 gallons (U.S) of treated liquid industrial waste is in storage at the SCA plant site, four miles from the Niagara River.

5. The following steps are being taken to ensure that the health and environment of Canadians will be protected.

(a) Environment Canada officials are working on a thorough re-examination of the information submitted as evidence in the SCA hearings being held in New York state; the consequences for the Niagara River arising from the conditions in the draft permit; and recent water quality data on the Niagara River.

(b) The technical and scientific expertise of Environment Canada has been offered to Canadians in the preparation of technical arguments which they may be developing for the hearings.

(c) Officials from Environment Canada, in co-operation with the Ontario Ministry of the Environment, are monitoring the SCA hearings.

COUNCIL OF RESOURCE MINISTERS

Question No. 969—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Was a resource ministers council established and, if so (a) on what date (b) what was its purpose (c) what were its accomplishments?

2. Was the council supported by a secretariate and, if so (a) where was it located (b) is it still functioning and, if not, for what reason and on what date was it disbanded?

3. With reference to the joint federal/provincial responsibility in resource management and development, what co-ordinating organization has taken over the responsibilities of the resource ministers secretariat and general secretary?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. Yes.

(a) The Canadian Council of Resource Ministers (CCRM) was incorporated under the Companies Act on March 5, 1964. The name was changed in 1971 to Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers (CCREM).

(b) The purpose was redefined in 1974 by the council members (ministers) as:

> "To stimulate development of compatible and co-operative nature resources and environmental management policies and programs through exchange of information, consultation and debate".

(c) The following comment relative to "accomplishments" appeared in a recent CCREM statement:

> "No systematic evaluation of the effectiveness of CCREM has been attempted, nor has a list of specific achievements been prepared. Both approaches would present problems in evaluating an organization whose objectives were initially, the provision of policy advice and, subsequently, stimulation of co-operative policies. The latter provides the basis for a very generalized evaluation: as the primary forum for consultation among governments at the policy level, CCREM has made a significant contribution to the development of 'compatible and co-operative policies' in the environment and renewable resource field. This evaluation takes into account the complexities of the fields, stemming from mobility of elements such as water and air; the extent of shared jurisdiction and responsibility among governments; and the general character or working relationships among the eleven governments".

2. Yes.

(a) Initially the CCRM Secretariat was located in Montreal. It is currently located at 60 Bloor St. W., Toronto, Ontario.

(b) Yes.

3. Appropriate functions of a "Resource Ministers Secretariat and General Secretary", as defined by ministers during the 1974 reorganization, are carried on through the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers.

FORT NELSON INDIAN RESERVE MINERALS REVENUE SHARING ACT

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT AGREEMENT

Hon. E. F. Whelan (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-26, to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian reserve, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

SALTFISH ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE BORROWING POWER OF CANADIAN SALTFISH CORPORATION

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved that Bill C-7, to amend the Saltfish Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles: We would like to hear the statement of the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. LeBlanc: When things are moving so fast in the House, sometimes you cannot follow everything. I am pleased to introduce for second reading Bill C-7 to amend the Saltfish Act and increase the borrowing authority of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation from $15 million to $30 million.

As hon. members who are familiar with that corporation know, it was given under the related provincial law and legislation the monopoly over the trade of saltfish produced in Newfoundland and Labrador as well as the lower North Shore of Quebec.

[English]

In the past, a $15 million ceiling for borrowing has been adequate for the corporation, but important changes have occurred. The Atlantic fisheries, close to bankruptcy in the mid-1970s, are now on the upswing. As a result of the recovery of codfish resources, the northern cod stocks in particular, a dramatic surge in the supply of saltfish products is forecast. At the same time, vigorous efforts are being made to create new market opportunities for codfish products abroad, especially in countries in southern Europe which were formerly supplied by their own home-based fleets.

While we are not yet sure as to the exact amount of fish which will be harvested by our own offshore fleet in those northern, ice-covered waters, our projections show that codfish landings from inshore and near shore operations alone will exceed 200,000 metric tons by 1985 or earlier in Newfoundland alone. Landings of that quantity represent a product yield in excess of 50,000 tons, which would be 50 per cent more than the 1977-78 supply of cod products from all sources in that province. Conceivably, if there is a substantial catch from the offshore grounds, the total supply could be twice the current level.

At the moment there is general agreement among industry and my department that existing markets—and this is chiefly the U.S. market—are not expansible enough to absorb a supply of that magnitude in frozen product form. Nor will the other potential markets take all of our surplus cod in frozen product form. It is, therefore, wise to consider the principal alternative to frozen products, and that is cured codfish. I consider it prudent to plan for an approximate doubling of salted and dried cod production over the next five years; that is, a supply of at least 20,000 tonnes per year.

[Translation]

When the Canadian Saltfish Corporation was established in 1970, the borrowing ceiling was set at $10 million. In 1976, that total proved insufficient and the actual limit was set at $15 million. Mr. Speaker, we have now reached a point where even that amount is totally insufficient. The prospects for the middle of this decade indicate the annual product yield will reach double the present volume. In addition, inflation complicated the financial problems of the corporation, as for any other commercial business, without the increase in prices for raw materials and processing costs at the rate of 5 per cent to 6 per cent a year.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out the necessity of passing those amendments as soon as possible. Indeed, this bill has for a large part been prepared and approved by the government that preceded ours and by my immediate predecessor. Mr. Speaker, as there could be a strike in the fishing industry in Newfoundland, the Canadian Saltfish Corporation could find itself forced to buy additional quantities of saltfish. And as the terms of reference of the corporation force it to buy all available saltfish, it must have the power to borrow the necessary funds to do that.

[English]

I am sure most hon. members will recall that the corporation is a non-profit organization which employs private firms as its agents for the purchase, processing and storage of cod, then buys the product and sells it on the Canadian and international markets.

Fishermen such as those living on Quebec's north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence who fish from isolated communities in small open boats have a difficult time making a living. Since 1971 the corporation has been the sole buyer of salted cod produced on the North Shore, and since that time has played a major role in the economic well-being of the area.

Over the past seven years the corporation's marketing efforts have resulted in an increase of 200 per cent in the price for salted fish paid to the small boat fishermen. As a part of an integrated operation the corporation supplies salt to the fishermen and advances loans to outfit boats and obtain fishing gear.

I am sure this proposal to increase the corporation's borrowing ceiling will be met with the general agreement of all hon. members, and that they will give their support to Bill C-7 in order that we can amend this act very soon.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, as the minister has indicated, this is a housekeeping bill, one which will meet with the general approval of the House. Indeed, evidence of that is the fact that the House has agreed to dispose of the bill at all stages this afternoon.

As the minister indicated, the bill in fact was introduced into the cabinet by the previous administration, a cabinet in which I had the privilege to hold down the portfolio which my hon. friend now holds. Certainly there is general approval of the need for an increase in the borrowing authority of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation for all the reasons outlined by my friend, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc).

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, normally I would take my seat, but I cannot resist availing myself of the opportunity to express a few of my concerns, which I have already made known to the minister, in respect of the direction of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation.

This is the first opportunity I have had to speak in the House on a fisheries bill. The last bill we had before the House was Bill C-28, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. Unfortunately I was not present for that debate, but if one reads what was said in that debate one would swear, apart from references by my hon. friend opposite, that there was not in fact a change of government or that there had been a new minister in office for the previous nine months.

However, I just say that in passing because I will have an opportunity to lay upon the record at some future date the very substantial accomplishments of the Clark administration during the nine months it held office, particularly in the area of fisheries.

I would also like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the minister's department. As one who had the privilege of being minister of fisheries and oceans, I found within the department a degree of dedication and professionalism which certainly impressed me and which certainly speaks well for the way in which this very important primary industry is being managed under the constitutional authority of the Government of Canada.

From the deputy minister right on down to the fisheries officers in the field, one could not find in any part of the public service of Canada or, indeed, in any other sector of Canadian industry, more professionalism and more dedication than among the men and women who serve the minister in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I take this opportunity to publicly thank them for the very objective way in which they supported me when I had the privilege of holding the portfolio of minister of fisheries and oceans.

Mr. LeBlanc: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I would also like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the founding president of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, Mr. Aidan Maloney, who is now chairman of the Fisheries Prices Support Board and who is a person upon whom I relied heavily for my advice during my tenure as minister. I am sure that my successor feels the same way and that he will utilize Mr. Maloney in the same way in which I did, because he is a very important source of good common sense and advice. He was the founding president when the corporation was set up in 1970, and he served it well.

I would point out to the minister that when the corporation was set up by the Hon. Jack Davis in 1970, there was general approval in the House to the principle of central selling of salt and cured fish. At that time Mr. Davis made it a point of having consultation with all members of the House who were particularly interested in this area of the fishing industry. I suggest to my hon. colleague that apart from the opportunities he will have to co-operate with the members of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, it might be a good idea from time to time if we were to meet with members of the House from all parties who have a special interest in a fishery or fisheries and who come from constituencies in which fisheries play a major role.

In any event, the corporation was set up with the active support of all members of the House. I supported the bill at that time. Indeed, we all did because we felt that setting up this corporation was the only way in which we could save this very important salt fishery. At that time, as the minister said in his opening remarks, the salt fish industry was on the verge of disappearing unless it received special attention. Of course, when dealing with a commodity, obviously the most efficient, expeditious way of dealing with commodity selling is through central desk selling, as in the case of the Canadian Wheat Board.

It is interesting to note that since the corporation was set up in 1970 its sales figures have gone from $6.8 million in 1971 to $24 million in 1979. The minister has already indicated that that figure will grow even more and hence the need for increasing the borrowing authority of the corporation. The reason the corporation will grow is because of increased demands upon it by fishermen, which will come about largely as a result of the recovery of fish stocks and as a result of the failure or inability of the U.S. market to handle 80 per cent to 85 per cent of our fresh frozen fish output, as is now the case.

I might say in passing that I was disturbed to hear a few weeks ago that the EEC had turned down proposals which I had initiated as minister of fisheries and which were supported by my colleague, my successor, with respect to trading off groundfish quotas within our zone for tariff concessions in order for us to compete successfully with the Icelandic and Norwegian companies in that very important European market, which has a potential, I believe, of somewhere around 500,000 metric tons. I was very disturbed to hear that that proposal had been turned down and rejected by the EEC, largely as a result of pressure, I understand, from the United Kingdom.

Unless we can penetrate that market, then not only the saltfish sector will be in trouble but the fresh frozen fish sector will be in very serious trouble, trouble into which it now appears to be heading. I hope that the minister will have an opportunity, either in closing the debate on second reading or in the opportunity which will be afforded him in the committee stage, to tell us exactly what the position is with regard to negotiations with the EEC for our groundfish products into that market to gain fair entry and compete with Iceland and Norway, which now enjoy tariff-free entry.

The minister referred a few minutes ago to increase demands on the corporation as the result of the growth in stocks and the inability of the U.S. market to absorb the total output of Canadian fishermen in Newfoundland and Quebec, which are the only two provinces that are covered by the mandate of the corporation. He also referred to the possibility, indeed the very likely probability, of a strike by the fishermen's union in Newfoundland this summer. Of course, if that happens—and I hope it does not because it is a strike, I am afraid, in which there will be no winners—the fishermen will be able to cure or salt their fish and sell it to the corporation and not be violating the strike, because essentially it will be a strike against the fresh frozen fish processors. However, it will certainly tax the ability of the corporation to handle and market this fish successfully.

I believe that this fish can be marketed successfully because I am convinced that there is a growing demand in the world for good quality saltfish; there is no question about that. We must put the emphasis on quality if we are to compete successfully with Norway and Iceland and other countries which are selling good quality salted fish. Of course, the market is immense. We have barely touched the market, although the corporation has made substantial gains since it was founded in 1970.

That brings me to the concern which I have and the reason I am making this intervention in this debate at this particular time. Shortly after assuming the responsibility of minister of fisheries, I met with the Canadian Saltfish Corporation and expressed to them my concern. First of all, I expressed my continued support for the Canadian Saltfish Corporation and the work it was doing on behalf of Canadian fishermen. I wish to re-emphasize that it is because of my firm belief in the corporation and the responsibility which it has that I am concerned.

My concern arises out of the fact that when I assumed office I discovered, for example, that the corporation was, under contract, marketing fresh frozen codfish from a co-operative in Newfoundland. I indicated to them my reason for not wanting the corporation involved in the marketing of frozen fish, that it was beyond the terms of their mandate. I had all kinds of sympathy for the co-operative which had no way of marketing its fish, and I suggested that such sales should be eased out as opposed to being cut off abruptly in order that the co-operative in question would have an opportunity to make alternate marketing arrangements.

My concern is that such an operation goes beyond the terms of reference of the corporation as they are set out in the act. The corporation agreed that they would not engage in the business of marketing fresh frozen fish. I am now advised that a contract between the corporation and certain small independent processors in Newfoundland is in the making, under which the corporation will handle and market the product of these small processors of fresh frozen fish. In my view, that can only serve to seriously undermine the corporation and public confidence in the corporation.

The minister knows full well that the corporation is not without enemies and that those enemies are not without influence. All they need is an excuse to turn their guns on this very useful and worth-while corporation. That would be regrettable. I believe that if the minister sanctions this marketing arrangement with the small processors he will not, albeit inadvertently, be acting in the best interests of the corporation. I believe the small processors have a right to marketing but they have a problem in that they have to compete with the large processors. There is nothing to stop them from coming together and forming a co-operative marketing company, however.

If the minister wants to bring in a bill to set up a company to market fresh frozen fish, then we will deal with it on its own terms. Or if the minister wants to bring in an amendment to the Saltfish Act to make provision for the marketing of fresh frozen fish, we will deal with that on its own terms as well. I hope, however, that the minister does not use the act establishing the corporation for these purposes.

I should like to quote in support of my argument from the statute establishing the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, Mr. Speaker. Under the heading "Purpose and Powers", section 7 of the act reads as follows:

> The corporation is established for the purpose of improving the earnings of primary producers of cured saltfish by curing fish and trading in and marketing cured fish and the byproducts of fish curing and, in addition to the powers conferred by other provisions of this act and by any other act, has for that purpose power to
> (a) buy fish and dress, salt, dry or package it, or otherwise prepare cured fish and the byproducts of fish curing for market;
> (b) buy cured fish and the byproducts of fish curing and package or otherwise prepare such fish and byproducts for market;

There is no reference there or anywhere in the act to giving the corporation authority to buy fish in its fresh frozen state and to sell it in that form. According to the act it can specifically only buy and sell cured fish and, generally speaking, that means cured codfish. It can sell other species as long as it is cured—for example, pickled herring or salted salmon, which it now sells from the Labrador fishery. Nowhere in the act, however, is there authority for the corporation to sell fresh frozen fish. If the corporation does that, as it has in the past, and if it agrees to act as marketing agent for small processors of fresh frozen fish, then it is acting beyond the terms of its mandate and certainly leaves itself open to litigation.

I want to repeat, Mr. Speaker, that my concern stems from the fact that I believe in the corporation. I believe it has an excellent future and that it is under good management now, as it has been in the past. As the minister knows, it has a good board of directors. It is a Crown corporation responsible to Parliament through the minister, and hence we as parliamentarians have a special responsibility for it. It is because of my concern for the future of the corporation that I want to express these arguments and to state categorically that I believe the minister and his corporation would be acting outside its mandate—indeed, would be acting illegally—if the corporation were to enter into an agreement with small processors or anyone else to sell products other than cured and/or salted fish products.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one further reference and that is to the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, which was the model for this corporation. As the minister knows, when this party was in office it undertook a review of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. We met with the western provinces and obtained a general agreement with them for such a review. Indeed, they agreed to name senior officials to a committee that would undertake the review. The review was to have been completed in April when there was to be a meeting of provincial ministers with the federal government in Winnipeg.

We have heard nothing of it since that time but I know the review has been completed. I wonder if the minister might take the opportunity that is open to him when he replies on second reading, or at committee stage or third reading, to tell the House exactly what has happened to that review and the role or mandate of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. I hope the minister will also take the opportunity to tell the House exactly what the position is with regard to negotiations on tariff concessions for Canadian groundfish in the very important market of the European Economic Community.

I wish the corporation well, Mr. Speaker, but I hope it does not get involved in activities that will bring it criticism. That is what will happen if it allows itself to be lured—even if for good, understandable and commendable reasons—into what in my opinion would be an illegal activity, the marketing of fresh frozen fish.

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on Bill C-7 as I appreciate the necessity of increasing the borrowing power of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation. The minister outlined some of the needs and reasons for increasing the borrowing requirement. The only criticism I have is that he did not elaborate on the needs of the Saltfish Corporation.

The 200-mile extended jurisdiction for our fisheries generated a great deal of enthusiasm in Canada and raised many expectations, particularly in the fishing industry. As well as the required capacity to process the stocks from the 200-mile zone, the minister outlined the increases expected by Newfoundland alone, particularly of northern cod which is in great demand. There is some controversy about who should harvest that cod but certainly the Saltfish Corporation has an opportunity to improve the quality of its fishery and the product that it can export.

Other reasons have been alluded to in the annual reports of the Saltfish Corporation. I am sorry that the minister did not expand on some of those requirements, particularly the improvement of quality. There has been talk at times of the need for more cold storage, more drying capacity, and a different kind of fleet to harvest the catch, or at least some onboard storage and handling facilities. I would have thought the minister would have taken this opportunity to inform the House, the public gallery and the public in general in more detail of his expectations for the Saltfish Corporation and its market.

I hope that some of the money being sought will be used to increase the research done by the corporation into the kind of product it can sell. This is an important matter, particularly when other nations are increasing their capacity as well. Others have a 200-mile limit and can manage their fishery just as well as we can manage ours. They will be looking for similar markets for their product.

Another place where the minister might give some direction is in regard to processing techniques and improvements in saltfish preparation to meet market demands. The $30 million is to be spent on improved means of preparation of the product. I hope that drying facilities will be provided by the corporation to companies in coastal communities in order to maintain employment in the onshore fishery that is so dependent on saltfish.

I should like to congratulate a former minister, the Hon. Jack Davis, who set up the Saltfish Corporation in 1970. It helped preserve those coastal communities at a time when private companies were finding that they could get a better price for fresh cod than for saltfish and so were decreasing its production. Indeed, I think the establishment of the Saltfish Corporation has justified its existence. We are now getting to the point where the Saltfish Corporation is getting some of the same benefits as some of the private companies in increased stocks, and hopefully an increased size of stock.

● (1600)

This brings me to a point that I would like the minister to explain; perhaps he will when we get into Committee of the Whole. It concerns the process by which we will improve the quality of the stock and the product that we sell in the United States market, in southern Europe and possibly in southern Brazil. The interdepartmental report filed in May, 1979, indicated that one of the concerns of the corporation and of the department was the small size of the cod that we are catching in Canada and the need to get a larger cod for a better product. The suggestion was made that perhaps we will have to diversify our present fishery. Rather than concentrating on the fresh frozen market of the United States particularly, as the major companies have, we should seek diversified markets. This party wholeheartedly supports that concept. We can no longer continually depend on a major market in the United States, a market that is attempting to meet its requirements from its own fishermen. By getting into the saltfish business and seeking different markets, we can agree and certainly support that concept. I would have liked the minister to explain how we are going to get a larger cod for the saltfish market.

The report suggests there is a possibility that the offshore fleet can perhaps provide some of the largest stock for the Saltfish Corporation and the agents of that corporation. I would have liked the minister to explain how he perceives that coming about.

The former minister who spoke recently indicated in a press release in The Globe and Mail in November last year that there may be an opportunity for the private companies, because of the expanding interest in saltfish, to get back to the saltfish business. I would like the present minister to comment on how he perceives the private companies and the larger corporations now coming back into saltfish marketing either through the corporation or in competition with that corporation, after having abandoned the Newfoundland and Quebec fishermen a number of years ago for higher profits in another field. Are we going to allow private companies in Quebec and Newfoundland to come into competition with the Saltfish Corporation and possibly reduce its effectiveness in terms of marketing that product on world markets? Perhaps we can ask the minister in committee if that is a possibility.

As I see it, the important thing for the minister, his department and the Saltfish Corporation is to meet growing demands. The minister made it sound as though our markets are rapidly expanding. Certainly the Puerto Rico market is the major Saltfish Corporation market. There are two countries that bought a great deal of saltfish from Canada in 1978, yet from the annual reports of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation they show a disturbing reduction in the amount of product those countries purchased in 1979. I am referring to Jamaica and Trinidad. In 1978 Jamaica purchased 3,826,000 pounds of saltfish from the corporation. In 1979 it purchased one million pounds. In 1978 Trinidad purchased over two million pounds of saltfish from the corporation and in 1979 it purchased only 1.4 million pounds. Trinidad's reduction in purchases is not of the same magnitude as that of Jamaica's, but it is still a significant reduction in the market at that level. The annual report does not indicate why there was any reduction of purchases by Jamaica or Trinidad. It would be interesting for us to find out if it is a matter of quality of product, a pricing problem, tariffs that have been imposed, or what the conditions are that are reducing exports to those two countries.

Between 1978 and 1979 total shipments were reduced from 20 million pounds to 18 million pounds. Again, this indicates that the Saltfish Corporation is not expanding its market as we may have wished and may have been led to believe by the minister's comments. It is a disturbing reduction in the total exports. We will, of course, be interested to find out what 1980 brings to the Saltfish Corporation.

While fishermen are getting better prices for their product, we do not seem to be expanding the amount of product that we are selling, at least in terms of tonnage. This is certainly true domestically and in the export field.

We support the Saltfish Corporation and we support the bill before us today which will allow the Saltfish Corporation to expand to meet the needs of fishermen and processors in the industry. We hope that the Saltfish Corporation will be able to develop a marketing strategy that will enable it to compete on the world market with other nations who will be looking for the same markets as Canada.

The $30 million should be enough to assure fishermen an adequate income and as well be enough to ensure that we do provide the facilities and give leadership, in terms of processing and fishing to meet quality standards, something which the minister and his department have been establishing over the last few years.

What is needed in the maritimes and Atlantic provinces is leadership from the minister and an indication of where he is going. We would like an elaboration of where he is going so that processors, fishermen and people who are involved in the marketing aspect know precisely what this minister intends to do with regard to fleet development, processing, quaity standards and inspection, so that we can have a determined effort on the part of the federal and provincial governments in conjunction with the federal government, processors and fishermen. We will be anxiously awaiting further announcements from the minister as well as some elaboration from the minister on these points when we go into Committee of the Whole.

[Translation]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved that Bill C-7, to amend the Saltfish Act, be now read the second time and, with unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

[English]

On clause 1—Limitation.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Chairman, it might help our discussion if I were to answer some of the points made. Of course, hon. members may wish to ask further questions.

I certainly share the support expressed by my predecessor for the Saltfish Corporation. In fact, if I have one slight regret it is that it does not seem to have been scheduled as one of the items to be considered by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. I know that the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation will be before the committee this week and I expect that the question of the report which the former minister raised will be addressed there. The fact is, however, that the corporation has been doing the job assigned by two provinces—Newfoundland, the leading province, and Quebec, whose part of the fishery is within the limits of the corporation. They have consistently appointed good board members; with the other appointments which, I might say, have traditionally been quite free of partisanship, the corporation has done a good job.

The former minister asked me to comment on the penetration of the European Economic Community frozen and saltfish markets. We have had some success in penetrating the European Common Market with saltfish. In the area of the negotiations which are taking place I can tell the committee that the last group which went to Europe was there some ten days ago. Since I was in British Columbia until last week I have not had a full report, but today I had a conversation with some of the industry advisers who attended the meetings and it is obvious that the desire of Canada to sell fish to the Common Market countries is very strong.

The question really will boil down to what price the community will want us to pay for access to their markets, and what price we will be willing to pay in relation to their access to the Canadian fishing zones. That is the type of trade-off which will have to be fully discussed with representatives of the industry.

I might say that on the Canadian side, especially on the part of the fishermen and processors, there is a little bit less enthusiasm about the sort of trade-offs that are being talked about because the Canadian industry feels it can process most of the fish available. I have pointed out, however, that we may catch every fish in the zone but we may also need some very large warehouses. That is where there may well be honest differences of opinion and I hope to hold further discussions with the industry in the weeks to come.

One of the difficulties we face—and I think this applies to comments made by the critic for the New Democratic Party and, of course, by the former minister—is in relation to quality. I would not want to be misunderstood and indicate that we are not selling good quality fish. We are. The fact is that very often quality tends to be defined in certain markets in terms of size, the sort of product which is very attractive to consumers, especially in what I would call the luxury markets. Of course, much of this fish is caught by large trawlers and is processed immediately through the frozen fish plants. The corporation this year offered an incentive price for larger fish and has been having good results from this offer. I think this tendency will increase since these high quality, premium products tend to act as leaders into the markets we hope to penetrate. The corporation, of course, is not at liberty to be all that selective as to size, since by law it must buy all the fish offered to it by fishermen if it is of acceptable quality.

The previous minister raised the question of a few small, independent processors of frozen fish who approached the corporation and asked it to help them in marketing their product. I was immediately advised of this and pondered at some length whether, in reacting to this sort of request, I should allow this to take place. I might say to the committee that I agreed, taking into account the precedent of the province of Newfoundland. For some years the Saltfish Corporation has been acting as the seller of northern-caught char and some herring, and since the government of Newfoundland is one of the principal partners in the corporation, it did not seem to object too strenuously. Also, this was not a direct approach by the corporation, and there would be no financial exposure of the corporation, which means that this could reflect on the income of fishermen who are served by the corporation. I might say, though, that my predecessor forgot to point out that one of the aims of the corporation was to increase the income of fishermen. Recognizing that this was not a precedent which should be taken lightly, I did indicate to the corporation that if the board approved its getting involved at the request of a few small processors, until such time as there was a mechanism to create the sort of organization for marketing that the hon. member for St. John's East mentioned, then I would "tolerate" it—and I use that word in quotation marks.

Now, it may have been that in doing this I trespassed somewhat, but I think that the board, acting upon its responsibilities, did agree that in this case the corporation could act as an adviser without exposure to itself, therefore helping the income of the fishermen. I do not see this as a long-lasting precedent. I think that the orderly marketing approach is now generally accepted. I might say that I had some excellent discussions on this issue with representatives of the Newfoundland processors at lunchtime this very day. Orderly marketing would, in fact, help to avoid this sort of situation and this appears to me to be highly desirable. But again having seen in the past that the corporation did act a little outside its mandate in the purchase of char and herring, I thought there could be a certain amount of tolerance in this case.

Mr. Chairman, in commenting on some of the points made by the critic for the New Democratic Party, I might indicate to him that one of the reasons there has been a drop in the Jamaican and Trinidad markets is the scarcity of hard currency in those countries, especially Jamaica, which has led to dramatic cuts in their purchases from Canada. This is certainly part of the explanation.

As for the drop in the amount of fish marketed by the corporation, I might say that the corporation to a certain extent plays a passive role in the sense that if a fisherman wants to sell to the frozen industry, which in 1978 was extremely vigorous and because of our dollar was selling everything it could get its hands on, then the corporation does not go out and compete directly with the preference of the fisherman.

The hon. member also talked about quality. I agree with him. I think the new president of the corporation has undertaken something of a crusade to improve quality, although I would not want this to be seen at all as a reflection on the previous authorities of the corporation. But the corporation does recognize that if it is going to invade what I call the high luxury market, that is, a market where high prices can be demanded, it must deliver the sort of product the client wants. Considerable efforts are being made in this area.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that saltfish prices held very well during the 1974 crisis when frozen fish was in trouble. That indicates that even when the frozen fish market is very good it is wise for Canada to have the Saltfish Corporation in good health, able to provide an alternative for fishermen and also able to maintain a window on markets which have stood up well over the years. I have already indicated that the size of fish is important and that some incentives are being offered this year.

• (1620)

I think, Mr. Chairman, that I will stop there and try to answer questions.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong the debate, but the minister did make reference in his reply to my question to the powers of the corporation and the fact that these powers were being exceeded by any attempt to market products other than cured fish. The minister said that I did not define what I meant by cured fish.

It so happens that the act clearly defines what it means by cured fish, and it might be worth entering this into the record. The interpretation section of the act, section 2, states that cured fish means fish that has received curing. Curing means processing with salt or with salt and drying. So clearly the act is quite specific. It is quite confining in terms of what the corporation may do, and the minister uses as a precedent the fact that, acting on the request of the government of Newfoundland, the corporation is involved in marketing certain products which are caught by fishermen on the coast of Labrador, namely, char and herring.

Some of that char is cured, and so is some of the herring. Some of it is also marketed in the fresh frozen state; but that is a relatively small amount of fish we are talking about from individual fishermen. Here we are talking about entering into an agreement with small processor companies which are able, quite frankly, to stand on their own feet in terms either of entering into agreements with larger companies for marketing purposes or banding together and forming a marketing co-operative which, I suggest, they should look seriously at. Or perhaps the minister may want, as I suggested in my remarks at second reading, to bring in an amendment to this act or a measure providing for marketing in certain cases for fresh frozen fish. We would certainly be prepared to deal with that.

The minister referred to the fact that this corporation will not be coming before the standing committee, and the reason it is not coming before the standing committee is that the committee anticipated this bill's coming before the House and, hence, the only chance we will have in this session to deal with the corporation is in the course of the debate on this particular bill.

I have no further comments to make other than to say that my party supports the bill. It is a housekeeping bill. We wish the corporation well, and we are so supportive of the corporation in what it is doing and we are so confident about the future of the corporation in terms of the potential for good salted fish that we see no reason why the minister should expose the corporation to criticism from those who are ready to criticize it by entering into such an agreement. Believe me, sir, I have great sympathy for the small processors. I happen to know them. I know the problem they have, and I am supportive of any measures the government may want to take to ensure the survival of these small processors. I think it is important that these small processing companies survive.

I share the concern of my hon. friend opposite about the corporate concentration which has been taking place in the industry over the past few years. This corporate concentration does not bode well for the future of the industry, so far as the individual fisherman is concerned. I think the best opportunity we have to ensure that the individual fishermen will be adequately protected is to ensure that the industry remains competitive. The only way the industry can remain competitive, in my view, is so long as we have in place policies which will create a climate whereby the smaller processor cannot just exist but thrive and prosper.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's point is well taken. In fact, we did look at the possibility of bringing in an amendment which might have authorized the corporation to widen its mandate, and for the very same reason the hon. member has expressed I felt that this would drag the corporation into the sort of debate which really should be settled not in that area but when and if the government brings in legislation to create orderly marketing, which could be a form of export licences, some other groupings, consortia or some other approaches which are now the subject of considerable discussion between my department, the provinces and the industry.

I think the hon. member's point that this could be an excuse for an attack against the corporation, or for this sort of amendment to be brought in or for a practice to be generalized, is a point which is well taken. If I had to err, I would prefer to err on the side of trying to help a few very small processors, who at the moment have no legal framework in which they can associate.

In fact, it might be that in the new legislation in which some groupings are created or are formed the Crown corporations in one way or another could act as a sort of umbrella for small processors who have nowhere to go and who are a bit worried about the type of concentration which my predecessor spoke about. However, I think these are issues which should be the subject of a wider debate. That being said, I recognize the hon. member's point.

Mr. Miller: Mr. Chairman, on the point of orderly marketing, I have just spent three days in Nova Scotia and met many processors who are concerned particularly about what an orderly marketing board might be. I do not want to get into a prolonged discussion about it today, but one of the concerns the fishery has is not knowing where the department or where the minister is going. I think it behooves the minister to make some of those critical decisions so that processors and fishermen have a better idea of the direction of the department and so that they can get on with the process of catching more fish and processing those fish for bigger and better markets.

I would like just to ask the minister if he could elaborate on the kinds of facilities that he sees this $30 million may be helping to initiate more than to provide. Does he see those facilities in the present processing plants that we have in Newfoundland, Labrador and on the northern shore of Quebec, or does he see an increase in the number of processing plants for saltfish in Newfoundland particularly, tending to be supportive of smaller communities, rather than the larger companies getting into saltfish through the corporation and marketing through that corporation? I think it is important to understand the desire of the people of Newfoundland to maintain as much as possible the type of fleet that is associated with the community.

I suppose my biggest concern right now is the increased funding going into the support of those processors which are already there, and if we expand our markets to increase the number of small processing plants in areas which perhaps are experiencing high unemployment as a result both of a lack of fish in those areas and a lack of markets for the fish.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni raises the point of orderly marketing. I think it was about two and a half years ago that I indicated that as the stocks were recovering I thought the Canadian industry should improve its co-ordination in the field of marketing, that we should not continue to have two or three dozen Canadian processors selling fish to brokers in competition with each other, and that our best competitors—I am thinking of the Japanese, Norwegian and Icelanders—had in fact co-ordinated and organized their foreign marketing efforts and were outcompeting us.

At the time the industry requested that it be given a chance to explore this and to come up with a voluntary approach at first. I felt that this occasion should be provided, but now even the industry does recognize that, although the voluntary approach has much to be said for it, those who are not voluntary in fact can become the culprits or the people responsible for fire sales and price cutting which, of course, weakens everybody else in the foreign markets. They can also sometimes be responsible for shipments which may not be of the highest quality.

So there is a general recognition that we should have a more organized and a more orderly marketing framework. On the west coast, the hon. member's coast, this is seen as being less necessary, and I suspect that the industry in that area feels that it can handle marketing with perfect competence. In fact, historically it has done quite a good job and I do not want to take anything away from them. That is why I see the possibility of formations taking place more on a regional basis than otherwise, and it may be that at one point the British Columbia industry will want us to put around some of their operations the type of framework which other countries have which strengthen their presence in foreign markets.

There is no doubt that we are in a situation in which, I think, my colleague the Minister of Justice, when he was in the Treasury Board, used to say that everybody wants to go to heaven but no one wants to die. So everyone wants Canadians to get the best market for fish on condition that this does not limit their freedom. Of course, this would not be imposed for ideological reasons. I think the idea is gaining ground now.

Canada should have the sort of strength in the world market for fish that comes from its advantages so far as resources are concerned.

The hon. member seemed to indicate that the $30 million in this bill is intended for construction and other purposes. The fact is that it is a credit increase. Although the corporation does help some of its agents with loans better to equip the facilities or to improve them, in fact it advances money to fishermen against the sale of their product or to the agents who act on behalf of the fishermen under contract with the corporation. The corporation is not very heavily involved in the provision and management of facilities, except in very isolated communities. In fact, it has provided salt and equipment and it has helped fishermen become organized in the sharing of machinery, etc. In that sense it has played an activist role, but usually only in response to a group of fishermen getting together and wanting the corporation to help them become organized. I have always encouraged the corporation to pay a great deal of attention to the isolated communities and to individuals who, with their families, often create a small but good little economic unit by salting very good quality fish as a cottage industry, including the use of their own wash line on which to stretch the fish, using their own back yards. Historically, this has been a successful venture. I see no reason why the cottage industry should not be encouraged.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I have no more questions to ask of the minister but I listened attentively to see if the minister would deal with the question raised by the NDP critic with respect to the role of processors in handling saltfish through the corporation. I do not think the minister dealt with the issue. I should like to bring the minister up to date on the recommendations of the MacKenzie report, which was a working group that was formed to look into the operations of the corporation. MacKenzie recommended in his report that—> —a way must be found to foster innovative action by private traders under the aegis of the corporation . . . the initiative and energy of firms in the private trade must be enlisted for the renewal of the saltfish trade.

He was basing this recommendation on the resurgence of 2J+3KL or northern cod stock. I wonder if a way has been found to accommodate private traders.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Chairman, to my knowledge a way has not been found, although there has been increased co-operation in some cases where commercial enterprises had operations in isolated communities and where salting fish was a good way of utilizing the product. I might say that my memory is a little vague with regard to consultation. I remember the MacKenzie report very well. At the time we were trying to see if we could in fact strengthen the corporation in terms of large fish which many of the private industry processors received from their fishermen. Some of the large fish could be segregated out and used for salting. One of the breakdowns which occurred is that the industry did indicate it would not feel compelled to buy all the fish which a fisherman would bring in. This created a situation where a company which was involved in the salting process could have an advantage over the corporation, which by law has to buy even fairly small sized fish. I suspect it is in this sort of debate that negotiations did not progress as much as we would have liked. There is no doubt that if the frozen market slows down, as it very well might, then the industry which a couple of years ago was doing extremely well in the frozen market might want to have a larger share in the salting operation.

Frankly, I have not seen the results of the period that intervened between my two "incarnations". I will have to check the records to see the point at which we arrived, and of course I will answer questions in the parliamentary committee if this question comes up. However, I will first check to see where we stand on this issue.

GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

MEASURE RESPECTING RELOCATION

The House resumed, from Thursday, July 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-13, respecting the relocation of government agencies, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words on Bill C-13 which has already been debated in the House on a couple of occasions. I should like to support the complaint which the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) made at the beginning of his first speech on this bill when he drew attention to the fact that far too often around here the government acts and then brings in the legislation afterwards. That is, in effect, what is happening in respect of this bill. Many decisions have been made and practically implemented before we get the bill to give parliamentary authorization thereto. As I say, this happens not only in respect of this piece of legislation, but it happens quite often. I think the government should be more respectful of the rights of Parliament in this regard.

● (1640)

As a matter of fact, something like this is happening on Parliament Hill right now. As hon. members know, we took over the East Block a couple of years ago in the belief that it would be a building for additional office space for members of the House of Commons. The Department of Public Works has had its people in there renovating it and getting it ready for occupancy, but already an argument has developed as to who is to be moving into the East Block.

Mr. Cullen: I wish there was no argument. I would be quite happy to go there if no one else wants to.

Mr. Knowles: I am not getting involved in the argument personally. I started off in this building a long time ago, and I intend to stay in this building for a long time yet.

Mr. Cullen: Until the next election.

Mr. Knowles: A lot longer than that. But it bothers me, although we have been told members of the House of Commons have priority over there, that that was the reason the building was taken over, that apparently some government people think it is up to the government to have first say as to who goes in there. Then, who start to rear their heads around here?

Mr. Nystrom: The senators.

Mr. Cullen: Do you mean the people from the other place?

Mr. Knowles: The senators, the people from the other place. Before there is a decision as to who is to go there, some people have started to move in already. I understand some ministers are over there and some other people have accommodation. I just do not think it should operate in that way. However, that is an example of action preceding the decision, and I do not like it whenever it takes place.

With respect to Bill C-13, hon. members will not be surprised if I say that I favour its general principle, but there is one instance of a removal from this city to another part of the country about which I am still unhappy. As I say, I agree with the general principle that offices of the Government of Canada should be in various parts of this country, that everything does not need to be congregated here in the national capital area. For example, we have the Mint in Winnipeg. I do not think it has done anything to the money supply one way or another that the Mint is out there instead of here.

An hon. Member: Do they mint coins of the same quality?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend questions the quality of the coins, but that is not because the Mint is out in Winnipeg. As I say, moving some of these departments out and giving different parts of the country the opportunity to have government employment in their areas is a good idea, and I support the general principle. However, before any department is moved, I think serious consideration should be given to its functions and to the question whether people will be affected adversely.

That is the feeling I still have about moving the Department of Veterans Affairs from this capital city. I think it should have been kept here. I think the nature of its operations and the accessibility of its branches and divisions in Ottawa is something which is important. I recognize it is too late to argue about that. The Liberal government that was in power in the Thirtieth Parliament decided that the move was to take place. The Conservative government that was in power in the Thirty-first Parliament endorsed the decision and decided to go ahead with the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs and its associated bodies to Charlottetown. Now the bill is before us, so it is an accomplished fact and there is no point in making further comments about that decision.

I rise to make a very strong plea that veterans not be asked to pay the price of this move. We had it brought out in the last meeting of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs that the backlog of veterans' cases—and I am referring to veterans who have disabilities and are seeking disability pensions—has increased in the last few months. We were given various reasons for that, such as the death of certain doctors, the difficulty of recruitment and so on. It was never said to us in plain language that it had something to do with the move of the department from Ottawa to Charlottetown, but most of us know it has something to do with that move. As I say, I am not trying to stop the move. There is not much point; it cannot be stopped. But in order to keep up with the service to which veterans are entitled, if it means more money will have to be spent, then let it be spent by the government and by all the people of Canada instead of making veterans pay the cost of this move. Every time a veteran's disability pension is delayed, an injustice is done to him. Even if he gets it down the road a bit, justice delayed is justice denied. If it becomes necessary to increase the number of people employed by the Canadian Pension Commission, the war veterans allowance board or the Department of Veterans Affairs itself in order to keep up the service to veterans, then let us increase that number of employees and let us provide the service they are entitled to receive.

I was pleased from an exchange today that it was made clear that the bill regarding veterans, and particularly their widows, will be brought in on Wednesday. Most of us knew that it was to come in some day this week in any case, but it is good to have it, to have it for sure and to get it passed into law on Wednesday of this week. But it is not enough to provide these things in the law, particularly in the Pension Act, if veterans will suffer delays in getting the awards to which they are entitled. The very real danger is that the transferring of the offices of all branches and agencies connected with veterans affairs to Charlottetown will have that effect.

I do not see my friend from Charlottetown who I believe intended to speak on this matter and perhaps be on the other side, but I say to him that I am not arguing either against the principle of decentralizing offices or that anything more should be done to try to stop this move. The Royal Canadian Legion and other veterans' organizations did their best. All right, the decision has been made, but my plea today is very clear. The decision having been made, if extra money has to be spent and extra persons have to be employed, be they doctors, clerks or what have you, so that veterans will get the same service from the department which is partly here and partly in Charlottetown as they would have got had the department stayed here, let those employees be hired and let that money be spent.

That is my plea, and probably it can be made with respect to some other departments as well. The superannuation branch is in Moncton now. That is not closely parallel to the case of the veterans, but there too, if this results in delays in dealing with superannuation cases, let us try and make up for those delays by employing whatever staff is necessary.

That is the comment I wish to make on this bill. I hope the problem of my friend, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen), or the problem of anyone else in getting over to the East Block will be resolved. I hope the principle will be established soon that these things are decided before they take place and not afterwards. I hope that in so far as the Department of Veterans Affairs is concerned it will get all of the help, backing and money it needs to provide the services to our veterans to which they are entitled, wherever the headquarters of that department may be located.

● (1650)

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I will just take one or two minutes to make a comment on the bill we are discussing today which will change the word "Ottawa" to "national capital", a change which, of course, reflects more accurately the country in terms of where the headquarters of certain government agencies, such as the Economic Council of Canada, and others are situated. I just want to say one or two words about the national capital and about the public service while we are discussing this bill.

I am very concerned as a person who comes from western Canada that the national capital be as reflective as possible of the country as a whole, that institutions be as reflective as possible of the country as a whole and that the departments of government be reflective of this whole country.

One of the problems we have, and this was said just a short time ago by the Speaker of the other place, the Hon. Jean Marchand, is that our country is extremely large, with a majority of Canadians now really getting from one region to another, whether it is from western Canada to Ontario or Quebec, let alone the Atlantic provinces, or vice versa. Because the country is so large I think it is doubly important that the people who work in this city for the taxpayers, those who work in Hull or in any part of the national capital area, try to be good mirrors of the country as a whole, or as reflective as possible of the country as a whole.

I said in this House a few weeks ago that often the centre tries to impress its values on regions of the country rather than the regions channelling their values and attitudes to the centre, having the centre reflect the entire country. A former very respected judge in Quebec, Robert Cliche, talked about a certain situation a few years ago. He mentioned the fact that CMHC was designing houses with very small kitchens, and one of the problems was that in Quebec the kitchen is the centre for socializing, a family centre and a place where everybody gathers and has conversations. Apparently that is very traditional for Quebeckers. CMHC had not recognized this fact. The kitchens of houses were designed here in Ottawa by a central agency and were uniform right across the country. Apparently what was good for the designers in Ottawa was supposed to be good for the country as a whole.

That is just a little example of what I am trying to say. This is a country with many communities, which makes us something much more than the totality of them all. To make this country, which is really fantastic, more reflective of those communities, we must find that reflection here in this city. All those values and all those differences which we cherish should be reflected here.

One or two other things along that line I feel are important. When the government, Crown corporations or agencies of the government are hiring people, they should include, along with the merit principle and everything else, the idea of hiring people from various regions and from among the various peoples of Canada. For example, the Indian people of this country have the need to be more directly represented in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In other words, there should be more Indian people having more of a say over governing departments and agencies that directly affect their lives.

I happened to notice the other day a report from one of the government agencies which indicated that the Quebec people, the Atlantic people and the people of western Canada are underrepresented in the federal public service in terms relative to their numbers in the population as a whole. That is one thing the people who do the hiring in the federal government should be thinking of in trying to bring more people from all regions into key positions in the government.

The same thing should take place in respect of Francophones in the public service. We have a special committee of the House now looking at bilingualism and Francophones in the public service. I will not go into details in that regard. Many of these problems were catalogued by Max Yalden in the official languages report. It showed that, in terms of middle and upper echelon positions in the Government of Canada, Francophones are vastly underrepresented.

I did not want this bill to go through without making a few of those points. We have to strive very hard to make the national capital a reflection of this country. Such a reflection was summarized very well by the Pepin-Robarts report of a year or so ago. It referred to duality and regionalism. That is probably as good a report as any to summarize what Canada is really all about. The things referred to in that report should be symbolized here in the national capital. In other words, the national capital should become as much as possible a microcosm of the country as a whole. I know that is very difficult to do in a country so vast and geographically so difficult to move around in, particularly at a time when it is much cheaper to get a chartered flight from Mirabel to London or Paris than it is to take an aircraft from one coast of this country to the other. These are things we have to change. I just wanted to make those few comments in passing.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, June 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill S-6, to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to speak on Bill S-6. I and other members on this side of the House have waited a long time for the presentation of this bill, which will give us an opportunity to discuss something very important to the farmers of western Canada; that is, the price they receive for the production of grain. This bill originated in 1974, six years ago.

That is a considerable time to wait for additional discussion about the price of something as important as grain.

In looking at the clock, Mr. Speaker, I see that it is approaching five. May I now call it five o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin)—Agriculture—Request for hearings on establishment of national potato marketing agency; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)—National Revenue—Effect of new customs regulations on small business; the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Administration of Justice—Charge of rape—Defence of consent—Amendment to Criminal Code.

Postal Service

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

Item no. 8, in the name of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty); shall the item stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POST OFFICE

ADVISABILITY OF RESTORING ADEQUATE LEVELS OF SERVICE

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of restoring adequate levels of postal service to new residential communities and to guarantee that there will be no further cutbacks in postal service.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the motion I would like to reflect on some of the history of what has taken place within the postal department. For many years postal service in the country was provided by trains which operated 24 hours a day and seven days a week. As the trains rattled across the country postal workers were busy sorting out the mail and dropping it off in various communities. We have now adopted a new system of carrying the mail; airplanes deliver the mail to various communities. I have visited some of the post offices to see exactly what is taking place.

The reason I put forward this motion is that airplanes are bringing in large bundles of mail, for example, into the Vancouver distribution centre. This centre is unable to handle this mail and to carry out the function of sorting it. When there is an overload mail is bundled up and thrown into a truck which transports it back to the interior to smaller communities. The post offices in these smaller communities are usually understaffed and it is all they can do to carry out the work of servicing the community, let alone carry this extra burden. At one of the post offices I visited there were over 200 pounds of extra mail which had been sent for sorting, which is to be done after the postal workers have carried out their regular duties. This is something which is going on throughout the entire territory.

When something is lost in the post office, and this occurs quite frequently, an investigation is begun. The people are usually told that there is no insurance on their postal package, so there is no compensation available. The postal worker in many cases is held to blame for the poor service.

The introduction of my motion is to serve two purposes, both of which are contained therein. One purpose is to ensure that there are no further cutbacks in postal service; the other is to ensure that all residential communities are guaranteed the same level of postal service.

The post office is a vital institution in our small communities. Small towns do not have the same choice of postal services as are found in large communities. The larger communities, for example, have drugstores which help the post office. Smaller communities do not have home delivery, a service which is found in larger communities. For this reason residents of small towns use their post office much more than do the residents of larger towns. Saturday service is essential to smaller communities because in many cases the people are working away from the smaller towns and come to town on a Saturday specifically to do business with the post office and their shopping. It is imperative to these smaller communities that an all-day Saturday service be made available.

Post office lobbies must be left open after hours so that residents may pick up their mail. I think specifically of a small community like Golden where the post office closes at five o'clock. In Golden many loggers work out in the bush and when they come in after five o'clock they are unable to get into the lobby of the post office in order to get their mail out of the postal box. There have been suggestions that this is because of vandalism in post offices. If that is the case, then we should be looking to the law enforcement agencies. We do not close our stores because there is vandalism, nor should we close the post office. It is strictly a matter of law enforcement. Those postal services should be open for a decent time in the evening so that people may pick up their mail.

I received a commitment from the minister that there would not be such a cutback, but to date the situation has not been corrected. The government must make a commitment not to close post offices in such areas.

Another area at which we must take a serious look is the importance of ensuring that all communities receive the same kind of service. In new subdivisions door to door delivery often ends on one side of the street, and because someone was unfortunate enough to build a new home across the street or a block away, their mail is put in a box which is a half a mile away from the house and they must pick it up. However, these unfortunates pay the same taxes, so they should be given the same opportunities and the same services as the group within the delivery zone. How can the government defend a policy where people on one side of the street receive daily service and people on the other side do not? It should not be a political decision or a decision which is made during an election that there will be postal service to the other side of the street or that postal service will be discontinued if a certain member is elected.

I would like to make a comment on something that was said in the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates on June 3. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) suggested that nobody in Canada should have daily home delivery of mail. He could see no reason why the aged, the infirmed and others less fortunate than himself should not have to trudge through the ice and snow to pick up their mail. That attitude was very disturbing to me, but perhaps more disturbing was the attitude taken by the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), who did not take the position that one would expect from a minister of the Crown. The Postmaster General did not tell the hon. member that daily home delivery of mail in Canada is a service of the Government of Canada which will be defended right down the line. He did not chastise this government member for not seeing that point. On the contrary, he said the following:

If I were to tell you that we will curtail the door to door service which is given, I would have a union on my hands tomorrow morning.

It is a shame that the press did not pick up on that remark in committee by the Postmaster General. In this country where the postal unions are blamed even for bad weather, it is certainly interesting to know that they are the only group standing between where we are now and the total elimination of daily home delivery in Canadian cities. Every member in this House, I would venture to say, has received a letter of complaint about the postal service. Petitions with regard to the postal service have been introduced. There is a suggestion in the Speech from the Throne that the Post Office Department will become a Crown corporation in the very near future.

I would urge that this motion be allowed to stand. I ask all hon. members on both sides of the House to give it an opportunity to stand in order that we may look at the management and at what is taking place in the post office. To allow the mismanagement of this department to occur and to blame it on the workers is, I think, a great injustice. This is largely the main problem in the Post Office Department today.

In conclusion, I would point out that no one wants to see the improvement of the postal service come on the backs of the post office workers. Although they were happy with the recent settlement of the CUPW contract, they are concerned that the government may try to improve the service by doubling the workloads, which is hardly the formula for labour peace in the post office. This is not the proper attitude. It is imperative at this time that we zero in on the major problems of the post office. The contract which was signed today includes some changes to the working conditions and privileges of the postal workers. It includes a clause that in the future, if there are lay-offs, there will be replacements, and that if there is to be centralization in larger cities, there will not be cutbacks in the small rural post offices.

We must all recognize the need for postal services, particularly in smaller communities. They must have the services that they require. It was a tremendous saving to move mail transportation from the trains to airplanes. I think we must recognize there have been some savings there. We must also recognize that management of the postal department must be improved and taken out of the political arena. As a Crown corporation it would present estimates to this House for approval and there would be some supervision of the way it carried out its duties and responsibilities.

A short while ago, when we faced the possibility of a labour strike in the post office, I was shocked to learn that the Postmaster General and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) would have had to find a formula to solve the problem. Had they not been able to do so, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) would have become involved as well. This is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. The intent of the motion is to bring about a realization of the serious managerial problems which afflict the post office and of the problems of maintaining service in small communities such as those I represent.

I should like to take a moment or two to deal with the question of mail delivery. I had a complaint recently from a constituent about a letter which took three months to come from England with the news that a relative had passed away. That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. I have complaints about letters taking as long as a week to come from Creston to Cranbrook, a distance of 60 miles. It is no wonder that some people are taking their business to the courier services and paying exorbitant fees in order to make sure a letter is delivered on time. The post office should recognize the need for prompt delivery and see that it is achieved.

It bothers me, Mr. Speaker, that we in this House are always pointing to the worker as being at fault instead of defining the real problem. The system is at fault when mail is delivered in one spot, trucked back to another, sorted, brought back again and still things are lost and people are told they cannot be reimbursed for them. Often when the mail does finally reach a small community, the post office workers have to work overtime because of the extra workload. When it has been transported, brought back by truck, sorted at time and a half rates, put back on a truck and sent to another community, that is clearly a management problem.

I urge members on both sides of the House to co-operate and not talk out the motion so that it can be dealt with.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) introduced this motion because it has finally given me an opportunity to express some of the views stated in letters from my constituents about mail delays. Today I had proposed putting a question on the order paper but this motion gives me an opportunity to put it on the record immediately.

I am not sure if the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) is aware that colour discrimination exists in his department. According to information reaching me from Victoria, the post office there is not giving some letters carrying first-class postage first-class treatment because of the colour of the envelope. Instead, they are getting third-class treatment. This is discrimination on the grounds of colour because the envelope is brown.

May I say facetiously that I suspect the Postmaster General has issued an order insisting that brown envelopes get third-class treatment in order to prevent them reaching members of the opposition so that they can ask questions based on their contents the next day! I am sure that is the reason.

In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker—and I am deadly serious about this—

Mr. Cullen: Why are you smiling, then?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): —in all seriousness, these brown envelopes could contain pension cheques and there could be delays in getting the cheques to the people to whom they are addressed. That would be most unfortunate, of course. Apparently the problem is the yellow colouring on the machine that does the sorting; it does not show up well on the brown envelope. The scanner does not pick it up and so the envelope slips through and there is a delay, resulting in third-class treatment.

While it was something of a joke to allege discrimination on grounds of colour, I think it would be inappropriate if the post office were to insist that all mail in Canada be sent in white envelopes in order to ensure first-class delivery. That would be utterly stupid.

The member who proposed the motion spoke of trains and planes. It sometimes seems to me that even when we use planes rather than trains to send the mail from one place to another, it still gets sorted and delivered slower. The hon. member mentioned that most of us would have had at least one complaint from our constituents. Mr. Speaker, I have had dozens if not hundreds of letters complaining of poor delivery.

This morning a letter was delivered to my office about which I shall write a complaint. It was from the Bank of Montreal in this city. The window envelope was quite clearly addressed to my office on June 23. Somehow it went to Canadian Forces Base, Ottawa, although for the life of me I cannot understand why. Perhaps because it was in a brown envelope it was discriminated against! The postal code for the House of Commons, K1A A19, was clearly shown.

Mr. Knowles: 0A6.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My office is in the Confederation Building, so it is probably 0A7.

Mr. Knowles: It is the same.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We have a separate post office over there so we may have a separate code.

Mr. Knowles: No, it is the same.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): All right, I will take the hon. member's word for it. The letter went to CFB Ottawa, I suppose because those little yellow, luminous things that are put on the envelope were not picked up by the sorter. Then it went to the post office in the House of Commons. It eventually reached me, about nine days later, having come from the main office of the Bank of Montreal at the corner of Wellington and O'Connor Streets. My office is one block away, at the corner of Wellington and Bank Streets, so it did not even have to go by plane or train.

Mr. Blenkarn: Perhaps they used a turtle.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is absolutely unacceptable. We are being adjured, exhorted, asked and urged to use the postal code to ensure that letters are delivered on time, and now we find that even when it is used they are not being delivered on time.

Other matters relating to the postal service baffle me as well, Mr. Speaker. We are told that it is in good shape. It was in good shape when it was the Royal Mail, but since it ceased to be the Royal Mail it seems to me it is not being handled the way it should be.

● (1720)

Mr. Blenkarn: It is a royal mess.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): For example, there are fewer and fewer drop boxes, in my riding anyway. I have noticed the disappearance of three or four boxes on the way from my home in Saanich to another part of the area. There was one I used to be able to count on right near a little shop where people could pick up a bunch of bananas, a pint of milk—I am sorry, a litre of milk—or a loaf or a kilo of bread. On the way to the shop there used to be a post box where we could mail our letters. It was half way between the one that was at the little post office nearby and at the corner; I would say they were a mile or a kilometre apart. Now it has disappeared.

If anyone ventures to stand up and explain why there should be fewer post boxes than there were, I think the argument that will be used is because they were being vandalized. I will not deny that some of them have been vandalized. Some have had to be bolted to the earth with deep-seated bolts and probably cement blocks below them, but they still get knocked over. I think this is most unfortunate and it is also unacceptable. But the fact remains there are people, particularly elderly people, who have to walk a good deal farther now than they had to before in order to mail their letters. I do not think there is any reason why they should. I do not know what has happened to those boxes. They have disappeared from some locations that I know.

Then we heard the Postmaster General say that there were to be no reductions in services. Within 24 hours of that statement I heard that in one particular area, in an unorganized district beyond my riding but in an area that I used to represent, the pickup of letters, which used to be at 6.30 in the evening, is now at 6.30 in the morning. When these letters were picked up at 6.30 in the evening they were taken direct to the Victoria post office to be sorted. That was fine; people could mail at any time during the day. No one complained that toward the end of the day the mail would be picked up. Now the pickup is at 6.30 in the morning and the mail is taken presumably to the collector's house and not delivered until the next morning. Mail is kept by him until the next morning, when it is delivered to Victoria for sorting. So already there is a 24-hour delay in the sorting and distribution of these letters. This is a reduction of service to the people in that area. People used to have their mail picked up in the evening and taken into town for sorting and delivery. Now it is picked up at 6.30 in the morning and not delivered to town for sorting and delivery until later the following day. I suggest that that is a reduction in service despite what the Postmaster General has tried to convince us is a continuation of that great service which the post office owes. I suggest that we ought to make it clear that the post office owes that service to the Canadian people.

Some of us can remember the day when we used to put three-cent stamps or four-cent stamps on letters and these letters would be delivered the next day. Now we put 17-cent stamps on a letter and the letter is not delivered until the next week, even in the same city. Sometimes it is even longer than that before a letter is delivered. I cannot speak for rural deliveries although I am sure somebody will. Some of the rural deliveries are absolutely deplorable.

The main thrust of this motion is that facilities be available in new residential areas. I quite agree with the proposer of this motion that it is difficult to explain to people in area B, which is right next to area A, that area A will get house to house delivery while in area B, just across the road, the mail is dumped in a great big green box at the entrance to the development. People whose mail is in those big green boxes have to go out in rain, shine or snow to pick up their mail, yet their neighbours within hailing distance out of the back window, more or less, have door to door delivery. This is not the kind of service to give people who are paying four times as much for stamps as they used to pay. Who knows when the next increase in delivery rates will be.

I made inquiries about this particular operation because it is within my riding. I was told the trouble was that there was only a single entrance to this development. There are all sorts of dead-end streets and having gone in one way you would have to come out the same way. On the other hand, in the other development across the street where the postman goes on foot door to door, he can go in one way and then out at the other end. I find this situation is absolutely impossible.

While the proposer of this motion suggests that it is not the people who are involved in the delivery of the mail who should get the blame, I think a fair amount of the blame should fall on them. Their duty is to deliver the mail. They are being paid to deliver the mail. They are public servants. They should be civil servants. They should be civil and they should serve. That is what they used to be.

Nevertheless, that being said, I do agree that this motion is a most timely one. I am sorry that the Postmaster General is not here but I hope someone will bring some of these complaints to his attention, not only with respect to giving adequate delivery to new residential areas—because people have never had it in the areas of which I speak, that being a little picayune in the use of the words—but also to guarantee that there will be no further cutbacks in service. I suggest that this motion—I am not going to make a formal amendment—could very well have gone further and said that we ought to return to the proper service of pick up and delivery to which this country has been accustomed.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as both previous speakers have mentioned some personal experience with the post office, I would like to add my own experience with the post office. However, I would like to say that there are people in Canada today who are quick in criticizing the post office but very slow in commending the excellent service that we generally have from the letter carriers. I would like to give them my vote of thanks.

I am pleased to be able to address the two points raised by the hon. member in his motion put down on April 30. We are asked to consider two things: first, the advisability of restoring adequate levels of postal service to new residential communities; second, to guarantee that there will be no further cutbacks in postal service.

The hon. member's first point concerns letter carrier extensions to new residential areas. In the fall of 1975, the post office decided on a freeze on the extension of letter carriers' services across the country. This was part of a general policy of restraint in governmental expenditures which applies to all federal departments. As a result, Canada Post called a halt to extensions of letter carrier service to new subdivisions, thus allowing for existing postal services while observing restraint on spending.

The subdivisions affected by this policy were to be serviced by group letter boxes or through general delivery. However, in the spring of 1979 this policy was amended to allow letter carrier service to 150,000 new points of call. The then postmaster general, now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne), announced at the time that this relaxation would require the reallocation of some $50 million and a letter carrier expansion of 800 new person-years including those required for establishing the new routes. These new points of call reflect the growth of the nation: Atlantic region, 9,171; Quebec region, 11,176; Ontario region, 34,902; Western region, 97,587.

The general policy of fiscal restraint was not abandoned. Canada Post was asked during 1979-80 to reduce costs by $50 million and 1,800 person-years. In October of 1979, the Post Office Department made clear to its managers the policy of zero growth. Canada Post had been called upon, as I said, to reduce over-all person-years, and consequently there could be no growth in letter carrier person-years. New letter carriers could be brought into service only if person-years were freed up through greater efficiency. A letter carrier starting policy was to be adhered to. Overstructured routes were to be given first priority, that is, "walks" which are deemed to be too large—equivalent to more than eight hours work. These are to be adjusted. Next, "fill-ins" and "extensions" will be covered. "Fill-ins", I might explain, are deliveries to new houses in the midst of existing letter carrier routes, and "extensions", as the name implies, are continuations of existing letter carrier walks. New letter carrier walks can be established only after the Post Office has used its redeployed person-years for, first, the relief of overstructured walks, and, second, to service fill-ins and extensions.

Thus, Canada Post does not impose a freeze on letter carrier extensions; it has to comply with a policy of person-year restraint which, in effect, results in great difficulty in coping with population expansion in rapid growth areas, especially in the western provinces.

In Calgary, I am told, more than 2,000 new residents arrive each month and expect to receive letter carrier delivery to their homes. The Post Office would have difficulty keeping pace with such unprecedented growth even if it had carte blanche for hiring and expansion. The is the additional problem of worker turnover in Calgary because of the competition by employers for workers. A staff turnover of between 65 per cent and 70 per cent continues to be a major problem at the processing plant. Full-time vacancies in any given week average 15, and most employees have less than one year's experience. The new collective agreement with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers now provides a badly needed competitive wage.

Subject to the restraints I have already outlined, the postal people are coping with Calgary's drastic increase in mail volume through alternative means. Number 10 postal depot, Calgary's busiest, has about 1,000 people dropping in daily to pick up their mail. Things were even busier there a year ago when 2,000 callers were coming in to depot 10. But Canada Post opened another depot, number 15, which provided a closer pick-up point for residents of The Properties area. Also, through efficiency and free-ups, the Post Office has been able to establish two new letter-carrier walks in the depot 15 area since May.

Normal office hours for a depot are from 8 a.m. until 4 p.m. and, if respected, would make it impossible or difficult at best for many customers to pick up their mail. The majority of the residents around depot 10 are young married couples in situations where both partners are working, and for their convenience the staff comes on duty at 6.15 in the morning to open the depot unofficially.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) perhaps summarized the situation better than anyone when he appeared last month before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and I should like to put his words on record here.

> Post Office officials have been put on very severe constraint. On the one hand, the two previous governments, first the Liberal administration and then the Conservative administration, have made an effort to reduce the number of person-years within the Civil Service and have asked specifically for some reductions in the normal growth of the person-years within the Post Office which has indeed created severe difficulties for the Post Office which is a service department and which indeed had to cope with the demand and the growth of our population in Canada. Secondly, this department has also been asked by the two previous administrations, the Conservative one and the Liberal one before that, to curtail their expenditures and try to reduce the important deficits this department is incurring year after year. Under these very difficult situations I am happy to report . . . that the administrators of the Post Office have done a magnificent job in trying to cope with the demand, continue the services where needed and indeed reduce substantially the deficits.

The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) asked for a guarantee from the government that there would be no further cutbacks in postal service. Mr. Speaker, our national postal service has important social goals and Canadians are entitled to expect good service, but different situations may require different methods of delivering that service. I, too, remember when we had letter carrier service to our homes on Saturdays. But that ended when Eric Kierans was postmaster general and tried to put the Post Office on a pay-for-itself basis. And prior to 1951, not only did the postman ring twice—he delivered twice a day. It is not realistic to think there will be no future changes, or no changes which the hon. member and, indeed, the general public, would not regard as cutbacks in postal service. But I can assure the hon. member that the present administration is doing everything within its power to avoid cutbacks. The proposal to merge the postal districts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba well illustrates this concern.

● (1740)

A study was made of a proposal to merge the Manitoba and Saskatchewan district offices into one. Its purpose was to reduce substantially person-years within both offices and to lessen expenditures. During April and May questions were asked and motions put forward both by the official opposition and by the hon. member's own colleagues. Finally, on May 26, the Postmaster General announced in the House that he had instructed his officials to make no change. Again, I should like to read from the minutes of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. The Postmaster General, speaking of the proposed merger, had this to say:

> Objections were raised by a number of people in Saskatchewan. The interpretation they gave to this was that it would mean a reduction in Post Office activities in the province. I must say that everything that has been written and said about this has been grossly exaggerated, and obviously it is too bad. This move, which was a genuine one on the part of the regional general manager for the Post Office in western Canada, was not at all meant to reduce or to diminish the service of Canada Post in Saskatchewan; quite the contrary.
> Because this sound management approach was so badly misinterpreted, I had to say bluntly the other day in the House that this project was cancelled in order to end any misapprehension and misunderstanding about it. Any way we tried to cope with this was obviously very badly misinterpreted, and I did not want the people of Saskatchewan to think the federal government, the government of Ottawa, was again trying to undercut the legitimate aspirations of the people of Saskatchewan. I regret very much some of the interpretation that has been given to what was a sound basic management approach to reductions of our top level representations in western Canada.
> I want to conclude by saying that the Saskatchewan district is going to continue. There is no doubt about it; it will continue. We will obviously have to look again at how we can cope with this demand that still exists on Canada Post to reduce person-years and to reduce our expenditures. How we are going to do it is not yet determined, but indeed our constraint on the operation of the Post Office is still there.

Another cutback which has recently been discussed is the question of Saturday closings of post offices. As I said earlier, Saturday home delivery was ended a dozen years ago when Eric Kierans attempted to put the Post Office on a pay-for-itself basis. He saw the movement toward a five-day business week, wanted to give letter carriers the five-day week then common to other Canadian workers, and proposed to save some $13 million in the first year of this cutback. Also proposed was a cutback to five-day service for all post offices. However, this was modified to provide continued Saturday service for those centres not receiving letter carrier delivery.

In those days the Post Office deficit was around $50 million. In 1979 it was $474 million, and thus it should not be surprising that once again Saturday closings have been under study as a means of reversing the trend of mounting deficits. To quote the hon. Postmaster General, again in committee:

> —in most locations, our front-counter services are open to the public on a six days per week basis. This, in fact, requires a complement of staff adequate to cover the six days, and that is done on a shift basis. In an effort to try to cope with the general, broad directives that Canada Post receives from the government... from both previous governments, Conservatives and Liberals—to reduce person-years and to reduce expenditures, some discussions and studies were carried out in order to find ways to reduce these factors, because it means that in smaller centres, the local postmaster must work six days per week. So this idea of closing on Saturday was studied. There is an alternative to it. Basically if we conclude that it would have to be, as it is in most major cities, a five days per week operation, a decision might be taken locally to decide on another day and, possibly, a small post office would not close on a Saturday because, basically, Saturday in these small towns has some significance, and it is important that the post office be open then. So, the alternative discussed presently with the CPAA is the possibility of having these small post offices close on another day of the week. However, we have not yet reached any final conclusion; this is only the subject of discussions and studies by our people and by the representatives of the Canadian Postmasters Association.

In conclusion, I think we should regard the Post Office as an arm of government struggling to maintain an adequate level of service to the Canadian people, yet concerned about keeping costs down. During a decade of double digit international inflation Canada Post saw mail volumes increase by 35 per cent and brought service to the most remote reaches as well as to the rapidly growing urban and suburban areas. It has not been easy, and we should regard the effort as ongoing, and commendable.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to commend the hon. member for introducing the motion. This is one of the few opportunities we have to say something in this House about the service we have been getting from a Crown agency called the Post Office. My city of Mississauga has the privilege of having the largest postal warehouse in all of Canada. Indeed, the statement around my riding is that the reason we pay 17 cents is that ten cents is to finance storage at Gateway and 7 cents is for delivery.

People throughout Canada—I am sure this applies in your riding, Mr. Speaker, as it does in the parliamentary secretary's riding—are very disturbed about the inadequate, incompetent and inept service they receive from their Post Office. It bothers me that hard-working individuals who work for our Post Office are afraid to tell their neighbours that they are employees of the Post Office Department because of the reputation of that organization.

Studies have indicated clearly that the management of the Post Office is probably the worst management of any organization, not just of this size but of almost any organization in the whole of the country. It should be impossible for the parliamentary secretary, who just finished speaking, to say, as she did, that things are improving in Calgary or in western Canada, perhaps, and to apologize for the lack of Saturday delivery.

We want delivery, and the fact that post offices are not open on Saturday as they used to be, and the fact that we do not get delivery twice a day as we used to get, are not the real issue. The issue is that we want delivery, period. Hon. members of this House find that their mail takes seven to ten days to be delivered. They send out householders, as I did in March, only to find that they are delivered in late April. Individual citizens throughout Canada continue to call us and complain about lack of service, delay in service, missing deliveries, and destroyed packages. When we have all these complaints, there is something serious.

My constituency office in Mississauga receives its stationery and other material for distribution through the use of the Post Office. These materials are delivered to my constituency office from Ottawa. Frequently the material is put into a mail bag and delivered to my office in the mail bag. What happens is that a good part of the stationery arrives completely destroyed, to the point that my executive assistant in my constituency office the other day telephoned our local postmaster and said, "I am very pleased to hear that you have a new elephant." He was abashed and asked, "What do you mean a new elephant? We do not have an elephant at all". My executive assistant said, "You must have an elephant; how else could you possibly destroy five boxes of new stationery?" There is something wrong here, and the hon. member's motion allowing this debate in the House today is very appropriate.

Hardly a day goes by when hon. members or their constituency offices do not have to listen to the complaints of constituents concerning the mail, to the point that one just throws up his hands and says, "Well, that is the way it is; something must be done." Business, hon. members of this House and, indeed, government departments here refuse to use the postal service. If they really want something delivered they call upon Air Canada or Purolator, but they do not call on the Post Office because they know that this organization which we support to the extent of well in excess of $400 million a year, over and above postal charges, is not competent to ensure delivery of any article to anywhere from anywhere. That is a pretty disturbing thing.

There has to be a better way, and some better ways are available. Let me say this to members of the Post Office through you, sir, that there is such a thing as an electronic transfer of funds, there is such a thing as transmitting messages by wire, by radio, by cable, and by video. There have been studies done by this government with regard to the transfer of pension cheques, of payroll cheques and all other transmissions which this government does, ranging from family allowances to pension cheques, to the bank accounts of individuals by electronic transfer. That very program would save some 60,000 jobs in the public service. That very program would ensure the delivery of pension cheques. It would ensure that John Brown, who never received his war veterans allowance last week, would have it on June 30 in his bank account where it belongs, and would not have to call his member of Parliament or the pension office to find out what happened to it.

This situation has gone on for long enough. If members working in the Post Office, if management in the Post Office, and if the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) himself cannot get his act together and provide the kind of service that we Canadians used to enjoy and should still enjoy, then other methods of transmitting information by the government transferring funds and by business transferring funds, will have to be employed. There are other methods, which might be somewhat costly, but the way things are going the Post Office should get its act together very quickly or it need not exist in this country.

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to address myself to the motion of the hon. member with regard to the Post Office. He used the phrases "restoring adequate levels of postal service" and "no further cutbacks in postal service" in a manner which would have us believe that service levels at the Post Office are woefully inadequate. That is an assumption which is not borne out by facts. May I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the meaning of the hon. member's motion. He used the phrase "restoring adequate levels of postal service" as if there had existed in the past a veritable golden age in the mails. This attitude reflects a complete disregard for present day realities. It reflects a mentality which does not examine facts.

The hon. member talks of "restoring adequate levels of postal service". The facts of the matter are that never before in its long and distinguished history has Canada Post provided such a high level of performance and reliability in the mails as it does today. The hon. member says "restore adequate levels of service". I submit that the word "restore" signifies to go back and do over again. To what period in Canadian history would the hon. member have the Post Office return—to the age of the horse when relays of ponies galloped between towns carrying the mail bags? Or perhaps he would have the Post Office go back to the age of steam when the great iron horses first thundered across this great country carrying messages that would link and bind it together?

I am not suggesting that, in its long history of contributing to the social, political, artistic and commercial fabric of the nation, the Post Office was not well served by the horse, train and truck, not at all. The Post Office always has availed itself of the best technology of the day. That is its tradition, a tradition of adapting to change and exploiting new and better ways of doing things.

I sketched this brief history of the mails to put the Post Office in perspective. It is in the best interests of us all that we look at the operation of the mails objectively, without sentiment, and without lamenting the past, as the hon. member has done, or of conceiving extravagant hopes for the future. Unless we bring a balanced perspective in examining the Post Office, we will lose sight of what we can do to improve it and what we cannot do. The fact of the matters is that the Post Office has now entered the satellite and electronic age. It has become modern. We cannot, as the hon. member suggests, "go back and restore".

In the interests of time I should like to refer to an episode with regard to Canada Post to which originally I wanted to refer toward the end of my intervention, and which I do not want to omit. I want to focus on this episode at Canada Post which I believe illustrates clearly its performance and the performance to which Canadians have become accustomed. Only a few weeks ago several thousands of the more than two and one quarter million family allowance cheques which the government sends out monthly did not arrive on the appointed day in a number of communities in Ontario. Immediately there was a public outcry over the delay. Let me hasten to add that the outcry began before the delay was one day old. Such is the Post Office's performance that the public has, over a sustained period of time, come to expect that family allowance cheques arrive on time as a matter of course. I think these high expectations reflect an extremely efficient postal service.

The family allowance episode illustrates another phenomenon about the Post Office, that is, that as we get still better we can expect still more criticism. This might seem like a paradox, but it is not. It is a matter of higher expectations. Shortcomings in the mails which were tolerated patiently in the past as being inevitable, seem unendurable as soon as the idea of solving them crosses people's minds. All the shortcomings then removed call attention to those that remain, and now they appear more galling. The shortcomings, it is true, have been reduced, but sensibility to them has become more acute. A generation ago, before the advent of the jet aeroplane, a one day delay of the cheques in the mail would have passed unnoticed. That is not the case today. We live in an era dominated by electronics and the computer. The public have come to expect the same almost semi-automatic results in the mails that they get from electronic gadgetry and from the computers. This is impossible in such a labour-intensive business as the Post Office. Nevertheles, our Canada Post levels of service compare favourably with any post office in the western world.

I do not lament the past as does the hon. member who would, as I said in my introduction, "restore" the post office. I do not share any such romantic notions about returning to the days of steam and the horse. I am, however, inspired by the recent achievements of Canada Post. These achievements inspire our staff to provide Canadians with a postal service second to none. The Post Office is not restoring, it is advancing. Let me tell you about a few of these advances.

In 1948 intercity mail went to air. That is, all first class mail went air mail. We were one of the first countries in the world to enter the air age totally and completely. Now, of course, all innovations are not without some shortcomings. At times fog over St. John's or a whiteout over Inuvik would prevent the aeroplane carrying the mail from landing, sometimes for a day or two. But is that an argument for going back to the horse and buggy?

In reviewing where the Post Office has been and where it is headed, I would remind the hon. member that we no longer live in a letter writing age. It would be inconceivable for our age to produce a Voltaire whose letters in the Besterman edition come to more than 100 volumes.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill S-6, to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

[English]

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, before five o'clock I mentioned the fact that it has been a long time—as a matter of fact it has been seven years—since the price of wheat could be discussed in the House of Commons. This bill was introduced by the previous Liberal administration and called Bill C-24, once under the legislation of the Progressive Conservative government called Bill C-7, and we have it here in the form of a Senate bill, Bill S-6. It is interesting that it has taken over two years for this bill to come on the floor of the House, to deal with something that is as important to the producers of western Canada as what they receive per bushel for grain.

I should like to answer a few questions in my own mind as to why this bill is here. Is it for the wheat producers of western Canada? Is it for the consumer? I do not think it is for either of those groups. It is to remove the liability of the present Liberal government to the tune of $200 million which it owes the farmers of western Canada and which will legally become due before July 31 of this year. This is a lot of money. We are talking about a drought in western Canada. There was a lot of hullabaloo and a lot of hoopla as to a possible $60 million pay-out to the producers of western Canada, in the cattle business, because of the drought. Here we have a bill by which this government is attempting to remove its legal obligation to the tune of some $200 million, three times what it is purporting to give the cattlemen and wheat producers of western Canada.

When the Two-Price Wheat Act was first introduced in the House in 1974 by Otto Lang, he said the following:

This is a bill whose specific purpose is to enshrine for a period of years, in this case for seven years, a procedure whereby the treasury supplements payments made for wheat designed for human consumption in Canada—

It is in its present form without any doubt and, I should think without any argument, in the nature of a consumer subsidy, an amount paid by the treasury, on behalf of the people of Canada as taxpayers, to lighten the burden on the consumer of the cost of wheat products in Canada.

Those were the comments of Otto Lang when it was introduced for second reading on October 29, 1974.

What happened with the introduction of that bill was that the wheat producers or the farmers of western Canada had the price of their wheat frozen for seven years. It was seven years that this bill was to run. I do not know of any other contract with longshoremen, Post Office workers or any other labour group, which goes for a term of seven years.

An hon. Member: Oil pricing agreements.

Mr. McKnight: They may not run that long if things continue. But what happened with this bill is that the prices the farmers of western Canada were to receive from 1974 onwards were frozen. We felt at that time that it was unjust and we feel at this time that it is unjust, particularly when not carrying through on the commitment of seven years.

● (2010)

In the fall of 1978 the Liberal government of that day decided to terminate the subsidy payment to the producers in western Canada. Instead of a fixed domestic price and a subsidy payment, the regulations of the Canadian Wheat Board were used, setting the price farmers would receive for grain consumed domestically. At that time it was set at a price of $4 per bushel as the floor, and $5 per bushel at the upper end. That was the price in respect of spring wheat. In the case of Durum the regulations set the price at a floor of $4 per bushel up to $7.50. We cannot understand the difference in treatment in respect of Durum and spring wheat; we could not at the time and we can not now.

Without Bill S-6, to advance the termination date of November 30, 1978, instead of the end of July, 1980, which obligated this government to pay the producer what he has been receiving since December 1, 1978, directly from the marketplace, and without this retroactive termination of this bill, the government would in effect owe the farmers of western Canada $200 million.

Let us discuss, as we were doing at the beginning, whether this was a subsidy to the farmers of western Canada or a subsidy to the consumers of Canada. The transfer of income under the two-price wheat program from 1969 to 1978 amounted to $396 million from the taxpayer to the consumer, but from the taxpayer to the producer it amounted to $75 million, from the consumer to the producer it represented $40 million, and from the producer to the consumer it represented an additional $35 million. Just using those numbers, $150 million was received by the producers, but $396 million was received by the consumers of Canada.

In addition, in the first four months of the 1979-80 crop year producers have subsidized the consumers another estimated $22 million. Furthermore, since the summer of 1979 producers have subsidized consumers up to $1 million a week.

This bill as introduced in 1974, and as we are discussing it today, is not subsidy to the farmers of western Canada, it is subsidy to the consumers of Canada. The cost of production is what a farmer is concerned about. If it cost him "x" to produce a bushel of grain and if he could make "x" plus, he considers that a profit, as any businessman would.

This government in 1974 refused to include indexing provisions for the cost of production in this bill. When the legislation was brought in, the price of wheat was around $6 a bushel. Today the price of wheat in Vancouver is $6.73 a bushel. It is strange how things go back. Durum today in Thunder Bay, or I should say at Vancouver, sells for $8.14 a bushel. Right now the farmer in Canada is receiving $5 a bushel for spring wheat consumed in Canada. If he were exporting it he would be exporting it at $6.73 per bushel.

"With levels which are still to this day pretty well close to record, we decided we should look at the proposition as between the Canadian Wheat Board on the one hand, other producers of wheat in Canada, and the consumers of Canada as represented by the buyers, millers and users. We decided we should enter into an arrangement whereby there would be a range of prices for grain; for wheat used for human consumption with a range that reflected more adequately than anything before the cost of production to consumers." That was said by Otto Lang in 1974. There has not been anything done to rectify the provision in this bill which does not recognize that the cost of production is what the farmer is concerned about. If he is going to sell wheat in Canada at a set price, a price set for a seven-year term, surely there should be some provision that, as times changed, he would be compensated for the increase in the cost of production.

The special adviser to the minister of state responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, the senator in waiting and twice defeated candidate for Assiniboia, at that time said:

—it has been argued that this legislation should reflect specifically costs of production. I think that kind of suggestion is somewhat inappropriate in a discussion on a two-price wheat system for wheat.

I would certainly hope that gentleman has changed his mind today, seven years later. It is very appropriate that the cost of production be considered in any pricing arrangement which ties people to a contract over a period of time as this measure tied the farmers for seven years.

In 1974 the member for Assiniboia at that time said:

—if conditions change drastically, as well they may, between now and 1980, if there is a downturn in the grain market—as grain producers of western Canada realize might happen—the figure provided for in the bill can be changed by this House to keep it in line with real circumstances.

At no time since this bill was passed in 1974 have members of Parliament had the opportunity to discuss the price of wheat for domestic consumption. Even now there is no consultation between the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board and the government.

I would like briefly to refer to Senate Debates, May 29, where the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Argue) said he had made inquiries and had been informed that the advisory committee was not asked in any formal way to pass judgment on or to state its opinion about this policy. That is really not what the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board should be used for. That advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board is a duly elected body to represent the producers of western Canada and to advise the Wheat Board as to its feelings on government legislation affecting farmers.

Asked why the government had not considered any steps to go back to at least this crop year or the last half of this crop year in order to supply the farmers of western Canada with an adequate income by removing the $5 ceiling per bushel of wheat consumed domestically, the minister of state said he did not consider that a question the government was then considering, or in fact should be considering, because it would be setting forth policy and would obviously be something of a risk to producers. It certainly would be something of a risk to producers. The minister went on to say that to have a fixed price is a benefit to producers and is also a benefit to consumers. I really do not know how it is a benefit, when we look at history over the last seven years, to the grain producers of western Canada.

I should like to draw the attention of members to the price that will be paid into the Wheat Board's fund at any given time by Canadian millers, which is at the export price for 13½ per cent protein wheat, so that wheat producers can look forward in the next two years to a price for wheat sold to millers for domestic consumption ranging between $5 and $7 a bushel. That has reference to the new price for wheat consumed in Canada. The farmers in western Canada will receive between $5 and $7 a bushel.

Earlier I stated that right now in Vancouver wheat is selling for $6.73 per bushel. We have not reached the end of this crop year and the start of the next crop year, when this agreement is to come into effect, and already we are within 27 cents of being at the limit, so that the consumers will be subsidized once again by the producers of Canada for their consumption of grain.

I mentioned the 13.5 per cent protein level. Something very strange has happened with regard to protein. The elevator companies said that it was too difficult for them to put in place protein testers which would allow them to buy and sell grain at a protein level, that it was very expensive and something which they could not afford. It may be too expensive for the elevator companies, but the producers of western Canada have been asked to supply $1.5 million. They have been asked to supply this money through a check-off of 75 cents a ton, in order that the elevator companies can buy this testing equipment.

At the same time the producers are being asked to pay 75 cents a ton to supply this testing equipment for the elevator companies, there is no provision anywhere in the legislation or in the grading system of the Canadian Grain Commission which says that farmers will be compensated for protein. In the next crop year there is no compensation provided to the farmers of western Canada for additional protein. During the similar debate in 1974 members on the opposition side warned the government that they should include an indexing provision for the cost of production or, as an alternative, that it shorten the seven years for which the farmers would be tied in.

On October 29, 1974, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), said, as it is quoted in Hansard at page 865:

> —this bill lacks an effective measure to take into consideration the increased costs of production. Therefore we would recommend to the minister the implementation of such a provision to reflect the rising costs of production over the seven-year period.

It seems strange to those of us in western Canada that there are two products which are sold at below world price levels on the domestic market. Both those products come from western Canada. One of the products is wheat, and it is sold at less than the export price to the consumers in Canada. Of course the other commodity is oil. We in the west find that very strange. I am sure that if most of the people—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: We have oil and wheat in Ontario.

Mr. McKnight: —were to make the comparison, they would find it very strange as well. I hear some members on the government side saying that that is part of what is called Canada. Let us talk about what being a part of Canada has cost the people of western Canada with regard to those two products. For example, since 1973 the province of Alberta has subsidized the consumers of oil in Canada by $17 billion. The province of Saskatchewan has subsidized the people of Canada by $3 billion in oil. That may be part of Canada and part of being a Canadian, but what we in the west do not quite understand is why it must be two products which come from our region of the country that are sold at less than the world price.

This situation is causing some problems and deep thoughts with regard to being a Canadian by many people in my region. I am sure that no member in this House likes to hear that such thinking is carrying on or would want it to continue. The hon. member for Vegreville was aware of the problem which was facing the western farmers. When he was a minister in the previous government of May, 1979, he sought and received cabinet approval to set the price of domestic grain at a floor of $6 per bushel. As a matter of fact, that is $2 above the floor which is presently in effect, and $1 above the floor which will be in effect next crop year.

This proposal was to take effect February 1, 1980. Unfortunately there was an election and the present government has since refused to accept this proposal or to look at any means of compensating producers in western Canada in this crop year. I do not expect hon. members to take my word, and therefore I would like to quote from the Western Producer which was issued on February 28, 1980. The article quotes the commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Charles Gibbings, who said:

> The federal election campaign and change in government have delayed planned changes to the act, Gibbings said. He said the maximum was to have been changed by February 1 by former wheat board minister Don Mazankowski, but that couldn't be done once the government was defeated and an election called.

I would like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that the announcement of the new domestic price for wheat in the 1980-81 crop year was set by regulation. Members of this House have not had and will not have an opportunity to debate that price. It will be implemented next crop year. The increase of $5 was set as a floor for domestic wheat with a maximum of $7. However, no maximum was set for the producers of Durum wheat. I find it very difficult to understand that, when farmers of Durum wheat make the same number of rounds in a field and require the same equipment to combine Durum wheat as is required for spring wheat. There is no provision in the present two-price system which will be put into effect in 1980-81 to link the cost which the farmers of western Canada receive for their product consumed in Canada to the cost of production.

I would like to speak on the cost of production for a moment. From 1973 to the second quarter of 1979 the cost of total farm input has risen by 80.6 per cent. The index for crop production expenses— seed, fertilizers, pesticides and so on— has increased by 105 per cent. Fertilizer alone has increased by 115 per cent and agricultural chemicals by 168 per cent. Producers are now in jeopardy because this act will cover two years and has no provision to index the cost of production.

I have before me some figures put together by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), and they are very interesting. In the calculations, the hon. member used 1961 as the base year and indexed it at 100. Then he deflated the actual prices for barley, wheat, hogs and cattle back to the year 1930 and inflated them forward to the year 1980. He used the same base of 100 for costs. If we deflate and go backwards, we find that in 1930 a bushel of barley, which was worth 80 cents in 1961, based on 100, would have been worth $1.42 at that time, even though the actual price was only 59 cents.

If we carry that ahead to 1980, we find that the same bushel of barley for which the Wheat Board is now paying $1.71 at the farm gate or $2.57 at Thunder Bay, has an actual value, based on 1961, of only 63 cents. The farmer receives 63 cents a bushel based on those values. In 1979 the actual price for wheat at Thunder Bay was $6.09, and based on a 1961 index of 100, the actual price would be only $1.48. For hogs, the actual price in 1979 was $64.24, and based upon the 1961 index, it would be $21.45. For beef cattle the actual price was $78.38, and on the basis of the 1961 index it would be $28.82. If we index everything else, why do we not consider indexing the costs to producers of grain consumed in Canada? Why do we not look at that? There cannot be anything against it. There can be no reason why they cannot be treated the same as other groups.

This government and the party it represents has just come back from a convention in western Canada, where I am sure a lot of concern was expressed by people in my region, and I am sure it was listened to as well. I hope that party paid attention to the problems of getting the Prince Rupert project under way and the lack of site preparation this year which will probably delay the project until next year. I hope also that attention was paid to the ridiculous statement of the assistant to the minister in the other place, about the initial price for grain. In view of the world price for grain today there is no justification for lowering the initial price by 50 cents per bushel. In a time of high interest rates and increased cost of production this shows a tremendous lack of sensitivity and understanding.

Another matter of concern in the west is the question of rail lines. Whereas we in this party protected 60 per cent of the lines recommended for abandonment by the last Liberal government, there is now some concern that these lines are to be reviewed and that some 7,500 producers in western Canada will be affected. I hope those concerns were expressed to the ministers and the government. We certainly tried to make them aware of the situation.

In Lacadena, in my constituency, the Sakatchewan Wheat Pool has emptied the existing elevator and has plans to build a new one, so people are very concerned about the future of that line. In the town of Coleville the same company has made a commitment to build a new elevator facility and we are concerned about the government's plans for those branch lines.

Every year just before April—although this year it is a little later—a booklet is issued to producers. It is called "1981 Crop Year Guide Initial Payments, Quota Guarantees, Recommended Seeded Acreage". This booklet, which arrived in May, recommended that producers in western Canada should not increase their acreage of wheat but keep it at the existing level. There would be a minimum 10-bushel quota. The producers and businessmen farmers of western Canada can only base their judgment on the information they are given by the Canadian Wheat Board or whoever is responsible for this booklet. I would not want whoever is responsible for this forecast to be looking after my business. At the moment there is the open quota on wheat. It has nothing whatsoever to do with the drought or seed planted in May of this year. It has to do with the grain accumulated last year.

Farmers are inclined to believe this booklet which, by the way, was not issued by the Canadian Wheat Board, which has been accused at times of making mistakes. I should like to know who was responsible for this publication. I stand to be corrected, but I think it is the grains group that issued this information which misled the farmers of western Canada. Rather than growing wheat, they diversified into other crops, with the result that not only do they lose but the country loses in terms of balance of payments. The Canadian Wheat Board is having trouble with the system of orderly marketing and next year things will be worse because of this misinformation. I am sure the minister is interested in this matter so I should like him to find out who is issuing this information. Where does it come from? He could ask his assistant in the other place about it.

I hope I have explained to some hon. members who really do not understand—and, of course, I do not understand too much about their business either—that the farmers of western Canada are being asked to carry a tremendous burden for the consumers of Canada. I do not think that is fair, and I am sure no member of the House thinks so either. I hope, in light of these numbers, and statements that will be made by my colleagues on this side of the House, that we can change the domestic price for wheat so that it is true reflection of the cost of production that the farmers of western Canada need if they are to continue to be a viable industry.

I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is now in his place, Mr. Speaker. I hope he will look into the matter of the $200 million set out in this bill, and we would sacrifice the supposed $60 million in drought payments that may be made some time in the next 18 months, to the cattle producers of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill S-1 which in effect repeals the Two-Price Wheat Act on July 31, 1980, or an earlier date to be fixed by declaration—

Mr. Knowles: Bill S-6.

Mr. Neil: Or, on a retroactive basis, to amend the act, specifically section 3 thereof, which reduces the term of the bill from a period of July 1, 1974 to June 30, 1980, of July 1, 1974, to November 30, 1978 as it relates to the designated area within the Wheat Board.

The two-price wheat system was introduced in 1974 by the then minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, the Hon. Otto Lang. In the debate on the bill on October 29, 1974, the minister said, as reported at page 863 of Hansard:

> This is a bill whose specific purpose is to enshrine for a period of years, in this case for seven years, a procedure whereby the treasury supplements payments made for wheat designed for human consumption in Canada.

And further down the same page there appears this statement:

> It is in its present form without any doubt and, I should think without any argument, in the nature of a consumer subsidy, an amount paid by the treasury, on behalf of the people of Canada as taxpayers, to lighten the burden on the consumer of the cost of wheat products in Canada.

I should like to emphasize the words "seven years" and the words "the nature of a consumer subsidy". In effect, the bill placed a ceiling price on Red Spring wheat of $5 per bushel for domestic consumption, and at the same time it fixed the floor price for the same wheat at $3.25 per bushel. In the case of Durum wheat the ceiling price was $7.50 per bushel and the floor price was $5.75. In other words, the millers and consumers of domestic grain were able to purchase Red Spring wheat and Durum wheat at the floor price, and the treasury—which in effect is the taxpayers of Canada—paid to the Canadian Wheat Board on behalf of the consumer, a subsidy which was the difference between the floor price and the world wheat price, up to a maximum of $1.75 per bushel.

I should like to make it perfectly clear to members of the House that the $1.75 per bushel was not a subsidy to the grain producer because he was asked, indeed, forced to sell on the domestic market at less than he could sell at on the world market. He was simply paid the difference by the treasury up to a maximum of $1.75. If the price of wheat on the world market went above the ceiling prices of $5 in the case of Red Spring and $7.50 in the case of Durum, and it did so on several occasions, the producer of the grain was then subsidizing the consumers of Canada for the difference between the ceiling price and the actual world market price.

Up to the end of 1978 this producer subsidy amounted to some $35 million. If you examine the records, you will find for the first four months of the 1979-80 crop year the wheat producers' subsidy to the consumers of Canada was some $22 million. Since January 1 the subsidy by the western grain producers to the consumers in Canada has been approximately $1 million per week.

We have only two products in Canada which come under a two-price system and both of these products come from western Canada. They are wheat and oil. There is nothing moving into western Canada, either from central Canada or other parts of Canada, at less than the market price. Over the years, western Canadians have subsidized the consumers of oil to the tune of approximately $20 billion. In the case of wheat, the western grain producers have subsidized the consumers of Canada in the last six or seven years to the tune of about $80 million. Is there any wonder that there is a feeling of alienation in the west and a strong feeling of separatism? This feeling is not just on the part of fringe groups or radicals. As I travel through my constituency I find that many responsible and respected people raise this issue with me. They mention that perhaps westerners would be better off if they went it alone. So it can be seen that the seeds of separatism have been sown and they cannot be ignored.

I said earlier in quoting the Hon. Otto Lang, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board when he submitted this bill for second reading, that the bill was for a period of seven years. The New Democratic Party supported the government in this regard. At that time this party, the official opposition, submitted an amendment to have the bill run only until 1977 rather than 1980. It was the Hon. Jack Horner, who was then on this side of the House, who submitted that amendment. I would like to read one paragraph of what he said when he submitted the amendment. This is recorded at page 5538 of the May 6, 1975, edition of Hansard, as follows:

This bill locks the wheat producer into a seven-year agreement. I cannot overemphasize that. Everyone in this House has witnessed several labour negotiations. I can recite the railway negotiations, the longshoremen on the west coast, grain handlers and longshoremen on the St. Lawrence, and so on. None of them relate to a seven-year contract.

He concluded by saying:

What has this Parliament got against wheat producers? Why lock them into a fixed price for their commodity?

As I said, he proposed an amendment to reduce the term by three years. And, as I said, the New Democratic Party were quick to point out that it was kind of nice to lock the farmers in for seven years, but they find now that the government, for some reason or another, did decide to terminate the subsidy in 1978. The seven-year period under the bill would run out July 31, 1980.

The problem is that the grain producers of western Canada under that bill carried out their part of the bargain. It was the government in the fall of 1978 which decided to terminate the subsidy payment to the consumers. As of November 30, 1978, the government ceased to make any further payments under the bill. The government did not come to Parliament and tell members that things were tough; that the government was going on an austerity program; that the two-price system was costing about $100 million a year and that the treasury just could not afford it. The government did not suggest that we review the program to see what we could do about it. Alternatively, the government could easily have complied with subsection 3 of section 5 of the Two-Price Wheat Act which reads as follows:

The minister shall, on an annual basis and in consultation with the producers, review the provisions of this act and all related regulations enacted by the governor in council with a view to making such recommendations to the governor in council as are appropriate in the light of prevailing costs of production of wheat and returns to producers.

The government did neither of these things. In the arrogant and high-handed manner which has characterized the Liberal government for so many years, it arbitrarily discontinued paying the subsidy. It broke the law in the same manner as you and I might break the law if we refused to pay our income tax, or if the wheat producers in western Canada delivered grain to other than the Canadian Wheat Board. If we had done that, we would have been punished; the producer would have been punished. He would have been fined, and possibly he would have been sent to jail.

But what does the government do? The government says that it is above the law. It says that about $200 million is owed and we are legally bound to pay it. We could be sued, but really there is no problem. We will simply pass a bill with retroactive effect which says that, despite the fact the two-price system was to be in effect for a period of seven years until 1980, the program came to an end on November 30, 1978, the day when the government decided that it would no longer make any payments under the act.

This is what the bill is all about, Mr. Speaker. We are asked to pass on a bill which, under section 3, says:

This act shall be deemed to have come into force on December 1, 1978.

We are here tonight debating a bill submitted by the government which it says is "deemed to have come into force on December 1, 1978." This is some one and a half years ago. We are being asked to make legal the illegal acts of this Liberal government and to wipe the record clean, in other words give it an unconditional discharge.

● (2050)

But, Mr. Speaker, though we are repealing the bill tonight this is not an end of the two-price system, as my hon. friend from Kindersley-Lloydminster said. The two-price system has simply been taken out of the hands of Parliament and placed into the hands of the Canadian Wheat Board which can fix the price by regulation—as a matter of fact, they have done so. On May 26 of this year Senator Hazen Argue, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, announced the terms of Canada's new two-price system for wheat. He said this:

The new minimum and maximum prices for Canadian wheat sold for domestic human consumption will be five dollars and seven dollars per bushel, basis No. 1 Canada Red Spring at Thunder Bay.

He said further:

Effective August 1 the new Durum floor price for domestic consumption will be five dollars per bushel.

Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that this new pricing by the Canadian Wheat Board was arbitrary and was made without consultation and without discussion with the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee. It is interesting to see that these increases in prices are effective as of August 1, because in the meantime the western grain producer is losing approximately $1 million per week. This is cash out of the producers' pockets and it is a direct subsidy to the consumers of Canada. It is also interesting to note that when the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) was minister of transport and the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board he had arranged with cabinet and Treasury Board to increase the price for domestic wheat for human consumption which would have put one million dollars more per week into the hands of the western grain producers. The present government was not prepared to carry out that commitment but has been prepared to say, "Let the western grain producer subsidize the consumers of Canada to the tune of a million dollars per week until August 1."

During the debate on the bill, back in 1974, the member for Vegreville, as he then was, made this comment, as reported at page 865 of Hansard of October 29, 1974:

This bill lacks an effective measure to take into consideration the increased costs of production. Therefore we would recommend to the minister the implementation of such a provision to reflect the rising costs of production over the seven-year period.

From 1973 to 1979, including the second quarter, the costs of total farm inputs had increased by some 80.6 per cent. The index of crop production expenses, taking into consideration such items as seed and fertilizer and pesticides, had increased by some 105.5 per cent. The cost of agricultural chemicals alone had increased by 168 per cent. Mr. Speaker, had there been a mechanism in the bill to deal with increased costs of production, and had there been an annual review as provided for in subsection 3 of section 5 of the act, the government would never had found itself in the position it is today, namely, presenting a bill to legalize its illegal acts.

Then again, this government has always shown and still shows a callous disregard for the west and, in particular, for the western grain producer. One has only to look back over the past few months and consider the uncertainty which has surrounded the port of Prince Rupert; one has only to look at the statements by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) who has cast doubt on the future of a number of railway branch lines which had been placed in the basic network by the party on this side of the House when it was in power.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member is simply repeating the previous speech.

Mr. Neil: The Liberals recently held a convention in Winnipeg which was supposedly to buoy up their strength in western Canada. Mr. Speaker, it would take more than a convention in Winnipeg to buoy up the strength of the Liberal party in western Canada. It will require an understanding of the hopes and aspirations of the west, an understanding which few if any of those sitting on the benches opposite possess. I do not expect to see that understanding and that enlightenment coming about in my lifetime.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to participate for a while in this debate. Agriculture is important. Wheat is very important, one of the most important commodities produced in this country, if not the most important one. The bill before us this evening will extend the two-price system for wheat in this country. What a two-price system means is one price for the wheat we consume as human beings domestically in our country, and another price for wheat sold internationally. We have had that kind of system for our grain since 1973. Under the old act, as hon. members have already said tonight, it was to go on for seven years, until 1980. So we are really debating a very interesting piece of legislation.

First of all we are debating a piece of legislation which originated in the Senate. I want to just say a word here. I believe the bill should be rewritten in this place, in the House of Commons where members are elected democratically, where members are responsible to their constituents on a democratic basis, not in the Senate, a place to which people are appointed.

The bill before us today is really going to legalize the ending of a subsidy on November 30, 1978, for bread for consumers in our country. The subsidy was brought to an end by an order in council, by cabinet. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board was not there then, but the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was, back in 1978, and they dropped the subsidy which was worth several million dollars a year to ordinary Canadians from coast to coast. They dropped it without consultation in Parliament, without consulting those affected, low-income groups and others, and we are really being asked tonight to legalize the action of the government back in November, 1978.

The other thing about the bill is that it increases the floor price to farmers for grain for domestic consumption. I obviously agree with that aspect. But let us take a look at why this issue is so important to us. First, as I mentioned, wheat is very important to the prairies and to the country. It is the most important commodity we have. Indeed, we are a tremendously large exporter of wheat, second in the world in terms of exports. It is worth a lot of money in terms of foreign exchange, our trade, jobs, and employing farmers on the prairies. There is not much we as a nation can do about grain we sell internationally, but there is something we can do about grain that is sold domestically.

What this bill does is increase the floor from $3.25 to $5 a bushel, but it puts a ceiling of $7 a bushel in the place of a ceiling of $5 a bushel, and I am somewhat concerned about that ceiling. As one hon. member said today, wheat now at Vancouver is selling for $6.73 a bushel. That is already very close indeed to the ceiling. If the price of wheat keeps going up the rate it has been going up for the last year or so, it will break through the ceiling very shortly, and we will have farmers again subsidizing consumers for bread and grain we, as human beings, use. So what I suggest to the government and to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), is that he consider changing the formula of the two-price wheat system and instead base it on the cost of production so that, if the cost of production goes up, the farmer will receive an increase in the price of wheat sold in this country. If the cost of production goes down, which is unlikely, then the price would go down.

I have here a brief from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture written a few weeks ago in which the federation suggested this type of system. Based on that system the price would be $5.40 for a bushel of grain, and each year there would be an annual adjustment based on a Statistics Canada report, namely, the farm input price index. The price index went up by 11 per cent last year, and therefore the price should be adjusted by an upward push of some 11 per cent. The principal suggestion I want to make to the government tonight is that the government consider changing the two-price wheat system and base it on a cost of production formula. If we did that, the farmer would not be subsidizing the consumer.

Up until 1978 the farmer subsidized the consumer by $35 million. I think it was the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) who said that in 1979 the subsidy was $22 million, and now it is an extra $1 million a week. I think that is very unfair. We should not have one sector of society subsidizing the whole society, particularly when that sector is barely getting a price which meets its cost of production, let alone providing a decent salary for grain producers.

If we look at the cost input for grain, any study which has been undertaken shows that the farmer is barely breaking even. The price of grain is not excessively high. It has not been set by some oil sheik in Saudi Arabia or Kuwait. The price of grain is not excessively high. Therefore for the grain we sell in our own country and for our own use, the farmer should not be subsidizing the consumer, and this is one way of getting around it.

The other thing I wanted to say is that I think the government should be putting a great deal of time and effort into trying to reach an international grains agreement or an international commodity agreement based on the same philosophy we use for the two-price wheat system. There should be a minimum price so that the producer is getting back the cost of production plus a decent salary, and a maximum price so that the consumer on the other side is not being shafted. I think that should be the objective for all commodities in the world. I think people in the world should get together and hammer out an agreement. They should take into consideration the cost of production and salaries for producers, whether they be producers of grain, copper, bananas, tobacco or whatever commodities.

A minimum-maximum price should be set, and there should be a sliding scale where there is a cost of production formula built in. Perhaps that is an ideal. Perhaps I am being an idealist by suggesting something like that, but I think Canada is a nation which is immensely respected in the world, and it could lead the way in trying to persuade other peoples to try to have international commodity agreements worked out between consumers and producers. There is a big difference between this and OPEC. OPEC is an organization strictly of producers. It is an organization of petroleum exporters, and it has set up a cartel. The producers, and the producers only, determine what the price to consumers should be. I am arguing tonight that consumers and producers should get together to determine a fair price for consumers and producers. There should be harmony in the marketplace. Then, for goodness sake, let us take these commodities out of the hands of international speculators. Let us take them from the futures market, where prices bob up and down like yo-yos or dice at a casino.

All we have to do is look at the price of sugar today. The price has gone up 200 per cent or 300 per cent in the last few months, and most of the reason for that is speculation. People like to play the futures market and make a few bucks. They buy sugar stocks. There has been a cutback in the supply of sugar in the world. There have been crop failures. There is not a real shortage; it is just that supplies are being restricted a bit. There is still enough in storage to supply the world market, but because of a cutback in supply and because of weather, the commodity market has gone a little wild. Speculators have been driving up the price. Who is going to pay? The ordinary consumers who have to go out and buy the commodity. We should have as an objective taking these commodities off the futures market and off the stock market and putting the control of prices into the hands of peoples so that we have an international agreement based on the real factors and not on something which is very artificial.

Mr. Pepin: How about the productivity of the land as a factor?

Mr. Nystrom: I cannot hear the minister, but perhaps in his remarks later on he can respond to some of these suggestions which are being made. Since from time to time he likes to think of himself as a progressive liberal I am sure that he will be moving in this direction.

The other thing which I think is important to look at is the fact that when the price of wheat goes up, the price of bread always goes up faster. The wheat component of a loaf of bread is only 11 per cent. The wheat component accounts for only 11.5 cents of a 24-ounce loaf of bread. However, under this act when the wheat component went up by some 1.25 cents per loaf and the price of a loaf was raised by three cents by some companies and two cents by others, the federal government had no way of stopping that. The federal government has not set up a fair prices commission which could go to a company telling it that the cost of its raw material has not gone up by any more than 1.25 cents per loaf yet the price of bread has gone up by two cents or three cents a loaf, and the company involved could be forced to roll back the price. I think that is something we should be doing.

The other thing is that the subsidy which was dropped by the government in 1978 should not have been dropped at all. I was saying earlier this evening that I think it is wrong for farmers to subsidize consumers for the price of their commodity when they are barely breaking even. At the same time I want to make it very clear that I think we should have a food policy so that some of the basic foods such as bread and milk are subsidized for ordinary people. We used to have a bread subsidy and a milk subsidy. When we look at the health standards of Canadians, we find that many people are undernourished. Perhaps they are overfed, but they are undernourished, and many people are not receiving enough of the basic foods. I think the government should be spending a few tens of millions of dollars every year subsidizing basic foods such as whole wheat bread and milk. I think we would be saving a lot of money when it comes to bills for medicare and hospitalization on the other side.

I think it was the Food Prices Review Board which said a number of years ago that about 40 per cent of our hospital days are tied in some way to the diets of Canadians. If we could save just a miniscule percentage of that through better nutrition and a food policy, we would indeed be making a real contribution to Canadian health and to our economy.

When I talk about the fact that the farmer should not be subsidizing the consumer, I am not saying that the consumer should be paying a higher price for some of these basic nutritious foods which are the basics of life. What I am saying is that our society as a whole should be making a commitment to make sure that the young people and all of the people of this country have basic and decent diets.

One could give many statistics about deficiencies amongst the Canadian people. One that struck me was that 70 per cent of old age pensioners in Canada suffer from calcium deficiency, when we have a capacity in this country to produce so much milk.

Another point I want to make before concluding is that the government, by doing what it has done with the two-price system, by establishing such a low ceiling, by making sure that farmers have to subsidize consumers over the years, is increasingly encouraging a feeling of hostility on the prairies toward the central government, toward the federal government of this land. Many Liberals wonder why they have not done better in the west. This is one of the many reasons why their party has not done better. There is a real feeling that the federal government does not understand us, and if it does understand us, that it does not really care about giving us a fair deal. If it is not just the two-price system on wheat, it is the lack of adequate assistance on the drought. A farmer told me the other day, "The federal government is giving us $60 million, but they gave Chrysler, one company, some $200 million". We are not complaining about aid to Chrysler, but there should be more equity and fairness.

There is the boycott of grain to the Soviet Union. Who is that going to hurt? I should like to refer the Minister of Transport to what is happening in the United States. Even Ronald Reagan said, "If you elect me president, we will terminate the boycott of grain to the Soviet Union". One reason he would do it, and one reason we should terminate this boycott, is that the boycott is not working. Time magazine said three or four weeks ago that the Americans are shipping as much grain now through the back door to the Soviet Union as they shipped through the front door in the last few years, that big companies like Cargill and Continental Grain are using third countries to transship grain on the way to the Soviet Union. They are finding other ways of getting their grain to Soviet Russia.

The only people who are suffering, in my opinion, are the farmers of Canada because of the fact that the grain companies are shipping their grain, because of the fact that the Soviet Union is going to other countries which ship grain to them and increasing their orders, countries such as Argentina. Therefore the farmers are suffering and the grain boycott is not having any effect on the situation in Afghanistan or on Mr. Brezhnev in the Soviet Union. If it is having any impact at all, it is creating some shortage of cattle and livestock in the Soviet Union, and if it is having any effect, the effect is on the poor people, not on leaders, and, of course, on the Canadian farmers.

I appeal to the government tonight to think about grain farmers, to terminate the boycott and start the shipping of grain to the Soviet Union because, if we do not, other people will do it.

These are some of the issues about which I am concerned in the bill before us today. A number of suggestions have already been made to the House by members of the Conservative party, and one does not have to repeat them. I just want to say in closing that I hope the government will change its policy when it comes to the two-price wheat system, that it will base the price of domestic grain for human consumption, grain we buy to feed ourselves—I want to say to the House that it is the minority of the grain we produce—on a cost of production formula so that the farmers will be paid for the minority of their grain according to the cost of producing it. In other words, it will be a cost of production index such as there is on MPs' salaries, in the cost of living increase, in the salaries of many unionized workers, and in the price of most commodities we buy where the wholesale and retail prices go up. Let us do the same for the farmers as we are doing for the other people in this country. If we do that, the farmers of this country will be much happier and much more productive, and they will produce an even greater amount of food for the people of Canada and for the people of an increasingly hungry world.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) responsible for the Wheat Board is in the House during this debate. He has been in the House on several other occasions when this debate went forward, and it is an extremely important debate, as I am sure he will agree. Yet he has remained strangely silent throughout the debate up to the present moment. No doubt he is absorbing and listening to all the advice that has been given during the course of discussion and is becoming increasingly aware of the fact that the grain farmers on the prairies are in a critical situation. We hope that one of these days he will rise to his feet with some positive answers to many of the worth-while suggestions that have been made during the course of the debate.

Not only has the minister been listening carefully to the debate but he made a pilgrimage to Manitoba this week. We had an invasion in Manitoba over the weekend, and I had the opportunity of travelling west on the plane on Friday morning and meeting some of my colleagues from the government side of the House and pointing out to them that it was bad enough that we had drought on the prairies but now we were suffering from an invasion of locusts. Locusts devour everything before them as they go. I say that as a preliminary to a few comments I wish to make on this important subject, and I hope that in the words which I shall speak here tonight I will be able to convey to the responsible minister and to the government the growing urgency of the cost-price squeeze suffered by the grain producers on the prairies.

Unfortunately, this is not the first time that the Liberal government has taken the attitude which is represented in the bill which was first put forward in 1974, and again is being put forward in the legislation before the House. As a matter of fact I am here as a member of Parliament because of the same attitude of the Liberal government—and we have had many Liberal governments down through the years—toward the pricing position of prairie producers way back in the 1940s and 1950s.

During the war years the prairie producers, as an act of patriotism, agreed to a price under the British wheat agreement which would subsidize the consumers, the people of the United Kingdom who were largely bearing the brunt of World War II and enduring most of the suffering. The prairie farmers, who have always been outstanding Canadians, have always produced food for the world market at a price which, most times, was lower than the cost of production. They agreed to a special pricing under the British wheat agreement, never anticipating that, following the war, they would have to bear the full brunt of this subsidization.

I remember fighting my first election on the strength of the British wheat agreement and the failure of the then Liberal government to come forward with any substantial part of the subsidy, the whole burden of which had been borne by the producers in that far off period. My opponent was mooted to become the minister of agriculture replacing the then well-known Hon. James G. Gardiner. I am referring to the Hon. Grant MacEwan who went on to fame and fortune in other vineyards, mostly in the province of Alberta. I can remember Mr. MacEwan who was then the dean of agriculture for the University of Manitoba promising that there would be a substantial contribution by the then Liberal government to subsidize prairie farmers who, over a long period of time, had sold their product at reduced prices. So, what we are seeing among latter day Liberals is a repetition of the same attitude toward prairie producers. Obviously they have forgotten nothing and learned nothing since that time.

The last election was precipitated unceremoniously, the second election in less than six months. Instead of allowing the new Conservative government to get on with the business of the nation which it was doing in quite progressive terms, the Liberal party was surprised when it was practically wiped out on the prairies. I submit it was inevitable this should happen because of its long continuing attitude which showed a complete lack of sensitivity and a complete unawareness of the longstanding problems of prairie grain producers. As far as I can see, at the conference in Winnipeg last weekend there was really no attempt to come to grips with these problems which have reduced the Liberal party to the unfortunate position where it speaks for only one part of Canada and is almost without a voice in the four western provinces.

I hear the minister muttering from his front bench, and he is smiling. I hope he will rise to his feet and in firm tones tell us that the Liberal party has had a change of heart and that by listening to the words of wisdom on this side of the House, and particularly in communing with the grass roots in Winnipeg last weekend, it now realizes that there are fundamental changes which must be made on the part of the government in its attitude toward western Canada.

I do not want to be repetitive in this debate, but I want to point out that even the former minister, the Hon. Otto Lang, was aware of what he was doing when he carried this legislation through the House in 1974. I have the quotation before me which indicates that he said it was a subsidy for consumers and that it had nothing to do with subsidizing the producers. I shall deal with this in a moment, but quite firm promises were made by the then minister to overcome some of the criticisms made at that time during a rather lengthy debate. Instead of coming up with answers, the Liberal government in 1978 unceremoniously cancelled the subsidy. It did not stick to its basic agreement which indicated that the subsidy would carry through until the end of the current crop year.

As my colleagues on this side of the House have said, this legislation is trying to legalize the termination date. November 30, 1978, was the date when the subsidy was cancelled, rather than allowing it to continue to the end of July, 1980, which was in the original program provided by the 1974 legislation. This act will not be proclaimed until the commencement of the new crop year on August 1. It means that prairie grain farmers will have to write off one whole crop year at a time of growing financial strain.

I want to point out a few suggestions whereby the minister responsible for the Wheat Board can make changes in the legislation which hopefully will do away with or deal with some of the criticisms which have been made on this side of the House. Of course the basic criticism is that it does nothing to deal with the rising costs to producers. Perhaps I should put on the record just how astronomically these costs have risen since 1973. The cost of total farm inputs or the cost of production to farmers has increased to the extent of 80.6 per cent from 1973 to the second quarter of 1979. Yet the government removed the subsidy, froze the price over a seven-year period, and totally ignored the impossible financial straitjacket into which farmers were being put by this astronomical inflation increase which derived mostly from the irresponsible economic and financial policies of the last Liberal government.

I should like to refer to the index of crop production expenses which includes seed, fertilizers and pesticides. The cost of those necessary ingredients in production have gone up by 105.5 per cent. The cost of fertilizer alone has gone up by 115 per cent. I should note there that the farmers have been leaving the land in droves because of the impossible financial position in which they find themselves. Survivors would never have been able to keep up with the increasing demand for grain and grain products had it not been for the increasing use of fertilizers on vast prairie grain areas. Their price has increased by 115 per cent. Agricultural chemicals have gone up by 168 per cent. So, I am sure one can understand from those few statistics why 10,000 farmers a year have left the agricultural industry on the prairies. Now the situation has reached the crisis point because of the problem of drought, the rising costs of capital, and the failure of the government to deal with transportation of the increased production of crops over recent years.

Let me refer to some meetings I held recently with my own producers. The Brandon-Souris constituency is one of the richest agricultural grain producing areas of western Canada. In fact the city of Brandon is still known as the "Wheat City" of the west. I have had meetings with farmers who, I thought, would be in a very strong financial position. These meetings have been attended by farmers and their families, many of whom go into second and third generation farm people, and they have sounded a note of panic, suggesting that not only will they be leaving the agricultural industry, but that they will be leaving because of impending bankruptcy. The reason for the impending bankruptcy I think should be obvious after the statistics I have quoted. One cannot continue to sell a product at well below the cost of production, and hope to survive.

● (2130)

The statistics I just presented to the House will, I am sure, demonstrate that this has been a losing game and has now become critical because these farmers who have survived by reason of hard work, by extending their holdings in order to become more productive, by fertilizing, using insecticides, mechanizing, with all the other ingredients that go into the production of grain today, are now facing the prospect of very little production this year. The present estimate is that they will receive about 50 per cent or less than the normal level, with no income to survive the economic crunch in which they find themselves. This is now an emergency situation.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was in the House earlier. He travelled all the way to Yorkton the other day to announce there was a drought emergency. He was addressing mainly members of the cattle industry, and he announced policies to convince the dairy farmer and cattle producer not to destroy their basic herds in order to keep their heads above the overwhelming economic waters. These policies do nothing to solve the problem of the grain producer. The grain producer is the individual caught in the cost-price squeeze, and the one in some cases, particularly in my constituency and in other areas of western Canada, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, who is faced with crop failure. The Minister of Agriculture realized there must be an infusion of cash to the tune of $60 million.

On the other hand the Minister of Transport in this case is depriving grain producers of $200 million which would have been made available under the subsidy had it not been arbitrarily cancelled on November 30, 1978.

Mr. Pepin: Your party introduced the same bill.

Mr. Dinsdale: The minister suggests that our party introduced the same bill. The minister of transport in our government, who was responsible for the Wheat Board and really took his responsibilities seriously, had already persuaded the cabinet to increase the subsidy by $1 to $6. That was action in that direction which was aborted when the Liberal party irresponsibly precipitated an unnecessary election last December.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dinsdale: I hear complaints from the other side. I saw no reason for the election. As a westerner I think I can point out clearly tonight that westerners from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories saw no reason for it. The party opposite received no support at all from that area. It was an unnecessary election because, for the first time, we were getting action in respect of western problems which had been totally neglected by a government whose basic support came and comes from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

My friends in the NDP suggest we lost ten seats in the west. That is true. If we must get into this subject, this was because the party alignment in western Canada is Conservative versus NDP. I admit that. The point I am making is that the election was unnecessary, and that is supported by the fact there was no support at all from western Canada for what the Liberal party was trying to do, and I am sure that is why that party made the pilgrimage to Winnipeg last weekend.

Let me give some examples of broken promises. The Hon. Otto Lang said, when we were debating the bill on October 29, 1974, speaking on the consumer subsidies:

> We should enter into an agreement whereby there would be a range of prices for grain for wheat used for human consumption, a range which reflected more adequately than anything before the cost of production to producers.

That is from page 864 of Hansard for October 29, 1974. That was a promise by the then minister that prices would reflect the actual costs of production.

The special adviser, as he is now, to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Argue), Hon. Ralph Goodale, a former member for the province of Saskatchewan, said that if conditions change drastically, as well they may, and they certainly have—

Mr. Knowles: And changed with him too.

Mr. Dinsdale: And changed for him too. He said if things changed between then and 1980, and not 1978, and if there was a downturn in the grain market, as grain producers in western Canada realized could happen, the figures provided for in the bill could be changed by this House to keep things in line with real circumstances. He said that on October 30, 1974. Since then there has been no debate in the House. Those who have been here over the years know there has been no debate on this subject. The minister whispered across the House that this is the same as the bill we introduced, but we were not given an opportunity to introduce the bill or debate it. Nor was the then minister responsible for the Wheat Board able to bring forward the $1 increase in the subsidy. There has never been any consultation, as Mr. Goodale said there would be. The advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board has never been consulted on the situation. That committee was set up for that purpose but there has been no consultation taking place.

Perhaps I should refer to another quotation from Mr. Goodale because of his important position as an adviser to the minister in the other place. He said:

> The minister shall, on an annual basis and in consultation with the producers, review the provisions of this act and all related regulations enacted by the governor in council with a view to making such recommendations to the governor in council as are appropriate in the light of prevailing costs of production of wheat and returns to producers.

Of course that is another total failure to live up to promises and expectations generated among farmers as a result.

● (2140)

To bring my remarks to a conclusion—and I hope that the minister will speak, perhaps tonight if he has reached the point of decision as he has listened to the debate—let me say that I hope that he will introduce some flexibility into the legislation. It is not fair to freeze farm prices for a period of seven years. When agreements are made with labour unions they sometimes last only one year. This happened with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers recently, which received a fairly generous agreement compared to what the legislation before us is providing to the basic grain producers of Canada, who produce a product which is urgently needed. As I have already indicated, these farmers are facing a crisis which is not of their own making, and because of the problem of drought many of our best producers will go out of business.

There should be continuing negotiation for a world price on wheat. It has been said before, but it bears repetition: there was a time when the price of a bushel of wheat as it was related to a barrel of oil cost about $2.50. We all know how the price of a barrel of oil has gone up to $30 plus. Yet the price of a bushel of wheat is not much above $6.

Both of these resources are basic to the Canadian economy and to the world economy. It is the western producers who are feeling the brunt in this country. I look directly at the minister and I say that that is why his party has no support in western Canada, because they do not even grasp the problem. That is why I hope he will make a statement before we proceed much further in this debate. The farmers cannot continue to sell their grain below the cost of production. There must be some adjustment for the inflation which has eroded the value of the dollar since 1973 by more than 50 per cent.

We must stop the exodus of the basic producer away from the land, which is occurring at a rate of 10,000 per year. I am sure that the exodus will increase by much more than that figure because of the impending bankruptcies due to the high cost of credit and capital, as farmers try to expand their holdings and their producing capacity. I trust that both the Minister of Agriculture, who has made some initial attempts, and the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for the Wheat Board, will either withdraw this act and pay the $200 million which is owed to the western grain producers, or bring in a revised act which does not freeze prices unrealistically for seven years, which is flexible and meets the costs of production and which will protect our grain producers in a drastic time of economic crisis.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill S-6, an act to amend the Two-Price Wheat Act. I would like to speak from the point of view of Canadian consumers. In so doing I must say that I am very proud to be joining the protest which was first raised in 1978 by many consumers and senior citizens groups across Canada, groups who were very concerned because the Liberal government of the day was removing subsidies on bread and pasta.

In these earlier protests it was predicted the price of bread would soar, and it has. The price of pasta has increased by 25 per cent. The prices of both items have increased far beyond the value of the subsidy. This, of course, is as the result of the direct withdrawal of the government subsidy. Bill S-6 will finally remove all government responsibility for subsidizing the present exorbitant cost of bread.

I think it is particularly symbolic of this government that bread, the staff of life, is the topic of this retrogressive bill and that it reflects the values and attitudes of it toward the needs of ordinary Canadians, particularly the needs of the over one million poor people in Canada today. As we know, bread is the staple food for most Canadians, with rice and pasta the alternatives in some ethnic groups. Bread is an essential food item for low income families on welfare who cannot afford to buy fresh produce or fresh meats more than once or twice a month. It is also very essential to the livelihood of our western wheat farmers.

Despite these facts, as my colleague and other colleagues have mentioned, in September, 1978, the skim milk subsidy program was dropped by the Liberal government, followed by the termination of bread subsidies in December. The Conservatives, I believe, supported these cutbacks. These subsidies were removed at the very same time that inflation was on the rise. We know that soaring food costs were putting great stress on family budgets such as they are today.

We in the New Democratic Party oppose this bill just as strongly as we opposed the cutbacks in 1978. With the high price of food today, the budgets and meals of low income families are affected, and I am sure that most families are shocked after their weekly shopping trips. For example, the magazine Ottawa Today conducted a survey of local food prices which showed that eggs are up to $1.19 a dozen, bread costs 65 cents a loaf, frozen fish costs $2.39, apples cost 98 cents per pounds, and milk costs 72 cents a quart. If one compares these prices with the prices in my riding of Vancouver East, they will find that prices there are even higher. In British Columbia the cost of a loaf of bread is now close to 99 cents. It is quite significant of our lack of Canadian policy when we know that people in British Columbia can go across the border to Seattle and pick up three loaves of breads for $1, which is the price the people of British Columbia pay for one loaf.

We also know that it is cheaper and easier for children to go into a store and buy a chocolate bar or a package of potato chips than it is to purchase a delicious Canadian apple. Local cherries in season in Vancouver cost about $1 a pound and a package of five beets costs 59 cents at the height of the season. There is no question in my mind that this supports the NDP position that there must be a fair prices review board with power to roll back prices and to take a good look at profit, particularly those of the supermarkets.

The high cost of food is not a trivial matter. It certainly relates to the bill which is before us tonight. It is an established scientific fact, and hon. members can refer to the recent report which was put out by the Year of the Child Commission, that children who are born of pregnant mothers who do not have proper nourishment suffer from irreparable brain damage, and many of these are poor children. They start life with damaged brains which will make it impossible for them to be fully mature people in society.

It is also well established, and I have had experience with this myself, that pre-school children who do not have the proper nutritious diet suffer from poor co-ordination, lethargy, and inadequate physical, intellectual and social development. It is no wonder that when these same youngsters get to elementary school they are the underachievers, the people who are categorized as having learning disabilities and behavioural problems, and who are the problem makers as they grow toward adolescence. Pretty soon they become the troublemakers, as they reach adolescence.

We can take responsibility for a good part of these social and personal problems because there is a very direct link between inadequate nutrition, poor diet, and the lack of development that we see in many of these children. Often their parents cannot afford proper food and are themselves poorly nourished and apathetic. The whole relationship of inadequate diet and food is an important part of the syndrome of poverty.

This bill has particular significance for millions of poor people in Canada. It should be opposed for the same reasons that many senior citizens on limited incomes protested against the termination of food subsidies in 1978.

I should like to remind hon. members of a few further facts about poverty. Families on social assistance have very little money available for food. Neither do they have money for transportation to go and hunt for bargains in food or to go to the hinterlands to buy directly from the farmers. They cannot afford to buy freezers and take advantage of bulk purchase prices. Although they have the least amount of money in their food budgets of any people, they have to pay the highest prices. Usually the only place they can shop for a few items at a time is the corner grocery store. By the end of the month these families are eating spaghetti, bread, or sandwiches without meat.

In British Columbia a family of four on social assistance receives $334 per month. That does not include shelter. Out of this they must buy bus tickets, clothing, school supplies, recreation, if they have any, as well as food. We know now that nutritionists say it requires well over $300 per month at today's prices to provide a nutritious and adequate diet for a growing family of four people.

If you were living alone, Mr. Speaker, even with parliamentary dining room privileges, I doubt if you could feed yourself on $136 per month. This is what a single person on welfare receives today and it must cover all expenses, including food. I wonder how such people can possibly afford to buy bread which is now close to $1 per loaf.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see the relevance of fish, freezers, and social policy to a debate on the Two-Price Wheat Act. I think it is indicative of something, that the hon. member did not know that the bill under discussion was S-6. This has been apparent through the speech, as she is not speaking to the subject.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. As the occupant of the chair I have had cause once or twice in recent weeks to ask hon. members to consider seriously whether they are observing the rule of relevancy, so it comes as perhaps a somewhat strange ruling on my part that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), although the subject matter of Bill S-6 is the two-price wheat system, is nonetheless speaking about food, food costs, and the cost of living to Canadians. In that regard I think I have to find that the hon. member is in order.

Mrs. Mitchell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it is particularly significant that the hon. member and the party he represents are insensitive to the real meaning of the two-price policy on wheat. It certainly was aimed at trying to make food available to people at a reasonable price.

Surely in a country like Canada, where we can afford to pay over $3 billion for fighter planes, we can afford to subsidize the cost of bread and milk for children and the elderly. Why can we not subsidize nutritious lunches in schools and daycare centres? I am told that this has been a regular practice in the United Kingdom for many years. Surely we could find the funds if we had the will to do it.

This bill establishes once and for all that the Liberal government does not care about the needs of the people, particularly poor people. It does not care enough to reinstate a bread subsidy program or to establish a national food policy. The New Democratic Party feels that food subsidies should certainly be the cornerstone of a national food policy and this bill relates directly to this.

When I first became a candidate for election to this House, Mr. Speaker, I consulted the former member for Vancouver-Kingsway, Mrs. Grace MacInnis, who will long be remembered in this House for her outstanding service to Canada. She told me that her greatest regret over the years she was here and since her retirement, was that this House did not bring in a national food policy for Canada, one that would recognize that all Canadians should have the right to nutritious food at prices they could afford, along with the right to decent and affordable housing. Perhaps these should be included as basic rights when we talk about the Bill of Rights and revising our constitution.

It should be the right of every Canadian child to start life well nourished, with maximum opportunities to develop his or her potential. If we accept this as a desirable goal for a country like ours, we must have a government that provides leadership and that will have a practical plan to assist consumers, as well as farmers, through the control and subsidization of food prices.

Instead of permanently withdrawing Bill S-6, we should extend it to cover a much wider range of essential food items. I would suggest a range of food items that reflects Canada's food laws would be most appropriate—food that would be distributed only through Canadian food outlets.

Last year I proposed to the Peoples Food Commission that the Government of Canada should initiate a fair food policy and that this policy should subsidize five essential foods—those foods which children are told in school that they must eat in order to have a balanced diet. The five sample foods are symbolic of the five categories of food that make up a balanced diet, and they are produced in Canada.

First, is nutritious whole grain bread, or, in the case of some ethnic groups, a substitute of rice or pasta. This should be the first food we subsidize. At one time the Liberal government recognized this, despite the way the hon. member opposite who just spoke seems to interpret the bill.

Mr. Nystrom: And Gene the Terrible took it off.

Mrs. Mitchell: Yes, Gene the Terrible took it off. Second are dairy products. At one time there was a subsidy on skim milk. Most families prefer fresh milk, of course, but certainly we should have a food policy that would make milk available to every family. I have just returned from a tour of the northern peninsula of Newfoundland where I discovered that milk is a rarity and, if it is received, it is often six or seven days old.

Third would be meat, poultry or fish. I am sure that my colleague to my right agrees that it should be Canadian fish, fresh or frozen. It should be available at affordable prices to every Canadian family at least once a week.

Finally, fresh vegetables such as carrots, should be available. Canadian apples should be made available under a fair food policy.

I should like to call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—REQUEST FOR HEARINGS ON ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL POTATO MARKETING AGENCY

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on June 16 I put the following question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), and I quote:

> In view of the apparent general support among potato growers for the concept of a national potato marketing agency, will the minister ask the Farm Products Marketing Council to initiate public hearings this summer in order to move toward that objective; and if they will not do that, will the minister immediately establish a commission of inquiry, on an urgent basis, to look into the potato industry in Canada?

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture replied saying that indeed he had been in touch with the National Farm Products Marketing Council and had asked it to hold public hearings to inquire into the potato industry. He added, and I quote:

> I believe I can safely say that hearings will be held this summer on the proposals, especially by the provinces of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, that a regional agency be established for the eastern production region of Canada, including Ontario, Quebec, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

Since then, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture—if I am to believe an article I read in the newspaper Le Droit of Ottawa on last Thursday or Friday which I unfortunately do not have with me at this time, the Minister of Agriculture came back charging and said he hoped the Farm Products Marketing Council would undertake as soon as possible to hold public hearings with a view to eventually establishing that potato marketing board that all or nearly all people are now calling for forcefully, of course, because of the poor situation in which the potato industry has been for the past three years, without going back further.

The other aspect of my question, Mr. Speaker, consisted in asking the minister whether the Farm Products Marketing Council did not want to go ahead immediately and hold public hearings with a view to establishing a potato marketing board.

I asked the minister whether he was prepared to set up an independent commission of inquiry into all aspects of the potato industry. I think there is no point in reminding the many hon. members listening to me tonight and the Minister of Agriculture that during the few months we were in the opposition I advocated the establishment of that independent commission of inquiry to report as soon as possible. And, fortunately, that proposal did not die on the shelves as the Liberal party in its great wisdom decided to include it in its agricultural platform. And I remember full well, among other things, a large page of advertising that was published in a farming weekly in the province of Ontario which was paid for by the Liberal party and where one could see the picture of the present Minister of Agriculture, who is still the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Whelan, containing that election commitment to establish as soon as possible an independent commission of inquiry into all aspects of the potato industry in Canada and to have it report to the government on an urgent basis.

• (2205)

Mr. Speaker, I know that the Minister of Agriculture has only the best of intentions when he urges the officials of the Farm Products Marketing Agency to hold public hearings as soon as possible. However, this is only one part of a much more complex problem, and as evidence I would like to quote a letter dated January 7 that I received from one of the big names in the potato industry, McCain Foods Limited:

[English]

Obviously, it would not matter to us one way or the other if an inquiry was held. I am certainly not opposed to it.

The problems of the potato industry are not simple. I don't think it is any one item that is giving us troubles—it is probably a series.

[Translation]

I could also quote many letters that I received at my office from simple farmers, people who deal solely with the production of potatoes and who support what I have said to the effect that it is urgent to get to the bottom of this situation, because when an industry like the potato industry has marked ups and downs for about 15 years, we have to wonder not if the industry is sick, but rather what stage of its agony it has reached, because, in my opinion, the potato industry is more than sick, it is agonizing.

When I speak about the potato industry, I have the impression that I know what I am talking about, and I am thinking mostly about the independent producers, the small family farms with 100, 150 or 200 acres and other family operations which might farm well over 500 acres.

However, I am thinking mostly about these hundreds of average producers for whom the state of the markets, the state of all the marketing structures and the government policies at the federal and provincial levels have become matters of life and death. No one in this industry and no one at the federal level is able now to pinpoint the trouble. I am not more of an expert than others, but I am ready to admit that, as written in the letter that I quoted earlier, we have a whole series of problems and that the simple fact of establishing a potato marketing agency will not get to the bottom of the situation and bring the potato industry back to health or to life. I therefore look forward to hearing the comments of the Minister of Agriculture because in the past, he has always responded very humanely to the problems which affect the various sectors of agricultural production in Canada.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member I will repeat a little of what I have already said. On May 29 I directed the National Farm Products Marketing Council to inquire into the merits of forming a marketing agency under the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and report the findings to me with dispatch.

Some people may have different ideas as to what "dispatch" means, but according to the act it means that after public notification has been given, hearings can be held within 45 days. They have held meetings with all the provinces they felt were interested and which have experienced this economic drought because they were producing a product—but they were as badly off as the farmers in western Canada who have nothing to sell; these people produce the product but they could not sell it, and in many instances a lot of it came to destruction through deterioration since there was no market for it. What we are saying to these producers is: let us organize properly so as to get rid of the kind of economic drought you face four years out of five, as the record will show.

There has been very little co-operation between the provinces which are the main producing provinces in Canada. That has to be a fact. Or else we can do as an old Conservative government did under R. B. Bennett when he forced a Canadian Wheat Board on the west in 1935—we could force a Canadian potato marketing commission on potato producers. That may be the only answer to getting a proper marketing system for the product because of the great inequity there is in the potato business.

We are also receiving messages from provinces like British Columbia and Alberta, saying, "Please do not leave us out of any marketing commission or agency that you are going to set up for potatoes because we want to be in it." We are receiving that kind of representation. I had further discussions late last week with the National Farm Products Marketing Council. The council is prepared to go ahead because now the provinces of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario have said they want a tough agency. They want those kinds of hearings to be held with regard to the marketing of potatoes in eastern Canada.

So, we are on the way, but we also may be holding hearings in some of the provinces in western Canada to see whether we should go even further, because there is that authority vested in the Minister of Agriculture in the national farm products marketing legislation. I say that this is something which is long overdue. I think that a commission would only find most of the things we know already. There are many, many, bad, bad marketing practices, and the only thought I have is that if we appointed a commission it might say, "Mr. Minister, go ahead and recommend to your government that you impose a potato marketing commission or board on the producers of that product," because there is much unfairness, inequity and economic disparity existing among producers who produce a highly nutritious product but receive no returns. Many of these producers are going bankrupt. They are productive people. Something must be done, and I agree with the hon. member that something probably should have been done some time before.

NATIONAL REVENUE—EFFECT OF NEW CUSTOMS REGULATIONS ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am faced with a dilemma tonight. It is now about 12 minutes after ten, and I have seven minutes to deal with a problem which I did not realize was such a monumental problem all across Canada.

On May 5 I rose to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) about the use of B32 actions against small businessmen. At the time I was raising this because a constituent of mine brought to my attention the way he was being abused by the use of this action. Subsequently I received a file about an inch thick from brokers across Canada who are bothered by this kind of action.

My dilemma is how I can talk about this subject without becoming perilously close to what sounds like civil service bashing, which I detest. Yet this problem has to be corrected. How can I deal with it without criticizing the people who are the cause of the problem?

After I raised the issue, I found that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has addressed itself to the problem, and in one of its bulletins said:

It was stated that there was a growing tendency among port officials to adopt the attitude "Pay first and then we will listen to you" which amounts to a complete denial of the basic purpose of the 30-day grace period.

It is the customs officials who have the businessmen by the throat when they arrive at ports of entry with products they are trying to import.

Since May 5 I have found the following things. First, the practice which Revenue Canada has adopted in the customs branch may in fact be illegal. The Customs Act allows for 90 days for payment to be made on a reassessment, but the practice by the customs branch and the policy of the customs branch is to give 30 days. Is it possible for revenue policy to supersede the Customs Act? In fact the government may be facing a lawsuit on this matter. However, the customs officials know that small firms cannot afford litigation and that large firms are not bothered by the small amounts they have to pay. They can ride out that kind of storm. Small firms cannot do that, but larger firms can.

Second, I found that the practice was designed, oddly enough, to cut down on paper work. I found out through a departmental bulletin that when the B32 form was adopted, the practice took three forms to replace the one which was used previously. That is some way of cutting down on the paper burden for Canada and for the business community! The way we cut down on the paper burden in this practice is to put a pistol to the businessman's head and say, "Give me your wallet in five seconds". That is a good way of cutting down on litigation. That is a good way of cutting down the number of appeals, because if one has 30 days in this case instead of 90 days, there will be many fewer appeals. I suppose in some ways this has been effective, but it has not been fair, and that, after all, ought to be the uppermost policy of the government.

I know that customs officials cannot be expected to have on-the-spot, intricate knowledge of the multiplicity of imports arriving at the ports of entry. Let me illustrate. I have received a letter from the Minister of National Revenue dealing with this very issue. Here is what he said in this case:

The goods described as Foam Compound B, MR resins, FSC Foams Compound B, Aropol resins, and Hetron resins were also entered under tariff item 93901-1 and 93901-41, free, most favoured nation tariff rate. These have now been determined to be unsaturated polyester and polyether polyol polycondensation moulding compositions classifiable under tariff item 93901-41 at 12.5 per cent, most favoured nation tariff rate. However, it should be mentioned that when Compound A and Compound B are imported together as a system in pre-determined mixing ratios, they are classifiable as a polyurethane polycondensation moulding composition under tariff item 93901-42 at 7.5 per cent, most favoured nation tariff rate.

I wonder if the minister understood what he was writing when he wrote that letter to me. I know I did not understand it when I read it. I expect that most customs officials, when an item comes to the border or many other times like it, do not understand what the item is about. If they can be human enough, as they must be, not to understand the tariff items because they are intricate, surely they can be human enough to admit when they have made a mistake. That is the bottom line of all this.

What the customs officials are doing, it seems to me, is harassing businessmen because they know that the regulations are on their side, not because they are quoting them accurately but because they are so complex that the poor businessman will have to cave in. In order to cover themselves even further, they devised B32 which means that they can go back two years and reclassify at will items which a company has imported. If you are a small manufacturer and you have imported an item two years ago, you have remanufactured it, you have sold it, you have based your price on the cost of the item plus a small margin of profit, how can you go back two years on that item which has been sold, add the extra expense to the cost and to the price and recoup your losses? It seems to me that the customs officials do not appreciate the implications of the complications that they create for the small businessman.

The minister still has not answered me how the businessman is supposed to function if the government can go back two years and the businessman has no recourse in recouping his cost. I wonder how many customs officials there are across Canada who have never had any business experience at all and therefore have never understood what happens to the businessman. In the case of my constituent it meant that the bill which was presented to him for 30 days payment wiped out the profit for two years for that company, which meant that there was no margin for error, which meant that 14 jobs were on the line, just because some official wanted a cushion of comfort to be able to go back two years.

There were three officials who reclassified those items three different ways. Could they be wrong? I expect they could be wrong. The option then is to drive these people out of business. If the government wants to do that, it can carry on with the present practice.

Let me state in conclusion that the great fear I have—and no company has said it to me—is that if a company makes a representation to a member of Parliament such as I, I wonder what will happen the next time it comes to the border. Will the customs officials harass the company even more than they have before because it had the audacity to make a representation to its member of Parliament?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I suppose we can only be thankful that the hon. member refrained from bashing our civil servants.

● (2220)

I appreciate the opportunity the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) has given me to explain the effect of new customs regulations on small businesses. In his question of May 5 the hon. member made specific mention of the B32 assessment and the 30-day period in which payments must be made. The practice of issuing requests for additional duty and/or tax of course is not new. What is new is the requirement that such assessments be paid within 30 days. This system of payment was introduced nearly a year ago. It was done as a result of a recommendation by the financial management task force on accounting and control of revenue, refunds and drawbacks, set up because of reports and criticisms generated by international audits and by the office of the Auditor General in the areas of accounts receivable and accounts payable. As we all know, the hon. member's party is the very one which told us Liberals to pay very close attention to what the Auditor General said.

The task force recommendation was that assessments and reassessments be payable on demand. However, the system introduced was to require payment within 30 days of the date of the B32 notice. In making this recommendation, the task force observed that accounts receivable in customs were too high and there were delays in payments.

It should be noted that the Customs Act envisages the payment of duty at the time of entry of the goods and that the 30 days of grace granted in paying assessments is in accordance with current business practice. Also, the vast majority of these assessments are paid without appeal or, if appealed, the ultimate decision confirms the assessment. Of course importers have the right to appeal these assessments under the provisions of sections 46, 47 and 48 of the Customs Act. This procedure provides for an appeal eventually to the deputy minister and, if not satisfied, to the Tariff Board and the Federal Court.

The problem in accounts receivable arose as a result of a systems change in 1973-74 designed to expedite the clearance of goods at customs to the benefit of all importers. The system has been very successful in this regard. This new system permits importers or their agents to clear goods on the basis of their own declarations of duty and tax owing. In general, it is not until some time after entry, usually within four weeks, that a departmental officer reviews the entry document and first, agrees with the entry as presented; second, decides that too much duty and/or tax has been paid; or third, decides that additional duty and/or tax is owing. A B32 assessment for additional duty and/or tax may then be issued. This assessment is made on the basis of the officer's interpretation of the legislation and past departmental rulings, policy statements and instructions. Of course importers and brokers may seek guidance from departmental officers on tariff classification and valuation matters in advance of importation so as to ensure the accuracy of their declarations.

As regards the three different classification judgments on one item by three different officers, departmental officers are aware of the importance of uniformity of application of the Customs Act across the country. Substantial resources are devoted to improving uniformity. If any situations occur when an opinion or a ruling on tariff classification will be given which conflicts with a previous opinion or ruling, the importer has recourse to the formal appeal procedure. I see Mr. Speaker is about to call my time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—CHARGE OF RAPE—DEFENCE OF CONSENT—AMENDMENT TO CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise in connection with a question which I asked in this House on June 4 last of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) with respect to the question of rape and certain decisions which were made by the Supreme Court of Canada on this subject in recent months.

In the April 14 Speech from the Throne the Liberal government pledged that it would take strong measures to promote equality for women, saying that there was no room in Canada for sexual discrimination of any kind. One of the areas on which we were promised action was "the very serious problem of violence against women". In the meantime we have seen no sign whatsoever of the government's proposed aid to women who are victims of violence.

● (2225)

What has happened is that the Supreme Court of Canada has produced two judgments which seriously affect the laws that relate to violent crimes against women. On May 20 last the Supreme Court delivered its judgment in the case of Regina v. Pappajohn. In this judgment the court upheld the admissibility of the defence on the part of an accused that he had an honest belief the victim of the rape was consenting even though he could cite no reasonable ground for that belief.

In upholding the validity of this particular defence our Supreme Court relied upon the precedent that had earlier been set in an English case, a decision of the House of Lords in The Director of Public Prosecutions v. Morgan. In that case the House of Lords ruled that three men who were in fact convicted of rape would have been acquitted had they claimed they believed the woman they had raped at the behest of her husband was playacting when she violently resisted the assault of these three men, even though there were no reasonable grounds for that belief whatsoever. In that particular case the husband of the woman in question had said that if the three men came home and wanted to rape his wife she would put up quite a struggle, but they should ignore that because really she was just pretending. The British House of Lords held, and our Supreme Court here in Canada followed the decision, that had they honestly believed she really was just playacting they would have been acquitted completely of the charge of rape.

We see the serious effect of that in a decision which shortly followed. In the decision of Regina v. Cogan, a case in which a woman who was crying, who was protesting against the advances and the assault of a man who had been invited by her husband to rape her, in effect, the accused was acquitted. This particular man who was charged with rape was acquitted. His defence was that he thought he had the consent of the woman because her husband had said it would be all right. That is the result of the kind of decision which our Supreme Court of Canada recently handed down in Pappajohn.

The serious implications of this decision cannot be overemphasized. The fact is that now women are going to be placed basically in the invidious position of having either to resist an attacker forcefully so it is clear beyond any doubt whatsoever they were opposing, or to submit willingly even though what that could mean is that the woman would subsequently have no recourse in law. This will, of course, mean there will be even fewer reported rapes and even fewer convictions for a crime in respect of which there is already a very low incidence of report.

On June 4 I asked the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development what action he and his government were prepared to take to deal with the effects of this very mistaken decision on the part of our Supreme Court. I certainly hope the parliamentary secretary in the House tonight is prepared to tell the House that legislation will be forthcoming very quickly, and that it will not be included in the omnibus criminal code amendments which have been promised by the government for some time.

It is critical we recognize that these changes should redefine the nature of rape to recognize that it is not a crime of passion, but in fact is a crime of violence against women. Our law must recognize that. I certainly hope the law will also get rid of the so-called spousal immunity whereby a husband cannot be convicted of raping his wife even under the most outrageous of circumstances. This perpetrates the old myth of a woman, a wife, as a property of her husband. I certainly hope we will hear tonight that the government intends to remove that particular inequity in our laws in respect of sexual offences against women.

Finally I would note that, although we have seen no action whatsoever on the part of the government in this important area of violent crimes against women, we have once again in the decision of Regina v. Forsythe, by the Supreme Court of Canada, seen a very serious setback to women in the area of rape and the laws of evidence in rape trials. We have seen that our Supreme Court has permitted defence counsel now to badger and harass women about their sexual activities with other persons other than an accused, activities which are clearly and totally irrelevant to the question of whether at any given time a woman was violently or sexually assaulted by a man with a charge of rape then being laid.

We see in both the Pappajohn and in the Forsythe decisions the need for Parliament to move quickly in this area of the law, the need for long overdue amendments to protect women who have been the victims of these kinds of attacks.

● (2230)

In concluding, I hope that we will see, as I said earlier tonight, the review which has apparently been conducted by the department, completed, and that the crime of rape will be redefined as a crime which reflects the reality of its violent nature against women.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern of the hon. member for the problems of victims of sexual assault, and I share those concerns with him. I do not concur with his views on the effect of the recent Pappajohn decision, to which he refers. In all seriousness I suggest that he take a closer look at the judgment before he makes and spreads abroad even more the misinterpretation of at least a part of the decision to which I will now address myself.

The Pappajohn decision of the Supreme Court of Canada affirms that what is known as a "mistake of fact" defence is available in Canada on a charge of rape. Before a judge can put a defence to the jury, there must be an evidentiary basis upon which that defence can rest. For a "mistake of fact" defence to succeed in a rape case, there must be some evidence which, if believed, would support the existence of the accused's honest but mistaken belief that the complainant was consenting to the act of sexual intercourse.

In the Pappajohn case the trial judge did not put the defence of "mistake of fact" to the jury because he was of the opinion that there was no evidentiary basis for it. The accused's defence was that the complainant consented; it was not that he mistakenly believed that the complainant consented. The majority of the judges in the Supreme Court of Canada agreed that the trial judge was correct in not putting this defence to the jury. The two dissenting judges thought that the defence should have been put to the jury.

It is incorrect to say that an accused must be acquitted even if there were no reasonable grounds for this belief. While the existence of reasonable grounds is not a pre-condition to the availability of the defence, those grounds necessarily determine the weight the jury will give to the defence.

The hon. member has also raised the matter of legislation amending the Criminal Code to deal with sexual offences against women. I point out to him that the code amendments under consideration right now would deal with sexual offences against men and women. I am sure that the hon. member was concerned with both instances, although his emphasis was on instances concerning women.

There was quite an extensive review over the last decade of this entire subject. As a result the government introduced Bill C-52, in the Thirtieth Parliament, which was criticized on a number of grounds, including that of redefinition of rape to indecent assault on the one hand and aggravated sexual assault in the other circumstance. Since that bill was introduced there has been a great deal of criticism from women's organizations. The Department of Justice and its officials since the introduction of that bill a couple of years ago have consulted very widely and have been assisted by the Canadian Status of Women Council in that particular respect.

I would inform the hon. member that the minister is presently reviewing all the possible alternatives on this very serious and acute subject. I am advised by the Department of Justice that the minister hopes to finalize this matter with cabinet in the coming weeks with a view to introducing a bill on the subject as soon as possible. In the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) I do not wish to comment on the Forsythe decision to which the hon. member has referred. However, I want to assure him that the minister is studying that decision of the Supreme Court very carefully. Finally, I concur with the hon. member in his concern for this matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PAYMENTS TO GRAIN PRODUCERS—DATE CHEQUES EXPECTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that there has been no indication by the government whether or not there will be a payment made under the provisions of the Western Grain Stabilization Act, and in view of the fact that it was the stated intention of the government when the bill was passed that payments would be made to producers at or about the time of spring seeding, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That the minister in charge of the act make a statement in the House advising why there has been a delay, whether or not a payment will be made under the act, and the date when it is expected cheques will be made.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

NEED TO TIGHTEN PROGRAM PROCEDURES AND CONTROLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the past dismal record of the administration of the Canadian Home Insulation Program, a few examples of which are perpetually late payments to home owners, shortage of application kits, lack of information, dishonest insulators fattening at public expense, and lackadaisical accounting practices which lead to home owners receiving double payments for the same job, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House urge the responsible minister to immediately tighten program procedures and controls so that Canadian taxpayers' money will not be squandered further.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INTERNATIONAL WHEELCHAIR OLYMPICS

CONGRATULATIONS TO CANADIAN PARTICIPANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I did not have an opportunity to consult with the government or the other party in the opposition about this, but I am hoping they will grant unanimous consent to my motion.

Under Standing Order 43 I should like to point out that whereas Canadian athletes have just returned from competition at the International Wheelchair Olympics in the Netherlands, and whereas many of those athletes achieved outstanding performances through tremendous professional, personal and team efforts and Canada placed third out of 43 countries participating, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House congratulate the athletes, trainers and organizers of the Canadian 1980 Wheelchair Olympics team, and that this House request that the Speaker convey congratulations to each of the athletes on behalf of all Canadians and members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Does the House agree to the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—REQUEST BILL S-6 BE WITHDRAWN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the inadequate price set by this Liberal government for domestic grain, grain consumed in Canada, in the last crop year and set arbitrarily for the 1980-81 crop year, and in light of the financial burden which this government has asked the farmers of western Canada to bear, rather than honouring its legal commitments, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this government immediately withdraw Bill S-6, recognize its legal obligation to the farmers of western Canada and pay out the $200 million owed to the farmers of western Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

NEED FOR STRONG NATIONAL GOVERNMENT—NEGOTIATIONS ON CONSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter which should receive the unanimous consent of the House.

In view of the fact that the problems of inflation, unemployment and energy are global in nature, in view of the present international tensions that are a threat to world peace, and in view of this year's report of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, which includes 23 western industrialized nations, that Canada has the most decentralized government of all these nations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mr. Kelly):

That this House acknowledge the need for a strong Canadian national government, and support the Prime Minister in the ongoing constitutional negotiations with the provincial premiers with regard to the split of federal-provincial powers.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ANNEXES TO CONTRACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

On April 17, I asked the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) to table the contract for the new fighter, the F-18, and cautioned him on the dangers in that contract. I further asked him about any contingency plans in the event of a United States decision to cancel the F-18 program. On May 6, the same minister was asked in the House by the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley) to table the contract. On June 12, he finally tabled the contract without annexes, but promised in the House that he would make these annexes available to members of the House who requested them.

On June 20, I wrote to the minister to ask for the missing annexes to the contract which detail the financial commitments made on behalf of Canada, and since that date I have heard nothing. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That this House directs the Minister of Supply and Services to table all the annexes to the fighter contract signed with McDonnell Douglas.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

HOUSE DEBATE BEFORE AMENDMENTS RATIFIED BY CABINET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, although I am not sure my motion will be passed. The issue concerns the northern gas pipeline.

Whereas the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), when he was serving as parliamentary secretary to the president of the privy council, said in the House on February 15, 1978, that Canada must be protected against "any risk on non-completion" of the northern pipeline; whereas the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), when he was president of the privy council, said in the House on April 4, 1978, "From the very beginning I undertook in the House to ensure that Parliament was brought in at every stage"; whereas the government so far has refused to bring the disastrous sell-out known as the pre-build of the pipeline back to the House so that Parliament can freely and openly determine if Canada is protected against the risk of non-completion under the proposed amendments to the Northern Pipeline Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House directs the President of the Privy Council to honour his predecessor's promise and his own words by bringing any amendment to the Northern Pipeline Act or schedule to that act before this House for full debate before ratification by cabinet.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PRODUCTION OF GASOHOL—EXEMPTION FROM EXCISE TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canada must move toward energy self-sufficiency, whereas the capacity of Canada to produce liquid portable fuels is declining, whereas the production of gasohol in Canada is technically possible on a large scale, and whereas many countries are now producing significant amounts of gasohol, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That the federal government exempt gasohol from the seven-cent a gallon excise tax in order to encourage the production of gasohol in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

DELAY IN ISSUING PROJECT PAYROLL CHEQUES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the deplorable, inexcusable and arrogant action by this government in telling young people employed with the federal Summer Youth Employment Program to borrow their pay cheques from chartered banks because the present Liberal government cannot issue pay cheques to these students in less than eight weeks from the signing of a contract—and I remind you, Madam Speaker, that some of these young people have been waiting since May for their first pay cheques—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott):

S.O. 43

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration immediately launch a full-scale investigation into this matter, advise his department that they are no longer to continue to advise these students to borrow their payroll from the chartered banks of Canada, and that government youth project payroll cheques will be sent out in a lot less time than eight weeks from the date of project approval.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN FEDERATION

SEVENTY-FIFTH BIRTHDAY OF SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA—COMMEMORATIVE STAMP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This year Canada is celebrating the seventy-fifth birthday of two western provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta. These two provinces supply much of the food and energy of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: The pioneers who settled and developed these provinces came from many countries and are truly representative of the multicultural character of this nation.

In recognition of the seventy-fifth birthday of these provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House extend to all people, and in particular the pioneers of Alberta and Saskatchewan, greetings and congratulations for their extensive contribution to the success of the Canadian federation and, furthermore, that the federal government strike a suitable stamp to commemorate the seventy-fifth birthday of these two provinces.

I suggest this in view of the fact that this has been done on many occasions in respect of other events.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER PATRIATION CONSTITUTES AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, may I, on behalf of all Alberta residents, sincerely thank the House of Commons for its kind wishes extended today.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I have some questions for the Prime Minister relating to matters on which I assume he has sought advice, particularly of law officers of the Crown. Can he tell the House whether it is the position of the government that patriation of the constitution constitutes an amendment of the constitution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not sought the opinion of law officers of the Crown on that matter, but I would be happy to do so.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I would hope the Prime Minister would convey that opinion to the House, since it could well prove to be germane. Is it the position of the government that the decision rendered on December 21 by the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of former Bill C-20 in any way affects the ability of Parliament to act unilaterally in respect of patriation?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure if the reference is to Bill C-20 or to Bill C-60.

Mr. Clark: I am sorry; it is C-60.

Mr. Trudeau: If it is to Bill C-60, would the Leader of the Opposition ask the question again?

Mr. Clark: I apologize, Madam Speaker, for miscalling the bill; it is Bill C-60. My question is whether it is the view of the government that the decision by the Supreme Court of Canada rendered in December of last year in any way affects the ability of Parliament to act unilaterally in respect of patriation.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I can ask for an opinion from the law officers of the Crown in that regard. But the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition will recall that the decision had to do with action by the federal government in respect of the Senate, and I have no recollection that it mentioned in any way the question of repatriation.

● (1420)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the Government of Canada still accepts the proposition put forth in the white paper issued by the then minister of justice, the late Hon. Guy Favreau, which said in part:

—that the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, that paper is nearly 20 years old and I am not quite sure in what context the particular phrase was used.

INQUIRY WHETHER NATIONAL REFERENDUM WILL BE HELD ON PATRIATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister. Many of us regard constitutional changes as a topic which often transcends partisanship. Many of us are concerned about the confrontationist statements which the Prime Minister made in his speech at the Liberal convention in Winnipeg. I refer to such statements as:

—I'm glad you're in a fighting mood—

Also:

—that's why it's up to you, the people, to decide that this matter must be done. So let us move!

In view of those statements which he made to the delegates at the convention, and statements made by his ministers, is the Prime Minister contemplating a national referendum on patriation of the constitution should the topic not find unanimous agreement at the first ministers' conference in September?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I answered that question some weeks ago in the House. The answer is that I am not contemplating a national referendum. As to the particular reference quoted by the hon. member, I think it is a valid statement that the source of all authority in this country is the people: They, being the last resort, will have to exercise their sovereignty if governments prove unable to do so.

Mr. Nielsen: It would really be nice if you believed that.

Mr. Trudeau: You don't?

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, despite the Prime Minister's disclaimer, there still remains serious doubt as to his position—to which he has alluded—and the direction that he may take on the matter after the September meeting. In terms of referendum legislation as it relates to patriation of the constitution, has the Prime Minister instructed any of his officials or, for that matter, any of his ministers to draft legislation relating to a national referendum on that subject?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have given no such instructions. I have reminded some of my colleagues of a suggestion which I made more than a year ago, that if after several more years of effort the provinces and the federal government are unable to reach an agreement yet again on the patriation of the constitution, there might be some cause to consider a referendum.

INDUSTRY

APPROVAL OF FOREIGN INVESTMENTS BY FIRA

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am sure the minister is aware that since the last election 94 per cent of all applications to establish new businesses which went before the Foreign Investment Review Agency were approved, and that 85 per cent of all acquisition requests were approved, all this in spite of the fact the government has indicated that it wants to discourage foreign investment other than where it is of proven significant benefit to Canada.

Would the minister tell the House whether or not he has responded to the request in the letter written to him on June 12 by the United Electrical Workers Union asking for an investigation into the acquisition by Murata Manufacturing of Japan of Erie Technological Products of Trenton, Ontario, and whether or not he has looked into the subsequent lay-off of approximately 150 employees by Murata immediately after the acquisition took place and was approved?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I certainly did respond to this request. I found that while the government had approved the proposed acquisition, it has not yet been completed, and that the lay-offs in question took place before the completion of that acquisition. We are continuing to look into the matter to ensure that all requirements under the act are being met.

Speaking of the administration of the act in general, I can assure the hon. member and this House that under my direction significant benefit, as is required by the act, is looked for very actively to ensure that the act is being enforced with respect to each and every application which is accepted by the government.

• (1425)

Mr. Deans: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I am sure the minister appreciates that although it may be technically true that the lay-offs took place before completion of the transaction, it was all part of the arrangement.

When the minister talks of significant benefit, could he explain to the House what significant benefit was derived from the sale of Thomas Holding Ltd. to Monique A. McCool, of Lima, Ohio, of a daycare centre? The answer given publicly by the Foreign Investment Review Agency is that it would improve product variety.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would read the release a little more fully, he would see that in the check list to which he referred there is also a check under other headings showing additional measures of significant benefit which he failed to mention to this House.

He failed to mention something even more important, and that was a small business application, as is the case with most of the ones we are dealing with. We are looking at significant benefits in every case. The economic significance of the transaction he mentioned is certainly not the same as the major acquisitions where we are paying special attention to the matter of significant benefit.

The hon. member is worried about day nurseries. I am worried about improving jobs and working conditions for millions of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: So Herb doesn't care about daycare.

Mr. Epp: Try and get the women's vote.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Deans: In light of the minister's answer, perhaps he might tell the House what the significant benefit was when Houdaille bought and then closed down their operation in Oshawa, and when Nokia bought or acquired and built a plant supposedly to make rubber tires in Ontario, when we all know there is a surplus of tires. Can the minister explain to the House where the benefits are and where all these wonderful jobs are?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, as usual, my hon. friend is really poorly informed, which is surprising because of his supposed background in the field. Nokia has not built any plant. In this case, some of the representations were set out in the press release indicating that this enables a change of what is now an import of tires, something that is permissible under present law, to the manufacture of tires in Canada, thus replacing imports with jobs for Canadians. He does not care about that.

With respect to the Houdaille transaction, that was approved under a previous administration. The representations, the undertakings, were being met; but conditions changed. We are investigating that to see whether there are breaches of undertakings so that we can take enforcement proceedings.

I suggest that my hon. friend ought to be more informed than he is on these vital matters, instead of fiddling around with day nurseries. When it comes to helping Canadians, he is still in diapers.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—SCHEDULE OF MEETINGS WITH PRODUCING PROVINCES

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday, the Prime Minister informed the House that at least tentative arrangements had been made for a meeting between himself and the Premier of Alberta for July 24, only one week before the expiration of the energy pricing agreement.

To make this July 24 meeting as productive as possible, am I correct in presuming that a series of meetings between now and July 24 are scheduled, either at the ministerial or top official level, for the purpose of clarifying, altering or setting forth new respective positions between the two levels of government? If that presumption is correct, I wonder if the minister would indicate the schedule of such meetings.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I intend to meet with my colleague from British Columbia in the course of the next week. It may be appropriate to have other meetings.

At the present time, no specific meetings have been set up with my colleague from Alberta. We have already had several meetings and I have put forward at least four or five offers. However, if there is any particular additional information that would be relevant, or if my colleague from Alberta is interested in discussing any particular changes, alternatives or offers he would have to make, I can assure my hon. friend that I am totally available and I will make myself available either in Edmonton or in Ottawa at any time that is convenient.

● (1430)

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, following the last meeting between the minister and his provincial counterpart, their respected positions were described by both ministers, I believe, as being miles apart, very far apart, or words to that effect, which presumably, unless the minister can inform us otherwise, is the situation today.

Is it the government's position, despite the crucial importance of an energy pricing agreement, that prior to July 24 no efforts are to be made to solve, for example, some of the ancillary issues or to set forth new proposals in order to give first ministers on July 24 some form of basis for agreement other than the situation where the positions are so far apart?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, it is quite obvious that the government is now thoroughly considering the results of negotiations between myself and my Alberta counterpart and studying any acceptable improvement to the proposals which I had the opportunity to make. If the government concludes that some improvements are possible, it is clear that the Prime Minister of Canada will have the opportunity to suggest and discuss them with his Alberta counterpart. Should it be deemed necessary to have further talks in the meantime, I wish to assure my hon. colleague that we will be quite pleased to meet our Alberta counterparts.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED SUBSTITUTION OF REGULAR FOR NON-LEADED GASOLINE

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister been made aware of any attempts by small oil companies to fraudulently substitute regular gasoline for non-leaded or super non-leaded gas in service station tanks, so that people are getting the cheaper leaded gas instead of the non-leaded gas which some vehicles require?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): No, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Solicitor General. As it is my understanding that this is, in fact, a practice which has taken place in Ontario, would the Solicitor General be willing to ask the RCMP to investigate the problem and determine the level of federal responsibility, if any, as to just how widespread the practice is and what measures may have to be taken to prevent further substitution?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I will look into the matter and speak to the hon. member about it.

Mr. Nielsen: You do not know what he is talking about.

SHIPBUILDING

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL MEET WITH MANAGEMENT AND UNION REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and follows up on the statement he made yesterday in the House. As of June 30, subsidies to the shipbuilding industry have been lowered from 20 to 9 per cent, which has put an end to negotiations for new contracts because of the uncertainty surrounding new measures to be announced by the government. When does the minister intend to meet the industry advisory group and union representatives? Also, will it be the same advisory group which has already submitted a report on the shipbuilding industry in Canada in 1978, and when does the minister intend to announce the new program?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I hope to begin as soon as possible consultations with groups interested in the future of shipyards. I am fully aware of the importance of this industry in the area represented by my hon. colleague, as well as in many other regions of our country, and hopefully it will be possible to obtain cabinet approval to implement a new and more effective program this fall.

ENERGY

UNITED STATES CONVERSION TO COAL-FIRED PLANTS—EFFECT ON ENVIRONMENT—EMISSION CONTROLS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given the serious threat to the Canadian environment if the American government proceeds with its plan to convert 80 power plants to coal in the northeastern United States, without emission controls, is the minister prepared to insist that before any future increases in the export of Canadian natural gas to the United States takes place the U.S. government gives written guarantees that the emission control standards on coal-fired power plants—or all industries, for that matter—will be the highest possible?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, this matter has been discussed both between myself and my colleague, the Secretary of State for Energy, and between the Secretary of State for the Environment in the United States and the Minister of the Environment. We have impressed upon the American authorities the great importance that we attach to this issue.

My colleague had a meeting as recently as a couple of weeks ago on this very subject. I think we are quite confident that the American authorities are very much aware of our concern, and that we will succeed in achieving a satisfactory arrangement in this respect. If my hon. friend wishes to have more specific information, I would suggest that he address his question to the Minister of the Environment.

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, the minister seems to be more confident about this problem than we are on this side. This situation has been going on for many years, with little action. If the minister is not prepared to use our natural resource exports to negotiate a clean air agreement with the United States, as I suggest he should, would he consider a special export tax on this resource to partially pay for the pollution damage to our economy that emissions from these coal-fired plants will cause?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the hon. member assumes in his question that there will be additional pollution arising from those developments. We are not ready to assume that at this time.

INCOME TAX

INDEXATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance perhaps I could put my question to the Prime Minister. As the deputy minister for finance, Mr. Stewart, indicated earlier today that his department continues looking to the total removal of indexing in the tax system, has revealed that this would produce a federal revenue gain of over $1.5 billion, and has also confirmed that it will reduce the threshold level in income for a family of four, if indexing is removed, from $12,400 down to $11,335—or a $1,000 difference as far as that relatively low-income family is concerned—would the Prime Minister put an end to the speculation about indexing removal once and for all and tell the deputy minister and his Minister of Finance that he wants no part of it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of State for Finance, myself, and the Minister of Finance have answered this question many times before. I fail to see why the hon. member is concentrating his attack on some hypothetical tax which is being studied. Why is he not making the same argument against all forms of taxation? I fail to understand that.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, we are concentrating our attack on this because it is hurting the relatively poorer income earner in this country more than anybody else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The Prime Minister does not need to be told again that the only reason the government is looking for this fresh revenue source is because it has failed to restrain its own spending.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please ask his question.

An hon. Member: Not a speech.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my supplementary to the Prime Minister is with respect to the wage earners who are now settling contracts with their employers through union negotiations. Does the Prime Minister feel it is fair for these wage earners to be settling, presumably, on what they think is a net tax position, only to find that some time between now and the fall they may be surprised to hear that indexing has been removed, and retroactively they will be taxed almost 10 per cent more than they anticipated?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, this question is hypothetical by its very nature: if something happens, something else will happen. But we do not know and we will not know until the budget. If the hon. member had used the same kind of indignation to prevent the government of which he was a member from slapping an 18-cent excise tax on all the people across Canada, he would still be on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What about wage and price controls?

An hon. Member: Where is your tax credit?

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT CONDITIONS FOR F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. It is about the new fighter aircraft. Can the minister confirm that he was recently in St. Louis and, as a result of his discussions with McDonnell Douglas there, is he now able to assure this House that McDonnell Douglas will satisfy all contract conditions and that everything is going according to schedule?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, having heard the hon. gentleman's motion under Standing Order 43 before the question period, I first of all wish to indicate to him that I would have hoped he would have been just a little more patient. I do have the annexes addressed to him with a covering letter that is available to him immediately after question period, if he should wish.

Mr. Clark: What a coincidence.

Mr. Blais: In terms of the F-18 contract, I wish to assure the hon. gentleman that I am content that best efforts are being made, in terms of the contract, to satisfy all terms of the contract. The project management team is already in St. Louis and is overviewing the performance of the contract and the meeting of all the milestones in terms of the performance of that aircraft.

We are content that the information that was available to us at the time of the signature of the contract is being maintained, and that aircraft will be the best aircraft available to Canada at the time of delivery. I might indicate, as well, that in terms of the industrial offsets there has been a great deal of interest by all Canadian manufacturers in the aeronautical and space industry. I am most encouraged by the response. In effect, the offset package will surpass the commitment that had been made by McDonnell Douglas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: It is nice to know that after raising the subject five times in the House of Commons the minister is finally going to give me those annexes. I listened carefully to his reply to my question. Does the minister, then, totally deny a news report in the July 7 Toronto Star which states, inter alia "and Ottawa officials have confirmed that production of the interceptor will be delayed six months because of a redesign of the aircraft's wings"?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I am denying a number of reports that have been contained in the press, and allegations made in this House by members of the opposition that were completely unfounded. We must recognize that the selection of this aircraft was following analysis in a highly competitive marketplace. In effect, the F-16 is still competing with the F-18 in other areas. That competitive environment encouraged some statements to be made that were completely unfounded.

I might indicate to the hon. gentleman that he has seen the contract: he knows very well there are milestones identified within that contract that have to be met by McDonnell Douglas, failing which there will be financial penalties in liquidated damages which will have to be paid by that company.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PAYMENTS TO GRAIN PRODUCERS—DATE CHEQUES EXPECTED

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport, who answers in this House for the minister in the other place who is responsible for the Western Grain Stabilization Act. Can the minister advise this House if statistics gathered indicate that a payment has been triggered under the Western Grain Stabilization Act and, if so, the possible date when cheques will be mailed?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my indication from the Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board is that, indeed, that could be triggered. I do not have the figures as to the extent.

Mr. Neil: The minister is probably aware that in the debate, when the act was submitted to this House, the then minister indicated it was the intention, under the act, that payments would be made at or about seeding time in early spring, so that the grain producers would have funds with which to finance their production. Every year the payment gets later and later. I wonder if the minister would pass on to the minister in charge of the act the fact that the delay causes considerable inconvenience. Also, can he determine why each year the decision to make the payments comes later?

Mr. Pepin: I will indeed do so, Madam Speaker, but I might suggest that the hon. member could do so himself by agreeing to send Bill S-6 to committee. The minister responsible for the Wheat Board is waiting there to answer all questions of this type and other types.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY INTO INCIDENT AT DORVAL—DATE OF RELEASE OF FINDINGS

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Mr. Laurent Chartier, a higher official of civil aviation in the Department of Transport, told us that a near tragedy occurred at Dorval airport during the month of February. Could the minister tell the House whether it is true that upper echelons in Transport Canada held up an attempted inquiry, whether disciplinary action will be taken against the air controller and when the results of the inquiry will be released?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, with regard to the Dubin commission, my position has been not to comment on or make major changes to the air safety standards that are in effect in my department for the very good reason that a commission of inquiry was created specially for that very purpose. My predecessor and the judge appointed to that commission had concluded an agreement that such would be the policy of the minister and the department and I think that makes sense. When a commission of inquiry is created, I think the least one can do is give it every opportunity to hear, ponder and filter the evidence and then make the necessary recommendations. That is the position I have taken and I believe it is the right one. If I am not mistaken, Madam Speaker, it was also that of my predecessor.

METRIC CONVERSION

REPORTED DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of recent statements by the major chain stores in Canada, including Dominion, Loblaws, A and P and IGA, is it possible that the rumour is correct that the present government is considering delaying the implementation of metrication in 21 cities in Canada on January 1?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have taken no such decision.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. In light of his throne speech and his commitment to listen to the people and respond to their wishes and desires, and in light of the fact that in the test centres of Sherbrooke and Peterborough up to 85 per cent of the people do not wish to proceed with metrication on January 1, and they are not proceeding there, will the Prime Minister assure the House that he will listen to the people of Canada and not proceed seven years ahead of the United States with metrication in 21 cities in Canada on January 1?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems to be putting his own opinion forward, which is one following some great distance the lead of others. I do not know on what polls he is basing that opinion.

AIR SAFETY

ACTION AGAINST PERSONS BREAKING REGULATIONS—DUBIN INQUIRY

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport as well, but on a different subject. When the Dubin commission reports to him, perhaps in October, will he or his department take specific action against those participants who are breaking the safety regulations of his department?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I suggest we wait until we get the recommendations. I can say very emphatically that it is my intention to act as rapidly as I can on the recommendations that the judge makes.

Mr. Ellis: I appreciate that the minister is going to act on the recommendations. What I am asking, and what has been asked in this House on both sides, is: is the minister not going to act on the specific breaches that have been reported in evidence before the commission? If he is not going to act on those specific breaches, why is the commission taking place? The corollary is that if he is going to act on them in October, why will he not act on some of the more dramatic ones now?

● (1450)

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I think it has been traditional for a minister to commit himself, as I just did, to being respectful and to acting upon recommendations, but I have not heard anything to the effect that a minister is obligated to accept all the recommendations of a commission. That is the fine line that I am trying to walk at this time. I think that is the standard approach to this question.

FISHERIES

DUMPING OF EFFLUENT INTO B.C. WATERS—ENVIRONMENTAL HAZARD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I am sure the minister is aware that the permit to Amax in northern British Columbia, which he took part in granting and which allows the dumping of 100 million metric tons of effluent into Alice Arm, was granted on April 10, 1979, in the middle of a federal election campaign.

A number of eminent scientists in British Columbia have concluded that the proposed dumping not only poses a serious environmental hazard but also that the permit itself was based on faulty and incomplete information. I wonder if the minister would tell this House whether he is prepared to make the permit comply with the act passed by this Parliament, which is the Fisheries Act, and to have the standards of that act comply with the proposal made by Amax.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, first I might say to the hon. member that this permit has nothing to do with the fact that there was or was not an election campaign. Second, a document was given to one of the hon. member's colleagues at a parliamentary committee last week. The hon. member may not yet have become familiar with that, but it gave the honest opinion of the departmental official on what was the most effective way to avoid the problem of bleaching of deposits which would be subject to very heavy rains in that part of the country.

The hon. member also said that there were a number of scientists: I understand that there is at the moment only one who has publicly challenged the view of the department. We will obviously review this whole issue and come back to the hon. member when we have more information.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. I think it is a crucial question and that the Prime Minister should respond to the whole of Parliament.

An order in council was passed in the middle of a federal election campaign allowing 8,000 times more dumping than that allowed by an act passed by this Parliament. I wonder if the Prime Minister would comment on whether he feels that this practice is a good one. Second, would he support a full public review of this permit, which is the only one of its kind in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that question. If the hon. member would like to have an answer, maybe I could take his question as notice.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RETRAINING POLICY FOR EMPLOYEES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. It has been reported, arising from evidence at a standing committee, that an official of the Treasury Board indicated to the standing committee that a retraining policy for the public service has been approved by the Treasury Board. Is that true or not?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, we have been examining at length a substantial retraining policy for the public service, as I have indicated on numerous occasions and as I have discussed with the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. We have given approval at this stage to a proposed training program, the details of which I hope will be made public in the very near future.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if the minister can, I would be grateful if he could let me know approximately when the publication of the policy might take place; and could he indicate to the House whether he has completed consultations with the National Joint Council, if those are indeed contemplated by the minister?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I believe the training program will be very satisfactory to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, who has shown a great interest in these areas in the past and I hope will continue to do so in the future. I hope he will be very supportive of this program.

As I indicated, with us "in the very near future" means just that, and I hope that in the next several weeks we will be able to make it public.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT IN NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO—RELIEF PAYMENTS FOR FARMERS

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. Since drought conditions in northwestern Ontario are certainly as serious as they are in Manitoba, I ask the minister if the relief payments which he announced for the prairie provinces last Thursday will also be applicable to farmers in northwestern Ontario, who will need 300,000 or 400,000 bales of hay for this fall.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the question the hon. member asks is a very serious one, because farmers are affected by drought in that area as much as those in some of the constituencies of hon. members from Manitoba or Saskatchewan. It will be a non-discriminatory plan: they will receive aid in an equitable fashion.

IMMIGRATION

MINISTERIAL DISCRETION IN ISSUING PERMITS—CASE OF GIUSEPPE CALAMUSA

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In the relatively short time the minister has been in office, I wonder if he can recollect for the House the approximate number of occasions on which he has exercised his ministerial discretion by issuing minister's permits either to permit someone to enter Canada or to permit someone to stay in Canada. Of that number, how many has he issued against the recommendation of one of Canada's law enforcement agencies?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows quite well, the ministerial permit is something which is issued in the hundreds, and sometimes thousands. I think last year there were some 7,000 or 8,000 ministerial permits issued. Not all of them were issued directly by me, but I am authorized to give public servants and the commission the authority to make those permit decisions. I cannot give the exact number, but I would be glad to provide it to the hon. member at a convenient time.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, as I am sure you recognized—if the minister did not—the nub of the question was how many, or approximately how many, or what percentage he has issued against the recommendations of law enforcement agencies. If the minister wants specifics, my supplementary question is with regard to the case of Mr. Giuseppe Calamusa. I wonder if the minister could inform us if he issued that permit against the recommendation of one of Canada's law enforcement agencies.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, with respect to any case which comes before us for discussion, I receive recommendations and opinions from a variety of sources and it is my job to make discretionary judgments based upon those opinions. I would not single out any one agency.

Mr. Lawrence: A brief supplementary, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody.

SPORTS

FUNDING OF CANADIAN WHEELCHAIR SPORTS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. All parties in this House today applauded the outstanding success of the Canadian wheelchair sports team at the recent Wheelchair Olympics in the Netherlands.

Since in 1978 the Canadian Wheelchair Sports Association was recognized by the government and granted funding for an executive director to be housed at the national sports and recreational office, and because the organization wishes to continue to work and strengthen its ties with the sports part of the organization—the sports delivery system, rather than through the recreation side—I wonder if the minister could assure the House that the government does not plan to revert to its previous policy of having wheelchair sports treated as a special group of disabled under Recreation Canada.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I will inquire into this matter for the hon. member. I have not taken any position along the lines he has indicated, and it appears to me that the present arrangement is a suitable one.

Certainly there are aspects of the involvement which are recreational in nature, but the fiercely competitive nature of the athletic events in which wheelchair athletes participate makes them very much sport and very much athletic events, and I think a very good argument can be made in relation to the present arrangement.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, rumours persist that this group is going to be treated as a special group, and it is opposed to that. Can the minister tell us when the group will receive official notice from the minister's office as to whether there is to be an administrative change; and before any administrative change is implemented, will the group be consulted?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, the question is hypothetical because I have indicated that I have not taken any such position. If any change is contemplated, there certainly would be consultation in advance and we would attempt to have agreement on any change which might be decided upon. However, I do not at this moment contemplate such action. I think we are all extremely pleased about how well the wheelchair athletes of this country have done, not just in recent competition but in general over the years.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

NAMES OF MEMBERS OF CABINET COMMITTEES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On April 22 government ministers in the Senate refused to release the names of members of the cabinet committees. In view of the commitment made by the government in the Speech from the Throne on freedom of information, would the Prime Minister overrule his ministers in the Senate and declassify the names of the members of cabinet committees?

An hon. Member: As we did.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): My understanding is that the names were published in the newspapers. If they were published correctly, I will confirm them. I have no objection to making them public.

An hon. Member: Would you table them?

Mr. Trudeau: The minister in the Senate was probably reflecting the previous attitude of the government which, as the hon. member will recognize, was changed in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Beatty: Will the Prime Minister undertake to table or to have tabled in the House of Commons the list of cabinet committees and their members?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker.

WELFARE

POSSIBILITY OF BABY BONUS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister tell the House whether or not her opposite number in Quebec consulted her about his plan to encourage the population growth in Quebec through a $240 subsidy to Quebec women? Does the minister intend to promote that program and recommend the financial participation of the government?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the Quebec government did not consult the federal government on that project and I hope it is no more than a trial balloon. We have received no information other than that supplied by the press to enlighten us on whether that baby bonus is a worthy cause. The real amount of money has yet to be established at which mothers are willing to have more children, and the projects submitted to me by other study groups in Canada dealt with sums of money, allowances to mothers in the months preceding the birth, but certainly not after the birth.

U.I.C.—COMPUTER CENTRE IN MONTREAL—INVESTIGATION OF POSSIBLE MISUSE

Question No. 7—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the RCMP investigate, prior to May 22, 1979, the possible misuse of the Unemployment Insurance Commission computer centre in Montreal, Quebec, by persons employed by the government on behalf of outside interests and, if so (a) on what date did the investigation commence (b) was it completed and, if so, on what date (c) did the investigation take long and, if so, for what reason (d) will the results be made public and, if so, on what date (e) will any charges be laid (f) was Key Data Canada involved in the investigation?

2. Were Mr. Robert Kingsley, former director of the Regional Payment Centre, Montreal, Quebec, and/or Mr. D. Mainville, former chief, computer regional director at the time involved and, if so, what part did they play in the incident?

3. Will the government confirm, by name and job designation, whether or not it has been determined that an employee of the UIC at the time received a swimming pool in return for his co-operation?

4. Will the government make public whether or not it was determined that certain employees were given twenty dollars in plain envelopes in an attempt to associate them with the venture and what are the names of those persons who took such envelopes?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1.

Yes.

(a) October, 1977.

(b) Yes; September, 1978.

(c) Approximately 11 months; not an inordinate length of time.

(d) No.

(e) The Provincial Crown Prosecutor has advised that no evidence exists to support criminal charges in this matter.

(f) The only involvement by Key Data Canada was that they were bound by a contract with the Unemployment Insurance Commission to convert and computerize the UIC payment system.

2. Mr. Robert Kingsley and Mr. D. Mainville delegated three or four UIC employees to work on a part-time basis for Key Data to correct an error made by Key Data on a former contract with another government department. This was done in order to speed up the UIC conversion and it is felt that it was in the best interest of all concerned. These persons acted in an acceptable manner under the circumstances and no criminal activity was found.

3. An employee of UIC installed a backyard swimming pool at his residence. This person obtained a second mortgage on his home and a portion of this money was used for the purchase of the pool. This matter was thoroughly investigated and it has been established beyond all doubt that this person used his own funds for the purchase in question.

4. During the time of the conversion, the work force at UIC was reduced by approximately 60 per cent causing a great deal of hostility amongst employees. It is felt that this allegation may possibly have been made by disgruntled employees seeking revenge. Although some of the persons interviewed stated that they had received payments of $15.00 or $20.00, the investigation uncovered no additional evidence to substantiate this allegation.

MR. MARK McCLUNG

Question No. 11—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Mark McClung a member of the RCMP and, if so (a) on what date was he appointed (b) what is his complete history with the RCMP, including whether or not he had any connections with the security service (c) on what date did he leave the RCMP and for what reason, including whether or not he was dismissed and for what reason?

2. What are all the subsequent positions in the public service held by Mr. McClung, including departments, salaries and dates?

3. Is Mr. McClung a member of the public service and, if not, on what date did he depart and what are all the reasons surrounding his departure including the causes?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Secretary of State and the Solicitor General as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) Mr. McClung was engaged by the RCMP as a civilian employee, on a temporary basis, on March 5, 1951.

(b) Mr. McClung was initially engaged as a civilian research technician in the RCMP special branch. He became a permanent employee on April 1, 1952, a position he held until his resignation in December 1960.

(c) On December 23, 1960, he, of his own free will, terminated his employment with the RCMP to take up a position with the Glassco Commission on Public Organization.

2. November 1973-October 1976

SAPP appointment—PM 6—Education Research and Liaison Branch

Department of Finance Salary range $10,081-11,800

1960-1962

Researcher, Royal Commission on Government Organization

Salary up to $12,000

1951-1960

Researcher, R.C.M.P.:

Salary range $5,800-9,800

3. Mr. McClung is no longer a public servant, compulsory retirement, due to age, was taken October 16, 1976.

RCMP—FORMER COMMISSIONER WILLIAM HIGGITT

Question No. 33—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did former RCMP Commissioner William Higgitt give testimony before the McDonald commission from notebooks in his possession and, if so (a) on whose authority did he keep such notebooks separate from regular RCMP files (b) were the notebooks kept in his residence (c) was it government policy to allow persons to keep private records of a sensitive or security nature in their possession after retirement and, if so, has this policy been changed?

2. Did any former RCMP official, including Commissioner Higgitt, ever advise the government, directly or indirectly, that they kept such records for purposes of "self protection" in the event that they were called upon at a later date to justify or testify in regard to certain incidents for which they would not ordinarily have files available to them?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. Yes.

(a) The notebooks contained the personal notes of Commissioner Higgitt kept by him during his term of office. Authority was neither sought nor given for Commissioner Higgitt to keep such notebooks. They were not, and ordinarily would not, be part of the regular RCMP file system.

(b) Yes.

(c) Although there has been no established policy with respect to the keeping of private records by civil servants, the government is now considering the development of clear guidelines in this area.

2. No.

GUY FAVREAU COMPLEX IN MONTREAL

Question No. 44—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the government intend to proceed with construction of the Guy Favreau complex in Montreal and, if so, what is the estimated cost involved at this stage?

2. Will the government consider not proceeding with the complex as a restraint measure?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1 and 2. The government intends to proceed with the implementation of the Guy Favreau complex in Montreal, Quebec. The most recent estimated cost is $100,000,000 (1978 dollars).

Order Paper Questions

INVESTIGATION—INFILTRATION OF SEPARATIST ELEMENTS

Question No. 73—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the RCMP or any department or agency investigate, or at present are they investigating, whether or not there are separatist elements that have infiltrated the RCMP and, if so (a) on what date did such an investigation begin and by which department (b) what are all the details?

2. Does the government have any knowledge of persons within the RCMP who have separatist sympathies?

3. Does the government have any knowledge of persons in the Public Service who have separatist sympathies or who actively support the Parti Québécois or the forthcoming Quebec referendum, in the affirmative, and, if so, to what extent and what are all the details of the government's plans to deal with the situation?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Prime Minister and Privy Council offices and the Solicitor General as follows:

1 and 2. Internal security requirements and investigations are an ongoing concern of the RCMP. Such matters fall within the category of security operations, which, as a matter of policy, are not publicly commented on. If the hon. member has information concerning the possible "infiltration" of the RCMP by separatist or any other elements, it is recommended that he make it available to the Solicitor General of Canada or directly to the RCMP.

3. The Government of Canada does not consider sympathy or support for the Parti Québécois as a factor which would preclude employment in the Public Service of Canada unless the activity falls within the definition of political partisanship as defined in Sec. 32(1)(a) and (b) of the Public Service Employment Act.

U.S. CITIZENS IMMIGRATING TO CANADA—CANADIAN CITIZENS EMIGRATING TO THE U.S.

Question No. 167—Mr. Cossitt:

1. (a) How many United States citizens immigrated to Canada as landed immigrants in each of the past four years and what is the total of all the years combined (b) what were their main occupational classifications?

2. (a) How many Canadian citizens emigrated to the United States as landed immigrants in each of the past four years and what is the total for all the years combined (b) what were their main occupational classifications?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration):

1. (a)

1976	1977	1978	1979	Total
15,608	12,147	9,305	9,096	46,156

(b) Of the above totals, 18,515 were workers. The following is a table showing the intended occupations:

	1976	1977	1978	1979 *	Total

The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission does not maintain any exit controls. Therefore, it is not possible to provide the number of persons who left Canada or their occupational classifications.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN URANIUM

Question No. 213—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government intend to bring forward legislation placing controls on foreign ownership of Canadian uranium in light of the problems of foreign ownership facing the uranium industry?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: The government intends to control non-resident participation in the Canadian uranium industry and will be looking at alternatives to do so including introducing legislation which is specific to the uranium industry.

DE HAVILLAND CANADA INC.

Question No. 286—Mr. Herbert:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits of de Havilland Canada Inc?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on de Havilland (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to de Havilland (c) investment by the government in de Havilland both before and after any write-off?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. de Havilland Canada Inc.

	Year Ending May 31 1977	1978
Total Revenues	$1,459,197	$1,548,064
Net Income	$ 65,300	$ 99,974

2. None.

DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA LIMITED

Question No. 402—Mr. Herbert:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits of de Havilland Canada Inc.?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write-off?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: It is assumed that this question refers to the company "de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited". Concerning "de Havilland Canada Inc.", see question No. 286 answered this day.

The de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited

1. (a), (b) $ 000,	Financial Year Ending May 31, 1978	Financial Year Ending May 31, 1977
Revenues or Sales	$124,774	$121,070
Pre-tax profit (loss)	1,624	4,499
Income tax (recovered)	(269)	1,834
Net profits (loss)	$ 1,893	$ 2,665

2. (a)	Fiscal Year Ending March 31, 1978	Fiscal Year Ending March 31, 1977
Research and Development	$7,896,523	$17,533,016
Capital Assistance and Source Establishment	12,415	166,666
	$7,908,938	$17,699,682

The Imperial Bank of Commerce requested and received a letter of comfort from the minister (effective date December 24, 1976) regarding a $70 million line of credit extended to de Havilland; it is not legally binding and its tangible value could only be determined by the measure taken by the government should the company default.

NOTE: All payments detailed above were made through the Defence Industry Productivity Program with the following conditions attached:

(i) Payments awarded for research and development were used mainly for the DASH-7 program and represent a 90/10 (government/company) sharing ratio. In this case, where the contractor was not able to make a 50 per cent contribution and a Crown contribution in excess of 50 per cent was provided, the contract entered into with the company contains a condition that repayment be made to the Crown as follows;

(a) 25 per cent of all profits up to 10 per cent realized from the initially supported project and/or follow-on production until an equal contribution to the project has been made by the company and the Crown;

(b) all profit in excess of 10 per cent until the total Crown contribution to the project has been refunded.

(ii) Capital assistance payments represent the total costs incurred in the purchase of capital equipment of an advanced nature; the company is required to reimburse the Crown 50 per cent of these costs over a five-year period.

(iii) Source establishment costs relate to pre-production with repayment contingent upon the profitability of the project supported (DASH-7), i.e., if the DASH-7 is successful, 50 per cent of these funds will be recovered by the Crown,

Funds were also received by de Havilland from the following departments and agency: Department of National Defence, Department of Transport and the National Research Council.

(b) Nil;

(c) Nil.

PUBLIC WORKS—NUMBER OF LAWYERS EMPLOYED

Question No. 622—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of Public Works?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): There are no practicing lawyers in Public Works Canada on staff. There are presently three Department of Justice lawyers working at Public Works Canada.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD INFORMATION RELEASE—CONTRACTS FOR ELROSE BARLEY

Question No. 954—Mr. McKnight:

1. With reference to the Canadian Wheat Board information release dated March 6, 1980, was prior notification given to producers regarding contracts for Elrose barley being issued for the 1979-80 crop year?

2. Were the producers who assisted in providing barley for testing and development given information as to when contracts would be issued?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The March 6, 1980 Canadian Wheat Board information release refers to the 1980-81 crop year; not the 1979-80 crop year as suggested by the question. If Mr. McKnight is referring to the 1980-81 crop year, the answer is no. Prior notification was not given to producers regarding contracts for Elrose barley being issued for the 1980-81 crop year.

2. Producers who assisted in providing barley for testing and development were not given information as to when contracts would be issued prior to the March 6 Canadian Wheat Board information release.

TESTING OF ELROSE BARLEY

Question No. 955—Mr. McKnight:

1. Were arrangements made for the testing of Elrose barley by the malting and brewing industry and, if so, what were they?

2. Where did the Elrose barley, used in the testing by the brewing and malting industries, originate and what are the names and addresses of the producers?

3. Was there any special compensation regarding the price for the Elrose barley used for testing development?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, the Canadian Wheat Board made arrangements for the testing of Elrose barley by the malting and brewing industry. Being that Elrose barley was a newly developed variety and its brewing and malting characteristics under commercial conditions were not fully known, the malting and brewing industry agreed to select and test a number of carlots of Elrose barley produced in 1979.

2. The Elrose barley used in the testing by the brewing and malting industry originated in Alberta and Saskatchewan. The names and addresses of the producers involved are:

G. Boltezar,	J. Dyck Jr.,
Coaldale, Alberta.	Brooks, Alberta.
W. Copeland,	R. Lockwood,
Rosetown, Saskatchewan.	Outlook, Saskatchewan.

3. No, there was no special compensation regarding the price for the Elrose barley used for testing development.

*CPR—RAIL RELOCATION IN WINNIPEG—FUNDING

Question No. 876—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Will the government adhere to the 50%, 25%, 25% funding formula developed in the rail relocation act in funding the CPR rail relocation in Winnipeg?

2. Under the recommendations of the Dillon Study, "Rail Relocation Versus Grade Separation Program" was the federal contribution to be $84,301,000 and, if so, will the government meet this figure for the CPR rail relocation in Winnipeg?

3. In providing the 50% federal contribution, which department or departments will provide the $84,301,000 contribution?

4. What was the rationale used by the government when it arrived at the "five million a year for five years" formula suggested by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in the House on May 7, 1980 and what escalation formula will be adopted to allow for inflation over the five-year period?

5. On what dates will the departments be making their first payments toward the Winnipeg rail relocation project and what will be the dollar value of the payments?

6. Is the government satisfied that the project can be completed at the estimated cost of $168,602,000?

7. Would the DREE grant be made available under the condition that the full Winnipeg rail relocation project is adopted?

8. Would the DREE grant be made available under the condition that the Winnipeg grade separation project is adopted?

9. Are the Arlington and Salter bridges under weight restrictions and have recent engineering studies predicted that they will be closed in two years and, if so, will the DREE grant suggested by the minister be made available before the end of the two-year restricted period?

10. Will the government enter into negotiations with the city of Winnipeg to provide funding for grade separation before the Arlington and Salter bridges become impassable in two years time?

11. Will the cabinet be submitting its recommendations to the Treasury Board to provide the $84,301,000 for the allocation of the funds for the CPR rail relocation and, if so, on what date?

12. Will the funds for the CPR rail relocation in Winnipeg be diverted from (a) provincial (b) federal DREE programmes and, if so, from which programmes?

[English]

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, this is a rather lengthy answer. It is a reply to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie). I am informed by the Departments of Regional Economic Expansion and Transport as follows:

1. The question is premature as no decision has, at this point, been made to fund the rail relocation project in Winnipeg.

2. The Dillon study compared the option of relocating the CP Rail facilities to the option of constructing the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass and other grade separations, on the basis of economic and other criteria. The report contains no recommendations.

3. See answer to part I.

4. The Minister of DREE was responding to the generally recognized need to reinvigorate the economy of the Winnipeg city core area. The "$5 million a year for five years" referred to the amount DREE might contribute to infrastructure to support economic development, and inflation in costs would be taken into account during project planning.

5. See answer to part 1.

6. This figure is the best estimate we have to date, for the yard and mainline relocation option.

7. The DREE assistance would be available provided that a plan for economic development and relief of disparity was undertaken which is acceptable to the city, provincial and federal governments. The DREE assistance would not be conditional on adoption of the full rail relocation plan.

8. The DREE assistance would not be conditional on the adoption of the grade separation project.

9. Information provided by Dillon indicates that repairs are under way for the Arlington Street bridge which would extend its life by two years under the present load restrictions (no trucks). Beyond that, the life of the bridge will be determined on a year to year basis. Weekly inspections are carried out by city staff. With respect to the Salter Street bridge, repairs completed this spring will extend the life of the bridge by about one year subject to weekly inspections by Dillon and city inspectors. The structure is subject to annual review for extended service under present load restrictions (no trucks or buses on the curb lanes, vehicles with six tires or less allowed on the inside lanes). Negotiations are already under way with the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg for a Winnipeg core area initiative.

10. Yes.

11. See answer to part I.

12. There are no plans to divert DREE funds from DREE programs to rail relocation. The department is unaware of provincial intentions.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions stand.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order at this time which I should like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. So far in this session only one question of several which I have placed on the order paper has been answered. I want to refresh the hon. member's memory because not long ago he indicated that some of the questions which were asked by one of my colleagues should be put on the order paper. It appears that we cannot obtain answers to questions on the order paper.

In particular, I wish to draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to notice of motion for production of papers No. 22, dealing with the bureau of physical resources in the Department of External Affairs, a study prepared by Professor Barnhill of Carleton University. This is a very important report dealing with the bureau of physical resources. It will indicate, when tabled, that the fiasco of Admiral Falls' expensive temporary assignment is only the tip of the iceberg. Definitely the study should be tabled in the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I also rise on a point of order. I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to question No. 970 which stands in my name and which was inserted in the order paper on May 23. This question asked what are the names of the cabinet committees and what are their functions, and second, what are the names of ministers who serve as members and as alternates on each committee.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has indicated that the government has changed its policy and has no objection now to allowing the public and Parliament to know what the composition of cabinet committee is, and in view of the fact that this question has been on the order paper now for some six weeks, will the parliamentary secretary indicate how much longer he thinks it will be necessary before the government can provide this information to the House?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, in answer to the last question may I say that, in view of the Prime Minister's answer today, I shall endeavour to obtain the answer very quickly for the hon. member.

In answer to the hon. member for Central Nova I should like to point out that we have answered over one-third of the questions to date, or 434. I indicated in the House last week that I was not pleased with the way notices of motions for the production of papers were coming along. I hope to be able to enlighten the House a little more tomorrow when I rise under that part of routine proceedings.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF CLASS OF 1974

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because I did not want to let this very historic day go by without this being recorded some place. As Madam Speaker will remember, it was six years ago today that members of Parliament of the class of 1974 were first elected. I just wanted to bring that fact to the attention of the House and congratulate my colleagues who survived the first six years.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PROVIDE COMPREHENSIVE ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

That this House deplores the Liberal government's indifference to the consequences of the global oil crisis and condemns its failure to provide a comprehensive energy program that would make Canada self-sufficient in energy.

She said: Madam Speaker, what the House is being asked to deal with today is a matter of urgency. Both the issue itself, that of international oil prices, and the increasingly limited, critical time frame that the government has to face up to this matter become more urgent with every passing day. Yet the government seems to be oblivious to the magnitude of the oil crisis, both in its international and in its domestic dimensions. Preoccupied as the government and its ministers have been with a domestic pricing regime, it has failed to comprehend the threat that oil poses to the peace and security of the world and to international order as we know it. As a result, the Liberal government's inaction, its procrastination, its dithering, or call it what you will, daily compromises Canadian security, Canadian effectiveness in international organizations and Canadian flexibility in foreign policy.

Instead of showing its willingness to shoulder some of the responsibility to help rectify the situation, the government sends its ministers abroad to whine that Canada needs relief from an energy crisis not of its own making. But at the same time here at home ministers do Canadians the great disservice of trying to lull them into a false sense of complacency that no such global energy crisis exists.

Unfortunately several stark facts become daily more ominous. First, world oil production is not increasing, it remains static; if may even be decreasing. Second, world oil consumption and demand is going up, not down. Third, it is virtually impossible to switch overnight from the use of oil in such key sectors as transportation and heavy industry to the use of some new form of energy. It will take years of lead time to develop those alternative forms of energy and the technology to use them. Of course, in the meantime we will continue to be dependent on oil. Fourth, the struggle for these increasingly limited supplies of oil, even in the immediate future, will bring ever greater tensions between the eastern bloc and the western bloc, between underdeveloped nations and developed nations, and between suppliers and consumers.

These are stark facts, and all of these facts have been of increasing concern to thoughtful people in all countries of the world. But somehow or other that concern fails to penetrate the fog that substitutes for gray matter in the Liberal government. Indeed, it is only too true that they do not recognize the situation.

[Translation]

The Liberal government did not even concern itself with Canada's vulnerability in this crisis. Seven months have passed since they cheerfully did away with the preceding government's energy policies which would have demonstrated Canada's will to come to grips with the international oil situation and the government has done nothing but waste seven crucial months.

I do not think this will have surprised us for the same group has obviously lost the better part of its time during the last seven years, or since 1973, when for the first time the OPEC countries made their power known.

The Liberal government has not in any way recognized the international oil situation. Nor does it have any understanding of the mounting tension from the implications the situation has on the security of our nation and on our foreign policy.

[English]

There is no recognition by the Liberal government of the international oil situation, no understanding of the mounting tension it is producing globally, for the implications that has for our nation's security or for the effect it has on the conduct of our foreign policy. There are no proposals to lessen Canada's vulnerability to the insecurity of offshore oil, no thought that Canada should be in the forefront of nations committed to face the reality of the situation and to take immediate steps, albeit difficult steps, to alter our present course. There is no recognition, no understanding, no proposals, no thought, and certainly no sense of urgency on the part of the government that there is an international oil crisis which cries out for action by governments of all countries.

It is for these reasons that today we have introduced a motion that deplores the Liberal government's indifference to the consequences of the global oil crisis and condemns its failure to provide a comprehensive energy program that would make Canada self-sufficient in energy. Virtually nothing is as vital to the stability of the western world as secure oil supplies. Yet nothing seems so far from reach. By their failure to blunt the initiatives of OPEC or to develop their own energy resources, Canada, the United States and other oil importing nations have left themselves vulnerable to oil-fired crises that could be havoc-wreaking. These include internal revolutions in the Middle East, conflict over oil supplies and financial ruin for many countries.

This gloomy scenario comes not from some doomsayer, but from Walter Levy, one of the best-known independent oil consultants. His thoughts are outlined in detail in the current issue of "Foreign Affairs". Nor is Mr. Levy alone in his harsh warning to oil dependent nations. There is a growing urgency among informed sources that the western industrialized nations have so far failed to "bite the bullet", failed to see the oil crisis for what it is and to take appropriate steps to reduce their dependency on offshore oil supplies.

The International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, England, recently commented as follows:

> The west's most serious security challenge for the 1980s is how to assure the supply from an unstable third world of the raw materials on which its economic well-being, domestic stability and political cohesion has come to depend.

● (1520)

Those were words from the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

We all know that the most vital of the resources referred to is oil and that the most unstable area referred to is the Persian Gulf, which provides an essential part of the western world's oil supplies. In the world of today you cannot separate oil from security.

Recently the British secretary of energy warned of the dangers of regional and even global conflict as nations compete for oil resources. Last week in Moscow Chancellor Schmidt made the point that there could well be a worldwide struggle for the distribution of energy supplies. Indeed, the question of oil, its supply and security, has dominated world politics and international affairs since 1973. More and more, foreign policy objectives are inextricably linked to energy considerations.

This linkage was certainly made clear by former secretary of state Cyrus Vance at Harvard recently when he zeroed in on the problems posed by declining domestic oil production on the one hand, and steadily growing imports on the other. Oil, he said, has the power to fuel inflation, undercut our trading position and determine the strength of our dollar. That is no mean feat for one commodity.

Vance warns that in meeting the energy crisis "we cannot rely on the genius of some economist with a new solution; we need acts of political will"; and he went on to predict:

If the United States and the other industrial countries do not act decisively to reduce our levels of energy consumption, and particularly our demand for oil, we will stand on the brink of economic disaster by the end of the decade—or sooner.

The International Institute for Strategic Studies in London warns of the security challenge oil poses; Mr. Vance warns of the economic disaster it threatens. The tragedy for Canada is that we have a government which lacks the political will to recognize and deal decisively with the energy crisis.

Seven years after the first oil embargo the Liberal government still has not produced a comprehensive energy policy; seven years after OPEC first demonstrated that oil could become a political weapon, a weapon no less strategic than missiles or bombs, the Liberal government remains committed to dependency on offshore oil supplies. It is this situation, this course of action, which my party condemns and deplores.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: The first oil crisis, the one caused by the OPEC embargo in 1973, came as a shock to western economies. Long used to cheap oil—$1.37 per barrel was the average OPEC price only ten years ago—our economies became used to, and dependent upon, large quantities of imported cheap oil. For Canada, the first oil crisis seemed remote; after all, we were then a net oil exporter. However, between 1973 and 1979 Canadian oil production declined by almost 25 per cent, from approximately two million barrels a day to one and a half million, and it is still falling. In the same period, however, while our production was falling our consumption went up by some 200,000 barrels a day. As a result we have become increasingly dependent on offshore oil—offshore oil that is no longer $1.37 per barrel but ranges between $28 and $37 per barrel. But our energy policy, both domestically and internationally, has yet to adapt to this drastically changed situation.

Is it any wonder the 1979 "Annual Review" of the International Energy Agency warns that the maintenance of a continuing and possibly increasing gap between Canadian and international prices will create serious distortions in the Canadian economy? The IEA puts it this way:

If self-sufficiency is not attained and maintained, new public sector budgets will have to take into account permanent and possibly very expensive subsidies.

It goes on to state:

Demand will be greater than otherwise and supply less, and this will be reflected in the balance of payments position. In the medium to long run, it is questionable whether any country can successfully isolate itself on energy.

That is the comment of the International Energy Agency, and the implication obviously is that the Canadian government has for far too long played the short-term game of trying to isolate itself from the reality of the world oil situation. This ostrich-like approach was evident in the comments of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) following his participation at the OECD meetings in Paris last month where much of the talk at that time was about energy. What did our Minister of Finance learn at those meetings? He learned there really is a crisis developing and that people outside Canada know about it. He said so in these words:

There seems to be a deeper consciousness in other countries than there is in Canada about the current world situation, and especially the impact of increased oil prices, and the possibilities of a slowdown worldwide.

Those were the words of our Minister of Finance. To think he had to go to Paris to learn that! To think he was so ill-informed he had not realized other western economies had long ago begun to take steps to reduce oil imports through conservation and consumer consciousness! To think he had not realized that the problem is not one of price alone but of supply and security of supply!

Even more serious, Mr. Speaker, is that the situation is likely to get worse, and it could become even more critical for any country which is dependent on offshore oil. There is a growing awareness that, for a variety of reasons, political, economic, financial and technical, OPEC production through the 1980s may be substantially lower than previous estimates have suggested, and the International Energy Agency forecasts serious shortfalls in production before the end of the decade. That agency now estimates that world production levels will not be higher through the 1980s than they were in 1979, and that is a change. These production levels will not be higher, so the very serious adjustment problems which were previously foreseen for the mid-to-late 1980s may well be with us now on a continuing basis and, what is even worse, in a climate of heightened political uncertainty.

The International Energy Agency reports that the anticipated global oil shortfall for 1985 appears likely to reach some three million barrels per day. By 1990, due in large part to declining availability of oil in the world market, the shortfall is expected to reach eight million barrels per day. I should add that these projections are based on the assumption that there will be no interruption of supply, either by further Iran-like revolutions or by oil producing countries deliberately turning down the tap. Yet just over the past weekend, the Iraqi oil minister, in a dramatic change of policy, joined Kuwait, Libya and Venezuela in calling for a limit on crude oil production among OPEC members.

The global shortfall of eight million barrels per day by the end of the decade is not the worst-case scenario, but rather one based on a comprehensive assessment of current realities—economic, political and strategic. Even if new resources were to come onstream, the lead time required to make them operational will take up most of this decade. So we are faced with a global shortfall of eight million barrels per day before we can even hope to bring on significant new sources of energy.

There are two additional frightening aspects to the present oil crisis. The first is the crushing burden oil imports place on the Third World, and the second is the danger to world stability as Soviet oil reserves begin to decline. With regard to the Third World, the International Monetary Fund calculates that this year alone OPEC will have a combined balance of payments surplus of some $115 billion, while the payments deficit of oil importing developing nations in the Third World will amount to $68 billion, an amount which these countries just cannot pay. The problems that these imbalances pose to the international financial system will be examined in greater detail by my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson).

There is also the question of the growing demand for oil by Third World countries. Some 90 of these countries presently consume four million barrels of oil a day. By 1990 it is estimated that their requirements will increase to 14 million barrels a day. So we have a situation where, at a time when the globe shortfall is expected to reach eight million barrels a day, these poorest of the poor countries will require an additional ten million barrels a day. Surely they will have the right to expect it and, indeed, they will demand it. The competition for scarce supply will be tough.

Second, and further complicating the picture, is the spectre of the Soviet Union going after oil supplies in the world market. The Soviet Union and its satellites are projected to shift from a net export position in 1979 to a net import position of at least one and possibly two million barrels per day in 1985, again at a time when a shortfall is predicted. Let us face it, Mr. Speaker: the Soviet Union will have to import oil and they cannot afford the large amounts of foreign exchange to buy that oil.

Analysing this situation, a U.S. intelligence report states that this—> —sets the stage for an East-West competition for mid-East oil, adding yet another potentially destabilizing ingredient to an area which already has experienced wrenching political events in the past year or so.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan places the Soviet Union in an advantageous strategic position, both in relation to the oil-rich fields of the Persian Gulf as well as the important sea lane of the Strait of Hormuz, through which two thirds of the world's oil passes. Already through a blend of military build-ups, subversion and diplomatic initiatives, the Russians appear to be manoeuvring the oil producers into a position where they would offer to pay for Arab oil by bartering commodities or military hardware instead of paying hard cash.

If that does not work, strategically they are in a position to seize the oil. Let us not be naive in our assessment of the potential of the Soviet Union to cause mischief through covert blackmail and subversion or, worse, through overt military action.

A further dimension to the vulnerability of the western countries because of their dependency on mid-East oil is the way in which it has begun to circumscribe their foreign policy. As the New York Times recently editorialized:

> The cost of oil dependency cannot be measured only at the pump.

It is increasingly apparent in all aspects of foreign relations. We have seen that as new policies have been worked out between Saudi Arabia and the United States, and between Saudi Arabia and Denmark. It is as I have said: many countries will have to come to new foreign policies as the result of almost total dependency on mid-East oil and, in doing so, their foreign policy becomes hostage to their energy needs. However gloomy this is, it is the global reality.

We must ask ourselves: Where does Canada find itself as we enter this perilous decade? We find that our production of oil from conventional sources is down by 25 per cent in the past seven years, whereas our consumption of energy, and of oil in particular, is up last year alone by some 4 per cent. Knowing that our production was dropping and that our consumption of petroleum was rising, knowing that the previous Liberal government had doomed Canada to a course where it had to rely increasingly on imported, costly oil, the Clark government recognized that energy self-sufficiency was an objective we had to tackle with a sense of urgency. Indeed, the future of our country demanded no less.

As a government we saw the linkage between oil and security, between oil and foreign policy, and between oil and economic stability, so we undertook commitments in Tokyo which were designed to reduce Canada's dependency on off-shore oil. We recognized the dangers of further exposure that offshore demands would create and present to this country. At Tokyo we undertook, along with our summit partners, to limit our imports of oil through to 1985. That meant two things. It meant that we had to reduce our growth of oil consumption to 1 per cent a year, and that we had to initiate a comprehensive energy program that would ensure self-sufficiency.

The tragedy for Canada is that the Liberal government has abandoned this policy and these commitments. Whereas we had committed Canada to limit oil imports to 600,000 barrels a day by 1985, it is projected that without the comprehensive program we proposed, Canadian imports will reach more than 800,000 barrels a day by 1985. Whereas we had undertaken to reduce the growth of oil consumption to 1 per cent a year, it is now reaching 4 per cent annually. Whereas we had presented to the Canadian public a comprehensive energy program designed to make Canada energy self-sufficient by 1990, the Liberal government has proposed nothing.

Canada, under Liberal leadership, has decided that rather than be part of the solution to this international oil crisis, it will put the country in the position of being part of the continuing problem. If you want some backup for that statement, Mr. Speaker, just read the OECD report released today which says that Canada has the second worst record among 17 developed countries in trying to conserve and find new sources of energy. But that is exactly what the Clark government's energy program was determined to correct.

• (1540)

Today, there is no longer the same sense of urgency that we attached to the development of oil sands and frontier sources, to the creation of alternate forms of energy, to the building of pipelines where none now exist, to incentives for energy substitution and, most importantly, to greatly increased emphasis on the need for conservation. We as a government knew that Canada had the potential to become energy self-sufficient and we set about doing so.

Our target for self-sufficiency was 1990. That is also the year the International Energy Agency forecasts that there will be a global oil shortfall of eight million barrels per day. The Conservative government had committed itself to making sure that Canada was not hostage to that shortfall, not to the prices it would impose, not to the insecurity of supply it would subject us to, and certainly not to the manipulation of our foreign policy that it would invite.

The Liberal government, not having worried about these things for the previous seven years, not having felt the need to come to grips with the international oil crisis, not having considered it necessary to work out a comprehensive energy policy for Canada, is once more bent on trying to delude the Canadian people into believing that the oil question is some mere domestic squabble contrived for partisan purposes.

In so doing, the government limits Canada's flexibility and credibility in foreign policy. Just ask any of the countries that were at the Venice Summit. It makes us increasingly vulnerable to the global struggle for oil, and denies to us the independence we have a right to expect and which energy self-sufficiency could provide.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to take part in this debate and to speak after such distinguished parliamentarians as the former secretary of state for external affairs, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and ahead of the "charming" Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). That is really quite an honour for a little fellow like me, Mr. Speaker, and I shall try to live up to it.

May I say that neither the former minister nor the present minister will be surprised if I disagree with them. I found a certain irony in the speech of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, especially when she focused on the fact that new foreign policies are needed in response to the global realities, the uncertain oil situation and the unstable world that we live in. I disagree with that. I do not think we need more new foreign policies but we do need a new domestic policy. As I listened to the hon. member I thought that Canada is surely one of the most fortunate countries in the world at the moment because, if we wanted to, we could become energy self-sufficient.

An hon. Member: That is what she said.

Mr. Waddell: Will hon. members just listen for a moment. If we were to become self-sufficient, we could be isolated as much as it is possible to be from the harsh realities of the world today.

I have just finished reading a little paperback book which I am sure many other Canadians have read as well. It is called "The Seven Sisters" by Anthony Sampson. It outlines the history of oil and especially the history of the oil companies. I will read the last paragraph which is very relevant to our debate today. In a postscript written immediately after the crisis of 1979, Sampson had this to say:

> But the problem of controlling the companies is only part of the broader question of national self-discipline and restraint. It is convenient for the western powers to use OPEC as their scapegoat, and to criticize the Middle Eastern nations for their reluctance to increase production. But the insatiable consumption of the west is putting those nations, particularly Saudi Arabia, in an impossible position with regard to their internal and external politics; and the only effective escape from a future oil crisis will not lie with increased Middle Eastern production, but with more serious western conservation and economies. The real lesson of the crisis can only be: we have met the enemy—it is us.

Today, I will focus on how we in Canada can become energy self-sufficient, and in that I think I am going to depart from the position of the other two parties.

I agree with the second part of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that the present Liberal government has failed to provide a comprehensive energy program. But what else is new? They have had years in office but they have not produced an energy program, and I doubt if they ever will. The minister has tried to come forward with a program but it is riddled with inconsistencies.

Our past record of resource regulation and development in Canada is unworthy of us as a people. There has been a vacuum in public policy. We should not blame it on the world situation but instead should look at the enemy, which is here.

In the recent past we were told that we were rich in unused energy and that our main problem lay in finding buyers for the surplus. Now we are being told that shortages are on the horizon and that unless we pay big for these wonderful mega-projects, they are not going to get off the ground and we are not going to have any oil. We appear to be doomed to a perpetual cycle of shortages and foreign ownership, not surpluses.

Canadian governments, it seems to me, think like foreign-controlled oil companies. We have allowed our future energy reserves—not the stuff we have been using and have been giving away, but the oil sands, the Mackenzie delta reserves, the High Arctic reserves, uranium and coal deposits—to be controlled by the same corporations that control our present conventional resources. We have sold out our oil and now the minister and his colleagues are about to sell our natural gas by prebuilding the Alaska pipeline.

We all remember industry's claim in 1972 which was echoed by the then minister, Hon. J. J. Greene, that Canada's oil reserves would keep the country in a state of self-sufficiency not for one year or a decade but for hundreds of years. What did we do then? We exported three billion barrels of oil. Then we were told that there was a shortage. Now we are being told there is a gas surplus and that we will have to export it. In a few years' time no doubt we will be told that there is a shortage. That is the kind of policy that has been followed.

We have a clear continentalist oil policy. The seeds were planted long before the fruit of the 1961 national oil policy appeared, whereby eastern Canada would consume Venezuelan oil and western Canada producers would look to United States markets for their surplus production. Today we have a shortage of oil and pay $3.7 billion into the compensation fund, mainly for the Atlantic provinces. Because of that and because of the uncertainty of the oil situation, the government cannot bring down a budget and I suspect—although he probably would not agree with me—that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not going to get constitutional change without a settlement of the resource question, specifically an oil pricing policy.

We must have a new national energy policy and the basis of that policy must be to break away from the historic pattern of foreign control of Canadian resources. For the New Democratic Party this is the key to the problem. Unlike the other two parties we say that, to make Canada self-sufficient in oil and self-sufficient in energy, we have to break away from foreign control. We can be self-sufficient if we do that; that is the key. I hear my friend to the right asking me what our position is, and I tell him that I am outlining our position.

It appears that the position my Conservative friends are maintaining and articulating is that price is the key. That is what I pick up. I cannot figure out the Liberals; they are still in the muddled middle. The minister is still trying to squeeze by. I notice he is getting thin. He is going to be even thinner if he tries to squeeze by that Liberal energy promise to Ontario. If he could just get by this year, he might just narrow it down enough that it is not more than $4 a barrel for this year; then he can sock it to us next year. Yet I still say he is getting out of his promise to have a lower price than the Conservatives'. That is no energy policy at all. At least my friends to the right are prepared to articulate their policy.

I am saying that we have a third option or policy. We say that the Canadian people can move to self-sufficiency if a move is made to control the oil companies and the large energy companies in Canada. This will be a big challenge. Sometimes I look across the floor and see the minister and his colleagues from Quebec and admire the fight they made to get their rightful place in confederation. As a young English Canadian, I sometimes feel a little bored with my country, especially the English part because we do not have anything to fight for and we do nothing.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Speak for yourself.

Mr. Waddell: But we do have something to fight for. I have to fight in my own part of the country. What we are going to fight for is something that we can combine in English and French Canada, namely an energy policy by which we can take over control of our own energy industry. That is the future of Canada as I see it, and that will be the fight.

I have listened to the present debate. It seems to me that the Conservative party is continuously fighting the last election through their questions to the minister. There is much talk of the deal which the Conservatives had. I am not too sure they had a deal with Premier Lougheed. I have never seen a copy signed, sealed and delivered. Even if they did have a deal, it seems to me that we should not focus so much on what the price increase would be, but instead on where the revenues are to go.

As I understand it, the Conservative "arrangement" with Alberta, as I call it, would have raised the industry's revenues, which were already $13.3 billion over the four-year period between 1975 up to the end of 1978 and into 1979, to $33 billion. That would be their take from 1980 to 1983.

If we go back to 1920, Lloyd George said this:

> Oil profits generally seem to find their way by some invisible pipeline into private pockets.

And as Tommy Douglas would say: What the Conservatives were doing was taking money out of the consumer's pocket and putting it in the pocket of the oil industry. That is unacceptable to the country.

The revenue implications of these schemes that we are now talking about being negotiated are simply enormous. Let me go into that in a little more detail. It has been estimated that between 1980 and 1984 the excise tax would have contributed $10.5 billion to the federal coffers and the revenue sharing arrangements would be $17 billion. At the same time, the oil import compensation expenditure would have been almost eliminated. Alberta's royalties, which rose from $1 billion in 1974 to $2.6 billion in 1978, would jump to $5.3 billion in 1980 and to an astounding $11 billion in 1983. So over a ten-year period, that is between 1980 and 1990, that would result in an accumulation of $143 billion, or $79,000 for every man, woman and child in Alberta. I look at Canadians sitting up in the gallery. I hope some of them are from Alberta. It would be nice to have $79,000 for each person. That is a pretty high accumulation of wealth.

The transfer of wealth from the rest of the country would be much larger than this amount, including additional industry revenues, the share of the rent which the federal government spent in the producing provinces and likely the substantial secondary effects. Under almost any set of assumptions this scenario would result in rapidly rising double-digit inflation and a prolonged and more severe recession in the rest of the country. There would be lay-offs and plant closures.

It seems to me that Ottawa and Alberta are miles apart now and they are likely to remain so in terms of oil prices as long as Alberta retains its goal of linking domestic oil prices with world prices. It seems to me that both players have whetted their appetites by the kinds of numbers they are looking at. They each seek to force the other to make up the shortfall created by a different price scenario. I think the Conservatives' wild card of 85 per cent of the world price, which is the Clark formula, has unfortunately raised everyone's expectations.

I want to focus for a moment on the supply situation in Canada because the next five years will be crucial. Imports in 1985 could easily be triple their present level. We could easily fail to meet our Tokyo target of oil imports of 600,000 barrels a day. Alberta has delayed approval of Alsands and the Cold Lake developments until a pricing agreement is reached. Hibernia, on the east coast, may be very promising but it is unlikely that oil will start flowing before 1986. Conventional oil supply, which presently constitutes 95 per cent of total production, will fall to 50 per cent in ten years; perhaps even to 25 per cent in 20 years. Frontier and non-conventional oil will rise rapidly in absolute and relative importance.

A minute ago I mentioned that price negotiations were going on. One of my concerns is the confrontation tactics used in the negotiations. I am not sure that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources opposite really wants an agreement. I am not sure that the Premier of Alberta wants an agreement. Hon. members will notice that everyone in this game benefits, but I ask, who is it that benefits? The Prime Minister benefits for being a strong centralist. Premier Lougheed benefits at home for sticking up for the population. Premier Davis can win another election in Ontario by sticking up for lower prices and putting it to his Conservative brothers and sisters in Ottawa. Everybody benefits—that is, the big boys benefit. But who loses? The answer to that is the Canadian people. I think that is the problem on which we should focus.

I will now suggest to the minister a basis for negotiating the oil price increase. It seems to me that everybody has a real interest, not just a confrontational interest but a real one. The minister and the federal government need more money. An energy program is needed. Regional disparities need to be reduced. Canadians can agree with that. Provincial governments need to have protected the principle that resources belong to the provinces, and Alberta is quite right about that. More money is needed in Alberta because oil is a depleting resource.

Despite my rhetoric a moment ago about there being $79,000 for every man, woman and child in Alberta, nevertheless that situation will only last so long. Money will be needed to put in alternate programs, industrialization programs. But the Canadian people have an interest because they are the masters and not the servants of highfalutin ministers. They need a secure supply. They know that higher prices are regressive. But higher prices themselves are an argument for redistribution of income, as Amory Lovins said, not necessarily against higher prices. They know that if there are to be higher prices, they will pay higher prices. Then the government have to get some of that money back to the people. It has to be made easier to replace oil with gas or other resources.

Therefore, there can be an agreement. Let me suggest to the minister that the agreement be in these terms. First, that the price goes up. It is not important whether it is 18 cents, 16 cents, 14 cents, 12 cents, or whatever. It should go up substantially, but in steps in order to protect Ontario industry. The second principle is that that same money go back to the people directly in reduced income tax. It could go back into their own pockets. Third, Alberta could get more money. Fourth, the federal government could get more money. The federal government should not use the money for a mortgage interest deductibility program to benefit the better off, but for an industrial strategy for Canada. Finally, there could be a joint fund between the provinces and the federal government invested in energy alternatives, transit and buying back industry. We do not want it all to go to the federal government because we know what they would do with it.

• (1600)

The Canadian people would accept this because it is equitable. I have just returned from Alberta where I was told that the minister is not negotiating seriously. They have their own axe to grind, but Alberta would accept these kinds of suggestions.

My colleagues will speak further on alternatives, probably the real future in energy. We cannot continue to go at the same apple. As Solzhenitsyn said, 12 worms can only gnaw at the apple for so long before it goes. We must find alternatives. We in the New Democratic Party are going to set out as well in the future the position that the money from increased energy prices should go to the federal and provincial governments, but not a penny to the oil companies because they do not need it.

Let me bring my remarks to a conclusion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Knowles: One minute.

Mr. Nielsen: No, Mr. Speaker. In order to have the greatest number of speakers participate in the debate, I believe that all members should abide by the 20-minute rule.

Mr. Waddell: I recall on a previous occasion suggesting that the hon. member get extra time, the very member who just spoke.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am indeed pleased to participate in this debate. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has put this particular motion on the order paper. I have noticed, however, that the official opposition carefully avoided making it a motion of confidence. I can understand, with their own record of dealing with energy, why they would not make it a question of confidence.

Mr. Nielsen: That's cheap.

Mr. Lalonde: Today we have the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands coming forward with a motion endeavouring to condemn the government for its "failure to provide a comprehensive energy program". The government is very pleased that two prominent members of the opposition have raised the question of energy since the House opened. The first time was within the first month of this government coming to office, and again today two months later. The first time it was put forward by the energy critic and today by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I wish that the government of which these two able members were a part would have attached the same importance to the question of energy when they were in office.

If we are going to talk about failure, as this motion tries to do, the dismal failure of the former government in the field of energy should be what this motion refers to. If we look back at the main elements of the energy policy of the previous government, essentially it was socking it to the consumers in that famous budget that was defeated by Parliament and which raised such an outcry in the country.

Second, it was to try and dismantle, dilute, dissolve, and I do not know what other verb to invent when referring to the so-called energy policy of the previous government vis-à-vis Petro-Canada, the only major Canadian institution set up in the last few years in the field of energy which has proved to be of such great significance in the few years it was in operation.

The hon. member spent a lot of time talking about the international energy situation. The only contribution the previous government made to this very delicate international energy situation, and particularly to the protection of Canadian interests in that regard, was their famous proposal to move the Canadian embassy to Jerusalem. That had the effect of Canada being blacklisted by every Arab country. It put us in a very difficult situation vis-à-vis OPEC. This situation was something the new government had to work at repairing as soon as it took office. That is the type of background that the previous government left us and it is the context in which we took office.

The hon. member referred to the international energy situation. What she described is established by many publications and authorities, but I submit that it is nothing new; it has been with us for several years. If the hon. member has bothered reading even the government documents of 1974 and 1976, she would have found in those documents as well as the studies made public at the time, such as the major study published by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in 1976 entitled "Energy Future for Canadians", that all the facts she referred to today in terms of the international crisis were referred to in those documents and put forward for examination by Canadians by the previous Liberal government.

The member from the New Democratic Party stressed the importance of dealing with the matter in Canada. He pointed out a very important fact, the exceptional and very privileged situation in which Canada is.

[Translation]

I am convinced Canadians are not unaware of the world energy crisis but I think they are truly aware of the particularly privileged situation in which Canada finds itself. If we have a crisis in Canada, it is not an energy crisis. Canadians know that, despite any speech the hon. member may make. Canadians know basically that Canada is extremely rich in terms of energy resources, that considering its population, Canada is undoubtedly the most privileged country in the world in terms of energy resources.

Today and for years now, Canada has been in a position of being not a net importer of energy but an exporter of energy, year after year. We are still today, even in the area of petroleum products, that is if you include gas and oil, a net exporter of petroleum products, a very large exporter, and I am talking about several net billion dollars of exports of petroleum products. I am not talking of exports of electricity or coal which, according to all forecasts, are going to increase considerably in the coming decade.

So Canada actually finds itself in an extremely favoured situation, an extremely privileged situation, a situation that is the envy of all industrialized countries with which we are in competition. However, we are facing a problem with respect to oil. Our oil production is not sufficient to meet our needs and, at the present and for several years already, we have had to import a large part of our consumption. We are now importing about 25 per cent of our domestic consumption. That situation is, of course, not very favourable. It is not a situation that we are very pleased to see developing but it is not, on the other hand, an insoluble situation—it is a situation that Canada can indeed meet in the coming decade. There is no doubt that Canada has not only the human resources but also the financial and physical resources to achieve total energy self-sufficiency, including oil self-sufficiency during this decade.

● (1610)

[English]

In order to achieve this energy independence during this decade, since the government took office it has worked very hard to put back in shape the energy policy which the previous Conservative government spent so much time attempting to dismantle rather than developing an energy policy of its own. As the hon. member should have known, the previous Liberal government established a policy in 1974 and then in 1976 which is quite clear and which is a matter of record. It is an energy policy which has been the envy of the OECD countries and which has been referred to by many other countries as a policy which they would have liked to be in a position to follow. Unfortunately, they were not in a position to follow it, and for a very good reason. They did not have the privileged situation Canada had, that is, of being able to rely on vast resources in the field of energy, even though we have to import part of our petroleum requirements.

When the Tories were in office we had the problem that 25 per cent of our oil requirements were imported. The result of that was that the Tories tried to resolve the problem by tying Canadians to having to pay 85 per cent of international prices, whatever they were, on all Canadian domestic consumption, including the 75 per cent which was produced domestically. We rejected that Tory policy. The people of Canada rejected that policy, and rightly so. As soon as we were elected and could recall Parliament, we presented to Parliament on April 4 in the Speech from the Throne the basic elements of the energy policy we intend to follow.

Mr. Knowles: April 14.

Mr. Lalonde: April 14, yes. I believe that is what I said.

Mr. Knowles: You said April 4.

Mr. Lalonde: I am sorry. If I may be allowed, I might refer hon. members to the elements of that energy policy. The first element is that an energy policy is critical to the success of the country's economic policies, and therefore we cannot have an economic strategy or an energy policy which would ignore the impact of energy decisions upon inflation, unemployment, regional development and money transfers in this country. We could not have an energy policy which would be developed in some kind of vacuum whereby we would have in the end slower economic growth, more unemployed and much higher inflation than Canada needs to have. That is a basic element of our energy policy.

The second one is that the price of Canadian oil must be based upon Canadian conditions and circumstances and not upon the vagaries of a turbulent and unpredictable world market. The last Summit of seven heads of industrialized countries in Venice condemned the recent increases imposed by OPEC as being intolerable, unnecessary and excessive. We have decided that the prices which would be established in Canada for Canadian consumers would be based on Canadian costs and Canadian conditions and would not be tied to the cartel-type of pricing which OPEC decides.

We have also indicated clearly that the made-in-Canada price for oil we are proposing will result in a lower price to consumers than the one which had been proposed in the budget of the previous administration and which had been rejected by Parliament and by the people of this country.

We have indicated, in addition, that a petroleum auditing agency will be established to report on the financial situation of petroleum companies and to administer criteria relative to Canadian ownership objectives. We have also indicated that we must reduce our dependence on imported oil by promoting conservation and by stimulating the production of new domestic energy supplies. We have also indicated that conservation measures will be designed and promoted relative to transportation, home and industrial use. We have also indicated that steps will be taken to encourage consumers to switch from oil to natural gas or electricity for home heating, and other steps will be taken to encourage more rapid substitution from oil to other energy sources. Finally, we indicated in the Speech from the Throne that Petro-Canada will be maintained and expanded as an instrument of public policy.

A new Canada oil and gas act for all the territories and offshore properties under federal jurisdiction will provide for increased exploration activity. It will also be designed to promote Canadian ownership and Canadian objectives.

An alternative energy corporation will be created to stimulate the development of new and renewable energy resources to replace oil, and Canadian companies and investors will be given opportunities to involve themselves more heavily in the energy field. The government has set the objective of a 50 per cent Canadian ownership target for the petroleum industry by 1990.

In the few short months we have been in office a number of decisions have been taken on each and every one of these subjects toward the implementation of these policy objectives, and I would like in the few minutes at my disposal to refer to some of them.

In the area of energy conservation I have already had the opportunity to sign three agreements. The first was with the minister of energy for Saskatchewan, then with the minister of energy for Manitoba and lastly with the commissioner of the Northwest Territories. These agreements deal with energy conservation and renewable energy technologies. In these three agreements we have agreed to spend several tens of millions of dollars among ourselves to promote energy conservation and new renewable energy technologies in the various provinces.

There has been a conference between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), on behalf of the federal government, and industry on energy conservation. That conference covered about 80 per cent of industry energy use, and at that conference there were reports from 15 different task forces set up by different sectors in response to a call issued to industry by one of my predecessors, the Hon. Alastair Gillespie. Fifteen different task forces have been set up, and they reported on the first five-year program which had been set up. We were pleased to see that industry had not only met its target of energy conservation, but had overtaken that target substantially. We got industry to commit itself to another five-year program of additional energy conservation. In this respect we have done as well as, and I would say even better than, any other OECD country in terms of co-operation with industry.

● (1620)

We have also extended during the past several months the Canadian home insulation program which probably has been the most important and successful of all conservation initiatives; and at present we are continuing research and preparation for a retrofit oil furnace program to improve the efficiency of home heating units. We are designing automobile mileage standards at present, and that measure will soon be brought forward before the House. The alternate energy corporation has been announced and a budget of $20 million has been set aside in Petro-Canada to cover the initial cost of that corporation. At present we are interviewing candidates to run that corporation, which we intend to set up in the near future.

While I am speaking about Petro-Canada I might also mention that one of the first things we have done since we have been in office has been to reassure the Canadian public that this government stood fully behind Petro-Canada. We intend to make PetroCan an even more significant instrument of energy policy in this country. As soon as we took office, we reinstated to the budget of Petro-Canada the $80 million which the Conservatives had cut from that corporation when they were in office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Petro-Canada has been very active ever since it has been shown that it has the support and confidence of the government. It announced in the last few weeks a project for a fourth tar sands plant with Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company, a project which could cost as much as $10 billion. This is the first totally Canadian-owned project in the tar sands area. This has been done thanks to the initiatives of Petro-Canada in co-operation with the Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company.

Petro-Canada also announced during the course of June three drilling programs in the Labrador Sea, and it is now the operator for a number of other companies in that frontier area which has a high discovery rate as compared to other frontier regions.

I should like to say a word now on oil and gas pricing; some of my colleagues have referred to it. I have indicated what our target is—a made-in-Canada price which will give all Canadians one uniform price at a level well below international levels.

In March I also indicated that, in order to achieve this target, I had the intention of invoking the force majeure clause in the tar sands projects, particularly the Syncrude oil sands project, in order to arrive at a cost to Canadian consumers for that oil, which will make it more and more important to arrive at a price which reflects the real economic cost of developing incremental oil supplies.

While discussing this matter with the government of Alberta, I indicated that we are continuing to pay compensation payments, subsidies which were provided under the previous agreements to the level of international prices. However, one area, which is probably even more important than the question of pricing itself in relation to the problem raised by this motion, which is security of supply, is the whole question of conservation. Because if there was one problem with the previous Conservative policy, it was its almost exclusive reliance on price as an instrument of policy in this field. It was what I would have called the baseball bat approach to energy policy: hit the consumer hard enough that he will not be able to afford the oil he needs.

In effect, there are many other ways of dealing with the problem. One has to do with conservation; the other has to do with substitution. I have already announced in the first few months since we have been in office a number of decisions by this government in order to move people to switch their consumption of energy from oil to other forms. In May I announced the government's policy and the government's goal to reduce the residential, industrial and commercial use of oil in this country to 10 per cent of their net energy requirements. The policies that we have under way and the others that we will announce shortly will permit attainment of this objective in most oil consuming sectors and areas within a decade.

Let me point out that to reduce oil use to 10 per cent would save about 150,000 barrels of oil a day in the residential field alone, another 150,000 in the industrial sector, and 75,000 in the commercial area, for a total saving of about 375,000 barrels a day in this country. At present the oil share of consumption in those fields is about 32 per cent. I am convinced that we can, without any harm to our Canadian consumers and Canadian industry, reach that 10 per cent level within the decade.

We also indicated in the Speech from the Throne that we were favouring the earliest possible construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes.

[Translation]

During the weeks which preceded today's motion, I had already had the opportunity to announce the decision of the government to approve the recommendation made by the National Energy Board to support the development and approve the immediate construction of a gas pipeline to serve the entire province of Quebec. The first section of this pipeline will go as far as Quebec City, and various branches will then supply the entire province so that the citizens of Quebec will be able to use natural gas rather than heating oil, which is much more expensive.

[English]

We have also indicated that the extension of that pipeline to the maritimes remained the preferred option of the present government, and we have been in touch with the sponsors of this project to review the reservations that have been expressed by the National Energy Board and to see what further steps are required to ensure that the maritime provinces will have sufficient gas available to meet their needs, whether that gas comes from the west or whether it comes from new discoveries in and around Sable Island.

Those measures of substitution which have been already announced are only some among others and I should like to mention another one which is of great significance. It has to do with making much better use of residual fuel oil in this country. During the month of May I announced that I have reached an agreement with the five refining companies to instal upgrading facilities in their plants which would provide a capacity to make better use of about 125,000 barrels a day of residual fuel oil. This will not only lead to the production of premium fuel, such as gasoline or heating oil, instead of unwanted and surplus heavy fuel oil, but it will also make way for natural gas and provide for a more efficient use of our total domestic and foreign petroleum supply. The net result again will be a reduction in our dependence on oil imports.

In terms of volume, these measures are the equivalent of the net addition to our oil supply which would be made by a $68 billion tar sands plant, and yet through the set of investments in the refineries which I have announced, Canada is getting this kind of production at half the cost and about three years sooner than it would come from a tar sands plant. I do not think there is a more telling rebuttal to the argument that only through a pricing mechanism can we increase our total oil supply.

● (1630)

In the field of international energy, Canada has not been dragging its feet. In the last few months since we have been in office, I have had the opportunity of attending the ministerial meeting of the governing board of the International Energy Agency in Paris, of attending the Venice Summit and of meeting several times with my colleagues, the secretary of energy for the United States, the Australian minister for national development and energy and the Japanese minister of energy. We had the privilege of the visit of the Saudi Arabian energy minister, and I had the privilege of meeting with the minister of energy for Algeria, who at the present time happens to be the president of OPEC.

These meetings and discussions which have taken place with the representatives of those various countries achieved good results for Canada. Certainly as far as OPEC and the Arab countries are concerned, I think they have helped in re-establishing the normal relationships which existed and should have continued to exist between our respective countries but unfortunately had been seriously damaged by the foolish steps in the field of foreign policy of the previous Conservative government.

I should like to summarize the various initiatives taken by the government during the past four months under three broad objectives. The first is to achieve energy independence, which we believe can be done during this decade. As I have noted, this goal is being achieved by conservation measures particularly directed toward oil. Also I have cited measures to substitute other forms of energy for oil. There are major incentives for enhancing energy supplies, and we will be going further in this direction when the oil pricing negotiations and revenue sharing questions are settled. We continue to have strong research and development activity in this country, particularly directed to our unique conditions of climate, terrain and location.

Also I have spoken of the government's oil pricing policy, and closely associated with this is the objective of ensuring a distribution of benefits from oil and gas revenues to all Canadians. As I noted before, we want a revenue system so structured that as prices rise the national government will get the share it needs to carry out its national responsibilities. We need to have a national government which will have not only the powers but the resources to ensure that regional disparities in the country are not going to become excessive.

Also our pricing policy very much reflects the right of producing provinces and corporations to a fair return for their resources and their investment, as noted in the Speech from the Throne.

The Speech from the Throne placed considerable emphasis on the specific goal of at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry by 1990. The objective is to enable Canadians to participate in their energy industries.

The central issue in the matter of a Canadian energy program is how the costs and benefits of developing and using energy are shared among Canadians. The government's objective in each one of the projects I have outlined today—and there are many more—is to ensure a fairness in the complex process of harnessing energy supplies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), I should like to deal with the proceedings on the adjournment motion this evening.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Public Service Superannuation Act—Request for measures to correct unfairness—RCMP provisions; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—Shipbuilding—Reduction of subsidy—Comparable program of assistance; the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)—Employment—Programs to create jobs.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PROVIDE COMPREHENSIVE ENERGY PROGRAM

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss MacDonald:

That this House deplores the Liberal government's indifference to the consequences of the global oil crisis and condemns its failure to provide a comprehensive energy program that would make Canada self-sufficient in energy.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether it would be in order if I were to pose a question to the minister. I think he had further time remaining in his speech. If I am in order in posing a question, and if the minister will answer it, I should like to ask one.

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, the hon. member can ask a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that the minister has used up his time. The practice has been that sometimes a member or minister can take questions if he has time remaining. But since the minister used up his time, I cannot permit a question.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank my colleague for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) for giving us the opportunity to make very important comments on the energy situation. I would also like to say once again that I support the proposals that we have already made. I am quite certain that time will prove these proposals to have been quite reasonable.

At the same time I was rather surprised to hear the minister repeat his energy policy. Of course, he was referring to the throne speech which contains proposals which I believe we heard as far back as seven or eight years ago. When the minister said today unhesitatingly that there was no energy crisis, I believe he should have said that there is no hydroelectric crisis because we indeed have a surplus of this type of energy.

However, by making a simple calculation, we can see that this government has been in power 14 years and five months during the last 15 years. So I do not think that we can be blamed any longer for that lack of energy policy and that lack of foresight. In the circumstances, I think that talking as he did today the minister has demonstrated to all Canadians his incredible failure, the failure of his government to provide any measure, to have any foresight and to give any guarantee to Canadians when he confirmed, with regret of course, that we are still importing 25 per cent of our domestic consumption. He deplores it, of course, but what has been done during all these years? Today he comes with the same proposals that we have already heard, and that have not been implemented for political reasons. I remember very well that within a few months we had to take strong measures because of the inaction of a government which did not take the present situation seriously.

And the minister responsible does not hesitate to accuse the former government of having attempted to mislead the consumers because, Mr. Speaker, we had proposed measures which took reality into account, and which required courage, to put Canada back on the road to prosperity and reach all the objectives mentioned today by the minister, self-sufficiency and, of course, benefits for Canadians. Did we have to pay because of the failure of the previous government to do its job and take its responsibilities?

We had to present a budget and I think that we were trying to shoulder our responsibilities. We were not taxing those who are not using gas and this was important. I look forward to the next budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is still not able today to assure us that he rejects the idea of deindexation.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the least we can say about the dubious situation in which the government finds itself is that it is the result of a Liberal and New Democratic conspiracy—we should not forget—to have Canadians believe that they could avoid higher oil prices more in line with international prices. I do not think there is anything new in this respect. How could anyone believe that the Liberals were sincere when for three or four years, if not six, they themselves had warned Canadians that the current oil subsidization program could not last forever and that sooner or later consumers in this country would have to pay for their oil at prices comparable to those of European, Japanese or American consumers?

Even the New Democrats, playing it both ways, had admitted the necessity of a price increase but they let Canadians believe that through some sort of miracle they could elude the fate of citizens of other industrialized countries in the free world. The New Democrats paid a stiff price for their complicity with the Liberals, Mr. Speaker, for not only were they frustrated in their own attempts at substantial electoral gains in Ontario, but they also favoured the re-election of the Prime Minister whose defeat they pretended to engineer. The New Democrats repeated their stupid tactic. In 1972, rather than give the Progressive Conservatives a true chance to show their stuff and find solutions to the practically insoluble problems they had inherited, the New Democrats sealed their pact with the Liberals. They simply put back at the helm the very people they pretend to attack publicly but whom they go on supporting and helping underhandedly.

Today the New Democrats are shocked that the Liberals are not keeping their more recent electoral promises, particularly with respect to oil, but could they give just one example of a situation in which the Liberals did not cheat the people, play on words, invent simplistic slogans, give out complicated formulas that no one understands or has any way of corroborating? Is the Liberal approach to the oil price issue not confirmation of their double dealing? The famous Canadian formula is but a lure which they used to regain power but already there are a number of indications which lead us to believe that in the long run the price Canadians will eventually have to pay for their oil will be the same as, if not higher, than the one foreseen in the budget submitted by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and this in the wake of I do not know how many denials, including the solemn promise made by the Prime Minister at the Bonn conference to spare no effort to see that Canadian oil prices would rise to international level. And all this while shelving the understanding between the Clark government and the Lougheed government, and doing nothing to avoid a new political crisis that might mean the end of Canada itself.

Indeed, the silence of the Prime Minister during the campaign should have alerted Canadian consumers to the sell-out being prepared. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) were careful at that time not to give details of the famous made-in-Canada price they wanted to establish for oil. They were careful not to suggest that one of the means they intended to use was quite simply a probable infringement upon the constitution, laying their hands on Alberta's, Saskatchewan's and British Columbia's oil and gas resources.

What guarantees have we that, if the Liberals succeed in overcoming these three provinces, they will not tomorrow launch an attack on Quebec's hydraulic resources, and later undermine Ontario's industrial and mining potential, for the benefit of the central government? These are questions we should ask ourselves now. The proof is that in respect of Atlantic provinces, they want to shelve the generous Progressive Conservative policy and to recoup for Ottawa's sole benefit the control over offshore mining resources. The Liberal conspiracy to lure Canadians takes various forms, Mr. Speaker. In general, they avoid resorting to outright lies that would be too gross to be believed. Most of the time, they are content with half-truths, or if you will half-lies, subtle understatements or again, quite simply, mute silences.

The Liberals have a very particular propensity for the tactics of silence. That keeps them from having to give their constituents explanations which could put them in a disadvantageous situation. Indeed the example comes from the high circles. Did the right hon. Prime Minister himself not hide from Canadians, when he was asking them for his first mandate in 1968, that his true objective was to centralize federal powers even more in Ottawa? As everyone can see, bad habits are not easily lost. Not only have the Liberals misled the Canadian people by luring them with the possibility of freeing the country from international constraints in oil prices, but they have to be held directly responsible for the instability of our own energy supply sources. They have always ridiculed, verbally and in their policies, the energy self-reliance objectives which the Progressive Conservatives have been advocating for quite a long time. They have allowed the situation to get so bad as to force us to pay high prices to foreign suppliers while the present government refuses to Canadian producers the price it pays to foreign sources without raising an eyebrow.

Nobody is blaming the government for having created in 1974 a subsidy system to help Canadian consumers adjust to the price increases which were dictated by OPEC. But what should have been a temporary policy became a permanent policy. The most direct result of that lack of foresight and courage of the government is that Canadians continued to delude themselves, thinking that they could inconsiderately waste oil and pay indefinitely a price which is below the international level. Another result, Mr. Speaker, is the incommensurable increase in our balance of payments deficit and the ensuing pressures on the Canadian dollar. Finally, we should realize that if the price of Canadian oil had reached the international level as early as 1975 or 1976, billions of dollars could have been invested in exploration for new hydrocarbon sources and new renewable energy sources. In order to gain electoral benefits in the short term, the Liberal party will have contributed to weaken the Canadian economy, to deceive consumers on the necessity of a sharp rise in the price of oil and at the same time it will have aggravated tragically our dependence on foreign energy sources for our supplies.

Further betrayal of the oil consumers by the Prime Minister and his government: did we not hear him, during the last election campaign, praise the merits of Petro-Canada of which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources spoke just a while ago? Did we not hear him say to whomever wished to listen to him that Petro-Canada would become the cornerstone of the policy on exploration and development of new sources of energy in Canada? What happened? In a reply to the leader of the NDP, a shortage of funds was invoked recently as the reason for dropping the presumably grandiose projects he had claimed to be planning with that Crown company. Is it any wonder the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) accused him of betrayal, but is the latter himself to be taken seriously? We heard from the very mouth of the right hon. Prime Minister—even while the NDP and especially its leader were castigating the Liberal party and its leader—that in the back rooms of their respective parties, they were discussing the possibility of a coalition government to stem the tide of Progressive Conservative popularity with the public. What confidence can we have in those two seemingly opposed political groups which down deep have but one objective, the subjugation of the citizens to the will and dictates of a state grown ever-present and all powerful?

But most obvious of all, despite appearances, the oil policy advocated by the Liberals and widely supported by the NDP benefits the rich unduly to the detriment of the working classes. A big fuss was made over the 18-cent a gallon of gas tax proposed by the Crosbie budget, but the Liberals and NDP carefully avoided telling the people that the same budget also provided, for the less well off and public transport companies, tax advantages that would have cushioned the effects of the price increases which were also designed to moderate consumption. What the Liberals and NDP failed to say to the consumers is that the present subsidy system is largely of greater benefit to the big than to the small oil consumer. At the present time, all Canadian taxpayers are called upon to pay, through their taxes and the money the federal treasury borrows, a subsidy of at least $20, if not more, for each barrel of oil imported from abroad.

Now, who benefits most from this subsidy? Naturally, those who consume more oil. And who are these people? The owners of castles like the one the right hon. Prime Minister bought for himself some months ago in Montreal. Whereas the average expense in heating oil for a modest bungalow is between $400 and $600 a year, that of the bourgeois palaces easily reaches $2,000 and even $3,000. One can easily conclude that the bigger the house, the higher the heating costs and also the subsidy one gets from the state. The Liberal policy claims to help the poor but in reality it helps the rich take advantage of the largesse of a government seeking to protect their privileges.

To the heating costs of these immense castles, add the heating costs of the swimming pool with which they are practically all appointed; add the gas expenses for members of the family driving either big cars, sports cars, not to mention snowmobiles, yachts, or even motorcycles or Jeeps to get to the ski slopes or the resort areas. Add up these gallons of fuel burned by the people and you will realize that the true beneficiaries of this subsidization policy are not the poor people, Mr. Speaker, like members opposite would have us believe.

In fact, those who benefit are the richest elements of our society, playboys who can afford the luxurious homes, the latest cars, the expensive snow blowers, motorboats and what have you; those who can afford to spend the warm evenings dining in a high-class restaurant, attend summer theatre productions or simply while away the hours in the fresh air while the poor people, forced to pay part of the gas expenses, must be satisfied with sweating it out on their poorly ventilated balconies.

It is with a view to correcting this injustice that the Crosbie budget forced consumers to pay the true price for oil and provided tax relief measures to help the less fortunate. Mr. Speaker, it is against this act of justice that the Liberals and the New Democrats voted not too long ago. History will show that it is the Progressive Conservative Party which defended the true interest of the Canadian consumer. I have nothing against those who can afford the luxury of large houses and gas guzzling cars, absolutely nothing, but I cannot bear to see the poor being forced to pay part of the costs through their taxes. I do want richer people to enjoy their wealth but provided they do not waste a resource that is getting scarcer and scarcer and provided they pay an appropriate price for the fuel they use.

I am not kidding myself, however, about the effect of my remarks on Liberal members opposite. Until the people decide to get rid of them and send them back in the opposition, we will witness the same little game of compromises and expedients, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, did the right hon. Prime Minister not warn us in 1963 that no burst of energy or burst of dignity was to be expected from the Liberals? In spite of his NDP past, did he not rather choose in 1965 to join the Liberal ranks because he knew that tool was malleable at will to implement his policies? The present Prime Minister knew, as he indeed wrote, one would not find in any other party the abject submission of members to the will and whims of its leader.

Did the recent Winnipeg convention not give us once again the example of a party incapable of thinking by itself, of giving itself policies that correspond objectively to the needs of this country? That convention gave us the proof once again that that political formation no longer has any will of its own, but what counts for it to stay in power is to obey the leader even though its members know he is leading the party and the country to ruin.

It was a great pleasure to participate in this debate because I think Canadians must be reminded of the proposals we made. I think Canadians must also grasp the repeated promises of a government that has been in power for years and is trying once again to fool the people by repeating promises that have already been made. But we must remind Canadians—and it is our obligation to do so—that this government refused to take responsibilities that were necessary for the good operation of a country if one really wants to put this country back on the road to prosperity, and the government across has been doing the opposite up till now.

[English]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in following the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) in this debate and listening to the empty rhetoric of his intervention, which was really in essence a pile of words supported by very few facts—and, if any, by the realization, which he unfortunately did not imply in his words, that he was re-elected by the slimmest majority that he has ever had since he entered politics—one is forced to look at the proposition before us today and to read it very carefully.

The Progressive Conservative party has put before us a motion which hinges on two words, "indifference" and "failure". Those are the two key words with which they would like to identify the Liberal government's energy and oil policy. Let us look for a moment at those two words against the background of the policies which have been evolved over the years.

You were a member of this House, Mr. Speaker, as I was and many of those who are here, and will remember when we had the debate on the Petro-Canada legislation, which was introduced by a Liberal government and passed in 1975. At every stage of that bill, when it was introduced on second reading, when it went to committee, when it came back at report stage, and finally at third reading, the members of the Progressive Conservative Party fought the bill tooth and nail, including the hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. La Salle: Sure.

Mr. Caccia: His party even asked for a recorded vote, and it is on record as having voted against Petro-Canada.

Mr. La Salle: We are still against it.

Mr. Caccia: And today we hear from that side this great rhetoric which accuses the Liberal government of having done nothing. Unfortunately, the memory of the hon. member for Joliette is filled with holes. He has no memory and he cannot recall the past. He can only look at the present. He cannot even remember what happened on February 18 of this year.

Petro-Canada is not indifference, nor is it failure. I would ask the hon. member for Joliette if it is indifference or failure.

If that is not enough, then let us go back to the policy paper which was published by the Liberal government in 1976. This policy paper for the first time put on record the intention of the Government of Canada to become self-reliant in energy. Here again it was criticized. Either it was too little, too late, too much or too soon. Whatever it was, again the so-called loyal opposition—which in drafting this motion today, I must admit, was perhaps more inspired by the word "opposition" than by being loyal to the facts—opposed that policy of 1976. Today they are claiming there has been no policy introduced by the Liberal government. That is not true. That policy, as you will well remember, Mr. Speaker, was advanced by the then minister of energy, mines and resources, the Hon. Alastair Gillespie.

Let us move to another policy to demonstrate the emptiness of this resolution before us today. I wonder if hon. members in the opposition remember the package which was announced in July, 1978, on renewable resources. Some $400 million was put forward by the Liberal government. I regret very much that the hon. member for Joliette finds my remarks so hot and the criticism so unbearable that he has to hide behind the curtains.

Mr. LaSalle: I will be behind the curtains having a cigarette.

Mr. Caccia: The announcement of that program was made in Toronto, the city from which I come. It was introduced to aid, launch and get off the ground Canadian industries interested in the development of renewable energy—solar energy, biomass, you name it. This package of $400 million for the first time gave the proponents in this country of renewable resources, and there are many, hope and opportunity to implement the ideas which exist in that particular sector within the energy policy in our country.

What did the Progressive Conservative Party say at the time that policy was introduced? I do not know. Do they remember? Evidentally they do not; otherwise they would not have used the words "indifference" and "failure".

Another example is with regard to pipelines. The pipeline system which we have today between Sarnia and Montreal is a result of a measure introduced by a Liberal government. That has already been forgotten, of course. The commitment to build a pipeline to the Atlantic provinces is a commitment by a Liberal government and is something which we will carry out. That was not mentioned by members of the opposition as something that supported their charge of indifference and failure. That is a Liberal promise made during the last election campaign and it is a commitment.

• (1700)

What about insulation and conservation, Mr. Speaker? In this country we have a so-called home insulation program. Is that indifference? Is it failure? Who introduced it? It is another measure introduced by the Liberal government and which, of course, received no attention at all today.

The agreement that we made with Mexico for oil was not in the amount originally hoped for, but nevertheless, it was initiated by the then minister of energy, mines and resources and a Liberal government, and it was concluded by a Liberal government. Could that be called indifference?

Mr. Paproski: At $50 a barrel!

Mr. Caccia: Could that be called failure? A motion like the one before us today can only be described as a sham, written by a group of members who got carried away with the desire to make a political point and gain political mileage without looking at the record.

In the few minutes since the first intervention I have been able to put together a list of Liberal achievements without even the opportunity for doing research but just drawing on my memory. I wish I had the time to do a better job.

Mr. Friesen: You call that an analysis?

Mr. Caccia: I should like to ask the hon. member who is now whispering but who is not in his seat—

Mr. Friesen: I was not whispering.

Mr. Caccia: —whether the electorate of Canada felt on February 22 that the Liberals were motivated by indifference and had a record of failure. Evidently not, otherwise the result would have been different.

When the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) spoke this afternoon, she forgot to tell us, perhaps inadvertently, why the government of which she was a member, just a few days before she tried frantically to cross the Atlantic on a Concorde last December, made an announcement for the sale of natural gas to the United States. How does that fit into her global outlook and her view that Canada ought to be self-sufficient by 1990? Why did she not mention the measure proposed by her colleague in early December which eventually was put aside, thanks to the vote of non-confidence? Why she did not speak about the dismantling policy proposed a year ago by her party and in their early days as the government of this country? There was no mention of the role of Petro-Canada as seen through the eyes of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) when he was prime minister. That was another oversight.

I found it hard to believe that the party opposite had the nerve to lecture this government on how to behave in the world, how to design and implement an effective foreign policy. That is the party which proposed to move the Canadian embassy to Jerusalem just about a year ago. We all know the potential consequences of that proposal.

These are just a few examples of the elements missing from the main intervention of the Progressive Conservative Party which I submit for your consideration, Mr. Speaker.

A number of declarations were made by the opposition. They used phrases such as "government lacks the political will" and other sentences of which I made note. Basically, however, the facts speak for themselves. I repeat what I asked a moment ago—whether indifference and failure are the characteristics of a government which in the last few years gave us Petro-Canada, an energy policy in 1976, a renewable package of some $400 million in 1978, is actively engaged in implementing the construction of pipelines, a reduction in the importation of and dependence on oil which is quite remarkable, a home insulation program, and an agreement with Mexico, if not with Venezuela.

I have limited my remarks to a short analysis of the Progressive Conservative motion. Apart from setting desirable dates like 1990 for self-sufficiency or regurgitating what we already know about the potential offered by renewables, we did not hear anything from them this afternoon other than high-sounding declarations. They offered no proposals on how to make Canada self-sufficient in energy.

There was nothing new on this subject in the speech of the hon. member from Kingston and the Islands or that of the member who spoke for the New Democratic Party. They had nothing to add to what has been said since the energy crisis in the world began. They gave us a regurgitation of ideas that have become commonplace. Nothing new has emerged today. We heard nothing that has not been the subject of debates in previous years.

In order to make their points the NDP quotes from books. That is the only way they can get their philosophy across in this House. They go back to 1920 and authors of the past in order to suggest what we should be doing in the present or the future. But they just come up with the same old chestnut about buying the industry. Of course, they do not tell the Canadian people what it would cost or where the money would come from and, if it were to come from increased taxes, how they would be increased and by how much. That is the extent of the NDP intervention so far today on this very central issue which is a puzzle to every nation in the world.

On the questions of how to reduce our dependence and how to become self-sufficient, the NDP repeated the old refrain of more renewables. Having said that, did they go on to tell us what share of the total energy package renewables, non-renewables, and so on, combined, would take care of? Are they able to tell us what the renewable energy sources can provide for the next five, ten or twenty years as an alternative to dependence on non-renewables today?

Judging from their performance so far, one can only wonder what contribution the official opposition can make by basing a motion on a charge of indifference and failure in light of the record of the Liberal party and in light of their own record. Only five years ago in this House they opposed tooth and nail, at every stage, the creation of Petro-Canada. It is incumbent upon those of us who believe that Petro-Canada has a central, vital role to play in Canada—where over the years we have developed a quite unusual balance between the public and private sector—to put on record some facts concerning Petro-Canada. I shall be glad to devote a few minutes of the time that I have left to doing just that.

As my remarks have clearly indicated, Mr. Speaker, on February 22 Canadians rejected a government which had committed itself to privatizing Petro-Canada—the Progressive Conservative party. A decisive mandate was given to the Liberal party which had declared its determination to maintain and strengthen Petro-Canada as a fine instrument of public policy—a policy which is in the interests of the public sector.

● (1710)

Petro-Canada was under fire from the Progressive Conservative government but certainly not from the Canadian public. In fact, the process went so far that one Montreal newspaper characterized it as "the slow destruction of Petro-Canada". Happily, the situation has been reversed and Petro-Canada is again a dominant force in the development of our oil and gas industries. As well, it is functioning as the necessary intermediary in state-to-state arrangements which are taking shape to supplement, but not supplant, private oil import supplies.

As hon. members know, Petro-Canada has played and is playing a most important role in frontier areas of Canada. Apart from the Beaufort Sea, where the continuing efforts of Dome and its partners claim our attention, Petro-Canada is actively represented almost everywhere.

On the Labrador shelf, Petro-Canada is the operator for a group of companies which are maintaining a high level of exploration effort with three drilling units operating during the short season. Indeed, one of these units was recommissioned at St. John's just last Friday. This part of Petro-Canada's exploration program will involve the completion and testing of two important wells which were started last year, as well as the drilling of new wildcats.

The most promising success of the 1979 frontier exploration program was the Hibernia oil discovery on the eastern Grand Bank. Here Petro-Canada has a 25 per cent working interest in what is almost certainly our first major commercial oil discovery in the frontier areas. Three drilling units are presently operating in this area to facilitate continuous evaluation of these important prospects. Simultaneously, environmental studies are in hand to determine how development can take place with a minimum risk of environmental damage.

Another important success with which Petro-Canada has been associated is the Venture gas discovery off Sable Island, in which Petro-Canada has earned an approximately 30 per cent interest. This discovery is the first potentially commercial gas discovery to be made in the eastern frontier area. It is obviously strategically located in relation to supply for the energy deficient Atlantic provinces.

In the north, Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada has a 48 per cent interest in Panarctic Oils Limited. Successes there have included the major Whitefish gas discovery, estimated to contain as much as one trillion cubic feet of natural gas. In 1980 and 1981, Petro-Canada will finance over 80 per cent of the Panarctic budget to ensure that the necessary level of activity is maintained. This high level of Petro-Canada participation results from a lack of budgetary commitment from the private sector partners of Panarctic to continue funding their representative shares. That in itself commands the attention of the Progressive Conservative Party to the presence of a publicly-owned Crown corporation, such as Petro-Canada.

An hon. Member: It costs $80 million.

Mr. Caccia: Maybe it is $80 million, but that is what protects the future interest of Canadian consumers. Probably the Progressive Conservative member over there cannot look beyond the tip of his nose; he just thinks in terms of what it would cost today without thinking of how much it would cost tomorrow.

Finally, Petro-Canada is the government's designated agent for the importation of some 50,000 barrels a day of Mexican crude oil which, from October onwards, will help to supplement eastern Canadian supplies from a secure oil supply source pending the development of indigenous supply for that area.

Mr. Paproski: At $50 a barrel.

Mr. Caccia: Such supplies, of course, include hydro and nuclear electricity, natural gas from western Canada and the commercialization of the Atlantic area's offshore oil and gas resources.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, what we have heard today from the other side on this very important motion which my friend, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), has put forward today is an illustration of the total lack of understanding that is quite clearly seen in the government benches. I have been waiting to hear whether there is any understanding of the serious nature of the international issue that we are facing. All that we have had is a repeat of the halfway attempts which the government and the previous Liberal administration have made in trying to come to grips with this problem. But as my hon. friend has said, there has been a total lack of understanding and an inability to come to grips with the political necessities and the very tough political decisions that are essential here if we are to avoid the exposure we are facing today.

I would like to commence my contribution to this debate on the serious state of Canada's energy policy in this increasingly unstable world by quoting what Cyrus Vance, the former U.S. secretary of state, said:

> In meeting the energy crisis ... we cannot rely on the genius of some economists with a new solution. We need acts of political will.

This is what is lacking in this government and in previous Liberal administrations since 1973 when this problem first arose.

The challenge and the clear feasibility of achieving energy self-sufficiency has been before us for many years. The pressing need for action has been clear. The opportunity for massive economic development is equally clear, and still the government has not accepted energy self-sufficiency as a clear policy objective.

The first time action was taken and the first time the opportunity was recognized and acted upon was by the Clark government last fall. Sadly for Canada, this far-sighted initiative was defeated by the near-sighted political opportunism of the Liberal-NDP coalition last December.

The tragedy and frustration of this government's inactivity on the energy front is best illustrated by the recent Venice Summit. In paragraph 7 of the communiqué, the seven leaders said it all, as follows:

> To this end, maximum reliance should be placed on the price mechanism and domestic prices for oil should take into account representative world prices. Market forces should be supplemented where appropriate by effective fiscal incentives and administrative measures. Energy investment will contribute substantially to economic growth and development.

This could have been the preamble to the Clark government's comprehensive energy policy announced last fall. But what did the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) do? It is difficult to understand how he can defend his so-called energy policy to his Summit colleagues. Instead he appeared to walk away from the meeting and laugh in the faces of the other six leaders. With this much respect for commitments by world leaders on such an important matter, it is a wonder that the Prime Minister bothers to attend these meetings.

The Prime Minister said that Canada should not be servilely bound to world oil prices which the Summit nations then violently condemn. These are soothing words for the folks back home, but this rhetoric has nothing to do with the energy reality of today.

How can we have his so-called made-in-Canada energy price when oil imports could reach as high as 45 per cent of our oil consumption by the mid-1980s? That is the most critical element of Canada's energy position, and that is the element around which we have to build an energy policy. This is the key problem. With no change in energy policy, we will continue to pay more and more money for more and more foreign oil in an increasingly volatile international environment.

● (1720)

During the recent election campaign I spoke frequently of "security of supply". I wish to elaborate on some aspects of this security, or shall I say "insecurity", for this government's inaction has exposed this country in two important areas to greater worldwide instability than we have ever seen. The tragedy of it is that it has been and is still within our power to reduce this exposure. We are now greatly exposed to the increasingly volatile international scene through the greatly increased cost of oil imports and through our chronic balance of payments deficit.

Let me set out the magnitude of this problem. Gross crude oil imports have averaged about $3.3 billion from 1975 to 1978. In 1979 they grew to $4.4 billion and this year will be between $5.5 billion and $6 billion. Our balance of payments deficit on current account has averaged $4.6 billion for the past five years and could be in the $6 billion to $6.5 billion range this year. The cost of crude oil imports by the mid-1980s is expected to be of the order of $10 billion to $15 billion. The impact on our balance of payments is clear.

But do not let me leave the House with the impression that oil imports alone caused these payments deficits. Hon. members will recall a speech I made recently in this House when I outlined how the disastrous economic policies of the Liberal government from 1973-76—their fiscal, monetary and collective bargaining policies—brought us to this position of chronic deficits. There are signs that we are sliding back into those discredited policies. Clearly action is needed on an urgent basis to meet the challenges ahead and reduce the risks of today's unstable world. We must make no mistake; the international situation is very volatile and we are in a very exposed position.

Third World debt has grown alarmingly. The cumulative figure to the end of 1979 was some $300 billion. In 1980 this is projected to increase by $60 billion to $68 billion and by a further $70 billion to $75 billion next year. Five countries to date have been negotiating a rescheduling of debt, tantamount to a corporation declaring bankruptcy. These countries are the weak ones. Others, including the ten largest LDCs which represent two-thirds of the Third World debt, are under great stress. It is expected that other countries will be the subject of further rescheduling in 1981. It is clear that the World Bank and IMF must move to play an increasing role in this program. I urge the government to support the initiatives of these two institutions in the work they must do.

These newly industrialized countries represent promising new markets for Canada, markets where we need to improve the balance of payments deficit. But these markets may not develop because of the oil problem and we will remain exposed because of our large deficit position.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has been wringing his hands because our interest rates have been so severely affected by the U.S. government in their monetary policy. Has he ever stopped to think why this is so? It is because we are in such an exposed position through our payments deficit. Unfortunately, we are caught in a vicious international circle. As the oil price increases, it leads to further instability in international foreign exchange and money markets, particularly the U.S. dollar. Since 1973, U.S. dollar holdings by official foreign institutions have doubled from $70 billion to $140 billion, and are increasing. This overhang represents a continuing source of instability in world financial markets. So unless we take action now on a broad front, we will experience the same pattern in Canadian interest rates again.

Today the political environment in the Middle East is more unstable than at any time in recent history. Iran is totally unpredictable. This is the country which knowledgeable observers regarded as one of the most stable countries in the area only a year or so before the return of Ayatollah Khomeini.

The Soviets now occupy Afghanistan. The Soviet Union today is a net exporter of oil, about 800,000 barrels a day. In 1985 this is expected to be reversed to a net import position of one million barrels a day, a turnaround of 1,800,000 barrels a day. The Soviets have clearly served notice that Middle East oil is not exclusively a western preserve.

This is a delicate situation, and not only from the standpoint of oil supply. A significant portion of the money on deposit in the major international banks, money that has been used to finance the balance of payments deficits of both the industrial and less developed countries, emanates from the Middle East. Any disruption in this flow of money, any disruption in this recycling process which has worked so well up to now, will have serious repercussions on, first, the LDCs and, second, the major industrial countries.

I do not want to be an alarmist, but it would be foolish for us to ignore the potential of some destabilizing element in the Middle East. At the very least, competition for Middle East oil will intensify during the same period as Canada's oil imports requirements increase, a condition brought about by the neglect of successive Liberal governments.

The rising degree of trade protection is another area of major concern, a concern which would be considerably less were we not facing a $6 billion to $6.5 billion payments deficit this year and had we not experienced a $17 billion deficit in trade of manufactured goods in 1979. Countries like Japan, Korea and Germany are facing a desperate struggle to increase exports of manufactured goods since they have few raw materials to export and such large oil and other import requirements.

In spite of the brave words of Venice, we are currently seeing national self-interest forcing these and other countries to slip into a more protectionist posture. Preferential treatment for United States produced steel by New York State, and controls on U.S. petrochemical and synthetic yarn exports to the EEC, are two such examples.

What is Canada's response? We cling to an outmoded energy policy which threatens seriously to damage our manufacturing industry. We have not learned that high energy prices and scarce supplies forced Japanese and German car makers to adjust quickly and early to the changing energy environment. Our North American car manufacturers are now in the most serious downturn in years, being badly beaten by foreign imports.

If we do not move our energy policy into this new world, other industries will follow this same path. They will also produce products geared to the energy world of five to ten years ago. Our $200 million bailout of Chrysler may only be the first of its kind if we do not move soon enough.

We must be careful not to link automatically higher oil prices to inflation. Certainly they have an impact; but the experience of Germany and Japan with inflation rates which are lower than Canada's in spite of moving to world oil prices proves that the adjustment can be made, because these are the countries which are providing the greatest competition to Canada and the U.S. For how long can Canada expect countries which have made this tough adjustment to higher oil prices to ignore the threat of our subsidized oil price in this period of growing protectionism? Surely countervailing duties on our manufacturing industries, particularly those which are energy-intensive or use petrochemicals as a feedstock, are a far greater potential dislocation than having to adjust to a more realistic energy policy. The longer we keep our heads in the sand, the greater that threat becomes.

There is another important element in the trade picture, the current very damaging competition in export credits. This is an obvious result of the need to increase manufactured exports to pay for oil imports. Countries with little or no oil production have now moved to an increasing extent to subsidized manufactured exports. The Venice Summit set December 31 of this year as a deadline to agree on a new set of rules to control this damaging aspect of a trade war. To be frank, I do not hold out much hope for improvement in this situation. The pressures of self-interest are far too great. Canada clearly has an interest here since subsidized exports can be very costly. This represents one of the largest single items in the U.K. budget. France has been said to have embarked on a policy of financial colonization in support of its subsidized exports.

Our needs are that much more pressing because of the serious state to which we have allowed our energy and trade position to fall. But the tragic part of it all is that we in Canada had and still have some options. Japan, Germany, Korea and France have no options. They continue to import oil and fight to increase manufacturing exports. We expect at an early date to be presenting to the House of Commons some views of these options as they relate to manufacturing and trade policy.

In the meantime I urge the government to act and tell the truth to the Canadian people. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), when he was the federal-provincial critic in the opposition and when he was sitting on this side of the House, said in this House on October 12 of last year, and I quote:

> There is only one thing that matters; to be honest with the public. That is all I ask of the government.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I ask of this government. We have tried to give the government and the Canadian people some understanding of the present and growing seriousness of this situation, both domestically and internationally. I hope the government will listen. I hope it will face these facts and display the necessary political will and leadership and tell the truth to Canadians. Action is necessary. Action is needed now. The future is too important to Canada, and it is too precarious.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express real appreciation to the opposition for bringing forward a motion which gives us an opportunity to boast about and to explain the policies which the Liberal government has pursued in the energy field for many years. Of course, the motion was planned as, and intended to be, a political ploy to try to condemn the Liberal government and the Liberal party for their policies. The motion was worded to say that we should be condemned for a failure to have a comprehensive program. It strikes me that it provides us with precisely the opportunity we would like to have to prove and to show how comprehensive our policy is, and how long-standing has been our awareness of the problems of which the opposition has just spoken.

I would like, for example, to point out that in 1973 the OPEC nations began their efforts by putting on an embargo which cut off oil supplies to the western world. This began to arouse the attention of the western world to the dangerous and vulnerable position in which it was situated. We found that OPEC could raise its prices arbitrarily from $2 a barrel in 1973 to $10, and then $12 within a few months, and then to proceed arbitrarily ever since to so raise the price higher and higher that it was dizzying. That was certainly evidence to the western world of the precarious position in which we found ourselves.

Our government was conscious of the need to be energy self-sufficient and, as has been pointed out already, Canada has the lowest dependence on offshore oil of almost any nation on earth, particularly any other western power. In fact, only 15 per cent of our oil comes from offshore sources, or OPEC sources, whereas the United States imports 28 per cent. Next year the United States will be 40 per cent dependent on offshore oil. Other nations in Europe, as has been pointed out, are anywhere from 75 per cent to 98 per cent dependent on offshore oil. Canada in fact is not only not energy dependent—it is a net energy exporter—but we are also in a strong position to help other nations to see their way through, and the Canadian government has tried to help them find their own solutions.

In 1973 we found that Canada, along with other western nations, faced a critical turning point. It faced the OPEC embargo and OPEC energy price increases. From then on we knew that energy would never be cheap again. It was clear that there were profound strategic problems. We do not need to be told by the opposition about those problems today.

Strategic problems were confronting us when we were dependent upon Middle East oil. We do not have to be told that now, because already in 1973 Melvin Laird, a former secretary of defence in the United States, said this was the greatest danger to the western world since Hitler and World War II. That was said by the American secretary of defence back in 1973. We certainly have been aware of the strategic dangers which faced the western world at that time.

We also realized the economic dangers and disasters which loomed ahead. In 1974 the British publication The Economist said that our world monetary system was being set awash and that this was the greatest transfer of human wealth that has ever taken place in the history of mankind. Much wealth in a short period of time was transferred to Middle East nations which had oil, and there were prospects of ever-increasing and arbitrary price increases which would force the monetary system of the western world to be set awash. Then we were told that the western world was heading toward possible recession and, in fact, to depression. We were told of the tremendous balance of payments deficits which would come about in the west as the west spent endless amounts of money for oil and energy but would be unable to get it back in terms of sales. That might set the whole western world into a state of chaos.

We have seen what this has done to the American economy. There has been an enormous transfer of American dollars and Eurodollars to the Middle East.

We certainly also can say that we were tipped off back in 1973 and 1974 about the danger of the loss of our independence as nations in the west. This is nothing new. In 1973 and 1974 it was quite evident—it was spoken about—that certainly some of the Middle East powers would be able to exercise both blackmail and bribery. We saw that various American civil servants were bought up. They resigned their jobs to work for certain powers which were not American. They registered as agents for foreign powers. I refer, for example, to the former vice-president of the United States, Spiro Agnew, a certain former American defence minister, and a certain former expert in Middle East affairs for the CIA. We saw already back in 1973 and in 1974 that there were signs that foreign powers would use their wealth both to bribe and to blackmail. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) very correctly just said that those powers were going to be able to use money and force to effect foreign policies in the world and that we are in danger. That power is a threat. The hon. member was quite right.
