Mr. Lalonde: That applies not only to Alberta but also to British Columbia and to Ipsco in Saskatchewan, n'en déplaise my hon. friends in the NDP. It applies to Sault Ste. Marie, it applies to Hamilton, it applies to Contrecœur and it applies all across the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The National Energy Board itself has concluded that pre-building alone and the flow of Canadian gas to the United States can generate national economic benefits of some $4.5 billion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: A substantial portion of those benefits will come through the potential sale over the life of approved export contracts of around $17 billion worth of gas and natural gas liquid byproducts, which in turn will provide a positive boost to Canada's balance of payments position of some $2 billion a year.

The export of natural gas through the pre-build will provide a substantial benefit to hundreds of small and medium-sized Canadian-owned producers, many of whom at present have substantial shut-in reserves because of the absence of markets either in Canada or in the United States. The opening up of markets for these supplies which are surplus to Canadian needs will provide the cash flows such producers require in order to maintain exploration at the high level required to develop additional reserves with which to meet our own requirements over the long haul. For some of these Canadian companies at least, a failure to secure early access to U.S. markets could leave them with little choice but to sell out their interests to large multinational oil companies which can afford to hold gas in the ground for a long time. Such an alternative would clearly be contrary to our policy of greatly increasing domestic ownership and control of the petroleum industry in this country.

The pre-build, though, is just a part of the story. The total project, both northern and southern portions, according to best estimates, will in and of itself result in a 1 per cent gain in Canada's gross national product, with benefits including $2 billion in pipe orders to Canadian mills, 350,000 direct and indirect man-years of employment for Canadians, and the development of Canadian expertise and export capability.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Given the nature of the U.S. assurances and given the very substantial benefits which pre-building will provide—for example, facilitating the completion of the entire project and immediate returns to Canada in terms of jobs, output, producer revenues and balance of payment inflows—I do not believe that there can be any doubt that our national interest lies in proceeding with this important undertaking at the earliest possible date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The government is convinced that this decision is good not only for Alberta and not only for the oil industry but that it is also good for all Canadians and all Canadian workers in each and every one of the provinces of this country.

[Translation]

The government has been considering this matter at length these last few weeks and took a whole series of measures to make sure that the whole pipeline would be built in the coming years and particularly by 1985. Today the American administration provided us with the final necessary assurances to convince us of the United States commitment to complete the proposed Alaska gas pipeline by 1985. From the immediate construction of the southern section of the Alaska pipeline will flow enormous benefits for the whole Canadian economy, not only for Alberta oil producers and the Alberta government, but also for manufacturers and particularly workers in each and every province of Canada, especially those involved in the steel and pipeline equipment industries. The construction now of the southern section is just part of the process toward the construction of the entire system of the Alaska pipeline that for the most part runs through Canada. The pre-build section will enable us to spread over several years the work and revenues necessary to build this pipeline. This project, on top of the one we have already announced regarding the extension of the gas pipeline to eastern Canada, particularly as far as Quebec City for the time being, will give a tremendous shot in the arm to the Canadian economy, in eastern as well as in western Canada, and that is the main reason that made the government come today to this decision which, I am sure, will benefit all Canadians.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed, without amendment, the following bills: Bill C-3, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971; Bill C-4, an act respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes; Bill C-26, an act to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve; Bill C-31, an act to provide for the imposition of certain economic sanctions against the Islamic Republic of Iran; and Bill C-18, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

July 17, 1980

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 17th day of July, at 9.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to request that the necessary arrangements be made so that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod will not knock at the door until the statements and the questions with respect to this matter have been concluded.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, after the royal assent ceremony, I have no objection to continue with this statement of the minister and the questions which may follow, should you so decide. However, it would be unacceptable under present circumstances if the ceremony to which your referred did not take place at nine o'clock, in view of the fact that we already had royal assent earlier today and that we have asked the hon. Justice of the Supreme Court to be here this evening.

An hon. Member: He can wait!

Mr. Pinard: He is available at nine o'clock as a replacement for the Governor General. After the ceremony, Madam Speaker, we will go on with the interventions on the minister's statement. The House has agreed earlier to sit after ten o'clock to allow us to go to the bottom of this issue and then go on with the adoption of the motion on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, even after ten o'clock tonight. I suggest therefore that this is simply a matter of elementary courtesy. I would expect that from members of the New Democratic Party—

An hon. Member: Courtesy! He can wait!

Mr. Pinard: —who are usually so courteous, so that we would have royal assent at nine o'clock and continue the debate a little later.

Madam Speaker: I should have liked to accommodate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I can see that we have no choice in this instance, for the substitute of the Governor General would not be available after nine o'clock. However, I agree that we should return and sit late if necessary.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

NORTHERN PIPELINE

APPROVAL OF ALASKA GAS PIPELINE PRE-BUILD SECTION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have never in my time here seen nor heard a triple flip-flop such as the one I have observed tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: We heard a minister just now make a statement, a minister who was a member of the government in 1977 and 1978, and who was in office when the Northern Pipeline Act was passed, which act required the construction of a pipeline. During the debate a discussion arose with respect to the pre-build and the necessity of that pre-build to finance the whole. The same minister in opposition made statements of which I am going to remind him in a moment or two because he has fallen far short, in his statement today, of coming up with those ironclad commitments of which he spoke last December.

Now he has flopped again—a flip-flop-flip. He is now on the side of the virtuous in reverting to the position of his government in 1977-78. It is a magnificent performance, Madam Speaker, a magnificent act. He really should, this ironclad man, be attending the Olympics as an acrobat.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A trampoline artist.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, a trampoline artist. Seriously, I have to reserve at least two positions here. One is a very serious one with respect to the amendments to section 12 of the conditions set out in schedule III of the act. There is no way that we on this side can exercise a value judgment as to whether or not the changes which are being made to section 12 are intra vires and are legal until we see those changes. They have not been made available to us, although I do thank the minister for instructing his office to make available to me at 15 minutes to eight o'clock this evening a copy of the statement he intended to make. Unfortunately, there were no copies of the president's letter attached to that statement, nor were there any copies of the changes to section 12 attached to the copy of the statement which I received, so we are unable to comment on these two very vital aspects of the minister's statement.

The reservation that I want to make—and I have not yet received copies, although I have requested them from the Table—is the so-called commitment of which the minister spoke in his statement, made by way of the letter which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) received from President Carter today. We must see that letter, and we must see the changes in condition 12.

Mr. Lawrence: We should have a copy.

Mr. Nielsen: As my friend, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) says, we should have had a copy. That has been the weakness of the NDP position all along. They have been trying to judge this matter on the basis of an hypothesis. Always there was an "if"—if the government changes condition 12, will they not agree that it would be illegal to do so without debate? We do not know until we see the extent to which the government intends to change condition 12, and we do not know until we can make a value judgment on the legality of those changes. But their position is even worse than that. In 1977 and 1978 the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was their spokesman on energy matters. Madam Speaker will recall that he is now one of the officers of Husky Oil, I believe it is.

• (2040)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: They then took the position—and if there could be any act that exceeds the act of the minister in the art of the flip-flop-flip, it is that party over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: They took the position in 1977 and 1978 that there will be no pipeline. Also their position is very clear that there will be no exports of gas. Now they are trying to have us believe that they are opposed to the pre-build but they are favourable to the pipeline. That is one flip-flop. "But if you can assure us that the guarantees are there that the whole line will be built—I am still not going to let you put any gas through it because that is not in accordance with our policy—go ahead", they say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: They say, "No pre-build, but if the guarantees are there, we will change our position of 1977-78 as long as you build the whole gas pipeline. But for God's sake, don't put any gas through that gas pipeline". What act can exceed that kind of position?

There have been no changes in substance between now and last December when the minister spoke on an announcement made by the then minister of energy, mines and resources which is almost on all fours with the announcement made tonight. The only difference is that instead of 4.5 trillion cubic feet that we are being authorized to export, the figure was 3.7.

When the minister made his announcement on December 6 last year, he made it quite clear that the exports were being authorized on the recommendation of NEB for transmission through the pre-build sections of this line only. At that time the now minister had some very startling things to say. But I point out that apart from the letter from President Carter, which I have not yet seen, there have been no substantive changes between the position of last December 6 and the position today, not one.

Mr. Lalonde: $500 million.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, there is the change from 3.7 to 4.5; that is the only substantive change. In so far as commitments and the rest of the matters of which he spoke last December, there have been no changes. The 1985 delay was present last December, indeed it was present long before that. What he is trying to do in his own inimitable convoluted way is to try to justify his own swallowing of himself and his words of last December.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What a mouthful, that would be impossible.

Mr. Nielsen: As the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said, it would almost be physically impossible. I really do not see how he can get past his iron head.

Condition 12 indicates that they have to be satisfied that the financing requirements for the whole line have been met. Now obviously that has been altered. It would be interesting to see just how it has been altered. Last December the minister made six conditions. The minister makes a moue, I will read those conditions to him to refresh his memory. In response to the minister's announcement on that date, he said:

I think this statement will be one that Canada will live to regret—

Essentially it was the same statement as the one made tonight. He continued:

—as one of the greatest sellouts we have seen.

That was the minister's value judgment on December 6 of last year as reported at page 2100 of Hansard for that year. He said that we should assume six points to be necessary prerequisites prior to the approval of the export and of the pre-build. He certainly laid his party's reputation on the line when he was making that statement speaking on his party's behalf. As reported at page 2101 of Hansard, he said:

—we are faced with the situation where eastern Canada, the Atlantic provinces, need more natural gas and need a gas pipeline to take gas to the homes and to the industries there.

I ask the minister to respond to this when he is replying to questions. Is it still the Liberal party's position that extension of the Q & M Pipe Lines to the maritimes must come before the pre-build which he has just announced, because that was his position of last December? Referring to page 2101 of the same issue of Hansard, he imposed a second condition. He said:

—with regard to revenues arising out of gas exports to the United States. They should be used to ensure the initiation and completion of the Quebec and maritime gas pipelines—

That is what he said last December, a few short months ago. Let me put this question to him: Is it still the government's position that revenues from gas exports to the United States be used to construct the full Q & M Pipe Lines? Are these government or private sector revenues that will be used to construct this eastern Canadian pipeline? That was his position and the position of his party when he was spokesman last December. He set forth a third condition then. As reported on the same page of Hansard, he said:

—we have an announcement that we will sell 3.7 trillion cubic feet of gas to the United States. That certainly is a clear indication that this government has its priorities all wrong.

Later on the same page he said:

Therefore, if we have to have a bias, our bias as Canadians should be against any gas exports outside Canada . . . That should take place only on the basis of an overriding national interest—

The factors, the elements and the circumstances have not changed in the interim between last December and now. What has changed? I ask Madam Speaker what has changed since December 6 except that presently the now government wants to export more than 3.7 trillion cubic feet? Or, does the government agree with its socialist friends to my left, their position that we should build a pipeline and not put any gas through it at all? If there is to be any logic in what the minister said last December, that has to be the compelling result of that logic.

He laid down a fourth condition then which is very interesting. Referring to the same page of Hansard, he said:

—there must be an arrangement for swaps in this agreement with the United States so that down the line, if Canada were to need natural gas, we would be in a position to obtain natural gas from the Alaska gas pipeline which we might need in exchange for the gas we are now providing to the Americans.

● (2050)

That was a very clear statement of his party's policies on the question of swaps which he does not mention at all in his statement tonight. I do not know whether it is an ironclad flop or whether he has increased his dexterity to a flip-flop, flip-flop, because he has already done it three times here.

I know that my harkening back to the rather rash statements which the minister made last December are certainly not comfortable to him, but it seems to me that they should be exposed in the light of the need for Canadians to assess the integrity of the kind of party that now sits there and then sat here.

With respect to the fifth condition, Madam Speaker, that was imposed—and in this connection I refer to page 2101 of Hansard of December 6, 1979:

In our view, exports of natural gas to the United States should be authorized only on the basis of, first of all—

—and the minister will remember the following words vividly. The sentence continues:

—an ironclad commitment regarding the building of the whole Alaska gas pipeline.

He went on to say that he was not satisfied with that firmness of statement, although the word "ironclad" cannot sound any firmer, but he went on to say:

Everything has to be signed, sealed and delivered—before we start exporting one cubic foot of gas out of this country to the United States.

An hon. Member: What about that, Marc?

Mr. Nielsen: That is what he said last December.

Mr. Nowlan: No wonder the gas has increased.

Mr. Nielsen: It is very obvious. Where is this commitment of which he speaks that has to be signed, sealed and delivered before one cubic foot of gas is exported out of the country?

I have not had an opportunity to read the letter from President Carter, but my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), has read it, and he has informed me that there is no commitment, guarantee or anything approaching the words of the minister in his statement, tonight contained in that letter.

An hon. Member: Shame.

An hon. Member: Why don't you read it?

Miss MacDonald: Why don't you?

Mr. Nielsen: I usually rely on my friend from Nepean-Carleton.

Mr. Harquail: Madam Speaker, this is a very important occasion. I would like to intervene and plead with you, Madam Speaker, that the very representatives from that section of the House who moved an adjournment debate to have this subject dealt with, and who have been calling for a statement, interrupted the minister's speech almost entirely throughout his speech. Now when this member is speaking, and he is saying some important things about Atlantic Canada and mentioning other important aspects relating to the speech, I wonder if we could have an opportunity to hear him since we were unable to have order while the minister, due to the interruptions and the fractious attitude of the NDP—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Children.

Mr. Harquail: I hope we can bring some order back to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The childish NDP.

Mr. Nielsen: In any event, Madam Speaker, so much for the president's letter which has been read by my friend. There is nothing approaching a commitment, the nature of which was contemplated by the minister, when he spoke last December.

Alaska Gas Pipeline

Regarding financial commitments, he went on at page 2102 of Hansard for December 6, 1979, to say this:

—we should have a commitment from the U.S. government in this respect, as well as from private industry.

I suggest to the minister that it would be stretching the truth beyond all recognition for him to even leave the inference that there is any financial commitment for the construction of the whole line. The conditions set forth in schedule 3, namely condition 12, make it abundantly clear that the minister—that is the Senator in the other place—must be satisfied that the financing is available for the construction of the whole line and not just part of it.

One thing which the minister did not touch upon, and he will recall that last December when the minister then made the announcement on December 6 of a seven-year time span over which the export would run, and he said—he, the minister now—at page 2102 of Hansard the following:

Our preference ... has been for five-year agreements on exports. We are surprised that the government has been considering seven-year agreements.

He might address himself to that matter when he is replying to questions. Those are the views, Madam Speaker, which the minister expressed last December when he was out of office. Now he has suddenly become responsible again in the swallowing of himself.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The ironclads have turned to mush.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: The ironclads have turned to mush. I think in an announcement as important as this one, if the minister really believes what he is saying now—

An hon. Member: Who knows?

Mr. Nielsen: —in the extent and the nature of the commitments, which he seems to believe are commitments from the United States with respect to financing, that the whole line is going to be built and is going to be within a 1985 time-frame, then he should put his seat on the line if he has any doubts about it at all.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Lalonde: Would the hon. member run against me in Outremont?

Mr. Nielsen: I will certainly come and run against the minister in Outremont if he will try the same act with me in the Yukon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: No conditions.

Mr. Nielsen: The last ten minutes or so of the minister's 30-odd minutes' statement dealt with economic benefits. They have always been there. Those economic benefits were spelled out when the act was before Parliament and before committee, and there have been no changes in circumstances whatsoever. I do not know what has taken the government so long in their shilly-shallying, delaying and fumbling in coming up with this decision.

I have one more point to which I want to address myself. It has to do with the response of the Prime Minister today when he was being questioned by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), and I am referring to commitments that were given by Mr. Schlesinger. My friend from Perth asked him to table the current assurances and the Schlesigner commitment of some months ago in order that the House may see what differences, if any, are contained in the United States commitments. The Prime Minister must have been in receipt of that letter from President Carter when that question was answered. We did not have any tabling of that letter this afternoon in response.

More seriously, the Prime Minister in responding to the first part of the question said that, "on the Schlesinger commitment I think I made it clear at the time that the then secretary, Schlesinger, had told me verbally that we would not be wise to proceed with the pre-build if we did not have guarantees that the whole line would be built. So, I cannot table anything."

But last December 7 when the Prime Minister led the questioning for that day, he questioned the then prime minister, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and he said this at page 2123 of Hansard:

> Could I remind the hon. gentleman that our government obtained from the United States a commitment that if there were to be any pre-build of the Alaska gas pipeline, it could only be authorized if there were a commitment to build the entire line? Could I hear from the Prime Minister whether that commitment obtained from Mr. Schlesinger last March still stands?
> RIGHT HON. JOE CLARK (PRIME MINISTER): Mr. Speaker, that commitment stands.

The present Prime Minister said later on in his second question:

> This phrase obviously indicates that there is no firm commitment, that we are asking them for a firm commitment and that we have authorized the export before obtaining this commitment.

We want to compare that statement of the present Prime Minister with the lack of any commitments, I am informed by my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, who has read the letter, or anything approaching a commitment in the letter from President Carter. The decision to go ahead is bound to result in immeasurable economic benefits to this country. We have always been of that view.

However, the government has fallen far short of obtaining that degree of commitment to the construction of the whole line which the minister certainly expressed, in no uncertain terms last December, and which when they were in office previous to the last administration, they expressed just as strongly. They have fallen far short of obtaining the kind of commitment which will ensure the completion of the whole line. I very much doubt whether the time-frame of 1985 will be met. Indeed, when I took part in the debate in 1978, I forecasted then delays which I anticipated would go to 1985 and beyond. From what I have heard tonight, those doubts have not only not been allayed, but my conviction has been firmed, that we are looking at a considerable piece beyond 1985 before we can see the construction of the whole line, indeed, if we see it at all.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of our party to speak on this issue which I regard as the most important issue of this Parliament so far. The minister during his speech looked across the floor and yelled at us on this side of the House words to the effect, "Do you guys feel sick or something?" Well, I do feel sick tonight.

An hon. Member: You look it.

Mr. Waddell: It is unbelievable that it is the same minister who is sitting across the floor tonight when one year ago, while he was in opposition and was the Liberal energy critic, he said that the pre-build would be one of the greatest sell-outs in Canadian history. Tonight he has turned around and made a statement which is exactly the opposite. What makes me really sick is that the statement is sheer hypocrisy. Those are our feelings toward his statement tonight.

Mr. Crosbie: Tough luck.

Mr. Waddell: I would like to set out briefly and summarize the position of our party because, unlike my friends to the right, I think it is very, very clear. What we have tonight is not a decision to build a pipeline, but a decision to export more Canadian gas which we think should stay in Canada to meet Canada's future needs.

There is no firm guarantee, none at all, that the rest of the pipeline will ever be built. The only thing which is guaranteed is that the United States will get our gas. Clearly, the government has failed to stand up for our interests. It has failed to get the ironclad guarantees which the minister so properly demanded when he was in opposition. The minister has failed to get the guarantees which would ensure the financing for the whole line. He has failed to get any swap agreements so that when we sell out the Canadian gas we receive, later, gas to replace it at the same prices from the Americans. The minister has failed to get that guarantee.

When I saw the minister receive a standing ovation for his speech of sheer hypocrisy, I wondered how the members opposite will go back to their ridings and say to their constituents, "Well, you have to pay more for gas in the future, because we are selling it all out now." In 1978 Parliament authorized a transportation pipeline to help the Americans transport Alaska natural gas from Prudhoe Bay through Canada down to the lower 48. What benefits were we to receive? We were to receive some jobs, to receive some contracts and so on for helping the Americans. We also were to receive a link up to the Arctic gas through the Dempster lateral. That is why Parliament passed the Northern Pipeline Act.

However, it was an act to transport American gas to American markets. Now, the government, without parliamentary approval or debate—and we have sought a special debate to have the matter brought before the House to find out about the guarantees—the government comes forward tonight, by order in council behind closed doors and against the real intent of an act of Parliament, brings in this announcement. It is clear to me, if it is not clear to the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), that the government has brought in an order in council which will authorize an export pipeline to export huge quantities of Alberta gas, Canadian gas to American markets. We on this side of the House say that this is a sell-out. Let us call it what it is. It is a sell-out of relatively cheap Canadian gas. Later Canadian consumers will have to pay higher prices, if we can get the gas. There is no guarantee that the whole pipeline will ever be build.

Some hon. members have raised in the House the fact that, according to the Prime Minister, even the Americans said that we would be damn fools to go ahead with the pre-build. Yet the minister receives a standing ovation for going ahead with the pre-build. That is what the Liberals think. I have never been more proud than tonight that I am not a Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: The minister, when he was the energy critic in opposition of course said, and the hon. member for Yukon gave us the words—they are familiar to this House—"Let us not sell out for a fast buck, let's have ironclad guarantees." Tonight the minister went against that statement totally. Not only has he flip-flopped, but he has given up the whole basis of his energy policy. As I recall, the minister's energy policy is to get Canada off oil. That part of his policy makes sense to me. Does it not make sense to use cheap Canadian natural gas to replace that expensive imported oil? That is a good policy and one with which I agree.

The problem is that when Ontario, Quebec and the other eastern provinces are ready to convert, they will ask, "Where is the gas?" It will all have been sold to the United States by this pre-build. I draw to the minister and hon. member's attention the Liberal party policy of 1980 which reads at section 124(a):

As far as practicable, a distribution network should ensure that all regions of Canada are linked to the provinces rich in energy resources.

It goes on to say in subparagraph (b):

Exports of energy or energy sources should be very carefully assessed to guarantee Canada's long-term interests.

There goes the policy right out the window. Where is the new Liberal party? Where is the nationalism and the concern for Canada's energy security? It is gone.

An hon. Member: It was never there.

Mr. Crosbie: They fooled you.

Mr. Waddell: We asked questions in the House with respect to whether there were any swap provisions in this agreement. Swap provisions are very simple and can easily be understood by Canadians. That is, if we intend to sell off all this gas now, let us make a deal with the United States that we receive some of that Alaska gas when it comes down. But there are no swap provisions. The minister said as recently as last week that he was still negotiating with the American secretary of the interior, but there are no swap provisions and there are no guarantees.

Look at the guarantees. First of all, we have a resolution of the Congress. The minister knows and members know that one Congress does not bind another. Hon. members know Congress does not commit one cent to construction and that it is the private companies that build the pipelines, not the American Congress, and they are not going to guarantee it.

The second thing is that there is a letter from the President: "Dear Marc, Go ahead. Signed, Jimmy." What is this letter worth? I say with respect to the President, what is this letter worth, Madam Speaker? It is not committing Congress or the administration to one penny. It is certainly not committing any President afterwards. Does the government call this "guarantees"?

The third guarantee is that the pipeline companies, the oil companies, have spent some money; they have spent 2 per cent. On projects? No, on studies in Alaska.

Those are the ironclad guarantees, Madam Speaker. Those are what the minister comes to the House with tonight. He says they are jobs. They are jobs for one-tenth of the project. The project is going to cost about $600 million and upwards in Canada, plus the spin-off benefits. The whole line in Canada would cost $8 billion and the total line would cost $22 billion. Why should Canadian workers settle for one-tenth of the loaf when they can have the whole loaf? That does not make any sense. No, Madam Speaker, on this side of the House we think that line will never be build.

There is another matter at issue here but before I deal with it I heard something from my friends to my right. What is the position of the Conservative party on this? They are in favour of the pre-build.

An hon. Member: What is it?

Mr. Crosbie: The same as it always was.

Mr. Waddell: This pre-build is going to hurt British Columbia, my province, substantially. It is going to end their gas markets in the United States. There are 16 Conservative members on this side of the House from British Columbia but not one of them has got to his feet to oppose this pre-build.

An hon. Member: You are not just from British Columbia. Be a Canadian.

Mr. Waddell: Unfortunately we do not have any members from the maritimes—yet—but I hear some of them yelling from across the floor. What happens when you extend the pipeline to the maritimes?

Mr. Rose: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. A moment ago the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) chastised members of my party and others on this side of the House generally for rudeness. I wonder if the same kind of courtesy that was requested by the hon. member could be extended to our spokesman.

An hon. Member: But he didn't get it.

Mr. Waddell: I think what I was saying, Madam Speaker, makes good sense. If we export all the gas through this new pipeline, then where is the gas for the maritimes and where is the gas for Vancouver Island to take them off oil?

We heard today as a result of a question I put to the minister that the industry is thinking of looping the pipeline and putting more gas in it. Where do we stop these exports?

Evelyn Gigantes, who is the MPP for this area, and I proposed to the minister and to the Ontario government that Ontario buy some Alberta gas. If the producers have a cash flow problem, then we will help them and buy that gas. We will not export it but will bank it in Alberta. That makes sense to me as an energy policy. We could use that gas later in Ontario when the people need it. That is what an energy policy is like. I thought the minister was moving toward that.

I want to conclude, Madam Speaker, by dealing with one other matter, and that is the challenge to Parliament in this whole issue.

An hon. Member: Cabinet dictatorship.

Mr. Waddell: We have asked for a debate in Parliament. We have asked for an amendment to this act—this act which may be illegal. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in this House the other day, "We are just building this northern pipeline by stages like you build the St. Lawrence Seaway—one lock at a time." The problem is that it is more like authorizing the building of the St. Lawrence Seaway and then building the Erie canal! It is totally different. It is comparing apples with oranges.

This is a very fundamental matter for Parliament, if we take Parliament seriously. Parliament authorized a transportation pipeline and then the government—not by coming back to Parliament but by order in council—authorizes an export pipeline. I hear it said that Parliament does not matter any more, that it is useless, that in this new age what we have is really cabinet dictatorship between elections.

It is up to us, Madam Speaker, to decide if we are going to let Parliament not matter any more. This is a fundamental issue that we in the NDP are going to continue fighting for.

At the conclusion of his remarkable speech when he was urging the building of a Canadian transcontinental railway, Sir John A. Macdonald, as reported at page 494 of Hansard, volume one, of the debate of 1880-81 said this:

"I can trust to the intelligence of this House, and the patriotism of this country. I can trust not only to the patriotism but to the common sense of this country to carry out an arrangement which will give us all we want, which will satisfy all the loyal, legitimate aspirations, which will give us a great, an united, a rich, an improving, a developing Canada, instead of making us tributary to American laws, to American (gas companies) to American bondage, to American tolls, to American freights, to all the little tricks and big tricks that American (gas companies) are addicted to—"

I have changed two of Sir John's words, Madam Speaker. In two places I changed the word "railway" to "gas companies". Otherwise that is a verbatim statement of Sir John A. Macdonald in this House in discussing the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

I did that purposely, Madam Speaker, because in the Speech from the Throne the government said the same thing. They said that pipelines are really the railways of the twentieth century. I agree with that. That is why this matter is so important tonight. That is why we must not stuff this "railway" full of Canadian gas to go to the United States. That is why we must get rid of this colonial attitude or we will always remain a colony.

What we are doing is taking all our jobs and our gas and stuffing them into a pipeline and exporting them. That is the fundamental issue here. When hon. members opposite stand up and give the minister the kind of ovation they did, they should really think about that.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): I will not take too much of the time of the House, but with all the exuberance that is in evidence tonight with the announcement, there is one forgotten group of people who are directly going to be affected by this line. I had hoped that the government in the past several weeks would have been able to have brought the Bill S-12 forward. That would have given a certain amount of protection to those people who are directly involved with the building of this gas pipeline.

My question to the minister would be—and I would hope that some time during the interim he would be able to answer this: Will those farmers on whose land this pipeline is going to pass over be given protection? Can we have a commitment from the government that these farmers will have the protection that Bill S-12 would have given them? Bill S-12 should be known to the government members because it came out of the Senate in the Thirtieth Parliament. It affects the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). We are responsible to those people.

At this time I have to give warning to the government that these farmers are going to be very difficult to deal with until we have an assurance from the government and the contracting firms that they are going to be protected. When you go on a farm, tear down the fences and mess up the surface of the land entirely, certainly those people are deserving of very direct consideration. Up to the present time the government has ignored this. I cannot state emphatically enough that consideration must be given to this question.

I spoke to the government House leader with regard to having Bill S-12 passed during this session of Parliament. Up to this time it has not been passed. Even if that bill cannot be passed during this session of Parliament, I hope the government will be in a position to give those farmers the protection that bill would give them.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I first want to thank the hon. member for his interest in the subject and remind him that Bill S-12 was introduced at the instigation of the government in the Senate. I also remind him that Senator Olson has repeatedly brought this matter to our attention, requesting urgent consideration on the House side of the bill that had been considered by the Senate. As the hon. member knows, the session is far from over. I am advised by the government House leader that he will give urgent consideration to this issue.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I have a short statement first and then I will follow up with a question.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Benjamin: Ask your question.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member should restrict himself to questions. Statements have already been made by representatives of the different parties.

Mr. Yurko: Madam Speaker, whereas the former minister of the previous government made the following statement to this House on December 13, 1979, I have to repeat the statement by way of news release before I put my question—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Yurko: It was a statement by the Hon. Robert de Cotret which was issued on December 13, 1979. The statement was as follows.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Benjamin: Ask the question or shut up.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Madam Speaker, it is the desire of the Honourable Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General that this honourable House attend immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (2130)

[Translation]

And being returned:

Madam Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-3, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971—Chapter No. 35.

Bill C-18, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods—Chapter No. 36.

Alaska Gas Pipeline

Bill C-4, an act respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes—Chapter No. 37.

Bill C-26, an act to implement an agreement between Her Majesty in right of the Province of British Columbia and Her Majesty in right of Canada respecting the sharing of revenues from the exploitation of minerals in the Fort Nelson Indian Reserve—Chapter No. 38.

Bill C-31, an act to provide for the imposition of certain economic sanctions against the Islamic Republic of Iran—Chapter No. 39.

Bill C-40, an act to amend the Pensions Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of Wars Act, the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act—Chapter No. 19.

Bill S-8, an act to revive Pyramid Communications Limited.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

APPROVAL OF ALASKA GAS PIPELINE PRE-BUILD SECTION

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, my question relates specifically to a portion of a news release of last December 13 by Senator Robert de Cotret, then minister of industry, trade and commerce. I would read just a very short part of it to come to the section pertinent to what I have in mind. The Senator stated:

I have had discussions with the principals in the Alaska gas pipeline project and have given them the assurance that the Government of Canada remains fully committed to the implementation of the Canada-U.S. agreement for the transportation of north slope gas from Alaska to the lower 48 states. Along with the significant industrial benefits to Canada, this project facilitates access to Canadian gas reserves in the Mackenzie Delta and the Beaufort Sea.

This is the pertinent section I am referring to:

Furthermore, the government is of the view that the pre-building of the southern sections of the system for the export of Alberta gas to the U.S.A. market in advance of the arrival of the Alaska gas is an important component of that project, both for its early completion and for the substantial benefit—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Benjamin: Sit down!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has to ask his question right now, as I have already been quite tolerant with him.

Mr. Yurko: I share the views expressed by the previous government when it agreed with the United States government—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member was going to ask a question. He must do so right now because he has already made quite a lengthy statement.

Mr. Yurko: Madam Speaker, I do not know how to ask the question unless I put the—

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman has just admitted he does not know how to ask a question. He has taken all these minutes making a speech and I suggest that you do not hear him any further.

Madam Speaker: I think I have to apply the ruling to the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). The period following a statement by the minister is set aside for questions to the minister thereon. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question immediately I will give him the floor one more time.

Mr. Yurko: Does the minister agree with the statement I referred to, and has he addressed himself to the need to export additional quantities of gas to the United States through the pre-build to ensure the completion of the entire northern gas pipeline? Has he addressed himself to that question at this time in connection with the following statement, that that government made—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Yurko: —back a few years ago, which was as follows—

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Yurko: Madam Speaker, can I—the statement was as follows, made on March—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have three questions for the minister. The first is with respect to the agreement which was signed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on behalf of the Government of Canada in 1977 and was also signed by Mr. Schlesinger. The schedule provides for expeditious construction in section 2, that the line will be begun in Alaska on January 1, 1980, will be begun in Yukon on January 1, 1981, and that other construction will start on January 1, 1983. My first question to the minister is a very simple one. When is the line going to be started in Alaska? It is already behind schedule. Can he please tell us when that line is going to be started in Alaska since it was signed in the agreement?

Mr. Lalonde: It is expected, Madam Speaker, that the Alaska line will have to be started in 1983, for completion by November, 1985.

Mr. Rae: I am sure the minister will also be telling us in his answers what steps the government plans to take if the line does not in fact start in 1983. I think it was the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who suggested he resign his seat. That should be the least of his punishments.

The second question I have is with respect to swaps. Yesterday and the day before in answer to questions from our party the minister said he would have a statement to make with respect to swaps when he made his statement in the House tonight. Does he have that kind of statement to make tonight?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Madam Speaker. I am ready to make comments on this, as I indicated. Indeed, it was my view that we should negotiate for swaps, and that is what I have done. I have had extensive discussions with the American authorities, particularly the American secretary and the deputy undersecretary, especially during the summit in Venice. We discussed and reviewed this matter at great length and examined possible avenues, and it was concluded—unfortunately, I have to say—that arrangements for swaps were not feasible and not administratively possible in this instance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: You have been had again.

Mr. Lalonde: I have gone into this matter to a great extent. We have tried, and I must say in that respect that I have been unable to achieve arrangements which would be satisfactory. I came to the conclusion myself that the objections and the problems which had been raised in considering such an arrangement were quite genuine and that it was impossible to make such arrangements.

I also came to the conclusion that the question of swaps was not as essential as it appeared in terms of supply for future Canadian needs. We have quite clear evidence that Canadian supply is quite large and that we can be assured that the future of Canadian supplies remains guaranteed.

Mr. Rae: Old "ironclad" has become "Mr. Playtex", Madam Speaker. He has been playing strip poker with the President of the United States, and the emperor has no clothes on tonight.

The Northern Pipeline Act states specifically—and the word is used throughout the act—that "pipeline" means the pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska across Canada along the route set out in annex 1 to the agreement. I would like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to table tonight the legal opinion of the law officers of the Crown with respect to the fact that the pipeline, on the government's own admission, is not a pipeline which goes from Alaska to the 48 states but an export gas line which is located solely in the province of Alberta. Could he please tell us what the legal justification is for that transformation?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am very sorry about the terrible damage the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood are doing to my reputation for being an inflexible, arrogant and tough negotiator.

Mr. Nielsen: You did it yourself.

Mr. Rae: You are only tough when they are weaker than you are.

Mr. Lalonde: I hope that after this they will laud my understanding.

Let me answer the question raised by the hon. member, which is very important, very major and very basic. Again I want to say quite clearly that this pre-build is authorized and can be authorized only as part of the construction of the total Alaska gas pipeline. It cannot be authorized as a mere export line or a mere line for the export of Canadian gas. That is provided for under the treaty. That is provided for under the act passed by this Parliament, and that has consistently been the view and the policy of the government.

We have acted on the basis of the advice of the law officers of the Crown. We have had the necessary legal opinions, but the hon. member knows that it is a well-established tradition in this House as well as in the British Parliament that, legal opinions of the law officers of the Crown are not for tabling in the House of Commons. That is a rule which Parliament has followed over the centuries. However, I can assure the hon. member that the proper legal opinions have been obtained, and they confirm that everything the government has done in this respect, respects both the letter and the intent of the law. I cannot be more emphatic in that respect.

Mr. Rae: See you in court.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Madam Speaker: It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 38(5), to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by Madam Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

APPROVAL OF ALASKA GAS PIPELINE PRE-BUILD SECTION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister just a couple of questions. My first question relates to the rather curious, if not deplorable, timing of this announcement tonight with respect to what the minister previously required, namely, an ironclad commitment that the whole of the pipeline was to be built before any part of it would receive permission to be built.

The question I am really asking is in relation to the dilly-dallying which has been going on in the cabinet room over the last few weeks and the great amount of agonizing over this question by the cabinet tonight. Obviously the cabinet has really been sweating murder over the last few days to try to get a commitment out of the United States government with respect to the announcement made tonight.

The minister's timing is bad. I am sure he should have realized that President Carter has been glued to his television set all week and probably would not want to commit himself in writing to any matter, but is this halfhearted letter tonight the commitment—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I also have to ask this hon. member to put a question to the minister. That is what this period is for.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I am asking the minister if this halfhearted letter tabled tonight, which we had some trouble getting and which my hon. friend did not have the opportunity of having during the course of his remarks, is now considered by the minister to be the ironclad commitment to build the whole of the pipeline? Obviously it is not a commitment.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources):

Madam Speaker, I am very happy to answer the particular question raised by my friend. The decision of the government is essentially based on three factors, three clear elements which are specific, and a broader one which is general. The first one is the undertaking which we have been able to obtain in the United States between the producers and the distributors to commit $500 million for the engineering and the beginning of the work in Alaska; that is $500 million on the line.

Second, we have a letter from the President, on the interpretation of which I disagree strongly with my hon. friend. The president indicated a very strong commitment of the administration to the completion of this pipeline before the end of 1985.

The third commitment, the third element which has been the basic decision of the government, has been the unanimous resolution by both parties of Congress, committing Congress to the completion of that line by 1985.

I have heard one of my friends in the NDP saying that one Congress does not bind another Congress. He knows, or he should know, that there are only two parties in the United States, and after the election there will be either a Republican majority or a Democratic majority in the Congress. What is interesting in this case is that we have the unanimous consent of both parties in the U.S. Congress and a commitment to see to it that this line is completed by the end of 1985.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: There are three very specific steps that have been taken during the last few weeks which did not exist before. In addition, there is the broad element that it is quite clear now that the construction of the whole pipeline has become vital to the national security and interest of the United States. In a way you could have a fully unquestionable commitment only if you had the line actually built, because until it is actually completed you never know what can happen, and even when it is completed you do not quite know what will happen. We have seen this in Come By Chance where a great refinery was built and the parties walked away from it. But what we have in this case is a clear, complete commitment of the U.S. Congress as well as the U.S. administration, plus $500 million on the line from the partners. I think that is an ironclad commitment indeed.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, my second question to the minister really should relate to his request enunciated in December of last year with regard to a pipeline to the maritimes and a pipeline to the eastern portion of Quebec beyond Montreal. He indicated that that pipeline should be built first and paid for before any other facility to export gas is considered. That was my second question, but I am intrigued to find out the actual wording which the minister says is a financial commitment on the part of the United States government, which he required also on December 6, in this rather barren letter which he has tabled here tonight. He can take either one of those questions, I do not care.

Mr. Lalonde: I will answer both, and I do not care. With regard to the first one concerning the pipeline to Quebec and the maritimes, if the hon. member has been in the House he has heard that the government has already approved the construction of the pipeline to Quebec and that the completion of the second part of that pipeline to the maritimes remains indeed a third option and a very high priority with this government.

Mr. Andre: Paid for by the proceeds of the gas sale.

Mr. Lalonde: That is our commitment. We have already delivered on the first half of this commitment which we made in the statement in which we said there should not be approval of the pre-build until that aspect of the pipeline to the east has been addressed.

So far as the second point is concerned, the question is not whether there is financial commitment but rather whether we have a commitment of the U.S. Congress and U.S. administration. Whether it is financial, legislative, administrative or otherwise, we have the commitment of the two branches of the U.S. authorities which have to deal with this matter, and that is good enough.

An hon. Member: They have double-crossed you before, they will double-cross you again.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, by no stretch of the imagination, I say with respect to the minister, can anything that is held in the letter to the United States be called a commitment upon which he would want to bet any of his own money. I think that is the position with respect to that.

I want to ask him a question with respect to the approval process. I am referring to page 17 of the text of the minister's statement which says:

> However, it still remains necessary for the board and Senator Olson to make a judgment as to whether Foothills is, in fact, capable of meeting the requirements of condition 12, as amended, with respect to financing of the project in Canada. I expect that both the board and Senator Olson will be in a position to reach a decision on that question within the next few days.

The senator is a non-elected official, notwithstanding the fact that he is a member of Parliament, generally speaking, being a member of the Senate. I want to understand the process. Has the senator, by today's decision of the cabinet, been authorized, after consultation with the National Energy Board and the decision by it, to make the decision now by himself, or does he have to bring his findings preparatory to his decision back to cabinet and have cabinet make the final approval on something that, by the minister's statement, is still outstanding?

An hon. Member: What is the difference whether he does it or the cabinet does it?

Mr. Lalonde: On the first part of the hon. member's question I will tell him that if I had money, I would indeed bet on the construction of the whole pipeline, and I would not hesitate to do so.

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. Lalonde: Everything I had, if I had any money.

So far as the main question raised is concerned, the hon. member knows the Northern Pipeline Act very well. The act states that the matter has to be examined by the National Energy Board and the NEB will make a recommendation to the minister responsible for the northern pipeline, and that is Senator Olson. That is the law. Senator Olson is a full member of the government, a full member of the cabinet. He has the same authority as any other member of the cabinet, and when he acts under the law he acts for the government.

An hon. Member: Whom does he represent?

Mr. Lalonde: That is the way it is going to be followed.

An hon. Member: He is a loser.

Mr. Lalonde: I am sorry, but the hon. member opposite seems to have had a very good dinner tonight.

An hon. Member: He should have been eating crow like you.

Mr. Lalonde: He wonders whom Senator Olson represents. He represents the people of Canada because he is a member of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He is a loser.

Mr. Lalonde: As a member of the cabinet, he will make a decision under the law. He may consult whomever he wishes. I am not in a position to say whether or not he would want to consult other colleagues in the cabinet, but under the law he has authority to act.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): If the minister thinks about this he will realize that he has already bet all he has on the outcome of the pipeline; that is his reputation and his credibility. He did that last December. In any event, the minister has made it clear now that, in his judgment, Senator Olson is only obligated now to consult.

Mr. Knowles: Or fall.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Or fall. The minister indicated in the affirmative to that question by nodding his head. Would the minister undertake to table in the House tomorrow the orders or other instruments which approve of this decision today by the Government of Canada, so that the House can see, as cabinet saw today, those matters beyond the statement of the minister which concerned cabinet, and the precise terms and conditions of the legal instruments setting this process in motion?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, indeed I will be very pleased to obtain all those documents and table them tomorrow. Reference was made to the amendment of condition 12. I believe those amendments to condition 12 were made public by the National Energy Board in April. I have copies of them here, but they are not the actual text of the order in council approved today by cabinet. I am quite willing to give copies to my friends if they wish, but I suspect we might as well wait and table the order in council itself tomorrow. If my friends prefer, I can also table the NEB recommendation of last April.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I thank the minister for that. It would be quite agreeable if he tabled them all tomorrow, if they are available.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to this one. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) asked part of the question I was going to ask. I refer the minister to page 8 of the statement which he provided to me where he said:

> —the government has had before it information on a number of steps that have been taken in the United States to encourage and facilitate the commencement and expeditious completion of the project by late 1985.

Apart from the material tabled this evening by him, would the minister undertake to table any other information upon which the government made its decisions, in particular, any notes which might have been exchanged between the Government of Canada and the government of the United States that I understand are necessary, if any amendments are to be made to the international agreement signed by both countries which forms part of the legislation?

Alaska Gas Pipeline

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I will investigate whether there are any further documents than those to which I referred in my opening statement or to which we have referred tonight. I will let the hon. member know what the documents are, if they relate or if they are pertinent to the decision of cabinet. As far as I know, the only documents are those that have been tabled tonight and the orders in council to which we referred a few moments ago.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. I notice the President's letter of today refers to a letter written by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in March. I do not know whether that letter has ever been tabled in the House. If not, I wonder if the minister would see to it that that letter is tabled, because it may be that this half-hearted letter by the President simply rose to the level of the letter written by the Prime Minister. I would like to make that comparison. The minister has heaped hope and praise on the congressional resolution by the joint Houses. Does that resolution have the force of law?

An hon. Member: No, it does not.

Mr. Lalonde: It has the same force of law as any commitment made by this House of Commons or by this Parliament when it adopts a resolution, a motion, any action, statement of intention or statement of action. It is an act of Congress. As with any decision formally passed here has the authority of this Parliament, this is the Congress of the United States speaking unanimously.

Mr. Friesen: The resolution reads that it is the sense of Congress. Tonight the minister said that we must begin to build the American section in 1983 if it is to be completed by 1985. In the interim between now and 1983, there could be at least two elections in the United States changing the character of Congress. Is it not possible that the sense of Congress could change in the United States and that another resolution could be passed unanimously withdrawing from that commitment?

Mr. Lalonde: It is the same as saying that this Parliament could go back and reverse a formal resolution passed by the Senate and the House of Commons, and supported unanimously by every member of Parliament in both Houses, which affected directly the relation of Canada with another country. If we found ourselves in a situation where, after an election, the same parties were back as before, I do not believe the Parliament of Canada would do any such thing without hurting tremendously its reputation internationally as well as nationally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I do not think Parliament would do that.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have three very short questions for the minister. I am sure the government examined the cost of a western-eastern gas pipeline as compared to the cost of the northern-southern gas pipeline. I should like to know what the difference in cost is between building one to eastern Canada to supply the markets there from western Canada, as opposed to the cost of exporting our gas to the United States, as opposed to self-sufficiency in energy. What is the difference between the cost of those two pipelines?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I would only say that it is a rather strange question because at the present time we have a gas pipeline which goes as far as Montreal and will be extended as far as Quebec City hopefully next year.

An hon. Member: What about Halifax and Moncton?

Mr. Lalonde: It will be extended to the maritimes as soon as possible. That is the situation at the present time. The option or the alternative is not between pre-building the southern section of the Alaska gas pipeline and alternatively building a new pipeline across the country. I do not have that figure. If the hon. member is interested, I will try to obtain a figure for him. I do not think any particular study has been made by any of the pipeline companies or any other agency of which I know that would have tried to cost the building of a whole new pipeline across Canada. At the present time no such project exists. I could inquire of my officials and give the hon. member a ball park figure, but indeed it would have to be at best a guesstimate unless TransCanada PipeLines, for instance, has already made such an estimate. No doubt it would be several billions of dollars; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer. In fact I would like that information so that I can do a comparison myself. Would the minister please tell me how the announced pipeline this evening helps achieve energy self-sufficiency for Canadians from coast to coast, whether they be in the maritimes or in British Columbia?

Mr. Lalonde: It will happen indirectly, obviously not directly. Indirectly it will generate a very large cash flow to Canadian producers, producers of Canadian gas. That cash flow will allow them to expand their research and exploration for new resources and reserves. We will achieve the same thing as that which happened in the past, whether it was in the sixties or the seventies, when we were able to allow the sale of gas otherwise shut in. We provided the industry with a lot of cash with which it was able to explore further. It spent that money in trying to find more resources—more gas, more oil. If the member looks over the last 30 years, he will see that this has been the history of the development of oil and gas in the country. I have no reason to believe that it will not be the same thing following this decision tonight.

Mr. Anguish: I would like to ask the minister about two conditions. First, if that northern section of the pipeline is not built yet you say the Americans have an ironclad guarantee to use it at will; second, when our gas is depleted to a point where we are in an importing position and the Americans will not give us that gas from Alaska at a comparable rate, will the minister resign if he is still involved in public life at that time?

Mr. Waddell: Resign now.

Mr. Lalonde: On one hand my hon. friend says that the rest of the pipeline will not be completed. On the other hand, he is asking me to get Alaska gas in exchange out of a pipeline that does not exist. I think that party will have to make up its mind: it wants a pipeline without gas going through it, and it wants gas without having a pipeline to carry it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very clear that Canada desperately needs the economic activity which will be generated by the construction of the southern portion of the Alaskan pipeline. The minister indicated that jobs will be located right across Canada. What studies were done regarding the economic spin-offs in the provinces across Canada? Where will these jobs be located, and were any studies done?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is indicated that indeed there will be benefits for most regions in this country. First of all, in terms of direct benefits, and these can be easily identifiable because they are direct expenditures, it is estimated that British Columbia will see expenditures of $70 million; Alberta will see expenditures of $650 million; Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec expenditures of $360 million.

The Canadian manufacturing benefits—and there one cannot precisely identify them by regions, one has to assume that they are spread very broadly indeed—are estimated to be $750 million, and the Canadian manufacturing expenditures are expected to be in the range of $400 million.

Mr. Nielsen: All those were there last December.

Mr. Shields: I would like to ask the minister one final supplementary. Will he be requiring the contractors or the builders of the pipeline to award contracts for pipe, materials or whatever, on any basis in Canada other than the lowest bidder?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, first of all if I may come back to the previous question, I mentioned British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, but I must mention that the other provinces in the rest of Canada will also get $10 million estimated expenditures out of this pre-build.

As far as the question raised by the hon. member is concerned, as he knows I am not the minister responsible for the pipeline. I will inquire and give him the information. I have no reason to believe that the awarding of contracts is not done on any other basis than competition. These contracts are let out by private industry, namely Foothills, which is the company responsible for the building of this pipeline. I have never received any information to the effect that there was ever any discrimination in terms of awarding contracts for supplies or otherwise. I will inquire if there is any justification to be concerned about this. If there are causes of concern, I will certainly inform the hon. member.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief supplementary. I think that it is quite clear and I believe we all know that on occasion this is done where contracts are awarded on other than the low bid. That might not necessarily be bad, but I wonder if there would not be the possibility to examine the spread of contracts and maybe allow some of the contracts to reach farther into the maritimes and some other provinces. Which also need this economic benefit? As the minister has indicated, the maritimes will get $10 million compared to $360 million going to Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, and $750 million to manufacturing, and so on. I wonder, therefore, if the minister would perhaps look at that.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, it would only be with the greatest reluctance that we would want to go into this particular approach of almost allocating contracts for the private sector.

I would remind the hon. member, however, that in the east we have a large expansion in pipeline capacity with the authorization of the pipeline to Quebec City at the present time. I hope that we will be able to see the construction also of the pipeline to the maritimes before very long. The construction of the pipeline to Quebec City is quite clearly giving a competitive advantage to firms in the maritimes, in Quebec and the neighbouring area of Ontario which is in close proximity to the actual building site. I would expect from the building taking place in the east that there will be substantial benefits to the eastern areas.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have three questions, and I will try to be brief. The first question relates to the position of the government of the province of British Columbia, from which province I come. I must say, both as a British Columbian and a Canadian, this is a very sorry day in the history of our country in terms of the sell-out of our natural resources. I would be interested to hear from the minister what is the present position of the government of British Columbia with respect of the sell-out of our resources? Can the minister tell us what the benefits are for the people of British Columbia in this particular sell-out? But, most important, what position has the government of British Columbia taken?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report to the hon. member that the government of British Columbia has expressed reservations about the construction of this southern section of the gas pipeline. However, it has not been a reservation because it was, as he calls it, a sell-out of Canadian resources. It was a concern because the government of British Columbia would not be able to sell to the United States as much gas as it would like to sell, which is a very different story.

Mr. Pinard: Right on.

Mr. Lalonde: I might remind the hon. member that we have an NDP government in office in Saskatchewan and it is very happy to see sales of oil and gas to the United States when they are evaluated as surplus. I might also remind the hon. member that when the NDP was in office in British Columbia there were large gas sales from British Columbia. My hon. friend is asking me what is the position of the government of British Columbia. The government of B.C. has expressed reservations as to the effect of those sales upon sales from British Columbia into the United States.

I also raised this issue with the government of Alberta because it was a matter of concern to me. I can tell the hon. member that this is one aspect which we weighed very carefully in our discussions in cabinet on this very issue, whether or not there would be damage to the markets of British Columbia through the United States. We have been assured by the government of Alberta that they do not feel that this is the case.

When I met with my colleague, Mr. McLellan—last Monday we reviewed the situation again—he indicated to me that the government of Alberta and the government of British Columbia had agreed to set up a joint committee to examine the possible impact of the pre-build if it were to proceed, and that there was recognition by the government of Alberta that, if necessary, some steps would be taken to avoid damage to the exports from British Columbia to the United States. I indicated that as far as we in the federal government are concerned, we are ready to co-operate in whatever way possible to make sure that the province of British Columbia will not be prejudiced by this particular decision with regard to its exports to the United States.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, what we have here is a very clear statement, at least to the extent that it is possible for the minister to be clear on this subject, that the government of British Columbia is indeed opposed to the pre-build. I would point out, if the minister is bringing in history, that it was an NDP provincial government which made sure that the people of British Columbia received a reasonable return on our own natural gas and raised the price to a sensible level.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would bring to the hon. member's attention that under the rules he is permitted to ask questions. I suggest that he do so.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but the minister took some rather great liberties in his reply and I was merely attempting to take the same kind of liberties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Ask the question.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): My second question relates to the guarantees which we supposedly have for this important project. The minister has specified three guarantees. He has specified a congressional resolution, a statement of intention for the spending of 2 per cent of the total cost, and a letter from the President.

Did the minister consider that all three of these particular conditions were essential before he decided to recommend to cabinet the approval of this particular project? If not, which conditions were not essential? Finally, what avenue will there be to enforce any of these conditions should the government of the United States decide that they wish to change their mind?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has recognized that the NDP government of British Columbia encouraged the export of natural gas when it was in office.

With regard to the question by the hon. member, indeed the three factors were a major determinant in our decision. The hon. member refers to only 2 per cent of the cost, but that means $500 million. I have yet to see even large businesses who think they can throw to the wind $500 million and say that it does not matter; we are not obliged to proceed with anything. Why should they waste $500 million? It may not be much money to the NDP, but we believe that it is a lot of money and a large downpayment even for a project such as this.

We wanted a commitment from the American administration and also a commitment from the United States Congress, because we did not want a repetition of the situation in which we find ourselves with regard to the fisheries.

An hon. Member: We are in the same situation.

Mr. Lalonde: My hon. friend must study the situation wher he says that we are in the same situation, because he is completely wrong. We never received a commitment from the U.S. Congress concerning the fisheries treaty before we made an agreement with the United States in that regard. In this instance, we received a clear commitment from both the administration and Congress, and then $500 million from the industry. In our view, that is quite a commitment and quite good enough.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my final question relates to a corollary issue. I would point out that the minister has not answered my question about how these guarantees can be enforced, and I hope that the minister will do so. If the United States decides in the next two or three years that it is cheaper or, for any other reason, more advantageous to move Alaska gas rather than by pipeline, by tanker down the west coast of British Columbia, what can the government do to ensure that the pipeline will in fact be built? What enforceable guarantees do we have that the United States will not decide down the line that tankers are more advantageous?

Mr. Lalonde: The points raised by the hon. member in his previous question and in this question are related. The Government of Canada is not without defences and without means at its disposal. If it were to find at any time that both Congress and the administration, in addition to the private sector, intended to renege on their commitments, there are a number of—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I can see that my friend has never played poker before. I thought he was a great player, but I think he needs some practice.

Mr. Waddell: You threw away your aces.

Mr. Lalonde: I think that it would be silly and irresponsible at this time to assume that the Congress of the United States, and that the President of the United States, will not live up to their word. It would be completely irresponsible and it is not the type of assumption I am ready to make.

Mr. Waddell: Look at their words.

Mr. Lalonde: What I will say, however, is that if such a thing were to occur, it would probably be the greatest breach of faith committed by the United States on Canada in the last 200 years. I am not one to assume that the Congress and the presidency will not live up to their word.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the minister in his statement and in answers to some of the questions has mentioned the rich industrial spin-offs during the construction phase. However, he has not mentioned anything of the presumably equally rich tax windfall which will come to the federal treasury as a result of this project.

In light of this windfall tax benefit, and in the interests of energy self-sufficiency, particularly through substitution, I am wondering whether the government will be disposed more than it is now to assist, if asked, in the construction of a gas pipeline from, for example, the mainland to Vancouver Island or the extension and the conversion of the M and Q line into a Q and M line.

Mr. Lalonde: I am very happy to tell the hon. member that those issues are being considered at the present time. However, I am not in a position to give a definite answer at this stage, for the very good reason that we have not concluded our discussions concerning the sharing of revenues, particularly with the producing provinces.

I want to assure the hon. member that our purpose in trying to enlarge the share coming to the federal government is, indeed, aimed at centering those additional moneys which would be raised on energy initiatives. I can tell the hon. member that the two points which he has raised are two points which we have very much in mind.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I understand, or we are led to believe, that the letter received by the Minister of Energy was in response to a letter written by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the President of United States. The minister has tabled the letter from the President of the United States. Would he do the House the courtesy of tabling a copy of the letter which the Prime Minister wrote to the President of the United States?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I forgot to answer this point when it was raised previously by another hon. member. Indeed I will inquire. The letter may have already been made public. Even if it has been made public, I will inquire as to whether or not it can be released. I assumed they will. I will try and get it ready for tomorrow, and I will table it at the end of the question period if there are no particular problems with it.

• (2230)

Mr. McKnight: Has the minister given any consideration to double-piping or twinning this pipeline?

Mr. Lalonde: Not yet, Mr. Speaker. If I may, I will come back to a question raised by another hon. member concerning the possibility of building LNG tankers later as an alternative.

In 1977, the United States government carried out a study of this particular issue and came to the conclusion that it would cost at least 30 per cent more to transport natural gas by tanker than by pipeline. As my hon. friend knows, using tankers also implies continuing costs that tend to inflate very substantially, while a pipeline, once built, has only a comparatively small operating cost.

Mr. McKnight: Has the minister received any representation from the province of Saskatchewan, which imports natural gas from the province of Alberta, to generate hydroelectric power? Has the government of Saskatchewan made any representation on how this could affect their purchases of natural gas from Alberta?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Mr. Speaker. I have not seen any such representations. I will inquire from the minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline Agency, and if there have been such representations I will inform the hon. member. But to my knowledge no such representations have been made.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the minister. Also, I will inform the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) that Saskatchewan bought gas in Alberta many years ago and a Liberal premier sold it off. It might be smart for Ontario to buy surplus gas in Alberta right now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Benjamin: When a resolution is passed by the United States Congress or by the Parliament of Canada, unless and until the administration implements those resolutions they carry no force or weight, and unless and until the administration implements the resolutions of Congress we are relying only on their word. We have nothing in writing: we have no treaty or anything else.

My second question is, would the minister advise the House what the division is on the pre-build, let alone the whole line, of construction of pipe, since the federal government has put money into the expansion of a plant in Regina? My steelworkers telephoned me today telling me they would be just as interested in making pipe for a line to Halifax and Sydney and Vancouver Island as they would be to the United States. What is the proportion of steel for a pre-build, and what is the proportion if, by some accident, we get the whole build?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I have some difficulty in following the hon. member's two questions and I hope I will be able to answer them properly. On the first question, I would remind the hon. member that we have a treaty with the United States. He said we do not have a treaty, but we do have a treaty with the United States. Now we have the commitment from the President and we have a unanimous commitment from Congress, both houses, both parties in the United States. I think that is a very significant development. I will not go any further with that, because I think it would be repetitious.

Mr. Waddell: You cannot say that with a straight face.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the plant in Saskatchewan is concerned, the Liberal government was very happy indeed to help. I can only tell the hon. member that under the pre-build itself, Saskatchewan and Manitoba would be the beneficiaries of about $360 million. I think a significant part of this would go to the Ipsco plant in particular. If the total line is built, it will represent $1,520 million of expenditures in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

As far as the other part of the question is concerned, I am glad the workers of Ipsco will be happy to have work and good jobs in building this pipeline. I am sure, in spite of what the hon. member has said, that they will be happy to contribute also to the Vancouver Island pipeline and to the Quebec and maritimes pipeline. I do not see why the hon. member would want to refuse those workers the right to have jobs in building the pre-build also. These are not exclusive.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I guess all the steel workers in Regina want to know is, when will the Government of Canada have a policy, since the Americans have to come to us for their gas and for our gas: when is Canada going to stand on its feet and say to the Americans, "We will be glad to be a good neighbour. We will build a pipeline to carry your gas and our gas. But first we are going to provide our gas to Canadians and Canadian steel workers are going to make pipelines for that gas for Canadians."

When are you going to quit running around with your nose at the backside of Yankee traders, who are going to be—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Benjamin: They are going to betray you. I wonder if the minister has checked with Mr. Reagan, or if Mr. Carter can give him any assurance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) on a point of order.

Mr. Waddell: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. If you would, I would like you to outline the exact procedure with respect to what we are doing now. That is very important, because a member can ask a simple question while the minister can answer at some length. I understand that is the way the procedure works, and I should like Your Honour to confirm that. I do not want the House to think that what we are doing tonight is a substitute for a full debate on this issue.

Could Your Honour guide me on that and tell me that this is not a debate but is simply questions being put to the minister? If it is otherwise, then hon. members should be allowed to debate this very important issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I will quote the rule of the House, Standing Order 15(3), which reads as follows:

On Statements by ministers, as listed in section (2) of this Standing Order, a Minister of the Crown may make a short factual announcement or statement of government policy. A spokesman for each of the parties in opposition to the government may comment briefly thereon and members may be permitted to address questions thereon to the minister. Mr. Speaker shall limit the time for such proceedings as he deems fit.

The Chair has shown a certain latitude tonight and wishes to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that their privilege at this point extends to putting questions to the minister. I hope the questions will be short and to the point, and I presume the answers will be also.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that you have read that important rule. We are now moving into an extended period of time which I think is quite appropriate, given the importance of the subject.

Mr. Waddell: It is not a debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I think the discretion of the Chair has been well exercised, if I may say so. With respect to the period of time within which members may question the minister, I hope the minister would agree, and that members would agree, that with this matter now before the House, the Chair should know it has the support of the House if it allows this question period to continue for some considerable period of time. I think it is important that members of the House, regardless of the party to which they belong, have the right to an exhaustive question period on this important matter.

I see the minister nodding his head in agreement, and I would hope the House would agree that the Chair be supported if it exercises its discretion to allow the continuation of the question period for as long as there are questions on this issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is the intention of the Chair to recognize all those who are seeking to ask questions. However, the Chair has not yet engaged on a second round of questions. We are still on the first round of those who have not been recognized. The Chair has permitted supplementaries, and hopefully this is with the consent of the House, and hopefully they will be within some time limitation and some restraints.

● (2240)

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, after the intervention of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), I can understand the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) wanting to create a diversion. In the first part of his statement the hon. member stated the Liberal government policy perfectly well. Indeed, this is government policy and Liberal policy. We are not authorizing, and we are not going to authorize, any exports unless we are sure that Canadian needs are going to be met first and the needs of future Canadians are going to be protected. This is our policy.

Of course our policy is also to make sure that Canadians benefit first from the building of the Canadian sections of the Alaska gas pipeline. I think the announcement made tonight is very good evidence of our concern to ensure that all Canadians benefit from such a decision. As far as the latter part of the diatribe by the hon. member is concerned, I do not think it deserves an answer.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has permitted supplementaries by the hon. member for Regina West. At this stage the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Victoria.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that, according to the act, before this construction can begin the federal government must conclude agreements with Manitoba, Saskatchewan, the Yukon and British Columbia to permit the construction. I understand these agreements have been concluded with Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Yukon, but not with British Columbia. Can the minister tell us what is the stumbling block there? Does he have hope of concluding them soon, and what will he do if he cannot conclude them?

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member is right, Mr. Speaker, the agreement with British Columbia has not yet been concluded. There are still discussions concerning some of the benefits the government of British Columbia would like to have. In particular, it deals with the clause on non-discrimination that is provided for in the treaty regarding domestic tariffs for the Alaska gas pipeline. Up to this stage the government of British Columbia has not agreed to guarantee to the Canadian section of the Alaska gas pipeline the same treatment that is being provided for the intra-B.C. pipeline. This is where there are still discussions in some areas of disagreement. Discussions will have to continue.

I presume the government of British Columbia will eventually reach an agreement along the same lines as the other two provinces and the Yukon territory have already reached agreements. I think the agreements reached with the other provinces were fair. They were in conformity with our treaty with the United States. Again, I have no reason to believe that the government of B.C. will not want to co-operate in the construction of the whole pipeline since it is going to benefit all Canadians, including Canadians in B.C.

Mr. McKinnon: British Columbia is in a rather different position than Alberta in this, which I presume is well known to the minister. They are in danger of this going through and being priced out of their own market, due possibly to a difference in the royalties that are rather modest in Alberta.

Can the minister advise if that is the reason he is having difficulty concluding this agreement with British Columbia? If not, what is the real reason?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am not the minister in charge of those negotiations. Those negotiations are being carried on by the minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline and the Northern Pipeline Agency. I do not know that these are the reasons. I do not believe they are the reasons that have been invoked up until now, but I will inquire and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Victoria on a final supplementary.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I would like, if I might, to have two supplementaries. That would finish me for tonight.

I notice in the letter from the President to the Prime Minister he starts off by saying, "Since you last wrote to me in March". We have been under the impression, gathered quite a bit from the minister, that we had been putting great pressure on the United states to give us commitments and so on, yet we find out that we wrote to them three to four months ago, and it took three to four months to answer. Can I infer from this that the Prime Minister has not written to the President of the United States on this subject for some three to four months, and that it just lay fallow for that length of time?

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member would be quite wrong in his conclusion, Mr. Speaker. There have been numerous discussions at the administrative level. Senator Olson has participated in some of these, and I have participated in some. I spent more than seven hours in meetings in Venice discussing this matter with the American secretary of energy and his undersecretary. The Prime Minister raised the matter with the President when they met in Venice. Therefore this matter has been very much on the mind of the government and, I expect, on the mind of the American authorities because, as the hon. member knows, significant steps have been taken on the American side in the last few months.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, there may have been a lot of discussions, but there seems to be very little in the way of the written word as a result of those discussions. We noticed how meagre the paper was that was tabled tonight. To get to the letter, the minister said just a few moments ago that we have a commitment from the President of the United States. The letter is eight paragraphs long. It is rather heavy on commiseration rather than commitment. It gives opinions. There are lots of them. However, I find no commitment, particularly no financial commitment. Nowhere does it say "we will commit the financial resources of the United States to ensure this", or "we will back the loans necessary by the companies", or anything like that. If there is a financial commitment, and surely that is the commitment that is important, can the minister tell us what paragraph he thinks it is in?

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member has a rather limited view of what a government can do. It seems that the only thing he thinks a government can do is spend money. The government has a lot of means at its disposal. What was important to obtain from the American government was that firm commitment that they would see to it that the pipeline would be built. Whether they do it by financial commitment, legislation, or other means, that is for the American government to decide. What is important is that we have that commitment. I refer the hon. member to page 2 of the letter, where the President clearly says, and I quote:

> In view of this progress, I can assure you that the U.S. Government not only remains committed to the project; I am able to state with confidence that the U.S. Government now is satisfied that the entire Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System will be completed. The United States' energy requirements and the current unacceptable level of dependence on oil imports require that the project be completed without delay. Accordingly, I will take appropriate action directed at meeting the objective of completing the project by the end of 1985.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2250)

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister has placed a great deal of confidence in the assurances of the different levels of the United States government.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Manly: I would ask the minister whether or not he considers that the government of the United States has always lived up to its commitments and assurances. For example, has it kept its commitment to the Indian people with whom it made solemn treaties in order to obtain their resources?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is asking me to interpret a situation which concerns only the United States. I must tell him that we have to make a decision in this case based on the facts that we have before us and on the commitments we have obtained from the U.S. Congress, the President of the United States and the private sector concerned. I did point out that the commitments obtained from these three sectors are sufficient to convince us that the United States are truly committed to the construction of the whole Alaska pipeline, and I cannot see why my hon. friend raises doubts as to these commitments at this time.

[English]

Mr. Manly: It might help, Mr. Speaker, if the minister had a chance to talk to some American Indians about this. Since the pre-build route will pass through Indian reserves in Alberta and British Columbia, I would like to ask the minister whether or not there are provisions for affirmative action which will provide for Indian employment. If there are, what are they, and do they provide more than simply labouring jobs?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member raises a question which is surely of great interest and the government has already made known its policy to promote employment among minority groups through positive programs, Indians as well as women. As in the case of the tar sands, we have already let the interested parties know that when the Canadian government contributes or participates through Petro-Canada, we request that measures be taken to protect those groups.

As for the project itself, as the hon. member knows, I am not the minister responsible for the pipeline as such but I will refer the matter to my colleague, Senator Olson, and report to him later. As the hon. member is aware, Senator Olson hails from Alberta, knows the situation and this is a matter which is of great interest to him.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that I have been getting up and down and keeping in shape for the last 15 minutes, I shall ask three questions, with your permission, and make no comments before or after at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Since the surface rights procedures have not yet been approved by this House and likely will not be until this fall, and since the right-of-way buying will start almost immediately, what protection will be given to surface rights owners who might sign up prior to the passing of the bill we now have from the Senate?

Mr. Lalonde: The question raised by the hon. member for Bow River is one which has been raised before. The Senate has, indeed, passed the bill as I have indicated. My colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), has said he is giving thought to expediting consideration of this measure by the House. I shall inquire of my colleague, Senator Olson; I know Senator Olson had great interest in this measure himself, so I would presume that he will want to discuss this matter with Foothills and since this bill has passed, shall we say, half of Parliament, I would be inclined to think he would request Foothills to act as if the bill had been passed. But I will bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and I am sure he will give it full consideration.

Mr. Taylor: Since the decision made tonight will keep scores of small and medium-sized independent companies in business and will permit them to remain Canadian instead of being absorbed by American firms—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: —has there been any apparent opposition to this pre-build by any of the multinationals?

Mr. Lalonde: None that I know of, Mr. Speaker. Certainly I have received no personal representations. As a matter of fact, all the recommendations I have received from the producers, both small and large, have been to the effect that this particular decision was very much needed in the interests of the industry as well as in the interests of Canada.

Mr. Taylor: My third question has been partially answered, but I would ask this: will the Canadian content, in regard to equipment and materials, be 100 per cent or 90 per cent? Will definite steps be taken to make sure that Canadians have first right of refusal on all equipment?

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member will give me a few minutes I will check with officials of the energy board to see what exactly the provision is in this respect. I will provide the answer to him in a few minutes. I will try to get the information.

[Translation]

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated tonight that all of Canada will benefit from the construction of that pipeline. Could he then give us some examples of the benefits the provinces in eastern Canada could derive from that program?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that the province of Quebec, for example, will benefit substantially from the announcement that was made tonight. I have already indicated that Quebec and Ontario will share among themselves, simply from that first part of the project, $360 million. In addition, when the entire project is put in motion, Quebec and Ontario will benefit from an additional amount of $1.57 billion, for a total for those two provinces of $1.93 billion.

So these are expenditures made in Ontario and Quebec in relation to a project that is taking place mainly in Alberta and British Columbia—expenditures that could reach up to $2 billion. In terms of specific examples, I am told, for instance, that Quebec firms, particularly a firm in Contrecœur, has a substantial contract for the manufacturing of parts used in the operation of the pipeline, whether it be engines, compressors or all sorts of other instruments used both in the manufacture and the operation of the gas pipeline. I think this is indeed a very good example of what Canadian federalism is all about and that a project like this which, even if it is carried out only inside a province, or seems to be carried out far from people living in eastern Canada, well, thanks to the existence of the Canadian economic union and the Canadian tie, all those firms can participate in the benefits involved and workers in Quebec as well as in Alberta will be able to benefit substantially through the contracts their employers will be getting in connection with the construction of that gas pipeline. So this is not simply a matter of welders or technicians from Quebec, for example, or Acadia or northern Ontario going down to work on the construction of the pipeline in Alberta and British Columbia but also of workers remaining in Montreal, Contrecœur, Trois-Rivières, Sudbury or Moncton being able to get down here substantial benefits from the decision that was announced tonight.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, a large portion of this pre-build is going to run through my riding, and I oppose the project. I make that very clear, but I want to ask the minister whether there is any possibility that many of our residents who are not serviced by natural gas can have some of that natural gas for their use.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I will inquire again on this very specific matter raised by my hon. friend. I am surprised that at the same time, as he opposes the pipeline he asks that his residents benefit from it. I am afraid this is another example of a typical NDP position. They want to have their cake and eat it too. The hon. members of the NDP should make up their minds.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking as a true Canadian. I realize the benefits to all of Canada, and I know the people in my riding would also state this same kind of concern.

If this project is going to go ahead, what kind of protection will there be? I asked the minister over a month ago if he would hold hearings in the riding so that the concerns of the people could be heard. I asked for public hearings. I was told that the National Energy Board made those decisions, so I therefore ask the minister here and now what kind of compensation there will be if this project is to go ahead. There are people in the tourist industry who will be affected. There will be an influx of workers coming into communities. What kind of protection are they going to have?

An hon. Member: Do you know what you want?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I think the people of the hon. member's riding of Kootenay East-Revelstoke will benefit substantially from the construction of this pipeline, notwithstanding the hon. member's opposition. They will benefit whether they are in the service industry or in the tourist business. They will benefit from this. Workers will be coming from other areas, and they will stay there. There will be work there for weeks and months building this pipeline. This will create revenues for all kinds of stores, shops, restaurants, hotels, you name it. I can only tell the hon. member that his constituents will indeed benefit very substantially from this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I now have some information for the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). I am advised that Foothills has estimated that the Canadian content on the project will be at least 90 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: My hon. friend knows that there are provisions in the treaty ensuring that Canada will achieve economic benefits from this, and I am pleased to advise the House, including my hon. friend in the NDP, that to date, particularly in the pipe area, we have achieved figures of 100 per cent Canadian content.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Do you want 110 per cent?

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister that I have seen these projects, and I have seen the benefits. I am asking explicitly, since there is another TransCanada highway which goes a different direction, what kind of protection is there in this agreement for the communities alongside this highway which could be affected by the construction of this highway? Since there were no hearings, I ask the minister what kind of protection or guarantees these communities can have.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, as to the previous question raised by my hon. friend, I am pleased to advise him that the United States-Canada agreement provides for the drop-off of Alaska gas in Canada to serve remote communities, and its replacement by Alberta gas in the key pipeline farther south, so it will be a matter of deciding at the time, I suppose, whether the residents in my hon. friend's constituency come under this particular aspect. I must have misunderstood the hon. member's question. He talked about a highway. We are not building a highway. We are building a pipeline.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, although many hon. members have questioned supply factors with regard to our natural gas situation and others have questioned the security of the guarantees which are offered, I take it that the minister is giving us an absolute certainty that we have supply, and I take it he has given us an absolute guarantee that the guarantees we are getting are adequate, so I will not question that part of it.

However, it seems to me that what strikes at the hearts and minds of people in areas like Ontario is that even though we have a pipeline coming through Ontario, they do not have access to this gas. What strikes their minds and hearts is whether they will be able to have access to this gas and whether the capacity is there in the pipeline as it exists now, even as it travels through our province and into other areas. They are not so much concerned about whether we build a major pipeline from Montreal to Quebec, or even into the maritimes, but whether in fact we can deliver this gas and, if we do, whether the capacity will be there to serve the homes and industries across Ontario. Can the minister tell us what the flow rates are? Can he tell us whether the opportunity will be there? Can he tell us what price factors will be there? In other words, it is not what we are doing with the pre-build which is concerning many people; it is what we are not doing in other areas which might concern them.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, my friend is quite right in expressing the concern of people in areas not served at the present time about being served by Canadian natural gas. As the hon. member knows, this government has announced in the last couple of months a policy whereby we would want to reduce to 10 per cent the dependence on oil in the residential and commercial sectors. This would mean a substantial increase in the amount of gas and electricity used for residential, commercial and manufacturing purposes over the next decade. This would mean a substantial enlargement of accessibility to Canadian gas. In particular this will mean the construction of a gas pipeline in Quebec, and a trunk line in the maritimes also which will either bring gas from the maritimes west or western gas to the maritimes.

With regard to the particular point raised by my hon. friend, this is an area in which we are working with the provinces to get full endorsement and full support for our 10 per cent oil dependence in the commercial and residential sectors. That is our off-oil policy, and I am pleased to report that I have had, up to now, complete support from every provincial government I have talked to in this regard.

With regard to serving individual communities, if I am not mistaken this is a matter which comes under provincial boards, and this is why it is important to work closely with the provincial governments. Our responsibility is to make sure that the trunk lines are there and that the gas is there. I have inquired of National Energy Board officials this afternoon with regard to the very question raised by my hon. friend, and I am assured that we have supplies—foreseen supplies—which are not only adequate to meet fully the future needs of the Quebec and maritimes gas pipeline, but we also have ample supplies—and we expect to have ample supplies—to fulfil the needs of our off-oil policy and make sure that Canadians can have access to natural gas.

As far as individual residences and individual communities are concerned, this, I believe, is a matter which comes under provincial regulation.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, the question really pertains to price and the price that these communities and so forth might expect. I think that would have some direct relationship to how the federal government looks at the whole pricing situation for natural gas. Can the minister comment on that and on how this might be an opportunity for people who are not serviced now?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, we have had in operation a program for the pricing of natural gas, as my hon. friend knows. Gas is now priced at about 85 per cent of oil Btu equivalent. I do know what the new arrangement will be under the current discussions. But again my friend knows, I believe, that in each province the provincial regulatory authorities also have a role to play in terms of the pricing of gas.

I have been told, for instance, that in Ontario the provincial board has a policy which has a tendency to favour the residential consumer rather than the large users. They have a tendency to distribute the cost in a way which would tend to favour individual residential consumers of gas. I am not in a position to confirm or deny this, but this is a piece of information that I have obtained. If my friend wishes to refer to specific communities, he would have to refer to the situation in that particular province and obtain information from the provincial board.

Mr. Gurbin: The price of the natural gas as it goes into the pipeline is, I think, under federal jurisdiction. Can the minister comment on whether he expects it would be maintained at 85 per cent of the Btu equivalent, or whether he is looking at something different from that, or what is happening?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I answered that question a while ago when I said that at present the arrangement is that it is set at 85 per cent of oil Btu equivalent. We are now discussing with the producing provinces more especially with Alberta. We are considering different possibilities, but I am not yet in a position to indicate to the hon. member if the future policy will be exactly the same or different from the present one in the sense that there will perhaps be measures, various prices according to the circumstances. I am afraid we will have to wait a few weeks until our discussions are concluded.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. minister can tell the House whether, in his opinion, this decision concerning the Alaska pipeline construction will have an impact on the construction or the extension of the pipeline between Quebec and Montreal as concerns either the availability of materials, the question of financing or other construction delays. Could this affect or delay construction or could it even have favourable effects?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform my colleague, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel) that we do not believe that tonight's decision will have any unfavourable effect on the construction of the Quebec pipeline. On the contrary, the action we are taking will have the effect of phasing the construction of the Alaska pipeline over several years beginning immediately, and this will enable the steel companies and the pipeline material suppliers to schedule the production of steel and other products required for the pipeline operation over several years and prevent production hold-ups, which in general considerably increase the costs and sometimes even cause product shortages and can prevent the construction or the completion of other projects.

As for the construction of the Quebec pipeline, I have been informed recently that the Quebec government has asked TransCanada PipeLines, which is not the same company as the one building the Alberta pipeline, once again to change the proposed route for the pipeline in Quebec. I must say that this decision worries me and that I am afraid it might substantially delay the construction of the Quebec pipeline. I hope that I am wrong.

I also hope that the decision made by the Quebec government as concerns TransCanada PipeLines can be implemented very quickly, as we have already lost several very precious months because of the way the Quebec government has postponed essential decisions, and if this new decision delays even more the building of the pipeline, Quebeckers will be the ones to suffer. First of all, they will have to pay more for heating oil. They will be prevented form burning Canadian natural gas instead of oil and Quebec consumers are the ones who are and will be suffering from the way the Quebec government is delaying, exaggeratedly in my opinion, its decision in this matter.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask the minister a couple of questions. First, can he tell me what percentage of the natural gas that was approved for export to the United States in 1978 and 1979 was actually exported?

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member raises a very good question in the sense that at present the level of exports to the United States is well below the authorized level, so that when the hon. member talks about a large amount being exported he has to remember that these are authorized levels, they are not necessarily actual levels. I believe that at present, for instance in British Columbia, the percentage of exports is as low as 35 per cent of the authorized level. I might be wrong by a few percentage points, but it is in that area. So far as Alberta is concerned or so far as the average production is concerned, I think it is slightly above 50 per cent. I will inquire and give my friend the exact figure.

Mr. Nielsen: Fifty-eight per cent.

Mr. Lalonde: My knowledgeable friend from the Yukon says it is 58 per cent. In spite of his great expertise, I think I will inquire from my officials.

Mr. Cooper: Can the minister tell me if any of the reasons for this gas not being exported have to do with the price of the natural gas?

Mr. Lalonde: It is a combination of several factors. As the hon. member knows, we had an extremely mild winter last year which resulted in a level of consumption, both in Canada and in the United States, that was much lower than had been the case before.

Second, the United States has experienced a rather deep recession in the last year and a half, which is still continuing and which has resulted also in a lowering in the consumption of petroleum products generally, including natural gas.

Alaska Gas Pipeline

Third, there is obviously a particular problem in certain sections of the U.S., particularly the northwestern states where there is an oversupply of residual fuels being used for commercial and industrial purposes as a substitution for Canadian gas in particular. In effect, our gas at present sells for about $4.47 at the border. I am told that it is possible, in view of the situation with residual oil, to get the equivalent perhaps for about $4.07 or $4.10. So there is an advantage which we believe is temporary in favour of residual fuel in the northwest states of the United States. We are confident that this is a passing phenomenon and that with the increase in the cost of oil on the international market, and the expected resumption of activity in the U.S. economy, the demand for Canadian gas will soon pick up, particularly with an increase in the price of residual fuels.

Mr. Cooper: In light of the minister's answer, I wonder if he could tell me if, in the discussions with his colleagues today, there was mention of a possibility of a tax on the export of natural gas.

• (2320)

Mr. Lalonde: I apologize to the hon. member, but the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was in a great conversation with me and I did not hear his question. Would he ask his question again?

Mr. Cooper: Can the minister tell me if his colleagues discussed today the possibility of an export tax on natural gas?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I have always followed the policy of not only not revealing discussions in cabinet, but refusing to confirm or deny whether any question was discussed in cabinet. So I am afraid my hon. friend will have to look elsewhere for an answer.

To come back to his first question concerning the exact percentage of exports of natural gas, I do not have the exact figure tonight. I am told the average current level would be about 60 per cent. I am sorry I do not have exactly the same figure as the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: I was closer than you.

Mr. Lalonde: Maybe he was right; we will see.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of discussion about the economic impact on the western part of Canada. I should like to elicit from the minister what type of impact we will see in the Atlantic area. At the same time, may I inquire as to the status of the much talked about and proposed MEB, the Maritime Energy Board, as well as to the status and attitude of the various provinces within Atlantic Canada, particularly the province in which my constituency resides, New Brunswick. What is the attitude of Premier Hatfield, and the over-all economic impact of the minister's announcement?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, my information is to the effect that Atlantic Canada would benefit from this particular announcement, roughly to the extent of $10 million. With the construction of the whole line, it is estimated that an additional $200 million will go to Atlantic Canada, for a total of about $210 million for the line which will be constructed in Alberta, British Columbia and the Yukon. Certainly, that is not a negligible sum. As far as the second part of the question is concerned, I believe the hon. member was asking about the maritime pipeline.

Mr. Harquail: The Maritime Energy Board.

Mr. Lalonde: The Maritime Energy Corporation?

Mr. Harquail: Yes.

Mr. Lalonde: I am afraid I have to report that at the present time this particular corporation is somewhat in limbo. There appear to be very conflicting views among the various maritime governments. I hope we will be able to get the situation back on the rails. In particular, I hope the provincial governments concerned will agree to sit down and work out an arrangement which would be beneficial to the entire maritimes. I am sorry to say that we have been unable to get this corporation going at the present time.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. For the benefit of the House and the residents of New Brunswick, does the minister anticipate, from the information he has to date, any difficulties or problems in terms of the eastern pipeline going from Quebec into New Brunswick and Atlantic Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that the construction of a Montreal-Maritimes pipeline was the preferred and privileged option of the government. The National Energy Board has recommended the construction of the pipeline up to Quebec City first of all. We have authorized the implementation of this recommendation of the board, and that will imply the construction of the first phase of the maritime pipeline. Hopefully, the environmental concerns that were raised, the questions regarding the environmental studies and certain reservations expressed in particular by New Brunswick, all this will be quickly settled. The NEB also indicated that it was interested in knowing more about the reserves found off Sable Island. I must add that the government is following the situation very closely and we want to make sure that the pipeline gets under way as quickly as possible. In the meantime, as I have indicated, the decision we have announced tonight and the eventual construction of the Alaska pipeline will represent benefits of almost $200 million for the Atlantic provinces.

Very shortly then when we build the pipeline to Quebec City and obviously also to the maritimes, I am sure that businesses and workers in the Atlantic provinces will derive substantial benefits from this decision, as well as all consumers in the maritimes.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, could the minister confirm that the pipeline he announced tonight will have the capacity to transport natural gas through the United States to eastern Canada, in case the TransCanada system proves inadequate to meet the requirements of eastern Canada consumers?

Mr. Lalonde: I am advised that the pre-build now under construction could occasionally be used to supplement our requirements. This is a situation which, I hope, will not occur, but should it occur, there will be ways apparently, following certain adjustments and detours, to supplement the needs of Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 11.25 p.m.—

[English]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am advised that in answer to the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) I referred to reservations by the government of Nova Scotia. I am sorry; I meant reservations by the government of New Brunswick.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 11.28 p.m., the House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

3. Convention on the International Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1972

Done at London, October 20, 1972
Canada's Instrument of Accession deposited March 7, 1975, accompanied by the following declaration:

"1. The Government of Canada considers that the provisions of Rule 10, 'Traffic Separation Schemes', do not provide the compulsory use of the adopted schemes. The Government of Canada considers that the compulsory routing of ships is necessary to avoid collisions between ships and the resulting damage to the marine environment.

2. The Government of Canada notes that there are no exceptions to Rule 10(b), (c), and (h) for vessels engaged in fishing with nets, lines, trawls, trolling lines or other apparatus, or for vessels engaged in special operations such as survey, cable, buoy, pipeline or salvage operations, and that the exceptions in Rule 10(e) are not broad enough to adequately provide for vessels engaged in special operations. The Government of Canada considers that the practical application of Rule 10 would be complicated without realistic exceptions for fishing vessels and for vessels engaged in special operations.

3. The Government of Canada therefore does not consider that it is prohibited from providing for the compulsory use of traffic separation schemes or providing for such exceptions to Rule 10(b), (c), (e) and (h)."

Entered into force July 15, 1977
Entered into force for Canada July 15, 1977

"the Government of Canada accedes to the Convention providing a Uniform Law on the Form of an International Will, done at Washington, D.C., on October 26, 1973, subject to the following declaration:

1. The Government of Canada declares that pursuant to Article XIV of the Convention, the Convention shall extend only to the provinces of Manitoba and Newfoundland.

2. The Government of Canada further declares that it will submit, at any time after accession, other declarations, in conformity with Article XIV of the Convention, stating expressly the additional provinces to which the Convention shall extend, when such provinces have enacted the necessary implementing legislation".

APPENDIX "B"

DECLARATION OF SOLIDARITY OF CANADIAN WOMEN PARLIAMENTARIANS TO RECOGNIZE EQUAL RIGHTS FOR INDIAN WOMEN

WHEREAS the situation of Indian women is so deplorable and because they are so blatantly discriminated against under the INDIAN ACT we, the federal women Members of Parliament of all three political parties, have joined together, and with Indian women, to request that Parliament urge to finalize immediately the negotiations with all Indian organizations and with the Indian Bands throughout Canada to amend the INDIAN ACT to grant Indian women and their children their full status and rights in Canada.

WHEREAS this is the first time in history that women Members of Parliament of all political parties have taken a united stand on an issue that affects all women, indeed all Canadians.

WHEREAS Canada leads most other countries in human rights and in its treatment of minorities, and provisions of article 12(1)(b) of the INDIAN ACT are detrimental to our image all over the world:

1. We, all women parliamentarians therefore request that the Parliament of Canada apply a moratorium on the application of article 12(1)(b) as it affects Indian women and their children with the approval of the Indian Bands until the Act is revised.
2. All women in Parliament, regardless of their party, are committee to redress this discriminatory situation and are urging both Parliament and the Indian Bands to treat their sisters as equals and be ready to amend the Indian Act next fall.

ANNEX

RE: Office Consolidation INDIAN ACT R.S., c. I-6, c. 10 (2nd Supp.) 1974-75-76, c. 48, 1978

APPLICATION OF ACT

Application of Act

4. (1) A reference in this Act to an Indian does not include any person of the race of aborigines commonly referred to as Eskimos.

Act may be declared inapplicable

(2) The Governor in Council may by proclamation declare that this Act or any portion thereof, except sections 37 to 41, shall not apply to

(a) any Indians or any group or band of Indians, or

(b) any reserve or any surrendered lands or any part thereof, and may by proclamation revoke any such declaration.

Certains sections inapplicable to Indians living off reserves

(3) Sections 114 to 123 and, unless the Minister otherwise orders, sections 42 to 52 do not apply to or in respect of any Indian who does not ordinarily reside on a reserve or on lands belonging to Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province, R.S., c. 149, s. 4; 1956, c. 40, s. 1.

Persons not entitled to be registered

12. (1) The following persons are not entitled to be registered, namely,

(a) a person who

(i) has received or has been allotted halfbreed lands or money scrip,

(ii) is a descendant of a person described in subparagraph (i),

(iii) is enfranchised, or

(iv) is a person born of a marriage entered into after the 4th day of September 1951 and has attained the age of twenty-one years, whose mother and whose father's mother are not persons described in paragraph 11(1)(a), (b) or (d) or entitled to be registered by virtue of paragraph 11(1)(e), unless, being a woman, that person is the wife or widow of a person described in section 11, and

(b) a woman who married a person who is not an Indian, unless that woman is subsequently the wife or widow of a person described in section 11.

Protest re illegitimate child

(2) The addition to a Band List of the name of an illegitimate child described in paragraph 11(1)(e) may be protested at any time within twelve months after the addition, and if upon the protest it is decided that the father of the child was not an Indian, the child is not entitled to be registered under that paragraph.

Certificate

(3) The Minister may issue to any Indian to whom this Act ceases to apply, a certficate to that effect.

Exception

(4) Subparagraphs (1)(a)(i) and (ii) do not apply to a person who

(a) pursuant to this Act is registered as an Indian on the 13th day of August 1958, or (b) is a descendant of a person described in paragraph (a) of this subsection.

Idem

(5) Subsection (2) applies only to persons born after the 13th day of August 1956. R.S., c. 149, s. 12; 1956, c. 40, ss. 3, 4; 1958, c. 19, s. 1. cvc

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 18, 1980

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

GRAIN—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that foreign feed grains are entering the prairie region, and that many farm experts believe supplies of wheat and feed grains are entering the system due to low prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That this House direct the minister to instruct immediately the Canadian Wheat Board to raise initial prices to bring on stocks in this and next year's crop year to meet our domestic and export needs.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ARCTIC CENTENARY

CONGRATULATIONS TO PEOPLE OF NORTHERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This year, 1980, is the centenary of the transfer of the Arctic Islands to Canada by Great Britain.

As the member of Parliament whose riding includes Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, the birthplace of Confederation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That this House congratulate the people of the Arctic on their centenary and affirm its commitment to the Canadian north as a vital part of our country's territory.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXPRESSION OF THANKS TO PAGES FOR OUTSTANDING SERVICE TO MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 for which I ask the unanimous consent of this House.

Inasmuch as it appears that this House may rise today, and noting that the parliamentary pages will be leaving the House of Commons in September after a year of service in this chamber, I move, seconded by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner):

That this House thank the pages for their outstanding service to the members; that it is our hope that some of them will return at a future date as members of Parliament; that they all receive copies of Hansard for the balance of this session of Parliament; and that a copy of today's Hansard, autographed by Madam Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister, the right hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, be presented to each page.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—LOSS OF JOBS IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Canadian auto industry has, on the government's own admission, received less than its fair share under the existing U.S.-Canada auto pact in new technology, design, small cars and investment generally, and whereas this unfairness has caused the loss of tens of thousands of jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

S.O. 43

That this government stands condemned, among other things, for its abject failure to know when to lose them, when to choose them, when to walk away and when to run, and in particular for its unilateral, unconditional sell-out of our natural resources without regard to Canada's bargaining position in, among many other vital areas, the North American auto industry.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

GASIFICATION OF COAL—STUDY BY NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, as natural gas is now being marketed for export at prices exceeding $5 per million Btu of energy, a price at which coal gasification is economically possible, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), a motion under Standing Order 43 as follows:

That the government refer to the National Energy Board a request from this House for study and consideration of the possible inclusion of the selective gasification of Canada's vast coal reserves as back-up to our enormous natural gas reserves.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FIGHT AGAINST INFLATION—EXCISE TAX ON CANADIAN WINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing importance.

Given the announcement this morning that double-digit inflation has hit the consumers of Canada for the first time since a former Liberal government imposed wage and price controls in 1975, after saying they could never do so, given that a substantial portion of this increase flows directly from the excise taxes introduced by the present Minister of Finance on April 21 last, and given the fact that much of this stems from the imposition of the excise tax on Canadian wines, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That this government begin its fight against inflation by removing the excise tax imposed on Canadian wines as contained within the mini-budget of the Minister of Finance introduced last April 21.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN POLLUTION—CANADA-U.S. AGREEMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the United States is responsible for the majority portion of acid rain which affects Canada, and is currently planning a massive expansion of coal-based facilities without adequate pollution control equipment, and in view of the American refusal to enter into meaningful negotiations or agreements with Canada on this crucial health, environment and economic question, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House record its disgust with the Prime Minister and his supine cabinet for their continuing and ongoing sell-out of Canada to the United States on every major issue, including acid rain; and, further, that this House records the shame of a Liberal policy which promotes the sale of clean, non-polluting Canadian energy to the U.S. when they are daily responding with an attitude and policies that pollute and destroy the Canadian environment and health.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR RELIEF FOR PEOPLE OF NORTHERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my motion is also under Standing Order 43 and it ties in with the motion presented by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan).

Having regard to the fact that the government has given recognition to the severe financial hardships which are suffered by people who live in northern and isolated areas of our country, and is therefore maintaining a very elaborate system through which employees of the federal government are compensated through northern living and isolation allowances, and having regard to the fact that the government has recently made the necessary changes to the Income Tax Act to provide for these allowances to be earned free of taxes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the Minister of Finance give serious consideration, in the course of preparing himself for a budget, to the establishment of a more permanent and universal system which would afford all taxpayers who live remote from the mainstream of life in Canada, which flows in a narrow corridor along the U.S. border, treatment under the Income Tax Act which would be to a degree more equitable and fair and in accordance with their ability to pay.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—REQUEST FOR TAX-FREE STUDENT GRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I have a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. While thanking the Minister of National Revenue—I am pleased he is here to accept my congratulations—for his recent efforts concerning the taxation of northern benefits, it is necessary to point out that within the last few days Revenue Canada officials have insisted that certain NWT government grants to students attending university in the south, which previously were not taxed, are now to be taxed.

• (1115)

In view of the evident unfairness of a system which does not tax vacation travel allowances, but taxes allowances for travel to educational institutions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That NWT student grants be included as tax exempt items under the isolated posts' benefits and allowances remission order.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CPI—CALL FOR BUDGET OR ECONOMIC STATEMENT—INCOME TAX INDEXING

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It relates to today's consumer price figures, which show a 1.1 per cent increase from last year and show, most alarmingly, a year-over-year inflation rate that is over 10 per cent for the first time since November, 1975.

The government has indicated already that it will not bring down a budget. The House may well adjourn some time this weekend. I would ask the Prime Minister, even if his government will not bring down a budget, will he give us a commitment now to having published or made by the Minister of Finance or himself a clear and detailed economic statement which will spell out the economic policies this government intends to follow? Could we have an undertaking to have that before the end of the summer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will be glad to discuss the suggestion of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition with the Minister of Finance.

Miss MacDonald: If you can find him.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I would have preferred a firmer commitment from the head of the government on a question of policy which obviously is so important to a nation now facing ravaging rates of inflation. But let me ask the Prime Minister another question relating to the benefit his government expects to take from inflation and relating to the proposal to end indexing elaborated on by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance in a speech the other day in Toronto.

Recognizing that inflation is back to double-digits and that the Government of Canada could reap windfall profits from an inflation that is damaging the lives and hopes of Canadians if they end indexing, will the Prime Minister, as this House prepares to rise, finally give us a commitment that the Government of Canada will not profiteer on inflation and will abandon immediately its proposal to end indexing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, that is a direct return to the question we have answered many times.

Mr. Stevens: Not well, though.

Mr. Trudeau: Until the budget is brought down we are not prepared to reject any way of fulfilling our duty in that budget, and that includes looking at all forms of taxation.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what the Prime Minister is suggesting to the House and the people of Canada today is that the government, which forced an election by defeating a budget that was the first attempt in recent years, in recent memory, to deal directly with major economic problems, intended not only to take no action in the first months the House sat, but intends to forecast no action and to create uncertainty among investors, individuals and, particularly, low income Canadians who may well be drastically affected by any proposal to end indexing.

May I ask the Prime Minister to stop dodging and face up to his responsibility as the leader of a government which must send clear economic signals to the rest of the community, and give us a commitment that we will have answers immediately—this summer, before the end of August—on the policy of indexing; that we will have answers on the economic direction of the government; that we will have answers on the priority the Government of Canada gives to dealing with inflation, and the means—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Clark: —by which it intends to bring Canada's double-digit inflation down?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, on the evil of double-digit inflation, which we both regret, I can only remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that his own budget last December predicted double-digit inflation for this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1120)

Mr. Trudeau: When he says that is the budget we combated, indeed we were against the budget which was not only predicting 10 per cent inflation—which we have reached—but was predicting 10 per cent inflation and announcing an 18-cent excise tax on all Canadians for all fuel they consumed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: No.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): False.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Get something right.

Mr. Trudeau: It was 18 cents on a gallon of gasoline, Madam Speaker.

Miss MacDonald: Not like Lalonde.

Mr. Trudeau: It was the equivalent on the farmer, the fisherman and all those who consume diesel oil. We have exactly the inflation that the opposition budgeted for; but, as a difference, we are not socking it to the consumer on fuel.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: As a second important difference, since the Leader of the Opposition asked for our priorities, we have had this House adopt a $35 a month increase for the people who need it most, and that is in line with our commitment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the fundamental difference was that our budget did not simply project rates of inflation: our budget proposed measures to bring those rates down.

When is this government of economic drift and economic carelessness going to indicate and spell out a policy that will bring inflation down in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, let us get the facts straight. The opposition party, when it formed the government, predicted 10 per cent, double-digit inflation for this year, and that is what we have. As to what we will do to bring it down in the years to come, I have just indicated in my answer that, first of all, we have ensured relief for those who needed it most—the aged; second, before the end of this year the Leader of the Opposition and this House will have a budget by this government which will do better to bring inflation down than his budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS WILL NOT BE INTRODUCED

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister forgets, of course, that the inflation rate does not take into account the oil price increases that are coming in Canada this year, while our forecast did.

The last time the Prime Minister was in power and inflation exceeded 10 per cent, he threw up his hands and introduced wage and price controls as his solution. We had them for three years. Now we are back at a rate of over 10 per cent inflation. Will the Prime Minister give this House an ironclad guarantee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: —that he is not going to throw up his hands in defeat and bring in wage and price controls? Will he give us an ironclad guarantee, like his old friend here, "iron pants", the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

An hon. Member: Better iron pants than mukluks.

Mr. Crosbie: —that he is not going to bring in wage and price controls, which proved to be so ineffective the last time he did so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is not quite fair to say that we just threw up our hands and did nothing and brought in wage and price controls. I remind the honourable blockhead from St. John's West—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —that in the summer of 1974 the ten premiers met together and, seeing that they were unable to control inflation at the provincial level—something which constitutionally they have the power to do—they begged the federal government to take some drastic action.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Some of the new members do not remember this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1125)

Mr. Trudeau: We went through a whole year of trying to negotiate guidelines with the various economic decision-makers in the country. We held national conferences, and so on, and we are not able to get voluntary restraint. Following that, during next summer—in August, 1975—the premiers met again and said, "Don't just throw up your hands; do something." So we convened here in Ottawa, in October, and said, "For two years in a row you have been begging us to do something to strangle inflation and—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Wrestle it to the ground.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, wrestle it to the ground first, and then strangle it. We said that under the constitution, prices and wages can be controlled by the federal government only in cases of emergency, by invoking the emergency powers. They said, like the hon. member, "Don't just stand there; go ahead and do it." So we brought in wage and price controls. The provinces have not yet begged us to step into their jurisdiction and impose controls on prices, contracts and wages, all of which are within their jurisdiction.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, we will have to get Ripley's "Believe It Or Not", to write the Prime Minister's history. I have been called names by far greater men than the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: Name them.

Mr. Crosbie: Joey.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: From a blockhead to a pointyhead, let me ask a supplementary question. The Prime Minister said in January—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: The Prime Minister said on January 12 that a Liberal government would reduce the deficit, "but not at the expense of jobs, growth and the attack on inflation". The government has not reduced the deficit; it has gone up by $4 billion. Unemployment is worse, and it is growing. There is no growth in the economy; in fact, there is decline. Inflation is worsening.

When will the Prime Minister deliver on his campaign promises; or will they go the same way as old ironclad's promises went last December 6? When is he going to start to deliver, because everything he said then has been contradicted—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think that the hon. member is getting argumentative.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, so I could know what standard of abuse is permissible with the hon. member, I would like to know what names he was called by these other people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: "Mr. Honesty."

Mr. Clark: The same names Claude Ryan has called you.

Mr. Trudeau: In so far as the statistics which the hon. member has just pointed out are concerned, I can understand why he is familiar with them because they are the very statistics which he announced in his budget. This is what he was budgeting for. As a difference, we have since then brought down the bank rate very considerably.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—GUARANTEES ON FINANCING—EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is busy over there studying his notes.

Mr. Nielsen: Old ironclad.

Mr. Broadbent: The government has provided us with many pieces of paper on the question of the pipeline, but instead of ironclad guarantees on financing we have the promise of a 2 per cent feasibility study. Instead of legal contracts with the private interests involved we have a U.S. Congress motion of good intent. Finally, last night we were informed that President Carter had written to the Prime Minister urging us to export Canadian gas to the United States.

Considering that the minister earlier said that an agreement on the whole line had to be "signed, sealed and delivered" in advance, would he now confirm that the only thing which has been "signed, sealed and delivered" is the export of Canadian gas to the United States?

• (1130)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member, who likes to refer to the 2 per cent figure, that the 2 per cent is $500 million of cash that is committed to be spent. I understand that may not be much for the NDP—

Mr. Broadbent: On a study.

Mr. Lalonde: —but it is a lot of money for any private entrepreneur and for a lot of people in this country and in the United States.

What we have signed, sealed and delivered is a clear commitment by the President of the United States and by the Congress. Both houses of Congress unanimously adopted that they are going to see to it that the Alaska gas pipeline is going to be completed by the end of 1985. These are current commitments.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it is obvious that the minister does not know an awful lot about agreements that have existed in the past, but he does know that what the President has written is an expression of good intent, and nothing more.

Madam Speaker, I should like to go to the Prime Minister with this question, if I could get his attention. The Prime Minister knows that we do not believe the cabinet has authority to change a pipeline that was intended to export American gas to American markets into a pipeline that will export Canadian gas into American markets. We also agree with this point on policy grounds.

Considering the fundamental importance of this $20 billion, plus, energy project to the future of Canada, does the Prime Minister not think that such a major matter requires the government, in advance of any action, to submit a resolution to Parliament for approval, during which time all members in all parties would be able to express their views and their votes on this fundamentally important question?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we have not changed the nature of the pipeline. It was always understood the pipeline would carry some Canadian gas, which it will be doing, so there is no change in the nature of the pipeline.

In so far as debating the question is concerned, I understand the New Democratic Party has been doing that for several days in the House. It did it yesterday, and probably will do it again today, so that is sufficient debate.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that the asking of questions and the receiving of answers is no substitute for debate followed by a vote by the representatives of the people of Canada of all parties.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister, because of the action that we are contemplating, which is very serious indeed in terms of delaying a recess that many members of Parliament, I think, have deserved, if he is telling us that the government will not submit this major decision to Parliament in advance of a recess, with a resolution so that we would have an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the decision was announced yesterday. There is a day of debate today. But I would be happy to make arrangements through the House leaders that there be a vote at the end of the day. The NDP would be able to express its opinion, if that is what it wants. They can amend the adjournment motion, if they wish, and we will accept an amendment. I am sure the House would give consent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Oh, they do not want that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: A motion on the pipeline.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. Leader of the Opposition wants a debate and he wants a vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: The NDP; Broadbent.

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry. We will accept an amendment on the pipeline and we can have a vote at the end of the day.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Paproski: Not the Leader of the Opposition; the Leader of the NDP.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF COMMERCE, PHILIP M. KLUTZNICK

Madam Speaker: May I draw to the attention of the House the presence in our gallery today of United States Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Philip M. Klutznick.

IMMIGRATION

MINISTERIAL PERMIT ISSUED TO CALAMUSA FAMILY—INVESTIGATION BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and again pertains to the matter of the ministerial permit issued to the Calamusa family.

Will the minister please confirm that the investigation conducted by his regional office in this case was one of the most extraordinarily extensive and thorough investigations undertaken by that regional office? Will he also please confirm that allowing Calamusa to remain in Canada was contrary to the recommendation of the trial judge at the criminal hearing, to the findings of the special inquiry that dealt with the immigration and deportation matter, to the order of the Immigration Appeal Board and, most significantly, to the recommendation of his department at the regional level which was apprised of all of the facts, including the compassionate grounds?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I think it is fair to say that any investigation the department does is always very thorough and complete.

I would simply say to the hon. member, as I said to him last week, that in this case, as in all cases, we take recommendations and assessments from a variety of sources. It is the responsibility of the minister to make the final decision based on all the evidence, and not a regional office.

Mr. Speyer: Madam Speaker, I should like the minister to please confirm that he acted contrary to the recommendation of the regional department that conducted this investigation.

More significantly, in assessing whether to exercise discretion in favour of Mr. and Mrs. Calamusa, will the minister please confirm that he was aware, at the time of making his decision, of the fact that his department had recommended that certain charges of giving false or misleading evidence be laid against certain witnesses who testified at the special inquiry of Mrs. Calamusa, and that the RCMP is presently conducting investigations with respect to that matter?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, in this particular case the judgment was not made on the basis of one series of recommendations. I can assure the hon. member that all the proper authorities were consulted—

An hon. Member: Were you aware?

Mr. Axworthy: —and all the evidence was weighed, and it was all given, including the RCMP which is always in on these cases, and on the basis of that conclusion the grounds for compassion still stand.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

INSPECTION POLICY OF FINAL USE OF CANADIAN SALES OF URANIUM

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As I am sure he knows, after several months of very intensive negotiations an agreement is now ready to be signed by the Government of Canada and the western European nations who are users of Canada's uranium which will water down, or limit Canada's existing policies of inspection and consent to the final use of that uranium. Obviously, this deeply involves the whole matter of reprocessing; it involves plutonium and it involves the risk of nuclear proliferation.

Will the government be making any announcement, or will it provide an opportunity for debate before any such agreement is signed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I imagine the hon. member is referring to the INFCE study which was set up in London a couple of years ago and which recommends certain new types of safeguards. It has not been studied yet in cabinet.

I do know that we have current agreements with those to whom we export our uranium, which are valid to the end of September. I am not aware of what actions are planned, but I will inquire. I would think the House would certainly be given an opportunity to express an opinion on it.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

POLICY RESPECTING CREDIT INSURANCE PROGRAM

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It deals with the apparent changes of intent and policy to the program of credit insurance, which was intended originally to broaden the sources of capital available to medium and intermediate-sized businesses.

Can the minister tell the House why his department is now encouraging the chartered banks to enter this area of financial assistance to industry, and that with this encouragement of banks into the field he will not be discouraging the development of independent credit insurance companies and will not be restricting competition in this area? With this move is he now expanding the policy of guarantees to include the reinsurance of chartered banks' loan portfolios to medium-sized companies?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the regulations remain the same as they were when they were first adopted in early February. We are not ceasing to encourage the creation of independent, small credit reinsurance companies. We welcome them coming forward so that they can qualify and the program can get under way to assist the term lending of resources of pension funds in the interests of Canadian small business.

• (1140)

Mr. Huntington: Madam Speaker, further to the regulations of which the minister speaks, does the minister agree with his departmental advisers when they insist that provincially-controlled pension and savings plans be excluded as lenders, and that the majority of commercial enterprises in western Canada and the maritimes be excluded as borrowers under this plan; because most of the industries in these regions do not fall within the narrow definitions set by his advisers in manufacturing and processing?

In addition, the minister well knows, being familiar with the expanse of Canada, that most of the industries outside of Quebec and Ontario are tertiary in nature.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I want to see this program operate to give special attention to the needs of small business in the regions which my hon. friend has mentioned. That will be my direction to my officials.

Oral Questions

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—GAS SWAPS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. When the minister was in opposition last year, he was a very local proponent for Canadian consumers of gas. He said in this House on December 6:

—there must be an arrangement for swaps in this agreement with the United States so that down the line, if Canada were to need natural gas, we would be in a position to obtain natural gas from the Alaska gas pipeline—

Those were his words. My question to him today is this: what did he mean by gas swaps, and why has he abandoned the idea?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, indeed I stated that the previous government should have at least attempted to negotiate this particular issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: That is not what you said.

Mr. Lalonde: I refer hon. members to Hansard for December 6 and they can read what I said.

Mr. Clark: I have read it, and your nose reaches across the House.

Mr. Crosbie: Watch out, Pinocchio.

Mr. Lalonde: I indicated at that time that we should try and get an arrangement for swaps. As I said last night, I have had frequent meetings with my colleague in the United States and we have discussed this question at great length. Unfortunately, I have not been able to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement in this respect.

Mr. Dick: An ironclad flip-flop.

Mr. Lalonde: It was established to my satisfaction and to the satisfaction of my officials that it was not administratively possible or administratively wise in the current circumstances to arrive at such an arrangement.

Mr. Waddell: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Am I to understand, and is the House to understand, that the minister came back empty-handed from these negotiations? One must ask why did he not wait for a year before playing his cards; in other words, giving this pre-build away? He could have waited for a year.

My supplementary question is this: would the minister agree with me that without these swaps, now that he has approved an export pipeline of Canadian gas to American markets, that in future the Canadian consumer is going to have to pay more for Canadian gas, if he can get it, or pay for expensive Canadian gas from the Arctic or for Alaskan gas, if he can get that?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would have to disagree seriously with the interpretation of my hon. friend. First of all, this is the southern part of the Alaska gas pipeline. It is not an export gas pipeline by any means. It has only been approved as an integral part of the Alaska gas pipeline.

Mr. Dick: That is not a guarantee.

Mr. Lalonde: Second, as far as the question he has raised, at the present time we are exporting only gas that is estimated to be surplus to Canadian needs over an extended period of time. Canada is going to get a good price for that gas that it is selling at the present time. It will help Canadian industry to explore further and discover new resources, and make our future even safer in terms of the supply of natural gas.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

McDONALD COMMISSION—DONATION BY COMMISSIONER TO LIBERAL PARTY

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that he has personally satisfied himself that there is nothing in the background, either from a legal or a moral point of view, which would make it unsuitable for any of his ministers to continue serving as a member of his cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is with respect to conflict of interest in the policy of the government, and the Prime Minister particularly. It was revealed recently that Mr. Guy Gilbert, one of the three commissioners serving on the McDonald commission looking into the affairs of the RCMP, made a financial donation to the Liberal party, and he stated that the Liberal party was the party that he wanted to support.

The McDonald commission is a quasijudicial investigation set up to examine, among other things, the role of the Liberal government with respect to alleged wrongdoing by the RCMP. In fact, the former solicitor general, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has expressed great concern with respect to such partisan statements tending to compromise the work of that commission. Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he, in fact, feels it appropriate for Mr. Gilbert to continue as a commissioner on this inquiry which has been lengthy and expensive?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I take it that what the hon. member is objecting to is that Mr. Gilbert was candid and said what he was and what he did. There is nothing wrong in what he did. I think the hon. member is objecting to the fact that he said he was a Liberal. Being a Liberal is not a crime in this country.

An hon. Member: It should be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It is morally offensive.

Mr. Crosbie: When are you going to change the Criminal Code?

Mr. Trudeau: It does not disqualify one from any office. You can even be a Liberal and be a judge. The difference is that you cannot vote if you are a judge, but you can be a judge and be a Liberal. In this particular case, he is not a judge; he is a practising lawyer, a very honourable one and a very competent one. He made the mistake, in the eyes of the hon. member, to say he was a Liberal. I see nothing wrong with that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DREE GRANTS TO QUEBEC COMPANY—LOSS OF JOBS IN OTTAWA VALLEY

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In view of the fact that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has said on many occasions that it will not finance companies to close down in one part of Canada to create jobs in another part of Canada, and that in 1971 A. Belanger Limitée, of Montmagny, Quebec, made an application—which was subsequently withdrawn in 1972—but closed down its subsidiary in Carleton Place, some 35 miles from here, costing some 220 jobs there, and in view of the fact that the federal government, with the provincial government, gave almost $2 million to A. Belanger Limitée in 1974-1975, and now that that company is owned by Admiral Corporation it is taking a further 270 jobs from Ottawa, is it the minister's view that losing 500 jobs in the Ottawa Valley through DREE grants to one company, namely, Belanger, making home appliances in Montmagny, is fair and reasonable for the Ottawa Valley?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the case which the hon. member has just mentioned is certainly one of the saddest cases that I have had before me. I would like to remind the hon. member of the situation. The announcement of the closing in Ottawa was made before that case came before us. Whether or not we gave a grant to the Montmagny location was really not at all in relationship with the closure which was announced about a year before.

Several departments in Ottawa have looked into this matter. I can say to the hon. member that I have looked closely at the distribution of the employees of that Canadian company. In two years from now, hon. members will see that the number of employees in the province of Ontario, which I think today is in the order of 1,200, will increase a little. But there is a problem of rationalization going on in that company.

Mr. Dick: It seems strange that having received quite a large amount in 1974-75 from DREE, the company should conveniently announce a closing in Ottawa and then make an application. It seems there are things working in tandem here.

Will the minister state—whether or not Admiral has more plants in Niagara Falls and Toronto is of no interest to the Ottawa Valley—that he will not approve a grant going to an Admiral subsidiary in Montmagny at this time to expand facilities down there, in view of the fact that it will replace existing jobs right here? That is what is going to happen.

Mr. De Bané: The problem, Madam Speaker, is that the plant in Ottawa is located at a particular site in Ottawa, and that for 30 years the municipal authorities have refused to issue a permit to expand. The company is in a location where it cannot expand.

The decision to close it was taken a long time ago, and the application to my department to open a plant in Montmagny was made a long time after that decision to close here was taken. There is really no relationship between the two. I would be happy to send the hon. member a thorough analysis of the whole question.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNTS OF RCMP, ARMED FORCES AND PUBLIC SERVICE—ACCOUNTING PROCEDURES

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the criticisms which have been directed by the Auditor General to government accounting procedures in relation to the superannuation accounts of the RCMP, the Canadian Armed Forces and the public service, and in recognition of the fact that the government is crediting interest to these accounts at a pitiful rate of only 4 per cent per annum, thereby enjoying a low-interest loan of about $9 billion financed by our public employees to cover a major portion of federal government debt, will the President of the Treasury Board agree to commission a full audit by the Auditor General of the superannuation accounts of Canada, and will he also put a stop to this blatant misuse by the government of the pension contributions made by our public employees?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, we are, of course, always interested in improving our standards of accountability. I have discussed a number of these issues with the Auditor General. It happens I am having lunch with him today, so I will raise the point the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. Siddon: A related question, again to the President of the Treasury Board. What are the minister's plans with respect to revision of the indexing provisions of the superannuation accounts? Does the Liberal government intend to reintroduce legislation this session along the lines of its earlier proposal, which would have the effect of restricting or eliminating the present indexing provisions accorded to public employees?

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member is dealing with a very complex issue, one which was studied extensively, as he knows, before the committee last year. Bill C-12 is the bill to which he is referring. It is a matter of great concern to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has indicated that a national pensions' conference will be held to discuss a number of aspects dealing with pension plans, portability and, of course, indexing.

I understand that studies on indexation are being conducted by a number of private groups, including the Conference Board in Canada. The hon. member can rest assured that this is a matter of priority concern with us and that we shall be bringing forward a paper for discussion or further proposals for discussion, I hope at a relatively early date.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—ASSURANCES OF UNITED STATES—GARRISON DIVERSION

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In making its decision to approve the pre-build of the Alaska gas pipeline, the government is relying heavily on assurances by the executive branch of the United States government.

Would the minister comment on the extent to which such assurances may prove reliable, in the light of the fact that less than three weeks ago President Carter approved further funding for the Garrison diversion unit after having assured Canada that the U.S. would live up to its obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the government is not relying exclusively on undertakings by the executive branch. We also have the motion which was passed by the U.S. Congress. It is precisely because of our experience with the United States in other instances that we felt we should get this assurance. I might say, with particular respect to Garrison, that we continue to rely on the assurance of the U.S. government that they will respect the Boundary Waters Treaty.

Mr. Sargeant: My supplementary is also directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last month, when he visited Washington, the Minister of Employment and Immigration received personal assurances from his American counterparts that the Garrison appropriation would not be approved. He accepted those assurances in good faith; yet the appropriation was made.

In light of the inability of the executive branch of the U.S. government to ensure that its commitments are fulfilled by the U.S. Congress, can the Secretary of State tell the House what action he intends to take to protect Manitoba from the eventual completion of the Garrison project?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the assurances which were received by my colleague were in respect to the way in which the money to be voted by Congress was to be spent. We do have an assurance from the executive that the money which has been voted will not be spent on works which in any way affect the province of Manitoba or the transfer of waters from one basin to another.

RAILWAYS

CROWSNEST PASS RATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask him whether he or his department are contemplating any significant moves or changes which, hopefully, would be of greater benefit to western Canadian grain production, agriculture and railways in terms of the Crowsnest Pass rate? If there are any changes forthcoming, will these changes be announced or will they be implemented or proceeded with some time between now and when Parliament comes back in the first part of October?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have spent a lot of time in contemplation on that subject in recent days and I have done a lot of consultation, also, as the hon. member is aware. I have drawn my own conclusions. I am due to present them to my colleagues in the course of a couple of weeks and will be guided by the consensus which will develop there.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF OIL SANDS—INVESTMENT THEREIN

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): My question is for the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker. It has been estimated that the approval of the pre-build portion of the Alaska pipeline is worth between $4 billion and $5 billion, resulting in a 1 per cent hike in the gross national product.

Will the Prime Minister explore with Mr. Lougheed in the upcoming negotiations the removal of the oil sands and heavy oil plant development from the pricing agreement so that $12 billion of funds which are ready to be invested in heavy oil and tar sands can go ahead immediately, thus securing the energy supply for Canada, creating 40,000 permanent jobs and probably increasing the GNP by between 2 per cent and 3 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We on this side of the House share the hon. member's interest in seeing Canada as a whole, and Alberta in particular, profiting from the development of the tar sands and, of course, in the case of the oil sands, heavy oil, this applies also to Saskatchewan. I am sure I shall be discussing this matter with Premier Lougheed; it will be a very substantial part of our discussions.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ALLOCATION OF DREE GRANTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for DREE and is a follow-up to the question which was asked by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton.

Is the minister aware that there are a great many other industries in provinces which are not favoured by DREE, communities which are suffering the same disaster with industries going to more attractive parts of the country where the DREE program applies? When one province receives 43 per cent of all DREE grants there is a strong inducement for industries to leave one province to go to the province where they can qualify for a DREE grant. I find this throughout central Ontario with industries employing up to probably 200 or 300 people.

• (1200)

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, my philosophy is essentially that we should try to build on the potential of each region. I, personally, do not think that we can play one region against the other.

If the hon. member is interested, I would be very agreeable to giving him all of the different figures for every region. He thinks his is not receiving enough. I am very pleased to say to the hon. member that I discussed this particular riding with several Ontario ministers of the provincial government to see to what extent both levels of government, and particularly through my department, can do something for his riding. However, I do not think we should criticize what we are doing in every region, because I think that would be quite counterproductive.

I could give examples. Just to give one, recently the province of Quebec asked me for a grant to build an industry in the poorest region of the province of Quebec, the Magdalen Islands. There is 60 per cent unemployment there. I said no because it would hurt two industries in the province of Ontario.

FISHERIES

RATIFICATION OF CANADA-U.S. EAST COAST TREATY

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As he is aware, and as the entire House is probably aware, there will be an interparliamentary delegation going to Washington next Wednesday to discuss the east coast fisheries treaty. This House approved that treaty over one year ago, and it is still waiting for ratification by the U.S. senate foreign relations committee.

In view of the minister's seemingly wholehearted approval of the sell-out of energy yesterday, I would like to ask the minister today, as he is sending that delegation to Washington practically naked, whether he would give some assurance to this House and the fishermen of Canada that he is not prepared to sell out the fisheries as he was prepared to sell out energy yesterday.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I thought when the hon. member's question began that it was a show of support and solidarity of all parties in the House on a very important and fundamental issue to the fishermen of this country.

Obviously, the hon. member chose to use one of the very overused cliches used by some of his friends on the west coast. Whenever negotiations take place, and whenever both sides arrive at an agreement, the hon. member's friends on the west coast always shout "sell-out". I am sorry to say so, but if we are going to negotiate boundary agreements and fisheries agreements, obviously there is going to be a level of grumbling on both sides, which probably means that there is a reasonable agreement.

Mr. Miller: Madam Speaker, I think there is just cause for calling "sell-out" in Canada when we look at the fisheries treaties. We on the west coast are getting no progress from the U.S. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake, indicated problems with the Garrison diversion. Acid rain has been a problem in Canada.

I would like to ask the minister whether at any stage he will indicate to his government that we should not be selling out our resources, and that we should be linking some of these fisheries resources with energy and those other things upon which the United States is dependent.

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member's approach to these issues is. I am a little worried, because I would not like to see the fisheries in the balance against some other regional interest in this country. If the hon. member is advocating that we should take this philosophy, I hope he explains that to his fishermen when he loses the next round. Thank goodness he will not, because he will not be in the government.

If the hon. member attended the briefing which was given to all members of the fisheries committee, he will have heard that the hope for agreement on the west coast salmon interception problem is greater than it has been for a number of years. This is not just from my officials; it is from all representatives—except one—of the industry in British Columbia.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF MR. ARTHUR STANLEY SILVERMAN AS ADMINISTRATOR

Madam Speaker: Hon. members will recall that in April, 1979, my predecessor, after consultation with the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services, invited the Auditor General to undertake a thorough review of the House of Commons administration. You will also recall that in October, 1979, the results of the preliminary investigation made by the Auditor General on the administration of the House of Commons were delivered to Mr. Jerome with a number of key recommendations under the form of an interim report. My predecessor immediately responded to that recommendation and accepted the proposal of the Auditor General to appoint Mr. Rhéal Chatelain, senior deputy Auditor General, as acting administrator of the House of Commons. Mr. Chatelain took up his duties here at the end of November, 1979.

[English]

The dissolution of the House of Commons delayed the early consideration of the Auditor General's interim report, but I have now had an opportunity to discuss his principal recommendations with the commissioners of internal economy and with members of the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services. I thank them for their assistance to me in this very important and complex matter.

I want to say to the House that, after giving very careful consideration to the various aspects of the administrative structure of the House of Commons, I have concluded that the Speaker and the House must be supported by a professional administrative staff to provide the services and systems necessary. Therefore, I have taken the necessary steps to create the position of administrator, whose authority will derive from the Speaker, and after careful consideration of the qualifications and experience of a number of candidates I have appointed Mr. Arthur Stanley Silverman to that position. Mr. Silverman is a certified general accountant with 15 years' experience in private industry and in government. He comes to us well qualified and very highly recommended, and I am sure that hon. members will give him every assistance as he assumes the important responsibilities of his new office.

TRIBUTE TO MR. RHÉAL CHATELAIN

Madam Speaker: On your behalf also, I publicly thank Mr. Rhéal Chatelain who has enabled us to benefit from his vast administrative experience in that temporary period and who, thanks to his sound expertise, has given us his unique assistance in developing administrative structures which hopefully will help us take up the challenge to make the House of Commons an institution which will more adequately serve the Canadian nation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—EDITING OF OFFICIAL REPORT—DISCREPANCY WITH "JOURNALS"—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: On April 28 the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) asked for leave and offered a motion to the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The question was put from the chair. The clerks at the table pointed out to the Speaker that the motion was not correct as to form. The clerks at the table exercised their editorial judgment and edited the motion accordingly. The hon. member was made aware of the changes and agreed with them.

Two days later the hon. member came back to the table to state that certain words in the motion were only meant for his introduction and should not have been included in his motion. On examining the situation the Clerk of the House decided that the hon. member was correct and, accordingly, a corrigendum was printed in Votes and Proceedings. Through an administrative error Hansard was not informed.

Hon. members move many motions under Standing Order 43, some of which are not correct as to form. Many of those motions are adopted and, if they are to be printed separately from their preamble, would make little sense to the reader and have to be changed as to form to make them complete.

I hope that this clears the matter for all hon. members, and I thank the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) for his interest in ensuring that our administrative practices relating to this procedure are of the highest possible standards.

TRIBUTE TO RETIRING "HANSARD" REPORTER

Madam Speaker: I beg also to inform hon. members that Mr. Charles Fisher, the senior Hansard reporter, will be terminating his service to the House of Commons on the day we adjourn for the summer recess.

Mr. Charles Fisher joined the Hansard staff in 1957. His talents are numerous and his reporting skill and dedication to Hansard immeasurable. I am sure all hon. members will join me in expressing best wishes to a faithful servant of the House of Commons.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT—USE OF ORDER IN COUNCIL AUTHORITY

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, the matter of privilege which I wish to raise arises out of this morning's question period, in particular the answer which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave to the leader of this party, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent). I should like to say that I think this point of privilege touches one of the most important issues in the operation of Parliament, namely, the relationship between the executive and Parliament. This relationship shows up most prominently in the instances where the government uses its order in council power.

What we have before us at the present time is an example of the use of that power by the government under the Northern Pipeline Act in a way which some of us think is questionable. Let me say immediately that I recognize there is a debatable point, but the difficulty is that if the government has used an order in council authority which does not exist and goes ahead with the construction of the pre-build of the northern pipeline, it will soon be the case that it will be too late for Parliament to exercise its authority.

I recognize, Your Honour, that all regulations and orders passed by the government are referred in due course to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and I assume, therefore, that this order in council will eventually get into the hands of that committee. But if the House were to adjourn soon, there is no telling when that consideration might be given. In other words, the construction of the line could be undertaken before anybody has had the opportunity to consider the question as to whether or not it is legal.

I remind Your Honour that there have been occasions when orders in council passed by the government, which the government claimed were legal, proved to be otherwise. I have in mind, in particular, an order in council passed by the Diefenbaker government in 1962 having to do with the increasing of import duties and certain other taxes. I will not take the time to tell the House the story of that incident, but the matter was taken to court and, as a result of its being taken to court, the Liberal government which followed a year later found it necessary to introduce a statute to legalize what had been done by the Diefenbaker government under an order in council.

I am prepared to admit that the question of whether it was legal or illegal never was settled; the Liberal government took no chance on the courts deciding against the order in council because, if that had happened, the amounts of money to be paid back would have been tremendous. But the fact that the government of that day did act as it did suggests that it certainly had doubts about the legality of that order in council.

I say that this situation confronts us now. I know the arguments that are made both ways. We contend that the Northern Pipeline Act provides—and the definition is very clear—for the building of one pipeline from Alaska across Canada into the lower 48 states. We contend that the building of only a portion of that line is not consistent with the provisions of the act. In fact, we contend that what was intended to be a transportation medium for American gas to move from Alaska to the rest of the United States has been turned into an export pipeline for the purpose of exporting Canadian gas to the United States.

The government's argument, on the other hand, is that it has authority under section 20(4) of the act to amend the terms of condition 12 in schedule III. I do not agree but I am prepared to admit that there are arguments on both sides. But my point of privilege, Madam Speaker, is this, that unless something is done now, it can be too late. Perhaps down the road somewhere the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will find that the order in council exceeded the authority set out in the act or that there should be court action about it, and by that time, of course, the construction could be under way and it would be a very costly proposition to alter it or change it at that time.

I feel therefore, Madam Speaker, that the time to get this matter settled is now, before the pipeline is started rather than afterward. I shall indicate what I suggest. I suggest that the matter should be referred to a standing committee of the House. If you find, either today or on Monday, that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I would be prepared to move such a motion. The usual motion when one raises a point of privilege is to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, but because this order in council would eventually go to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, I think it might be appropriate for the motion to read that it be referred forthwith to that committee so that it can investigate it right away.

As I say, Madam Speaker, this touches on a pretty important matter in our parliamentary relations. There is no doubt about our position and that we have views about the pre-build; I do not deny that for a moment. But I am speaking now as one who is concerned about how government and Parliament operate and I just do not buy the idea of government arguing by assertion, saying that it has the right to do under section 20(4) of the Northern Pipeline Act what it has done. I just do not buy the argument that the government has the right to say that a bill which provided for a transportation link between Alaska and the lower 48 states can now be turned into authority to build a southern Alberta pipeline for the export of Canadian gas to the United States.

I submit, Your Honour, that Parliament has the right to have this legal question at least reviewed by some body responsible to us, and I hope that you will give the matter serious consideration.

The Prime Minister suggested today to the leader of this party that he would accept an amendment which we might move to the adjournment motion. I would remind the Prime Minister that you, Your Honour, are the one to decide on whether an amendment is acceptable, I can also tell him and I can tell you that since that suggestion was made I have tried to draft one; I have one ready for the hon. member for Oshawa when he speaks later. I can see procedural problems about it, but in no case can we draft an amendment to a motion to adjourn the House for a recess in such a way that it gives the government the authority to act by order in council with respect to a matter that is spelled out so clearly in a statute of Parliament.

I hope that this amendment which I have drafted will be accepted and we can have a debate on it and vote on it at some time, Monday, Tuesday or whenever we get around to it. But in the meantime it seems to me the basic question of the right of the executive to say to itself that it can do this under the terms of the act must be reviewed.

• (1220)

I go back to an incident which I hope will not annoy my Conservative friends because I am referring to something that happened in their time; it is just the one that comes to my mind. I recall so well how, on the floor of this House in 1962, we challenged the then prime minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, to get a court consideration of the matter. He just stood up and said, with all the power of assertion the late right honourable gentleman had, that it was in order, that the government had the authority to use two statutes—one was the Customs Tariff and the other was the Financial Administration Act—to raise duties considerably on the one hand and then forgive them and put them back a little on the other. In fact, however, changing the rates of duty cannot be done by a government unless it has the authority of Parliament.

I am making the point that this sort of thing has been done. Just because the prime minister, whether it was Mr. Diefenbaker or the present one, stood up and said, "What we are doing is within order in council powers", does not make it such.

When the Hon. John Turner was minister of justice, the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments was set up. It is a very important committee. The government argued then that the power of regulation or the power to do things by order in council had to be put within certain limits. One of the limits he proposed, which supposedly would protect the rights of Parliament under this, was this standing joint committee to which all orders and regulations would stand referred. That committee has been a joint committee of both Houses. It has had opposition persons, at least from our side, in the chair of the committee. It has done some awfully good work, and I would be quite happy to accept the judgment of that joint committee on this. But there is not much point in getting that judgment some time after October 15, which is the date that it is proposed we come back.

I present this matter to Madam Speaker as a very serious question of privilege. I do not deny my bias and the bias of my party in so far as the policy is concerned, but I ask Your Honour to join with me in looking beyond that to the importance of an action by the government which, in my view, transcends its authority to act by order in council under a statute. One of the basic principles around here is just that—yes, governments can pass orders in council but only if they are given that authority.

I well remember back in the days of World War II that we used to be astounded by the things the government could pass by order in council. It was able to do so because of the War Measures Act under which it could do anything. I remember we came down here in November, 1944, for a special week's session to deal with the conscription crisis. At that point the pay of members of Parliament was only $4,000 a year, and we had had our $4,000. Most of the members who had come for that week in November were finding it pretty difficult to get enough dollars together on which to live, but the government solved the problem by using the War Measures Act to pass an order in council giving us $25 a day for seven days. As I say, the War Measures Act was all pervasive; the government could do anything under it. But once that is no longer there, no order in council can be passed by the government unless there is authority for it in a statute.

Now, the Prime Minister said that the government have the authority under section 20(4) of the Northern Pipeline Act. We question that. Their argument may prevail over ours if it gets before a proper court, but I deny the right of the government simply to stand up and argue by assertion that they have the right and therefore Parliament just has to take it.

Therefore, I raise this matter as a serious question of privilege. If Your Honour finds either now or after you have reflected on it that I have a prima facie case, I would be pleased to move that the matter be referred to whichever committee Your Honour advises, either to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has couched this as a question of privilege. I do not know whether it is a question of privilege in the sense that Your Honour has defined it, but I think whether or not it is a question of privilege is academic at this point.

The hon. member has really said that he takes the view that orders in council or other instruments which have been issued, promulgated, passed or whatever by the government, are passed without authority in the statute. It is a matter of elementary parliamentary law and elementary law that there must be power in the statute before such orders can be passed.

The minister has not yet tabled the documents respecting other matters which he undertook to do today. But if that is the issue in terms of the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, then I think whether or not it is a question of privilege the issue regarding the power to pass that order in council can be settled, and I respectfully suggest should be settled, at least in the parliamentary sense.

Of course, the place for the settlement of that issue is in the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments; I think that would be the appropriate one. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to possibly two committees, but I think that is the appropriate committee. It is important that the issue be settled, at least in so far as we can settle it here in Parliament from the points of view of the government on the one hand, and members of Parliament on the other, respecting the relationship of the executive to Parliament and, of course, respecting the producers and users of the facility which is the subject of the argument and was the subject of the statement last night by the minister.

Our hope is to facilitate the early settlement of that point in so far as Parliament may be able to settle it. From our party's point of view, we would be prepared to consent to a reference now of that matter to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, that that reference take place, that the committee convene quickly next week whether or not Parliament is sitting, and that the issue which has been placed squarely by the member go to committee so that in a parliamentary sense it can be settled and dealt with.

In my judgment and in my respectful submission, that does not take away any other rights that are there. Let me be clear about that. It does not take away the right of a citizen to go to court. Whether that citizen is a member of Parliament or otherwise, he has that right. But at least it would settle that issue.

If we could agree upon that today, then I think the business of the House could proceed and at least there would be some certainty put on the question of the legality or illegality of what the government has done. I am not passing any judgment on that because I have not seen the documents; they are to be tabled later on today, according to the undertaking of the minister. At least it would settle the question that has been put squarely and was the subject of a considerable amount of debate last night.

I just want to make it clear that we would be prepared to consent to that kind of arrangement and to negotiate that kind of an arrangement if that were the case, because I think it is important that it be settled.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, with all due respect to the experience of the hon. member who rose on what he called a question of privilege, I must unfortunately differ from him with regard to the substance of his intervention. Basically he claims that the order approved by the governor in council should be subject to examination by this Parliament, or a committee of the House, before being applied; that is to say, he would like the order in council authorizing the construction of the pre-build, as an integral part of the whole pipeline, to be studied by Parliament—there is a standing committee of the House—before construction starts.

I must say, Madam Speaker, that it would be contrary not only to the letter but to the spirit of the law, as well as contrary to the opinion requested and obtained from the law officers of the Crown, for us to proceed in that fashion. My colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), indicated that, as far as his party is concerned, he sees no objection to the order in council and supporting documents being examined by the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments as soon as possible, even next week if need be.

Personally, I do not see why that committee could not meet today, or early next week, to study the order in council of the government. Still, I would hate to see that study delay the start of the pre-build construction. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, very pertinently, I must say, indicated that the Canadian people, whether it be companies or individuals, have other recourses, which the government does not deny them, and that if anyone should claim that the government has acted illegally, the matter could in various ways be referred to the courts. An injunction could be requested to prevent the start of operations if that upsets the NDP too much.

Be that as it may, there are ways and means of having recourse to the law when people doubt the legality of an order in council, or a government decision or policy. But resorting to a question of privilege because the government has applied section 20(4) of Bill C-25 is splitting hairs, not in four but in eight, 16 or even 32. Basically there is no substance to the question of privilege brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Madam Speaker, I deem it advisable, for the record, to quote a very brief excerpt from the law under which the government has acted: section 20(4) of the act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency stipulates as follows, and I quote:

> The board or the designated officer may rescind, amend or add to the terms and conditions set out in schedule III or deemed to be set out therein but no rescission of or amendment to such a term or condition or addition of a term or condition is effective without the approval of the governor in council.

Madam Speaker, what NDP members and especially their House leader are referring to is an amendment to section 12 of schedule III, something covered by section 20(4) of the act. It cannot be any clearer that the government had the authority through an order in council to do what it did. This time, Madam Speaker, we are not dealing with the legislation of a foreign parliament, a foreign country, or the government of another land. This is legislation of the Canadian Parliament. Hon. members of the House are those who at a given time had to examine it, clause by clause, and when they reached clause 20(4), they realized that in a democratic fashion, following their election by the people, they were giving through a majority mandate to the government the power to do essentially what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is now reproaching it with doing. He is going against the will of Parliament, of a previous parliament, when he questions the right of the government or cabinet to act as it did through an order in council.

Madam Speaker, it is therefore obvious that there is absolutely no substance to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In my opinion, this is undoubtedly a ploy to air the New Democratic Party's views or its disapproval of the government's policy in this case, but they ought not to use the House's time to pretend that there is in fact substance for a question of privilege and force hon. members to debate a question as to whether, after adopting such an explicit legislation giving the governor in council unequivocal powers, they can take the time of the House to argue that we have now given the governor in council authorization but we wish to go further and have this legislation studied once again in committee.

This is more or less the nature of the request made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I say that it is an abuse of procedures, a traditional means which dates back to the war of 1914 or the last war to which he referred earlier. But this is 1980 and we wish to administer laws in an efficient manner, we have lots of work to do and there is absolutely no legitimate basis for his request.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, even if I endorse the excellent proposal made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton to ask the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments to meet as soon as possible in the next days or in the next few weeks, to which we do not object because it would allow members from both sides of the House to make an in-depth study of the order in council, to review our legislative texts, to see to what extent the government application of this Parliament's previously adopted act is carried out democratically, even though I am not opposed to a referral to the appropriate committee, I want to make it clear that in the name of the government I am formally opposed to any reference which might in any way delay the construction of the portion of the pipeline which must be an integral part of the whole project before the end of 1985.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, in concluding, this is what we on this side of the House are submitting: the question is very simple, very clear and what we have done is to respect the legislation adopted by this Parliament. There is absolutely no basis to the question of privilege and I understand that members of the New Democratic Party will have ample time to discuss the motion which will be moved soon to adjourn the House and to express their opinions, just as they have done since the beginning of this week.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like some clarification on the government's attitude. We agree that a study should not delay the implementation of a decision such as the one which was announced last night by the Government of Canada. But the government House leader knows that if there is to be a reference to a committee he is the one who had to make it. I think one thing that all parties recognize is that such reference is desirable.

I agree, as I have said and I repeat, that we do not wish to delay the implementation of the decision announced last night, but I think it is essential that all members of the House, through committee, take part in a study on the validity of government actions. I have not heard the government House leader say whether or not he is prepared to make such reference to the committee, to recommend such a reference. I have heard no such commitment and I think it would be useful if the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) made such a commitment. If he does, he can be assured of the Progressive Conservatives' acceptance and agreement.

In my opinion, it would be quite worth while to have the House leaders of all three parties get together and draft some terms of reference that would be acceptable to all. We in our party are prepared to discuss the terms of reference later today. The President of the Privy Council might indicate today, now, whether he would be willing to recommend such a reference to the committee.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I think that earlier I made myself clear enough. Some time this afternoon, before we close this first part of the session, hopefully before four o'clock, I shall be very pleased to have a more thorough discussion with the House leaders and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), if they so wish, so that we might try to agree on a reference and have the order in council, which in any case will eventually come under the consideration of the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, examined sooner than it would be under the normal conditions we all know, without, as the Leader of the Opposition said, causing any delay in the building of the pipeline. So I shall be pleased to work in co-operation with the House leaders during the day to try to reach an agreement in that regard.

[English]

Madam Speaker: I would not like this question of privilege to degenerate into a long debate. I have heard many arguments and I will entertain one more. After that, I will give my decision to the House as to what I intend to do.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I was amazed at the remarks of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) for two reasons. Firstly, it occurred to me that if it is against the spirit of Parliament to refer this matter to the committee, why do we have the committee? Is that not what the committee is for, to examine these matters?

Secondly, and more fundamentally, I would draw to the minister's attention a speech during the debate when the Northern Pipeline Act was passed. We not only have in the House one flip-flop, but now there are two flip-flops. If the minister will examine his speeches, he will see that he comes out quite squarely for the concept of having guarantees that the whole line be built.

Furthermore, the President of the Privy Council comes out along with his predecessor, the Minister of Finance (Mr.

MacEachen), who had this to say in Hansard for April 4, 1978, at page 4120:

From the very beginning I undertook in the House to ensure that Parliament was brought in at every stage—

Indeed, the government did that. I researched the matter extensively over the last couple of weeks. I looked at all the speeches then and at all the debates in the pipeline committee. I talked to some of the participants, in particular to the Hon. T. C. Douglas who was then a member of this House. I am told by Mr. Douglas that the government then rejected the concept of a pre-build. The concept was brought up and rejected and the act was passed as the Northern Pipeline Act. That was all in the spirit of the act, and hon. members recognize that.

The minister stood up and said that we have the power under section 20, subsection (4). Again, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, that is just an assertion that the government has the power. The minister may be right. I think he is wrong and that it is illegal. I do not see how an apple can be changed into an orange by an order in council, but that may be a matter for the courts.

I appeared at the National Energy Board hearings as an intervener to challenge the power of the board to take this action. There has been a slight misleading, perhaps unintentionally, in the House on this matter. At the hearings, the counsel for the government of Ontario supported my proposition that the board did not really have any jurisdiction in this matter. That was the position of the government of Ontario.

Last night we were told that the government of British Columbia also opposes the pre-build. Perhaps Ontario and British Columbia will bring legal action. I am told that the B.C. Union of Indian Chiefs has also taken that position, and they were at the hearings. Will they bring action? Of course I have, in my status as an intervenor, the right to bring legal action if I so determine. However, the better and ideal remedy would be for the government, as the Minister of Finance said in 1978, to consult the House at all steps and to bring back an amendment to the Northern Pipeline Act. That would be the proper parliamentary procedure, and that is what the government should do if it is really concerned about Parliament. What is the big hurry to go home today? We are paid to be here, and it is our job. We will sit down while the government brings in an amendment. Then we can vote on the amendment and we will see whether the government backbenchers or the Conservatives will vote for the amendment. Then it would be legal.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, three members have spoken on behalf of the opposition, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) is the fourth member. Only one member has spoken for the government side. You, Madam Speaker, have already ruled that the present speaker will end the debate. While I do not wish to interfere with the hon. member's right to intervene at all, I would respectfully submit that the hon. member is ranging far from the question of privilege itself. He is getting into the substance of the debate.

If the hon. member wishes to get into the substance of the debate, I submit that we on this side should be allowed to refute some of the arguments put forth by the hon. member, which have nothing to do with the question of privilege. The hon. member has suggested that the government should introduce an amendment to the legislation. I would argue that such a step would be a recognition or admission by government and by Parliament that we will support the notion of a pre-build which is separate from the whole Alaska gas pipeline. This would be the worst possible step the government and Parliament could take.

An hon. Member: It is what you are doing.

Mr. Lalonde: The government has indicated that it proposes to stick to building the whole Alaska gas pipeline, not the type of pre-build which the hon. members are proposing. I submit that if the hon. member is permitted to carry on this kind of argument, then we should be allowed to engage in the substance of the debate.

Mr. Waddell: I will conclude, Madam Speaker, now that the minister has made his speech, so he will not have to follow me. I want to say that what we are dealing with is a matter of privilege. I sincerely ask the minister, what is more a matter of privilege than whether the government has the right to take this action by order in council? It is what Parliament is about. It is not, as the President of the Privy Council has said, "splitting hairs"; it is a whole concept.

The concept is, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, that there is disagreement as to the legality. Also, it is not enough for the government to stand up and make the assertion that it has the power. As I tried to point out, if the minister would listen, there are a number of parties outside this House in Canada, including some governments of the provinces, which may indeed challenge this move. Then we will be in a real pickle if we lose that law case.

What I am saying is that the matter is indeed a question of privilege, that this matter should come back before Parliament and be dealt with in the House, and that the government concede, before construction goes ahead, that this question will be dealt with in Parliament.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is asking me to proceed on the basis that a certain government action could be illegal. I have already stated that the Chair should not have to rule on the legality of government actions. I would even remind hon. members that governments must accept the consequences of their actions, whether good or bad, and that it is not up to the Chair to save them from any possible disaster. The proposal of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) seems acceptable to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I do not know if it is acceptable to the representatives of the other party in the House, but in any case it would seem a good idea to allow some time to the House leaders to negotiate referral of the issue raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton to the appropriate committee, and I shall give them time to negotiate this matter. Outside this proposal from the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, the question of privilege remains entirely open. I am well aware that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would not raise a question of privilege without very serious motives. His knowledge of parliamentary procedure is very extensive, and the House has often benefited from his interventions in this regard.

Because I am aware that his arguments are certainly very serious, I would like time to reflect on the issue and to examine further the arguments he has raised. I would like to take time to examine the blues, and I shall give my decision on this question of privilege some time later today.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—HUMAN RIGHTS—INQUIRY WHETHER ACTION TAKEN ON S.O. 43 MOTIONS

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker. My point of order concerns two motions under Standing Order 43, one of which was passed on November 3, 1978. It was moved by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), and was seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon Biggar, now Saskatoon West, (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and concerned the release of Danylo Shumuk. That motion received the unanimous consent of this House in view of the fact that after 34 years Danylo Shumuk is still in prison in the Soviet Union for his defence of human rights.

The same motion under Standing Order 43 was presented on July 14 by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis).

I believe this matter will come under the purview of the Chair. After all you, Madam Speaker, as the first commoner, may write to the Soviet embassy and ask them what they are doing about this particular case. You represent all of us in this chamber. This is a very serious matter. The man is dying in prison. We have not heard anything since November 3, 1978, when I believe Speaker Jerome wrote a letter. I do not know whether you, Madam Speaker, have had the opportunity to write a letter or to contact the ambassador from the Soviet Union.

On behalf of this gentleman and all of us in this chamber who have had a great deal of correspondence regarding this case, I think something should be sought from the Soviet ambassador. I sincerely hope that when you do receive such correspondence you would pass it on to all members of this chamber who are concerned in this matter. I think the Soviet Union is taking its time on this. By the time we get an answer from them the man is likely to have died in prison.

I say sincerely, Madam Speaker, that I think this is a case within the purview of the Chair. I hope that we may receive an answer in the very near future.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is right in saying that I often act for hon. members of this House.

I would have to look at the wording of the Standing Order 43, but depending on that wording the Chair or someone else would act, depending on what the resolution said. I do not know as I do not have it with me, but I shall look at it to see whether it would come under my purview or that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan).

At any rate, I would not want to be found in neglect in my responsibilities. The hon. member has raised a very serious point of order and I shall look into it. If there is something that I was supposed to do and have not done, I will look into it immediately. I am not sure that it is really under my purview but I will look at it.

Mr. Paproski: There was unanimous consent—

Madam Speaker: I have not given the hon. member the floor. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I do not want to cut off my colleague from Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski), but I think we accept your undertaking to look into the matter. I know that Your Honour shares the feeling of all members of this House that this is a matter of very real importance, that Your Honour or the Department of External Affairs will act with dispatch and that there will be a reply to the House.

MR. CLARK—IMMIGRATION—REQUEST FOR LIST OF MINISTERIAL PERMITS ISSUED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order which relates to an exchange, reported at page 2799 and 2800 of Hansard for July 11, between myself and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). I think this is the first time we have both been back in the House since that exchange. I gave the minister written notice only a few minutes ago that I would be raising the matter again.

Madam Speaker, my point of order relates to an exchange regarding the Calamusa case. On July 11 when I asked him for the identity of persons making representations in the case, the minister indicated that I should seek them out. He also said that if I could secure their agreement to have their names published, that would probably proceed.

I raised with the minister the very practical difficulty that I cannot seek these people out until I know who they are. I raised the question of whether, on a private basis, he would make available to me the names of those individuals upon whose advice, in part, he had acted in this very important and contentious case so that I could get in touch with them to see if they would agree to have their names brought forward.

The minister's reply to me, shown on page 2800 of Hansard, was that he would take the position that I had raised as notice and see what would be made available. It may well be that the House will rise today. I know the minister would not want any suspicion to exist that he was acting in a deliberate way to try to keep information relating to this highly contentious case from my attention or the attention of Parliament.

I raise this point of order now, Madam Speaker, so that the minister may have an opportunity, after a week's reflection and after having received my note 30 or 40 minutes ago, to indicate whether he will give me those names so that I can seek the consent of those people to have their names published. In that way we would have a clearer understanding of exactly what went on in this case.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I should like to speak to this point of order both to clear up some suggestions made in the statement by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and to respond to the point of order itself.

First, I think we should understand very clearly that the facts of the case are absolutely open and clear. A decision was made purely and simply on the grounds that I explained to Parliament—that there is a serious family problem involved, and that we did not want to break up the family or cause undue hardship or further personal tragedy. Those are the only grounds for the decision.

Any suggestion that the Leader of the Opposition or his colleagues attempt to make that there was anything further is a disservice to the family involved and to me. I would like to have that stated very clearly. I think it is unfortunate that there is an attempt to try to suggest that something took place other than that which was explained in this House. Those are the grounds upon which a decision was made and those are the only grounds.

Whatever the motives of the Leader of the Opposition may be—and I am sure they are multiple—he can be assured that those are the only prima facie grounds upon which the decision was made, and he should be assured of that fact.

As far as the question of names is concerned, the Leader of the Opposition knows that I have been overseas. I asked my department to compile a list and to comment upon the advisability of that. I have not had an opportunity yet to review their recommendation on the list but as soon as I have had a chance to do that, I will be in communication with the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): On this point of order, Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the minister what the circumstances are that make this family situation somehow unique. Members of Parliament receive pleas from new Canadians and immigrants from all over the world who argue on behalf of their relatives for very legitimate reasons.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Siddon: I should like to know what the specific, exceptional circumstances are in the present case, which led the minister to grant this application.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, this is somewhat irrelevant to the point of order but I think it deserves a response.

All kinds of cases come to my attention and each has its own unique characteristics. If the hon. member wants, I will be glad to sit down with him and recount for his interest and education the number of cases I have received from members on both sides of the House and the variety of circumstances upon which judgments are made.

I would also point out to the hon. member and for the interest and education and edification of all members of that party, who seem to ignore a basic fact, that section 19(2) of the act sets out a large category of inadmissible evidence where people are allowed to come in under order in council. That accounts for hundreds of cases on an annual basis. Those reports are tabled in Parliament. I suggest that the hon. member look at that report before he and his leader and others make such suggestions. It has been a well-established practice and pattern in this House for many, many years that those are the grounds and that comes within the purview of the act.

I would point out to the hon. member that each case is considered on its merits and its circumstances. Many members ask that this kind of evaluation and assessment be made and I have been very open and accessible to them in making it.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

First report of Standing Committee on Public Accounts, in both official languages—Mr. Clarke.

[English]

FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present in both English and French the second report of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Do I have permission not to see the clock so that we can continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1.03 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT—USE OF ORDER IN COUNCIL AUTHORITY

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am ready to rule on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) if the House is agreeable.

The Chair was invited to act on the basis that an action of the government is illegal. I would repeat that this is not within my purview, but even if it were I would have one minor difficulty in that the document referred to is not now before the House. However, even in that case I would have to remind hon. members that it is not for the Chair to determine the legality of an action of the government; I am not expected, nor should I be expected, to place a legal interpretation on such a document, as it relates to a statute.

The hon. member is probably not wanting me to rule on the document itself; he would wish me to send it to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. But this is something the House itself should decide. Perhaps at some future time it will decide on such a course but must do so of its own volition, not from some action on my part. If the House wishes to make a reference to a committee it must do so on its own.

Before I would give priority to a debate on such a motion I would have to be convinced that there is an element of privilege involved in the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I must say that having examined all the arguments put before me I do not find there is a prima facie case of privilege.

AGRICULTURE

PRESENTATION OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Claude Tessier (Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of tabling in the House in both official languages the third report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. May I also add that, with the consent of the House, I intend to move that the report be concurred in later today on motions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH U.S. PRESIDENT AND SUPPORTING DOCUMENTS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, last night I was asked to table certain documents and I undertook to obtain them. Among them there was a letter which the Prime Minister sent to the President of the United States back in March. We have been authorized by American officials to allow the tabling of this document so as to make it public. I am therefore pleased to table a letter sent last March 12 by the Prime Minister to President Carter. I will have other documents to table in a few moments. However, Madam Speaker, several members on both sides of the House have asked me whether it would be possible that the documents tabled last night as well as these letters be printed as appendices to today's Hansard, so as to make them readily available. We have no objection, and if such is the wish of the House, then we would agree that the letters exchanged by President Carter and the Prime Minister of Canada, the Congress resolution, the agreement signed, and the memorandum of understanding between the American oil producers and distributors be printed as appendices to today's official report, that is the documents I tabled last night as well as this letter.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House?

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): If the hon. gentleman is asking for consent to that suggestion, he has it.

● (1410)

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Madam Speaker, we give that consent as well.

While I am on my feet and we are discussing documents, may I draw the attention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to the statement made a few moments ago by Your Honour, namely, that the order in council which changes condition 12 is not yet before us. Can the minister table that as well?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Madam Speaker. I was also asked last night to table a series of documents, including all orders in council relating to the decisions of the government. That included the order in council concerning condition 12, several other orders in council pursuant to recommendations by the National Energy Board and the orders in council to which reference was made in my statement last night. With the permission of the House I would like to table all those orders in council immediately.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I have a question. I do not have Hansard in front of me; because of the lateness of the sitting last night I think Hansard is not available. My recollection of the questions and answers, and particularly the answers given by the minister, was that he was asked to table a wide range of documents. I do not have a list of them here. Is it the position of the minister that he is tabling all of the documents he was asked to table yesterday?

Mr. Lalonde: I was coming to that, Madam Speaker. I have reviewed the whole exchange of last night and the commitment I made. In some cases I said I would inquire whether there were additional documents. I know of no other documents, and I want to give the assurance that if later on I was to find one I would table it. But I am assured by officials that there are no other documents than those which are being tabled which are relevant to the decision which has been announced.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I am delighted that the minister is going to table these documents, but since we do not see them right away, and as a matter of interest, I wonder if the minister would inform the House of the date of the order in council which changed condition 12.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the document is at the table, I do not have it with me, but the order in council was adopted last night at the cabinet meeting at roughly six o'clock. I think perhaps it was five minutes to six. I might mention that the order in council is, I think, in terms identical to the proposed order in council put forward by the National Energy Board last April, and it was made public at that time. So it is the same document.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I wonder if while the minister is tabling documents he would be prepared to table the financial guarantees that, first, the pre-build can be built and, second, that the whole line can be built. Would he ask his friend, Mr. McMillian of the United States, to give us the financial guarantees so that he could table them today?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, if my hon. friend wants to put his own financial guarantees behind it, I think the two of us together could do pretty well.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: By unanimous consent, the documents referred to during the exchanges that took place last night and today will be printed and appended to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could ask a question of the President of the Privy Council with respect to the bill to repeal the Small Loans Act. I am sure the President of the Privy Council knows full well that there have been discussions with the New Democratic Party and the Conservative party. We took it to be the position of the Liberal party that this was one item which would proceed prior to adjournment. It was one item on which there was unanimous agreement that we would in fact repeal the Small Loans Act and provide relief to those credit unions and caisses populaires which have been so ravaged by the effects of high interest rates and the policies of various governments.

I would like to hear from the President of the Privy Council why it is that this bill is not proceeding with unanimous consent, which is what we agreed on some time ago in discussions with representatives of both parties. We agreed that we would proceed in that way.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. member, a suggestion was made earlier this week during the discussion of a private member's bill which had the same effects as the one the government intends to introduce since we gave notice of it today. But to set things straight, first, I want to say that I told the Progressive Conservative member who had raised the point of order that I was going to consider his suggestion, and indeed I believe we are giving notice today of our intention to introduce eventually a bill to repeal the Small Loans Act.

At the same time, I want to make it quite clear that there never was any agreement between the parliamentary leaders to dispose of that legislation at any time. I would not want the hon. member to mislead the House. It is probably an oversight on his part, but he only has to check with his parliamentary leader and he will find out that this bill has never appeared on the list of bills to be passed before the summer recess. But, in any case, we are giving notice today of our intention to introduce such a bill, and I am convinced that with the support of opposition parties, the government will be able to dispose of this bill at the first opportunity within a very reasonable period of time.

[English]

Mr. Darling: Madam Speaker, following upon the matter raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, I point out to the President of the Privy Council that I spoke specifically to the minister responsible, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the day before yesterday. He gave me an undertaking that that bill would be brought in Friday morning. I assured the minister that I had talked to the leaders of both opposition parties, that there would be little or no debate and that it would go through. The credit unions have been waiting for this bill and, with all due respect to the President of the Privy Council, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs gave me an undertaking that that bill would be introduced today and be disposed of through all stages.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague misunderstood what the hon. minister told him. The minister told him the truth. The minister told him we would give notice of the bill today, and that is what we are doing.

Mr. Darling: Certainly not.

Mr. Knowles: We could put it through all stages on Monday.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask the indulgence of the House. Since the President of the Privy Council will in a few minutes be moving a motion to adjourn the House for a recess, I wonder, out of courtesy to 30 hon. members who have questions on the order paper, if we could proceed to questions on the order paper before we consider motions.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 8, 17, 21, 24, 26, 104, 237, 248, 262, 265, 559, 595, 603, 638, 712, 713, 714, 723, 830, 866, 909, 945, 946, 949, 970, 975, 1,046, 1,195, 1,199 and 1,438.

OTTAWA INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Question No. 8—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the government have plans for improving and extending facilities at the Ottawa international airport and, if so, what are the details and what is the estimated cost?

2. Does the government plan to improve the facilities so that the airport can adequately handle international flights?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Transport Canada is currently undertaking two studies in the national capital region: one is called Eastern Ontario/Gatineau Area Aviation Development Plan; the other, Ottawa Airport Master Plan.

The first will develop the most appropriate alternative locations and roles for the airports and aeronautical system components for the area; the second will provide a master plan for the development of the Ottawa airport.

Concurrently, a study to develop the passenger terminal complex, including the modification and expansion of the terminal building, associated aircraft parking apron, access roads, public car parking and utilities, to meet the forecasted demand to 1990 design year, has just been completed. The study is being reviewed by Transport Canada headquarters officials.

The passenger terminal complex development is limited to an immediate improvement program which will allow it to meet travel demands up to the year 1990. The long-range development options required to meet the demands beyond this time-frame will be addressed by the airport master plan which is being developed at the present time.

During the airport master plan process, additional studies are being carried out. These will be based on the airport role and airside requirements established as part of the area aviation development plan. The extent of details and costs associated with the additional facilities required to meet the long-range demands cannot be estimated at this time. Order of magnitude costs will be identified when the conceptual alternative airport plans are developed. The order of magnitude cost for the terminal complex development in the pre-design stage is approximately $35 million.

2. The present inspection service facilities meet the forecasted demand for scheduled international/transborder traffic. However, a possible expansion of the international inspection facilities to meet the demand of the charter operations is to be taken into consideration in developing the terminal concept.

MR. MARCEL RACETTE

Question No. 17—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is or was Mr. Marcel Racette an employee of the National Research Council and, if so (a) in what capacity (b) was he associated in any way with the office of the former Solicitor General, the hon. member for Nipissing (c) did he at any time assist either the hon. member for Nipissing, former Solicitor General, or any of his office staff, specifically a lawyer, in any way, including with translation?

2. At any time after May 22, 1979, did Mr. Racette visit any offices of the former Solicitor General and, if so, for what purpose?

3. To the knowledge of the government, were any documents in the custody of the former Solicitor General or any member of his staff shredded after May 22, 1979 and, if so, was Mr. Racette present at the time and what part, if any, did he play in such activities?

4. To the knowledge of the government, did Mr. Racette state to certain employees of the National Research Council that he assisted in the shredding of documents in the custody of the former Solicitor General, the hon. member for Nipissing, after May 22, 1979?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the National Research Council and the Solicitor General as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) Translator (translation of technical documents).

(b) No, but his friend, Louis Gerard Alberti, was a special assistant to the former Solicitor General.

(c) Yes. Assisted, from time to time, Mr. Alberti with some translation terms, usually by telephone.

2. Yes, to help Mr. Alberti move out of his office.

3. No.

4. No.

RCMP—"FEATHERBED FILE"

Question No. 21—Mr. Cossitt:

What is the exact origin of the name "Featherbed" including all the reasons why the file was designated by this name by the security services of the RCMP?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): The exact origin of the name "Featherbed" is unknown. Files are codeworded to maintain confidentiality of the investigation so that only persons working on the file with a proven need-to-know have access. The file could just as easily been called Christmas Tree as the name has no significance to the subject matter.

NATIONAL SECURITY—NATURE OF "FEATHERBED FILE"

Question No. 24—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer given to a question by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville on Friday, November 23, 1979, at page 1638 of Hansard, which stated in part that the Featherbed File "has been dormant for a number of years", has the file been dormant since 1974-75 and, if not, since what year has it been dormant?

2. On what grounds could such a file and the information which it contains be considered dormant after four or five years?

3. What are all the reasons that the government considers it dormant when it is of such recent vintage?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The "Featherbed File" has been dormant since 1975.

2. When the RCMP are satisfied that an investigation has been pursued as completely and comprehensively as possible, the file is placed in a dormant or non-active classification. Should new information come to light concerning any investigation, they have no difficulty in reopening the appropriate file.

3. The government considers the "Featherbed File" dormant because all necessary investigative action has been taken.

"FEATHERBED FILE"

Question No. 26—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the "Featherbed File" contain between 240 and 275 names and, if not, how many names does it contain?

2. Are some of them names of academics, members of the media, federal and provincial government public servants and certain professional people?

3. How many of the names were/are connected with the Department of External Affairs and how many were connected with the Prime Minister's office?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The policy of the RCMP is to maintain the confidentiality of names and organizations it maintains in its files. For this reason it is not considered advisable to disclose the precise number of names mentioned in the "Featherbed File".

2. It is the policy of the RCMP to maintain the confidentiality of names of people in their files. This policy extends to releasing any clearcut detail which would assist others to breach this policy.

3. The policy of the RCMP is to maintain the confidentiality of names, organizations, and areas of the public service their investigations encompass. No need is seen to abrogate this policy.

Question No. 104—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the reply by the Prime Minister given to a question by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville on November 15, 1977, at page 873 of Hansard, which stated in part, that he had never heard of the "Featherbed File", are any records in existence showing how the hon. member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes, the former Solicitor General, was able to state in the House in reply to the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville at page 927 of Hansard, that there was a Featherbed File and was able to give some details about it one day after the Prime Minister denied any knowledge of such a file?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): In so far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are concerned, records indicate that an aide memoire was prepared on November 16, 1977, and the deputy director general (Operations), RCMP security service, briefed the Solicitor General that day.

OWNED OR RENTED BUILDING SPACE

Question No. 237—Mr. Herbert:

How many square feet of building space was (a) owned (b) rented by all departments as at March 31, 1979, and what amount of the space was not occupied?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): In so far as the National Capital Commission is concerned:

(a) 16,068.448 m² of owned building space all occupied.

(b) 6,343,769.4 m² of rented building space all occupied.

In so far as Public Works Canada is concerned: As at March 31, 1979, with respect to accomodation under the jurisdiction of Public Works Canada:

(a) Total Crown-owned accommodation: 5,598,547 m²

Total Crown-owned accommodation: 644,684 m² (not occupied)

(b) Total Crown-leased accommodation: 2,512,740.8 m²

Total Crown-leased accommodation: 58,497.6 m² (not occupied)

NOTE: The 644,684 square metres of Crown-owned space not occupied on March 31, 1979, consisted of the following: 455,696 square metres of non-marketable space, i.e., space under active consideration for disposal, space in locations where no market existed, space in buildings undergoing major renovations, etc. 123,529 square metres were assigned to client departments and action was underway to prepare lay-outs and fit up the space for occupancy. The balance of 65,459 square metres was the vacant marketable space at that time representing a vacancy rate of 1.2 per cent of the total Crown-owned inventory. The 58,497 square metres of leased space not occupied on March 31, 1979, included 8,954 square metres in space for which a federal government use no longer existed and where practical efforts were being made to negotiate quit leases with the landlords concerned. Of the remaining 49,544 square metres, 42,332 square metres had been assigned to client departments and action was under way to prepare lay-outs and fit up the space for occupancy. The remaining 7,212 square metres represents the vacant marketable space at that time which represents a vacancy rate of 0.3 per cent of the total Crown leased inventory at that time.

FIRST CLASS MAIL STICKERS

Question No. 248—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the government discontinue the printing of the maple leaf emblem on the green first class mail stickers and, if so, for what reason?

2. Is it intended to replace the emblem with another indication of the country of origin?

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): 1. Yes. Originally these stickers had an "old style" maple leaf with the appropriate text on either side in a symmetrical design. With the introduction of the corporate identity and federal identity programs, these "public use" forms were some of the first redesigned. Design consultants to Canada Post provided an asymmetrical design utilizing the earlier text and the "bar and leaf". After those stickers were in use for about a year, Information Canada objected to the irregular use of the "bar and leaf" without the deparmental identification "Canada Post—Postes Canada". A number of prototypes incorporating this additional text were tested but proved to be too complex. Returning to the original "leaf" either centred or in an asymmetrical design was rejected by Information Canada. The only alternative then was to print the stickers without the "bar and leaf" or "leaf". Printing only the text allowed the sticker to be reduced in size, achieving some economies.

2. It is not the intention of Canada Post to replace the emblem with another indication of the country of origin.

CANADIAN CONSTRUCTION ASSOCIATION—MIDDLE EAST

Question No. 262—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the Minister of State for International Trade receive a letter dated June 14, 1979, from the chairman of the Canadian Construction Association in which it was stated, regarding the proposed move of the Canadian embassy to Jerusalem, "The hidden cost is the number of business people who will now hesitate to seek out work in that area. The hidden costs of the proposed move, therefore, are substantially above the visible costs"?

2. Did the Canadian Construction Association estimate the value of current construction activity in the Middle East at approximately $2.5 billion, not including the Bell Canada contract?

3. Did the minister reply to the letter and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. The Hon. Michael Wilson, PC, MP, Minister of State for International Trade: Yes.

2. The Canadian Construction Association (CCA) estimated that the financial impact of the proposed embassy move on the construction industry was of $2.479 billion. The CCA letter did not indicate whether the above figure included the Bell Canada contract.

3. On July 27, 1979, the Hon. Robert R. de Cotret, PC, MP, Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wrote to the CCA to inform that the government had appointed the Hon. R. L. Stanfield to undertake consultation with all of those who have an interest in government policy regarding the Jerusalem issue.

IMPORT OF CAPITAL INTO CANADA

Question No. 265—Mr. Herbert:

What was the (a) gross (b) net import of capital into Canada in each of the past ten years?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: Data are not available on disaggregation of capital transactions between gross and net flows. Flows related to Canadian assets abroad and Canadian liabilities to non-residents in the last ten years are given below.

Capital Flows

Year	Assets[1]	Liabilities	Net	Net errors and omissions[2]
1970	-1,219	+500	-719	-387
1971	-1,747	+2,664	+917	-1,348
1972	-2,607	+4,448	+1,841	-1,455
1973	-5,545	+6,087	+542	-650
1974	-2,774	+5,101	+2,327	-867

Capital Flows

Year	Assets[1]	Liabilities	Net	Net errors and omissions[2]
1975	-1,638	+7,598	+5,960	-1,203
1976	-5,390	+12,890	+7,500	-3,658
1977	-3,193	+9,343	+6,150	-1,851
1978	-8,325	+15,364	+7,039	-1,737
1979	-7,753	+17,174	+9,421	-4,402

[1] minus sign means an increase in assets.

[2] the balancing item representing net errors and omissions in the recorded estimates of both the current and capital accounts.

STATEMENT BY FORMER PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 559—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the former Prime Minister state on December 7, 1979, in a press conference, that he had had the opportunity to learn the contents of the two RCMP reports concerning a CBC producer's involvement with a KGB agent and, if so, is the government prepared to release full details of both reports and, if not, would it agree to turn the reports over to top management of CBC for consideration and possible action?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): It would not be appropriate to comment on an alleged statement made by a former Prime Minister.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—SECURITY SECTION

Question No. 595—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has there been a change in the security group of the services branch of the Department of Supply and Services of any kind?

2. Was security chief Russell Knox given the title director and, if so, what is the significance of the title?

3. Did Mr. Larry Fry, deputy minister, in a memo to staff members in March 1980 state in part that it was desirable "to relocate the security function from the operational function to the policy sector" and, if so, for what reason is this desirable?

4. Is it planned to add additional personnel and, if so, what are all the details?

5. What are all the details and a full description of the duties performed by all security personnel with the department and how many persons are involved?

6. Has any security work been contracted out and, if so, to whom and at what cost?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The security section was located within payments services branch and reported through a director general to the assistant deputy minister. It now reports directly to an assistant deputy minister.

2. Mr. Knox has been given the title of director to signify his reporting level within the services organization.

3. A memo on security was issued on January 18, 1980. It stated "Recent organizational changes and the consolidation of operational roles within services make it desirable to relocate the security function from the operational sector to a policy sector. Such relocation is in keeping with the concept that branches with operating responsibilities be separated from those with policy formulation responsibilities." The concept is of particular significance in a predominantly financial operation.

4. There are no plans to add additional personnel.

5. (a) Services security: under the direction of the ADM planning and finance, is responsible for the protection of the assets and facilities involved in the payments process of the Receiver General and other services operations involving auditing, consulting and computing. It is also concerned with the protection and safety of our employees. Services security consists of a total of six persons.

(b) Supply security: under the direction of the ADM, commercial supply, is responsible for the planning and implementation of industrial and government protective security for the supply administration. It advises the minister, deputy minister and assistant deputy ministers on security matters to ensure protection of information and materials. It also provides personnel security clearance arrangements for the department. Supply security consists of a total of 42 persons.

6. (a) No security work has been contracted out by services administration.

(b) Supply administration has contracted out as follows:

Contractor	Amount
Corps of Commissionaires	$ 996,446.93
National Protective Service Ltd.	$ 13,265.00

FINANCE—LAWYERS ON STAFF

Question No. 603—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of Finance?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): In so far as the Department of Finance Canada is concerned:

A. There are six members of a Canadian Bar Association who are employed on the staff of the tax policy division of the department. These employees are however working as tax policy officers, not as lawyers.

B. The Department of Justice provides 11 lawyers to a single legal branch which furnishes legal services to the Department of Finance Canada, Treasury Board Canada, the office of the Comptroller General of Canada, and the inspector general of banks.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES IN PUBLIC RELATIONS

Question No. 638—Mr. Howie:

How many persons engaged in public relations, publicity or media relations, are employed on staff in the Department of National Defence?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The Department of National Defence has a total of 83 persons engaged in the functions of public relations, publicity and media relations composed of 38 military officers, seven civilian information officers, eight military photographers and 30 military/civilian support staff, covering every region in Canada and overseas (Lahr, West Germany), as well as NORAD and NATO Headquarters.

ENVIRONMENT—LOSS OF EQUIPMENT

Question No. 712—Mr. Clarke:

1. With reference to the uninsured losses of more than $1,000 of equipment recorded by the Department of the Environment in footnote number 5 at page 12.62, volume I of the 1978-79 Public Accounts of Canada, under what circumstances were the magnetic tapes transport lost and (a) who was culpable (b) was the equipment replaced (c) did the department undertake steps to ensure that such a loss does not recur and, if so, what were they?

2. What use does the department make of magnetic tape transport?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. Theft during 1977/78 fiscal year at the Chemical Control Research Institute, 25 Pickering Place, Ottawa, Ontario.

(a) The Ottawa Police apprehended two individuals in connection with the thefts. All records are confidential but can be obtained by legal officials.

(b) Yes.

(c) Yes. The thefts occurred in the Chemical Control Research Institute located in the Dustbane building, Ottawa. The security at the Dustbane building was adequately handled, but the building was not burglar proof and was easily accessible by thieves as stated in the police report showing how entries were made into the building, i.e. through the ceiling, over walls, etc. The Chemical Control Research Institute now known as the Forest Pest Management Institute is, now, located in a departmentally-owned facility at Sault Ste Marie. The new location provides for better measures of security.

2. Used to carry magnetic tape for the storage of data and information. The one referred to in this text was used in conducting forest pest control research.

ENVIRONMENT—LOSS OF PEN RECORDER

Question No. 713—Mr. Clarke:

1. With reference to the uninsured losses of more than $1,000 of equipment recorded by the Department of the Environment in footnote number 5 at page 12.62, volume I of the 1978-79 Public Accounts of Canada (a) what is a recorder pen and how is it used by the department (b) did the department undertake steps to ascertain the present whereabouts of the equipment and, if so, what were they (c) was the thief apprehended (d) in what location did the loss occur?

2. Did the department undertake steps to ensure that such a loss does not recur and, if so, what were they?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment):

1. (a) This should read "pen recorder". A pen recorder is an instrument attached to a computer or other analytical piece of equipment which prints or writes data from the analyses being carried out by the instrument or computer. The one referred to in this text was used in conducting forest pest control research.

(b) Yes, the Chemical Control Research Institute contacted the police, who conducted an investigation and police reports are on file.

(c) Yes.

(d) The loss occurred at the Chemical Control Research Institute, 25 Pickering Place, Ottawa, Ontario.

2. Yes. The thefts occurred in the Chemical Control Research Institute located in the Dustbane building, Ottawa. The security at the Dustbane building was adequately handled, but the building was not burglar proof and was easily accessible by thieves as stated in the police report showing how entries were made into the building, i.e. through the ceiling, over walls, etc. The Chemical Control Research Institute now known as the Forest Pest Management Institute is, now, located in a departmentally-owned facility at Sault Ste Marie. The new location provides for better measures of security.

ENVIRONMENT—LOSS OF SPECTROPHOTOMETER

Question No. 714—Mr. Clarke:

1. With reference to the uninsured losses of more than $1,000 of equipment recorded by the Department of the Environment in footnote number 5 at page 12.62, volume I of the 1978-79 Public Accounts of Canada (a) what is a spectrophotometer and how is it used by the department (b) did the department undertake steps to ascertain the present whereabouts of the equipment and, if so, what were they (c) was the thief apprehended (d) in what location did the loss occur?

2. Did the department undertake steps to ensure that such a loss does not recur and, if so, what were they?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment):

1. (a) A spectrophotometer is an analytical instrument for colorimetric quantitative analyses of chemical compounds. The one referred to in this text was used in conducting forest pest control research.

(b) Yes, the Chemical Control Research Institute contacted the police who conducted an investigation and police reports are on file.

(c) Yes.

(d) The loss occurred at the Chemical Control Research Institute in 1977/78 at 25 Pickering Place, Ottawa, Ontario.

2. Yes. The thefts occurred in the Chemical Control Research Institute located in the Dustbane building, Ottawa.

The security at the Dustbane building was adequately handled, but the building was not burglar proof and was easily accessible by thieves as stated in the police report showing how entries were made into the building, i.e. through the ceiling, over walls, etc. The Chemical Control Research Institute now known as the Forest Pest Management Institute is, now, located in a departmentally-owned facility at Sault Ste Marie. The new location provides for better measures of security.

ENVIRONMENT—RECORD OF UNINSURED LOSSES

Question No. 723—Mr. Clarke:

1. With reference to the uninsured losses of more than $1,000 of equipment recorded by the Department of the Environment in footnote number 3 at page 9.60, volume I of the 1977-78 Public Accounts of Canada and the losses recorded in footnote number 5 at page 12.62, volume I of the 1978-79 Public Accounts of Canada, in what way does the department explain the similarity of the losses described in both years of (a) one Nikon camera with lenses—$2,000 (b) one recorder, pen—$1,855 (c) one magnetic tape transport—$4,000 (d) one spectrophotometer—$3,000?

2. Did such losses actually incur and (a) if not, was a clerical error made in preparing the Public Accounts (b) if so (i) what steps has the department undertaken to ensure that such losses do not recur (ii) in each case, in what location were the losses sustained and under what circumstances?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. These losses were reported in the 1977/78 Public Accounts in the year in which the loss occurred and were reported again in error in the 1978/79 Public Accounts in the year in which the losses were written off. Public Accounts Instructions Manual states: "Individual losses of $1,000 or more must be reported in the year in which they occur rather than when approval for the write-off is obtained."

2. Yes, such losses actually occurred in 1977/78 but not in 1978/79.

(a) An error was made in preparing the 1978/79 Public Accounts.

(b) (i) The thefts occurred in the Chemical Control Research Institute located in the Dustbane building, Ottawa. The security at the Dustbane building was adequately handled, but the building was not burglar proof and was easily accessible by thieves as stated in the police report showing how entries were made into the building, i.e. through the ceiling, over walls, etc. The Chemical Control Research Institute now known as the Forest Pest Management Institute is, now, located in a departmentally-owned facility at Sault Ste Marie. The new location provides for better measures of security.

(ii) Thefts at the Chemical Control Research Institute, 25 Pickering Place, Ottawa, Ontario.

Order Paper Questions

INCOME TAX—COST OF EDUCATIONAL AIDS AND ADVERTISING

Question No. 830—Mr. Howie:

What was the total cost for (a) educational aids (b) advertising with regard to the 1979 individual tax return (i) on television (ii) on radio (iii) in printed publications (iv) by other means and what were such means?

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue):

(a) Educational aids: Teaching Taxes Program, $34,000,

Volunteer Tax Information Program, $12,000.

(b) Advertising: There was no advertising campaign related to the 1979 tax return. The department prepares tax materials and provides these free of charge to the media for use in public service programming. Departmental costs for materials related to the 1979 tax return were: (i) television: $35,000, (ii) radio: $10,000, (iii) print: $3,000 and (iv) none.

ATLANTIC SALMON BOARD

Question No. 866—Mr. Gass:

1. (a) What is the function of the Atlantic Salmon Board (b) who are its members (c) how often has the board met?

2. What recommendations, if any, have been issued by the board?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans):

1. (a) Purpose and Objective

As the official focal point for federal-provincial, commercial, recreational and native people consultations relating to resource management, the Atlantic Salmon Board provides to the Federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans advice and recommendations on broad policy matters governing conservation, enhancement and utilization of atlantic salmon as it relates to the five Atlantic provinces.

Duties and Responsibilities

In addition to providing responses to matters specifically referred to the board by the department, the board is expected to consider and provide advice and recommendations on the following:

(i) Establishment of policy guidelines upon which the department can base decisions on matters pertaining to access to and utilization of the salmon resource, while providing due consideration of such factors as types of fisheries, interception, community impacts, seasonal parameters, markets for salmon products, social and recreational benefits, international implications and developmental or enhancement techniques and strategies; and,

(ii) review of policy options respecting conservation measures and resource management priorities including specification of alternative policy options and assessment of the implications associated with each option.

(b) The board has representatives of five provincial governments, commercial fishermen, recreational fishermen, native peoples and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. The board is constituted as follows:

—a chairman, appointed by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans

—a vice-chairman, appointed by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans

—four members representing the department

—one representative from each of the five Atlantic region provincial governments

—six members representing commercial Atlantic salmon fishing interests

—five members representing Atlantic salmon sports fishing interests

—two members representing native fishermen

—one member acting as scientific adviser to the board

(c) The board has met twice:

(i) Fredericton: February 13, 1980

(ii) Quebec City: March 27, 28, 1980

The next meeting is tentatively scheduled for mid-June in Corner Brook, Newfoundland.

2. On February 13, at Fredericton, New Brunswick, three recommendations were issued:

(i) The Atlantic Salmon Board recommends that compensation to bona fide commercial salmon fishermen be continued during 1980 in order to give the board time to evaluate alternative proposals relating to future commercial Atlantic salmon fisheries.

(ii) The board recommends that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans prepare initial recommendations to reduce interceptions of Atlantic salmon in distant fisheries for discussion at the next Atlantic Salmon Board meeting.

(iii) The board recommended that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans encourage his provincial counterparts in Quebec, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia to enter into an Atlantic salmon tagging program comparable to the program that will be initiated in New Brunswick in 1980.

On March 27 and 28, 1980, at Quebec City, P.Q., it was recommended under the following headings:

(a) Terms of Reference

It is recommended that:

(i) the terms of reference as proposed, be amended to ensure that the board report to the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

(ii) that the board be free to hold the number of meetings necessary, and that funds be allocated to enable the board to respond to its needs, and that the frequency of board meetings should not be unduly restricted by budgetary or other constraints.

(iii) that the proposed terms of reference be amended to ensure that reports to the hon. minister be made available to the public on a current basis.

(b) Interceptions

(i) to reduce the Newfoundland commercial fishing effort by eliminating all but bona fide fishermen.

(ii) to standardize the type and quantity of gear used by bona fide fishermen.

(iii) to licence and control the gear of the cod, mackerel and herring trap fishermen.

(iv) that the opening of the Newfoundland commercial salmon fishing season be delayed until June 1, or later in coastal areas of Newfoundland where data indicates that such a delay in the opening could help achieve the objective of minimizing the interception of Atlantic salmon of mainland origin.

(c) Enhancement Task Force

The board recommends the establishment of a Federal-Provincial Atlantic Salmon Board technical team from the five Atlantic provinces to identify the potential for enhancement, identify objectives, coordinate strategy and to report back to the board by October, 1980.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—GRAINS GROUP

Question No. 909—Mr. McKnight:

1. For each year 1976 to date, what was the total number of staff assigned to the grains group under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

2. (a) What is the total budget allocated to the grains group (b) what amount was allocated for (i) travel (ii) accommodation (iii) other expenses for each trip in the years 1976, 1977 and 1978?

3. What was the total budget allocated to the grains group for research into potential markets for grain in (a) 1976 (b) 1977 (c) 1978 (d) 1979?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. From 1976 to date—Six.

2. 1976/77—$2,005,200 was allocated to the grains group for operating costs; of this amount $119,000 was provided for travel and accommodation and all other expenses related to travel.

1977/78—$695,500 was allocated for operating costs, with $45,000 provided for travel and accommodation.

1978/79—$585,800 was allocated for operating costs, with $30,000 provided for travel and accommodation.

3. The grains group is a policy co-ordinating body and does not undertake any research into potential markets for grain.

NOTE: In the fiscal year 1976-77, the Grain Handling and Transportation Commission was appointed and additional funds totalling $1 million were included in the grains group estimates for that year. The grains group also undertook a Grain Handling and Transportation Information program which was estimated to cost $500,000. These funds were provided for that fiscal year only.

STATISTICS CANADA—SURVEY INTERVIEWERS

Question No. 945—Mr. MacKay:

For the fiscal year (a) 1978-79 (b) 1979-80 (c) 1980-81 (estimate), how many survey interviewers were hired by Statistics Canada pursuant to subsection 5(1) of the Statistics Act and what remuneration did they receive on an hourly or daily rate?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The number of survey interviewers hired by Statistics Canada pursuant to subsection 5(1) of the Statistics Act for fiscal year:

2859

(b) 1979-80

2200

(c) 1980-81 (estimated)

2268.

The remuneration received was on an hourly basis.

STATISTICS CANADA—1981 CENSUS

Question No. 946—Mr. MacKay:

How many enumerators and commissioners will be required for the 1981 census pursuant to subsection 5(1) of the Statistics Act and what remuneration is planned for such employees on an hourly or daily rate?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: For the 1981 census it is planned that 33,924 enumerators and 1,895 commissioners will be employed under subsection 5(1) of the Statistics Act. Census enumerators will normally be paid a piece rate determined by the type of questionnaire, geography and density of dwellings. This planned piece rate is based on an hourly remuneration of $5.43. The 1981 census commissioners will be paid $58.00 daily for up to 75 days.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—GRANTS FOR PROGRAMS

Question No. 949—Mr. MacKay:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76 (c) 1976-77 (d) 1977-78 (e) 1978-79 (f) 1979-80, by province and territory, what was the total in grants and contributions by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology (PAIT) or any successor program under the Enterprise Development Program (EDP)?

2. For the same fiscal years, by province and territory, what was the total in grants and contributions by the department's Shipbuilding Industry Assistance Program (SIAP) or any successor program under the Enterprise Development Program (EDP)?

3. For the same fiscal years, by province and territory, what was the total export financing assistance provided by the Export Development Corporation?

4. For the fiscal year (a) 1978-79 (b) 1979-80, by province and territory, what was the total in grants and contributions by the department's program for Export Market Development (PEMD) or any successor program under the Enterprise Development Program (EDP)?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: Please see the list below for reply to questions 1, 2 and 4.

In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned:

3. For each of its financial years mentioned below, the total of its export financing loan agreements with foreign borrowers and financial guarantees signed to finance the sale of capital equipment and services sold by Canadian exporters was:

	Year	Corporation account section 29 of the Export Development Act	Government account section 31 of the Export Development Act
(a)	1974	$ 502,240,000	$157,236,000
(b)	1975	$ 885,000,000	$250,000,000

(d)	1977	$1,087,498,000	$ 94,897,000
(e)	1978	$1,671,978,000	$ 87,756,000
(f)	1979	$1,992,131,000	$ 80,683,000

The loans are made to foreign buyers and are not export financing assistance applicable to a province or territory since the network of suppliers and subsuppliers spreads the benefits beyond provincial boundaries; as a result the corporation does not keep its records or statistics in the manner contemplated by the question. There are no statistics maintained which would permit ready retrieval of the information requested. In addition the corporation provides export credits insurance which may be used by exporters to facilitate bank financing.

CABINET COMMITTEES

Question No. 970—Mr. Beatty:

1. What are the names of the cabinet committees and what are their functions?

2. What are the names of the ministers who serve as (a) members (b) alternates on each committee?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. Cabinet committees are an extension of cabinet, which remains the focus of decision-making in government. Committees enable ministers to consider issues coming before cabinet in greater detail than would otherwise be possible. The committees review and examine ministers' recommendations for policies and programs, and have been delegated authority by cabinet to take decisions in their areas or responsibility, subject to cabinet ratification procedures. All ministers attend weekly full cabinet meetings. The list of cabinet committees, together with the names of the ministers and alternatives, where applicable, who serve on the committees, was tabled on July 10, 1980. The names of the cabinet committees indicate the areas of policy with which they are concerned. The cabinet committee system is closely integrated with the government's policy and expenditure management system. The committees which manage resource envelopes, and their respective envelopes at the present time, are as follows:

Committee	Envelope
Economic Development	Economic Development
Foreign and Defence Policy	External Affairs and Aid; Defence
Government Operations	Parliament; Government Services
Priorities and Planning	Fiscal Arrangements; Public Debt
Social Development	Social Affairs; Justice and Legal

NATIONAL DEFENCE—GUNS

Question No. 975—Mr. McKinnon:

Is the Department of National Defence buying "guns through 30mm" for $23,873 and, if so, what type and how many of each type?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes. Thirty each .22 calibre rifles complete with slings, magazines and other accessories. These rifles are specialized biathalon rifles used for practising skiing and shooting and because of the special balance needed are essentially hand-made.

LOG HAULING CONTRACTORS—TAX CREDITS

Question No. 1,046—Mr. Riis:

Will log hauling contractors be treated the same as logging contractors for tax purposes and thus be eligible for investment tax credits on the purchase of logging trucks?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): In the budget of November 16, 1978, the Minister of Finance announced that the scope of the investment tax credit was to be extended to transportation equipment acquired after November 16, 1978. Therefore logging trucks used in the transport of logs by a trucking company will ordinarily qualify as transportation equipment and be eligible for an investment tax credit at the rate of 7 per cent.

ADMIRAL ROBERT FALLS

Question No. 1,195—Mr. Cossitt:

1. On or about the end of May, 1980, did Admiral Robert Falls fly to Canada from Europe with the final destination of the aircraft being Trenton, Ontario?

2. Did he or anyone acting on his behalf issue an order that the aircraft be diverted for a landing at Greenwood, Nova Scotia, so that he could personally make an exit and, if so, what was the cost involved in an additional landing and take-off?

3. For what reason did Admiral Falls make an exit in Greenwood, Nova Scotia?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

2. Yes. The additional cost was $1,132.

3. This landing permitted Admiral Falls to make his last official visit to maritime command as chief of the defence staff.

INSPECTORS—WEIGHT SCALES

Question No. 1,199—Mr. Wise:

1. How many weight scales have federal inspectors inspected in each of the past five years?

2. How many inspectors does the government have for the purpose of inspecting weight scales?

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General):

   1976/77 139,091
   1977/78 122,655
   1978/79 123,907
   1979/80 135,000 (estimate)

2. There are 152 inspectors in the department.

GOVERNMENT DECISION—IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST

Question No. 1,438—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How does the government decide what is or what is not "in the public interest" to reveal on any specific matters?

2. Who exercises such authority and what are the criteria used?

3. Are any political considerations involved and specifically is consideration given as to whether revelation of any particular information would help or harm the Liberal Party of Canada or the government?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1 and 2. This is clearly a matter of judgment by the minister or ministers responsible for answering any question or notice of motion for the production of papers.

3. No.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, before moving the adjournment motion, I want to say that we have had consultations following questions asked in the House yesterday. I understand that there would be agreement if motion No. 4 in the name of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) could be introduced today and debated by one spokesman for each party, with a time limit of five minutes each. If all parties agree, we shall introduce this motion immediately.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF POLICY RESPECTING DEFENCE CO-OPERATION WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence) moved:

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to hear evidence and consider Canadian policy with respect to future defence co-operation with the United States in the North American region with particular reference to air defence and related arrangements embodied in and flowing from the North American Air Defence Command (NORAD) agreement, and it shall report thereon no later than December 31, 1980.

He said: Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the other parties in the House for their co-operation in allowing this committee to discuss this motion, probably at least during the summer, to prepare for resumption of the session in the fall.

[English]

The North American Air Defence Command agreement between Canada and the United States was first concluded in 1958 and then renewed in 1968, 1973 and most recently in 1975 for a five-year period which expired on May 12, 1980. On that date, by means of an exchange of notes, the 1975 agreement was extended for a period of one year. The purpose of the extension is to allow a review by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence of the NORAD agreement and related arrangements as set forth in the accompanying motion.

The agreement provides for the joint North American Air Defence Command through which Canada and the United States co-operate in aerospace surveillance and warning systems and integrated operational control of North American air defence forces, but it does not specify the nature or level of the resources each country should contribute to the common aerospace defence effort. National contributions are determined by each government, often following intensive bilateral consultations.

NORAD operates within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty, and it has always been perceived by both countries and by our NATO allies as a symbol of Canada-U.S. co-operation and as a valuable contribution to the over-all security of the NATO area.

[Translation]

At the present time, NORAD has highly effective and economical land, air and space detection and communication systems which can signal the attack of missiles or bombers against North America, prevent unauthorized aircraft from entering the North American airspace, monitor strategic and tactical space operations, and detect the re-entry in the atmosphere of objects from space which represent a hazard for human beings and the environment.

[English]

In its deliberations following from today's motion, the SCEAND may wish to examine or receive evidence on the following topics which are relevant to our co-operation with the United States in the Canada-U.S. region of NATO, and in particular to the arrangements flowing from the NORAD agreement: the changing strategic balance and implications for the stability of mutual deterrence; prospects for strategic arms control and the peaceful use of space; the strategic-aerospace threat to North America: past, present and future; strategic-aerospace defences in North America: air defence, passive space defence, active space defence ballistic missile defence; the place of NORAD in strategic defence: recent and planned or potential changes to the organization, roles and force structure of NORAD; Canada's contribution to NORAD; responsibility and cost sharing in NORAD; other elements of Canada-U.S. defence co-operation in the North American region; North American defence co-operation linkages: Canada-U.S. relations generally, defence outside North America, control of civil air traffic, surveillance of space.

[Translation]

I am sure, Madam Speaker, that in considering those matters and all others they will deem necessary to consider in order to fully understand the agreements on the defence of North America, the committee will be doing something very useful for Parliament and the Canadian people as a whole. The government hopes that the committee will report without delay, so that their recommendations will prepare the ground for the negotiations regarding the ongoing Canada-U.S. co-operation on defence.

[English]

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the minister did not read the wording of the motion, so I assume it is exactly the same as motion No. 4 under government business on the order paper which is, for all practical purposes, exactly the same as an entry on the order paper of December 7, 1979, in happier days. So we cannot complain too much about the wording of the order, it being so close to identical to our own. The only change is in the date. Instead of being returned by the end of March, 1980, the committee is to finish its findings by December 31, 1980. It seems as if there is more time, and yet I doubt it will be enough and perhaps the minister would be willing to entertain some amendments to that later in the year.

I should like to say a few things about this motion. Besides the change in date there are several other things which need to be considered by the committee. I am particularly concerned, and tomorrow will be looking at today's Hansard, over the number of extra things which the minister added in his remarks, particularly with reference to space. I take it that by space he means generally outer space, the peaceful uses of space, space defence, and space surveillance. These are words which trigger a reaction in me, and I am sure in most hon. members—that we are moving quite a bit beyond the air defence of North America, and if we are going to do that we want to understand what we are getting into.

Among other things, we are getting into a very expensive infrastructure possibility. One only needs to worry about that by looking at the airborne warning and control system which the Liberal government got us into a couple of years ago, following which we found out that we have no control over expenditures. We are faced with paying a fixed percentage of an unfixed amount and we have no Auditor General who would look at the AWACS agreement whithin NATO and no Auditor General, so far as I know, who might look at a treaty change with NORAD, if there were such a change, which would leave us paying a fixed percentage upon unspecified costs of the NORAD infrastructure. The committee should be particularly alert to that possibility and the danger of committing us to unfixed amounts.

One thing that we need to get from this committee is a much clearer definition of the roles of the various appointments to and parts of NORAD than we have at present. There has been a vast change in the organization of NORAD in the last five and a half years since we last looked at this, such as the disappearance of the air defence command and the changed roles of the strategic air command because that command has changed completely. These changes were made without Parliament being consulted. I should like to see the new treaty or the re-signed treaty which this party supports in general. I do not know what my friends to the left might have to say about that, but in general we support the re-signing of the treaty now, subject to these suggestions.

The problem that we have is that NORAD have made changes in their organization without our getting them back for consideration by the Parliament of Canada. I should like to see that worked into the re-signed agreement.

The most important thing we established five and a half years ago is that this treaty should always be subject to parliamentary review. The minister of the day was opposed to that and thought it should run along until there is some reason for changing it or having it considered by Parliament. I will certainly encourage the committee to come up with a fixed term of probably five years when it should be reviewed by Parliament.

• (1430)

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few comments on this referral. I am particularly pleased that this matter is being opened up for review by members of Parliament, because since taking office the government has shied away from reviews of our country's over-all policy in both foreign affairs and defence. Instead, the government seems to change its policy on a day to day basis. In this week alone we have heard from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) that he favours the increased build-up of a new sophisticated nuclear weapon for use as a deterrent, and then a day later we heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that such is not the case and Canada is as firmly committed to disarmament as it ever was. There seems to be an interesting dynamic in the Liberal caucus, a dynamic that perhaps could best be resolved by a clear, definite policy toward defence in the form of a white paper review.

I should like also to draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that presently my party is undertaking a thorough review of its foreign affairs and defence policies in order to make sure that they are in tune with changing world affairs and events. Circumstances do not remain the same in perpetuity. We in the New Democratic Party realize this and hope that the government, and perhaps the members to our right, would also realize this and not dismiss such reviews as being boring and a lot of needless paperwork.

I believe the traditional reservations of the NDP concerning NORAD are well known to members of the House. We have often in the past questioned the need to defend ourselves against manned bomber attack from the Soviet. In the time it would take such a bomber to reach its targets, the world would have been destroyed four or five times over by intercontinental ballistic missiles. The role of intercepting manned bombers in an age of ICBMs is nearly as useful today as the armour worn by English knights would be as protection against the bullets from a machine gun.

Others have said that the existence of military alliances such as NORAD are contributing factors in heightening world tension. Indeed, recent events where a computer mistaking a goose or a flock of geese for an enemy bomber put North American air defence on red alert and brought the world to the brink of self-annihilation should give us all cause to question how appropriate NORAD is in its present form.

Canada has only limited resources, and we must be careful that they are spent as wisely as possible. We have assigned such a wide array of tasks to our military forces that they are now strained to the limit of their capabilities to cover all bases. Canada is not now and is not likely ever to be a military superpower. There are those in this House who believe that we need all the trappings of a military superpower. A country the size of Canada, with its population accepting all the trappings of a military superpower, is similar to a young boy who dresses up in his father's work clothes. Because he is not big enough, everything hangs strangely and looks out of place. The boy looks like a caricature of the person he is trying to imitate. So too, I submit, Canada would look like a caricature if it were to surround itself with the trappings of a superpower.

We must take a serious look at our role in world affairs and the contribution we can make with our limited resources. We should not try to be all things to all people, but instead should concentrate our defence efforts in those areas that would best serve our national interest.

The process of reviewing our alliances such as NORAD is a positive one. It gives us the opportunity, at least in this area, to review our present commitment of resources. As I mentioned earlier, I believe this government should be reviewing its entire policy on defence. However, this faltering first step at least is acceptable and I welcome it.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That, when the House adjourns on July 18, 1980, it shall stand adjourned until October 15, 1980, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pinard: If it is carried, we will go on to the next item.

[Translation]

Mr. Knowles: Not yet—

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, today is the sixty-fourth day of the first part of the first session of this Thirty-second Parliament and I am delighted to be able to say that during those 64 days we have accomplished more work than we did in the course of both preceding sessions. I shall explain myself, Mr. Speaker. During those 64 days the House of Commons had to face the commitments which had been emphasized very eloquently in the Speech from the Throne. You will remember that the Speech from the Throne stated, and I quote:

Canadians expect much of this Parliament. The country asks for action and action now. The first task is to clear the accumulation of essential legislation left from previous Parliaments. This backlog must be dispatched expeditiously so that the affairs of the state may be put in good order. To that end, my government is relying on the good will of members and senators of all parties.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to say publicly that indeed the wish expressed by the Governor General in the Speech from the Throne has been fulfilled thanks to parliamentary spirit and co-operation of all members on both sides of the House. Of course, some would have liked to see additional legislation or measures other than those which were introduced to be debated and passed. However, in our responsibility as government we had to take into account the fact that the country had held two elections within a year and that Parliament having failed to sit without interruption, there was an accumulation of legislation. There was disorder in the House in the sense that it was absolutely essential and urgent to pass at least 15 bills which had acquired a technical urgency.

As an example, and to quote only a few of them, it was urgent to adopt Bill C-2 to amend the Immigration Act. It was equally urgent to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, the Employment Tax Credit Act, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act. All these measures, Mr. Speaker, were necessary to meet the needs of the people and of various classes of society, so that people could benefit from funds made available to certain categories by virtue of some acts which were expiring. So, at first we were facing that accumulation of legislative measures resulting from two elections, and it was our responsibility as a government and it was the responsibility of all of us as parliamentarians to try in the first few weeks, in the first few months, to prevent this new Parliament from making mistakes, to help it be responsible and to pass those pieces of legislation after reasonable debate. This is what happened.

I am pleased to confirm and to report what most of my colleagues know by now, namely, that since April 15 the House has permitted royal assent to be given to 25 bills instead of the 15 mentioned. Among those bills are not only those which were technically urgent but some which enabled the government to implement the most important electoral commitment they made, namely, to increase the guaranteed income supplement for older citizens. We succeeded through all those accumulated pieces of legislation, with the co-operation of all parties, to pass that bill which raises the guaranteed income supplement of our senior citizens, of those who are least able to protect themselves against inflation and the economic problems countries such as ours are experiencing. We have also succeeded in the present constitutional context, besides more technically urgent legislation, in securing the contribution of all parties to adopt "O Canada" expeditiously, after all those years, as the national anthem of a country we all want to be united and stronger.

And, Mr. Speaker, we have also been able to rearrange the parliamentary schedule of supply business. If I were asked as government House leader to point to the most important measure, policy or agreement during this first session, I would not hesitate at all to indicate the major agreement concluded about supply business. My colleagues the House leaders of the other two parties will agree that the most complex procedure in our rules is that of supply.

Because there have been two elections in one year, not only had estimates for last year not been approved by Parliament but those for the current year could not be approved either, outside a time frame like that which is normally provided for under our Standing Orders. To put it another way, because the estimates for the current year had not been tabled in due course on account of the date the election had been called and the date Parliament had reconvened, none of the provisions of the many sections and paragraphs of our Standing Orders dealing with time limits and fixed dates for the adoption of supply bills, and none of the provisions providing for natural, legal and time honoured cutoff dates could apply, due again to the fact that the election had been held on a certain date and that the main estimates had not been tabled at the proper time.

Parliament was therefore in a very confused state. Theoretically, the opposition parties could have taken this opportunity to debate endlessly any item of the estimates, under any department, without any time limit. Parliament could have sat for weeks and months, without any control other than that provided for under Standing Order 33, which is not the most popular section on Parliament Hill, namely, that the government has the authority to use closure to put an end without notice to any debate in the House, thereby preventing members of the opposition from expressing their views as fully as they would care to.

So fortunately we did not have to use Standing Order 33. The opposition parties through their parliamentary leaders, after lengthy but harmonious discussions, made it possible to reach in due time that major agreement I referred to earlier. I say it is a major agreement because we were in a situation where there was absolutely no order possible in this House on the business of the House unless we used the real guillotine which would have created a commotion, poisoned the climate and compromised seriously, I have no hesitation to say, the passage of other bills which had become urgent. What made that major agreement possible and was making it even more important is the fact that we needed interim supplies by May 15 when the Governor General's warrants allowing the government to spend and administer expired.

There again, the agreement was all the more crucial as it had to be reached in the month following the opening of the session, that is before May 15, and we were limited by time and the understandable psychological predispositions of opposition members, following the change in government, but despite all those obstacles, those time limitations, that psychological stress, the parliamentary spirit prevailed—and I have no hesitation to say so—and the parliamentary leaders came to an agreement which deserves to be pointed out and which made it possible not only to put order in the business of supply, but we were able to set a very orderly parliamentary timetable to work in a reasonable and to a certain extent innovative way. Indeed the House will have to sit for six days in Committee of the Whole this fall to consider estimates but not only was some order put in the business of supply but at the same time allowed the climate to remain favourable to doing legislative work and, as I mentioned earlier, the passage of 25 pieces of legislation that were absolutely essential for most of them and the others will allow the House to be free this fall to dispose of other measures such as the ones we introduced yesterday, namely, the access to information bill, the bill to turn the Post Office into a Crown corporation, and many other economic and social measures to come.

So, Mr. Speaker, I put my finger on what I consider to be the major development in that first session. Even if there is agreement on the business of supply, that is no excitement for the public. Even if there is nothing glaring about that agreement, it is not a scandal, it is not a sensational measure but a parliamentary measure that is basically essential, crucial, not only to draw up our schedule so that we can dispose of the business of supply, but also to develop a spirit of co-operation, a true parliamentary spirit such as we have known in the last weeks.

As concerns the achievements made in this first stage of the first session, I referred to the 25 bills that have been passed, I referred to the parliamentary schedule for the business of supply. There is also our experiment with parliamentary task forces that my knowledgeable colleague from Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) likes to call, quite rightly, special committees of the House of Commons. And the House knows that they are actually parliamentary task forces consisting of a smaller number of members. There are six now at work in six different fields of public interest and they are instructed to act rapidly and report to this House within a limited period of time, by December 19, and they may help us to find out how we can make full use of the talents of all hon. members from every region of the country, and more particularly from western Canada.

I think the conclusion of this agreement for the setting up of parliamentary task forces in the course of the first part of the session is an event which deserves to be underlined because it was the result of co-operation between all parties in this House. We must stress that the climate in which we worked has been unusual. Several of us have worked twice as hard, Mr. Speaker, as we were actively involved in a campaign of major importance for the future of our country and I am talking of course of the referendum campaign in Quebec. The first part of the session ran parallel with the pre-referendum campaign and the referendum campaign itself and a very large number of hon. members representing all areas of Canada have directly or indirectly helped bring about the wanted results of the Quebec referendum either by way of their personal and direct involvement in the field or by way of their attitude here in the House or by way of the very nature of their contributions in this place or by way of the things they did or refrained from doing. I take this opportunity to stress the merit which the parliamentarians of this House deserve for having contributed to our victory in the Quebec referendum.

We had the twofold responsibility of putting our country's affairs in order, at least with regard to the backlog of procedures and legislations. We had the twofold responsibility governing the country on the one hand and on the other being involved in a crucial campaign in order to secure Canada's unity and this country's survival. I think that on both sides of the House we have all taken our responsibilities to heart, and we did make the necessary effort which was met with the success we all know and which is a credit to all parliamentarians. But I would be remiss if I did not emphasize the tremendous work done by the very great majority of the hon. members for the province of Quebec in that respect.

Then, when we consider the volume of business I just summarized, this first part of the session may not appear to be sensational for certain people. They would say that Parliament did some business but it was dull. For sure, there has been nothing outstanding, there has been no scandal nor perhaps the kind of debates we have seen when the Canadian flag was adopted. However, there is a fact we all must admit, and it is that during its first two months of existence this Parliament has been very efficient. This government has behaved responsibly. This has to be said of Parliament also, not just of the government. And when I say that Parliament has behaved responsibly, this implies that members on both sides of the House who of course do not always agree with what we are doing, who have criticized some of our bills but have never abused their right to criticize, considering that the country had been through two elections and that it was urgent to dispose of some business to which I referred earlier.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would like to convey my special thanks not only to members of this House but also to the senators, Madam Speaker, her assistants, the officers at the table and all the officials of the House of Commons as well as the pages who have all been very efficient and quite devoted and who at this time of the year, either on account of their children, their parents, their families, their spouses feel the need to withdraw and lead a normal life, whether they be members, employees of the House of Commons, members of the Press Gallery, the media or the public, most of whom are already on holidays or are going to be soon.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank all those people who helped make Parliament during this first stage of the first session so productive and responsible and I am sure that all my colleagues on this side of the House will join me in extending to all those who deserve them and whom I have just mentioned my very special thanks.

Finally, I wish to deal with one question but I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is absent—no, he is here. I am addressing my remarks especially to his party through him who knows the parliamentary spirit which induced us to co-operate as parliamentary leaders during this session and this comment, of course, is also aimed at the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton.

He knows the extent to which there has never been any desire on this side of the House, neither, I believe, on the Conservative side, but my colleague will speak on their behalf, will be tricky. Admittedly, it would be hard to fool the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre where procedure is concerned, in view of his long experience and wide knowledge of the rules. However, we have always refrained from attempting to take advantage of hon. members by resorting to procedural games, and as House leader it has always been my policy to use an open and straightforward approach, which up till now has been producing results. I would like to tell him this afternoon with the same open and straightforward frame of mind, that I am fully aware, after hearing the statements made up to this point by his leader, for whom I have much respect, by himself or by other hon. members, that he is looking for a way to tell the public at large, for reasons known to his party, his opposition to a government policy very well known to him.

The adjournment motion is a means by which his fellow members can make their points. One of many means, because up to this point, this week at least, during the question period, on the eighth day of the throne speech debate yesterday, following the statement made by the minister yesterday evening until 11.30 p.m., when every contribution had been made and nobody asked to be recognized, and today again, at least until four o'clock and later if his party so desires, he can have all the time required to fully express his views.

Mr. Broadbent: Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday!

Mr. Pinard: So what I would like to tell the hon. member and his colleagues, and the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), is that there is no rule we could apply to prevent the New Democratic Party from requiring the hon. members on both sides of the House, the staff employees of the House and all those who are interested in our debates, either the media or the public, to come back next Monday, if such is the wish of the New Democratic Party. Clearly then, there is no authority whatsoever in our rules under which I, as House leader, or any member here could force the hon. members to adjourn today. In other words, if NDP members want to return next Monday at all costs, nobody can prevent them. That is quite clear and I am aware of it. However, there are rules which allow members to sit beyond the regular sitting hours. Today is Friday. It is the last day of the week and usually the House does not sit on Friday evening. I for one, and I speak only for my party because I do not wish to involve the Progressive Conservative Party, believe I speak for all my colleagues on this side when I offer, if NDP members deem it necessary, to extend the sitting hours indefinitely today so as to allow all members who want to speak today to do so. My learned colleague, the House leader for the New Democratic Party, is well aware that any matter of government policy may be dealt with on the adjournment motion. NDP members may take advantage of that motion to speak on any other subject, either on the veterans' pensions we willingly granted a short time ago with the co-operation of all parties, or on the Alaska pipeline or on the $35 paid to pensioners by the Liberal government. I repeat that we are prepared to allow NDP members to sit indefinitely today until they have fully made their point on one or several government policies. Once again, they are free to accept or reject our proposal, that is their political judgment. We, as members of Parliament, shall have no choice but to return next Monday, if such is the wish of NDP members.

So, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to reiterate my thanks to all those who deserve them, and remind the House of the parliamentary spirit that has prevailed until now, banking of course on that of the New Democratic Party, so that we can, in orderly fashion, without abuse and humanely, discuss fully a matter of interest to them, without in any way penalizing unduly people who do not share their views, all the more so when their objections concern measures that have been passed according to parliamentary rules and an act passed by this Parliament.

So, once again, Mr. Speaker, in closing I express the wish that, with regard to the future, hon. members of all parties will take advantage of the summer break, whether it starts today or next week, to reflect seriously on what amendments could be made to some of our rules with a view to ultimately making this Parliament, while respecting its spirit, of course, more efficient, more modern and also more humane.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my remarks on this motion may I take the opportunity while I am on my feet to correct what might have been a misimpression flowing from remarks I made on a procedural matter earlier this day. I was commenting on the fact that I did not at that moment have in my hands copies of Hansard. I would not want that to be interpreted as a criticism of the Hansard staff. As the House well knows, we sat exceptionally long hours last night, and if there is fault to be assigned for Hansard not being ready for the 11 a.m. session, it is with those of us who speak, rather than with the reporters who record the proceedings of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me make some beginning remarks in response to the observations of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I think that he will allow me, and that the House will agree, to congratulate him on a very graceful act of self-congratulations for the manner in which matters have been proceeding through the House. I will have a little more to say on that in just a moment.

Before doing that, however, Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to the proposition that he has made to the New Democratic Party regarding the possibility of this House not seeing the clock tonight and allowing members of Parliament who want to speak on the adjournment debate to have an exceptionally long Friday. Certainly, on behalf of my colleagues in the official opposition, I can say that arrangement would be acceptable to us. We would agree to a procedure of that kind if it were to be proposed and necessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me deal now with some of the matters that the President of the Privy Council, the House leader of the government, raised. He talked about the legislation that has been brought forward. I will say on his behalf that he had the good grace to admit that most of the legislation was proposed and prepared by governments other than his own. He admitted that indeed what this government has done, primarily, in this first session of a majority Parliament, when the nation faces urgent issues, is deal with housekeeping matters, with matters that were already prepared, with matters that would have been brought forward in any event. There has been very little indication of any new initiatives by this government.

I must say in passing that I noted with a certain humour that the President of the Privy Council took credit for the special committees of Parliament looking into matters which are of interest to members of this House. He well knows, and members well know, and students of the parliamentary process should know, that what this government tried to do was run around the rules of Parliament by establishing task forces that will report to ministers and not to Parliament. It was only after pressure from this side of the House, and this party in particular, that the government followed the rules and practices to respect the privileges of the House of Commons. Instead of having task forces which answer to ministers and could then be forgotten, the government reverted to establishment of special committees of the House of Commons which will report to the House and whose recommendations will be debatable by the whole House under the eyes of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I hear the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) who speaks much more often and much more eloquently from his seat than on his feet—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I can anticipate the hon. member's point of order, and I am prepared to hear him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. With respect to the comment of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that he can anticipate the point of order, so can I, but it is the right of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) to put his point of order.

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, what I want the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to do is to expand upon the business of task forces reporting to ministers and governments only. He could also explain about the task force of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) last year.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I correctly anticipated and I am interested to note that the hon. member for Regina West is continuing to try to put obstacles in the path of efforts taken by my government to increase rail line service and grain transportation movement in the prairies of Canada. That was a major initiative taken by our government. It was an initiative that was opposed throughout by the hon. member. I am pleased to see that he continues to take his position against the interests of the grain producers of western Canada on his last day in the House this session.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Regina West on a point of order. May I indicate to the hon. member that he, or any other member of the House, has the right to call upon the Chair to recognize a point of order. In courtesy to whatever member may be speaking, however, and in the present case it is the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, one hopes it is a point of order and not a point of debate.

Mr. Benjamin: That is true, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. Leader of the Opposition has just distorted the entire position of the party of which I am a member, as well as my own position.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Benjamin: Our position was—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Regina West sought the floor on a point of debate, not a point of order. I specifically requested that if there is to be a point of order it ought to be just that—a point of order. That was not a point of order.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition quoted me as saying that I continued to oppose the position of the prairie grain producers. I said no such thing at any time.

An hon. Member: Get up and debate it.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. Leader of the Opposition is totally out of order. He is not telling the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: The Leader of the Opposition only has to reply to the point of order that I originally raised about task forces that report to ministers only, which is exactly what he had last year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I say again that the hon. member for Regina West is entering into debate. I would ask him to be so kind as to co-operate with the usual procedure of the House and permit the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to continue.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I was not distorting the position of the hon. member. I was simply reviewing it and recalling it to his mind. I am not at all surprised that he is unhappy when that is done. He would also be unhappy were I to recall to his mind the positions, in the plural, of his party on NATO, the positions, in the plural, of his party on NORAD, and the positions, in the plural, and the contradiction of his party on the Quebec referendum. We could do that, but I do not intend to spend very much time reminding the New Democratic Party of the inconsistencies that have become a way of life with them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What I wanted to deal with instead was some of the records of the government and indeed, in my opening remarks, some of the matters that were prepared and ready to be introduced by the government I had the honour to lead. For some peculiar reason those things have disappeared and have not made their way to the legislative agenda of this House. I think, for example, of the beef import law which was ready for introduction last year and of which nothing has been seen. In light of the references of the President of the Privy Council to his interest in parliamentary reform, I think of the very comprehensive package of parliamentary reforms that had as a purpose not the convenience of the government but the powers, the rights and the respect of individual members of Parliament. That package was introduced by our government, but nothing has been seen of it.

I think, for example, of the proposal we made to have an open, public inquiry, into all aspects of nuclear energy in this country, instead of a silent, quiet, private, hidden inquiry by officials of the Government of Canada who have the most to hide. We believed in openness. We acted on openness, and they have acted in the exact opposite direction. Or we could have spoken about the committee on voluntarism designed to try to have the Parliament of Canada recognize the great damage that is being done to the spirit of Canadians by the growth of bureaucracy, both public and private, to have the Parliament of Canada address directly the problems and the potential of encouraging more individuals through voluntary organizations to play a larger role themselves in the development and in the improvement of our Canadian society. That was a parliamentary special committee proposed by the government of which I had the honour to be leader, a parliamentary committee on a matter which apparently is of no interest to the government now in office.

• (1510)

There is a long list again. I am reminded of the report of the public accounts committee today. The Conservative government established a special committee to look into the very serious problem of cost overruns. That was a committee which would have allowed full public discussion of that important public question which this government has abandoned. It has ditched that idea. I note with interest the unanimous report of the public accounts committee of this House of Commons which was brought down today. It recommended again explicitly that the committee on cost overruns which we established, which this government abandoned, should be established again and established immediately. Certainly that is a view which this whole party supports, as well as being the unanimous position of the public accounts committee of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: I have to draw the attention of the President of the Privy Council to the fact that, though a number of bills have been passed by the Canadian Parliament, several others mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and others proposed by ministers during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, have yet to be introduced. We were promised amendments to the legislation on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; we have yet to see them. Proposals were made on setting up a Crown corporation for exporting agricultural products; no bills have been introduced. Other legislation was promised by the government which, to date, has not yet been introduced in the House of Commons.

[English]

I must say one thing about one piece of legislation that was brought in yesterday, and I will say it in a complimentary way. I am very pleased by what I have seen. While I have not had an opportunity to review the freedom of information law tabled yesterday by the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), I think it is also true to say that there is no doubt in the world that that freedom of information bill would not have been introduced by this government in this Parliament had it not been for the work, through several Parliaments, by the former member of Parliament for Peace River, Mr. Ged Baldwin—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —and the presentation as a priority measure of a freedom of information bill in the name of my colleague, the House leader of the official opposition, the then president of the privy council, namely, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

There is one other matter on which I must comment, and perhaps I will return to it a little later on in my remarks, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Privy Council talked about what he called the campaign for the future of the country. He suggested perhaps that campaign occurred at a point in the past in this session. I make it very clear to him the view of this party and that of my colleagues, that the campaign for the future of the country is not at all a thing of the past. It is not at all a period of the past. The campaign for the future of the country is a matter which must be a preoccupation of all of the members of this House of Commons. I add this: that it is not simply a question of dealing with matters raised in a referendum, and it is not simply a question of dealing with concerns that were raised in the province of Quebec.

The campaign for the future of this country must be a campaign which takes real account of the special requirements and the special sensitivities of Canadians in all regions of this country, and of times that are not limited by a referendum debate established by one party, one government in one province. That campaign for the future of this country continues. I must say, as I will be indicating a little later on, as someone who had the honour to take part in the referendum debate in the province of Quebec, that I am personally concerned that many of the actions of this government have reflected an insensitivity to the problems and to the aspirations of western Canada that could do very serious damage to the capacity of Canada to heal and to grow together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The President of the Privy Council indicated that the government had made some progress in clearing up what had accumulated in the past. This Parliament, of all parliaments, should not be content with clearing up what had accumulated in the past. We have here a majority government, a government that does not have to be preoccupied with the matters that preoccupied my government that ultimately brought us down. This is a government that has a mandate, not as to platform because it ran without one, but at least it has a mandate to act, a mandate as a majority government in this House of Commons to face directly the major problems and the great potential this nation faces. That is the mandate, and that is the unique and historic opportunity which this government has.

The President of the Privy Council quoted from the Speech from the Throne and the reference which spoke then about much being expected of this Parliament. As I said earlier in this session, much is expected of this Parliament. But, in particular, much is expected of this government. This is a majority government. This is a government which has not yet changed the rules of Parliament to democratize Parliament, so consequently this is a government which controls Parliament. If this government is not prepared to show leadership, this Parliament will not be able to show leadership. I make the point to the President of the Privy Council and to such of his colleagues as who are here that there is an onerous obligation upon him and upon his colleagues in government to do much more than housekeeping. They must face the urgent problems and the potential that exists in this country. I do not want to have another session of this Thirty-second Parliament that dedicates itself to anything but housekeeping.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I think it worthwhile reviewing the manner in which the Liberal government has acted in the last seven months, seven months of a majority government, to correct the problems which it faces as a nation and which challenge this Parliament. In the seven months since the Trudeau government was elected and assumed power, the deficit in Canada has grown by $3.7 billion. Since February alone another 51,000 Canadians have become unemployed. Inflation, as the figures cited today indicate, has now reached double digit proportions in Canada for the first time in almost five years. Virtually every economic forecast concludes that the economic situation will worsen significantly before it improves. The point which the government apparently does not understand is that one of the major contributing factors to economic problems in this country is the absolute lack of clarity as to what are the economic intentions of this government.

What does it intend to do? What is the government's attitude toward inflation? What policies will this government introduce? When will we have a budget? When will there be an economic statement? What is going to happen to indexation? All of these questions which deal directly with the ability of individual Canadians to make their plans, to live their lives, to build the country, all of these questions are cast in shadow. Since February the Liberal government has given no indication of any consistent economic plan or program. Neither has it given an indication of having any on its agenda.

Of course one of the other major problems which the nation faces is that both consumers and producers of energy in Canada are faced this many months after the election in February with increasing uncertainty regarding the price of petroleum—prices are being increased by stealth two cents at a time—and regarding security of supply. Any government confronted with these difficulties ought to be prepared to act honestly and openly to correct the problems. In fact, as I mentioned, the throne speech held out for Canadians the hope and the promise that this government was finally prepared to act. It promised and I quote, "that the deficit would be reduced in a planned and orderly way". That was one promise in the throne speech. Another promise in the throne speech was, and I quote, "security of energy supply at a fair price for all Canadians". Security of energy supply at a fair price for all Canadians! Again quoting from the speech, "the burden of economic sacrifice would be shared equally". Well, the record of this government on any of those questions has not borne out its promises.

What has this government done with its brand new majority mandate? There has been no budget. There has been no energy agreement. There has been no sense of direction, no effort to correct the drift of the last seven months. What has the government been doing? Well, Mr. Speaker, the largest amount of legislative time in the House of Commons has been devoted to a bill to borrow an additional $12 billion. I make the point that this comes from a government which said, a brief six months ago, that only $3.5 billion was required. In opposition they said $3.5 billion; in government they want $12 billion. That is the legislative item which has consumed the greatest amount of time in the House. The spending deficit of the government will be $14 billion. Apparently that is a "planned and orderly reduction" as promised in the Speech from the Throne!

What else have they done? Well, they have introduced, perhaps in a way which is illegal, perhaps in a way which violates the law of the land and would hold the Crown open to suit, a levy on Syncrude products which would increase the price of gasoline by two cents a litre but also applying to home heating oil and other fuels which were exempted from the taxes and the levies anticipated and announced by the Progressive Conservative government last year.

My hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) raised a question eloquently the other day about members of Parliament from Atlantic Canada. Why were they not speaking out in protest against the increase in home heating fuels for elderly Canadians in Atlantic Canada, for elderly Canadians in the province of Quebec, for elderly Canadians anywhere whose circumstances are too straitened to allow them to adjust to this increase in the cost of home heating fuel, snuck in by a government that won its way to office by promising there would be no increases, or smaller increases in the cost of energy? That promise to the widows of Wolfville, to the low income Canadians across this country, has been cavalierly broken and broken in a way which may breach the laws of this land.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Clark: They introduced as well an employment tax credit which provides no incentives to target the creation of employment for women, for young people, for natives, for the handicapped. So much for the promise of this government—and I quote again—"to meet the needs of these groups who face special problems in finding jobs". Those people are talked about at the time of campaigns and talked about by the Liberals at times of throne speeches, but their concerns are not reflected in the legislation brought before the House of Commons. That is shameful neglect and shameful duplicity by this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Finally, the government smuggled in an economic statement which failed to provide any new initiatives to get the country working again. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) at that time told the House he would—and I quote him—"consider measures that will distribute the burdens of both unemployment and inflation more equitably." Yet in that smuggled budget he brought in he neglected the opportunity to introduce tax incentives brought forward in my government's budget which would encourage the growth of industry and the creation of jobs in areas of regional disparity already bearing much more than their share of unemployment.

What measures has the government introduced to deal with inflation? What have ministers been considering? Well, they have been considering one item in particular on the question of inflation, and that has been the prospect of bringing to an end the system of indexing in this country. This will have two effects upon the people of this country. One, it will swell the revenues of the Government of Canada by a back-door tax, a tax that makes the Government of Canada a profiteer out of the inflation it is supposed to be fighting. That is one thing it will do.

The other thing it will do is this: the attempt by the Liberal party to end indexing, the attempt they are studying and planning to implement today, the attempt they refuse to repudiate, this attempt by the Liberal Party of Canada to end indexing will place a particular burden upon lower income Canadians. It is a most inequitable tax, it is a tax upon the poor, and I am shocked and chagrined to find that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) should sit laughing in his place while we discuss a tax which will put a special burden on low-income Canadians.

An hon. Member: Look, he is just sitting there laughing about it!

Mr. Clark: In fact the typical taxpayer in Canada would see his or her taxes rise by $1,564 between now and 1985 if the Liberal government proceeds with this proposal which it is actively considering now. This proposal would sneak in a tax increase which would hit hardest at the poorest in the country.

Mr. Speaker, I want now to talk at some length about a major question which has not been addressed by this government, one which has not been addressed since February, a problem which our government addressed directly and fully during the period in which we held office. That is the question of energy. This Liberal government has been guided in its energy policy by two considerations which have nothing to do with the energy security of Canada and which have nothing to do with the energy opportunities for Canada. I suspect, with the deepest of regret, that one of those considerations is the temptation to use legitimate differences over energy prices as a means to inflame the opinion of the majority of Canadians who live in consuming provinces against the minority of Canadians who live in producing provinces. To do this cynically in the interests of building a case for a certain kind of constitutional reform is totally unacceptable.

There is so far no firm evidence that that is the motive of the Liberal party. However, in recent days we have heard Liberal members of Parliament proposing that fundamental national policy on pricing be directed by public opinion polls on resource jurisdiction, however deeply that might rend this country, however deeply it might divide us. I can find no other reason for the failure of the federal government to negotiate seriously an energy agreement with Saskatchewan, with Alberta, with British Columbia, until a week before the expiry of the June 30 agreement; I can find no reason whatsoever for the failure of the federal government so far to have made any reasonable proposal to the producing provinces when there are only about two weeks left in the extended agreement. If there is a reason, it is well hidden. If there is not a reason, then there has been an absolute dereliction of responsibility, not simply to the citizens of this country but to the security of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What is your policy?

Mr. Clark: I am asked by members of the NDP what is the Conservative policy on energy matters. They know. They know, because they voted against it on December 13. What they voted against was more Canadian control over Canadian energy. And they applaud voting against that. They voted against security of supply for the Canadian community. And now they are applauding themselves for voting against security of supply. They voted against a tax credit for low income Canadians who needed the help to meet the price increases for energy which are inevitable. And now, that New Democratic Party, that haven of hypocrisy, is congratulating itself for voting against the poor, for voting against security, and for voting against Canadian ownership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1530)

Mr. Clark: I notice that now Liberal members of Parliament opposite are applauding. They are applauding their action in voting against Canadian ownership, as the Liberal party voted against Canadian ownership on December 13. The Liberals are applauding themselves for voting against low-income Canadians because they voted against tax credits to low-income Canadians on December 13. The Liberal party, naturally, given their policy, is congratulating itself for voting against security of supply because that is what Liberal members voted against, and in that, clearly, they knew what they were doing on December 13 because they have shown no interest at all on any day since in making this country secure in our domestic supply of energy or in protecting this country against being a hostage to foreign nations in energy policy.

That brings me to the second consideration. It is a consideration which has nothing at all to do with energy security and nothing at all to do with taking advantage of the great energy opportunities of Canada. The second consideration which is guiding the Liberal government is simply Liberal party politics.

In the last campaign the Liberal party proposed an energy policy which hon. members opposite knew was dishonest. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) admitted that last night when he introduced a gas export that he had opposed absolutely in opposition, and when he broke his word at least four times in relation to promises he made before the February election. Before the election the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Liberal party said that gas exports of 3.7 trillion cubic feet to the United States were too high. That was what they said before the election. Last night they said they were too low. They broke their word on that question.

Before the election the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, and I quote:

> Everything has to be signed, sealed and delivered, particularly the financing plan or the financing guarantees, before we start exporting one cubic foot of gas out of this country to the United States.

That was what he said before the election. Last night he broke his word and told us that the only thing which needed to be signed, sealed and delivered was a non-committal letter from the President of the United States.

Before the election, speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, and I quote:

> There must be an arrangement for swaps in this agreement with the United States.

Last night and again today he broke his word and said there would be no swaps.

Before the election he called for, and I quote:

> —the initiation and completion of the Quebec and maritime gas pipeline.

Last night he admitted he had broken his word and is so far proposing a pipeline which goes only as far as the city of Quebec.

Those specific misrepresentations are important, and there no doubt are more misrepresentations. But what is even more fundamental is the attitude toward honesty of the Liberal party. I said often during the election campaign that in energy policy the difference between the Progressive Conservative and Liberal parties was not really a difference on price and not really a difference on exports but that it was a difference on honesty. We took an honest position, and the Liberal party took the opposite position.

Unfortunately, a casual attitude toward honesty has become the hallmark of this Trudeau government. There is, for example, an honest way to introduce a budget and there is another way, and this government chose the other way and not the honest way. There is an honest way to amend the Northern Pipeline Act and there is another way, and this government chose the other way and not the honest way. There is an honest way to change the levy in the Petroleum Administration Act and there is another way, and this government chose the other way to change that levy.

I will not give a long list of the commitments which were broken, but some come to mind. I was reminded the other day about the minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I wonder if there are government members here from the Niagara Peninsula. I see at least one. The Minister of Agriculture made a firm commitment to Ontario grape growers that he would change a tax to which they objected. It was a firm, unequivocal, and clear commitment. He then came back to office, and he broke his word.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that his spending would not exceed the real increases in gross national product. That was his promise during the election campaign. He broke his word, as it has become the habit of the Liberal party to break its word to the people of Canada.

Mr. Chénier: Look who's talking.

Mr. Clark: That casual attitude toward honesty damages the very fabric of Canadian democracy, but in no field does the failure to face facts honestly more endanger the future of this country than in the field of energy policy, because we are a nation with immense potential and immense good fortune. We are also a nation which is blessed by individuals who have gone out to acquire skills and who have turned their skills to innovation, to creativity, and to opening and building a land. That is part of the legacy of this great nation, but our good fortune cannot be allowed to obscure two fundamental facts. The first is that no one else will look after Canada. We Canadians have to build on our good fortune, and we have to do it ourselves. Sometimes that means taking hard decisions, and always that means honesty. If we back down from hard decisions, our country will slide down the scale of nations.

The second reality is that energy, which can be the source of Canadian security and success, can also be the cause of Canadian decline. If we build on our own resources, we can be the strongest nation in the world. That is if we build on our own resources, but if we expose ourselves weakly to the world, we can be cut down by revolutions in Iran, by invasions in Afghanistan, and by national decisions of foreign governments taken for their own reasons and with no thought of Canada in mind.

Any of us in this House of Commons who are honest and knowledgeable about the facts know the frailty of the world energy picture. We know that demand is rapidly exceeding supply in the world. We know that the foreign policy of the Soviet Union is focusing more and more upon securing energy supplies at whatever cost to world stability. Hon. members of this House of Commons also know that we in Canada are unique among nations in our ability to protect our future against hostile foreign decisions and to protect our future by making realistic Canadian decisions here at home. That is the reality facing any Government of Canada, but the response of Canada's two recent governments has been dramatically different. My government faced those facts and for the first time in post-war history in Canada prepared a comprehensive national energy policy which would build upon the energy strengths of this energy nation. A federal-provincial agreement on that package was two days away when the Liberals and the New Democratic Party combined again to bring our government down.

An hon. Member: Poor Joe!

Mr. Clark: Since then there has been no comprehensive energy policy at all advanced by the Liberal government. Negotiations on a narrow but important part of energy policy, the part concerning price, are apparently under way. The producing provinces, naturally enough, are insisting that they receive the same net benefits from this government that they would have received from the agreement we had prepared. That is understandable, but the point for this Parliament to underline is that all the people of Canada also have the right to expect that Canada will get equivalent benefits from the Liberal agreement, equivalent to those benefits Canada would have received from the agreement two days short of signing by the Progressive Conservative government defeated last year.

The Prime Minister is apparently meeting the premier of Alberta. He may well have a proposal to make. He has an adjournment ahead of him. I want to suggest some items for his agenda during that adjournment as they relate to energy policy. I would like him to bear in mind, as I believe the Canadian people are increasingly bearing in mind, the important elements of the comprehensive energy proposal which we made and which the Liberal party and the NDP, for their own narrow political reasons, voted against.

● (1540)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Those elements of that proposal were designed to build Canadian security, were designed to ensure Canadian supply, and they included some of the following. First, they included a pricing regime which would be sufficient to lead to exploration in this country, including non-conventional exploration in areas where exploration has not occurred successfully before, and which would lead the producers of this country to go forward and to guarantee security of Canadian supply, because we believe that Canada, with the resources available to it, with the initiative of its people and of its industry, is eminently capable of becoming self-sufficient in energy by the year 1990. That was our goal, that should be the goal of Canada, that can be the goal of Canada, and that is a goal which apparently has been abandoned by the Liberal government and which I recommend that they adopt, not in my interest but in the interest of the nation that they will govern for a few years more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Second, that energy package put together to secure Canada's energy future, to take advantage of the rare resource we have as an energy nation, provided— and I say this for the special information of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who, unhappily is absent—a force majeure clause which would have permitted the Government of Canada to separate Canadian price, to an even greater degree than was in the agreement spelled out, from the changes that might occur in world price, in prices by OPEC. That force majeure clause was an item of protection which was in our agreement, and we have no way of knowing what protection, if any, will be in the agreement signed by the Liberal government, if indeed there is one.

Third, we recognized as a fundamental element of an energy policy for Canada that there had to be help to those Canadians who were going to be hit hardest by the increases in price that were inevitable in a modern world economy. So we introduced an energy tax credit which would have been available to the lower income and harder hit Canadians across the country, an energy tax credit, I would remind the House, voted against by the NDP and voted against by the Liberal party, but introduced by this party, introduced by the government we formed, as a fundamental element of a national energy package—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I am being heckled by the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier). I wanted to say the hon. member for Hollywood, but it is Timmins. His interjection was a complaint against the tax credit. I am not surprised that he should interject against the tax credit since the other night he applauded the imposition of an increase in the price that his constituents have to pay for home heating oil, an increase they would not have had to pay under our government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We introduced those measures of aid to help Canadians who would be hardest hit. That was another major element of that program. Again we recognized that there were in some parts of Canada energy generation which depended excessively upon petroleum. So we offered special help to the province of Nova Scotia and to the province of Prince Edward Island so that they would be better able to deal with the increases which were inevitable in the current international energy situation. We proposed an energy self-sufficiency tax which would have yielded some $6 billion. We proposed a tax that the NDP voted against which would have taken $6 billion from the large multinational oil companies of this country. The NDP voted to spare multinationals from a $6 billion tax burden which we proposed to introduce.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: That energy self-sufficiency tax imposed upon the energy industry was to have been directed entirely to energy supply and to developing conservation in this country.

We proposed the establishment, as part of that package, of a Canadian energy bank which would encourage individual Canadians and Canadian controlled companies to invest in Canadian energy projects. Again there has been no mention of that important factor, no similar instrument spelled out by the Liberal party. This party stands committed—and we proved it with the energy bank—to the concept of Canadian ownership of the Canadian energy industry. That is a principle which was voted against by the NDP, it was an initiative which was voted against by the Liberal party, but we believed in it and we set it forth in the energy package which was brought forth by us as a government. We believe in Canadian ownership of Canadian energy resources, and we gave Canadians a program which would have accomplished that goal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Those are some of the elements of our energy package, and the NDP was caught in the act of voting against Canadian ownership, of voting against low-income Canadians, of voting against energy security, so they are making a great deal of noise in this House. No doubt they are trying to shout down the relevation of their record, but as a party they voted against lower income Canadians, they voted against Canadian ownership, and they voted against Canadian security of supply. If they do not like hearing this now, they had better get used to it because they are going to hear a great deal more about their actions against Canadian interests.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Indeed, as one of my colleagues pointed out, they will be hearing a great deal more about their actions against the steelworkers, their actions against unions.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the record clearly shows that it was the Canadian people who in fact voted against the Leader of the Conservative Party (Mr. Clark).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a point of debate, not a point of order.

Mr. Clark: I regret that in the uproar which was being caused by the hon. member's colleagues I did not hear his remarks, but my colleagues who did hear him tell me I missed nothing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I want to speak for a moment not simply about the contents of that energy package, important as they were because they faced, for the first time since the war in Canada, the great possibilities that existed for this nation to become self-sufficient in energy. I want to speak for a moment, for the benefit of the Liberal party, about the process that was followed in working out that package because I happened to read a most extraordinary chronicle in the life of Canada the other day, an interview given by one Pierre Elliott Trudeau to, of all people, the Toronto Globe and Mail. I thought that wonders would never cease when I read the account of that interview, until it became clear why exactly that interview had been given by that individual to that particular medium. The reason was that he wanted to build up the idea that there is no alternative approach to the confrontation politics which he has practised for so long at such a high cost here in Canada.

He suggested that what he termed as the non-confrontationist approach of my government has not worked. I want to give him one instance where it did work, and I wish him as much success as we had. When we began the process of working out an energy agreement which would speak to supply and security of supply for Canada, we consulted with the premiers of the country, Premier Buchanan, Premier Blakeney, Premier Davis, Premier Hatfield, Premier MacLean, and Premier Lougheed. We consulted with the premiers of the country. We did not take them a package which was a fait accompli, but we said, "Look, here is the goal for this country, a goal for a price which Canadians can afford and will have to face, but a goal also which will take advantage of the great resources that are here and will build upon those resources."

I went to them as prime minister to premier and I said, "This is not a closed book, this is an arrangement, an agreement which conserves the interests of the whole community of Canada which we commonly serve." I received from those premiers several proposals that became part of that agreement and that were very helpful to the final package which was proposed. For example, it was the Premier of Ontario who suggested first that there be a relation that would not go above 85 per cent of world price and would naturally be protected after that by the force majeure clause.

We did not go to a province, as the Trudeau government so often does, and say, "Take this or leave it". We said, "Here is a proposal. How can it be improved?" Premier Davis made a suggestion that improved it significantly. We went to the Premier of Nova Scotia and said, "Here is a proposal. How can it be improved?" Premier John Buchanan and Premier Angus MacLean of Prince Edward Island co-operated with us in having the energy package that was brought forward reflect the special requirements of their parts of Canada. There were other items where we went to the premiers and listened to the advice of other governments, because we wanted a package which would not simply be a package that bore a party name, that would not be something that was forced down the throats of Canadians by a national government, but in effect would be a genuine national package reflecting a genuine national consensus and pursuing genuine national goals.

That kind of consultation will work in this country. That kind of consultation came within two days of working out a national energy package. If that package had been adopted this country would be much more secure in energy supplies than we are now, this country would be much better protected against the vagaries of the international market and against political changes which may occur in countries we cannot control, than it is now. That was a national policy worked out by a national government that was prepared to treat the provinces as partners sharing common goals, rather than as enemies who are there only to be confronted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: One other dimension of the energy negotiation which is important to recall to the attention of the House and the Canadian public at this time is that we recognized, as I think most Canadians do, that the question of pricing cannot be separated from the question of changes in the equalization formula of the country. I will say to the House that we received advice from public servants and from others that the only way to approach that problem was to approach the two issues together. I considered that advice and I knew it would fail.

I knew the only way we could get agreement on those two important and fundamental questions in the country was to approach them in the proper sequence, and to recognize that in western Canada for a variety of reasons there had grown such a deep suspicion of the national government that there would not be a ready agreement on equalization until there was seen to be a fair agreement on an energy package first. That is why we proceeded in the sequence of getting agreement first on energy. We would have had that agreement on the Saturday after the government fell, and on the Monday after the government fell we had scheduled a first ministers' conference at which we had prepared for presentation to the premiers the proposal of a new review of equalization in the country based upon the Rowell-Sirois report, recognizing the fact that 40 years after Rowell-Sirois it was necessary for us to re-examine root and branch the equalization system in this country.

We proposed the innovation that instead of just simply being a commission imposed upon the provinces by the government, it should be a commission jointly appointed, with members appointed by both provincial and federal government, because that is the way to make a federal system work—not to argue about commas in a law but to recognize we share a common country and we want to build this common country together. That was the approach we took to equalization.

I know we have heard nothing of the reforms in the equalization agreement which will expire in less than two years. We have heard nothing of that from this government. To our knowledge and to the knowledge of the House of Commons, it is doing nothing about that fundamental problem. Had we been successful—and we were not; that is history—not only would we have had an energy package that would have moved this nation toward energy self-sufficiency by 1990, also I firmly believe we would have had an agreement on an amendment to the equalization formula which would have taken account of resource revenues in a way that would have truly shared, not by imposition but by agreement, the resources and wealth of this whole nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think that we have thoroughly discussed national unity during recent years. I think, however, that we may have overlooked some means available to a national government. We have decided, for example, that it was not sufficient to convene the provinces and the federal government merely to discuss constitutional matters. We must also co-operate to consider modernizing other Canadian institutions.

This is why we have advocated the establishment of a national conference on economic development in Canada. The purpose of such conference would be to gather for the first time in Canadian history all the representatives and spokesmen not merely of the federal and provincial governments but also from the industry, the unions, the credit unions, the farmers and other individuals concerned with the economic development of Canada.

It is by working together that we can have a united country. The constitution alone or discussions dealing exclusively with legal matters will not do it. I referred earlier today, Mr. Speaker, to the actions of the Liberal government on energy matters and I indicated and there was evidence of it as recently as last night, that the word of the federal government is worth nothing or is not acceptable and that the people cannot rely upon it. Finally, the Liberal government is specializing in policy flip-flops and we just had a new example with energy. That is very serious, particularly when we think of what the Prime Minister said during the referendum campaign. He solemnly committed himself to achieve a new Canadian federalism. He promised it to Quebeckers and other Canadians.

But now that the referendum campaign is over, can we truly believe that he has really changed, that his attitude is different from what it was in the past and that the proposals made by his government constitute the slightest opening onto a genuine reform? Unfortunately, the answer is no. In fact, all the Prime Minister has managed to do up to now is to cause a lot of people to worry, from Claude Ryan to Roy Romanow. It augurs no good at all for the future, and I hope that the Prime Minister will be able to pull himself together in the next few days and will realize that the time has come at last to keep his word and to take concrete steps toward the renewal of the Canadian federation.

[English]

I close by reminding this House that we are a nation with great opportunities. We are a nation which, as well as its natural wealth, also has a wealth of good will and a wealth of common interest. We are a nation which can be brought together, but also we are a nation which can be driven apart. We need, as a nation, national projects. We need, as a nation, co-operation among levels of government and among individual Canadians. We need, as a nation, national leadership. We have had none from this government in the first session of this Parliament.

They have sought and are receiving an adjournment. I would hope their agenda for an adjournment would include having a budget ready for the early days after we come back in mid-October, would include having an energy agreement concluded which gives the people of Canada at least the benefits that would have been available under ours.

Having regard to the time, I wonder if I might conclude my remarks by moving, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House continue to sit this day beyond the ordinary time of daily adjournment in order to complete its consideration of the motion of the President of the Privy Council now under consideration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1600)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion. Will those who object to the motion please rise in their place.

And more than ten members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Ten or more members having risen to object, pursuant to Standing Order 6(5)(b), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Item No. 8, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Stand by unanimous consent.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF VETERINARY COLLEGE IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of supporting the establishment of a fourth veterinary college in Canada, which will emphasize preventive animal and marine health, to be located in the Atlantic provinces.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise to sponsor and support this motion and to participate in the debate on it. As hon. members will appreciate, the motion itself will not cause the Atlantic regional veterinary college to come into existence. However, the debate on the motion is an opportunity for the House to express itself on the issue which is of great importance to the Atlantic provinces and, indeed, to all of Canada. My remarks will be relatively brief in that I have no desire to talk out the motion. By the some token, I am hopeful that support for the motion will be so widespread among all members that there will be an opportunity this afternoon to vote on it, and to do so favourably.

In my own remarks, I wish briefly to talk about the great regional and national need for a fourth veterinary college in Canada, about the nature of the proposed college and the requirements associated with it, and about the history of the proposal. I also wish to suggest a course of action, if there is time.

At the outset, may I make it clear that I do not have in mind the popular conception of a veterinary college. What I am referring to, instead, is a modern centre for animal and fish health. Too often we in Canada, especially lay people, including politicians, think of veterinary colleges in terms of the training of people for private practice. We have some notion that veterinarians have nothing more to do than to neuter cats or to hold Aunt Bessie's pregnant poodle while the dog is giving birth. However important these activities may be, veterinarians do much more. Seen in a very different light, a fourth veterinary college for Canada would give a much needed boost to the economy of the Atlantic region, especially in the areas of agriculture and fisheries.

Many members on all sides of the House will know that we in Canada have not been singularly successful in eliminating or even alleviating regional disparities. The Atlantic region lags far behind the rest of Canada. For example, the relationship between the per capita income in the Atlantic region and that in the rest of Canada is not unlike what it was as long ago as the 1920s. That is true despite the establishment of DREE in 1969, and despite the fact that under that program, and others, the federal government has been spending millions and millions of dollars to give the Atlantic region an economic lift. The trouble is we have been essentially engaged in the provision of welfare in various forms. Our approach has been one of "welfare augmenting". We have concentrated largely on transfer payments, whether they be equalization grants or unemployment insurance. What is needed are not handouts but, rather, assistance to the Atlantic—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, private members' hour is rather precious. It is not to be interrupted by a conclave of blabbering NDPers who do not have the good grace to get out of here to hold their meetings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McMillan: I thank my colleague for that intervention. Perhaps, because we are talking about veterinary medicine, the NDP thinks it appropriate to act like a bunch of animals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I find it interesting that they claim this is such an important and proper motion when they have only 40 members in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has not made a point of order.

Mr. McMillan: If I may continue without further interruption, Mr. Speaker, I suggest the required approach is one of helping the Atlantic region to become self-sufficient. In particular, what is needed is help in the agricultural and fisheries areas—the traditional base of economic activity in the Atlantic region. At present livestock and livestock products account for 55 per cent to 60 per cent of total farm cash receipts in the region. But only between 35 per cent and 40 per cent of the food now consumed in the Atlantic region is produced there.

There is a tremendous opportunity in Atlantic Canada for a major impetus to food production. Canada itself is very much an underdeveloped country. If it is not underdeveloped, it is fast becoming underdeveloped in so far as food production is concerned. We cannot even feed ourselves much less engage in the export of food on a large scale. We as a country import something like $4 billion of agricultural goods year. That is equivalent, according to the experts, to one out of two meals.

The situation in agriculture per se is paralleled by that in fisheries. The world demand for fish has not diminished, but the supply has dramatically diminished. This is another opportunity for the Atlantic region to become a food basket for the rest of the world. The Maritime Farmers' Council has made a commitment to itself and to the country to triple agricultural production over the next 15 to 30 years. The goal is to help make the region self-sufficient in food production, with enough surplus to enable the Atlantic region to become a net exporter of food as well.

The Atlantic regional veterinary college that I am proposing today in my private member's motion is essential in that over-all strategy, because it can play an important role in encouraging and stimulating production efficiency in animal agriculture and in farming of marine species—or aquaculture as it is called—throughout the four Atlantic provinces.

I would like now to talk about the particular role I have in mind for the Atlantic regional veterinary college. A couple of examples are obvious. The first example which I wish to mention is that of preventive medicine. Traditionally veterinary medicine has been geared toward "salvage practice", as it is called in the profession, or concentration on sick animals. More and more, however, the direction of veterinary medicine is toward improving the general level of health of the animal population. In other words, the emphasis is on prevention.

In the United States the total value of livestock and poultry exceeds $35 billion. The estimated losses from animal diseases is $3 billion in that country. Disease in cattle alone results in a $1 billion loss per year. Swine losses are over $800 million or 20 per cent of the gross income of swine breeders. A similar situation exists in Canada, particularly in the Atlantic provinces. The goal should be to reduce waste. It is estimated that 12 to 15 per cent of every dollar spent on food production is wasted because of disease. This is an area where a veterinary college could play a vital role in assisting the Atlantic region to become more efficient and more productive as it strives toward the goal of food self-sufficiency.

Moving on from agriculture for a moment to fisheries, the goal of improved husbandry in fisheries and in other marine life is relevant to veterinary medicine. Unfortunately, the tools for the prevention, the control, and the eradication of fish diseases are still very few in the Atlantic region, throughout the rest of Canada and, indeed, in many parts of the world. The Atlantic regional veterinary college would give a huge boost to the fisheries industry by strengthening this area of weakness.

We need to improve harvesting techniques in fisheries. We also need to improve diversification of production, quality control, marketing, modernization of handling methods and professional training. The marine aspects of the proposed college are among the most unique and futuristic parts of the plan, and they are a vital part of the rationale or the justification for an Atlantic regional veterinary college. The recent establishment by Canada of a 200-mile offshore limit makes fisheries all the more economically significant and the proposal which we are debating today all the more relevant.

Quite apart from the offshore fisheries is the question of fish farming. In the next ten to 15 years this area could have a major economic impact. In some countries, such as the United States, fish farming has surpassed the offshore catch of some of the main species of food in a period of less than five to six years. In all those ways which I have mentioned, and in others which I did not, veterinary medicine could play a key role in training, direct service, research, extension and continuing education.

The college would not only be for the benefit of the people directly involved in the food industries, the farmers and fishermen, but also for the benefit of agrologists, veterinarians, biologists and many others, in fact, everyone involved in food production. The Atlantic regional veterinary college could become a vital ingredient in the economic infrastructure of the whole area.

I would like to talk for a moment about a specific dimension of the problem which we have at hand. Despite the importance of veterinary medicine to the Atlantic provinces, the region is not now directly served by a veterinary college. It is the only region of Canada which is not directly served by such a college. At present, there are three colleges. One is the Ontario Veterinary College at Guelph, the only English-speaking veterinary college in eastern Canada. The second college is the Western College of Veterinary Medicine at Saskatoon, on the campus of the University of Saskatchewan. The third is the Faculty of Veterinary Medicine at Saint-Hyacinthe in the province of Quebec.

Each is a regional school. These colleges have a national role, but essentially they are designed to serve their respective regions. The Western College of Veterinary Medicine, for example, serves British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Its operating costs are met by all four provinces, just as all four contributed to the capital costs originally. That particular college does not accept, as a general rule, although there are exceptions, students from outside the region. The same is true, to a lesser extent, of Guelph and Saint-Hyacinthe.

The Guelph veterinary college has an unwritten quota of something like six students for the Atlantic region. It is the only English-speaking veterinary college in eastern Canada. Yet it accepts only six students each year from my region. No wonder there is a dire need for vets in Atlantic Canada, in private practice, in government and in teaching. In 1975 the number of vets per 100,000 in the Atlantic region was 7.81. In the rest of Canada the corresponding figure was 14.45. The number of students entering a veterinary program per million population for the Atlantic provinces was only 3.7. In the rest of Canada the corresponding figure was 11.9. Hon. members can appreciate the disparity. With only six students accepted every year from the Atlantic region, mostly by Guelph, we are not even holding our own. We need 26 graduates every year just to conform to the national average, but we are falling far short of that figure. You can see why we have a short supply, Mr. Speaker.

A similar situation is true nationally, regarding supply. The three colleges combined take in about 260 students. A recent study of manpower conditions conducted by the provincial veterinary associations predicts a national shortage of 100 veterinarians per year in the foreseeable future.

There is a special need in the area of teaching, Mr. Speaker. If my memory serves me correctly, there are 3,900 registered veterinarians in all of Canada. Forty per cent of them are employed outside private practice. At Western College of Veterinary Medicine only 40 per cent of the 75 professionals on staff are Canadian. The college is finding it extremely difficult to attract Canadian faculty. Dr. Ole Nielsen, Dean of Veterinary Medicine there, states the case graphically when he is quoted in an article which appeared in the June-July 1980 issue of University Affairs, which reads in part as follows:

'There's a cutthroat competition for faculty right now', he states. The college must compete for faculty with veterinary schools in the rest of Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom. In the U.S. eight new veterinary schools have opened, or are in the process of opening, during the last 10 years, says Dr. Nielsen, and at times the situation for MCVM is 'absolutely desperate'.

It is a dire situation indeed, Mr. Speaker. If such is true in the western provinces where there is a regional veterinary college, you can imagine the situation in the Atlantic region where there is no college. We in Canada have been importing 30 or 40 veterinarians every year, between 1964 to 1976. The experts indicate that, in the foreseeable future, we will need to continue importing 20 to 30 veterinarians every year.

The irony and the scandal is that, at the very time we are going outside Canada for veterinarians, the three existing Canadian colleges must turn away qualified students in droves. About 1,000 applications are received at Guelph every year for the first year of pre-veterinary medicine. But the college is able to accept only about 120 people.

The situation was described very well in a report prepared by Dr. R. G. Thomson, Planning Co-ordinator for the planned Atlantic regional veterinary college. He refers to the irony I am talking about. On the one hand, Canada is recruiting veterinarians outside Canada; while, on the other hand, we are denying qualified Canadians access to veterinary education. If I may paraphrase what he says in that report, Mr. Speaker, Canada should be specializing in veterinary medicine, rather than depending on other countries. We should be producing veterinarians to take care not only of our own needs but also the needs of other countries, especially the developing countries.

The Atlantic regional veterinary college that I have in mind would be a regional resource but, at the same time, a national resource. It would be modest by Canadian standards, even by Atlantic regional standards. It would accept about 50 students per year, in contrast with the 70 or so students accepted every year at the Western College of Veterinary Medicine. If we allowed for a growth of six per cent per year as a result of establishing this college, we would be close to meeting our regional needs providing the graduates were available as early as 1987. In other words, the Atlantic regional veterinary college would allow for an average growth of 6 per cent per year to the year 2000, starting in 1987.

The need in veterinary medicine that I have referred to concerning fisheries, agriculture, preventive medicine, research, continuing education and other areas was recognized by the atlantic region and by the federal government some years ago. In 1975, the Maritime Province Higher Education Commission engaged Dr. D. G. Howell, who was then the Dean of Veterinary Medicine at Guelph, to produce a report on the subject. This report strongly recommended the establishment of the Atlantic regional veterinary college. He documented, in great scientific detail, both the feasibility of such a college and the need for it. The commission deliberated on the report, accepted Dr. Howell's recommendations and took some action.

Among other things, Dr. Howell recommended that the college be established in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island—which is in my riding of Hillsborough—as the logical site by academic criteria. That is not the point that I wish to address, however. Naturally, I have an interest in the college being established and particularly in it being established in my riding. But my main concern is that it be established in the region because of our great need, irrespective of site. The council of maritime premiers has been trying, ever since Dr. Howell reported, to reach a consensus on the need to establish the college and especially on a site for it. For obvious political reasons, they have become bogged down to a degree. Each premier has been subjected to a good deal of pressure within his own province to have the college located there.

While they have recognized the regional need, they have—to an extent which I think is unhealthy—risked losing the whole project altogether because of failure to reach a consensus. There is cause for optimism, however; there seems to be light at the end of the tunnel. At their meeting recently on Prince Edward Island, the premiers went a long way toward agreeing on the need for the college and on the site.

I should like to mention a few details about the college that is shaping up, Mr. Speaker. It would cost about $25 million. The estimated annual operating cost would be about $4 million. The proposal contemplates that the federal government would meet 50 per cent of the total capital costs, with the rest being met by the four provinces on a per capita basis. The operating costs would largely be met by the participating provinces, again on a per capita basis.

Mr. Speaker, from time to time issues arise in this House which transcend parties, transcend politics, and transcend partisanship. The Atlantic regional veterinary college is such an issue. It would not be just an education facility but is a proposal for a major ingredient in the economic infrastructure of the Atlantic region. It would especially complement fisheries and agriculture, but it would have multiplier effects right across the board. As such there is a lot to be said for it.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), when he was a member of an earlier cabinet, took steps to bring the college into existence. I would like to pay tribute to the leadership role he has played and continues to play in that connection. Because this is a non-partisan issue I urge all members—regardless of politics, regardless of party, and regardless of where they sit—to support the motion and to do so vigorously.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would very briefly like to respond to the questions raised by my hon. colleague on the other side, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), concerning the establishment of a fourth veterinary college in Canada, to be located in the Atlantic provinces.

That college would, of course, be located in the Atlantic provinces and would aim its courses of study on preventive animal and marine health as well as fish hatcheries. It could of course extend preventive medicine to all other forms of agricultural production. This issue is of great interest to the government at present, Mr. Speaker, and in particular to the Department of Agriculture, and has been so for several years, since Agriculture Canada is quite aware of the situation which exists at present in the maritimes. Everybody can appreciate the importance of having enough veterinarians to satisfy the needs of the agricultural sectors in these areas and to ensure the training which may be necessary.

Agriculture Canada employs a good many veterinarians who have always had an important role to play in developing Canadian agriculture, especially in the fields of livestock and poultry production. Veterinary medicine will also have a role to play in developing fish hatcheries, a field which up until now was in the hands of biologists. But first of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to review briefly the situation as to the possibility of establishing a fourth veterinary college in the maritimes.

As mentioned by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) a national survey was made in 1970 and 1971 of manpower resources in the field of veterinary medicine and techniques which revealed a general shortage of veterinarians across Canada. The committee, therefore, recommended an increase in the number of annual inscriptions at Canadian veterinary colleges. Two years later, cabinet agreed to negotiate an increase in the number of veterinary colleges by accepting, in principle, the setting up of a fourth college. In 1974, the federal government signed agreements with the provincial governments concerned accepting, in principle, to finance up to 50 per cent of the costs incurred to expand the three existing colleges, namely, those of Guelph, Saint-Hyacinthe and Saskatoon. On the other hand, in 1975, the governments of the maritime provinces, as pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough, asked Dr. Howell, dean of the veterinary college of Ontario, to conduct a study on the needs of their area and the possiblity of establishing there a fourth veterinary college.

At the time, Agriculture Canada paid half the cost of the studies. In his report, Dr. Howell recommends the creation of a school of preventive animal and marine health at the Prince Edward Island University located at Charlottetown. Later on, the council of ministers of the maritime provinces studied Dr. Howell's recommendations and set up a committee to look into the situation further. By that time, the P.E.I. government had contributed $200,000 to finance the study. Throughout that period, it had opposed the recommendation to set up the veterinary college in Charlottetown. It wanted the college built in Truro.

Besides, it was on January 28, 1980, that the matter was withdrawn from the agenda of the council of maritime premiers because Premier MacLean thought Prince Edward Island could not afford the financial cost of the project. Mr. Speaker, how is the study and planning for the establishment of that fourth college progressing? The development program of the Ontario veterinary college is completed while the Saint-Hyacinthe school of veterinary medicine in the riding I have the honour to represent in the House, expansion and development work is moving very nicely. At the Saskatoon veterinary college the development or expansion project is still at the planning stage.

So I think that with the expansion of actual colleges, until this fourth college is established, it will be possible to meet the demand for veterinary education better. It must also be pointed out that every year the Guelph college reserves a minimum of six places for English-speaking students from the maritime provinces. As far as the Saint-Hyacinthe veterinary college is concerned, the University of Montreal has reached an agreement with the New Brunswick education department to take at least—and that is not many—two students a year from that province. As you can see, students from the maritime provinces are not totally devoid of opportunities of registering in veterinary medicine colleges. They are not totally deprived, Mr. Speaker, but I am convinced—and I believe my colleagues in the maritime provinces know it quite well—that there are a lot more young people in 1980, in this coming decade, interested in going into that field of education.

Mr. Speaker, recently we learned that new regulations on brucellosis in the United States had been amended and that that amendment to the amendments to those same regulations helped Canadian exports of livestock to the States. And the new set of regulations introduced by the Department of Agriculture and the U.S. Department of Agriculture—and that is to the credit of the representatives of the maritime provinces—recognizes the provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland as areas exempt of brucellosis. The cattle shipped from the Atlantic provinces to the United States will only have to be accompanied by a certificate attesting they come from an area recognized as exempt of brucellosis and reacted negatively to a anti-brucellosis test. Those exports will have to be accompanied by a certificate signed by an Agriculture Canada veterinarian.

That shows in any case that there is already a lot of work being done in Atlantic Canada in preventive veterinary medicine. And quite recently, again with a view to having more veterinarians, the convention of the order of Quebec veterinarians took place and was held, of course, in Saint-Hyacinthe at the veterinary school, and the theme of that convention this year was "The Vet and the Environment—a soul-searching experience". And, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to quote a few words by Michelle Alie of the faculty of veterinary medicine who says, and I quote:

> When one day it is too late to talk of "negligible residues" and we can talk about real contamination of animal and man, we will look for those responsible for the problems of production and reproduction in our herds, or at man's level, so-called "civilization" diseases.

Mr. Speaker, this was in the spring, at a convention of the order of veterinarians. Obviously, we need more veterinarians as we are continuously increasing our agricultural output. We just need to think about our hog production which increased considerably, by 27 per cent in the seventies. And thank God, we did not have any serious diseases in that sector.

Very recently during the study of supplementary estimates I asked the director of Agriculture Canada if our veterinarians would be ready if there were an outbreak of contagious disease among hogs as we have become a country which produces hogs of very good quality, a very good meat, the best hog produced in North America. He told me that they would not really be ready if there were an outbreak of contagious disease in the pork industry. So you will understand why we raised the number of registrations. We must supply more and more veterinarians and I think that the people from the maritimes are entitled to it. Their request is perfectly justified. Dr. Howell's study recommended the establishment of a fourth college of veterinary medicine in the maritimes.

I think of the slaughterhouses we have everywhere in Canada. I think of the slaughterhouses in Quebec. I want to tell you about some experiences in my province. Some slaughterhouses have the seal "Quebec approved" and others the seal "Canada approved". Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that all slaughterhouses in Quebec would like to have the "Canada approved" seal. Why? It is very simple. The competence of our veterinarians is certainly more recognized, more advanced than in some other sectors.

So, to conclude, I shall say that the proposals concerning the creation of that fourth college for veterinarians are still to be considered and I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and that the Government of Canada are perfectly aware of this, but it should be considered, of course, in the context of the budgetary restrictions of the federal government for the 1980s.

● (1640)

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise to speak on this motion to consider the advisability of a fourth veterinary college in Canada in the Atlantic provinces.

New Democratic Party policy states very specifically that we should and must develop the kind of education which is required to enable the agricultural industry in Canada to develop in the direction which is best for Canada. Along with that total factor of education we must include veterinary colleges. As an educator myself I find I am really prepared to give some advice about the development of any kind of college, but after listening to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), I am of the opinion that any advice I might give is probably superfluous because, quite obviously, he and his colleagues in the area who are looking toward the development of a veterinary college in the maritimes have done their homework and know quite a bit about what they are getting into.

Planning any kind of a college or any kind of educational institution must be done well, and be thorough if it is to produce an effective institution. The needs must be well defined if it is going to do what the people want it to do, or think it should do, for that particular area. In my career as an educator I have too often watched the development of institutions which were not well planned and where the objectives were not well defined. Those kinds of institutions in many cases have been funded by federal money, and sometimes it has been my belief that the money was available and the use of the money was more the objective of the development than the educational benefits which would accrue from it.

A second factor which I think should be recognized is that a college of this type must look into the kinds of areas which are not being well taken care of by the present three colleges. The example of western veterinary colleges has come up on several occasions and I think that the maritime provinces could learn a lot by discussing with the people who were responsible for the development of the regional colleges in the west the problems they experienced in getting together to form a team to develop the college in Saskatoon.

In the party to which the hon. member for Hillsborough belongs there are a couple of westerners who could contribute a considerable amount to this project. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), during his period as minister of agriculture, was very instrumental in getting the four provinces in the west together, leading to the kind of co-operation which allowed them to get a regional college in Saskatchewan. The negotiations resulted in Edmonton getting a library and college, and Saskatoon getting the veterinary college, etc. I think it is necessary for the maritimes to follow this kind of approach if they wish to get the kind of college proposed.

The agricultural proposals which were brought forward by the hon. member for Hillsborough are very interesting. This is an area which I am sure none of the other colleges have gone into in any depth. Research in this area should be developed as much as possible. The other member in the party of the hon. member for Hillsborough is the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) who, at the time of the development of the western regional veterinary college, was a member of the board of governors of the University of Alberta. He, too, was very instrumental in getting the kind of college which the western provinces wished to have.

On behalf of my party I would like to say that what we have done is part of our policy in the west. We have put forward as strongly as possible the idea that such institutions must be developed so that rural youth can get the type of training which will make them good members of the agricultural industry. Too often decisions are made at government level based on the idea that one can farm or carry on in agriculture without the training that is necessary in other industries. This is far from true, and it is good to realize that the maritimes are attempting to put forward for their use the kind of institution which would allow them to have the kind of training which they need. Therefore the New Democratic Party supports this proposal and if the maritime provinces can get together on what kind of institution they want, and where it should be located, we would support them in every way we could.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I hear members on the other side of the House calling for the question. I am certain they would not want to prevent a member from New Brunswick from speaking on such an important project, which I support in principle. I want to make this clear right from the start. However, Mr. Speaker, there are certain things that I want to mention as a citizen of New Brunswick, a member from New Brunswick, and also in my special capacity as a French Canadian, of which I am proud.

Mr. Speaker, the suggestion made in the motion of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) is most worth while, and I wish to underline this, because, as stated by the previous speaker, the residents of the four eastern provinces have to beg to be registered at veterinary colleges in other Canadian provinces.

● (1650)

As concerns French-speaking Canadians in the Atlantic region, the Acadians, the Francophones originally from Quebec who settled in the maritimes five or six generations ago, for instance the Brayons of the Republic of Madawaska, I would like to note that not only is there no veterinary school in the Atlantic region, but also that there is only one French school in the entire country, and as noted by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy), it is located in the lovely city of Saint-Hyacinthe in Quebec. This is still quite far from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and even farther from Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

What I want to point out especially in this debate is that not only French-speaking Canadians of the Atlantic region have fewer opportunities than anyone else, but they must also submit to the good will of an institution in a neighbouring province. I do not know exactly how many places have been reserved at the Saint-Hyacinthe veterinary college, Mr. Speaker, but I do know that students from New Brunswick get the remaining places if there are any, so that in the Madawaska area there are only four or five veterinarians, some with the provincial government, others with the federal government. All of them come from the province of Quebec. Not only young people from our area cannot register in a French language veterinary college but we have also to rely on graduates from Quebec to fill the minimum positions available in our area. That obviously supports the arguments of the hon. member for Hillsborough that the veterinary college be established as soon as possible.

There is an aspect of that project which is very interesting and that is aquaculture. All members of the House of Commons are aware that Acadian people, French-speaking people from New Brunswick, from Prince Edward Island and from Nova Scotia have a special interest in developing fisheries, research in fisheries, as many of them make a living from that resource. I would have hoped that in the spirit of comprise which we usually succeed in developing in Canada between the two major language communities, I would have hoped that in the consideration of the Atlantic region veterinary college they could have recognized the needs of the French-speaking people in the area. Unfortunately, it seems this has not been done. I would have hoped that in my own province of New Brunswick, whose premier is a member of the council of maritime premiers, the premier would have spoken for Francophones so that in the course of the negotiations and talks with the two other premiers, he could have ensured a minimum of French-speaking participation in that institution. I am sure that my hon. friend from Hillsborough would not object to that kind of concept, that kind of participation of the two main linguistic communities in the area. I feel there is still time to consider this. At any rate, I rise this evening in this House to request it. I ask that this be considered, and that in co-operation with the University of Prince Edward Island in our own University of New Brunswick, they hire French-speaking and French culture professors, and researchers, in order that our French-speaking citizens in New Brunswick, in Prince Edward Island and in Nova Scotia may use the excellent teaching facilities and research opportunities that will exist, so that we, French-speaking citizens of New Brunswick, are not eternally forced to go to Quebec to get a minimum of services in our language.

We are citizens in our own right and we want to have at home, in our own province, as much as Quebeckers have in their province—our own services and our own facilities.

I would conclude on this. It is unfortunate that we do not have another hour to discuss this, because one of my colleagues, himself a veterinarian, the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder), wishes to contribute.

[English]

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) for bringing this matter to the attention of the House because it gives me an opportunity to say some things about my profession which I think the House should hear.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to mention the fact that I know Dr. Reg Thomson, who is doing a feasibility study on this college in the maritimes. He is a former student of mine, and also a personal friend. I also would like to mention that Dennis Howell, who did the original study, also was a colleague of mine and again a personal friend. I think we are very fortunate in this country to have men of this calibre who have been making these kinds of studies.

Rather than go on record as saying that I favour or do not favour the establishment of this veterinary college in the maritimes, I would like to put in perspective what it really means to be a veterinarian, so that if hon. members are going to vote on the establishment of a veterinary college, they really will have some idea about what they are doing.

I suspect that few hon. members know that one of the main reasons for the shortage of veterinarians in Canada today is that four of them are now members of Parliament in this House of Commons, so there has been a loss there. I suspect it would be rather immodest of me to say that not only are we losing quantity but that we are also losing quality from the profession to the House of Commons.

One of the things which happens in professions is that they become popular for reasons of which we sometimes are not really sure, but I suspect that one of the things which makes veterinary medicine popular in this country is the book written by James Herriott, "All Creatures Great and Small". When I was—

The Right Honorable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, P.C., Q.C., M.P., LL.L., M.A., F.R.S.C., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Since you last wrote to me in March, the United States Government has taken a number of major steps to ensure that the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System is completed expeditiously.

Most significantly, the Department of Energy has acted to expedite the Alaskan project. The North Slope producers and Alaskan segment sponsors have signed a joint statement of intention on financing and a cooperative agreement to manage and fund continued design and engineering of the pipeline and conditioning plant. The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission recently has certified the eastern and western legs of the system.

The United States also stands ready to take appropriate additional steps necessary for completion of the ANGTS. For example, I recognize the reasonable concern of Canadian project sponsors that they be assured recovery of their investment in a timely manner if, once project construction is commenced, they proceed in good faith with completion of the Canadian portions of the project and the Alaskan segment is delayed. In this respect, they have asked that they be given confidence that they will be able to recover their cost from U.S. shippers once Canadian regulatory certification that the entire pipeline in Canada is prepared to commence service is secured. I accept the view of your Government that such assurances are materially important to ensure the financing of the Canadian portion of the system.

Existing U.S. law and regulatory practices may cast doubt on this matter. For this reason, and because I remain steadfastly of the view that the expeditious construction of the project remains in the mutual interests of both our countries, I would be prepared at the appropriate time to initiate action before the U.S. Congress to remove any impediment as many exist under present law to providing that desired confidence for the Canadian portion of the line.

Our Government also appreciates the timely way in which you and Canada have taken steps to advance your side of this vital energy project. In view of this progress, I can assure you that the U.S. Government not only remains committed to the project; I am able to state with confidence that the U.S. Government now is satisfied that the entire Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System will be completed. The United States' energy requirements and the current unacceptable level of dependence on oil imports require that the project be completed without delay. Accordingly, I will take appropriate action directed at meeting the objective of completing the project by the end of 1985. I trust these recent actions on our part provide your government with the assurances you need from us to enable you to complete the procedures in Canada that are required before commencement of construction on the pre-build sections of the pipeline.

In this time of growing uncertainty over energy supplies, the U.S. must tap its substantial Alaskan gas reserves as soon as possible. The XXVI trillion cubic feet of natural gas in Prudhoe Bay represents more than ten per cent of the United States' total proven reserves of natural gas. Our governments agreed in 1977 that the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System was the most environmentally sound and mutually beneficial means for moving this resource to market. Access to gas from the Arctic regions of both countries is even more critical today as a means of reducing the dependence on imported petroleum.

Successful completion of this project will underscore once again the special character of cooperation on a broad range of issues that highlights the U.S./Canadian relationship.

I look forward to continuing to work with you to make this vital energy system a reality.

Sincerely,

(Signed: Jimmy Carter)

STATEMENT OF INTENTION BY PRUDHOE BAY PRODUCERS AND SPONSORS OF NORTHWEST ALASKA

Joint Statement of Intention

Atlantic Richfield Company, Exxon Corporation, and Sohio Alaska Petroleum Company (the Producers), and Alaskan Northwest Natural Gas Transportation Company, a partnership (Alaskan Northwest), enter into this Joint Statement of Intention at the request of the United States Department of Energy.

Preliminary Recitals

The Producers and Alaskan Northwest have a common interest in the efficient and cost-effective construction and operation of the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System (ANGTS) including the conditioning plant at the earliest practicable date. Alaskan Northwest has developed a construction schedule for the ANGTS which would result in completion of the system in 1985.

The facilities to be constructed in the State of Alaska which are necessary to placing the ANGTS in service require immense capital investment, and private sector lenders who will be asked to advance funds for the construction of Alaskan facilities will require reasonable assurance that the facilities will be completed and placed in service, and their debt serviced.

The President's Decision and Report to Congress describes the plan for private financing of the ANGTS to be implemented by Alaskan Northwest. Alaskan Northwest has indicated that the Alaskan segment of ANGTS can be financed in the private sector, if there is meaningful participation by the Producers in the financing structure. The Producers have indicated willingness to participate in a substantial way with Alaskan Northwest in the financing of the Alaskan pipeline and conditioning plan upon reasonable terms and conditions, provided they are not placed in the position of becoming, in effect, the ultimate guarantors of completion of the ANGTS and provided that their financial exposure is effectively limited.

In an effort to move forward in surmounting the acknowledged difficulties presented by this project, the parties have entered into a Cooperative Agreement for continued design and engineering of the Alaskan gas pipeline and the conditioning plant which will prepare natural gas produced from the Prudhoe Bay unit of Alaska for transmission through ANGTS.

Statement of Intention

It is the mutual objective of the Producers and Alaskan Northwest that the ANGTS be completed and placed in service at the earliest practicable date, and, accordingly, the producers and Alaskan Northwest intend to use their best efforts, on a joint and cooperative basis, to expedite design, engineering and cost estimation.

The Producers, together with their advisers, will work with Alaskan Northwest in an effort to develop its financing plan in such time and manner so that necessary governmental approvals may be obtained and construction commenced and completed as scheduled by Alaskan Northwest.

It is recognized that in order for the financing plan to be acceptable to the financial community the project must be economically sound and the financing plan must accommodate reasonably desired protections for the interests of potential lenders. If the parties, or any of them, conclude that alternative approaches in financing, or waivers of law under the Alaskan Natural Gas Transportation Act are necessary to effectuate a feasible and effective plan of financing, such party or parties may develop alternatives and advise appropriate authorities of their conclusions.

This statement of intention shall be signed after approval thereof by the Department of Energy and the Department of Justice.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the parties have executed this Statement on June, 1980.

Concurrent Resolution Expressing the Sense of Congress Regarding the Importance of the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System

Whereas, the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System is a critically important energy project that will tap Alaska's North Slope natural gas reserves which constitute more than ten per cent of this nation's entire proven natural gas reserves;

Whereas, the System, when complete, will supply the United States with five per cent of its annual natural gas demand, displacing over 400,000 barrels of oil thereby greatly reducing this nation's excessive dependence on foreign oil;

Whereas, the Congress has already expressed its overwhelming support for the System in approving by joint resolution the President's 1977 Decision on the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System;

Whereas, a portion of the System known as prebuild can be constructed by the end of 1981 to bring Canadian gas to this nation until the entire system is complete in 1985;

Whereas, pre-build will contribute to completion of the entire system by spreading demand for capital, labor and materials over several years, and will enable this nation to obtain Canadian natural gas to displace 200,000 barrels of foreign oil a day;

Whereas, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has issued decisions granting certificates for the prebuild facilities in the United States;

Whereas, the Sponsors of the Alaskan segment of the system and the North Slope natural gas producers have entered into an agreement to fund and manage jointly the design, engineering and cost estimation for the Alaskan segment and have made a joint Statement of Intention to work to develop a financing plan for the Alaskan segment with the object of completing construction by the end of 1985; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) that it is the sense of Congress that the System remains an essential part of securing this nation's energy future and, as such, enjoys the highest level of Congressional support for its expeditious construction and completion by the end of 1985.

OTTAWA, K1A 0A2
March 12, 1980

Mr. Jimmy Carter,
President of the United States of America.

Dear Jimmy,

Two and a half years ago, representatives of our two governments signed the agreement on principles for a northern natural gas pipeline project. The pipeline offers substantial economic advantages to both our countries and provides the United States with access to Alaskan gas. The Canadian Government remains committed to the pipeline and I know from statements you made when we last met March 3 1979 in Washington, and since, that the United States Administration remains determined that the project proceed as quickly as possible.

The lack of progress on the financing of the Alaska portion of the line is, however, a cause for concern. Failure to establish a basis to assure the financeability of the Alaska portion will lead to delays that could jeopardize the entire project.

For some time now efforts have been directed to beginning construction of the pipeline in the south, rather than in Alaska as was originally intended, the so-called "pre-build" concept. Hearings are under way before the National Energy Board in Canada and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in the United States to authorize construction of these pre-built sections to carry Alberta gas to United States markets prior to the completion of the line and the arrival of Alaska gas. Both governments have expressed support for the pre-build concept. However, the Canadian Government cannot, under the Northern Pipeline Act, authorize the construction of any part of the line, including pre-build, until it is assured that the entire line will be completed.

The Foothills Company, owner of the pipeline in Canada, has expressed, to our government and to yours, grave concern about the delays and is reluctant to invest more money until the uncertainties are resolved. Failure to resolve the Alaska financing promptly could add more than a year's delay to the construction of the pre-build sections and, therefore, could conceivably lead to the indefinite postponement of the whole project.

I know that you will continue your efforts to resolve this serious problem standing in the way of the pipeline project.

With warm regards,

Yours sincerely,
(Signed: Pierre E. Trudeau)

HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL IN COUNCIL, on the recommendation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, pursuant to subsection 17(2) of the National Energy Board Act, is pleased hereby to approve the variations in Licence No. GL-56 by:

(1) deleting the phrase "at a place on the international boundary line between Canada and the United States of America near Emerson, in the Province of Manitoba" where it occurs therein and substituting therefor the phrase "at places on the international boundary line between Canada and the United States of America near Monchy, in the Province of Saskatchewan and near Emerson, in the Province of Manitoba".

(2) adding the following condition:

"8. Of the total quantity of gas authorized for export during each of the periods specified in condition 2, the quantity of gas that may be exported near Monchy, Saskatchewan, shall not exceed:

(a) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1981, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1982, 2,613,700 cubic metres in any one day, or 954,000,000 cubic metres in the period;

(b) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1982, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1985, 4,849,400 cubic metres in any one day, or 1,770,000,000 cubic metres in any consecutive twelve-month period ending on the 31st day of October;

(c) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1985, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1986, 4,249,200 cubic metres in any one day, or 1,550,000,000 cubic metres in the period;

(d) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1986, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1987, 2,124,600 cubic metres in any one day, or 775,000,000 cubic metres in the period, or

(e) for the six year period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1981, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1987, 7,648,500,000 cubic metres in the period."

IN THE MATTER OF a variation, pursuant to subsection 17(2) of the National Energy Board Act, of Licence No. GL-58 issued to Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd., filed with the Board under File No. 1537-P23-3.

BEFORE the Board on Monday, the 14th day of April, 1980

UPON an application by Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd. (hereinafter called "the Licensee"), dated the 12th day of February, 1980, for an order varying Licence No. GL-58 so as to allow the Licensee flexibility in its deliveries of quantities authorized for export under the licence,

AND UPON a public hearing having been held, commencing on the 18th day of March, 1980, at which the Licensee and other interested parties have been heard,

IT IS ORDERED

THAT Licence No. GL-58 be and the same is hereby changed, altered and varied by:

(1) revoking condition 1 therefrom and substituting therefor the following:

"1. The term of this licence shall commence on the 1st day of November, 1981, and end on the 31st day of October, 1988."

(2) revoking paragraphs (d) and (e) of condition 2 therefrom and substituting therefor the following paragraphs:

"(d) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1986, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1987, 6 232 100 cubic metres in any one day, or during the period, 2 073 600 000 cubic metres plus an "additional" quantity of gas, subject to condition 8, equal to the difference between the quantity of gas authorized for export under paragraph (a) during the twelve-month period ending the 31st day of October, 1982, and the quantity of gas actually exported under this licence during that twelve-month period, up to a maximum quantity of 13,605,100 cubic metres in any one day or 4,526,800,000 cubic metres during the period.
(e) for the "extended" period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1987, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1988, and subject to condition 8, 24,928,500 cubic metres in any one day, or a quantity of gas during the period equal to the difference between the quantity of gas authorized for export under paragraph (a) during the twelve-month period ending the 31st day of October, 1982, and the quantity of gas actually exported under this licence during that twelve month period, less the quantity of such gas exported during the twelve-month period ending on the 31st day of October, 1987.
(f) 37,324,800,000 cubic metres during the term of this licence."

(3) adding the following condition:

"8. the additional quantity of gas specified in condition 2 paragraph (d) and the gas authorized for export during the extended period, condition 2 paragraph (e), shall be subject to having the quantity authorized for export during the respective periods reduced by the Board should deliverability be insufficient to meet the Canadian requirements and authorized exports."

LICENCE NO. GL-62

IN THE MATTER OF an application by Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd. (hereinafter called "the Licensee") pursuant to the provisions of the National Energy Board Act (hereinafter referred to as "the Act") for a licence under Part VI thereof for the exportation of gas, under File No. 1537-P23-4.

BEFORE the Board on Monday, the 14th day of April, 1980.

WHEREAS an application dated the 12th day of February, 1980, has been made by the Licensee to the National Energy Board under Part VI of the Act for a licence for the exportation of gas at a place on the international boundary line between Canada and the United States of America near Kingsgate in the Province of Saskatchewan,

AND WHEREAS a public hearing has been held, commencing on the 18th day of March, 1980, at which the Licensee and other interested parties have been heard,

AND WHEREAS the Board has satisfied itself that the quantity of gas to be exported does not exceed the surplus remaining after due allowance has been made for the reasonably foreseeable requirements for use in Canada,

AND WHEREAS the Board has satisfied itself that the price to be charged by the Licensee for gas to be exported by it is just and reasonable in relation to the public interest,

NOW THEREFORE the National Energy Board, pursuant to section 82 of the Act, hereby issues this licence to Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd. for the exportation of gas at a place on the international boundary line between Canada and the United States of America near Monchy in the Province of Saskatchewan.

This licence is subject to the following terms and conditions:

1. The term of this licence shall commence on the 1st day of November, 1984, and end on the 31st day of October, 1987.

2. The quantity of gas that may be exported under the authority of and in accordance with this licence shall not exceed:

(a) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1984 and ending on the 31st day of October, 1985, 6,232,100 cubic metres in any one day, or 2,073,600,000 cubic metres in the period;

(b) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1985, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1986, 12,464,000 cubic metres in any one day, or 4,147,200,000 cubic metres in the period;

(c) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1986, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1987, 5,091,300 cubic metres in any one day, or 1,694,000,000 cubic metres in the period, or

(d) 7,914,800,000 cubic metres during the term of this licence.

3. As a tolerance, the amount the Licensee may export under this licence may, in any 24-hour period, exceed the daily limitation imposed in condition 2 by two per cent of such amount.

4.(1) The price to be received for gas exported in each month comprised in the term of this licence, including all transmission costs of moving gas to the international boundary line between Canada and the United States of America, shall be not greater than and not less than the Canadian dollar equivalent for each such month of $4.17 in United States currency per gigajoule of gross heating value.

(2) The Canadian dollar equivalent for each month comprised in the term of this licence shall be an amount in Canadian dollars equal to the price in United States dollars specified in subcondition (1), converted to Canadian dollars at the rate of exchange for each such month, which rate of exchange shall be the average of the noon spot exchange rates for the United States dollar in terms of Canadian dollars in each month, as published by the Bank of Canada.

5. Gas exported under the authority of and in accordance with this licence shall be delivered to the point of export near Monchy, in the Province of Saskatchewan, through the pipeline systems of Foothills Pipe Lines (Alta.) Ltd. and Foothills Pipe Lines (Sask.) Ltd.

6. The quantity, relative density and gross heating value of all gas exported under the authority of and in accordance with this licence shall be measured by the Licensee in a manner approved by the Board.

7. The Licensee shall, within 15 days of the end of each month comprised in the term of this licence, file with the Board a report setting forth the daily quantities, relative density and gross heating value of the gas exported hereunder.

AND WHEREAS a public hearing has been held, commencing on the 18th day of March, 1980, at which the Licensee and other interested parties have been heard,

AND WHEREAS the Board has satisfied itself that the quantity of gas to be exported does not exceed the surplus remaining after due allowance has been made for the reasonably foreseeable requirements for use in Canada,

AND WHEREAS the Board has satisfied itself that the price to be charged by the Licensee for gas to be exported by it is just and reasonable in relation to the public interest,

NOW THEREFORE the National Energy Board, pursuant to section 82 of the Act, hereby issues this licence to Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd. for the exportation of gas at a place on the international boundary line between Canada and the United States of America near Kingsgate in the Province of British Columbia.

This licence is subject to the following terms and conditions:

1. The term of this licence shall commence on the 1st day of November, 1980, and end on the 31st day of October, 1987.

2. The quantity of gas that may be exported under the authority of and in accordance with this licence shall not exceed:

(a) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1980 and ending on the 31st day of October, 1983, 931,500 cubic metres in any one day, or 340,000,000 cubic metres in any consecutive twelve month period ending on the 31st day of October; the total quantity of gas exported under this Licence during this period shall be taken from and reduce by the same amount the quantity of gas authorized to be exported during the balance of the term of this licence;

(b) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1983, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1984, 1,869,700 cubic metres in any one day or 622,100,000 cubic metres in the period;

(c) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1984, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1985, 3,739,400 cubic metres in any one day, or 1,244,200,000 cubic metres in the period;

(d) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1985, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1986, 2,528,300 cubic metres in any one day, or 841,200,000 cubic metres in the period, plus an additional quantity of gas subject to condition 3 of 3,080,700 cubic metres in any one day, or 1,025,000,000 cubic metres in the period;

(e) for the period commencing on the 1st day of November, 1986, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1987, 5,786,400 cubic metres in any one day, or 1,925,300,000 cubic metres in the period, plus an additional quantity of gas subject to condition 3 of 1,692,000 cubic metres in any one day, or 563,000,000 cubic metres in the period;

(f)6,220,800,000 cubic metres during the term of this licence.

3. The additional quantities of gas authorized for export during the periods specified in paragraphs (d) and (e) of condition 2 shall be subject to having the quantities authorized for export reduced by the Board should deliverability be insufficient to meet the Canadian requirements and authorized exports.

4. As a tolerance, the amount the Licensee may export under this licence may, in any 24-hour period, exceed the daily limitation imposed in condition 2 by two per cent of such amount.

5.(1) The price to be received for gas exported in each month comprised in the term of this licence, including all transmission costs of moving gas to the international boundary line between Canada and the United States of America, shall be not greater than and not less than the Canadian dollar equivalent for each such month of $4.17 in United States currency per gigajoule of gross heating value.

(2) The Canadian dollar equivalent for each month comprised in the term of this licence shall be an amount in Canadian dollars equal to the price in United States dollars specified in subcondition (1), converted to Canadian dollars at the rate of exchange for each such month, which rate of exchange shall be the average of the noon spot exchange rates for the United States dollar in terms of Canadian dollars in each month, as published by the Bank of Canada.

6. Gas exported under the authority of and in accordance with this licence shall be delivered to the point of export near Kingsgate, in the Province of British Columbia, through the pipeline systems of Foothills Pipe Lines (Alta.) Ltd., Foothills Pipe Lines (South B.C.) Ltd., Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company Limited and Alberta Natural Gas Company Ltd.

7. The quantity, relative density and gross heating value of all gas exported under the authority of and in accordance with this licence shall be measured by the Licensee in a manner approved by the Board.

8. The Licensee shall, within 15 days of the end of each month comprised in the term of this licence, file with the Board a report setting forth the daily quantities, relative density and gross heating value of the gas exported hereunder.

17 July, 1980

HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL IN COUNCIL, on the recommendation of the Minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline Agency, pursuant to subsection 20(4) of the Northern Pipeline Act, is pleased hereby to approve the annexed Order No. NPO-2-80 made by the National Energy Board on the 2nd day of April, 1980.

ORDER NO. NPO-2-80

IN THE MATTER OF the Northern Pipeline Act and the Regulations made thereunder;

AND IN THE MATTER OF amending condition 12 of Schedule III, pursuant to subsection 20(4) of the Northern Pipeline Act.

BEFORE the Board on Wednesday, the 2nd day of April 1980.

WHEREAS the Board may amend any condition set out in Schedule III to the Northern Pipeline Act, pursuant to subsection 20(4) of the Act, subject to such amendment being effective with the approval of the Governor in Council;

AND WHEREAS condition 12 of Schedule III of the Northern Pipeline Act does not provide for the commencement of construction of a portion of the pipeline where the financing of the whole has not been obtained;

AND WHEREAS the Board considers that the provisions of condition 12 of Schedule III do not encompass the circumstances related to the pre-building of the southern sections of the pipeline and without in any way changing or altering the requirements under paragraph 4 of the Agreement set out in Schedule I of the Northern Pipeline Act.

NOW THEREFORE the National Energy Board, pursuant to subsection 20(4) of the Northern Pipeline Act, hereby amend Schedule III of the Northern Pipeline Act in accordance with the schedule attached hereto.

DATED at the City of Ottawa, in the Province of Ontario, this 2nd day of April, 1980.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Brian H. Whittle
Secretary

SCHEDULE

Condition 12 of Schedule III to the Northern Pipeline Act is rescinded and the following substituted therefore:

"12. (1) The company shall, before the commencement of construction of the pipeline,

(a) file with the Minister and the Board evidence that the company has been incorporated in Canada and is not a non-eligible person within the meaning of the Foreign Investment Review Act as that expression was defined in that Act on April 13, 1978;

(b) establish to the satisfaction of the Minister and the Board that financing has been obtained for that portion of the pipeline, hereinafter referred to as the pre-build sections, that will be used for the transmission of Canadian natural gas to the United States prior to the completion of the pipeline;

(c) establish to the satisfaction of the Minister and the Board that financing of that portion of the pipeline other than the pre-build sections, hereinafter referred to as the northern section, can be obtained to enable the pipeline to be completed before the end of 1985 and that protection can be provided against risk of non-completion of the pipeline and interruption of construction on a basis acceptable to the Minister and the Board; and

(d) file with the Minister and the Board documents relating to the financing obtained for the pre-build sections and such documents shall include all relevant contracts and instruments.

(2) The company shall, before commencing construction of that portion of the pipeline other than the pre-build sections,

(a) establish to the satisfaction of the Minister and the Board that financing has been obtained for the northern section and such financing includes protection against risk of noncompletion of the pipeline and interruption of construction on a basis acceptable to the Minister and the Board;

(b) file with the Minister and the Board all documents relating to the financing of the pipeline not already filed pursuant to 12(1)(d); and

(c) provide evidence to the Minister and the Board that debt instruments issued in connection with the financing of the pipeline do not contain a provision requiring the consent of the holders of those debt instruments to the financing of the construction of the Dempster Line referred to in the Agreement or any other provision, apart from normal trust indenture provisions generally applicable in the pipeline industry, that would prohibit, limit or inhibit the financing of the construction of the Dempster Line."

EXPLANATORY NOTE

This note is not part of Condition 12 but is intended for information purposes only

The amendment to Condition 12 of Schedule III to the Northern Pipeline Act requires that Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd. establish to the satisfaction of the Minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline Agency and the National Energy Board that financing has been obtained for "pre-build" facilities and can be obtained for the remainder of the pipeline in Canada so as to complete it by 1985.

DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

EXCLUSION OF NORTHWEST TERRITORIES FROM ITINERARY OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a subject which I feel is sure to be supported by all members of the House. Whereas the special committee of the House of Commons on the disabled and the handicapped has published its proposed itinerary in which it plans to travel to every province in Canada and to the Yukon Territory but for some reason has declined to visit the Northwest Territories, and whereas the Northwest Territories, which has always taken a special interest in this subject, takes serious exception to this exclusion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm), in the absence of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That the special committee of the House of Commons on the disabled and the handicapped travel to the Northwest Territories as well as to other territories and provinces.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INSTALLATION OF MOBILE AIR CONDITIONING UNITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my motion also is being put under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and arises out of the fact that we are here today on Monday, July 21. In order to destroy once and for all the hollow myth that the NDP is so fond of nurturing to the effect that they and they alone are the great defenders of the working people of this country, and in particular of the staff of Parliament, and yet it was the NDP which, on its own, took action which will extend unduly this session of Parliament and require the staff to remain at their post through the muggy heat of Ottawa's humid summer weather, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That during this NDP motivated prolongation of the current session of Parliament, mobile air conditioning units be installed in the English and French Hansard offices and the interpreters' booths where working conditions can best be compared to those to which Dante condemned mortal sinners in Inferno into which is injected superheated steam.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

PROFIT-MAKING VENTURE WITH U.S. MULTINATIONAL CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Nanaimo Commonwealth Association, the financial arm of the Nanaimo NDP Association, is planning on building a $4.5 million complex and signing a joint venture agreement with the U.S. multinational Ramada Inn for a $12 million hotel in that city, and in view of the fact that the Canada Elections Act provides for a return on expenses to local executives at the expense of the taxpayer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That this House call upon the national Leader of the NDP to explain this obvious contradiction between that party's stated abhorrence for multinationals and their profit-seeking venture with them and do further request from him assurances that no moneys which have come to the riding executives by virtue of the Canada Elections Act be invested in this profit-making venture of the NDP.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CLOSURE OF MANPOWER CENTRE IN REGINA, SASK.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. At the end of June of this year, the Regina handicapped manpower centre was closed down. This centre, funded by the Outreach program of the Department of Employment and Immigration, successfully placed over 1,500 physically handicapped people since its inception in 1973. Its success can be attributed to the fact that handicapped people helped to find employment for other persons in the same position. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House condemns the government for its backward attitude in not providing further funding for the Regina handicapped manpower centre, and that this House urge the government to employ handicapped people's organizations to provide placement and counselling services for the handicapped.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

INVESTIGATION INTO CARBURETTOR DESIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on an urgent and pressing matter under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas carburettors and the weight of the vehicle are the two main factors in determining gas consumption, leaving out pollution for the moment; whereas carburettors in Japan provide 62.4 miles per gallon and in Canada we are aiming at 28.8 miles per gallon; whereas periodically individuals claim they have sold rights to carburettor designs to multinational automobile companies that would give a much higher mileage per gallon gasoline ratio, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the Department of Transport undertake an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining if indeed the automobile giants have purchased and are holding designs for carburettors that would conserve large volumes of gasoline and, furthermore, if such is found to be the case, that any said company be charged with criminal conspiracy, irrespective of how much money they paid for the said design.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

PROGRAM TO INCREASE NUMBER OF FISHERIES OFFICERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the knowledge that the British Columbia salmon industry is experiencing its worst year in a decade; given the additional knowledge that part of the decline of fish stocks results from widespread violations of the Fisheries Act by some users and abusers of the resources and by habitat destruction; given the fact that fisheries officers find it increasingly difficult to carry out their complex enforcement work as well as their administrative and survey work; recognizing that government restraint has resulted in a totally inadequate number of fisheries officers to protect the salmon industry of British Columbia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly):

That this House urge the government to implement immediately a program that will radically increase the number of fishery officers in the field, form teams of investigation officers for the purpose of collecting evidence and laying charges, and to introduce changes in legislation that will give fisheries officers confidence that their work indeed will be productive in protecting our salmon resources.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGAR CONSPIRACY PROSECUTIONS—COMMENTS OF MINISTER ON SUPREME COURT OF CANADA DECISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last week the Supreme Court of Canada threw out the convictions of three major sugar companies for conspiring to lessen competition between 1969 and 1973. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) previously has been involved in contempt of court proceedings concerning the sugar conspiracy prosecutions, and while this cabinet may now contain more men of conviction than any other cabinet in the history of Canada, in order to support the contention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last Friday that being a Liberal is not a crime in this country I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House direct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to desist from making any comments with respect to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on prosecutions of certain sugar companies for conspiring to lessen competition between 1969 and 1973.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PUBLICATION OF SITTING DATES FOR HOUSE AND COMMITTEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my motion under Standing Order 43 is as follows. The lack of firm sitting dates for the House of Commons, such as are found in other legislative forums, denies members of Parliament of all parties the ability to plan properly constituency activities which in many instances are frequently as important as activities within the House of Commons. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That the government announce by the first week of each session the dates upon which the House shall sit and that the calendar year allocated for sittings of House and committees be published one year in advance.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RECYCLING OF NEWSPRINT DISCARDED FROM PARLIAMENTARY OFFICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since it is in the interests of all Canadians that we conserve and reuse resources to the largest extent possible; since a successful paper recycling project is at present in place on Parliament Hill but does not include newspapers; since members of Parliament and their staffs now use many newspapers which at present must be discarded; since there are now successful newspaper recycling projects in operation in at least two communities in the national capital region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the House recognize the need to take all possible steps to conserve our natural resources and request the officials of the House to take such measures as are necessary to ensure recycling of newsprint discarded from their parliamentary precincts.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

POST OFFICE

CAMPBELLVILLE, ONT.—DELIVERY OF MAIL IN ACCORDANCE WITH REGULATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Campbellville post office in my constituency of Halton has taken upon itself to return all mail not marked "general delivery", even though the names, addresses and postal codes are marked properly thereon, and because the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) has failed to respond to my request to investigate this matter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis):

That this House direct the Postmaster General to have his officials look into this matter forthwith and at the same time instruct the Campbellville postmaster to have all mails delivered in accordance with general postal regulations.

Madam Speaker: The motion can be put to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR DISPUTES

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHING INDUSTRY—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As he knows, the fishing industry in Newfoundland is virtually at a standstill as a result of a legal strike by the fishermen's union at two plants, triggering a lockout at the remaining plants and thereby placing 12,000 plant workers and 8,000 fishermen out of work. Have the hon. gentleman's good offices or those of his department been called upon to assist the government of Newfoundland, which exercises principal jurisdiction here, in putting an end to this very costly dispute?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has recognized the jurisdiction of the provincial government of Newfoundland. About a month ago I met the Newfoundland minister of fisheries and, in view of this looming deadlock between the fishermen and the processors, I put to him a suggestion that an industrial inquiry or some other form of inquiry might serve to cool tempers down and put all the facts on the table. I offered the full co-operation of my department in terms of making statistics and personnel available to inform the public, the fishermen and the processors of everything we knew. I regret very much that the Newfoundland minister of fisheries and the government of that province did not see fit to follow through that idea and I regret very much that the fishermen, especially the inshore fishermen, will find it very difficult to dispose of this catch of cod which is rather plentiful at this time.

Mr. McGrath: Now that we have a full-scale shutdown of the industry at the height of the inshore season, and given the tragic consequences this could have for our fishermen, especially this coming winter, has the minister considered making provision to enable the Canadian Saltfish Corporation to buy over-the-side fish which could be salted, given the excellent market for good quality saltfish?

Mr. LeBlanc: When events seemed to forecast a strike I asked the corporation to make sure that the extra supply of salt which might be required was put into reserve. This was done. I also asked the corporation to envisage the measures it would undertake if, in fact, there was delivery of fish to its agents which they could not handle. As hon. members know, through an act of this Parliament the corporation must buy all the cured fish offered to it by fishermen. Of course, I will support the corporation in its endeavour to meet the needs of the fishermen. This being said, I must add that if the industrial dispute is prolonged even the best efforts of the corporation will not fully meet the needs.

Mr. McGrath: Has the minister measured the impact which this costly shutdown could have on our principal, indeed our only, market for frozen groundfish—the U.S. market?

This leads me to ask the minister if he is in a position to tell the House and the country whether or not he has succeeded in reopening negotiations with the European Economic Community which, as he knows, went off the rails a few months ago, in an effort to get tariff concessions to have access to Canadian groundfish and to that very important market?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, negotiations with the community have not gone as well as we would have liked. The fact is that in terms of bargaining for access to the Canadian zone as against access for Canadian products entering the community, we felt the price which was asked was a bit high. Our industry representatives, both union and processors, felt that we should take some time to reflect and re-examine market conditions. It is obvious that we may find ourselves with a very low inventory if the plant closures predicted by the hon. member and which appear to be inevitable take place right now.

The problem with the community is really one of judgment as to whether the price which has been asked of Canada is reasonable or is too high. That certainly must be a subject of discussion with all representatives of the industry, and I hope they will take place in a more serene atmosphere than what we now have in Newfoundland.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALBACORE TUNA—APPROACHES MADE BY UNITED STATES NEGOTIATORS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary, but it is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There are fairly reliable indications that the albacore tuna will again be in Canadian waters within the next ten days or so. If these tuna are followed by U.S. fishermen, the fishermen could be arrested. There are also indications that the U.S. negotiators on fisheries and boundary matters on the west coast have made offers, on at least one and possibly two occasions, to enter into negotiations with regard to the albacore tuna to avoid a head-on clash.

Could the minister tell the House whether or not he is aware of these approaches and, if so, what his response has been and, if not, what steps he will take to ensure himself that we are not faced with a head-on clash once again?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we have not yet begun negotiations with the United States. We are hoping to do soon. The American position has not been entirely satisfactory to us, but we look forward to good negotiations.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs aware that a head-on clash at this time with the arrest of U.S. fishermen in Canadian waters could extend the embargo against the landing of fish, not just of tuna but of other species, in U.S. ports to the detriment of all fishermen on both coasts?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, there is considerable question as to whether U.S. action of that kind is legitimate under GATT. We are investigating our rights in that respect.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, will the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans consult with his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in order to determine the state of play here on the albacore tuna matter—because it is only a few days off—rather than have a head-on collision and the possible danger which he recognizes, if the Secretary of State does not and, also, in order to give the Canadian tuna fishermen an opportunity to reap some of the harvest which will be available on the west coast.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, obviously, I have been in close consultation with my colleague. This situation exemplifies the sort of support one can find on one coast for negotiations on another coast. In fact, it is the New Brunswick industry which has been the subject of tariff impact from the United States. But recognizing the importance of these negotiations for Canadian fishermen generally, there have been very few complaints from New Brunswick. Of course, we recognize the importance of the issue, but surely the hon. member does not advocate giving in to the sort of pressure which he is advocating.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—CABINET DECISION ON PRE-BUILD SECTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, we have had a weekend to read the interesting set of letters tabled on Friday afternoon by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In his letter to President Carter of March 12 when referring to the United States portion of the Alcan pipeline, the Prime Minister indicated that the United States should "resolve the Alaska financing promptly."

Considering that it took more than four months and an impending parliamentary recess in our country to produce a totally non-committal letter from President Carter last Thursday that included no specific guarantee of the Alaskan portion of the pipeline either in the form of annual timetabling for the construction or for the financing, why, in the face of a refusal to meet his request, did the cabinet agree to the pre-building of a portion of the pipeline only?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think it is important for the hon. member to realize that this letter which, as he says, took four months was not the first reply that I had from President Carter. I was writing him in March in answer to a letter from him dealing with the Olympics matter at that point and other subjects. I said "That is fine, we are going to look at that, but I also want you to look at certain things too". He phoned me at least a couple of times before writing this letter and I talked to him in Venice on it. This was a series of answers by the President. The final letter, I think, brought together in one place as strong an affirmation and commitment to policy as one could expect to get from the President of the United States, who is not himself involved in the financing but who expresses the political will of the administration after it had been obtained from Congress, to ensure that the whole pipeline be built. That is the context in which this letter was written.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it may present to us what the Prime Minister describes as the political will of the President, but I repeat, it contains not one word of guarantee either in terms of timetabling on an annual basis of the construction or guarantee in terms of the financing which the Prime Minister said in his March 12 letter was important to him. So what he asked for, he did not get.

I should like to put a second question to the Prime Minister. Last year, as the Prime Minister may be aware, the then secretary of energy, Mr. Schlesinger, as reported in the document entitled "Report to the Congress" by the comptroller general of the United States, in reply to a question about the level of guarantees, said that "$2 to $3 billion would appear to be an adequate level of guarantee" in financing the $8 billion portion of the pipeline that is in Alaska alone.

Considering that Mr. Schlesinger said a year ago that $2 to $3 billion were required as a guarantee for that portion, a small part of the pipeline, why did the Government of Canada accept as a guarantee required by the law of Canada an amount of money that is a mere fraction of this $2 billion to $3 billion as a guarantee?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I quoted Secretary Schlesinger myself earlier saying words to that effect. That was in the context of building the whole pipeline. Naturally, if the whole pipeline were going to be built more or less at the same time, this type of guarantee would have been forthcoming and there would have been no need to amend condition 12 of annex 3. It is because the government had to respond to a particular request for building just part of the pipeline, which request was entertained and accepted by the National Energy Board, that the government then had to make the other decision, in view of the fact that the whole thing is not going together at the same time, namely do we have enough guarantees (a) that the pre-build will be financed, and (b) that the whole thing can be financed?

It seems to me the hon. member is begging the principle when he argues that indeed if the whole thing were going ahead we would have had more money on the table. But the whole thing is not going ahead at the same time. We are dealing with the question of building one part of it. It is the financing of that part which is necessary and required and which is present. It is the expression that the whole thing can be financed that this government had to make a decision on. That decision was based on the fact that we had more, in a sense, than financial guarantees about something that would happen two or three years down the road; we had the absolute guarantee of the President of the United States and of the Congress that they had the political will to see this thing proceed. That is the position of this government.

● (1430)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, in the Prime Minister's letter, he himself states:

> —the Canadian Government cannot, under the Northern Pipeline Act, authorize the construction of any part of the line, including pre-build, until it is assured that the entire line will be completed.

Mr. Schlesinger said that $2 to $3 billion was required as a guarantee for a small part of the line. With all due respect to the Prime Minister, I would suggest to him that if $2 billion to $3 billion is required for a small part, even more than that sum should be required as a guarantee for the whole, which is an essential pre-condition for building the part of the pipeline on which the government is going ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: As a final question, since clause 21 of the new freedom of information bill, introduced recently by the government, will enable Canadians to have access to cabinet documents that are relevant to the government's decision-making process, keeping in mind that that bill, of course, is not yet law, but to test the spirit of the Government of Canada and its willingness to comply with those principles, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he will now table in the House all the documents that were relevant to the cabinet in reaching the decision that it made last Thursday?

Mr. Lalonde: They were annexed to Hansard.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as to the preamble to the question, I just want to point out to the hon. member that he is right in saying when I wrote in March that those were the laws which then stood. He knows, because he has been told many times and it has been debated in this House, that that law, being condition 12 of annex 3, has since been changed, under the provisions of the act, by the National Energy Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If Parliament authorized the law to be changed under certain conditions and those conditions are fulfilled, then it is the law that applies. I repeat to the hon. member that since my letter was written in March, talking about the financing of the whole, there have arisen conditions where the NEB and many interests in Canada have said "Okay, that is for the whole line, but we want the government to address the problem of the pre-build," which we have done since then.

As to the question about tabling of documents, I understand that most of these documents have already been annexed to Hansard. But if there are other documents which, under the freedom of information act, should be made public, I can assure the hon. member that they will be made public.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONSERVATION

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In 1975 at the beginning of the first attempted major energy conservation program, the then minister of energy, the hon. Donald Macdonald, was quoted as saying:

The government is not asking Canadians to shiver in cold houses, stumble about in the dark or suffer hardship.

Would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, after we have had five years of increasing oil imports and prices, international shortages and decreasing domestic oil supplies that have left us on the brink of crisis, be willing to admit to the House that his government has not had a real national energy policy?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is again directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister admit to the House that his conservation program is really just an off-oil program and that during this parliamentary recess he is going to spend $12 million on PR to explain it instead of bringing forward major conservation efforts?

Mr. Lalonde: Again, Madam Speaker, I would have to answer no. However, I might expand by saying that we have a conservation program and policy in this country which has been examined and lauded by many other countries. Whether it is in the area of the home insulation program, the area of substitution off-oil, the area of helping citizens, and industry in particular, to reduce the energy component in units of output, the Government of Canada has been providing leadership with the co-operation of industry and of private citizens in this country. I hope that in the weeks to come the government will be able to enlarge and expand those opportunities. I hope also that we will be able to start the alternate energy corporation in such a way that Petro-Canada will have a subsidiary which will provide additional leadership in this area. I could go on enumerating other actions of this government and other very good developments which have produced excellent results for this country.

FUNDS ALLOCATED TO NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL SOLAR PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister aware that the National Research Council solar program could not fully use its allocated $10 million budget in the last fiscal year?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, for the most part this would have been under the Conservative administration, and I will have to inquire from my predecessor as to why he allowed such a situation to develop.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Spend, spend, spend.

Mr. Lalonde: I can assure him that when the alternate energy corporation is set up we will have an organization that will be concentrating exclusively on new forms of energy, and that solar energy will be one of the areas where that corporation is going to be able to concentrate.

Mr. Wright: Madam Speaker, that sounds like another flip-flop on the part of this government. The minister of energy should know that the fiscal year ends in March. As this shows a failure to appreciate the requirements of managing a research facility and also demonstrates in part the reasons why we are falling behind in energy technology, will the minister consult with the Minister of State for Science and Technology to help him understand and make better use of resources already allocated?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, again I would have to put the blame on the previous minister of science and technology under the previous government for what happened last year. I can assure the hon. member that the present Minister of State for Science and Technology is very much aware of the situation in this regard. He is very conscious of encouraging research in the energy field and increasing research and development generally in this country, as was made clear when the minister announced increased funding in the area of research and development generally in this country under this government.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

PROVISION OF NATURAL GAS LINE IN CANADA FROM COAST TO COAST

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I gather from statements made by the minister that he recognizes the infinite value of energy self-sufficiency. If I read the statements of the minister and his colleagues correctly, they appear to appreciate the immeasurable potential for economic development if we in Canada were able to provide a guaranteed source of competitively priced energy from coast to coast.

I ask the minister on what day in which year will the government proceed with the building of a pipeline linking the natural gas fields of Alberta and Saskatchewan to consumers on both the east and west coasts, so that we get the benefits that I have mentioned and which the minister has mentioned, and in addition get the benefit of both short and long-term employment opportunities?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Where do you stand on the pre-build?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to note the interest of my hon. colleague in energy self-sufficiency and independence. I remind him, however, that the government has already announced the extension of the natural gas pipeline to Quebec and we have indicated that its extension to the maritimes and to Halifax was a high priority of this government and it was the option that we favoured.

However, the hon. member is aware of the reservations expressed by the National Energy Board about it. We are considering the situation and we hope to be in a position to announce later some specific decisions in that respect. As regards conditions on the west coast, especially on Vancouver Island, I have already met twice my colleague the British Columbia energy minister and I hope that the project will be carried out in the very near future. Indeed, the appropriate British Columbia board will be holding hearings on that issue this fall, if I am not mistaken.

• (1440)

[English]

On both aspects, whether on the east coast or the west coast, this government is indeed very involved. We are talking to the people concerned. As I said, we are attaching very great importance to this.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, the minister appears to recognize that energy is now, and no doubt will remain, the single most important resource any country can have.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Tell us about the pre-build.

Mr. Deans: Recognizing that economic development, employment and quality of life would be directly affected by the availability of competitively priced energy, not only now but into the future, how then can the government speak about Canada having a surplus energy resource that we could well use to develop our country for the next 50 years?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Tell us about the steel workers.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, this government indeed attaches a great deal of importance to energy, but before saying that energy is of the most important value in this country, as far as this government is concerned the people of Canada are the first value.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: That means providing the people of Canada with jobs and income that are fair, preventing inflation from going too high and ensuring growth in this country. If I may leave the preamble of the hon. member's question after this important clarification as to at least the difference between our respective parties, I remind him that energy exports like other exports are related to a broad economic policy. You have to take into account the benefits for the whole of Canada. This is something that the hon. member may not understand but that the NDP government of Saskatchewan understands.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The NDP government of Saskatchewan has approved very substantial exports of heavy oil.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT ASSURED PROJECT UNLIKELY TO BE COMPLETED

Mr. Norman Kelly (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to press reports of mounting opposition with the U.S. government to the final phase of the Garrison diversion project, can the minister tell the House whether he has received official assurances that the project is unlikely to be completed?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the assurances that we have received have not been as to whether the project will go ahead, but that the money which has been voted by Congress this year will not be spent on any aspect of it which will affect Canada injuriously.

ECONOMIC SUMMIT

LOCATION OF 1981 CONFERENCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Canada will host the 1981 summit conference. He did not bother to address us when he came back from the last one. Can the Prime Minister indicate why only Montreal and Vancouver are being considered as a site for that conference? Will he give some consideration, as the previous government did, to recognizing that there are other parts of Canada, including Atlantic Canada? The city of Halifax would make an excellent site.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is news to me that Montreal and Vancouver are being considered in any specific way. I believe that various sites are being looked at. Consultations will then have to take place with the other participants in the summit as to the type of locale we would want to propose.

Mr. Forrestall: Obviously the Prime Minister is not interested in the location of the summit. I would direct a more specific question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is there a short list of locations for the economic summit? If so, will he give us an indication of what that list is? At the same time, will he tell us whether this government is prepared to recognize that Atlantic Canada exists by considering the city of Halifax, with all of its amenities, for the site of the 1981 summit?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, not only does this government recognize that Atlantic Canada exists, but the people of Atlantic Canada recognize that this government exists, as evidenced by the number of Liberal members here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: There is not yet a short list. We are at a more preliminary stage. I understand that the provinces of Quebec and British Columbia have suggested to the federal government that they each would like to host the summit. Our consideration is not limited to those provinces; we are looking at the whole country.

INCOME TAX ACT

GREATER DEGREE OF EQUITY AND FAIRNESS TO NORTHERN RESIDENTS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance whom we welcome back to the House. We all join in wishing him a complete recovery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: I wish to ask him a question with regard to a commitment made by the Prime Minister in the Speech from the Throne, namely to make certain fundamental changes to the Income Tax Act in conjunction with certain principles of equity and fairness. Is it the minister's intention, in the preparation of a budget and preparing the changes to the Income Tax Act, to take into account the discriminating aspects of the Income Tax Act as it applies to northern residents? Are there any changes that would establish a two or three tier tax system similar to that in Australia to help northerners achieve a greater degree of equity and fairness?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his words of welcome on my return to the House and to tell him that I find the House easier to bear when I am here rather than when I am away.

Mr. Nowlan: For us it is just the reverse.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to tell the hon. member that this very morning I had a discussion with the Minister of National Revenue on the subject of taxation of northern benefits. We both agreed that it was a matter that ought to be discussed before the preparation of a budget. I am glad to know the hon. member shares that opinion.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, my question relates to a more universal approach than simply compensation for federal public servants and an elite group of northerners who happen to work for large corporations. Will the government consider a more universal approach which takes into account a section of the Income Tax Act that requires the levy of income tax in accordance with one's ability to pay? In other words, is the government considering a more universal approach which would give certain concessions to northerners on a more universal basis, not just to an elite group of northerners?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member means by a "universal approach" that we ought to take into account all the broad factors relating to income, then that is the intention of the government.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST FOR UPDATE ON INTER-MINISTERIAL MEETINGS—FINAL PAYMENT TO METRIC OVERVIEW BOARD NOT RECEIVED

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for supply and services. Can the minister update us on the inter-ministerial meetings which have been taking place pertaining to services performed and delivered to the letter of the contract, for which payment has not been received? I am specifically asking for further information on the Maritime Agencies affair. Perhaps at the same time the minister could advise us as to why the Metric Overview Board has not received its final payment for services rendered.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, with reference to the involvement of the Metric Overview Board I would be pleased to look into that matter and advise the hon. gentleman further.

In terms of the MAL matter, as the hon. gentleman is very well aware because of his own interest, that matter is under constant supervision. I am in contact and my office is in contact with the officers of MAL on almost a daily basis. I hope to be able to advise the hon. member on progress in the very near future.

The hon. gentleman may be interested in knowing that the third ship, the Jasmine, has now completed loading and is on the high seas.

Mr. Huntington: Madam Speaker, the issue here is very serious. The carriage contractor, Maritime Agencies Limited, has performed all services to the letter of the contract, and I have had that word from advisers directly to the minister. The problem is that the Canadian Wheat Board did not deliver the product to the ship as it lay in the berth. Is there something which is interfering with respect to the sanctity of contracts here? Every time we come back to this issue, something new comes in from left field to interfere with the process of payment. Surely the minister has had enough time now since 1978 to bring into place a payment mechanism which would relieve this company from serious potential damages?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman has identified that there have been some matters in contention since 1978. He is also aware that indeed legal process has been commenced, and therefore he understands that I cannot comment in terms of the 1978 events. In terms of more recent events, as the hon. gentleman knows, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and I are presently in consultation in order to reach a solution as rapidly as possible.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION OF BUDGET

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. I believe I heard him say that he had been having discussions with a cabinet colleague regarding budgetary preparation, I believe he said this morning. Does that mean that the Minister of Finance is now involved in budgetary preparation, and can he give the House of Commons a date on which a budget will be presented to this House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows, the process of budget preparation is a long one. He knows that probably better than I do. I am engaged in that process at the present time but, unfortunately, I am not in a position today to indicate when the budget will be presented, although it has been my desire to present such a document as soon as all the complex factors can be brought under control.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I take that as a commitment for a budget by 1990, but the Minister of Finance will know from having watched the question period that his Prime Minister was unwilling to give us a commitment the other day. Even given the rate of inflation and the rate of unemployment in the country he was unwilling to give us a commitment that, if it was not going to be possible for us to have a budget in the early fall, there would be an economic statement indicating the general policy directions of the Government of Canada before the end of the summer. I wonder if the Minister of Finance has now had an opportunity to reconsider that exchange and whether he could give us a commitment that, if there is not a budget in the early or mid-fall, there will be an economic statement before the end of August.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I remind the right hon. gentleman that on April 21 I presented an economic statement to the House. Hon. members opposite have insisted on calling it a budget. Incessantly it is called a budget, and I wonder why another one is required. But I remind the right hon. gentleman that just very recently the New Democratic Party presented a motion to the House which included a vote, and on that occasion I gave quite an extensive summary of the economic situation and certainly the present attitude of the government. I remind the right hon. gentleman further that that happened within three or four months of our election to office, which did not happen in the government of which he was the leader.

LABOUR DISPUTES

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHING INDUSTRY—INQUIRY WHETHER SALTFISH CORPORATION TO ACQUIRE ADDITIONAL VESSELS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In view of the present fishing industry dispute in Newfoundland which has closed some 70 fish plants around the province and left some 30,000 people out of work, and in view of the minister's comments to the hon. member for St. John's East regarding the role of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation in this dispute, I wonder if the minister can tell this House whether he is considering empowering the Canadian Saltfish Corporation to acquire additional vessels or boats to buy even more of the surplus fish which no doubt will be available in the days and perhaps weeks ahead during the course of the strike.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, as I said earlier, the Canadian Saltfish Corporation by law must buy all the fish offered to it by fishermen. In fact, there are precedents in which the corporation has utilized foreign vessels and trawlers to act as receiving stations for fish made available to it by Canadian fishermen. Of course, I would be quite willing to look at this proposal, and I might indicate that I would look at it pretty favourably.

As to the other suggestion that we should allow sale over-the-side for other fish products besides cod, this suggestion has been made in a telegram to me by the head of the fishermen's organization. I have not yet indicated what would be my reaction because I want to ascertain all the facts before I make a decision of this importance. However, at the moment this is neither accepted nor rejected.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DUMPING OF RADIOACTIVE WASTE OFF B.C. COAST

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment my question is also addressed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As I trust the minister is aware, between 1946 and 1965 quantities of radioactive waste were dumped off the British Columbia coast into the ocean by such institutions as the University of British Columbia and the Pacific Naval Laboratory of British Columbia. In light of the fact that roughly 47,000 barrels were dumped off San Francisco during the same period of time and the fact that over 10,000 of those barrels have now burst and dumped their contents into the environment, would the minister tell this House what is the monitoring process, what responsible agencies are looking into Canadian radioactive ocean dumping and what have been the results of the monitoring of the site off British Columbia since 1965?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I do not know if I could give details to the hon. member from memory, but certainly this Parliament legislated in the area of ocean dumping some years ago. Permits must be obtained before dumping takes place, and I might say that the recent judgment—I believe it was only last Friday—of the Supreme Court of Canada sustaining part of the Fisheries Act which was being challenged also, in my view, gives the Department of Fisheries and Oceans greater leverage in imposing good behaviour on those who would dump or throw into the water substances which hurt fish.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is essentially the same as my first question. I wonder if the minister could tell the House and the people of British Columbia what the monitoring process is and has been with regard to the radioactive waste which was dumped into the ocean between 1946 and 1965, and whether he would confirm that there is still radioactive waste being held in the city of Vancouver.

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I will undertake to look into this matter and answer the hon. member, possibly tomorrow.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF SEAT SALE DESTINATIONS

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In September of this year Air Canada again will embark on a series of seat sales whereby travellers can fly at greatly reduced prices. This is, of course, good for the airline, and it is good for travellers as well. However, as some of the destinations are foreign cities, I wonder how much good these seat sales are for the Canadian travel industry.

In order for the government to promote tourism and travel in Canada will the minister agree that a review of the destinations for seat sales would be useful?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not know what my hon. friend has in mind to demonstrate by this question. Is he looking for ways of preventing foreign carriers from coming to Canada? Is that what he is trying to prevent?

Mr. Fretz: No.

Mr. Pepin: Would he then kindly repeat the question and make the point?

● (1500)

Mr. Fretz: Madam Speaker, I will again pose the question to him. Air Canada is to have a seat sale starting in September. As I have said, this is good for the airline and good for travellers. However, some of the destinations are to foreign ports. How good is this for the tourism industry in Canada? In order for the government to promote tourism and travel in Canada, which we should be doing, would the minister agree that a review of these seat sale destinations would be useful?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I can only answer by expressing a number of generalities. The first point obviously is that we want Canadians to travel in Canada, but when my hon. friend tells me that there are special sales for Canadians to go abroad, I could say to him that there are similar opportunities for other people from abroad to come to Canada. This freedom of travel, not only domestically but internationally, obviously is one of the objectives of Canada.

Mr. Fretz: Madam Speaker, it appears that the minister is flying by the seat of his pants—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): At a discount.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fretz: —on his answer to the question I posed, and I am surprised. I will try another question. Will the minister consider asking Air Canada to introduce seat sales from foreign ports to Canada? Let us have it that way, tit-for-tat, then.

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I said. I said that I thought there would be similar opportunities, and there are many of them. I have a group of French people coming from France in the fall, for example, at extremely favourable cost.

An hon. Member: On what airline?

Mr. Pepin: This is done by Air Canada. Obviously Air Canada does it both ways. But to be absolutely pleasant to my friend, I will deliver his question to the president of Air Canada and wait to see if he has a better answer than I.

An hon. Member: No doubt.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, after consultation with all parties I understand there is unanimous consent to change the words in motion No. 17 in the name of the government which deals with the adjournment of the House. I should like to change the words in this motion which reads, "on July 18, 1980", to the words, "on the day that this order is adopted". It would be understood that making this change at this time would not prevent any member from subsequently proposing a motion to amend exactly this part of the motion.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there have been those consultations. The purpose of this is to put the form of the motion more in accordance with the facts. That is agreeable to us.

Introduction of Bills

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that there have been such consultations and that there is consent to make this change in the motion so that it will make some sense when we come to debate it today. Also I should like to confirm that our consent is given on the understanding that, when the revised motion is under debate, it will be in order to amend it to change the very words to which we are now agreeing. Indeed, as everyone knows, that is precisely what will be done in an amendment to be proposed by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

Madam Speaker: With the reservations expressed by the hon. minister, does the House agree to this proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

GUNDERSEN SLOUGH HARBOUR ACT

MEASURE TO TRANSFER AUTHORITY TO FEDERAL MINISTRY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-611, to transfer control over certain lands commonly referred to as Gundersen Slough from the Fraser River Harbour Commission to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans under the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I never thought I would live to see the day when I would be willing to sponsor a bill to turn something over to the government, but really that is what this bill is intended to do. Since the Fraser River Harbour Commission was formed the fishermen in Gundersen Slough have had to live under the paternalistic care of a very capricious harbour commission. I should like to see this taken out of the control of the harbour commission and put under the care of the minister.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

SMALL LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-44, to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[English]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to say with respect to this piece of legislation that, speaking on behalf of our caucus, we are prepared to have this bill read a second and third time today without debate.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, speaking in the name of our caucus, we also are ready for the bill to be put through all stages as long as there is no amendment.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. My party has been on record throughout this session of Parliament as trying to have repeal of the Small Loans Act. Unfortunately this bill is not a repeal of the Small Loans Act but an attempt to deal with a very complicated subject, the calculation of interest under the Criminal Code.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Blenkarn: We would like to see the Small Loans Act replaced immediately without debate. We have said that on a number of occasions. Indeed there is a bill in my own name, Bill C-610 in the private members' bills, to accomplish just that purpose.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Blenkarn: This bill presented by the government requires a great deal of evidence, consultation, and debate because it is not an easy bill to understand. It is a bill that deals with the calculation of interest, but interest itself is not an easy concept. This bill should have full and complete parliamentary discussion, including evidence before committee with respect to this part of the legislation. The bill is not an easy one, and it is unfortunate that the government refuses to take the bull by the horns and abolish the Small Loans Act and do the thing the trust companies, the small loans companies—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is entering into argument. I think he has made his point, that there is no consent to put this bill through all stages at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, I regret we cannot get the support of the Progressive Conservative Party because the purpose of this bill is first to repeal the Small Loans Act, second to ensure that current loans under the law are continued and, third, it adds a provision against setting a prohibitive, criminal interest rate; I am sorry we cannot get unanimous consent to help our credit unions and caisses populaires by repealing the Small Loans Act and by passing this bill this afternoon.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I think it should be made quite clear to the House and to the government, and particularly to the government because everybody else understands it, that if the government brings in a bill the purpose of which will be to repeal the Small Loans Act, or change the wording a little in the hon. member's Bill C-610 which repeals the Small Loans Act, that bill will go through today without debate.

• (1510)

The problem—and I think it is important since the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) is involved—is that the minister of state has for the first time introduced into the jurisprudence of the country the idea of controlling interest rates through the criminal law. That is the issue. There is no issue at all with respect to the repeal of the Small Loans Act. If the minister of state will bring in a bill later today which carries out the intention of Bill 610, it will go forward without debate because these are matters which have already been discussed. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) nodding his head. He is aware of this issue as well.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I greatly appreciate the remarks of the House leader of the Progressive Conservative opposition, but I must remind him that a provision is needed on a criminal rate precisely because there already is one in the Small Loans Act, the act we want to repeal, which authorizes police officers in Canada to prosecute those who are known as loan sharks. I would therefore ask hon. members of the Progressive Conservative Party to reconsider their objection to that clause of the bill because the only thing it does is to make sure that police officers can continue prosecuting those who charge usurious rates in Canada, and allow them, under the Criminal Code, to continue prosecuting loan sharks.

I believe that, in light of the exchange of views we have just had in the House, perhaps later on in the day the caucus of hon. Progressive Conservatives members could meet and reconsider their decision.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: A further point, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has already made his point. I understand there is no consent to putting this bill through all stages. It is up to the House to decide when it wants to call that bill, but I understand it will not be today.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 113, 904, 907, 963 and 998.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

GOVERNMENT OF JAMAICA—GRANTS OR LOANS

Question No. 113—Mr. Cossitt:

In the past six years, did the government contribute money by way of grants or loans to the government of Jamaica and, if so (a) in what amount (b) in each case (i) on what dates (ii) in what amounts (iii) what is the total to be repaid (iv) what is the interest rate being charged, if any (v) are any interest payments or principal payments in arrears and, if so, what is the amount?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): See reply to question No. 963 answered this day.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Question No. 904—Mr. MacKay:

For the year (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977 (d) 1978, what revenue was generated for the government by the inclusion of capital gains in corporate and individual income for purposes of calculation of income tax payable and what was the additional administrative cost to the government?

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): (a) See question 1,699, Thirtieth Parliament, third session, tabled October 10, 1978.

	Individuals ($ millions)	Corporations ($ millions)	Total ($ millions)
(b)	160	150	310
(c)	225	190	415

(d) Estimates for 1978 are not yet available. The above are estimates of amounts of revenue received by the government attributable to the taxable portion of capital gains, based on calculations by the Department of Finance.

Since capital gains are not taxed separately, information is not available as to additional administrative cost.

PATROL VESSEL "HOWAY"—REPLACEMENT

Question No. 907—Mr. Siddon:

1. Did the Department of Fisheries and Oceans commission a high speed patrol vessel to be built in Vancouver to replace the patrol vessel Howay and, if so (a) what is the estimated cost (b) who is constructing the vessel (c) were tenders called before a contract was awarded and, if not, for what reason?

2. Was a meeting of senior masters of the west coast convened to discuss the replacement vessel or vessels for the Howay and, if so (a) on what date (b) what were their recommendations?

3. Is the vessel an aluminum-hull, shallow-draft vessel and is it suited to deep-sea work off the west coast?

4. What is the name of the company which holds the licence to construct this type of vessel on the east coast?

5. Was any money paid to the company which holds the propriety rights to the design and, if so, what was the amount?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans):

1. Yes, the contract was signed on March 30, 1979.

(a) At a firm price of $6,447,033.68

(b) John Manly Shipyard, Vancouver, B.C.

(c) Tenders were not called. Only two Canadian shipyards are licensed to build this type of vessel and the licensees are not permitted to compete. Therefore the Department of Supply and Services entered into a negotiated contract on behalf of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

2. The Howay replacement did appear as an agenda item at the annual meeting of masters and chief engineers held in February, 1979. As in previous meetings where large groups of masters and chief engineers gathered, several opinions were expressed as to the suitability of a Breaux boat for the west coast fishery. The input from the masters of our vessels is highly valued and is one of the many factors considered when developing the specifications for new and replacement vessels. Our masters are kept informed on all decisions with respect to new and replacement vessels. This information is provided throughout the procurement process.

3. Yes, the vessel has an aluminum hull with a draft of 2.5 metres which is suitable for the particular fishery in which this vessel will be employed. Experience with two similar vessels operating out of St. John's, Newfoundland and Halifax, Nova Scotia has been entirely satisfactory.

4. Breton Industrial and Marine Limited, Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia.

5. Yes, $120,000 has been paid to Breaux Baycraft Limited by John Manly Shipyard. This has been included in the contract price.

GOVERNMENT OF JAMAICA—GRANTS AND LOAN AGREEMENTS

Question No. 963—Mr. Cossitt:

Since April 20, 1968, were funds given, loaned etc. to the government of Jamaica and, if so (a) in what amount (b) in each case (i) on what date (ii) what were the terms including interest, if any (iii) what was the purpose (c) what was the interest rate and have payments of interest and principal been received on time and, if not, what is the status?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Finance is concerned: On November 9, 1976, Canada entered into a loan agreement with the government of Jamaica to provide a Canadian $25 million loan from the Department of Finance, with repayment in full six months thereafter and interest payable at the average annual rate of interest on six-month treasury bills, namely 8.93 per cent. Principal on the loan was rolled over three times due to Jamaica's financial difficulties, but interest was kept current. On August 9, 1978, the loan was converted to a three-year loan at the Crown corporation rate of interest on three-year money, namely 8.875 per cent, with the entire principal due at term, subject to interest being paid annually and to maintenance of a standby arrangement with the IMF. Jamaica has been current with respect to interest payments since conversion of the loan into a medium-term instrument. In the past six years the Export Development Corporation has extended six loans to Jamaica, two under government account (section 31) and the remainder under corporate account (section 29). Total value of these loans was Canadian $8.1 million under section 31 and Canadian $42.6 million under section 29. There are no arrears in payments to EDC. Because of commercial confidentiality, EDC cannot disclose its rates of interest. Attached is a detailed schedule of these loans indicating dates signed, amounts of financing and principal outstanding, and purpose of each loan. In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned:

(a) Development assistance grants and loans totalling approximately $62.4 million for the purchase of services, goods and commodities by CIDA or its executing agents for delivery to Jamaica have been made since April 20, 1968.

CRTC—BROCKVILLE CABLE LTD.—RENEWAL OF LICENCE

Question No. 998—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the required or customary advance public notice that is to be given by the Canadian Radio and Television Commission in connection with public hearing and is this approximately 50 days?

2. Did CRTC announce a hearing for June 25, 1980, in connection with an application for renewal of a cable television licence for Brockville Cable Ltd. also known as Brockville Amusement Company Ltd. and, if so (a) on what date was it first advertised in the news media of Leeds-Grenville (b) what publications carried the notice and on what dates (c) were the notices given within the required time for those who wished to register objections or interventions and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission that the reply to the above question is as follows: 1.

When an application is set down for public hearing, a notice of the application is published in The Canada Gazette not less than fifty (50) days before the day fixed for the commencement of the public hearing and in one or more newspapers of general circulation within the area normally served or to be served by the broadcasting undertaking to which the public hearing relates.

2. The licensee of the broadcasting receiving undertaking for Brockville does not have an application in the commission to be gazetted for a public hearing and no application from the Brockville licensee is on the June 25, public hearing.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed from Friday, July 18, consideration of the amended motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard):

That, when the House adjourns on the day that this order is adopted, it shall stand ajourned until October 15, 1980, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I want to begin my speech this afternoon by raising the question of why we are sitting here at this particular time.

Prior to certain developments which took place last week, the New Democratic Party was prepared to join with other parties in this House in agreeing to the adjournment motion which was put down—supposed to be put down—last Friday. But as a result of a decision made by cabinet last Thursday the NDP believes the Liberal Government of Canada has placed our energy future in jeopardy and has done so by using what we regard as an illegal process, both of which are objectionable.

Madam Speaker, if we in this Parliament are about to change the law of Canada which was passed two and a half years ago and which made provision for a pipeline to transport American gas to American markets into one authorizing an export pipeline carrying Canadian gas to American markets, the very least that should be done is to bring a measure to that effect before the Parliament of Canada for decision. The cabinet acting alone, either in legal terms, in terms of the provisions of the bill concerned, or, certainly, in moral terms, ought not to be making such a fundamentally disastrous decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We believe that in certain conditions this export pipeline, euphemistically called a pre-build, should be proceeded with. If the government had obtained assurances that the whole line was going to be constructed and if it had negotiated with the Americans swaps of gas in exchange for the gas we were going to export from Canada when gas from Alaska becomes available, we in this party would be supporting this export pipeline. But under given circumstances there should be no misunderstanding; the New Democratic Party is 100 per cent opposed to the course of action taken by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: What we are witnessing in the course of action being pursued by the Liberals in the energy matter now is exactly the kind of indifference to the serious long-range concerns of the people of Canada as we see in their ignoring of the claims of our fishermen on the east and west coasts at the present time, in their selling out of the auto workers through their failure to implement the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement since 1965, in their indifference to the people of Manitoba when it comes to discussion and effective action with regard to the Garrison dam project, in their indifference to the people of Quebec, Ontario and the maritimes through failure to take action with respect to the massive increase in acid rain which will fall on Canada due to the conversion from one type of energy in the United States to another.

What we see, in short, is the perennial approach of the Liberal Party of Canada—indifference to the long-range needs of Canadians, always sacrificing long-range gains to the short, quick fix, a few bucks which will come in over a limited period of time; they think this will compensate for loss of benefits in the long run. As one of our members from the Hamilton area said yesterday, we in this party do not believe, when it comes to energy resources, that we are living in a time when we can agree to the export of any more oil and gas. Such energy resources should be kept for the long-range development purposes of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has come back to the House. I have been here for some 12 years, now, and I know why he is here. Whenever the Government of Canada is in trouble, the minister could be off sailing, he could be dying of tuberculosis, he could be indulging in some frivolous pursuit in Venice or seeking out the muses in the beautiful wilderness of Cape Breton; whatever the case may be, one thing is as certain as anything in this universe: the call will go out from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), "Allan MacEachen, get back. We need you." That is why the Minister of Finance is here in the House today, and I am sure that we will hear from him later. I particularly want to hear from him because he was the minister who brought in the original pipeline bill which this government is thoroughly emasculating. I also want to hear what the Minister of Finance wants to say about this government's course of action. What was the original purpose of the bill which the government is now changing so fundamentally?

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) shortly in this debate will devote his whole speech to the illegality of the government's actions. However, I will not dwell on that subject; I will deal with the policy matter. What is the government changing so fundamentally? The original bill, as I said, was to provide a service to our American neighbours. We defended that service. We said that the Americans do indeed have a need for gas, that they indeed have gas in Alaska, and that if we can facilitate the transmission of that gas from Alaska to the United States as good neighbours, then we ought to do so.

An agreement was reached with the United States the central purpose of which was to export gas from Alaska to the United States. That was the principal objective and the overwhelming purpose of the pipeline legislation. I would like to say in passing that the New Democratic Party of Canada was the first party in Canada to propose the all-Canada route. We did so when the Hon. Tommy Douglas was energy critic for this party. We made the suggestion in advance of both the other parties. I do not say that in a boastful manner. I say to my Conservative friends and I just want to make it clear because of our objections which I will outline today, that at one point in terms of the original purpose of the bill we were front and centre in the energy debate in this country on the necessity of getting a feasible and desirable method of transmitting American gas to the American market, from the north to the south.

What were the benefits to Canada? This must also be kept in mind, because they are being completely undermined by the course of action taken by the Government. Canada was to have access, because of the possibility of a spur line, to some five trillion cubic feet of natural gas in our Arctic. That was one of the benefits which the Minister of Finance and some of his colleagues argued for at the time. A second benefit was that the people of Canada—and I am referring to the negotiations which went on with the Americans at the time, and which I remember very vividly—would be able to make swaps if, as it was hypothetically raised, at any point we should decide to export more Canadian gas to the United States.

It was argued by the Liberals at the time that the pipeline, as it was then debated and approved by Parliament, would make it possible for us to swap gas at an equivalent value. If we sold cheap Canadian gas from the south now, then at some point in the future, and at the equivalent value, when American gas came on stream from Alaska we could take advantage of a commitment to obtain that gas in exchange. That was another potential advantage for Canada if the whole pipeline were built.

The third advantage was jobs for Canadians. Steelworkers in Saskatchewan, Ontario and elsewhere, and construction workers in the provinces directly affected would benefit from the building of the pipeline. If these were the intended benefits for the United States and for Canada, what have we ended up with in terms of what the Liberals are now about to do?

Before I come to that subject I want to say that at all times, up until as recently as a few days ago—and it was confirmed here in the House this afternoon by the Prime Minister—the Liberals said in and out of the House of Commons that there would be no partial pipeline. They never even talked about the export of Canadian gas through that pipeline. They were always insistent that the whole pipeline from the Canadian border in the south to Alaska would have to be built. There would have to be ironclad guarantees.

This position was repeated as recently as December 9 when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) used the phrase, "We have to have ironclad guarantees". He will become known in history as "old Mr. Ironclad". It merely goes to show just how flexible the meanings of words are to Liberals. Then in the letter of which we received a copy on Friday, which was written on March 12 to President Carter by the Prime Minister and in which he asked for prompt action, he again reasserted the need for guarantees for the whole pipeline. He did not need to spell it out for the American President, but for Canadians the reasons for the guarantee were just as I have indicated; we need the whole pipeline in order to have access to our gas in the north at some point and in order to take advantage of the possibility of swaps of American gas from Alaska if we were to export our gas from the south.

On the same point, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in the same debate on December 9, made reference to the need for swaps. So the government's position was very clear, or at least it has been up until the last few days. On the one hand ministers wanted the same guarantees on the whole pipeline as we are talking about today, and, on the other hand, they too thought that swaps were essential to any kind of feasible and practical pipeline proposal. Swaps is the second subject on which I will be talking at length and which will be in the motion at the end of my speech.

What are we getting instead, as the result of last Thursday's cabinet order in council decision? First, instead of getting what the law of Canada provided, which was a pipeline to transport American gas to American markets, we are getting a pipeline that is conceptually and entirely different. We are getting a pipeline which is being built only in the southern part of Canada to export Canadian gas to American markets. In addition, this exporting will go on for some 15 years and will involve some 4.75 trillion cubic feet of our gas which will be gone forever.

Secondly, as a result of that cabinet decision, there are absolutely no guarantees on the financing for the whole pipeline, which is something that came out in its most open form today in the answers provided by the Prime Minister. The original project ought to have been guaranteed in the United States. The then secretary in the United States said that some $2 billion to $3 billion would have to be put up just for the Alaskan portion alone if there were to be any real guarantees. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had the nerve to say in the House a week ago that his obtaining some $500 million for feasibility studies of one kind or another really constituted a guarantee. That may go over in the Liberal caucus, but that will sure not go over in any home in any part of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Another result is that inevitably we are selling off relatively cheap natural gas in the south of Alberta with no guarantee of swaps at all, not even a sincere effort. The Senator responsible for the pipeline provided a truly ludicrous spectacle on television the other night when he had to admit that the only way swaps were talked about in discussions with the Americans was in the form of a casual conversation. When the visiting American responsible for energy was asked about the matter in the same television interview, during the same evening news, if I recall correctly he shrugged his shoulders and said, "What are swaps?" He said that that was the first time he had ever heard about the subject.

Swaps were serious for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he was in opposition, but of course, now that he is in government, and like so much of what the Liberal party stands for, he has completely forgotten the matter of principle. So we have no swaps.

● (1530)

Secondly, it is going to mean, in terms of prices, that Canadians pay inevitably higher gas prices because we are using up the low cost gas from the southern part of Alberta; it is going to mean to the United States that the more expensive gas will come from the Canadian Arctic, or the gas we may be forced to buy from the Americans at some point down the road if they will sell any, is going to cost us much more. That means the people of Atlantic Canada, Quebec and everywhere in the land, are going to have to pay more for energy. It also means that Canadian industry—whether we are talking about Ontario or Quebec or the emergence of industry in western Canada—is going to have to pay more. That reduces their competitive position. In addition, it means that we will not have—if we do not have a guarantee for a northern part of the pipeline—any access to our own gas in the Arctic.

What are we going to do? Are we going to construct our own pipeline? If we are going to have to go after that gas in the Arctic it looks as if we will have to construct our pipeline now. The cost to get that gas down to the Canadian market will be massive because without the guarantee and the northern portion of the pipeline we have no access to our own gas.

Finally, on the question of jobs, what does it mean? It is true that steelworkers in certain parts of Canada now will get some jobs because of this decision to build an export pipeline. It is true that if the government did not make this decision, some of those jobs would not exist. But I want to point out two things, Mr. Speaker. The first is that if we got the commitments that are written into the original bill for the original pipeline, there would be ten times the number of jobs that we are going to get from this pipeline.

Second, as leader of the party that probably associates itself with the trade union movement, I do not hesitate to say that one of the things that distinguishes this party from the present party in power, is that we are prepared to take a long-range view of this country. We are not prepared to sell out our energy resources in the short run even if it means a few more short run jobs. We believe in the long-range development of this country. The time is long since past when the country should have been given a long-range industrial strategy that would make that possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Instead of getting that from the Liberals, we have their traditional "in power" solution. The quick-fix boys are in action again. Yes, we are going to make money, in the hundreds of millions—indeed billions of dollars—from selling it off. But at what cost, Mr. Speaker? The Liberals are going to sell off $17 billion worth of irreplaceable natural gas. It will be gone—gone forever. That means that if we need it, as I have just indicated, it will not be there. It is the archetypical Liberal solution. It is, indeed, no solution at all to the long-range needs of our country.

In this part of my comments today I want to deal with something that I hope the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will deal with in his argument, because to me it is crucial, and that is the reasons why we in this party believe either the pipeline in the north will never be built at all or, if it is built, will not be built by 1985. You can bet on that, Mr. Speaker. Instead, it will be built at some distant point in the future when it suits American, not Canadian, purposes. At this time I want to set out our reasons for believing that.

First of all, it has not been brought out up to this point, because we have not had the debate, that a lot of American investors for very good reasons are skeptical about the project because of the costs involved. They know, from the Valdez oil pipeline experience in Alaska, that the cost estimates are likely to be well in excess of the original estimates. Right now the pipeline which when we debated it a couple of years ago in the House was estimated to cost $8 billion, has jumped to an estimated cost of $22 to $24 billion. That, for a very large multinational corporation, ain't hay; it is a lot of money. It is the reason why the companies involved have indicated to American congressmen and to a lot of people that they may never proceed with the northern portion of the pipeline because it is simply too risky.

In that context I want to quote something that I wish the government would read. It is a report prepared not by the research staff of the New Democratic Party but by the Comptroller General of the United States Congress, and not two years ago, but just six months ago. Referring to the feasibility of the project this report, at page 13, reads as follows:

The project's sponsors have estimated a one-in-three chance the project will be abandoned in 1979. This estimate is almost three times higher than the 1978 estimate.

Put differently, the risks have gone up by some 300 per cent. That, Mr. Speaker, is scaring off, quite reasonably, a number of potential investors. That is one reason for having doubts about the northern part of the pipeline.

The second reason, which is connected, is that the American government has refused guarantees. I say that if the President of the United States took the Primer Minister's letter of March 12 in which he asked for guarantees seriously, and if he really intended to lay it on the line in terms of a commitment to the northern portion of the pipeline, the letter tabled in the House on Friday afternoon would not have contained vague expressions of good will. What President Carter ought to have said, if he really believed in the project, was that he would lay it on the line, and take a request for financial guarantees for the project to the U.S. Congress. That would be meaningful action, but that was not in President Carter's letter.

That is another reason why not only the private financial community is skeptical about the northern part of the pipeline but that, I suggest to you, the U.S. Congress is skeptical. It is the President of the United States himself who has severe reservations about the ultimate building of this pipeline, no matter what he says is his intent in the letter that the Prime Minister no doubt requested very hastily by telephone at the end of last week.

The third reason we give for being dubious about the building of the northern part of the pipeline pertains to the level of money put up by the private companies. Only $500 million has been put up, and note, Mr. Speaker, it is for feasibility studies—for assessments about the pipelines. It is not hard cash. There is no commitment, for example, to build, as the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) suggested, foot by foot, or that if we started a Canadian line in the south the American investors would commit themselves to so many millions of dollars and build—every time we put in a mile in the south, they would commit themselves, at least in principle, to build a mile in the north, which is one possibility, or at least to put up a substantial amount of money, something in the order of, as Mr. Schlesinger said, a $2 billion to $3 billion commitment. If that kind of money were put up there would be some reason to believe in the seriousness of this multibillion dollar project, for in terms of a project that costs $22 billion to $24 billion in terms of guarantees, $500 million is peanuts. I want to stress that these feasibility studies could be used ten, 15 or 25 years down the road as well, and we should keep that in mind.

After all our gas is gone, the $500 million may not be wasted because the feasibility study could show to the Americans that when they really have need for their gas in Alaska, when ours is all gone, they can go ahead with the project after all. But no money has been put up in terms of a commitment to build the pipeline in the north at this time.

● (1540)

A fourth reason for skepticism about the northern portion of the line is that the Americans have been discovering in their country since 1978 a lot of relatively inexpensive natural gas. They have discovered also that the Mexicans have come upon deposits of substantial proportions of inexpensive natural gas. And another country, to the north of them—dear old Canada, the perpetual supplier of resources to the United States—has also discovered substantial new reserves of natural gas since 1978.

I would like to quote to the House again from page 19 of this report to the United States Congress on that question. In discussing why the pipeline perhaps is not so desirable in the north, here is what is reported to members of the U.S. Congress:

Publicity concerning possible alternate natural gas supplies have further undermined public confidence in the project's future. The sponsors specifically mentioned optimistic reports about the potentially vast Canadian and Mexican natural gas supplies, the domestic surplus that unexpectedly developed in 1978—

That is the United States. The report continues:

—and optimism about potentially substantial lower 48-state reserves.

That is an American source which tells Americans that perhaps they do not need the northern pipeline after all because they can get Canadian gas, Mexican gas, or cheaper American gas which has been discovered since 1978 in their own country.

A fifth reason is this: the very acts of increasing exports of natural gas to the United States, first by a Conservative administration during the past winter, and subsequently by the Liberals—although they denounced the Tories at the time—undermine from an American point of view the desirability of proceeding quickly with the pipeline in the north.

With respect to the Conservatives, I will always remember the then prime minister of the day answering questions in the House about the shortage of heating fuel in Atlantic Canada and on the very same day as he was announcing potential shortages in Atlantic Canada, he announced the increased sale of 3.75 trillion cubic feet of natural gas to the United States. That is a sell-out. That is a foolish, short run sell-out of Canadian energy resources.

Mr. Waddell: That is why he is not in the House.

Mr. Broadbent: We said that. We were not the only people who said that, Mr. Speaker. The Liberals, too, said that. The Minister of Finance took on that demeanour of sober seriousness, as is so appropriate when he is denouncing the Tories. If I recall, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that this increase in exports of natural gas was one of the greatest sell-outs in Canadian history.

Of course the Liberals then had an election and they formed the government. I ask hon. members, did the Liberals come in and say that that was a terrible sell-out? They could have. They could have said that they would change the situation and would not allow the gas to go to the United States. But no, they did not do that at all. Having described this as the greatest sell-out in history before the election, one of the first things the Liberals did after they assumed office was to increase the level of exports of natural gas to the United States by .75 trillion cubic feet.

I do not know who wants to sell out this country faster, the Liberals or the Tories. You make your choice, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: The Liberals win by a nose.

Mr. Broadbent: What I do know—and this is the point I want to make and the argument for the pipeline—is that the Americans know that they can buy our gas. And if you were an American—and I do not blame them one bit—why would you be interested in building a line that is going to be a very risky venture in the northern part of Canada and into Alaska which will cost many billions of dollars, if Canadian political parties are suckers enough to sell natural gas?

Specifically on that point, in case one is inclined to think that this is simply New Democratic Party partisan politics, I refer you to a source, hardly a socialist source, Mr. Speaker, it is once again the Comptroller General's report to the United States Congress. I ask you what does he say about this? This is what he says about the Alcan pipeline:

> While this project could supply 800 billion cubic feet of gas a year to help close the 1985-90 gap, conservation and non-traditional domestic sources could possibly produce significantly larger amounts than have heretofore been anticipated. In addition, foreign sources—> could supply at least 2 trillion bucib feet yearly, assuming favourable government policies (see table 3 on page 27).

And guess who he has in mind? The Comptroller General's report continues:

The Americans have no doubt that either with the Liberals or the Tories in power they will get, from their point of view, favourable government policies. These are just the opposite from the Canadian point of view.

The sixth reason we have for believing that the pipeline is not likely to proceed in the north is the very building of what I have euphemistically described as the pre-build section. This accurately describes the gas export pipeline project on which the Liberals are now embarking. This act ironically goes against the building of the whole pipeline in the north itself because we are providing a facility in the south to get them good cheap Canadian gas. The more we provide them with good cheap Canadian gas, the less interest they will have in extending the pipeline to the north to get access to their own much more expensive gas. For anyone but a Liberal, that, I think, makes elementary economic sense.

Now I come to reason number seven. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, do large petroleum companies have an interest now in getting that Alaskan gas down as quickly as possible to the lower 48 states?

An hon. Member: Not a chance.

Mr. Broadbent: That is right, not a chance. They do not have an interest. I ask why? Because the oil companies want to do for their purposes what the New Democratic Party says that we as a nation should be doing for our purposes. The oil companies have an interest in keeping the Alaskan gas in Alaska for the present time. The reason for that is because they do not want to increase the supply. They do not want to flood the market and bring down the price. There is already what is called in the trade a bubble appearing in gas supplies in the United States. The very fact the American government has given in to the multinational oil companies, that is the big oil companies which control basically the development of this natural gas, and the very fact that they do not have a long-range interest in increasing the supply of the natural gas because it will reduce their profit margins, make it very unlikely indeed, in our judgment, that they will be proceeding quickly with the development of the northern portion of the pipeline.

Finally, there are certain regulatory barriers which were created by the American government itself in 1978 which have forced Foothills to say it will not go ahead with the northern portion of the Canadian part of the pipeline until these regulatory barriers have been changed. I think it is very interesting—and I will not go into them in detail—that the wording of President Carter's letter which was tabled in the House on Friday obliquely makes reference to these barriers. But does President Carter say that he will take immediate steps to change these barriers? Does he say with determined, decisive action that they will meet their commitments overnight? Not at all. He makes a general reference again to the future that if there should be problems, then he would take action. According to Foothills, the problems will not exist at some time in the future. They exist now. Once again, if the American administration were serious about getting the northern portion of the pipeline built, it would be taking concrete action today rather than making vague promises about the future.

What do these eight reasons add up to? I have taken time, because it is central to this debate and to our concern, to demonstrate the implausibility of building the northern portion of the line, whether it is going to be built on schedule or, conceivably, not even built. What these points add up to is precisely the conclusion that our energy critic and others in our caucus have been alluding to for many days now. They mean that we are certainly not going to get the northern portion of the pipeline built by 1985. In my judgment it is quite possible that the northern pipeline will not be built at all. That is what it means.

It also means that with this measure the Liberal Party of Canada have done once again what they are so capable of doing, namely, selling out our resources. Canadians will recall that it was the Liberals in the early seventies who told us that we had—what was the figure—390 years' supply of oil. We had centuries' supplies of oil. Then they proceeded to sell it off. I looked at the figures this morning. The Liberals sold more than 1,700 million barrels of Canadian oil in the early 1970s.

When Tommy Douglas, our energy critic at the time, pointed out that it was a mistake, he was laughed at by the Liberals. They said, "They are the gloom and doom boys". Well, Tommy Douglas happened to know what he was talking about.

Mr. Kempling: Good old Husky.

Mr. Broadbent: The Liberals sold our oil in the early 1970s and, as a result, we are now importing oil. What they did with oil in the seventies they are about to do with gas in the eighties. That is exactly what they are doing. The Liberals are the masters of the short-run, quick-buck solution, which always ignores the long-range interests of the people of Canada. Just to turn around a phrase used by the colourful, if incompetent, former minister of finance, the Liberals really do believe in short-term gain for long-term pain for the people of Canada. That is what this sell-out amounts to.

I want to conclude by saying that if there is one party which can accurately be described as a collection of phony nationalists, it is the Liberal Party of Canada. They suddenly discovered in the latter days of the last election campaign that Canadians were concerned about resources, wanted an industrial strategy, and wanted a Canada that in the long run we owned and controlled. We got the nationalist rhetoric. That is the nationalism of the Liberal party in essence, nothing more than rhetoric. The time has come, and the people want this above all in the energy field, to replace rhetoric with substance. The people of Canada want something entirely different from what they get from that cynical crowd across the chamber. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper):

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words "on the day that this order is adopted", and by substituting therefor the following words:
> "after it has voted on a government motion providing that the building of the pre-build portion of the northern gas pipeline will not commence until complete financial guarantees for the whole pipeline have been obtained and that an agreement has been reached between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States that the Canadian gas exported through the southern portion of the proposed pipeline will be replaced by Alaska gas at an equivalent price".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would like to reserve judgment on the amendment. It certainly has some substantive aspects to it. If, however, there is a disposition on the part of the House to accept such an amendment unanimously, that might be considered. Is there any indication that there is unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is unanimous consent of the House to accept the amendment as proposed for debate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I had presumed that the reservations which the Chair had put were reservations as to the propriety of the amendment under the Standing Orders. The Chair has nodded yes. It is in agreement. I presume the Chair, with those reservations, will have to take its own counsel. I further suppose that every member of this House is in exactly the same position. We will be looking at the amendment from that point of view.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would invite further comment. Does the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) care to comment on the propriety of the amendment?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, we have absolutely no objection to this amendment being moved by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party. We do not support it, but we have nothing against the amendment being accepted for debate in the coming speeches.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the motion be accepted for debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is unanimous consent. In that case—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect, I do not know whether that question really arises because, as I understand the practice, it has always been that if the Chair had some reservations about a motion, which reservations it has now indicated it has, debate could continue while the Chair considered those reservations. If that is the normal practice, and I believe it is, we have no objection to that practice being followed. However, when the Chair expressed reservations about the substance of the motion, I was reserving the right of the House to do what the Chair is doing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will reserve judgment on the motion, and debate will continue.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That's better.

Mr. Waddell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this matter, I would simply ask that you consider this, Mr. Speaker. I distinctly heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House the other day propose or agree with a motion in this line. I would ask the Chair to note that, and to note there is no one in the House objecting to the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, last Friday the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested that the New Democratic Party propose an amendment along the lines of this one, provided the debate be terminated last Friday, but that was not the case. However, I am certain that the Prime Minister will not object to such an amendment being moved. We object to the merits of the amendment but not to its acceptability, if it meets with the approval of the Chair.

Summer Recess

• (1600)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The concern expressed by the Chair relates to the substantive nature of the amendment, and I will reserve judgment. Meanwhile we will recognize speakers in the debate.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I have been able to listen to this debate, which in reality began on Friday, continued today, and may possibly extend over most of the week, on what I think is an extremely important subject. I could not help contrasting the contribution to the debate of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) with that of the leader of the socialist party. While I did not agree, naturally, with everything the Leader of the Opposition had to say, I did find myself moved and impressed by the sensitivity with which he discussed this problem. He spoke eloquently about the reception he received in Quebec during the referendum. I, too, was pleased at the reception paid to the right hon. member, if only because of the determination and skill with which he has mastered the other official language of this country. I think it is no secret that the Leader of the Opposition is welcome in any riding in any part of that beautiful province.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke also of the sensitivity of the unique problems of Alberta, implying, I suppose, that we in the east should understand a little more some of the problems and economic problems of Alberta. It is perhaps time that we in the east understood that not everybody in the province of Alberta is a millionaire or near millionaire, that there are people in Alberta who are very dependent on the prosperity of this country for their own economic survival, and that everybody in Alberta is not necessarily linked to the gas and oil industry.

What I got out of the message of the Leader of the Opposition is that if there are any regional considerations being advanced here by hon. members from Alberta, they are being advanced positively, logically, and in the spirit which I think has to prevail in this country over the next ten or 20 years if we are going to mend fences, so to speak, and bring this country closer together rather than farther apart. I think the Leader of the Opposition stressed that energy and the way it is handled in the next ten or 20 years can be a positive force but that it can be an equally divisive force and that at this present moment we need to be a little more considerate, tolerant, and understanding of regional problems.

Perhaps it is in that vein that I approach the whole issue of the pre-build pipeline and what it means to segments of the economy of Alberta. I am thinking particularly of people in the natural gas industry. I know a little bit about this in the sense that I have been in the riding of the Leader of the Opposition, I have been to Blairmore, I have entered the Coleman collieries and I have seen the coal industry, their horizontal shafts, and people working extremely hard for their livelihood. I know the frustrations of people in the natural gas industry, the independent producers of natural gas who sit with thousands—not hundreds—of natural gas wells capped because there is no market or, more properly put, no access to the markets which are there. We would not be discussing this at the moment if the National Energy Board had not clearly indicated that there is a surplus of natural gas at this moment, and a market ready.

Mr. Orlikow: How many times are they wrong?

Mr. Mackasey: I do not want to get into an argument with the hon. doctrinaire socialist on the front bench, who constantly interrupts with the same diatribe each and every time somebody wants to approach a debate on a different plane.

If it is a matter of trading insults with the hon. gentleman, I can do it, because if we carry his logic to a conclusion, nothing which is not renewable should be exported from this country until sometime in the twenty-second century. That is true of copper, silver, gold, iron and coal. It is equally true of the 22 million barrels of crude oil which the province of Saskatchewan exports every year. We do not hear a word in the debate about the 22 million barrels of crude oil which are exported from Saskatchewan. Sixty thousand barrels are exported daily. I happen to agree with the policy. I think it is logical. I think that the province of Saskatchewan has acted wisely and with restraint, but the fact still remains that to some hon. members in that party there is no valid excuse for selling one barrel of crude oil today.

It is obvious and inevitable that ten, 20, 50 or 100 years from now, if we still need crude oil or gas, its value will be increased that much more. The false logic of all the arguments on Friday and today, including that of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) today, is based on the false premise that because it can be demonstrated that natural gas and crude oil or energy of any type will have a greater monetary value ten, 20, 40 or 50 years from now, we should wait for 50 years. The Leader of the NDP does not tell the independent producer of natural gas what the people in this business should be doing in the meantime with their inventories or their supplies. It should be sold if it can be clearly demonstrated that in selling it the national interest of this country is not affected.

Mr. McDermid: Tell that to your energy minister. Read Lalonde's speech of December 6.

Mr. Mackasey: The problem with the New Democrats is that everything must be discussed and weighed on the basis of their doctrinaire approach that private enterprise has no place in our society, that multinational corporations—or indeed any corporation of any size—should not exist and that everything should be state-owned, including all forms of energy, all retail outlets and every service station on every corner. It is extremely difficult to debate with people who begin from that premise. In his speech the Leader of the New Democratic Party had to admit that there will be some negative effects on steel workers, but he rationalized that away. He said that there will not be too many. Let him tell that to the steelworkers in Lincoln. Let him say to the steelworkers of Hamilton that there will not be too many. Let him tell unemployed steelworkers that the New Democratic Party says that factories being out of work is not important because there are not too many steelworkers involved. There is always one too many if one person is unemployed.

Even if we were not creating jobs with this project, I would stand with the NDP if I felt that we were exporting natural gas that we need. Of course we will need natural gas in 50 years, 100 years or 200 years. In the early seventies I had the same misgivings about selling gas and oil, and expressed them quite publicly, but I have to say I was wrong because since the sale of natural gas and since the sale of oil in the seventies, the effect those sales have had on research and development and on exploration has been obvious. We have more natural gas now than we had in the early seventies. The incentive under the private industry system is profit. That is not a dirty word in our party, nor in the Conservative party. It is a dirty word only in the NDP. They do not tell us where they would get the capital if the state were to own all sources of production. That is something they skim over. In the last year or two when members of the New Democratic Party were pretending to be liberals, they could skim over it, but never again.

They cannot any more. So despite telegrams from the leader of the Canadian Labour Congress, subtly worded, and the head of the steelworkers, subtly worded, I am more impressed by the steelworkers, employed and unemployed, I met in my riding on Saturday morning. They expressed concern and anger at the New Democrats for blocking a project which means the difference between survival and prosperity and poverty in that particular part of the community.

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Mackasey: The member over there does not care about the rank and file.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member wants me to name one. I have a telegram signed by Len Stevens, Director, District 3, United Steel Workers of America.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Mackasey: I will read it into the record because the hon. member has asked me to read one. It reads as follows:

For your information following telegram sent to Ed Broadbent by Dick Martin, President, Manitoba Federation of Labour:

"The Manitoba Federation of Labour representing over 76,000 Manitoba workers requests your support of approval of the construction of the western Canadian section of the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline, while at the same time pursuing guarantees and environment safeguards. Jobs are badly needed by Canadians, particularly in view of the increasing unemployment and forecast of a bleak economic winter".

An hon. Member: Read it all, Bryce.

Mr. Mackasey: It does not please them. They think that the labour movement is homogeneous. They cannot elect a member in Windsor despite the concentration of the labour force there. It is because they treat unionized members as robots. The NDP said that this project was bad. They asked, "Why is it bad?" The NDP said, "Because we tell you it is bad". They fail to appreciate that workers today are educated, sophisticated, and knowledgeable as investors. They will make their own minds up as to whether this is a good project or a bad one.

What we have heard today is total disdain for the word of the President of the United States. That amazes me, because I grew up in a period when there was great respect for the United States and for the office of president.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Mackasey: I cannot understand it. Obviously they do not have that respect. They would rather salute some other country, which is their privilege. But I was brought up that way and I cannot see any politician, because politicians are people of integrity, sending out a letter over his signature as did President Carter—and restating it verbally on the weekend—a statement which clearly implied that the pipeline would go ahead as scheduled—

An hon. Member: You cannot guarantee that.

Mr. Mackasey: Nor can the hon. member guarantee that it will not. That comes down to the differences in our philosophies and convictions. Maybe the hon. member is right, but he does not know if he is right. If he is wrong, he should think of the harm he is doing to the country at the moment.

An hon. Member: You are gambling.

Mr. Mackasey: The other day I read an article by someone in the steel industry. It pointed out quite logically that this country, as was pointed out by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, is truly a great one. It needs a little vision, a little leadership, and a little entrepreneurship. As many members in the House will remember, when we were building the Seaway we procrastinated, delayed, and waited for the Americans, and finally got it through. I can think of other projects that were dealt with in the same way. But this gentleman, in a well-reasoned speech, made the point that in the matter of a very few years by necessity this country will be dealing with a half dozen massive projects, not just one. There will Beaufort, Hibernia, further development of the tar sands, the eventual pipeline to the Atlantic provinces once we see the quantity of gas available off Sable Island, and of course the Alaska pipeline.

If all these projects come on stream simultaneously in two, three, four, or five years, one should think of the problem we will have. It will be as much as we had in the late sixties with the building of the subway in Montreal at the same time as Expo was being built. One must remember the impact it had on the economy, wages, and salaries. There were shortages of skilled labour, professional labour, engineers and capital.

Inflation hit badly, and we reaped it in the seventies because of the lack of co-ordination, planning or scheduling in the sixties.

Apparently the byword of the New Democratic Party is "industrial strategy"; a great phrase that, "industrial strategy". Another great one is a "manpower policy". It amazes me that they cannot understand how beneficial it is for us to have an opportunity to begin the pre-build now rather than five years from now when we may begin simultaneously the whole pipeline. At this moment the country is badly in need of such a project. If this was not the project, logically we should look for another one.

The average Canadian who is out of work through no fault of his own, and this includes the high number of unemployed people in the greater Hamilton area, would prefer a steady job. He would prefer to work instead of receiving a handout, unemployment insurance, welfare, LIP, OFY, make-work, or call it what you want. There is no real substitute for these types of projects properly handled and properly introduced.

I am sure the opportunities for the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) are obvious. With the injection of capital from the United States at the beginning of this project, the dollar should be strengthened. If he wants to lower interest rates and if he wants to bring the value of the dollar down so that it will not affect our exports in the pulp and paper industry, he can then do so. He needs this kind of a project badly. We need it to help Alberta, the people in the natural gas industry and the independent producers who are essentially Canadians. They need this cash flow. There is nothing wrong with stating that. They will take that cash flow, reinvest it, explore some more and bring other wells on stream.

In a country with the energy surplus we have but an oil shortage, obviously natural gas is one source of surplus energy. It happened to be a byproduct of oil in the old days and now it is coming into its own. We have a tremendous surplus, and will for five or ten years, if we believe the National Energy Board, and that is its responsibility. We have the need, the customers, the gas and the will power. Only the NDP with its reactionary approach cannot see the benefits of a project of this size. This is why they will never get out of the corner. They cannot think nationally. They never could; they never will. They do not even have the freedom to think because they are fettered by their convictions that something about private enterprise is bad, that we should own everything.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: It has been proven so many times it is obvious. Perhaps the Leader of the NDP is not quite that doctrinaire, but he does what his backbenchers tell him. That is why he is there. That is why he came hustling back to the House on Friday to find out what was going on. One only has to go back to the auto pact. They were against the auto pact in the sixties—I remember that like yesterday—then they became the greatest supporters of it. Even the statement of Dennis McDermott today is a reasonable one. It embarrasses that party with the type of faint praise you and I know we could do without.

What are the economic benefits of this project? They have been restated over the weekend in every newspaper, by the minister, and by the hon. senator in the other place. I know statistics bore all of us, but if one looks at the figures of the Department of Finance, the pre-build itself will represent a $2 billion positive impact on our balance of payments. That is a greater sum than the main line, because the main line will be built in the other country. It means 150,000 man-years of work, none of which would be worth it if this was a bad project. It is not a bad project. It means 150,000 jobs which will be spread right across this great country of ours. I have to be a little selfish and suggest that it is more than a hope that they will find their way into Welland, Hamilton and the Niagara Peninsula where unemployment is much too high.

I cannot get up in the House on a debate like this and suggest that it is relatively unimportant to the unemployed in Hamilton, that in the name of false economic nationalism we should postpone this project for five, ten, or 20 years until there are some Utopian-type guarantees. I am more concerned about the unemployed workers in my riding than that.

The statistics indicate that we will knock about one half of one per cent off the unemployment figure just with the pre-build, and two-thirds of 1 per cent when the total project is over. As the minister mentioned, we will have upwards of 90 per cent Canadian content in most of our purchases, and 100 per cent Canadian content in the pipe. It means an injection into the economy of $1.45 billion at a time when the economy needs such an injection. Ironically, this is quite in line with the NDP's change in policy, with which I do not necessarily differ. If we were to come along during any other period of unemployment and suggest, "We are going to inject $2 billion right now into the economy. Let's change it"—that is the policy which the eloquent financial critic of the NDP has been talking about for months. He wants to get it through a greater deficit, which is the same thing. We, fortunately, happen to have a $2 billion project available. The problem, of course, will be to make certain we do not fan the fires of inflation.

Mr. Waddell: What happens two years from now?

Mr. Mackasey: Calm down. Relax. That $2 billion should have a beneficial effect on the dollar. The minister, his advisers suggest, will have more flexibility with regard to the setting of interest rates. If he is worried that the dollar is going too high he can lower interest rates and bring the value down so that our exporting companies will not be affected.

I was particulary interested in one telegram which came in; I think it was an honest appraisal of the impact. The company in question is Dofasco in Hamilton; it does not benefit directly from the project because it does not make pipe of the size required. But they endorse it. I will just read the first paragraph:

> Approval by the federal government of construction of the pre-build portion of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline will provide a much needed boost to the Canadian economy both with respect to maintaining existing jobs in Hamilton and creating new ones. In addition to the direct impact of this undertaking there are also immense spinoff benefits which will come from ancillary developments.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the result of the exciting concept of injecting $2 billion into a badly depressed economy at this time. I am amazed at the position taken by the New Democratic Party. On one hand we have the National Energy Board telling us of the surplus which exists because of the initiative of private enterprise and Petro-Canada in a mixed economy from the early seventies onward in finding excess gas. Since 1977, as the hon. senator, the minister responsible for the pipeline in 1977, mentioned, the volume of Canadian gas surplus to our needs and available for export has grown from 800 billion cubic feet to around 4.5 trillion cubic feet. How did it happen? Did Santa Claus wave a wand? Did the socialists insist on it? No. It was discovered because people with initiative and incentive went out and explored for it. Canadians, through their willingness to invest and participate, provided the capital which enabled these independent firms to find, since 1977, natural gas which under the socialist banner would remain in the ground until hell freezes over—a long time.

That is what has changed since 1977. The National Energy Board has been subjected to a lot of ridicule from time to time. It is doing a difficult job. It has stated we have 4.5 trillion cubic feet of gas to export. The idea that anybody is likely to come along in ten or 15 years time and return those 4.5 trillion cubic feet of gas at today's prices is very unrealistic. That amount probably will not even pay for the transportation 20 or 30 years from now. What we have, in other words, are reserves. We have the willingness, we have the need, we have the correct economic conditions in the sense that a $2 billion injection would work against our best interests if it were brought in four or five years from now when the economy is, perhaps, at its height, when it would be nothing more than inflationary, when we could not spare the steelworkers, when the mills would be doing something else and the craftsmen would be doing something else, when the professionals would be busy with some other phase of our expansion. This is needed now, and the only thing that should hold us back is the presence of any real evidence that private enterprise does not intend to continue the pipeline in a few years. The NDP has not the slightest bit of evidence to that effect. What they have advanced is some skepticism about the value of the letter from the President of the United States. They have talked about the need to keep the gas in the ground for 20, 30 or 50 years. But note this: there has not been one protest about the millions and millions of barrels of heavy oil which flow out of the beautiful province of Saskatchewan. Not a word. Nor do they dare say a word, because Mr. Blakeney would tell them to get lost.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: If we listen to them we would never export copper. Because that is not renewable.

An hon. Member: Potash?

Mr. Mackasey: I was saving that for the end, but you have spoiled it!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: I was around when the NDP tried to seduce everybody in the House of Commons in an effort to get some agreement to get potash out of this country. Mr. Blakeney made trip after trip to the United States to talk to private enterprise so as to come to an accommodation about shipping out potash. And he did well.

What are the jobs I am talking about? Are they limited to steelworkers? If they were, it would be unfair. British Columbia is getting $70 million; Alberta is getting $650 million; Saskatchewan and Manitoba, $360 million; Ontario and Quebec, $360 million. Stelco in Hamilton will be providing 12,000 man-years—that is an interesting figure if you are listing steelworkers in Hamilton; Welland, 1,800 man-years; Regina, 10,000 man-years. Little wonder the steelworker labour unionists of Regina do not want anything more to do with the NDP. And we are talking about introducing a greater degree of industrialization to the west as inevitably must happen as natural resources become depleted, as they will one day. Camrose and Edmonton—I will not say too much about that particular area, but the benefit there will amount to 2,700 man-years. It is not just pipe.

Turbo-compressors costing $20 million will have to be installed, creating 500 man-years of employment in the industrial heartland of Ontario. Three units will be purchased from the Cooper-Rolls Corporation in Montreal providing 100 man-years employment in the Rolls-Royce plant in Montreal; 80 man-years in Stratford, at the plant of Cooper Energy Services, and that is just one company—I cannot go on to list them all because so many companies are breathing sighs of relief today having learned that the government is courageous enough, with support of the official opposition, to bring forward a $2 billion project at a time when Canada needs it.

The only thing that is creating the slightest reserve in anybody's mind is that the signature of the President of the United States and his letter are not worth the paper they are printed on. I happen to have a greater respect for the office of the President of the United States and for that country than do the New Democrats. If you share their philosophy, you can understand their cynicism and disdain. I do not happen to share it. I can understand their concern. Their concern is that they are becoming superfluous.

• (1630)

I made a few notes on the comments of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). He wiped out $500 million as if it were nothing. He referred to a feasibility study. That $500 million is not going to a feasibility study. It is going for an engineering and conditioning plant in Alaska. The Leader of the New Democract Party called it a feasibility study. That would be some study if it were to cost $500 million. I wonder what the whole project would be worth.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: They are a spent force. The Leader of the New Democratic Party referred to higher prices later on. Of course, prices will be higher later on. The independent gas producer in Alberta needs the cash now. Ask him if he would rather leave his gas in the gound. As a matter of fact nobody in Alberta has to sell their gas. If they prefer to store it for their grandchildren or their great grandchildren, they can do that. They can leave the cap on the well, even though they may have an opportunity now to dispose of their gas to eastern Canada and to the United States.

Mr. Paproski: We want to share it.

Mr. Mackasey: If the Alberta producers want to leave their gas in the ground and take advantage of higher prices five years, or ten years from now, they can do that. After all, the oil is not state owned. The people who own it still have rights and they do not have to sell their gas if they do not wish to. We do not have the kind of regime which one might find in a socialist country and, certainly, if the producers in Alberta want to hang on to their gas and take advantage of higher prices later on, they can do so.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party said that there would be more jobs if the whole pipeline were built. That one really got me. Of course there would be more jobs if the pipeline is built, and of course the pipeline will be built. That is the difference. When it is built, there will be more jobs. The thought that possibly the project will go through bothers these prophets of gloom and doom in the corner. Of course the project will go through, and as the Leader of the New Democratic Party so aptly and so logically put it, there will be more jobs when the pipeline is built. I can assure the hon. gentleman that my instincts are as good as his, and I am sure that the whole pipeline will be built. I may be mistaken, but I believe that the NDP voted against the Alaska Pipeline Act. Perhaps they were not too concerned about the jobs which would be created or they could not see the need for them a few years later.

According to my notes, the NDP leader said that the pipeline will be built not at all, or only some time after 1985. Again he totally ignored the $500 million which has been committed, the unanimous commitment of the Senate, the unanimous commitment of the Congress, and he ridiculed the president of our greatest friend.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted a slight recollection at this point in this debate and do a double-take, if I might, with respect to the government's position vis-à-vis the amendment which has been proposed by the New Democratic Party, I recall rather vividly the furor and shouting match which went on at the time I made an announcement with respect to the export of natural gas from Canada, a very sensible decision and one which has now received the acclaim of all straight-thinking and forward-thinking people in Canada.

An hon. Member: Except the voters.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Indeed, I am fascinated to watch what is happening now with respect to the statements which have been made by the government.

Most of us are probably asking ourselves, "What are we doing here today?" I had made all the necessary arrangements to move back to my constituency of Saskatoon West to serve at the local level and to work directly within the constituency. What are we doing back in Ottawa at this point in time? It is a rather curious situation which has caused the continued sitting of the House during the summer. Of course it is the motion brought down by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). It is a very bold and imaginative gesture which he has taken in order to grab the attention of the newsmakers of our country while everyone else in the country is away on vacation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Unfortunately, I had to go back to Saskatoon on Friday, so I did not have the opportunity to hear the very excellent speech which was made by my leader. However, a very interesting development took place. The NDP were talking about the urgency of this matter and saying that the country was about to fall apart, action had to be taken, and Parliament had to sit on a continuous basis, but when the NDP was given the opportunity to continue the debate into the weekend on this very urgent matter, they turned the invitation down and went away from here to contemplate and consider whether or not they were on the right side of this issue as far as the newspapers were concerned.

Mr. Rae: We wanted you to be here, Ray.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In fact, what really happened, was that the Leader of the New Democratic Party went to see the real leader and had a long talk over the weekend with Dennis McDermott. It was a very informative discussion in which the Leader of the New Democratic Party engaged at that time because he was worried about the vibrations he was receiving as to whether or not there was total support for his proposition.

Today, he stood up in the House and said that there was 100 per cent unanimous support on the part of the New Democratic Party for the proposition which he put forward. Unfortunately, the statement of the Leader of the New Democratic Party is simply not correct because a very substantial and important part of the New Democratic Party, in terms of its support and power within the party, is adamantly opposed to the position put forward by the Leader of the New Democratic Party today. I refer, of course, to the Saskatchewan New Democratic government.

I have just returned from enjoying a weekend in beautiful Saskatchewan.

Mr. Broadbent: There is good government there.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Notwithstanding the provincial government there. At the same time I was amazed to read in the newspaper the position taken by the New Democratic Party there. We must put this into context and perspective because we know that the NDP is the only party which does not have its leadership chosen on the basis of representation from every constituency in Canada on an equal basis. What they do in terms of their leadership selection is based upon membership. For example, the trade union movement is a very important faction in the consideration of party policy. The province of Saskatchewan has a large membership and a large delegation in terms of the national party and the support which the hon. member for Oshawa receives.

The voice of the New Democratic Party in Saskatchewan is very important in terms of party policy, and they came forward on the weekend and said that they were absolutely opposed to what was said by their leader. The headline in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix of Saturday, July 19, reads "Messer lauds pipeline pact". For those who are uninformed, Mr. Messer is the minister of energy for Saskatchewan. The article goes on to say:

Saskatchewan has welcomed the federal decision to proceed with the pre-build portion of the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline, mineral resources minister Jack Messer said Friday.

He said that the concerns which have been expressed by the NDP in Ottawa have, according to him, been resolved and settled to his satisfaction. He has no concern now. I am not putting these words in the mouth of the New Democratic Party of Saskatchewan. I am simply quoting what a very important segment of the New Democratic Party hierarchy says with respect to this policy which we now hear is 100 per cent the position of the New Democratic Party. I would like to hear an explanation from one of the spokesmen of that party, if there is to be another speaker from that party during this debate, on how they stand with regard to that particular policy.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the Socreds in British Columbia.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I should put the rest of this article on the record, because it is interesting and because it has allowed me to hear both sides of the story. From there I can make up my mind with respect to this issue and determine how I want to vote. I want to know what both sides are saying.

● (1640)

I listened to the Leader of the New Democratic Party making a speech in Ottawa, and for the other side of the story I go to Saskatchewan to hear what the New Democratic Party there is saying. The article I referred to earlier goes on to say:

Despite provincial concerns, Messer noted the government has been fully supportive of an expansion of the Interprovincial Steel and Pipe Corporation (IPSCO) plant in Regina aimed at supplying pipe for the line, and it would be 'ridiculous' for the province now to be opposed to the project.

I wonder whether the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) and the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin)—I don't see them in the House at the moment—are twitching to get involved in this debate. And what about the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans)? Where does he stand? Why has he been silent?

Mr. Broadbent: He speaks next.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Hallelujah, brother! We are finally going to hear, after this delay, what the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, who has so many steelworkers in his constituency and relies so much on their support, what position he takes and precisely where he stands in respect to the position put forth by his leader.

An hon. Member: He doesn't want that pipe order.

Mr. Deans: Why don't you sit down?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I simply want to put forth a calm and logical approach to this very complicated issue. I know members of the New Democratic Party will listen and take note, and be very interested in what I am saying.

What else does Mr. Messer have to say? He is the minister of energy in the New Democratic government of Saskatchewan. That information is for those who are just tuning in, in other parts of the country. I know it is getting close to the dinner hour and a lot of people will be watching this very interesting debate. Dealing with Mr. Messer's comments again, the article ended as follows:

Messer noted the provincial environment department is inviting comments from the public on the Saskatchewan portion of the line before final provincial approval is issued.

But he said he is not aware of any pressing environmental concerns in that area of the province which might significantly delay the project.

I have looked through this article and I have tried to contact my NDP friends in Saskatchewan to find out whether there is a dissenting point of view. The only one I have heard is with respect to the speech made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party in this House this afternoon. There is obviously a serious breach on this as on many other issues in the New Democratic Party. It is almost an article of faith now that if the hon. member for Oshawa says something in the House of Commons with respect to the position of that party today, someone else in the New Democratic Party elsewhere will say exactly the opposite. I can give a list of instances where that has happened. They came out against the proposal made by this party with respect to the home owners' grants and exemptions and the grants for taxes and mortgage deductibility.

Mr. Nystrom: Petro-Canada.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: At the same time that the Leader of the New Democratic Party was on his feet, Mr. Blakeney in Saskatchewan was introducing legislation which was the very same as the legislation we had proposed. It was incredible. There was a double-take by the people of Saskatchewan, I can assure you.

Mr. Broadbent: Wrong again.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I have just been handed a note to the effect that there is a feeling by some of my advisers that I should not take this amendment too seriously. I am trying to take it very seriously.

What about uranium? The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) has made reference to the position of this party on renewable resources. I wonder about the question of uranium exports. The Premier of Saskatchewan has been to China and Japan to discuss the export of uranium from Saskatchewan. He has not suggested that the uranium should be left in the ground or that it be used only domestically for energy purposes. To the Japanese he said, "We are prepared in Saskatchewan to give you a guaranteed supply of uranium—a guaranteed supply of uranium, exporting that commodity from our country". The New Democratic Party speaks with one mouth in terms of its political attempts on the floor of this House, keeping this House in session, and yet with another mouth its key supporters across the country take a diametrically opposed position.

An hon. Member: They are full of potash.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to address myself to some of the broader aspects of this matter. As we consider whether this House should adjourn, I think it is important to review what has taken place during this session and consider the challenges that will face us when we return.

We have been very much preoccupied with matters relating to energy. I think it would be appropriate to consider the prospects held out to us by the government and to review the progress made toward an energy policy. The people of Canada could take advantage of the adjournment to advise members on both sides of the House on how they think the government has performed and what positions they think should be taken. It might be useful, in that context, to review some of the undertakings given by the government in the Speech from the Throne.

The speech contained several items relating to energy. Without according them any priority I should like to take them individually and comment on each.

The Speech from the Throne, read by the Governor General on behalf of the government on April 14, stated:

> A new blended price is to be established which will progressively incorporate the costs of the oil import compensation program, while at the same time maintaining a single national price for consumers.

I do not believe that new blended price has materialized either by way of legislation, agreement or substitution. We are still trying to find out what this blended price is all about—trying to figure out if it was as stated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) who was asked during the election campaign what was meant by a blended price and who replied:

> If the price of conventional oil is x, you will have a price of x plus y for the non-conventional oil, and then the international price—you know what it is—but we have indicated we will continue to subsidize the price . . . So what you would end up with would be a mix of these prices.

An hon. Member: Say that again.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There is erudition unequalled in terms of political pronouncement, statements and explanations of policy in the history of our country. Not only has no legislation been introduced or the policy been brought in in any way, but we do not even know what it means.

The second item in the Speech from the Throne was this:

> The blended price will reflect the right of producing provinces and corporations to a fair return for their resources and their investment.

They have been silent, Mr. Speaker. We have no knowledge of any statement. Five months have passed since the election but there is not a tittle of evidence on this new idea of fair return. At a press conference the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested in a rather jocular fashion that they were going to give an arm and a leg but there would be no tradeoffs. We still do not know precisely what they mean by a fair return to provinces and corporations, however.

The third thing brought out in the Speech from the Throne was that the government did not intend to impose the 18 cents increase in excise tax on transportation fuel. It has not done that yet—directly, I should say. But we can rest assured, on the basis of what is happening in terms of international prices and general commitments in principle, that we in Canada are faced with the highest increase in the price of oil on the basis of the cost of imported oil and growing dependence on that. The 18 cents will look like a paltry sum in the eyes of Canadians by the time this government has finished its mandate in office.

• (1650)

I come to another point. Under the heading "Security of Energy at a Fair Price" we find the following paragraph:

> A petroleum price auditing agency will be established to investigate and report to the government and people of Canada on oil company costs, profits, capital expenditures and levels of Canadian ownership.

There is no legislation, nor was any reference made in the House today by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to this new commission. I simply wonder aloud. When I asked the minister a week ago last Friday about this particular commission, he seemed to be under the misapprehension that he already had the powers for this agency on the basis of the petroleum monitoring act which now allows the government to make a full audit of the oil companies' books. We have not had any decision with respect to this new agency. We have no idea what the government is talking about with respect to the mandate and what is happening. So there is another item promised in the Speech from the Throne on which there has been absolutely no action nor any indication of action planned in the immediate future.

I hope I have 40 minutes to carry this out because the promises are rather lengthy. Generally speaking, I can get rid of my part of the speech very quickly because I can tell you in advance that when I go over these things my reply will be either: no action, no action taken, or none contemplated in the immediate future.

The Speech from the Throne goes on to say:

> In spite of Canada's large energy resources, which put this country in the extremely favourable position of being a major energy exporter, we remain partially dependent upon imported oil.

That is the understatement of the year. It continues:

My government is determined to reduce that dependence by promoting conservation and by stimulating the production of new domestic energy supplies.

Not one initiative has come to pass. There has been nothing taken of a novel nature in terms of the new initiative on energy conservation nor in obtaining newer and other supplies of this precious commodity. Another item says that mandatory fuel efficiency standards for automobiles will be established. Policies will be designed to improve home insulation. Where are the legislative enactments with respect to these initiatives? What are we looking forward to? Does the manufacturer of automobiles in this country know what kinds of constraints will be placed on him with respect to the production and manufacture of automobiles? When will the home owner become apprised of what additions and benefits will be available to him or her? I suspect this will probably be just after the heating season commences next winter so they will be unable to take advantage of it for at least another year.

Here is another item:

In co-operation with provincial governments, other steps will be taken to encourage more rapid substitution from oil to other energy sources in order to substantially reduce the significance of oil in meeting our energy needs.

There is nothing; there is not one indication of any movement in this direction.

Here is another item:

Policies will be introduced to encourage consumers to switch from oil to natural gas or electricity for home heating.

Mr. Deans: That is in the United States.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am glad for that intervention, Mr. Speaker, because it gives me cause to consider that it may be that we have heard the speech from the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain already, if that is the extent of his contribution. I hope not. I hope we will hear from him and I hope we will find out where he stands on this important issue so he can go back to his steelworkers in Hamilton and get their unblemished support.

I shall now continue. The next item says:

My government equally favours the earliest possible construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritime provinces—

I guess I have to give the government a C-minus for this item because if I had left off the words "and maritime provinces" I suppose that might have been some indication that they had taken some steps. The maritime provinces are out on a limb again as usual with this government. There is no consideration with respect to the long-term energy requirement for that part of the country, and I would say we would have to give them a C-minus with respect to that. It is very encouraging to see at least in one of these items there has been some small statement of their policy.

Here is another item:

Petro-Canada will be maintained and expanded as an instrument of public policy.

Further in the same paragraph it says:

—our national oil company will also receive a renewed mandate to engage vigorously in oil purchase negotiations and agreements with foreign suppliers.

That is a nice statement of intention, but again I have to state regretfully that there has been no indication that that policy will be introduced in the immediate future. There has not been exactly, from what I hear, a plethora of Petro-Canada people rushing around trying to get external contracts. As far as I know, the initiatives that have taken place while I was minister are still the only initiatives that are being undertaken by this government.

We are almost at the end. I just want to conclude and make another reference to the Speech from the Throne as follows:

You will be asked to approve a new Canada Oil and Gas Act, which will provide new preferential rights for Petro-Canada and other Canadian companies—and establish new and more demanding requirements for exploration and development of these promising frontier areas.

This has not happened yet. Maybe it will happen later on. Maybe when we get back and the government has had a chance to consider its priorities, we will have some idea of what the government is going to do with the Canada oil and gas act and the regulations which are now in effect.

The last item to which I shall bring your attention is this:

An alternative energy corporation will be created with a mandate to stimulate the development of new and renewable energy sources to replace oil.

There is nothing except some suggestion in question period today that this is one of the things which the minister was giving serious thought to. It may be, indeed, a subsidiary of Petro-Canada. But there is nothing too precise. No action has been taken. All we hear is promise after promise, without the suggestion of any sort of movement with respect to all of these undertakings made by this government in the Speech from the Throne.

The government came into power on the basis of introducing, at an early date, an energy policy to meet the crisis we face in our energy situation in Canada today. It has been virtually inactive in any area of energy development and energy policy.

Mr. Deans: You tell us what your policy is.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I have one final point. I believe the time allotment is 40 minutes, and I have another ten minutes, and then I will be finished.

Mr. Deans: You are not going to use the ten minutes, are you?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Yes, I am.

I know that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is interested in getting into this debate, so I think it is only incumbent upon me to take the initiative that will allow him to speak so we can hear him and allow the New Democratic Party to carry on.

Mr. Deans: I will speak at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I move, seconded by, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the House continue to sit this day through the dinner hour in order to consider the motion of the President of the Privy Council now under consideration, including any amendment or amendments proposed thereto.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I should interrupt the hon. member and advise all hon. members that it is the intention of Madam Speaker to enter the chamber in a moment or two in order to give a ruling with respect to the amendment put by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I might add that perhaps the best way to proceed is for the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) to continue. I have another problem however, in that it becomes private members' hour at five o'clock. I note that the hon. member's amendment proposes that the debate continues this day through the dinner hour, but it does not deal with the subject of private members' hour. However, that matter is easily handled by unanimous consent.

Momentarily I think I would have to put the amendment as proposed by the hon. member for Saskatoon West. But I think the best way to proceed is that I suggest we continue with the hon. member in debate if the House gives it unanimous consent—

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I think it is incumbent upon you to put the motion immediately you receive it, according to Standing Order 6(5). This motion cannot be put in private members' hour. The assumption is that we will come back at six o'clock and continue debate on the adjournment motion. That will not interfere with private members' hour in any way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): That is understood. Nor can the present motion be debated. I will have to ask for the yeas and nays.

• (1700)

Those opposed to the motion will please rise.

And more than ten members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There being ten or more members who have risen in opposition, the motion is considered to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, since the NDP are more interested in eating than debating—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —I will call it five o'clock.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) has offered an amendment to the adjournment motion which is currently under debate before the House. There is no question about the importance of the matter referred to in the hon. member's amendment. However, the Chair sees a serious difficulty with its procedural acceptability. What the House is now debating is strictly a motion to adjourn for the summer recess. The amendment of the hon. member for Oshawa is a distinct proposition, asking the House to pronounce itself on certain matters relating to the construction of a portion of the northern gas pipeline and on the financial guarantees relating thereto.

In the opinion of the Chair, this is a new proposition of a substantive nature which could only be brought forward before the House after the required notice. As hon. members are aware, there are many precedents in the Journals of our House to support the position of the Chair in this instance. May I refer hon. members to such a ruling as appears at page 330 of the Journals for July 7, 1967.

I might also refer the House to citation 437 of Beauchesne's fifth edition, which reads as follows:

(1) An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

(2) An amendment may not raise a new question which can only be considered as a distinct motion after proper notice.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Madam Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Energy—Export of natural gas to United States; the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer)—Air Transport—Scheduled jet air service to Brandon, Manitoba; the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly)—Environmental Affairs—Movement of oil by tanker—Government representation at U.S. hearings.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Is item No. 8, in the name of the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), allowed to stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is item No. 11, in the name of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean), allowed to stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is item No. 12, in the name of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), allowed to stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is item No. 14, in the name of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), allowed to stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

RECOMMENDATIONS SUGGESTING CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of implementing the recommendations contained in the report of the special representatives of the Prime Minister on constitutional development in the Northwest Territories.

He said: Madam Speaker, maybe I should wait a few minutes until all the assembled multitude depart. I see they are on their way out.

Mr. Taylor: In more ways than one.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The steelworkers' friends.

Mr. Nickerson: The report of the Prime Minister's special representatives on constitutional development is this turquoise coloured report which has been circulated to all members of Parliament and widely circulated throughout the country. It is a particularly important document in that in the latter part of the twentieth century it surely must be apparent to Canadians that certain parts of this country are still subject to what we must call semi-colonial rule.

Canada is a federal country, but part of the population, those living in both the Yukon and Northwest Territories, are deliberately excluded from this great confederation. The rights and privileges of citizenship which everyone else in Canada enjoys, and which in fact are taken for granted in the provinces, are not available to those who live in the northern part of Canada.

In the area from which I come and among the people I represent, these constitutional issues are probably the most burning ones we have. The constitutional issues in the north impinge on all the other issues with which we have to contend. How can you really talk about land claims and economic development proposals if you divorce them from the overriding constitutional ideas? Our situation is in one way comparable to and in another dissimilar from that in Quebec. In Quebec they are trying to get out of confederation; in the Northwest Territories we are trying to get into confederation.

Maybe I should delve a little into the history of how the Drury report came into being. About 12 years ago, 1967-68, the report of Mr. Dean Carrothers was made available. That was one of the first studies into constitutional issues in the territories. Some of the recommendations made by Mr. Carrothers, those concerning the wholly elected territorial legislature, development of a cabinet type system of government in its very earliest stages, were put into effect. The government of the territories was transferred from Ottawa, where it had been previously, at least in the war years, very much a committee of senior bureaucrats. It was transferred physically to the Northwest Territories.

Ten years later, and this in a time period recommended by Carrothers, people again started to look into the question. At that time the legislature did not want somebody else to come up and make yet another study. Therefore, the proposal at that time was to set up a negotiating committee, on the one hand comprised of members of the territorial legislature, those with executive positions, and on the other hand ministers of the federal Crown.

At that time the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) was minister of Indian affairs and northern development. Unfortunately that gentleman did not really understand the mandate given to him under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development Act. He did not know what he was supposed to do. He was in a daze. He really did not understand the issues. Because of his failures the matter was taken out of his hands by the Prime Minister of the day. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—I think originally just to prolong matters or to put them to one side—appointed the Hon. C. M. Drury as his special representative. I think we must be pleased that the Prime Minister did take that action because in the opinion of just about everyone in the Northwest Territories Mr. Drury did a very good job. He was one of the first people to come into the Northwest Territories on behalf of the federal government and really talk to the people there and find out what they want. His report reflects their views more than it does, possibly, the privately held views of Mr. Drury before he undertook this exercise.

I think there are many comparisons between the Durham report of 1837 and the Drury report of 1979. Both of them were compiled by eminent statesmen with many years of political and administrative experience. Both gentlemen used competent staffs. They went out of their way to hire competent people and put them to work. Just as the Durham report was the landmark document of the middle of the nineteenth century as far as Canada was concerned, I think the Drury report will be the landmark document, as far as constitutional issues in the Northwest Territories are concerned, in the third quarter of the twentieth century.

The present constitutional state in the Northwest Territories leaves much to be desired. It is somewhat comparable with the state in the old Northwest Territories around 1895. The old Northwest Territories, which comprised that part which remains today and also what are the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, received, prior to provincial status in 1905, responsible government in 1897. This is what we in the Northwest Territories would like to achieve within the next two, three or four years. I think it has to be that close if people there are not going to lose faith altogether in the government here in Ottawa.

When the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were withdrawn in 1905, we went back to the constitutional dark ages in what is presently the Northwest Territories, and since that time we have been evolving. Of late, within the last ten years, that rate of evolution has accelerated, and we who live in that part of the country want, as I said, to be able to look forward to responsible government within the next two or three years. We would like to be able to look forward to provincial status either for the whole of the existing territories or for parts thereof within a reasonable period of time; let us say ten to 12 years. In the old situation it took from 1897 to 1905—that period from responsible government to full provincial status—and I think we should aim at that same time frame today.

I have made some general observations with respect to this report. Now let us look at some of the recommendations which have been made and some of the questions Mr. Drury has addressed. Of course this will have to be a very cursory overview. First he has looked at the question of division of the territories. As hon. members are probably aware, geographically and demographically the area is pretty well divided into two. The western area, which is not dissimilar from northern Alberta, has a developed infrastructure and is much more financially self-sufficient than the eastern area and the High Arctic part. The question of whether those two should remain together or whether they should be separated has been a matter of debate for at least the last 15 years of which I know. This is one of the few areas in the report where I take exception to the recommendations of Mr. Drury in that he feels that for the time being division should not take place. I know many people who would take exception to that view. However, Mr. Drury does not say that the combination should last forever. He thinks that the ultimate choice should be made by the people who live there, and proposes institutions such as a constituent assembly to make these decisions.

He addressed himself to the sticky problem of land claims. Every new minister of Indian affairs and northern development who comes along says that he will settle these things within six months. At least the last five ministers have said that, but I am afraid that the problem is a little more difficult than they originally anticipated.

Mr. Drury has laid down a few principles. He thinks that the agreements in principle are mainly a matter between the federal government and the claimant groups, whereas the implementation of these agreements and principles is primarily a matter between the government of the territories and the claimants themselves. Mr. Drury would take exception to the overriding collective nature of some of the settlements which have been proposed.

Mr. Drury made some valid observations about government in the territories as it exists today. He said, and I quote, "The present system hides real authority and diffuses responsibility," and I think that that is a very valid observation. People do not really know where to go to get things done. Authority is partly here in Ottawa, partly somewhere in Yellowknife and partly somewhere else, and one can never nail down the person who is ultimately responsible or who has ultimate authority.

The perception of government in the territories leaves a little to be desired because of the paternalism which has existed. The idea of government amongst many people who live there is one of delivering of services, welfare services, educational services, etc., but not the alternative or the other part of government, the decision-making or the deciding of policies to be followed. At present I am afraid that that is not really there, and this is due in part to another observation made by Mr. Drury that what we have is a strong administration, both federal and territorial, and a rather weak political system, so we must strengthen the political arm of government in the territories, and I think this indeed is taking place.

Mr. Drury addressed himself to municipal affairs. He proposed, for instance, that minimum municipal powers be placed in a new Northwest Territories act of this Parliament of Canada. He takes as his example for this what is going on in Switzerland. A proposal was made by the Swiss commission of experts in 1977. He makes a recommendation, which makes eminent sense, regarding the ownership of land within a municipality, and that land which is not presently privately held should be transferred to the ownership of the municipality.

Because of the time I have available to me—I see it is only another five minutes or so—I will make a rather quick run through of the other matters which I would like to bring to the attention of the House. Mr. Drury proposes—and this is one of the more important items for us as federal politicians—some rather sweeping reorganizations within the federal government. He thinks a minister of federal-provincial territorial relations should be appointed. In fact there was a minister of federal-provincial relations sometime ago. He no longer exists and another one has not been appointed. Instead of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that minister at the federal level should be responsible for the administration of the Northwest Territories Act. He should be the person to whom the commissioner of the territories should report in the interim.

He thinks the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should divest himself of the northern development side of his portfolio, become the minister for native peoples and be the spokesman in cabinet for the native peoples of Canada, and that those things now done by that department in the north should be transferred to the legitimate branch of government which takes them over. Of course some could be transferred to the government of the territories. There are other things such as the administration of oil, gas and minerals. Would it not be logical if that were transferred to the jurisdiction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? Is it not logical that the responsibility for major public works projects should be transferred to the Department of Public Works? Is that not what it is there for? Similarly, would it not be logical for environmental matters, agricultural matters, etc.?

I should like to refer to the transfer of those areas of responsibility presently under the jurisdiction of the federal government which, in all honesty and all right, should be transferred to the territorial government. I am referring to areas of provincial nature such as forests, the environment, agricultural matters, inland fisheries and justice. We should have our own attorney general instead of being dependent upon the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Chrétien). Also, there are labour matters, certain remaining health matters, matters dealing with territorial waters and housing. These things could be easily and justly transferred. Mr. Drury touched on the problems relating to education and housing in the north.

Another very important matter is the transfer of land and resources. If we in that part of the country do not control our own land and resources, we never will have those revenues with which to finance provincial status. As an interim measure the administration of the land, if not the ownership of it, could be transferred. We could devise a system of resource revenue sharing whereby as an interim measure, again, we would be prepared to put a cap on those revenues accruing to the people of the territories. After that cap has been reached, then the revenues could be shared on a 50-50, 75-25 or "you name it" basis with federal authorities.

These land items are extremely important. The executive arm of the government of the territories must be made more workable. The situation is that the present commissioner is the chairman of the so-called cabinet and a federal civil servant. This situation just does not work. As an interim measure the commissioner must become a federal agent, not a departmental employee. His position must evolve into that of lieutenant-governor. The executive council of the territorial governments must evolve into full provincial-type cabinets.

There are a number of very important financial recommendations which Mr. Drury made, but in 60 seconds I cannot get through many of them. The main idea is that the territory should negotiate with the federal government very much the same as a province does in matters of financing. They should not have operating and capital grants. They should take part in the equalization payment system and the revenue stabilization program. These are some of the very, very important recommendations made in this report. Mr. Drury has done a good job. He is showing us the way. Now, let us have the fortitude to carry out some of his recommendations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to Motion No. 15 in the name of the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) which reads in part:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of implementing the recommendations contained in the report—

That refers to the Drury report. The hon. member ought to ask himself whether he really does any justice to the cause he espoused in the House this afternoon.

Given his stated concerns on this particular matter, concerns which I share with him and I believe are shared by every member of the House, I am rather surprised that in stating those concerns he chose to use this particular vehicle to have his concerns implemented. If the House were to adopt this particular motion, it seems to me it would in some respects fly in the face of the very authority he quotes, the Drury report. Contrary to what the member suggested, I am sure in good faith in the last few minutes, the report acknowledged that there was no consensus on the substance or process of change. That was one finding the hon. member did not mention this afternoon, that is, that there was a lack of consensus on the very subject we are talking about. A lot of good ideas came from the report, as well as a lot of good suggestions and concrete recommendations which I will come to in a few moments. But I believe the first thing which needs to be said is that the hon. member for Western Arctic may well be defeating his own purpose if he persists in getting the kind of decision from the House he advocated this afternoon.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) within three or four days of taking office showed clearly his commitment to this particular issue. One of the first press releases or public statements the minister issued dealt with this very subject. It reflected his particular priority for the issue and the concern of the people of the Northwest Territories. He said then that he was anxious to get on with the job and that he would not tolerate any undue delay on this particular subject. Having said that he would not tolerate any undue delay or procrastination, I am sure the hon. member for Western Arctic would not want to see the government rush into something and lock the people of the Northwest Territories into a mechanism which time will prove may not serve them very well.

I should like to say just a word or two about background. Most of us will know that by the late 1970s the territorial government in Yellowknife had been in place for a decade or so. With the support of elected territorial councillors, it was pressing for evolution of responsible government along the traditional Canadian provincial pattern. On the other hand, native associations have sought through their land claims to establish unique political jurisdictions and processes aimed at protecting their positions in northern society.

Large-scale resource development projects were imminent. This placed increasing pressure on native associations, the territorial government and the federal government to find a means of settling land claims and charting a course for future constitutional development. Against that particular background, in August, 1977, the federal government appointed the Hon. C. M. Drury as special representative to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to consult with the residents of the Northwest Territories about modifications and improvements to existing government institutions in the north, and to seek a consensus on future constitutional development which could then be co-ordinated with the land claims process I have already mentioned.

One point needs to be reiterated. For approximately two years Mr. Drury canvassed opinion in the Northwest Territories by travelling extensively throughout the Northwest Territories and meeting with various groups of individuals. After all that process had been gone through and after the findings had been recorded, one key factor still stands out, the one I alluded to at the beginning, and that is the lack of consensus on the substance and the terms of the change required. Surely, that alone is argument enough not to delay unduly but to proceed with caution, and that is what the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development gave notice he intended to do on March 7. I shall not take up the time of the House unduly because the hon. member for Western Arctic has done a good job in providing hon. members with some of the cardinal principles involved.

I wish to turn to consider the government's intentions as far as the Drury report is concerned. As I said, it covered a wide range of proposals. Some were of a purely administrative nature. Others would involve quite sizeable shifts of responsibility both within the federal government and from the federal government to the territorial government. Local government is also involved. Because of the complexity of many of these proposals the government has not yet concluded its deliberations on this matter and is not prepared to make any definite announcement of action at this time. Indeed, in my view, it would be presumptuous of the government to decide hastily on questions of such vital interest to residents of the Northwest Territories and to us all. The territories has its own legislative assembly and we are anxious to have the views of that body on many of Mr. Drury's recommendations. Right now, we would have to reach decisions without hearing the views of that body. Surely, it is illogical to suggest we ought to give greater jurisdiction to a group of people without asking them to offer considered opinions as to the kind of government they want. Hopefully, the views we are seeking will be articulated in the session of the legislative assembly scheduled for Frobisher Bay in October. In particular, the government is anxious to have the report of the Unity Committee established by the legislative committee to review, among other things, the proposal that the territories be divided, and that a new territory of Nunavut be established which would include, basically, that part of the territories lying north of the tree line. This question is of great importance to all territorial residents and, indeed, to all Canadians, and it must be studied carefully.

The federal government is moving with all due haste, in concert with NWT residents and institutions, to determine the direction in which constitutional development should be going in the Northwest Territories. No clear consensus has been made manifest. There are very real differences of opinion held between segments of the territories' diverse population. The government wishes to reconcile these divergent views, insofar as this is possible, before determining upon an appropriate course of action. Complicating the situation to some degree, as you know, Mr. Speaker, are the land claims negotiations being held or to be held soon, with the major native associations in the territories. Senator Davie Steuart has been appointed to conduct these negotiations with COPE. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will announce very soon the appointment of a negotiator for the claims by Inuit Tapirisat. All of these balls are in play, and all impinge one upon the other.

I repeat that the government is moving as quickly as possible to determine appropriate responses to Mr. Drury's recommendations. The issues are as important as they are complex, and the greater good will not be served by moving precipitously. There is no disagreement that a greater degree of responsible government should be provided to the Northwest Territories. This objective is entirely consistent with the government's policies.

The problem is one of timing and one of degree—one of endeavouring to satisfy the aspirations of as many residents of the territories as possible. This takes time. Surely, residents of the Northwest Territories cannot criticize the government for ensuring that any changes ultimately made will have the support of as many as possible of those who live in the region. As I say, this will take time but it is our view that it should take as little time as possible. We shall address ourselves to that aspect as well.

As hon. members know, Mr. Drury did not recommend any specific model of government for the territories of the future. This must be developed in co-operation with the territorial government, other territorial organizations and interested residents. I repeat that a solid and lasting framework is more likely to be achieved if due consideration is given to all points of view. This process is now in train. The hon. member has my assurance on behalf of the minister that he is pursuing this process as quickly as possible with a view to accommodating the real concern expressed today by the hon. member for Western Arctic. Our difference is not one of substance. We disagree with the vehicle by which he seeks to achieve his objective. For that reason we shall oppose the motion he has put down, though we do not question the sincerity of his clearly stated concerns for the future.

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am quite pleased to be speaking today on this motion put forward by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). It is one with which I think the people of the north in general would not agree.

It is a very small group in the Western Arctic which actually supports the hon. member's motion. As a matter of fact, most of the contents of the report we are discussing were devised by the bureaucracies of Yellowknife and Ottawa. On many occasions the native people in the Northwest Territories refused to speak with Mr. Drury when he approached them about writing his proposal. I myself had the experience of meeting with Mr. Drury on a couple of occasions when he asked me questions about my ideas about political change in the Northwest Territories. He rejected my views. He rejected outright ideas proposed by the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, the Dene Nation of the Western Arctic and others. These included recent permanent residents of the territories.

I would like to comment on the Drury report by posing three questions which we feel are important in discussing the report. The three questions are: why was Mr. Drury appointed in the first place, what are the principal features of his report, and what should be done with his report. I have already stated what should be done with his report but, in all fairness, I shall delve into the matter of the history of his appointment and why he would choose to take the course of action which he proposes.

I would like to look initially at the first question. When Mr. Drury was appointed, it was at a time when the future of the Northwest Territories and its peoples were causing considerable consternation in Ottawa and in Yellowknife. The Berger inquiry had been revealing to southern Canadians what many people in the north had known for years, that in many ways the Northwest Territories more closely resembled a colony of the south than an integral part of the Canadian political framework. I believe the hon. member for Western Arctic on that.

The popular sentiments expressed before Judge Berger were being stated to the federal government at the time by leaders of the Dene Nation and leaders of the Inuit. Both Dene and Inuit had rejected Ottawa's interpretation of land claims negotiations as a process by which the federal government assumed clear title over the areas of traditional use by aboriginal peoples in exchange for small strips of land and money—in other words, beads, trinkets, blankets, and what have you, were indexed for inflation.

The aboriginal people of the Northwest Territories had stated clearly that land claims negotiations could not be pursued to successful completion if they started on the premise that negotiations constituted some kind of giant real estate transaction. Northern natives wanted to accomplish what had not been attempted up to that point, an accommodation between the needs and aspirations of northern peoples and the concerns of the federal government—a government mandated to speak for Canadian citizens as a whole.

I should like to be quite honest and say that statements made by many native citizens before Justice Berger and the ideas articulated by the leaders elected to head representative native associations scared many people, particularly in Yellowknife and some in Ottawa. The newly heard native leaders were perceived as a threat to the status quo, a status quo which may have satisfied Ottawa and the Yellowknife bureaucracy, but which was less than satisfactory to the people whom it governed. Thus, in late 1977, the federal government faced the problem of what to do about land claims negotiations when the native peoples involved insisted on talking about political development as well as ownership of the land and resources. I might add that most people in Canada enjoy the freedom of being able to talk about political change, a freedom which would have been denied to native people if the Drury report were implemented, at least in the Northwest Territories.

The federal government tried to resolve this problem with the appointment of Mr. Drury as special representative for constitutional development in the Northwest Territories, thereby deferring questions of political development until the completion of the report. At the same time, Dene and Inuit leaders were informed that matters of political structures brought up during land claims negotiations would be, in the words of the personnel employed at the office of native claims, a "non-starter".

This 1977 policy has resulted in a three-year impasse in negotiations between the federal government and the Inuit Tapirisat and between the federal government and the Dene Nation in the Western Arctic. It is apparent that land claims negotiations in the north have been delayed by the Drury process. With this in mind, I would like to review the major features of the Drury report.

The report contains a wide range of recommendations with respect to the discharge of government services in the Northwest Territories. Many of the recommendations, particularly the ones regarding the transfer to local government of as many functions as can be effectively handled at that level, are commendable. We admit that. The report's concentration on the nitty-gritty of government services, however, is at the same time its chief strength and its chief weakness. While the report contains many comments and conclusions about the need to build on existing experience and success with its local self-government, these comments and conclusions would be equally germane to any outcome of the debate on division.

The tone and substance of the report is based on Mr. Drury's acknowledged premise that the manner in which government programs are administered is more important to the people of the north than the nature of the political structure. This premise is totally at odds with reality. It is at odds with the events which have taken place in the north during the last few years, and it is at odds with the position of the Dene and Inuit organizations which speak for the majority of the residents of the Northwest Territories. It is at odds with the position endorsed by the aid to legislative council of the Northwest Territories and at odds with the statements made by members of the ninth legislative council of the Northwest Territories in seeking to formulate a consensus position on political change. It is at odds with the pronouncements of all candidates for the riding of Nunatsiaq and Western Arctic during the last federal election campaign, and that includes the hon. member for Western Arctic.

People in the north have disagreed, sometimes bitterly, about the proper direction of political change and the kind of political structures which should be set in place, but seldom has there been disagreement on the fact that the political questions framed in the north go far beyond tinkering with the provision of government services. In his report, Mr. Drury recognizes that the question of division is a serious one. Nevertheless, he recommends that wide-ranging powers, including full or partial control over Crown lands and resources, should be transferred to Yellowknife. Following this, he suggested that a debate should be initiated in the north to determine whether powers should have been transferred to Yellowknife and whether the Northwest Territories should have been divided. We believe that this is a case of putting the sled before the dogteam.

The report suggests that the people living north of the tree-line should suspend their age-old commitment to a new political unit called Nunavut, watching passively while the Yellowknife bureaucracy is strengthened, and then question the appropriateness of this bureaucracy. The implementation of this report would be totally unacceptable to the people of Nunavut.

Some years ago the Government of Canada committed itself to the settlement of native claims through a process of negotiation with the office of native land claims in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. All aspects of claims, political, economical and cultural, must be considered in those negotiations, as well as many other aspects, such as equity participation on development, and so on. The federal government's appointment of a special representative for its constitutional development, Mr. Drury, in 1977 bypassed this legitimate process by demanding that the political aspects of claims be channelled through his office and not through these legitimate negotiations. This was, and still is, unacceptable to the Inuit and certainly to the Dene of the Western Arctic.

At the time, this move was somewhat discouraging. However, since then the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) has made substantial progress in negotiating the framework for negotiations through which land claims and political development will be settled in the Northwest Territories. This is in direct contradiction to the advisability of implementing the recommendations of the Drury report, and this is the process which we will continue.

I believe I speak for the New Democratic Party when I say that the implementation of the Drury report would result in denying the constitutional right of those peoples to determine their own political future. Therefore, we must oppose the motion of the hon. member for Western Arctic.

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today on a subject which has been of interest to me for a long time. I want to speak against the motion of the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). The suggestion that we should now, immediately, without further ado, implement the report prepared by Mr. Drury is, to say the least, premature. There are some good things in Mr. Drury's report, some things with which I agree and some with which I do not agree.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am sure that the hon. member would not want to mislead the House. The motion does not say that the report should be implemented at this time or any other time. The motion very specifically says:

—consider the advisability of implementing—

How can a government possibly go against considering the advisability of implementing its own report? The motion says nothing about implementing the report at this time, just about considering it. I am sure that the hon. member would not want to mislead the House.

● (1750)

Mr. Watson: I will speak against the advisability of implementing the report, Mr. Speaker. There are a number of points which are consistently made when this topic is discussed in the House of Commons and which I feel should be dealt with.

The hon. member for the Western Arctic, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), and occasionally others in the party opposite, referred to the state of colonialism that exists in the north. The hon. member for Western Arctic was a little more moderate—I believe he said quasi colonialism.

The leader of the Conservative party in the Yukon, Mr. Pearson, who for a short period was designated by the former minister of indian affairs and northern development as premier, used the term first-class and second-class citizen. Yukoners apparently are not first class citizens, and the same argument, presumably, would apply to people living in the Northwest Territories. Let us examine this for a minute, Mr. Speaker.

I would ask the forgiveness of the hon. member for the Western Arctic for my continual reference to the Yukon, but I use the Yukon argument because the Northwest Territories is perhaps a few years behind in constitutional development, but not too many years, so the arguments which apply to the Yukon may apply, two or three years ahead, to the Northwest Territories.

Let us look at the argument that people in those two territories are somehow second-class citizens and are being colonized by the rest of the country. The total population of the Yukon, 23,000, and of the Northwest Territories, 45,000, represents percentages of the Canadian total which do not stand up to comparisons between the situation when Manitoba entered confederation and the situation today, vis-à-vis the total population. The Yukon's percentage of the total population is less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of our total. When Manitoba entered confederation, I believe the province's percentage of the Canadian total was around 1 per cent, ten times higher. Yet the argument is made that the comparison with Manitoba, which had something like 25,000 people when it became a province, favours the immediate move for the Yukon, and later the Northwest Territories, toward provincial status. That is not the case; things have changed, Mr. Speaker.

When Manitoba entered confederation, her population was about to explode. That is not going to happen in the Yukon unless, of course, the kind of thing occurs that is being proposed by certain politicians there who would like an immediate move toward provincial status. In that case, a completely artificial situation would occur. In order to justify provincial status there would be an artificial stimulation of a population move into the Yukon.

This is where we come to the root of the quandary about development in the north. The people who want development per se are usually those with the most political clout who can make the most political noise. Through chambers of commerce and businessmen's associations, they are able to exercise pressure on politicians in the north for an immediate move toward provincial status. They are primarily interested in all the business activity that is anticipated if they could somehow achieve control via the provincehood vehicle.

That is a very dangerous concept indeed from the point of view of the native people. I think the hon. member who comes from the eastern Arctic expressed this in the hesitation he showed in embracing the idea of provincial status. In effect it would mean that with the province in full control of immigration and stimulating economic development in a way that would not necessarily make economic good sense but would bring people in to justify the apparatus being set up, native people would be overrun by a larger population coming in from the south. This is a demographic fear which is well based and well justified, in my view. This is probably the most basic reason why there should be no movement toward provincehood now in the Yukon or in the Northwest Territories.

There are a host of other reasons why we should move slowly in the direction which, for a time last year, seemed to be toward creating a province within the next three years. The then prime minister indicated that he intended to create a province in the Yukon before the end of his first term in office. Fortunately for everyone in Canada, that did not happen. I say "fortunately" because when we are talking about the north we are talking about something which, in the minds of a lot of people in the country, helps tie Canada together.

There is a common heritage which we all share in the north. We share it on the land mass in the north and we share it on the offshore areas of the north. No one in this House would suggest that northerners should not have first call on the resources of the north, the extent of which we do not yet know. As far as I am concerned, they should have first call on them in order to assure themselves of a standard of living second to none. Beyond that, however, I think the rest of Canada should participate in whatever riches are found there.

Until now—and for the foreseeable future—the Canadian taxpayer has been footing a major portion of the bill. We pay 60 per cent of the public service costs in the Yukon and a higher percentage for the Northwest Territories. All Canadians have made these contributions and in fairness, over the long run, we should expect a return.

The path for constitutional evolution should not necessarily be provincehood, it seems to me. It may be provincehood, but we should not bind ourselves to that single objective.

From my experience and through talking to northerners over the years, I believe that the one idea that keeps coming back is, "Let's get rid of that federal red tape." I quite agree. If we could somehow rid the northerners of their impression that they are always tied up in federal tape, we could solve a lot of problems. I would point out as well that politicians in the two northern territories have become as adept as separatist politicians in Quebec at pointing out deficiencies in the federal government. In addition, they point out how in some instances, where there are perfectly normal, legitimate reasons for slowness in achieving results, the federal government is somehow totally to blame because of this insensitive, slow, lethargic public service which looks after relations between the people there and the government here in Ottawa. They point out distances and bring all these reasons together and point out that somehow the system is not working.

● (1800)

We should be aiming for a solution in the north which could be used as a model for future constitutional developments in the rest of Canada. Let us keep our minds open. Fortunately, the report does not specify a single constitutional objective. I would hope that all members of this House could take a new look at just where we are heading in the north. I feel there are other solutions which will help the people in the north better than anything that has been proposed so far and yet will preserve this kind of cement which the common heritage represents for all of us as part of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Summer Recess

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. this day.

At 6.03 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed consideration of the amended motion of Mr. Pinard:

That, when the House adjourns on the day that this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until October 15, 1980, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the debate on the motion was interrupted at five o'clock, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) had the floor.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, now that we have had the opportunity of dining, the NDP will go up to the dining room to get a few more members into the House to make sure that they have ten here so that any motion which might be contrary to their interests of having a full meal can be overcome.

I want to carry on my remarks. Before the adjournment for the dinner hour, I had the opportunity to consider the position vis-à-vis the record of this government on energy matters as a whole, about which we should be concerned.

I am glad the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) is here to listen to this because rarely does he have an opportunity of hearing good, simple, common sense. He should stay in the House more regularly where he will have the opportunity to hear these contributions. Then he would not be in the position to delay and waste the time of the House as he now does.

Before the dinner adjournment, I stated that it was a rather abysmal record with respect to this government in terms of energy policy. We have had virtually no initiatives at all respecting our energy policy, and no legislation. None of the initiatives mentioned in the Speech from the Throne have been brought forward.

It is amazing that we now have a situation where, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) so often puts it, the natural allies of the government, the New Democrats, are making a big ruckus so that it will appear they have a main difference in terms of policy. We know that the Liberal government, for all intents and purposes, over the course of the administration of this Prime Minister, has been kept in office by the very same NDP. Therefore, it ill behooves them to stand up now and pretend they are speaking on behalf of the interests of Canadians when they themselves kept the Liberals in power over the past 12 years by constantly voting, particularly in minority situations, to keep them in power. The people of Canada will reflect on this during the adjournment debate. It will allow them to think about whether there is a trace, or a touch, of hypocrisy in what the NDP are doing in terms of this debate.

What concerns me is that this very government, supported by the NDP, has made no progress at all in terms of energy policy. What is even more distressing and disturbing is the fact that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), in terms of our energy policy and domestic oil pricing, left the whole issue until a couple of weeks or months before the expiration of existing arrangements in Canada. In fact, we have now passed the expiration date on June 30 and are faced with an extension, which has been agreed to by the producing provinces and the federal government, until the end of July.

One would have expected all sorts of activity during the month of July in which negotiations on a new arrangement would have been carried on, but no, we are going to adjourn this House. The meeting of the Prime Minister and Mr. Lougheed will not take place until July 24, a mere six days before the conclusion of the extension period. Many people in Canada do not fully understand the implications of the federal government and the producing provinces not arriving at an agreement. There are certain central issues preoccupying the government in terms of this negotiation.

The central issue, in my view, is the whole question of revenue sharing and the recycling of funds that has been and will continue to flow to the producing provinces. They like to concentrate their attention on the province of Alberta because it is by far the largest producer of oil in this country. We have to look at what is going on in this negotiation.

From my reading of the situation and observing it, unfortunately from the sidelines now, the parties are very far apart in terms of an agreement. The federal government is trying to achieve some process by which there will be a bigger take on the part of the federal government with regard to revenues on oil. There are some suggestions that that is what the federal government is trying to do in this connection. They are talking about a number of prospects through their blended oil price, blending some combination of old and new oil. Through this processing, the Oil Import Compensation Act, to equalize the cost of imported fuel, will continually be reduced through some sort of charge to the refineries. This is something the federal government is considering with respect to its negotiations with the producing provinces.

I am concerned about the prospect of no agreement having been reached by the end of this month. Unless there is an awful lot of change in position, there is a very distinct possibility that this will take place over a very short period of time. We face the potential prospect of there being no agreement between the federal and provincial governments.

It is very easy to consider different scenarios as to what might transpire if an agreement is not reached. I suppose everyone can make his own scenario, but there are different possibilities we should consider. Conceivably we could stay here if the members of the New Democratic Party decide to speak indefinitely over the course of the summer and bore everybody to death. There are some possible scenarios, and these would involve either the federal government or the provincial governments taking some initiatives with respect to the important question of oil pricing.

One scenario could be that, if there is no agreement, the federal government will decide unilaterally to announce its own energy policy, including a set of oil prices. Let us assume that if the federal government takes that initiative, the province of Alberta, being the largest producer of oil in our country, could either follow those prices or take its own initiative, with instructions to the Alberta Petroleum Marketing Commission to offer Alberta oil at a particular price set by it.

Conceivably the price could be higher than the one suggested by the federal government because the federal government, I suppose, is interested in carrying out its election promise of low prices or cheap energy for Canadians. The federal government price would be imposed under the provisions of the Petroleum Administration Act, part II, and if there were this conflict, another distinct possibility could be a very serious confrontation in the courts. There could be a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine the constitutionality of pricing on the part of the federal government as opposed to the provincial governments, and to determine which should prevail in constitutional terms.

Another possibility is that the province of Alberta could consider using as its weapon the provisions of the Mines and Minerals Amendments Act of 1980 to limit the movement of crude oil out of Alberta. A question could arise as to whether that would be sustainable as being within the jurisdiction of the provincial government to take that option. However, the consequences would be very serious, whether we are talking in terms of conserving a resource which is a depleting resource or using this as a vehicle for strife with the federal government.

Another possibility might be that the Alberta government might consider taking steps with respect to provincial Crown leases or royalty land and simply not allowing any oil to be lifted from royalty land or Crown land. In any event, this could lead to very long, protracted and difficult legal action which would have serious consequences for our country.

In addition to that there is the whole question of whether we in Canada would become more and more reliant on offshore oil. That matter would very quickly come to the forefront because of the uncertainty caused by lack of agreement and because of the possibility of action taken by producing provinces with respect to oil in their jurisdictions, and there is no doubt that if this takes place, there would be two consequences. One would be increased reliance on offshore imports, which would create serious economic consequences for our country, especially in view of the international price and the fact that the oil import compensation program is now in such a horrible deficit position. The second consequence would be the implementation of the Energy Supplies Emergency Act passed in 1979, and we in Canada would be faced with the propect of allocation and presumably rationing of petroleum products.

These could be some of the consequences of the drift and the almost cavalier attitude the federal government has taken in energy negotiations. We should be greatly concerned, as we participate in this adjournment debate, about what is going to transpire, whether or not the adjournment will be until October next. In light of the possibility of there being no agreement, there is the prospect of this kind of confrontation. Notwithstanding the New Democratic Party, we could be back here, if there is no agreement, sooner than we think and sooner than anticipated by this motion.

I am giving the House a report card, so to speak, on this government's record in terms of energy policy. Its record is dismal. There has been literally no action or initiatives taken since this government came to power. We face a very serious prospect of a breakdown in terms of agreement between the federal and provincial governments. The negotiation of an agreement has been left, not to the eleventh hour but to the thirteenth hour. An agreement is past due already.

In a non-partisan and serious way I question the effectiveness of the government, and I question very seriously the New Democratic Party for its continued support of the Liberal government over a long period of time. I know there are arguments and a lot of shouting, but marital breakdown is always very distressing.

With the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party fighting as they are, I want to close my remarks by telling a story told by a person who has been quoted over and over again by speakers from the New Democratic Party. I refer to the Hon. T. C. Douglas. Mr. Douglas is now one of the corporate boardroom bums referred to by the New Democratic Party. It will be interesting to see whether members of the NDP will take advice from Mr. Douglas now as they have in the past. He is a member of the board of directors of Husky Oil. He is with all the bigwigs of the oil industry. He sits with Husky Oil directors and others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Murphy: Filibuster.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to hear the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Deans said no.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to leave the wrong impression. I did not refuse the hon. member the right to proceed. I was just shaking my head at the pitiful effort he put forward. I could not imagine wanting to inflict any more of that on the House.

I have been listening with interest to the speakers who have preceded me. I listened to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) with considerable interest, hoping to grasp or to hear some indication of what the Liberal party really believed. I listened to the hon. member for Saskatchewan West—Saskatoon West—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Saskatchewan is the province; Saskatoon is the city.

Mr. Deans: I realize that. I listened to the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) with interest because he seemed for one reason or another to want to address himself more to the NDP than to the issue. As I listened to him and tried to compare what he was saying with what has been said by other Conservative members over the course of the last week, or perhaps week and a half, with regard to energy policy and this particular problem of the pre-build, I came to the conclusion, in the words of a close colleague of mine, that the Conservative party, on this issue at least, has more positions than Masters and Johnson.

Mr. McDermid: Bill Davis used that line three weeks ago on you guys.

Mr. Deans: It is a shame that we have not really addressed this very crucial problem. This is an important day in the history of Canada. We are debating an issue which could well decide the economic future of the country. We are talking about whether or not this country will be self-sufficient in energy, with energy available from coast to coast in years to come. We are talking about the single most valuable resource any country can have. We are very privileged as a country because we have energy in various forms and in sufficient quantities to allow us to be self-sufficient. We have energy which very few industrialized countries in the world have available to them, we have the capacity right in this country to develop an economy, job opportunities and a quality of life second to none. Yet, the government makes a decision which allows some of that very valuable energy, which no doubt we will need some day in the future, to be exported out of the country to the United States without any consideration for how it will be replaced, what it will cost to replace it, or for the fact that future generations will require that energy for their needs. That is what the issue is all about today, and that is what we should be talking about.

I thought for a while that the Liberal party understood the issue. I listened with interest to the comments made by Liberals over the course of the last year. I read with interest what was said by the Liberal party during the debates in the House of Commons prior to the last election and on the hustings during the last election. I read with interest the comments of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). Here is a nationalist if ever I saw one, or at least so he says. As reported in Hansard of December 12, 1979, he said:

> The Conservative answer to our balance of payments problem is to encourage more exports of unprocessed non-renewable raw material. This, in fact, is what their decision to allow larger exports of natural gas really means. Rather than use it to build up and expand our petrochemical industry, rather than use it as a substitute for imported oil, Conservatives have agreed to export it, and they have done so without getting any commitment that American gas will be available later for Canada on a swap basis at the same price.

He then went on to say:

> They have done so without getting any commitment in return from the United States for greater access for our manufactured goods. The Conservatives have allowed these exports, without getting any final commitment on the building of the northern gas pipeline. They do not have any final commitment from the gas producers that they will finance and ensure the building of a natural gas pipeline to Atlantic Canada. Instead, through this budget, Canadians are being asked to pay higher fuel prices and higher taxes under the guise of helping Canada reach energy self-sufficiency.

He went on to say:

> But to the extent any of this money is used to find new oil and new natural gas, I ask the House what assurance Canadians have from the Conservative government that any new reserves found at the expense of Canadian taxpayers, middle and lower-income Canadians, will not simply be exported to the United States.

This is happening with much of the reserves of natural gas found in recent years in Canada, natural gas reserves found with money put up by Canadian taxpayers through higher prices and tax expenditures. That was the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce speaking in the budget debate. When one reads that, one says to oneself, "Now, there is a man who knows what the problem is". My colleague sitting beside me said under his breath, "What a phony". I wish he would say it louder.

An hon. Member: What a phony.

Mr. Deans: Thank you. It is quite clear to everyone exactly what that was. Of course it was not only the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He is not the only phony on the Liberal benches.

Mr. Broadbent: Do not forget the Tories.

Mr. Deans: We will get to the Tories. I should like to refer to the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). He said before the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines on March 20, 1979:

> It is the policy of this government that we will insist upon a guarantee that the total line be built, that the financial arrangements for the building of the entire line be in place before we give the green light for going ahead with the pre-build.

That was the Minister of Finance speaking. There was another phony, if I ever heard one. Then there was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), kindly soul that he is, speaking on behalf of Canadians and looking after our best interests, so to speak. As reported in the record of the House of Commons for the fall of 1979, he said:

> In our view, exports of natural gas to the United States should be authorized only on the basis of, first of all, an ironclad commitment regarding the building of the whole Alaska gas pipeline. Everything has to be signed, sealed and delivered, particularly the financing guarantees, before we start exporting one cubic foot of gas out of this country to the United States.

Well, we have the phony Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the phonier Minister of Finance, and now we have this kindly gent who poses as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and tries to tell us that, all of a sudden, as if by some magical means, a new light has dawned and he sees a new truth. Now he is really speaking on behalf of the Liberal party and in the best interests of Canadians. What kind of nonsense is this? What kind of nonsense are we faced with? We are faced with a bankrupt political party which sells out the country, a political party which turns around and allows development to take place which in fact will cause untold hardship in years to come. We are faced with a political party which does not protect the interests of Canadians, a political party which says one thing that suits it one day and an entirely different thing another day.

An hon. Member: And your party supported them last December.

Mr. Deans: It does not even marginally alter its position, but it changes 180 degrees every time. One has to wonder about this political party; in office and out of office they are a very strange bunch.

Not only did they say those things while they debated in the House of Commons, not only did they put these positions forward in an attempt to embarrass the easily embarrassed Conservative party, but then they went out on to the hustings and told Canadians that they would put in place an energy policy which would work in the best interests of Canadians.

On January 25, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke in Halifax, he said quite clearly that the Liberal party would put in place an energy policy that met all the requirements which guaranteed Canadians access to their resources, which would make available to Canadians the energy resources they needed at a price they could afford, that we would see the kind of energy policy coming from them, if they were re-elected, which would satisfy the needs of Canada now and into the future. For example, they said that there would be a natural gas pipeline to ensure access by all Canadians to their resources. The Liberals would take immediate action to begin negotiations for the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes. Initially it would carry natural gas east, but when the maritime supplies were ready, the pipeline would be like a natural gas railroad with a return delivery facility as well.

An hon. Member: Double tracking.

Mr. Deans: Perhaps he was talking about double tracking. He went on to say that the Liberals would ensure that Canada's energy sector became more Canadian-owned and controlled. Also he said that industry would be developed close to energy sources, so that producing areas in the west and elsewhere would have first chance at processing the resources. Where will it be developed? Will it be in the southern United States? Is that the government's policy? The Liberal party was stumping around the country trying to gain support during the last election campaign. When the Conservative party approved of 3.75 trillion cubic feet of natural gas being sold to the United States, on January 9 the Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition, said:

> By just approving that export without conditions, it lost another great chance for our industrial development.

He was referring to the Conservative government. Hon. members are bound to ask themselves: What is it about this political party? What are the people supposed to believe about this political party? This Liberal party, when out of office, says anything it can to get into office and when it is in office, does anything it can to get rid of the resources of Canada. I had a colleague in the legislature and he sometimes used a phrase which I shall repeat—no doubt members have heard it before. He used to say that putting the Liberals in charge of resources was like putting Dracula in charge of a blood bank.

There are problems attached to the course the government is about to embark upon and there are risks which Liberal supporters have failed to recognize. I watched with a sick feeling as Liberals leaped to support the minister of energy as he made his statement the other evening. I watched as they euphorically applauded the sell-out of our resources, the building of the pipeline from resources we are going to need, to provide for the greed of the United States. I watched it happening. I said to myself: surely they do not understand the position; surely they do not have the evidence before them; they cannot know what it is all about or they must be very easily led. Accordingly, I thought I would put on record tonight some of the reasons for which I believe that this proposal is bad for Canada now and will be bad for the nation in the future.

To begin with, it has been said that the rate at which natural gas is being discovered, not only here in Canada but in the lower 48 states and in the Gulf of Mexico, makes it quite possible, if not quite probable, that given the high cost of bringing gas from Alaska to the market the project will not be pursued—that at some point in time there will be more readily-available and cheaper gas for exploitation by the United States, not only in that country but here, where they are getting access to our supplies of natural gas. So there is no reason for them to spend many billions of dollars pursuing an expensive source of energy after we have given them free access, as it were, to cheaper energy sources.

In addition, there is no question that once we have committed ourselves to the pre-build, Canadians will have to finance the entire operation by continuing to export the natural gas which belongs to us for far beyond the short term envisaged by the present decision. Further, there is no question but that the history of the last decade is repeating itself. The same Liberal government as we see there today made all kinds of grand predictions in the past about the availability of oil and then proceeded to sell it off as quickly as they could at a cheap price until we were forced to go into the marketplace and buy back what we needed. At that point, of course, the price was way out of proportion to the cost of production.

I suggest the same thing is about to happen again in the case of natural gas. The Liberal party is certainly consistent in this regard. We shall find ourselves in the position of having to buy natural gas from other sources in the not too distant future and in so doing we shall be paying ten or 20 times what we might have paid had we held on to our own supplies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: The minister says there is a surplus of natural gas. Mr. Speaker, there might be a surplus of commodities which can rot; there might even be a surplus of products which can go out of date. But there can be no surplus of energy. We do not even know at this point what kind of economic development will take place in Canada in the future. Bear in mind that so far we have been unable to provide natural gas for the people in our own country who so desperately need it. We are being forced today to pay something like $3.6 billion to subsidize the purchase of oil from offshore though we could have used our own natural gas to replace expensive foreign oil. Until such time as we have an industrial strategy in place and until such time as gas is available to people all across this country, bringing them energy at a price they can afford, there is no one in this government or in the National Energy Board who can prove to me that there is in fact a surplus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: There is no surplus.

Mr. Gimaïel: You have to prove it.

Mr. Deans: I do not have to prove it. It is as plain as the nose on your face. We do not have a national energy policy. The Liberal government has no idea how they are going to integrate our energy resources, no idea how they will be used. They do not know what proportion of our energy needs will be met by oil or what proportion will be met by gas or what proportion will be met by electricity or what proportion will be met by coal, not to mention new resources. Until such time as an energy policy is in place, how can we determine that there is a surplus of one of the components? What the government is doing, supported by its inadequate backbenchers, is this: it is rushing ahead to sell off our gas reserves for a quick buck today without any consideration for the cost of replacement or for the needs of people in the future.

Mr. Rossi: How can you say that without smiling?

Mr. Deans: Anyone looking at this so-called energy policy would have to agree that the decision to go ahead with the pre-build is an ad hoc decision based on nothing of any consequence, based on the creation of a certain number of short-term jobs. Mr. Speaker, if we were to embark on providing a means of moving the gas from the existing natural gas fields to the east and the west coasts, we would be able to provide even more short-term jobs but, in addition, we would be able to set up an infrastructure which would allow us to encourage the industrial and economic development needed to bring about long-term jobs for Canadians. And that should be the goal of any government in office these days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: I am sure Liberal backbenchers are impressed enough now by the arguments—

Mr. Gimaïel: I don't think so.

Mr. Deans: —which have been put forward by many speakers this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

• (2040)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is difficult to hear in the chamber if hon. members interrupt.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that you cannot hear me. I am trying to speak directly to you, and if the Liberal backbenchers would sit quietly, I could have you listen.

An hon. Member: Just like you did last week.

Mr. Deans: You are insulting the Speaker. He wants to hear. Since they do not care, Mr. Speaker, I shall speak to you. Since it is quite obvious that the Liberal party does not give a damn about Canada, you and I will talk about it. There are certain facts about the pipeline which cannot be overlooked. To begin with, we all understand that the total cost of the project will be in excess of $20 billion, perhaps even $30 billion or $40 billion, before it ever gets under way, if it ever gets under way. Over 80 per cent of that cost will be borrowed by the principals from normal lending sources.

This is the largest single financial investment which has ever been undertaken in the private sector. It is clear that the people or institutions lending the money will demand explicit and comprehensive assurances. They will want to have guarantees that their loans will be paid with interest according to a pre-arranged schedule.

Mr. Bosley: Just like Chrysler.

Mr. Deans: The simple fact is that the Alaska highway pipeline sponsors cannot provide those guarantees because the pipeline costs considerably exceed their assets.

An hon. Member: Give us a figure.

Mr. Deans: The figure at the moment is about $30 billion and the total assets of the sponsors do not come close to half of that.

An hon. Member: You're guessing.

Mr. Deans: The pipeline will be financed on the strength of the transmission of gas through the pipeline. Because there are risks that the pipeline might not generate sufficient revenues to cover the debt interest and the generated costs, institutional lenders will demand guarantees.

The guarantees will have to be provided by government at one level or another. There is the serious risk of non-completion of the pipeline. That becomes clearer with every passing day. There is the serious risk, and it is almost a guarantee, of cost overruns on a project of this size. There is of course the interruption or, if you will, the reduction of the service. A Wall Street investment banker, quoted in Energy Daily of November 4, 1977 said:

Remember, this is the largest single project ever undertaken by anybody in private industry. For every institution that takes part in it, it will be the largest investment they ever made in anything. No one will move an inch—

No one will sign, no one will put out a penny, no one will sign a document until the guarantees are in place for every single step of the project through to its completion. When one stops to think about it, one says to oneself, "The guarantees, obviously, must come from government". They must come primarily from the federal government of the United States because it is, after all, a pipeline for the United States to bring gas from Alaska to the lower 48 states. That is what the pipeline is all about. Therefore, the United States must find a way to guarantee the financing.

The U.S. department of the treasury has maintained since 1975 that the pipelines' beneficiaries—Prudhoe Bay, Exxon, Sohio, the state of Alaska, the natural gas transmission industry—which, most notably, includes Northwest Pipeline in the U.S. and Foothills in Canada—would have to provide the guarantees required by lenders. In a report prepared for the Alaska state legislature by Dr. Arlon Tussing and released in April, 1979, the following conclusion was drawn:

The Alaska highway gas pipeline cannot be financed and built unless the United States government guarantees at least part of the project debt.

However, Northwest Pipeline Company of the U.S. will find it difficult obtaining financial guarantees from the U.S. government. The report of the U.S. Senate energy committee accompanying the congressional resolution endorsing President Carter's pipeline decision in October, 1977, stated:

It is essential for the project sponsors to proceed with their financial arrangements as promptly as possible. The state of Alaska, the producers, and most of all, the project sponsors should bear in mind that the door to the federal treasury has not been left open to them—

That is the federal treasury of the United States. But much more persuasive, from my point of view, than the rather innocuous self-serving letter put forward by the Prime Minister, is the fact that President Carter in 1977, in his decision and report to Congress on the Alaska natural gas transportation system, rejected government guarantees on the following grounds: one, serious questions of equity result from the transfer of risks to taxpayers, many of whom are not gas consumers and will not receive additional gas supplies as the result of the Alaska project; two, federal financial support substitutes the government for private lenders in the critical risk assessment function; three, the incentive for an efficient management of the project is reduced; and four, the government is placed in conflicting roles as guarantor and as regulator of the project.

President Carter made it clear that on these grounds he would not recommend that the federal government of the United States embark on many guarantees or in any direct way become involved in the financing of the Alaska Highway pipeline. When one stops and weighs that against that quite inadequate document produced in the House last Thursday—

An hon. Member: Unsigned.

Mr. Deans: —unsigned and which was supposed to sell us on the commitment of the President of the United States over and against a carefully thought out position put before his own legislators, I think, if I were to make the judgment, I would believe his original statement, and I believe that the government should believe it as well.

One must also bear in mind that even if the Northwest Pipeline approaches institutional investors with a financial package before the end of 1980, with a presidential election this year Congress will likely not address the question of government guarantees until at least 1981. This pushes the completion back to 1986 at the earliest, and that is already one year later than we heard on Thursday.

If I were to make judgments about the intention of the U.S. government to do something which we must have if this project is to be successful, I would have to come to the conclusion that, on a number of very valid grounds backed up by their own statements, there is no likelihood that the United States will be able to proceed with the development of the pipeline in its entirety, that they will syphon off what they can get from us at the lowest possible price, that we will receive nothing in return other than today's dollar value and that we will inevitably have to purchase gas to replace that gas, for which we will have to pay the price of the day, and that may be five years, six years or ten years from today. That, my friends, constitutes a rip-off of Canadian resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: I do not wish to suggest that this is only my opinion—

An hon. Member: Stanley is leaving because he is getting a headache.

Mr. Deans: Stanley, please come back.

Mr. McDermid: I could not sit there in front of that either.

An hon. Member: He does not want to listen to you any more because he is fed up.

● (205

Mr. Deans: Actually, in keeping with his former colleague, he has gone out to do some missionary work among you.

Mr. Knowles: I have found that you have exactly ten minutes left.

Mr. Deans: I have ten minutes yet, so wait for it.

We ought to look at what others are saying. We have looked at what the Liberals have said when out of office, when in office, at the flip-flop, the fact that you cannot trust the Liberal government, that you never know where they are coming from or what they will do. We have looked at the sell-out of our oil resources in the early seventies when they were well warned that the result would be higher costs for Canadians. We have looked at the potential of providing at least an equal number of jobs for Canadians, and of building an east-west facility rather than a north-south facility. We have suggested that in the best economic interests of the country and its future, and the need to provide energy at the lowest possible cost for the use of Canadians, we should be building an east-west pipeline rather than a north-south pipeline.

We have suggested that when in 1978 a bill was passed by this Parliament to approve the northern Alaska highway pipeline, it was intended to be a transmission line from Alaska to the United States and that this decision does not conform with that legislation. We have pointed out, I think, that the possibilities of getting this pipeline completed are slim if they exist at all. It is clear that the government in the United States recognizes all the pitfalls I have set out and that the President of the United States has quite clearly set out for his own Congress the fact that they cannot possibly undertake the financing of the pipeline because of a number of factors which I have enumerated.

It is therefore clear to me, and I now suggest to many Canadians, that the decision being taken by the Liberal government today is not in the best interests of Canada. It is that simple, Mr. Speaker. It is that simple.

An hon. Member: What do you suggest, then?

Mr. Deans: I think, instead of talking, if the hon. member had listened, he would have heard. Let me tell him that the learned commentators of the media have set out some very clear positions on this. Almost without exception editors across this country have said that the government's decision is wrong-headed; that the government's decision, if it has to be taken at all, should not be taken now—that it should be delayed and there should be an opportunity for careful review. They have said that if by any chance the decision turns out to be in the best interest of Canada, this should be clear to everyone before the project is proceeded with.

On every open line program, the overwhelming majority of people who have phoned in have made it clear that they want to develop their own resources for their own needs and for the future. There is something wrong with a government that does not listen to anyone.

An hon. Member: There is something wrong with your party.

Mr. Deans: Let me address myself to the mouthy member in the back row. There is an opportunity to do useful things for this country. To begin with, the government should put an end to this now. They should say that the decision was hasty—that they are going to reconsider and make sure that whatever is about to be undertaken is stopped.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Second, the government should make a decision today to build a pipeline from the natural gas fields in Alberta, British Columbia and other parts of the west, to both Vancouver Island and the maritimes. That would provide the short-term jobs everyone says we must have. That would be a concrete decision and would go toward meeting the third goal.

The third goal would be a move toward reducing the need for importing oil to the east coast, a considerable financial burden to the Canadian public, and would enable us to undertake a replacement program which would allow this government and this country to transfer its dependence from offshore oil to natural gas.

The fourth point is that with those things in place it would be possible to start a concerted effort for economic development across the country because we would have an assured supply of energy from coast to coast at a price that we in Canada could regulate. We would have an assured supply of energy coast to coast that would guarantee that our industry could, if we so desired, be more competitive—could be competitive with anyone in the world.

We should be following the example of other oil producers and other energy producers of using our energy and oil to develop the country where we have jurisdiction so that the people of Canada can benefit.

That is the kind of program that I suggest this government should follow. Unfortunately, the government does not appear to have what it takes to make the tough decisions. It is always easy to turn around and give things away—to go for the buck right now, no matter what the end cost will be. That is what this government has done every year it has been in office. That is why this government will, in historical perspective, stand indicted for the moves taken over the last few days.

They will go down in history known for the sell-out of our natural resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of speaking in this debate which I think is an important debate. I suppose the debate could have taken some other form but the NDP decided to filibuster the adjournment debate and take the opportunity to discuss the advantages or disadvantages of the government's decision taken last week to authorize the construction of the pre-build section of the Alaska gas pipeline.

After about a dozen years in Parliament one begins to understand that whenever someone has a position on which he or she is safe, normally they will come forward with facts and do away with dogma, the doctrinaire attitude and the bombast. But all we had from the hon. member from Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) this evening was bombast. He did not deal with the facts. He kept repeating, "You are selling out the resources of this country. You are not protecting the industrial future of this country." He kept predicting, " The line will not be built. You do not have the guarantees."

Mr. Deans: You are obviously deaf as well as dumb.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member should realize that repeating a falsehood never brings the truth.

What the NDP should come forward with is evidence on which to base their judgment that the announcement last week by the government was as bad as they say. Why do they not come up with evidence on this? All they come up with is dogma and doctrinaire bombasting. I know the NDP well enough to know that whenever they rely on bombast, it means they do not have a case.

The NDP members in the country normally stick together. Whenever somebody from the NDP says something in this Parliament, normally at least, on ideological grounds, in principle, the provincial NDP parties agree with them. There are a few NDP members from B.C. here. The critic on this issue is the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). He is here blasting the government and saying that this is a bad decision, that we are selling out the country. But it is funny that the leader of the New Democratic Party in B.C. is not saying that.

• (2100)

An hon. Member: Yes, he is.

Mr. Breau: Here is what he said in the July 18 edition of The Citizen:

B.C. NDP Leader Dave Barrett said Thursday the decision leaves his province threatened by Alberta's access to markets "which naturally should be ours."

He does not talk about too much gas being exported. He is worried about B.C. losing its markets.

An hon. Member: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Breau: He goes on to say:

The southern section will serve U.S. areas now served by B.C. gas.

He goes on to say that in B.C. apparently this thing is an issue. It is an issue because B.C. is worried that it will lose its markets. He goes on to say:

The prospect of a drive by Alberta to sell natural gas in the market B.C. had staked out is a worry to the B.C. government, facing a shortfall of as much of $300 million in export revenues this year because of a slack U.S. appetite for Canadian gas.

So here we have the leader of the NDP in British Columbia supporting the B.C. government and worrying because this is going to be competition for B.C. gas markets.

Here we have a group of NDP members saying something totally different. I think that is sheer hypocrisy on the part of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: It is funny that the NDP, a party which normally stands for jobs, more socioeconomic benefits for Canadians, would adopt the position they have on this issue when it has been proven by the competent authority, the National Energy Board, that there is a surplus of Canadian gas. Whenever the National Energy Board speaks in matters which the NDP agree with, they laud the National Energy Board. But all of a sudden because the National Energy Board's facts do not happen to agree with the NDP's fantasies, they do not agree with the National Energy Board.

An hon. Member: It sounds like the Liberals on December 6.

Mr. Breau: Yet when it has been proven that there is a surplus of Canadian gas, the NDP say we should not export it, that we should not go ahead with this pre-build section, we should not create the jobs and industrial benefits which this construction will provide.

For the first time I hear the NDP say more unemployment now, less industrial activity now, maybe industrial benefits or prosperity 25 years from now.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) made the suggestion this evening in his speech that instead of going ahead with the construction of this pipeline, we should build pipelines in Canada from west to east. We agree with that, of course. The position of the government is that there should be a gas pipeline from coast to coast. That is the position of this government. But, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain compares this project that we are talking about, involving investments of over $20 billion, the Canadian section of the pre-build alone worth close to $10 billion, with a pipeline from west to east in Canada, the hon. member is really in dreamland.

An hon. Member: The whole party is in dreamland.

Mr. Breau: How can he expect the construction of the pipeline from west to east will create the industrial activity and the jobs which this pipeline will provide?

The amount of gas which will be carried in the pipeline from west to east to serve Quebec and the maritimes, is infinitely small compared to the amount of gas that we are talking about now and the amount of proven gas reserves in Alberta. Why does the NDP all of a sudden, a party which apparently believes in the labour movement, suggest that the labour leaders of this country are now speaking for the unemployed? Whatever is said, written on paper, signed by credible labour leaders in the country, some of whom are from the constituency of the member who preceded me, namely the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain who is now saying that is not important, that they do not know what the hell they are talking about—

Summer Recess

An hon. Member: They are in Disney World.

Mr. Breau: I have copies of a few telegrams here. One is from Mr. Stewart Cooke, District No. 6, Director, United Steelworkers of America in Ontario, who says:

On behalf of the 100,000 members of the United Steelworkers of America in Ontario, I wish to add my voice to that of Director Len Stevens, District No. 3, of the United Steelworkers of America, urging the government to proceed with the Foothills Alaska highway natural gas pipeline.

I have three other telegrams from labour leaders in the country.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who are they?

Mr. Breau: There is one from a Mr. Norm Rousseau, representing the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, Lodge 103.

An hon. Member: Read it out, Herb.

Mr. Breau: I have another one from Mr. Len Stevens.

Mr. Rae: Read it out.

An hon. Member: Read them all out.

Mr. Breau: Do I understand that the hon. members from the New Democratic Party cannot read? Do they want me to repeat the telegram for them? The telegram from Mr. Rousseau, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers reads as follows:

Our brotherhood is deeply concerned with the possible hold-up of the pre-build of the Foothills pipeline. We need the jobs here in Stratford to build the compressors and turbines.

Mr. Chénier: What do you think of that?

Mr. Breau: The NDP does not agree with that.

An hon. Member: What do you say about that, Bob?

An hon. Member: Read them all.

Mr. Breau: The telegram from Mr. Len Stevens, District 3 Director, United Steelworkers of America reads as follows:

United Steelworkers of America, District 3, representing over 30,000 Canadian steelworkers in the four western provinces and the two territories, requests your support of approval for the construction of the western Canadian section of the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline. Any further delay will only add fuel to the present recession, causing more unnecessary unemployment.

An hon. Member: Listen, Bob.

Mr. Breau: We have had telegram after telegram from the labour movement and industry coming in to the government—

An hon. Member: Read the rest.

Mr. Breau: —urging the government to approve the pre-build.

An hon. Member: You do not believe it anyway.

Mr. Breau: The NDP knows better. The NDP knows better than the labour leaders and the workers of this country. Normally when the NDP says it knows better than industry, one can excuse its members because they do not know how the economy works or how the industry works.

An hon. Member: But you do?

Mr. Breau: But when the NDP is suggesting that the labour leaders of the country do not know what they are talking about, really I think the NDP has gone overboard.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party does not understand. There was a delay in the proposed pipeline to move natural gas from Alaska to the United States through Canada. There was a delay in the original design of this project for certain reasons that are entirely outside the control of the Government of Canada and of the Canadian company responsible for construction within Canada.

And the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that if the government had not gone ahead with the approval of that section of the pipeline called the pre-build, those delays would have meant that Foothills (Yukon) would have found it impossible in the present circumstances to meet the requirements to set up the financing of the line within Canada unless the Government of Canada approved that construction. Once the Canadian energy agency said there was a surplus of natural gas in Canada, the export of that natural gas meant more money for the Alberta producers who are now in a situation where they have shut-in gas that is capped; that gas cannot be exported, so this decision allows the export of more natural gas, but it also allows Foothills Pipelines to generate revenues and pay not only for the pre-build now but the whole section of the pipeline that will be on Canadian territory. And without that decision at this moment, Mr. Speaker, we were running the risk that this project, at least as far as the Canadian section is concerned, might never take place, but the NDP were prepared to run that risk.

Mr. Speaker, the surplus of natural gas in Canada as indicated not by just anybody, not simply by Liberal members, not simply by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), but by the National Energy Board which made an appropriate study, the competent authority in Canada on energy—that agency said we now had in Canada a surplus of about 4.5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

Mr. Speaker, the NDP say we are selling out Canada. What are the facts, Mr. Speaker? I checked how much surplus natural gas Canada has and here are the figures obtained from the National Energy Board. The export commitment for the pre-build, which was authorized last week and which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced in the House last week, will mean 2.3 trillion cubic feet of natural gas between 1980 and 1987. At the present time, up to 1980, the total gas export commitments allowed in Canada amount to 14.5 trillion cubic feet. You will note that we are only talking here about 2.3 trillion, but the total up to 1980 amounts to 14.5 trillion cubic feet.

Canadian needs during the next decade will amount to 21 trillion cubic feet. In other words, total requirements between 1980 and 1990, that is for export and for Canadian needs, will be 35.5. trillion cubic feet. At the present time, western gas reserves amount to 71.8 trillion cubic feet. NDP members are confused by the facts, and because this time the facts are the opposite of what they would like, they are trying to hide them. They speak one after the other and make ideological and philosophical speeches without stating the facts. When they say that there will be a shortage of natural gas in Canada, where do they get their facts?

It is certainly not from the NDP leader in British Columbia, because he is not worried about this decision. What concerns him is that Alberta will now be competing with British Columbia. He did not say that there would be a shortage of natural gas. I have said that the total requirement for Canadian needs and exports during the next decade will amount to 35.5 trillion cubic feet. Canadian supplies amount to 71.8 trillion cubic feet, which means that we shall have a surplus in the next decade of 36.3 trillion cubic feet. This means that, in spite of the exports that we have authorized, we shall have a surplus, and this is in addition to new potential reserves of 46 trillion cubic feet. Moreover, these new potential reserves do not include the substantial reserves which can be developed in what is called the deep basin area of Alberta. There are still enormous reserves in that area which are not even included in our potential reserves.

Moreover, to ensure that we shall have adequate reserves to meet Canadian needs in the future, it should be noted that present production for domestic and export markets amounts to 2.7 trillion cubic feet. Natural gas is now being discovered in the west at a rate of over 4.5 trillion cubic feet. Where, then, are the facts used by the NDP, Mr. Speaker? I would like to hear facts—

• (2110)

[English]

I heard the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) bombast the government about how we are selling out the resources of this country. Why does he not come up with the facts to show that the National Energy Board has found that we will be short of natural gas in the future? He does not give them, not at all.

Mr. Murphy: Where is the oil?

Mr. Breau: I thought the hon. member would know enough about the difference between oil and gas to know that you cannot put oil in a gas pipeline, and we are talking about the gas pipeline. I do not foresee that we will be exporting oil through this gas pipeline.

An hon. Member: Just give us the facts.

Mr. Breau: I just quoted some figures on the absolute number. What about the test which the National Energy Board has? I again mention that the National Energy Board is the competent authority in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, (Mr. Waddell) who is just arriving in the chamber, will know that a few years back when the National Energy Board began saying there was a possibility of an oil shortage in the future and the government should restrict exports of oil, the then energy critic, the former member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, Mr. Douglas, said that whatever the National Energy Board stated was competent and factual and when the NEB spoke on this matter, the government had better listen. All of a sudden the National Energy Board does not count, the NDP knows better than the NEB.

Mr. Waddell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Breau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Waddell: Is the hon. member aware that the National Energy Board gave its gas price forecast of our surpluses in December, 1979, and the minister came along in May with his policy on off oil—from oil to gas—which will increase our demand substantially? Is the hon. member aware of that? Will he agree that that throws out the forecast of the board?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not have a case. He is bringing in a red herring that does not have anything to do with what I am saying. I am talking about surpluses of gas. I am not talking about oil. If the hon. member has any facts—

Mr. Rae: Do you have any facts?

Mr. Breau: I hear the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood interjecting. He will speak in this debate. He can give us the facts.

An hon. Member: He will be speaking a week from next Monday.

Mr. Breau: If the hon. member says we are going to be out of gas, he can tell us how much gas we have. When the National Energy Board approves an application for the export of gas, they use three tests to determine whether Canadian requirements can be met by current reserves and if the export should be approved.

• (2120)

I gave the absolute figures a while ago regarding what the reserves are, what the potential reserves are and what the domestic requirements would be in the next decade. The first test is the current deliverability test. It is based on the level of deliveries possible each year from established reserves. For there to be a surplus, the deliverability from these reserves has to be able to meet annual Canadian requirements plus currently authorized exports for a minimum period. This period is five years.

The second test is the current reserves test. This test compares the inventory of established reserves with 25 times the first year's Canadian demand, plus currently authorized exports. That is the second test before exports are approved.

The third test is the future deliverability test. It is based on the level of deliveries possible each year from established reserves and from estimated future additions to these reserves. Deliverability from these reserves has to be able to meet forecast annual Canadian requirements plus currently authorized exports for some ten years into the future. The most stringent of the three tests governs the amount of gas declared surplus.

Those are the facts. That is how the National Energy Board arrives at decisions.

Mr. Waddell: Who provides the figures?

Mr. Breau: If the NDP wants to provide facts to the National Energy Board, all its members have to do is to go to the NEB and produce the facts. If the NDP has facts to show that this is not correct and that the numbers the NEB has found to be surplus are incorrect, why do its members just stand up in the House and make dogmatic speeches? Why do they not take their facts to the NEB and tell the NEB, as Canadian citizens, that the NEB does not know what the facts of the situation are? They do not do that. My friend does not have the facts.

An hon. Member: You have nothing.

Mr. Waddell: You guys are stupid.

Mr. Breau: Canadians will always have priority with regard to access to their own gas. That is because, under section 83 of the National Energy Board Act, gas cannot be declared surplus until Canadian needs are met. In addition, new exports will stimulate drilling activity, and more gas will be found.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain has said that this decision could endanger the construction of a gas pipeline from west to east because there might not be enough gas. In its decision in December, the National Energy Board set aside ample reserves to protect Quebec and the maritimes before declaring gas to be surplus for the purpose of this pre-build.

Mr. Waddell: What about oil?

Mr. Breau: The hon. member comes back to oil. He loses the debate on gas, so he comes back to oil. If he wants to raise a question about oil, he can do that, and I will answer him, but today I am talking about gas.

I have all sorts of information I could put into the record to prove that the NDP just does not have the facts, but let us look at the decision and the benefits this decision will bring to Canada. The total and indirect employment generated by the entire $8.4 billion pipeline project in Canada is estimated at 350,000 man-years.

Mr. Waddell: Baloney.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member says "baloney". He wants workers to eat just bologna because he does not want the pre-build.

There will be capital expenditures of $1.6 billion for pre-building the western and eastern legs, and gas production, conditioning and gathering systems at a cost of $935 million are estimated by the company to create 150,000 man-years of employment directly and indirectly. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain worries about the future. He does not worry about the workers of STELCO in the city of Hamilton. This is going to create 12,000 man-years of employment.

Mr. Waddell: Not in Hamilton.

Mr. Breau: I am a member of Parliament from a high unemployment area in the country. I do not understand how a member from prosperous Hamilton could reject 12,000 man-years of employment. It baffles me.

The export sales revenue from this project will be $17 billion. The change in the gross national product of Canada in 1980 will be .2 per cent. By 1987 it will be .5 per cent. The change in the unemployment rate will be .4 per cent, and the NDP says no. They want more unemployment now to protect tomorrow's prosperity, so they say. The approximate average per year balance of payments will be improved by $2 billion.

Potential Canadian content, something the NDP was very worried about when we had the debate on the bill in 1978, is 90 per cent, and they say they want to help Canadian industry. They do not want to help Canadian industry. All they want to do is to bring forward their doctrine and their dogma. They think they have an issue here with which they can fool the Canadian people, but the Canadian people will not be fooled by the bombastic NDP. There will be Canadian manufacturing benefits of $750 million. There will be Canadian manufacturing expenditures of $400 million. There will be plant expansion of $365 million. There will be research and development amounting to $35 million.

I do not mind staying here a little longer and discussing this because the NDP will be laughed at by the country. I do not mind staying here. I do not mind coming back this week or next week, because if that is all the NDP is going to bring forward as its position, its members will be laughed at. The NDP could tell it all to us now, but its members do not have much to tell. They can be bombastic about everything this evening and keep us here all this week. That does not mean very much, so under Standing Order 6(5)(a) I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr):

That the House continue to sit this day beyond the ordinary time of daily adjournment in order to complete its consideration of the motion of the President of the Privy Council now under consideration, including any amendment or amendments proposed thereto.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed to the motion will please rise.

And more than ten members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): More than ten hon. members having risen to oppose the motion, the motion is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the opportunity of getting into the debate on the pipeline question, and if I have time tonight, I intend to do so, but I would also like to speak, because we are basically on the adjournment question, about another matter first.

Certainly during this session charges and countercharges have been hurled back and forth in this House, and in the press, especially between two successors of mine, the attorney general and solicitor general of Ontario and the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Kaplan), respecting the evidence and testimony taken before the McDonald royal commission relating to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police activity known as Operation Checkmate of the early 1970s.

It is not my intention to deal in any way with the actual evidence which came before the commission relating to Checkmate in either its public or its private sessions, except to say that obviously if the various alleged acts of the police had been committed by anyone other than police officers in the line of duty and the evidence had been brought to the attention of the proper law officers of the Crown, charges would certainly have been laid by now.

● (2130)

As solicitor general of Canada in the Clark administration, my interest was whetted by some newspaper reports of what the royal commission had heard. Therefore, on taking office I asked for a series of briefings on what evidence had been heard and what was still to be heard. Due to time strictures, those briefings were not completed by the time I left office, but I did have a partial report on Checkmate. To put it mildly, I was more than surprised and angered. That partial report was presented to me in late October just before the then minister of justice, Senator Jacques Flynn, and I jointly convened a federal-provincial meeting of ministers of justice, ministers of correctional institutions, attorneys general and solicitors general of all the provinces. Indeed it was the first time that all provincial and federal law officers of the Crown had been together in a single federal-provincial conference.

I must say that I was deeply concerned then, as I am still deeply concerned, that my provincial colleagues did not know the full story nor have the full facts on those operations.

Why, one might ask, is it any business of any provincial minister what a federal police force does or what happens before a federal royal commission? It is simply this: in my view a provincial attorney general under our constitution is the chief law officer of the Crown charged with the administration of justice for that province and is almost exclusively responsible for bringing to justice anyone, anyone who commits a criminal act in that province. This is very clearly a provincial responsibility. I am also old-fashioned enough to believe that it is the duty of any citizen, no matter what his rank and position, whether he is a royal commissioner, a judge sitting in any capacity, a prime minister, a minister of justice or any other officer of the court or of the Crown, and certainly any solicitor general or any policeman or peace officer, to lay before the proper officials any evidence they may have about anything which could in any way be illegal and certainly any facts or circumstances which could involve criminal activity. Those facts should be given as soon as possible to the person or his agent who is charged with enforcing the Criminal Code in the courts. In this country, that person is the provincial attorney general. In my mind the facts in operation Checkmate indicated to me that at least four provincial attorneys general should have been informed long before I came on to the scene of the evidence that either had been or was about to be presented to that royal commission.

Members should appreciate as well that in most instances a curious solicitor general can find out in advance what is going to be presented to that particular royal commission, because the source for almost all the information that goes to the McDonald royal commission is either RCMP files or testimony from RCMP personnel or ex-personnel. If the facts known to the RCMP were transmitted to my provincial colleagues, as I think they should have been, it then would have been their job and it would be within their discretion to decide what to do with them. That is their responsibility. It is not left to the discretion of the federal Solicitor General, it is not left to the discretion of the federal Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), it is not left to the discretion of the royal commission, but it is at the discretion and the responsibility of provincial attorneys general to decide to prosecute or not to do so.

Ideally that information, with sworn statements naming names, dates and location, all available to the federal solicitor general, should have been collected, collated, and because of the belief that criminal acts had been committed, should have been sent to the provincial attorneys general. The reasons why I was unable to transmit that information to my provincial colleagues in October were fourfold. First, not all of the facts known to the RCMP had been presented to the royal commission. Second, because the commission itself had not completed taking testimony on Checkmate, as I indicated, further acts, or indeed extenuating circumstances, might still be presented to the commission, and therefore, either or both the royal commission or the provincial attorneys general might end up with information denied the other. Third, we were about to convene a federal-provincial conference when the matter could be discussed. Finally, the complete transcripts of the royal commission relating to Checkmate were not available, obviously, because the testimony was not completed. It was the transcripts, not the solicitor general's versions of the facts, that the provincial attorneys general wanted.

At the federal-provincial meeting at the end of October, to the surprise of some federal officials, but on behalf of the federal government, I gave to the provincial attorneys general what I thought was an ironclad commitment, to use a hackneyed phrase around here, that as soon as the Checkmate testimony before the royal commission was completed and the transcripts made available, the uncensored, unedited testimony, along with any other evidence, knowledge or facts pertaining to those occurrences in the RCMP files or within the knowledge of the solicitor general, would be turned over to the provincial attorneys general, in advance of any public disclosure of the testimony, so that my provincial colleagues could perform their constitutional responsibilities before the courts and under the criminal law, and also from a practical point of view and for the sake of courtesy, so that they could have a reasoned response once the fat hit the fan. The attorneys general were appreciative. I think they left that conference last October secure, having received the commitment I had given them on behalf of the federal government.

Some time around the end of the year I was informed that all the testimony and evidence relating to Checkmate was in and that the royal commission had moved on to other matters. As far as I am aware, the Checkmate occurrences were the only, if not the main, allegations of potential illegalities by the RCMP outlined to the royal commission in the period between June 4 and December 12 when the Clark government fell, and therefore comprised the only testimony and allegations that I felt I could transmit at that time to the provincial officers of the Crown.

As we all know, on December 13, the government was plunged into a general election. The full transcripts were not received by me before then, or indeed since then. During the election campaign, I believe some time early in January, I was surprised to learn from my departmental official that within a few days, but certainly before the end of January, edited and censored versions of the McDonald transcripts were to be released to the public by the commission, edited and censored, I may add, not by the government, not by the Solicitor General, but by the McDonald commission itself.

I was truly incensed. My officials knew, but perhaps did not approve, of my commitment; the royal commission knew of my commitment, although they might not have agreed with it; and certainly the provinces knew of my commitment, and that I intended to live up to that commitment. The relationship between a minister of the Crown and a royal commission is hazy, to say the least. I had no means of enforcing any order, desire or command I might want to issue to the commission, and in any event unlike prior solicitors general I had attempted to establish a pretty good relationship with that particular commission. But I certainly did not want those transcripts released until the provinces received them first. If anyone was going to vet anything from a security point of view, that was my job as a minister primarily responsible for national security and not theirs. I strongly believed that as with the commission's first report I would probably have been willing to release the whole testimony, unedited and uncut, to the attorneys general and to trust their judgment which, quite frankly, I am sure is as good as my own and certainly as good as that of any royal commission, confident that matters affecting national security, civil rights or individual privacy would be respected by them—and by "them" I mean the provincial attorneys general.

At my insistence, and I had to insist, the edited versions were therefore not released in January. The whole matter was put off until after the February election at which time, once re-elected and reappointed as solicitor general, I had determined to make sure that the provincial attorneys general had all of the information, not just the information the royal commission thought they should have or just the information that a federal solicitor general thought they should have. Well, as you know, Mr. Speaker, we did not win and I was not the solicitor general any longer. I noted with interest that within hours of the change of government severely edited and censored versions of those transcripts were released to the public by the commission and to this day, in defiance of the commitment given by me in good faith on behalf of the federal government, the provincial attorneys general as the proper officers of the Crown have not yet received the full facts or the full, unedited, uncut, uncensored transcripts or any of the facts or evidence contained in the RCMP files on this matter. I can only term this a very real dereliction of duty on the part of the present Solicitor General of Canada and I consider it a very real abuse of the system of Canadian justice and a continuing blow to the reputation, spirit and morale of the members of the RCMP who would, I am sure, whether they are implicated or not, want to get the whole thing over with.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few brief words on the pipeline question. Our policy in the Conservative party has been consistent throughout. Unlike the Liberals, unlike the NDP, our position throughout on this matter, going right back to the time of the original concept of the northern pipeline to take Alaskan or northern gas down through to the states or the southern part of Canada, has been consistent. Sir, we want the full, whole, complete northern pipeline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: There is no question about that. It will provide jobs, it will provide investment capital. It will put a spark to the Canadian economy that it badly needs today. It is a facility which can help enormously to develop Canada's northern potential and help solve some of North America's energy problems.

The question before the House comes down to this: What can we do to encourage the building of the pipeline? There are those who state that by going ahead and building the lower portion only, we are removing the incentive to build the line as a whole. This is obviously the view of the New Democratic Party and they are entitled to that view. They may be wrong, but they are entitled to hold that opinion. The government's view is that at a time of economic recession, construction of the pipeline will provide the revenue, the experience, the technology and the expertise needed to move ahead with the whole line at a later date.

Speaking only for myself, I must confess that I am not happy with either position. I just wish there was a more recognizable thrust or anxiety on the part of the Liberals to make sure that the whole line is built. I hope we are not being "conned". I think, quite frankly, that the arm of the United States could have been twisted harder, that public and private pressures could have been exerted to obtain those "ironclad" guarantees the minister used to huff and puff about. But the Liberals have not done this. We have no guarantees and, frankly, this worries me. The government, with all the information it now possesses, obviously feels we should go ahead with the pre-build now and with construction of the whole line afterwards. So be it. I am willing to give them the benefit of the doubt. If that is their policy, we agree to go along with them after earnest consideration. Indeed, I think the mass of the Canadian people is willing to go along with the government's policy now. In deciding upon this procedure, the government is in possession of information which is, perhaps, not available to us. Very well. But the die is cast. The ball is in the government's court. The pre-build will go ahead in accordance with the government's decision. But I say this by way of warning to members opposite: If, by any chance, the rest of it, the whole of the northern portion, is not started by the end of 1983, then, to put it mildly, all hell is going to break loose. We will go along with the pre-build scheme only because it is apparent the government has decided that this is the best way to get the whole of the line built. But if this does not happen, if they are pulling the wool over the eyes of the Canadian public, if somehow or other they have been bought, if this is a con job, then by golly, if that line is not started by the end of 1983, I say to them: Look out, the assurances of this government will be one of the greatest traitorous "con jobs" ever perpetrated on a trusting Canadian people.

We are going along with the government only because we feel this will be a help, not a hindrance, to the building of the whole line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in this debate. I agree with the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), when he stated that this is the single most important issue to come up at this session of Parliament, but that is where our agreement ends. He sees only the negative side, while I interpret the decision as positive.

In my short time in the House I have formed certain impressions. The role the NDP sees for itself is one of negative criticism. I know that our democratic system is based on criticism from the opposition. But opposition should be objectively critical and have positive alternatives to suggest. My impression is that the members opposite rarely have a positive suggestion to offer. Perhaps this is conditioned by the fact that they know they are never going to be in a position to govern and therefore need make no positive suggestions.

I submit that a good example of negative thinking was held up last week when the member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) stated that on this issue he was never so proud "as not to be a Liberal". Why wouldn't he say rather, that he was proud to be a member of the New Democratic Party? I think the answer is obvious. He cannot be proud to be a member of such a negative party.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, since the members of the New Domocratic Party have been the obstructionists in the House and since they brought in the motion, will they at least follow one word in the title of their party, which is "democratic" and at least be democratic enough to let the hon. member be heard.

• (2150)

Mr. Deans: You were the heckler when I spoke.

Mr. Harquail: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we could invite you to demand order. The hon. member is a new member in the House and perhaps the NDP should show sufficient common courtesy through their leader to at least allow the hon. member to be heard. Since they do want to hold up Parliament and hold up the country, and since they do want to create unemployment in this country and since they do want to be absolutely opposed to what they are supposed to stand for, I think they should at least be democratic enough to let the hon. member be heard.

Mr. Waddell: Listen to who is talking about being democratic.

Mr. Schroder: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a Liberal. I am proud to be a member of a party which has men of the calibre of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) who are showing great leadership in this Alaska gas pipeline solution. I am proud to be a member of a party which recognizes the importance of jobs which will be created by the immediate construction of the pre-build pipeline.

I am pleased that the community of Hamilton and other neighbouring cities to my constituency will be the major beneficiaries. As a result of the help which this project will be to the steel industry, I know that the effect will ripple into my own constituency. Also, on the positive side, there will be new jobs created. This is vastly in contrast to the negative attitude of the NDP, who would rather preserve their right to think they are right than to support a project which would create jobs which we need right now.

I am proud because we are giving encouragement to those people in western Canada who have faith in our economy and our country. As private entrepreneurs, they have found gas in abundance and can now market that gas and begin to get a return on their investment, thus creating the possibility for them to stay in Canada as viable Canadian companies and to have the capital resources to further their successes by finding more oil and gas. This will ultimately help to ensure our energy independence.

While being sensibly responsive to the need of assurance about the intention of the United States to keep their part of the bargain, we recognize the natural market for our gas. We are aware of the need our neighbour has for this gas and we are willing to share what we have in abundance. Energy disruptions in the U.S.A. are at the heart of American economic problems. It is clearly in our best interest to assist our best ally when it has a need.

I am sure hon. members have heard the quotation "When the United States catches a cold, we in Canada catch pneumonia". Political realism makes it necessary for all countries to be careful and vigilant with respect to agreements and promises. I believe that while we may sometimes lose faith in politicians and governments, we must never lose faith in people. For that reason our very survival dictates that we learn to share what we have. Where better to start than with our friends and neighbours? Sharing, once begun, can lead the way to a mutual sharing on this continent which can serve as a model to other parts of the world, places that do not have the basis of understanding which is natural to our two great nations.

I am positive about this pipeline. I base my evidence not on the past and not on past decisions, but on the evidence which I see now. There is such evidence as even according to the NEB, the volume of Canadian gas that is surplus to our needs and available for export has grown from some 800 billion cubic feet to around 4.5 trillion cubic feet. I am impressed by the fact that the United States has said that it has an absolutely vital national interest in securing access to its gas in Prudhoe Bay in Alaska because it represents more than 10 per cent of its total reserves. Tapping these reserves is essential to the United States for security of reliable supply. I am impressed because, according to Foothills' calculations, pre-building would lead to direct capital expenditures in Canada of some $1.6 billion—$665 million on the pipeline itself and a further $935 million on associated gas production, conditioning and gathering facilities. Together these outlays would provided an estimated 150,000 man years of employment between 1980 and 1984. These are jobs. I am impressed by the fact that, given the nature of the U.S. assurances, the government has decided that there is minimal risk of non-completion or long delay in the construction of the entire Alaska gas pipeline.

On the other hand, there are substantial benefits which pre-building will provide. Facility and completion of the entire project will bring immediate returns to Canada in terms of jobs, output of producer revenues and balance of payment influences. I do not believe that there can be any doubt that our natural interest lies in proceeding with this important undertaking at the earliest possible date. My mind is made up and convinced by the facts. Do not try to confuse me with fiction.

In contrast, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) in no way answered the question with facts, but instead tried to throw up a smoke screen to cover the fact that this party's position will not lose jobs for his riding. He talks about somebody being phony. Since he brought out the facts, he just confirmed that what he wants to do to the workers in his constituency is what Masters and Johnson is all about.

New jobs are important, the development of industry is important, and the encouragement of Canadian-owned resource development is important. I am convinced that the pipeline should be built now by Canadians for Canadians because in the end it will be Canadians who benefit most from this imaginative project.

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order respecting the business for tomorrow and any other days there might be. I put it as a question to the government House leader. Madam Speaker found our amendment which was moved today to be out of order. But the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated the other day, and the government House leader indicated today, that the government would like to have a debate on the proposition contained in our amendment, so that there could be a vote.

• (2200)

Will the government House leader discuss with the Prime Minister the possibility of the government presenting a motion to this House tomorrow or the next day—but preferably tomorrow. I am suggesting a motion which might incorporate the two principles that were in our amendment of today, a financial guarantee for the whole line and the guarantee of a swap or, even better, a bill to amend the Northern Pipeline Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I am ready to allow the New Democratic Party, with consent, to introduce tomorrow the motion of their choice on the pre-build section of the Alaska pipeline, with such a motion to be voted upon, provided indeed the debate is limited. If such is the wish as I understand it of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, we are willing as far as we are concerned, to let that party introduce the motion of their choice in respect of the Alaska pipeline, and have that motion debated tomorrow, with division tomorrow at 9.45 p.m., as requested by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Provided of course the division is automatically followed by a division on the adjournment motion.

I believe this meets the wishes of the New Democratic Party but requires unanimous consent. I am ready to give consent this evening. If this is more or less to the liking of the New Democratic Party, tomorrow at 9 a.m. I am ready to meet the House leaders in my office to finalize the formula. There would be a debate on the subject chosen by the New Democratic Party, but a limited debate nonetheless. There is no question of spending the whole summer in this House to please 30 members out of 282. If this is what the New Democratic Party really wants, the opportunity to vote on the pre-build section of the Alaska pipeline, they will have their debate tomorrow, they will have their vote tomorrow, and then we will adjourn tomorrow night. Mr. Speaker, this is what we would be agreeable to.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, we are certainly prepared to discuss the matter at a meeting of House leaders but I suggest that to propose to a free Parliament that a matter such as this should perforce be dealt with in one day is going a bit too far. We are prepared to discuss the matter tomorrow morning and we will then see what can be done to get a vote on an actual proposition or preferably to put before the House a bill to amend the Northern Pipeline Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I should like to say to the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) who rose to speak in the debate, that he will be recognized on the resumption of the debate on the adjournment motion tomorrow, whenever it occurs during the day.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—EXPORT OF NATURAL GAS TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, the question I want to raise this evening is relevant to some of the matters that have been discussed today. Indeed, it is rather coincidental.

On April 17, the second day of this sitting, I directed a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) asking whether he maintained the position he took on December 6 last in opposition to the export of natural gas to the United States. I also inquired, in the course of my questioning, about the minister's policy with respect to natural gas and whether he had made a statement that one of his priorities would be to introduce an export tax on natural gas. I also asked him whether, if that was a statement of government policy, it continued to be so.

In response, the minister gave a rather unsatisfactory and vague statement to the effect that the government was looking into the matter. Subsequent to that date, we have had a statement by the minister with respect to the Alaska natural gas pipeline, but we still have not heard from him, by way of a policy statement on the question of an export tax on natural gas.

I think it would be useful to look back at what was said on December 6 and put on the record again exactly what the minister said at that time when he was the Liberal party critic on energy matters.

● (2205)

I quote from page 2101 of Hansard for December 6. At that time the minister said:

> In our view, exports of natural gas to the United States should be authorized only on the basis of, first of all, an ironclad commitment regarding the building of the whole Alaska gas pipeline. Everything has to be signed, sealed and delivered, particularly the financing plan and the financing guarantees, before we start exporting one cubic foot of gas out of this country to the United States.

We have had the statement with respect to the assurances of the completion of the total project. But the second interesting ironclad requirement which the minister indicated at that time was as follows:

> Second, there must be an arrangement for swaps in this agreement with the United States so that down the line, if Canada were to need natural gas, we would be in a position to obtain natural gas from the Alaska gas pipeline which we might need in exchange for the gas we are now providing to the Americans. That would be the second point.

The minister continued by saying:

> The third point is with regard to revenues arising out of gas exports to the United States. They should be used to ensure the initiation and completion of the Quebec and maritime gas pipeline so that eastern Canada would be fully served in terms of gas service and so that people in the maritimes and eastern Quebec would be assured of getting natural gas at a reasonable price.

There you have, Mr. Speaker, what I consider to be some fairly firm and unequivocal statements made by the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would be interested in finding out on three very important points precisely whether or not he still holds that position. We have heard nothing with respect to the whole question of swaps. That was a fundamental question. We have heard nothing at all with respect to the completion of the natural gas pipeline to the maritimes which was to be financed out of the moneys to be made on the Alaska natural gas pipeline.

The third point is that we had a statement in response to my question by the minister on April 17, with respect to an export tax on natural gas. It can be found in Hansard at page 96, and it reads as follows:

> Madam Speaker, I do not recall ever having made such a statement.

He goes on to say:

> If the hon. member has such a quote, I would like to see it.

The important words are these:

> But this is not part of government policy.

We have had innumerable reports that the minister is seriously considering an export tax on natural gas. He says now that he is considering not only natural gas but an export tax on other resources which are exported out of the country, including electricity. He has been somewhat quieter lately with respect to this proposition because he is receiving a lot of opposition on the latter proposition from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

If the parliamentary secretary is going to answer for the minister tonight, I would like to know whether or not these items are still fundamental with respect to the Alaska natural gas pipeline, whether we can take the minister at his word—his word has been considered very leniently up to this point but we expect him to be consistent—that an export tax on natural gas is not part of government policy. I would like a clear and unequivocal statement. I would like to have that reaffirmed by the parliamentary secretary tonight.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to the question which the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) raised on April 17. I would point out to him that it is that particular question to which I propose to respond, not the new twist which he put to it tonight relating to taxation on gas exports.

I propose responding to him on the matter of substance which he raised on that particular date because we assume full well, knowing the gentleman as we do, that that was his concern, and we shall attempt to address ourselves to that tonight.

When the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources responded to the question raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West last April concerning the undertaking that would be required before gas exports could be approved, the minister stated that the government at that time had decided to postpone any action concerning approval of gas exports until a clearer indication was obtained from the United States government than the previous government, led by the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), had been able to obtain with regard to the United States commitment to the Alaska pipeline project.

We have now obtained the necessary assurances, subject only to confirmation from the sponsoring pipeline group, that financing can be completed for the pre-build section and for the rest of the pipeline within Canadian territory.

As the minister stated in the House of Commons on July 17, the assurances received from the United States have been expressed in several ways. First, there were the decisions by the federal energy regulatory commission, a U.S. government agency, certifying the pre-building of the western and eastern legs of the northern pipeline system within the U.S. for the initial purpose of transporting surplus Alberta gas and for the transportation of Alaska reserves when the system is completed from Prudhoe Bay.

Second, on June 19 there was an agreement between the major gas producers in Alaska and the northwest Alaskan Pipeline on the sharing of $500 million worth of expenditures to complete the final design and engineering work that will be necessary preparatory to constructing the pipeline and the various related facilities in Alaska. This was a clear intention of the sponsoring companies to proceed with the project.

Third, on June 19 the oil companies holding the reserves in Prudhoe Bay and the pipeline company also signed a statement of intention in which they undertook to work together to facilitate the financing of the pipeline and related facilities in Alaska with the objective of building the entire system by 1985.

Of course, there have been other assurances since then, including a resolution by the United States Congress and the letter from President Carter to which reference has been made in this House in the last few days.

Based on these formal assurances, and an assessment of the importance of the project to the Canadian economy, the Canadian government has taken the decision to proceed with the project. The widespread support of the government's decision to approve this major pipeline project, and the related gas exports, has been evident in the past few days through many messages of support from a broad spectrum throughout the Canadian economy.

And, finally, may I say to the hon. member, yes, you can take the minister at his word.

AIR TRANSPORT—SCHEDULED JET AIR SERVICE TO BRANDON, MAN.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening on behalf of many of the residents of southwestern Manitoba and southeastern Saskatchewan who have been without air service connecting them with points east and west in Canada. Brandon services a large number of people. The city is made up of about 40,000 people. It services some 130,000 people in southwestern and western Manitoba. It has been without regular scheduled air service to points east and west for a considerable period of time.

Prior to 1969, Brandon was linked to Winnipeg and Regina by turbojet. This service was transferred to TransAir which in turn terminated flights from Brandon in 1972. Since then, the residents of Brandon and area have been effectively stranded when it comes to travelling to either Calgary or Toronto.

When a resident of the Brandon area wishes to travel either east or west, he must somehow get to Winnipeg. If he is going west, he must overfly Brandon in order to get to either Regina or Calgary. Going east, someone living in Brandon has to travel approximately 130 miles to Winnipeg, worry about parking, and board an aircraft travelling to eastern Canada.

Brandon is a very progressive area. A year ago it hosted the Canada Winter Games, and did an outstanding job. In 1982, Brandon will be hosting the Labatt's Brier, an event of national significance. A city which will be hosting that kind of event obviously must have the services available to do a proper job. The city of Brandon has approximately 1,000 hotel units. It is capable of attracting conventions. It is, from my own experience, home of one of the nicest livestock sale pavilions, and when it comes to cattle, it has some of the best breeding stock in Canada.

● (2215)

It seems to me that air service into Brandon would provide an impetus to that area and link it not only with points in Canada but also points in the United States on which we depend for buyers.

Brandon is also an agricultural and a very large commercial centre. It is the centre of a large grain-growing area. The retail sales in the Brandon area in 1979 were some 30 per cent above the national average. To my mind this is all a way of saying that Brandon is a growing and energetic city which needs—in fact, deserves—the added impetus of regularly scheduled direct flights to other Canadian trade centres.

I raised this question with the minister in the House back on May 29 when I had an opportunity to ask him about this. I will eliminate some of the preamble and read into the record what I asked him back on May 29, as follows:

Would the minister tell the House and the people of that area what the government's position is in terms of this service, which is very much in need in that important area of Manitoba?

Among other things the minister said the following:

However, I am trying to help matters move faster.

That was nearly two months ago. We have not seen action on this since that time. In a supplementary question to the minister I tried to point out to him that this was an urgent matter, and he responded by saying, and I quote:

I would prefer the CTC to make an objective appraisal of the situation, knowing full well that I and the government as a whole can change that decision if judged necessary.

The implication I drew from that was that once the CTC had held hearings and if it was not satisfactory to the people of Brandon and area, the government would be willing to take another look at it. Since then, as I said, nothing has happened.

What did happen when we were the government was that back on November 21 the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), while on a trip to Brandon on which I had the pleasure to accompany him and when he was speaking to the annual convention of the Union of Manitoba Municipalities, said that he had cleared the way for regional air carriers to apply for this route. I will read part of the press release which accompanied his speech, as follows:

Without this announcement, Mr. Mazankowski said, there could otherwise have been concern that a licence application for such a service might be rejected by the Canadian Transport Commission as being incompatible with a provision in the regional air carrier policy that regional carriers should not expand as potential transcontinental operators.

By making this announcement the then minister made it possible for regional air carriers to apply for that route without violating the transportation policy of the government. It seems to me that the position of the government should be to set policy, and it should then be the position of the CTC to enforce it or see that that kind of policy is carried out. What I find unfortunate today, despite the fact that there have been 350 petitions from the area in support of that kind of service, is that this government has seen fit not to push the CTC to set a date for hearings. What we did have a week ago was a situation in which Frontier Airlines, a foreign air carrier based in Nevada, made an application for a route to fly into Saskatchewan to pick up passengers at Saskatoon and Regina and then to carry on to Minot and Denver. This application was made and this route was granted without a hearing. What I find disturbing is that in the case of our own country, the government has not even pushed the CTC enough to set hearings. The application before the CTC for this route is made by Pacific Western Airlines. It is a Canadian company which is willing to provide this service on a daily basis without a subsidy.

The air terminal at Brandon is a controlled terminal. There is a new building there. The runways are of sufficient length that the service could be commenced without any additional moneys being spent. There is a small problem. On hot days during the summer, the 737s which PWA proposes to use may not be able to take off at full load and have enough fuel to get to Toronto going east. However, in its submission to the CTC, TWA said this, concerning that rather minor problem:

Operationally, the length of this runway will occasionally impose payload restrictions on a Boeing 737 operation between Brandon and Toronto. However, on such infrequent occasions, the applicant is prepared to make an en route technical stop at Winnipeg on eastbound services between Brandon and Toronto.

We have a situation in which an area of Canada is very much in need of, and deserves, this kind of service but is without it. A Canadian air carrier has applied for this service, and we have a government which is not prepared to go ahead and see that a hearing is set so that a Canadian company can provide services for a very important area of the country. I urge the government to go ahead and set a date for the hearings as quickly as possible so that we can have this kind of service which is much needed and overdue in western Manitoba.

● (2220)

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of the eagerness of Brandon and of the communities surrounding Brandon to obtain jet service to the east and west. I also know that many people in the area have been trying to achieve this objective for some time. I can therefore appreciate their impatience, now that PWA has formally applied to the CTC for a licence to provide the jet services desired.

I understand that the application was filed with the CTC on January 21 of this year. The fact that the application is still under consideration by the commission makes it inappropriate for me to comment on the case lest my comments be interpreted as prejudicial to an unbiased consideration of the matter by the CTC. All that I can say at the moment is that the CTC is required by law to follow certain procedures in considering applications for new air services. For example, the application must be advertised in the newspapers of the area to allow anyone interested to intervene in support of or against the application. These parties must then be given adequate time, as specified in the CTC regulations, to file their interventions, to which the applicant is then given the opportunity to reply. In the case of the PWA application to serve Brandon and Toronto, this process was not completed until late March. The CTC then had to examine all the submissions made, which included complicated arguments about the economic viability of the proposed service. As a result of this examination, the CTC determined and announced in early July that it will hold a hearing in Brandon on the application of PWA. Because of other commitments, the CTC is unable to hold the hearing before the fourth quarter of 1980 and will announce the exact dates as soon as these are set.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—MOVEMENT OF OIL BY TANKER—GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION AT U.S. HEARINGS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my concern is with the proposal to have an oil tanker superport at Port Angeles, Washington. On different occasions since the February 18 election, I have asked different ministers about their stand on this in the House. Also I have written letters to the ministers. In neither case have I received satisfactory answers.

I should like to outline briefly some of the reasons why the people in my constituency and all the people on the coast of British Columbia are so concerned about this tanker traffic. First, there is a distinct possibility—perhaps I should say a statistical inevitability—that there will be a major superspill sometime off the coast of British Columbia which will result in ecological disaster.

Dr. Andrew Thompson in his final report for the West Coast Oil Ports Inquiry said:

> Time is on your side only until a spill occurs; an Amoca Cadiz could ground in Rosario Strait tomorrow.

This is a worldwide problem. Between 1969 and 1973, a total of 82 losses occurred. There were hundreds of other minor mishaps in which a great deal of oil was spilled.

Second, we are concerned about the incremental damage which will come through small spills, through seepage from hook-ups, and from illegal flushing. In many areas, this incremental damage is even more serious than the threat of one major spill, because this is something which is going on day after day, week after week, year after year. It is destructive of marine life.

Third, there is the danger to fishing vessels and other small craft in the shipping lanes. There are numerous instances, in areas where there is tanker traffic, of trawlers and other fishing vessels just mysteriously disappearing. We do not need to have a Bermuda Triangle to explain that sort of thing. In many cases they have simply been hit by supertankers which did not even know they hit these vessels. They just kept going and lives have been lost. I do not want to see that kind of situation prevailing off the coast of British Columbia.

Finally, the presence of a major tanker terminal less than 20 miles from the city of Victoria could create a serious air pollution problem. In his statement of proceedings before the West Coast Oil Ports Inquiry, Dr. Thompson talked about this aspect and said:

> It is possible that the emissions from the tankers, docks and storage tanks mixed with the air pollution from the existing forest industry operations at Port Angeles would exceed established standards with such frequency as to place in question the continuing viability of the oil port operations. If authorities enforce air quality standards by closing down offloading operations when violations occur, the resultant queuing of tankers in the Strait of Juan de Fuca could seriously heighten navigation and oil spill risks.

For these reasons and others we are very concerned about this proposal. The government claims to be aware of these facts and has declared its opposition to a superport, but when asked specific questions about the manner in which they are expressing their opposition, when asked what they are doing, they are entirely too casual. For example, in response to my question on April 28, 1980, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) refused to have Canadian representatives present at the environmental hearings held in the State of Washington at its capital in Olympia. He had no answer to give to my request that the Department of the Environment should be conducting independent studies in this area. Two years ago, Dr. Thompson put his finger on the problem. He said:

> The public concern in British Columbia is that these negotiations are not being given the priority they deserve.

Liberal policy seems to be best summed up in the phrase "Leave it alone; maybe it will go away, perhaps after the presidential election in November." As I say, the attitude of the government is entirely too casual. For instance, when asked about a Canadian presence at the site hearings in Seattle, the minister said:

> The consulate general . . . is keeping us fully informed of events and allowing us to assess continually the situation.

I had a similar response from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), but when I asked him in committee to give us an update, he could not do so. I do not expect the minister to be in possession of detailed information on every subject under the sun, but we in British Columbia think this is an important subject, a priority, and that we should at least know what is happening.

So my question is this: What co-ordination is there between the various ministers involved? Who is really in charge here and what is the Department of the Environment doing to help face this threat?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first, let me thank the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) for raising this important issue and pursuing it on a number of occasions. I want to assure him on a personal basis that it is a matter of some concern to me. It is only a year or so ago, April, 1979, I believe, that the Kurdistan broke up off the Atlantic coast. One of the results was that several hundreds of fishermen in my own riding of Burin-St. George's found their activities disrupted; they were subsequently compensated for loss of gear but in other ways they were seriously inconvenienced. I fear that should another spill come, it might well involve more than temporary inconvenience or interruption of income. For this reason alone I share the concerns he has raised.

The hon. member said he has not been receiving satisfactory answers. I am not sure that what I have to say tonight will satisfy him either, though I believe it will satisfy a number of people who may have occasion to hear it.

● (2230)

For this reason, and with the strong support of the government of British Columbia, the Canadian government has publicly expressed its concern about, and opposition to, increasing tanker traffic on the west coast. We have repeatedly made our feelings known to the United States on this matter. For example, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) personally made his position clear to the United States secretary of the interior when he visited Washington back in April. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) stated this position to the energy secretary of the United States, Mr. Duncan, when he visited Ottawa last March. Even since then, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) underlined our concerns again during the visit to Ottawa of the former United States secretary of state, Cyrus Vance.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Northern Tier Pipeline for which President Carter has expressed a preference, would be located totally within the United States. Tankers may, if necessary, proceed to and from the proposed oil port at Port Angeles entirely in the United States and international waters.

Hearings under the Washington state permitting process with respect to the Northern Tier proposal are under way and are expected to continue until late this year with a state decision unlikely before the end of 1980. These hearings are long and involved but officials of the Department of the Environment and External Affairs are following them closely. Contrary to the statement made by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands, we are sending specialists to the hearings as it becomes necessary.

I can assure the hon. member and this House that the government is continuing to do everything possible to discourage additional tanker traffic on the west coast. We have also made a number of co-operative arrangements with the United States to reduce the risk to the citizens of the west coast from existing tanker traffic. For example, the provision for compensation for Canadians in the event of a spill of Alaska oil, scientific research into the marine environment and the impact of oil spills, the development of a joint oil spill contingency plan and the installation of sophisticated navigation and traffic management systems are all efforts to reduce the risk.

Finally, we recently signed a vessel traffic management agreement with the United States which, when fully implemented, will provide the Juan de Fuca region with one of the best systems of marine safety found anywhere. While we can never entirely eliminate the risk of an oil spill, we are at least working to increase the odds against it and to minimize the possibility of serious environmental damage.

I would suggest to the hon. member that the examples which I have given with regard to the situation can hardly be, "leaving the situation alone", as he phrased it. We are very much on top of the situation and we are conscious, as he is, of the seriousness and magnitude of the problem. We pledge to continue working on these problems.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.33 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INTERNATIONAL WHALING COMMISSION

POSITION TAKEN BY CANADA AT CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I am afraid my preamble may be a bit long, but it is very important.

Whereas the threat of extinction of many species of whales is well known, since there is no commercial whaling currently carried on by Canada, since Canada has voted against the moratorium on distant water whaling at the recent meetings of the IWC, in spite of the fact that 16 countries, including the United States, Britain, Australia and New Zealand supported a commercial moratorium, whereas Canadian officials have routinely ignored the recommendation of conservationists, and whereas the Department of the Environment has been given no role in formulating this important policy, all of which subjects Canada to growing international criticism, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That this House recognize the serious threat posed by commercial whaling to the survival of all species of whales and record its opposition to the actions of Canada in voting against the moratorium at the IWC meetings held yesterday and today in England and that this House direct the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to make a statement on motions to explain the actions of his officials.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

SUGGESTED ABOLITION OF METRIC COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that the Metric Commission of Canada has a budget of $8 million for the fiscal year 1979-80, given the fact that the metric commission in Britain has been abolished and given that the metric test centre of Peterborough is returning to imperial measurements in retail food outlets, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this government immediately abolish the Metric Commission, thereby saving the Canadian taxpayer over $8 million this fiscal year.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

WOMEN

LEGISLATIVE AMENDMENTS TO REMOVE DISCRIMINATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I too rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. Whereas Canada signed the UN convention on elimination of all forms of discrimination against women last week in Copenhagen at the world conference of the UN decade for women, and whereas it will not be possible for Canada to ratify this convention as long as discriminating features exist in such federal legislation as the Indian Act, the Income Tax Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Canada Pension Plan Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House instruct the government to introduce as soon as possible such amendments to the Indian Act, the Income Tax Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada Pension Plan Act and other relevant acts as are necessary to remove existing discrimination against women, thereby enabling the governmment to ratify the UN convention on elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

POSSIBLE ABUSES AT RETAIL LEVEL RESULTING FROM METRIC CONVERSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise on an urgent matter related to the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz), and under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Consumers' Association of Canada is investigating complaints by its members of price rip-offs at the retail level because of metric conversion, and since the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs funds the CAC in order for it to be vigilant on behalf of consumers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House requires the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to table the findings of the Consumers' Association of Canada report and to act on the CAC's recommendations if abuses are found as a result of metric conversion at the retail level.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

DISMISSAL OF SHEILA ZIMMERMAN—INVESTIGATION OF AWARDING OF GRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker I rise on an urgent matter concerning special assistant Sheila Zimmerman's recent questionable dismissal by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) as the alleged author of a letter to Liberal members of Parliament on New Horizons grants, and now a further letter, a copy of which I have here, issued by Bill de Laat, special assistant to the former minister of national health and welfare, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), addressed to all Liberal members of Parliament and dated May 10, 1977.

● (1410)

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That because the 1977 bilingual letter in the French version gives similar New Horizons grant veto power to all Liberal members of Parliament, as in Mrs. Zimmerman's recent letter, this House declares Mrs. Zimmerman wrongfully dismissed for a system in effect for years and, finally, the House requests a parliamentary investigation of awarding methods, not only for New Horizons grants but all grants under government jurisdiction, for the dual purpose of protecting reputations of ministerial employees and particularly to determine what extent such grants have been and are awarded by ministers against a background of shocking patronage shovels digging into public funds.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INFORMATION

REQUESTED REPLACEMENT OF TERM "FEDERAL GOVERNMENT" BY "CANADIAN GOVERNMENT" OR "GOVERNMENT OF CANADA"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the systematic use made by the Quebec separatists of the phrase "le fédéral" to refer to the Canadian government, considering the frequent use of this phrase made by parliamentary reporters of the CBC French network and by the media in general, considering the disparaging connotation that such an overuse gave to the word "le fédéral", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lapointe):

That this House recommend that press gallery reporters and any other member of the CBC French network news team as well as other French media use the terms "Gouvernement canadien" or "Gouvernement du Canada" instead of "le fédéral" to refer to the government of our country in any news coverage or documentary presented to Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

POLITICAL ALLEGIANCE OF JUSTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last week made the novel and disconcerting statement that, while judges may not vote, it is acceptable for them to retain partisan political connections. This concept is diametrically opposed to long-standing principles of the common law respecting the independence of the judiciary. In view of the fact that one item on the constitutional reform agenda is the reorganization of the Supreme Court of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to make a statement on motions as to the political allegiance of each member of the Supreme Court of Canada and whether his proposals for reorganization of the said court will involve the filing by the justices of the court of an annual return declaring their respective political allegiance.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AGRICULTURE

PREPARATION OF UP-TO-DATE BEEF MARKETING SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the Minister of Agriculture has consistently described Canada's beef marketing system as "archaic" and "medieval"; whereas beef producers are busy attempting to produce beef under difficult and trying conditions and have neither the time nor the resources available to research and recommend changes to the system; and whereas the minister has marketing experts on staff and the resources of his department to assist him, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo);

That this House instruct the minister to prepare and table a proposal outlining his ideas on an up-to-date beef marketing system.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

RAILWAYS

STATUS OF BRANCH LINES PUT INTO PERMANENT NETWORK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has caused great anxiety and uncertainty for many western farmers by raising the question of whether he would honour a commitment by the previous minister of transport to guarantee service on some 30 branch lines by placing them in the permanent network. In view of the fact that this uncertainty is causing railway and elevator companies to postpone upgrading and maintenance programs until the government makes up its mind, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Minister of Transport end the uncertainty surrounding the future of these branch lines by stating that he will not change the status of any branch lines put into the permanent network by the previous minister.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING AGREEMENT—INQUIRY WHETHER NEW PROPOSAL PREPARED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and relates to the meeting to be held on Thursday of this week between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Alberta regarding an oil pricing agreement. I wonder if the minister can tell the House if the Government of Canada, in anticipation of this meeting between first ministers, has prepared a detailed new proposal and whether that detailed new proposal, if prepared, has been presented to the producing provinces?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government has indeed prepared a detailed proposal which the Prime Minister will discuss on Thursday with the Premier of Alberta.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister declined to indicate whether there is a new proposal after the failure of his negotiations with Mr. Leitch and whether in fact that proposal has been presented in advance to the producing provinces. The minister and the House will recall that the position of the producing provinces is that they want the same net benefits from a new agreement that they would have had from the agreement that was ready for signature by my government. We in this House are particularly interested in knowing whether the people of Canada will have the same net benefits from a new proposal as they would have had from the proposal that was near signature between the provinces and my government.

In light of achieving the same net benefits for the people of Canada, may I ask the minister whether the federal proposal includes some equivalent of a Canadian energy bank or an institution of its kind which can take billions of dollars from multinationals and use that money to help Canadians acquire ownership of energy resources?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I should like to reassure the Leader of the Opposition that the offer—the proposition put forward by the Prime Minister—will be much better for Canadian consumers than the one contained in the last budget; that should not be too difficult.

Mr. Andre: Is that an ironclad guarantee?

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the other part of the question is concerned, I should also like to assure the hon. member that if any particular bank, to use his expression, is set up it will not be set up at the expense of the Canadian consumer, as the December 11 Conservative budget was proposing.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, anyone who would believe what the minister has just said would also believe that a tax on home heating oil is better than no tax on home heating oil.

Let me ask the minister, again in the interests of having the same net benefits for Canadians that would have been realized under the agreement that was ready for signature with my government, if the proposal that is going to be put forward by the Prime Minister—if there is a proposal—includes a refundable tax credit to offset the impact of price increases for low and middle income Canadians?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition will have to wait until those discussions have taken place with the Alberta premier and perhaps also until we have consulted with other premiers before we can announce in detail the contents of the proposals put forth by the government. I want to emphasize again, however, that to all intents and purposes the proposal made by the Prime Minister will be of greater benefit to consumers than what was contained in the December 11 budget.

[English]

POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT IF FAILURE TO REACH AGREEMENT

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister who confirmed to me several weeks ago that upon the expiration of the current agreement as extended, and in the absence of a new agreement, three scenarios are possible: unilateral federal action, unilateral provincial action, or the normal conditions of market supply and demand.

Setting aside that third scenario, the open market system, either federal action under the Petroleum Administration Act or in terms of provincial legislation the petroleum marketing commission act or the mines and minerals amendment act, obviously in the minister's mind, I am sure, raises problems of constitutional validity which would likely necessitate reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. Can the minister confirm that these references have in fact been prepared in order that they may be acted upon expeditiously in the event of a failure of a new pricing agreement?

● (1420)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am afraid I have to advise the hon. member that we are still working on the basis of an agreement, not a failure to agree. Therefore, no work has been done preparing references of the type he has mentioned to the Supreme Court of particular provincial legislation.

I understand that some queries exist because of the constitutional validity of the Alberta acts in particular, but the federal government has not prepared any particular step to take these matters to the Supreme Court at this time. We are working on the basis that there will be negotiations in good faith and hopefully we will be able to reach an agreement. What we are going to propose, we believe, is a fair and equitable deal for the producing provinces. It is a fair deal also for the federal government which needs additional resources to meet its commitments and it is an excellent deal for the Canadian consumer.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I understand the minister hoping for a new agreement; indeed, I think everyone hopes for that. What I do not understand is why, in the face of a potential horror story within six or seven days following the first ministers' meeting of this week wherein there is no regime in place for pricing, supply or delivery, let alone the impact on the constitutional discussions, no action has been taken in terms of preparing these references in the event the horror story does in fact unfold. Can the minister indicate to the House, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, in view of the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada does not normally sit in July and August, whether discussions have taken place between the Minister of Justice and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, or between any minister and the Chief Justice, in terms of special sittings in August?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, as far as the first part of the question is concerned, I would like to tell the hon. member again that this government does not believe in confrontation for confrontation purposes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: Especially you, Marc!

Mr. Lalonde: Therefore, we have refused even to consider the possibility that we would not have an agreement.

Mr. Clark: If you are a dove, who is a hawk?

Mr. Lalonde: We are going to work on the basis of an agreement.

As to the second part of the question, again there has been no consultation that I know of with the Chief Justice. As a matter of fact, I am sure there has been no such consultation between the Minister of Justice and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOUSE LEADERS' DISCUSSIONS REGARDING VOTE ON PIPELINE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader. Is the government House leader in a position to report to the House on discussions that took place among the House leaders of all parties who were seeking to work out an arrangement so that there could be a vote on the fundamentally important question of a pipeline which is about to be constructed in this country?

An hon. Member: Is Stanley not talking to you these days, Ed?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well what his party suggested. Last night I offered members of the New Democratic Party in the House to let them have the whole day today, to let them introduce the motion of their choice, with such motion to be voted upon, provided after that vote we could put the motion for adjournment. The New Democratic Party—since the question has been put to me by its leader—suggested two days of debate rather than one, and we have no objection to it.

However, a compromise may be achieved since the hon. member knows that tomorrow as on any Wednesday the House sits for three hours, that is from three o'clock to six o'clock and then adjourns. Thus, if we sit from six to eight tonight during suppertime and, if necessary, later on from ten o'clock to midnight we would then have four additional hours of debate instead of three. Further, as far as we are concerned, we would be prepared to allow the NDP to have one speaker out of three throughout the debate until midnight if necessary, so that with this alternative proposal I am making to the NDP leader, his members would have more time to speak today than they would have had otherwise if the House sat two days as suggested earlier today by them. Since we are talking about a meeting of parliamentary leaders, I do not intend to reveal the contents of these consultations. I do not want to speak on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party but I have every reason to believe that the House would rather give unanimous consent to that proposal than to a two-day debate as proposed by the hon. member.

● (1425)

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the government House leader knows very well that we in this party disagree in substance fundamentally with the course the government is pursuing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Will the government House leader confirm that he has genuinely agreed to a two-day debate on a matter that is going to involve the expenditure of anywhere from $18 billion to $22 billion? We in this party think that is a reasonable amount of time for a debate and a vote. Will he agree the government party has gone along with that proposal, but that the Conservative party of Canada, because it does not want to be put on the spot, has turned it down?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have no right to reveal publicly the position taken by the Progressive Conservative Party during the meeting of parliamentary leaders. It is not my intention to do so. All I want to say to the New Democratic Party is that as far as we are concerned we are prepared to give them the two-day debate they seek. But I will also tell the hon. members of that party that it would be more advantageous if they condensed those two days of debate in one day to finish before midnight, and I think that they would have the support of the Progressive Conservative Party.

[English]

UNWARRANTED LIMITATIONS PLACED ON RIGHT OF DEBATE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Will the government House leader also agree that in the course of the discussions we had indicated that we felt that the limitations being placed during the adjournment debate on the right of members to discuss a number of matters which are inherent in the right of members of Parliament were unwarranted? Will he also indicate to the House that during the discussions it was agreed that a question with respect to the matter could be put this evening, following which the question on the adjournment debate would be put, and that the government House leader was agreeable to that suggestion?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, since the question is put to me by the parliamentary leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, what was said during that meeting is no longer a secret, and I feel more comfortable talking about it. My problem is that I am prepared to subscribe both to the proposal of the New Democratic Party and to the proposal of the Progressive Conservative Party, but they do not agree among themselves. So, Madam Speaker, it is fair to say that we could finish the debate tonight or tomorrow evening whether we agree on the two-day or the one-day proposal. There is no problem, the members of the Progressive Conservative Party or the members of the Liberal party may deal with any other subject because the proposal on the table provided in its terms for the latitude to allow each hon. member to express his views on any other subject, and not necessarily on the northern pipeline.

To conclude, Madam Speaker, since the question is put to me by the parliamentary leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, we are prepared to agree to sit two days or to sit today until midnight, provided the New Democratic Party and the Progressive Conservative Party come to an agreement.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

INQUIRY WHEN SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO REVIEW CAPITAL ACQUISITION PROJECTS TO BE ANNOUNCED

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. The minister, because of his position while a member of the opposition, will be familiar with the subject matter covered by the first report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which was presented to the House last Friday. Because of his present position, he will be aware that the current commitments to all capital projects presently under way are in excess of $10,000 million.

When will the minister be announcing the establishment of a special committee of the House of Commons, as proposed by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and similar to that proposed by the Clark government, to review capital acquisition projects expected to have cost overruns?

● (1430)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I am indeed familiar with the material. In fact, I was studying the report of the public accounts committee this morning and I hope to speak to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who is the chairman of the committee, with respect to my conclusions based on the very good work the committee has done. I hope there will be consultations in the very near future.

Mr. Clarke: I thank the minister for those kind remarks. I know he is aware that Treasury Board rules are frequently ignored when it comes to the approval of capital projects. Is the hon. gentleman ready to announce that before final approval is given to capital acquisition projects, in excess of $10 million, deputy heads of departments and heads of agencies will be required to certify in writing to the Treasury Board that all established procedures, as set out by the Treasury Board, have been followed and, in particular, that the proposal is supported by accurate and complete documentation?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member knows how supportive I am of the work the public accounts committee has done in this regard and of the work done by the Auditor General. He should also be aware that substantial improvements have taken place in procedures since the specific instances which were studied by the public accounts committee on capital cost overruns. As a matter of fact, the previous government introduced procedures last July with respect to the reporting and control of these projects, and similarly improved procedures concerning major projects are in effect and additional requirements with respect to monitoring these projects were approved by Treasury Board earlier this year. I shall look very carefully at the work of the public accounts committee to determine whether any additional safeguards are required.

AVOIDANCE OF WASTEFUL PROCEDURES REGARDING BUILDINGS UNDER TENDER

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the President of the Treasury Board. Given that carrying out changes in a structure after construction has started is costly, time-consuming and wasteful, and given that plans changed several times after construction started on the Calgary airport to the extent of 59 per cent, involving an increase of some 268,000 square feet, resulting in a cost increase of 255 per cent, or $54.4 million, may I ask what the government is doing to make sure that such procedures will not be followed in connection with buildings which are now under tender?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): It is apparent when reference is made to material that I have already made reference to during the course of my response to the questions of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra that procedures have changed since the Calgary airport was tendered for some years ago. In fact, one of the requirements of the Auditor General and one of the suggestions which arose from the Spice studies was that all these projects should be based on complete estimates and full information. I understand from the Department of Transport that this is what they are now doing.

Mr. Taylor: The minister will recall that in the public accounts committee it was alleged, and not denied, that the man responsible in the ministry for the fiasco of wasted money at the Calgary airport was not disciplined other than by being promoted and getting an increase in pay. What is government policy now with regard to punishment and retribution in the event of unnecessary waste, carelessness and disregard for accountability on the part of civil servants?

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member will recall that one of the recommendations with respect to all these projects is that one person should be held accountable as project manager. That is one of the requirements of the major Crown projects guidelines which have been in effect now for some years. We hope that accountability and the performance evaluation of individuals involved in these projects and the fact that one can point to a single individual as having responsibility will go a long way to correcting the situation to which the hon. member has referred.

ENERGY

IMPLICATIONS FOR ARCTIC PILOT PROJECT OF NATURAL GAS EXPORTS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given that the export of gas from southern Alberta will hasten the exploration and development of energy projects in the Canadian Arctic, would the minister agree that the export of environmentally secure southern gas has implications for the timetable of the Arctic pilot project and associated tanker traffic?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would not tend to agree with the hon. member but he might want to elaborate his question. The Arctic pilot project is coming up before the Energy Board some time this fall, I believe. There is a letter of intent with Tenneco of the United States which has been signed in which Tenneco has indicated its interest in buying Arctic gas. I submit we will have to wait until the Energy Board has held its hearings and reached a decision as to whether this application should be entertained or not before coming to any conclusion. But the hon. member may have more he wishes to tell us in this respect.

SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE CLAIMS PRIOR TO NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that in the other place the minister responsible for the pipeline did indicate that there would be implications involving northern development. My supplementary is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. An acceleration in northern development would have serious implications for native people who have outstanding claims against the federal government. Will the minister assure the House that native claims in the north will be justly settled prior to the approval of any massive development projects in the north?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that I have discussed this matter at considerable length with the native leadership and I have appointed negotiators. I have assured them that no development will be approved in areas where the government has jurisdiction or in which I have jurisdiction as Minister of Indian Affairs without assurances being given which will not preclude a just settlement of their land claims.

EMPLOYMENT

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Does the minister intend to help job creation as was the case in the past, and I am thinking of the Canada Works program? If so, what will be the closing date for project application and what will be the terms and conditions?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have announced a direct job-creation program called "Canada development projects". It is my intention to announce the guidelines for that program next week, hopefully on or about July 28. At that time we shall submit to members of Parliament a package of information outlining the steps to be taken, but I can assure my hon. friend that the first principle is that the projects to be selected will apply to every constituency across Canada and will be based upon the views of an advisory group established by each of the members, so there will be a full grounding of local and community review and assessment as to the type of project most appropriate for those local areas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

REQUEST MINISTER CONFIRM EXISTENCE OF LETTER GIVING LIBERAL MEMBERS VETO POWER

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, as I cannot under the rules question the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with regard to a former portfolio, I shall direct my question to the present Minister of National Health and Welfare. I refer to the recent firing by the current minister of her special assistant Sheila Zimmerman as the supposed author of a letter addressed to all Liberal members of Parliament giving them a virtual veto power over New Horizons grants. Will the minister confirm the existence of a further letter dated May 30, 1977, a copy of which I have in my possession, issued by Bill de Laat, special assistant to her predecessor, addressed to all Liberal MPs and, in the French version, giving exactly the same veto power?

An hon. Member: Read it in French!

Mr. Cossitt: I would if I was permitted to do so under the rules; I would be glad to read it into the record. That letter gave exactly the same veto power to Liberal MPs as was given in Mrs. Zimmerman's letter, for which she was fired, for being the originator of something she had absolutely nothing to do with. Will the minister explain this situation?

● (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to question the hon. member's attitude and the mud he is trying to throw at certain people and at a program. Facts are always a bit scary, especially when they are quite ordinary and easy to understand if one really wants to. I cannot personally confirm the existence of a memo which was circulating before I was in charge of the department. However, my colleague tells me, and I would have liked the hon. member to have the courage to read this document himself, that this memo, written in French, said textually that if members of Parliament have "any criticisms" to express, they are asked to raise them with whomever they may concern. All I can say is that never since I have been in charge has it been possible for an hon. member to interfere politically in any project or program of my department and to try to suppress it or to reduce its funding. The hon. member, who was present at the standing committee, did not have the courage to say what I said to the small group of hon. members in attendance. All hon. members of all political parties—

An hon. Member: The Liberals!

Miss Bégin: Put your seat on the line! All hon. members of all political parties have always received on a regular basis notices advising them of each New Horizons project in their riding. I intend to continue that practice. The false scandal the Progressive Conservative opposition is trying to create is without basis.

[English]

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY INVESTIGATION INTO AWARDING OF GRANTS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, in prefacing my supplementary question, I see no purpose in replying in kind to a defence that is not a defence by distorting and muddying up the picture as the minister has done.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Cossitt: So in the hopes there is someone on the other side who may have a little more intelligence—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Tell her to put her seat on the line.

Mr. Cossitt: She obviously has her seat somewhere right now—I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. I hope the Acting Prime Minister, who often gives very admirably smooth replies, will now also give us something that is not of questionable content. Will he specifically assure the House that cabinet ministers in the future will not be permitted to blame or dismiss staff for things they did not do, the Zimmerman case being an example? In particular, is the government prepared to agree to a full parliamentary investigation of the whole system of awarding New Horizons grants, other grants and even government contracts, to determine the extent that the dry rot of political patronage has eaten into the framework of awarding such things?

An hon. Member: Yes or no, Allan?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam speaker, I thought the Minister of National Health and Welfare had dealt with the subject carefully and assured the hon. member that these projects are administered in a fair way, and that the citizens of all constituencies, regardless of the political affiliation of their members, are eligible and do receive benefits from the programs of Canada.

REQUEST OPPORTUNITY BE AFFORDED MEMBERS TO PRESENT CHEQUES TO GRANT RECIPIENTS

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the fact that the latest New Horizons grants involved some 20,000 participants and are in excess of $1 million, is the minister prepared to involve members of this House in the New Horizons program in a meaningful way by affording us the opportunity of personally congratulating the recipients and presenting the cheques?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, it is always moving to see a new member discover the mysteries of life. If he uses this gadget, I could recommend that he listen to the interpretation. He would then have understood that I have just said that during my first mandate, as well as this one, and if I am not mistaken during the five years under my predecessor, at which time the New Horizons program was set up, all members of all parties have received an official notice of each project, by letter, advising them of it. That is very clear. It has always been done. That will always be done. So, will he be kind enough to tell us what new proposal he intends to make? I must admit that in committee I added, about a month ago, that hon. members who are interested in going one step further and in presenting a cheque, provided they do not forget it in the basket on their desk in the House of Commons, are most welcome.

[English]

Mr. Bradley: Madam Speaker, I have one of the releases and it is very pretty. I feel that possibly—

An hon. Member: You cannot even read the question.

Mr. Bradley: I am sure the minister is not intentionally doing so, but either she is misleading the House or the standing committee.

An hon. Member: Welcome to the House.

Mr. Bradley: In committee three weeks ago she said this:

So can we conclude that you will all meet your New Horizons groups and give the cheques yourselves; then I will not have the problem.

And later she said:

But do not lose the cheques, because you will be in trouble.

I viewed this as an ironclad commitment of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is coming to it.

Mr. Bradley: I was just getting to it, Madam Speaker. I was wondering if the minister could get up off her apathy and tell us whether or not she intends to carry out the commitment she made in committee.

An hon. Member: She just answered that.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Luckily, since my knowledge of English is rather limited, I did not understand the expression which, if I understand correctly, I had better not know anything about.

[English]

I should like to repeat to the hon. member that he started his quotation dishonestly a line too far.

Mr. Clark: Dishonestly?

Miss Bégin: He should have given the context. We were discussing the federal presence in the programs of the Government of Canada for the people of Canada. I said and will repeat that if members knew their New Horizons constituents and the groups in their ridings, we would not have the problem of having to remind them that they exist. We are close to the people and we are not ashamed of saying it.

ENERGY

REQUESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NATURAL GAS RESERVE IN CO-OPERATION WITH QUEBEC AND ONTARIO

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I shall put my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the importance of natural gas for Canada's future, does the federal government intend, in co-operation with the governments of Quebec and Ontario, to purchase now natural gas from Alberta in order to set up a reserve or bank and keep it for Canada's future, as the government of Mr. Tommy Douglas did in Saskatchewan several years ago?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I should like to remind my friend of the NDP that the government of Saskatchewan is now selling, if I am not mistaken, about 21 million barrels of heavy oil to the United States every year. So the idea of exports is not new. As to the suggestion of the hon. member, I must tell him that we are now reviewing our whole energy policy.

I hope that when the oil pricing discussions are over, we shall be in a position to announce a whole series of measures which should make Canada self-sufficient in energy and ensure the Canadian people a much more secure supply of oil products in the future, which includes natural gas. So I must tell my friend he will have to wait for the official announcement of our policy to draw a conclusion of the specific question he asked about natural gas.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRICE OF NATURAL GAS WILL BE MAINTAINED AT ACCEPTABLE LEVEL

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He did not reply to my first question, but I shall ask him another one. Because of the decision of the federal government to export natural gas, this energy source will be more expensive for future generations. I would therefore ask the minister if the government will undertake to maintain in the future the price of natural gas at a reasonable level for the consumers and small businesses of Canada.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the price of natural gas will increase, as will the price of oil and this is not because of any exports, but simply because we shall have to pay more for our energy resources in the future. The authorized exports only apply to the resources recognized by the National Energy Board as surplus to Canadian needs, and the billions of dollars so obtained by the country and Canadian business will help us to discover additional resources which will, once again, ensure secure supplies for future generations of Canadians. As for the oil pricing policy, we are now negotiating with the producer provinces, and I wish to tell my colleague that we indeed want to maintain for natural gas a price which will be lower than the price of oil with regard to Btu's produced. Therefore, in the next decade, it will be in the Canadian people's interest to consume Canadian natural gas rather than any other oil product.

STANDING COMMITTEES

INQUIRY WHETHER AUTHORIZATION WILL BE GIVEN TO TRAVEL DURING RECESS AND SESSION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Claude Tessier (Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council and government House leader. Following the numerous requests received in the last few months by the House standing committees to travel in order to hear the representations of Canadian organizations, for instance, several western farm organizations would like the Standing Committee on Agriculture to become more involved with drought-related problems, to show its awareness of the problems and to make suggestions regarding the appropriate special measures to be taken in these special circumstances, can the minister tell the House if he would be willing to authorize the committees to sit outside Parliament, and this, not only during the recesses of the House but also during the session?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, each case is studied on its the merits, and it is up to the House as a whole to decide whether a committee may on request travel or not during normal sitting hours. For my part, each case must be studied on its merits. If the circumstances warrant it, I am convinced I will have no objection to a committee travelling even when the House is sitting.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT DECISION ON NATURAL GAS EXPORT TAX

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. At a news conference in Edmonton last week Senator Olson said that an export tax on natural gas would hurt exports via the pre-build portion of the Alaska gas pipeline which has been approved by the federal government. To quote his actual words, he stated that "any tax is disastrous". Furthermore, Senator Olson is reported to have backed up Alberta Premier Lougheed's and B.C. Premier Bennett's joint declaration that any gas export tax would cause alienation and division in western Canada.

As Senator Olson is a member of cabinet, are we to understand that the government has already made a decision that there will be no export tax on natural gas, or is this another example of Senator Olson resorting to political trickery in Alberta in that he is trying to be on both sides of the issue at the same time?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend would not want to mislead the House or misrepresent what Senator Olson said. I have before me a transcript of what Senator Olson actually said and, I suspect, from which the hon. member has attempted to quote. It says:

> I think everybody would make an argument that any tax is disastrous. They don't like it. There is no question about that and I don't think there is such a thing as a popular tax.

So I think my hon. friend has, to say the least, given a very wide interpretation to Senator Olson's statement.

Mr. Yurko: Madam Speaker, it is quite obvious that the government is still considering an export tax on natural gas even though the minister, in replying to a direct question by the hon. member for Saskatoon West on April 17, indicated categorically that this is not part of the government's policy.

Is consideration of an export tax on the agenda for discussion between the Prime Minister and Premier Lougheed as a trade-off for other price concessions by the provinces?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am surprised at the reference the hon. member has attributed to me. I suspect, if he looks at Hansard, he will find that I indicated that the government was considering many alternatives and that we were not closing up any alternatives.

As to the exact subject of discussions on Thursday between the Premier of Alberta and the Prime Minister, I will say only that they will discuss the price of petroleum products generally in Canada, and I am sure that they will want to cover a very wide range of items under this general heading.

NATURAL GAS EXPORT TAX—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER HAS CHANGED POSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I just want to refresh the minister's memory by using his own words without any editorializing. I asked him a simple question as to whether one of his priorities would be to introduce an export tax on natural gas. I asked him whether that is a statement of government policy. The minister responded, "This is not part of government policy". I want to know whether he has changed his mind with respect to that categorical answer he gave to me, or are we observing another flip-flop on the part of the minister?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, there is absolutely no change of mind. What I indicated clearly is that when government policy is decided and when cabinet has made a final decision, it will be announced in the proper way. Until the government has made a final decision on the whole issue of energy pricing, gas and oil pricing in particular, we are examining all kinds of alternatives. I will leave it at that. The policy has not been determined in a final way until the cabinet has made a final decision.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS CONCERNING MODERNIZATION PROGRAM FOR QUEBEC PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Last year, I think, the federal and Quebec governments had apparently agreed on a modernization program for the pulp and paper industry. A few weeks ago, I believe the responsible minister in Quebec stated that by delaying his answer, the federal government hindered at least 15 industries which were very interested in this program from starting major projects. In such circumstances, could the minister inform us today on the progress of the negotiations and the expected starting time of this program in the light of his department's decision?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Madam Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that the federal government is particularly proud of this program, not only because it will contribute to modernizing the industry, but mostly because it was designed in answer to a request by the Quebec government for a $90 million DREE subsidy on the understanding that it would be enough for the implementation of that program. My predecessors have agreed to the Quebec government request and paid out that amount but, of course, the government of Quebec now claims that it is not enough. In the circumstances, I have briefed the cabinet on the situation and they will have very shortly to decide whether or not the funds allotted to that program should be increased.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary. In view of the fact that the federal government had agreed I think, on $109 million funding, which figure went up to $259 million, I understand the government had to reassess their decision, but can the minister now indicate whether he recommended that the Canadian government share be increased on the basis of the same percentages, 60-40 if I am not mistaken? Could the minister further state whether his government will take a decision on the 15 projects, including an important one, a pulp and paper industry in my parish—and this explains my interest—the best papers in the world, Scott papers, that are still waiting? But how many other industries also are waiting? Would the minister be in a position to state at least when, approximately, he could announce the Canadian government contribution to that funding?

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that his submission that projects are waiting is not accurate. A year and a half ago the Quebec government asked us for a certain amount. At that time they assured us in writing they would never ask for increases. And today the hon. member is telling me they are waiting for extra funds. So this is not quite accurate.

As far as the second question is concerned, as to when the federal government will announce a decision on that request for increases, I think this should come within two weeks at most.

LABOUR DISPUTES

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHING INDUSTRY—POSSIBLE ACTION BY MINISTER

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. We are into the second day of a disastrous strike and a lock-out which has virtually shut down the entire fishing industry in Newfoundland and which will bring, as the minister knows, disastrous consequences to the Newfoundland economy and potential tragic consequences to the fishermen.

Given the fact that the minister has—and I use the word advisedly—a form of concurrent jurisdiction here, surely he must realize that he has a role to play. Has the minister been in touch with the Newfoundland government during the past 24 hours? Does he intend to meet with his counterpart in Newfoundland to determine what role the Government of Canada can play in bringing an end to this disastrous situation?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, after the hon. member's questions yesterday, I was informed that the Newfoundland cabinet was holding a special meeting. I felt that I should not intervene at that moment because we would learn from the Newfoundland government, under whose jurisdiction this matter lies, what position they were taking.

I was informed—and I hesitate to give this information because it may not be totally accurate—that the Newfoundland government has requested a cooling-off period of 30 days. Both sides would examine the matter for 24 hours and then express their position. I received this information second-hand and it is subject to correction. Just before I came into the House I attempted to obtain the latest information, but I could not reach the person. To answer quickly, I have not been in touch with the Newfoundland government since yesterday afternoon.

ALBACORE TUNA—APPROACHES MADE BY UNITED STATES NEGOTIATORS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, on the same general area of fisheries, has the minister had time to consider the question raised yesterday about the albacore tuna on the west coast, and has he entered into discussions to find out at least what the Americans are prepared to offer in this particular case?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I had some discussions after questions yesterday with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In fact, I expect that our officials may meet American officials for a preliminary "tour d'horizon" in the next day or two, and from that we will determine the course of action.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is with respect to House business and I suppose that this is as good a time to put it as any. You will recall yesterday that the government called Bill C-44:

An act to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code.

At that time, because of the inclusion within the matter of the Criminal Code, I reserved my position to consider it. You will also recall, Madam Speaker, that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs requested that we do so. We have considered the inclusion of that aspect of the criminal law. I had a discussion with the minister, for which I thank him, in which he indicated that they would look at the operation of that bill after one year to determine how it was being utilized. I think that he and I have some views with respect to the appropriateness of the Criminal Code which we could share privately.

In any event, as a result of that discussion, it would be agreeable, if the government House leader sees fit and considering the statements made to me by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that when we come to the calling of government bills, he call Bill C-44. We are now prepared to allow it to go through all stages. I thank the minister very much for his consideration with respect to this matter.

Mr. Rae: On this point, Madam Speaker, I want to indicate to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton that I am sure there are many credit unions and caisses populaires which are grateful for the fact that the Conservative party has decided to change its mind on this critical issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: We are extremely glad that this has happened. I want to indicate to the government House leader that if he does decide to call this particular bill, there will be no objections from this side. We would like to see it go through all readings in one stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: In view of that understanding, Madam Speaker, I have no objection to the legislation being dealt with today through all stages, without debate or amendment. Hopefully we can come to other understandings within the next few hours.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order in relation to the tabling of documents. I noted that in his response to the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) quoted in part from a statement which he said was a transcript of remarks made by his colleague in the other place. Since the minister quoted from that document, would he agree to tabling that whole document in the House?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would be very glad to table the document as soon as I have a copy. Hansard has asked for the copy which I had, and as soon as it is returned I will be very happy to make it available. I must say that it is exactly that, a transcript of a press conference.

MR. HNATYSHYN—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is present, I will raise my point of order. In the course of the question period I asked him whether or not he still stood by his categorical statement of April 17 which can be found at page 96 of Hansard, to the effect that it is not part of government policy to consider the imposition of an export tax on natural gas.

The reason why I raise this point of order is that in terms of the minister's response he indicated that that is not the position which he now holds. Last night during the late show I asked the same question of the parliamentary secretary who was representing the minister. When I brought the statement of the minister on April 17 and my concern over the subsequent statements made by the minister that the government was considering export taxes on natural gas to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, he told me that I could rely on the word of the minister. Those were his words.

It is not even 24 hours after I received that assurance from the parliamentary secretary, and we now have the minister standing in his place and not only trying to deny that he in fact said that that was not part of his policy, but today completely reversing himself and swallowing himself. The point of order is in the terms of the ability of this House to rely on the word of a minister who purports to speak on behalf of the government on a very important issue, an extremely important issue.

From what the minister has indicated here, he has perhaps misled the House—and I would not suggest for a moment that it was intentional. The minister has made one statement and his parliamentary secretary reaffirmed, as recently as last night, after ten o'clock, that the minister's word could be taken. We now find that his word cannot be taken.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, to say the least, this is a most strange point of order which the hon. member has raised. I hope that you will allow me to put the record straight and very clear in order to show what the opposition is trying to do with statements which were made in this House.

• (1510)

On April 17, several months ago, the hon. member asked me whether it was government policy to establish an export tax. I indicated at that time that this was not the case; at that time it was not government policy. I indicated today that when government policy is firm and final it would be announced. That is the position. There is no hesitation as to where we stand on this particular issue. If my hon. friend goes back to my statement of April 17, I think it should stand quite clearly.

He attributes a statement by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Simmons) in this House last night. I should like to read what the parliamentary secretary said—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Read the last sentence.

Mr. Lalonde: —as reported in Hansard at page 3188, as follows:

When the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources responded to the question raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West last April concerning the undertaking that would be required before gas exports could be approved, the minister stated that the government at that time had decided to postpone any action concerning approval of gas exports until a clearer indication was obtained from the United States government than the previous government, led by the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), had been able to obtain with regard to the United States commitment to the Alaska pipeline project.

It is no surprise that that government got into so much trouble when it was in office. My hon. friend cannot even make the distinction between gas exports generally and a gas export tax. I think the record speaks for itself. My hon. friend should be ashamed of raising the kind of point of order that he has raised.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Read the last sentence.

Mr. Clark: Read it all.

Order Paper Questions

MR. TAYLOR—STATEMENT MADE BY MR. RAE

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, to keep the record straight in regard to statements just made by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), I should like to point out that on May 6, I presented a motion under Standing Order 43 to this House asking for the repeal of the Small Loans Act. On May 14, I questioned the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) and later discussed it with him. He said he would be repealing it at the earliest possible time.

I just thought we should keep the record straight.

OVER-THE-SIDE SALES

Question No. 865—Mr. Gass:

1. Will over-the-side sales be permitted by the government and, if so (a) under what conditions (b) who will receive the benefits of such arrangements (c) will guarantees by the government be part of any such arrangements?

2. Will government officials be involved in the negotiations at public expense and, if so, will the Crown be compensated for its involvement in the negotiations and, if so, by whom?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans):

1. Yes.

(a) East coast

"Over-the-side" sales will be permitted in 1980 where potential catches are surplus to the processing and marketing capability of Canadian industry or where no domestic market exists at acceptable economic return to fishermen. The program was initiated at the request of the fishermen, through their representative organizations. We do not permit as part of our general policy "over-the-side" sales arrangements to prejudice the existing markets of the Canadian industry. Preferential treatment is given to countries with which Canada has marketing or other special interests and foreign partners will normally be restricted to countries which do not use the purchases in direct marketing competition with Canadian products. Foreign vessels involved should be from countries which have a bilateral fisheries agreement with Canada. Sales "over-the-side" on the Atlantic coast in 1979 represented approximately one percent of the total landings, and less than 0.7 per cent of total value.

West coast

"Over-the-side" sales will be permitted in 1980 for Pacific hake as this species cannot be delivered to Canadian fishing plants without freezing-at-sea and as only one Canadian freezer trawler is available on the west coast, other Canadian fishermen must have the opportunity to deliver fish using "over-the-side" sales of fish to foreign vessels.

(b) The benefits will be with the fishermen because they have a market for fish at an acceptable economic return which might not otherwise be the case. The British Columbia fishing industry is also directly involved and benefit from "over-the-side" sales on the west coast.

(c) As an extension of the department's commensurate benefits policy, a direct allocation of fish which have not been traditionally fished offshore by Canadians, may be granted in return for firm commitments to provide freezer trawlers for a number of months and purchase fish at predetermined prices.

2. Yes—east coast. No—west coast. The Crown on the east coast will be largely compensated as the harvesting of the direct allocation, as per 1(c), will generate revenues, as an example, in the maritimes arrangement of approximately $125,000 as the foreign vessels will be required to pay all foreign access and fishing fees in accordance with Canadian regulations.

CENSUS 1981

Question No. 944—Mr. MacKay:

What is the planned advertising budget for the 1981 census and have advertising firms been selected and, if so, what are their names?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: There is no planned advertising budget for the 1981 census. As a consequence, no firms have been selected to handle paid advertising. There are, however, plans for a public relations program which will in part seek free public service advertising. To assist in the program, four public relations firms have been selected. Contracts are in process for the following values:

Saga Communications Limited, St. John's	$ 18,400
Public and Industrial Relations, Toronto	$324,500
Francis, Williams & Johnson Limited, Calgary	$ 38,300
Wordsnorth Communications Services Limited, Winnipeg	$s38,300

PROMOTIONS IN THE DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Question No. 1,039—Miss MacDonald:

1. How many foreign service officers in the Department of External Affairs classified as (a) FS-1 (b) FS-2 (c) FS-3 (d) FS-4 were (i) eligible for promotion (ii) promoted in each year 1970 to 1979?

2. In the department, what was the average number of years of experience among those promoted from (a) FS-1 to FS-2 (b) FS-2 to FS-3 (c) FS-3 to FS-4 for each year 1970 to 1979?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Due to a public service requirement to destroy promotion competition records, the Department of External Affairs is only able to provide information on the number of foreign service officers eligible for promotion and actually promoted for the years 1976 to 1979.

Promotion	Eligible Candidates	Promoted
	1976
FS-1 to FS-2	137	44
FS-2 to FS-3	153	37
FS-3 to FS-4	97	7
FS-4 to FS-5	28	4
	1977
FS-1 to FS-2	148	38
FS-2 to FS-3	148	38
FS-3 to FS-4	86	8
FS-4 to FS-5	Nil	No promotions
	1978
FS-1 to FS-2	137	32
FS-2 to FS-3	133	17
FS-3 to FS-4	87	11
FS-4 to FS-5	28	5
	1979
FS-1 to FS-2	173	17
FS-2 to FS-3	Nil	No promotions
FS-3 to FS-4	Nil	No promotions
FS-4 to FS-5	Nil	No promotions

2. Based on a recently completed human resource study of its foreign service officers, the Department of External Affairs is able to provide information for the years 1974 to 1979 during which the average number of years experience in the government on promotion for career officers is as follows:

	1974	1975	1976
S-1 to FS-2	6 years	5.6 years	5.6 years
S-2 to FS-3	15.4 years	14.6 years	13 years
S-3 to FS-4	25.6 years	23 years	22.8 years
S-4 to FS-5	33 years	29 years	30.6 years
	1977	1978	1979
S-1 to FS-2	4.8 years	5 years	6.3 years
S-2 to FS-3	10 years	12 years	No promotion
S-3 to FS-4	23 years	20 years	No promotion
S-4 to FS-5	No promotion	30.6 years	No promotion

PRIVILEGE

MR. BRADLEY—STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I believe that in the discussion between myself and the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) there is a possibility that she referred to me as being dishonest which, of course, would discredit me in the eyes of my constituents.

Mr. Clark: She laughs at it.

Mr. Bradley: I should like to inform the minister that if she were to read the minutes, she would see that not only was I not dishonest but that I was correct and she was possibly questionable when we were discussing singing "O Canada" prior to those statements.

I should like to inform the minister that I intend to reserve my right to a question of privilege on checking the blues.

SMALL LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance) moved that Bill C-44, to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its appeal and to amend the Criminal Code, be now read the second time and, with consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blaker in the chair.

[English]

Clauses 1 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the bill be read the third time. Now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Bussières moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, In accordance with the agreement I do not propose to debate the motion, but I should like to ask the government House leader a question with respect to this bill. Now that we are passing it in the House of Commons in the hope that it may soon become law, will the government House leader suggest, or do something else, that the senators come back so that they can pass the bill and it can become law? Surely he will agree with me that for the senators to have gone home until October 15 when this important piece of legislation is before us, is hardly doing their duty.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that if the Senate had known we would adopt this bill today they would have stayed. On the other hand, I am sure that they will suffer less, politically, for having left last week than any party on the other side of this House.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I assume from his answer that the government House leader will bring this matter to the attention of the senators. When he does, I would ask him to inform them that he has our complete support and also the support of the man who wished he could be a senator, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I thought my friend and neighbour on Commanche Drive was really a friend. To suggest that I would like to go to that other place is as unfriendly a thing as he could say!

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

The House resumed from Monday, July 21, 1980, consideration of the amended motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard):

That, when the House adjourns on the day that this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until October 15, 1980, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, during the last few weeks and days many matters of tremendous importance have come before the House. One of the matters which has concerned me is the administration of the law by the ministers upon whom it is imposed. Specifically, I should like to deal with the whole area of discretion exercised by a minister, properly or improperly.

Every minister of the Crown has reposed in him by statute, certain discretions and to varying extents. For example, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) has the ability to choose the method of prosecution in income tax cases. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has the discretion to determine whether to bring a matter before the Supreme Court of Canada even after all judicial remedies have been exhausted. But nowhere is the discretion wider than that reposed in the minister of immigration.

The Immigration Act sets forth standards to guide in the admission of people into this country. Those standards are rigid, and they need to be, but they are general. There are a certain number of cases in which it is important, however, that we relax those standards. That is the purpose of the discretion. That is the purpose whereby a minister is able to give a ministerial permit. Accordingly, a wide power of discretion is vested with the minister of immigration so that he can relieve or give relief to worthy people who want to come into this country and who are not technically eligible under the act or the regulations.

There is no member in this House who has not pleaded on behalf of a constituent or some other person for the right of that person to be admitted to Canada even though in the circumstances he is technically disqualified. I say to this House that every minister, especially the minister of immigration, has to have a sense of compassion and a sense of humanity to deal with cases which, on their facts, cry out for admission. However, there are certain cases in which a minister abuses that right and abuses that discretion.

There has never been any necessary correlation between, on the one hand, a high degree of intelligence, and on the other, good judgment. How many people in this House have we seen with a high degree of intelligence but no judgment, or a lack of judgment?

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) in this session has consistently set a pattern which has demonstrated, certainly to me, a lack of capacity to exercise good judgment. When a prime minister looks for a minister, what does he look for? He looks for integrity. He looks for intelligence, and above all he looks for good judgment. As I say, we have some compelling examples which I shall bring before this House which I say to hon. members have rendered ineffective the minister of immigration's functions because of a serious lack of judgment in a number of instances.

It is far too easy to generalize because we all resort to our own sense of prejudices. We have to be specific and draw conclusions from specific instances. No instance is more compelling than the matter which I have drawn to the attention of the House on a couple of occasions, namely, the Calamusa matter. I wish to speak to the facts of this case. I know only certain facts but there are many others which are the duty of the minister of immigration to bring before this House in order that we can have a proper accounting with respect to immigration policy.

Mr. Calamusa is 38 years of age. He has six children, three of whom were born in Italy. He came to this country in 1968. However, before he came to Canada he had a serious and long record of criminal activity in Italy. So that the record is clear with respect to this matter, the RCMP report which is reposed in the Federal Court of Canada shows that in 1961 Mr. Calamusa was convicted of aggravated theft in Cagliara, Italy. For this offence he was sentenced to a term of one year in prison and fined 12,000 lira. He said in his testimony that he only served a period of three months.

In 1962 in another part of Italy he was convicted of receiving stolen goods. He was sentenced to 15 days in jail, and fined 4,000 lira.

He was accused and acquitted of swindling in October, 1963. In 1965 he was again convicted of aggravated theft and jailed for a period of eight months and fined 10,000 lira, with a notation on the record "penalty remitted".

Mr. Calamusa came into this country illegally in 1968. He was expelled from Canada in 1970 because he was not eligible to be here. He came illegally, and as a result of his criminal record he was deported. However, he was not only deported on one occasion, he has now been deported on five different occasions.

In court terms, if a person disobeys an order of the court, we call that contempt of court. Mr. Calamusa has consistently shown an absolute disregard for the administrative orders that we know as deportation orders.

The last time that Mr. Calamusa was deported after a jail term, which I will refer to later, as a result of a violation of the Immigration Act, he came back here within days, using another name. He has consistently shown contempt for the administration of immigration law.

Far more significant than that is that Calamusa was convicted in 1977 of counterfeiting. He was arrested for counterfeiting in 1975. A bench warrant was issued for his arrest in 1976 by reason of his non-attendance in court; again a form of contempt of court. In 1977 he was picked up by the Metropolitan Toronto police. He was taken into custody, and he was represented by able counsel. At that time he pleaded guilty to possession of counterfeit money. He was sentenced also on an immigration matter and deported to Italy, but he returned to Canada within days.

There is no such offence known to law as just possession of counterfeit money. There is an offence of knowing that you are in possession of counterfeit money. For members in this House who have served in the criminal courts as prosecutors or as defence counsel, one knows that that is a very unique offence. We are not talking about a person who has committed a criminal offence while in Canada in circumstances where, for example, he might have smoked marijuana or where he might have shoplifted or where he might have committed any number of offences, such as impaired driving; we are talking about a person who knowingly had in his possession counterfeit money.

I ask the question where did Mr. Calamusa get the counterfeit money? Does the minister know? Has the minister examined the record completely in this case? We are talking about something in terms of the nature of the offence which is unique. But not only that, we have circumstances where Mr. Calamusa has completely exhausted the legal procedure. After he was apprehended the last time, he was again released on bail. A special inquiry was undertaken. It was one of the most exhaustive inquiries which the Hamilton regional people in the department of immigration had conducted. It lasted about 75 hours. The volumes of transcript are literally as long as your arm. The special inquiry officer decided on all of the evidence that Calamusa, who was again ably represented by distinguished counsel, should be deported.

What did Calamusa do after that? He resorted, as was his right, to the Federal Court of Canada, who turned down his appeal. What did he do after that, I ask? He appealed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration to exercise his discretion. At that time the Conservative government was in power and the minister of immigration was Mr. Atkey. I say thank God that in these horrible and rancid set of circumstances the minister decided that this was not a man worthy to be in this country.

Canada is a magnificent country. It has a relatively small population. Last year we took in just over 100,000 people. There was an exodus of approximately 85 so in my opinion we do not have an immigration problem. Canada is a country that holds out its hands. We are a country of immigrants, all of us. This is a great country and that is why we have so many applications to come to this country, but our immigration policy has to be realistic.

As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, there is no member of the House who would rather see a minister err on the side of compassion or humanity than myself. However, these circumstances are so outrageous that they bring the whole system of discretion into a state of disrepute.

● (1530)

There are many other questions I wish to raise with respect to this matter. After the expulsion order came about, we know that Calamusa was residing in Niagara Falls. There are certain compassionate grounds which the minister said he acted upon. One was the fact that Calamusa had three children who were born in Canada. We know that the special inquiry into Mrs. Calamusa indicated that she left Canada in 1972 and, when she returned with her husband, she herself was the subject of a deportation. I submit that played very little part in the decision.

The other matter which the minister brought to the attention of the press and the House when asked to account for his action was that he stated that one of Calamusa's sons had serious health problems. I checked that out. I went to the the major cities of Italy, whether it be Genoa, Venice or Rome, colitis could be treated as effectively there as in the Sick

Children's Hospital. We know now that in Winnipeg the young Calamusa does not resort to the hospital there, or at least on the evidence he wanted to be close to Sick Children's Hospital for medical attention.

Many other factors rear their heads with respect to this matter. One which interests me is the fact that Mr. Calamusa drove, apparently without appointment, to see the Minister of Employment and Immigration one Saturday morning in June. He drove with his possessions and his family to Winnipeg. There was no phone call. He did not decide to come to Ottawa, but to attend in Winnipeg. He put forward a story which I am sure in his mind was a real plight. In these circumstances the minister answered in this House that he had a certain sense of feeling for the man, and he asked a respected man in the Italian community, Mr. Bova, what he should do in this regard. He also undertook, he said, an investigation with respect to this matter. I hope that discretion was exercised. The following procedure was adopted by the minister, or at least his department.

This family was conveyed by government automobile, limousine-type service, 100 kilometres away to Emerson. What notice was given immigration officials in the United States, as he was being deported from one sovereign country to another? What notice was given to United States officials as to whether they would accept him as a deportee? He was taken across the border for a period no more than five minutes where he was processed. He was then deported, and he and his family were given a ministerial permit to come back into Canada. This limousine service continued, and they were brought back to Winnipeg.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked certain germane questions of the minister as to whether this is the standard procedure accorded to every person deported to another country. It offends my sense of intelligence to believe that this is standard procedure. Do you take a person across the border, bring him back and drive him and his family back to where they came from? What representations were made in the meantime that were so compelling?

The minister said that the mayor, or at least the council of Niagara Falls, made certain representations on behalf of this man. I would like to know the nature of those representations. There are certain other people who also made representations, and we will speak more about that later. The point is this. In exercising his discretion the minister established a certain set of criteria. The immigration minister has a certain set of criteria.

The minister exercised his direction even with the flagrant contempt that Calamusa has shown towards the minister's department by returning to Canada, even though Calamusa had committed a serious criminal offence while in Canada illegally. As I mentioned in the House the other day, and the minister did not contradict me, Calamusa is subject to investigation, as are other witnesses. The RCMP are in charge of that investigation which is currently being conducted.

How are we to go back to our constituencies where there are so many worthy cases of people with unblemished records, and tell them that they cannot come into this country? How do we do that?

Let me give by way of contrast a specific case which has occurred during this session. A man by the name of Gunther Seidel, who is now back in Germany, was a constituent of mine. Mr. Seidel did not have an enviable record when in Germany. He had been convicted of assault in 1976 and received a second sentence for carelessly inflicting bodily harm, and was sentenced to ten days in jail. In 1973 he was convicted of theft. He came to Canada with that criminal record. Mr. Seidel was issued permits to work. One time he forgot, he was a day late, and the permit had expired. As a result we had to resort to a ministerial permit.

During the period of time that Mr. Seidel was in Canada, he married a Canadian citizen and they had a child. He was always gainfully employed as a pastry chef. There was no problem there. The only thing was that he was indebted, like many of us here and many other people, to the tune of $18,000. He had never committed a criminal offence while in Canada and had not done anything to disqualify himself. He had married a Canadian citizen and was father of a child born in Canada. When the minister reviewed this matter, he certainly did not show him the compassion that he exhibited in the case of Calamusa.

When we go back to our ridings on Saturday mornings, we see that the bulk of the cases deal with immigration. I cannot speak for all members, but I can probably speak for the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) who has consistently taken a deep interest in the whole notion of immigration. Every member of this House is aware of many tear-jerking instances where people ask us to intercede on their behalf. We go to the minister to plead our case. We plead them personally, by mail, and by walking across the floor during question period. We care; everybody cares. However, if this is the way in which discretion is going to be exercised in future, I am going to send all my constituents to the Winnipeg office of Lloyd Axworthy.

I do not want to be misconstrued in terms of the necessity of exercising proper discretion; it is something that must be reposed. My very serious criticism is this: what type of minister, with such a flagrant set of circumstances, would decide in favour of a person who, in my submission, is not worthy of the compassion which the minister says that he extended? The minister's own department said that for very cogent reasons they would not recommend a ministerial permit. What questions do we ask when we hear about this limousine-type of service to Emerson, over the United States border and back? This is a horrible case in terms of the exercise of discretion.

● (1540)

There have been other cases, for example, the Leary case which though not as serious, is an indication of the same type of faulty judgment on the part of the minister of immigration. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that unfortunately, in terms of his track record since February, the minister of immigration, in the very important area of exercising discretion, has fallen upon bad times, if he ever had good discretion in the first place. There is a nexus between good judgment and discretion. To exercise discretion properly demands good judgment.

Many matters have been raised in the last few weeks pertaining to subjects of great importance. The pipeline has certainly been one of the most pre-eminent topics as it well might be. But I say to this House that we have to keep a keen eye on the type of discretion which is being exercised, not only by the minister of immigration but by those responsible for other departments because the people who have the power to administer our laws are as important as the laws themselves. This is a case where I believe the Minister of Employment and Immigration has done a disservice to the House, a disservice to the Canadian people, and certainly a disservice to himself by such a flagrant misuse of his discretion.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, today's debate on the adjournment motion reminds me of the remarks made by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who, at the outset, was wondering what he was doing in the House on July 21. I suggest several of our colleagues are also wondering what they are doing here. As a matter of fact, ever since our return on Monday, I have had the opportunity to tour various buildings on the Hill, to meet messengers and others servants of the House, and I have come to realize, from what I have seen, that the annual leave of a great many people has been delayed by the stubbornness of the New Democratic Party—need I mention it—to extend this session which has proved most productive in terms of the adopted legislation. I am somewhat puzzled by the attitude of that party which always claims to favour employment and the work force. How can it justify its stand when on the one hand it is supposed to favour workers while at the same time depriving them of a well-deserved vacation?

During this session, Mr. Speaker, we have been dealing with indeed quite a number of bills, and I should like to mention some of them which are considered most significant. Of course all bills are important, but among those passed by the House, I suggest that the bill introduced by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to increase the income supplement for senior citizens is probably the most important, for it has made it possible for them to get assistance on top of their pension.

Unfortunately, however, some provinces, at least one I know about—I do not know what is going on in other Canadian provinces but I know that once again in the province of Quebec, senior citizens will only receive a $15 increase and that the Quebec government will keep part of it, even though the Minister of National Health and Welfare sent a letter to Mr. Lazure explaining that this increase was intended for people in greater need and that the Government of Canada considered that senior citizens needed this $35 increase in the GIS. According to my information, Mr. Speaker, up to now, the situation is still the same, that is they do not actually receive the full amount. This is quite unfortunate for the senior citizens, because the Canadian government had decided that this amount was intended for the people in greater need and it is not being fully paid to them.

An hon. Member: This is PQ piracy!

Mr. Dubois: My colleague here says that it is PQ piracy, Mr. Speaker. That is right on. Each time the Canadian government makes payments to senior citizens, the Quebec government, in this case at least, lays hands on them and deprives the people of part of the money.

During this session, Mr. Speaker, we passed a bill concerning an employment tax credit which was voted by the House, and I was quite surprised to see that only one party was against this bill, namely the NDP. I think that NDP members voted once again against their own interests, because how can they be unaware of the situation? If workers are hired by various employers who benefit from the employment tax credit across Canada, these workers might be members of the CLC, and the wages earned by these workers might accrue to the CLC and indirectly to the NDP, since that party actually gets a very important contribution from the CLC. Therefore they really voted against their interests.

I have seen members of the Progressive Conservative Party during the debate on that legislation make representations, ask for explanations in Committee of the Whole to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and later on, when the question was put after they heard explanations from the minister, they voted with the government in support of employment tax credit program. The only party that voted against was the NPD, and I thought they were voting against themselves.

As far as other bills were concerned, Mr. Speaker, this past year, there has been, of course, the veterans' bill that was sponsored by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). It included substantial amendments granting our veterans very important rights that were lacking under the previous act.

And as stated by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), we have seen in this House since April 14, since the opening of this new parliament, 25 pieces of legislation that were introduced and passed, and I feel that this House can boast to all Canadians that we have been very productive. These were significant measures for the well-being of all Canadians, including, of course, the province of Quebec, all Quebeckers. Clearly then, after that period from April 14 until Friday last, that very productive period, hon. members from the Progressive Conservative Party also were in agreement that we should adjourn.

I listened yesterday to the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), who asked what we were doing here. He was referring to the fact that he wanted a few days' holidays, as a number of other members to go and explain the measures that were enacted in this House to Quebeckers, to Canadians, to people in Saskatchewan, what the purport and the thrust of these measures were, and tell the people in our constituencies what benefits they can expect from these bills. Indeed, several programs were designed for the benefit of the workers. That could be explained. The only party, of course, that would not allow, as I suggested at the outset, the security staff, the pages or the messengers to take a well-deserved holiday, the only party bent on preventing that from occurring is the New Democratic Party who say they require certain guarantees and by the same token question the Congress, decision and President Carter's word.

Mr. Speaker, what conclusion can be drawn from such a situation? Is this normal, given the circumstances, when you look at the situation in which the messengers and other support staff of the House find themselves? I am told there are about 3,000 people working here as members of the House support staff and that probably 1,000 would be deprived of their well-deserved vacation as a result of this systematic blocking or whatever you may call this filibuster by the NDP members.

Is it in fact possible then—and we are praised for that and considered even as being on the workers' side but they are preventing workers from going on vacation. Where is the logic in all that? And they seem happy about it. Mr. Speaker, since April 14, we also had to pass a bill a few days before Canada Day—July 1—on the national anthem "O Canada". I believe it was one of the great moments of the House to see "O Canada" officially adopted as the national anthem of this country, and I remember quite well that on that day, in this House, we sang our national anthem to show that the passing of that bill was really desired by all parties in the House.

Then, Mr. Speaker, in the last days of the session, on July 17 to be more specific, the gas pipeline issue came up followed by the NDP request for guarantees. When we see that the New Democratic Party which is in office in Saskatchewan is against the position taken by the same party here in the House of Commons, we wonder where the logic is in the position taken by the NDP members in the House and we ask what their policy really is. When we refer to the official report in last week's Hansard more specifically that for July 17, and when we think of the economic fall-outs in Canada, the revenues could be used to create new jobs and increase productivity, we find that the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) stated, as reported on page 3043:

> According to estimates—

—the pre-build section!

> —will result in direct capital expenditures in Canada of a total of $1.6 billion, the benefits of which would be felt right across the country in terms of jobs and output.

How can a party which claims to be fighting for the workers of this country be against such a project? That is the question all parties in the House except, of course, the New Democratic Party, are asking, for these members are working against themselves and against the workers they say they are proud to represent. I think perhaps they will have to consult Mr. McDermott, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, to know whether indeed he agrees with them when such investments are made on a national scale. Those people could perhaps help them in the next election campaign so that they can have more money at their disposal. Now they are again voting against them, and thus preventing their financial support from doing its job.

Of course it can be argued also that direct and indirect manpower needs generated by the pre-build and related works could mean 150,000 man-years between 1980 and 1984. What kind of a country can refuse such an investment, such an employment opportunity? I think, Mr. Speaker, it is not possible at this time to refuse that when knowing what guarantees are provided. We read in Hansard, page 3053, what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said in this House when answering a question, and I quote:

> I have heard one of my friends in the NDP saying that one Congress does not bind another Congress. He knows, or he should know, that there are only two parties in the United States, and after the election there will be either a Republican majority or a Democrat majority in the Congress. What is interesting in this case is that we have the unanimous consent of both parties in the U.S. Congress and a commitment to see to it that this line is completed by the end of 1985.

Mr. Speaker, as matters now stand it does not make any difference what happens in the United States after November, whether the Republicans or the Democrats are elected, they have unanimously accepted in Congress that the line should be completed before the end of 1985.

Subsequently, Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States wrote to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) assuring him that such was the situation. Is the New Democratic Party going to challenge the word of the President of the United States? Many newspapers editorializing on this issue conclude that we have in the House of Commons a party that is challenging the unanimous consent of the Democrats and Republicans in Congress and also the word of the President of the United States.

What sort of logic inhabits those people? I think they are trying to drum up some publicity, but it is turning against them, Mr. Speaker, because much of their credibility is being lost over the situation. Naturally, the west is involved. But what will happen to Quebec and Ontario? Many people have expressed concern over the situation. If we take Hansard for July 17, on page 3062 we find the following in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson). The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) replied, and I quote:

I have already indicated that Quebec and Ontario will share among themselves, simply from that first part of the project, $360 million. In addition, when the entire project is put in motion, Quebec and Ontario will benefit from an additional amount of $1.57 billion, for a total for those two provinces of $1.93 billion.

Mr. Speaker, such are the benefits which the provinces, some eastern provinces like Ontario and Quebec, will derive, an industry in Contrecoeur, which is not far from Sorel, I think it is in the riding of Verchères or Richelieu, was even mentioned. An industry in that area would benefit from a substantial contract to build parts used in the operation of the pipeline. Mr. Speaker, the NDP has taken an unexplainable position. It is unexplainable because of contradictions in their data. This is what the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) said on page 3063 of Hansard on July 17, after saying that he is opposed to the project:

I make that very clear, but I want to ask the minister whether there is any possibility that many of our residents who are not serviced by natural gas can have some of that natural gas for their use.

What can we think about such inconsistency? One day they are against the project and next thing you know they want to use it. What are we to make of such disagreement within their party? I suppose they do not all agree with their position. When I hear so many conflicting statements I think time has come for NDP members to rest. Sometimes the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has to restrain those young backbenchers and tell them to keep quiet and stop yelling in the House because obviously they are getting nervous. So much so in fact that they really need a vacation. They have to rest, evaluate their position and seek to reach agreement among themselves.

When we read about it in the newspapers and especially when we go over Hansard on page 3063, I believe they need to hold a caucus not in this House but in their own ridings, and during the recess in order to consider their position and then return to the House to represent adequately the CLC membership from which they get their funds.

Mr. Speaker, when we talk about the type of guarantees—Thank you, Mr. Rae, I see that he is applauding, that he is willing to leave on vacation. Concerning the guarantees they are looking for, last Wednesday during the question period the Leader of the New Democratic Party was asking for guarantees in the House. But when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) made his statement, the member was not here. He is often absent but on Thursday night he was not here to ask questions. He had passed the buck to one of his members. Maybe he had learned that President Carter had sent a letter of guarantees and knew of the unanimous agreement of the Congress and the position of the Republicans and the Democrats. Mr. Speaker, he was not in the House to comment on the situation. Why? Because had he been here he would have had to accept the government position and hear for himself what guarantees had been offered. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to speak about a memo from the Canadian Construction Association dated July 17, 1980, which all members of Parliament have received. This memo says the following:

TO: ALL MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

The 25,000 members of the Canadian Construction Association wholeheartedly support the message that the Pipeline Contractors Association of Canada sent to the Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, to the right hon. Joe Clark, to Mr. Ed Broadbent and to Senator Bud Olson on July 16, 1980, which reads as follows:

I want to put this message on the record.

The Pipeline Contractors Association of Canada believes that pre-building of the southern part of the Alaska highway pipeline should start as soon as possible. This project could stimulate the rather stagnant activities of this sector of the industry and help fight unemployment in Canada. We hope that the Canadian government will authorize quickly the implementation of this project.

(Signed by Gordon R. Hodson, Executive Secretary of PLCAC)

Yours truly,

And it is signed by Mr. R. E. Nuth.

This is a letter sent to us by the Canadian Construction Association, which has its head office here in Ottawa, and which states that 25,000 of its members support the project wholeheartedly. We have here about 30 members of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, who are still in caucus or rather, who are holding a real conclave. They have to rest because they must hold their caucus in the House. This is obvious. They want to hold a meeting to see what they will decide because they know that they are losing the floor, that they will lose their publicity, that things are going badly for them, and they feel that they have to—

An hon. Member: Crocodile tears!

Mr. Dubois: They are certainly going to complain later about the situation. So, Mr. Speaker, I think that in the circumstances I agree with my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon West, that it is time to go back to our ridings, to explain the bills to the people to show them the telegrams and notes we received from the Canadian Construction Association which has 25,000 members and to make the NDP realize that they are working against their own interests, against the members of the House who are entitled to their vacations, who are working. Out of 3,000 people 1,000 will have no vacation, as I said, and they are asking us when the House is going to adjourn. Those people have been working all year with us and certainly want to take the vacation they deserve.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I would urge the New Democratic Party to review seriously their position. They should go back to their ridings to see if they have the support of the people who are going to get some advantages as concerns employment, which would surprise me. Those people should tell them to go back home, to have some rest and to explain their views. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that we should adjourn as soon as possible.

Summer Recess

● (1600)

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I plan during the next few minutes to discuss some items—three, four, or five depending on the time—of concern to the people of Bow River and I believe also to the people of Canada. The first one is conservation of gas and oil. We hear much discussion about gas and oil, but there has been very little discussion about the conservation of gas and oil.

The other day I had the opportunity of asking the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question about the wastage of gas from pipelines. Some say we have in Canada half a million miles of gas and oil pipelines. Certainly we have well over 200,000 or 300,000 miles of them, and the law requires that they be traversed in some manner at least once every three years. Many companies are traversing these by helicopter or airplane, and unless oil or gas has leaked to the point where it has spread over quite a large area, it is not discernible. The lines are not walked except in a very few cases. Consequently it is very difficult, if not impossible, to estimate the large volumes of gas and oil lost in this country through complete waste, and yet we ask our people to cut down on their mileage and to conserve gas and oil in every way possible, and properly so.

I suggest that the government and the corporations of this country set an example for the people by conserving these very valuable resources to the greatest possible extent. The other day I suggested one means which has come into vogue with regard to finding gas leaks, and that is through the use of dogs. Many people thought it was some sort of joke, but a large gas company in Texas telephoned my office about three or four days later wanting to get particulars of this method of detecting gas leaks. The Lone Star Gas Company has more than 3,300 miles of gas lines in Texas and the U.S.A. It is now in touch with the Avery Kennels to see what can be done in this regard. Wastage is no joke to the Lone Star Gas Company in Texas, and I do not think wastage from the lines in this country should be a joke either.

It has already been proved that dogs are able to find leaks with very little training. As a matter of fact, in 1978 dogs found ten leaks in a 30-mile line in the Redwater area of Alberta which had earlier been checked by helicopter. No leaks were found by helicopter, and then the line was checked by electronic flame packs. No leaks were found, yet the dogs found ten. How many thousands of cubic feet of gas are wasted through not detecting these leaks and not detecting them at an early stage?

Dogs have been able to do tremendous things. A brother of the dogs at the Avery Kennels is now doing narcotics work with the U.S. government. It is spotting narcotics and doing a splendid job, I am told. In Texas two similar dogs are involved with dope detection and doing a splendid job. If we can use our dogs to help conserve a few thousand cubic feet of gas, that would be a very valuable service to this country. We can talk about conservation all we like, but if we ignore some of the wastage which is apparent, then we lose all credibility with the rank and file of the people who are asked to deny themselves in order to conserve gas.

I hope the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) are prepared to provide a grant which would allow the continued training and managing of dogs so that we can find out what their capabilities are to more distinct degree. Already there are a number of companies which are interested in this particular phase, but they want to make comparisons with dog detection, electronic flame and helicopter methods of detecting gas. The government has a responsibility to take the lead in providing the means for finding these gas leaks. Trans-Canada PipeLines Limited, Saskatchewan Power Corporation, Alberta Gas TrunkLines, Alberta Government Telephones, B.C. Hydro, West Coast Transmission, Norcin Resources plus some other 19 companies in the United States are interested in using dogs to detect leaks. There is a major need for a comparison study and for charts to guide these companies in the detection of gas leaks. It would require a grant of $70,000 to buy the modern equipment and to acquire the knowledge to work it with trained dogs and handlers.

We could also develop the method using flame ionization equipment as well as with dogs. This system has tremendous possibilities. I ask the government to give some very careful thought to the conserving of gas in this way. I am referring to gas which has already been produced and paid for. It is criminal to see it simply being wasted.

The next point of conservation which I have in mind deals with the carburetors in our cars. There was some brief discussion on this matter. My executive assistant, Joe Williams, and I have carried out some research. We find that in Canada the average mileage for a carburetor is 47.1 miles per gallon. In the U.S.A. the average mileage is 42 miles per gallon, and in Japan it is 62.4 miles per gallon. We all know that the weight of the vehicle, the carburetor and the pollution controls are the factors which determine the mileage, of a carburetor.

There are a number of anomalies which exist in this area. I have seen a much larger car give better mileage than a smaller car with the same pollution controls. It would indicate that in many cases, but not all cases, the carburetor is the answer.

Every once in a while we hear of people who claim to have knowledge of automobile companies buying carburetors from inventors. There are inventors who have claimed that they have invented carburetors which could get 50 miles or 60 miles per gallon. Some years ago while working for the highways department in Alberta, I received a letter from an individual in Montana telling me that he had a carburetor which would get 50 miles to the gallon. I was interested immediately and I wrote back to him. Approximately two weeks later I received an answer, and he informed me that he had sold the invention to one of the large automobile companies in the United States.

If these automobile companies are buying inventions, such as carburetors, which are designed to give better mileage, and not putting them in their cars, then it is criminal conspiracy against the people of our country. There are also people in Canada who have claimed that they have invented carburetors, sold them, and then heard no more. There is some indication that the large automobile companies want to keep these carburetors and eventually bring them on the market some years down the road. That is not good enough. We are facing shortages. We are today trying to conserve natural gas even though we have a surplus. We are trying to conserve gasoline because we do not have a surplus.

When an automobile company has at its disposal, if indeed they have, carburetors which would double the mileage per gallon of their automobiles and which they are not using, then in my view that is criminal conspiracy. The government should carry out a very careful investigation into this whole matter, and determine whether or not these auto giants are holding these carburetors. If they are, then they should be prosecuted to the limit because they are certainly not acting as good corporate citizens should in the interests of the country.

The department is now doing something along these lines. They are now providing for an average and hoping to get 26.4 miles and 28.8 miles per gallon respectively by 1981 and 1982 in all passenger cars. We must also ask ourselves why it is that Japanese cars can get 62.4 miles to the gallon. Weight is one of the factors, but the carburetors, I think, provide a more complete answer.

The whole matter of conservation of gas and fuel, by whatever means, should be led by the government to encourage our people to conserve. I went into the home of a senior citizen a couple of years ago. It was at the time that the government was asking people to conserve energy. It was a chilly night and the house was cold. The father had a heavy wool sweater on, and his wife was wearing a similar garment, but they were chilly. I asked why their house was so cold. As a matter of fact, I kept my overcoat on. The fellow said, "Well, the government wants us to conserve energy, and we think that we should do our part". They were excellent citizens, trying to co-operate with the government by conserving energy.

When we hear of corporate citizens doing the reverse, it only discredits them in the minds of the people. Conservation is an important item and I do not think that it can be over-emphasized. But let us not put all the emphasis on asking our people to conserve energy before we are willing to do everything within our power to make sure we detect the wastage, whether it be in gas lines, oil lines, carburetors, or the use of the fuel itself.

The second item which I would like to discuss is somewhat agricultural in scope. While we were in government our minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), did a tremendous job during the few months he was there. As a matter of fact whenever I talk to farmers throughout western Canada, the name of Mazankowski is symbolic with action, sincerity, and help for the people of the land. Some of the things which the hon. member for Vegreville had done while in that position are still paying dividends. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), to his credit, is following along the lines in many areas which were initiated by Mr. Mazankowski. He is on the same track in many things, but he has slowed down the train.

The people of western Canada want action with regard to the sale of their grain. They are not getting that action as fast as they would like. More hopper cars are coming, and the hon. member for Vegreville appointed probably the top man in Canada with regard to knowledge of the whole transportation system as it affects farming, Dr. Hugh Horner, to do a study on grain transportation.

I had the pleasure of watching Dr. Horner work in the legislature for many years, and I was always amazed at how he kept himself informed on all aspects. He knows agriculture like a book, and he knows the transportation system. If he is given a free hand he will do wonders for the transportation of our grain. The hon. member for Vegreville predicted a 20 per cent increase in sales. Statistics show that there has already been a 17.6 increase this year and that it will likely go to over 20 per cent if things continue to work well.

● (1620)

I think we should pay tribute to people like the hon. member for Vegreville who worked long hours and dedicated themselves to making sure they did something for the people who really needed help.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Our farmers need help. Many of them are living below the poverty line. They are not being paid as much as they should be for their grain. I hope the day will soon come when they receive a cost plus price for the crops they raise. Food is an important item, Mr. Speaker, and we cannot expect them to sell for less than it costs to produce, year in and year out. They should have a cost plus margin of profit in order that they may enjoy the good things of this country. We are making progress, and I hope we can do even better in the months ahead.

Branch lines are another matter of vital concern which the hon. member examined in a realistic way. He said, "Where there are elevators or where there is some sense in keeping a line, then we will keep those lines." He made no bones about it, and the farmers are thankful. If the present Minister of Transport were to accept the program outlined by the hon. member for Vegreville he would be on the right track, but if he starts talking about this line, that line, and the other line for some reason being not relevant to moving grain or coal or whatever has to be moved, he will be doing this country a disservice. Where there are elevators on branch lines that the companies are prepared to keep, elevators to which the farmers have been hauling grain for years, those lines should be kept. They are part of our transportation system and are necessary for getting the grain to market. Every extra mile a farmer has to haul his grain adds to the cost of production and the farmer must, of course, increase the cost of his product if he is to make a reasonable living.

I know of one branch line that was declared valid until the year 2000 under the jurisdiction of the hon. member for Vegreville, but it is now in jeopardy because his recommendation is apparently not being followed. There are active elevators on the line and the farmers want to haul their grain to them. The elevators are surrounded by coulees and it would be difficult for the farmers to go elsewhere, so I would urge the Minister of Transport to look again at that particular branch line abandonment. He would do himself credit if he were to follow the program initiated by his predecessor. If the Liberal party is looking for credibility in the west, this is one way they could get it—by doing what is right, and it is right to keep these lines operative.

Another matter that concerns me is the problem of level crossings, Mr. Speaker. I learned that at a western hearing the Canadian Transport Commission gave the CNR permission to remove a crossing that has been in service for many years. The village council, the elevator companies and the people in the area cannot understand why. The crossing has been there for 30 or 40 or even 50 years, and is still being used. Indeed, it is still required, but the CNR has been given permission to remove it. I have written to the commission asking for the rationale for moving the crossing, as in my view the decision does not make sense. This is the type of thing that brings discredit on the government, when it permits its appointed board to take such actions. Railway crossings should not be removed simply because the company wants them removed. If a crossing is being used it should be kept.

The next item I should like to deal with briefly is the matter of waste. People bring this to my attention at almost every meeting I hold in my constituency. I should like to deal with three or four items—and I do so respectfully, in the hope that it will have some effect on the program followed by the government.

The first item concerns a fishing vessel. This matter was brought to light by the Auditor General, but it is still in limbo. It is a fiasco that the government should take steps to set right. Apparently CIDA decided to carry out additional work on a vessel which it had contracted to build for Argentina in 1973 at a cost of $308,000. But it cost an additional $357,000, making a total cost of $665,000. It was then delivered to Argentina but Argentina would not accept it because it was in terrible condition. In 1976 the government spent another $745,000 on it, bringing the cost up to $1,410,000. It was again presented to Argentina and again Argentina would not accept it as it was not satisfactory. Argentina would not even accept it as a gift, Mr. Speaker. In 1976 CIDA applied to the government and got ministerial approval to spend $3.5 million on another fishing vessel. That second vessel was not acquired but CIDA took $720,000 of the funds allotted for it and spent that money on the first vessel. Now the price of the first vessel was $2.1 million.

An hon. Member: Is this a true story?

Mr. Taylor: This is a true story, Mr. Speaker. Ripley should have been told about it. In 1978 Argentina again refused to accept the vessel—after Canadians had spent $2.1 million on it! It rests in limbo and now the government is apparently considering spending more than $2.1 million so that the vessel can be presented as a gift to a country that apparently needs it. If this is an example of CIDA's activities, then it should be abandoned. It should be held accountable and responsible.

Just today the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) asked the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) what was being done to make sure that the extravagance and waste evident in our buildings are curtailed. The minister answered that they were taking steps to appoint a project manager and to do certain other things to keep control and make government accountable. That is fine, but unless we start dealing with some of these items that are bringing discredit on Canada, something is wrong. The government should find out who is responsible. Do they know what they are doing or is some landlubber in charge of building these vessels? The matter should be investigated and whoever is responsible should be severely disciplined.

That is one example of waste that I am sure no member of the government is proud of, and as a Canadian I am not proud of it. We should correct it and make sure that it does not happen again.

● (1630)

Another example is the Calgary airport. I dealt with this subject briefly in question period today. The Calgary airport was started in 1967. As a matter of fact I was employed by the department of highways at the time and negotiated the price for the right-of-way with the Canadian government for the Calgary airport. The land was acquired by 1969 and the federal cheque came to the Alberta government approximately in 1970 or early in 1971. The actual planning started in 1967. The actual construction started in 1974. In spite of that seven-year time span to plan and prepare the plans and get concurrence by everyone involved, construction started only in 1974 and the airport was completed in 1977 and officially opened.

But here is the sad story. We have an excellent airport in Calgary. I am not complaining about the airport. In fact I commend the government for building the airport and having vision for the future in so far as the vision has gone with respect to that airport. What I am complaining about is the lack of planning to the point where alterations and changes are made after a building is under construction. A layman, whether he has ever had a hammer in his hand or not, knows that if plans are changed after tenders are let it will cost additional money. There will be penalties involved, things to change and additional materials to be bought.

What happened with the Calgary airport? In 1974 the plans were ready and the cost was estimated at $21.3 million. The square footage was 452,530. By the time that airport was completed in 1977, the cost had risen from $21.3 million to $75.7 million, an increase of $54.4 million, which is more than twice the original estimated cost. It is an increase of 255 per cent. The square footage had increased from 452,530 to 720,550, or an increase of another 268,020 square feet.

These are typical examples of what I am trying to point out. I know this situation happened in the past and under a Liberal administration, but that is not the point I want to make. My point is that people's money is being wasted. If we had wanted an airport consisting of 720,000 square feet, why was it not planned that way? Why did we not go to the various airline companies before letting tenders. Why did we not get a final plan, let it out to tender, and then stick to it after consulting with all parties involved?

I raise this point for two reasons. First, every year the government is building new buildings, new airports, etc. I say let us make sure that we do not change plans once we get the contract under way. Let us make sure we do all that work before, and present a final plan to the Treasury Board and then have the money allotted based on that amount.

When I served on the public accounts committee last year I was amazed to hear civil servants, when they were trying to explain this type of thing, say that to alleviate the problem we will have project managers. Project managers have not suddenly been manufactured or invented. In Alberta we had project managers oversee the building of highways in 1950 and in 1960. It was nothing new. The provinces used project managers to oversee construction of public buildings. So I ask why has it taken so long for the federal department to have someone on the job responsible for the construction of buildings? Although I am not a member of the public accounts committee this year, when I was a member last year I asked what happened to the man in charge and there was no answer from the civil servants. Someone suggested he was promoted and got an increase in pay. I do not know whether he did or not, but he should have been fired, and he should have been held responsible and accountable. I do not think it is right to simply pass these costs on to the people and just let it go at that. It is the people's money and we, as members of Parliament, are responsible for that.

I have another example of high level spending. When the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) raised the point a few weeks ago in this House about a representative of Canada getting lavish living accommodation abroad, it amazed me. This accommodation was reported to be costing $98,400 per year. The parliamentary secretary to the minister thought that was quite a joke. She wanted to know whether the hon. member thought a representative of Canada should live in a tumbledown shack. I say we do not want the admiral to live in a tumbledown shack, but we do not want him to be living extravagantly either.

When I became a school teacher and went into a new district there was a depression on and at that time I was on the negotiating committee for the teachers. One of the first things I told the school board was that the negotiating committee should not live above the standard of the people in our region. In other words, we should not have a higher standard of living than that of the boys and girls we were teaching. The school board agreed, and there was no difficulty in reaching an agreement on a fair salary for that time. It was not very much in those days. It was $750 a year, but it was a fair salary in the light of all conditions.

This admiral should not be living high and mighty above everybody else. An expenditure of $98,000 does not make sense. There are hundreds of people in this country who are not living in shacks but are living in homes they have worked on and improved. I am thinking of the renters, but these people are not renting at this high price. I was shocked at the minister for condoning this type of thing. That is the most serious part of the whole affair. Our civil servants should not be living high above the average of other Canadians. Certainly we want them to live well. They hold important jobs and are important people. But let us not go completely out of line by paying almost $100,000 a year for living quarters in addition to all the other expenses. In my view that is another example of waste.

There is one other item about which many people may not agree. Nevertheless, it bothered me when I read the report which came out the other day. It indicated that we are spending something like $5,000 a day on entertainment in the House of Commons on booze. I think that is going very far. I realize a drink might be nice for those who want to have a drink at social events, but $5,000 a day on the average, or $2 million a year on booze, is going too far.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I think we should get some accountability and respectability to the people. Thousands of Canadians like a drink and do not mind their members of Parliament having a drink, but they object very seriously to this kind of public money being spent on something that is completely unnecessary. That is the sad story of waste which I wanted to bring to the attention of this House.

When the parliamentary secretary supported the extravagance, she said that they realized neither a shack nor a lean-to were suitable accommodation for a man who represents the finest forces in the world. Neither the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, nor anyone in this House was suggesting that this admiral should have a lean-to or a shack. We want him to live in good accommodation but not at $100,000 a year at the taxpayers' expense.

The next point I would like to raise is the matter of the two languages. We live in a country founded by two peoples, and the language to each is important. I do not find people in western Canada anti-French, anti-Polish, or anti-Hungarian. Our people come from almost every country of the world. I have a cosmopolitan population in my riding. What people object to are the inequalities which come out of these two languages.

I commend the government for what has happened in Alberta with regard to the two languages. Out of the 17 senior executive positions in Alberta, not one is required to be bilingual. That is proper because it is not necessary. We have a comparatively large number of people who speak French, fine people, but they also speak English. There is no need for both languages in that province. Of all the Canadians I know of French origin, I do not know one who does not handle English as well as I do, and many of them far better. Therefore there is no need to have the positions in Alberta calling for bilingual qualifications. That means that everyone in Alberta, of whatever origin or language, can apply for these positions.

● (1640)

Where the inequality comes is that many senior positions in the federal government are designated as bilingual. That is where many English-speaking people feel they are being discriminated against. They feel there is no opportunity for them to ever get to those positions. I know that some positions must be bilingual, and I agree with that. However, I suggest to the government that if we are going to be equal on both sides, it should review the bilingual positions in the federal government in the capital area with a view to seeing whether it is essential that each of those be filled by someone who speaks and reads French as well as English. If that is the case, it immediately disqualifies hundreds of good Canadians who speak English well, but not French. If it is essential, I do not think they can carry the judgment of our people anywhere. If it is not completely essential, we build up an inequality that helps to build up this wall between the peoples of the two languages.

One other item I wish to discuss is the teaching of language by the Public Service Commission. I have the 1977-78 figures. At that time $40 million was spent on language training, $6 million in the armed forces and $9.8 million, totalling $56 million spent on language training. There were 18,426 people who took lessons in the other language. Twenty per cent of these were English taking lessons in French and 80 per cent were Canadians of French or other origin taking lessons in English; 3,600 and 14,700, 18,000 altogether. I do not know how many of those people completed the course to the point where they could handle the language.

In teaching school I found that if I did not stop every once in a while and review what was going on, I did not know whether I was being successful or not. I suggest that the Commissioner of Languages is an excellent commissioner, a very fair-minded man who is doing a good job for the administration. If the government would give him authority to review this whole matter we could eliminate these small sections of dissatisfaction and inequalities that may be bothering some Canadians of French, English or some other origin.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are giving me the sign that my time is up. Two minutes? Fine. I want to deal with one other item, that of freight. This is of very deep concern throughout western Canada. In Alberta we pay the apex of freight rates, right at the very top. Manitoba and Saskatchewan are not quite as bad, but almost.

The other day a farmer said to me, "When I ship wool east I pay freight on that; when I buy back the finished product, I also pay the freight." At the western economic conference, and I wish I had another half hour to go into that, the Prime Minister promised that something would be done about freight rates. So far nothing has been done. I ask the government and the Minister of Transport to give the matter of freight rates top priority if they want to build up some credibility in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there have been some further consultations among House leaders of the different parties in this House. I am glad to report that we have come to some agreement on a House order that would read as follows, if there is unanimous consent of this House:

That at 5 p.m. this day the member for Vancouver-Kingsway shall propose a motion, without notice, relating to the conditions respecting the proposed summer adjournment of the House;

That during consideration of this motion no member shall speak for more than 20 minutes;

That no later than 12 midnight the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings before the House and shall put forthwith and successively all questions necessary for the disposal of the said motion without further debate or amendment; and

That, if the motion is negatived, government order (government business) No. 17 shall be called and the motion relating thereto shall be put and disposed of immediately without further debate or amendment;

Provided that, for the purposes of this order, on July 22, 1980, there shall be no private members' hour this day and the provisions of Standing Order 6(3) shall be suspended.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it has been an interesting period for all of us. You will recall that when the period began, there was going to be general debate. We were going to sit here until the cows came home. Now the NDP have decided that they want to go home.

It has been an extraordinary day with four House leaders' meetings and three caucus meetings. We have worn out the rug in the office of the President of the Privy Council. I am delighted to consent to this motion if for no other reason than to relieve the NDP of the terrible trauma in which they find themselves, as they so often do, on both sides of the issue at the same time. Now they can be tested, so we consent.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, for the compliment he has extended to me and to my colleagues, for surely he would not have said what he did if he thought we were easily provoked. As he knows, we are an even-tempered group of men and women. We are quite used to these taunts and so on. If it were not for that, he knows that the things he just said could result in someone saying "No" and then the agreement we have reached would be off. Incidentally, I make no charge for that little lecture to my hon. friend.

We have had an interesting day. It is one of the few days I remember where we had four House leaders' meetings in the same day, plus various caucus meetings and so on, but we have arrived at an agreement among us. I think we understand all of the details of it. We are prepared to go along with this proposition.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is here, and if this proposition is agreed to, perhaps we could start right away rather then waiting until five o'clock. My friend will be making the motion and the speeches will continue. It is understood that no one will speak for more than 20 minutes. We will take the break from six to eight for the usual dinner time, but at twelve o'clock midnight the debate will be interrupted for a vote on what we think is a very important motion.

We would rather have had something more significant such as a bill from the government, but at least this compromise gives the House a chance to vote on whether the government should proceed with the building of the so-called pre-build before it gets certain guarantees. As I say, in the eyes of someone not as mild-mannered as I am, that speech might have been provocative. But I refuse to be provoked.

● (1650)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: We have reached an agreement and we are prepared to go along with it. And if anyone accuses me of speaking for a minute or two now in order that my hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway can catch his breath, since he has just come over from the Confederation Building, it is an accusation I am quite prepared to accept. We agree to this proposal. We hope the five-hour debate which is to take place on the motion to be put by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway will be an important debate in this House, and we look forward to seeing how the members of the various parties vote at midnight tonight.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Just one point, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member was obviously asking for consent to begin now, somewhat before five o'clock—that we should call it five o'clock for the purpose of this order. We would, naturally, consent. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has caught his breath now and is ready to proceed.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, as there is unanimous consent, I understand that the order of the House which I read earlier is now in force. I congratulate the opposition parties for having reached an agreement.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I think I should seek consent from the House, by way of formality. The Chair takes it as implicit that the debate on the adjournment motion at ten o'clock this evening will not be called.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In that case, hon. members have heard the proposition put forward by the President of the Privy Council. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed and so ordered.

Northern Gas Pipeline

NORTHERN PIPELINES

SUGGESTION GAS SWAPS BE CONDITION FOR PROCEEDING WITH PRE-BUILD PORTION OF ALASKA GAS PIPELINE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That before the House adjourns for a summer recess, the House calls on the government to declare that it will not proceed with the construction of the pre-build portion of the northern gas pipeline until complete financial guarantees for the whole pipeline have been obtained and an agreement has been reached between the government of Canada and the government of the United States that the Canadian gas exported through the southern portion of the proposed pipeline will be replaced by Alaska gas at an equivalent price.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I really do not need time in which to catch my breath. I have not really lost it, although I know some people across the way would like me to lose it.

I am very pleased to move this motion and, in effect, to continue our discussion. We have already been debating this matter for some time. I am also pleased to say that we in the NDP have decided to end the debate with this motion, to deal with this very important issue and to state our position very clearly. We have stated our position before. We have been stating it all last week. Indeed, I have been raising this issue in this House ever since April 17, namely, that we in the New Democratic Party believe this pre-build should not go ahead unless Canada is guaranteed that later on there will be gas swaps of amounts equal to the gas we sell now at approximately equivalent prices, along with guarantees, ironclad, signed, sealed and delivered, that the whole pipeline will go ahead. That is the position of the New Democratic Party. We don't go this way or that way. It is solid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I have been told that I am a grinch. I have been told I have delayed the summer holidays, that I have hurt members' children and all that. Mr. Speaker, had this party not pushed for a debate and kept Parliament here, the Canadian people would never have been able to understand clearly just what the government is doing. We are prepared to have every one of our members speak on this issue. But there is a better way of doing things. The better and more practical way is to make our point clearly, as we have been doing all along in this debate in the last few days, to make it strongly and, further, to make clear by our votes exactly where we stand. I might say I am proud of my colleagues, proud of what they have done in connection with this matter.

We often heard it said by members of the Liberal party during the election, in pamphlets and so on, that they are Canadian nationalists, that they are concerned about this country. But it is all talk and no action. The issues as I see them today are very clear. I see an hon. member shaking his finger at me as I say this. The main issue is that the Liberal party is gambling with the future of this country in going ahead with this pre-build. Hon. members on the other side obviously do not see this, but I believe the jury in the country is beginning to understand what is really at stake and just what the Liberal government has done.

The government and its supporters are gambling three ways. First of all, they are gambling with our energy security. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), in an eloquent speech last night, showed just how important this is to us as the basis of our future prosperity. But what does the government propose to do? It intends to sell it out to the Americans—to use a phrase favoured by the minister when he was opposition critic—at bargain-basement prices so that people in southern California can continue to use air conditioners.

The second gamble the government is taking is this: it is gambling with Canada's sovereignty.

The third gamble it is taking is with the rights of Parliament. There is a pattern to this, and I believe the country is beginning to see it even though we are only in the first session of the Thirty-second Parliament and it has not lasted very long. They saw the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) sneak in a mini-budget a few months ago. They saw the minister of energy sneak in a gasoline price increase. They saw the government try to sneak in a pre-build of the largest privately financed construction project in history—to sneak it through Parliament in the dying days of the session, to have it rubber-stamped by a senator, to have it considered by the cabinet behind closed doors, followed by a quick order in council and an Alice-in-Wonderland-proceedings before the National Energy Board. They tried to sneak it through Parliament, but we in the NDP will not permit that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: This is a high stakes poker game, as my hon. friend from Regina will appreciate. I said the government was gambling with our energy security. They are proposing to export Canadian gas to the United States—not to transport 3.2 trillion feet of Alaskan gas but to export Canadian gas. We say it should have been kept here for use in this country. It is said that we in the NDP are not positive, that all we do is criticize. No. We say it could be banked. Today my hon. friend from Yorkton-Melville asked a question in French. He asked whether the minister had considered Quebec and Ontario and the federal government getting together and saying, "Instead of shipping that gas out we will bank it in Alberta and save it for Canadian consumers." During the debate last night two backbenchers heckled and criticized us. I found it absolutely incredible, since both of them were from ridings in Quebec that have over 15 per cent unemployment and are not connected up to Canadian natural gas. Because of this decision I predict they will probably never get Canadian gas and will have to rely on expensive power. It is incredible the Liberal party cannot see through that.

● (1700)

Instead of exporting gas to the United States, instead of selling it out, we could have extended the pipeline to the maritimes. I know there are maritimers in the jury I spoke about out in the country. I think they want Canadian gas in the maritimes so that they can get off expensive oil. It makes sense to them, but it may not make sense to the government. The people in my part of the country and in the other parts of the country from where my colleagues come, such as Vancouver Island, rely on expensive imported oil. They would like to have Canadian gas as well. They will not get it soon, if the government does not build a pipeline. The government goes north-south instead of east-west. In our view that is a bad mistake.

It is clear that the government is relying on the energy figures of the National Energy Board. Can we really rely on the figures of the National Energy Board, considering that they are supplied by the oil and gas companies, most of which are not Canadian companies but multinational ones? In September, 1970, the Canadian government, on the advice of the National Energy Board, approved the largest natural gas deal in this country's history. Canada agreed to sell 6.3 trillion cubic feet of gas to the United States, and it got $2 billion over the course of the contract. Today that gas is worth $25.2 billion, so Canada lost approximately $23 billion for that sell-out.

As a matter of fact, the oil and gas companies told the Canadian government in 1973 that we had enough oil to last 80 years and enough natural gas to last over 100 years. Acting on this information, the government allowed the sale of three billion barrels of oil between 1974 and 1978, and another three trillion cubic feet of natural gas. Less than a year later the industry returned to the Board and claimed that in eight years Canada would not be able to meet its own needs and therefore the industry needed massive tax cuts to find more oil. So, they told the Board one thing, then came back and told them something else. At the risk of sounding repetitive, let me say that a country must be rather silly to make a mistake once, but it must be crazy to make the same mistake a second time.

The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) asked the minister various questions. He asked, "Why not gas swaps? If we are to sell this gas now, then require them to give equal amounts later on." The minister said that it was technically impossible. The minister has not stood up and told us why we cannot have gas swaps. In fact no front bench Liberal, no cabinet minister, none of the big boys or the heavy guns, have stood up and told us why we cannot have gas swaps. They have not even taken part in this debate. That is what they think of Parliament and the Canadian public.

We asked for assurances from the United States. When the minister was in opposition he asked for ironclad commitments and assurances. There has been a little debate in the country in the last week about those assurances. I want to say what I think Canadians think about these assurances. They do not think they are worth the paper on which they are written. One can even be objective in that and say that one congress does not bind another congress, that President Carter does not bind the future president. The point is that it is not binding at all; there is no deal there at all.

We in this party tried to raise in the context of the debate last week and this week that there is a pattern of assurances in our dealings with the United States. Some of my colleagues have raised this matter. The United States is our great neighbour and friend, but in the last few years there has been a pattern. The question is: can we really take these assurances as being there? We can look at what happened to the assurances respecting fisheries, the auto pact, acid rain and the action on acid rain. The point is that we are not getting anywhere. We had a trump card, we had an ace in our poker hand. What did we do? We went down there and threw it away by allowing the pre-build. We could have postponed the pre-build for at least one year, said that we wanted swaps and adequate assurances, and then we could have dealt with the new administration, whichever it is, in the new Congress. I submit we could have had that, but the government gambled that the whole line would be built. I do not think it is a gamble worth taking. It is a reckless gamble.

The government gambled with Parliament. Section 20(4) is not very complicated. Perhaps I sound like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or some Philadelphia lawyer in saying this, but really that section is quite simple. Parliament authorized the Northern Pipeline Act. It talked about a pipeline bringing gas from Alaska to the lower forty-eight. The government did not come back to Parliament, but it brought in an order in council which did not require a vote or any debate; it just made an announcement. We were the ones who forced the debate. The government was not going to have a debate. By order in council, rubber stamped by the National Energy Board, the government brought in a complete change. It talked about a smaller pipeline exporting Canadian gas to American markets. Last year or the year before, the present Minister of Finance said in the House of Commons that they would consult the House in every part of this act. Numerous ministers, including the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), before the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines, said that it was the total pipeline, the whole pipeline.

One could cite chapter and verse, not to mention the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), when he was writing committee reports for the government, said that they should not bring in legislation like this, that they should not do things like this, and that it was wrong for Parliament. I am a new and young member of Parliament, as are many of my colleagues, and do not have a great deal of parliamentary experience.

Except for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and a few other members, I do not really see any great concern in the House any more for the rights of Parliament. Maybe that is something in the past about which no one really cares. I care about it because Parliament is the last bastion of freedom. This is it, this is democracy, this is the bottom line. If we go around this, there is nowhere else to go. I see a member putting his head down. I do not think it is funny. I think it is important and I think the jury out there in the country thinks it is important too. I would bet on that.

Various telegrams have been sent. During the debate last night the minister and other members pulled out some of these telegrams. I looked at the telegrams as well, the ones orchestrated by Senator Olson. I say shame on the Liberal party that it has to have a man who does not represent anyone, basically, because he cannot get elected, conduct this whole deal.

Mr. MacDonald: He was elected.

Mr. Waddell: I am not saying anything against his personality or the man himself, but he does not represent anyone. He and Mitchell Sharp, the other sore in the continentalist wing of the Liberal party, negotiated this deal.

● (1710)

An hon. Member: Liberal fossils.

Mr. Waddell: They negotiated this deal with the Americans, and it is a bad deal. We get telegrams, but the telegrams are not from real people; they are from the Premier of Alberta and a few construction associations. There has been nothing from the province of British Columbia.

We have heard nothing from the 16 Conservative members from British Columbia. Where do they stand on this pre-build? They are hiding. We hear nothing from B.C. We have heard nothing from the other western provinces. We have heard only from Alberta, some construction associations and a few unions, but not many. I have telegrams too. I have a telegram from the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Dennis McDermott, who says that he stands by this. He sees no need in going into the pre-build without those assurances and without swaps. We have telegrams from the auto workers, 140,000 strong, saying "stand up" and "we encourage you to stand up and debate this and not to allow this."

There are telegrams from business associations, and I even received calls from small gas producers, believe it or not, who said that they would not benefit from this but that the big boys would. They said pro rationing should be brought in because they will not benefit from this.

I have a telegram from the city council of Toronto. By a vote of 15 to five the Toronto city council agreed that a cable should be sent to the Prime Minister requesting a full parliamentary debate on the pipeline pre-build at the earliest opportunity and that cables be sent to the leaders of the other two federal parties advising them of this action. The city council of Toronto passed that resolution by a vote of 15 to five because it is concerned. Why is it concerned? It is concerned because the people of Toronto know that as a result of this decision to go ahead and sell out this gas they will have to pay more for gas in the future. It is as simple as that, and that is why they are concerned.

I have also received other telegrams, and I want to read just one because I think it is important. As a young member in Ottawa I have found that we get lots of material from lobby groups. We are approached by lobby groups which are well heeled and well represented. We very seldom hear from little people, consumers or ordinary people. It is very hard for them to have that kind of organized representation in Ottawa. Of course that is the role of a member of Parliament, but the following is a telegram I received from Oakville:

I and in particular my young children appreciate your gallant effort in regard to the Liberal and Conservative natural gas resource sell-out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: Hon. members can laugh if they think this is funny.

We feel it is a disgrace. Be assured of our continued full support for your stand and from now on for the NDP.

There are many points to be made in the debate. I listened to hon. members opposite speak last night with some attention and care.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order please. I apologize to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). I miscalculated the time in my own mind, and the 20 minutes accorded to him under the proposal put by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) have now expired. I presume hon. members would want the Chair to hold firmly to the 20-minute rule so that as many members as possible can enter the debate this evening. Since the fault was that of the Chair, I will accord one minute—not more—to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway to wrap up.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I think the points have been made and will be made further in the debate. As I said, I am proud and pleased that we in this corner have forced this debate, and we are prepared to vote.

Canada is a northern country, and energy is the key to our survival. The matter goes more than just to air conditioners or whatever. It is a matter of our survival as a northern country, and we do not hesitate a moment to stand up, to talk about this gamble and say that the Canadian government should not gamble with the future of this country.

We believe—and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would quote from the Bible—that we must dream dreams and see visions about this country, and our vision is that of an energy-secure country and not a country the future of which the government gambles. That is why we propose this motion today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the introduction of the motion by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). I know his area well because I am from Vancouver, as the hon. member is, and I am pleased to say that there was at least one sentence in his introduction with which I could agree, and that was the commitment of his party—as indeed of the government—to energy self-sufficiency. I think perhaps the hon. member had in mind oil self-sufficiency, since we have already achieved energy self-sufficiency in a broad sense, but we are committed to achieving oil self-sufficiency as well.

In other respects, I had difficulty following the statement of the hon. member in introducing his motion. He seemed to be eager to include in his remarks every possible allegation and distortion about the government's energy policy, and in particular about the reasons for the decision to proceed with the pre-build of the pipeline. I fear that it would take me more than the 20 minutes available to respond to his curious potpourri of allegations and distortions. However, let me, for a moment at least, say a word about one or two.

The hon. member alleged that the government is gambling with our sovereignty. He did not in any way substantiate that statement. In one sentence he said that the government is gambling with Canada's sovereignty. What does he mean? He made a statement and left it. There is no evidence whatever in the decision to proceed with the pre-build of the pipeline of any gambling with sovereignty or any sell-out. There is no evidence of that, and the hon. member could not substantiate his statement.

Speaking of allegedly devious acts by the government, he referred to a "sneak-in" of the Syncrude levy. If the hon. member had taken the time to look at the legislation governing the Syncrude levy, he would have seen that there is a formula which is followed and which relates the price paid to the Syncrude producers to world price levels. The other night when the minister introduced his ways and means motion in that regard, the government was simply continuing a practice which the House had accepted and which has been in place for several years.

The hon. member spoke of the need for more use of natural gas in Canada. That is a program which the government has been active in pursuing. The program includes the construction of a natural gas pipeline from Montreal to Quebec City which the minister recently announced. There is also a very real interest on the part of the government in overcoming the environmental problems which have, I trust, only temporarily delayed the construction of the pipeline into the maritimes.

The hon. member opposite noted his misgivings about National Energy Board estimates. I find that to be a curious statement on his part because, when NEB estimates substantiate his point of view, he is only too ready to use them. However, on this occasion we find that they are supposedly unsubstantiated and unreliable.

● (1720)

Finally, in his introduction the hon. member opposite referred to a series of letters or telegrams which the government and opposition parties have received on the subject of the pre-build, a question to which I would like to return in a few minutes. However, I do find it odd that we are not supposed to accept the Premier of Alberta as a "real person", that we are not to accept the views of the industry and of trade unions, that we are not to accept the views of university people or any range of Canadians as being in support of this decision, but rather that we are only to accept those who the hon. member says have been in contact with him.

The fact is that the government has decided to proceed with the southern section of the whole Alaska highway natural gas pipeline. The decision was taken to make the whole integrated pipeline possible, and it was taken to spread the construction costs and the demands which the construction will make on the skilled manpower and other resources of this country over a longer period, a period when there will not be so much competition with other massive energy projects which lie immediately ahead for Canada.

Hon. members noted of course that yesterday the National Energy Board, subsequent to the government's decision, decided that the Foothills company has met the financing requirements under the Northern Pipeline Act. The decision to move ahead with the pre-build of the pipeline was not an easy decision. We have recognized, particularly the ministers involved most directly in the decision, that there are risks, but weighed against the substantial economic benefits which are inherent in the decision to proceed with the construction of the southern section of the total pipeline, those risks seem to us well worth the taking.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred to the decision as a "judgment call". Indeed it is a judgment call in the sense that a wide variety of benefits and factors had to be weighed. But to govern is to decide, and the government has decided. I, therefore, find it particularly odd that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway would accuse the government of being all talk and no action. The fact is that the present government has taken action and made its decision, but apparently not to the liking of the hon. member opposite.

I think, through the discussions of the past week, that the benefits to Canadians of the pre-build of the southern portion of the pipeline have become evident. It is known, for example, that Canada will benefit through the construction of this pipeline section which will cost over $600 million. Perhaps more important, 90 per cent of that expenditure will be made in Canada. Indeed, 100 per cent of the expenditure on the pipe as such will be made here at home. Approximately 2,100 man-years of employment will be provided directly through the construction of the pre-build section. Moreover, it has been estimated that 150,000 man-years will be provided directly and indirectly over the period from 1980 to 1984 from the capital expenditures of $1.6 billion required to pre-build the pipeline and instal the necessary production and gathering equipment to support that section of the pipeline.

As I say, it must be evident by now to all Canadians that the benefits of the decision which the government has made and the subsequent conclusion of the National Energy Board to authorize proceeding with the pipeline will bring benefits to all Canadians. The geographic impact has been estimated. The benefits to British Columbia, for example, will be of the magnitude of $70 million; Alberta, $650 million; Saskatchewan and Manitoba together, $360 million; and Ontario and Quebec another $360 million.

Mr. Benjamin: That is what Foothills says.

Mr. MacLaren: However, as the spokesman for the party opposite, noted, many of the benefits flow toward those Canadian-owned gas companies, many of which are smaller in size, which can benefit enormously from this opportunity to expand their operations, to promote their further exploration of gas and to help provide yet further gas supplies to Canadians in the future. In terms of these benefits it must be evident to the House and to Canadians everywhere, as it is to the minister of energy of Alberta or the minister of energy of Saskatchewan, that the impact on our economy and on the future of Canada will be great.

The minister of energy of Alberta and the minister of energy of Saskatchewan have joined in the general support which has manifested itself across Canada in the last days and in the previous weeks for the pipeline decision. The member opposite referred to telegrams and letters which he and his colleagues have received, evidently in opposition to the decision. I would gladly offer the hon. member opposite, if he is interested, the opportunity to see the very large number of telegrams and letters from Canadians everywhere which we on this side of the House have received in support of the decision.

Of course, we might well recognize that the industry, with its participation and knowledge of the opportunities involved, would support the project, but I would willingly offer the hon. member opposite the opportunity to look at the correspondence which has been received from the United Steel Workers, the International Union of Operating Engineers or the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, if he feels that this correspondence which we have received is one-sided or distorted in nature. In fact there has been a broad range of support across the country which has emanated from all sectors of our economy and our society.

There have been some misgivings expressed during the course of this discussion by our colleagues in the New Democratic Party about the forecasts of the National Energy Board, apparently so as to substantiate their fears that in taking this decision the Canadian government will somehow deny future generations adequate access to our own natural gas. The facts of course are somewhat different from such allegation. We have in Canada today a situation where almost twice as much new gas is being discovered annually than is being consumed and exported. We have more natural gas today than we had in the 1970s. For example, from 1977 till today the volume of Canadian gas surplus has risen from an estimated 800 billion cubic feet to a current estimate of 4.5 trillion cubic feet.

Mr. Benjamin: It is not a surplus.

Mr. MacLaren: Yesterday my colleague, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), set forth at some length the three tests which the National Energy Board applies before exports are approved. He drew the attention of the House to the current deliverability test, the current reserve test and the future deliverability test.

● (1730)

It is not my intention to provide details of those three tests to the House again as the details are in Hansard. They do, however, test the conclusion of the National Energy Board that ample reserves are available to provide the export opportunity of which Canada is now availing itself.

There has also been some discussion about the guarantees which our neighbours to the south have provided. In the minds of our friends in the New Democratic Party those guarantees are apparently inadequate. I would draw the attention of the House, as other members have, to the unanimous resolutions of the United States Senate and of the United States House of Representatives which, together, have formed a commitment to the completion of the total pipeline. This embraces both political parties in the United States and should assure any who fear, in the months before a U.S. election, that a change of the U.S. presidency might result in some withdrawal from the assurances provided. In fact, the Republican members of the Senate and the Congress, just as much as the Democrats, were in total support of the commitments and assurances provided in the unanimous resolutions. As the House is aware, those two resolutions have been followed by a letter from the President of the United States to the effect that the United States is ready to take "appropriate additional steps necessary for completion" of the pipeline. In the letter the President wrote as follows:

I recognize the reasonable concern of Canadian project sponsors that they be assured recovery of their investment in a timely manner if, once project construction is commenced, they proceed in good faith with completion of the Canadian portions of the project and the Alaskan segment is delayed.

I would submit to you that those resolutions and the commitment from the President of the United States provide the assurance on which a reasonable judgment can be based and a reasonable decision can be made to proceed now with the construction of the pre-build.

In addition to those assurances received from the United States executive and the United States legislature, we have the commitment of the companies participating in the pipeline project to proceed now with the final design and engineering studies necessary for the early construction of the pipeline.

We also have the assurances that are implied in the necessity of the United States to have access to its Alaskan gas. That is perhaps one of the greatest assurances that any country could seek. The United States itself is fully aware of its need for access to its own natural gas in the Alaska region. It is for those reasons that we share the view of the minister of energy of Alberta that we have received assurances that the United States will not back out of commitments to build the remainder of the pipeline.

It is also for that reason that, since I see my time has expired, I will conclude by noting that the government has decided, in essence, that there is a minimal risk in proceeding with the pipeline. We are assured that there is a very real commitment by all parties to proceed with the construction of the entire pipeline, and in the meantime, Canadians will receive substantial and extensive benefits from the pre-build portion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this matter—and I might say that there are innumerable other issues with which one could be preoccupied on this adjournment motion—I should like to use the short time available to me to talk about the oil pricing negotiations, or lack of them, and the potential for doom that we face if those negotiations fail. I should like to talk about the development of other oil reserves in Canada which, it appears to me, are postponed for at least a year because of the failure of this government to reach conclusions. I should like to talk about conservation and about alternate sources, only within the energy field.

Indeed, in terms of the economy, in terms of our environment, in terms of our regional disparities, in terms of transportation and a variety of other issues, I could easily use up the 20 minutes allocated under the House order.

I wish to address myself, however, to the motion presented by the New Democratic Party. Since 1977, we in this party, to use the words of my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), have been supportive of a full, whole, complete northern pipeline. We have had that view since 1977. Then, in 1977-78, particularly during the House debate and committee hearings, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) prophetically pointed out that we could be in exactly the position in which we find ourselves today. It was his view at that time—and I do not believe events have changed it—that the pre-build facilities would be helpful, if not essential, to the financing of the northern section.

There will be those who agree and those who disagree with arguments of substance and integrity that may say the pre-build may hinder or prevent the ultimate construction of the northern section. Nevertheless, in 1977 the hon. member for Yukon pointed out to the Liberal government of the day, both in committee and in the House, that we might be faced with a situation where the pre-build would either facilitate or be essential to the eventual construction of the entire line. It should come as no surprise to hon. members opposite, therefore, to find themselves in this pre-build situation today.

On that basis, in approving of the whole, complete line in 1978, we tacitly said that we were in favour of the pre-build as part of that complete line. On December 6 the then minister of energy, mines and resources in our government, announced in this House approval of the National Energy Board recommendation to export a quantity of natural gas to the United States.

An hon. Member: Treason.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I did not interrupt the pious mewings or grandstanding of the NDP for the last whole week because I did not think it was warranted. I do not need to be corrected or interrupted by the grandstanders to my left either.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: We made a hard decision on December 6. To use the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), it may have been a "judgment call", and we were prepared to stake our government on that judgment call. So do not expect me to forget the events of that day when the hypocrite of the House took us to task on the basis of that difficult decision. He called it the greatest sell-out in Canadian history.

Before I come to that, Mr. Speaker, may I take a moment to dispel something? I have a newspaper clipping here which refers to Senator Olson. Its gives me precious little comfort to realize that Senator Olson is in charge of the pipeline. Quite frankly, that makes me more nervous than the NDP does. I remember Senator Olson. He crossed the floor and he became the minister of agriculture, the most forgettable minister we have ever had in that portfolio, I might say. I understand the senator's need for some publicity because he has languished over there without a headline for years. However, Senator Olson said this:

Progressive Conservative leader Joe Clark and his political associates did their best to prevent the pre-build from getting final approval.

"Their opposition in the House of Commons almost killed it," he charged.

● (1740)

That statement is blatantly untrue. I will forgive Senator Olson if all he needs is just a headline. Heaven only knows he needs one. I do not know why the Liberals need him in the cabinet, but I understand the regional problems over there. However, I will forgive him if he is just trying to grab a western headline or wherever he might get one. But if he is serious, I ask my good friends opposite: is this the type of minister you want in charge of an enormous project such as the pipeline? The sooner you get rid of him in terms of his responsibility, the better it is going to be, not in the Liberal's partisan sense—although I think that would help too—but in terms of the country, the pipeline, all our interests and the interests of all Canadians. If he has his headline now, I ask you, would you either replace him or tell him not to give any more press conferences because he does not know what he is talking about?

Let us now come back to December 6 and to what the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) said, as reported at page 2101 of Hansard, and I can only interpret his words as establishing certain conditions under which he would permit the greatest sell-out in Canadian history. The first condition was stated as follows:

—we are faced with the situation where eastern Canada, the Atlantic provinces,—

He says eastern Canada, the Atlantic provinces, which appears to me to emphasize it. He continued by saying:

—need more natural gas and need a gas pipeline to take gas to the homes and to the industries there.

That was a condition precedent, but he did not leave it at that because he went on to say:

The third point is with regard to revenues arising out of gas exports to the United States. They should be used to ensure the initiation and completion of the Quebec and maritime gas pipeline so that eastern Canada would be fully served in terms of gas service and so that people in the maritimes and eastern Quebec would be assured of getting natural gas at a reasonable price.

First, he established a condition precedent that there had to be a pipeline not just to Quebec, but through to Atlantic Canada. Second, revenues arising out of gas exports to the United States were to be used to pay for it.

We have no commitment of any kind despite election promises and despite this kind of rhetoric in the House of Commons. We have no commitment, let alone an ironclad guarantee, that that pipeline will ever get anywhere near Atlantic Canada. That is deplorable and unacceptable to us as a party. It is completely unacceptable.

In terms of financing the pipeline, I do not know where the minister was expecting to get the revenues. He did not say. Would it be from a gas export tax on exports to the United States? Would he get them from the producers? I do not know where the minister is going to get the money. But his commitment to this House on behalf of his party as energy critic of the day was that not only would they build the pipeline, but they would finance it out of revenues coming from the export of gas to the United States. That was the commitment. Neither last week nor this week has there been one peep from the minister in terms of those commitments, not one.

Talking about swallowing words, the minister swallowed a whole pipeline at the expense of our fellow Canadians in eastern Canada. Let nobody be under any misapprehension about that. Then the minister talked about selling 3.7 trillion cubic feet of gas to the United States as a clear indication that the former government had its priorities all wrong. He said:

—our bias as Canadians should be against any gas exports outside Canada.

The only thing that is different is that it is not 3.7 trillion cubic feet, it is more. He is approving more now.

The next point is with regard to swaps. There is no word in this statement about swaps and nothing about the eastern Canadian situation. The present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, at page 2101 of Hansard:

—there must be an arrangement for swaps in this agreement with the United States so that down the line, if Canada were to need natural gas, we would be in a position to obtain natural gas from the Alaska gas pipeline which we might need in exchange for the gas we are now providing to the Americans.

What do we hear about swaps? This was not two or three years ago, this was not even back in 1977 when we made our commitment to the whole line and the pre-build. This was in December, precisely December 6. This is not something which happened years ago since which time events have changed. What has changed between December 6 and now with respect to swaps? Absolutely nothing has changed except that the minister, after having swallowed and digested a pipeline to Atlantic Canada, has now swallowed swaps.

Finally, of course, we come to the notorious statement "an ironclad commitment, signed, sealed and delivered." So much for the hypocrisy of that minister. It is simply inconceivable that events have changed sufficiently to cause such a turnabout.

We are in the position we are because, if it is in fact a judgment call, as the Prime Minister said, nobody trusts this minister's judgment. How could anyone trust him after that December 6 statement and comparing it to what has happened in the last few days? The construction is being justified on the basis of jobs. I am supportive of the job-creation potential in the pre-build section of the pipeline. I am very sensitive to that. But if that is such a big deal, why do we not have a go-ahead on the Cold Lake and on the oil sands project, which are enormous projects in terms of jobs, not just in Alberta and the west, but in my riding and the riding of my Liberal friend opposite, and all over central Canada? Time and time again the Prime Minister has said: "because Alberta will not agree". No province and no company will ever agree on those projects without an oil pricing agreement. They would be crazy to do so. The only people who would ever agree to someting like that is the New Democratic Party. That party would think that was super. But one cannot have those projects go ahead without an oil pricing agreement. It is not Alberta's fault. It is the fault of two governments. They have to agree. Now we have lost a whole year, and I believe it means 50,000 man-years in terms of direct employment.

Let me come to the motion. The motion is to provide that the building of the pre-build will not commence until complete financial guarantees to the whole pipeline have been obtained. From whom, I ask. I say to hon. members, do you expect a performance bond from the constructors of this? I say, do you seriously expect in the NDP that the companies responsible for the construction of the pipeline can put up a performance bond? No company can put up a performance bond. It is 100 per cent of the value of the project. Nobody can do that.

An hon. Member: How about the ironclad guarantees?

Mr. Jarvis: I did not talk about ironclad guarantees, nor did our minister of the day, because it is absolutely impossible. If the hon. members there demand complete ironclad guarantees, I say to them that they are against the pipeline. It is as simple as that. If you are for complete ironclad guarantees from industry, you are against the pipeline, and I say to you that you have to make up your minds.

I think it goes more than being just facetious to say that you in the NDP want a pipeline but you do not want to put any gas in it. There is more truth than fiction in that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: Let me go over the second point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: I have listened to you for a whole week and now you can listen to me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: Then you go on to say "an agreement" because you did not say anything. They did not say anything, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. de Corneille): Order, please. Would you kindly address the Chair?

Mr. Jarvis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am glad to see you in the chair.

Their motion did not say anything about the complete financial guarantee from the United States government. They left that out. But the motion went on to say:

—an agreement has been reached between the government of Canada and the government of the United States that Canadian gas exported through the southern portion of the proposed pipeline will be replaced by Alaska gas at an equivalent price.

● (1750)

That is a swap, replacing gas, whether we need it or not, and at an inflated price. Whether we need it or not, we are obliged to buy as much gas from the Americans as we export to them at an equivalent price, which I presume is today's constant dollar. Therefore, it will be at a price plus the inflation rate. I presume that is what they are saying.

Why would we ever commit ourselves to that? I can see a first right of refusal, or a call on it, but why would we want to buy gas that we may not need, and commit ourselves to buying it at an inflated dollar down the line? I do not understand that at all. If the NDP were serious about swaps, why would they not put it that Canada would have first call on so many trillion feet, or whatever? I could understand that, but this motion just does not make any sense. It ignores completely the fact that we may not need it.

The swaps position may be accurate. I do not know. My friends made a great point of saying the historic mistakes of the National Energy Board should give us cause for concern. Maybe they should, but it is by far the best information we have according to any expert I have ever talked to. They are confident of it.

I cannot imagine even this Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources committing himself to the off oil policy, and I have some real doubts about that one, unless he knew full well the gas was there so that he could accomplish this ten-year figure. I find it hard to believe that this minister would stick his neck out, or perhaps stick his nose out, would be more accurate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: I have been very calm in this debate so far. Let me have a little bit of luxury because I feel rather strongly about this. No minister in his right mind would stick his neck out that far unless he knew full well he had the surplus gas to implement his off oil policy, a reduction in ten years so that in ten years oil would form 10 per cent of the total energy consumption of residential, commercial and industrial. I think he has his gas.

No matter if we have gas coming out our ears—and I hope we do and I believe we may—under this NDP motion we would have to buy gas from the United States, an equivalent amount that we exported to them. That makes no sense. If they did something intelligent here, they might have some sympathy but, frankly, I cannot support this. This swap idea is absolutely ridiculous. In terms of financial guarantees, if the NDP had at least not been so cute as to try and exclude any reference to the U.S. government, because they are looking to industry for these guarantees, they would know that the only way they could get them is with a performance bond. No industry in the world can put up that performance bond, unhappily. I wish they could, but they cannot. We have to oppose this motion of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the House would be agreeable to calling it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests that the House call it six o'clock. If the House is so agreeable, at eight o'clock this evening the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, followed by the hon. member for Châteauguay. Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the debate was interrupted at six o'clock the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had the floor.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are only three members of this Parliament who were members of the House of Commons in 1956. They include the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and myself. Since the other two are not here at this moment I have the distinction of being the only one present this evening who was here for the historic pipeline debate in 1956. However, I am quite confident that most, if not all, members of this House know about that debate; some of them listened to it and watched it and read it from outside, some of the younger ones have no doubt read about it in the history books. It was dramatic and a traumatic occasion for the House of Commons. If you can imagine the House of Commons at two or three o'clock in the morning with persons standing out in the halls waiting to get into the galleries, that tells you how dramatic and how exciting that session was some 24 years ago. I thought I was already a veteran member of Parliament having been here for 14 years, and that was 24 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, why did the House of Commons have galleries which were full until three or four o'clock in the morning on four different occasions? Why did that debate drag out as it did? Why was there so much concern about it in the country? Why did it play a part in the defeat of the government of that day at the next election? The answer is that the government of that day chose to make a deal with persons whom the late John Diefenbaker called "Texas Buccaneers". In other words, the government of that day chose to lend our money to foreign persons so that they could make huge profits out of building a gas pipeline in our country. That was one side of the story.

The other side of the story was that the government of that day rode roughshod over the rights of Parliament. I doubt if ever in the history of the Canadian House of Commons the rules of this place were so abused and so misused as they were in 1956. That debate lasted about two months and I suggest that those who are complaining that this debate has been going on for three or four days have the wrong perspective, especially when I make the assertion, sir, that what the present government is doing today is worse than what was done in 1956 on two counts. On the one hand the Liberal government of 1956 was merely lending $80 million—in those days that was a lot of money—to non-Canadians so that they could make profit out of Canadians. But this time the government is selling out for a fast buck natural resources which should be the preserve of our children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: The sell-out today is far worse than it was in 1956. That has been clearly documented by my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) and others who have taken part in this debate. I emphasize that that is our concern, that this is the reason we have been so unwilling to let this Parliament close for the summer recess without a vote being taken on the central elements of this proposition.

I said that the Liberal government of 1956 produced that dramatic and traumatic situation in two ways, one, by the sell-out and the other, by what it did to the rules of Parliament. At this time we have a government that has gone further on the second count. It is abusing and violating the law of the land. It may be said that I am making an assertion and that others on the other side are just as capable of making the opposite assertion. They have done so but I intend, in the time I have, to demonstrate the point my caucus and I are making, namely, that the order in council under which the construction of the pre-build is going ahead is in violation of the rules regarding the making of orders in council. If it was bad in 1956 for the Liberal government of that day to abuse the rules of Parliament and to impose closure on debate—it was applied after one or two words and we were kept here until three and four o'clock in the morning on four different nights to bring down the Chair, if you will, to bring down the government itself in the next election because it abused the rules—how much worse it is now that it is violating the law of this land as enacted by Parliament.

• (2010)

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, in answer to a question put by my leader, that subsection 20(4) of the Northern Pipeline Act gave the government the power by order in council to change condition 12 of schedule III; that this had been done, therefore the law now is as the government has changed it. It reminds me of an Old Testament story I used to tell in another profession years ago. When Moses complained about the golden calf, Aaron said to Moses, "It is not our fault, we put in the gold and out came the calf". Today the Prime Minister said that it was not his fault, that the law as it now reads is there for him to use. The fact of the matter is that it is his fault. He is the head of the government which agreed to an order in council which this government should not have passed. The government says that the authority is there under subsection 20(4). It is true that subsection 20(4) gives the board, subject to the approval of the governor in council, the power to rescind, amend or add to the terms and conditions set out in schedule III which are deemed to be such and such, and so on. Yes there is power to change the terms and conditions set out in schedule III. In schedule III there is condition 12 which provides that the company shall do certain things respecting the pipeline. The pipeline is defined in clause 2 of the bill as a line for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska across Canada, along the route set out in the accompanying documents.

It is very clear that what this act is all about is the construction of one pipeline from Alaska across Canada into the United States for the transportation of Alaska gas—Alaska being part of the United States—to another part of the United States. That is all this legislation provides: it provides for nothing else. But the government, using its order in council power, has amended condition 12 of schedule III. The wording of that amendment is to be found on pages 3133 and 3134 of Hansard for Friday, July 18. I invite all members who take this matter seriously to read that order in council. It says that condition 12, as passed by this Parliament, is rescinded or is wiped out and that another one is put in its place. What does this other one include? It includes a provision for a portion of the pipeline. There is no reference in the act to the pipeline being in portions. It is the pipeline, the whole line.

Then in addition to that, the amended version passed by order in council says about that portion that it is to be referred to as the pre-build section, and I would rest my case completely on the following half sentence:

—that will be used for the transmission of Canadian natural gas to the United States prior to the completion of the pipeline;

By no stretch of the imagination is that merely the use of the powers set out in subsection 20(4) to amend the terms and conditions of condition 12; that is changing the act, that is changing the whole purpose of the legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: That act provided for a transportation unit to transport American gas from Alaska to the lower 48 states. The order in council turns it into an export pipeline for the transmission of Canadian gas to the United States prior to the completion of the pipeline.

Everyone knows that I am not a lawyer, but I challenge any lawyer in this place to try to make a case for that being simply an amending of the conditions for the pipeline set out in schedule III. Yet this has been done by order in council, and the Prime Minister stood up yesterday and, like Aaron to Moses said, "but it is the law, we are acting under the law." It is the law because he and his colleagues changed it illegally.

Then if one reads a little further in the same revised condition 12, one finds that whereas the one this Parliament passed said that the financing for the whole pipeline had to be in place, now it is changed to read that the financing for the southern portion has to be in place. But, all the companies have to do with respect to the rest of it is to certify that it can be obtained. By no stretch of the imagination is that a mere amending of the conditions. That is changing the whole concept, that is changing the law. It is arbitrary use of power, if I ever saw it in this place—and I have seen it before—for the cabinet, in the rooms where it meets, to change completely the law passed by the House of Commons. What is the excuse for that? It is right in the order in council, apart from the fact that the Prime Minister admitted in his letter to the President of the United States a few months ago that the government had no power to build a portion of the line under the legislation which, of course, he now says got changed by the order in council. Apart from that, even the order in council gives a reason for it. Listen to this language:

Whereas the board considers that the provisions of condition 12 of schedule III—

The Board is the National Energy Board which made the recommendation the cabinet approved; that was as far as the Board could go; the cabinet had to turn it into an order in council.

Whereas the Board considers that the provisions of condition 12 of schedule II do not encompass the circumstances related to the pre-building of the southern section of the pipeline—

That is the excuse for making all these changes. If I may give a parallel example from a field in which I have a good deal of experience, the Old Age Security Act, with its provision for a spouse's allowance, says that no person, no spouse, can get an allowance under the age of 60. The reason for this is that a widow of an older spouse can get it, provided she was widowed after age 60. I should like to see an order in council which would say: "Whereas the legislation did not encompass the circumstances related to the difficulties a 59-year-old widow would experience because she lost her 67-year-old husband, the government amends the legislation and says that the widow concerned would get a pension."

● (2020)

Mr. Orlikow: That will be the day.

Mr. Knowles: "That will be the day", says my hon. friend. No, they stand up every time and say "you have to draw a line somewhere, and the line that is drawn in the law is the one which has to be observed." I could do the same with the veterans' legislation we passed the other day under which we will extend pensions to widows in the case where a veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent. We warmly welcome that legislation, and I commend again the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) for the bill he brought in last December which broke the ice, but there is a six and one-half year staging-in period. We are going to have correspondence and messages from widows who have waited eight or ten years now but whose husbands' rates of pension were 30 per cent or 25 per cent, and they need it now. Will the government come in with an order in council which says, "Whereas the legislation passed on July 9 does not encompass the circumstances faced by widows in this circumstance, we will give them their pension now"?

Mr. Orlikow: That will be the day.

Mr. Knowles: Again my hon. friend says, "That will be the day". Do we in this place respect the law or do we not? We say over and over again, "Too bad, that is where the line was drawn". If we provide money for a dock in Prince Rupert, we cannot use it to build a grain elevator in Edmonton, Alberta. The law is specific, and I invite hon. members to read, if they have time to do it, an interesting document to be found in Votes and Proceedings of July 17. It is the report of the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. It is a lengthy and detailed report. It is a thorough study of the whole problem of the authority of Parliament to delegate legislation. It is a tremendous report. It makes the case that there has to be a lot of delegation because of the complications of parliamentary and governmental business today, but that the principle of parliamentary control must be retained. It questions, for example, the postage increases which were made by order in council under the Financial Administration Act, when there is a Post Office Act under which it should be done.

I remind hon. members again of the story I told the other day about the Conservative government's action in 1962 when it passed an order in council based on two different statutes under which it raised the customs duties on the one hand and then forgave them or reduced them a bit on the other and insisted that it was legal, just as the Prime Minister and the government House leader stand up in the House and say that their order in council is legal. But the Liberals who succeeded the Conservatives in 1963 found out that they were being taken to court on that and that they were going to lose millions of dollars, so the very Liberals who had criticized the order in 1962 came back in 1963 and brought in the necessary statute to legalize what had been done. We are dealing in something which is very important. I cannot quite hear what my hon. friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), is saying, but I think he is probably thinking about the same thing happening and that there may be again a reference to the courts on this very issue. As I said earlier, we are concerned about this matter because it is a sell-out of our children and grandchildren. We are concerned about this policy and the mistaken view of the government in going ahead with this.

However, the point I am making in the minutes which are allotted to me in this debate is that we are also violating one of the basic principles of parliamentary government, that is, that governments cannot pass by order in council things they are not entitled to do, and my contention is that it is crystal clear that this government has no right to amend condition 12, as it has done. Therefore the whole operation is illegal and this government should be brought to task for violating an act of Parliament and violating the rights of this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is convinced that he is correct in his interpretation of the law with regard to the use of an order in council to approve the pre-build of the Alaska gas pipeline. The best legal minds in the Department of Justice and the various other law officers of the Crown who advise the government from time to time are of a different opinion. The government and the official opposition believe that this pre-build is part of a whole unit. It is an initial construction phase, and if we do not get started on this initial construction phase this year, it may be one or two years before we can proceed to the construction of the full line. It is a judgment as to whether or not we take the word of our friends and allies south of the border. We have a situation where the President of the United States and both houses of Congress unanimously tell us that they are totally committed to the construction of the full line before 1985.

Mr. Waddell: Not one red cent.

Mr. Watson: They have given us their commitment morally.

Mr. Waddell: Morally.

Mr. Watson: I am prepared to accept it. The hon. member is not. I am, and I think most members of this House are.

Mr. Waddell: You guys are selling out this country.

Mr. Kempling: Button your lip, you turkey.

Mr. Watson: The American Congress has unanimously indicated support for the construction of the full line. The Government of Canada has taken the U.S. Congress and the U.S. president at their word and has treated this pre-build as the first phase of a construction project on which the full line will be completed by 1985 or 1986. If the American Congress cannot be trusted on this by the Canadian government and the Canadian Parliament, I am afraid it will never be trusted again, and the Americans are well aware of this.

I would like to place it clearly on the record that my confidence is with what the American Congress has promised, and I am certain that I will not be disappointed. The government is certain that it will not be disappointed. If we are, then the relationship between Canada and the United States will change permanently, and that will not happen, in my view.

I think we should run through a few of the points which have been made by the New Democratic Party because one by one they can be shown to be defective in at least a part of the reasoning behind each of the arguments. Let us deal first with swaps. The swap question was first proposed officially when in 1977 the National Energy Board included a swap proposal in one of its reports. At that time there was a small gas bubble, as it was called, which was predicted to occur in the period from about 1981 to 1984. At that time it was felt by the National Energy Board that with some 800 billion cubic feet available—this was in 1977—a swap arrangement would make sense. Two things have changed since then to alter the practicality of the swap proposal. First, the reserves of gas in Canada have increased enormously, and I will deal with that in a minute.

Second, there is the realization that the question of swapping is simply too complicated to allow an arrangement to be made now which would be of any use to get this pipeline project, which is so important for a number of reasons for both Canada and the United States, on the road. One of the complications would simply be the number of parties involved in the whole process, whether it be producing the gas, transporting the gas or selling the gas. There are so many parties involved that the swapping arrangement becomes very difficult.

A third reason is simply that the Canadian gas producers in Alberta—if we take as a direction the content of the NDP motion tonight and the result of what is being proposed in that motion—who are already strapped for cash, would be faced with the prospect, in the very near future, of having to take in or absorb all this gas from Alaska, if it were a short-term arrangement. If it were a long-term arrangement, the American gas producers in Alaska would be faced with the proposition of having to agree to supplying this gas back to Canada perhaps 20 years down the road.

Nobody would want to be involved in that kind of long-term arrangement, so for practical purposes, swapping cannot be arranged. It is just too complicated and it would mean, in effect, a delay in the project. So we are faced with that choice: not delaying the project or swapping. Swapping is just not an acceptable alternative for those people who have to make a decision.

Finally, to deal with a question which has been raised in the House of Commons frequently in the past few days by the New Democratic Party, that it is more sensible to buy the gas and to keep it in the ground—if the producers need money, why not buy the gas, give them the money, which will allow them to keep on producing and exploring, and simply not export the gas but put it back in the ground and supply it to Canadians eventually? That particular argument has some merit because in effect Alberta is already doing that.

Alberta is using part of its heritage fund or part of the other funds available to it to purchase gas from gas producers to keep them solvent, and they will eventually put that gas into storage or keep it in the ground for use later. It may be a good investment if one takes into consideration that it is being done to keep those producers from going into insolvency. But if one looks at it from the point of view of the argument advanced by the NDP, one finds that they are into a situation where that kind of aid to producers has a limit. The limit is the capacity of the country simply to keep on putting billions and billions of dollars into gas storage. In effect, one has to make a judgment at some point, that exports are in fact a necessary evil, and that they are, at some particular point, necessary if we are to allow the most important exploration development and drilling to continue.

If we do not supply, in effect, the grease to keep this process going, then the whole machine slows down, exploration slows down and we end up in a situation where Canada has fewer gas discoveries, therefore fewer reserves, therefore less capacity to promise industry that 20 years down the road they can be guaranteed enough gas to permit them to convert from oil to gas.

This entire relationship between energy self sufficiency, between moving more rapidly to allow Canada to become self-sufficient and less reliant on foreign-oil imports is tied directly to the amount of reserves we have. The amount of reserves we have is tied to the ability of Canadian gas producers to find oil and gas. They can only do that if they have money. We are faced, therefore, with a decision. Do we simply go into a national debt and finance this exploration and development, or do we use the export of natural gas to the United States to help finance part of it?

This government has made a decision to use that export to finance a part of the project. It is a judgment which was made. I support it because I think it makes a lot of sense. We are not going overboard on gas exports. The government has shown its intentions to protect our natural resources by slowing down the degree of oil exports. We are down now to about 100,000 barrels a day from something like 400,000 barrels a day a few years ago. We have shown that our intentions are to reduce these oil exports down to zero. In the case of gas exports, we will do it if it is necessary, but not in a totally unrestricted manner.

I think we should run over some of the points which are the most important to remember when dealing with this pipeline question. We have the guarantees from the United States that they will move forward on the full line. Let us just look at the consequences of not moving forward this year. Think about them. First of all there is inflation. One year's delay will mean more cost for the entire line. If we do not start this year, we will end up with a more narrow spread in economic development, a more narrow time-frame in which to build, not only the whole line, but also the many other energy projects which are coming on stream.

Surely the NDP is in favour of solid economic planning. How does what they propose fit in if we end up in a situation where we bunch four, five or six major energy projects into three of four years in the mid-1980s? What we are doing now with this project is allowing a reasonable spread. It happens also to fit in with a downturn in our economic cycle.

I have made the point about the necessity to protect the largely Canadian-owned, independent gas producers in the west who are strapped for finances, and this project will help. It seems to me that the people in Alberta and in western Canada generally have a right to expect a little bit of consideration for their economic future in this decision. Their economic future will be strengthened by the move to build this pipeline, starting this year. Surely the NDP—and I know that they have received a number of telegrams to this effect—realize the economic ramifications to eastern Canada if construction on this pipeline starts this year. There are firms in the ridings of almost every single member in this House which will be affected by the construction start this year. One hundred and thirty thousand man-years of work is certainly nothing to be cast aside.

An hon. Member: A hundred and fifty thousand man-years, get that straight.

Mr. Watson: One hundred and thirty man-years is the figure. Whether you believe it or not, that is what the economists are telling us.

● (2040)

An hon. Member: Which ones?

Mr. Watson: It seems to me as well, Mr. Speaker, that the use of natural gas in eastern Canada is going to be enhanced substantially by the decision to move this year. If there had not been a decision this year, it would have taken that much longer before eastern industry—they are the most important consumers—could be persuaded to use natural gas instead of the imported oil they are using right now. This guarantee of supply is important.

There is one little incident which I think we would all be wise to remember, Mr. Speaker, but no one has mentioned it so far in this debate.

Last February when the TransCanada pipeline broke down because of a valve problem in its major compressor, eastern Canadian supplies of natural gas were in jeopardy for three days. Replacement gas was supplied by the pipeline that goes south to Chicago and back up into Sarnia. This American pipeline was able to save eastern Canada from a shortage for those three days.

The eastern leg of the northern gas pipeline will allow the transportation into eastern Canada of additional quantities of natural gas in the event that the TransCanada system is not able to handle all the new demands that will be created in the east and also in the admittedly unlikely event of another breakdown in the TransCanada system. It is an additional bit of security for eastern consumers which, believe me, is very important.

Let us deal for a moment with the reserves that have really changed the picture in deciding whether or not we should move toward pipeline construction this year.

When the National Energy Board was talking about a gas bubble of 800 billion cubic feet in 1977, they were being conservative, but at that time they were not aware, nor was anyone, of the tremendous potential of what is now referred to as the deep gas play in northwestern Alberta and northeastern British Columbia.

This particular series of discoveries has increased the Canadian total of proven gas by only about five trillion cubic feet, but the potential increase in reserves for Canada ranges somewhere between 150 trillion and 200 trillion cubic feet of gas; an absolutely astronomical amount.

The National Energy Board figures—which, by the way, in 1978 were something like 66 trillion cubic feet of gas for the conventional areas of Canada—did not include the 20 trillion cubic feet which have been proven now in the frontier areas of the north, nor did they include the some three trillion cubic feet off Sable Island and they have not even touched on the gas discovered off Newfoundland.

We are talking of potential reserves of three to four hundred trillion cubic feet.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Watson: That is not rubbish. It is combination—

An hon. Member: Absolute rubbish.

Mr. Watson: The NDP do not seem to be aware of either the discoveries that have been made—

An hon. Member: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Watson: —of the discoveries that have been made over the last two years, nor are they aware of the technological advances which have permitted a much higher recovery rate in existing fields.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Watson: The ignorance of the NDP in this area partly explains their position during the past two or three days.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) on a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the hon. member would quote the source of 300 to 400 trillion cubic feet of gas.

Mr. Watson: I would be pleased to give the source, Mr. Speaker. The source for the deep gas play in northeastern British Columbia—

An hon. Member: The only source of deep gas is you.

Mr. Watson: —and Alberta is the company which is most deeply involved in this gas play.

An hon. Member: Just quote the source.

Mr. Watson: I would like to specify that this reference to a possible 200 trillion cubic feet relates as well to the price, and if the price is high enough, that kind of reserve could be recoverable. That is the kind of arithmetic we are talking about. The company involved in that sort of guesstimate—and I admit it is a guesstimate—is Canadian Hunter. On the east coast, Mr. Speaker, the latest analysis I have seen is by Merrill Lynch, and they estimate 74 trillion cubic feet potential on the east coast.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan).

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I must say in opening that I view the order made by the House just before the recess at suppertime to be almost a conspiracy against me. Until that time each member had 40 minutes to talk about many things, including pipelines, and then all the House leaders got together after a fairly active day and restricted the contribution of members to 20 minutes. That puts an almost unfair burden on one of such Irish intent and loquaciousness.

Be that as it may, I shall try, in the 20 minutes available, to say what I have to say. I should like to say to my friends in the NDP to whom I will give one bouquet, before some thorns, that we are debating an issue and there are sincere views on all sides of the House on this fundamental issue of pipelines.

I had one of the greatest speeches I ever prepared ready before we had your ruling to cut our contribution to 20 minutes. It was about the reform of Parliament and all the crazy mutations that members go through in the summertime to try to get out of this place and back to their constituencies. If implemented, these reforms would give every member a chance to speak and do many things. I am not going to speak on reform unless I have a few minutes available at the end of my remarks. I want to speak to the matter that is germane to all hon. members because there is no member with a monopoly on the interest in, and the knowledge of, the pipeline problems that face this land.

To quote or to paraphrase a famous Canadian, who unfortunately is not here tonight to hear my words of wisdom, as we "welcome the 80s"—I think those were the words used on some unfortunate night after an election win several months ago—it is perhaps appropriate that in this House of Commons as we try to move toward a summer recess, that we talk about pipelines and energy. Those matters were with us long before the eighties and they will be with us long after the eighties. They will affect the lives of people outside this House for generations and are not just subjects for the cut and thrust of debate tonight.

Ordinarily I could be very provocative toward both sides of the House. I could allude to my friends in the government, to what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has said, and to his flip-flops. In a facetious way I could suggest that this is one of the reasons why the export licence is going to be more than the 3.75 trillion cubic feet initially recommended by the government of which I was happy to be a member—even though in the backbench. That, Mr. Speaker, is one of the reasons and I could be facetious but I wanted to add a little levity to the very serious subject. My friend, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), in a very eloquent and constructive contribution just before the supper recess in his assessment of the adjournment and the motion with which we are confronted, said that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources not only swallowed the commitment to Atlantic Canada, an area of which I am proud to be a member, but he swallowed the Q and M Pipe Line and any financial assistance to build that pipeline as well. When a minister has such incestuous indigestion, it is no wonder there is a lot more gas around. Why not ship it out?

● (2050)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I have to say this about one of the hon. members. He has fought a good fight. He is a new member and he has made an interesting contribution. In many cases I do not agree with him at all. But I give him full credit, as Thomas Paine said many years ago, before he swung, but he has a right to say what he said.

Talking about pipelines, we find an interesting connection with history. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) who has contributed to this debate, in an interesting accident of history, has been the executive assistant, or the special assistant, to Mr. Justice Berger, whom I practised against and for whom I have the highest judicial respect. In my opinion—and I do not wish to saddle my party with this view—his report after two years is one of the reasons we are meeting tonight and wondering where we are going on an energy pipeline across this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: You could say, Mr. Speaker, that it was an unholy alliance between the NDP and the CBC. Every night, and every other night in the summer two years ago, I used to turn on CBC television broadcasts to watch the national news, as any faithful Canadian would do to try to keep in contact with the current affairs of this country. Every other night I saw Mr. Justice Berger playing ball with the Eskimos, looking at the caribou and doing many interesting things which we all wish we could do. But I suggest, in a serious way, that I am not sure about the future of the Alaska pipeline in view of what the government is doing tonight.

But I do say that when we move away and get a perspective on history, the assessment of the decision between the Mackenzie Valley and the Alaska pipeline is something which perhaps will not bring credit to this House of Commons.

Be that as it may. I was most interested in listening to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway today who based his argument on three points: that it was a sell-out, that it was a question of sovereignty of Parliament, and that it was the right of Parliament.

I am from Atlantic Canada, and I confess this on the floor of the House that when this debate started—not just here on the motions in the last few days, but over the period we have been talking about pipelines—I was one member who really wondered about the advisability of the pre-build section of the Alaska pipeline. I do not say this disparagingly about members, not just the NDP but members on both sides, not all of whom have spoken in this debate, but I could wrap myself in a cloak about heritage, the future, selling of our birthright, and then ask what about the mess of pottage? I could say all that. I seriously, sincerely felt that way while this debate progressed.

I must say that I am prepared and happy to be here in the House participating in this debate. Many other members will not have a chance to do so because of the ruling so I am trying to be serious.

The debate in this House has actually changed my opinion. Perhaps it is the judgment call which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred to earlier. It is a judgment call that unless there is a pre-build section of a grand pipeline from the 49th parallel to Alaska, we in the east have even less chance of getting gas to heat our homes, to feed our fires and feed what little industry we have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: In tribute to my friend, it is not a sell-out. He knows as well as I do that the pre-build section is a "Y" type section. Part of it goes into California, he says, to heat the air conditioners there, but the other part of that "Y" goes east to Saskatchewan. It gets tied into the northern pipeline; it goes into the Chicago market and it ends up in Sarnia.

How can my friends to the left preach platitudes, which we all preach from time to time, and not get down to the practicality of how gas is put into a pipeline and transported to give us gas in eastern Canada who do not have gas today?

My NDP opponent is a fine citizen, but he was misguided. He kept saying that there is enough gas and energy being shipped offshore in the 3.75 trillion cubic feet that were authorized by the then minister of energy to light all the homes and all the Christmas trees in Atlantic Canada for 50 years. But I agreed with him.

However, how does one get the gas from the west to the east? Can it be done by wheelbarrow?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: A pipeline is what is needed. How do you get a pipeline? Let us be reasonable. This pipeline we are talking about goes from the 49th parallel to Alaska. I know my friends to the left have many solutions to all of the problems. But I ask them how many of them have worked on a pipeline? Do they know how to build a pipeline that is over 1,000 miles long?

An hon. Member: Do you?

Mr. Nowlan: I have. I can tell you a pipeline is built in sections.

The interesting thing is that I sympathize a little with my hon. friends and I do not fault them for this because in terms of economic nationalism perhaps we should all be more economic nationalists. I heard some of them say they have worked on a pipeline. I wish I had the time to recite the story about when I worked in Seven Islands—it was called Seven Islands before being known as Sept-Îles—when I saw plans for the iron ore carriers going through the St. Lawrence seaway three years before the St. Lawrence seaway bill ever came on to the floor of the House. Therefore, I have been a little suspicious of so-called sell-outs before. But there is an interesting paradox to this problem. My friends and all members want Canadians to own Canadian industry. We can quote figures, but I will not get into an argument about a trillion cubic feet of gas. I will go by the National Energy Board who are the experts and others who are more expert than I. I will confess my ignorance. I will acknowledge their wisdom. The National Energy Board does not allow export licences unless there is at least a 25-year surplus for Canadian needs. I am not going to talk about 400 trillion cubic feet because right now it is 75 trillion cubic feet, or whatever. There are 25 trillion cubic feet more in the frontier. But I say to hon. members, how can you have it both ways in economic nationalism?

We know about the multinationals who, in effect, control the oil industry. My friends to the left know that so far the gas industry in this country is basically owned, operated and controlled by Canadians and small Canadian companies. Unless those small Canadian companies get a cash flow to develop more of the frontier, then some time down the road we will be worried about where we go and how much surplus we have.

I talked about the NDP. My friend from Vancouver-Kingsway said it is so simple. He says to bank the resource, in other words, leave it in the ground. Do my friends from the left want to bank the coal fields in Cape Breton and the iron ore from the smelter in Sydney? Do they want to bank the iron ore at Inco? Do they want to bank the steel from the smelter in Hamilton and leave the potash in the ground in Saskatchewan? And when we get to Trail, do they want to leave the lead there? We all know that these things will be more worth while after—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: When it comes to coal, I suggest if they have a sincere interest in the development of Canadian industry, they will get the lead out of their ideological position and not just be against business because it is business. Having made those few remarks about the NDP, I will now come to the government position in this matter which my friend from Perth handled so admirably. There is no question that when we talk about ironclad guarantees, that is where my friend opposite has to stand on the docket of public opinion, not just today but down the road.

● (2100)

I am not going to accept the act which says that the bearded senator in the other place, who is in charge of economic development, that Messiah trying to find a home and a tent to crawl under, who may be the economic minister today because the act says he is the minister who has to make a decision. I am not, as a member of Parliament, going to accept his responsibility or just put this on to the NEB.

My friends opposite are in charge now. They have been given a mandate by the Canadian people. They talked about the ironclad guarantees last December, the commitment to Atlantic Canada, the swap arrangement, all those matters. Unless this government produces, they are going to be in the docket of public opinion and we will have sold out the heritage of Canadians from coast to coast. However, at the moment I do not know all the things that have gone on in government. I was not in Venice, I do not know the assurances the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) received. However, I know this.

I am not voting, in a sense, because this motion is a little funny, but the intent of the motion is to vote for or against a pipeline. As the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis) said, you can talk about ironclad guarantees, but was the CPR built on an ironclad guarantee? Was the TransCanada pipeline, the Trans-Canada Highway or the Pine Point railway built on an ironclad guarantee? On this motion of my friends, we would never have any development in this country.

I am worried. The government has the responsibility. They were given the mandate. However, when I see what happened to the Q and M Pipe Lines which is not going beyond Quebec, with no assurances and not even a study on the matter, when I see what happened to Georges Bank, an agreement between two administrations, and the American fishermen are still raping the Georges Bank of fish, I can say to you, Mr. Speaker, I am worried.

I am not seduced by a letter from the U.S. president who may be a lame duck. I am not seduced by a congressional motion which is something like our 43s. We know how much effect they have. What I have faith in is not some ideological position of the NDP. I certainly have no faith in the ironclad guarantees of the minister, which were a sell-out in December of sensible policy in the summer of 1980. I have faith in the entrepreneurial skills of Canadians and in Canadian people. That is where the final test is going to be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: There is much more I would like to say but will say in conclusion, and I say this very seriously, there have been other decisions of Parliament taken and perhaps the political process is filled with these types of decisions. I do not go along with the statistics given to me by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). All members know that more jobs will be created. My friends to my left say it is a short-term deal. There is an argument there. I do not go along with that. In terms of the long-term interest of Canada, and to build the first cornerstone and spur in a pipeline that is going to bring more energy to eastern Canada, I am prepared to go along with the pre-build.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Statistics that were quoted to me and have been quoted in the House may be accurate, but unfortunately some of the reasons that have been used to back up those statistics may be the wrong reasons.

In conclusion—and I wish everyone for about one minute would hearken back to this history—I go back to something called railways. Pipelines are the railways or arteries in this day and age. Railways, even the CPR, were not built overnight in one line in east to west. They were built by spurs. Certainly the CNR was built this way. The spurs were connected.

While I have real, grave questions for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about the so-called ironclad guarantees which are not ironclad guarantees, I suggest that the pre-build section of this pipeline is the cornerstone, by accident, of an energy policy that this government, for as long as it stays, is going to have to implement. If they do not implement it and check on those guarantees, the Canadian people will have a chance to turn things around and put a party in power which had an energy policy that was derailed for a short term, but we will be back in charge not too far down the road.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the importance of the pre-build issue and in support of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). I want to say a word of commendation to that member because not only has he put this motion forward, but consistently, in the first part of this session, he has kept this issue before Parliament. He has ensured that Parliament has not been able to go to sleep on this very important question.

Last week, the Leader of the New Democratic Party referred to the American opinion that the Canadian government would be "damned fools if they went ahead with the pre-build without 100 per cent guarantees for the entire pipeline". But this is what we see happening. Just as someone once said, there are lies, damned lies, and statistics—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Then there is the NDP.

Mr. Manly: —today we can see that there are fools, damned fools, and the Liberal government. The pre-build is not the first betrayal of Canadians in connection with this pipeline.

In 1977 the government appointed a board of inquiry under Dean Lysyk to examine the social and economic effects of the pipeline on the people of the Yukon. On many occasions the board explained to the people that this was only the first of a two-stage inquiry, that there was to be a second inquiry and, as a result of that, there would be a final statement, and all the terms and conditions for the pipeline would be based on that second stage.

However, the people of the Yukon were betrayed. The second stage was aborted. Its concerns were referred to regulatory agencies. Government assurances did not help the people of the Yukon. I submit that assurances from the American government have no more meaning and no more value than assurances from this Liberal government today.

In a similar way, Indian people of Alberta discover that proposals for the pre-build betray their interests. It provides no meaningful jobs for them, no training for skilled jobs as machinists or in heavy equipment. At best, some Indians will get a couple of minor contracts, jobs clearing a few miles of right-of-way.

Indian bands have no recourse if they disagree with recommendations of the pipeline agency with respect to the socio-economic impact. Trappers who suffer economically can act only as individuals, coming before the company which decides both damage and compensation. The Indian people in the southeast corner of British Columbia have had to hire legal advisers to see what recourse they have because they can see that they are going to get all the negative effects of this pipeline and none of the benefits. In British Columbia numerous land claims are outstanding and nothing has been done to settle them before this pipeline goes through. No wonder Indians in Alberta and British Columbia are protesting the pre-build. Their interests are being completely overlooked.

Last Thursday night, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) what provisions had been made for native people to get jobs on the pre-build. The minister replied, in effect, that this was a very interesting question but that he did not know the answer and, in any case, was not responsible. Once again we find ourselves in a situation where no one on those benches opposite is responsible for answering to Parliament when basic questions are raised concerning the pipeline.

Because the pre-build will increase pressure to develop energy resources in Canada's north, native land claims in the region are bound to be affected, and the native people are concerned. I suggest that if the cabinet is able to change such a basic requirement as the need for financial guarantees, there is no assurance that the Canadian people will not be short-changed in the same way when it comes to other conditions. In the debate on the pipeline which took place in 1970, we were given very inadequate assurances with regard to environmental protection, land claim settlements and the Canadian content of material which would be used in construction. Rather, the Liberal government took the attitude: trust us and we will look after everything. Today we hear a different story. The cabinet is relying on a very legalistic interpretation, a dubious interpretation, to avoid coming to Parliament with the changes it has made. Instead of a pipeline to transport gas from Alaska, we now have an export pipeline to send gas out of Alberta. Watching this government is like watching a soap opera. It lurches from one crisis to another and after a while onlookers have a good idea what is going to happen next.

Two years ago when the Northern Pipeline bill was being rammed through Parliament, Tommy Douglas objected that the House was > about to take part in putting on the statute books a piece of legislation in which there are glaring gaps and deficiencies, shortcomings which will become more obvious as the project proceeds.

He pointed to the lack of adequate protection for the environment, faulty financial arrangements, the lack of agreements with native people on their land claims and the lack of guarantees of Canadian content. Then he went on to expose the real purpose of the bill. He said:

> The primary purpose in the immediate future is not to take Prudhoe Bay gas to the United States. The primary purpose is to take Alberta gas to the United States.

Today we see that the government is doing just as Tommy Douglas said it would, two years ago.

Some of the members opposite have raised the question of the NDP's position in British Columbia. They see a contradiction between our federal policy opposing increased sales of natural gas and the concern of New Democratic Party members in British Columbia that the pipeline will lock in the B.C. natural gas supply. There is no contradiction, Mr. Speaker. If we found a family living on junk food, we would not help the situation very much by simply taking that food away. Something has to be provided in its place. That is the situation with respect to natural gas in British Columbia.

We face the same situation with regard to our forest industry. In spite of what people once thought, our forests are not an inexhaustible resource. We in the New Democratic Party believe that British Columbia must adopt a policy of more intensive processing of our forest resource rather than exporting huge squares of timber which will be further processed in the receiving country. In the meantime, though, the forest industry depends upon the export market. When that market takes a downturn, our people suffer. What we need is a phased-in policy of more intensive processing while we are phasing out export of raw or semi-processed products. It is the same with natural gas, Mr. Speaker. The New Democratic Party of British Columbia knows very well that our province depends very heavily upon the revenues from the sale of natural gas. After all, back in the seventies, it was Dave Barrett and the New Democratic Party government which demanded that while we respected existing contracts, the people of British Columbia should at least get a fair return from the sale of their resources.

We have to move away from dependence on the export of raw resources. But we have no intention of doing this in an arbitrary or unplanned manner. Our position is clear. Increased exports of natural gas from Canada—from Alberta—confirm Canada's position as a hinterland to the United States. We become more dependent upon the export of our non-renewable resources, but at the same time this places the economy of British Columbia in jeopardy by threatening to cut off our exports when the government has become so dependent upon them. What I want to know, and what the people of British Columbia want to know, is where the 16 Tory members of Parliament stand on this issue.

An hon. Member: Where are they?

Mr. Manly: What is their position? Where do the members for Vancouver Centre (Mrs. Carney) and Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) stand on this question? Do they have any policy other than silence or skirting the issues?

An hon. Member: They are hiding.

Northern Gas Pipeline

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I believe we need to debate the remarkable assertions of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning swap agreements. On Thursday night the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) asked what provisions there were to swap present exports of natural gas from Alberta for an equivalent amount and at an equivalent price of Alaskan gas when it became available. I would like to quote the minister's reply. He said:

> We discussed and reviewed this matter at great length and examined possible avenues, and it was concluded—unfortunately I have to say—that arrangements for swaps were not feasible and not administratively possible in this instance. I have gone into this matter to a great extent. We have tried, but I must say in that respect that I have been unable to achieve arrangements which would be satisfactory. I came to the conclusion myself that the objections and the problems which had been raised in considering such an arrangement were quite genuine and that it was impossible to make such arrangements.
> I also came to the conclusion that the question of swaps was not as essential as it appeared in terms of supply for future Canadian needs. We have quite clear evidence that Canadian supply is quite large and that we can be assured that the future of Canadian supplies remains guaranteed.

We need to hear more from the minister about this. Instead of a simple admission that he had completely failed, he said that there were objections and problems attached to any swap arrangements—objections and problems that he considered genuine and which made swap provisions impossible. I say that we need to hear some of the details about these objections and problems. What were they? How did they come to have such an overpowering effect on the minister's mind, causing a complete turnabout of his former policy? We need a chance to debate these things. Further, the minister said that the question of swaps was not as essential as it once appeared. The minister began the discussion by saying that unfortunately arrangements for swaps were not feasible. He concluded it by saying they did not matter. Mr. Speaker, this reminds me of Aesop's fable about the fox which saw a fine bunch of grapes. The fox tried to jump up and get the grapes. It jumped again and again but could not reach them. Finally it gave up in disgust and walked away. It said: "Those grapes are sour." We have a case here of sour grapes. The minister tried to get swap provisions, and when he could not he said they really did not matter. The reason the minister gives for this is that the Canadian supply is quite large and we can be assured that the future of Canadian supplies remains guaranteed.

An hon. Member: At what cost?

● (2120)

Mr. Manly: Happy days are here again. We are back to the euphoric period of Joe Greene when he was minister of the same portfolio. Only nine years ago he stated that Canada had a supply of natural gas that would last for 932 years and a supply of oil for 390 years. We can forget all about those terrible years in the mid-seventies when it was predicted that we could be running short by 1985 and even 1983.

It becomes quite evident that estimates of gas reserves vary in accordance with industry proposals at any given time. In the early seventies the industry wanted to increase exports, and so we heard about reserve supplies which would last for hundreds of years. By the mid-seventies the push was on to rush through the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. We heard that unless we got this pushed through in the next few months, we would all be freezing in the dark. Now when we want to go ahead with the pre-build which involves further exports, we hear once more about huge reserves.

It becomes increasingly difficult for Canadians to place any credence at all in the differing statistics given to justify these different projects. However, we should recognize that no matter how large our reserves, there is no such thing as a surplus of a non-renewable resource. Our reserves might be surplus to our needs for this year, or even for this generation, but when we consider the long-term future of Canada, there are no real surpluses of natural gas.

Today we hear the government talking about the jobs involved in the pre-build. We want those jobs too, but we want all of the jobs in the total pipeline. We do not want the pre-build jobs at the expenses of our children's future. We do not want them at the expense of future energy requirements, nor at the expense of future jobs that will depend upon those gas reserves. The lack of planning exhibited by the government poses a continual threat to the natural resources of Canada.

Back in the sixties members of the New Democratic Party opposed the terms of the Columbia River treaty with the United States. At that time we were shouted down by cries of cheap energy. Today the people of British Columbia are paying through the nose for that sell-out by Liberal, Conservative and Social Credit governments. In the sixties we sold our power down the river; in the eighties we are sending it down the tube.

The NDP heard the same story when it tried to modify the original auto pact agreement, legislation in which all the cards were stacked against Canadian people. As Tommy Douglas said, "We were shooting craps with loaded dice". Today our unemployed auto workers are paying the price for the refusal of that Liberal government to demand proper terms.

Going ahead with the pre-build without 100 per cent guarantees is only the latest chapter in this long, depressing soap opera, a soap opera in which the sponsor refuses to come clean by coming before Parliament with a bill to make it all legal.

The sell-out of our natural gas reserves reflects the continuing foreign domination of that industry.

An hon. Member: And that party.

Mr. Manly: And that party, right. In spite of the minister talking about the benefit of the pre-build to hundreds of small and medium-sized Canadian-owned producers, the fact remains that concentration and foreign control is only slightly less in the natural gas industry than in the oil industry. In 1979, four of the six top producers were foreign-controlled multinationals—Shell, Amoco, Gulf and Imperial. Perhaps this does not bother the Liberal cabinet too much. In spite of Liberal rhetoric about Canadian control of the economy, most Liberal cabinet members appear to be thinly disguised continentalists. After all, it was only 11 years ago that the Hon. Joe Greene, in asking for a continentalist energy policy with more exports from Canada, spoke of our boundary with the United States as the "imaginary border". Unfortunately, if all that separates Canada from the United States is an "imaginary border", the Liberal government suffers from a failure of imagination. It is unable to imagine a Canada not dependent upon exports of raw resources, it is unable to imagine a Canada in control of its own economic destiny, it is unable to imagine a Canada in the twenty-first century that will need these resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say how much I appreciate the opportunity of giving my maiden speech in the House at this time. I count it a great privilege to be elected to this forum and to be part of the Government of Canada. Many ask, "Why give up your business and your way of life to go to Ottawa?" Canada means much to me. Canada is more that geography although I like the writing on the portal of the main door, "from sea to sea". Canada is more than the natural resources with which we have been blessed in such abundance. Canada is more than beauty, although she has been endowed with so much—mountains and lakes, spaceless prairies, endless forests, farmlands; we have it all. Canada is still more. Canada is rich in her freedoms—freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of choice and freedom to worship God. Canada means security—a place to stand and a place to grow. That is what Canada has done for me. Canada is rich in her heritage for freedom and was always willing to give of her sons and daughters in the cause of liberty. Canada is rich in her compassion to those who need shelter in the time of storm. To me Canada is the beautiful pearl among nations.

I should like to thank those who elected me to represent the great riding of London-Middlesex in the Thirty-second Parliament. The London-Middlesex riding is situated in the beautiful farmland of southwestern Ontario. The city of London is the capital of that part of the country. My riding is the east half of Middlesex county and the eastern and southern portion of the city of London. The London-Middlesex riding completely encircles the ridings of London East and West represented by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), our party whip, and the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan). Middlesex county is farmland at its best, with over 90 per cent class 1 and 2 land backed by very diversified farming—dairy, beef, pork, poultry, grain, beans and fruits. It is almost like the garden of Eden. Also we have many small towns and villages that contribute much to the total community. A good two-thirds of the population of my riding is within the city of London. As with the rural, the urban part also is diversified with many well-kept subdivisions, with mainly single family homes, with many small businesses and the corporate giant, GM Diesel. The population is basically Anglo-Saxon, with many people from other countries coming to settle in the London area. We have Italians, Dutch, Greeks, Poles, Hungarians, Portuguese, Ukrainian, Germans, Croatians, Lebanese, French and many others. These folk have come to this land with many technical skills and have certainly helped to build this country to what it is today.

I was elected on February 18, 1980, to represent the riding of London-Middlesex as a member of the Liberal party. I promise to do my best, but more than that, I believe I became a director to the "Canadian company". Even as my riding is very diverse, so is Canada, and I intend to serve my country as a director in trying to see that the Canadian company does well. I have always said what I believe and taken an active role in issues which concern me. As a responsible representative of the people of Canada, my obligation as a director of the Canadian corporation is to make decisions which are best for the country as a whole, to make the right turn when faced with the inevitable fork in the road and to choose the path which is best for the long-term future of Canada, even though that particular road may be rocky and steep and, indeed, may contain potholes which pose the possibility of bottoming out. It really does not matter what level of government one is operating in; making the right decisions, not necessarily the popular ones, gains long-term respect and confidence. He who serves his country best serves his party best.

I would like to express my views, first of all, on the present state of our country's unity and wealth. I am all for the various provinces having good, strong, individual voices, but we must never forget that we are Canadians first. What world voice would we have if we each were intent on being known as Albertans, westerners, Ontarians, maritimers or Quebeckers instead of Canadians? As we look around the world, we realize we in Canada are very fortunate people. We have inherited a wonderful way of life and have vast resources at our disposal.

I would like to give an illustration of what I see is happening in Canada today. It seems to be like an old couple with lots of money who, having raised a large family suddenly die, and then the family begins squabbling over the will—or the constitution—and over who can grab the most. Can confederation withstand that kind of assault? Will there be any confederation left if we all "get our rights" and build our own empires? It helps to strengthen the country to broaden the base, but we should never forget that we are all members of the same corporate family. Our Canadian concerns should come first and our provincial second. Provincial governments are the regional outgrowth of municipalities, but the federal government is the Government of Canada responsible to the people of Canada.

I would like to tell the story of a traveller in twelfth century Italy who came across two men laying bricks. "What are you doing," the traveller asked. The first man replied, "I am laying bricks". The second man answered, "I am building a cathedral". One was working for daily needs, and there is nothing wrong with that, the other one was working for daily needs too, but with a long-range plan for a better tomorrow for the next generation. So I emphasize again that as each of us sit here in this board room, we must, for a time, doff our special ridings and even our provincial hats and accept the responsibility of wearing the corporate hat of a Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bloomfield: Let our object be our country, our whole country and nothing but our country.

As I have said many times, the challenge of the eighties will be energy and finances, and I am sure governments will be judged on how well these two great problems are handled. The solution to the energy question and the state of our nationhood seem to go hand in hand.

While I fully support the right of each energy producing province and private corporation to a fair return on their resources, somehow we must not lose sight of our over-all corporate goal: energy security at a fair price for all Canadians. As I have stated before, the price of oil must go up. We must narrow the gap between our price and the world price of oil, and while I do not expect Petro-Canada to solve all our energy problems, I have always believed that Petro-Canada is a small window into a very dark room.

Personally, I would not want to see Petro-Canada take over the oil industry, but I believe it should provide some stability and reliability in the oil business, to the extent that the government has some insight in the oil industry to ensure that the consumer is not being ripped off by the multinationals.

I sometimes wonder about the interlocking of board rooms, especially between oil companies and car manufacturers. I am not a socialist, but I believe that the government must keep an eye on what is going on in the private sector. I honestly believe that if oil companies are not members in the same club, there is certainly a definite family connection. It is amazing how often the directors or their representatives turn up in different board rooms, not only of our oil companies but also of our automobile manufacturers and our financial institutions. I am sure that if we traced the stock holdings of many, there could not help but be some glaring conflicts of interest which discourage healthy competition which, if left unfettered, could perhaps have led to lower energy prices for Canadians.

To achieve our economic goals, we must find ways of attaining energy self-sufficiency. That must be done through many different ways and means such as oil development, conservation, energy alternatives and switching to natural gas or hydro—of which we enjoy a surplus—to list some of the solutions.

If we Canadians could agree on an energy pricing policy which would give Canadians a long-term lower price than world prices, think of what that would do to give our industry an edge in the world market in manufactured goods.

I would like to give credit to the province of Alberta, for it has been sharing its resources with the rest of Canada at a price—much lower than the world market, but there are always two sides to every story. I go back in history to 1956 when there came on the scene of Parliament a very stormy issue. It eventually brought the Liberal government down because it pushed through legislation for the right to build a pipeline from the oil fields of Alberta to the market in Ontario. Ontario paid more for western gasoline for many years than if it had been brought in from offshore.

Pipelines are like railroads in that they link the country together. This most recent pipeline, known as the pre-build, is just the first phase of a line which will reach into the far northwest corner of our country when completed. This line will serve a dual duty in that it will not only transport Canadian gas from the far north but will also accommodate the United States in sending their natural resource to the lower 48. The spinoff from this project will be of tremendous benefit to the financial structure of Canada in terms of jobs and cash flow. I am sure time will vindicate the go-ahead on this pipeline. Who would suggest that the first pipeline from the west to the east was anything but a roaring success for Canada?

However, at this point there is simply no way we can develop alternative energy resources fast enough. Canadians will be dependent on oil energy for many years to come.

What about the energy potential in Canada? We have the oil fields in the west and the north, Hibernia off the east coast, and uranium mines, but where do we go from here? Do we harness the power of the ocean tides or recycle garbage? Gasohol and the development of energy resources is paramount to our survival. Some diesel tractors in the United States of America are being fuelled by an extract from soybeans. I believe the proposed alternative energy corporation should find itself a half dozen good scientists, lock them in a room and tell them to forget the word "oil". I am sure that if we have the capability of sending a man to the moon and taking pictures far out in space, we can find other sources of fuel to fire our machines. I look forward to the proposed alternative energy corporation supplying some of those sound choices in the years to come.

Another national resource important economically to every Canadian is our western wheat. I am greatly distressed when I hear about millions of bushels of wheat sitting in granaries and unable to get to world markets because of transportation problems. According to the Canadian Wheat Board, a while back it was losing $2 million a day in potential wheat sales because of mechanical and transportation bottlenecks. I want to see the grain terminal at Prince Rupert a fact in the near future. I support the notorious double-tracking, where necessary, and that is only in certain spots, I understand, but let us get on with the job. As a federal government, we should take definite steps somehow to get that grain to the ships and to world markets. If that means upgrading the railroad, the grain terminals or port facilities, then somehow let us do it. We cannot afford not to.

Another issue we cannot afford to neglect is our responsibility for the health and well-being of our most precious resource, our youth. A real health hazard in our society among our youth is the use of drugs. I believe we must be very careful of any change in our drug laws. We have seen what tragic results there were from lowering the drinking age. The same thing took place when we changed the laws on abortion. Many members have related to me that they would never have voted for the change had they known the detrimental effect that the new law would bring to society. I believe that we have history to prove, especially over the last 20 years, what softening the laws will do to our country.

● (2140)

I believe young people need to know that somebody cares for them, has a genuine interest in them and that we do not want to see them destroy themselves and their future in the drug scene. Laws that have any meaning must have the support of society. They must be fair and just. They must be severe enough to be a deterrent and, hopefully, be strong enough to bring correction.

There are two other issues that I would like to touch upon briefly before I finish. The Government of Canada, through our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), had my wholehearted support in the boycott of the Olympics and in the buying of the new fighter aircraft. We all, I am sure, felt for the youth who looked forward for so long to the competition in Moscow, but what better way was there, short of war, to tell the Soviets that if they were going to act as barbarians in the world community, then they would have to pay a price.

The Russians, I am sure, were wanting, by hosting the Olympics, to demonstrate to the world what a fine, civilized and responsible Communistic government can be. By their intervention in Afghanistan, the Soviets vindicated those of us who believe that they still have world domination in mind.

Because of the recent happenings in the world, especially in the Middle East, and the continual build-up of the Soviet military machine, I believe that the free world has no alternative but to respond. War is unthinkable, but to be crushed by a ruthless dictator, would, in my opinion, be worse. George Washington once said, "To be prepared for war, is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace".

I would like to suggest that we as Canadians are a very privileged people. We have so much in comparison with the rest of the world. While we are privileged, we must be responsible in ensuring that our freedoms and opportunities are retained in our society, and each generation must come to grips with these matters. A democracy does not have perpetual power. It is something that we must work at and struggle for, to be involved in, to make it a lasting thing. Democracy is everyone's business.

Democracy demands involvement. If left to itself, it rots and decays. It demands the involvement of all of us at all levels of government. Democracy makes each of us responsible for the future of our country, Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, when I left here this afternoon I had a potpourri of experiences from this first session of the Thirty-second Parliament in mind, and I had a collection of rather serious matters which had been left undone. I listened to my learned friend, the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer), this afternoon on matters pertaining to immigration. I have been conscious of our move toward a just society. I brought in a great package of unresolved questions pertaining to immigration matters of a compassionate nature from my riding which I have not been able to resolve.

I must be fair to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and thank him for one or two matters, but when I heard the story of the Calamusa affair as described by the hon. member for Cambridge this afternoon, I went back and reviewed my file and found that retarded children trying to be reunified with families were being denied access and that people were being deported who had compassionate grounds for staying, stories which were heart-rending. I just hope that as a result of the speech this afternoon and the awareness that many of us have gained, a great deal more compassion, consideration and humane judgment will be given to some of the applications and contacts which many of us will be making with the Department of Immigration through the summer break.

Before I get into the heart of my remarks, I would like to share a couple of concerns. Personally I am very concerned that we as a Parliament and a governing body have failed in updating the terms of reference under which the National Energy Board should be working. I believe that if they had more modern terms of reference and a better understanding of the concerns of members of Parliament and Canadians in terms of supply for our children and their children into the future, then perhaps debates of this nature would not be necessary.

I have a criticism of some of the data which is behind the decision-making base. It is really the lack of updated policy which the National Energy Board is using. In my remarks tonight, I urge the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to begin resolving this matter and to present to the beginning of the second session of this Parliament terms of reference for the Energy Board which can be perhaps debated in this House so that the importance of this issue can be impressed in the minds and hearts of Canadian people and can be resolved.

I think that is what this chamber is all about. It behooves all of us sitting during the Thirty-second Parliament to take an interest in this issue and to become involved in it. In my opinion we are using a frame of time which is too short in the calculation of reserves. I would like to understand the part of review or special committee of the House that perhaps can deliver what we want as a Canadian people and what our constituents want in terms of security of energy in the future.

I would also like to have better knowledge about the non-renewable forms of energy and the programs which are ahead in that area. One of the most serious things in terms of the energy debate which is going on—and I speak with all the sincerity I can muster in my heart and soul—is the debate and the stance or the threats which are coming from not only the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) but from this minister of energy in terms of the export gas tax to the western provinces. I want to tell the gentlemen opposite that there is nothing which is concerning the government in my province more than that one single issue and that one single constant threat.

The dollars which this government has threatened to take away from the B.C. treasury are in the order of $250 million to $300 million. I was told yesterday that if that export tax goes through, as threatened by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources of the federal government, by 1985 the sum drain from the provincial treasury from the province of British Columbia will be as high as $1,200 million. Gentlemen, for goodness sake, hear this continuing plea from the western source of energy.

Those provinces have in their history the complete ability and they want to share with the have-not provinces of this country. It is the way in which they share. Allow them to have an input into the sharing. There has never been greed to any degree. But this federal government, if it intends to resolve the constitutional debate into which we are entering, a debate which will be at the hearts of every Canadian over the next two years, will have to back off on the stance that it is taking and the alienation it is causing in terms of a drain on the resource revenues of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

It is quite interesting that all of us in the west, I believe, consider Premier Blakeney to be a man of very great, statesman-like ability, in terms of provincial premiers. I am sure that even he is having great trouble wrestling with the proposition of the federal government. If he intends to represent his province, he must join the no-stand of the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. I ask the government to please not expose this country to a strain which will break it by continuing on the present path taken by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

● (2150)

I should like to point out one of the fundamental differences between the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal party in terms of what we are entering into in the Thirty-second Parliament. We hear a great deal about a national energy strategy, particularly from our friends to the left. We know that the hardworking Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is burning the midnight oil putting together a national industrial strategy.

I anticipate three major pieces of legislation that will come from this new Liberal government with their new mandate. I suggest to everyone in this House that we are moving into an era of highly structured type of law and legislation with bureaucrats, tribunals and agencies to control the decision-making aspect of our lives.

Our approach was different on this side of the House. Our legislation was going to direct itself to behaviour. We were going to spread the decision-making base of the nation into the board rooms, to the presidents and managers of industry. That way we could once again spark this country with the incentives so necessary to create wealth and to take care of the distribution problems that we have.

I see one of my friends on the government benches shaking his head. If he does not know what I am talking about perhaps he should do some reading, even if it is newspaper clippings. We are into a period of a highly structured type of law.

I can also warn every member of the House that we will be faced with a new set of regulations and instructions from FIRA which will give more control over foreign corporations. I do not suppose anyone in the House will object to that, Mr. Speaker. I would bet, however, that that type of control will be exerted over Canadian corporations as well. We will be offered a competition act that will be highly structured. Business and the incentive sector will answer to tribunals, to committees and agencies.

We have moved away from a very sincere and energetic effort on the part of the Clark government toward incentives, tax credits on incremental increases for research and development so that once again the boardrooms of this nation could direct their monetary energies into high risk areas. In this way we could generate new technologies, new techniques, update productivity and start creating wealth so that we would be able to compete in the industrial world. All that has gone, Mr. Speaker. We are moving to the socialist approach of a highly structured economy where the bureaucrats are wiser than all the people gambling their own savings and making the decisions.

An hon. Member: Tell them what they want to hear.

Mr. Huntington: I should like now to make some observations about the NDP. This is the party that is always calling for a national industrial strategy. The only national industrial strategy they have ever offered is to impose state ownership on the production of goods and services.

I was very surprised the other night, and I mentioned my surprise, when the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) spoke about the small business community. I wept at that; I was really moved. I have noticed in the election campaigns in which I have been involved since 1972 that the NDP always talks about taxes. Two-thirds of their campaign literature is directed to taxes. They want indexing removed from middle and upper income earners so that their level of tax is increased.

I know enough about Marxist doctrine, Mr. Speaker, to know that the method is to tax employers and merchants and take taxation from the workers. When the NDP preoccupy themselves with taxes, they are occupying themselves with matters that are of concern and importance only to merchants and employers. They are in turn attacking the business community and those who make it work. That includes the small and medium sectors to which, every once in a while, they like to promise something.

The tax question that they present by rote is for the bourgeoisie, Mr. Speaker. Make no mistake about that. Workers are naturally concerned about deductions, negotiations and catch-up. The wage in the marketplace is the commodity of labour power. Competition assures that the take home pay is all that the worker gets. Herein lies one of the great challenges for each and every one of us in this House.

This party, Mr. Speaker, places a high priority on spreading the benefits of capitalism across to the work force. I personally will continue my efforts in all committee hearings, to encouraging share ownership and taxation plans like RRSPs which allow workers to buy with pre-tax dollars more and more of the wealth-creating opportunities in this country.

The New Democratic Party is always crying for rent controls. It is interesting that Marxist activists always work against the landlords, Mr. Speaker—against the free market concept. This continuous attack delivers nothing but shortages. Anyone who wants to know what a housing shortage is should visit the west coast to find out. Incentives have been removed for those people who have saved, for the people who have capital, to invest it and to create shelters.

Therein lies another of the dilemmas which stems from the continuous attention to socialist dogma. We have delivered everything to consumerism. It is time that we returned to a balance between consumerism and supply. The shortage of goods is causing an inflationary pressure that will never be licked until some government policies move into this area.

These shortages do not serve man, Mr. Speaker. They do not serve the low income earner that the NDP is always championing. In my opinion, the NDP position on rentals is completely wrong. This is still a free enterprise system, I hope. If the incentive is removed, there will naturally be a shortage.

In all their activities during the elections and in this House, the New Democratic Party creates irritants, they never create cures. They only serve their own political ends with their activity.

The NDP does not really give a tinker's darn about tenants. They do not give a tinker's darn about the individual or the sense of individualism in our society and neither, in my opinion, do the mandarins of organized labour who are their bosses.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: Most of Canada's problems could be solved if we were to create the environment to encourage Canadian savings and capital. I do not see that happening in the moves taken by the Liberal government. The NDP programs destroy capital. How can any of their programs create capital, considering the way they want to spend and create deficits. They show no ability to take a risk. They agitate tenants and use their rancour and cliches only to gain political advantage for themselves. They offer irritants, never solutions. Industrial strategy and planned economy are but catchwords. Their industrial strategy is only state ownership of the means of producing goods and services. Can the NDP tell us what the alternative to capitalism is? What is the alternative, gentlemen? How do we achieve it?

An hon. Member: Socialism is the alternative.

Mr. Huntington: They are long on listing the evils of capitalism but they never offer a correction or a solution that will lead man as an individual or man with the freedom to set the goals, to achieve and to create wealth.

An hon. Member: You are running out of gas.

Mr. Huntington: Marxist doctrine has not survived the test of time because no situation has developed—

An hon. Member: Groucho or Harpo?

Mr. Huntington: —where the doctrine has been applied in its genuine form. Possibly the country that came closest to the Marxist ideal was the United States, a highly industrialized society. It is a society that was built on capitalism, free enterprise and taxation laws—

An hon. Member: Argentina. Chile.

Mr. Huntington: —that encourages initiative.

I am really getting to them now, Mr. Speaker. This system of rigid forward planning, in my opinion, is totally false. I cannot see all the developing aspects of the future. But this is what they want in their industrial strategy. They want everything tied down into a framework that is immovable and entrenched.

• (2200)

Did Marx see the technological revolution which has taken the labour and the sweat out of the labour of man? No, he did not. That is one of the reasons so many of the doctrines and so many other countries have failed. An industrial revolution which we are in the middle of today will enlighten and reduce the labours of man, but Marx did not see that. Nowhere in a planned economy can you adjust to the exciting technological evolution that is coming out of man's mind today.

In my opinion, capitalism does make a beneficial contribution to human development. But we have not yet reached the stage where the benefit of capital is available for all. I think that that is the challenge which this government on the other side might pick up. I will certainly needle them as an opposition member because I think we need taxation laws which will allow the pre-tax purchase of equity and shares in the place of work of Canadian labour. If we can do that, capitalism will have a shot in the arm. It will put the socialist dogma into the garbage can once and for all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think this debate is somewhat arid for us all here in the House of Commons, first because of the very warm weather we have had in recent days and also because of the incessant work that the New Democratic Party has forced us to do in the past couple of days. Of course, we all need to be in our ridings as soon as possible to be able to discuss with our people, to know their problems a little better, to hear their points of view on the different policies we implement from here. Unfortunately, it seems certain members of the House did not understand that and decided to keep us here just to draw some publicity. Still I do want to be consistent, and I am happy, Mr. Speaker, to be able to speak tonight for several reasons.

First of all, this is the first time I have sat in this august chamber, as I was newly elected on February 18, and tonight I have a chance to tell you what I think, to sum up the work that has been done in the past few months. When you come here to work in the interest of your people, the first thing you try to do is to understand what people need and what the people you represent want. That is what I have tried to do. I tried to find out if my colleagues from all parties shared the same view. Of course, that becomes difficult because we are caught here five days a week, sometimes more, and at the same time we have to be at home to know what our people think.

From that context it is still easy to determine who in the House is serious and who is not. One thing that appears certain to me is that there are fundamental differences between what the Progressive Conservatives may think on certain points and what we may think on others. It is the same thing on the pipeline as on any other project. Our goals are different, and so are our views. Still, I noticed that the Progressive Conservatives are serious in what they do. When they ask a question and a minister answers, they listen to the answer. If they have criticisms to make, they make them. If they do not agree, they say so. As you know, Mr. Speaker, tonight there was a motion introduced on the pre-build section of the northern pipeline. It was introduced by a member of the New Democratic Party. I am pleased. It is part and parcel of the rights and rules of the House to be able to introduce motions when what has been done is considered inadequate. Be assured that I have deep respect for the parliamentary leader of that party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I will try to tell you in English, and I hope that my friends will understand. Tonight is the first time that I have spoken in English in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gimaïel: I am very respectful of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for the knowledge he has of the rules of the House. I understood the point of view he gave tonight. He thinks deeply that the government is not acting legally by taking the position to commence the pre-build. We have received assurance from the government that all is okay. I respect the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for telling us in the House that he does not agree. I want to tell the hon. member that I hope his friends in the NDP take an example from him. What we saw from this party over the last few days, and I do not want to go over it, but when his colleagues were asking questions of ministers they were speaking throughout the time a minister was answering those questions.

I remember quite well when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) made his speech announcing the decision. There was no one except the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and perhaps one or two others of that party, who were listening.

Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I will address you. I want to tell you more about this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Well done.

Mr. Gimaïel: If somebody wants to criticize or speak in the House, it is important to understand what a minister is saying. I can tell hon. members that the intervention given tonight by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the only one truly based on facts coming from the NDP throughout this debate on the pre-build. All the rest did it for publicity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Gimaïel: And I do not accept this as a member of this House.

I thought the letter "N" meant new. When you are new, you are usually aggressive, especially in the economy. I always thought the letter "D" stood for democratic. Democratic means that when you take a decision you go and see the people in your riding and listen carefully to the people in this country, including the workers and their unions. Usually the letter "P" stands for the party. But I am asking myself now that perhaps the name should be "Non-Development Party" instead of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gimaïel: Mr. Speaker, while addressing my colleagues through you, I shall say that this country called Canada, which has a very important neighbour called the United States, has always developed. It has always been in the forefront because, instead of waiting to see what our American friends would do, we often forestalled them, we provoked them, not with weapons but with ideas and actions, actions we took at the economic and social levels. Today they are looking at us, our American friends, they are looking at our health policies, and they are saying: How do they have social policies which are so strong, which are so good in that country? They want to do the same, but they are far behind.

• (2210)

Today, they look at us when they see that this country has succeeded in respecting its basic cultures, and tomorrow, they will look at us and say: How can you have so much energy at work and so much energy in the literal sense: Oil, gas, electricity, and so on? What this government has decided to do is to use the powers conferred by a bill which said that, provided the required guarantees were there, they could go ahead and build a pipeline. We are doing this because we know that Mr. Carter, in his capacity as President, and the Congress, which represents the American people, needed someone to show leadership to build the Alaska highway pipeline. We are giving them this leadership and they will act as promised. Mr. Speaker, to do this, you need social and economic awareness.

I was listening to certain members say that we should keep for tomorrow the two trillion cubic feet of gas that we could sell to the Americans. When a country has one million unemployed in such a difficult economic situation for North America and the western world, it has no right to abandon investments of half a billion dollars which can produce $22 billion. If this is gambling, if this is playing heads or tails, as a young Canadian member of Parliament, I am ready to meet this challenge and to gamble, because I am sure that we shall win.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to say: We have enough; we shall keep our gas for tomorrow. However, you have to go and see those who are unemployed today, you have to go and see the industries. Even in my own constituency, there are industries directly related to this issue. I am from Lac-Saint-Jean, thousands of miles from where the pipeline will be built. Can we afford to put this problem aside, especially when the workers' unions are telling us to go ahead? These are the same unions for which this party is supposed to be working. They have never worked for the workers. I hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) shouting. I am not surprised. We are discussing a motion that he introduced himself in the House. Instead of listening, what is he doing? He is shouting. He can go on shouting, what he says will still be irrelevant. Excuse me, Mr. Speaker.

Just the same, seriousness must be exercised at some point. It is my belief that this government, the government built by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), one of the best this country has had and an extremely active one, shares the same concern as the other ones we have had over these last 12 years. And this includes our Progressive Conservative friends, because they did have just the same concern for pushing Canada forward. Even though we disagreed on programs and they made mistakes that at some point brought us back to the government, they had that concern and that seriousness.

Just the same, that concern for the well-being of all Canadians is shared by this government with every other one led by the right hon. Prime Minister, the concern not for the bulk of Canadians, not for Canadian corporations, not for the Canadian government, but for each and every Canadian to have what he needs. It is not good enough that today our young people have to shoulder the hardship of too few jobs. With the pre-build we want to help them, as we have helped them with various programs.

It is not good enough either to assume that future generations will lack some things. Because in my view the most extraordinary trait of pseudo-socialists on this earth is that they are pessimists. They are afraid of the future. We Liberals believe in the future, and to believe in the future one must believe in the present. And believing in the present is going forward. What are we doing here but making a step forward?

Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty if I continued this debate without mentioning something basic and I hope that all hon. members will understand the meaning of my remarks.

An hon. Member: You blew it again!

Mr. Gimaïel: I wish to know if before taking a stand the leaders of the New Democratic Party consulted someone about this. Their own supporters, the unions are endorsing the position of the government. In our ridings the people have applauded this decision. Everyone here in Canada, except the so-called experts, understand that it is by co-operating with the Americans that we shall get results and also by co-operating with each other and by giving what we have to give to the modern world that we are going to develop as a nation.

When we call our American friends foreigners, we are talking about human beings like us. And someone who comes and tells me that, when we have a reserve of 71 trillion cubic feet of gas and that we cannot sell two trillion cubic feet to our neighbours, probably because they are foreigners, that person completely forgets that we owe most of our modern technology to those same foreigners. That person forgets that we live in the same world as they do and that we are only separated by a black line on a geographic map. They are human beings like us and we have been living side by side for 200 years. Of course, they are not communists, they are capitalists like us. If Mr. Carter was called by another name, if he was from a socialist country, our friends might have more confidence in him, but he lives in a democratic country and is not elected for life, as we know. We have confidence in those neighbours called Americans. Because they have been our neighbours for a long time and we have a good relationship. And they have always kept their commitments towards Canada and they will continue to keep them better than the people of the New Democratic Party, than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—I am sorry but I do not refer to you and your experience when I say this—better than those people have respected their commitments to their electors at the time of the last election. I hope their electors remember that four years from now.

One thing is sure, Mr. Speaker, and that is that our country, under the leadership of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, has become the country whose minorities are the most respected, the country whose social laws are the most balanced, the country whose economic development has best been achieved, the country where inflation has done the least harm to the poor, the country whose economy is developed the most, and now the country with the greatest energy resources; and there are only 26 million inhabitants in the wonderful country the Liberals have built and rebuilt from the bottom up in the last hundred years.

We will not allow a group of pseudo-socialists to set us back a hundred years every decade: that we shall not. We shall continue to work toward the development of that country and make of it, no matter what our socialist friends think, a capitalist country, a country that is respected, whose social laws are strong, just and fair to all Canadians, no matter where they live.

You know, Mr. Speaker, though I cannot see the Rocky Mountains from my house, I can say one thing: I have never considered even for one moment that my country is limited to my Lac-Saint-Jean area. If there are people in this House who think that because gas is sold on the other side of the Rockies those who live on this side of them have to do without, they are mistaken, because the people in British Columbia will continue to sell gas, if they so desire, as will the people in Alberta. But the people in eastern Canada, as the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) said a few moments ago, will also be able to benefit from the pipeline we are about to build.

In conclusion, I want to emphasize the hard work done by each minister and by each member of Parliament in the last months. But never, Mr. Speaker, will I forget the filibuster orchestrated in committee by the New Democratic Party during the last few weeks, and the publicity that they have tried to get from the House in the past few days. I am going back to my constituents, I will try to listen to them and hope they listen to me.

● (2220)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the speech we have just heard is the type that we generally get during an election campaign, and not in a place where words carry their full meaning. It was similar to some speeches I heard during the campaign in Quebec, over gas and oil. It was very confused in some respects. However, I must say I admire the hon. member for his enthusiasm. Since he is a neophyte in the House I hope we will have the opportunity to hear him again in the future.

I would indicate especially to the party whip and the House leader that they should not be in such a hurry to muzzle government backbenchers. There is always that tendency. Tonight I do not really want to talk about the issue raised by the socialists, but I would like to address the question of the pipeline. However, since the person concerned speaks only English, I will continue in English. I will return to the discussion on an issue which concerns us all here in the House and in Parliament, the entire administration.

[English]

I do not want to say anything about the pipeline tonight.

An hon. Member: You don't know anything!

Mr. Lambert: Oh, I have heard from some of those bayers in the NDP whose only connection with the petroleum business is when they drive up to the pumps with their cars and say "Fill 'er up!" And then they blast away with gas at subsidized prices. That is all they say, and that is all they know.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert: I want to talk about that other individual known as the hon. senator from southern Alberta who is a member of the cabinet and who last Saturday, in Calgary, at a press conference, would never have made a statement about all the Alberta members of this House and their stand on the so-called pre-build section of the Alaskan gas pipeline had he been looking at me or any of my colleagues face to face, because he would have been called a bare-faced and public liar, twisting for purely partisan purposes. That is a measure of the bankruptcy of the Liberal party in Alberta, and that is all I say.

I want to talk about something which affects hon. members of this House even more. Certain events have transpired during the last few weeks which highlight this problem. First, we have received the eighth report of the advisory group on executive compensation in the public service. This touches on salaries, allowances, and other conditions of employment in what is known as the DM-SX salary range which will be revised effective April 1, 1980. At the lowest level is the SX-1 where the minimum of the range is $36,800 rising to a maximum of $50,600 up through six ranges to a DM-3—Deputy Minister 3—where the minimum is $68,900 to a maximum of $85,700. That is in the public service. The commission explained how it arrived at the increases—the 9.5 point increase at the mid-point of the various ranges.

Then there appeared Bill C-34 which is an amendment to the Judges Act, highly overdue, providing for increases in the numbers of judges, increases in pay, the changing of the pension structure of federally appointed judges, the salaries of the Auditor General, the Commissioner of Official Languages, and the Chief Electoral Commissioner. Now, Mr. Speaker, I indicated that the maximum salary potentially paid to a DM-3 was $85,700. Under this act, the Chief Justice of this country will be paid $88,000, and variously down, so that justices of the Superior Courts of the Queen's Bench Division, the Federal Court, will be paid $70,000 per annum. There are two catch-up phases dated April 1, 1979, and April 1, 1980, each of $6,500.

However, there is an additional feature which some of us find disturbing—I do—and that is a provision whereby what had been a contributory pension scheme introduced in 1975 after a good deal of pressure from members of this House on both sides is now being revoked, and all that will be collected by way of pension contributions from federally-appointed judges will be a one per cent levy toward a supplementary remuneration act which provides for increases in the pension due to inflation.

I seem to recall—and at this point my figures are rather rough—that this non-contributory pension scheme is about the equivalent of another salary, because if tax were paid on that second slice it would yield tax dollars which, if invested in an annuity, would yield about the retirement pension of a federally appointed judge. Incidentally, the minimum period, now by right and not by consent of the minister as heretofore, will be 15 years, but in some cases only ten years of tenure will entitle a judge to receive a full pension on retirement for whatever reason—it may be disability and so on. In any event, ten years is the minimum period. But the average period is 15 years of service.

The third event was a report during the past few days that there has been discussion among members of Parliament about changes to be made to our own pension scheme. The press talked about secrecy and so forth. Since I was involved, I want to say quite candidly that we have been looking at certain details and testing out members to see what their reaction was to certain proposals. This is the point the process has reached. The maximum pension payable to members requires 25 years of service which can be made up, in the case of ministers, on the basis that the salaries they touch as ministers may count as payments into the scheme. But an average working member of Parliament must put in 25 years of contributions.

● (2230)

When we consider that the average period of service in this House is somewhere between six and eight years, we can readily see that only a limited number of people will reach the 25-year mark. If the good Lord allows me another year or less, I will have achieved 25 years of service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: Other colleagues of mine have achieved this, such as the very eminent chairman of the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), and others. We speak with a certain amount of dispassionate interest because nothing that is done affects our pensions in so far as we are concerned.

When I came here 24.5 years ago, my salary as a member of Parliament, my expense allowance and my allowance as a parliamentary secretary, were in excess of the salary of an assistant deputy minister. Now an assistant deputy minister can buy me out twice. It was the same situation with the salaries of county court judges. My salary plus expenses actually exceeded the remuneration he received from the federal side. He was compensated in some way by the surrogate fees to which he was entitled under a provincial pay scheme. Now that self-same judge receives $65,000.

We in this House have a real problem respecting our salaries compared to those of heads of Crown corporations, the governor of the Bank of Canada, people appointed to the PMO under order in council, and ranking House officers on the administration side. A very disparate gap has crept in over the years, all because the different groups are marching at a different step to a different tune, resulting in these particular dislocations.

We know the salary scales in government agencies and banks. For instance, the salary of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is less than that of the Chief Justice or that of the Auditor General. The Auditor General receives $78,000 and the Commissioner for Elections receives not much less than that, as does the Commissioner for Official Languages. But there are very senior people, such as the governor of the Bank of Canada and the president of the Federal Business Development Bank, whose salaries are tied into that of the Prime Minister. That result is in the middle-range salary levels where there is a total bleedout of trained personnel.

When I look at some of the agencies which perform essential services for government, I wonder how those at the top management level can possibly tolerate the situation where they train bright, young men and women, and lose them because they cannot pay adequate salaries. Where does this all lead? As I have a notice of motion on the order paper, I would advocate to hon. members that we follow the example of our friends in Australia. In 1973 they set up a remuneration review tribunal under the remuneration tribunals act, 1973. This body was named by the governor in council and headed by a state-appointed judge, not a federally appointed one. This tribunal reviews all salaries of judges, Crown corporations and public servants. Also they have a different tribunal which touches on what they call tertiary educational institutions.

I should like to refer to their report of 1979 which reads in part as follows:

> We have followed the practice established by the tribunal in past reviews. Advertisements were placed in 16 newspapers indicating the coverage of the review and inviting interested persons, organizations and associations to submit in writing any reviews they consider should be taken into account in the review . . . Also, as in earlier reviews, letters were written to the Prime Minister (inviting an over-all submission from the government)—

The government does not make a decision in this regard. The government is merely a party making a submission to a tribunal. It continues:

> —to the leaders of each parliamentary party (inviting a submission from each party), to each member of Parliament (including supplementary requests to each minister inviting submissions on holders of first division offices and holders of public offices within his portfolio), to the Attorney General (inviting a submission relating to judges), to the Chief Justice and to the chief judges of other federal courts, to all first division officers of the public service, and to individual statutory office holders or chairmen of statutory authorities covered by the act.

In 1979 they received 388 written submissions, which was an excellent review and testing of public opinion. Nothing was done on the quiet. They brought in a report. The government made certain comments with regard to the holding of salaries in certain branches, and the commissioner said:

> We are not persuaded that we should follow this course.

Then, according to the act, the report is given to a minister who reports on behalf of the tribunal, and within 15 days of its receipt he must table it in the House. The report will take effect, unless within 15 days of its receipt or tabling there shall be passed a motion in either House objecting to it. If the motion objecting carries, it all stops. But the government itself is not party to the appointing of the commission, and it defers its own discretion to some time in the future. The beauty of this is that a professionally constituted and practised body examines the requirements of office and the salaries that should be paid. It is able to weigh them all, one against the other, and maintain a semblance of justice and continuity.

● (2240)

There is no question, as in the Judges Act, of appointing commissioners after three years who will then examine the situation with regard to judges over and beyond the cost of living clause which is included in the bill which will widen the disparity between, shall we say, this House and members of the judiciary or the public service, and it seems to me that we have to put some rationality into this whole system. And what better way, because members who were here in 1974 will remember the road to Calvary, preceded by the Gethsemane in their constituencies, with regard to proposed salary increases, which were modest enough as they were, but having been deferred so long they appeared to be inordinate at one time to some people.

Somehow the public got the idea that it was wrong for elected bodies to set their own salaries. Do the publishers and editors of newspapers, who are directors of publishing companies, not set their own salaries? Do directors who are officers in private corporations not set their own salaries? It is done every day, but somehow there is some sanctimonious clap-trap which drops out of academic circles and which is found in newspaper columns that it is wrong for people to vote generally about their own salaries. It is the same way, for instance, that I vote for changes in the War Veterans Disability Pensions Act. I am a recipient because of some difficulties which arose during war service, and am I wrong in advocating changes in that or changes in prisoners of war compensation legislation because I was a prisoner of war? Am I wrong? What is wrong there?

However, let us go along to meet the objection which appears in public quarters in an attempt to remove this inequality of compensation at this level. I hope the government will soon bring in a bill based upon the Australian bill so that we have a proper, independent remuneration review tribunal at the public level, and then we will be much better off. Incidentally, this must include pensions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that I am very proud to be a member of this House and to be a Canadian, but I wish to say that I am not very proud of the government of my country this evening because it has perpetrated here one of the potentially greatest sell-outs and one of the greatest rip-offs we have seen in the history of this country. The government has made that decision without a discussion here in Parliament, without guarantees from the Americans and without input by this Parliament, and I think it is about time we, as parliamentarians, had more input in the decision-making in this country and that we built a Canada in which we used our resources for this generation of the Canadian people and for generations to come. We should have some kind of vision of Canada, Canadianism, sovereignty for our people, nation building and nationhood, and I am afraid I do not see it in the sell-out which was announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) just a few days ago in this House.

Why do I say that? We have heard many arguments made by my party already without regard to the fact that we have absolutely no guarantees that the rest of the line will be built. We have no guarantees whatsoever that the Americans will indeed spend money on the rest of the line. We have no guarantees with regard to a swap, and there is a possibility that in the future we will have shortages of natural gas in this country.

I said that Parliament was not involved, and I heard some mumbles in the back benches of the Liberal party. I heard mumbles from some of the quiet back benchers who never speak except from their seats. They are beginning to be a bit concerned, and I want to say to them that there is a Northern Pipeline Act, and there has been a number of people who have questioned whether the government has the legal authority or power to do what it is doing under that law. Many people have said that the government does not. However, leaving that aside, I want to say that the pre-build is the beginning—if it is to be concluded—of the most expensive project ever undertaken in this country. Its cost will be $23 billion, and yet this institution, Parliament, is having no say at all in the matter.

We have not had a committee of this Parliament. We have not had a committee to look at the question. We did not have a debate before the decision was made. What we are having tonight is a debate after the fact. We are asked to rubber stamp a decision which has been made by the government. It has been made by the minister in the Senate and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What is Parliament? Are we a bunch of political eunuchs who do not have any real clout or say? Where does the power reside? Does it reside only with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the PMO and the PCO? Does it reside only with the cabinet and the senior bureaucrats and in the board rooms of some of the corporations of this country?

Mr. Blaikie: Yes.

Mr. Nystrom: The other thing which makes me rise in this debate after spending some 12 years as a parliamentarian is that I think more and more people are becoming cynical about the governments and politicians of this country, and they are becoming so with just cause.

I have taken the trouble to look up statements made by Liberals in the House in the last few months, and I think we would be doing the people a great service if we were to take the December 6 Hansard, frame it, and send it out to every single voter in this country to show voters the hypocrisy of the Liberal party which sits across the way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I will give a few examples. Old "ironclad" or "ironside", the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, said on December 6 after the Conservative government announced the selling of 3.7 trillion cubic feet of gas to the United States, and I quote:

I think that today we had another unbelievable statement from this government. I think this statement will be one that Canada will live to regret and that may go down in history as one of the greatest sell-outs we have seen.

The same minister six months later announced an even greater sell-out of natural gas to the United States. Is there any Liberal in this House who can justify that type of flip-flop and hypocrisy?

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) is walking out behind the curtain in shame. He is embarrassed and has a red face. Look at him.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: He is back.

Mr. Stollery: I would just like to point out to the hon. member who is speaking, who alluded to me and who said I was standing behind the curtain, that if there was any reason for me to have walked out, which I did not, it would have been the tedious boredom brought about by his speech.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Rose: He is gone again.

Mr. Nystrom: That is about how serious the Liberal party is.

Mr. Cullen: Let's try somebody else.

Mr. Nystrom: Somebody else?

Mr. Cullen: Not me.

Mr. Nystrom: In the same speech the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, and I quote:

In our view, exports of natural gas to the United States should be authorized only on the basis of, first of all, an ironclad commitment regarding the building of the whole Alaska gas pipeline. Everything has to be signed, sealed and delivered, particularly the financing plan and the financing guarantees, before we start exporting one cubic foot of gas out of this country to the United States.

● (2250)

I asked the Liberal party how seven months later they can justify exporting even more natural gas to the United States without any guarantees whatsoever, except a letter from the President of the United States, which is hardly worth the paper it is printed on, a joint resolution of the American Senate and of the American Congress. I could go on and on about the sell-out, hypocrisy and flip-flops of the Liberal party. I have here a quote of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) which can be found at page 2103 in the December 6, 1979, Hansard. It concerns the sell-out of natural gas by the Conservative party. The hon. member weeps, groans, moans, and crocodile tears run down his face. He says:

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister. I should like to know from him whether, in the export sale he announced tonight, he intends also to include in the bargain for export his mother and his father, his grandmother and his grandfather, his daughter and his son, his granddaughter and his grandson; all the children, sons and daughters and all the grandsons and granddaughters of the 23 million Canadians whose heritage he is supposed to protect? Will he answer this question, please?

I would like to see the hon. member for Davenport come into this House and vote on the motion which is in front of it this evening. Is he still concerned with the sell-out and with the heritage of his children and grandchildren? If he is, how can he sit in the Liberal party which now intends to sell even more natural gas to the United States than was authorized by the Conservative government a few short months ago? One can go on and on. One can find here a statement by the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae) who said, as it is reported in the same issue of Hansard, at page 2104:

I find this additional export permit a very, very dangerous thing. It disturbs me a great deal.

How can the Liberal party say one thing when they are out of office, but when they are in office say exactly the opposite? Is it any wonder at all why more and more people are growing cynical toward the Liberal party which sits across the way? Surely to goodness the two characteristics in politicians that are important are consistency and honesty. I see one or two Liberals nodding their heads. The Liberal party is exhibiting exactly the opposite to consistency and honesty. In fact, on this issue and other issues, that party has taken more positions than the very famous person Xaviera Hollander. I think that is an absolute crime, that the government of this country would get up and do such things.

Mr. Cullen: He is getting sore now.

Mr. Nystrom: I notice that the trained seals are getting very excited. It is no wonder that they are very excited. We have had a debate now for several days and not one cabinet minister has participated in that debate. I ask why it is that the most senior person on the other side of the House to speak in this debate is the good old friend from Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), the famous old parachute from Lincoln? He is the only person of any stature in that party who has participated in this debate. Where is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Prime Minister, or the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), who is negotiating for the pipeline? I would like to know where these people are and why they are not participating in the debate which is before the House.

This is a very important debate, and the way in which the government is handling the matter and their disrespect for Parliament cause a great deal of concern. I can just see the way in which they are treating Parliament now that they are a majority. The opposition does not count any more. Members are nobodies once they are a few feet off Parliament Hill. It is not only the decision on the pre-build without a parliamentary committee, but it is the mini-budget in April brought in by the Minister of Finance without any consultation with the opposition parties and the oil tax announced a week or two ago without any consultation with the opposition parties.

There is a very serious constitutional discussion going on in this country without a committee of this Parliament looking at the constitution. This is very important, yet the government said that it would consider establishing a committee of this House to look at the constitution. We have had no special debate at all in this House on the constitution, except for the one day on an NDP motion on about May 21 or May 22.

Will the government consult Parliament and involve Parliament in these matters? If it does not involve Parliament and parliamentarians, I suggest that it is a tremendous slap in the face to Canadian people, because if there is one place where we must defend freedom at its ultimate, it is in this institution of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I suggest that the government is very arrogant in the way in which it is treating people in this country.

Mr. Foster: It is too late for the news, Lorne. Sit down.

Mr. Nystrom: All the Liberal members can do is sit back and heckle. I would like to see one of them get up in this House and talk about the need of keeping our resources, our gas and oil, and developing them for Canadians of future generations. Instead, we have a lot of talk that we must sell out very quickly to the United States so that we may make a few bucks.

No hon. member in this House has mentioned the fact that both Canada and the United States are energy gluttons. We consume a great deal of energy, while two-thirds of mankind in the world live in countries that are very poor, where millions of people are going to bed hungry every day because they do not have enough food to put into their bellies. Yet this government is concerned about making a few bucks on the short term by selling our gas to the United States.

There are a number of risks in constructing the pre-build portion of the pipeline. A number of hon. members have mentioned many of them over the past couple of days, but I want to cover them very quickly again. The first risk is with regard to cost overruns. About three years ago when we began talking about the pipeline it was said that it would cost $8 billion to construct the pipeline in its entirety. The projection now is for a cost of $23 billion or $24 billion. That will make Drapeau look very insignificant. It will make the construction of the Olympic complex look like a Sunday school picnic in comparison.

Another risk concerns the investment of the Canadian people. I suggest that it is not a very sound investment when one looks at all the tax concessions given by this government and the government of Alberta to people who invest in the oil and gas industry. Approximately 90 per cent of every deal is written off in income tax, and only about 10 per cent is put out by the companies themselves. What we are doing is financing the takeover of our economy and our resources with our own money. Our control is vested in the hands of the large multinational corporations, many of which are from outside this country.

Need I remind the government opposite that the five largest exporters or producers of natural gas in Canada are Shell Oil, Gulf Oil, Imperial Oil, Hudson's Bay Gas and Oil Company, and Amoco. There is only one company which is controlled and owned by the Canadian people, and that is Petro-Canada, which is now involved in producing natural gas.

Mr. Kempling: How about Husky Oil?

Mr. Nystrom: If we intend to use taxpayers' money to develop gas and oil in this country, then the taxpayers should own and control that company because we are paying for it with our own money.

Another matter which should be of concern to this House is the possibility that the Americans may never build the rest of the gas pipeline, because they are discovering more gas reserves in the lower 48 states. There are more and more gas reserves being discovered in Mexico, and there is the very fact that we are building the pre-build, which means that we will export more and more Canadian gas from Alberta to the United States. Because of that increased supply there will be less pressure on the United States to build the rest of the line. Why should they? They will get the gas from us, the cheapest possible source. If they can get it from us and if we are stupid enough to sell it to them, then, of course, they are going to be content.

There is a very good chance that history may be repeating itself. If you think back to the 1960s and early 1970s you will remember that we were selling very cheap oil to the United States then at $2.50 and $4 per barrel. Just a few years later, despite the fact that the National Energy Board and the minister of energy at that time, Mr. Green, said that we had a lot of oil in this country—enough to last for dozens of years, even hundreds of years—we are running short of oil. We are now faced with mining and refining the very expensive tar sands oil. We sold our cheap oil, and now present and future generations will have to pay world price for oil. That is the fault of the Liberal government sitting across the way. That government decided to ship out cheap Canadian oil in order to make a few bucks. They did it without foresight or plan, and now we have to pay high prices for imported oil from the United States or Venezuela.

I have one minute left, Mr. Speaker, so I want to say in closing that I wish this government had spent some of that money to expand the pipeline into eastern Canada. If they had, people in the Atlantic provinces, people in Halifax, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island would have access to Canadian gas. We could use that Canadian gas as a substitute for oil. If we have a good supply we can use it to make our industry more competitive, to heat homes across the country, and thus ease the pressures of the cost of living on ordinary Canadians. We should be saving it for ourselves and for future generations. We should be thinking about the future of Canada, Mr. Speaker, about building a nation and exerting our sovereignty and independence to build a strong country for Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to add my thoughts to this debate on the pre-build section of the Alaska pipeline. For the last seven days, and indeed in the last 24 hours, I have had the opportunity to hear from what I call the party of fiction in this House, the New Democratic Party.

As a backbench member of the Liberal party I welcome the opportunity to put forward some facts on the matter and to get away from the rhetoric of the last 24 hours.

The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel), who spoke previously, said that having listened to members of the New Democratic Party in the last several days he felt they should switch their name from the New Democratic Party to the Non-Development Party. That comes as no surprise to me, Mr. Speaker. When I hear the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) referring to cynics on this side of the House, then, as a young parliamentarian who has only been here since February 18, I share the feelings of the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean. When I came here I expected to find that most members in this House would deal with their philosophies and feelings. I agree with him when he says that the only speaker from the New Democratic Party with some credibility in the last 24 hours was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I do not know why that came as a surprise. I was not surprised to see the cynicism developing on the other side of the House.

When we went through the recent referendum debate in this House, two parties supported the federalist position on the Oui-Non issue in the province of Quebec. Only one party refused to take a stand—the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is not true and you know it.

Mr. Frith: I expect that to some extent the reason the New Democratic Party—the party that claims to be the social and political conscience of our country—refused to take a stand on the critical issue in the province of Quebec was that many workers for the New Democratic Party who reside in the province of Quebec supported the separatist faction in that province.

I am only going to dwell on two particular issues, Mr. Speaker, to set the record straight on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada. First, I should like to deal with our commitment in the Speech from the Throne when we stated that one of the key sectors of our economy, where we wanted to have greater Canadian control, was the petroleum industry. Unlike the New Democratic Party, when the Liberal Party of Canada makes a commitment, whether in the Speech from the Throne or in a policy statement made by a minister in this House, we at least put our actions where our rhetoric is. That is not like the rhetoric I have heard emanating from the New Democratic Party in the last few days.

An hon. Member: Give us the facts.

Mr. Frith: When the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) said we should not sell our Canadian gas but save it for our own consumption—then I suppose if I were the member where Alice in Wonderland resided, I could understand his statement. But I do not live in a riding that represents the Alice in Wonderlands of the world, Mr. Speaker. I live in and represent a riding that has a good cross section of Canadian population. They not only have dreams about where this country is going but are prepared to accept reality in order to make those dreams come true. That, unfortunately, is the problem with the New Democratic Party. They are unable to face reality in order to attain the dreams that people on all sides of this House have for this great country of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has restated several times the commitment made in the Speech from the Throne to increase Canadian ownership of our petroleum industry. This was part of the complex decision to go ahead with the pre-build. The minister responsible and other members on this side of the House have admitted that this was a risk decision. I will say that the reason the Liberal Party of Canada has been the Government of Canada so often in the years since confederation is that we have been able to marry reality with dreams.

When we talked about increased Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry, one fact that has not come out in the debate so far is that 70 per cent of the exploratory wells are being drilled by small Canadian firms. It is not that they are not successful Canadian firms; they have been quite successful in finding new gas deposits. The problem has been the inability to send the gas to a market. As a result, these small Canadian firms have been squeezed by the banking community and others to the point that they have a cash flow problem. The government—the Liberal party—recognized that if we were not to proceed with the pre-build section of the Alaska pipeline, those who would suffer the most would be these small Canadian firms. One of two things would have occurred. They would have had to go further into debt to the banking institutions of this country, or they would have had to sell out to the large multinationals which can afford to wait for the decision.

The government made a very conscious decision to help the Canadian ownership content of our petroleum industry—unlike the New Democratic Party which has always mouthed that principle but when it is time to vote on a pre-build to make that a reality they had us go through a two-day debate. I welcome the opportunity at midnight to stand up and be counted, Mr. Speaker. We know where we stand, but I do not think that party ever understands where they are on any given issue.

There may be another definition for the NDP. Earlier we said it was a non-development party, but given their record in this House in the last three months perhaps we should call them the no-decision party. Whenever it has been convenient for members of the New Democratic Party to use figures from Statistics Canada they do not mind using them as long as they fit in with their thinking. When the National Energy Board states that Canada, particularly as a result of the increase in exploration in the last five years—largely under policies developed by a Liberal government—has a significant excess of natural gas—

• (2310)

Mr. Clark: Is that the Liberal government of Alberta?

Mr. Frith: Had the decision by the government been not to proceed with the pre-build section of the Alaska pipeline, foreign money markets probably would have resulted in a drop in the Canadian dollar which, in turn, would have made the oil imports to this country much more expensive and increased our deficit.

Mr. Rae: Who am I to believe?

Mr. Frith: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has asked us to give the facts. Quite frankly, I think in the last two days the Liberal party has attempted to give the members opposite the facts but they choose not to believe them. We have in front of us telegrams from unions and companies. Several members have stoop up and stated that fact. They are all in support of the pipeline. They choose and they do not want to believe it. They do not wish to believe the statistics given by the National Energy Board.

Two weeks ago in this House I sat and listened to a non-confidence motion in this government put by the New Democratic Party. It said that the Liberal party had mismanaged the economy. The NDP complain every day about the size of the unemployment rolls in this country. But when we try to do something about it by going ahead with the pre-build, they are against it. When they talk about the very little real growth in the gross national product that has occurred in Canada or that is projected for the next year, they complain about it. When the Liberal Party of Canada attempts, through a decision made by the cabinet, to increase our gross national product—which this pipeline will do to the tune of 0.2 per cent this year and which will rise to 0.7 per cent in 1985—they sit there and vote against us.

When I hear the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) complain about the unemployed in his particular riding and all throughout southwestern Ontario with the auto layoffs, etc. and the Liberal government decides to go ahead with the pre-build which will add 23,800 man years of work in the Hamilton ridings alone, the hon. member sits there and votes against us. It is no wonder, as the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has stated earlier, that some Canadians find politicians to be very cynical. It is not from the actions or results of the Liberal party or this government; it is from the actions that I have seen taken by the members of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: I am not going to belabour the point. The Government of Canada has come up with a policy which will add to our gross national product. It will help us in terms of creation of manpower over the next several years. It has been able positively to help Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry in this country.

I will not be afraid to stand up here in 57 minutes time and vote with my conscience. I know exactly what I will do when I come to vote. It is more than I can say for the members of the New Democratic Party who sit in this House.

The reason I welcome this debate is that I am not afraid to face the Canadian people and give them the facts of the matter which contradict the fiction and Alice in Wonderland stories that I have heard emanating from the other side of the House for the last 48 hours. Perhaps when this is all finished the Canadian public will understand that the Liberal party stands for compassion in this country. It stands for a dream, but it also stands for a government which has the ability to govern and take gutsy decisions to make this country become the dream that we all have in this House.

Perhaps when it is all said and done and the vote is taken this evening, Canadians will see the New Democratic Party for what it truly is, that is, a party of opportunists and cynics.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not want in any way to diminish the fervour of the rhetoric by commenting on the speech which the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) has made with respect to the Liberal party. If I have a few moments later on, I can tell everyone in the House about the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I hope my friends on the other side will listen, but what concerns me in this debate, and I think ought to concern every Canadian, is not the Liberal party at this point in the discussion but the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want everyone to cast their minds back to about a week ago when there was a discussion in the media by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), who unfortunately is not here tonight to take part in this debate.

Mr. Epp: He has gone to see Dennis McDermott.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He may be out talking to the United Steelworkers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): In any event, I draw everyone's attention back to that party over there with respect to this pipeline, with respect to the export of natural gas that they were going to fight on the beaches, they were going to fight on the landing fields, they were going to fight in the Rockies, on the backs of the poor and the disadvantaged, but today they are going to fight there, but do not dare ask us to fight beyond twelve o'clock tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I agree with my friends over there. It is not often that I do, but from time to time I am overcome and I will agree with them. I agree with them now that they are the non-development party. With respect to any issues they are the peut-être party—the perhaps party. They are the potential danger party. They are the party of concern. They are the rump of pity and compassion.

An hon. Member: That says it all.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is what we have.

Madam Speaker—Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I also apologize to Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I do not want you to think that they are not above misleading the House—just a little wee bit. It is not enough to amount to that accusation of mine being a question of privilege because everyone knows how I love the rules of this place. But, just a little bit. What they tried to imply in the debate tonight was that at no time was Parliament consulted with respect to the Alaska pipeline. There was a long involved act of Parliament, the leadership for which was taken by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) with respect to the development of that act. The position of this party, my party, with respect to that act was clear in 1977. It is clear tonight, that it is in the best interests of Canada to have the Alaska pipeline built.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Even if the NDP would like to have it that way, even if they would like to have a bunch of helicopters carrying that whole pipeline and dropping it into place, that pipeline cannot be built that way. If we were paving the road in front of the house of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), we would have to pave it in sections. The same is true of the pipeline. We have to build a pipeline in sections, too. That should be obvious. It should be equally obvious to the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I really have them riled up. I did not intend to do that. I am sorry. I am glad to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has come into the House tonight. We can talk about the terms and conditions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I have indicated clearly and the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis) has indicated what the position is and how absolutely silly it is for us to regard this matter of pre-build in any other way but the first step in the development of that pipeline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We might as well face up to it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been praised tonight. I will join in giving him the paean of praise that he deserves for his years of service. Sir John A. Macdonald told me he met him the first day he came to this place! However, his memory is a bit faulty. He tried to liken this situation to the pipeline debate in 1956. We all know what happened in the pipeline debate in 1956. There was a gross abuse of the rules in 1956. As a result, a Speaker resigned. As a result, the Speaker tried to turn back the clock. As a result of that, the late M. J. Coldwell, one of the heroes of socialism in Canada, got out of his seat, marched up there, and nearly grabbed the mace. I did not see the New Democratic Party doing that tonight.

• (2320)

The New Democratic Party says this is illegal. This government, in fact all governments, have to act on advice. If governments mislead the House, if governments get faulty advice and act on it, then governments are responsible. We have been told by a minister of the Crown and, as I said to him, he spun out his credit with that statement the other night, if he is wrong and misled the House, then he is in danger of losing his place in the ministry. That is why I am glad the Prime Minister is in the House tonight.

We were told by that minister that it was all legal and proper. We have to accept that advice. There is nothing else we can do. As the Prime Minister says, it is a judgment call. It is on his head if the judgment call is wrong. However, if the New Democratic Party is really concerned about legalities and illegalities, then the remedy is not in this Parliament. It is in the courtroom, and I ask them to put their money where their mouths are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is the clear position. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) says "politics is in the House." He is the first member I have ever heard to state that there was any politics in the House of Commons. If he is right, Mr. Speaker, "the politics is in the House" all right and the political publicity seekers are standing right over there to my left.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The position is this. If that party really honestly believe in the principles and the position that they are taking, we would not be creeping out of this House at 12 midnight. We would be fighting in the battlefields, in the oil fields and in the gas patches. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be up there swinging the mace around his head like you swing a cat by the tail and saying, "A pox on both your houses". He is not doing that tonight. He is sitting there meekly and quietly, waiting to spin out the clock until twelve o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Finally, let me deal with the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). That hon. member was weeping his crocodile tears by the bucketful. He had to go out and change his shirt because it got wet. He said we ought to extend the pipeline into eastern Canada. Of course we ought to do that. The fact that it is not started now is as a result of the neglect of that government over there. The hon. member for Sudbury does not cheer about that.

Does the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville not remember what the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) said? He said that if there is to be that extension, and it has to happen of course, then the wherewithal has to come from somewhere. That was a commitment by that government as well. We intend to see the government live up to that commitment, to provide the wherewithal to develop that pipeline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What we are debating tonight, and let us not forget it even though it has developed into a pipeline debate, and other members have spoken on other subjects as they have the right to do—

An hon. Member: Only Conservatives.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Other members have certain rights, even if the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville will not recognize it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Some don't speak at all.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Some don't speak at all, and some make their best speeches from their seats.

What we are dealing with tonight is a motion to adjourn the House, not a giant filibuster, not a fight to the death by the NDP but crawling out from the position they have been put in by the United Steelworkers of America and every other person in this country who is interested in development. That is what we have here tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the speech by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), I nearly forgot what I had to say. In any event, I will be very brief and perhaps in a somewhat less partisan speech I would like to join with my colleagues and stress the constructive work done by all hon. members of the House during the period of the present session just ended.

I think we should pay tribute to all our colleagues for the good work they did in the House, and perhaps not only our colleagues but, in the final analysis, all employees of the House. Indeed, as was mentioned, over 25 bills were passed. This means we still did a good job in this latter part of the session. What is very offending and shocking is to see the New Democratic Party persist in wanting to keep this House working. Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to remaining in here a week or two more, not at all. But what shocks us and what is offending is that they want to give the impression that we did not do our job. They want to give the impression that we have to stay here a little longer to earn our salary. That might be the case for the members of the New Democratic Party but certainly not for members across, the Conservatives, and the Liberals.

What is shocking is the impertinence of the members of the New Democratic Party in talking against the construction of the pipeline when you consider, Mr. Speaker, that the projections from here to 1985 show we are going to be importing an average of 730,000 barrels of oil a day. We are going to be importing that every day. And in return, we also have natural gas that we can swap. The NDP members do not accept this kind of deal. Imagine, we should import, pay with our money and keep the natural gas for the future, for our children. I find this impossible to understand. How can these people go to their constituency during the summer or during their holidays, Mr. Speaker, and look their constituents in the eyes and tell them: We have tried to take the bread out of your mouth with false principles and false scruples. In another context, since I am one of the last to have the floor this evening, I would like to take this opportunity to tell all my fellow citizens, whether from the east or from the west, in my capacity as a Quebecker, that they have all our affection, I wish them and all our hon. colleagues pleasant holidays. We must not forget those who cannot enjoy a summer vacation because they are in hospitals, and so on. I would therefore like to tell all our fellow citizens that they are my brothers and that we shall have to use the summer vacation, which may last two weeks or one or two months, to meditate on the future of our country. If this country must go on, Mr. Speaker, either we separate immediately and everyone will do his best to get the most for himself until the country breaks down, or else we must form a whole in this country. In closing, I would like to wish all my colleagues and all Canadians a very pleasant vacation.

[English]

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am very happy to rise tonight to speak in the pipeline debate. First, let me say that as a new member there are times when I am pleased with the role we all play as members of Parliament, in forging our country's future. At other times I am disappointed and frustrated at the length of time it takes to achieve the desired results.

Mr. Speaker, I have to say, as a new member, that I am disappointed and, in fact, alarmed at the filibustering nature of the New Democratic Party. I had assumed that these members, both individually and collectively, were interested in the orderly treatment of events. However, even though I know that some members of the New Democratic Party, especially new members, wish to contribute as much as they can, I believe that as a party they act neither for their constituents, their regions, nor for their country. This filibuster by the NDP, which has turned into a pipeline debate, is nothing more than an attempt by the New Democratic Party to attract and keep the attention of the media. If they could not retain the attention of the media in Canada I am sure they would be the first out of the doors. And when I say that they would be first out of the doors, I mean that they, too, as well as the rest of us, have commitments to their constituents.

All too often we all have the tendency to think that the world begins and ends here. But that is not so. As members of Parliament we have an equal commitment to our constituents, and we must never forget it. The NDP is only interested in grandstanding. It is only interested in waving flags of alarm. It is the party which opposes everything. It is the party which has sold its soul to the multinational unions. It is the party which, in 1979, received approximately $150,000 from one international union, and approximately $325,000 from another international union. It is the party which encourages strikes. It is the party whose leader stands in the strike line and says, "Do not go back to work—at least not until the press come".

This is the party which wants to see more unemployment in Ontario. It is the party which wants to see more unemployment in Hamilton. And it is the party which wants to bring industry to its knees. It is the party which wants to bring the Alaska gas pipeline to a halt, the party which believes we should not go ahead with the pipeline unless we can guarantee all the funds before we lift a shovel, guarantee all gas contracts, present and future, before we do any work, and guarantee that all gas prices, present and future, will never change. This is the party which does not believe in the future of Canada and that is why the Canadian people, year after year, election after election, reject them.

Let me state a few facts related to the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline. Exports of natural gas from Canada are not approved by the National Energy Board until they have been certified as surplus to Canada's needs. Our gas exports to the United States are in no way a cut price sale. They are distinctly more expensive than domestic U.S. supplies. We are selling this gas at the highest price possible. Holding up the decision on the southern part of the total project, might just hold up the whole thing since the cash flow generated by the exports from Canada will help finance the northern part. More serious, though, is the attitude the Americans will take to indecision, an indecision which might force them to go elsewhere for their energy source. During 1980, 15 per cent of the total exploration budget for Canadian oil and gas will be invested in the United States. This amounts to $600 million and most of this money will be from small oil companies departing to the United States. The U.S. gas reserves in Prudhoe Bay represent more than 10 per cent of our established reserves. Surely we recognize the importance of these reserves to the United States.

In Canada direct capital expenditure for the pre-build will be $1.6 billion. Of this, $655 million will go to the pre-build line, and another $935 million to the installation of production mills and other facilities. The pipeline will create employment opportunities between 1980 and 1984 of 150,000 man-years, of which 25 per cent will accrue to Ontario and Quebec, 25 per cent to Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and the remainder to Alberta and B.C. Mr. Speaker, the boost to Canada's balance of payments will be approximately $2 billion a year. Surely we understand that this will help keep interest rates down.

Natural gas reserves in Canada at the present time amount to approximately 70 trillion cubic feet, and this does not include the 10 trillion cubic feet in the Arctic, the five trillion cubic feet in the Mackenzie Delta, and the three trillion cubic feet off the east coast. It is estimated that approximately 50 per cent of all gas wells drilled in Alberta are not tested or proven up, so they are not included in the National Energy Board's reserves. The pre-build pipeline will increase gas production in Alberta by 16 per cent or 18 per cent and the gas companies say they can easily increase it by 50 per cent.

The Alberta Energy Conservation Board now estimates that reserves of gas in Canada could be as high as 160 trillion cubic feet and could even go to 200 trillion cubic feet in the next few years. Mr. Speaker, if momentum is stopped on this pipeline with respect to exploration, development and sale of surplus natural gas, the industry will start to gear down. This will have an effect on the flow of capital, less reserves will be found, unemployment will increase in some areas, technological advances related to new methods for extraction and finding new reserves may slow and, strangely enough, this could be the way to prove the NDP are correct.

I am happy that the government is following up on yet another policy introduced by the previous Conservative government. As proof of this I would like to refer to the statement made by the Hon. Robert de Cotret who, as the minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline Agency, spoke on December 13 last. He mentioned two main points: one, that the government was committed to this pipeline, and, second, that the pre-build was an important component in the completion of the whole line.

For some time now many Albertan members of Parliament have verbally and in written form pressed the government for a decision on the Alaska highway gas pipeline. Of course we are disappointed that it has taken so long to recognize the tremendous benefits to Canada. We are vitally interested in this project. I was more than a little shocked to read in a Calgary paper on July 19 that Senator Olson stated some Albertan members of Parliament were not in favour of this pipeline. I want that Liberal retread to know that no Albertan member of Parliament has opposed the pipeline. They have spoken out for more action and better information on the details related to the proposed pipeline. It seems that the Senator from Medicine Hat is all wet once again. Certainly the constituents of Medicine Hat proved that some years ago when they did not re-elect him. Just last week I sent him a letter refuting his allegations that some Albertan members of Parliament were opposed to the pre-building of the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline. I see the Senator in the gallery. I hope he is not leaving, because I am not through with him yet.

An hon. Member: Nor is he through with you.

Mr. Wright: In that letter, I mentioned that on three separate occasions, June 26, July 3, and July 10, some Albertan members of Parliament sponsored motions under Standing Order 43 in the House of Commons requesting that the pre-build section of the Alaska gas pipeline be approved. I was co-sponsor of such a motion on July 10. I should like to read that motion because I do not think the honourable Senator reads his mail. It read:

> That the federal government immediately approve all Canadian aspects of the pre-build Alaska highway gas pipeline, while concurrently continuing negotiations with the U.S.A. for guarantees in regard to construction of the northern and Alaska sections of the gas line.

In addition, in my letter I urged Senator Olson to support Albertan members of Parliament in bringing this decision to a successful conclusion.

As late as last week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked for representation from Albertan members of Parliament. I am assuming from the letters and telephone calls which Senator Olson received that he was successful in persuading cabinet to approve the pipeline. Also I wish to say that Albertan members of Parliament are conforming to the Speech from the Throne wherein western members of Parliament have a responsibility not only to represent their constituents to the nation, but to represent the nation to their constituents. The Speech from the Throne indicated that it was a task no one else could fulfil. Albertan members of Parliament believe that to this point we have achieved that goal.

In conclusion, the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline is a pipeline which will benefit all of Canada and will make the completion of other pipelines in the north and the east, to Ontario and the maritimes, not only a possibility but a probability.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, when listening to the wise words spoken this evening by the twin wings of the parties of reaction, the Liberals and Conservatives, I asked myself the following question: what is the difference between Canada and a banana republic?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: It seems to me that there is an important difference between Canada and a banana republic, because bananas are renewable! One can have a surplus of bananas from year to year because they can be renewed. One can have a surplus of turkeys! After listening to the speech of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), we were reminded of the fact that it was quite possible to have a surplus of turkeys even in the House of Commons! But when the National Energy Board told the Canadian public that in 1980—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You will turn into a pumpkin in 15 minutes.

Mr. Rae: If the hon. member wants to heckle, he should get into his seat.

When the National Energy Board told the Canadian public that we have a surplus of natural gas, it was making a fundamental conceptual error. Natural gas is a finite resource. It is a non-renewable resource. A cubic foot of natural gas sold is a cubic foot of natural gas gone forever.

Mr. Chénier: No!

An hon. Member: Are you sure?

Mr. Rae: I know it upsets members of the Conservative and Liberal parties, but I should like to read to the House from The Oil and Gas Journal, which publication is not normally sympathetic to our party. Indeed it is the spokesman for the oil and gas industry. The journal referred to the views of Shell Oil, which is the largest gas producer in Canada, regarding the kinds of resources we have and the natural gas left in Canada. It indicated that we have 59.5 trillion cubic feet and 9.4 trillion cubic feet expected from known fields in the future. It continued:

> Another 36 trillion cubic feet is believed to be discoverable in new fields in the established area, Shell points out. That would sustain production that could meet demand until the mid-1990s.
> "After that, gas from the frontier regions could be brought to market to satisfy demand past the end of the century".

What will happen after the year 2000?

An hon. Member: Biomass.

Mr. Rae: There is lots of biomass in the Conservative party. There is more biomass and methanol being produced by the Liberal party. We hear about solar energy and other alternatives, but what about the hard fact of the matter? We heard all the projections made in the statements of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) and the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith). The hon. member for Gloucester indicated that there was a lot left over, but how can Sudbury be used as an example when all its nickel is gone forever? There are no renewable resources left in Sudbury, yet that is the example they give.

An hon. Member: Why did you lose the riding? What happened to Rodriguez?

• (2350)

Mr. Rae: Hon. members opposite shout, "Watch out for your ridings". Let me say that there is no issue on which all members of our party feel more one, comfortable and truly at home—and I think with a majority of Canadians—than on this issue at this particular time in our history.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) speaks of guarantees. Let us look at the statements. Hon. members can read along, if they want to turn their editions of Hansard for July 18 to page 3128. They can read for themselves and Canadians can see for themselves the statement of intention of the producers at Prudhoe Bay. They can see exactly what the position is. They can see the conditions and the statement of intent of these producers. Hon. members should listen to the tremendous commitment that Sohio and Exxon are making to build the Alaska pipeline. Hon. members should listen to the extent of this tremendous commitment:

The producers have indicated willingness to participate in a substantial way with Alaskan northwest in the financing of the Alaskan pipeline and conditioning plan upon reasonable terms and conditions—

God knows what that means.

—provided they are not placed in the position of becoming, in effect, the ultimate guarantors of completion of the ANGTS and provided that their financial exposure is effectively limited.

That is some commitment: "Okay, we will go along with this plan provided we do not have to guarantee it, provided we are not exposed too much, and provided, and provided, and provided". These are the ironclad commitments the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) put down on Thursday night.

Listen to what they go on and say.

If the parties, or any of them, conclude that alternative approaches in financing, or waivers of law under the Alaskan Natural Gas Transportation Act are necessary to effectuate a feasible and effective plan of financing—

Which means they do not now have a feasible and effective plan of financing because, if they had one now, they would not be talking about what they will have in the future.

—such party or parties may develop alternatives and advise appropriate authorities of their conclusions.

That is not exactly what I would call a full-fledged commitment or guarantee. It is so hedged and couched in the terms of what may happen and provisos as to what might happen that it is not even funny, and there is a simple reason for that. There was a previous pipeline in Alaska. There was an oil pipeline in Alaska. Many members of this House from both sides have been to see that pipeline. That pipeline was supposed to cost $1.7 billion. It came in at over $11 billion, and the hard fact of the matter is that as long as Canada is providing the United States with reasonably secure and reasonably cheap supplies of gas, they will have no incentive to go to Alaska. Why should they when they can suck it off us at cost?

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, the Wizard of Ooze, came before this House and said, "You have to build a pipeline in stages". There is no argument about that, but what are the stages which are called for in the act? What is in the act which was brought before this Parliament? What is in the agreement which was signed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and James Schlesinger? It is right here in schedule I which refers to expeditious construction and a timetable: Alaska, January 1, 1980; Yukon main line pipe laying, January 1, 1981. Other construction in Canada is to provide for timely completion of the pipeline to enable initial operation by January 1, 1983. Those are the stages of the line. It is to start in the north at Prudhoe Bay and go all the way south, and because it is starting in stages, one gets down to knowing that that in fact is what the Americans intend to do. They have reneged on that deal.

The Americans have failed to live up to their commitment to build the Alaska pipeline. And what is our punishment? The Prime Minister negotiates and says we are going to get the toughest deal we can on fisheries, on acid rain and on the auto pact, but what is the punishment we are going to mete out to the Americans? We are going to build our stage of the pipeline first so that we can finance the whole damned thing and sell out our natural gas in the course of doing so.

The final argument we get from the Liberal party is with regard to jobs. There is no member of Parliament in this House who is not concerned about jobs. The question is what is the best way to create permanent jobs, and not jobs which disappear as soon as the pipeline is built and not jobs which have no meaning because they are simply short-term jobs.

We are talking about jobs which are based on an industrial strategy because those jobs are renewable, and those jobs make sense because they are not part of some quick fix or reliance on a short-term construction project. When in doubt, build a pipeline: That is the policy of the Liberal party.

Mr. Cullen: Tell that to the steelworkers.

Mr. Rae: If the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) or any other Liberal wants to talk about investing $1.6 billion, there are ways of investing $1.6 billion which will make it come back, and come back and be here for the future of Canada. The result of the pipeline envy which fixates hon. members opposite will simply be that the Canadian dollar will go up and up, and our manufacturing competitiveness and our manufacturing industry will be less and less competitive. That is the final bottom line implication of the policy which is being followed.

It was a former Liberal cabinet minister, in the days when there were Liberal cabinet ministers who were not afraid to speak their minds from time to time, Eric Kierans, who wrote an article entitled "The day the Cabinet was misled" published in the March, 1974 "Canadian Forum". I commend to hon. members who want to understand how the cabinet and how this government have been misled and led by their noses by the multinational oil and gas companies for the last 15 years. Mr. Kierans said:

We do object to heavy investments in projects which have the sole objective of selling and exporting our badly needed resources. It would be much wiser to invest our scarce capital in other projects and to negotiate a right-of-way for the Americans to build their own pipeline. That would protect our environment, safeguard native rights and would provide a percentage of the line's capacity to transport Mackenzie Delta gas to Canadian homes and factories.

There is a real difference between investment in a vast construction project which will have a highly distorted effect on the economy and a program of industrial investment over the whole range of the economy which would provide the industrial structure and the industrial strategy we need.

Under this Liberal government we have a $17 billion deficit in finished goods. We have a government which has consistently increased the portion of our resources that is exported and the portion of our resources which makes up our total exports. The Prime Minister, who is sitting in his chair tonight, has presided over the systematic dismantling of the Canadian economy and its takeover by foreign multinational companies. Who are these multinational companies? Is it any surprise that Shell, Amoco and all those other American companies are buying up our gas and then going to the NEB and saying they would like to take our gas—which is really our gas because we own it—and export it back to their home country? Should that come as any surprise? The hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan), in a speech which was certainly interesting and vital if nothing else, said that the gas industry in Canada was Canadian-owned. That is a false statement because 70 per cent of the gas industry in Canada is owned by foreigners, the vast majority of them Americans.

The reason we are voting on this tonight is very simple. We are insisting on a vote and refusing to leave this House before we have a vote because we want to make it perfectly clear that the New Democratic Party is concerned about the future of our resources and the changing of our economy, and those other twin parties of reaction are concerned only about quick fix and short-term gain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2400)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being the witching hour, and pursuant to order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

Hon. members can expect Madam Speaker to enter the chamber in a moment to put the question before the House. While we are waiting for Madam Speaker, may I on behalf of the Deputy Speaker of the House, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier) and myself, the most junior of your servants, express our thanks and our sense of honour and privilege in serving Madam Speaker and all hon. members of this House. We will await Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In fact, with humility, I will put the question to the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Waddell) which was negatived on the following division:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That, when the House adjourns on the day that this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until October 15, 1980, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to order made earlier this day, this House stands adjourned until Wednesday, October 15, 1980, at 2 p.m., under the terms of Standing Order 2(1).

[English]

I wish everyone a very happy holiday with their friends and families. To keep up with the good tradition, I invite all members to Room 16 where we will hold a small reception.

The House adjourned at 12.28 a.m., to stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 15, 1980, at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NOTICE OF RECONVENING OF PARLIAMENT

Madam Speaker: I wish to inform hon. members that pursuant to order made on Tuesday, July 22, 1980, as shown on page 500 of Votes and Proceedings, I was satisfied after consultation with the government that the public interest required that the House should meet earlier. In the meantime I ordered the publication of a special edition of The Canada Gazette dated October 1, 1980, giving notice that the House should meet today and, moreover, on the same day I sent a telegram to each member of the House explaining the reasons for the recall of Parliament. Finally, pursuant to representations from the government under the provisions of Standing Order 42, the Chair had caused to be published in a special order paper the notice of a government motion regarding measures about the constitution. In that regard I now table letters from the government House leader dated September 30 and October 1, 1980, concerning that notice of motion.

THE LATE HON. DANIEL J. MacDONALD

TRIBUTES TO FORMER MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I know that you and all hon. members share my sadness at the absence from our midst of our friend and colleague, the Hon. Daniel MacDonald, Member of Parliament for Cardigan and Minister of Veterans Affairs. His death last Tuesday deprived this House of a man who enjoyed the affection and respect of us all. Indeed, we have lost a friend whose life gave expression to the highest ideals of public service, in war and in peace.

As Minister of Veterans Affairs he had a rare gift for serving Canadians extremely effectively, a gift for making tough decisions without giving offence and a gift for fighting political battles while retaining the friendship and high esteem of his opponents. I admired him for that and for the passionate commitment to Canada's veterans which gave strength and great dignity to his efforts on their behalf.

● (1410)

He was probably the best Minister of Veterans Affairs Canada has ever had. It is not that other incumbents have not served in that portfolio with distinction; it is just that no other minister, to my knowledge, has ever achieved such a wonderful rapport with Canada's veterans, nor served them with such a strong sense of mission.

His last parliamentary act, Madam Speaker, was to witness the giving of royal assent on July 17 to legislative measures which have improved pensions and allowances for veterans and their families. He had initiated those measures in cabinet. He guided them through Parliament. He saw them become part of the law of the land. It was an achievement of which he was justly proud. On that July day in the Senate chamber, he remarked to a cabinet colleague that it was one of the best days he had ever had in Parliament.

[Translation]

I know of no one who deserved more than Dan MacDonald to feel the great satisfaction of a job well done for his people, and I am happy that his last official act in Parliament gave him so much joy.

Dan MacDonald bore, in his very body, the scars of his devotion to his country, and he gave all Canadians an example of the fortitude that enabled him to overcome his physical limitations. He simply refused to be restricted by his wounds, and his refusal inspired others in overcoming lesser obstacles in order to lead rich and fulfilling lives.

Dan MacDonald held high offices in both the government of Prince Edward Island and the Government of Canada, but he never lost sight of life's true values. He would much rather be told that he was a devoted husband and father, a good soldier, a skilled farmer, a faithful friend.

We will remember with affection and admiration the man he was and the life he led. We will remember with respect the way he served his riding, his province and his country, all of which he loved dearly. And we will also remember with gratitude his priceless contribution to the lives of all those who knew him.

Madam Speaker, I am convinced that all hon. members will want to join me in asking you to convey our deepest sympathy to Mrs. MacDonald and the family.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, on my own behalf and on that of my party and of Canadians who did not share the political affiliations of the late Dan MacDonald but admired the gallantry and the courage that he showed, I want to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today in paying tribute to a singular Canadian, a devoted servant not only of his country but of his beloved province, Prince Edward Island.

The late Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald

We cannot count the ways in which Dan MacDonald sacrificed for his country. He never grudged those sacrifices. In that he set an example which should inspire, and which does inspire, all of his fellow citizens.

[Translation]

It was with a deep feeling of respect and friendship that we bid him farewell Saturday in Charlottetown. To serve one's country in times of peace as well as in times of war demands a lot of those who have done it like Daniel MacDonald, that is, giving the best of themselves.

[English]

I might say in passing that the government might consider very seriously the suggestion made by my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), that it would be a fitting tribute to have the new national headquarters of the Department of Veterans Affairs now being constructed in Charlottetown named in honour of Dan MacDonald.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, if men are to be judged by the love that is borne them, then the judgment of the man we honour today must be in no doubt at all to all who knew him and all of us who count ourselves the better for having known, having served with and having befriended the late Dan MacDonald.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I am very grateful to my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), for his suggestion that as one who worked closely with Daniel MacDonald I might speak on behalf of our party on this occasion.

● (1415)

We join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in paying our warmest respect to the memory of the late Minister of Veterans Affairs. Many of us got to know him as a personal friend, a fine gentleman and a fighter for those whom he represented as Minister of Veterans Affairs. As I say, we are happy to enter into these moments of tribute. If I may do so, I should like to quote the words the Prime Minister used at the funeral service in Charlottetown on Saturday when he said that we went there not to mourn Daniel MacDonald's death but to celebrate a life well lived.

We are all conscious of the difficulties under which he laboured because of his double amputation, but we were greatly impressed by the vigour with which he pursued his efforts right to the very end. I believe it is only fitting for me to say that on July 9 when he piloted that last important piece of legislation through the House some of us that day were concerned about his health, but it was an accomplishment to complete something that had been waiting for about 50 years. We are glad that Daniel MacDonald had the privilege of piloting that piece of legislation through this House and then had the privilege of being the Acting Prime Minister the day when that bill was given royal assent.

We join with the suggestion just made by the Leader of the Opposition that the new veterans building in Charlottetown should be named the Daniel J. MacDonald Building. We express our warmest appreciation of the life of our friend and we extend our heartfelt sympathy and understanding to Mrs. MacDonald and to all the members of the family.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I should like to associate myself with all the beautiful things that have been said about the Hon. Daniel MacDonald. He was my seatmate in this House for many years and I got to know him quite well. I think I can say that he was indeed a great gentleman. What I especially liked about him was that he had such great faith in his fellow countrymen and in God, and this faith sustained him in distinguished service to his country in war and in peace. We will all miss him very much, and I should like this House to rise and observe two minutes of silence in his memory.

[Editor's Note: The House rose and observed a two minute silence.]

VACANCIES

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received communications notifying me that vacancies have occurred in the representation:

Of the Hon. Judd Buchanan, PC, member for the electoral district of London West, by resignation.

Of Raynald Guay, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Lévis, by resignation.

Accordingly, I have addressed my warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of new writs of election for the said electoral districts.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Stanley Hudecki, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Hamilton West, introduced by the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau and Hon. Herb Gray.

Madam Speaker: I will now accord the usual time for motions under Standing Order 43 and the question period.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867

UNILATERAL ACTION TO CHANGE PROVISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. Whereas the British North America Act is a contract between Canadians as represented by their federal and provincial legislatures, and whereas the Government of Canada now proposes to change the terms of that contract by unilateral action without consulting the signatories to that contract, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this government be condemned for acting alone without fairly and properly obtaining substantial agreement to those changes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

REQUEST PRIORITY BE GIVEN TO BILL C-43—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Canadians have waited far too long for effective and comprehensive freedom of information legislation and an end to secrecy in government, and in view of the apparent decision of the Liberal government, as revealed of course in a secret memo, to put freedom of information legislation on the back burner and further delay action on this important bill, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

That this House call upon the government to give priority to speedy second reading and referral to committee of the freedom of information bill, Bill C-43, where much needed improvements may be made and an end be put once and for all to decades of secrecy in government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

THE BUDGET

INTRODUCTION BY OCTOBER 17, 1980—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In December of last year members opposite supported a non-confidence motion against the realistic budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bosley: —because in the view of today's Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) the budget did not do enough to lower interest rates, lower taxes or stimulate the economy. Madam Speaker, for eight months the government has steadfastly refused to face the economic difficulties facing Canada while the minister has said he supports higher interest rates, higher taxes and that more stimulation is not needed. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West:

That this House instruct the government to find the real Allan MacEachen and to instruct him to bring in a budget by October 17, 1980, at the latest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

ALL-PARTY COMMITTEE TO INITIATE PRICING NEGOTIATIONS WITH PRODUCING PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the recently failed oil pricing talks have put Canada's future oil supply in grave danger by placing our dependence on this very vital resource in the hands of undependable foreign suppliers, as witnessed by the present mid-East crisis, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House of Commons appoint an all-party committee from the House of Commons Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works to initiate with the producing provinces pricing negotiations to secure an energy agreement, so that we may gain oil self-sufficiency and security of supply so vital to our vast country.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH CARE

TABLING OF HALL REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Mr. Justice Emmett Hall has released his report on the state of health care services in Canada, and in view of the fact that many of the recommendations contained in the report would create major changes in Canada's health care system, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That this House instruct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to table forthwith the report of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall on the state of health care services in Canada and that the report be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DROUGHT ASSISTANCE

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the shortage of hay caused by the prairie drought has now been worsened by wet conditions on the prairies, whereas it is essential to the continued health of the livestock and dairy industry and to the continued supply of meat to consumers that a payment be made quickly under the federal drought assistance program, and whereas the high cost of purchased feed makes it imperative that the federal government be able to pay the full $70 per head promised, since a great many producers have borrowed money at the banks conditional upon that promise, I move seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That this House instruct the Minister of Agriculture to set up the appeal committees and procedure as soon as possible under the federal drought assistance program, and that this House calls upon the minister to instruct these committees to be as generous as possible in making the payments to the many producers in need, and further, that this House ask the federal cabinet to approve further funding for the drought program so that the $70 per cow promised and the $140 per dairy animal can be paid to farmers.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

INTRODUCTION OF DEVELOPMENT BOND LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of legislation regarding small business development bonds, legislation which expires December 31, 1980, and the significance of this particular piece of legislation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Minister of Finance introduce, without delay, legislation confirming the intention to introduce the small business development bond and extending the expiry date, so that the program is a meaningful one and not merely a political gimmick.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

TAX ON SALE OF PROVINCIAL RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of very urgent necessity. In light of the embodiment in quite unequivocal terms in so many constitutional documents, beginning in 1866 and culminating in 1931, of the principle that all lands, mines, minerals and royalties shall belong to the provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

That this House would reject and condemn as entirely unconstitutional any attempt by the federal government, through budgetary provisions or otherwise, to impose a tax on the revenues derived from the sale of provincial natural gas, electricity or other natural resource energy sources from any of the provinces, thereby diminishing the ability of the provinces to finance the health, hospital care and other services within their proper jurisdiction.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

CR CLERKS DISPUTE—COMPARISON WITH POSTAL WORKERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board could explain to the House of Commons the justice of offering clerical workers less over two years than he approved for postal workers over one year, bearing in mind that before their last settlement postal workers were 20 per cent ahead of the private sector while clerks are currently 8 per cent behind?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am sure the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is aware that the principle which governs all offers made by government in these circumstances is comparability with the private sector. I think it might be more appropriate for him to address his question to my predecessor, who opened these negotiations with a 5 per cent offer at the same time that he was carrying on negotiations with the Letter Carriers Union.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Perhaps it would have been more appropriate for me to have addressed the question to the Postmaster General, who made a settlement with relation to postal workers which his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, has gone on the public networks to condemn. The fact is that the responsibility for these negotiations rests now with this minister. He talks about the particular circumstances of this union. Let me ask the minister whether it is now the affirmative action policy of this government to single out a union, three-quarters of whose members are women, as a special target for unfair wage restraint?

An hon. Member: You don't believe that, do you?

An hon. Member: That is a cheap shot, Joe.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I am sure the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is aware that I have a meeting this afternoon and that negotiations are resuming at four o'clock. I hope that we will arrive at a just and equitable settlement.

The offer which we have put on the table we regard as just and equitable but there will be further negotiations. It does not strike me, Madam Speaker, that our offer, which brings the average wage of the group to $15,360 per year, is that unfair or unjust. If the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has data which has not been made available to me by the Pay Research Bureau with regard to what is the equivalent in the private sector, I would be very pleased to receive it and will take it into consideration.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, we are all aware, sadly, of the style of negotiation in which the minister has proceeded. Given the fact that the minister's threats of disciplinary action against other public servants supporting the clerks are being widely ignored by thousands of public servants, will the minister give us an undertaking now that when he meets with public service representatives later today he will be taking more positive steps that will bring us to a resolution of this dispute and that will allow Canadians to count upon such basic services as mail delivery and air transportation in the country?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I think that if the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is as close to these negotiations as he pretends to be, then he should be fully aware of the positions which we have taken. We have made many positive moves. We have moved a long way from the 5 per cent that my hon. friend from York-Peel opened with in January. I must admit that we have been rather firm in terms of stating our position on discipline, Madam Speaker, because the entire fabric of the collective bargaining system could be under threat if public service employees do not honour their obligations under collective agreements with this government.

I do not think that we have been heavy handed in the kind of disciplinary measures that we have suggested but I think we have an obligation to the people of Canada, Madam Speaker, to enforce the obligations which are due to this government and which had been fairly negotiated in the past.

Mr. Clark: A further supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Is the minister saying that he is going to enforce his threat against those public servants who did not resist the crossing of picket lines? Is he going to enforce that threat?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I hope that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition would share the government's view that we have an obligation to the Canadian public to ensure that legal obligations vis-à-vis the government must be respected.

Mr. Clark: Answer the question, Don.

Mr. Johnston: Otherwise the entire system breaks down. Otherwise the whole benefit of collective bargaining does not exist as far as the public service is concerned.

CR CLERKS DISPUTE—INQUIRY WHETHER SETTLEMENT WITH POSTAL WORKERS COMPLICATES NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the President of the Treasury Board. I only wish he would elaborate on the national 5 per cent offer that he claims was made by this government. That is just not true.

Does the President of the Treasury Board feel—

Mr. Clark: It is just another lie.

Mr. Stevens: —that the very rich settlement that was made by the Postmaster General—he was set aside at the time, I believe—the very rich settlement with the postal workers, has greatly complicated his negotiations with the clerks?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see that the hon. member for York-Peel is in closer touch with the negotiations now than he was when he held this post. The settlement with the postal workers—the CUPW workers—as the hon. member knows, re-established the historic differential between the Letter Carriers Union and CUPW. He, of course, had very recently signed an agreement with the letter carriers, the LCUC group, which basically established the benchmark for the CUPW settlement.

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question is again for the President of the Treasury Board, Madam Speaker, who has referred to an historical relationship between two bargaining units. Would the President of the Treasury Board confirm that approximately 15 years ago the clerks and the postal workers were also relatively at the same wage level? If he does confirm that—which is the truth—would he indicate why he now feels that it is suitable to be firm and rigid with the clerks, who are now about one-third behind the postal workers, at the same time that he had such a rich settlement with the postal workers?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I am astonished that the hon. gentleman, who has always been such a strong advocate of the marketplace, does not accept that comparability with the private sector is the criterion that must govern our settlements in the public sector.

An hon. Member: What about the Post Office?

Mr. Johnston: That is what we are attempting to do. We have made a fair and just offer. As I said, we are renewing negotiations this afternoon in an attempt to bring this, I hope, to a quick conclusion.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my further supplementary question is again for the President of the Treasury Board who has referred, as their basic test, to comparable wages in the private sector. In view of the fact that the clerks last January were 8 per cent behind the private sector and the postal workers were 20 per cent ahead, would he indicate why he has got into the impossible position of having, for the first time in history, this relatively responsible bargaining unit on strike just for the want of a fair settlement? We at least avoided strikes when we were in office.

An hon. Member: You will choke on that one.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I find it quite extraordinary that the hon. member for York-Peel would admit that the clerks were 8 per cent behind market in January and would have offered them 5 per cent at that time.

Mr. Stevens: I didn't.

Mr. Johnston: As a matter of fact, when I became President of the Treasury Board the negotiations had broken off and we made attempts to get this back on the rails from the outset. But I am afraid that the damage done in the brief tenure—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark: Check your facts, Don.

Mr. Johnston: —of my hon. friend has made it pretty difficult.

CR CLERKS DISPUTE—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT OFFER COMPATIBLE WITH THRONE SPEECH COMMITMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, the clerks in question have an average salary now of $12,800; 75 per cent of them are women and many of them are single parent heads of families living below the poverty level.

● (1440)

Considering that the throne speech says: "My ministers will help first those who need help most", I would like to ask the Prime Minister if the offer—which was misleading, and I will come to that in a minute—just outlined by the President of the Treasury Board, which will still leave the clerks among the worst paid employees in Canada, private or public sector, is compatible with that commitment made in the throne speech.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the answer hinges on the assertion by the hon. member that they are the worst paid group in Canada. That is in direct contradiction with the facts as we know them to be, and I repeat the offer made by the President of the Treasury Board to the Leader of the Opposition. If the hon. member wants to adduce information showing that the clerks in the public sector are out of line with remuneration in the private sector, then we will take another look at it. But these are not the facts that we have. We have followed the position of comparability, as the President of the Treasury Board indicated, and that is a principle which had, indeed, the support of the provincial first ministers when we met on economic affairs about a year and a half ago. We are applying that principle now.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. I said "among the worst paid", and I would stand by that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: That is what I said. I would like in that context to ask the Prime Minister to confirm the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board that the offer now would leave the average clerk with a salary of $15,000 a year, the implication being that that is a continuing salary. I would ask him to confirm that that is misleading, because the government well knows that one-tenth of that is a lump sum payment for one year only. It will not continue on an annual basis as part of the base for salary and, therefore, is a fundamentally distorting view to put before the public of Canada. Will the Prime Minister confirm that the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board is misleading in that sense?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He will do it himself.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, if I may reply to that question, it is clear that the Leader of the New Democratic Party has not understood the offer. Perhaps if he had taken the time to read the offer properly, he would not be making such outrageous statements.

The fact is that the average income is now $12,800. That amount is being increased under the outstanding offer by 20 per cent base salary as of November 12; that is the second year of the contract. In addition to that, for the first year of the contract a lump sum payment of not less than $1,500, or 10 per cent of base salary, has been offered to every clerk. That is the offer, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Not according to the base.

Mr. Johnston: The 20 per cent is a 20 per cent increase on the base.

Mr. Stevens: And the $1,500 is included.

An hon. Member: Don't confuse him with the facts.

Mr. Johnston: It could not be simpler, but for some reason it seems to be difficult.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister is right, it could not be simpler, and we understand it very well on this side. The increase that he is talking about in percentage terms is quite different from the addition of the $1,500 which is being provided on a one-shot basis. That is the crucial point.

Since the principle of a COLA clause has already been accepted for one category of civil servants and is widespread in its acceptance in almost every part of the private sector of the Canadian economy, why will the Government of Canada not accept at least the principle of a COLA clause, the details of which the minister well knows are negotiable?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the issue of a COLA clause has been quite celebrated during the course of these negotiations. I have pointed out consistently that the offers we have made take into account the contracts in the private sector, some of which have COLA clauses, some of which do not, so that the offers we make are designed to protect against inflation through a negotiated settlement.

I would also point out, Madam Speaker, although it is not really relevant as a matter of principle, that it would be quite unprecedented, to my knowledge, in the middle of a contract with one year to run to make an adjustment for the first year, which we are doing and introduce a COLA clause effectively for a one-year contract. The purpose of the COLA clause in most private sector contracts is to protect against inflation in multiple year contracts—a three-year contract or whatever.

Let me give the hon. gentleman one example, taking the CR-1 average level, to explain why a COLA clause in our judgment is not necessary—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Johnston: —and also to correct a $1,500 misunderstanding. The average salary is $8,900. The lump sum payment would be $1,500. The gain, which would be a further 10 per cent, would be $608. With a 20 per cent salary increase it brings the salary base to $10,698. The gain in in-pocket cash for that CR-1 level over the two-year period is $3,283, starting from a base of $8,900.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance to see if he is prepared to break his vow of silence on financial matters. It is 23 months since this House adopted a budget in November, 1978.

Mr. Chrétien: We had a good one.

Mr. Crosbie: The government is now in its eighth month in power, yet on December 11 last year hon. members opposite defeated a budget because they said it did not lower interest rates, cut taxes and stimulate the growth of the Canadian economy.

Will the minister now give us the date when he is going to bring in his budget? The mines minister says October 21. Perhaps she is making up his mind for him and that is why she is a "mines minister".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Will the minister give us the date of his long awaited budget, and will he advise us whether his budget is going to lower interest rates, cut taxes and stimulate the Canadian economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I would suggest that maybe it would have been better for himself and his friends if he had undertaken a vow of silence last December.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I have already indicated in response to an inquiry by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, which he conveyed to me by letter, that I would bring in a budget in the last two weeks of October.

Mr. Knowles: What year?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I would hope to be able to indicate the precise date very soon, next week probably.

An hon. Member: October 21?

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, silence is truly golden, as the minister is pointing out to us. He has been very silent since last December. Could I ask him this: the minister said in a speech in Halifax on September 8, his only speech this summer, that we are going to need a significant increase in revenues if we are going to meet our responsibilities in the years ahead. We never heard about this last fall, but we did hear about it this fall.

Will the minister now give this House a commitment that he is not going to raise revenues by deindexing the personal income tax—the great Stanfield innovation introduced in 1975 by the great Turner—and that he is not going to introduce a regressive tax at the refinery gate level on all gasoline products made from a barrel of oil, transportation fuels, heating fuels and the like? Will he give us a commitment that he will not do that, in line with the promises and the commitments made by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce last fall?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, on the first point I am hesitant to comment on the question with respect to de-indexing in case my answer would dissuade the Conservative party from wasting money on these foolish ads they have been putting out on deindexing over the course of the summer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I would rather leave that question in doubt until budget night in the hope that the publishers and advertisers would benefit further from what seems to be a very full Tory war chest.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, it is worth $30,000 to have the Minister of Finance read anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister of Finance's predecessor as finance critic said that the government was going to take a new approach and a new look at interest rate policy. That was on November 6 last year. On February 7 he said that he was going to resign if the government did not carry through on that commitment. Is his resignation now in the hands of the minister, or are we going to have a new interest rate policy? I point out that the prime bank rate has now gone to 13 per cent; it is "Allan MacEachen upward trend" again as this House opens. Has the minister some new policy, or is his cohort going to resign shortly?

• (1450)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the bank rate decreased quite considerably from a high point of 16 or so in April—

Mr. Crosbie: Under you.

Mr. MacEachen: —to a point of 10 or so in August, as I recall. Since that time there has been some increase in interest rates, but they have not yet reached the higher levels that prevailed when the hon. member was minister of finance.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NATURAL GAS EXPORTS TAX WILL NOT BE IMPOSED

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the subject is the proposed natural gas export tax. Can the minister give to this House an unequivocal assurance that the government is not planning to impose what we on this side of the House regard as a discriminatory tax on natural gas exports?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would have to answer this question in the same way the Minister of Finance answered the previous question as to speculating about the contents of the budget. I will not indulge in that any more than the Minister of Finance has.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, the minister talked in the past about raising revenue for the government. Has the minister considered using more effectively the income tax provisions which the government already has against the foreign controlled oil companies—in other words, taxing them more—rather than attacking the resource base of the western provinces, as he is going to do if he brings in a natural gas exports tax?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member that the government has been looking at all possible revenues and is looking at what will be the most effective and fairest way of approaching this difficult question. When the Minister of Finance brings in his budget, the hon. member and the House will have the answers to these questions. I want to assure the hon. member there is no question of attacking the natural resources of any province in this country. It is a question of exercising what are the proper responsibilities of the national government for the good of all Canadians, and that is what we are trying to work out.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATEMENT OF MINISTER ON REFERENCE OF PROPOSALS TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Did he consult with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or did he adopt the position taken by some provincial spokesmen from time to time when he said on the weekend that he would not refer any of the constitutional proposals to the Supreme Court because the Supreme Court is very unreliable?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should read the whole sentence. I said that if we were to refer them, one of the problems would be that in terms of timing it would change. It is in that context that I said it. Further, I checked with the reporter to confirm he understood it that way.

Mr. Dick: Madam Speaker, since it is 113 years versus one sentence, the timing does not seem to be all that crucial. I was wondering whether the minister was somewhat influenced by the fact that the government in a previous incarnation had a portion of its Bill C-60 dealing with the Senate turned down by the Supreme Court, and it is afraid there are sections in this resolution which will be turned down by the Supreme Court?

Mr. Chrétien: Not at all, Madam Speaker. At the time of the move on the Senate, it was not certain that Parliament could change the status of the Senate. The Supreme Court said it was not possible for the Parliament of Canada to change it, but the British Parliament could do that. With the change in the constitution, we will be going straight to London for the last time.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MODERNIZATION OF PAPER FACTORIES IN QUEBEC

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I wonder whether the minister can now put the House up to date regarding the joint federal-provincial proposal for a policy on the modernization of pulp and paper factories?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I am indeed very pleased to report to the hon. member for Joliette that cabinet has substantially increased the envelope for Quebec. It has in fact earmarked 50 per cent of the budget for this nation-wide program for Quebec alone. In other words, after making the required adjustments, our contribution to Quebec is 40 per cent greater than that to Ontario, and I trust, like the hon. member no doubt, that Quebec will sign this agreement as soon as possible.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, the minister has just stated that he hopes his counterpart from Quebec will sign this agreement. Can the minister assure the House that this program will be started soon? Also, in light of the 15 projects or so that are mentioned so often, what does the minister intend to do to have these projects launched as soon as possible?

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to question his conscience on this matter. This program is aimed at the pulp and paper industry and in this field, the same corporations are operating in all provinces. Why is it such a big success in the other provinces? Why are the investments in this program ten times greater in Ontario than in Quebec? One cannot always hide behind the screen of nationalism to explain why this program, which is directed at all the provinces where the same corporations, most of them American, are involved, is a success everywhere except in Quebec, where it is at a standstill. I would like the hon. member to consider this question as well.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, if I were a minister, I would discuss this matter with my opposite number in Quebec, because I think many Quebeckers would like to get an affirmative answer as soon as possible.

As a supplementary, Madam Speaker, knowing that for the establishment of a paper mill the minister chooses an area well known to him, and considering also what his Quebec colleague proposed when he spoke on September 5, in a very limited municipality, I should like to ask the minister whether he can give an affirmative answer. If not, what is his final position about that paper mill?

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, in reply to the first question, I would tell the hon. member that I sincerely hope that the conditions imposed by cabinet will be accepted without delay by the Quebec government. The second question deals with the speech Mr. Bérubé made on September 5, as we all know, in Rimouski, to announce the project of the century for the valley. The whole valley population has known all along, of course, that the announcement was an electoral gimmick that will be short-lived because, as the hon. member knows, according to the conditions mentioned in that speech of September 5, the mill should get a grant equal to 75 per cent of the cost of the project, which is obviously impossible. That is why I am now optimistic. I have two reasons to be: because finally Mr. Bérubé no longer announces projects for the valley without going there himself, and he has been there, and most of all because the people of the Matapedia Valley have created a committee to find out which of the two governments does not co-operate.

FINANCE

HIGH INTEREST RATES—TIGHT MONETARY POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The prime rate is now at 13 per cent, mortgages are at 14 per cent and even 16 per cent and 18 per cent, unemployment is escalating upwards over one million, real production and output are down for the second quarter in a row and there is a virtual collapse of our construction and housing industry. Can the minister explain to the House, quite apart from the hypocrisy of the offers of resignation from his resigning friend, the logic of a tight monetary policy and continued high interest rates as a deliberate policy of this government, as it was with the last government, at a time when we are facing the most serious recession in this country since 1954.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question is quite comprehensive. However, let me say to him that the high interest rates that we are now facing—and even though they are lower than they were earlier in the year they are still high—can only be reduced if we can reduce the general level of inflation, not only in Canada but in North America.

● (1500)

That is why the governor of the Bank of Canada is following a particular monetary policy, why the Government of Canada is supporting that monetary policy, and why almost every government in the industrialized world at the present time regards inflation as the basic long-term threat to the future growth of all economies. I cannot, of course, answer in all detail the very comprehensive question, but I would ask the hon. member to reflect on at least those few nuggets I have given him.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I think tea leaves rather than nuggets might be what the minister leaves behind him in the House of Commons.

As a supplementary question let me point out that the evidence from Britain in particular is that a tight monetary policy and high interest rates squeezes jobs and growth out of the economy but not inflation, as witnessed by the record inflation that is currently being suffered by Mrs. Thatcher's England.

In view of the statement the minister has just made, will he tell us whether he still takes the sanguine view that these interest rates are a passing phenomenon, or will he not agree that with rates as high as these, along with problems faced by home owners, small businessmen and farmers just as serious this year as they were last year at the time we defeated the Tory budget, he should be planning measures to provide relief and stimulus for these Canadians?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has raised the question of stimulus. As I prepare for the budget one of the questions I will have to decide, of course, is whether in these circumstances I should add further stimulus to the economy, in view of the fact that at the present time we are running a deficit of $14 billion—

An hon. Member: It is $16 billion.

Mr. MacEachen: —which means that the Government of Canada is putting that much more money into the economy than it is taking out. That is considerable stimulus, indeed. It is not as if we were running a balanced budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: It is not as if we were running a balanced budget or as if we had said that we intend to produce a balanced budget in a year or two. I make that point because when the hon. member talks about the policies of Mrs. Thatcher and compares them to those in Canada, I suggest his comparison is quite irrelevant.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS EXPORTS TAX—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who is quoted as having said, in respect of an export tax on natural gas, that "We fight on all fronts, all of the time"; "That's the nature of politics"; that holding off the proposed gas tax "wouldn't help us win the west" and "We need the revenues and we have to take the revenues (from) where the money is".

Would the Minister of Justice tell this House and his colleagues what the position of the Liberal party was when campaigning in British Columbia during the election earlier this year in respect of taxation on exports of natural gas?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, I would just say that we have the right to do so. What I have explained is that the federal government has certain taxation rights provided in the constitution and that the Minister of Finance may, as the need occurs, collect taxes where he wants and where the money is. The situation is as simple as that.

I do not believe that the constitution does not authorize the central government to collect taxes on any property in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, is the minister, or for that matter his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Right Hon. Prime Minister, or any hon. gentleman opposite, prepared to say to this House in no uncertain terms exactly what their party promised in British Columbia during the 1980 election campaign, especially through the good offices of Mr. Gordon Gibson who put in writing that there would be no export tax on natural gas from British Columbia or Alberta? In view of that I want to know from the Prime Minister or anybody else why they are playing this game and why they do not come out and say they are or are not going to stand by their promises. But do not fool around about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I remember very well that during the last campaign we said that the price of gasoline was not to be taxed. I am not great on science but I understand there is a difference between gas and gasoline.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT REGARDS HYDROELECTRIC POWER AS MANUFACTURED PRODUCT

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is along the same lines regarding a tax on the export of natural gas. There was clearly a commitment in the province of British Columbia by his party that it would not impose that tax.

Without repeating the question asked by my friend in the NDP, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the minister will be aware of speculation about a tax on the export of hydroelectric power. Without asking him whether that will be in the budget, is the minister aware of the argument being made by those provinces exporting hydroelectric power that it is a manufactured product rather than a natural resource, and does he subscribe to the argument that one can distinguish between natural gas and hydroelectric power on the basis that the latter energy source is a manufactured product?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as I have already indicated on various occasions, we shall hear all kinds of speculations. Indeed, last month, we heard all sorts of suppositions about what the budget will contain and not contain. I have already stated that it would not be wise for us as government members to try to speculate on this matter in order to determine whether such a form of taxation represents such a situation or whether it has such a nature rather than such another. I have no intention to play this kind of game.

[English]

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, perhaps because we have so recently resumed this session the minister did not understand what I asked him. Let me give him a chance to clarify this. Is it the position of the government that oil and natural gas may be subject to export tax because they are a natural resource, whereas on the other hand the government does not regard hydroelectric power as such an export, but regards it as the export of a manufactured product? Perhaps the minister might enlarge upon his answer by indicating to the House his position vis-à-vis coal, for example?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, again I think if there is any explanation to be given in this respect it should be given as part of the budget, if any such tax were to be considered.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CR CLERKS DISPUTE—REQUEST MINISTER REPORT TO HOUSE ON NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. He has indicated that he will be meeting with the president of the CLC and perhaps with others later today to continue the negotiations in relation to the CR strike and the things that fall out from that. Because of the importance of this meeting, would the minister undertake to return to the House when the day's work is over, if that day's work is definitive, and make a statement to the House in respect of the results of that meeting and their impact on the work stoppage in the public service?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I presume from the hon. member's remarks that when he uses the word "definitive" he means that a contract has been agreed upon or signed. It would not be my intention in any way to prejudice these negotiations by making premature statements regarding the content thereof. Obviously in the event that an agreement is reached I would be very pleased to return to the House and advise the House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there is no one who wants the negotiations to be prejudiced. What we want is for the negotiations to be advanced. Thus far the work of the President of the Treasury Board has not advanced the interests of the government, the public service employees or the public generally. In fact, the whole matter has been botched by him thus far.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1510)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): In order that this situation does not continue, would the President of the Treasury Board undertake at least to consider taking into that meeting this afternoon, or at subsequent meetings if they are held, his colleague, the Minister of Labour, who may be just a little better attuned to the human relationships which are quite important to the settlement of such a dispute, given the importance of it? Would he consider that in order that perhaps the negotiations could be advanced in a somewhat better and more productive way than we have seen thus far from this particular minister?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman seems to be making a speech expressing some opinions, but I have heard very little from the opposition as to the value or the benefits of our offers to date. I think there has been considerable advance; I take issue with that. I point out that in any negotiations there are two parties negotiating.

The hon. member can also rest assured that I depend very much upon the counsel of my colleagues, and I have had frequent consultations with the Minister of Labour and other ministers of the government.

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY, N.S.—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO SYSCO

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. On January 24 the current Prime Minister promised a crowd in Sydney, Nova Scotia, that a Liberal government would spend $50 million to upgrade the plant at Sysco. He further promised that $35 million would come in the first year after his election. There was no mention of any studies, just a promise of $35 million in the first year.

My question, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please ask his question right away?

Mr. Parker: Will the amount which has been described as peanuts by the Liberal Member of Parliament for Cape Breton-The Sydneys be forthcoming before February 18, 1981, or is this just another Liberal campaign promise down the tubes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the statement which the right hon. Prime Minister made at that particular meeting in Sydney was a repetition or reiteration of a decision which had already been taken by the Government of Canada to support, at the request of the government of Nova Scotia, the Sydney Steel plant in the amount of $50 million.

At the present time the government of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada jointly and by common agreement are attempting to work out a business plan which would ensure some future viability for the operation of the plant and the maintenance of employment at that plant. That business plan has not to my knowledge yet been submitted, but when it is it will be some basis upon which to begin the financing of the plant, as we have indicated earlier.

Mr. Parker: Another Liberal promise goes by the side tracks. In light of the minister's refusal to guarantee that the $35 million is forthcoming, what specific action will the minister take to assist the economy of Cape Breton, which is suffering an unemployment rate nearly twice the national average and which has just suffered the results of an additional 641 lay-offs in the last two months?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am sorry if I did not make explicit enough the commitment of the Government of Canada to support the future operation of the Sydney Steel plant. We have made that commitment and it continues. I think it is important, however, to know how we are going to spend the money and particularly whether it is going to contribute to the long-term future of that plant. I think it is about time we decided what we are going to do to make that plant a successful operation and not put further sums of money into the plant without knowing whether it will succeed or not. That is the purpose of the business plan at the present time.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHETHER REPLACEMENT FOUND FOR GRAIN TRANSPORTATION CO-ORDINATOR

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Since he now has the resignation of Hugh Horner, who is the grain transportation co-ordinator, is the minister in a position to inform the House whether or not a replacement has been found for Dr. Horner in his role as grain transportation co-ordinator?

Mr. Crosbie: Is his name Jack?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I want to say first how much I regret the resignation of Dr. Horner. I think his appointment and his activities have done considerable good for the co-ordination process with respect to western grain transportation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: I see no reason not to continue the existence of that co-ordination role, and I plan to appoint Mr. Radke on an interim basis. I also plan to go to Winnipeg in the coming ten days to solicit the views of the industry on some of the recommendations which were made by Dr. Horner in his letter of resignation.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, in his answer the minister alluded to my supplementary question. Can he tell the House unequivocally that the role of the grain transportation authority as it was set up under the previous government will certainly continue into the future? Is that something the minister is planning, and will there be no disbanding and no change at all in that role simply because Dr. Horner has left the chairmanship?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, with respect to the role of the authority as it is now, which is mostly operational, I have no great disagreement at all, but in his letter of resignation Dr. Horner makes a number of recommendations. Some of them I can accept quite easily; others I would like to reflect on and consult on further.

For example, he sees the authority being strengthened by legislation at this time. That is a debatable point. My predecessor who appointed him did so on a trial basis for up to four years. Dr. Horner is now suggesting a confirmation by legislative action of the authority, which in my view, I repeat, is very much debatable.

He also says that the authority should become a leader in branch line rehabilitation and things of that kind, which in my view also need much more reflection.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In responding to the questioning of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) dealt with two quotations from a report by Dr. Horner to himself. I believe the rule is quite clear that that report is now required to be tabled. Would the minister give us the assurance that it will be tabled?

An hon. Member: Immediately.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it was a letter of resignation which Dr. Horner wrote to me, and my understanding was that he was going to make it public. If he has not done so, I suggest that he do what he planned to do in the first place.

Mr. Nielsen: In response to that, Madam Speaker, the rule applies to letters as well as to reports or any other document. If the document or paper is quoted from, the minister is obliged under the rules to table it, and since he seems so willing and eager to do so, why wait? Let us have it now.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the reason I am willing is that Dr. Horner told me he was going to do so, but I was travelling at the time, and I understand that he has not. As it was his original intention to do so, I will ask him if he still agrees with his original intention. Besides, I did not refer to the letter specifically. I just mentioned that there were recommendations that he had made.

Madam Speaker: I do not think it would do any harm to wait one day in order to check the record to see whether this is considered a private document or not and whether the minister can contact the person in question to see what were his original intentions. I do not think the House will suffer if we wait for one more day.

• (1520)

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly we will wait one more day, but we are not speaking about the whim of the minister or the whim of someone who made a report to him; we are speaking with respect to the rules of the House of Commons. The rules of the House of Commons are quite specific with respect to quotations from papers, documents, reports and whatever. So I have no objection and, if we can accomplish the production of the paper by waiting a day, there is no problem at all.

Madam Speaker: I think it is quite clear that if there is a quotation from a document, it should be tabled. What we do want to make sure is whether that quote is really a quote from that document, and I would ask the House to wait for one day until we check Hansard.

MR. STEVENS—STATEMENTS MADE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to indicate that I would like an opportunity to read the official record of today's proceedings with respect to statements made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), as I feel I may have a question of privilege in that certain of his statements may have reflected on me personally.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-612, to amend the National Energy Board Act (provincial representation).

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, this private member's bill is one of a series. What it calls for particularly is for provincial representation and appointment to federal boards which include the CRTC, the Canada Council, the National Transportation Commission, and so forth. I do not think these particular bills call for the removal of power from one level of government or a transfer to another level. Instead, they entrench the principle of partnership which has been inherent in the Canadian political system. If the government had understood this principle earlier, it could have long ago asked the provinces to appoint members to boards. Unfortunately, the federal side instead resorted to confrontation and unilateral action. In this atmosphere—although I hope otherwise—I suspect that the attention paid by the government to the upcoming constitutional debate will be only slightly greater than that paid to these kinds of private members' bills.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Madam Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Wenman: Again this is a similar bill calling for representation on other boards and calling for co-operation and compromise as opposed to confrontation. It is indeed regrettable that this has not been the policy and the procedure of the government to this point.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Madam Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

October 2, 1980—The Minister of Justice:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen.

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion by members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report no later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 21(2), this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I wish to advise the House through you, Madam Speaker, that some 446 answers to the questions on the order paper will be tabled today. As the list is obviously quite long, I would ask for the consent of the House to dispense with the reading of these numbers. I might say that the list has been distributed in the last few minutes to all hon. members. I will read the numbers of the questions proposed for orders for returns, however, and I would ask, Madam Speaker, that you be so kind as to call starred question No. 1029 in the ordinary way.

[Text]

*ATLANTIC SALMON ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 1,029—Mr. McMillan:

1. What progress has been made with the Atlantic Salmon Enhancement Program and who is participating in it?

2. What amount did the Department of Fisheries and Oceans spend on the program in the fiscal year 1979-80 and what amount is it spending in the fiscal year 1980-81?

3. What is currently being done to transfer responsibility for the protection of Atlantic salmon to the provinces from the government?

4. In which areas off the coast of Newfoundland is commercial salmon fishing permitted?

5. How long is the commercial salmon fishing season off the south-west coast of Newfoundland and (a) how many fishermen are licensed to fish (b) what is the total allowable catch?

6. Is there evidence to support New Brunswick's claim that salmon caught off the south-west coast of Newfoundland would otherwise return to spawn in New Brunswick rivers and, if so (a) what is it (b) has the commercial Atlantic salmon season off south-west Newfoundland been shortened in light of such evidence?

[English]

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I should like to give this answer on behalf of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), and I seek the indulgence of the House because it is somewhat long. The Department of Fisheries, in answer to question 1,029, advises as follows:

1. In 1978, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans formed a federal-provincial task force to review the salmon management and harvesting situation within the five Atlantic provinces; enhancement and expansion of fishery benefits were major considerations.

Besides defining management problems and solutions for the existing resource, the review indicated that proven enhancement techniques such as hatcheries, spawning-incubation facilities and fishways are available to significantly increase the size of the resource base within eastern Canada. Hence efforts during 1979 and 1980 have been directed toward investigating the feasibility and socioeconomic desirability of a long-term resource development initiative. A preliminary report will soon be available which will outline the appropriateness of expanded salmon enhancement at this time.

Federal Fisheries and Oceans, maritimes and Newfoundland regions are presently involved in the planning studies. The provincial governments of Atlantic Canada are also being invited to participate.

● (1530)

2. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has for many years conducted hatchery and support operations for Atlantic salmon and trout in eastern Canada. Annual expenditures for the existing level of enhancement activity within the maritimes and Newfoundland regions during the past years has been:

1979/80:	$2,616,580.00*
1980/81:	$2,810,791.00*

*The above figures do not include $270,000 allocated to support Atlantic salmon enhancement research at the North American Research Centre, St. Andrews, New Brunswick.

3. Although the federal government is not presently considering a delegation of its management responsibility in the case of salmon, it is actively seeking ways of improving related administrative processes. With that in mind, the previous government wrote to the governments of New Brunswick and Newfoundland suggesting that there might be advantages for both parties if those provinces were to assume responsibility for conservation and protection of the salmon resource in provincial streams and rivers with the federal government retaining responsibility for the coastal commercial fishery.

The New Brunswick reply indicated a willingness to discuss the question of salmon protection. On the other hand, the province of Newfoundland proposed that the salmon protection issue be addressed within a more comprehensive approach. Follow-up discussions will be held with New Brunswick in the next few months. In the event that a transfer of responsibility from federal to provincial control is found to be feasible, the Public Service Alliance of Canada will be notified of our intention to protect the jobs of present employees.

4. Commercial salmon fishing is permitted in all areas off the coasts of Newfoundland except for areas set off by caution notices near the mouths of all salmon rivers. Caution notices are placed on both sides of the river and no fishing is permitted between the notices and rivers. The distance from the caution notices to the river varies with each river. Generally the distance is within 100 metres. Narrow inlets with a salmon river and estuaries are usually closed to commercial fishing. In bays less than six nautical miles across, all salmon gear must be "tied up" from midnight each Saturday to midnight the following Sunday.

5. The present commercial salmon fishing on the southwest coast of Newfoundland, Statistical Area J, Pass Island to Cape Ray is from May 20 to July 10. This was implemented in 1978 to provide additional spawners to rivers along the west coast of Newfoundland. The fishing season up to 1977 was May 15 to December 31, similar to other areas in Newfoundland. In addition to the benefits to west coast salmon stocks, the shortened season allows salmon to escape to the maritimes and Quebec.

(a) There were 308 licenced commercial salmon fishermen along the southwest coast in 1979. The number licenced in 1980 could be slightly lower due to attrition.

(b) There is no total allowable catch per se set for Atlantic salmon in Newfoundland. The catch is controlled by season, gear and number of licensed fishermen. The mean annual catch from 1975-79 along the southwest coast was 211 tonnes.

6. This is the final point on behalf of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Examination of past tagging studies indicates clearly that a significant proportion of salmon migrating along and caught off the southwest coast of Newfoundland in the early weeks of the season are bound for the maritimes and Quebec rivers.

(a) In Statistical Area J which was referred to previously the over-all seasonal interception rate is in the order of 50 per cent.

(b) Besides the shortening of the season that was mentioned previously, the drift-net fishery at Port aux Basques was terminated in 1972, involving approximately 70 fishermen.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the usual consultation having taken place, there seems to be unanimous consent that today's hour reserved for the consideration of private members' motions at five o'clock be cancelled in order to allow the leaders of the opposition parties to speak before six o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, that is correct provided of course—and I am sure my friend would agree—that the member whose private member's hour it is today and to whom we are grateful will not lose his place in priority.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, these negotiations were on an all-party basis. We also agree.

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed by the House that private members' hour is to be suspended under the conditions quoted by some hon. members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development) moved:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

[English]

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report no later than December 9, 1980;

[Translation]

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

[English]

He said: Madam Speaker, for over half a century federal and provincial governments have agreed on the desirability of bringing home Canada's constitution by means of establishing a procedure for amending all of it in Canada, and yet despite numerous attempts and many federal-provincial conferences, governments have been unable to agree on means to achieve these objectives.

For one reason or another, the federal-provincial attempts of 1927, 1931, 1935-36, 1950, 1961, 1964, 1971, 1975-76 and 1978-79, to find such an amending formula all failed.

On May 9 of this year, ten days before the Quebec referendum, the House of Commons approved unanimously a resolution proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) and seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). The resolution read:

Whereas some provinces have repeatedly refused to endorse the patriation of the Constitution of Canada from Britain—

It was moved:

That the Parliament of Canada submit an address to Her Majesty the Queen, that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: At the time the resolution passed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said:

We are determined that in the months ahead the House will have an occasion to express itself on this matter.

Mr. Dick: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hesitate and apologize for interrupting the Minister of Justice

(Mr. Chrétien) on this occasion, but we cannot get copies of the resolution. He will be using it in his speech; apparently they do not have any. I wonder, since it has been tabled, if there is some way we can get copies of the resolution as that is what we will be debating.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I am told that it is on the order paper, and I will follow the usual rules. There is nothing I can do about it at this moment.

Madam Speaker: I have asked the Clerk to find out whether the resolution has been distributed. I believe it has. But the hon. minister could continue his speech while I find out if I am able to inform the House whether this resolution has been distributed. Perhaps we could continue and hear the minister in the meantime.

Mr. Chrétien: I am informed that everyone has a copy.

Mr. Nowlan: That is the notice.

Mr. Chrétien: I am not in charge of distribution, so there is not much I can do about it. I have many responsibilities, but not that one.

Madam Speaker: Copies of the resolution are available. They have not been distributed. They will be in the minutes following. Perhaps we could then resume the debate and listen to the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien).

Mr. Nielsen: That is very nice.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, it is obvious that the documents tabled today by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have not yet been distributed, but to clarify the situation, I want to advise the House that as early as last Thursday, even before the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) had an opportunity to appear on television, I had made sure that each House leader had enough copies of this resolution for distribution to the members of his caucus.

Madam Speaker, we have taken this action out of sheer courtesy and not because we were under any obligation to do so. The purpose of the motion, which appears in today's order paper, is to refer the resolution to a committee, and we have taken precisely this step to make it possible for hon. members to examine it over the weekend. Madam Speaker, you have also mentioned that this text is now available for hon. members, but I wanted to make it clear that these documents had in fact been provided last Thursday to all parliamentary leaders for distribution to their respective colleagues.

● (1540)

[English]

Mr. Dick: Madam Speaker, my only problem is that we are now entering debate on the very resolution. I have a right as a member of Parliament to have that document. It has been tabled and I am asking for the document before we continue. If the government does not have the ability to do that and ministers say they control and run things—

Mr. Trudeau: You have had it since Thursday.

Mr. Dick: I do not have a copy.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that on Thursday afternoon I made myself available to the caucus of the Conservative party to brief them. He did not bother to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think we can put an end to this point of order by distributing the documents which are requested by the hon. member at the present time.

Mr. Epp: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, in order to get the debate going I believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) would want to be accurate in his statements. He mentioned that he had made himself available last Thursday afternoon to our caucus for discussion on the draft resolution. I think he would recognize, in conformity with what happened, that while he made that offer there was a delay in meeting with our caucus for the simple reason that the government requested a delay so that they could change their documents. They were not ready. So the meeting took place in the evening rather than in the afternoon. It was at the government's request, because their documents were not ready.

Mr. Chrétien: Well, Madam Speaker, we are a long way from Thursday—five days ago.

With the permission of the House I will continue. At the time the resolution was passed the Prime Minister said, and I quote:

> We are determined that in the months ahead the House will have an occasion to express itself on this matter . . . For my part, I think it would be appropriate if we consulted the provinces before acting unilaterally on that motion.

The House leader of the official opposition, in support of the motion, commended the Prime Minister "for indicating the necessity and, indeed, if not the necessity, certainly the propriety in our system of consulting the provinces before we act unilaterally." Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) himself said in Toronto on June 6 of this year, just before the June 9 first ministers' conference, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of June 7, 1980:

> The participants in Monday's conference speak for 11 governments, Parliament speaks for 23 million Canadians. If the first ministers of the federation cannot make marked progress toward changes which fit the Canada of the 1980s then the Parliament of the federation may have to assert a stronger role.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien:

> But if it does, that must not be as the instrument of one government, but as the forum of all Canada. Parliament, alone among institutions, reflects that country and can lift the discussion above the question of what governments need and focus on the question of what the nation needs.

An hon. Member: Well said!

Mr. Chrétien: During the referendum campaign members from both sides of this House, and leaders of all provincial governments outside of Quebec, expressed clearly their commitment to early and significant constitutional change. For my part, I began consultations with the provinces the day after the referendum. These consultations lasted all summer. At both the ministerial level and the level of first ministers we attempted to reach agreement on means of renewing our federation, bringing our constitution home, updating our political institutions, changing the distribution of powers, and guaranteeing economic, political and legal rights of Canadians.

As a federal government, we made proposals which would have increased the power of the provinces in many areas. As such, we were prepared to further decentralize powers in a country which is already highly decentralized. But we refused to accept demands which would have impaired the ability of the national government, the government of all Canadians, to take action in the national interest in cases where that interest transcends the interest of a particular region or province.

The federal government offered to transfer to the provinces jurisdiction over family law. We were prepared to give the provinces the ability to levy indirect taxation on resources, and the ability to make laws in the field of interprovincial trade in resources. This would have been of particular benefit to all western Canada. Indeed, our proposals would have resolved all of the problems which have concerned the province of Saskatchewan.

I might add here that I listened with interest to the statesmanlike approach taken on Thursday evening by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) in stating the policies of his party. His views on resource ownership coincide with the offer I made during this summer's constitutional negotiations.

Mr. Clark: The deal!

Mr. Chrétien: I can only regret that our offer at that time was rejected by some of the provinces as not going far enough. We proposed new provincial powers over fisheries and we offered the provinces more revenues and a greater say in the management and development of offshore resources. Under our offer, Atlantic Canada would have received 100 per cent of offshore revenues until the income of those provinces was above the national average.

We are prepared to give the provinces more jurisdiction than they have ever had in the field of communications. We agreed to enshrine in the constitution the obligation of the federal government to make equalization payments to the less favoured provinces.

We stated our willingness to place the Supreme Court in the constitution, and we said that we would give the provinces a say in the appointment of Supreme Court judges. In return for all of these proposed transfers of jurisdiction to the provinces, the federal government did not seek broad, new powers for itself. But we did insist that the provincial governments must recognize Canada as a country where there is one citizenship and not ten provincial citizenships. We stated that Canadians should have much more in common than just the same passport.

• (1550)

We told the provincial governments that they could have more of our powers if they agreed that Canadian citizens, as a matter of right, should be free to take up residence, to hold a job, to invest their savings, to sell their products and to purchase their supplies anywhere in Canada. And that we wanted these rights to be guaranteed in the constitution.

We were unable to achieve agreement, despite three months of intensive consultation, discussion, and negotiation with the provinces. We wanted to reach agreement with the provinces, and we did everything possible to achieve agreement except compromise on our fundamental principles.

[Translation]

The reason we did not reach agreement was that provincial governments attempted to bargain the rights of Canadians against more powers for the provinces. We were prepared to negotiate powers of governments, but we would not negotiate peoples' rights against powers for governments.

The House leader of the opposition said on May 9 that the federal government should consult with the provinces "before we act unilaterally". We spent the next three months consulting, but without the success we all hoped for. We have no choice now but to act in the House of Commons.

We must act now for three reasons. First, all of us made a solemn commitment to the people of Quebec that if they voted for federalism, there would soon be significant constitutional renewal. We campaigned in Quebec—and I remember twice sharing a platform with the Leader of the Opposition—telling the people that all of Canada is their country; that their individual rights and language rights will be protected everywhere in Canada, that the principle of sharing is fundamental to our society. Today we must fulfil that promise.

The second reason to act now is to provide a momentum for further change. Once we have succeeded in bringing our constitution home with an amending formula, we will have created a mechanism to permit constitutional change as and when necessary. We will no longer have to hesitate because of the humiliation of having to go to London every time we want to change our constitution.

The measure which I am introducing today will change the dynamics of constitutional negotiation and will facilitate the achieving of further reform. No longer will we be in a position where powers will be negotiated against patriation. We will negotiate powers on their merits. I believe that this will mean more rational negotiations and a far better chance for a successful conclusion.

Today marks the end of one stage and the beginning of another. The second stage of constitutional reform will deal with division of powers and with the updating of our political institutions. I am anxious that this process get under way as soon as possible, for it too is part of our commitment to the people not only of Quebec but of all of Canada.

The third reason to act now is that the people of Canada can no longer tolerate interminable discussion about the constitution and are frustrated by the inability of politicians to make Canada work the way it can and should. Canadians believe that it is vital that we act now so that we can get this first major stage in constitutional reform behind us.

For all of these reasons, I am proud to have the opportunity today of introducing a motion in the House of Commons which will provide for the patriation of our constitution, for the entrenching of a charter of rights and freedoms including mobility rights of persons and minority language education rights, and for the enshrining in the constitution of the principle of equalization and of a commitment of governments to equal opportunity for all Canadians and the reduction of economic disparities.

The constitutional proposals of the federal government do not affect the division of powers in Canada. There is no transfer of powers from the provinces to the federal government. All that has been done is to prohibit both levels of government from interfering with fundamental rights of Canadians. These rights which are inherent in Canadian citizenship include not only fundamental freedoms, legal rights and democratic rights, but also the right to educate our children in their own official language. I must say that I find it strange that the Leader of the Opposition would take such violent objection to this as being fundamentally contrary to the nature of Canada. I believe that the substance of the resolution reflects the Canada all of us believe in.

In technical terms, the address to the Queen, which is set out in the resolution, is similar to previous addresses to the monarch and asks the Queen to lay the Canada Act before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for enactment.

The Canada Act commences with the recital of the action taken in Canada that makes it appropriate for the United Kingdom Parliament to enact the proposed bill. The bill is technical in nature. It provides for the enactment of a schedule, The constitution act, 1980 containing the new substantive provisions that would have the force of law in Canada. It would also continue as law in Canada existing constitutional statutes relating to Canada and provide that no future United Kingdom laws apply to Canada. Finally, the bill contains provisions relating to its implementation, such as the coming into force of various provisions.

The constitution act, 1980 is set out in schedule A to the Canada Act. This statute contains important new provisions that, for the most part, are not closely linked to matters now provided for in the Constitution of Canada. It includes the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms and provisions relating to equalization and regional disparities as well as procedures whereby the constitution could in future be amended in Canada. In addition the bill provides for the preparation of the first official French version of the Constitution of Canada and would change the titles of previous British North America Acts so that they would in future be known as Constitution Acts. These name changes and other consequential amendments are set out in schedule I to the constitution act, 1980.

Upon the adoption of the Canada Act by the United Kingdom Parliament, Canada would have a constitution that would form part of the body of laws of Canada that could be amended only in Canada.

Madam Speaker, after 113 years of nationhood, Canada at last will be able to bring its constitution home. No longer will it be necessary to go to the parliament of another country to amend our own constitution.

In addition to bringing the constitution home, the resolution provides for an interim amending procedure which gives full weight to the role of the provinces in our federal system and provides more legal protection for provincial interests than do the existing practices of constitutional amendment. This procedure will require that no amendment affecting all the provinces can be made without their consent and that of the Government of Canada. If a formula acceptable to all provinces and the federal government is agreed upon within two years, it will take effect.

The resolution provides for certain means to ensure that Canada will not be faced forever with the requirement of unanimity before constitutional change can be made.

If the provinces and the federal government fail, yet again, to agree unanimously on a formula, but no other proposal has sufficient provincial support, then a formula similar in principle to the Victoria formula of 1971 will come into effect. But if eight or more provinces, representing at least 80 per cent of the total population of all the provinces, agree within two years after patriation on a proposal for a different amending procedure that meets the requirements set out in the resolution, this formula and another similar in principle to the Victoria formula will be put to the people in a referendum. The federal government will also have the opportunity, at that time, to put forward a formula of its own choice, instead of the modified Victoria formula.

● (1600)

[English]

As I just mentioned, if there is no consensus among the provinces on a formula, an amending procedure, similar in principle to the Victoria formula, will automatically come into effect two years after patriation. The formula is based on the principle that amendments to certain parts of the constitution should require a consensus in each region of the country, as well as a general consensus across Canada. The Victoria formula required this consensus to be expressed through provincial legislative assemblies, and the House of Commons and Senate in Ottawa. The formula in the resolution will, in addition, allow the consensus to be expressed through a national referendum.

In general, the formula would require that amendments to the constitution be approved by Parliament and either the legislative assemblies or by a majority of voters in a majority of the provinces, including every province that has or has had a population of at least 25 per cent of the population of Canada; at least two of the four Atlantic provinces with combined populations of at least 50 per cent of the population of all the Atlantic provinces—

Mr. McGrath: Goodbye P.E.I.

Mr. Chrétien: —at least two of the four western provinces with combined populations of at least 50 per cent of all the western provinces.

An hon. Member: Hail P.E.I.

Mr. Chrétien: The Leader of the Opposition has taken the view that only a provincial government can speak for the people of a province. We take the view that the people can speak for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: We do not believe that it is contrary to the spirit of federalism—

Mr. Clark: To wipe out the provinces.

Mr. Chrétien: —to allow the people to express their views on constitutional amendments.

Before the Leader of the Opposition talks too much about how this government is overturning the principle of federalism, I thought that he should be reminded that in two other federal states, Australia and Switzerland, constitutional amendments are valid when passed in a referendum by a majority of the people in a majority of states. Despite this practice, neither of these countries can in any way be described as being unitary states.

Mr. Andre: They also have elected Senates.

Mr. Chrétien: If the provincial governments disagree with the modified Victoria formula, I have already explained that they will be able to propose something different. And the people will then decide.

What would really constitute passing over the heads of the provincial governments would be some sort of constitutional assembly as proposed by the Leader of the Opposition, where none of the provincial governments would have any say at all; it would be the members of the assembly but not the government. The decision to call a national referendum—

Mr. Clark: Where do the governments come from?

Mr. Chrétien: —on a constitutional amendment would rest with the Canadian Parliament.

In 1947 the first Bill of Rights in Canada was passed in the province of Saskatchewan by the government headed by a distinguished former member of this House, Hon. T. C. Douglas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: In 1960—

Mr. Clark: There is the deal.

Mr. Chrétien: Wait a minute; your turn is coming.

In 1960 Parliament passed the Canadian Bill of Rights. When that bill was introduced, a good friend of all of us, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker stated:

An hon. Member: Put his name on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: He stated, and I quote:

> This measure that I introduce is the first step on the part of Canada to carry out the acceptance either of the International Declaration of Human Rights or of the principles that actuated those who produced that noble document.

Today, Madam Speaker, we have the opportunity to complete the work of Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Douglas by providing Canadians with constitutional guarantees of their fundamental freedoms and liberties so that no government will ever be able to take them away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Except by referendum.

Mr. Chrétien: It is our duty to carry forward the work of two great western Canadians, John Diefenbaker and Tommy Douglas.

John Diefenbaker understood that western Canada has been built by immigrants from all over the world who fled oppression to seek freedom and opportunity in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind those present in the galleries that they are not allowed to participate in the debate, even by applauding.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see that the gallery agrees with John Diefenbaker!

Mr. Nielsen: They sure were not applauding you.

Mr. Chrétien: The ethnic communities in Canada above all others understand the importance of an enshrined charter of rights and freedoms.

I appeal to the Leader of the Opposition, as a western Canadian, not to forsake the legacy of John Diefenbaker; I appeal to him not to oppose a measure which is of such importance to Canadians of so many different cultural backgrounds. As a westerner and as the leader of a party which has always upheld the rights of the individual over the state, he should not oppose a measure containing a charter of rights.

Some have told us that provincial legislatures are better able than the courts to protect the rights and freedoms of Canadians. If rights and freedoms were to be dependent upon the governments of individual provinces, there would be no such thing as rights and freedoms common to all Canadians.

I believe that Canadians, wherever they live in Canada, should have common rights and freedoms. I am supported in this view by the special joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons which, both in 1972 and in 1978, recommended the entrenchment in the constitution of a charter of rights. And it was once again proposed in Halifax in October 1979 by the federal government at a meeting of the continuing committee of ministers on the constitution. I remind the House that this proposal was made in Halifax by the government led by the Leader of the Opposition.

● (1610)

The case for a charter of rights was made eloquently by the constitutional committee of the Canadian Bar Association, and I quote:

> The symbolic and educational importance of proclaiming the rights of the individual as being beyond the power of a transient legislative majority can scarcely be exaggerated. A clear statement in the constitution of the fundamental values all Canadians share would, we think, have an important unifying effect. It would inculcate in all citizens, young and old, a consciousness of the importance of civil liberties and an authoritative expression of the particular rights and liberties our society considers fundamental. To the politician and the public servant, it would provide an authoritative standard for scrutinizing not only statutes but delegated legislation.
> Beyond its symbolic and educational functions a bill of rights can be an effective instrument of enforcement, particularly of fundamental political and legal rights. The courts can declare laws that violate constitutional rights invalid. In the absence of guaranteed rights, a transient majority in Parliament or a legislature can do incalculable harm to a minority or an individual. Unlike existing human rights legislation, which can always be abrogated or modified by statute, it would constrain future legislatures and governments from acting in violation of human rights. This protection is all the more important in our modern administrative state where there is such a vast quantity of delegated legislation that is not subjected to the type of questioning involved in parliamentary debate.
> It is true that there are now non-constitutional bills of rights at the federal and provincial levels. But these are mere legislative directions to the courts as to how legislation is to be interpreted. Constitutional entrenchment should encourage courts to take a stronger stand to protect fundamental rights.

The resolution before the House provides for a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms binding upon Parliament, all provincial legislatures and all governments. The rights and freedoms in the charter include: freedom of conscience and religion; freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of information; freedom of peaceful assembly and of association; the right to vote and to stand for office, and the right to elections at least once every five years.

[Translation]

Sections 7 to 14 of the charter set out basic legal rights of Canadians. Some of these rights derive from the Canadian Bill of Rights and some are new. Of the latter, some derive from the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. I might remind the House that before adhering to the covenant, the federal government received the consent of all provinces. If provincial governments agreed to be bound by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, they should not object to being bound by a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms.

The legal rights include the rights to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice; the right to be secure against search or seizure except on grounds and in accordance with procedures established by law.

There is the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned except on grounds and in accordance with procedures established by law; the right on arrest or detention to be informed promptly of the reasons, to retain and instruct counsel without delay, the right to obtain the remedy of habeas corpus.

Section 11 provides certain fundamental protections to those charged with an offence.

The protections include the right to be informed promptly of the charge; to be tried within a reasonable time; to be presumed innocent until proven guilty in a fair and public trial, and to be granted bail where appropriate. The rights also include protection against being found guilty if an act wasn't an offence when it occurred and against being tried twice for the same offence. In addition, if punishment is changed between the time the act occurs and sentencing, only the lesser punishment may be imposed.

In addition, the charter enshrines the right not to be subjected to any cruel or unusual punishment, the right of witnesses to protection against self-incrimination, and the right to assistance of an interpreter in court proceedings.

Non-discrimination rights include the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law without discrimination because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age or sex. These rights will come into effect within three years after patriation. The reason for the delay is to give Parliament and the provincial legislatures time to amend statutes which presently contravene the protections against discrimination.

As a federal government, we understand that women have for years been subject to discrimination because of sex. Minority groups have been subject to discrimination because of race, religion, colour or ethnic origin. This type of discrimination must be wiped out in our country.

As Minister of Justice, I want to assure this House that the government will act immediately to see to it that our laws comply with the non-discrimination provisions of the charter of rights. For this, we will need the collaboration of all members. As a government, we now consider ourselves morally bound by the non-discrimination provisions of the charter even though it will be three years before we are legally bound.

I would like to turn now to two very important parts of the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms. First, I want to speak about mobility rights. We believe that certain rights are fundamental to the concept of Canadian citizenship; these rights must be guaranteed by the constitution and be applicable everywhere in Canada. I have spoken already of fundamental freedoms, democratic rights and legal rights.

Our conception of Canada is one where citizens as a matter of right should be free to take up residence and to pursue a livelihood anywhere in Canada without discrimination based on the previous province of residence. In other words, no Canadian should be prevented from seeking a job anywhere in Canada merely on the grounds that he or she comes from another province. This right which is inherent in Canadian citizenship will be enshrined in the charter and will be binding on all governments.

This does not mean that provinces cannot impose their normal laws on people who come or move to their province. It simply means that they cannot single out certain Canadians for harsher treatment just because they come from other parts of the country. In other words, there will be one Canadian citizenship not ten provincial citizenships.

The charter of rights and freedoms will also give all Canadians the right to send their children to school in their own official language where there are sufficient numbers of the minority language group to justify a school. English-speaking Canadians who move to Quebec will be entitled to have their children educated in English, and French-speaking Canadians will at last be entitled to have their children educated in French wherever they live in Canada.

By guaranteeing minority language education rights in the constitution, we are enshrining what provincial premiers agreed to at St. Andrews in 1977 and in Montreal in 1978, namely, and I quote:

> Each child of the French-speaking or English-speaking minority is entitled to an education in his or her language in the primary or secondary schools in each province wherever numbers warrant.

Some have said that the constitution should not protect the rights of English-speaking parents to send their children to school in English in Quebec or the rights of French-speaking parents to send their children to school in French outside of Quebec. We have been told by some to forget the lessons of history and to depend upon provincial legislatures to protect minority language education rights.

Mr. Speaker, this government holds the view that such rights must be protected in the constitution because they are fundamental to what Canada is all about. When minority language education rights are taken away, the right to take up a job in any part of Canada is seriously impaired. English-speaking Canadians, if they move to Quebec, want to have the right to send their children to school in their own language. Indeed Mr. Lévesque and Quebec government members pat themselves on the back for doing so, therefore I do not see why that could not be enshrined and confirmed in the constitution.

Similarly French-speaking Canadians do not want to move to other parts of Canada unless they can send their children to school in their own language. The only way to achieve this is to guarantee such rights in the constitution. In effect, without a guarantee of minority language education rights, there can be no full mobility rights.

Members on all sides of this House representing Canadians everywhere made a commitment to the people of Quebec during the referendum campaign that a new constitution would guarantee the fundamental rights of French-speaking Canadians outside of Quebec and English-speaking Canadians in Quebec. The guarantee of minority language education rights everywhere in Canada meets this commitment. It also marks our maturity as a nation because it must never be forgotten that a civilization is judged by how it treats its minorities.

For the first time in Canadian history, the education rights of official language minorities all across the country will be guaranteed. I would appeal particularly to the Federation of Francophones Outside Quebec to put pressure on Premier Lévesque to drop his opposition to a measure which goes further than anything in our history to protect the rights of French language minorities everywhere in Canada.

It was because of the opposition of the government of Quebec to the Victoria charter of 1971 that we lost the opportunity to achieve institutional bilingualism in many provinces. Today I would strongly urge the people of Quebec to put enormous pressure on the government of Quebec not to oppose this chance of a lifetime to assure education rights for French Canadians anywhere in Canada.

And I would urge just as strongly support for the charter of rights by those who oppose the provisions of Bill 101 which restricts the rights of English-speaking Canadians who move to Quebec to send their children to an English school.

There are other language rights which are now part of the constitution which apply to the use of either English or French in the legislatures, the courts and in the statutes and records of the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba. These will continue to be protected by existing constitutional provisions.

The constitution provides rights for the use of the English or French language in Parliament and in federal courts. These rights will be codified in the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms.

There are other language rights which are now found in the Official Languages Act. These will be enshrined in the constitution. English and French will be entrenched as the official languages of Canada. Also entrenched is the right of the public to communicate with and receive services from any head or central office of an institution of the Parliament or Government of Canada in either English or French, and, in areas where numbers warrant, from any other office of such institutions.

These rights will now be part of the charter and will be binding on the Government of Canada and will not be able to be changed except by an amendment to the constitution.

I appeal to the people of Quebec to pressure their provincial government not to oppose a measure which implements the dreams and aspirations of generations of French Canadians who, believing that all of Canada is their country, have wanted to see their rights enshrined in the Constitution of Canada.

● (1620)

[English]

I would like now to turn to another part of the resolution and speak about equalization. The practice of using federal revenues to redistribute wealth to the less advantaged provinces of this country is well accepted. Since 1957, unconditional transfers known as equalization payments have been made by the federal government to enable every province to provide a reasonable level of public services, without having to impose an unreasonable tax burden on its residents. This practice has become so well established that it has now emerged as a fundamental "principle" of Canadian federalism.

Sharing of the wealth has become a fundamental right of Canadians and that is why the resolution entrenches the principle of equalization and commits both orders of government of promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians; furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities and, specifically, providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

By entrenching this principle in the constitution, we are enshrining the obligation of sharing which has been fundamental to the Canadian experience.

Before I conclude, I want to speak about one criticism that has been voiced outside this House in the last few days. Some have suggested that the government has no right, without the consent of the provinces, to introduce a resolution asking the Parliament of Great Britain to amend and to patriate the Canadian constitution.

I will be prepared in committee to deal with this matter at some length. However, I want to state here today as Minister of Justice that there is no legal impediment to the Parliament of Canada's asking the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act.

In the past, amendments to the British North America Act have been made by Great Britain following a joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons. In 11 cases, such resolutions have been adopted without consultation with, or the consent of some or all of the provinces; in only six cases have they been made after consultation with the provinces and with the consent of all or some of the provinces.

Past practice shows that there is no hard or fast rule concerning whether or how the federal government should consult with and obtain the consent of the provinces before presenting a resolution seeking to amend the British North America Act. Theoretically, the legal sovereignty of the Parliament of the United Kingdom is such that it can amend the British North America Act with or without the consent of Canada. But precedent tells us that the Parliament of the United Kingdom will amend the BNA Act only at the request of the Parliament of Canada and will do so despite any objections from any particular province or provinces.

On the subjects contained in this resolution, the Government of Canada has consulted for years with the provinces. We failed, yet again, to reach agreement, and therefore the government decided to proceed on its own in the spirit of the resolution passed unanimously by this House on May 9. Whatever the merits of unanimous agreement as a condition for change, the kind of constitutional deadlock we have had in this country for the last 53 years cannot be allowed to continue forever. However, the amending formula which we propose will ensure that in future there cannot be any unilateral action by the federal government. In other words, the changes we are proposing actually reduce the future powers of Parliament with respect to the amendment of the constitution.

In concluding, I want to express my hope and desire that members of Parliament will deal fully and yet expeditiously with this historic measure. I hope that this debate will rise above political partisanship. I hope all members will heed the words of Premier Davis who told us to divorce what is best for the country——from partisan feelings and from personalities. This nation will not be shaped and the challenges we face will not be met, if narrow partisanship is to determine where each and every one of us stand on the large and fundamental issues touching upon the very structure and reality of Canada.

● (1630)

Canada is a country of minorities. It is made up of people from many varied backgrounds who came here seeking freedom and opportunity. The changes proposed to the constitution will guarantee freedoms for all individuals and will help protect the rights of minorities. Canada is a sovereign and a dynamic country. It must have the means to renew its own constitution by Canadian means and not by resorting to the parliament of another sovereign state. The amending procedures we propose would provide those means.

I think this is a very important occasion. Some people question our right in this regard and ask why we are doing this. I spent much of last year discussing this matter. I made a lot of speeches in Quebec and in many places right across Canada. The Leader of the Opposition was in attendance when I made one of those speeches in Quebec. It was recorded, and in it I said in Quebec that I had a mandate from my caucus and from my cabinet to state that we will change Canada; Canada will have complete control of its own economy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: We will have a Canadian constitution. I told the people of Quebec that we will have our own Canadian constitution.

An hon. Member: He is the best friend René Lévesque ever had.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: As I was saying, we will have a Canadian constitution in which both official languages will be protected. Also, the Constitution of Canada will protect the fundamental rights of Canadians as well as the rights of Francophones outside Quebec to be educated in French finally, which was not the case in the past. I was also saying that we would grant the same right to English-speaking Quebeckers, and this concept would be entrenched in the constitution, this concept of sharing and of opportunity for all Canadians which has formed the basis and the strength of our country.

So that is the procedure we have followed. This is not an end, it is a beginning. For 53 years, Madam Speaker, we have tried to bargain the patriation of the constitution against something else, and that has never worked. Since 1921, there have been many constitutional conferences. Starting today, change will become possible. I spent three months with the ministers of the different governments and I can say today that if under the present constitution we could have made some constitutional amendments during the summer, we could easily have arrived at four or five agreements.

But as usual, at the last minute, some tried to bargain to try to get more, just like in Victoria, just like in 1939 and at other times. But by having in Canada the means to bring about changes as they may become necessary, then, as I said in my speech and as the Right Hon. Prime Minister promised in his address to the nation last Thursday, we are committed to continue the renewal of our constitution, to review the division of power, to change Canadian institutions. We have to get started, and the only way to succeed is by patriating the constitution to Canada immediately so that we can amend it in Canada, and that, Madam Speaker, is exactly what we are doing today for the benefit of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Mr. Clark: I do not think you, Madam Speaker, were able to hear me, but members opposite did and they knew I was rising on a point of order. I do so simply because I would not want the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) to leave what I am sure was an inadvertently misleading statement on the record of the House.

[Translation]

He spoke about the language rights of Francophones outside Quebec. He said French Canadians will have the right to speak French anywhere in Canada. Yes, that is what he said, but he never qualified this right, even though it is well qualified here in the resolution. I would like to give the Minister of Justice, through a point of order, the opportunity to correct the record in order for him to avoid being in the position of manipulating public opinion or saying something which is not in the statute.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, if the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition thinks that I do not go far enough in these proposals, if he wishes all these rights to be written in the constitution without any restriction, we will gladly accept an amendment moved by the opposition in this matter.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie)—Housing—Assistance for home owners adversely affected by rising interest rates; the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish)—Public Service—Cost of living increase less than rise in inflation; the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields)—Energy—Development of tar sands and heavy oil resources.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommitees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, perhaps I might begin by replying to the last comment made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). What I would like is to have the minister speak the truth about the measure he has presented. What I tried to do in a gentlemanly fashion on the floor of the House of Commons was to indicate that three or four times during his reference to the rights of Francophones to speak French outside Quebec he forgot the qualification in the resolution proposed here. I would not want him to misrepresent the position of his government in any way to the people of Quebec who might be listening or, indeed, to anyone else who might be concerned about the rights of Francophones to speak their language outside the province of Quebec. I wanted to raise that matter simply because I was sure the error by the minister was inadvertent. I rather regret that he did not take my point of order in that spirit.

I must deal at the outset as we begin to discuss this resolution with one or two matters of procedure. First I must express my regret at the absence of the government House leader, although I am not surprised by the absence from this debate of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). I think that is well understood by all members on this side of the House. He was here for part of the debate but he has now left. The minister responsible for government advertising or propaganda has said that the Minister of Transport does not want to listen to me. That is the trouble with this government; it does not want to listen to Parliament. Members of that government would be better served if they paid more attention to what members of the opposition have to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The point I want to raise is that in relation to a matter of such importance to the government there has been remarkably little consultation with either the members of the House of Commons or, indeed, parliaments, governments and legislatures of the provinces. It is my understanding that the premiers did not receive copies of this resolution until well after it had been discussed in public by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Certainly, as was revealed today, no steps were taken by the government to ensure that members of the House of Commons had delivered to them by the government, as I believe it is the government's responsibility to do, copies of this resolution that members of Parliament are being asked to consider. It is said that a bulk number was left with my colleague, the House leader of the opposition.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not so.

Mr. Clark: He tells me that is not the case. The obligation clearly rests upon the Government of Canada, if it considers this bill to be so important, to ensure that the House of Commons which is to debate this bill has a copy to read before the debate begins.

● (1640)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I think it is important that the House and the country also understand some of the implications of the motion which has been moved by the Minister of Justice and the implications of the proposed resolution. If one read the press and relied simply upon that, one might be led to believe that we are to follow a process here which is similar to the process followed for the passage of a bill. According to newspaper reports, that would be that we would have a debate in the House followed by committee study and amendment, followed by final approval in the House. That is not the case with the measure put before us. The government has chosen another route or another method to have this matter debated before the House of Commons. We do not have a resolution before us. We have a motion referring the subject matter of the proposed resolution of address to a special joint committee of this House and the other place.

When we debate this reference—and I make this clear because it is very important to people who want to see a full debate in Parliament of constitutional matters—we cannot, under our rules, propose amendments to the proposed resolution itself. We can only move technical amendments to the motion of referral. I serve notice on the government that we may well want to move some technical amendments because there are some aspects of the notice of motion moved by the Minister of Justice today which cause grave concern to us. One of them, of course, is the time limit placed upon committee study by this House of Commons and by the joint committee of the proposed resolution. We are limited to two months, another deadline imposed by this government on constitutional processes, for whatever purposes.

Another matter of very real concern to us has to do with the fact that according to information exchanged in the briefings the other night, it is not the intention of the government to allow this committee to travel. In other words, a constitution to serve the whole country will be decided sitting in isolation in Ottawa. A constitution to serve the centuries will be decided and discussed by Parliament in a time limit of two months.

Those are serious deficiencies, we believe, in the government notice of motion. They raise serious questions as to the sincerity of this government in having in fact a full discussion, a full debate, and a full opportunity for Parliament to consider this matter.

Then there is the question of the quorum. I may well be corrected by others more expert in parliamentary procedure. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) can find in his experience some example of some place where this has been done before. He has never failed to do that to this point.

Mr. Broadbent: Even when he has made it up.

Mr. Clark: "Even when he has made it up", I am told by one of his seatmates.

We have here a committee of 25. Undoubtedly 13 or 14 Liberals will be sitting, always a majority. We have in the notice of motion the idea that a quorum will be composed of any 12 members. Generally opposition parties are respected and protected by saying that a quorum will require not simply a certain number of people but the representation of more than one party. That is not contained in this amendment here.

What is proposed in this amendment is that the Parliament of Canada, the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada, sitting in Ottawa, forbidden to travel, and required to conduct our work in only two months, must carry out that work in a period and under a quorum that can be decided by members of one party alone. The quorum can be decided by Liberals alone. Members of this party can be excluded from the decision. Members of the New Democratic Party can be excluded from the decision. What we have here is a provision that a meeting could be called and a decision could be taken with a quorum composed simply of members of the government party in the House of Commons. That again may simply have been an oversight, and it may well be that there will be an attempt made by representatives of the government to correct it. We hope that will be the case but, if not, we may have amendments to suggest on this or, indeed, on other matters which relate to the resolution here and to the notice of motion.

I have some other points to make. When the proposed address is before the committee, the committee cannot amend it. It can only prepare a report describing the amendments it thinks should be made. That is what we are dealing with here. If there is a debate on a motion of concurrence in that report, we in this House of Commons still cannot move amendments to the proposed resolution. We cannot even move amendments to the report of the committee. We can only pass amendments to the concurrence motion, and what would the effect of that be? The only power Parliament would have would be to refer the matter back for another committee study. This matter has been drawn up by the government, presumably with intent, in such a way that it is not possible for Parliament to amend the substance of the matter in any way. That again may well have been an error. If it is an error, we want it to be corrected, but if it is practice and if it is deliberate, we believe that is a bad way to start discussion of a constitutional process in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Again, concurrence by the House in the report of the committee would not constitute adoption by the House of the resolution of address. All we will have done is agree that a resolution be presented, perhaps with the proviso that certain amendments should be made.

The significant debate will come when the resolution itself is brought directly before the House sometime after the committee has made its report. Only when that resolution is presented will we know if the government has taken any account at all of the views that are expressed by members of this House of Commons in the committee proceeding that the Minister of Justice wants us to start now. Only during the debate on that second resolution will we have the chance to propose amendments to the resolution instead of an indirect motion of reference. Only when that resolution has been passed will the House of Commons have adopted a resolution for presentation to Her Majesty. In the meantime, we do not know if there is to be a concurrence debate after the committee presents its report. There has been no indication of that. We have not been told when the resolution that counts—and this one does not count in terms of being able to constitute an address to Westminster—will be brought into this House of Commons.

We do not know what deadline the government has for the passage of the motion that counts. All we have is this preliminary round, but we do not know where it leads, and I believe that if the Prime Minister and his colleagues are sincere about involving Parliament in this debate, Parliament and the public should be told when the next shoe drops, what the next step is, and what is going to happen after this process. If the House and the public are to participate in an orderly debate, the government should tell us a little bit more about the process we are engaged in and not allow the impression to persist that the secondary question we are debating now is in fact the main question.

The Minister of Justice talked about an historic moment. I suppose we all like to talk about historic moments and pretend that the world will change suddenly as the seas part. In fact, history happens much more slowly, and it usually takes its shape from an accumulation of actions, decisions, and events. However, there are actions and there are events which can create a climate for good or a climate for ill which will affect what a country or, indeed, what a parliament does for some time to come. To draw two contentious examples from his own government's past, I believe that the passage of the Official Languages Act created a positive climate which made it easier for Francophones to feel at home across Canada.

By contrast, this Prime Minister's War Measures Act created a climate of fear and apprehension which will reach through history.

An hon. Member: Where were you on the vote, Joe?

Mr. Clark: In both cases the taking of the action—its actual taking—was more important than the details of the action. What counted was the motive; to codify rights in one case, and to abuse rights in another case.

• (1650)

We are debating today another action which, if taken, will live in Canadian history as the symbol of the motive of this Parliament on a fundamental question. What is at issue here is more than a law, more even than a constitution. This resolution contains a power which could destroy the federal system in Canada.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: By destroying the federal system in Canada it could destroy this country. I regret that the Prime Minister smiles at that.

An hon. Member: I did too.

Mr. Clark: Let me refer the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), who is one member of that cabinet who should know how to read the law, to section 42, because section 42 denies the essence of federalism in this country, and by denying the essence of federalism in this country, you deny the essence of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This country of ours was created as a partnership of governments and legislatures. The constitution defines the relation between different levels of government, and our practice has ensured that amendments affecting both levels of government must be approved by both levels. Section 42 of this proposal breaks that practice, breaks that partnership.

[Translation]

The purpose of the resolution is to break the fundamental balance which has been at the heart of our federal system ever since the Canadian nation was created. Canada is a federation because the two levels of government share powers which they may exercise exclusively.

The extent of these powers has changed over the years, and the perfect equilibrium between these two levels of government will remain an issue for debate for many years to come. However, the existence of this equilibrium which is at the core of the Canadian system, had always been an accepted fact, at least until this resolution was introduced today.

On the basis of this resolution, the central government would have the authority to deprive unilaterally the provinces of their powers. And because this authority would not be limited, this central government could, if it chose to, deprive the provinces of all their powers and for all times.

Under this resolution, the central government could destroy what makes Canada a federation. And if it did, I am afraid it would signal the end of Canada as a country. As a matter of fact, because of the mere mention of the possible creation of this authority, as stated in the resolution, we are very much in doubt about the ability of this government to understand, promote and unite the diverse factors which make up our federal system.

[English]

There are several specific issues in this resolution. Some of them, of course, deserve approval, such as the act of bringing our constitution home or the decision finally to enshrine the principle of equalization in the constitution of Canada. Other proposals deserve rejection; others require continuing debate, including a frank discussion of the best way to guarantee rights. I believe that basic rights must prevail over ordinary law, but I have been witness to the practical problems of relying too exclusively on law as an instrument of social change. For that reason I believe we would make faster progress to more bilingualism in this country if there were an opting in provision for language rights. I say in passing—I am sure the Prime Minister knows it—that that would also allow such provinces as choose to opt into language rights which reach beyond the schools to affect provincial courts, legislatures and other institutions.

Mr. Trudeau: There is Bill C-60.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister speaks of Bill C-60, and I will be reminding him of that and of its treatment in the courts in a moment.

I do not want this debate to become personal, but I was concerned about the personal references made by the Minister of Justice to myself, particularly in relation to my attitude to French language rights in this country. It is not a matter about which I boast, but I think the Minister of Justice would find it difficult to discover anyone else in this House who has worked as hard, or indeed risked as much as I have, to promote French language rights in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. I am sorry but I have never referred at all to the attitude of the hon. member. I have always congratulated him on his attitude vis-à-vis the French fact in Canada, and he knows that. I have not made any reference at all in this House during my speech to this, and I do not know how he can make such a comment. I want to correct the record right away because I told him, both personally and publicly, especially in my own riding during the referendum campaign, how proud I have been for a long time of his attitude on that matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I accept the statement made by the Minister of Justice. Later I will refer to the text of the remarks he uttered in the House. But I accept the sincerity of what he said and I know, having heard him make those remarks in the past, how startling it would be if he said what I thought I had heard him say. But I accept his position now that he did not say that or if he did, he did not intend to say those words in his remarks.

I may now turn to the question of the late Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker and his bill of rights. I think he would have, at the least, been amused to have heard himself celebrated so by people who condemned him when he was here on the floor of the House of Commons. One of my colleagues behind me makes the point that during those remarks by the Minister of Justice there was an earth tremor in the region of Saskatoon in the immediate vicinity of the Diefenbaker Centre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I found it interesting, on the question of rights, that the Minister of Justice, makes the case that we should not trust the courts to protect the rights. I gather he has now corrected the statement attributed to him that he finds the Supreme Court unreliable. My point is that after having said that he cannot trust the courts—having said that he would not want the rights to be—

Mr. Trudeau: Do not put words in his mouth.

Mr. Clark: Well, we shall see. The point I want to make is that the greatest menace to rights is that section 42 of this provision allows rights to be removed by referendum, and any day when there is a fever in this land against a particular group of people, against a particular group of rights, this government, by the power it seeks in section 42, could invoke that power to have a national referendum, which would mean the end of those rights. Rights written into the constitution by referendum can be written out of the constitution by referendum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Right on.

Mr. Clark: That is a reality that this government will have to face.

What we have here is something quite different from what this government normally introduces. Normally it introduces legislation that looks as if it contained a great deal more than it does. This legislation looks a great deal simpler than it is in fact. The government, and the Minister of Justice most recently, have tried to wrap its initiative in the Canadian flag of patriotism. What is in that flag of patriotism and what is in this bill is a Trojan horse, a Trojan horse which is defended on the ground of bringing home our constitution, enshrining equalization, guaranteeing rights, and doing all of those good things that we want to have done. But inside, hidden away, written into the detail of this legislation is a range of other changes, a series of other proposals which could not only fundamentally change the nature of this country but could, in fact, as I intend to indicate during this debate, bring an end to this country, Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: At least one of those proposals—the Prime Minister spoke a moment ago of Bill C-60—is very similar to an action which ten months ago the Supreme Court of Canada described as being illegal.

● (1700)

Without detaining the House of Commons too long at this stage, I think it is well to identify some of the changes that are tucked away in this resolution. Section 44 would change unilaterally the central Canadian institution of Parliament. That section dramatically reduces the power of the Senate in constitutional matters. I make the point that the Senate was established to protect regional and provincial interests, but its powers are dramatically limited and dramatically changed by this proposed section 44. Madam Speaker will recall, as the House does that this government tried before to change the Senate unilaterally in the old Bill C-60. That attempt was ruled ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada as recently as ten months ago, in December of 1979.

Another basic change is introduced by section 51. In that section paragraph 91.1 of the British North America Act is deleted. Paragraph 91.1 was adopted in 1949. It was meant to give to Parliament the power to amend its so-called internal constitution. But in doing so the government of the time was very careful to protect provincial rights, namely, to protect the division of powers in the federation, a division the Minister of Justice said goes untouched in this bill. In deleting the protection for provincial rights, that is, the protection of provincial jurisdictions, section 51 is in fact making a substantive change in the Constitution of Canada. By my calculation, protection for those aspects of jurisdiction that have been exclusively provincial is put in jeopardy.

Again this resolution establishes a double standard for amendment. We have in the resolution that limited list of amendments which the Prime Minister wants; his personal package of change. Even though some of those changes are in a provincial field, he proposes to have them adopted without any reference to any province. Yet, at the same time the resolution proposes that any other changes which any other prime minister or any other provincial government might seek must be approved either by provinces or by referenda. If the Prime Minister believes so strongly in his method of amendment, in the method of amendment he proposes, why does he not apply that method to his personal package? Why should there be one standard for amendments he wants and a different standard for any other amendments that any other Canadian would want?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I must make note of the irony that what permits the Prime Minister to claim the ability to apply to his package a weaker standard than would apply to later amendments is precisely the fact that he is relying on Britain to accept his will more easily than Canada.

An hon. Member: Colonialism.

Mr. Clark: The document he proposes to amend is the British North America Act, a British statute. The document which subsequently would be amended would be a Canadian statute. He defends this package presented today involving patriation as being an end to colonial status. Then he uses that very colonial status he deplores to seek approval of his personal package of amendments.

The Prime Minister is the last of the great Canadian colonials. He does not trust Canada to approve his amendments, so he wants to try to sneak them past Westminster just before he changes the rules. We know that the Supreme Court of Canada ten months ago found that the designs of this government on the Senate were ultra vires and illegal. It is entirely likely that other aspects of this proposal are illegal. We were told by the Minister of Justice that he does not think so. He thinks they are fine. We will see what the Supreme Court thinks. The Minister of Justice thought Bill C-60 was fine too, but the Supreme Court did not agree. Undoubtedly the government will try to draw a distinction between constitutional law and constitutional convention. They may reach into some dusty corners of constitutional precedent somewhere in the Commonwealth, somewhere in the world, and find a precedent which upholds their doing what they are doing so that they can say it is legal.

Mr. Crosbie: Zambia.

Mr. Clark: As my colleague said, they might look to Zambia. They might look to Rhodesia.

Mr. Crosbie: Or Uganda.

Mr. Clark: They will reach as far as they can to find some precedent which they think will defend what they are doing. I do not want to join the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister in prejudging the decision of the courts, but it may be that they will find that what they are proposing to do is legal to some Philadelphia lawyer. It may be that it is strictly legal, but there is no question that what they are proposing to do here in a way that would destroy the Canadian federation, is wrong.

An hon. Member: Dead wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The obligation upon Parliament at this stage in the debate is to ensure that the basic facts in this proposal are understood by the Canadian people because, after all, it is the country of the Canadian people this resolution proposes to change. If I may say so, I believe that obligation is shared by journalists across the country and by others who have influence and, by their influence, who have responsibility to look beyond the surface of events and to look to the heart of proposals. But the primary obligation is ours in this Parliament because we are Parliament and it is in the Parliament's name that the government would act.

An attempt was made again today by the Minister of Justice to portray this resolution as the natural next step after constitutional discussions which failed. Well, that is false; that is false.

I had no question as to the sincerity of the Minister of Justice when he was running around the country, indeed when he was running around Quebec speaking in the referendum campaign. But the fact is that the hopes he caused to be raised in his work this summer were dashed once the first ministers came to meet with the Prime Minister under the klieg lights in the Conference Centre down the street. Indeed the suspicion of many of us about the motives of this government on constitutional change were immensely compounded by the language of the document or of the memorandum which I am sure they wish had not been leaked but was leaked. It revealed to the country the manipulative approach to federal-provincial relations, the manipulative approach to public opinion which has been constantly taken by this government consistently.

Just to refresh everyone's memory, the constitutional discussions this summer dealt with specific changes in the balance between the central government and the provinces. Some of the matters discussed this summer are mentioned in the resolution, such as the reference to equalization, the reference to rights, and the reference to the purpose of patriation. There is no reference at all to other matters discussed this summer. There is no reference to resource jurisdictions, no reference to communications, and no reference to the amending formula on which all governments this summer, as we understand it, virtually agreed in principle, the so-called Vancouver consensus requiring that amendments be approved by Parliament and at least any seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the Canadian population with, where necessary, the right of a dissenting province to opt out. Instead, in section 42 there is a proposal that has never been seen before, a fatal proposal which would allow a majority government that controls Parliament to use a direct and binding referendum to bypass entirely the elected governments of all provinces. By section 46 of this resolution a majority federal government which controlled Parliament would also write the rules of that referendum and would write those rules alone, imposing its majority to be sure that it got its way.

An hon. Member: And the question.

Mr. Clark: And would write the question.

• (1710)

As we know from recent experience, this federal government is prepared to spend millions of advertising dollars—the minister responsible will not tell hon. members on my side how much—on billboards and on television and on other instruments to manipulate the opinion that a referendum would express; and by this resolution such a referendum, if carried by a simple majority in each of the four regions, would be binding, it would have the force of law. It would not be an expression of opinion as the referendum in Quebec was, it would be a tool to change the basic law by which we live as a nation. That is the issue. This resolution would let Ottawa, with a manipulated majority in a referendum, ignore the elected governments and legislatures in all provinces and change any item, any item at all, in the Constitution of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: With only the people supporting them!

Mr. Clark: With only the people supporting us. I will get to the Prime Minister and the support he has been able to engender among the people of Canada from time to time—I remember particularly ten years ago on the War Measures Act. I will speak a little longer of that because it indicates the dangers which are inherent in a proposal of this kind.

But let me deal with the Minister of Justice for a moment and give him a little lesson in geography and a little lesson on nationalism. He talks about Australia, about Switzerland. Well, I have some news for the Minister of Justice. This is not Australia, this is not Switzerland; this is Canada and we want a constitution for Canada that respects the traditions of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: No doubt we will hear, as debate continues, on this infamous section 42, this section which wipes away the provinces—no doubt we will hear that the power will never be used. Well, if the power will never be used, why is it there? Why is it here in a resolution? Why is it proposed for consideration as part of the law of the land if it is not going to be used? Why do they put it there?

Some may say that the ability to manipulate opinion is exaggerated. Well, I ask the House and the country whether it was exaggerated ten years ago this month when this government terrified the country with reports of an apprehended insurrection, which apparently did not exist? I ask the people and the Parliament of Canada, I ask Canadians who are worried about civil rights—and I believe the Solicitor General is or was one who was worried about civil rights—to imagine the results of a referendum on civil liberties, a referendum conducted by this government during the heat of the James Cross affair. What would have happened to civil liberties then? What guarantees would there have been in the constitution of Canada then? How safe would the people of Canada be if we granted this request of the government—the same government which passed the War Measures Act, which manipulates opinion? How safe would the people of Canada be if those rights could be ruled out by a referendum? How safe indeed?

Indeed, to those who welcome the references in this resolution to language rights and to other rights, remember that those rights, too, would be subject to change by national referendum, and since legislators must contemplate the worst, as well as hope for the best, we must recognize that there could be, on some fundamental issue, some other fever in the country and some other majority prime minister who would say, when challenged, "Just watch me."

This resolution holds a clear potential for the abuse of particular rights or particular regions or particular minorities. That potential for abuse would alarm civilized legislators in any democracy. But the special threat to Canada, the threat that we must consider, is that this resolution would let a central government, with a manipulated majority in a referendum, end the federal system. It breaks the balance which makes the federal system work. We are not arguing now, as we have before in this House, whether Newfoundland should have the same resource rights as Ontario, or who should control cable television. The question here instead is whether there should be two parties to a constitutional decision, or just one, whether Canada is a partnership, as the Fathers of Confederation and every subsequent Parliament believed, or whether we intend to so change the rules as to destroy the partnership.

How can any province negotiate effectively on any question if it knows that a simple act of Parliament and an appeal to public opinion can take away its jurisdiction? If such a system had been in place, would the governments of Ontario in the 1880s, 1920s and the 1930s have been able to protect their resources from the arbitrary unilateral actions of the central government of those times? Would Quebec have been able to maintain its culture and identity in those days when their only protection was the provincial government and the British North America Act?

Mr. Trudeau: The people.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: I heard certain remarks from the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I hope he will be interested in contributing personally to the debate, either today or later on. I am told he is very interested in the matter. I will be quite ready to accept his remarks when he is in his seat, and I hope that before the end of the debate he will be there to speak directly, to give his own views on the matter.

But I would like at this point to deal with something the Right Hon. Prime Minister referred to. When he campaigned across Quebec, he often referred to a renewed federalism, because in May, 1980, Quebeckers once more gave a dramatic proof of their faith in this country. This was not only a negative answer to sovereignty-association. Quite the contrary, it was a highly positive gesture that clearly demonstrated a desire for change. In May, 1980, Quebeckers voted for a renewal of our Canadian federation. Quebeckers believed in the message of Claude Ryan, in the Canadian renewal message that I also gave during the referendum campaign. And Quebeckers trusted the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Ryan did not change positions, neither did I. We still believe in the principle of federalism, adapted if need be to the reality of today's Canada and tomorrow's Canada. Unfortunately, the same cannot be said of the Right Hon. Prime Minister. His concept of federalism is much closer to a unitarian state than a federal state. Because such is the basic meaning of the resolution now before us. Rather than renewing our Canadian federation, the Canadian government may destroy it. What the government is now proposing is not only patriation or Canadianization of our constitution, it proposes at the same time to submit to the Parliament of Westminster several formulas for future constitutional amendments: the rule of unanimity for a transition period, an amending formula roughly the same as the Victoria formula and particularly a third one, the one that I mentioned and which substantially amends our federative system.

• (1720)

We, for our part, are not only in favour of patriating our constitution but we are also convinced it is high time this was done without delay. In addition, we believe that patriation must be accompanied with an amending formula but the formula we propose is not the rule of unanimity, it is not the Victoria formula even amended, it is not above all the formula that would give Parliament the power to amend unilaterally the constitution by way of a referendum and, in so doing, over the governments and the legislatures of the provinces.

The formula we propose is the Vancouver formula which was raised at the last first ministers' conference and on which a consensus would have been possible at that conference if this government had accepted a true dialogue in that regard. Here is our position: patriate with an amending formula based on the principles of the Vancouver formula. But the proposed resolution, as I said, goes a lot further than patriation with an amending formula. It would bring in at the same time in the process substantive changes to the Constitution of Canada.

The question is not whether those changes are valid or not. It is the very fact of asking the Parliament of Westminster to make such substantial changes that is the real problem, the essential problem for us Canadians. The paradox is that the Prime Minister is asking us to break the last colonial tie we have with England and at the same time he uses that colonial tie to change our federal system and bring in fundamental amendments to the constitution. We do not agree on that.

The changes to be made to the constitution must be made in Canada by Canadians and not by the Parliament of Westminster in the course of patriation. We shall make these changes when the constitution has been brought back with an amending formula on which both levels of government will have agreed. We shall decide among ourselves whether, for instance, to entrench in the constitution a charter of rights and what this charter should contain. We shall decide among ourselves whether equalization should be the subject of a constitutional provision.

In other words, we shall bring about ourselves the changes needed to renew the Canadian federation. This is our position: to bring back the constitution with an agreed formula and nothing else.

It is in this optic and for these reasons that we shall discuss this resolution and that we shall use all means at our disposal to amend it and make it acceptable.

[English]

The work of amending the Canadian Constitution is for Canadians to do, not for the British to do. The Prime Minister of Canada is asking that a certain, select list of amendments, those that he prefers, should be "snuck" through by the British people and by the British Parliament. I say that the Constitution of Canada should not be amended in substance by the people of Britain, that the Constitution of Canada should be amended in substance by the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is the issue here before this House of Commons. Every single member of this Parliament would like to have the Canadian Constitution brought home. but we want to have it brought home in a way with which we can work with it, and then we want to go to work with it. We know the inequalities that exist in the country. We know the errors that exist now in the constitutional status quo. I have spoken against it in the province of Quebec during the referendum. I have acted to end, or begin to end, that inequality as prime minister of Canada by recognizing the right of coastal provinces to be treated as equals with the provinces in which the resources are under the land.

We want to change the Constitution of Canada, but we want to change our constitution here in Canada. That is why we take such deep offence at this attempt by the Prime Minister of Canada to run around Canadians, to get around us by sneaking away to London to have our constitution changed in his way first before it comes home so Canadians can get their hands on our constitution to change it in the way they would like to see it changed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Now someone is speaking for Canada.

Mr. Clark: It is bad enough that this government has so little confidence in the provinces of Canada that it writes in a section 42 which will allow the provinces, the provincial governments and the provincial legislatures, to be written out of the picture. That is bad enough, but what is worse is that this government has so little confidence in the citizens of Canada that the Prime Minister will not risk putting those amendments which are closest to his heart to the people of this country. Instead of putting them to the people of this country, the Prime Minister proposes to put them to the people of another country. He proposes for the last time to take advantage of the colonial status inherent in the British North America Act and to use the fact that it is a colonial document and that it is in Britain to have it changed there, rather than changed here where it should be changed.

This is an anniversary for the Prime Minister, because ten years ago this month he introduced the War Measures Act.

Mr. Trudeau: And you supported it.

Mr. Clark: I was not here. It is also an anniversary for me, because it was eight years ago this month that I was first elected to this House of Commons. During that time I have been engaged in debate on many measures, many for which I had deep feelings and in which I became intensely involved. Some of them were difficult. I remember standing between Mr. Diefenbaker, the then right hon. member for Prince Albert, and Mr. Horner, the then Conservative member for Crowfoot, who changed his party but not his position on the Official Languages Act. I remember having to speak at that time in favour of the Official Languages Act bracketed by those two gentlemen.

I have dealt in this House of Commons with issues that touched me deeply and which touched my region and my country deeply. But no proposal which has come before this Parliament in my time here has alarmed me more than the proposal that is before us today, because it is not simply a change in a law; it is a change in the way of governing Canada; it is a change in the fundamental respect that we have always shown for the two levels of government and for the essence of the federal system.

What alarms me and the members of my party is not simply that a bad law has been introduced, but that a proposal has been put before the Parliament of Canada that could destroy our federal system. When that is married, if it is, to the initiatives we hear are being planned with regard to energy policy and which are bound to enrage western Canada, and set into context with the province of Quebec where there is now already deep disappointment and concern about whether or not people were misled by the statements made on behalf of federalism—not by Claude Ryan nor by myself—in the referendum campaign, then we could have here a situation which is of the gravest danger to this country.

● (1730)

I say that with sorrow. I say it in the hope that some of my friends in other quarters of this House of Commons, that some of my friends elsewhere in the country who know my feelings for Canada even though they may not share them in each particular or each matter, will understand with what sincerity I express our concerns about the provisions of this bill—provisions which I believe could not simply end the country as we know it, but could end the country itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, in this historic debate, I think that all the details of this proposed resolution, in terms of the consideration of its relevance and whether we should support it or not, can be reduced to two questions.

The first question is—is it legitimate, is it appropriate at this time, for the Parliament of Canada, alone, to be supporting a resolution that would change the constitution of this country? That is the first question.

The second question to be answered, whatever one decides on the first, is whether the particular package we have before us on a range of matters—and I shall come to those in a minute—is one we should support on its own terms whether it was submitted as a resolution by the Parliament of Canada or whether it came after unanimous agreement between the government of the day and the provincial governments of the day.

Surely those are the two questions. Are we right at this point, in 1980, to be acting, here in Ottawa, alone? The related question, of course, is whether we have any right not to be acting at this point, and I want to deal with that one as well.

Then we have to look at the package, Madam Speaker. My party and I, not only before the referendum but right at the time of the referendum as well, have said that the process we have used to get constitutional change in Canada has not been effective. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) listed instances of previous conferences—with different prime ministers, not just the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—where the unanimity rule was said to prevail and when we did not get change. For this reason my party and I have believed for a long time, particularly since the referendum, that the best way of building the consensus the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is correct to be concerned about, would have been to broaden the basis of discussion over the summer to get away from the institutions of power alone.

I am not going to pass judgment because, frankly, it is irrelevant to the debate now whether a premier or a set of premiers or the Prime Minister himself brought to the particular conference that took place the best set of attitudes. I do not think that is relevant.

I do think the structure within which we have been operating—the unity principle—had built into it profound limitations which were not present and have not been present in other federal states.

If you have duly elected heads of government—whether New Democrats or Conservatives or Liberals—at the level of the provinces, and the prime minister, whether Conservative, New Democratic or Liberal, heading a federal government, then you have a conflictive situation that is almost impossible to resolve.

At any other point in our history, if we had not gone through this for so many weeks, months and indeed years, I would say we should give it another chance. I would say, "Let us try again." But surely, Madam Speaker, it is indeed time to act, and act now, on the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: There is no doubt that the premiers from almost every province, the leaders of all the parties within Quebec in the referendum—and we were not always on the committee and that has been mentioned—all spoke for federalism—and said in that context that we wanted change. But it is not just—

[Translation]

Quebeckers are not the only ones to have problems as concerns the future of Canada. It is a fact that Quebeckers want some changes, but people also want some changes in every other province, whether in Newfoundland, Alberta or British Columbia.

[English]

The particular changes of the province of Quebec may be one kind but the changes in other regions of Canada at this moment are real as well. They want change; they want action. Whether one wanted the timing to be somewhat different or not, is irrelevant. We sense a mood in the country in its different regions that is saying, "Let's have some action. Let's break the roadblock." I repeat, I am not blaming the premiers. That is intellectually vacuous. I am not blaming the Prime Minister, either, since in my view that would be intellectually vacuous too.

The point is that if one thinks we have to do something at this moment in our history, then I, as one Canadian not exactly old yet, but too long in politics and feeling already we ought not to sit around as Canadians without our own constitution, want some steps to be taken and I want them taken now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If you say there is a mood in the country that we ought to deal with it now, then I say, with respect, to the Leader of the Opposition that we have to act now. If he is correct in his judgment that the package is wrong and could be divisive and would lead to what his rather dramatic—and I do not share the judgment—concluding sentence—could lead to the breakup of Canada,—then I am going to argue something different if we get a different kind of package.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How naive.

Mr. Broadbent: Just listen to the argument, please. I sat and listened with care to two important speeches and now I have some points I want to make.

The point I am making is that here is an historical circumstance that presents an opportunity for change. The Americans had to go through a revolutionary war in order to effect change and I could list a whole series of modern nations where constitutional change took place at a particular point in time. If you do not seize the opportunity to reduce the grievances and ease the tensions, it may be lost. The tensions, whether they are those in the province of Quebec at one time in our history—and I shall come to another part of our country in a minute—or somewhere else, will become too great. Then we might lose this land of ours in its present structure and we might create one, two or three Canadas. I think at this point in our history the situation is as serious as that—that we have to seize the opportunity for some change.

If that is the case, then the relevant question is whether the package before us is going to be divisive. It is a serious matter to go against the premiers—it is a serious act and I acknowledge that; it would have been preferable to get an agreement, but if we are going to do it, are we presenting a package that Canadians, whatever their partisan affiliation can accept? We know that the militants in all parties are going to have their partisan concerns but I am talking about people who may vote at one time or another for one party or another and who do not pay much attention to constitutional debate. When they see the package they are going to be asking themselves, "Can I as a farmer, or as a fisherman, or as a lawyer who may be concerned about civil liberties, accept it in my part of Canada?" It seems to me it is in this context that we have to look at the package.

The mix of items is important. The number of items is also important. I do not think it appropriate for us in the Parliament of Canada to be amending a whole range of items across the board and then saying to the British parliament, as the Leader of the Opposition has correctly said, that most of the changes should be made here in Canada by Canadians, and not elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1740)

Mr. Broadbent: We need a balance in proposals; we need a limited number of items. I want now to apply that test to the resolution before us.

I want to say at the outset that I do not see it. Rather, I would have seen one particular package having come from the government as a personal set of priorities from the Prime Minister, because he talked about a lot of things in the summer which did not get support from the premiers, which did not get support from the Conservative party, which did not get support from the New Democratic Party, which, I say, in all candour, are not in the package.

I want to give credit where it is due by saying that the Prime Minister backed away from certain things that I knew were being discussed. I had anticipated they would be here, and they are not. So I ask: what is there? There is a patriation aspect to the bill, which, as I have already indicated, in principle we support. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) submitted on behalf of my colleagues a private member's motion or bill 20 years ago calling for patriation. The idea of patriation is hardly new to us.

Then what about a charter of rights? The minister said there are only four or five essential things in the bill, so it is limited in number. We have to discuss those things to see if they merit support. There is a charter of rights. These items, I say, may be believed in by the Liberal party, but they are also things which my party has argued for for years: patriation and rights.

The former member for Greenwood—Andrew Brewin—I will mention him by name because he is no longer here—a distinguished Canadian who fought for Japanese Canadians back in the forties when it was not popular to do so, argued for a charter of rights for the then CCF. Subsequently, the New Democratic Party adopted the same position.

We want a charter of rights. For example, if we had had a charter of rights back when the Prime Minister was active in a non-political way fighting the Duplessis regime, we might not have had a padlock law in the province of Quebec because it would have contravened a fundamental right such as we are, perhaps, going to entrench. We might not have had an Alberta press bill in 1937. We might not have had a government in Newfoundland which tried to violate the rights of workers in 1959 when the premier of the day and his government broke up the IWA, violating, in my view, the right of association in a fundamental way. So, Madam Speaker, we want a charter of rights. We think it is overdue. One can debate, as our members will in committee, some of the particular rights envisaged and propose certain amendments which we hope will be seriously considered, but we are on the record as favouring a charter of rights because it is important to restrict governments in advance from doing certain wrong things as well as to give citizens the right to challenge them subsequently if they have done those wrong things. In that context, my caucus colleagues are particularly concerned about the rights of native people. I am not going to elaborate on that aspect this afternoon, but you can be sure that someone in committee will be raising from our point of view our concerns about the inadequacy of the measure as it affects native Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Broadbent: I would now like to talk about language rights. If I may, I shall say a few personal words. As a candidate in the 1968 election, I defended the rights of Francophones in Oshawa for the first time in my political career.

[English]

It is a matter, surely, of all the things that we ought to believe in and ought to implement if we believe in the duality of Canada. Specifically, that we in English Canada at long last should be saying to Francophones, whether they are in Manitoba or Maillardville in British Columbia that we are not going to force French down people's throats, Francophones outside Quebec ought to have the same rights as Anglophones in the province of Quebec in terms of education.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: So we believe in that part of the bill and we think it is time to do that, especially in light of the referendum.

I add, too, that we will have something to say in terms of an amendment in that respect. It seems to us that the first ministers' agreement of 1978 said, "Yes, minority language in the schools," but also, "Yes where numbers warrant." But the provinces should have the jurisdictional authority to establish by definition what the numbers are. I see the Minister of Justice nodding in agreement suggesting at least a sympathetic understanding of that important provincial point.

Mr. Lawrence: It is not in there.

Mr. Broadbent: It is not in the bill now, but it is an amendment we will be looking at.

With respect to equalization, which is the fourth key item of the bill, as the leader of a social-democratic party I can tell you that if there is one thing we believe should be entrenched in the constitution it is a fundamental goal of equality that will remove a lot of unfair distinctions.

Again, the question is not one of principle. Surely in the bill we should be talking about these fundamental principles. We agree with them. We will have something to say in committee about the wording. We think there is a better possibility to deal with it in the constitution, but again we think it should be there. It is a New Democratic Party principle that should be there.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: A Tory snickers. Maybe it is because he does not believe in equalization. I can understand that, but we do.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise on a minor point of order. I am sure that the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) made that comment flippantly. He knows that the inculcation of the recommendation for enshrining equalization in the British North America Act, which is part of the Kingston communiqué, has been part of the policy of this party for several years. I am sure it is simply rhetorical excess.

Mr. Broadbent: I simply point out to the Leader of the Opposition that it was not one of my colleagues who was snickering when I was talking about equalization, it was one of his.

Mr. Malone: We snickered at you claiming it was yours.

Mr. Broadbent: In this motion I have talked about certain matters of substance that in principle we agree with, namely, patriation, rights, language rights, equalization—

An hon. Member: Why don't you join them?

Mr. Broadbent: Finally, there is an amending formula. We have some very serious concerns about one aspect of the amending formula. I mention the two-year rule where unanimity is to continue. I say to the Leader of the Opposition, one of the things which appealed to me is that it will stop any further unilateral action by Parliament for the next two years moving in that way during the two-year period the unanimity rule is in force. What is to come after that, we have some concerns about which we will be expressing in committee. However, I hope we can approach this aspect. I say both to the government and to the official opposition that when we get to committee I hope we can discuss some of these details in a sensible way, if we agree on the principle, in order to get some decent amendments accepted.

If what I have said so far is acceptable in principle, even if a number of details have to be dealt with in committee, there is a fundamental question for myself and my colleagues which is not adequately dealt with because the balance that is necessary in a federal system is absent. I say with all seriousness to the Prime Minister that from time to time I have found his rhetorical response offensive to the premiers who have said they want to get a resource item in the constitution. The Prime Minister has a tendency in his polemical way to say that they want to bargain fish for rights. I say to the Prime Minister and through him to the Minister of Justice: surely, that is not the response. The issue is not, in this context, one of rights or resources. Surely we can have both in a constitution—resource control and fundamental rights.

I appeal, particularly to the government of the day. When we are making serious changes affecting language rights there is the possibility of being misunderstood. We all know about that elsewhere in Canada. I can almost hear the arguments now that we heard a few years ago when we passed the official languages bill with support of all parties when the accusation was made that we were trying to force French down people's throats. Well, it was not true then and it is not true today in this legislation. We must head off the bigots before the arguments start. One of the ways to deal with it is to give a package which includes the matters I have talked about in principle and also says something to ordinary Canadians, whether they live in Newfoundland and they are concerned about resources there, in Nova Scotia, the prairies or the province of Quebec. In particular, I want to emphasize western Canada in this debate.

● (1750)

I wish to digress for a second, not because resources are more important substantively to western Canadians than to those who live in Newfoundland. In recent history we have gone through a difficult period in terms of Quebec-Canada relations. One would have to be dreaming to contend that such has not been the case. All the difficulties have not been removed. That is for sure. However, as a Canadian from central Canada, I am concerned about another region, that is the west.

Over the past 20 years we have had to deal with national unity with a Quebec focus. Over the next 20 years, if we do not do what is right, we will have to deal with national unity with a western focus. As someone from southern Ontario, I want to stress this. We should not kid ourselves. The west was settled by men and women who had a tough time for many decades. They saw my home province of Ontario and the province of Quebec imposing tariffs to protect their industry. They saw us getting very wealthy. They accepted that, in part because they had such things as the Crow rate which offered some sense of equity. However, on the whole, they were poorer than the rest of Canada.

They now sense that with their control of their resources, they can somehow make up for our control of industry. They have oil, gas, potash and lumber. There is increasing world demand for all of these things, both in terms of finished products and manufactured goods. Because of this, western Canadians are now saying they can do it. However, they are apprehensive. It should not be reduced to paranoia. They are apprehensive that those of us who numerically have power because of the greater population in central Canada will take the resource control away from them.

That is not the concern of the parties. It is a human concern which has been expressed by ordinary people in western Canada who are not members of any party. Therefore, if we want to get this good and civilized package, as I described in principle on another occasion, one that is acceptable to the people of our country, and if we want to head off the bigotry and have an element of non-partisanship in this important debate on the future of our land, then I say to the Minister of Justice, please moderate the language, even that which you used today. There was some opening on the question of resources. However, the minister seemed again perhaps to close the door. I hope that is not the case.

We should take this package to our people and get them to defend it. I again emphasize, this is not only the west. There are people in Atlantic Canada who do not want to survive on equalization. They want to get control of their resources, legitimate control. They think they can move out of poverty and become independent, getting away from handouts. That is important.

In particular, we must say to western Canadians: let us legitimize what you thought you had before some recent Supreme Court decisions. Let us say that to this package of changes, which is limited in number, we will add another one. I will be very specific about what we see as a condition for our party being able to support this. I do not want to do this timidly or half-heartedly, one that is part of the package. I hope the Prime Minister will now show greater flexibility on this.

Let us take the two points talked about on the opening day of the first ministers' conference. One is the provincial right to indirect taxation. That does not stop the "feds" from collecting income tax. It does not take away any federal authority. It will simply give the provincial governments the right to impose indirect taxes on their resources so as to do something for their people. There was agreement on the first day, but it is not in the package.

The second important aspect of resource control is interprovincial trade. The premiers were prepared to say that they wanted a role in interprovincial trade, but with federal paramountcy. This was in case one provincial government might want to give preferential treatment to or discriminate against another province. I understand the premiers accepted this need for federal paramountcy within the new power of a provincial right to participate in interprovincial trade and constitutionally have a say in it. Those are the two points of basic importance to give us a package so that we can say we not only believe in rights, whether they are language rights or other rights or equalization, although equalization is not important to the western provinces now in terms of dealing with their needs. They feel they are on the go and we should be encouraging this feeling instead of holding them back.

I want to conclude by saying on behalf of my colleagues that there is much in this proposal that is attractive to us, not because it comes from a Liberal Prime Minister but because it reflects resolutions and motions passed by my party over the years. If the government will show flexibility in committee and accept some amendments, we can have a decent piece of legislation. If the government wants our support in the House of Commons, the very minimum it must do is to make reasonable, fair changes in the constitution in the resource sector which are important to Canadians wherever they may live in this land.

I conclude by saying that this is an historic event because if this measure passes, we shall be changing the fundamental law of our land. I hope when the bill comes back to the House from committee, it will be so improved that members of all parties can be proud to support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, in view of the hour I wonder whether there is a disposition to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1800)

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.58 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): It would be worth while for one moment, Mr. Speaker, to ask ourselves tonight, during what the preceding speaker described as an historic debate, why we are amending the constitution.

As I recall it, the process of looking at our constitution was initiated in the city of Toronto from which I come. At the instigation and initiative of the then premier of Ontario, Hon. John Robarts, a conference was called together, and it was perhaps from that moment that the movement began in Canada, in recent times at least, toward the development of an all-out effort, initiated at the provincial level, to reform the constitution. Now tonight, some 14 or 15 years later, we find ourselves involved in what hopefully is the concluding phase of that process.

If you look at this document before us, a "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada," and begin to read it you will see there is a heading on page 3 which immediately jumps to your eye, namely, the "Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms". In that schedule we find fundamental freedoms spelled out as follows:

(a) freedom of conscience and religion;

(b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of information; and

(c) freedom of peaceful assembly and of association.

A growing number of Canadians have over the years expressed their desire to see freedoms of this kind safeguarded in our constitution, and you will find them among our majorities as well as our minorities across the country. May I point out to you also, Mr. Speaker, that since the end of the war over four million individuals have come to Canada to settle here from coast to coast. It is among those four million new Canadians that you will find a very keen desire to have these rights and freedoms and a charter embracing them in our new constitution. The fundamental freedoms as set out in this resolution will give our people a reassurance of how deeply Canada once again is committed as a nation to such basic principles.

Over the weekend in Toronto a number of people approached me and voluntarily expressed their support, quite vigorously so, for a charter of rights and freedoms, embodied in the constitution and they expressed their delight on learning through the media that this is the case. The same can be said for our fine democratic rights and the principle of mobility and of legal rights as outlined in this proposal.

I would like for a moment to deal with a question in relation to this resolution under the heading "Minority Language Educational Rights".

● (2010)

I have difficulty putting this all together into one title because it is my concept of Canada that language rights are attached to what are majorities in some parts of the country and to what are minorities in others, but that these are two major groups in our society from which educational rights flow. What is contained in this bill seems to me to be a very good step in the right direction in the light of present political circumstances and within the limitations imposed flowing from three months of consultations between Ottawa and the provincial premiers. However, I hope that one day our constitution will give to anyone the right to have his children educated in the other official language. When it comes to English and French, each of these languages is a majority language in some parts of Canada and the world. We have here a great cultural, linguistic asset, and the least we can do to give the fullest scope to this linguistic heritage of ours would be, in the long run if it cannot be done now, to modify clause 23(2) and to remove the idea that only a sufficient number of children would warrant minority language education.

One child in this nation of ours should be sufficient, in my view. Otherwise, how can a Francophone civil servant be transferred from Quebec to Alberta and have the assurance that his children will continue to be educated in French? Or let us consider the English-speaking family in Toronto which wishes, a more recent development in our city, to have its children educated in French. It is the desire of a growing number of Canadian families to bring up their children fully bilingual, competent in both languages, in the hope that by doing so over the years some of the isolation between the two major groups will be reduced and in the long run completely eliminated. That effort, of course, begins through the effort that is made in the learning of a language at an early stage in life. A growing number of Canadians, I am glad to report, not only in Toronto but I understand also in Vancouver and other cities want to bring up their children in both languages.

I believe firmly and passionately that Canada never was and never will be a country of one language and one culture. I believe that our existence and survival in North America will depend to a considerable degree on how clearly we have established in our minds—and as a result of that in our laws—the essential quality and character inherent in Canada, the concept of bilingualism, from which naturally flows that of multiculturalism.

Moving on to other parts of this bill, I am glad to see a clause dealing with unclaimed rights and freedoms related to native peoples.

I am glad to see that full recognition will be given to the principle of equalization as a cornerstone of our confederation.

With regard to the amending formula, it is a rather technical expression. As I understand it, it means the rule that will be followed when we make changes to our constitution. The proposal before us, it seems to me, is the quintessence of reasonableness. Step one: What is proposed here is that for the next two years another try be made. The hon. member from British Columbia laughs at the expression "quintessence of reasonableness," but I suspect that he, like his leader, is one of those Progressive Conservatives who is being reluctantly dragged into the twentieth century by this bill. It is high time they were dragged into the twentieth century reluctantly, but that is their problem, not ours.

Let me go back to why I describe this proposal as the quintessence of reasonableness. Step one: This bill tells us that for the next two years another try will be made by the ten provinces along with the federal government and that if a formula is agreed upon unanimously, that will be the formula to amend our constitution in the future, and the problem will be solved.

Step two: If efforts should fail, then, as I understand the bill, a formula agreed upon by eight provinces with no less than 80 per cent of the population would be put to the people by means of a referendum. The people of Canada would be asked to choose between the formula agreed upon by the eight provinces, a formula similar to the one agreed upon in Victoria or a formula which might be proposed by the federal government.

There is a third step because it may be that the eight provinces representing 80 per cent of the population will not come up with a formula. If the eight provinces do not agree, there would be an automatic coming into force of the formula agreed upon unanimously by all provinces in 1971 in Victoria.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would allow a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I would rather complete my remarks, and then I will be glad to reply.

How much more reasonable can a proposal be? The proposal sets out three steps. It sets out one following the other. There would be an attempt once again over two years to come up with a solution with the ten provinces. If that fails, eight provinces come up with one, and finally we go the route of a referendum, an idea which opposition members and the provincial premiers really should not find too offensive, that of turning to Canadians to ask them for an opinion. Perhaps that is an idea which might be worthy of their support. After all, we live in a democracy. After all, the loyal opposition believes in democracy. Here is a proposal which says that if step one fails and if step two should fail, we would then put the question to the people, having exhausted all the other alternatives. Having resolved the question of the amending formula through these three steps I have outlined, no longer will the amending formula, as Senator Forsey once put it, be suspended between earth and heaven like Mohammed's coffin. It will have been dealt with.

In conclusion, I would like to say that change is not always easy, and in this case we are adopting in our constitution new concepts like the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms.

● (2020)

We are changing as individuals; we are changing as a nation. Our values, our goals, have been changing since 1867 by way of immigrants, by way of new Canadians, by way of the evolution of our own thinking as a society and by way of the concept we have of ourselves. What is emerging here? Is a new Canada emerging? I say yes, it is a new Canada. The constitution of Canada as proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will be remembered by historians, I venture to say. That was the step, they will write, which needed to be taken in 1980.

It seems to me that the proposed constitution reflects the way in which the majority of Canadians think today. But, what is more important, it reflects the world of our young people, the world they see daily in their schools in our large cities, for instance. Our society as it grows and expands requires this Parliament to move now in the direction of offering people protection of their basic rights. It is moving in the direction of asking this Parliament to offer people choices in the unfolding of their cultural and linguistic aspirations, talents and heritage. It is moving in the direction of offering people the opportunity of choosing the instrument with which they will want to change their number one law, namely, their own constitution.

This, in essence, is what the proposed Constitution of Canada conveys to me, Mr. Speaker, the way it stands before us here tonight, the way it was first announced last Thursday by a thoughtful, bilingual Canadian, Pierre Elliott Trudeau. After so many years of negotiations and effort, now is the time to move ahead. Once this task is completed, Parliament will be able to devote its full attention and time to other pressing issues. But now is the historical moment. Now the time is ripe.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that almost 15 years have gone by since the provinces initiated this process of demanding constitutional reform. How much longer can this process, not initiated by Ottawa, go on?

Remember this, Mr. Speaker: Quebec has a government devoted to the idea of leaving Canada. That government has every possible interest in prolonging this constitutional process. Remember too, Mr. Speaker, that last February most Canadians gave their confidence to our Prime Minister who has the confidence of the overwhelming majority of Quebeckers. Remember also, Mr. Speaker, that while the Tory benches are shaking their heads in disbelief, this very same man, the Prime Minister of Canada, has the confidence and the full support of Premier Davis of Ontario.

An hon. Member: How about Claude Ryan?

Mr. Caccia: The opposition benches may be trying to reorganize their thoughts. All they can be afraid of is their own fear, their fear within the walls of this building, because out there the nation is vibrant, the nation is vigorous, diverse, beautiful and anxious to go ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: Canadians are expecting from their Parliament no more federal-provincial conferences, which are coming out of their ears. What the nation is expecting from us is, at last, our own made-in-Canada and changeable in Canada constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, as another thoughtful, bilingual Canadian I thought I would ask the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), a question, if he would entertain it now. The hon. member used the term "the quintessence of reasonableness" in relation to the amending formula. It has such a beautiful ring to it that I could not leave it alone. I should like to ask him: If eight provinces are uniformly in favour or are opposed to a certain measure but all of them are provinces other than Ontario or Quebec, would they contain 80 per cent of the people?

Mr. Caccia: Provinces must have no less than 80 per cent representation of the population. Therefore, it is a pretty substantial base from which to operate. The hon. member understands that politics is the art of moving with support and a strong base. I submit to him that eight provinces with 80 per cent of the population is a pretty good, solid and therefore reasonable base.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, 113 years ago Canadians, one could say ordinary Canadians, joined together to create a country, a confederation. Theirs was not an ordinary task and their work also has been judged by history as being extraordinary. That task is before us today as well and it is in that spirit of confederation I intend tonight to try and put before the House and Canadians, the spirit on which the country was founded and which is necessary today to make the constitutional changes that are sought by many.

This nation was founded on a spirit of integrity, of mutual trust and, above all, on compromise. Canada has proven to be a difficult nation to govern. It has taken great wisdom and a willingness to co-operate and also real concessions on the part of all who have been our political leaders.

Now the Prime Minister intends to complete the foundation of our nation as he sees it by improving the cornerstones. His proposals and his actions over the past few months have ensured that our foundation will be completed in an atmosphere of distrust, disunity and open confrontation. If he is allowed to follow his proposed course of action, he will not, as he claims, unblock the future progress of constitutional reform but rather he will disrupt any possibility of it ever being undertaken with the unanimity that we all seek.

Canada needs and wants our constitution brought home which would be amendable in this country. Many Canadians urgently require real constitutional renewal. The time has come to meet those demands but this will only be possible in what has been termed the Canadian way. We cannot ignore 113 years of experience which has taught us the need for co-operation and compromise on the part of all our political leaders. Unilateral action and confrontational politics will not mark the end of our beginning but rather the beginning of our end. These leaders accepted such an arrangement because it was in accord with the political and social reality of the nation, and I suggest to all members of the House that that reality still exists today. First, Canada is a federation, a partnership, and this fact is central to the view that we hold of our country. The Prime Minister puts forward the position that the provinces must be subordinate to the central government. The provinces then retaliate by rejecting new arrangements because of the circumstances and the atmosphere that has been created. So, we must ask ourselves as members what is best for our country. We on this side of the House believe that both levels of government must be strong. An order of checks and balances must prevail and that order of checks and balances cannot be broken. No central government has the right or the power to change the division of powers without the agreement of the other partners, and no province has the right to reduce the federal government to a mere "chairman of the board" role.

● (2030)

Over the past few months I have been disturbed, as I am sure others have been, to hear various commentators and other people suggesting that what the political leaders really intended in 1867 was the creation of a dominant central government with subordinate local counterparts known as provinces. They point to the broad general powers given to the federal government, particularly the power of disallowance. Yet, at the time of confederation it was suggested that the federal government model this power after New Zealand's strong power disallowance. They rejected that position. As we seek to patriate and alter our written constitution, it is important that we remind ourselves what the document is that is planned to be changed. The British North America Act does not spell out all the rules by which our political system operates. Most of these rules are not written down anywhere but have evolved as conventions through many centuries of experience. It is at our peril if we reject that experience. In Canada we can be proud that we have inherited the most admired democratic system in the world, the British parliamentary system. Canada has a few of these rules written down because unlike Britain Canada is a federation. Most of these rules are contained in the British North America Act which outlines the basic institutions of each order of government and their respective powers. In other words, Canada's written constitution defines its federal system. The British North America Act was the product of discussions and mutual concessions between representatives from the various colonies of British North America. Many Canadian political leaders at that time would have preferred to create a legislative union or a unitary state. Included in that group was our first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, who preferred a legislative union but agreed to establish a federal system. One must ask the following question: Despite such personal inclinations and backgrounds, why was the federation formed? I should like to quote John A. Macdonald who said when speaking of New Zealand that they gave the powers stated to local legislatures but the general government had power to sweep these away. This is just what they did not want. Lower Canada and the lower provinces—that was the maritimes at the time—would not have such a thing. Today the ten provinces—and I want to include the two territories north of sixty—will not have such a thing because their powers will be swept aside. This is the reality we face. Tempered by this political reality, the Fathers of Confederation limited the power of disallowance so that provincial governments would remain strong enough to protect their traditional powers. That cannot change today.

When Lord Carnarvon, the official who helped translate the Quebec resolutions into the British North America Act, presented this act to the British Parliament, he affirmed the nature of the confederation bargain. As we start this debate, I think it is important to understand that bargain. I should like to quote him as follows:

> The adoption of the principles of federation, as compared to what might be preferable if practical, a solid legislative union, is simply the consequence of the absolute necessity of the adjustment of inveterate local interests and the ultimatum of mutual compromise between the provinces.

He went on the explain the British role respecting that agreement as follows:

> As the arrangement is a matter of mutual concession on the part of the provinces, there must be some external authority to give a sanction to the compact into which they have entered . . . Such seems to me to be the office we have to perform in regard to this bill.

Of course he was referring to the British North America Act. I believe what he said applies today too, that is, that the compact which was formed was incorporated into the British North America Act and any amendments, any changes, or call it now the constitutional act, 1980, cannot fundamentally alter that partnership without agreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Therefore it is essential that any constitution recognize the sanctity of the federation and the supremacy of jurisdiction of federal and provincial governments as provided in the British North America Act.

Since 1867, then as today, the British parliament has acted as the external authority protecting the terms of the confederation agreement. Our native Canadians make an excellent point when they say that that was part of the bargain struck in 1867 and that they are part of that bargain. It might not be very popular with some members of this House and perhaps some Canadians to mention that the native people made this bargain, but the fact remains and one cannot alter history. If we want to have a just system, we must finally recognize that these rights were enshrined in the British North America Act of Canada's first citizens.

During this past century it has been clear that the authority of Britain has been formal more than real. The British parliament, all the statements of ministers of the Crown to the contrary, has not made major changes to Canada's constitution except in response to formal requests from Canada. The Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues, are not relating facts when they say or leave the impression that patriation must take place in order to end Britain making laws which affect Canada. Just recently the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) made that statement again on national radio, leaving the impression that in the absence of patriation there seems to be a whole stream of legislation coming out of Westminster which is affecting our lives. That is simply not true.

For example, as early as 1925 Prime Minister Mackenzie King could confidently tell the hon. members of this House that the formality of processing amendments through the British parliament was no indication of Canada's subservience. Still, since the 1920s, Canadians have shown a recurring desire to end this formal authority, not because it presents some real threat to Canada's sovereignty, but so as to affirm our independence. I share that view as do my colleagues. Patriation, that is, making our constitution truly our own, has come to be increasingly important to all Canadians, especially those Canadians under the age of 30. I believe it is an act of national self-confidence, an affirmation of the future harmony and unity of our great nation. Also it is necessary to show Canadians and the rest of the world that we are a sovereign country. In that respect we have no disagreement with the Prime Minister in terms of the act of patriation. We could go into some detail as to the process, but I do not think it is necessary. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) gave the historical context of the number of times attempts at patriation have been made, but one fact must be kept in mind by all members in terms of the changes made to the act in 1949 at the time of the prime ministership of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. At that time in 1949 that prime minister assured members of the House that Parliament was limiting its unilateral amending powers so as not to interfere with the protection provided to provincial and minority rights in the constitution. That guarantee was given by a Liberal prime minister not many years ago. He outlined in the House that if there was to be a complete amending formula there had to be guarantees. He put it as follows:

> We do not want the Canadian constitution to be too rigid, but we do want to make sure it contains the fullest safeguards of provincial rights, and of the other historic rights which are the sacred trusts of our national partnership.

That Liberal prime minister recognized the nature of the federation, that is, when it is changed it must be changed with as broad a consensus as possible rather than saying, "I am the prime minister. I will do it. You had better agree or else".

That is the difference. It is very simple. It is attitudinal, but it concerns the manner in which this country can function and the only manner in which it will.

● (2040)

It is our duty as the official opposition to be wary of the manoeuvres of this Prime Minister, not that patriation is questioned on our side, but what are his other actions? What are his other goals? Today, for example, the Minister of Justice said this was the first phase; the second phase would consist of re-examining the division of powers.

I will get to the amending formula in a minute. Take a look at the provinces and their wariness, their concern, their opposition to the methods used, their apprehension that an amending formula will be brought in which does not even need their advice, much less their concurrence, and we are told the next round is going to be on the division of powers. The premiers have no choice in that context but to strongly oppose what is taking place on the floor of the House of Commons.

Patriation aside—and I am spending some time on that theme tonight because some members opposite keep repeating this as if there was not general agreement on the need for patriation—what changes to the constitution are needed, if that is fundamental? We then have to ask ourselves by what power and in what way we can change the provisions? Every province, no matter how large or small, entered into agreement and gave up some of the powers it had earlier, prior to provincial status, in the interest of establishing a strong federal government. But because of its unique development in history and the character of each province it retains certain powers necessary to maintain its particular heritage. For example the western provinces, which were created by the federal government, were established under certain terms additional to the British North America Act, terms which I suggest cannot be unilaterally altered. It took a formal constitutional amendment, for example, to alter one of the provisions in 1930, and that was the one affecting the three prairie provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, under which we finally got control over our natural resources, something the other provinces already enjoyed. How can you tell the provinces—not the premiers but the citizens of those provinces—that suddenly there must be a new arrangement to cover resource ownership and control? Manitoba, for example, spent a longer period without control over its resources than the period during which it did exercise control. In economic terms, Mr. Speaker, that is the only manner by which those provinces will attain economic equality.

What the Prime Minister says to us, with his amending formula, is that such a formula can be worked out without broad agreement among the provinces. I do not think it can happen that way. For example, the Prime Minister has said that for two years he will guarantee the protection of provincial rights by implementing the convention of unanimous consent. The assumption underlying this action would seem to be that the provinces and the federal government have two years in which to come up with a more flexible amending formula and that this provision would force a decision. As long as this government is in power there will be no incentive whatsoever for the federal government to bargain in good faith. Why not? Because the Prime Minister has repeatedly rejected all suggestions except the Victoria charter, and any new amendment coming in after two years that would deviate substantially from Victoria would be acceptable to the federal government. There is no way in which agreement can be found if the federal government insists on holding this trump card.

The Prime Minister has offered an alternative—a referendum between the federal government's proposal and that of eight of the provincial governments. The Vancouver consensus had a provision whereby the voices of seven provinces comprising 50 per cent of the population could determine the manner in which amendments should be sought. I am one who does not believe that the unanimity formula can work and I think experience will indicate that this is so. On the other hand, I do not believe the 50 per cent was adequate. I personally would have preferred a two-thirds majority. But according to the wish of the Prime Minister, even before an amending formula can be voted on in referendum by the rest of Canadians, just to get it on the referendum order, so to speak, you need eight provinces and those eight provinces must have 80 per cent of the population. It does not take very long to see that there are two provinces which will immediately get a veto. On the other hand, you need a number of smaller provinces which will never compose the 20 per cent, just to have the question put to the people of Canada.

Additionally, there is strong objection to the Victoria charter. People might ask why. There was general agreement to the Victoria charter of 1971 and the amending formula. The fact is that great opposition to the Victoria charter comes from western Canada because in the last ten years the west has changed. It has changed in this way: we have a larger population and more economic growth and we just cannot accept the removal of the principle that in terms of amendment the provinces are not equal partners. We cannot accept that principle because under the Victoria proposals either in the maritimes or in the west we needed two of the provinces to agree and they had to comprise 50 per cent of the population. In practical terms could Saskatchewan and Manitoba ever stop an amendment which would affect their rights? The answer is, no. Alberta and British Columbia could join at any time, or British Columbia at the present time could join with any other province in western Canada. So what is fundamental here is recognition of the fact that if you have an amending formula two criteria must be met. One is approval of the House and the Senate—and this House is a reflection of the population of the country and the way in which that population is distributed. None of us have any argument with that; that is how any of us get here. A province having a larger population send more representatives. But you cannot then ask the provinces to again accept those population criteria. So I say to the government that the Vancouver consensus recognizes that in terms of partnership the provinces have equal right. I say to the Prime Minister and to his colleagues that we will press very hard to have this viewpoint included either in the resolution or in the report of the committee so that it can become part of our constitution.

Trust the people. That is the point made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) and the Minister of Justice. Well, Mr. Speaker, I trust the people. Every member of this House has to trust the people because that is how we got here. You finally have to put yourself before the judgment of those from whom you are asking support. But there is a question which remains. Before I even get to section 42, which is so onerous to us, there is the principle of the tyranny of the 51 per cent majority. People say the majority rules. Yes, that is true in pure democratic terms. But let us look at the practical limitations of the constitution. If you subscribe to the absoluteness of the 51 per cent majority, the 51 per cent vote, then on the basis of that absoluteness the dictators in this world were right; they were right to remove the rights of the minorities.

An hon. Member: Auschwitz.

● (2050)

Mr. Epp: There is no question that in the Germany of the 1930s, during the heat of that period, the leader of that day had an absolute majority of 51 per cent. But what happened to the minority? So while one can argue as long as one would like that a majority should govern, if there are no checks and balances in the constitution, you can also develop a tyranny of the majority. On this basis—and I would like to go into greater detail, but I do not have the time—I would like to refer to a scholar who has influenced my thinking on this subject to a great degree, a gentleman by the name of Dr. Francis Schaefer. He says that on this basis law and morals—and that is what we are dealing with in a constitution—become a matter of averages. Yet they are absolutes.

Let us as members never forget that averages can be manipulated and statistics can be used. I do not wish to be disparaging of the media or of my colleagues in the House, but I think all of us recognize that we have a certain ability to move people into certain positions of thought.

What would happen if there were a combination in a referendum of the power of the media and the power of the political leadership to convince a majority for the time that a certain course of action were the right one? Before too may days hence, we would find that the majority was in fact simply a hollow victory to the detriment of everyone concerned. I say to all hon. members that when we get into committee we must be careful about referendums because so often the minority—and we are saying here that we have a charter with which we want to protect the minority—is the very group that can be defeated by the tyranny of the 51 per cent majority.

Although my leader has spent a fair amount of time discussing section 42, I think the reason we object to it bears repeating. The problems arising from the unilateral imposition of the Victoria amending formula, I believe, pale against the other formula outlined in section 42 and section 46 of this resolution. It is a Catch 22 situation, or perhaps more aptly put, a "Catch 42" situation as it concerns the federal government's proposals.

This section has received very little attention from federal officials, the media or hon. members, yet it could fundamentally alter the future of our federal system. According to section 42, the federal government by a simple majority in this Parliament, can initiate a referendum on any constitutional amendment. If the federal government's proposal receives a simple majority of support across Canada, for example in Ontario and Quebec or in two of the western provinces and two of the eastern provinces with 50 per cent of the population of the respective regions, it can remove any of the traditional provincial minority rights without even having consulted the legislatures, much less having received their concurrence.

There is no doubt that this is an affront to the federal system. There are those who have said, "Maybe section 42 is only a throw-away bargaining position". If it is, I say to the government, "Throw it away". I believe that if there is a stalemate, the people should be consulted directly, but only as a last resort. Section 42 does not make such a provision. In fact, it can become an amending formula of the first order. As I have said, we want to patriate the constitution, but we do not accept the Victoria formula as modified in the constitution and we absolutely reject section 42.

I will say a few words on the Vancouver consensus and go on from there. The Prime Minister has frequently criticized the Vancouver consensus because of its provision for opting out. Yet, if an amendment must apply to all provinces, it would be the obligation of the federal and provincial governments to work out suitable compromises. That is tradition in our country. The Prime Minister says that this formula would result in a so-called checkerboard Canada. Personally, I do not think of it as a checkerboard but as a mosaic, and when it is changed we get back to the essence of what Canada is as a country.

Our nation is a checkerboard. That is why we have chosen to call it a federation rather than a unitary state. The point we would like to make to the government is this: we are not saying that the Vancouver consensus or the other formula are perfect, but by the same token the government should not say to us, "Our system is perfect and if you do not agree with it, we will impose it anyhow". That is not how the system works.

There are other points which should be mentioned, for example, the entrenchment of the principle of equalization. This principle has been endorsed by my party for some period of time. The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) gave the inference today that we were opposed to equalization. That is not the case. Traditionally my party has been in favour of resource ownership and management by the provinces.

It is here that I find the New Democratic Party to be most inconsistent. I am not sure whether the Leader of the New Democratic Party had to make his point here with regard to resource ownership being in the hands of the provinces because of the Premier of Saskatchewan. We agree with that approach, and that was also the position of our government. But if I understand the policies and platform of the NDP correctly, they say they are in favour of a national industrial strategy and nationalization of the oil industry. However, how does it put the square in the round hole when it says, on the other hand, that resources should be owned and controlled by the provinces? It cannot have it both ways.

The NDP are saying on the one hand—and I think it is for political reasons—that the provinces should own their resources. Then it turns right around and says that those very resources should be nationalized and used for purposes of administration control and ownership by the provincial governments.

Mr. Broadbent: Just like potash in Saskatchewan. You can understand that, can you not?

Mr. Epp: I hear the Leader of the New Democratic Party and it seems that another sensitive nerve has been struck. Another point which I think bears repeating in this House is this: Throughout this draft resolution there is no reference to Canadians living north of latitude 60. Do they not exist? Do they not fit into the Prime Minister's plans? I imagine they will be part of the "simple majority" about which he speaks in a referendum.

An hon. Member: All 25,000 of them.

Mr. Clark: Someone demeaned them by saying all 25,000 of them, and I think it was the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans).

Mr. Nielsen: That is typical.

Mr. Epp: If the Liberals are saying there are only 25,000 residents for instance in the Yukon Territory and another 45,000 in the Northwest Territories, the point is, they are Canadians.

● (2100)

An hon. Member: And minorities.

Mr. Epp: They have the same rights and privileges as those I want and receive. We are not speaking about provincial status nor are they, but in this whole amending formula they do not exist.

An hon. Member: They can't even vote on a referendum.

Mr. Epp: Surely that is not acceptable. I should like now to deal with the charter of rights. There will be a debate, sometime, as to better ways in which we might protect our rights, whether through a charter or through a convention such as the British parliamentary system. One thing we have to keep in mind is that regardless of our viewpoint on how rights are best protected every one of us holds the position, first of all, that we have basic fundamental rights, that these have been respected in Canada and that in each case, every party and every member intends to uphold those rights. That is not the issue. The issue is a fundamental one, honestly held, and that is, how best do you protect them?

For example, at the first ministers conference the Prime Minister made the point, I believe sincerely, that because we did not have a charter of rights, Canadians of Japanese descent were relocated, primarily from British Columbia, to other regions of the country. I have in my riding members of the Canadian Japanese community and I have discussed with them the period of turmoil through which they had to go. The point I want to make is that the Prime Minister leaves the inference that had a bill of rights been entrenched, this would not have happened. That is not so, because in the United States where they had a charter of rights and a written constitution, the same action took place. I am not justifying the action of the United States at that time nor of Canada at that time. That is not my point. They were both wrong. As we examine this question in committee, however, let us be careful to address the fundamental point—not that we have not got rights, but how the rights we have can best be protected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: This raises, obviously, the objection to my argument—that we do not trust the judicial system. That is not the case, Mr. Speaker. I am not for a minute suggesting that the courts do not have an important role to play in the protection of individual freedoms. Under a bill of rights which functions properly, the courts do make many of these decisions but their judgment is advisory. The ultimate responsibility rests here, in Parliament, and in the legislatures. When rights are constitutionally entrenched, when the final decision rests with the courts, the judiciary must be cautious lest it should be charged with partiality or misinterpreting the intentions of the draftsmen and setting a precedent with which none of us can live. So long as the judge's role is advisory, as it is under the Bill of Rights of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, the courts do feel more free to be clear and forthright in their judgment.

The real value, as I see it, of a bill of rights, is that it reflects those goals toward which we all must strive. What I have tried to say is that when we entrench a charter of rights, it is not just a symbolic act. It significantly alters the very nature of political responsibility in our parliamentary system.

On a matter of detail, this resolution calls for the forming of a joint committee. Its purpose is to examine a draft resolution for the patriating and amending of the Canadian constitution. The federal government has proposed that the House should appoint this all-party committee to study the government's proposed resolution. The committee will be empowered to hear witnesses and thus ensure greater citizen participation. For months, our party has been urging and supporting the participation of representatives from all political parties from all parts of Canada, as well as certain other groups such as the native people of Canada, in the process of constitutional reform. We have called it a constitutional assembly. Today, we have a constitutional committee. I shall not quibble about the words or the function but the purpose which must remain is that Canadians can be heard.

There are ample precedents for a constitutional assembly. For example, in the United States one was called in the 1770s in Philadelphia. After the turmoil of the Second World War, citizens of Western Germany got together and worked out a constitution. Shortly thereafter they established a country based on democratic rights. They had an economic revolution which became known as the oeconomishes wunder and which became the hallmark for the industrial economic society of which we also are part of today.

There is ample precedent, Mr. Speaker, for us not to worry about allowing Canadian citizens to participate in the making of their constitution. We should not be worried about that. It means, first of all, that the committee deadline of December 9 is simply not adequate. If we are sincere that Canadians are to be heard, that the resolution is to be debated and discussed, the job cannot be done in less than two months. It is not possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Additionally, the committee report is to be written by December 9. This means it would have to end its debate possibly two weeks before the December 9 deadline. It is an affront to Canadians to ask them to become part of this.

Canadians can be heard—if they can get to Ottawa.

An hon. Member: If there is not a strike.

Mr. Epp: This is where the committee is to sit. Mr. Speaker, I am one who does not believe that the committee's mandate should be open-ended; I believe that now is the time for action in constitutional reform. This party will be proposing that the deadline be extended to a minimum of six months. We suggest this because in this House on June 10 the Prime Minister proposed another deadline, this time on the first ministers. I am convinced, as I stand here, that that deadline contributed greatly to the failure experienced in the former railway building across the street.

Turning now to the matter of a quorum, it is proposed that 12 of the 25 member committee will constitute a quorum which can make decisions. Those 12 members must have representation from the two houses but the resolution does not say anything about more than one party. Is the government serious when it says that Parliament should make a decision without the opposition parties being represented at the time it is taken?

An hon. Member: True grits.

Mr. Epp: I could accuse them of all kinds of things, but I did not think they would be guilty of that kind of action.

An hon. Member: You are too trusting.

Mr. Epp: For a committee to hear evidence, six members shall form a quorum and again, both houses must be represented. But only one party could in fact form a quorum.

The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) says I am wrong. He should read his own notice of motion because that is exactly what it says. That is an amendment we want, Mr. Speaker.

I accept that patriation with a unanimity formula for two years is already a substantial amendment, without agreement by the provinces, but we should not go further at this time. We should bring the constitution back and then change it here in Canada—not ask Britain to do it first and then bring it back. If we are mature—and I believe we are as a country—let us exercise that maturity and responsibility and not ask someone else to do it.

There is a saying which goes like this, Mr. Speaker, "Time does not respect what is done without it." I am not an advocate of endless time on this question because I believe this debate in itself can serve to rend the country apart as the various views are expressed ad infinitum.

● (2110)

But the Prime Minister said that he made promises during the referendum debate.

Mr. Clark: And he broke them.

Mr. Epp: I say to him now: let us not exacerbate the situation either in Quebec or in western Canada or anywhere else by being rash. We must not endanger the harmonious operation of the federal system. Therefore, in view of the pressure which this government will receive from all parts of Canada to amend beyond the points I have made, I suggest that the government follow the course struck by the Fathers of Confederation, that of consensus, of debate, of discussion and of agreement. That is the Canadian way, and that, I believe, is the manner in which we should proceed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make sure the record is clear on the comment attributed to me by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). My comment was in response to that made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) that the people from Yukon and the Northwest Territories were not represented. I said that all 25,000 of them are.

Mr. Nielsen: That is inaccurate.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is a member of this House and he represents 25,000 people, the populace of Yukon. The two members from the Northwest Territories, one from the Progressive Conservative Party and one from the New Democratic Party, represent the people of the Northwest Territories. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that my comment was not made in any derogatory sense. I am saying that the people of Yukon and the Northwest Territories are represented in this constitutional debate right here in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we may have overworked the word historic, and this being an historic debate. If it is not historic, most assuredly it is important. Unhappily that has not been the case with many of the debates in the House of Commons over the few years I have been here. It seems to me there is a tendency to talk too much rather than too little and to be afraid of setting deadlines and of taking decisions on important subjects because we might not give everyone in the House of Commons an opportunity to speak on each subject that comes before this chamber.

Most assuredly this particular debate, so eloquently led off today by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), it is an important debate and one which should capture the attention of every member who should make a point, if he or she cannot be here, of reading the comments that will be made.

I listened with careful attention this evening to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). I do not agree with all the conclusions he reached, nor with some of the assumptions he has made. I think he has a tendency to underestimate the intelligence of the Canadian public. He seems to feel that because we have a debate and because we do not totally agree with each other, it is going to tear the country apart. I think Canada has reached a maturity, which the hon. member referred to but almost rejected further on in his address. Canada has grown up. Canada has come of age, and it is about time we had a Canadian constitution amended by Canadians under which Canadian decisions are made about this country for present and for future generations. We have an opportunity to do that with this particular resolution and with the amendments which will follow. This can be done either in December or at subsequent meetings to be held in this chamber and at meetings between first ministers.

It is my considered opinion that the action Parliament is taking now—because this is not a government action per se, the government takes initiative and shows leadership but this will be a Canadian parliamentary decision—is ambitious, appropriate and most assuredly necessary. We have an opportunity to break the log jam of constitutional debate.

In the short time that I have been here, almost 12 years, I was surprised to learn of the number of meetings the Minister of Justice was able to cite today as having taken place with respect to constitutional debate. As I said earlier, the concern is not that we talk too little on this particular subject but that we may have talked too much about it. I heard the hon. member for Provencher nit-picking, if you will, the amending formula. We have tried several procedures. We had one named after the Hon. Davie Fulton when he was minister of justice. It was called the Fulton formula. Later came the Hon. Guy Favreau, who filled the same portfolio and endeavoured to come up with a formula that would be acceptable. Then we heard about the Fulton-Favreau formula. We have heard about the Victoria and the Vancouver formulae. We have heard about all kinds of formulae. Every one was delinquent in one fashion or another. No amending formula will please everyone. Therefore, a decision has to be taken. This particular suggestion made by the government is not unilaterally imposed by the government on the provinces.

Mr. Malone: It is, too!

Mr. Cullen: We indicate that for two years it will be unanimous consent by all provinces and the federal government. We set a deadline, in other words a time-frame within which we can come up with an amending formula with which surely eight out of ten provinces can agree. If they cannot, there is provision for dealing with it. But at long last we have indicated that the time has come when we must have an amending formula so that we can get on with the business of creating a Canadian constitution made in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I believe that every member of this House would have preferred some form of consensus to have come out of the first ministers' meeting so that we would be going to Westminster with a view, a consensus, acceptable to the provinces and to the federal government. Every possible effort was made by the federal government and by the provinces to arrive at a consensus. But it became evident, surely it became patently obvious, that such a consensus could not be reached. What is the alternative. The status quo was unthinkable. Surely we made a promise to the people of Quebec, when they voted in the referendum overwhelmingly in favour of Canada, that we would do something? The status quo was obviously unacceptable. Some change has to be made. We could not arrive at a consensus. The federal government took its initiative and said unilaterally that it would move to patriate the constitution, to take the action necessary to put things into this constitution and bring about an amending formula. We will not impose it, but we indicate that an amending formula is necessary, and that these are the steps by which it must be reached.

To suggest the federal government was less than honest in its presentation or that it was not prepared to negotiate or not prepared to make concessions is not in accordance with the truth. Consider the fact that we were prepared to make concessions at the federal level on family law and, on indirect taxation of resources, which the Supreme Court of Canada determined was ultra vires to the provinces—but with which we were prepared to go along. We were prepared to give more powers in interprovincial trade and resources. We were prepared to give new provincial powers in fisheries.

When we talk about consensus, Mr. Speaker, consider the dilemma of the federal government. The province of Newfoundland says it wants total control over fisheries, inland and offshore. The other Atlantic provinces say no, that they are quite content to deal with the inshore fisheries but they want the federal government to take care of the offshore. When you cannot get a consensus among provinces which are as vitally concerned in the fisheries as they are, certainly in Atlantic Canada, surely the time comes for the federal government to take some initiative and say that it will resolve this particular problem? We were prepared to give greater jurisdiction in so far as fisheries were concerned. We were prepared to say that they would have a greater share in revenue and management of offshore resources.

I heard the Premier of Newfoundland say this was not good enough. I heard him say he wanted it all. As it turns out, he wanted to make everybody in Newfoundland fabulously wealthy. No matter what amount of money was derived as a result of finding these resources on the offshore of Canada, they were going to be for the single benefit of the province of Newfoundland. No person representing all of Canada, and certainly no parliamentarian should be prepared to go along with that issue and say he is doing a job for all Canadians. We did say we would give them 100 per cent of the revenue from those resources until such time as they became a rich province. Surely after that a decision has to be made about the distribution of wealth found on the offshore of Canada.

● (2120)

Shortly before I came to this House, Alberta had an oil find. It was involved in production and could not find a market for its resource. It had to charge higher than world prices in order to get the resource developed. People in Ontario and other parts of Canada, divided by a particular line, said they were prepared to pay more than world prices in order to help develop this particular resource. That was appropriate.

Canadians from other provinces made that contribution so that Alberta could evolve and develop its oil industry. Now the province has done so. It is a very rich province with a significant Heritage Fund. I do not begrudge that. However, Alberta should not be saying to petrochemical industries that in the future if they want to establish in Canada, they must establish in Alberta, because that is where all of the oil is, and unless they establish there they are not going to get any help. More than that it should not tell a very strong, viable petrochemical industry in southwestern Ontario that it will not be considered a traditional purchaser and that if it wants to get oil, it will have to get it from certain particular groups without any guarantee of security of supply.

So far, the petrochemical industry has been able to get the oil that it requires. In the event of a shortage though, Petrosar will surely have a very difficult time convincing its suppliers that there should be a sharing of that short resource.

I am very apprehensive about the legislation passed in Alberta. If I may indicate a personal opinion, I think that piece of legislation is ultra vires. However, nobody is making any noises about that. We are taking what the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) talked about, the Canadian way. We are trying to work out an accommodation. We are trying to make it work so that it will work to the benefit of Alberta and, certainly, to the benefit of the petrochemical industry in southwestern Ontario.

When the time came to build a world-scale plant, when the petrochemical industry was in difficulty in Canada in 1968-69, the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, now Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), suggested the formation of a joint government-industry committee to determine what were the problems. He wanted to forget about name-calling and placing blame. He wanted to find out how to save the petrochemical industry in Canada.

Government and industry got together and said they needed economies of scale and world scale plants. Canada could not support five or six world-scale plants, so it was decided to build them in a progression. The first one, based on an economic decision made by the industry, was to be built in Ontario, the second in Alberta and the third in the Montreal region. Staging along these lines is in fact taking place at the present time and it is beneficial to the petrochemical industry. We were not selfish. We were all working together to make a strong petrochemical industry for Canada. That is the kind of responsibility a federal government has when dealing with the provinces. We must, as a federal government, take our responsibilities.

At that bargaining table we talked about greater jurisdiction in communications for the provinces. We talked about enshrining equalization payments to the provinces. Surely this is absolutely essential and no one could object to that move. We offered to give the provinces a greater role in the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court and a greater provincial role in the upper chamber. There was an attempt to negotiate, to accept a responsibility to speak for all Canadians, to accept that the provinces had some concerns as well and should have more power and more say in those areas.

When I read the statement which has been made about the constitution and the areas we are asking the British Parliament, if you will, to incorporate into the constitution, I asked myself who could, in all sincerity, object to the items which are to be incorporated. The hon. member for Provencher said we should have brought back the British North America Act, solely patriate it, not have an amending formula and not incorporate anything. That is a legitimate point of view. I do not agree with it, but it is a point of view that he has. I believe it makes more sense to patriate the constitution, to have an amending formula so that we can do something, and surely no one in Canada can in all conscience object to those things we are talking about incorporating. We are suggesting these items:

For the first time, the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians will be entrenched in a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms so that they cannot be infringed upon by any single government, legislature, or Parliament. Individuals and minorities who feel aggrieved will have recourse to the courts.

Who can object to that being incorporated? It is not as though we were making some power grab. This is to protect people.

In the charter, Canadians will be assured of the freedom to move across the country, take up residence, and pursue employment in any province.

We do not have that now.

The charter will guarantee that citizens of the English or French language minority in a province have the right to educate their children in that language wherever numbers warrant.

Surely that is a reasonable approach to the right to education which every Canadian should expect. It is not imposing. The language indicates "where numbers warrant". If I may speak personally, I would have gone further than that, but in the interests of compromise, those words are incorporated at the end.

The principle of equalization which is with us at the present time is being enshrined in the constitution. Who can really object to that?

An amending procedure will ensure that all changes to the constitution can be made in Canada.

For the life of me, I cannot understand how anyone in opposition can seriously object to the incorporation of those items I have just listed. Nor, frankly, can I see the problem with the amending formula when we have had so much difficulty over the years. Here at least there are some guidelines. If we can improve upon it, let's do that. But for heaven's sake, let us get an amending formula which makes it possible to have a constitution that lives and gives some direction to this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I wince a little when I hear—and I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say it on one or more occasions that we have to remove the last vestige of colonialism. Some people have taken that as a rap against the British. I think the rap is really against Canadians when that statement is made, and well it should be. It has taken us an unconscionably long period of time to come of age, to say that we can come up with an amending formula and declare what we want in our constitution.

If I may interject a personal note, my father came from Somerset in Great Britain. He taught me about Britain. Instead of telling me gory stories and hero stories, I heard about England. The brainwashing got through. When I was 17 years of age, I participated in a public speaking forum. The topic of my speech was how Britain saved the world in 1940. I know of the parliamentary system the British have given to us. They have given us the idea and sense of fair play. I think of the accommodation, the politeness and the way in which the British conduct themselves. They have been calm in times of great trouble, particularly during World War II. We saw their reaction. We have much to learn from our British heritage.

Four days after the 1968 election my father passed away. At that time we had our new Canadian flag. My father had lived in this country since coming from England in 1924. He was proud of the fact that he was living here in Canada and that Canada gave to him a great living. When I buried him, I placed the Union Jack on his coffin because I felt that was appropriate. The poet said it better than I: "There is some corner of a foreign field that is forever England". That was all right for my father and his generation. I am a Canadian and I am proud of it. I do not feel the least bit concerned about the suggestion that the Brits are trying to impose colonialism on us. I believe it is a fact that because we are not prepared to grow up, not prepared to set deadlines and not prepared to make decisions we remain colonialists. The Brits are not trying to keep us that way. We are being kept that way because of our own shyness, quietness, nervousness and apprehension. Perhaps it is because of our time-consuming debates that really do not amount to anything. It should be said to us as Canadians that surely it is time we stood on our own two feet, make decisions and amend the bloody formula. I am sorry, "bloody" is swearing. My father taught me that.

● (2130)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That's a good navy word.

Mr. Cullen: We have come of age and we have an opportunity to prove that during this debate. I do not know whether we will see non-partisanship. I do not ever expect to see that in this chamber. I hope that never occurs. I would hope that opposition parties and the government party will put forward positive suggestions. If the amending formula is not good do not knock it for the sake of knocking it, but come up with something better. I would bet that we could find ways to attack those suggestions publicly as well, but let us come up with some positive ideas. Let us not underestimate the intelligence of Canadians. This country is not going to split up because we have a debate in the House of Commons, or for that matter in the media or on any platform. This country can stand on its own two feet, and I am satisfied it can take a little bit of honest disagreement and difference of opinion. I am not afraid of deadlines and I am not afraid of making decisions. I do not think Canadians in the country are concerned about this debate. Give us a chance and let us get this legislation through bringing that constitution to Canada where it belongs. Let us make the changes here in Canada as Canadians for Canadians. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to respond to the personal references the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) has made to the way he feels about Canada. Many of us, if not all, have the same personal sentiments as those expressed tonight by that hon. member. I think, though, we must go beyond personal considerations.

The hon. member suggested it is time we got over being quiet, nervous and apprehensive about constitutional change. Let me assure the hon. member that the people in the area of western Canada from which I come are not nervous, apprehensive or quiet. We are rather loud, confident and sure about the kind of Canada we want, and I must say I resent very much the hon. member's suggestion. The same sort of suggestion was made in respect of those who expressed opposition at the beginning of the flag debate in 1965.

Let me assure hon. members that I oppose what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is attempting to do and that I will continue to oppose it with every ounce of strength I can muster in this House.

An hon. Member: You oppose everything.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roche: I do not oppose everything. Hon. members in this House who know me will know that during the eight years

I have stood in this House I have not been an opposing member. However, I do oppose what the Prime Minister is attempting to do in this debate.

The resolution before us is in essence unconstitutional because it goes directly against the principle of federation. It goes directly against the kind of Canada we inherited and want to leave to our children. It goes directly against the kind of Canada which was formed through a union of the provinces with a centre. It goes directly against the kind of Canada which we recognize as something other than a unitary state.

The proposed resolution goes directly against the regional diversity of this country and I want to say a few things about that diversity during my remarks, particularly as it applies to our international commitments today.

The kind of Canada I inherited and the kind of Canada I want to leave to my children is a Canada that will not be totally changed, as it will by the application of proposed section 42 in the resolution before us. That proposal would permit amendments to our constitution as a result of a binding referendum. In this way provincial governments would be completely bypassed. As my leader pointed out today, this is proposed because the Prime Minister knows he cannot get the agreement of the provinces, so he is making this last-ditch stand, going to Westminster to get these amendments. It would be funny if it was not so sad. He wants to go to Westminster to obtain these substantive amendments to our constitution.

I venture to suggest that every member of this House wants the constitution brought to Canada, or patriation on the basis of a unanimity formula. There is no dispute about that. What we oppose is having Westminster charged with making substantive amendments. These are not just casual amendments but amendments that would virtually change the character of this country. We are being asked in the name of the flag to support this idea.

I may come into this House as a western member, and I do so proudly. I will say a few things about that in a moment. However, I have spoken and I have voted in this House for eight years as a national member and as a member supporting the whole country. I do not bring into this House a mere regional representation. I lived outside this country for ten years. As the late Lester Pearson used to say, and he was a friend of many of us here, sometimes the way to understand the country better and the way to be a better Canadian is to live outside the country and see it from afar. I have done that, sir. I do not claim I have a better understanding of Canada than other members of the House. I am only suggesting that we have to summon up in this debate the strength that is within us with an insight and an understanding that transcends our regions, backgrounds, politics and personalities. We must ask ourselves a fundamental question. I hope members on the other side of this House will also ask themselves this question. The fundamental question is; when you look at the totality of the legislation before us is it right or wrong for Canada? I submit, sir, that it is wrong for Canada. I am sure we are going to hear a lot about the charter of rights. We heard about that yesterday afternoon on "Cross-Canada Check-up". It seems clear that those of us who oppose this resolution are on the wrong side of this issue politically. I do not worry about standing here in opposition on this issue, even though I acknowledge that the perception today in Canada is that we are on the wrong side. It is put forward that because the people of Canada are to get a charter of rights that should be enough to persuade us to vote in favour of it. It has been said we are going to receive equalization and a charter of rights, but I do not believe the people of Canada have yet had an opportunity to examine fully what this resolution will do for Canada.

• (2140)

I hope our party—and I invite other members of other parties in this House to do so—will seriously reflect and debate it fully. I hope there will not just be a casual two or three-day debate. I hope it will be fully debated so that the people of Canada get the message of what we are trying to say, which is in essence that even though this resolution may have some factors and features in it which appear to be attractive, the fullness of it will destroy the Canada we know.

I put that to the House at this major moment in the history of our country. I do not think there is a debate—certainly not very many in my time here—which matches this one in intensity with regard to the direction of the future of our country and in importance.

I have said that when this resolution is considered in its fullness one comes to the conclusion that it does go directly against the principles of federation, and clause 42, among others, is the centrepiece of that objection. It is a unilateral action, which is enough to discount it right away. It would bring in amendments directly affecting provincial rights, particularly in education.

Some might say that is all right, but it would provide, as I have said, the possibility, indeed, even the probability, of amendments by referendum in which the provinces are bypassed. That is a different kind of country. If we are going to have that as the basis of our federation, then let the Prime Minister bring the constitution to Canada, let us debate it here, and let the provinces have an input. Let us have a constituent assembly. Let us have a formal structure in Canada to make such decisions and not run it through by a so-called joint address from the Senate and the House of Commons as an expression of the will of the people of Canada, for it will not be. It will be fraudulent, and I hope the people for whom I have great respect in Westminster are listening. I hope the people in the other place who will be under attack by the fullness of this resolution will give consideration to these factors.

I want to move now to what I consider to be an even greater evil in this resolution and explain why it deserves to be attacked on the principle of being wrong. It will certainly promote divisiveness in our country.

I return here to my role as a western member. Those western members who will be joining this debate will reflect the feeling of alienation which is building quickly in western Canada today. There is a group called the West Fed—Western Federation. As a matter of fact, three or four nights ago the federation met in Red Deer. Five hundred people came out to its meeting. West Fed would have the four western provinces secede and form their own union and, in effect, their own country. There are many people in western Canada who today are disposed to join such an organization. I know what I am talking about. The man who runs Western Federation is a man who opposed me for the nomination for the Edmonton South Progressive Conservative nomination for this past election which I had the honour to win. I beat him in the last nomination meeting, and I will beat him in the next nomination meeting. I will run against him. I am not afraid of him, and I am not afraid of Western Federation, but it is the Liberal government and whose actions are fomenting the membership of Western Federation which is a threat to western Canada today.

There is divisiveness in our nation, and I feel badly about it because of the nature of our country. We have technology, space, resources and everything which is needed for a successful country in the world today. In my work for my party I have travelled around the world, and I have seen many countries. I have seen countries which do not have one-tenth of the potential this country has to be successful, yet we are hung up on divisiveness, internal wrangling and these things which sap our energy. Why? Is it because our constitution is bad? Our constitution, the BNA Act, has served us for 113 years and has built this country. I checked with my secretaries in Edmonton today, and no one is calling me and telling me we have to get the constitution changed. What they are saying is that they want an energy agreement. I have received much mail and many calls on that. We need an energy agreement, and we need to get the economic situation of our country turned around. We have to address these matters seriously. No one thinks there is any magic button. I do not care who is in office; no party has a magic button to make the energy and economic situations better, but there is a sense of priorities. Those priorities are energy and the economic issues. I am proud to say that when my friend, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), was Prime Minister, he addressed those two central questions, which affect the lives of every Canadian, in a meaningful way.

What will the patriated constitution do? Will it produce an ounce of oil or create one job? It certainly will not. What it will do is enlarge the smokescreen for the Prime Minister, who has been unable to solve the problems which really affect our country, and make it look as if we are doing something good because we will have a charter of human rights.

There are two perceptions of this country. I hope hon. members opposite are listening to my two perceptions. They are not new, but I feel intensely that there is a perception that is best reflected in the conduct, the words and the attitude of the Prime Minister. I would not push it too far, but he says that it is the centre which really has the answers and which should have the power to send down into the various regions those things which we—whoever "we" are in Ottawa—decide ought to be sent. It is the centralist view of Canada.

Opposed to that there is a regional, community view. Our country is 4,000 miles wide; there are five time zones and three oceans. This country has a lot of diversity. My friend, the right hon. member for Yellowhead best reflected what it is today that makes our country. It is a sense of national unity which comes up from the regions, rather than being imposed.

This is really a high level debate we have entered into because what we are arguing is not just the resolution and not just clause 42, central though it is to our debate. We are discussing what kind of view of Canada will prevail. We have seen this come out in economic issues before, and we have certainly seen it in the energy issues. Now we are seeing it perforce in the constitutional issue, and if we who are opposing this measure lose, and that constitution is brought home, we are going to see a different kind of Canada. It will mean that hon. members opposite have prevailed. I do not think the people of Canada want that. That is why the people of Canada need to know what is happening in this chamber. They need to know what this debate is all about. I hope the media will fully reflect that. I think somebody said earlier today that the media is being somewhat superficial in this. That was not a criticism of the media. It was a question of whether the media will be swept away by the seeming fulminations in favour of a better Canada brought about by this resolution while failing to dig into how the character of our country will be changed.

Now let me get to the charter of rights. This is supposed to be very attractive, as we heard yesterday, and as I am sure we will hear in the course of this debate.

There is a central point to make about a charter of rights. A charter of rights is meaningless if the intention of the government is not to endorse it fully. To sell a charter of rights and to entrench it is something which will automatically make our lives better: try to tell that to the people of the Soviet Union. Try to tell that to the people of many countries. I think what is important is for us in this country to have human rights commissions, as we do at the federal and provincial levels, which protect the rights of people. I believe it is important for us to have the bill of rights.

● (2150)

I believe it is important for us to move eventually to an entrenchment. I am not speaking against entrenchment; I am only saying that to put up a smokescreen in this whole debate and to say that entrenchment is so valuable that it can override section 42 is to mislead the Canadian people and to take them down a path on which they do not even know they are going right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: Now we come to the international application of the charter of rights. I hear it said that we must have this entrenchment because it will be better for us at the United Nations. We have the Helsinki review coming up at the Madrid conference. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that entrenching our rights will not do one iota for Canada in enhancing human rights around the world through the Madrid conference. Canada already is a signatory to the human rights conventions of the United Nations. It is a smokescreen to be told that this is a necessary factor, either domestically or internationally today.

I believe we must centre on what this debate is all about. It is about the character of Canada. If we who feel deeply about the divergent strengths and the regional strengths of our country if we lie down and let this thing roll over us, we will not be responding to our duty. I say there will be those who will ask one day where were the members of Parliament when this fundamental change was made in our country. There are many members, I think, who will want to stand up and give an expression of their deep commitment, whether they come from the western area, from the Atlantic region or from Quebec or Ontario, who understand that it is all of us together who make up our country.

There are many other aspects to which I would like to go on, but I do not know whether or not you will give me any more time, Mr. Speaker. I say that this is a fraudulent measure. I would not feel I am making a complete statement if I did not give you a few more words on this, Mr. Speaker. Somebody has said that section 7 does not deal with the native rights. I say it does not deal with many human rights. Section 7 states that everyone has the right to life except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. I would like to know how that accords with the Criminal Code amendment passed in 1969 which led to the abortion situation in our country today where 60,000 abortions are taking place in the name of so-called justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: I would like to know how that accords with that amendment. This government, which has been in power throughout the 1970s, without ever addressing itself seriously to the question of what is happening to abortion today, has the gall and the nerve to come to the House and say that everyone has the right to life. Everyone does not have the right to life in this country as a result of the Criminal Code amendment. Let the government clean up its own house first before it gives us nice language that is supposed to make us feel good.

That is just one aspect of how I feel about the essence of this resolution. I believe it should be opposed, not opposed in a mindless or vacuous way but opposed because we ask Canadians to seriously consider that what is being done through this resolution will affect their country and the country of their children in ways of which they never dreamed, ways which will change this country from the manner in which it was built up by a formulation of regional strength into an overly centrally dominated institution, absolutely incompatible, we feel, with how the Fathers of Confederation viewed our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in this historic debate. It is indeed a great day for all Canadians and more particularly for French Canadians. I do not share at all the great sadness or the apparent sadness of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Today he nearly had us crying at the end of his speech, and in fact I might have cried out of disappointment at hearing him, a man who said he was a new leader with new ideas; I had the impression that it was politics like was being carried out in the 1930s when there was no real desire for change. The leader of the party that calls itself Progressive Conservative should certainly take a look at the name of his party and have the word progressive struck out forever because I believe that in the interventions we heard on that side of the House there was absolutely nothing progressive—on the contrary, it was very regressive.

Mr. Speaker, during the referendum campaign I was very active with my fellow citizens, and during the whole course of the summer I followed very attentively all the implications of the constitutional conference, and like many other Canadians, I was disappointed that it failed. I was disappointed for several reasons because I thought at a certain time our present structure might enable us to achieve a renewed federalism. Unfortunately, the circumstances being as they were, we had to act. I would like to remind you that we made a commitment during the referendum, and in the past few days several politicians, especially the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, have been trying to give an entirely different meaning to our commitment by saying or suggesting that we have deceived those who voted no. I personally voted no and I am not at all disappointed by the proposed resolution that was tabled. When it is suggested that we mislead Quebeckers, that we do not keep our commitments, I would like to remind all our detractors that the only true commitment we made was, and I quote from a speech by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the Paul Sauvé arena on May 14, 1980, when he said:

> And I know, because I talked to those members this morning, I know I can make the most solemn commitment that following a No vote we would immediately put in motion the mechanism for constitutional renewal, and we will not stop before that is done.

That is what the Right Hon. Prime Minister said at the time of the referendum. That is still the position we stand by today, and the government is certainly prepared to reaffirm to all Quebeckers and all other Canadians that we will not stop before that is done. And now I think that all people acknowledge the need for action. The only issue is the means to achieve this objective. Some would prefer a constituent assembly. If they think that with such an assembly things will go faster, I wish them good luck. Others would rather hold additional constitutional conferences. Before I got involved in this kind of debate I somestimes heard politicians call these conferences "circumferences". I think that in the past few years we have witnessed several such circumferences and time has come for the federal government to show leadership in this matter. I think we enjoy public confidence. We enjoyed it at the last election and we have it again in this endeavour.

Earlier I heard the member who spoke before me say that he was afraid of ending up with a different Canada. If he has come to sit here to let things remain as they are, it is fortunate he belongs to the Progressive Conservative Party because what we precisely want, and it is also why I have come to Ottawa, is to change Canada. I think that some members opposite fear change. It is only the beginning of their surprise because we are committed to making those changes and we will keep on doing so and I hope that following this procedure other changes will take place.

Mr. Speaker, I also read the articles published in newspapers in the wake of the various reactions to our project and the Premier of Quebec went short of calling us traitors. Frankly, I am wondering who is the real traitor with regard to the interests of French Canadians.

An hon. Member: And Canadians!

Mr. Lapierre: And Canadians. French Canadians are part of Canada.

I believe that the real traitor in this debate is certainly the Premier of Quebec who hides behind the smokescreen of collective rights to ignore all improvements made to individual rights. We know that his policy was not intended to serve the individual interests and rights of Quebeckers, but we believe that Canada and Canadians have certain rights to gain and we are ready to go ahead. That process might require more intestinal fortitude but we are ready to take part in all discussions and I think that the debate that will be going on in the next days in this House will demonstrate our determination to act to the opposition and particularly to the Progressive Conservatives who are the greatest reactionaries.

I read in the paper that the Leader of the Official Opposition said that this proposal did not meet the expectations of those who voted no. Beware. I urge him to visit the province of Quebec and meet some people and as evidenced by polls and as he recognized himself in his press conference, he will see that his position did not reflect the opinion of the majority or the consensus of Canadians.

An hon. Member: He never visits the province of Quebec.

Mr. Lapierre: May I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If I can have the attention of the government House leader, I assume from various public statements which have been made that we will be continuing with this debate tomorrow. I wonder if he might confirm that and give an indication of the business of the House for the remainder of the week.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, we are going to proceed with this motion to refer the resolution to the committee tomorrow, Wednesday if necessary, Thursday if absolutely necessary, and Friday. I suggest that next Tuesday be an allotted opposition day but I wish to consult further my colleagues the leaders of the two opposition parties in the House to confirm that next Tuesday might be an allotted opposition day. Otherwise it might be this Friday but I prefer to have further consultation. In the meantime, we propose to continue the debate on this motion but if that debate should end before Friday, we would proceed with other bills on the order paper. We have about 30 of them and we hope to be able to clear the order paper as soon as possible.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—ASSISTANCE FOR HOME OWNERS ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY RISING MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise in connection with a question which I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on April 21 about assistance to home owners, renters and those suffering from high interest rates in Canada.

Let me tell the House that the constitution and amending the constitution will not help one of those home owners, one of those renters. Not one person suffering from high interest rates today when the bank rate is 13 per cent will be helped by all this talk about amending the constitution. Not one hungry person will get a meal from it. Not one person will be employed by it. Not one person will be saved from the high costs of inflation by all of this talk on the other side about the constitution. They are wasting the time of the House and the people of this country when they talk about the constitution, when the economy is a shambles and when they have turned their backs on every promise they made in the last year.

Now to come back to housing and interest rates, what kind of promises were made there? In Hansard on November 6, 1979, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is recorded as saying:

—it is right and necessary for Liberals to take a new approach and a new look at interest rate policy.

Well, the new look was a pretty quick look. They have done nothing on it. Also on November 6 he said that he wanted——action taken now to prevent the hardship this Conservative high interest rate policy is creating for millions of Canadians and their families.

Interest rates today are 13 per cent at the bank, and under this government they went up to 17.5 per cent—17.5 per cent under the policy of that government. When the government is asked when it will produce a policy to help home owners and renters, there is no answer. The Prime Minister does not answer. He gives some easy patter about the great Liberal principles of helping those who most need the help. Those who need the help now are the people who have had to take out mortgages and renew them at the present rates of 14 per cent or 15 per cent. The Liberal rates of interest are down slightly now from what they were a few months ago under the early leadership of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), 17.5 per cent. We want to know when gentlemen opposite will bring in a great policy to help home owners and to help renters. It was the present Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who all last fall opposed our mortgage interest and property tax deduction program which would have helped middle and lower-income Canadians who had homes or wanted to acquire them. He and gentlemen opposite fought that policy so that it never went through. They said they would bring in a tremendous shelter allowance program. I have the quotation here from the gentleman who was the housing critic at that time. He is now the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He is hiding in that portfolio. Here is what he said as resported in Hansard at page 1017 of last fall:

—if there is a requirement to raise interest rates, there is an equal requirement to help those people who are hurt by those interest rate increases.

What action is he and his government taking to help those people who are hurt by interest rate increases which now appear to be necessary because the government is now in power? What has happened to the government opposite that voted for a non-confidence motion and defeated our budget because it did not lower interest rates, it did not cut taxes and it did not stimulate the growth of the Canadian economy? Where are the honourable geniuses opposite, those chameleons, those people who think they are born to rule? When will they lower the interest rates? When will they cut the taxes? When will they stimulate the growth of the Canadian economy? We have a Minister of Finance who is the most silent minister of finance ever in our history—and he is the Minister of Finance who has the most to be silent about. He has a shameful record of seven months of complete inactivity in comparison to the finance critic who is now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). That gentleman was tremendously active in the fall of 1979 when he had such fantastic policies. He was so confident that he went on CTV on February 7, 1980. He was asked the question: "Would you lower interest rates?" He replied: "Yes I would". Question: "Would you be prepared to resign your seat if the government didn't carry through on that policy?" Herb Gray: "Yes, I would." That was February 7, 1980. What happened afterwards, Mr. Speaker? Interest rates went up. They were then 15 per cent, the prime bank rate. They went up to 15.75 per cent on March 13, then up to 17.5 per cent. And did the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce have the decency to resign? He did not. He went to Japan to tell the Japanese what he was going to do about the car imports from Japan. They wouldn't even let the Dash-7 Aircraft land at the airport in Tokyo. He was going to straighten out the auto pact. He went down to Washington and that is the last we have heard of the auto pact from the great honourable Herbie. Not another word on the auto pact. This was from the man who was going to force the interest rates down and save the home owner. He was like a vacuum cleaner gone berserk when he was finance critic. But we have heard nothing from him, Mr. Speaker. Not another word have we heard from him. And now the bank interest rate is up to 13 per cent again.

● (2205)

By the way, here is the housing critic, the promise to home owners, Mr. Axworthy:

The government could have started where the real problem lies and could have provided something for rental assistance.

That was November, 19, 1979 in the House of Commons. There was going to be help for all occupants. The great Liberal Party that is all heart was going to help not only home-owners, they were going to help the renters. Everybody in the country was going to get help from hon. gentlemen opposite—a shelter allowance. Now, they have been in power seven to eight months, Mr. Speaker. And they have not helped one home owner, they have not helped one tenant, they have not helped one renter, they have not helped one person who occupies a rathole. They do nothing to help anyone and they have now got a majority so we cannot get any answers from them.

It is useless to ask the Minister of Finance a question. He is what I call the Celtic oracle. He is the most silent oracle since the Delphic oracle. And now we hear he is to bring in a budget between October 15 and October 31. God help us.

An hon. Member: The twenty-first.

Mr. Crosbie: No, the thirty-first.

An hon. Member. It is the twenty-first. It is already set.

Mr. Crosbie: The minister of mines said the twenty-first.

Well, this is what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said in a recent speech to the chamber of commerce. Last year he had the solutions to everything. This year he warned the business executives they would be "unwise to expect too much too soon by way of economic recovery". Herbie out of power is going to solve the problems of the world in no time. Herbie in power says it would be unwise, gentlemen, to expect too much too soon. Do not rush the government. We have a majority after all. He says "circumstances permit no magical fiscal solutions to the cyclical economic downturn" such as a stimulative budget. No longer can we expect any solutions from his government. Uncle Herbie is in power. Now what he says is that circumstances permit no magical fiscal solutions to the cyclical economic downturn. Cyclical? It's sickacle, s-i-c-k-a-c-l-e, that's what it is, this picture of hypocrisy, rank, stinking hypocrisy, Mr. Speaker. I do not like to use strong language but in this case I cannot avoid it. He went on to say this:

Double-digit inflation threatens to plague Canadians for some time to come—

Well, isn't that nice news to give the chamber of commerce? He is not too worried about it.

● (2210)

He says that double-digit inflation threatens to plague us for some time to come. He says, "Don't worry about it, we Liberals are in power, don't worry about double-digit inflation, after all it is worth it to have us back. You can have a sense of confidence now that we are here looking after your energy problems. We are going to crush Alberta and British Columbia. We are going to gut confederation. We are going to end this federation. We are going to impose our own solutions about the constitution."

He says, "Don't worry about inflation, don't worry about high interest rates, don't worry about the fact you are unemployed, don't worry about the fact that you are starving half to death, because after all we are fixing the BNA Act. We are going to repatriate that from Westminster. We are going to bring it over and put it up in the Peace Tower, and everybody can feel that much happier because Canada will work that much better by the time we get this back. We think that we can keep this fuss going for another year. We are going to extend our honeymoon. We usually only have a honeymoon for five or six months but we are going to extend it for a year and a half because everybody in Canada is so thrilled with this move we are making to repatriate the unrepatriatable—the constitution, the BNA Act or whatever it is."

He says, "on the way we are going to ask the British parliament to do the job we can't do here. Us old colonialists are going to ask Aunt Maggie Thatcher". She is the only hope for the government opposite, and she is a Tory. The government opposite must go on its knees to Aunt Maggie Thatcher and ask her to amend the Canadian constitution without the consent of the provinces."

I am a bit off my topic, Mr. Speaker, so I had better sit down and end by saying that it is a most unsatisfactory situation.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression after reading the orders of the day that the hon. member who just sat down would be dealing with a question about housing. As he indicated, he has strayed somewhat. However, I have prepared a response to that question which was asked of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in my absence earlier.

I would like to respond and preface my remarks by saying that I will give some examples of how this government has acted to help the people who most needed help in the situation to which the hon. member opposite has referred, that of rising interest rates. I would like first of all to draw his attention to my announcement on March 26 which directed government action toward those people involved in the AHOP program.

The hon. member will be interested to know that between March 26 and July 31, 1980, 2,168 AHOP accounts were reviewed. Of these only 55 required extension assistance under that program, notwithstanding the dire plight which the hon. member has painted. This support was made available to reduce borrowers' payment of principal, interest and taxes to 30 per cent of their income where possible. The benchmark of 30 per cent of income should be directed toward meeting those shelter costs. This benchmark is used widely in the industry and it refers to the amount which people as a rule should be paying toward those costs in an average budget.

AHOP borrowers who renewed their mortgages before that announcement, which is the question that was initially asked of the Prime Minister, were also considered as candidates for assistance. I say that because those AHOP mortgages renewed before March 26 were direct CMHC mortgages. They were not indirect mortgages which the corporation secured under the insurance program of private borrowers.

For the people in this category a program was made available to reduce the interest rate to 8 per cent. The gross debt service in all cases was reduced to 30 per cent. For this reason there was no necessity to make the program retroactive—interestingly enough, this was the question that was asked of the Prime Minister initially.

The hon. member has expressed concern about support for lower-income Canadians. He said that nothing, but nothing, had been done to assist those Canadians. Mr. Speaker, this government shares his concern for those Canadians.

● (2215)

That is why I was pleased to announce in June an increase of 5,000 social housing units which are allocated across the country. Some of them are in St. John's, Newfoundland which benefited by this allocation. I would say the facts are there to support the government's action.

In terms of what is happening in the industry, I am pleased to indicate that the starts in September show that the seasonally adjusted annual rate has rebounded to 166,500. This is a welcome increase over the experience of the past six months where the range has been anywhere from a low of 125,000 in June to 145,000, increasing in July and August.

This activity introduces some sign of recovery in the industry. With that recovery the pressure for accommodation and the pressures that spill over to other areas should be somewhat moderated. I am hopeful that it is a trend for the future.

ENERGY—DEVELOPMENT OF TAR SANDS AND HEAVY OIL RESOURCES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, on April 24 I posed a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). I asked if he had taken into consideration the cost to the Canadian economy of a minimum of a one-year delay in the Alsands project in northeastern Alberta. He replied that he was not causing the delay and had not taken it into consideration. He indicated that this was Alberta's delay. Because Alberta had given the approval, he said, it was up to Alberta to take action.

I take exception to this, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is a total misrepresentation of what actually happened during the negotiations.

Mr. Menzel, chairman of the Alsands project, announced the cancellation of a $50 million Winter Works program for this year. He also indicated that they were prepared to cancel the 1981 budget allocated for next year and that by January 1, 1981, they would be ready to shelve the program if the sunset clause comes into effect, and partners in the Alsands consortium withdraw. If any of them pull out, the project will be cancelled. He gives the reason as the lack of an oil pricing agreement.

That does not mean that one province is holding it up, Mr. Speaker. It means that this government cannot make an agreement with Alberta. First, the government said that the price would be set unilaterally at $32 per barrel. The Alsands consortium, the Shell Oil group, said to the government, "Give us the world price. Tax us at the top. We cannot gamble $8 billion and put it in a hole in the ground, not knowing that we will get a return."

What kind of return are they asking for? The same, Mr. Speaker, as you would get if you invested in an apartment building anywhere in Canada or if you invested in a high office tower. That is the kind of return they are asking for.

The mechanism is in place for the federal government to impose a tax on excess profits and it has always been there. But the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources went to Alberta last week, in a big show and offered $38 per barrel. The companies asked for world price, saying, "We are sinking $8 billion into the ground in northeastern Alberta to help with our energy supply."

A delay of one year would add $1 billion to the cost of the project, which is presently set at $7 billion. Officials of Imperial Oil told a House of Commons standing committee last week that the government's failure to reach a settlement on an oil pricing agreement meant they were ready to pull the plug on their project. That means $14 billion, which is ready and waiting to be invested in the future of our country.

As a result of the delay, inflation alone will add $1 billion to $1.2 billion to the cost of both plants. When one plant goes on stream in 1985-86 it will produce 130,000 barrels of oil per day and the other one will produce 140,000 barrels. The cost of 200,000 barrels of imported crude per day for a year, at today's price of $38 per barrel—assuming that is still the price in 1985-86—would be $2.8 billion. This is money going right out of the country to Venezuela, Mexico, Iraq and Iran. Canada's reserves from conventional crude are declining. This whole mess is moving beyond an economic situation. It is clearly a matter of our survival. It is not going to matter much what the price of oil offshore will be if we cannot buy it because it is not available. We have seen what can happen in the Middle East. We know what can happen with an unstable supply that can be cut off, and in a matter of six months we could go begging for oil.

Until the Alsands plant receives the green light, orders from Ontario for iron and steel will be sitting waiting to be placed, orders for metal fabrication will be sitting waiting to be placed and transportation equipment will be sitting waiting to be placed strictly on the go-ahead of this one plant, Alsands. This means an injection into the Ontario economy of $6.2 billion over the life of the project. That is a five-year injection, and that is one plant alone. For two plants one can double the figures.

There must be a fog prevailing on the government side of the House. It goes beyond normal bounds of reason that ministers opposite cannot sit down and work out an agreement to get those two megaprojects off the ground, particularly when our supply of energy is so crucial. In 1985 and in 1986 oil will be imported. Alberta and the producing provinces will not be able to meet the demand of Ontario, let alone of Quebec and the maritimes.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the government's commitment to the Alsands oil sands project and Imperial Oil's heavy oil project is clearly evidenced by the recent proposal of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) for an incentive for oil sands production of $38 a barrel for 1981. This incentive price would be escalated annually by the consumer price index, with the provision that it not exceed the international oil price. This will provide the industry with both an attractive return and a new certainty in the further development of non-conventional oil projects. Our impression is that this approach will be welcomed by the industry. In fact, what we have offered appears to be what one of the potential participants seeks. This proposal is moreover in keeping with the government's promise to provide a new Canadian blended price which incorporates the cost of non-conventional and enhanced recovery methods of production.

The Alberta government, on the other hand, has not accepted this proposal and hence has caused the delay in the approval of these important projects. The federal proposals which were placed before the Alberta government were based upon the commitments which we, in this government, have given to the Canadian people. We are determined to achieve a resolution of oil pricing and revenue sharing in a manner consistent with those commitments and with our energy principles.

The government's promise to provide a fair price for Canada's energy was implicit in our announced intention to invoke the force majeure clause which revoked the agreement that international prices would automatically apply for oil sands and heavy oil development. When the original agreement was signed, international prices for oil were under $13 a barrel, not $38 a barrel, which is nearly a threefold increase. Much of this increase occurred over the last year due to the vagaries of the international marketplace. Canadians should not have to pay OPEC-related prices for Canadian oil.

● (2225)

I see that the hon. member who asked the question has left the chamber. It is evident that I have deflated him and refuted his argument. I will conclude by saying that the fundamental issue of oil pricing is whether prices will be set at levels which are fair and reflect supply conditions in Canada. Although oil sands projects will no longer be tied to international prices, they will be able to proceed with confidence on the basis of a price regime much more favourable than that applying to the traditional oil fields of western Canada. This intention is in full recognition of the fact that oil sands production is more costly than production from southern Alberta oil fields and therefore requires a more favourable price schedule.

The proposal which the federal government has made to Alberta represents what is a reasonable resolution of the issues which divide us. It is a generous but balanced package, which guarantees large and growing returns to the producing provinces, but is also consistent with federal energy policy. It is Alberta which has delayed and keeps the Alsands and the heavy oil projects from proceeding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

CROSS-COUNTRY MARATHON OF TERRY FOX

STRIKING OF STAMP IN COMMEMORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Terry Fox, through his "Marathon of Hope", has joined the ranks of our oustanding Canadian heroes in the fight against cancer. To those people suffering from this dreaded disease in Canada and all over the world, it is Terry Fox who has given them hope through his courage and determination. Most of us have lost someone dear to cancer, just as I lost my dad. Terry Fox has given special pride to Canadians and has touched the hearts of us all.

In recognition of Terry Fox and the "Marathon of Hope" in the fight against cancer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House extend to Terry Fox hearty congratulations and thanks on behalf of all Canadians, and furthermore, that the government strike a suitable stamp to commemorate Terry Fox and the "Marathon of Hope".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

APPOINTMENT OF NEW MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Government of Canada has lacked a functioning Minister of the Environment for several months now as the nominal incumbent devotes all his time to constitutional matters, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to appoint a new Minister of the Environment who can be counted on to deal full time with Canada's serious environmental problems, such as acid rain.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

FULL-SCALE INQUIRY INTO REASON FOR POOR SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the authority of Standing Order 43. Whereas the people of Alberta are completely disgusted with the way the Canada Post Office is operating, if indeed it can be called an operation; whereas people are paying dearly for damaged parcels and lost letters totalling thousands of dollars; whereas it takes days, from nine to 17 days, for a letter to go from Edmonton to Strathmore, with most of that time being consumed in the Calgary regional post office, and 21 days for a letter to go from Humboldt, Saskatchewan to Strathmore, Alberta—it only takes eight hours to drive this distance; whereas large companies are completely disgusted with the postal service and are using alternative methods of mail delivery, which hurts the smaller post offices which are doing a good job locally and denies the Post Office badly needed revenue; and whereas the postal service is now viewed by many Canadians as an inept, bungling department of national disgrace; therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Kushner):

That the House of Commons urge the government to conduct a full scale inquiry for the purpose of pinpointing the reasons for the poor postal service in Canada, ascertaining who or what is responsible for the damaged parcels and thefts, and recommending the changes necessary to restore to Canada reasonable postal service.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST THAT PRINCIPLE OF INDEXATION AND MATERNITY LEAVE BE PROVIDED TO TRANSLATORS AND INTERPRETERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the fact that the government has refused to negotiate in good faith with the translators and interpreters working for the federal public service by rejecting the recommendations of the conciliation board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the House request the government to accept as soon as possible the recommendations of the conciliation board, including the principles of indexation and maternity leave.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES ON CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because of its excess borrowing the Government of Canada is now paying 11.5 per cent on 90-day treasury bills and in excess of 12.25 per cent on 180-day treasury bills. The government's excess demand for money will continue to push interest rates in Canada higher and higher. The government has pegged the Canada Savings Bonds rate this year at 10.5 per cent.

In view of the fact Canada Savings Bonds are sold as having a good rate of return, as being an investment in Canada, and marketed as top quality securities to the ordinary people of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That this House do direct the Minister of Finance to pay to those holding Canada Savings Bonds an interest rate at least equal to the 90-day treasury rate paid to the big boys in the marketplace.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

DELISTING OF GOVERNMENT ELEVATORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact the Canadian government inland elevator at Moose Jaw has been delisted as a delivery point for rapeseed futures contracts; in view of the fact that this delisting would indicate an intention on the part of the government to shut down the facilities if the elevator is not sold, despite the fact the elevator has been operating at a profit; and in view of the fact that a shutdown of the facilities would affect approximately 50 employees and their families, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the Minister of Agriculture seriously consider relisting the elevator as a delivery point for rapeseed futures contracts and spending the necessary funds to rehabilitate the electrical system, in order that the elevator may continue to play an important part in the grain handling system in western Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PLIGHT OF UNEMPLOYED CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the lay-offs of working men and women at a rate of 1,000 per day makes a mockery of the fundamental principle that labour is not a commodity, and whereas the basic economic rights, living standards and futures of hundreds of thousands of Canadians are threatened by runaway employers and government neglect, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this government be condemned for its indifference to the plight of Canada's unemployed, for economic and social policies that promote unemployment and offer no protection to those laid off, and for failing to promote policies of full employment, decent pensions and employer obligation to Canada's employees.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

PLEA BY PREMIER OF MANITOBA FOR VIGOROUS FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas an eminent Canadian, the Honourable Sterling Lyon, the Premier of Manitoba, last evening appeared on a CBC public affairs program, "The Watson Report", and whereas notwithstanding the barrage of questions this same Canadian was able to plead eloquently for a strong federal government, endowed with the necessary tools to deal with unemployment and inflation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail):

That this House applauds the Honourable Sterling Lyon, Premier of Manitoba, for his tardy but welcome endorsement for a vigorous federal government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1415)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this is a matter which, of course, allows debate in the House of Commons under Standing Order 43. While I would not want to delay unduly the proceedings of the House, I think I can say with absolute confidence and certainty, knowing the views of the Premier of Manitoba and sharing his confidence, that the Premier of Manitoba would not only want the Government of Canada to have the tools to deal with unemployment and inflation; he would want, as we on this side of the House of Commons want, this government to begin to use those tools to deal with inflation and to deal with unemployment in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Indeed, Madam Speaker, we are convinced that the Premier of Manitoba, like the great majority of Canadians, is shocked and chagrined that to this point, some seven months into their mandate, the Government of Canada has not yet even introduced a budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member is right, this motion is debatable, but I am afraid that, in accordance with our Standing Orders, I must interrupt the debate at 2.15 for oral questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PUBLIC SERVICE

CR CLERKS DISPUTE—ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question will be to the Prime Minister and it touches on the strike activity that is now rampant in the country, with airports closed down, some reopening, and the Post Office disrupted. I note that the Public Service Alliance of Canada has asked that their workers designated essential to the safety and security of the country to return to work to perform the full scope of their duties. Would the Prime Minister indicate whether, with this welcome news as it is, any assurance was given to the Public Service Alliance of Canada that there would be no repercussions with respect to those that have acted illegally so far as a result of the various strike activities which have been taking place?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the answer with respect to the current negotiations, as I understand it, is that the matter is presently under discussion. No such assurance has been given.

INQUIRY WHETHER DISCIPLINARY ACTION TAKEN AGAINST FIREFIGHTERS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): I am sorry to hear that something as significant as that is still being left as a matter of discussion, Madam Speaker. Let me direct my next question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that eight firefighters at Malton and two or three firefighters at certain other airports have been able to shut down their respective airports, and in view of the fact that on September 30 the President of the Treasury Board indicated that departments had been instructed to take firm and consistent disciplinary action in the case of any employees engaging in illegal strike activity, would the Minister of Transport indicate what disciplinary action his department has taken against these firefighters who now claim they were only on a two-day coffee break?

● (1420)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we have taken this disciplinary action. We have tried to take a moderate approach so as not to aggravate the situation unnecessarily, but it has not been very fruitful. I am the first one to recognize that fact. The difficulty, as my friend knows from previous experience, is due to the number of issues at hand. When it is not reclassification, it is higher wages; and when it is not higher wages, it is a greater number of controllers and so on.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are negotiating with your feet.

Mr. Pepin: We have taken disciplinary action and we will continue to do so. If we have to do more than what we have done, then we will do that also.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, would the Minister of Transport indicate specifically, though, what action he has taken?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, obviously, we deprive the controllers of their pay for the day on which they leave their jobs. We penalize them by imposing another day of suspension, we add a letter of reprimand to their file and that sort of thing. If they repeat the offence we escalate the combination.

Mr. Crosbie: You will take away their coffee.

Mr. Pepin: If they repeat the action the suspension goes from one day to three days. That is the normal practice.

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO PROTECT NATIONAL INTEREST

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. This morning a judge of the Federal Court described the situation by saying: "The existing situation is perilously close to anarchy".

There have been outbreaks of violence on the picket lines this morning both in St. John's, Newfoundland and in Ottawa. There are indications that the situation is growing more militant every day. My question to the Prime Minister—and I pose it in the aftermath of the bungling of the President of the Treasury Board—is: What steps is he taking on behalf of the government to protect the national interest and to ensure that Canadians have access to essential services?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as the Deputy Prime Minister just answered a moment ago, the negotiations are presently going on and I would not want to intervene in them.

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO DELIVER PENSION CHEQUES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question in light of a statement made by the President of the Treasury Board in which he indicated that departments have been asked to prepare their own plans to ensure the maintenance of the highest level of service to the public. Given the chance that there will be a disruption in postal services, and there is already an indication that this is happening across the country, what steps is she taking presently or what contingency plan does she have to ensure that essential social service payments will get to the recipients in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to assure all Canadians that so far we have every reason to believe that they will receive their cheques on time at home. Several families will receive their family allowances cheques about one week before the usual date which is in the third week of the month. The usual date is between the 18 and 21 of each month. The cheques for the Canada Pension Plan have almost been completely written. The cheques for the old age security pension as well as most adjustments are also under control. The mechanism for the delivery of the cheques is the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services; to date we have no reason to alarm Canadians, and I think that as usual we shall have the co-operation of all people concerned.

[English]

CONTINGENCY PLANS FOR DELIVERY OF UIC CHEQUES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I pose a similar question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who is responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In light of the present situation and the potential it has for disruption of mail services, what contingency plans has the minister taken to ensure that unemployment insurance cheques will be sent out to their recipients?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in most parts of the country there is a complete and continuing operation of the unemployment insurance program. There are some regions, however, where there have been disruptions in service which were primarily due to the absence of clerks who were designated to stay on and perform their duties. We certainly believe that the measures taken by the government will have a corrective influence on that situation. We hope to maintain as much of the service as possible, so long as those people who are supposed to work do their work.

HEALTH CARE

HALL REPORT—RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING EXTRA BILLING BY DOCTORS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Former Justice Hall has rightly observed in the recently released "Health Services Review" that extra billing by doctors, if allowed to continue, will eventually destroy medicare and result in a two tier-system of health care in Canada.

Can the minister tell the House at this time when she intends to bring in legislation outlawing extra billing by doctors by revising the Medical Care Act to provide that extra billing by physicians inhibits reasonable access to services and is contrary to the intent and purpose of the Medical Care Act?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am tabling the Hall report later today in the House; it was made public a month ago. Since that time we have had the federal-provincial meeting of health ministers at which I confirmed, and I would like to repeat it today, that I will explore that recommendation made by Mr. Justice Hall to the federal government. However, that recommendation includes also the concept of binding arbitration. Would the New Democratic Party make it clear if they are ready to accept, and is the government of Saskatchewan, for instance, ready to accept, binding arbitration as well as the ban on extra billing? That is only one of the problems with which we are faced today.

The purpose and objective that has always been ours is the strengthening of the medicare system of Canada for all Canadians. Right now I have chosen the route of consultation with all interested parties, because it is surely essential if we want to put together the very conflicting interests of the key health professionals as well as the provincial governments, who on that subject have totally diverse opinions.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, may I say that I am not here as a spokesman for the government of Saskatchewan, but I can say that I know that province is interested in the outlawing of extra billing.

The minister says that she wants to consult more. For a government obsessed with timetables, the timetable for saving medicare seems to be pretty loose. Can the minister say why she is breaking her campaign promises to the Canadian people by not acting swiftly to stem the erosion of medicare now that she has the Hall report to support her?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, the report was made public upon its receipt on September 3. I immediately invited my counterparts to a meeting on the September 15 and 16. They thought that was too fast and the meeting finally took place at their request on September 29, I think it was, in Winnipeg. That was a week ago Monday. The ten provinces told me that they reject binding arbitration.

The morning after, I received the Canadian Medical Association for a long meeting, the first of a series of meetings. They reject extra billing. So the two parties are in total opposition. If the hon. member read the Hall report in depth he will know that it is very well said that the two must go together, that there is, on the one hand, a mechanism to make sure that the doctors get fair process of negotiation and, at the same time, that Canadians will not see their medicare system eroded by breach of the agreement, namely extra billing.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is to ask the minister again when she is going to start some initiative by the federal government and when she is going to take the responsibility that is rightly hers for the health care system in Canada and stop being intimidated by the medical associations in the provinces. When is she going to take some action and live up to some of the promises that she has been so accustomed to making over the last few years?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, it may well be that there are players in the medicare system who want to feed and nurture a confrontation between the parties. For a few months now we have been repeating and repeating that sooner or later the parties must come together and settle it. Mr. Hall himself said very clearly—and we are left with that dilemma and all members of the House have to take a stand on that—that, for example, the interruption of block funding by withholding the monthly payment—in other words, by applying the act the way it was passed by this Parliament—is disruptive to services. On the other hand, he also recommends that provinces ban extra billing and adopt binding arbitration as the mechanism to give fair process to the doctors and to us to amend the Medical Care Act. I cannot change our act and impose binding arbitration if the ten provinces reject it. We will have other consultations in order to come to an agreement. My next meeting of ministers is in February.

INQUIRY WHETHER ALTERNATIVE TO COMPULSORY ARBITRATION OFFERED

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which concerns the same matter. The report from Mr. Justice Hall indicated that there ought to be compulsory arbitration. My understanding is that the minister has publicly rejected that as a recommendation. It seems to me that she has a responsibility to put something in its place. What has she offered?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am very pleased, Madam Speaker, to have an opportunity to correct the statement made by my colleague. At the Winnipeg conference, in a very short statement at the end of the meeting to my counterparts as well as to the press, I said that I had accepted that recommendation of Mr. Justice Hall; that I would explore the timing and the way it could be done; that I would not implement it unless full consultations had taken place with all interested parties. I still have to see representatives of the nurses of Canada, of the hospital administrators, of the coalition for health, etc.

I would not propose an amendment, because I am not in a position to do so, including the addition of the words "binding arbitration". The objective described by Mr. Justice Hall, namely that there would be a mechanism giving fair process of negotiations to the doctors, would be used instead of the words "binding arbitration".

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I had assumed that the minister had rejected compulsory arbitration. She now seems to be not saying that. Would the minister confirm to the House whether or not she accepts or rejects the principle of compulsory arbitration for professional medical fees, as outlined in the recommendation of Emmett Hall?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I wish I could find the exact words of the recommendation, which sets out what we should be doing. Mr. Justice Hall recommends to the federal government an amendment to the Medical Care Act in order to ban extra billing. Mr. Justice Hall recommends the provinces ban extra billing and provide for binding arbitration. Who are we to impose on the provinces who will be bound by binding arbitration?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Just like the constitution.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

HUMANITARIAN AID GIVEN TO PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION BY QUEBEC

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the Quebec government has decided to give humanitarian aid to the Palestine Liberation Organization, according to recent press reports, and in view of the fact that aid from a provincial government to one of the antagonists in the mid-East conflict could be construed as support for one side over the other, thereby prejudicing the international position of the Canadian government, will the acting minister advise the Secretary of State for External Affairs to conduct an investigation into this matter and, if necessary, to stop this aid or have the federal government see that both sides receive equal amounts of assistance?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the federal government is not aware that the government of Quebec has committed itself to provide humanitarian aid to the Palestine Liberation Organization. But we are going to check those facts. However, I can tell the House that the federal government does not intend to provide any humanitarian aid to the PLO. Our humanitarian assistance to the people of Palestine is transferred through the Relief and Works Agency of the United Nations for Palestine Refugees, an agency to which Canada is one of the main contributors. Madam Speaker, our contribution to that agency was roughly $5 million last year and it will amount to $5.7 million for the current year.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO HOW GOVERNMENT WILL RECOVER COST OF OIL IMPORTS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On August 1 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is going to share budget night, we understand, with the Minister of Finance—there is going to be a joint presentation, the "Mutt and Jeff show"—

Mr. Malone: The "Marc and Allan show".

Mr. Crosbie: —said this: "At the retail level, we believe it is only fair that consumers bear the costs now borne by the taxpayer to subsidize imported oil while we are still importing oil." Since the cost of that subsidy this year is about $4 billion, and since the cost of gasoline since March 1—since this government took office—has risen 15 cents a gallon—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I do not know what that is in litres, but it is quite a bit even in litres—will the Minister of Finance tell us how the government proposes to pass on this $4 billion cost to the Canadian consumer, and how many cents a gallon or a litre will that come to for the Canadian consumer when it is passed on this year as this principle of the minister of energy is carried out?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that we do have in place an oil import compensation program that has the effect of assisting consumers of imported oil. When that program is changed it will be announced in the House and the hon. member will be assisted by all of us in reaching whatever calculations he requires at that time.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I just gave the quotation where the policy was changed on August 1 by the minister in this very detailed statement. It is just the mere details we do not know yet, namely, how the $4 billion is going to be collected from the public.

The Prime Minister on January 12, in Toronto, before he was Prime Minister—in his interlude—said that he was going to make the tax system more equitable. In order to make it more equitable, will the minister explain to the House how he is going to pass on this $4 billion to the consumer? Will it be by deindexing the personal income tax, or by a tax at the refinery gate level that will increase the price of gasoline, transportation fuels, heating fuels, petrochemical products, and all the rest of the products made from oil, or will he eliminate the sales tax and put it up another 3 per cent and reverse what happened in November, 1978? How is he going to carry out this equitable tax principle of the Prime Minister's and pass on this $4 billion?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am a bit surprised at the series of questions which the hon. member is asking this afternoon; whether we intend to deindex; whether we intend to have a refinery tax; whether we intend to increase the sales tax.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Surprise us with an answer.

Mr. MacEachen: I just ask him to wait and he will find out the answers in one shot before the end of the month.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Some shot!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SURVEY RESPECTING RESULTS FROM FAILURE TO REACH OIL PRICING AGREEMENT AND THREATENED IMPOSITION OF TAXES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, the question is: Will we survive the shot?

I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. According to a survey by the Canadian Association of Oil Drilling Contractors, the failure of this government to reach an oil pricing agreement and the continuing threats to impose gas export and other taxes have led Canadian oil companies to reduce their planned exploration budgets for next year by about one-third, or $2 billion, and to divert this money to the U.S. Is the minister aware of this situation; is he concerned about it; has he expressed his concern to his cabinet colleagues; has he planned some action, or is he prepared to believe the propaganda in his energy advertising that the energy future is secure regardless of government action or inaction?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I was reading very recently a submission by Dome Petroleum to a board of investigation in British Columbia which indicated that in spite of the fact there was no agreement on pricing this year, drilling in western Canada has increased by between 15 and 19 per cent over the year when the Tories were in office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I look at what has happened in the course of this current year and I am confident that when our decisions are announced, companies in the oil and gas field in Canada, particularly Canadian companies, will be very happy with what we are going to produce.

● (1440)

Mr. Andre: I gather that means you are not aware of what is happening. My supplementary deals with the government's proposed gas export tax which, in addition to being discriminatory, represents in the case of British Columbia a direct tax on the B.C. treasury and, in the case of Alberta, a tax on the industry which will drive many junior Canadian gas producers, if not into bankruptcy, at least into forced sales.

Is the minister concerned about the consequences of this proposed export tax? Has he expressed his concerns to his colleague the Minister of Finance, who is preparing this shot for Canada, or has he simply adopted the view that his main responsibility is energy revenues, and the health of the industry and future exploration is not something he really has to be concerned about?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I want to reassure the hon. member that the Minister of Finance is only thinking of introducing fair taxes. This is the view of this government as well.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

MASSEY-FERGUSON—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL ASSIST IN REFINANCING

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister indicated in his statement on October 3 that it is his government's view that, given an adequate refinancing plan, Massey-Ferguson will continue to play a strong role in the farm implement sector of the Canadian economy. Is the minister prepared, should the private sector fail to refinance Massey-Ferguson, to participate in an equity program with the government, the employees and the dealers buying shares and holding positions on the Massey-Ferguson board of directors recently vacated by Argus Corporation, to ensure that jobs and Canadian productivity are given highest priority?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we will be working actively with Massey and the Bank of Commerce to assist them to put together an adequate refinancing plan to achieve the kinds of objectives which the hon. member stated and which are, as he confirmed, very much those of this government. I do not think it would be helpful in reaching that objective to speculate at this time on what the final package may be and what the resulting role of the government may turn out to be.

Mr. Blackburn: My supplementary is to the same minister. I hope the minister appreciates the urgency of this in view of the fact that some of Massey's very heavy debt load comes due on a short-term basis at the end of October. Can the minister assure this House that adequate guarantees have been obtained from the creditors and suppliers of Massey-Ferguson Limited so that the loans coming due at the end of this month will not cause the company to go bankrupt before a refinancing plan can be put in place?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, in my statement of October 3 I said that in the circumstances outlined in that statement the government expects the companies, lenders and suppliers to maintain their existing arrangements with the company to allow time for the Bank of Commerce and the company to put a refinancing plan in place. I have no information as yet that the lenders and suppliers will not be responding positively to this statement.

ENERGY

NATIONAL GAS EXPORTS FROM B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO POSITION OF LIBERAL PARTY

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the House, and in particular his own party colleagues, just exactly what the promise was to British Columbians during the last election with respect to Liberal policies on the imposition of a tax on the export of natural gas from British Columbia.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I made no promise in that regard. I understand that yesterday the hon. member quoted some statement made by one of our candidates. I am not aware of that, but I am looking into it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: I hope Madam Speaker will excuse me if I point out that the candidate was formerly a member of the Prime Minister's staff, three times a Liberal candidate in B.C., and leader of the Liberal party in the legislative assembly. His name is Gordon Gibson. He put this in writing, and—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member ask his question. I do not think that is actually a question.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, the truth is sometimes hard to get at around here; it takes a few words. Mr. Gibson said this in writing on February 13—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I ask the hon. member to co-operate by going immediately to the question and not quoting. I do not think that is necessary. The statement is probably known by the Prime Minister and he can answer. Will the hon. member now ask his question?

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, keeping in mind your admonition, which could be a matter of some debate later—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the Prime Minister this. Does the Prime Minister consider himself bound by solemn commitments made by Gordon Gibson as the leading Liberal candidate to the effect that there would be no tax on the export of natural gas from British Columbia, that that was the policy of the Liberal party and the policy of the energy critic, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, as expressed in writing in a newspaper in the province of British Columbia? It is no use looking to the energy minister because he will not answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member and perhaps his party will be interested to know that at the beginning of the last election campaign we put together a platform committee composed of 20 members appointed by caucus, 20 members appointed by the federation from among members of the party and people across the land. This platform was put together and approved by the Deputy Prime Minister and by myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I thought perhaps the opposition could learn how to put a program together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The point, Madam Speaker, is that we put this platform together, we published it and made it public. The item referred to by the hon. member was not in that platform. It is true that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Listen and learn.

Mr. Trudeau: That's right. I cannot say it; I hope you heard it.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is really going on too long. I would ask hon. members to please stop shouting so that this question can be dealt with efficiently.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is a politician. He knows that in an election campaign many people who stand for election undertake to make their best efforts to obtain certain things if they are elected. I cannot, nor could any party leader, monitor the statements.

Mr. Fraser: Give an answer.

Mr. Trudeau: If the loudmouth would please be quiet, Madam Speaker, then I might be able to give him the answer that he is asking for.

REFINANCING OF MASSEY-FERGUSON—COMPARISON WITH CHRYSLER CORPORATION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is further to that asked by the hon. member for Brant in connection with Massey-Ferguson and is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister is being a somewhat reluctant bridegroom in his pursuit of the negotiations with Massey-Ferguson. He is much more aggressive in the negotiations with Chrysler Corporation. Will the minister inform the House in what way Massey-Ferguson is different from Chrysler Corporation, apart from the fact that many workers of Chrysler Corporation live in the ridings of Windsor where there are three Liberal ministers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, there is a great similarity between the Massey and Chrysler cases. With regard to the Chrysler case, there were some eight months of negotiations before a final decision was arrived at. If I am not mistaken, discussions with the previous Conservative government began in August, 1979, and there had not been a conclusion at the time the government changed. This went on for some months further before a decision was reached which was in the best interests of the employees of the company, the suppliers, the dealers and the Canadian economy as a whole. I think I am following a sound precedent in making sure that in working on this matter we do come up with the best solution for the company, its workers, suppliers and dealers, and the economy as a whole. I hope my hon. friend will not disagree with that.

● (1450)

Mr. Wilson: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. In view of the reluctance the government has shown in providing any support to Massey-Ferguson because that support might be perceived as being support for or a bail-out of the Argus Corporation, what impact on the negotiations has there been as the result of the donation of Argus's shares in Massey-Ferguson to the Massey-Ferguson pension fund?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we pointed out in the statement I issued on behalf of the government on October 3 that we have decided to work closely with Massey, the Bank of Commerce and other interested principals in order to assist them in putting together an adequate plan for the refinancing of the company. We had been pressing the company, the banker and other principals to come forward with an adequate refinancing plan, and when they failed to agree among themselves on the details of such a plan we decided to take this further initiative in the interests of the workers, the company itself, the dealers and the many farmers across the country with Massey equipment, in a way which would respect and bear in mind the best interests of Canadian taxpayers and the economy as a whole.

In this instance our position is no less forthcoming than that of the government of Ontario, which has certainly been no more ready to provide immediate assistance than the federal government. I notice that my hon. friend has not said a word about that.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY REGARDING AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and it relates to recent developments involving two of our major newspaper chains.

Given that the present director of the combines investigation branch feels that present legislation provides "periodic licence to engage in illegalities", which certainly identifies the lack of teeth in that legislation, given the fact that the legislation is very weak regarding advance notice of transactions and, of course, weak in providing any encouragement for the Attorney General to take action, and given the fact that it takes up to four years for an investigation and three years for a prosecution, will the minister tell this House when he plans to bring the former bill C-13 to counteract this, and why has he not brought it in before this date?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, obviously, an inquiry being under way, it becomes difficult to make any observations on the matter brought up by the hon. member.

On the other hand, the question of the hon. member allows me to confirm to the House the intention of the government to table, in the near future, the amendments to the competition legislation in order to strengthen the section dealing with mergers. I trust that, when this bill comes up for study in the House, I shall get the support not only of the hon. member who put the question to me, but as well that of all other hon. members.

[English]

Mr. Riis: My supplementary question, Madam Speaker, refers to the action or, perhaps, inaction on the part of the minister some weeks back when he failed to initiate an inquiry. I should like to ask why he gave the Canadian people the impression that he was initiating an inquiry when in fact it was the result of the efforts of six individuals?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I deny the allegations of the hon. member. Quite the opposite is true: immediately after the merger was annouced, I asked my officials to make a preliminary study to determine whether in fact a formal inquiry was warranted. As we know, the law provides various ways of setting up a formal inquiry. At the time when those officials were in the process of formulating their recommendations with regard to holding a formal inquiry, a number of consumers requested one, which was set up immediately under the act.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES ON ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the present trend toward higher interest rates and the disastrous effects they have on the fragile economies of the Atlantic provinces, with which the minister is familiar, is the minister going to be taking any measures to either hold the line on interest rates or cushion their effects on the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have under consideration at the present time a number of possible options that might be used not only in the Atlantic provinces but elsewhere, but I am not sure at this stage what the final decision will be.

Mr. Howie: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for his answer and ask whether he will implement the December last budget proposals to stimulate the shipbuilding industry, to provide tax incentives for regional development, and possibly help lower income families through an energy tax credit system?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has mentioned the shipbuilding industry and probably has reference to a proposal that had been made by a former minister in respect of Atlantic fishing vessels. I found that proposal to have certain flaws in it, but it is still under consideration.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS DO NOT ADDRESS RESOURCE SHARING

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. There have been some foolish suggestions by some provincial politicians that the constitutional package being proposed by our government has all kinds of hidden powers which will do the provinces in. The Leader of the Opposition last night clearly went as far as to suggest that the "bogey man" was hidden there.

An hon. Member: Make your speech later.

Mr. Tobin: For the public record, Madam Speaker, will the Minister of Justice assure this House that the constitutional package proposed by this government does not address itself to the question of offshore resource jurisdiction, or the question of resource sharing?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that we were very careful in drafting that document not to begin to change the balance of powers between federal and provincial governments. That is why we are not making changes in terms of resources or anything at this moment. We wanted to avoid completely touching the sharing of powers. We wanted to patriate the constitution and provide a bill of rights for Canadians so all Canadians will have their rights protected forever in the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL RENOUNCE PLAN TO IMPOSE TAX ON EXPORTS OF NATURAL GAS OR HYDROELECTRIC POWER FROM B.C.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in light of the remarkable statement just made by the Minister of Justice, which absolutely contradicts something he said on the weekend relative to the imposition of a natural gas export tax, and in view of the government's implied plans to plunder western provinces by levying a discriminatory export tax on natural gas, a measure which is equivalent to imposing a supplementary income tax of $500 on every resident of British Columbia, and recognizing that thousands of British Columbians are declaring their absolute rejection of an excise tax on natural gas and hydroelectric power throughout B.C., will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicate whether the government will now honour its election commitment quoted by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver South, and promise to the people of British Columbia, as promised last February as well, that it will renounce any plan to impose a federal excise tax on the export of natural gas or hydroelectric power from British Columbia?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member can avoid dying of apoplexy between now and the budget I think he will have his answer, but we will have to wait and see.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, this is not a matter of dying of apoplexy; it is a matter involving the death of this country, which is what is at stake.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Siddon: I would suggest that if that proposal to impose an export tax was contained—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question, please.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister why he does not show courage here and now by admitting to the people of western Canada at this time that the government intends to proceed with an export tax on natural gas? Admit it!

HEALTH CARE

REQUEST THAT HALL REPORT BE REFERRED TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. We on this side certainly agree about the importance of the report presented by Mr. Justice Hall, and we have observed the apparent difficulty in its utilization. The minister has shown us her uncertainty about what course to follow.

An hon. Member: Let's have your question.

Mr. Bradley: In view of the importance of proper, affordable medical care for Canadians and a just return for physicians, will the minister refer the Hall report to committee so that Justice Hall and other witnesses may be examined and we can assist in developing a method of solving this difficulty?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I find the idea interesting. However, the hon. member should remember that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of the House of Commons has a very heavy workload. In particular, there are several subcommittees set up right now. I will, however, explore that and look at it as a mechanism which may help strengthen medicare.

The hon. member says that I am not sure, or some such expression. He said I did not know what I was saying. I would like to call his attention to page 28 of the report where very precisely Justice Hall tells us the following:

Nor is it within the constitutional authority of the federal government to legislate the way in which a province and the physicians... enter into an agreement.

He goes on very clearly to say that it is none of my darned business to reject binding arbitration, but it is up to the provinces to do so; so I hope the hon. member will correct his way of speaking on the issue of medicare and recognize that we know where we stand. We want to save medicare.

Mr. Bradley: Madam Speaker, I am aware of the report and what it holds. I am wondering if, in pointing out that the workload of the committee is very heavy, the minister is aware, which I am sure she is, of the anxiety that Canadians are going through today in switching from family physicians they have had for many years in order to find physicians who have opted into medicare. I wonder if she is aware of the erosion of faith and trust in our physicians and our medical system today. I wonder if she is aware that we are forcing physicians—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question which is a supplementary question?

Mr. Bradley: In view of the fact that we are forcing physicians to take action they do not want to take, will the minister please review the committee's workload and ensure that there is a spot for consideration of the Hall report?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I think the time for action has come, and if the hon. member wants one more study, as I said earlier, I will look into that possibility, but when he appears as an angel and suddenly realizes that medicare is in some danger, he is saying and confirming what many people in different provinces of the country do not acknowledge. He is saying, "Yes, premiums have caused damages," as Justice Hall says; "Yes, extra billing was popping up here and there in the country; yes, some provinces were having new user fees or increasing their user fees". That is what we said a year and a half ago when nobody else was acknowledging it. We said that that was a problem.

Mr. Broadbent: Do something about it.

Miss Bégin: Justice Hall confirmed it. We are trying to solve that problem, and we will continue to do so until medicare is back to normal.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER SUFFICIENT SUPPLY OF HEATING FUEL THIS WINTER

Mr. Michel Veillette (Champlain): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the continuing situation in Iran and Iraq, could the minister assure the House that Canadians throughout the country will not experience a shortage of heating fuel this winter?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for this very important question. I would like to reassure Canadians that despite the current conflict in the Middle East, oil supplies are at such a level in Canada this year that we have every reason to believe there will not be any shortage of oil and heating fuel in particular during winter, contrary to the situation that occurred last fall when there was much worrying and the previous government had neglected to take appropriate action to prevent such a development.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. EPP—PROCEDURE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek clarification from the Chair in terms of how we are to conduct our business for the next few days.

Today the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) asked a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) regarding a clarification of the draft resolution which is on the order paper and which will be the order of business today. The Minister of Justice was given permission to answer that question. That question was directly related to the draft resolution before us, so I ask Your Honour whether that was a different question from questions which can be asked relating to constitutional renewal. The question was very specific as it related to the motion which is before this House at this time and which will be called in a few minutes. As I heard it, the question was not only specific but was also clearly meant to undermine the ability of the opposition to debate the issue. As the government is having difficulty in clarifying its position, the question period is being used for those specific clarifications. That should be done in debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: If clarifications are necessary, it is incumbent upon members of the cabinet to rise in debate and to give those clarifications and not to use the question period, unless the rules pertaining to the question period and the orders have changed. If that is the case, I would like a clarification. If it is the case, then obviously we can ask questions during the question period on specifics regarding the draft resolution, and I suggest that the question period would become a shambles. In view of what has happened today in the House, I ask for clarification.

Madam Speaker: I shall take that point of order under consideration. It is true that questions in the question period should not relate to the order of the day. I do not know in advance what the question is going to be; therefore I just have to allow questions to be asked. It is not clear to me whether this point of order is justified at this point. I will have to go back and check the record. I shall do just that, and I thank the hon. member for raising the point.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Madam Speaker: I am not sure that I can entertain more discussion on this point. I did say that I would take it under advisement. Unless the hon. member wants to give me some supplementary information which I cannot get through reading Hansard, I think I have to tell the hon. member that I will not recognize him on this point of order.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, I just want to—

Mr. Nowlan: Come on. What kind of stable are we running here?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If I do not recognize the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) because I do not feel I need any supplementary information, naturally I do not think I would allow it either from the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin).

MR. CROMBIE—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to a response made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to a question from the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley). I think the minister inadvertently misled the House in her response, and I think this point is important for the purposes of the record. She referred to page 28 of the Hall report, and I will quote the sentence she quoted as follows:

> Nor is it within the constitutional authority of the federal government to legislate the way in which a province and the physicians practising within its boundaries enter into an agreement.

That is where the minister stopped, but she neglected to read the remainder of the paragraph which says, and I quote:

> However, the federal government does have a responsibility to set objectives which will reaffirm the national character of Canada's medical care program. The Medical Care Act—which is the minister's responsibility

—should be revised to provide:

> (1) That extra billing by physicians inhibits reasonable access to services and is contrary to the intent and purpose of the act.
> (2) That the provinces should develop a mechanism to ensure reasonable compensation to physicians.

To make sure the record is clear I merely suggest that that is a recommendation placed by Justice Hall as a responsibility of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. That is found at pages 28 and 29.

● (1510)

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): On this same point of order, Madam Speaker.

[English]

I would like simply to make it very clear that in the exchange this afternoon at different moments in the question period, members opposite asked me if I had a stand on binding arbitration, specifically if I would include the words "binding arbitration" in the Medical Care Act, and I answered them that that was not the recommendation of Mr. Justice Hall, that I would follow the objective of Mr. Justice Hall, which is a fair process of negotiation with the doctors. That is exactly what my predecessor has just read from pages 28 and 29, that the provinces should develop such a mechanism. I hope this is made very clear. That is what I said, that if we come to the conclusion that we are ready to implement that part of the report, it is not the words "binding arbitration" nor that specific technique that I, as the federal minister, can include, because it is not within the jurisdiction of the federal government to do so.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, this is on another point.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I will not entertain any further discussion on this particular point of order because it is quite obvious to me that this is simply a debate. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) feels that the answer the minister gave him during the question period was not complete. That is an opinion which he is allowed to hold. The minister tried to explain what she meant by the statement in the House of Commons. I think there will be other opportunities for clarification to be made of this matter which occurred during the question period, and therefore I will not allow further debate on this point of order.

MR. NIELSEN—TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, now that we have waited a day, I wonder if the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) will table the letter, about which I inquired yesterday, which he appears willing to do.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will do so at the appropriate time.

Madam Speaker: I did not hear what the minister said, but at the appropriate time I intend to advise the House that I have checked into the records and that indeed the minister was not quoting from a letter but was referring to a letter. I understand that when tabling of documents is called, the minister will have something to say about the point of order which had been raised yesterday by the hon. member.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I do not intend to pursue the matter today, but may I say that the question, as well as turning around the point of a quotation from a document—I believe it is under rule 327 of Beauchesne—also specifically refers to members who refer to a document, and when reference is made to a document it must be tabled. However, I will not pursue that point today since the minister has indicated that he is willing to table the document, and we look forward to that.

Madam Speaker: I think the hon. member forgot to mention the fact that when a member refers to a state document, an official document, it has to be tabled. However, this is a different kind of document. It is a private letter to the minister from a correspondent. Therefore, when a minister quotes from it, he is not necessarily obliged to table it. In yesterday's case, the minister referred to a letter which he had received from someone. As I said earlier, I think we will find a resolution to this problem later on during the course of government business.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, once again let me say that I do not intend to pursue this question of order at any length. However, I think that if you, Madam Speaker, consulted your advisers in more depth, you will find in all likelihood that any reference made to a document during a debate makes it become a public document, not a private document.

MR. STEVENS—QUESTION CONCERNING POSTAL SERVICE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I rise on a different point of order. During the question period, in view of the fact that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) was not in attendance, nor was the Acting Postmaster General, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), or the second acting minister, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), I wonder whether the Postmaster General, now that he is in the House, could indicate if he will be making a statement later today concerning the situation with respect to the close downs relating to certain operations of the Post Office in view of the fact that they seem to be clearly illegal and we have been given to understand that the government has a contingency plan to ensure that such services will not be disrupted.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, we have always had the courtesy, when a minister intends to make a statement, of giving prior notice to the opposition parties; as we have not given this notice today, we will not take up the time of the House.

Madam Speaker: Indeed the hon. minister had given me notice of her intention, so I know she wanted to table a document. That is why I repeated twice "tabling of documents". The minister must have been thinking of something else. Is there unanimous consent to revert to tabling of documents, so that the minister may table her document.

MR. ROBERT NELSON

Question No. 560—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the complete public service employment history of Mr. Robert Nelson presently with the Department of Employment and Immigration?

2. (a) Is he serving as acting manager of the Canada Employment Centre in Brockville, Ontario, in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville (b) did he have any experience at managing such an office in the past and, if not, for what reason was he appointed?

3. (a) Was there a board arranged for April 11 and 14, 1980, to interview applicants for the position of student summer replacement officer at the Brockville office (b) did Mr. Nelson refuse to hold an interview, in order to accommodate a student writing examinations during the period in question on the morning of the 15 and, if so, was such a refusal over-ruled by his superiors (c) for what reason did Mr. Nelson not use his own initiative in taking such action in the first place?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Mr. Nelson was hired as an industrial training consultant (PM-4) in 1973. He has served in Thunder Bay district, Ottawa district and Belleville district. He is currently at the PM-4 level.

2. (a) Yes.

(b) No. The reason he was appointed was career development as the incumbent is on extended sick leave, but, since Mr. Nelson is already at the level of the position and working in the same area, he is considered to be qualified.

3. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes. Mr. Nelson decided to interview the applicant after discussions with the director, employment and insurance, Belleville district.

(c) The delay in taking the initiative to interview the applicant was due to the acting manager's concern for operational requirements.

Question No. 1,032—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Robert Nelson acting manager of the Canada Manpower Centre in Brockville, Ontario, until May 30, 1980?

2. Did he at any time since the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville placed question No. 850 on the order paper call a meeting of all members of his office staff and did he read the question to the staff and, if so (a) for what reason (b) did he criticize the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville or make derogatory remarks about the member's right to question the operation of his office (i) at the meeting (ii) to certain employees after the meeting?

3. Was Mr. Nelson transferred from Brockville on May 30, 1980, at the close of business and, if so, what is his present position and location?

4. Was Mr. James Parsons appointed acting manager of the Canada Manpower Centre at Brockville and, if so, what are the details of his public service career?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

(a) The purpose of presenting question No. 850 to the Brockville CEC staff, raised by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, was to make them aware of external concerns regarding services being provided to clients.

(b) (i) No; (ii) No.

3. Mr. Nelson's career development assignment terminated May 30, 1980, as previously planned. His regular and present position is industrial training consultant in Belleville.

4. Yes. Mr. Parsons joined the UIC in 1965 as a claims officer in Belleville, Ontario, transferring to Oshawa in the same capacity in 1967. He returned to Belleville in 1970 where he held positions of: insurance officer, PM-1, regional claims and benefits officer, PM-2, and in May, 1974, he was appointed to the position of regional claims services officer, PM-3. During the period August, 1977, to January, 1978, Mr. Parsons acted as district manager, Pembroke, PM-4, and in March, 1980, he became a participant in the management assignment program.

FEDERAL SPACE REQUIREMENT REVIEW—EDMONTON

Question No. 1,280—Mr. Lambert:

1. (a) Was the space requirement review completed of the federal requirements in the city of Edmonton as instituted by the former administration late in 1979 and, if so, what was the conclusion of the review (b) in the event that there has been a positive answer to space requirements, is it the intention to resume negotiations at an early date with the city of Edmonton regarding the acquisition of land in the 97th Street area, south of 102nd Avenue?

2. (a) On what date is it anticipated that a firm decision will be made to go ahead with the establishment of a new federal centre in Edmonton in the location decided upon over two years ago (b) if there is a decision to proceed, on what date would it be anticipated that plans could be completed and that the project would actually be under way?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1. (a) The cost-benefit study of federal office accommodation requirements for Edmonton was completed in June of this year. Its principal conclusions were that the lowest cost accommodation alternative is the status quo, at least in the short-term (two to three years). In the long run, however, Crown ownership is the preferable alternative.

(b) The resumption of negotiations with the city of Edmonton to acquire a site in the 97th Street and 102nd Avenue vicinity is still an option available to the government at present. Should a decision be made in this direction, my officials would commence such negotiations as soon as the required departmental and Treasury Board approvals were obtained.

2. (a) At this time, no definite date has been established to proceed with development of a Government of Canada building in the aforementioned (southeast civic centre) location.

(b) If a decision is made to proceed with such a facility, it is established that planning, negotiations, approvals, and tendering would take approximately two years with construction under way after that time.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

Question No. 1,360—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. (a) What is the total amount anticipated to be paid during 1980 to annuitants who hold Canadian annuities (b) are such payments computerized?

2. (a) Has the annuities branch contemplated arranging with recipients' bank accounts for the direct transfer to the bank account without the necessity of processing a cheque (b) has a study been made in this regard?

3. What is the anticipated cost of postage for mailing annuity cheques to individual annuitants for 1980?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. (a) $95 million;

(b) Yes.

2. (a) No. Certain pilot studies have, however, been carried out by the Department of Supply and Services to evaluate the appropriateness of such a method of funds transfer for government payments generally. These studies have not advanced to the point at which government-wide policies or guidelines can be announced. Should such policies or guidelines be produced, the annuities program is only one of many similar payment programs which would be governed by them.

(b) See (2a) above.

3. Approximately 1.4 million cheques are sent to annuitants annually; at present postal rates, the expenditures are approximately $238,000.

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed, from Monday October 6, 1980, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than Decemer 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when 6 members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): At ten o'clock last night, when we adjourned the debate, I was questioning the judgment of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who says that the people who voted No in the referendum are disappointed by this resolution. I recognize that his ideas about the province of Quebec are as accurate today as they were at the time of the last federal election when he hoped to have 15 Progressive Conservative members elected in my province. On that same matter I also wish to give a warning to some provincial politicans who are making aggressive and passionate statements against that resolution. These laments, as they often are, stem from spurious, improvised and opportunistic nationalism and have already been translated into lost elections for those who try to have it both ways.

I say to those men and particularly those women who pretend that we are proceeding too fast with those changes that I question the sincerity of their argument. By reading between the lines you can see their frustration at not having been heard. I would go further and say that I am convinced that not only do we meet the expectations of those who voted No but that many Quebeckers who voted Yes only to break the constitutional yoke are satisfied with what we are doing.

Consequently if the threats of legal action do materialize, I urge the government not to change its approach at all and proceed diligently with the changes. Let us not be impressed by dilatory measures which are only aimed at gaining political advantages at our expense.

I now, Madam Speaker, go to the measure itself, to the main feature which seems to please everyone and which I would nearly call virtue and motherhood—the patriation of the constitution.

I believe the Leader of the Opposition as well as the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) agree with our move to patriate the constitution and feel the urgency to do so. I am convinced several of us would have liked to have seen that action taken a lot sooner. The determination of the government heartens us, and I believe we will all be able to proceed with that first part as soon as possible.

Many people worry about the amending formula. Certain offended virgins said we were taking something away from the provinces. We always have to remember that, in order to be flexible, this government allowed for a period of two years during which the provinces will be able to arrive at a unanimous agreement; that is, to stop the changes by unanimous agreement. Consequently, that two-year period will allow the provinces and the federal government to arrive at a new formula. On the other hand, we know that past experience has shown how difficult it is to come up with that famous amending formula, and that is why we provided a mechanism that might allow us to submit the formula to Canadians by way of a referendum.

I listened last night to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) when he talked about the tyranny of the majority. The tyranny of the majority might apply in the case of his election. But I must confess that I have faith in Canadians, and when he said he is afraid of the propaganda or this or that, I think he is using it himself as well as his party for their thing about deindexing. I think that might be positive, and we are not afraid to use that kind of propaganda. I think a referendum might be the thing to do. It is not a formula welcomed by anyone. Personally, I lived through a referendum, and I must admit I am not very enthused over the idea of a second one. I think that most people were not enthused over that procedure. On the other hand, you need a means, and I think a referendum still is the height of democracy in a country like ours.

Certain provincial politicians are very worried when they hear talk about the Victoria formula. I want to reassure the people of Quebec, because that formula provides Quebec with the right of veto. Consequently, we have nothing to fear from that formula, and I am convinced our interests will be well protected.

I now come to the charter of rights and feedoms. I believe that the Progressive Conservatives are somewhat divided on this point because yesterday one of them said that he was in favour of such a charter and his leader, as usual, did not quite know what attitude to take. The hon. member for Provencher was opposed, so finally we do not know exactly where they stand on this subject. One thing is certain however, and this is that we believe that individual rights must prevail. If the Progressive Conservatives cannot decide where they stand, it is too bad for them because we shall go ahead in any case.

I am thinking about basic freedoms, and especially the Official Languages Act. This has not been brought up very often in the House since the beginning of the debate, but for my part, I believe that it is very important for Francophones to feel represented by their federal government. To illustrate, I would like to give an example which has always impressed me. My own grandfather, Charles Cormier, served Her Majesty for about 40 years as a lighthouse keeper. In the 1960s, he decided to retire and I still have a copy of the beautiful letter he received from the then minister, which was written completely in English. My grandfather was able to read it, but my grandmother was never able to read about all he had done. I believe that this type of situation used to frustrate Quebeckers and that we could give many other examples where the French language was completely forgotten. Incorporating the Official Languages Act within the constitution gives us a guarantee and it is a great step forward.

Yesterday, the Leader of the New Democratic Party said that this should not be overemphasized among English-speaking Canadians because we do not want to force French upon them. I hope that no one will try to play that card as was done on corn flakes boxes. And some say that there are divisive measures. I believe that this type of prejudiced attitude did nothing to help the Canadian cause. And I hope that the members who used that type of example to defeat our Liberal candidates realize the damage they have done to Canadian unity.

We also speak about democratic rights. I spoke to some of my friends in my constituency on this matter. They told me, "Come on, all that is protected."

Few Quebeckers—or people from any other province—know that a provincial statute enacted by a provincial legislative assembly could allow that body to sit for ten years. It could happen quite legally. This is why I feel it is essential that the constitution provide for elections at least every five years.

● (1530)

On the matter of mobility rights, it must be remembered that for many young Canadians the future is in mobility. Indeed, the government already has mobility programs to allow young Quebeckers to work in Ontario because they cannot go to Newfoundland. These programs allow people from other provinces to find well-paid jobs. Such a mobility provision in the constitution would brighten in my view the future of many young Canadians whose horizons may be wider than their predecessors' who limited themselves to local employment. If one is to go ahead in this day and age, one may have to look farther away, and this kind of guarantee in the constitution will certainly be welcome.

On the matter of educational rights this is where I have the most painful conscience. It is my impression, after reading and rereading sections 23 and 24, that we have made a large step forward. And when I speak of a historic day, I have the feeling that Francophones in this country, with this resolution, have acquired rights perhaps many would never have hoped for in the past. There is just a minor aspect that hopefully can be amended, a lack of clarity concerning the case of immigrants to Quebec whose mother tongue is English. I am convinced that with all the goodwill of committee members, this minor matter can be clarified.

As far as legal rights are concerned, all those who fought the implementation of the War Measures Act, especially those who were the most vocal at that time, for the most part, of course, oppose the replacement of the charter of rights. The legislation will be amended through enshrinement. This week has been the celebration, so to speak, of the tenth anniversary of the October events, and I believe that abuses which took place at that time will never occur again in future. That is why I believe legal guarantees are essential.

As regards discrimination, women may have been those most affected in this regard and I do hope this constitutional resolution will bring about true equality. That is argued and assumed but there is still a long way to go. I heard a union worker say: "Equal work means equal pay". This is not provided for in the constitution but I do hope our policy will go along these lines.

Mr. Speaker, I listened yesterday to the Leader of the Opposition when he made his comments and surely he represents a loyal opposition because members of his party are always opposed to everything. I had the feeling of being back in the flag debate. At that time the Conservative party was on the wrong side and each time we are trying to make something Canadian, they find themselves on the wrong side. The attitude of the opposition leader does not surprise me at all. Although he knows the people do not support him, he is nevertheless assured of the support of all those who are opposed to changes.

Last night an hon. member was almost crying when he said that Canada would never be the same as before. I suggest that if his purpose is to have today's Canada as he always had it, he does not favour too much initiative. Mr. Speaker, I have entered politics to bring about some changes. In addition, I said during the electoral campaign that if we did not succeed in bringing about some change during my mandate, I would not run as a candidate because I would be too embarrassed to go back to my constituents after making such a firm commitment. Given the commitment of our leader, I would be embarrassed to go back to them and say, "We shall try harder. It is too late to do that."

I think people are fed up. We must act and act as quickly as possible.

This is obviously only a starting point. I do not feel that we have done everything there was to be done. On the contrary, there is evident need to pursue negotiations toward future reforms once we have gotten rid of the present straitjacket. The new amending formula will make it possible to trade powers. As to communications, it seems to me several demands of the provinces are justified. As to the degree of economic union, there is still much room for progress.

What is exciting is that in future, when there will be agreements such as those we have had on family law and other matters, we will be able to entrench progress in the constitution. And when I talk about entrenching progress I am thinking about the representations that have been made by the New Democratic Party and, personally, I think we could go in the direction they propose provided the demands are not too greedy. I just hope that during the study in committee particular attention will be paid to their suggestions which, unlike those of the Conservatives, are constructive.

I listened to a Conservative member say that Canadians must be heard. I think Canadians have had ample opportunity to be heard and that they do not want to hear anything further from us on the subject. That is why I am confident the members of the committee will work quickly and efficiently, but as concerned parliamentarians.

About launching into country-wide travelling, that has been done by the Pepin-Robarts Commission. The recommendations they made were taken into consideration, and repeating the whole exercise would serve no useful purposes.

Finally I hope that many other persons, be they politicians or businessmen, will join us in support of our will and resolve to bring about change. I hope that maybe some Progressive Conservative members who are truly progressive will find it possible to join us when the time comes to vote in the House. My dream is certainly the symbolic and definitive proclamation on July 1, 1981, of the only true Canada Day because only at that time will that holiday be truly Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, all through this debate which is getting under way in this House I intend to watch very closely the arguments used by members opposite because they say they will fight us constantly throughout the country. I am eager to welcome them in Quebec and to all those who will want to fight with us on a constant basis in order to rally Quebeckers behind their stand, I extend an invitation to a debate any time in my riding. I am convinced that their proposal is out of touch as they say in English, and that their determination to block any change is not at all in the best interest of Canada.

When the Leader of the Opposition says that our proposals are dangerous for the future of this country, my answer is that the very fact that he might have remained in power would have been dangerous for the future of this country. I am now convinced that all Canadians will be proud of the courageous move that we are making, in many cases against all provincial governments, and I hope that the matter will be solved as soon as possible and in the best spirit possible.

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that over the last few months there has been a carefully orchestrated attempt by the Government of Canada to change fundamentally the very essence of our federal form of government.

Two of the highlights have to be the exposure, for the first time, for most of us late yesterday afternoon, of the actual terms and details of the draft joint resolution which the government proposes sending to the Queen and British government so that this fundamental change will be made, and the other highlight, to my mind, is the widely reported public relations exercise by two members of the Queen's Privy Council of Canada in going to Britain to explain to Her Majesty and to British parliamentarians the purpose and method by which, at long last, the British can be rid of Canadian constitutional problems.

● (1540)

The reason I am speaking this afternoon is simply because all of my adult life I have been a student of constitutional matters. Through discussions in my party I helped, along with others, to advise a past federal minister of justice, the Hon. Davie Fulton, in a landmark series of proposals for constitutional change and patriation that nearly succeeded. As well, I took a leading part in the preparation of another series of intergovernmental meetings and moves as the attorney general of Ontario, which again almost succeeded, at Victoria in 1971, in devising a system for Canadian amendment and patriation of our constitution.

And, finally, I wanted to speak today as another Canadian member of the Queen's Privy Council in and for Canada. I will have a special request to make of the present government today.

Yesterday afternoon in one of the best and most forceful speeches I have ever heard in this House or elsewhere, this chamber was quite attentive to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as he outlined what was wrong with the constitutional package being presented by the government.

Today I intend, as one who is not inexperienced in these matters, to attempt to give at least one person's opinion on what we as a Parliament should be doing and what the proper, correct, and acceptable alternative course of conduct of the government should be in light of the very difficult positions which have always existed and will always exist in this country if it is allowed to remain as a federation. Of necessity, I am afraid that my presentation will be legal in content, will be based on this country's constitutional history, and will include some rather dry technical and legal details and precedents. I am sorry that it will not be an entertaining, political or partisan speech to the House. Believe me, though, it is intended to be helpful as we all grope and as we all must grope for the right way out of the recurring constitutional dilemma which has always been present in this nation.

May I start with an overly simplistic constitutional history. In any federal system there has to be a division of jurisdiction, a dividing of power between governments in that federal system. In a unitary system for a compact country such as, for instance, the United Kingdom, there is no need for a written constitution to contain a division of powers because the single, central government is all-powerful and paramount. But in a federation with a federal system, especially in a widely dispersed, regionalized, diverse nation such as Australia, the United States, or Canada, where a unitary, centralized government would simply not be workable, representative or responsive enough to the differing needs of our varying regions and peoples, there must be some founding, fundamental, basic statutory instrument which sets out the division of jurisdiction between those governments which make up the whole.

In this country that statute is the British North America Act which was drafted by Canadians for Canadians in the mid-1800s at conferences in Charlottetown, Quebec City, and London. Finally—and I think it is a point well worth emphasizing—only at the very end of those very complicated Canadian conferences of Canadians, which really must have required much tolerance, patience and understanding, was the British Colonial Office brought into the decisions so that the intended legislation could be passed by the United Kingdom parliament.

It was done that way because it was one of the very first peaceful births of a new country in modern time, because it was the easiest legally, and because it fitted in, obviously, with the prevailing public opinion in this country of that day. It was the easiest because, while the British North America Act outlined the limits of jurisdiction between the partners in the federation, the provinces, and the central or federal government, it was also a very handy method of fulfilling that other absolute necessity, that absolute necessity and requirement in a federated system, namely, that the constitutional document that sets out these divisions be beyond the reach of easy access or control or change in those important powers of any single one of the partners to the arrangement.

The reasons for this are obvious. If, in any of the many inevitable, ongoing disputes concerning whom has authority over what, one side or the other could unilaterally change the rules of the game, then no longer would there be a federation or a federal system. That one level of government that had the power to change the rules would be entirely paramount in all things. There would be no rein, no check on its power, and in the hands of an arrogant or intolerant or misunderstanding government or governments, the federal system would eventually evolve into a centralized, single government, all-powerful, unitary system.

So at the request of the Canadians themselves and as a safeguard and guarantee of fair play, and because it was the easiest method, the amending procedure was quite consciously left in the hands of the United Kingdom in 1867. There have been increasing tensions as time went on between Canada and the mother government at the colonial status of this, the senior dominion within the Commonwealth. Other dominions and other members of the British Empire, as it then was, in striving for a position of independence within what was evolving into the Commonwealth, not only devised their own constitutional acts but set up their own domestic amending procedures as well.

There was a logical and inevitable progression toward nationhood in the many different fields in international relationships and inter-Commonwealth relationships of the dominions. One of the most important declarations was the recognition by the imperial conference of 1926 that Canada was as equal and as independent, or should be, in both its domestic and international relationships as the United Kingdom itself.

In 1927, for the first time that I can discover, the then federal minister of justice had the question of a domestic, "in-Canada" amending procedure placed on the agenda of a dominion-provincial conference here in Canada. No decision was announced, no recommendation was made, and no action was taken. However, three years later in 1930 at another imperial conference, the United Kingdom and all of the named dominions of the day agreed that no constitutional statute of the British parliament, indeed, no United Kingdom statute affecting in any way the constitutional substance or procedures of any dominion, would in the future be amended by the United Kingdom unless the amendment was at the request and with the consent of that dominion. This constitutional milestone was formally enacted into British law the next year, 1931, by the Statute of Westminster, which in effect removed any remaining jurisdiction of the United Kingdom parliament in the constitutional provisions and problems in all of the named dominions in the British Commonwealth.

● (1550)

Canada was the leading and senior dominion, and successive Canadian governments, both Conservative and Liberal, had been the leading proponents in the discussions which led to that Statute of Westminster. But to the sorrow of the British who also desired to be rid of the problems of the dominions, the Canadian delegation insisted that an exception be made for the British North America Act so that Canadian amendments would continue to be made by the United Kingdom parliament. Canada could not, because of the lack of agreement among Canadians themselves, cut the colonial cord.

Section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster still states today that nothing in that statute, which finally and irrevocably set the dominions free in a constitutional sense from the United Kingdom parliament, was to apply to the British North America Act or any regulation arising from it.

We ask why was Canada excepted? That is what that section was—an exception. It was simply because in contrast to the rest of the dominions in the British Commonwealth which had or were about to work out their own special constitutional safeguards, the Canadians feared that, without recourse to the United Kingdom, the Canadian parliament and the provincial legislatures in Canada would have gained the power to alter the British North America Act by ordinary methods, by ordinary procedures, or by ordinary statute.

I repeat: a constitution in a federal system is no ordinary statute. That is the reason for section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster.

Since that time, many dominion-provincial conferences have been held and they have all demonstrated the very great divisions and diversities that are at the same time the weakness and the strength of this country. However, we were making progress as time went on. Even the federal Liberal administrations started making progress.

Not too long ago, the 1965 white paper of the Government of Canada, under the imprint of the then Liberal federal minister of justice, the hon. Guy Favreau, asserted flatly and unequivocably a general principle of constitutional practice, as follows:

> —the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

In a federal system, I submit to you that that type of consensus and agreement is a prerequisite. In a nation such as this, we have to have a federated system. It would be foolhardy, if not impossible, to have a centralized unitary form of government. Indeed, not only is the federal government considered remote from the peoples' problems in most parts of the country even under today's system, but some of our provinces are so large that the complaint is also made that some of them do not supply the intimacy of knowledge and the capability for quick action respecting our citizens' complaints that should be present in an efficient democracy.

Our problem is not an easy one to solve; indeed, there are many who say it is not even a problem—that the present system of amendment best suits the peculiar Canadian need.

I have to confess to you that I am not one of those. I have always believed, and have said before, that this country should have control over its own constitution. There is something lacking in ourselves, regardless of our immense debt to Great Britain for what it has done for us in the past, when, hat in hand, we have to interrupt the British parliament which has enough to do dealing with its own problems, and ask it to intervene at our request in our affairs. If nothing else, sir, it is not fair to the person of our Queen, it is not fair to the British government, and it is not fair to the United Kingdom parliamentarians.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Lawrence: It is also a blow to our prestige—if not to Liberal members, it is at least to my own prestige and my own pride—that we have to do it. We should not have to do that.

What we have to do, then, is devise a new system of citizen control and supervision of all our Canadian governments; protect our people from abuse and erratic behaviour of the majority and the various levels of government, and ensure that some degree of flexibility for change remains in a rapidly changing world and nation.

I repeat that it is absolutely essential in a federal system that the country's constitution should be above and beyond the control of any single government or group of governments. It must be special, not changed easily, and be beyond the reach of a federal government only, or the provinces alone.

I believe as well, that our constitution should protect not only the human and civil rights of our citizens but should protect us also from the abuses of government.

Finally, to make it workable, it cannot be imposed on governments or groups or regions; the constitution must be the result of honest consensus and honest agreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: That is the content, but there are other requirements as to method as well.

If we are honestly sincere in shucking off the last remnants of colonialism—and there have been emotional appeals made in certain sections of the country in that vein —then in all honesty it should be complete; there must be a severance. We should not have to go to the United Kingdom even once more and ask them to do something we are unwilling to do here ourselves. In actual fact, sir, we do not have to.

We should also bear in mind what the resolution we received only yesterday asks the Queen and the United Kingdom parliament to do. It not only requests the British government to patriate Canada's constitution, which, even though the concept in some quarters is controversial, the British, I believe, will be overjoyed to do in order to get Canada out of its hair, but in addition to that patriation we are asking the British, in a supplicant's mood to "please, kind sirs and madams, also add several important, controversial and, to some, deeply disturbing and divisive changes and additions to Canada's constitutional provisions?"

It is not my intention to argue today about the content or even the need for these provisions, the provisions respecting a charter of rights, the concept of financial equalization and redistribution of the taxed wealth of this country, or even an amending procedure that, for the first time, introduces a referendum concept into an amending procedure that many in this country have never even heard of before. This type of manoeuvre, to my knowledge, of adding detailed and specific new law, apart altogether from the other amendments, has never been requested by Canada before. Never, Mr. Speaker! We not only ask for amendments, we add substantial provisions which are new law—totally new detailed statutory provisions—which we could and should be enacting as Canadian statutes ourselves.

If this is the proper way of proceeding—and I say this particularly to my friend, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien)—with British North America Act amendments, then in 1940, for instance, when the federal government requested the unemployment insurance powers with the agreement of the provinces, why did it not add a schedule to that requested amendment adding the whole Unemployment Insurance Act as well? In 1951 and in 1964 when the federal government, again with provincial agreement, asked that the British North America Act be amended to provide for old age pensions, why was the whole statute respecting old age pensions not included in the schedule as these other extraneous schedules are added to the resolution we have been presented with just yesterday? The reason is obvious: while the amendments were required to give the power, and to change the division of jurisdiction, the actual new legislation itself should have been, and was, enacted here in Canada.

● (1600)

I am all for the patriation of our constitution. I have been in the past and I have worked very hard to bring it about in the past. I have also been on the record for years as stating that our Canadian-made and enacted "at home" constitution should protect not only the human and civil rights of our citizens and of our minorities, with protection, for instance from such moves as the Mackenzie King treatment of Japanese Canadians and manoeuvres such as the Trudeau-Bourrassa use of the War Measures Act, but it should contain a check as well on abuses by government, and it should also contain limits on what any government, federal, provincial or municipal, in this country can do to or with its citizens.

Can we in all fairness now, in the belief that everyone should have the opportunity in Canada to be involved, and in the nagging doubt which some of us might have that perhaps the British parliament and British parliamentarians might not recognize the uniqueness and diversity of the Canadian scene, really be asking the British to enact, as Canadian law, important measures which are certainly inadequate, certainly incomplete, and are vigorously opposed by the great majority of the elected governments in this federated nation? As a matter of fact, I think there are only two exceptions in the twelve.

I suggest to you, sir, that the measure which the government has presented to us is ill considered. It is inadequate. For those of us who are proud of our Canadianism, it does not remove the element of colonialism and imperialism so decried in some sections of the country by government supporters. This resolution should simply not proceed until we, here in Canada, in this parliament and in our provincial legislatures, ourselves, or a preponderant majority of Canadian governments, have enacted, or agreed with, ourselves, a new Canadian constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: We should not have to go to Britain to ask the British to do it for us. We should be capable here. I believe we are capable here, in this House and in the provincial legislatures, of passing not a resolution but an act, the Canada constitution act of 1980-1981, in which we, not the British, cut off our constitutional ties of amendment; in which we, not the British, lay out a division of powers; in which we, not the British, set down an amending procedure guaranteeing provincial and citizen involvement; in which we, not the British, safeguard civil and human rights in this country; in which we, not the British, limit the power of governments in Canada; in which we, not the British, provide for equalization and resource ownership, and other important matters neglected in this proposal; and finally so that we, here in Canada, as Canadians, for Canadians, provide for a constitutional convention representative of the governments of and in Canada, and also, sir, of non-political citizens who, I believe, should have the opportunity to be involved, to be represented and to make a meaningful contribution to something that deeply involves this nation's future.

This way the United Kingdom parliament would only have to repeal that single exception. It would only have to repeal section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster—nothing more—once our Canadian constitution is ready to replace the BNA Act. This way Britain would no longer even have the opportunity, much less the obligation, to solve our Canadian problems. Again, there would be no fear, groundless though it may be at this moment, that a British enactment could still in the future change a wholly Canadian intention, because that avenue would still be open to a Canadian government or to a United Kingdom parliament to do just exactly that. This way, sir, we would be masters at long last, not in our own house but in our own houses, because there is more to governing the country of Canada than this chamber.

In conclusion, may I end up with my personal request to the government, which is to seek an audience with the Queen, to explain comprehensively the Canadian alternatives to the British government and to the United Kingdom parliamentarians. Even a member of the Queen's Canadian Privy Council, one who has had experience as a key member of a provincial executive council in legal, in political, and in constitutional affairs, should properly make the arrangements for such an audience and make the arrangements for such interviews through the government of the day, even though it may not strictly be necessary.

I quite sincerely make this request because there may be others in the House; there may be others in parliament; there may be others in the legislatures; there may be citizens as well, but certainly on my own behalf, I sincerely request the government to do this through Canada's High Commissioner in London. I am convinced these explanations and this advice have not been made available by those the government has already sent. I ask the government to make the necessary arrangements for me, perhaps for others, as a Canadian Privy Council member to have that audience and to request those interviews.

This government, in my mind, is imposing far too much on the Crown and on the United Kingdom parliament. We can, we should be doing the work ourselves here in Canada, and those in the United Kingdom government and those in the Mother of Parliaments should be so informed by other than merely members of the present government. Sir, I will await the government's reply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there are times, in the life of any nation, when it is no longer sufficient to formulate ideals, to exercise one's normal duties and to assume routine responsibilities. Those times require an expression of courage and a spirit of decision which go well beyond the immediate necessities.

For Canada, that time has come. We are now at the crossroads. So long as we have the wisdom and the determination necessary to choose the right direction and to follow it without straying, I think nothing will be beyond the reach of our collective effort. On the other hand, if we hesitate to make a choice, our only legacy to our children and to our children's children will be a fragmented country. We will be held responsible for the failure of confederation. On what basis should we renew the Canadian Constitution, if indeed we want to maintain this country and truly renew the constitution as we promised all Canadians and, in particuliar, my fellow citizens from Quebec? In our view, and one which we have held since 1967, we must do this by giving priority to the rights of the individual over those of the government. Why? Because the interest that man has shown in his own rights goes back to the dawn of civilization. Once he had satisfied his basic needs of protection, shelter, and food he started to consider the problems relating to his human dignity. In antiquity and in the centuries that followed he was concerned mainly with so-called natural rights. Speaking of natural law, Cicero called it unchangeable and eternal, adding that it remained the same regardless of country or time. In the middle ages, Saint Thomas Aquinas gave natural law precedence over the laws of man, and consequently over sovereigns.

Progressively as the notion of social contract developed during the eighteenth century as a government theory, increasing stress was put on the rights of the individual. What if a government failed to respect natural rights? That, according to the writings of Locke and Rousseau, would justify disobedience and rebellion. Thus the notion of the rights of man, of human rights, was born.

Mankind proved so sensitive to that notion that the greatest social revolutions in the history of the western world broke out, one in America, the other in France, to guarantee the rights men claimed as being eternal. That wish, deeply rooted in every individual, that his dignity as a human being be recognized, is expressed in the memorable words of the American Declaration of Independance, which I quote:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

In France, the Charter of Human and Citizens' Rights of 1789 sought to achieve similar results. It said that, and I quote:

Men are born and remain legally free and equal—

—and that, and I quote:

—the purpose of any political association is the conservation of natural and imprescriptible human rights. Those rights are freedom, ownership and resistance to oppression.

In both France and the United States as well as in all modern countries today it is recognized that a government has in fact only those powers which the citizens were willing to relinquish.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the roots of the option we take, that the only powers that all our governments, all our legislatures have is that part of the sovereignty of the people that the people let us have for awhile, their inalienable and eternal rights, and we are starting the renewal of our constitution by recognizing forever those rights that no Parliament will ever be able to take away from them. You will look in vain among the Fathers of Confederation for a politician who was able, like a Thomas Jefferson in the United States, to express in those pithy formulas that are part of history the ideals that have continued to be the foundation of the Canadian political community. We have not stopped regretting it since 1867.

There are now in Canada no constitutional fundamental guarantees of those inalienable citizens' rights. No legislation, whether federal or provincial, is beyond legislation that could be passed by another majority. And we say that, if we really want to rebuild this country, we must start by recognizing the rights which belong to the people and which no jurisdiction can ever take away from them. Furthermore, since different levels of government can lay claim to Canada's internal sovereignty it is obvious that if we really want to protect the rights of citizens, all governments must surrender at the same time those rights over citizens. Of course, one might also say that the basic rights of the citizens have been upheld in Canada, it is true, but to go from that to the other extreme and think our purity of heart and our righteousness of living have been spotless, I think that those who know our history know this would be an exaggeration.

We could not protest our innocence and deny accusations of having passed laws that ordered the burning of books, that forbads reading, that took guaranteed rights away from linguistic minorities, that allowed expropriations that looked very much like confiscations, and we can still recall people being arrested in the night and secretly kept in prison for days. Do we or don't we want to put an end to the possibility that certain kinds of things that have happened in Canadian history might happen again? If we really are sincere, if we really believe in the freedom of individuals, in these inalienable and eternal rights, then let us entrench in our constitution a fundamental act whereby all governments would forever relinquish these rights in favour of citizens.

We have no right to be complacent. How many Canadians know that Canadian law allows policemen to produce evidence during a criminal trial no matter how legal or illegal the means they used to get it? Our tribunals will receive compelling evidence without bothering to find out how it was obtained in the first place. It may have been obtained fraudulently, the police may have stolen it or taken it without a search warrant or after breaking and entering into a private residence. Are we really sincere when we say that these things should never happen again in Canada? If so, the only way to go about it, Mr. Speaker, is for all levels of government to renounce altogether and forever in favour of the citizen certain powers they exercise over him.

And what is more, let them not say that we are bent on increasing or reducing the powers of this or that level of government. In fact, if we look carefully into the charter of human rights for all Canadian citizens, we realize that the federal Parliament is indeed the biggest loser. But we are very glad of this, because each and every one of us is aware that the federal Parliament can exist and operate as an institution only because the sovereign people has delegated to us part of its sovereignty, and for a limited time only.

A new constitution must therefore begin with the recognition of inalienable rights for all our citizens. The second question we must answer deals with the purpose of life in society; in other words, what must be the goal and objectives of these men and women to whom the citizens have delegated for a while some powers to govern their country.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no other goal but justice. And that is why through that fundamental legislation, in section 31, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) inserted two new sections in the Constitution of Canada. Furthermore, where there was a consensus between the provinces, namely, that all governments must try to reduce regional disparities in their provinces, and that the federal government must give unconditional subsidies to the public finances of the provinces which are poorer than the others. Why? For a reason which is similar to the first one. If all Canadians do not have exactly the same fundamental rights, the will to live together would of course rapidly fade away. If all Canadians do not have exactly the same quality as far as essential services are concerned without being burdened with excessive taxation, their solidarity must be expressed through their central government which will have to tax the richest regions in order to help the poorest regions. Today there are still provinces where children belong to families which are considerably poorer than some others, where they live in houses which are more crowded than others, where they have poorer medical services than in other provinces, where educational services are provided by teachers who are less competent than in other areas. And we say that it will be the responsibility of all Canadians to be solidary not only as far as rights are concerned but also as far as real equality is concerned. And this is the raison d'être of the other section, to show how closely entangled fundamental rights and equality of opportunities are. What meaning can the section have we are inserting into the constitution to ensure mobility across the country, unless there is a duty for Parliament to help the various regions? Because there would then be a one-way rush to one area, the other way to the poorest ones being senseless.

And the federal government took that unqualified commitment, in consideration of which there is absolutely no commitment from the provinces, because history teaches that every province, every area, can at some point in history suffer poverty or hardships.

Our western provinces, now the richest, 50 years ago were going through the worst crisis in Canadian history. Who could have envisaged that the Atlantic provinces, among the most prosperous at the beginning of confederation, would later undergo a period of difficulties, that today the fishing industry or the maritime industry could once more put them in a better position than the centre, and that they would find oil and their financial resources could increase significantly? Who could have thought 40 years ago that the two central provinces, the backbone of all Canada, would today be soft spots that the two peripheral regions would have to help? All Canadian regions therefore in their histories went through changing circumstances, and the federal government is unconditionally committed to extending each one financial help, subsidies allowing them to give their citizens the same standard of essential services without excessive hardship.

Mr. Speaker, how come the provinces accepted outright that commitment from the Canadian government, while a number of them are somewhat more reluctant to grant rights to their own citizens?

This is, Mr. Speaker, the basic issue because it affects the very purpose of society on which is based the fellowship of all Canadians. Let us act in such a way that all Canadians do not enjoy the same basic rights and surely their willingness to live together will disappear. Let us act in such a way that equality of opportunities is not the same in all regions of Canada and there again, this willingness to live collectively will disappear.

I want to deal with another issue which is of great concern to me as it is to all French-speaking hon. members, this Achilles' heel of Canadian history, an issue which we are going to settle once and for all, namely, the history of the rights of the French minority in provinces other than Quebec.

This issue, Mr. Speaker, is at the roots of all our problems in this country. It is perhaps the saddest aspect in the whole beautiful and praiseworthy history of this country. Canon Groulx who was the spiritual leader of all Quebec nationalists wrote a book about this entitled "French education in Canada—Minority Schools." And we can read in this book what each of us knows about the endless battles that French-speaking Canadians have been fighting since 1867 throughout territories which have become provinces, in the maritimes or in Ontario, battles which have been mostly frustrating and useless, especially during the last century and at the beginning of this century.

It is not by accident indeed that during the referendum campaign that argument was by far the most often talked about in the province of Quebec—those injustices that were committed during the last century and also during this century.

When you look at those sad events which everyone knows about and which have been the Achilles' heel of our whole history, we cannot refrain from saying it is time to put an end to it. It is time French Canadians in other provinces stopped fighting to get French language schools.

The injustice done to Riel in 1885, the Manitoba legislation of 1890, the legislation of 1891 concerning the Northwest Territories, the legislation of 1905 of Alberta and Saskatchewan which became provinces at that time and where Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself could not break down the stubbornness of Anglophones refusing to accept French in the new provinces, the famous regulation 17 passed in 1913 in Ontario, without forgetting what happened in the Acadian provinces in the earlier part of the century, those are the arguments that were talked about during the referendum, and now that the federal government is finally saying it is time for those fights to stop, to give French Canadians what they are fully entitled to, some of their own fellow citizens are turning their heads away and saying that fight does not interest them.

When you consider, Mr. Speaker, that in the last census, 926,000 French Canadians outside Quebec gave French as their mother tongue and nearly 700,000 identified it as their everyday language, some would like to turn their heads away and say that their lot does not interest them.

I only have to quote again in that respect our great thinker, Canon Lionel Groulx, who in his book Les écoles des minorités françaises says, and I quote:

That French minorities are advance guards—

—talking about Quebec—

—its first fortifications, has been repeated time and time again in Quebec to no great effect, it would seem. However, one of these days—

—Quebec—

—will have to reflect on the possibility of a withdrawal of French masses from the east and the west toward the borders—

—the French borders.

When I think about what we French Canadians owe to our fellow citizens of the other provinces, I cannot shirk my responsibilities. On this point, I have only to quote what the French Canadians of the other provinces told us recently in their report entitled The Heirs of Lord Durham, and I quote:

Nowhere in Canada except in Quebec does the Francophone community have inalienable education rights. In two provinces, British Columbia and Newfoundland, French has no standing as a teaching language. In four other provinces, . . . access to French education is subject to a series of discretionary powers. In not one of these provinces is the survival of French schools ensured by regulations.

And now that we would like once and for all to answer this appeal for help from Francophones outside Quebec, some people would ask us to isolate ourselves from them. No, Mr. Speaker!

Rather than listening to those who tell us that we are betraying them, I prefer to listen to Canon Groulx who said, on page 251 of his work on the history of French minorities in Canada, that it is the role of the federal government—

—purveyor of the common good—

—to ensure this protection to French minorities.

The French culture is a part of the collective treasure of the Canadian nation, and not only does the state—

—the federal state—

—have no right to weaken or undermine this treasure, but, on the contrary, it has the strict obligation to protect and increase it for the good of its citizens.

● (1630)

And how did the government of Quebec get out of this one, since only two years ago it had recognized that the French minorities living in other provinces the right to have their own schools? By what pirouette? Let me quote from the working paper tabled by the Quebec government on July 8, 1980, four months ago, in Montreal, where this sophism can be found:

If language rights were written in the constitution, they would be frozen forever.

"Being protected forever" becomes "frozen forever". Mr. Speaker, very seldom have I been witness to such a betrayal. As we are enshrining in the constitution inalienable rights for French Canadians living in other provinces, for them this move has the disadvantage of "freezing the rights". What we want is to protect those rights forever, for as long as this country exists. Mr. Speaker, that is the solution dictated to us by our conscience. And I tell myself that this betrayal has been committed by a government which pretends to be the protector and the spokesman for Quebec traditional positions. Needless to say, the leader of the Liberal party in Quebec has stood by the position of that province which, he insists, is the home, the cornerstone, the very foundation of the French Canadian people; it has always acknowledged its responsibility.

Ask Jean Lesage about it! He recognized that the French-speaking Canadians in the other provinces also had those rights. He did not wash his hands of the matter. That is why I was particularly happy when the leader of the Liberal party in Quebec said recently that he agreed that those rights should be recognized for the two linguistic majorities in Canada.

Mr. La Salle: But not by going about it that way.

Mr. De Bané: Now, if we are going to talk about ways of doing it, may I be allowed to tell my hon. colleague that I, too, am sorry it was not done on the basis of unanimity. But for 50 years now we have tried to follow the ideal way which the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) suggests and which many others have tried to follow before him.

I would remind him that his own former Progressive Conservative Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, Mr. Pearson, the present Prime Minister for 12 years now, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who was Prime Minister accidentally as a result of popular aberration, all of them tried to do so. We have all tried and if I am asked to express regrets, I will say that these are my regrets.

For 50 years now, we have tried to achieve the ideal goal through the ideal means. It took some time to realize that each and every one of the 11 governments to which that right of veto was given has used it to exercise its tyranny over all the others. To my mind, in a democratic country, the inalienable rights of the French Canadians cannot be negotiated; the inalienable rights of all the citizens of this country cannot be exchanged, swapped for rights over fisheries or long distance telephone rates.

If my hon. colleague wants me to continue expressing my regrets, I shall be specific about a few more. At the constitutional conference held a few weeks ago, when the Ontario Premier told his Quebec counterpart, René Lévesque, that he was against section 133 of the constitution applying to Ontario, the Quebec premier did not insist in the least. In so doing, he destroyed all hope of those rights being recognized for Franco-Ontarians. If the hon. member for Joliette wants me to express my regrets I shall tell him that this proposal is an enormous step forward in the renewal of the Canadian Constitution but, unfortunately, it represents less compared with what the federal government had obtained in 1971 in Victoria where seven provinces had accepted that the debates in their legislatures should take place in both official languages. As well, three provinces had accepted that their statutes be published in both official languages. If he would like me to go on expressing my regrets, I would tell him that I was deeply saddened when the Prime Minister offered the provinces, two weeks ago, to create a new constitutional court which would exemplify the dualism of Canada—not only the legal system which is dualistic, but all other dualistic aspects—when he offered them a new dualistic constitutional court and, as you are aware, they could not reach agreement between them. If the hon. member wants me to go on expressing my regrets, I will tell him that I was overcome by a boundless sadness when the offers concerning a second chamber, which would have been a chamber of regions, was rejected. While senators are now exclusively appointed by the federal government, it was offered to the provinces that they be involved in the appointment of their representatives here, and these offers were rejected. No, if I were asked to express regrets, I would do so, but rather I am asked today to look at the paths that we will cover with this resolution. And I recall to the hon. member the solemn commitment made by every member from Quebec to their fellow countrymen from this province during the referendum campaign. We will start the revision right away, without delay, and we will not stop until the task is finished.

And we are saying: is there a better way to undertake this revision than by basing it on the people, by acknowledging as all governments should that it is to the people that we owe part of the sovereignty? Is there a better way to start than by saying: the central government is going to give unconditional subsidies to all provinces in order to enable them to provide essential public services to their citizens. Is there a better way to start than for the federal government to undertake as a new commitment in the constitution the provision of equal chances to all Canadians? Is there a better way to undertake this revision than by saying that from now on all French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians will have the fundamental right to their schools and that nobody will ever be able to take that from them and that they will no longer have to fight for them as has been the case for 100 years? A party tried to use these facts in our recent history to justify a certain option 100 years later and today, as we are intent on solving these problems, they do like Pontius Pilate and say, "We do not feel responsible for the fate of the other Francophones of Canada."

So, Mr. Speaker, what we have tried to do in this bill is to state on what bases this country is going to stand, and for us there are only two, freedom and dignity.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona on a point of order.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question on his speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. minister accept a question?

Mr. De Bané: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister spoke of the lack of evidence provided by police in a legal matter, if I understood correctly. If so, can he tell me what section he was referring to?

Mr. De Bané: Certainly, section 8 which states:

Everyone has the right not to be subjected to search or seizure except on grounds, and in accordance with procedures, established by law.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to affirm my belief in the federal system in this country and particularly in co-operative federalism which I think is so important for Canadians from one coast to the other. I believe that a number of principles are very important when we talk about Canada and its future.

First of all, we must have a strong central government which is strong enough to ensure equalization of income and other things for Canadians from one part of this country to the other. At the same time, I believe we should have strong provincial governments able to implement programs which respond to differing provincial and regional needs.

I also strongly believe that in this country we have two orders of power, two sets of jurisdiction, partners between federal and provincial powers. As Alan Blakeney, the premier of my province says, those powers are equals.

I also believe we have in this country a number of peoples. It has been said that this country has existed now 113 years, but many people have been here for much longer than that. I understand that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) can trace his family back 200 or 300 years perhaps, probably many years before confederation. I think of our Indian and Inuit people whose roots go back many hundreds of years in North America.

[Translation]

I am also thinking, Mr. Speaker, of the Canadian duality, a very important historic duality which is based on the distinctive character of Quebec society and of Francophones outside Quebec and also on a different legal system. The NDP believes in this principle. We recognize that Canada has two official languages, French and English. We supported the official languages bill tabled in 1969, we continue to endorse it and we strive to improve it so that federal institutions reflect a bilingual Canada.

[English]

It is in that context that I want to discuss in the next few minutes the resolution before the House today. In the debate yesterday my leader put the position of our party very eloquently. He spoke about the need for some action on the constitution. He spoke about the feeling in the country that we have to change things from coast to coast. He spoke about the need for the patriation of the constitution. He spoke about the position of our federal party and the course that our party had taken in September in endorsing the principle of a charter of rights. Indeed, I can refer back to the first bill of rights which, as the minister said yesterday, was introduced in this country in Saskatchewan in 1947 by Tommy Douglas when he was the premier of my province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I would like to refer also to the philosophy of equalization which our party has supported for many, many years, and I will speak about that at greater length later on in my remarks.

I also want to spend some time this afternoon issuing a few warnings to the government. I want to pick up the lead of my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), when he spoke yesterday in the House so eloquently about the issue of resources which, I say to the government, is absolutely vital to the western part of this country and indeed, in my opinion, to every single province from one coast to the other.

Speaking for a moment as a westerner, I want to say to the government that we are serious when we say that resources are very important in my province, but in the package that is before the House today resources are forgotten. I remember that when I was growing up as a child I heard stories about homesteaders and pioneers, stories about the "dirty thirties" and the great depression, and of all our fears in western Canada that we were to supply our raw materials and food products to central Canada and that central Canada had the industry, the tariff protection, and the transportation policy to help itself. I want to say to the Minister of Justice that if he does not include something in the package on resources, then he will just be stirring up many of these old historic feelings in western Canada, and unfortunately in western Canada there is an increasing alienation from Ottawa and what "it stands for".

There will be increasing alienation from many institutions in central Canada, from the Liberal party and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself, unless we can make some serious changes in the package on resources in the proposal before the House. I need only mention that this extremism is growing, that we do have small separatist groups in the west, that we have a unionist party which wants to join our part of Canada to the United States, which is something that I and my colleagues will fight against as hard as we possibly can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: The point is that if we do not change some of the things in the resolution, what we will be doing as parliamentarians is spurring on that kind of sentiment, that kind of feeling, that kind of movement in western Canada.

I want to say also that we must clarify the fact that the ownership of resources must belong to the provinces. We must have some concurrence with federal paramountcy of the provinces with the federal government when it comes to interprovincial trade. I think it is also important to consider the possibility, as our party has said in its council resolution of a few weeks ago, of provincial concurrence with federal paramountcy when it comes to international trade. In my province, for example, most resources are exported, resources such as heavy oil, potash and uranium, are exported to other parts of the world. I think it is imperative that we also include indirect taxation. This is important, not just in my province but to all the provinces in this country. I say to the minister who is in charge of the constitution, the Minister of Justice, that the federal government agreed to most of these items four weeks ago, down the street here in this city, and I appeal to him to include these points in this package so as to make it more balanced for the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I do not have to speak again about the court cases we have had, such as the Cigol case and the central Canada potash case where provincial legislation in my province was struck down. I also want to refer to the fact that we should be treating off-shore resources the same as on-shore resources. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) will be saying something about that later on in the House, either this evening or tomorrow.

I would also like to spend a few moments picking up on what my leader said yesterday, that we must have some other changes in the resolution in the House today, and I want to elaborate on three of them. One of them is section 42, the other is equalization, and the third one is the whole question of the language of education where the numbers warrant it, and how that is defined. As I said, someone else will speak about off-shore resources, and the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) and the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) will speak about the native peoples of this country.

I want to begin with section 42 and I want to voice some grave concerns about the way section 42 is written in the resolution before us today. First of all, we have an amending formula which is the modified Victoria amending formula. Under that formula one must have two of the Atlantic provinces, Ontario and Quebec, and two of the western provinces representing at least half of the people, agreed upon a constitutional amendment.

● (1650)

I hope members will study section 42 very closely and will listen to my remarks very carefully. Under that section the federal government has the power to go over the heads of any legislature and conduct a national referendum by itself on any constitutional question whatsoever. It has the power to do that, and if they have a majority in Quebec, Ontario, two provinces in the Atlantic region of our country and two western provinces, representing at least half the people, then that constitutional amendment will carry. I think that is very dangerous in a federation where there are two powers, federal and provincial powers that are partners which should be sharing.

Looking even further at the consequences of section 42, one finds in section 46(1) that the referendum rules will be written exclusively by the Parliament of Canada. In reality it means that they will be written exclusively by the government of the day if it is a majority government. Section 46(1) reads in part as follows:

—Parliament may make laws respecting the rules applicable to the holding of a referendum under section 42.

I think that has very dire consequences because it means the government can control the timing of the question, which is very important. One can put his finger to the wind and take public opinion polls. If the timing is right, there is a referendum. What would the results have been of a national referendum back in October, 1970, exactly ten years ago today, if the government of the day had put forth a constitutional amendment to retract civil liberties in the country? Because of the emotionalism of the day it would have carried and we would have lost, through a referendum, what we have in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights or what we will have in an entrenched bill of rights in the constitution. What would happen to an amendment on capital punishment after the brutal killing of a policeman and the emotions it might cause? What would happen if there were a tremendous energy crisis, a conflict in the Middle East and a tremendous increase in the price of energy, if there were a national referendum to have more control of resources going to the federal government? That may even carry in two of the western provinces representing 50 per cent of Canadians. For example, it could isolate the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta which have the oil. It is dangerous to have the power which exists in sections 42 and 46 of the resolution.

Also I should like to refer to the money. The federal government can make the rules. I have been in politics long enough to know that money can manipulate public opinion. This summer I saw an advertising campaign launched by the federal government. They spent $6 million rewarding a lot of their friends in the advertising business, talking about Canada and the constitution. That advertising program will be increased. I understand the unity office is increasing its budget from $10 million to over $30 million. It is planning another major advertising program in the country. It is wrong, because they are advertising a simple proposal, not a government law or government program.

When this first happened this summer I spoke to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who has been in the House since 1942. I asked him what the precedents were for this. I think he went back to 1966 or 1967 when the Hon. Judy LaMarsh was secretary of state. At that time she was piloting the Canada Pension Plan through the House of Commons. After a long debate in the House there arose considerable opposition from certain reactionary forces in the country which I shall not name. A number of people went to her and said, "For the sake of Canadians, why do you not put on an advertising program saying why we need the Canada Pension Plan?" Her response was that it would not be proper, that it was a government proposal which had not been passed by Parliament. She indicated that it was not the law of the land and therefore the government had no moral right to advertise a proposal, which in fact was a partisan proposal of the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I say to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Justice that, under sections 42 and 46(1), indeed the Government of Canada has the power to go against the wishes of all the legislatures and all provincial parties of this country and to appeal directly in a referendum where it controls the timing, the money, the funding proposals and the wording of the question. It will write the question. In other words, it sets the rules. It is a loaded dice. That is not right; that is not proper. A right can be given through the amending formula in this resolution and then taken away through a manipulative referendum which denies the basic partnership and the basic essence of federalism.

My second concern is the whole question of equalization. We all endorse wholeheartedly the principle of equalization. I am very glad that it will be enshrined in the constitution of Canada because the very essence of a democratic socialist party is equality of condition. I think members should study very carefully section 31 of the resolution before us to see whether it will equalize conditions in Canada. I have read and reread that section, only to find out that it does not even mention equalization payments. There is no reference whatsoever to equalization payments in section 31. For example, the way this section is written, the government does not have to pay equalization payments. It can make direct grants to people in certain provinces where they qualify for equalization. In other words, it can pay moneys directly to people in Quebec and Newfoundland as citizens, despite the fact—

An hon. Member: Even corporations.

Mr. Nystrom: Perhaps corporations, as my friend said. It can bypass the duly elected local governments which historically have received equalization payments. It can do it for no other reason than to buy votes in a partisan manner, which I would not put past the Liberal party because of its traditional program over the years. I have only to ask people in Newfoundland and Quebec. They will confirm that this practice has been only too common in those two provinces.

We are a federation. We are supposed to try to reach a consensus before doing things. As my leader said, before acting unilaterally we must try as much as possible to have the consensus of all provinces and the federal government. I looked at the equalization proposal and I followed the conference across the street. Only one province supported the proposal in section 31 whereas nine provinces supported a different proposal. I have a copy of it here, but time does not permit me to read it. That proposal refers to the fact that Parliament and the Government of Canada are committed to making equalization payments to ensure provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation. It lists in more succinct detail the regulations that would govern the payment of equalization payments in the country. I say to the House, and through the media to the people of Canada, that we must take a look at section 31. It is not enough to endorse it in principle. Indeed we may be endorsing the Liberal party or any other government buying votes in provinces and going over the heads of the legislatures, instead of endorsing something on which all the provinces are agreed.

The third matter I should like to raise is an objection to sections 20 and 23 dealing with the official languages of our country. I find a bit of a double standard. Section 20 refers to two languages in federal institutions and parliament. When we get to determining whether or not numbers warrant, we find out that parliament will determine what the numbers are, whether numbers are warranted for bilingual services, whether numbers are warranted for French in the nine provinces that are predominantly English, whether numbers are warranted for English in Quebec.

• (1700)

Then we go on to section number 23. I support the fact wholeheartedly, as the Minister of Justice knows, of making sure that there are schools for Anglophones in Quebec and Francophones outside Quebec. We find out when we talk about where numbers are warranted, it is not the provinces, the provincial legislatures, or the people elected—and education is provincial—but it is left to the courts. I do not accept that double standard in federalism.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are signalling me to sit down. I see it is five o'clock and I did want to speak for five or six minutes more, if I could continue. With your permission, I will. If not, I will come back at eight o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, we did make an agreement yesterday to allow the hon. member's leader to continue until six o'clock. I think we should ask the consent of the House, especially that of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Sannich (Mr. Munro) who has seen this bill of his being passed over once in the summer, if he is willing. I think that we should not anticipate that every single day when we get to five o'clock we will intrude upon the business of private members' hour.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would agree to this request provided that the full hour is accorded to the debate on my bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Perhaps hon. members will excuse my own intervention. I think that if it is the will of the House to extend a few extra minutes to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) we will do so, but I think the ordinary course of adjournment should be followed, that is to say, at six o'clock. If there is not unanimous agreement for the hon. member to continue, we will proceed to private members' hour immediately.

Is there unanimous agreement for the hon. member to continue for not more than five minutes?

Mr. Collenette: We do not want to be difficult this early in the resumption of the session, and members on this side will certainly agree to allow the hon. member to continue for five to seven minutes. However, we do insist that private members' hour end at six o'clock, the allotted time, which seems to indicate that it would not be acceptable to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Nystrom: I can resolve this quickly. I am a very co-operative person. I will come back at eight o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before we move to private members' hour may I just deal with the adjournment debate which will take place later this evening.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro)—Airports—Victoria International—Absence of radar equipment; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—Energy—Oil—Sources of supply for eastern Canada; the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly)—Consumer and Corporate Affairs—Inquiry into oil industry—Release of information gathered.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved that Bill C-215, to amend the criminal law (punishment of certain offences), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we would ask that all preceding bills remain on the order paper and be allowed to stand since, as I said earlier, the hon. member did give up his turn in July and we would not want all the hon. members below him on the order paper to lose their places.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I was not in possession of the information indicating that other bills or motions were on the order paper, and the consent of the House is sought that they be allowed to stand. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for your co-operation. I have no gratitude at all for the co-operation that is extended to me from the other side of the House. I was prepared to agree to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) continuing and having that few minutes extended beyond six o'clock. I am very surprised that the government should say it is not going to be obstreper-ous this early—this is day two of the resumed session. It is already being obstreperous by not allowing the extra few minutes to the discussion of a very important bill.

As the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) has said, I did stand down on the day the House rose and I hoped, even then, that there would be some give on the government's side to introducing sane, sensible, meaningful proceedings in this House so that, as was promised by the government of the Thirty-first Parliament, all government members' bills would have two hours of debate and would be able to be voted upon—not talked on, but voted upon—as to whether they should go to committee. But I see that there has been no move to have the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization reconvened so that we can have meaningful debate on private members' bills. Therefore, I shall proceed with the discussion, my opening remarks on the second reading of this bill. I do hope it will not be talked out today. That is why I felt a failure of the Chair to see the clock at six for those few minutes might permit the government member to sit down—because I am sure one of them is planning to talk it out—so we could agree to have this matter go to committee for discussion, and come back to this House for a free vote. I mean a free vote, like one of those freedoms that this government claims to be putting into the charter of freedoms and rights.

Mr. Speaker, I am committed to the notion that man as a rational being is responsible for the acts he commits. The purpose of this bill, as will be seen on page 1A of the bill—

Mr. Blaikie: Will it be a free vote in your own party?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, there will be a free vote in this party, too. That is an undertaking given by the leader of this party a good many years ago, and he stands by it.

The purpose of this bill is to restore the death penalty for first degree murder and high treason while substituting a more humane mode of execution for hanging, because I abhor this notion that the television and press have of putting a noose on the screen and front pages to depict the sentence of death. The punishment for serious narcotic offences would also be stiffened to the point of the death penalty for persistent repeaters.

It may come as a surprise to some members of the House that the death penalty is on the statute books of Canada. Section 75 of the Criminal Code, which deals with piracy, indicates quite clearly that anyone who, in the commission of a piracy, for which offence he would be liable to imprisonment for life, murders or attempts to murder another person, or does any act that is likely to endanger the life of another person, shall be sentenced to death. That is the penalty. It is still on the statute books.

It is the purpose of the bill that if, under a certain set of circumstances, a rational being kills another, he has forfeited his right as a law-abiding citizen and the law should take its course. The course I propose is the death penalty. I say the murderer has demonstrated his unwillingness, or his unreadiness—it is a matter of degree—to live by the laws that others are prepared to obey, for one reason or another. He may demonstrate this unwillingness by carrying a deadly weapon and by using it.

The decision in the first place to carry a death-dealing weapon, be it a knife or a gun, is in itself a rational act and a preparation for a commission, in certain circumstances, of a crime. Although it could be a poker game for which this individual is setting out, it is more likely that in such circumstances he is on serious business, either to rob a bank or to hold up someone. This person carries with him a death-inflicting weapon and seems prepared to use it. If the individual had no weapon but his body and hands and was prepared to use them in such a way as to extinguish the life of another, the consequences are the same and the full effect of the law should be applied. My bill says that that full effect is death.

It should be clear that the intent of my bill is not vengeance but deterrence. The argument over deterrence will be heard interminably. I insist that it is a matter of belief. Those who believe that there is no deterrence are entitled to their opinion, but I feel that they should allow those who believe that the death penalty is a deterrent the entitlement of their opinions, and I would like to see a free vote on that matter.

With regard to statistics, how can we compare known statistics on those who have not drawn back with those who have drawn back at that fatal moment? They are not going to admit that they have drawn back. They are ashamed, thoroughly ashamed, of what they did and they do not want it known that they drew back because of a deterrent, but they did. On a statistical plane, I insist that there is no real valid means of comparison. So I insist that it is a matter of faith or belief that there is a deterrent in the presence of a death penalty on the statute books.

There are those, of course, who use the argument that it is abhorrent to take life. I abhor those who would take life out of a whim, fear or desperation, and without a fair and impartial trial. They are the judges and they take the life. Those are the ones whom I abhor. My concern is for the innocent victim. I can think of the many police officers who have in the performance of their duty lost their lives. I can think of a particular case which occurred within the last two or three weeks in my part of the world, I regret to say, in which an officer suffered death in the performance of his duty. He was just behind the counter of the police station. He left not only his wife, but a child and another child yet unborn. These are the people whom the law should protect.

Has rehabilitation proven its case? I suggest that the death penalty has proven its case very simply because the murderer is not able to commit a second murder. There are those who say they do not, but they do if we are to believe the press. I have before me a press clipping from April which describes the incident of a man who was being held in a triple killing. They do repeat the offence. They may not have been caught the first time. What about that creature—and I cannot think of a better word—in Chicago who went around enticing women into the bushes and murdering them out of hand? That man has forfeited any right he had to live in a civilized society. In another case a killer from Repentigny escaped on July 13, 1980, while he was being taken on a visit, presumably as a rehabilitation exercise, to Les Floralies in Montreal. He escaped, and stabbed a man.

What does this bill contain? Its provisions are broad and the crime is specific. There is provision for appeal and commutation. But once all recourse to a second or third look is exhausted, the sentence is final.

The bill speaks of treason. I do not think there should be any question in the world but that someone who has committed a treasonable act has forfeited the right to live in that society. Those who kill officers of the law and prison guards in the performance of their duties, such as in prison breaks, and those who kill fellow inmates should face the death penalty. If death occurs in the course of a highjacking, kidnapping or forcible confinement, rape, or attempt to commit rape or indecent assault, then the death penalty should be there to be used.

Finally, where there is a second offence of murder, once under the provisions of the current law and once under the provisions of this bill which might become law, the death penalty should be considered. I suggest that those who traffic in drugs in large quantities and who are apprehended committing that crime more than twice have forfeited their right to live in the society of this world, not just in the society in which that crime was committed.

This is a controversial bill and there is no question about it. But let us face the controversy and let the bill go to committee and emerge for a free vote.

I suppose one should not really deal with polls and percentages, but they exist nonetheless. The Gallup poll shows that 82 per cent of the people are in favour of the death penalty. My own poll in my own riding shows that 85 per cent of the people there are in favour of the death penalty. I have here another poll which was taken rather hastily one day by a radio station. All of the people in that poll supported the idea of at least some categories of murder being subject to the death penalty. I have another clipping which tells of a retired official from the Solicitor General's office who left his duties because he found that the members of Parliament were not addressing the real problems of crime. That clipping was found in The Globe and Mail of July 5, 1980.

There are those who would rather stay in prison than die because there is a chance of getting out. That is true. Here is a recent account of a convict who was given the option of life in prison, or death. He chose death. So I suggest that we proceed with our debate. I urge members on all sides of this House to allow this matter to come to a vote so that it may go to committee and be discussed at greater length, so that the issues can be examined in depth and detail, and so that it can come back to this House for a free vote.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) has presented his reasons for putting forward Bill C-215, in a very articulate and very reasoned manner. But many aspects of the bill trouble me. The title of this bill is the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1980. The explanatory note is far more serious, and it is the principle and assumptions upon which Bill C-215 is based that concern me.

The explanatory note reads as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to restore the death penalty for first degree murder and high treason, while substituting a more humane mode of execution for hanging. The punishment for serious narcotics offences would also be stiffened, to the point of the death sentence for persistent repeaters.

In discussing this bill it is necessary to cover some territory which has been explored many times in this House of Commons with regard to similar pieces of legislation. I believe this is because the suggestion of the hon. member is not new. At the same time, the arguments for and against capital punishment are not new and so I should like to spend a short time reviewing the recent history of capital punishment in Canada.

On July 14, 1976, by a free vote of 130 to 124, this House abolished the death penalty for all crimes under the Criminal Code. The then Bill C-84 culminated a trend toward abolition which began in common law countries such as Canada, over a century ago. The criminal law of England introduced the "Bloody Code" to Canada which, in 1763, called for death as the penalty for over 200 crimes. Later, between 1859 and 1865, the extent to which the death penalty applied in Canada was narrowed, so that capital punishment became applicable only for murder, treason, and rape.

By the late nineteenth century, reforms on the application of the death penalty were progressively introduced into Canadian law. Following World War II, Canada moved legislatively to narrow the crimes for which capital punishment could be applied—following the lead of the United Kingdom.

After a long process of review—including the joint parliamentary committee in 1953—which witnessed a trial ban which maintained the death penalty for murders of police and prison guards, the death penalty was abolished for all crimes.

Outside of Canada, the scope of application of the death penalty has been progressively restricted in law. As recently as April, 1980, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe adopted, by a wide margin, a resolution and recommendation favouring the abolition of the death penalty in all 21 member states of the Council of Europe.

In Canada and elsewhere in the world, the death penalty has been increasingly de-emphasized as a judicial instrument. A 1962 United Nations report concluded as follows:

> The abolition or suspension ... of the death penalty does not have the immediate effect of appreciably increasing the incidence of crime.

This is an empirical judgment: one which the author of Bill C-215 has not disputed.

But let me ask, Mr. Speaker, what kind of evidence can be brought forward in support of Bill C-215? What sorts of arguments can be asserted at this time which would lead this House to reopen a debate on the merits of capital punishment?

Perhaps it would be that the rate of homicide has increased. If our post-abolition experience in Canada had shown a disproportionate rise in the murder rate, which could be ascribed to abolition, then I could understand hon. members wishing to embark on a renewed debate on capital punishment.

Let us look at the evidence, Mr. Speaker. Allow me to refer you to the August, 1979, Statistics Canada publication entitled, unfortunately, "Homicide Statistics". Tables I and II of that document detail the situation with respect to homicide for the past several years.

Table I deals with homicide "incidents" which are distinguished from homicide "offences", which are detailed in Table II.

"Incidents" are defined as every single event in which homicide is committed.

"Offences" are defined as the total number of homicide victims in a given year.

Using either of these definitions, the 1978 rates for homicide in Canada were the lowest since 1974. The 1978 figures, as we are all aware, are the latest available on this subject.

The total rate of homicide incidents in 1974 was 2.46 per 100,000 population in Canada. The rate in 1975 went up to 2.77. In 1976, the year of abolition, the rate dropped to 2.66. In 1977, it rose marginally to 2.72. Then, in 1978, it fell again to 2.62.

Exactly the same pattern existed in the case of homicide offences. The 1974 rate of 2.67 was followed by a rise to 3.07 in 1975. This dropped to 2.89 in 1976, marginally rose to 3.03 in 1977, and finally in 1978 dropped to 2.80.

The 1978 murder incident rate of 2.35 per 100,000 population was the lowest since 1974. Similarly, the 1978 murder offences rate of 2.51 was also the lowest since 1974.

The principal conclusion which I would suggest we can draw from this data is that there is absolutely no evidence that the abolition of the death penalty for Criminal Code offences in 1976 has led to a disproportionate increase in the murder rate in Canada. In fact, as I have demonstrated, there has been a levelling off of that rate. The issue of changing murder rates in Canada cannot lead us to reconsider the question of abolition in this House.

Another point that I should like to raise with regard to the deterrent effect of capital punishment refers to the most recent information that I have available to me, which is an article in today's Globe and Mail. This deals with a study done in the United States regarding the deterrent effect of capital punishment by a sociologist at the University of California, Mr. David Phillips. The article reads as follows:

> Executions of convicted killers deter other murders for no longer than two weeks, says a new statistical study.
> David Phillips concluded from a three-year research project that the homicide rate drops during the week of a highly publicized execution and during the following week.
> But Mr. Phillips, a sociologist at the University of California at San Diego, found that the murder rate then begins rising. "Within five or six weeks of a publicized execution, the drop in homicides is cancelled by an equally large rise in homicides," he wrote.

So, Mr. Speaker, this new evidence, which is the latest evidence, takes into consideration all previous data that has been available. I do not know the statistical validity of this study, but if it is the latest information we have we will have to go with it until we can examine it more closely. Being the latest study, it indicates to me that there is no evidence that there is a permanent or long-lasting deterrent effect from capital punishment when it is used in a country as a means of punishment.

A second issue which concerns me is clause 6 of Bill C-215. This clause provides, in part, for the re-introduction of former Criminal Code provisions instructing a judge to seek the recommendations of a jury as to clemency.

The amendment to section 670 of the Criminal Code provides for a judge to put a question to a jury in the course of which jurors are told that if they make a specific recommendation with respect to commutation, such a recommendation will be drawn to the attention of the Solicitor General and will be given "due consideration by the Government of Canada".

If you read this part of clause 6 with the subsequent amendment to section 671 which states, "would allow commutation to life imprisonment only where a majority of the jury so recommends", major problems become apparent.

Under the wording of Bill C-215, it is entirely possible to foresee a situation in which five members of a jury recommended positively for commutation, while the other seven jurors made no recommendation at all. Under Bill C-215 the cabinet would be prevented from even considering commutation of such a death sentence, because the amendment to section 671 of the Criminal Code forbids such consideration except in cases where "a majority of the jurors who found the person guilty of the offence recommended in favour of commuting the sentence". Surely this outcome cannot be considered just or reasonable.

The wording in Bill C-215 is inadequate since it gives members of a jury no indication whatsoever that their failure to make a recommendation would have the mandatory effect of sending an individual to his death without the possibility of cabinet review.

Nevertheless, even if this fatal weakness were remedied in Bill C-215, it seems to me that the bill places an intolerable burden upon a jury by giving them the unprecedented power to remove the discretion of the governor in council even to consider cases for commutation.

There are absolutely no criteria in Bill C-215 to guide or limit the absolute discretion of a jury to make a clemency recommendation. Bill C-215 also has the effect of widening the scope of the application of the death penalty. Not only is the sentence of death to be imposed in cases of planned and deliberate murders, or murders of police officers and prison guards, but it is also to be imposed in cases of death caused by a person while committing other offences. These can include aircraft highjacking, kidnapping, rape, attempted rape and indecent assult, to name but a few.

● (1730)

To make my point, allow me, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the amendments to the Narcotics Control Act suggested in clause 10 of Bill C-215.

Presently, there is a maximum of life imprisonment for trafficking or possession for the purpose of trafficking, and there is a mandatory minimum seven-year term for importing or exporting.

The bill we are considering would establish as a judicial formula such things as the following: a mandatory minimum seven-year term for first offences; a mandatory minimum fourteen-year term for second offences and a mandatory death sentence for third offences.

Already, the seven-year term currently in law has been vigorously criticized by the Canadian Bar Association and by some judges. They feel it is too harsh. To replace the seven-year term with the formula set forward in Bill C-215 is completely intolerable. Bill C-215 would widen the scope of mandatory minimum sentences and provide for even harsher mandatory minimums, up to and including a sentence of death. In my opinion, this is unthinkable.

It seems to me there are but two reasons why anyone could put forward a bill which would bring back the death penalty. The first is the deterrent effect. In other words by having the death penalty on the statute books there would be fewer murders per 100,000 population in the future than in the past. I think the statistical evidence indicates that this is not the case in Canada both before and after capital punishment was abolished. In my view, the evidence does not support the deterrent effect, or at least the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) has not presented statistical evidence which would support his position and lead those who believe in the deterrent effect to support the bill.

The second reason one could put forward for bringing forward capital punishment is simply a desire for vengeance. I fear a situation where a civilized nation institutionalizes vengeance in its Criminal Code or in its criminal system. I think a system of government, a societal system, which builds upon itself or builds within itself a code of violence, begets violence.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We have got it.

Mr. Evans: I think that a situation where criminals are treated with violence leads to violence. I think that over time as a result of abolition of capital punishment we will find that because we do not institutionalize violence in our system in this way, we will probably wind up—I certainly hope this will be the case—with a fewer, rather than a greater, incidence of murder and such previously classed capital crimes. I hope that is the case. The evidence before me indicates some tendency in the direction I suggest. I will certainly want to watch that very carefully to see if that trend continues in the future. That is my hope, and until such other evidence can be brought to my attention, I hope that we will go no further in considering this legislation.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-215. However, before I do so, I wish to say that in my view it is rather unfortunate we are seeing the use of valuable parliamentary time in this private member's hour devoted to this subject when there are so many other important issues facing Canadian people.

An hon. Member: Why are you speaking, then? Sit down.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): For example, there is the issue of high unemployment, particularly among young people. I note that in the hon. member's own constituency there are serious layoffs in the shipbuilding industry. It is unfortunate that the hon. member chooses to speak on this subject, one which has been spoken about so many times in the past by members of his party and other parties, instead of speaking about layoffs in the shipbuilding industry. To talk at this time about capital punishment when so many people are out of work and when our resources are being sold out is unfortunate and is a reflection on the kind of priorities to which the party to my right is subjecting Parliament to at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I might remind the hon. gentleman that, to my recollection, as a general rule once a bill is before the House, as in this instance, it is not ordinarily the case that its origin is subject to comment. The hon. member has sought an opportunity to put a bill before the House and, to the best of my recollection, his motivation is not ordinarily one which should be the object of comment.

I want to make it clear that I am not referring to a standing order; I am working at the moment on my recollection. Perhaps the hon. member might pursue the debate in terms of the bill rather than the proposer's motives.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, with respect, I make no aspersions whatsoever on the motives of the proponent of this bill. I merely suggested that this was a reflection of the priorities of that particular party and, obviously, of that particular individual.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) for a moment on a point of order. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I do take issue with the hon. member who was just speaking. He is questioning my motives. The hon. member will recall that I accorded to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) the courtesy of allowing him to interfere with my time. The time was not of my choosing. The time of my choosing was July. I had the floor on that particular occasion, and I was asked to continue now. I do feel the rules of the House here prevail. If the speaker wishes to criticize the bill, he should do so and cease any criticism of the author.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, while the time may not have been of the hon. member's choosing, the point I was making concerned the subject itself which was of the hon. member's choosing and, as I say, that reflects the priorities of that particular member, and perhaps to a lesser extent of the party.

I turn now to consideration of the subject itself. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) has asked what are the priorities of this party. The priorities of this party are to build a decent society in this country, to reduce unemployment and to end the sell-out of our resources. If the hon. member wishes me to continue on this subject, I will be quite happy to do so. The hon. member is silent. In that event, I will turn to the subject of the bill before us.

We have heard already from the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) in terms of the technical drafting of this bill, and indeed it is deficient in a number of respects in that regard. However, I would point out that fortunately all three leaders of the political parties represented in this House are opposed to capital punishment and are on record as being opposed to capital punishment.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): But not to a vote.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): That includes the present leader of the Conservative party, I am pleased to say.

I might also point out that while the Conservative party was in government it took absolutely no steps whatsoever in the direction suggested by my hon. friend. I am pleased to note that. I am pleased to note that the initiative my hon. friend appears to be putting forward was in no way seen as a priority by the government his party formed for a short period of time in this country.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I was number one on the list.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I also point out that at this particular moment it is divisive, and it would be destructive to embark again on a lengthy parliamentary debate on this subject. More than 100 members of Parliament took part in the debate in 1976 on this subject. I suggest we should be getting on to far more important issues at this time, issues which affect the people of Canada such as those I referred to earlier, rather than spending valuable parliamentary and committee time debating this issue. This issue should be allowed to remain dead.

● (1740)

What are some of the concerns we have with this bill? My friend from Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) said, and I certainly accept his statement, that he is not motivated by vengeance. He said he is motivated by deterrence. Surely there is some obligation on my friend to provide evidence that the measures he is proposing would in some way deter the crime of murder. No evidence has been submitted by my friend to suggest that if we stick needles in people and kill them, that will somehow deter the commission of the offence of murder.

If my friend is concerned about deterrence, rather than suggesting as he does in his bill that the method of execution would be by intravenous injection of sodium thiopentol, an anaesthetic which in sufficient dosage leads directly to unconsciousness and death, he should be proposing public hangings or perhaps public stonings which would have a far greater deterrent effect.

Why should we be sticking needles in people behind closed doors if we are concerned about deterrence? Rather, I suggest my friend should adopt the example of civilized countries such as Iran which have more open forums in which to stone and otherwise indicate their disapproval of various offences which are deemed to be capital in that country.

I would also point to some of the types of punishment which have been meted out in the past which have not in any way helped to deter the crime of murder and to some of the other crimes which have been capital offences in the past. In the past in countries such as the United Kingdom, the following have been used and have failed as deterrents. We have seen burning at the stake, boiling in oil and water, iron coffins, burying alive, breaking on the wheel, drawing and quartering, decapitation. My friend behind me says don't give them ideas, there might be another bill coming.

We have also seen impaling, hanging, crushing, flaying, shooting—maybe it should be retroactive—exposure to insects, poisoning, throwing to animals, stoning, drowning, torturing, electrocution, asphyxiation, crucifixion, mayhem, which is the amputation of one or both legs. All of these have been used in the past in an attempt to deter and all have failed.

Why should it be suggested by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that sticking a needle in somebody behind closed doors will deter someone from committing the various offences which he would make capital? If someone is contemplating cold-blooded murder, surely he will not say to himself, "Well, I only face 25 years behind bars, so that's no problem". The reality is that they do not think about the penalty. Most think that they are too smart to get caught or are acting in a moment in which their emotions are governing, and certainly they are not acting rationally.

There are a number of other concerns we have with this bill. For example, in no way will this lead to an improvement of our criminal justice system and to a reduction in the number of murders in Canada. Instead, we should be looking at a number of other more positive and constructive measures. We should be looking at better trained, better deployed and better equipped police. We should be looking at more effective gun control, particularly hand gun control; preventive, rather than reactive police work, and more effective correctional programs for juveniles and adults. The resources presently put into juvenile programs when dealing with juvenile delinquents are miserably inadequate. We should be improving them substantially.

We should be looking at more effective and economic programs to remove the causes of crime and improve treatment for alcoholics and drug addicts. In other words, we should be attempting to prevent murders in this country by effective programs rather than dealing after the fact in a manner which will not in any way reduce the number of murders. As has been suggested by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), that merely sets a bad example in which the state is emulating the very act which it is condemning. The state is merely repeating that act.

There are those who seek to glorify or make martyrs of themselves. If the crime of murder were punishable by death, this would contribute to those individuals who seek the glory; the Gary Gilmours of this world who seek the publicity and exposure they would get in such a case.

Recently in one of our newspapers there was a letter to the editor headlined "A standard of humanity". I draw this to the attention of all hon. members as being a very vivid and graphic example of one of the reasons why we believe on this side of the House that this bill is a mistake. This letter was written by the widow of Sir Christopher Ewart-Biggs, a former British ambassador to Dublin. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich may be aware that Sir Christopher Ewart-Biggs was assassinated by the IRA. This letter was written by his widow, Lady Ewart-Biggs, following the assassination. I quote:

As capital punishment will be coming up soon for debate in the Commons, I am sure that some readers will welcome the use of your columns to express their views.

I would point out in explanation that the subject of capital punishment was recently debated in the U.K. Parliament. A motion in that Parliament to restore capital punishment was overwhelmingly defeated. The letter continues:

I look at this issue from a practical and moral viewpoint. Is hanging a deterrent to killing and is it morally defensible that the community should be empowered to decide on whether one of its members lives or dies?

Statistics convince me that the threat of execution does not deter the potential murderer. This leaves the moral standpoint. In my view it should be the responsibility of a civilized society to contain the destructive elements within it without resorting to similar methods. This whilst striving through social reform to eradicate the root causes of crime and violence. We must judge the criminal, condemn him, isolate him—but not emulate him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Siddon: Will the hon. member for Burnaby permit a question in view of the fact he is now speaking of morality?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): No, Mr. Speaker. I continue the letter:

On another aspect, and one which touches me deeply. It is felt that certain categories of murder justify the supreme penalty more than others. Murder through terrorist action is deemed one. Again, from both practical and moral viewpoints, this is to me indefensible. Society cannot degrade its own behaviour to match that of a terrorist.

It must, within the limitations imposed by a democratic state, wage continual war against the terrorist and strive to protect the community from his action.

I am convinced that the execution of a terrorist—thus making him a martyr—would infinitely enrich his cause. Many would rally with renewed vigour to fill his place. His supporters, sharing his contempt for human life, would in retaliation make further reprisals.

Surely the arguments which I have put forward can be shared by every sane, civilized, and compassionate human being.

As I say, that was written by the widow of Sir Christopher Ewart-Biggs, who was brutally assassinated by IRA terrorists. If any member of our community were in a position to wreak vengeance or in any way suggest that capital punishment is a deterrent, I suggest that a woman such as Lady Ewart-Biggs would have done so.

● (1750)

A former leader of the Conservative party, the late Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, had a story about the alleged deterrent effects of capital punishment. I should like to quote it because I know members of his party would be interested in this story, and I know that perhaps after hearing it they would want to change their views on this important subject. Mr. Diefenbaker said as follows:

My great-grandfather saw a boy hanged in Upper Canada for picking pockets in 1837. I think the boy was 17 years of age and everybody gathered for the public execution.

Those Scottish people in North York turned out in large numbers.

There was a great celebration, and during the ceremonies of the execution, four of them had their pockets picked, which just indicates the argument that the fear of capital punishment will greatly reduce the number of offences is not completely tenable, or indeed tenable at all.

That illustration, as I say, was from the distinguished lawyer and former leader of the Progressive Conservative Party.

There are other problems inherent in this bill and one of them is, of course, the fact that we have seen traditionally in this country, and in other countries, that the enforcement of capital punishment is very selective in nature. The reality is that it is not the rich who hang; in fact, it is the poor who hang. I would like to quote from a former warden of Sing Sing prison who has seen a lot of convicts come and go, Lewis E. James. He said as follows:

Not only does capital punishment fail in its justification—

That justification allegedly is deterrence.

—but no punishment could be invented with so many inherent defects.

It is an unequal punishment in the way it is applied to the rich and to the poor. The defendant of wealth and position never goes to the electric chair or to the gallows.

Juries do not intentionally favour the rich, the law is theoretically impartial, but the defendant with ample means is able to have his case presented with every favourable aspect, while the poor defendant often has a lawyer assigned by the court.

We have seen once again selective enforcement of the law, a law which obviously in its ramifications is very serious. We have also seen historically documented cases of errors made, of innocent people who have been executed by the state. Surely if members on this side of the House are concerned about the preservation of human life they would not want to bring into existence a punishment which has the possibility of taking innocent human lives.

I should like to point to a couple of examples. One is cited in the Ottawa Citizen of May 20, 1976 relating to a man who spent seven years in jail for a murder which, ultimately it became clear, he had not committed. Another person confessed to the murder and showed by conclusive proof that indeed he was the person who had committed the murder. Had the condemned man been executed, it would have meant an innocent life taken.

In concluding let me say that this is an issue which touches many people in Canada and on which many organizations and individuals have genuine differences of view. I would like to close by quoting from one important organization in this country, the Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops. That Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops has resolved that it is in favour of the abolition of capital punishment in Canada. At the same time it urged the government to move to bring about the reforms which are required in our penitentiary system and in all areas of justice. I am pleased that the Catholic Church has taken such a courageous stand on this important question. I suggest at this time that to embark once again upon a divisive and destructive debate of this nature when there are so many other important issues facing the people of Canada would be a very serious mistake. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why members of the NDP get so disturbed about a resolution like this. It hits at their very conscience. They are quite in favour of murdering little babies that are unborn but they are very much against the death penalty for someone who kills a little girl, a child. I think that is the reason they are so disturbed.

I want to deal with some of the reasons—

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I must take exception to the remarks by my friend, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), and his statement that is completely without foundation. We are in no way in support of the murder of innocent children. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement as being completely unfounded.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of withdrawing it because the very member himself and one of his colleagues acted in favour of abortion during the last session. If he has changed his mind let him stand and refute his own statement.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member took up a lot of time. Surely he can hear the other side of the argument.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member rises on a point of order. I am perfectly aware that a misunderstanding took place between two hon. members as to whether a reference was made to abortion or to the murder of young people. What is happening now is that we are having a debate between one member and the other as to what has or has not been said. I think the hon. member should be allowed to continue. There is relatively little time left, and unless the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) insists on pursuing his point of order, the hon. member should be allowed to continue. The hon. member has distinguished his previous statements, he has made the correction he wants made on the record. I will recognize him on a point of order but I would ask that the hon. member for Bow River be allowed to continue the debate.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief, but I must insist that any suggestion that either myself as a member of Parliament or any of my colleagues in any way condone murder, however murder is applied—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I took the trouble to advise the hon. member for Burnaby that this was not what was said. I heard perfectly clearly what was said by the hon. member for Bow River. I would suggest a reference to Hansard if that is necessary. What is taking place now is not a point of order but an argument over what has been said.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I believe in capital punishment, the death penalty, in the case of a murder of a human being that has been deliberately planned and carried out and the person is found guilty without any shadow of doubt.

When we are young we are punished if we do something wrong; if we do something even more wrong we are punished more severely, yet people today are saying that when we commit the ultimate crime of killing another human being we should not then receive the ultimate punishment.

I think capital punishment is a deterrent. It is utterly impossible to determine how many people were not killed because of the fear of death. The argument against that is rather void. In my view the fact that people fear death makes this a realistic deterrent.

The death penalty is an effective tool that pinpoints law and order. The abolitionists appear to have no objection to punishing a child for stealing or a grown-up for rape. Why then in the logical order of things do we not go the rest of the way and exact the death penalty for those who commit the worst possible crime, the killing of another human being?

Violent crime is becoming all too rampant across Canada. The elderly and women are afraid to walk outside after dark in some of our cities. Boys and girls are being murdered by animals, as I call them. We then put the convicted in jail, provide them with education, the best of TVs and food and we keep them there for the rest of their lives. One of these days all these criminals being kept in these prisons will get together and commit a terrible crime. Perhaps then people might realize that these criminals who have taken the lives of others have no right to live. We give too much consideration to the criminal. Let us give some consideration to those who are the sufferers, the victims of the criminals.

I would move, Mr. Speaker, that the question be now put.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that we have to reflect on how valuable life is and how sacred it is. The sages of old have said "He who saves a life is as if he saved an entire world, and he who destroys a life is as if he destroyed an entire world". How tragic it is to see an innocent man die.

Capital Punishment

There are few countries in this world which enjoy the unique distinction Canada has enjoyed in having demonstrated its commitment to human rights, and in providing freedom for its people. It is a country to which men and women from all over the world have come in order to enjoy such freedom and rights. Both in Canada, as well as beyond its borders, we must continue to be vigilant in our concern for these rights and freedoms. We must not be just average, we must set an example, and our efforts must extend both to the rights of the individual as well as to the rights of the social group.

● (1800)

The overwhelming need for this concern is strikingly demonstrated by the case of Raoul Wallenberg, whose rights as an individual were totally denied him while he himself was engaged in protecting the human rights of others in Hungary. His case provides us with a fascinating and remarkable example, which stands as a warning about the dangers of government having the power of life and death in its hands. His is the case of an innocent man condemned to death.

Thirty-five years ago a young Swedish Christian diplomat named Raoul Wallenberg disappeared suddenly under the arrest of the Soviet secret police. It was a mystery because he had helped to save thousands from dying at the hands of the Nazis. Lost hero of the holocaust, a righteous gentile, an unsung war hero, saviour of Hungarian Jews, champion of the Jewish people—these are but a few of the tributes now being paid, worldwide, to Raoul Wallenberg.

During the past few months, some 35 years after that Swedish diplomat's disappearance behind the iron curtain, "Free Wallenberg" committees have sprung up all over the world. Articles, books, television programs and, most important of all, a recent documentary entitled "The Wallenberg Mystery"—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock, we were on government business, item no. 18, and the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) had the floor.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I believe I had a few more minutes to go at five o'clock. I was talking about minority language rights when it came to education. But for a moment or two I should like to review what I said earlier. I started off by saying that this party thinks we have come to a time in history when we need a constitutional change in this country, and I said that later on in this debate other members would talk about the need for changes in a number of areas, one of them being changes with regard to our native Canadians, the original people, another one being the failure of the government to refer in this resolution to offshore resources. I spoke about the absolute necessity to have something in this resolution about resources. This is very important, not just to western Canada but indeed to all provinces in our country. Without the inclusion of resources, I want to make it very clear that I do not see this resolution supported by people in western Canada. That resource section is absolutely vital. I also said earlier that we have grave concerns about section 42 of the resolution. That is the part of the resolution where the federal Parliament can unilaterally hold a referendum on a constitutional matter in this country. Regardless of what a provincial legislature may do, regardless of whether or not in a provincial legislature all the parties are united in opposing a referendum, a referendum may be held and it may pass because the federal government is playing with loaded dice. They have control of the referendum question, they write the question, they determine the funds and they determine all the rules for that referendum. I find that to be highly unacceptable, as I said before the supper hour.

I also referred to the section on equalization and said that we agree in principle to equalization. But in the resolution before us today—and I wish hon. members would take a look at it—there is no reference at all to equalization payments. I find that absolutely disgusting and unacceptable. Under the formula, which only one province supported at the conference here a month ago, nine provinces argued for a different approach. I say we must change that to make sure that equalization payments are referred to and that a system such as the provinces want is included. There is a system that is talked about in here, one where the federal government can go over the heads of provincial governments and make payments directly to individuals in various provinces. That is not right and not fair and I find it very difficult to support that kind of approach.

The fourth point about which I was really concerned, and I was speaking about this in detail at five o'clock, arises in sections 20 and 23 dealing with official languages. As I said, in section 20 we are talking about the official languages as they pertain to the federal Parliament and to federal institutions. There is a reference here to the phrase "where numbers warrant", but it is the federal Parliament which is going to decide whether or not the numbers warrant it. But when one turns to section 23, one finds it talks about minority language educational rights and when we get to "where numbers warrant", all of a sudden there is a double standard and we see that it is not the provinces, with their control over education which will determine that, but it is the courts which will make that determination. I say this is not acceptable. It is not acceptable to have that double standard in federalism where, on the one hand, Parliament will make decisions which affect our institutions while, on the other hand, when it comes to the provinces, matters are left to the courts to decide.

I wanted to refer very briefly to a communiqué which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is very fond of quoting. He quoted this communiqué last Thursday evening in the televised address to the people of this country. It is a February, 1978, communiqué from the premiers who met in Montreal when they spoke about language rights in education. They said:

> The premiers reaffirm their intention to make their best efforts to provide education to their English or French-speaking minorities, and in order to ensure appropriate levels of services, they also agree that the following principles should govern the availability of, as well as accessibility to, such services;
> (i) each child of the French-speaking or English-speaking minority is entitled to an education in his or her language in the primary or the secondary schools in each province wherever numbers warrant

That is what the Prime Minister refers to when he talks about all the premiers agreeing to this. But what he does not say is what is contained in the second part of the communiqué, which I think is very important. It reads:

> (ii) It is understood, due to exclusive jurisdiction of provincial governments in the field of education, and due also to wide cultural and demographic differences, that the implementation of the foregoing principle—

—which is "where numbers warrant"—

> —would be as defined by each province.

There is a very important difference here and I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) that he accept that principle because there are demographic differences in this country from one province to the other. Education is under the exclusive authority of the provincial governments, and if we are going to have Parliament define "where numbers warrant" in the case of federal bilingualism, we should make sure the same rights reside with the provincial legislatures, that they define where numbers warrant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2010)

Mr. Nystrom: I have a number of concerns about the resolution before us. I suppose I am airing those concerns as a warning to the government. A lot has been written about the fact that the government has widespread support among its people for what it is doing. But within that support I detect a great deal of apprehension about a number of things in the resolution. I detect a great deal of apprehension in western Canada, Quebec, Newfoundland and among the original peoples of this country, just to name a few. Because those apprehensions are there, I have made four or five points today—a number of further points will be made by my colleagues later.

I mentioned original peoples and offshore resources. Those apprehensions are there because of the process which occurred over the summer and the fact that the government failed to widen the negotiating process as was suggested by my leader and the leader of the Conservative party last June. Also, the apprehension is there because of the advertising campaign launched by the government at a cost of $6 million over the course of the summer. Also it is there because the budget of the unity information office has been increased from $9 million or $10 million to around $33 million. We wonder what is to come.

In conclusion I should like to make one more suggestion to the government. It was contained in a resolution passed by my party on September 7. It was supported by my leader, my caucus and the national council of the party. It was a bit of advice for the government concerning future constitutional negotiations which we hope will be ongoing. I should like to read part of the resolution. After the September 8 to September 12 conference we recommended the following:

> —that a new round of deliberations be started almost immediately and that the conference participants include multiparty delegations selected by Parliament and each of the provincial legislatures—in addition, that the original peoples be given the right to direct representation and vote in the deliberations; in addition, that multiparty delegations from the territories be given the right to direct representation and vote in the deliberations;

in addition, a delegation of women's organizations be given the right to direct representation and vote in the deliberations; that a series of regional meetings be held by this group across Canada.

In effect this would bring the discussion on the constitution closer to the people of Canada. It is important to learn a few lessons from what has happened and to widen the negotiating process to include the government and the opposition here, the governments and the opposition parties of all legislatures, the legislatures of the two territories, the original peoples and women's organizations. In my opinion the constitution belongs to more than just 11 men. All the heads of government in this country happen to be men, and I am not sure that all the views of Canada with its divergent regions and people can be properly reflected in the process that has gone on until now.

I suggest to the government that we should broaden the process and that the process should be started as soon as possible. We should consider making serious changes to the resolution before us. We should dig out the repugnant section on the direct referendum to be organized solely and exclusively by the government. It strikes at the very essence of federalism. It can take away by referendum what has been given in a charter of rights in a time of emotional concern. We should entrench the philosophy of equalization payments so that there may be genuine equality of condition across the country. We should not have a double standard when it comes to federalism.

Sections 20 and 23 refer to the official languages, which is a very sensitive issue. If it is good enough for Parliament for us to define "where numbers warrant" concerning our institutions, programs and things we do, then surely in the name of equity, co-operative federalism and fairness, it is for the provinces to define "where numbers warrant" when it comes to education in minority languages rather than leaving it to the courts.

Finally changes are absolutely necessary in the area of resources so that there may be access to indirect taxation, concurrent powers with the provinces in international and interprovincial trade with federal paramountcy because it is international and interprovincial. There must be a clarification of resource ownership. I appeal to the government to seek such a consensus, to listen to all members of Parliament and indeed to some of its own backbenchers, some of whom are not happy at all with a number of matters in the resolution before us. I appeal to the government to listen to the people of Canada, the various provincial political parties both government and opposition from one coast to the other. If the government does this, perhaps it will be a very historic beginning, the beginning of a new Canada, not the end, or something which will turn out to be a very tragic nightmare.

I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) running out. I hope he heeds our words and makes some very serious changes to this resolution. If he does I assure him all Canada will applaud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to follow such a distinguished member of the House as the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), particularly after the remarks he made in closing when he indicated how important he thought it was to the country and its people that this Parliament be the focal point for this debate.

There is a certain moment in each decade and generation when events begin to converge and Parliament becomes the centre of the nation. In the past many commentators have assessed that Parliament is no longer the power it once was, that it is the executive, the cabinet, which is the centre of influence. Some have even suggested that there is a new level of government in Canada called the federal-provincial conference which makes the real decisions about how we are to be governed. I believe this debate once again shows how relevant and valuable an institution Parliament is. I for one am very glad that the debate has finally come to its proper home. The debate about the constitutional laws of this country is now outside the arena of the federal-provincial conference and in an arena where the full range of opinions and views in all regions can be heard, expressed, debated and discussed.

In the end, this is the place where the choice should be made. It should not be made around a table by 11 people who, though they represent regions, do not in any way represent the full range of opinions and views withtin those regions. As one of the western members on the government benches, I think it is very important that I express this other point of view which I, together with hundreds of thousands of western Canadians believe, was not expressed at the federal-provincial conference last September.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: No one representing the provinces around that table whether it was Mr. Lougheed, Mr. Blakeney, Mr. Lyon or Mr. Bennett, spoke for the kind of political traditions and concerns which many of us from the west feel. I am not saying there are not others in this House who would not agree with the Lougheeds, the Bennetts and the Lyons, because we have already heard from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that he is basically taking the position of the provincial premiers. He spoke at great length about the Trojan horse. Well, Mr. Speaker, he is a horse of another colour. He is a stalking horse for the provincial premiers and he is simply representing their point of view once again, which is legitimate enough, there is no problem with that. It does mean we should be very careful and very cautious that we do not assume it is the only point of view which is being heard or expressed in the west, because there are many westerners who believe there is a need for a strong central government, that there is a need for a bill of rights, there is a need for repatriating the constitution, and they want action now. That was not a voice which was being heard at the conference or has yet been heard by members of the Conservative party in this House. In fact, what has really been heard is more the Cassandra-like wails of woe-betide-the-country, that this will devour the nation, that this will be the downfall of Canadian democracy. There are times, listening to the Leader of the Opposition, when I am reminded of the character in the Woody Allen movie who said: "We stand at the crossroads; on the one hand there is total extinction and on the other utter annihilation." Not much of a choice. The danger we have to be fearful of here is not this resolution. The real danger we have to watch out for is the fearmongers in this country who are attempting to use this resolution and this initiative as a way of raising fears and alarms throughout Canada and creating their own divisiveness with those tactics alone. A concern to our caucus and a concern to us in the west is that somehow the rest of Canadians will take as the representatives of the west those provincial premiers who have their own objectives, legitimate as they may be, for fighting for their own continuation in the power game they have been playing for decades. We should not assume that this is the full range of points of view coming from my region of the country because they do not speak for the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or for many of the members in the New Democratic Party. Yet that was the only point of view being heard at the conference and that is why it is critical at this time, in this Parliament, that we have the opportunity to hear from people with all ranges of points of view.

● (2020)

It is important to dispel some of the myths which have been perpetrated about what this resolution really means. The first was the one that was parlayed in this House last night and is being heard across the land. Mr. Lougheed talks of total war and the Leader of the Opposition was expressing that this was the final moment, this was the Armageddon, that he was concerned that somehow the country was going to break into pieces, that somehow the federal government, with this resolution, is involved in some dark conspiracy to fundamentally change the framework of Canada. It is like the Lyon approach which says that we are on the slippery slide of republicanism. The fact of the matter is we have to look at what the resolution is really all about, what are the elements of this grand conspiracy about which Mr. Lyon, the Leader of the Opposition and others are beating the drums of fear across the nation. Well, we are talking about bringing the constitution back to Canada. That is really a radical and extreme measure—that the country wants to have its own constitution. Now, isn't that an awful thing to consider, Mr. Speaker, that we may want the power to amend our own constitution? But then they say: Look, how you are going to amend it; you are going to have a referendum. That is how section 42 has somehow been raised as the great bogeyman of this constitutional debate. They somehow found something in the resolution that expresses in some way the deep, dark conspiracy of the Liberal party to destroy Canada in section 42. What was it really all about, Mr. Speaker? It simply said that somehow we are denying the rights of the provinces. Well, then, they haven't read section 42 very carefully. What we have said in this resolution is that the provinces have a full and equal chance to present a new amending formula—

Mr. Andre: What about section 42?

Mr. Axworthy: —and we can negotiate that. And if they don't like that, they can have the Victoria formula. The provinces have full and equal rights, Mr. Speaker. Then, we say if they cannot agree to that, we must go to a referendum. So they are saying they don't trust us. But, after all, section 42 requires a debate in this House. Well, what we are saying is that obviously the members of the Conservative party are expressing a deep mistrust of the procedures and processes of Parliament itself. This is an unusual thought for me because I have always believed they were the guardians and defenders of the parliamentary system. I have heard them defend this. They don't want a bill of rights because they have said they can depend on Parliament, but when it comes to the Magna Carta they cannot depend upon Parliament. They cannot have it both ways. Either you believe in Parliament or you do not believe in Parliament. You cannot believe in Parliament on the question of amendment but not believe it on the bill of rights. So they should get their act straight and decide whether they do believe in Parliament and on what issues.

Mr. Andre: We don't believe in a dictatorship!

Mr. Axworthy: That is part of the other conspiracy. Somehow they have refined the art of character assassination, somehow this is a deep, evil plot by the Prime Minister of this country, something he has been hatching over the years—

Mr. Andre: That is it.

Mr. Axworthy: That is the myth. That is the great Tory lie in this country. That is the great Tory mythology which they have spread up and down this country. Why? Because they cannot use logic, they cannot use reason, they cannot use rationality. So what do they use? They use personality assassination. That is the nature of their attack. It is an interesting comment, you can always tell when the other side does not have an argument because that is when they start picking on people. It goes right back to schoolyard politics and battles. If you really do not have a basis of reason and rationality, what do you do? You pick on the person. We have found out that this art has been developed to a fine form by members over there, because they do not have much reason, much rationality or logic in their position.

Thus we hear the Premier of Manitoba and other members from the opposition saying that a bill of rights is unCanadian, that a bill of rights is really going to destroy the fundamental traditions of our country, that we should adhere to the British system of common law. I am sure hon. members would be interested in the September 22 copy of the Manchester Guardian I have here. It says Lord Hailsham and Sir Keith Joseph and all the members of the Margaret Thatcher government are doing two things: one, they are considering a new charter of rights for the British Parliament and, two, they have just ratified the European Convention of Human Rights. I have known that Margaret Thatcher and her government have been held up as paragons of excellence by members opposite. I would suggest they read what their counterparts in Great Britain are talking about. Why? Because even the Thatcher government recognizes and understands that when the country becomes complex and pluralistic there must be some fundamental set of rights as a standard by which people can determine what their guarantees and protections are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: They say the bill of rights is something which is foreign to our traditions because we are afraid of the courts; we cannot go to the courts. They say we should depend on the legislatures.

An hon. Member: They are unreliable.

Mr. Axworthy: Maybe they are unreliable but we use them every day. What about the Bliss case, the Lavallee case and the Drybones case, all the cases being judged by our courts every single day dealing with questions of human rights? The weakness in their argument is that there is not a bill of rights upon which the courts can properly decide. The Canadian Bill of Rights which was passed in this House in the early sixties is not strong enough and the Supreme Court decisions have said that they need further guidance from this Parliament on the constitution in order to establish a common standard of rights across Canada. That is why we do need a bill of rights—not only to make sure there is an evenness and equality in those opportunities and rights, but it is also needed to set directions for the courts in the decisions they are making every single day dealing with matters of human rights in this country. There is nothing untraditional or uncommon about the courts dealing in these matters.

Then we come to the argument that I have heard Mr. Lyon use. He says we should trust the legislatures, trust the legislature of Manitoba. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, did George Forrest trust the legislature of Manitoba to get his rights as a French-speaking Manitoban guaranteed? No. He had to go to traffic court to get his rights guaranteed. I was a member of that legislature for several years and I was there when a resolution was initiated by our party, and rejected by the other parties, trying to establish some basic fundamental rights.

● (2030)

The legislature of Manitoba spoke so well to the issue of linguistic rights in that province, that Mr. Forrest had to go to a traffic court to have his rights protected because our legislature was not prepared to deal with these rights.

Mr. Andre: How about Peter Treu's treatment by your party?

Mr. Axworthy: The large voice from the other side, he has the point—that you do not trust any party or any majority. That is why we need the entrenchment of a charter of rights which cannot be touched by the ephemeral decisions of a majority. It does not matter what party is in power in which legislature. This is why we need a fundamental charter.

Mr. Andre: Why a referendum if the majority of decisions are ephemeral? Be logical. You can't have it both ways.

Mr. Axworthy: That is exactly what we said, but the member from Calgary, according to his past history, wants it all ways and usually gets it that way too.

Mr. Andre: If you are going to lecture about logic, I suggest you listen to your own rhetoric.

Mr. Axworthy: There are many people in western Canada who feel, because we are the most multicultural society and the most pluralistic region in the country, that it is absolutely essential that we have a bill of rights. This fact has not been expressed by western members or western premiers. In fact there is an increase in discrimination against the new ethnic groups moving into the west. In a recent study by a social scientist from Alberta, of all places, it was shown that discrimination was on the increase during the 1970s and that ethnic groups themselves are far more concerned about such fundamental protection, protection which they want.

So there are many people in the west who want a bill of rights. There are many people in western Canada who feel it is important that it be entrenched in the constitution. They do not buy the great conspiracy theory which says that somehow it is all unparliamentary or unCanadian to include such a charter of rights in our constitution. In fact they feel it is the best way of enhancing our fundamental freedoms, rights and liberties, and they are prepared when the chips come down to back us on this particular issue.

Let us deal with another one of the great myths about which I have heard the provincial premiers and their spokesmen in this House, the Leader of the Opposition, talk, that somehow this is all a federal plot to pick on those poor, weak, defenceless provinces of the west, those poor provinces which are struggling to survive. That just does not conform to reality because the fact of the matter is that for the last ten or 15 years of this confederation powers have been devolving rapidly to the provinces and the fact of the matter is that the provinces have by far the largest expenditures from the public purse. They make close to 50 per cent of the public expenditures in this country, 15 per cent more than what is spent by the federal government. If those trends continue, the ratio will be 75/25 in ten years' time.

The provinces are not defenceless and weak, but in fact are very powerful. At the present moment, our federation is probably the weakest and most decentralized of any federal system in the world. The reality we must face is that if we intend to manage and deal with the conditions and issues we must face in this decade, then we need a far more effective central government to provide that effective management and growth.

The fact of the matter is these powerful provincial premiers do not want change. Of course they do not want change. They want the status quo, because they have the chips on their side.

Why would they deal away a winning hand. What we are talking about, of course, is a power play or a power game being played by the provincial premiers and, of course, they will stand up on their hind legs and rear because they do not want to share any of their powers. It is far more important to them in their political mandates to amass more power and more influence. The question arises, though, whether this is good for the country. Is this really what is necessary at the present time having regard to the problems and conditions that we will face in this decade?

I am here as a western Canadian saying, "No, it is not what we need". If we allow devolution to continue and decentralization to take place, then we as western Canadians will have given away one of the great opportunities in this country to help our region grow. The fundamental assumption which is being made by members of both the Conservative party and the New Democratic Party is that it is only the provinces which can manage this new growth in western Canada, that it is only the provinces and provincial jurisdictions which should be the managers of the new wealth.

Mr. Malone: Who said that?

Mr. Axworthy: You have all been saying that.

Mr. Malone: Name one person.

Mr. Axworthy: I do not have time to name all of you. The fact is that we did offer concessions to the provinces. This seems to have been conveniently forgotten among the hysteria and exaggeration implying that somehow there is a Liberal conspiracy to destroy the provinces. I saw the list of concessions which was assembled for the constitutional conference. We were prepared to share the powers of taxation with the provinces on resources. We were prepared to share interprovincial trade and powers over communications and fisheries. Where was the conspiracy against the provinces in those concessions?

However, Mr. Speaker, if one looks at the other side of the ledger at what those generous, open-hearted visionary provinces were offering, it adds up to one big goose egg. They were playing the game of "heads I win, tails you lose". It was a classic no-bargain, no-win game. The federal government would have betrayed its fundamental mandate if we had even listened to that kind of blackmail. We went into those conferences with all the right intentions to bargain and to share and to deal with the provinces, but we did not get anything in return.

What we must really examine at this point, because I believe it is important to the debate, is really what kind of federal state is necessary to take advantage and develop the new-found opportunities of western Canada. There has been historically and is a strong and abiding role for the federal government, but this has been conveniently forgotten by hon. members opposite. When the prairies were in trouble during the depression, it was the federal government which moved in with the wheat board, the PFRA and other kinds of grain acts. It was the federal government which used its declaratory powers to bring in the Wheat Board in order to protect the western farmer. Those are the very powers we are being asked to give away at the present time.

It embarrasses me at times to hear the kind of expressions which come from certain western politicians, including the premier of my province, who has no business saying what he says because we are a have-not province. We need equalization, not him saying, "Now that we have ours, we are going to keep it". Suddenly equalization, which was one of the basic touchstones for western Canada for many years, can be conveniently forgotten because we have discovered a big pool of oil and gas below our soil.

This kind of spirit in western Canada is not the kind of traditional spirit of which I feel a part. It may be the tradition which has been there historically, a kind of New Englander approach—how to shrink your horizons, in your dimensions and draw yourself into a fetal position for utmost protection. That is not the only point of view that is being heard in the west. There are many westerners who say they would like to share and the only vehicle and mechanism for that sharing is the federal government. That sharing must be in our interest as westerners as well as in the interests of the entire country.

In the next decade we will go through an amazing growth in the west. We will be putting billions of dollars into railroads, water systems, research and development and industrialization. By their nature there must be some degree of cross-regional management in these areas.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: I hear a harrumph from the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I am glad he has finally come awake in this debate. The fact is we must recognize the realities, not dreams and fantasies. Let me use an example from my own department.

Mr. Lambert: You would not dare make that speech in Winnipeg.

Mr. Axworthy: I have made that speech in Winnipeg five times in the past two weeks. I am going to the hon. member's province on Thursday to make it again, and he is invited to come. In fact, I will be glad to accept an invitation from the hon. member to speak at his next riding association meeting. They might find it educational.

• (2040)

Let us look at one dimension that concerns my ministerial responsibilities, namely, the enormous movement of people, both within and outside the region in western Canada. We are talking about the need to develop 30,000 or 40,000 skilled jobs per year for western Canada. We are talking about training hundreds of thousands of people over the next decade to do the work that is necessary to ensure the growth of the west. We are talking about trying to make sure that this enormous employment opportunity is available to the native people of western Canada and to women in this country. We are talking about using the enormous growth potential that exists.

When I start negotiating how to provide these skills and this training I find, increasingly, provincial barriers to the movement of labour or certification laws which provide that people cannot work in a certain place because they do not have a white piece of paper—their paper is not the right colour. When we try to sign training agreements with industries in western Canada, right away the provincial governments say we cannot have training agreements with their industries. When we talk about introducing affirmative action programs to make sure there is equal opportunity for native people, the provincial governments tell us they do not believe in affirmative action. They claim there is no inequality in their provinces and they do not have affirmative actions, and therefore the agreement cannot be signed.

Our capacity and ability to provide some degree of management of the human resources which are absolutely essential for the development of the west, are being hindered and handicapped by the increasing growth of provincial barriers to the mobility and movement of people. They are being hindered and handicapped by the increasing number of labour laws and provincial human rights codes which prevent federal activity providing those skills and opportunities. We cannot build the west with those kinds of barriers, Mr. Speaker. We cannot fulfil our destiny unless there is some jurisdiction that provides comprehensive management. The people must come from somewhere. They cannot come from under the ground like the oil and gas. They must come from other parts of Canada or from offshore and someone has to manage that movement. That is one of the great tasks of our time.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member opposite does not have to believe that. He can stay on his couch. He can hide his head in the sand, that is his prerogative, but it happens to be the reality about the new western fact that there is going to be a tremendous movement of people which somehow must be managed with some degree of care and concern. The federal government is doing it right now because the provinces are not prepared to or are not in a position to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Let us now talk about resource management—all right, we will cut off all the grants in your provinces and see how much they are going to react in Ottawa! If you think it is a big handicap, we will see. We will call your bluff on that one.

Let us talk about resource management. We hear a great deal about the provincial premiers and how they want to make sure they can manage the oil and gas and the coal and the electricity. What we do not hear about them is how they are going to manage the forests or the farms in those areas. It is a fact that the condition of the soil in the west is deteriorating every year and that there is no reforestation being done in western Canada. Those resources are under provincial management and lie within their jurisdiction. Somehow they have forgotten about resource management. Why? Because there are not as many bucks in those areas as there are in others. What is happening now is that every day coal is being mined. The Minister of DREE and the minister responsible for forestry have applications on their desks asking them to look after the fisheries or the forests or the farms. When they get into trouble they know where the first hand is out—it is the provincial hand out for the federal purse.

That is the way federalism should work, Mr. Speaker. We must recognize, however, that in order to provide that kind of management and control, we need to share in some of the revenues from those resources. We simply cannot be drawing purely upon a tax base which is static and that is a part of what the debate is about. That is why we have to work at changing the rules and why we have to ensure that there is at least an equal sharing of powers over the resources of this country. There is no ambition whatsoever to intervene in existing powers over resources. There is not a line in the resolution that says we are going to take resource powers away from the provinces.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) made a revelation on Monday. We were very pleased with his constructive comments but he said we forgot the whole question of the provision of powers over resources. We did not forget it, Mr. Speaker; we altered it. We altered it at the conference. It was not forgotten; it was there on the table for the provinces to pick up. They did not pick it up, however, Mr. Speaker. We offered to provide some of our share.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member should have opened up earlier. We feel that the issue on the division of powers should still be discussed and debated and negotiated.

There is no point getting into that debate, however, until we have in this Parliament and in our own hands the ability to make changes to our constitution. The history of constitutional change in Canada has been that every time we reach a consensus or agreement and are ready to make a change, we do not have the lever because it is in England. By the time we figure out how to get it, the consensus has changed.

Mr. Kempling: Go back and read history.

Mr. Axworthy: We also consider a debate on resources to be an important debate. it is something that should be looked at as part of constitutional change. It is a critical item in terms of where we go in this country and it is something we have to put in place in this constitution. But other things must come first. We must obtain the power to make the amendments in our own constitution so that when some of those provincial governments change—as the government of Manitoba will change next year and the government of British Columbia the year after and several others—we may get a more progressive point of view from those provinces, allowing us to get back into serious, sharing negotiations. Then we can bring about the changes we need because we will have the power in Canada to make those changes when we need them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) on a point of order.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member had finished his peroration. I wanted to ask him a question.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very pleased indeed to answer the hon. member's question.

I think we have seen that a number of myths have been perpetrated and a number of fantasies have been spread around this House and other places about what the west really wants. I think it is time we dispelled those myths and realized there is just as much a commitment among western Canadians to the position stated in this resolution as there is in other regions of Canada.

Evidence of this is supplied to me daily from western Canada. Just this week someone told me he did not realize how much of a federalist he was until he heard the premiers speak. Westerners are really saying that they are prepared to make the federalist choice—to make a choice in terms of what they see as a necessity for their own region to develop through strong, effective, central government and to use that strong, effective, central government to provide some degree of sharing of its resources and its opportunities with other Canadians.

There are also westerners who have not given up on the ideal of equalization. They still believe this country is based upon the notion of equality of opportunity and they are not prepared to abandon that.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Hon. members opposite say that is not so, Mr. Speaker. I do not know what conference they were watching in September. If there is all the agreement with equalization and bills of rights and repatriation that hon. members opposite have indicated, why are they opposing this resolution? If there is all that agreement, then why are they opposing it? Do they have principles or do they not? Do they believe in what they say or do they not? If they say they agree with all those items, then why do we do not have the vote tonight, get the resolution passed and go to England as soon as possible? What are we waiting for, if there is this consensus and agreement? Are they simply interested in using this debate for some degree of political posturing?

I suspect there is no problem of unity in Canada, Mr. Speaker. But there is a problem of unity in the Tory caucus. They do not know what they believe in and they do not know where they belong, because there is no agreement among members of that caucus. Their only tactic is to attack. Let them state what they believe in. I would be very interested in hearing them. What kind of constitution do they want? They have been very good at saying what they are against, but what are they for?

There is a line in the play "The Rainmaker". When the evangelical preacher is on his feet holding forth, someone tells him he is so busy being right, he forgets what is good. I suggest that hon. members opposite are so busy being right that they forget what is good for this country.

• (2050)

Finally, it comes down to the fact that this is not a debate between the federal government and the provincial governments. Governments are simply a means to an end. They are simply mechanisms for achieving goals and values for people. They are simply a way of trying to provide basic values for what we want to achieve in this country. Rather than degrading this debate into a great federal-provincial clash, what we should be talking about is what it means for the individuals of this country. What does it mean for people in this country? What will this resolution do for women who have been denied their rights for many, many years in this country? How will the entrenchment of a bill of rights make sure that when they go to court to get equality or when they try to get a proper definition of their rights before the courts they will have some protection under the law?

What does it mean for individuals in this country who want to make sure they can work wherever they live, because they are Canadian, and are not disbarred from working simply because they do not happen to be an inhabitant of one province or another. There are many people who want to see in our constitution not some abstract piece of theory, not something politicians just talk about, but the real nuts and bolts of their daily lives. It means restructuring our foundations so that we will have the powers to begin to provide for the effective management and growth of our economy.

There was an interesting sort of trio who all agreed that the federal government at the present time does not have enough power nor does it have the levers required to do the job it has to do, namely, the economic council, Joe Clark and Jacques Parizeau. None of those can be considered to be a Liberal adherent, from what I can tell, yet they all agreed the federal government at this point does not have the ability to govern and manage in the way it should. I agree with those statements and that is why we need to go back to some fundamentals as to how we change our constitution. I think, Mr. Speaker, we should ask that question about what kind of government can best serve the demands and needs and necessities of Canadians over the next several decades and get away from the picayune technicalities, which we can deal with in committee, and come back to some fundamental questions on the principles of constitutional change. If we can do so, I think this Parliament will have served very well its purpose of helping this country to make a choice about how it is going to govern itself in the future, and how it will provide a framework of government to give it the ability to be the kind of country we all want it to be.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a question. He built his case on the need for an entrenchment of a charter of rights around the report of what he called an Alberta social scientist who produced a study showing that western ethnic minorities are clamouring for a charter of rights for their protection. First, I want to ask the minister what is the name of that Alberta social scientist? What is the evidence adduced that minorities in western Canada feel they need this charter of rights for their protection? Second, does the minister recognize that the reason for the growth of alienation in western Canada, growing into such organizations as the western federation, is precisely because of the intransigence and unilateralism of the federal government, as shown precisely in this resolution?

An hon. Member: That is a speech.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to provide the hon. member or any other member, with a copy of the article which appeared in a journal called "Race" about two years ago.

As for the hon. member's second question, I think his assumptions are somewhat specious. I think the reasons many of the ethnic groups feel the need for a bill of rights is because they feel discriminated against. That discrimination can be solved by the bill of rights we are proposing.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister who has just finished speaking would not want to deliberately leave the House, and although he is from Winnipeg and the Wheat Board is centred there, I am sure if he does some research and checks into it he will find that the Wheat Board was not set up as a result of the federal government using declaratory powers.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister a very straightforward question.

Mr. Collenette: Go into committee and ask these questions.

Mr. Roche: He used the phrase "Alberta social scientist." He built his argument around it. I am simply asking him the name of the Alberta social scientist.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. As the hon. member will recognize, the practice on occasion of asking questions at the end of another member's speech is tolerated, if I can put it that way. It is, of course, done at the option of the hon. member, in this case the minister, who has the floor. Normally the Chair will allow a question once, perhaps twice. That seems to be a courtesy which is extended both to the person who had the floor and the questioner. But I think the point has been made and perhaps we might go ahead.

Is there another hon. member who is seeking the floor on a point of order?

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I represent The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency. I would like clarification from the minister about something which arose from a comment in a speech he just made. He mentioned that part of the commitment to western Canada would be the extent of dollars that would be spent on the railway system. I would like to bring to the minister's attention a situation that happened in our constituency—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have just attempted to explain to hon. members that in a situation where a minister or a member is finishing his speech there are times when with the agreement of the hon. member who wants to raise a question and the agreement of a member who has been speaking, the Chair has permitted that kind of an exchange. It should also be noted that it has never been done beyond the time limit of the individual member who had the floor. I did not make that point clear earlier with respect to the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) when he rose. However, I must point out that in accordance with the rules of the House the time given to the minister for his speech has now expired, and it is appropriate to move on to the next hon. member who seeks the floor.

The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake on a point of order.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Speaker, I would ask for the unanimous consent of the House. I have a question that is very pressing and urgent arising from the minister's presentation.

Some hon. Members: Order!

An hon. Member: Ask it in question period tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is simply irrelevant whether the hon. member thinks his question is the most important since creation. I cannot allow it under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that this debate is of great interest and significance. I wish to contribute to the discussion and I would like to refer immediately to the previous speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), who told us about the co-operation shown by the federal government and the role that it must play within Canada. We do not object to the federal government taking part in the development of economic projects in the west and in the other provinces. There is no problem about that. However, he seemed to forget one most basic fact which is to speak about the provinces. Of course, this proposed resolution could lead to very interesting discussions about principles, rights, and so on. And in addition, there is another issue of which we are all aware, that of the patriation of the constitution. We have nothing against patriation as such except to the extent that we want to respect the federal structure and the two levels of government and that we shall never allow this government to go over the head of the provinces. This is very clear in our minds.

An hon. Member: Speak louder.

An hon. Member: What did you do in Quebec for 40 years?

Mr. La Salle: This afternoon, I heard the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) play a very different tune since the time he signed the minority report on the constitution seven or eight years ago. Of course, he is now a minister. He spoke for instance of his deep concern for Francophones outside Quebec, and I remember that not so long ago, this same government and this same minister refused the Fédération des Francophones Hors Québec, a mechanism which they suggested to us when we were in power. Within a few weeks, we had accepted this mechanism through which the Fédération des Francophones Hors Québec would be able to take part in the development of policies which could affect them. The present government rejected this mechanism offhandedly and still refuses to provide the federation with sufficient funds to maintain proper offices to do its own propaganda, in a manner of speaking. The minister spoke about his interest in Francophones outside Quebec, but he omitted to tell the people about this decision which goes against Francophones outside Quebec and about this delay which is unfair for these Francophones.

An hon. Member: What have you done in Quebec? Nothing!

An hon. Member: Where were you?

Mr. La Salle: I shall tell you where I was later.

An hon. Member: It is easy to see that winter is coming in Quebec.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, it is the first time that we hear them; let them release their frustrations. Mr. Speaker, we are certainly going to hear this evening a voice from Quebec, but it will be a very different voice from that of the Liberals on the other side. We shall hear things said by someone who speaks on behalf of thousands of Quebeckers because those hon. members opposite do not do so. Of course, we shall hear comments which I hope will also be heard by thousands of Canadians. And I would certainly not want, especially during this debate, to give Canadians the impression that 74 out of 75 members think the same.

Under the circumstances, I shall of course speak on behalf of the provincial party leaders in Quebec. Our friends opposite have not spoken about the position of Mr. Le Moignan, Mr. Ryan and Mr. Lévesque. Just as was the case concerning the sales tax, the National Assembly opposes unanimously the proposed resolution.

An hon. Member: Get yourself elected to the National Assembly!

Mr. La Salle: What I have just said cannot be denied.

• (2100)

I could not refer to the comments made by my friends opposite, completely subjugated as they are by a man who has an artificial vision of Canada and who tries to sell us an artificial Canada, I mean the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). From the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien)—I will come back later to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin)—to all the others, they are a group of sheep hiding behind the Prime Minister about a vision that he has had in mind for years and I shall speak mostly about him because it is not the Liberal party that presented a resolution, that invented that resolution but a man determined to find an acceptable solution with the provinces.

An hon. Member: What is the word?

Mr. La Salle: And I will prove it. We have been complaining for 53 years. I was listening to Liberal members. In the last 53 years we have not succeeded in finding a solution with the provinces. Let us go back over the last 15 years when the present Prime Minister promised to amend our constitution when he came to Ottawa with two other doves that have flown to gentler climes. And 15 years later he has yet to succeed in reaching agreement with the provinces. Considering the spirit of the constitution and the fact that he almost dreamed up the present failure himself what allows him to think that he can act unilaterally?

An hon. Member: No right!

Mr. La Salle: No right, but the Prime Minister demonstrates that after 15 years of efforts his idea has failed completely and he cannot reach an agreement with the provinces. Perhaps we ought to wonder whether we should change the premiers or the Prime Minister of Canada himself.

An hon. Member: Change the Prime Minister.

Mr. La Salle: So, Mr. Speaker, I come back to that man, as I said I cannot talk about the Liberal party because they are behind him, they are subjugated by him and it is not the philosophy of the Liberal party, never has a Liberal delegation given a mandate to a prime minister on such a vision, it is his own. Ten years ago, Mr. Speaker, while bombs were blowing up here and there in Quebec, Pierre Laporte was murdered by young terrorists who considered themselves above the law and tried to force upon us their own political ideal. Today, in October, 1980, under the pretence of a quite artificial urgency, a 60-year-old Quebecker, the Prime Minister of Canada, declares himself an absolute ruler and tries to go beyond the constitution which gives us a political tradition. He hides a time bomb right in the heart of the country and gets ready to murder the Canadian federation, this marvellous achievement of the political genius of our fathers.

When the hon. member for I do not know what constituency tells me that he was not elected by 200 votes, I, for one, was not elected on the coat-tails of the Prime Minister, for instance. You will understand that as a Canadian and as a Quebecker, I cannot agree with such an initiative. Therefore, I am prepared to keep fighting, Mr. Speaker, against this bid for power which would lead, should it succeed, to the disruption of Canada and to the end of the political system which we have had since 1867.

It is not enough for this Prime Minister to have ruined the Canadian economy, Mr. Speaker, to have dangerously reduced the value of the Canadian dollar, to have piled up huge budgetary deficits and threatened our balance of payments, it is not enough for him to have brought unemployment to millions of Canadians, fuelled permanent galloping inflation and increased disparities between various regions of this country. So many disasters have not yet satisfied this monstrous egocentric.

Now, he has to set Canadians against themselves. Now, he has to undermine the very constitutional structure of this country. He has to destroy what was its strength and harmony, namely, the presence of two levels of sovereign governments in their respective jurisdictions. He also has to deny the original duality of Canadian society. He has to burden the whole country with an economic autocracy whose weight is only equalled by its administrative incompetence.

The natural tensions between regions and groups so diverse are not enough. He has to have open war with the provinces. He has to crush all those who do not dare think like him. As to the members of his party, they have been crushed for a long time. He has to challenge all those who refuse to share his dream of centralizing hegemony and level out the cultural originalities that had been up till now a source of pride for Canada, what was its strength and guaranteed its social balance. To justify the rape of the constitution and our political traditions, the Prime Minister points to the failure of the last conference of heads of government. He is the only one to say there was no progress and chances for agreement in a not too distant future are inexistent.

Most participants at the conference said they had moved much closer on several points and compromises were still possible with renewed discussions and good faith on all sides.

That feeling was also shared by most newspapers and Canadian and even foreign commentators. At the same time, politicians and observers warned the Prime Minister of Canada not to try to go ahead anyway, even on the unilateral patriation of the constitution. But the Prime Minister turned a deaf ear, even to Mr. Ryan in Quebec. He persists, in spite of the recent progress made in talking about a definitive failure, not because there is no more hope for agreement but because he and he alone, Mr. Speaker, wants to regard it as a failure.

And this he has orchestrated for his own personal reasons and because he is anxious to get out of politics, as everyone knows. The Prime Minister wittingly engineered the scenario of the last conference and he astutely manoeuvred so the apparent results would be nil, so he could feel justified in referring to such a failure to better sell to the public his unilateral patriation proposal.

There is no need to recall here the confidential memoranda prepared by officials in his office, the existence of which we learned thanks to providential leaks. Clearly the Prime Minister wanted a failure.

No doubt he would have been most unhappy had the Premiers acquiesced to his requirements, because much more so than patriation, the Prime Minister wants to receive de facto full powers to better regulate Canadian society and shape it according to his own political designs.

The September conference was not a failure, far from it. But it was described as such because that was the Prime Minister's will, to justify his autocratic control over the unfolding of Canadian life. If that is not dictatorship, words have become meaningless, Mr. Speaker.

What the Prime Minister wants to establish in Canada, and it is important that Canadians should learn about it because this they will not hear from my friends opposite, is in effect a unitarian government, a central government with exclusive ownership over the instruments of social and economic life in this country. What the Prime Minister wants to establish before he leaves is a federal authority so powerful that provinces will be reduced to the rank of vassals merely there to carry out the will and the policies of the central body.

In his view, provinces should not derive their jurisdiction from the 1867 pact, under which a number of matters are exclusively their own. In the Prime Minister's scheme, the provinces must become mere administrative divisions responsible for punctiliously and silently implementing the policies and orders from the mandarins and the bureaucrats in Ottawa.

Such a vision of Canada I personally reject, as does my party, because it inescapably leads to the fragmentation of our confederation and the ultimate end of this country.

● (2110)

It stems from the Prime Minister's deep contempt for the provinces, a contempt that the present Leader of the Government showed even before he entered active politics and has kept showing for the last 13 years. Is there any need to remind anybody of the compliments he paid to Robert Bourassa when he was premier of the province of Quebec? My friends across the way do not talk about the attitude the Prime Minister of Canada had towards the Quebec premier. That would be embarrassing and I can understand that.

That is why, for instance, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, in the April, 1963, issue of Cité Libre for which he was a political commentator at the time, blamed the provinces for what he called the decay of the Canadian political philosophy. Why was that? Simply because, according to him, the central government has to take the provinces into account and make concessions to them. The fact that he wants to get rid of these structures and of the provinces is nothing new. Some people think that I am exaggerating? I will quote the exact words of the man who was to become the prime minister of this country five years later. He said, and I quote:

The men of the 1867 constitution must have feared the paralysis that such a state of affairs inevitably leads to. Today, they would have to reconcile many more things than Upper and Lower Canada, the maritimes and the provinces that followed. As a result, to take over power in Ottawa, political parties naturally had to strive increasingly to reconcile very different regional interests, which usually meant reducing the ideological content to its bare minimum.

And Mr. Trudeau concluded, at that time, and I quote:

But what may have been overlooked is the degree of intellectual decay that process finally led us to.

So, what constitutes, in the eyes of other Canadians, the main value of the political men in this country, whether they work at the federal or provincial levels, is the faculty to compromise and adjust themselves to the political facts and situations, of Canadian life, that admirable philosophy that has enabled Canada to go through, without too much danger, the severest crisis in its history, the need to love, understand, tolerate and accept one another, and get along together, which is the main characteristic of Canadian political life, all that is not the greatest Canadian virtue; in the eyes of the present Prime Minister, all that has become an offensive vice that leads to the "decay of Canadian political thought".

Those who had a chance to watch the debates of the September conference on television were unanimous in praising and admiring the quality of the interventions of the ten provincial premiers, including that of my province. They were in a position to see that if there is any decay in the Canadian political thought, it is not at the provincial level. The decay, Mr. Speaker, is found in the Pitfield and Kirby documents, in the "bulldozer" tactics of the Minister of Justice, and in the art of expertly presenting facts in a wrong light of the Prime Minister of Canada himself.

The Prime Minister brags about having the support of his caucus, as if the latter represented the Canadian people, but I doubt that Canadians, especially Canadian Liberals, see themselves in the people the voters sent to sit in Parliament. For all practical purposes, the Liberal caucus actually represents only two provinces: Quebec, with more than half the caucus members, and Ontario, which provides the other half, more or less. The Atlantic provinces are poorly represented and the west is totally missing, except for two members. In these circumstances, how can the Prime Minister emphasize the representativeness of the Canadian nation rather than that of the Liberal caucus? One would not argue if the Prime Minister had received a clear mandate from delegates representing the whole of his party in a policy convention. But he never had such a mandate, even at the last election, because he deliberately and knowingly kept silent on the matter of constitutional reform, arguing that the provinces were fed up with this subject matter which, one has to admit, had become the pet project of the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada.

But in fact, is the Liberal party worth more than its caucus? On this point, let us refer to the statement made by the Prime Minister himself in the article published in the April, 1963, issue of Cité Libre. I apologize to my friends from the other side if I go back to Cité Libre. However, the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: It is not a shared feeling!

Mr. La Salle: It is.

I referred a moment ago to an article published in Cité Libre. In fact, knowing how ambitious the government head is, one cannot help but wonder whether it is not precisely what he calls the decay of the political thinking within the Liberal Party which has drawn him into this formation, thus repudiating his past links.

For that matter, did he not confess it publicly by running under the Liberal banner in 1965? Isn't it well known that despairing ever to see the New Democratic Party take power he needed a more flexible tool to realize his plans and that this tool, always available to autocrats, he would have found in the Liberal party? In spite of the deep contempt that he feels toward his own party, isn't it precisely that proverbial spinelessness of its members which prompted him to run for the leadership?

Let us read again, Mr. Speaker, excerpts from Cité Libre, a text of 1963, 17 years old but which still conveys a vivid sense of present-day reality. It said, and I quote:

"Since I have been watching politics, I do not recall having witnessed a more degrading spectacle than that of all these Liberals who have acted as turncoats along with their boss."

Also, criticizing what he calls—

—the autocratism of the Liberal structures and the extraordinary cowardice of its members—

—The present Prime Minister, but back in those days, with Cité Libre, he would add, and I quote:

The philosophy of the Liberal party is quite simple——That is interesting, Mr. Speaker.

Just say anything, think about anything; or even better, do not think at all; but get yourself into power because we are those who can best govern you——and Mr. Trudeau to conclude:

Suckers, all of them.

He wrote that. Say anything, this is what the Prime Minister of Canada has just done in his most recent statement to the Canadian people when he stated that the repatriation is urgent because of the commitments which were made to Quebeckers during the May 22 referendum.

An hon. Member: You were not there on May 22.

Mr. La Salle: No, Mr. Speaker. I was not there on May 22. Those who worried about the fact that I did not take part in the referendum will understand today—

An hon. Member: You have never been there for Quebec.

Mr. La Salle: —will understand, Mr. Speaker, what I felt in the slogan which was launched by the Prime Minister, since it was nothing but a slogan. I had the opportunity to say that I did not want to take a position publicly during the referendum when I recognized that I voted against Mr. Lévesque's proposal but that I could not defend the slogan presented by Mr. Trudeau to Quebeckers because I already felt the perfidy and the hypocrisy in his renewed federalism. And I was right. And I shall read later what Mr. Ryan said. He too regrets to have been taken in by the proposal made by the Prime Minister of Canada and by his accomplices, his sheep, who followed him without protesting. What dissatisfaction among the partisans of the No-side today!

An hon. Member: And your people in Joliette?

Mr. La Salle: What dissatisfaction among the partisans of the No-side. Do not concern yourself with the people in Joliette.

Of the deterioration of the political ideology and the absolute lack of principles within the Liberal party which were denounced in 1963 by the present Prime Minister and described by him as the "raddled face of power", we have had a clear illustration these past few days.

I am coming now to the constitutional apostasy of the Minister of Transport, which has demonstrated the slavish partisanship which the present leader of the Liberal party denounced 17 years ago. The fact that to keep his position within the cabinet the Minister of Transport has deemed it advisable to repudiate now the spirit and the letter of the Pepin-Robarts report is certainly one of the most despicable events in Canadian history. When we consider this decision by one of the co-chairmen of the Task Force on Canadian Unity to repudiate so lightly his own report, we feel both sad and angry because there is not a single person on the Liberal side who can still grow incensed at the unspeakable machination masterminded by the leader of the party.

The man who once proclaimed the sovereignty of both the federal and provincial governments over their respective areas of jurisdiction—I am still referring to the Minister of Transport—who claimed that an equilibrium and a consensus between the two levels of government were necessary for the survival of Canada, has come to adhere to the thesis that the provinces are only the subordinates of the central government.

"The thesis of the Prime Minister on the paramountcy of the federal government can be established and easily defended" the Minister of Transport dares tell us now, thereby rejecting the judgement he himself had passed as co-chairman of the royal commission. Canadian history is not devoid of vile actions but I do not know of a great many that are more degrading than that one, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the pure and simple violation of provincial jurisdiction in the field of education under the pretence of entrenching language rights in the constitution. The Minister of Transport subscribes to this view with an eagerness that his fellow members of the Pepin-Robarts commission will have no ground for being proud of. The pseudo intellectual gimmicks of the minister will not fool anyone. The minister has kept his power but he has forsaken honour. His credibility has been reduced to nothing, but his servile attitude will probably not carry him very far in the realm of politics. I suspect that the minister will eventually experience the fate his leader had in store for John Turner, for instance, precisely the man who represented his riding of Ottawa-Carleton. Yet, unlike John Turner, he will not find anybody to regret his departure except those who will feel pity and shame for him.

And I turn again to the Prime Minister, to the man who, the day after the Victoria conference, stated that he no longer wanted to hear about the constitution and that it was more urgent to find some remedy to the mounting economic problems that Canada faced. This same man is today making an impassionate plea for patriation, which everyone wants, no doubt, but which no one finds so pressing as to have priority over the other ills of our Canadian society.

That is another strategy of this government, to bring Canadians to discuss constitutional amendments in order to hide the real problems while Parliament and Canadians have no budget and while there is a pressing and vital need for economic direction. During the next two months the Prime Minister will try to make the media concentrate on constitutional reform because he is ashamed and does not have the courage to table his economic proposals but especially because he has none that would please Canadians. This is the kind of strategy which will not fool Canadians as far as this government's attitudes are concerned, and everybody subscribed to them. The constitution will not put bread and butter on the tables of the unemployed this winter.

An hon. Member: It is about time you started to think about it.

Mr. La Salle: That is not scandalous. It is high time the hon. member thought about it. A government member criticized us for having waited seven months before presenting a budget, and the Liberals have now been waiting for nine months. I forgive them, Mr. Speaker, because they do not know any better.

Here again we are witnessing well known Liberal tactics, that of twisting facts and misrepresentation. All those who followed the progress of the referendum campaign in the country, whether they belonged to the Yes or the No committee, know that the May 20 vote was about one precise question: the mandate of the Lévesque government to propose a system of political sovereignty coupled with economic association with the rest of Canada. The question never dealt with any other project. Quebeckers said no to sovereignty, because they were promised a thorough constitutional reform, the nature and extent of which the No forces did not even consult or ever agree. That is something the Prime Minister knows very well. To say otherwise is to make a statement that the Standing Orders do not allow one to qualify by the only right term.

Indeed, putting his head on the block the Prime Minister promised to amend the constitution but he knows full well that for Quebeckers this reform was in fact a new distribution of powers. If Quebeckers had been told by the Prime Minister that this reform would be limited to unilateral patriation of the constitution, including a bill of fundamental and linguistic rights entrenched in it and that it would only be a way for the federal government to grab the rest of powers and of economic liberties of the provinces, I do not hesitate to say that Quebeckers would have massively rejected such arguments. Most likely, under those circumstances the Yes-side would have won. The No supporters would have dissociated themselves from the Prime Minister of Canada and I do not think I am wrong when I say that Claude Ryan would have dissociated himself from the position of the federal Liberal leader. It is important that Canadians know that the provincial Liberals do not approve the methods used by the Prime Minister of Canada. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read two paragraphs from Mr. Ryan. Of course, like us, he dreams about great principles which would be respected throughout Canada, he dreams about an ideal situation as concerns justice and many other things. Of course, this is what Mr. Ryan wishes. We wish the same thing, but we want to respect our present structure. If a change is needed, we must consult the provinces. Mr. Ryan says and I quote:

> What I fear personally because of the way things have been going is that we might be led gradually to profound changes in the very nature of the federal structure which governs us.

The man speaking is not a Tory! He is not a separatist!

> Until now, the federal structure has been based on the principle of the equality of both levels of government—

Is this clear, my Liberal friends on the other side?

> There was no question of subordinating one level of government to the other or of giving one level priority over the other. The method advanced in the federal proposal, asserts the supremacy of the federal government over the provinces.
>
> This is a new political principle which, in my opinion, opens a completely new page in the history of constitutional law and political evolution in Canada. We maintain—

—says Mr. Ryan, still on behalf of the Liberal party—

> —that the constitution is the common property and the responsibility of the two levels of government. If we want to bring about major changes which would affect the constitution, these changes must be made with the agreement of both levels of government. Neither one of them can claim the privilege or the right to act alone in these matters which could affect federal relations.

And he adds something interesting about trying to evaluate the referendum in Quebec.

An hon. Member: Do not speak about the referendum; you know nothing about it!

Mr. La Salle: And when I hear, says Mr. Ryan—Can someone tell me the name of the idiot who speaks louder than anyone else? And when I hear, says Mr. Ryan, and I quote, Mr. Speaker:

> And when I hear Mr. Trudeau suggest that the No given at the referendum was the same as giving a free hand to the Prime Minister of Canada to impose his concept of constitutional change, I cannot agree on this point either. We fought both for the No vote and for reasonable changes in the federal system of Canadian government, but we have always said that any basic change must be sought and made with the agreement of the two orders of government—
> If I had been told:

—concludes Mr. Ryan:

> "You are going to chair the No vote committee and will after that be told what to do, what your duty is and shut up", I would never have chaired the No committee, as you perfectly know. And if I had been told that this was my last chance, that after that sovereignty-association would come, I would never have let myself be caught in such a trap either. For some months, both sides have been joyfully falsifying the true meaning of the results of the referendum held on May 20 of this year. As a well placed witness of that enterprise, as chairman of the No committee, I feel obliged to record my dissent.

It is therefore important in my view that Canadians know the Quebec Liberal party is totally opposed to what Liberals here imply.

That implication by Liberals, who pretend to represent Quebec voters, is false representation as I said. They say it is urgent. How can that be explained, Mr. Speaker? Well, it would have been so easy for Mr. Trudeau, for the Prime Minister, excuse me, to meet with Mr. Ryan and allow Quebec Liberals to make their views known rather than taking immediate decision. As far as we are concerned, we would have preferred that the Right Hon. Prime Minister have another try at a first ministers' meeting, a last minute effort in order to at least have the decency to have that two-year freeze accepted. Let us suppose the ten first ministers accepted patriation with a two-year freeze, we—

An hon. Member: Never!

Mr. La Salle: Somebody says, never. Because the Right Hon. Prime Minister is not interested in having an affirmative answer from the provinces. The Right Hon. Prime Minister's vision of Canada is evidence of his incompetence and his inability to find a solution.

So it is true that to dress his salad the Prime Minister talks about a charter of fundamental and linguistic rights. What he has yet to prove is that fundamental rights are being threatened. Quite the contrary, all Canadian provinces, if I am not mistaken, have their own charter of human rights and I do not know of any case where they are really endangered. What I do know on this point of upholding human rights is that the government of this Prime Minister is not beyond reproach. That is why I urge him to approach the problem with a little more humility. His past attitudes make him more than suspect.

It was his government, Mr. Speaker, that during the October, 1970, crisis when it was a matter of seeking out some thirty young terrorists did not hesitate with the co-operation of the police to put under arrest and detain without warrants some 450 people whose only crime was to continue to believe in the socialism the Prime Minister had himself advocated up until the time he joined what he elegantly described as the Liberal centre of intellectual decay.

One should not forget, indeed, that the Prime Minister was and remains the chairman of the cabinet committee on national security and in that capacity must bear responsibility for the actions that were taken and, consequently, the general directives that were given. Well, judging from the information that filtered through during the past ten years the Prime Minister never even bothered to really find out what had happened and people are still waiting for his excuses to Quebeckers, be they leftists, unjustly deprived of their citizens' rights and their fundamental freedoms.

Until the McDonald commission clearly assesses the respective responsibilities of cabinet members and police departments, I, for one, hold the present Prime Minister above all responsible for the thoughtless imposition of the War Measures Act and all the police and other abuses that resulted from it.

In any case, as long as we live in a democratic society, I do not see the need—and I do say the need—to entrench human rights in the Constitution of Canada. It is enough for me that these rights be provided for in specific federal or provincial legislation with enough flexibility to make them more explicit with the evolution of our society and indeed for the addition of new rights that are not yet clearly defined.

Concerning the language rights, I hope they will be recognized for French-speaking people outside Quebec with as much generosity as those of the English-speaking residents in Quebec. But as these rights are very closely related to the provincial jurisdiction over education, I do not see why it should be urgent or necessary to enshrine them in the constitution at the risk of giving rise to quarrels like those the past generations have known. But I think it is the duty of a responsible federal government to help the provinces financially to establish an education system in the second language. On the other hand, I do not want the provinces to be forced, I want them to be permitted, I want them to be invited, I want them to be respected. That is the difference between the Liberals and I. But what I am really against, is that acting on the suggestion of his leader, one of the cabinet ministers should have the presumption to undercut at its very base the historical foundation of the right of Francophones to receive an education in their mother tongue. Did not the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) go as far as to denounce the thesis of the two founding peoples, on the pretext that this expression could give rise to semantic difficulties? But making the two great linguistic communities takes away any justification for Francophones outside Quebec who demand their own schools.

As Marcel Adam wrote—I might finish with that, Mr. Speaker. As Marcel Adam wrote, I do not quote the "blues" yet, in the paper La Presse of October 1, in refusing to use the expression "two founding peoples", on what ground would Mr. Fox enshrine the language rights in the constitution?

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that my time has run out. I had more things to say, but I consider it as a privilege to have been able to express myself on behalf of thousands of Quebeckers, and to have had the possibility, in a desperate gesture, to ask these Liberals on the other side to show a minimum of respect, only a minimum, for the aspirations of millions of Quebeckers, as I did today.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of Environment): And now, Mr. Speaker, after that irrelevant tirade, let us get back to the motion.

● (2130)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, when we as students of history, whether Canadian or otherwise, look back on events, unless we are steeped pretty deeply in them or are graduate students of them, which I am not, we tend to identify certain milestones as though they were simple, uncomplicated or harmonious events. So, in general terms, we tend to associate a date with the act of union or the adoption of the maple leaf as our national flag. In so doing, it seems to me, unless we delve more deeply into the event, we are often not aware of the reservations, for example, which would have been expressed at the Charlottetown conference by some of the participants or the bitter acrimony which accompanied the fight for confederation in Newfoundland in the years from 1946 to 1948.

It seems to me that in respect of the proposal before us now we will find ourselves in an analogous situation a few years down the road. We are too close to it now, the emotions of the people are too tender, our minds are too cluttered by conflicting viewpoints from all sides to appreciate the ultimate magnitude of the step we are contemplating with respect to the resolution before us. An event such as this must by its very nature generate frustration and produce misunderstanding and misapprehension; it must lend itself to misrepresentation of the kind that I heard just two or three hours ago on a national radio show, the CBC's "As it Happens", when the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) perpetrated on the Canadian people an unfortunate misrepresentation, unfortunate perhaps but obvious. He alleged in that program this evening that the document which is now before the House constitutes an effort by the Prime Minister, as he said, to create a unitary state with all the power vested in one order of government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), or my good friend the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), could not have read the document or clearly have not understood the proposal if that is what they allege. One of the clearly stated provisions of this particular document is that it would guarantee that for all time all future changes in our constitution would require the agreement, the consensus of the provincial governments. That hardly sounds—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Simmons: I will sit down if the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) will let me read it to him. He may learn something. Very clearly in the documentation it states that from the day the committee comes back with a finished proposal, only by consensus will the details of the amending formula be left to the provinces as well. Only by consensus will we be able to change the constitution.

● (2140)

Mr. Forrestall: There are other ways.

Mr. Simmons: I say to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East that there is one other way. We can ask the people of Canada, which I happen to think is a very sensible way of doing things. We can ask the people who put us here. The government is not afraid of doing that. The Leader of the Opposition expressed some fear. He was dealt with rather badly by the people of Canada before, so he should be apprehensive about going back to them again.

Mr. Forrestall: Were you here when he spoke?

Mr. Simmons: As much as I would have liked to, I was not able to sit here yesterday and hear the hon. Leader of the Opposition. I was down in the riding of my good friend, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees), helping some of his constituents who dearly wanted to hear some points about the constitution. I was delighted to go down and give them of my wisdom on the subject. I was not here but I read with interest not only the press reports of the speech of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition but also the actual text of Hansard, the transcription of what he said. The first sentence which caught my eye was:

By destroying the federal system in Canada it could destroy this country.

He was referring to this proposal. I say to him, welcome to the twentieth century. That is what we were trying to tell him during his brief days in power. That is exactly what we were trying to tell him. He hardly crossed the threshhold of power and he was giving orders to put out the fire sale signs, to give it away to the provincial governments completely. He insisted on doing it from the day he took office. At long last my good friend from Yellowhead has seen the light. I have no doubt that it has something to do with the fact that he sits next to my very good and wise friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). He is a sensible man if ever there was one, a man who will not stand idly by and see trampled the precepts and the principles for which John Diefenbaker fought. For that I admire the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the public statements he has made in the past few days on this particular subject. As the chief watches us from up there somewhere tonight, he must be having a double nightmare. First, his main protagonist during his last years in this House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), is now doing what he, Mr. Diefenbaker, would have done had he been given the opportunity. He would have done that very thing. Indeed, while he was in power he tried to do it, not through legislation but by another route, the route we are going now. But he was prevented from doing it by provincial governments of his own party stripe. That is the first thing which must make him turn over tonight. He must be having a nightmare tonight. Second, it is insult enough to have one's main protagonist step in and do what one would have done, but the insult of insults is to find one's successor, once removed the leader of one's party, a fellow westerner not having the gratitude and loyalty and lacking the common decency to pick up the torch when one was obliged to yield it. We know the lines which read as follows:

To you from failing hands we throw
The torch; be yours to hold it high.

"No, Joe. Not upside down, Joe, you will get your hands burnt that way." When the government decided to proceed with the patriation of our constitution, it became aware of the complexities attached to making an address to Her Majesty the Queen. Asking Parliament to deal with so detailed a measure in one gulp would be like asking a man to swallow a watermelon whole.

I say to my hon. friend whose riding escapes me, as it escapes him, that at this point in time I am proposing to respond to two or three points the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition raised questions about yesterday. I invite my good friend from the west to listen. He may well learn something; it is highly possible. Asking Parliament to deal with so detailed a measure as we have here would be quite an assignment. The rules of debate are such, as members know, that attempts to propose amendments would be awkward and difficult in this particular forum. The government did not consider this reasonable or fair and consequently it decided that the best course was not to put before Parliament what amounted to a fait accompli, but to present Parliament with certain ideas, the ideas of the government obviously. It decided that it was best then to appoint a joint committee of both Houses, this chamber and the Senate chamber, in effect to draft the address to be presented to the Queen. That is the assignment, not to rubber stamp but to take this particular document before us as a working paper to draft an address to Her Majesty the Queen. The proposed address which we published on October 2 and tabled here on Monday is a working paper. Naturally we on this side hope the recommendations of the committee when brought back to this chamber will be similar to the proposed address as contained in the document. But by no means are we wedded to every detail in it. In his opening statement the Prime Minister indicated we are looking forward to a frank exchange of ideas in committee. If members have concerns on this issue, before they place their bets they should try us in committee.

An hon. Member: The ten premiers did.

Mr. Simmons: I will talk about the ten premiers a little later on. Let me address myself to some of the things my good friend from Yellowhead said, the gentleman who is facing a leadership review in February. They call him out west the white elephant from Yellowhead. Let me talk about some of the points about which he was concerned yesterday. What was his response to our gesture? We said, "Here is a working paper. Go work on it some more, refine it and come back with a product that we can take over to Westminster to get our constitution back in this country where it belongs". What was his response? The Leader of the Opposition professed his usual great love for Parliament. His government said that it wanted to augment committees. What was his response to the proposal that a parliamentary committee draft an address rather than having the government ram something down his throat? His response was red herrings, good old red herrings from the good old white elephant. The Leader of the Opposition used to call himself a red Tory. Now he specializes in red herrings. The proposed joint committee is being asked to consider a proposed address to the Queen. It is being asked to consider what form it ought to take. In other words the joint committee is being asked to draft, on the basis of a working paper, the penultimate or the ultimate form of the address which should go forward, depending upon whether the House concurs without change. Members opposite, and in particular the Leader of the Opposition, claim there is no opportunity to amend the proposed address. The fact is that the ultimate form of the address does not yet exist on paper. The committee will prepare that form. Certainly the government will present its ideas to the committee. That is our right and responsibility. Certainly those ideas will be the same as those in the document referred to in the motion. Certainly members of the committee will put forward alternatives, perhaps in the form of amendments to motions before the committee. Perhaps even some government members will have such amendments as well. I do not know. We cannot predict that, nor do we want to. What we want is an address to Her Majesty that will achieve the over-all objectives stated publicly by the Prime Minister and, indeed, embodied in the resolution and the document accompanying it. That is the white elephant's red herring number one.

• (2150)

Next we heard him say that the proposed committee ought to travel all over the country. Members should remember that people have been travelling on this one for 53 years. I do not think there is any lack of information, any lack of ideas or lack of exchange of ideas on this. What is required now is for us to make up our minds on which set of information, which particles of truth, we want to embody, then ship if off to England and get the response back that we very much want to have. The travel is behind us. This is not the time for travel. We have had 53 years of travelling. Now let us get our heads together and make up our minds. That is his second red herring. He wants a travelling circus. I say no to that.

Then the Leader of the Opposition complains about the time limits. How long do we need, after 53 years, to arrive at a consensus upon which there is no shortage of information, no shortage of input? Then we hear the Leader of the Opposition talk about the provision of a quorum. I have enumerated three or four objections the hon. gentleman made to the resolution and the form in which it has been introduced. But now I come to what must have been his finest hour. All the objections which have gone before, I submit, were just preliminary. He was just warming to his subject. But now, with the matter before him, Mr. Speaker, here is the white elephant, the walking dead from Yellowhead. Here he is with the vilest outrage of all. This is it. Nothing ever was as bad as this. There he stood with sagging jowl, with penetrating gaze but without the intellect of a Diefenbaker, projecting the appearance of one who understands what he is talking about. Well, what was he talking about. What is it he was objecting to about the quorum? Has the Leader of the Opposition finally stumbled on the truth for which he has been searching for all these years, the clear evidence which to date has eluded him, that we are a bunch of parliamentary scoundrels and legislative varmints? Has he finally discovered that he's got what he always needed to clench his case against us? Surely, if we can judge from his excited rhetoric of yesterday, he is without a doubt on the very verge of driving the final nail in our political coffin. What is it he is so exercised about? What is he objecting to? I will tell you. Does he not realize that the section he objects to is taken, verbatim, word for word, not from the mind of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) or from the Prime Minister, not even from the mind of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, if that were possible—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: No, Mr. Speaker. Taken verbatim, word for word, from the motion in our Standing Orders establishing special joint committees. Does the hon. gentleman not read the rules he lives by here? It was taken word for word from our standing rules governing the establishment of joint committees which operate under the auspices of this chamber and the chamber down the way, the Senate chamber. That is what the fuss has been all about, Mr. Speaker. That is what the Leader of the Opposition has been out misleading the public of Canada about. And he expects to have credibility after February. He will have a job keeping it until February.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Simmons: There is so much more we could say in terms of what the Leader of the Opposition has been saying. His problem is that he should really stop looking over his shoulder, he should start looking straight ahead and then he might be able to see the future of the nation. He might be able to see the vision which is embodied in the document before us. As it is, looking either way, Mr. Speaker, he can only see the president of the Iron Ore Company of Canada. He really has only himself to blame. Let no one in this chamber tonight, let no one in this country for one fleeting moment, think there is any lack of compassion in my heart for the right hon. gentleman from Yellowhead. I am overwhelmed with compassion for him. My heart overflows with abject, unadulterated pity for him. A person in his present situation deserves the pity of an entire nation. And, indeed, he is getting it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: To demonstrate the utter unselfishness of my compassion and to permit others in this House and across this compassionate land to rally to his side in a tangible way, I am tonight announcing a new humanitarian endeavour, a new fund-raising drive to be known, for the sake of brevity, as the FTSTHOTHMFYATIHFATLOHMLO. Or, for the few of you who did not follow my shorthand, the Fund to Save the Hide of the Honourable Member for Yellowhead and to Instal Him forever as the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. You see, Mr. Speaker, we on this side need him. We need him because he makes our job—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think we have hit the bottom of degradation in this House. The speaker, the member from I-know-not-where, has diverted from a topic of great national importance—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is not making a point of order. The parliamentary secretary—

If the hon. member is making a point of order would he please get to the point?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is what I am getting at. The hon. member has—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has been listening with as much attention as possible to the debate and has to concede that there is about equal relevance on both sides on certain matters. The parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Simmons: I do apologize to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) for coming slowly to the point. But I was really doing it for his own benefit. I wanted him to understand what I was saying. I wanted him to know how much we in this chamber need the Leader of the Opposition. He may have different views, he may not be on the leader's side in February, but that is not a matter he should discuss in this chamber. He should not wash his linen in public, I say to him. Mr. Speaker, we need the right hon. gentleman here, we want him here. We in this party hope he will always be leader of the opposition. It is our constant fear that the Tory party might smarten up and promote him laterally.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: That is the best the Leader of the Opposition can do with a serious document—as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said—to pick and falsify and misrepresent to the public of Canada and go out and say: Look, see what they are doing, the vilest act of all. And what was that vile act? To lift from our Standing Orders, word for word, dot for dot, without a change of an "i" or a "t". We lift it, put it into the document before us and somehow, Mr. Speaker, that is a crime for which we have to be smeared across the country tonight on a national radio show by the irresponsible Leader of the Opposition. If you think that is irrelevant, then I say to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that everything the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday is also irrelevant. It needs to be answered, this vile smear job, this misrepresentation of what has the makings of a noble document. If the people in this House would only get off their pedestals, get into committee, take this as a working paper and then come back with something we can vote on in this chamber—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Simmons: In a simpler age, when Sir John A. Macdonald, that great Canadian, and Sir George Étienne Cartier, another great Canadian, framed our constitution, the rights and liberties of the citizens were held to be an implicit part of our parliamentary democracy. But experience has shown that what is only implicit can be endangered by lack of recognition. So John Diefenbaker, another great Canadian, secured the passage of a bill of rights. And when he spoke to that bill he said: "As far as a constitutional amendment is concerned it is impossible of attainment at this time."

The reason for that, of course, was that it was blocked by the provincial governments. We are now seeking in this great Liberal party to conclude what the Tories began—Macdonald and Diefenbaker and the rest of them.

● (2200)

Those of us on the government benches are puzzled, therefore, by the present aberration manifested in the Leader of the Opposition, the present aberration from the unction and honourable tradition of the Canadian Tory party. Is he really speaking for his caucus, or are the rumors true? Has the caucus smartened up and taken Bill Davis' sage advice on the subject? We on this side of the House have a profound respect for the great tradition—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In accordance with Standing Order 40—

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Points of order are not entertained at the moment of adjournment.

Mr. Roche: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is well recognized in the House that once the adjournment debate has started points of order or questions of privilege are not recognized.

An hon. Member: It has not started.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I rose and interrupted the hon. member and began to talk. The purpose of interrupting the hon. member was to commence the adjournment debate. That is my ruling.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS—VICTORIA INTERNATIONAL—ABSENCE OF RADAR EQUIPMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche). On May 12, I asked a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) which he deliberately misheard and tried to answer in a different way. I was speaking about the problems caused by the absence of radar at Victoria International Airport, but he wanted to tell me about the improvements which have been made to the airport, the extension of space and the freightways and the new roads which are being built. As I indicated to him, we are all aware of the physical improvements to the buildings which were being contemplated. I believe there is one order out at the moment to redirect the road around the airport. However, these were not my concerns at the time.

My concern was with safety, as it has been for more years than I would like to count, considering the number of times I have had to land at that airport with the absence of radar. My first annotation of that particular exercise, and I still carry the memorandum telling me about it, goes back to Air Canada flight 266 from Victoria at 8.10 a.m. on January 21, 1977. Three and a half years ago, as my note reminds me—althouth I do not need any reminder because the impression is still very vivid in my mind—as we were taking off I suddenly felt the wing dip to starboard, and looking out the window which was then above me, I saw a float plane go by the tip of the wing.

I asked the pilot when he had regained level flight if he had been warned of the existence of that particular aircraft, and he said "No". When I got to Vancouver I spoke to the air traffic controllers there and asked them if they were aware of the presence of that aircraft in the flight path of a scheduled airline. They, too, said "No". I asked if a report was being prepared. They said, "Well, it depends on whether a request for a report is called for". From that time on I have been asking at regular intervals whether anything is being done about radar at Victoria International Airport.

• (2205)

On May 12 I raised the question again because I had heard that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) had been out there. I am glad he did not have a near miss when he landed at Victoria International Airport. Since that date, however, I have had a number of other occasions to raise the matter. I raised it on July 15 as reported at page 2192 of Hansard in the first column, when I pointed out that within the last 13 months at Victoria International Airport there had been 19 near misses. It is the only airport in a capital city of Canada that does not have radar. These did not all involve scheduled airlines. Some were with private airlines or business airlines. Indeed, one happened to be an RCAF flight. When coming in, the pilot suddenly found himself confronted on the flight path with three parachutists dropping in front of him. The next day, when another flight came in, there were 30. No one had been notified. The parachutists were in American territory because the flight path happens to go over that territory. The international boundary is there. There was no problem, except that the air traffic controllers in Victoria had not been notified. Now I hear that there are hang gliders in the circuit and there is still no radar.

In a centre like Victoria which I think is one of the tourist attractions of Canada, surely it is time there was radar.

It is stated in Hansard of June 12 at page 2049 that the original cost of Mirabel International Airport was set at $212 million—but that it ended up costing $371 million. Mirabel rates as forty-seventh in importance, based on the number of landings and takeoffs. From 1976 to 1979 it built up from 49,000 landings and takeoffs to 59,000 per year. Victoria is in thirteenth place at the moment. In 1979 it was in twelfth place. It handles between 186,000 and 200,000 landings and takeoffs. I am sure there is radar at Mirabel—and of course I do not say there should not be. But Victoria International Airport also has international flights and, further, it has international overflights as it is on the flight path between Seattle and Alaska and is also on some of the flight paths from Seatac Airport that serves Seattle and Tacoma, to the far east. The presence of aircraft in the area should be known to the air traffic controllers so that incoming and outgoing traffic can be notified.

All I am suggesting is that it is high time there was radar. I am not making a plea for a new appropriation but just a for a re-examination of the assignments of funds to, let us say, Mirabel, in order to purchase radar equipment for Victoria International Airport.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The hon. member has raised the question of radar at Victoria a number of times. I am somewhat surprised that he wishes to raise it again as he was given a clear explanation of the situation in a letter from the minister dated June 2, 1980. At the conclusion of his letter, the minister even offers to have his officials provide further detail if the hon.

member is interested. To my knowledge, the hon. member has not taken the minister up on this offer.

Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, the situation at Victoria airport is quite safe with the procedures currently in place. Controllers use the radar system at Vancouver to some extent, and when it cannot be used specific non-radar procedures are applied to ensure safety at the airport. In addition, the department has established a special operating position in the control tower at Victoria which provides an advisory service. Pilots have reported that this service is a marked improvement.

● (2210)

The hon. member raised a question last July about parachutists interfering with general aviation at Victoria. I would like to point out that the incidents in question took place outside the Victoria control zone in U.S. air space, and that in any event, radar would not have been able to detect the parachutists. The record at Victoria with regard to loss of separation has been remarkably good in the recent past. Naturally, we must look to the future.

Victoria has been identified in a long-term radar modernization plan as being a location requiring radar. The details of this plan will be developed in a rational manner, and Victoria will get radar at an appropriate time in the very near future.

ENERGY—OIL—SOURCES OF SUPPLY FOR EASTERN CANADA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my concern as well arises out of a question asked in May and because of the very nature of events that have taken place in recent months. It centres on the signing of an agreement by the Government of Canada and the government of Mexico regarding the supply of crude oil for the basic needs of Canadians. We have been led to believe for a long period of time that the Canadian government was on the verge of initialling and entering into the final details of contractual arrangements for the supply of 100,000 barrels of crude oil for eastern Canada and eastern Canadian refineries. When we heard the announcement on May 26 or 27, we discovered to our surprise, shock and disappointment, that all the present government had been able to negotiate was some 50,000 barrels a day. This left eastern Canadians with a sense not only of disappointment but of real concern.

My question arose at a point in time when the glut that may exist for the present in the world oil supply market had not arisen. It arose at a point in time when there was growing apprehension about stability in the Middle East and at a point in time when we had come through a winter when most eastern Canadians were vitally concerned, with justification, as to whether or not there would be sufficient oil to supply the refineries, and, through the refineries, the requirements and demands for home heating, electrical generation and the general demand for oil and oil products. The answer given at the time by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) was:

Madam Speaker, I would like, first of all, to alleviate some of the fears of the hon. gentleman by saying that Canada has not lost, today, 50,000 barrels a day; it has won 50,000 barrels a day.

That is a play on words from an individual who had very little, if any, concern for security of supply for eastern Canadians. Yet that minister is a resident of what might generally be described as eastern Canada. What measures has the government taken? What measures is it prepared to pursue with respect to restoring the supply to 100,000 barrels a day, which is the commitment the government gave to eastern Canadians and to this House? In addition, I ask the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Etobicoke North (Mr. MacLaren), to address himself this evening to the question of eastern security. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) made a clear statement at the port of Halifax annual dinner a few weeks ago to the effect that he would personally intervene to ensure that the Quebec-maritime natural gas pipeline would be extended, notwithstanding the position of the National Energy Board.

● (2215)

What discussions have taken place as a result of this concern regarding security of energy? What discussions or negotiations have taken place since May 27 in support of the principle of security? What has been done to replace the lost 50,000 barrels a day which we were counting on? A glut may be present today because of the world situation, but the strife over the past two weeks in the Middle East has destroyed the possibility of eastern Canada receiving its required share on the world market.

We cannot afford to buy on the spot market, although I suspect we are doing that to a large degree. What is being done about that? What plans are in place? What can one tell eastern Canadians other than that there is enough oil to last us until late February or early March? What happens after that, because it is very cold in Atlantic Canada and northern Quebec in late March, April, and indeed if the truth be known, through to the middle of May. What is being done to assure Atlantic Canadians that there will be enough oil for home heating, electrical generation and the ships that come in and out of our ports after the end of February?

In addition, will the parliamentary secretary address the vital question of the degree to which gas will be supplied to replace oil in accordance with the statement by the Minister of Finance so that we might conserve and, indeed, replace the lost 50,000 barrels with this alternate source of energy?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and other members of the government have noted on a number of occasions, the agreement signed in Ottawa with Mexico on May 27 guarantees delivery of 50,000 barrels a day of Mexican oil to Canada, starting late this month.

I am pleased to say that arrangements have been completed for these deliveries. We can expect that from an initial 20,000 barrels a day they will rise to the full 50,000 barrels a day by the end of this year or early January. While there was never any firm commitment on the part of Mexico to increase the level of deliveries above 50,000 barrels, the president of Mexico indicated last spring that he would consider favourably an expression of interest by Canada in increasing deliveries above the 50,000 barrels a day. Currently the government has under consideration measures to ensure fair and equitable allocation of Mexican crude oil to eastern Canada refineries as this new source of supply becomes available.

Regarding the outlook for supplies to the Atlantic region, there are naturally concerns as to the impact the present Iran-Iraq crisis may have on oil supplies to our country. Latest information available indicates that the war is causing the loss of exports from the two countries to the international market of some three to four million barrels a day. However, Canada has only been receiving about 1.5 per cent of its total oil supplies from these two countries and the Canadian importers involved do not anticipate any major difficulty in making other arrangements to cover this disruption. Furthermore, because of record high oil inventories and weak demand for oil products, the rest of the world appears to be able to absorb the loss of Iran and Iraq exports with relative ease.

● (2220)

Over the longer term, the policy will be to substitute oil in the Atlantic region by domestic energy sources. In this connection, the federal government is planning initiatives which will result in a major substitution of imported oil by other forms of energy. There will be increasing reliance on Nova Scotia coal and an increase in programs designed to use renewable energy sources. Another important source of energy will become available with the delivery of natural gas to the Atlantic market. At the same time, certain conservation programs now implemented will lead to a marked decline in the energy growth rate. We can, therefore, anticipate that increased domestic energy supplies and effective conservation programs will enable Canada, by the end of this decade, to be essentially free of dependence on oil imports from uncertain foreign sources of supply.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—INQUIRY INTO OIL INDUSTRY—RELEASE OF INFORMATION GATHERED

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question this evening in relation to a question I raised in the House on June 25, 1980, concerning an investigation by the director of research and investigation into an alleged conspiracy to fix prices and to restrain competition in the oil industry.

I would point out that this particular investigation began on February 13, 1973, and some seven and a half years have passed since then. It is interesting that a similar situation occurred in the United States involving the same major oil companies. It was dealt with very quickly and very effectively. In this country the technique to deal with it was obviously to refer it for study to a committee and then allow it to disappear. Absolutely nothing has been done and we have seen no effective results from this investigation.

The only actual results that have occurred are continued increases in the price of petroleum products to Canadians, and these products are controlled by a virtual monopoly in this country. There has been no movement on the part of the government to do anything about it.

We raised this question on June 25 after raising it on numerous occasions in the House and getting numerous commitments from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) that action would be taken or was pending. We may wait for another seven and a half years before that occurs. At one time the minister suggested action would be taken in a matter of weeks. He said it was under consideration by the Minister of Justice. The Department of Justice had received the matter more than a year before that, had fooled around with it and promised action within weeks of the day we asked the question. Nothing has occurred to this date. A few weeks have gone by, the end of the summer has passed and we are now into the fall and a session during which I doubt that anything will be done about this question, this enormous rip-off of Canadians.

There is an additional element of concern. Even if the director of investigations and research made a report, it would go to the minister. Frankly, I submit that the minister in this particular field is a do-nothing minister. Even if it went to the attorney general, in view of the action we have seen on the part of the Department of Justice in Canada on this matter, which has been reprehensible, there would be nothing done. With the reference to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission we may see another seven and a half years pass while the matter is swallowed up there.

In short, the problem in this country is that the government lacks the will to protect the Canadian people. We need a minister with some determination; we need a government with some determination and we need legislation.

The minister suggested in committee that during this session we would have competition legislation before us which would protect people before the fact rather than after. I suspect that in fact we will not see that competition legislation.

● (2225)

I expect that tonight we will be given a report about how this business has transpired and how, in a few weeks or perhaps in a month or so, we can expect a further report on this subject. It can be referred to the minister, or to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission or somewhere else for another seven and a half years of consideration. But basically I think the Canadian people have been tremendously short-changed not only on this issue but also on the Campeau-Royal Trust issue, the amalgamation of forest companies in the province of British Columbia, the amalgamation of the print media, the concentration of the cablevision and electronics industries in Canada and the monopolies of the telephone companies. Yet this government sits here doing absolutely nothing.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the inquiry into the oil industry in Canada the government recognizes that the public, as well as the parties concerned, deserve to have its results confirmed as quickly as possible. However, this inquiry is one of the largest ever undertaken under competition legislation. Its scope relates to numerous sectors of a highly integrated industry as well as covering a long period.

While inquiries are conducted in private pursuant to section 27(1) of the Combines Investigation Act, there have been occasions when information relating to the pursuit of this particular inquiry has come to public attention from sources other than the office of the director of investigation and research in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As a result, it is possible to advise the House on a number of steps this inquiry has followed.

The inquiry commenced in 1973 when the then director of investigation and research received an application pursuant to section 7 of the act applying for an inquiry into the conduct of a number of oil companies. This application was made by the Consumers Association of Canada, which informed the media of it. Subsequently, the director exercised his full formal powers to conduct searches of the premises of a large number of oil companies pursuant to section 10 of the act. The director removed documents deemed to be relevant to his inquiry. In addition, hearings before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission were held where company officials were examined. The director also requested that oil companies respond to a detailed request for information and has also interviewed many individuals and petroleum trade associations who wanted to provide information.

It has also become public that during the course of this inquiry Petrofina Canada Limited commenced proceedings in the Federal Court questioning the validity of the procedures. The Federal Court denied this challenge. However, the Supreme Court has granted leave to appeal this denial, so it would be inappropriate to make any conjecture on the outcome, which is expected later this year, or on the effect of the challenge to the inquiry.

The director has pursued his investigation in an exhaustive manner while at the same time fulfilling his statutory obligations under the act as other matters have arisen. Given the nature of this inquiry, the effort already expended and its current stage, the governement believes that the public interest will best be served by allowing it to follow its course as prescribed in the Combines Investigation Act.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

RESOURCE OWNERSHIP—GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), who is the government's token western Canadian, has pledged in the House that the federal government has no intention of interfering with the provincial right to resource ownership and also has professed that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should not be suspected of mounting an evil Machiavellian plot to establish a new socialist republic, and in light of the Prime Minister's disdain for similar promises made by other well-known Liberal spokesmen from the west, such as Mr. Gordon Gibson, as well as the loquacious Liberal Senate leader from British Columbia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Prime Minister be directed to clarify that it is he and he alone who speaks for Canada and that Canadians should not take seriously any promises made by that vanishing breed of prominent Liberals from western Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPPING

TAX INCENTIVES TO HELP PATRIATE CANADIAN-OWNED MARINE FLEET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the government's decision to patriate the constitution will not resolve economic problems or create new jobs for unemployed Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan):

That this House direct the government to help patriate the Canadian-owned marine fleet by providing tax incentives similar to those available to Canadian shipowners through registry in other marine nations like Great Britain.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MONOPOLIES

NEWSPAPER INDUSTRY—REPORTED INCREASE IN ADVERTISING RATES BY "WINNIPEG FREE PRESS"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The recent demise of the Winnipeg Tribune has left Winnipeg with only one daily newspaper. On October 7 it was reported that the Winnipeg Free Press, now enjoying a monopoly position, will be increasing its advertising rates by as much as 37 per cent effective December 1, 1980. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls upon the government to introduce effective competition legislation creating the conditions for a genuine free press.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL-INDUSTRY MEETINGS TO IMPROVE SAFETY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, and I mean urgent and pressing necessity. The recent increasing incidence of injuries and fatalities in the mining industry cries out for action. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That this House request that the Minister of State for Mines and the Minister of Labour exercise their respective responsibilities and immediately provide leadership through joint federal-provincial-industry meetings and action to reverse this tragic performance in industrial safety.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

POST OFFICE

FORT McMURRAY, ALTA.—REQUEST FOR IMPROVED SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the postal service in Fort McMurray is unable to expand mail delivery to new districts in Fort McMurray due to a lack of staff and present budget allocations for staff, and whereas Fort McMurray is a high growth area and new subdivisions are being built eight to ten miles from the nearest post office, causing severe hardship to residents of these new areas, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That this House instruct the minister responsible for the Post Office to review immediately the budget allocation to Fort McMurray and provide the necessary funds to provide the proper service required so that—

And I quote the government's constitutional proposal.

—every citizen may move to and take up residence and pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any part of Canada without the prejudice which is presently being manifested by the lack of federal government services to Fort McMurray, Alberta, Canada.

NORTHERN TELECOM

RECEIPT OF INTERNATIONAL INDUSTRIAL AWARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On Monday, October 6, Northern Telecom was informed by the Institute of International Promotion and Prestige of Geneva, Switzerland, that the Institute had selected it for its highest annual honour, the international industrial award. The institute is presenting the award to Northern Telecom in recognition of its emergence as a successful multinational, its record of penetration of key telecommunications markets outside of Canada and its technological leadership.

Northern Telecom Limited is the first Canadian company to receive the international industrial award and only the second company in North America to be so recognized. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Government of Canada pass on to Northern Telecom Limited its best wishes for this prestigious accomplishment and continued success in maintaining Canada's exceptionally high profile in the field of computer technology.

Madam Speaker: I think we will have to revise this matter of offering felicitations under Standing Order 43. I will accept this one for today but I think there should be a discussion among House leaders about this.

This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO PAST AND PRESENT PAGE STAFF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I accept your admonition. With respect to strangers in the House may I point out to you the urgency of my motion under Standing Order 43, which arises from the recognition that since the opening of Parliament on Monday we have had among us 38 of the perhaps most welcomed strangers this House has had occasion to have visited upon us. They are the best, Madam Speaker, I might add, of over 300 applicants from all corners of this nation. These strangers are neither elected nor are they officers of the House.

I want to set the record straight, thus the urgency of my motion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael): That this House expresses its appreciation to those pages, those young men and women, who served us so ably last year, and extends to the 38 "strangers" our congratulations and welcome, expressing at the same time our collective hope that their work and effort among us is both rewarding and fulfilling, as we all know it was for their predecessors.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. I gather there is unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Moved by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House expresses its appreciation to last year's pages and extends its congratulations and welcome to the new "strangers", expressing at the same time that each and every one will find their work with us rewarding and fulfilling in every way.

Motion agreed to.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR RETAILERS REVERTING TO IMPERIAL SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, now that the federal government is following the course which was set by the former Progressive Conservative government in postponing the implementation of the metric system in the retail food sector on January 1, 1981, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the high cost to the retail food stores in Peterborough, Sherbrooke and Kamloops of converting back to the imperial system in order that they can use the same system of measurement as the rest of the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this government show compassion for these independent food retailers and offer them financial assistance to ease the difficulties caused by this necessity of reconversion back to the imperial system.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST ENERGY POLICY BE TABLED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a motion which is directed at the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). I expect it will get unanimous consent.

Whereas there is no energy policy in this country at this time—the tar sands developments have stopped and there is no oil pricing agreement—and whereas the Prime Minister has been spending all his energies on the constitution and has met with the Premier of Alberta, I believe, for two days, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the government move right away to deal with the real concerns of the ordinary Canadian and table in the House of Commons forthwith an energy policy for Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CR CLERKS DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SETTLEMENT REACHED

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On October 6 the minister made a statement to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton with regard to the settlement with the clerks. As it appears in Hansard, he said, "in the event that an agreement is reached I would be very pleased to return to the House and advise the House".

Would the President of the Treasury Board indicate when in fact he intends to make that statement? I am quite sure that we could get unanimous consent now for such a statement if the minister would care to make it.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make any statement in response to questions from the hon. member for York-Peel. He probably has a number of supplementary questions at his disposal, being the lead-off questioner. If there are any details of the arrangement which have not already been released and which the hon. member would like to have, I would be more than pleased to furnish them.

Mr. Nielsen: What happened to the commitment to the House?

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I find it shocking that in a matter involving over $600 million in payroll, and after the President of the Treasury Board found time to post a notice in the press gallery that he would meet with the press after question period, and after distributing a press release, that he would turn up and affront the House by stating that he has no statement to make other than through answering questions.

Mr. Crosbie: Resign.

Mr. Nielsen: Another broken promise.

Mr. Stevens: Would the President of the Treasury Board indicate two things to the House: What is the total cost of the settlement arrived at; and would he specifically indicate the cost of the extra 4 per cent which he added on to the original majority conciliation board report as grounds for settlement?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I would be glad to do the extrapolation for the hon. member because I have found his arithmetic in the past somewhat inadequate. The additional cost per employee over the two-year period from the time we made our last offer, which is well known and which was commented upon by the Leader of the New Democratic Party the other day, is in the order of $234 per clerk over the two-year period which we think is very generous, Madam Speaker, and very helpful.

• (1420)

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Since the President of the Treasury Board took to the airwaves, TV and the print media during the time of this strike to indicate how firm he was going to be in disciplining those who would break the strike or act illegally, I note that the press release from the Public Service Alliance states—and this is in quotes—"According to the agreement the employer would freeze disciplinary action".

Would the President of the Treasury Board indicate why the Public Service Alliance has said that, in view of the inconsistency in his press release in that he claims that he does intend to go ahead and discipline the various employees who may have broken the law? In short, has he in truth turned out to just be a mouse that was roaring?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I have indicated on many occasions, as the hon. member for York-Peel rightly points out, that we consider disciplinary action, where there is illegal strike activity, to be an essential element in the collective bargaining process in order to make that process effective.

An hon. Member: "But—"

Mr. Johnston: I can assure the hon. member for York-Peel that, notwithstanding what he may have read into any press release from the Public Service Alliance, which I, incidentally, have not seen—

Mr. Stevens: There it is.

Mr. Johnston: —the arrangement is very clear. Employees who are subject to disciplinary action will receive notice of discipline from their respective departments. Then a special joint review committee will be established, consisting of a representative or representatives of the union and representatives of the employer, to determine whether the discipline recommended by the department is fair and just in the circumstances. We think it only fair, due to certain controversies that have arisen in particular parts of the country, that those circumstances should be objectively determined before discipline is, in fact, applied.

If there is any disagreement, it will be referred to a third party, appointed by the PSSRB, and discipline will be applied in the normal fashion. In other words, if you like, this is a more expeditious review process to the normal grievance procedure, which these employees may also use if they care to; we are not excluding that possibility. The fact is there is no amnesty; there is no partial amnesty. Discipline will be applied as we have indicated. I hope the hon. member is satisfied with that situation.

Mr. Stevens: You had better explain that to the union.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Wait till Andy Stewart gets hold of that.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

THE CONSTITUTION—INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT SPENT ON PROGRAM

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) in charge of government advertising or the Minister of Justice who is in charge of the constitution, so I shall ask it of the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The question concerns the continuing partisan advertising of the government of his constitutional package. In view of the present situation where the proposed resolution is before this House, could the Prime Minister tell this House and Canadians how much money has been authorized for spending on advertising, on billboards, in the print media and on television, for example, regarding the constitution, and whether the government has also approved additional spending?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member realizes, that kind of statistical question is better asked in the order paper or after having given notice.

An hon. Member: Give or take a million.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, give or take a million. I do not know the figures, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, again the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It might be correct that this question should be on the order paper, but questions have been asked of his ministers and we have not received the information in written form. I think it is imperative that as we now look at the constitution, and the debate is before us, referring back to his own Machiavellian memo, on pages 56 and 57 his advisers very clearly stated that it would be improper to advertise during the period of this debate.

I am asking the Prime Minister, therefore, in view of that advice—and he has followed every other bit of advice in that document to date—whether he will now give an order to withdraw the advertising on the constitution during the period that Parliament has this matter before it?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I must point out that when the hon. member refers to as my memo is, of course, a memo prepared by officials not under my supervision and one that they presented to the cabinet. I am happy now to see that the hon. member is quoting that memo with approval, and I hope he will realize that the thrust of that memo is that we should seek an agreement with the provinces.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

PUBLICLY FINANCED POLLS—AVAILABILITY OF RESULTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last April I asked the Prime Minister if the government would, as a matter of policy, make available to all the people of Canada, through the House of Commons, all the information it was obtaining on the basis of publicly financed polls conducted by the government. The Prime Minister said then that he saw no trouble in principle and would get back to me. Being a patient fellow I waited until July. Then I wrote a letter making the same request. I got a reply yesterday from the Prime Minister saying that it turned out to be more complex than he had imagined.

Could the Prime Minister tell us what is so complex about a proposal that the people of Canada ought to have available to them opinions about themselves through polls which they have financed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would hope that my answer to the hon. member would have explained the facts to him, that the President of the Treasury Board and his officials are working together on compiling a list of all opinion polls conducted by the government over the last year or so. If there is a delay in providing the list, it is because we want to make sure that the responses of all departments are consistent with this spirit of the access to information bill. It should be available in a matter of weeks.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I have the letter here, and the last sentence in the letter from the Prime Minister says: "I would hope to be in a position to make much of the information available in the coming weeks." I think those words "much of the information"—not all of it—are rather significant. Therefore, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he could establish for our benefit now the principles within which he is operating. In short, what is the principle that would justify the holding back of any opinion expressed by the people of Canada which the people of Canada are financing and is being collected by the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I just indicated in my answer that the information supplied would be in conformity with the access to information bill and eventual law of the Canadian government. There are certain circumstances where the revealing of the facts, or the information, or the policies, at a specific time are counter-productive.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Such as the cost of your referendum.

Mr. Trudeau: This is what is stated in the access to information bill. There are certain circumstances where certain information would interfere, say, in international relations or in federal-provincial negotiations or in labour-management relations, and where we would want to hold the information until the result of the negotiations was made public.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, we are not asking for sensitive matters which may pertain to national defence or what have you. I find it difficult, in principle, to understand even polling on such a matter, but could conceive that in matters of state, or national security, there is some hypothetical possibility of the government wanting to withhold information. I say that as a matter of principle, although I cannot think of a concrete example. What I would like to get from the Prime Minister is assurance that the general rule will be that all such information will be made available.

The second question I have is this. I just learned yesterday that an agency well known to the Liberal party, namely Goldfarb Consultants, has been awarded a $61,000 contract by the President of the Treasury Board to do a survey for the Department of Justice.

Mr. Crosbie: Shocking.

Mr. Broadbent: Specifically, could the Prime Minister or the minister tell us what the subject matter is of that survey? When will the data be in, and will it at least be made available to the people of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks that assurance be given, at least in principle, that we agree the information should be made available. That is the thrust of my answer, and that is what I said in my letter. The hon. member says he finds it difficult to justify hypothetical exceptions. Precisely. Let us wait to see whether there are any exceptions and then the hon. member will try to justify them.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

THE CONSTITUTION—INQUIRY WHETHER PROGRAM WILL BE DISCONTINUED

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the right hon. gentleman's new found interest in the noble institution of Parliament, I would like to ask the Prime Minister this. The advice that was contained in the famous leaked memo of August 30 reads as follows:

> Ministers must recognize the distinction between advertising as a negotiating tactic and its use as a tool to sell the government's programs over the head of the opposition . . . Under these circumstances, ministers need to decide if advertising is politically legitimate.

● (1430)

I want to ask the Prime Minister if, in the face of that information, it is the government's intention, in light of the fact that the measure is still before the House, to proceed with this advertising, which seriously undermines the role and the responsibility of Parliament?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, advertising which is meant to convey information to the public of Canada about what is going on—

An hon. Member: The republic of Canada.

An hon. Member: Brainwash the republic.

Mr. Trudeau: A man over there is talking about his brain being washed, Madam Speaker. I don't know, there may not be all that much to wash.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think the people of Canada are as afraid of information as members opposite seem to be.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister does not seem to understand that what he is doing is seriously undermining the role of Parliament to debate a government measure that is now before the House. What he is in fact doing is using the taxpayers' money to sell the Liberal party's position to this country. That is patently wrong and irresponsible.

The Prime Minister says a million here or a million there. We know that $6 million has already been spent. I want to ask the Prime Minister this. How can they find $6 million for a questionable advertising campaign when $6 million has been denied to the Minister of National Health and Welfare which would provide an immunization program for children in this country under five years of age and would have 99 per cent effectiveness?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: How come on the one hand—and the Minister of National Health and Welfare need not have a questioning look on her face because it came from her own—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe the question has been asked.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sure all of us on all sides of this House could find ways of effectively spending $6 million. That is the job of every government. We could cut the staffs and increase the price of lunches in the parliamentary restaurant, raise some more money and spend it on poor children.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY CONSERVATION—INQUIRY AS TO PROPRIETY OF PROGRAM

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is diverted to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It deals with his multimillion dollar advertising campaign which is laid out in a document leaked earlier this summer. The document describes his strategy for conditioning the Canadian public to believe that this Liberal government is doing a good job of managing the energy situation. It outlines all kinds of dubious tactics, but does not even raise the question of the constitutional document questioning the legitimacy of spending taxpayers' money to permit what will be deemed by many to be a partisan representation. My question to the minister is this. Before he approved this program, did the question of the propriety of this program come to his mind? Did he consider it? What arguments did he present to justify this improper propaganda campaign using the taxpayers' money?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to a memo drafted by an official. I would be very happy to send him a press clipping at the time this memo became public. When the official was interviewed by the press, he indicated that his memo had been rejected by his minister. I suggest that before quoting memos as government policy or the policy of a minister, the hon. member should at least get proper information.

As far as the advertising put out by my department during the summer is concerned, I suggest that the hon. member take the trouble to read it. That advertising is quite clear. It puts before the public the importance of conserving energy so as to ensure that we are going to have the support of the people of Canada to act on their own in terms of supporting all our efforts toward conservation of energy and replacement of oil by other forms of energy, particularly through the excellent "Enersave" program which the federal government set up and which is working very well. If the hon. member will bother to check, he will see that what has been put forward has been institutional advertising aimed at informing the Canadian public about the importance of conserving energy and the importance of substituting other forms of energy in place of oil. I believe that such a policy has the support of all parties in this House and all governments in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the actions of this government belie the statement just made by the minister that this program has been cancelled, because there have been three ads so far, each of which contained the kind of Orwellian double-speak that this document deals with. This kind of propaganda campaign is outlined in a document by one of his officials, a document which talks not about perspective but which describes an $11 million program in some detail and what kind of words officials use to create a condition rather than how to transfer facts to the public. If he is sincere in rejecting the philosophy behind this document of government propaganda, of Orwellian double-speak, will he here and now cancel that $11 million advertising program, save the taxpayers some money and save his dignity a little bit? Because surely he must be embarrassed by this program.

Mr. Lalonde: I wish to thank the hon. member for his great concern about my dignity, Madam Speaker. I want to repeat to him that this memo and the $11 million proposal was rejected by myself. What has been put in its stead is an advertising campaign which clearly is centred on the importance of conserving energy and substituting other forms of energy for oil. Also it informs the public that Canada is a net exporter of energy. Contrary to what some of my friends on the other side try to make people believe, we have a surplus of energy in this country, apart from a shortage of oil. Canada has the ability to become completely self-sufficient and independent in energy in the next decade if we can get support for the policies we are putting forward.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

DELAY IN COMPLETION OF McDONALD COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Over the past several months the Solicitor General has stated on a number of occasions that the long delayed report of the McDonald commission would be finally completed by the end of this past summer. It is now mid-October and the commissioners stated just yesterday that they do not intend to be bound by any timetable, and, of course, their report is still not complete.

In view of the inexcusable failure of the Liberal government to commence prosecutions where there has been evidence of RCMP law breaking or to initiate any disciplinary action whatsoever in these circumstances, and in view of the lengthy delay in the report of the McDonald commission, what action does the Solicitor General intend to take to ensure that the rule of law is indeed upheld in this country?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. member that his party as much as others supported the establishment of this royal commission which, as he noted, is independent. It is doing its work. Now he wants to have both sides of it. The government decided to wait for the report of the commission before taking the kind of action that the hon. member has demanded. No one is more anxious than I to have the report of the McDonald commission. It will affect my ministry and give advice for reorganization that I would like to have. However, the commission is independent. Its terms of reference, which the hon. member's party supported, provide that it can report when it is ready to report. I have no control over that.

● (1440)

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Of course, Madam Speaker, it was over three years ago that this commission was established and we supported its establishment, but we did not support the terms of reference of the commission.

My supplementary question is again addressed to the Solicitor General. On May 8 of this year the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated in response to a question from me regarding the McDonald commission: "Mr. Justice McDonald would prefer any action in terms of laying of charges to await his report". I have here a letter signed by Mr. Justice McDonald in which he states as follows:

> I am not aware that I have ever indicated that I would prefer the laying of charges to await the report of the commission of inquiry of which I am chairman.

He goes on to ask the government to correct this inaccuracy which was presented to the people of Canada through Parliament. In view of this inaccuracy which was stated in this House on May 8 last, will the Solicitor General now take this opportunity to correct the erroneous statement made on his behalf; and will he also take this opportunity to say that he will no longer hide behind the delay of the report of the McDonald commission but, as I way, will uphold the rule of law for all Canadians in this country?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I do not believe I have seen the letter the hon. member referred to and I would like to see it before commenting on it. The observation that was made about Mr. Justice McDonald's opinion was based on a statement that His Lordship made during hearings of the commission, copies of which were made public. I will take another look at it and perhaps answer a question about that in the light of the letter the hon. member is bringing to my attention now.

AIRPORTS

MOUNT HOPE, HAMILTON—INQUIRY WHETHER STEPS BEING TAKEN TO ENLARGE FACILITY

Madam Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. What steps, if any, are being taken to implement the promise made to the Hamilton-Wentworth region to upgrade its airport by enlarging it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we are still committed to the expansion of that airport, that multimillion dollar program. Consultation and planification is taking place with municipal authorities and we expect to have a tender call in the very near future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

ENERGY CONSERVATION—CONTINUANCE OF PROGRAM

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my questions are supplementary to those put by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, and I direct them to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I accept his advice to ignore for the time being the unfortunate document from his department leaked earlier in the year and I will concentrate on the contents of this multimillion dollar advertising program.

I would draw his attention to one advertisement which appeared in the Citizen on August 15. The caption was "We Canadians produce more energy than we use". That is hardly conceived to encourage conservation. Setting that aside, let me point out that ad specifically says that last year we imported a net $500 million in petroleum and petroleum products. That is the content of the ad, and that is the equivalent, on the basis of $22 per barrel, of 62,300 barrels per day net imports. I think that is a very fair calculation for 1979.

Will the minister explain how he can possibly permit the continuance of that incorrect information when the National Energy Board has said our imports were 334,000 per day, Stats Canada has said they were 322,000 barrels per day, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in a report to the Senate said the figure was 227,000, and the most unimpeachable source of all, the minister, in Vancouver on September 15 of this year, said the figure was 150,000 barrels per day? How can the continuance of this campaign be permitted in view of these four impeccable sources?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, once again my honourable colleague does not make the distinction between energy as a whole and oil as one specific element in the consumption of energy in Canada. With regard to the total reserves of energy in Canada, and this is a fact no one has any reason to hide or doubt, we are net exporters of energy. It is high time the opposition got that through its skull, if it is not aware of the facts.

As for oil as such, we are net importers, and that we have said time and time again. The figures mentioned by the hon. member, which I too have quoted, are there to indicate it, to prove it. As for the specific figures quoted from the advertisement referred to by the hon. member, once again I must point out that he is referring to last year's figures. If I understood his question correctly, and I can assure him those figures were checked by officials of my department, they correspond to the reality.

[English]

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, is the minister suggesting that he can continue to spend millions of taxpayers' dollars in the face of that deliberately misleading statement? I do not accuse him of being responsible for it, but it is misleading to the extent that Canadians are being told on the one hand in an advertisement that we import 62,000 barrels per day, when in other statements, not the least important of which was the minister's, it has been indicated that it is at least two and a half times as much?

I will set that aside and let the minister consider it because I want to ask him about another ad dealing with Arctic resources, and the minister is familiar with that advertisement. It contains several inaccuracies, inaccurate to the degree that the minister has been contacted by the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee. Why has the minister refused to answer at least two letters of inquiry from that committee; will he withdraw that particular advertisement; why is the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs not investigating this; and will the subject matter of the entire advertising program be referred to the appropriate standing committee?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I want to challenge very completely the statement by the hon. member that the advertisement he was referring to was misleading in any way, shape or form. The statements are there and they correspond with the facts.

As far as the second advertisement to which the hon. member referred is concerned, indeed I have been contacted by the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee, I have examined very carefully the statements and the allegation, and up to now I have been able to find only one point the committee raised which corresponds to an omission, and that was the omission of reference to Dome Petroleum as being one of the partners in the Arctic pilot project. As far as the rest is concerned, the statements made in the advertisement are completely according to the facts.

THE CONSTITUTION—INCREASED EXPENDITURE ON PROGRAM

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): If I may, Madam Speaker, I would like to return to some questions about the constitutional advertising. I had intended to direct questions to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism on publicly paid for Liberal propaganda, but he is not here so perhaps I can turn to the President of the Treasury Board. I should start, perhaps, by indicating to members opposite that those on this side like the new ad showing all the Liberal parliamentary secretaries dressed up as beavers holding signs. We think that is terrific!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1450)

Mr. Bosley: There was an indication given in the recent Quebec press and through the CBC to the effect that the budget for the publicly paid, partisan Liberal constitution advertising has been approved by Treasury Board to increase for this fiscal year from $9 million to $30 million or $35 million, against all the arguments which have been made by the other side. Can the President of the Treasury Board confirm that?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the reports in question.

Some hon. Members: Come on!

Mr. Johnston: I would be happy to review them if the hon. member would be kind enough to provide me with them.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I suppose I am not surprised that the President of the Treasury Board does not know anything about matters before the Treasury Board. He has shown that with respect to the labour negotiations of the last three or four weeks.

Can he tell me, please, whether the fact that the memo which was discussed in debate at the first ministers' constitutional conference has not been government policy—the memo says that the fundamental question to be addressed concerns the legitimacy of spending taxpayers' dollars to promote what will be deemed by many to be a politically partisan position—would lead him, should there ever be a request to increase this pork-barrelling by the Liberal government, to accept his responsibility as President of the Treasury Board and refuse any increases in this politically partisan budget?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, it is not our practice in the Treasury Board to make decisions, on the basis of press commentary, as to whether expenditure is or is not a good thing.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN MINISTER AND PRIME MINISTER THATCHER ON CONSTITUTION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs would give the House a brief summary of his four-minute discussion with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher on constitutional matters.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, and I spent almost an hour with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

An hon. Member: How many in the waiting room and how many talking to her?

Mr. MacGuigan: We explained to her the details of the government's proposal for patriating the constitution and other matters in the proposed resolution. We explained our reasons and discussed with her the timetable problems she faced and her gracious willingness to organize her timetable in such a way as to accommodate us.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I wonder if in his brief report the Secretary of State for External Affairs would include the reply he received, if any, or any assurance he received from the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and if in that brief time he was also able to explain to her the 12 or 14 other viable and meaningful alternatives to the government proposal which exist.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, it is the Government of Canada which is adviser to the United Kingdom government on matters affecting the Canadian constitution, not the opposition and not the provinces.

Mr. Clark: Parliament?

Mr. MacGuigan: Parliament advises the United Kingdom parliament and government; but in speaking of constitutional advice, constitutional advice is given by our government to their government. For the information of the hon. member, we did not go cap in hand to ask for anything.

Mr. Crosbie: You went with truncheon in hand.

Mr. MacGuigan: We went to explain. We had assurances from previous occasions that the constitution convention would be accepted by the British government and, I might say, by the opposition parties as well.

An hon. Member: Did you put up billboards?

Mr. MacGuigan: The discussion centred on the modalities rather than on the substance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT AID TO B.C. SALMON FISHERMEN

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The minister will be fully aware that the B.C. salmon fishing industry was at least disastrous this year as a result of lower runs of salmon, increased cost of borrowing money, increased cost of equipment and lower prices for salmon. The minister will also be aware that many fishermen in British Columbia are in serious jeopardy and threatened with the loss of their vessels. I would like to ask the minister if he or his government at this time have any aid program to announce to assist those fishermen and, if so, when will it be introduced, and under what kind of program is the minister hoping to aid those fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I recognize that there has been a rather low trough in the cycle of the Pacific salmon. In fact, we are expecting a considerable improvement next season. We have been monitoring in co-operation with the fishermen's organization the difficulties which are being met, although it is only now that we have a fairly good assessment of the real extent of the problems they are facing.

I might say to the hon. member that two very senior people have undertaken on my behalf an examination, in consultation with all representatives of the industry. I hope their report will be in my hands in the next week or ten days. In fact, if it is not during the week of the budget, I intend to meet the B.C. fishing representatives on the week of the twentieth.

Mr. Miller: Madam Speaker, I remind the minister that part of the real difficulty facing fishermen in British Columbia is the callous attitude of his government in allowing interest rates to float freely. The problem they have is meeting the 15 per cent to 20 per cent interest costs. In addition, in order to remain competitive in the industry because of overcapitalization they have had to invest in larger vessels. The issue is that there are people right now who are losing their vessels, and I would like the minister to give some assurance that within the next ten days or when he receives that report, he will seriously think about giving some interim support to the fishermen of British Columbia.

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I will be meeting with the representatives of all the fishing interests including the union, the trollers and the other organizations. So far they have indicated that they might have problems meeting payments in some individual cases. I asked that they inform my department, and if there is a significant number who do come forward, we will obviously try to assist them. But I really think the hon. member at the moment is slightly exaggerating the dimension of the problem.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CR CLERKS DISPUTE—DISCIPLINARY ACTION AGAINST EMPLOYEES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. If I understood the minister correctly, he said that apart from breaches of the criminal law questions of discipline would be referred to a special joint review committee. I wonder if the minister can tell us whether he as minister retains any further authority on questions of discipline after those matters have been referred to the special joint review committee.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the normal procedure is that if an employee feels that he or she is being improperly disciplined, there is a grievance procedure at the moment which is under the auspices of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. In the normal circumstance, once the discipline is applied by the appropriate department—the minister of that department has made his position clear and has applied discipline—the matter then goes through the grievance procedure.

What is being suggested here is simply a parallel procedure which will consist of a special committee and joint committee consisting of union representatives and management representatives. If there is disagreement on the severity of the penalty, which would already have been imposed at that point—and the department in question would have notified the employee involved—then the matter can go to a third party appointed by the PSSRB. That is the procedure which has been agreed upon, and it is designed in particular to take into account the circumstances I referred to where there is some question in certain parts of the country as to whether the departments did or did not act properly in certain very particular circumstances.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, if I understand that correctly, the minister is saying that he is delegating away his authority to impose discipline. That was an authority he undertook in this House to impose in response to questions the other day. Will this review committee, which is being established to become involved in deciding whether the minister's word to Parliament will be kept, deal exclusively with CRs, or will it deal also with other public servants who might have taken actions which breached law other than the criminal law?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, perhaps the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is unaware that discipline is normally applied in all such circumstances by the departments involved and not by the Treasury Board. However, that aside, I am sorry but would the right hon. member care to repeat the second part of the question?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I have a great deal of patience for the minister. The second part of the question was as to his guarantee to this House of Commons on Monday that discipline would be effected against public servants who broke the law. Will the review committee he has established, either to carry out or to smother his promise to Parliament, touch simply CRs, or will its authority also extend to other public servants who might have breached a law other than the criminal law?

• (1500)

Mr. Johnston: I apologize, Madam Speaker, for that slight slip of memory in reply to the question. The disciplinary procedure which we are recommending, and this special procedure for review of the discipline which will be applied by departments—I make that point clear, nothing is being smothered, this is a normal disciplinary procedure which will be applied—the review procedure which I have outlined, will apply to all member units of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, all the bargaining units of the Public Service Alliance. It will not apply to other bargaining units. In other words, it will apply to circumstances such as that of firefighters at the Toronto International Airport, for example, who are members of the PSAC.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOMALIA—REQUEST EMERGENCY AID PROGRAM BE STUDIED

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As Somalia, one of the poorest countries in the world, is facing an influx of over one million refugees, as well as a shortage of 100,000 metric tons of food and the loss of oil supplies from Iraq, could the minister consider setting up an emergency assistance program including the CIDA recommendation, according to which Somalia should be considered as a target country in terms of bilateral aid?

[English]

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member and our colleague from Fraser Valley West, both of whom have shown in recent days such concern for international relief and international humanitarian affairs. Canada is the second largest contributor to the world food program and a very great effort is being made in the horn of Africa. We have also contributed $2 million to the African fund of the International Red Cross which also is devoting all of its resources to that particular problem. I will be very pleased to meet the two hon. members and to review, in light of the needs and also of our available resources, whether there is anything further we can do to assist in this serious problem.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—ANSWERS GIVEN BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have risen on a question of privilege on the assumption that the question period is over. I apologize to you, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I was about to interrupt the question period but I had decided to let the hon. member ask a question. I will recognize him now on a question of privilege.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): My question of privilege involves two points of privilege, first, the answers to questions today given by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) with respect to the completion of the agreement which was reached with the public servants to which we referred, and an earlier one arising out of a question which I put to him on October 6 and the undertaking which he gave to me on the same day. Madam Speaker, you will recall that at that time I said the following, as reported at page 3271 of Hansard of that day:

Because of the importance of this meeting—

I was referring to the meeting which led to the completion of the agreement.

—will the minister undertake to return to the House when the day's work is over, if that day's work is definitive, and make a statement to the House in respect of the results of that meeting and their impact on the work stoppage in the public service?

His answer to me was as follows:

It will not be my intention in any way to prejudice these negotiations by making premature statements regarding the content thereof. Obviously in the event an agreement is reached I would be very pleased to return to the House and advise the House.

In the context, my question to him was to advise the House by way of a statement, and that is the reason I used the words "and make a statement to the House", which is part of our proceedings. That is exactly what I had in mind. That is the first aspect of it, and I think the minister should consider whether he could wait for just a few minutes before going out to meet the press, and make a statement here in the House of Commons so we will know what the results were.

The second aspect of my question goes to the line of questioning which underscores what I was asking for as a result of the question of the hon. member for York-Peel regarding disciplinary action. We have now in our hands two written statements, one by the President of the Treasury Board dated today for immediate release, and the other by the Public Service Alliance of Canada, also dated today for immediate release, and they are different. That is why a statement to the House is quite important. These two written statements are different with respect to discipline.

I do not want to re-read the whole of the minister's statement, but the important thing is that from the point of view of the government he says:

—that no amnesty has been granted, partial or otherwise—

That is his position. It goes on:

Those who have broken the law—

Civil or criminal, here I paraphrase.

—must face the consequences, subject only to careful review of the circumstances in individual cases.

That is a very hard line which the minister has taken. I am not quarrelling with him taking it, but that is what he has taken.

The statement which has been made by the president of the Public Service Alliance is completely different. It says this:

According to the agreement the employer would freeze disciplinary action—except for those actions related to criminal acts.

In other words, if they are going to carry on with respect to civil acts, the minister's answers to the questions indicate another proceeding altogether.

Madam Speaker, it may be that the President of the Treasury Board might argue that he is not bound to make a statement to me if he does not choose to do so, except for the fact that he said he would. I took it, and I think the House took it, that he would be making a statement in the House when matters were definitive. In any event, I think members are entitled to a statement from him. I would hope that we could wait for just a few moments for a statement from the minister here in the House so that we could question him and have a number of things cleared up now. It is clear that a wrong impression has been left with regard to the outcome of these negotiations, by either the President of the Treasury Board or by the president of the Public Service Alliance, perhaps by both in good faith, but I think the House is entitled to have the releases explained, and I hope the minister will comply with what I believe to be a reasonable request.

Mr. Nielsen: And members should know this, before the press.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, may I say, in reply to the first part of the question of privilege, that the hon. member has referred to Hansard of October 6, 1980, and I remember the exchange very well. He asked me, and again I will quote as he has done:

Because of the importance of this meeting—

That meeting was taking place, you might recall, Madam Speaker, at four o'clock in the afternoon of October 6.

—would the minister undertake to return to the House when the day's work is over, if that day's work is definitive, and make a statement to the House in respect of the results of that meeting and their impact on the work stoppage in the public service?

When that question was put to me, I replied that if we did reach agreement during that negotiating session, I would be very pleased to return and to advise the House.

As matters turned out, I would dearly have loved to have returned and advised the House, but as hon. members might well know, negotiations continued through the night without interruption, continued all day yesterday without interruption, and an agreement was finally signed late last night.

Mr. Nielsen: Tell us about it.

Mr. Johnston: It seems to me, Madam Speaker, that I gave hon. members every opportunity and did advise them in response to the questions put to me by the hon. member for York-Peel. I regret if I have in any way misinterpreted the question which has been put to me by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), but I do feel that I have fulfilled my obligation to him in advising the House. I can assure him that had an agreement been reached on that Monday, I indeed would have returned to the House and, in one form or another, would have advised the House of the agreement.

With respect to the second part of the question, the hon. member has me somewhat at a disadvantage because I have not seen any statements issued by the Public Service Alliance of Canada. I have simply advised the House, in my response to questions from the other side, initially in response to questioning from the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) and subsequently in response to questions from the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), that a special procedure had been established to review the discipline which is to be applied by various departments in respect of illegal activities carried on during the course of the strike. That answer does not change.

• (1510)

If the president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada interprets that as a freeze, then perhaps he is entitled to do so. In other words, there was a certain appeal procedure established, and until that appeal procedure is carried forward and until the individual circumstances of each case are examined, I suppose one would be entitled to say that at least there is a suspension of the application of the penalty. But there is no question that the line I have taken is hard and is intended to be hard.

I hope the hon. member who put the question to me shares my belief, and the belief of the government, that it is essential our collective bargaining agreement be honoured, that we not place the people of Canada in a position where they can be held hostage by illegal activities carried on by various unions that do so on the assumption that they will be relieved from the penalties attached to those illegal activities. I stand firm on that, and the government stands firm on it. I hope I have the support of all members of the House in supporting that kind of an approach and that policy.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I should like to comment on both aspects of my colleague's question of privilege, the first being the clear undertaking given by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) to make a statement in this House. I would only suggest that the President of the Treasury Board has acknowledged that there may have been a misunderstanding, and I think he said that he was sorry for that. He can rectify that very quickly. He can rectify it, not by walking out of the House, but by making a statement now. It does not have to take too long. We have yet to reach motions in the orders of the day. If the President of the Treasury Board wishes to be co-operative with the House and wishes to live up to the undertaking he gave, he can make a statement in the House.

I should like to refer to the words of my colleague, which read as follows:

—and make a statement to the House in respect of the results of that meeting and their impact on the work stoppage in the public service?

As is agreed, the President of the Treasury Board came back and said:

—I would be very pleased to return to the House and advise the House.

This was providing there was an agreement on that day, the next day, or a week away. Essentially, the understanding was that if there was an agreement he would be pleased to come back and advise the House, as was requested by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

On the second point, I thought I would be helpful in saying that as there is an obvious difference in the reading of what was signed in the form of at least a tentative agreement between the employer and the employees, it would be helpful if the President of the Treasury Board would undertake to table the agreement in the House so that we can actually see the wording with respect to whatever disciplinary action or no disciplinary action there is to be taken with respect to those who have acted illegally.

I do not wish to delay the House. I would only point out that the President of the Treasury Board has made repeated statements in this House indicating that he intends to uphold the law, and I emphasize the civil law. If agreements are broken he will see to it that people are held responsible. Yet, we now have two conflicting statements as to what in fact will be the form of discipline, if any, which will be brought against some people who broke the law.

Also we are faced with the fact that the President of the Treasury Board has now apparently delegated to another group—a labour-management group, eventually an arbitrator—the entire question of discipline other than anything of a criminal nature. This is a very, very serious problem if in fact it has been agreed to. Now we are in the position of where the second great mistake has been made by the President of the Treasury Board. He acquiesced in a too "small" liberal, settlement for the postal workers. Now he has virtually undermined the entire system of collective bargaining which we have in this country by, in the one breath, in effect talking sternly about discipline and, on the other hand, simply delegating any future responsibility for discipline to a committee of labour and management.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, there are two things. First, opposition members are talking about answers that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) gave them, when obviously they would have preferred different ones, or else they do not understand those given. In any event, the fact that they are dissatisfied with the answers given or, as they admit, that they do not understand them as they would want to, does not constitute a question of privilege.

The second point, Madam Speaker, is that a minister does not have to make a statement in the House. As we all know, under Standing Order 15(3), a minister may make a statement if he wishes, but he is not required to do so. The President of the Treasury Board has indeed shown respect for this institution in two ways. First of all, he postponed his press conference until after question period. He could have held it this morning or before question period. However, out of respect for this institution, he waited until questions had been put to him in the House before talking to the media. Second, he made himself available during the entire question period to answer questions from the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) or any other Conservative or NDP member. He was available and provided complete and honest answers. And if hon. members of the opposition are not satisfied with the gist or substance of these answers, this is not grounds for rising on a question of privilege, Madam Speaker, just something to be debated.

For these two reasons, therefore, I respectfully submit that there are no grounds for this question of privilege, because the President of the Treasury Board has answered very well, he has respected this institution by answering all the questions directed to him, he has delayed his press conference until the oral question period is over, and he is not bound to make a statement pursuant to Standing Order 15(3).

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): On the same question of privilege—

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Indeed, I can hardly conclude that there are grounds for a question of privilege. Obviously, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is not happy with the way the minister has fulfilled or interpreted his obligations toward him.

The minister has provided answers which the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton feels are inadequate, but insisted that he had not undertaken to make a statement, only to keep the House advised of any new development.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is still not satisfied with these answers. But I must regretfully rule that this is only a debate, that at best it is just a grievance against the minister who, according to the hon. member, had made certain commitment which he has failed to meet.

Therefore, this is not a matter for a question of privilege, and I cannot entertain the point raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton.

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—STATEMENTS MADE BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY DURING ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege relates to a question I raised earlier in the House with the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). It arises initially from a proceeding in what we refer to as the "late show" on May 8, 1980, in which I raised certain questions following up on a question to the Solicitor General.

In reply the then parliamentary secretary to the Minister of State for Mines, apparently speaking on behalf of the Solicitor General, made certain statements. Subsequently it came to my attention that those statements were such that the parliamentary secretary apparently inadvertently misled the House. During the course of my question in question period today, I gave the opportunity to the Solicitor General to clarify the position and to correct the erroneous statements made by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of State for Mines.

I believe the Solicitor General stated that in fact he had not received this letter previously. I was informed by the former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of State for Mines that he had forwarded a copy of this letter some time ago to the minister and, indeed, that I should obtain a copy of the letter from the minister himself. I do not quite understand how it could be said that the minister had not received a copy of the letter from Mr. Justice McDonald, dated May 14, 1980. The concern that I have relates to a couple of sections of the letter.

● (1520)

The letter is sent by Mr. Justice McDonald, chairman of the McDonald commission, to the parliamentary secretary. In this letter he states that the response which was given to me in this House and, of course, through this House to all Canadians, was not correct.

He states, after referring to the answer which was given by the parliamentary secretary:

I am not aware that I have ever indicated that I would prefer the laying of charges to await the report of the commission of inquiry of which I am chairman. My fellow commissioners are also unaware of any of the Commissioners having said that.

He then goes on to refer to certain statements made during the course of commission hearings, which I believe may have been alluded to by the Solicitor General today, and he concludes as follows:

I trust that you will bring this correction to the attention of those who may have understood that the position of my fellow commissioners and myself was as indicated—i.e. that we "would prefer any such action to await his report".

Here we have a clear indication on the part of the chairman of the commission that this House has indeed been misled. This letter was written on May 14. I only received a copy of the letter today after persistently pressing both the parliamentary secretary and requesting the staff of the Solicitor General for a copy of the letter. The House was sitting from May 14 until well into July. At no time did either the Solicitor General, or the parliamentary secretary who received this letter, take any opportunity whatsoever to correct the record, to correct the erroneous statement which was made not only to myself but to all Canadians, and which is presently recorded in Hansard.

It is a fundamental point, in that the government stated that they were awaiting the laying of charges because the McDonald commission had suggested they should await the laying of charges. We have the head of the McDonald commission saying that is not the case.

In conclusion, I would urge the Solicitor General to take this opportunity—I have sent him a copy of the letter during question period—to correct the record, to make it quite clear that it is not the McDonald commission which is responsible for any delay in the laying of the charges, that the responsibility rests squarely at the feet of the government.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I would like to speak, first of all, about the policy of laying charges against RCMP officers and others named by the McDonald commission. The policy I have been following is to turn over to provincial attorneys general any evidence that comes to my attention of possible wrongdoing, or suspicion of wrongdoing, on the part of a member of the force. That policy is in effect and we have begun a process of turning over this information to provincial attorneys general. It is their responsibility to decide in most matters whether or not, and when, charges should be laid against particular individuals. There are some matters, such as income tax, matters relating to the Post Office Act, relatively smaller in number than the main, in which a prosecutorial decision is the responsibility of my colleague, the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Chrétien).

The Attorney General of Canada has made it clear to this House his preference in waiting for the report of the McDonald commission before addressing these matters and taking these decisions. It may well be that the McDonald report will contain some argument or some evidence which will affect his decision on whether charges should be laid or not, matters relating to the circumstances in which possible or alleged offences may have been committed.

I was under the impression that the McDonald commission had expressed a preference for a wait before laying charges, in other words, the McDonald commission had indicated a preference for the attorneys general to wait for its report to be made public before taking any action. I formed that impression from something I read in a public transcript of McDonald commission hearings. I do not have that transcript in front of me at the moment. I will certainly look it up and bring it to the attention of the hon. member and, if he would like, to the House.

I do not believe I have seen the letter the hon. member referred to, addressed to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of State for Mines. There is no doubt that in this letter Mr. Justice McDonald says that he is not aware that he has ever indicated—and I am quoting—"that I would prefer the laying of charges to await the report of the commission of inquiry". In other words, he is not aware of having indicated that. My recollection is that there was a statement made by him or one of the other commissioners to that effect during the course of the hearing. That transcript is public and I intend to look it up. I certainly do not see, on the face of it, that any question of privilege has been raised by this question from the hon. member.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) will understand that under the guise of a question of privilege, he cannot attempt to correct the statements of other hon. members. It is not up to him to have other members' statements corrected. Only those who made the statements can correct them. I noted that in his remarks the hon. member never said that if the hon. member concerned misinformed the House, he did so deliberately. Therefore, if the hon. member, following the hon. member for Burnaby's comments, feels his statement needs to be clarified or corrected in any way, I will leave that to his initiative. He is the one who can best judge whether what he said in the House is valid. I repeat that the hon. member cannot correct the statements of another member. Only the hon. member who spoke in the House can correct his own speech.

The hon. member for Burnaby also raised in his question of privilege the fact that answers to questions he had asked were long overdue, too much so in his opinion. That constitutes a grievance, a legitimate one perhaps, but I repeat that it is a grievance. He is right in trying to express it at the first opportunity, but he chose to do so as a question of privilege. However, as Speaker of this House, I fail to find in the remarks the hon. member has just made, in light of information given by the Solicitor General, any grounds for a question of privilege.

[English]

MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)—RECOGNITION BY CHAIR

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege relates to my right to be heard in this chamber. Following the intervention of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Johnston) in the previous question of privilege, I rose to add what I thought were three contributing factors, which I thought the Chair might wish to take into account before making a ruling. It may very well be that while I said as I stood, "A question of privilege—" the Chair either did not hear me or understood I was raising a separate question of privilege, in which case I could quite understand I would not be heard at that time. But the points that I wanted to raise were that the President of the Treasury Board, I felt, was quibbling with the matter of time when he was talking about that day's proceedings because he admitted, following that, that there were uninterrupted proceedings under way and at the end of that he was prepared to advise the House—not to submit to questioning but to advise the House, which is a positive gesture by the President of the Treasury Board.

● (1530)

Madam Speaker: I had understood when the hon. member rose to seek the floor that he wanted to intervene on the question of privilege that was being debated in the House. I thought that the hon. member was now raising a new question of privilege. I believe when I recognized him that I asked the hon. member whether he was speaking on a new question of privilege. The reason why I did not recognize the hon. member as a third or fourth intervener in that debate was that I felt that I was sufficiently informed to make a judgment, that there was no question of privilege in the question raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

If the hon. member is raising a new question of privilege I will hear him. But if he is referring back to the decision which I have already made on the question raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, I am very sorry but I will not be able to hear him.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in other words, my right to be heard in this House is being thwarted by the ruling that I had nothing to contribute to that general debate on the question of privilege. My question of privilege now is in protest against my inability to be heard.

Madam Speaker: I really do not feel that the rights of the hon. member to be heard in this chamber have been thwarted by the action that I have just taken. The hon. member knows that the Speaker has the discretion to listen to as many interventions as the Speaker feels are necessary to be sufficiently informed in order to rule on a given question of privilege. At some point in time in these debates, and they often do become debates, the Speaker does have to interrupt, assuming—and the assumption of the House should be—that the Speaker feels that she is sufficiently informed. I do not think that the hon. member can legitimately say that his freedom to express himself in this House has been thwarted by that action.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—NOTICE OF POSSIBLE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a point of order to raise which I believe is a serious one. It arises out of a line of questioning which I was developing today with the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I raise this point of order now in order to reserve the right later to raise a question of privilege.

It seems to me that when I sought from the Prime Minister an assurance that moneys voted by this House would not be used to undermine the members of this House in a debate that is currently taking place in the House, I did not receive such an assurance from the Prime Minister. The matter goes to the very heart of the responsibilities of each one of us in this House, and of the government, because here we have a situation which is totally unprecedented in my view, whereby the government of the day is using the taxpayers' money to mount a massive national advertising campaign to generate public pressure which is to be, presumably, applied to members of this House on a measure that is still before the House, in support of the governing party's position.

It seems to me that the only time such an advertising campaign could be justified would be if the measure were passed by the House. Then, of course, the government can sell its program because the program has received parliamentary approval. But in this instance we are placed in the invidious position as members of this House of having to stand by and see the very moneys that we voted for the government being used inappropriately, to say the least—

Mr. Nielsen: Illegally.

Mr. McGrath: —and probably illegally, to mount a national advertising campaign the only purpose of which, surely, can be to apply pressure to members of this House to support the position the government is taking before the House. That seems to me to be highly improper. It goes to the very rights and privileges of this House, namely, to hold the government accountable for expenditures of public funds which it in fact has allotted for this purpose.

I want to reserve the right to raise this as a question of privilege subsequently after I have had a chance to consult with my colleagues. May I say in passing that this is not yet the Bundestag of the Third Reich.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I do not want to deal with the substance of what my hon. colleague has said, but once again a member of Parliament is trying to use a point of order to score political points because he was not satisfied with an answer which was given to him, in this case by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I think this is an abuse of the rules and that members should avoid trying to score political points when they are not happy with the answers to their questions.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. We are entering into debate. I would like to take the notice of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) that he is reserving the right to raise a question of privilege at a time which he finds suitable.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

Madam Speaker: Presenting reports from standing or special committees.

Tabling of documents.

Statements by ministers.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I was contemplating rising when you called tabling of documents, and I apologize for delaying to this point, to inquire of the government House leader whether he will speak to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) to determine if the agreement reached between the PSAC and the Government of Canada might be tabled in the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I shall be very pleased to speak with the President of the Treasury Board.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 125, 850, 957, 1,028, 1,030 and 1,316.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

ARMED FORCES—COMMITMENTS TO OTHER COUNTRIES

Question No. 125—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Canada obliged, under any treaties or agreements in force with any other country or countries, to provide armed forces under certain conditions should such conditions arise and, if so, what is a detailed list of all such situations including the estimated number or required number of personnel that must be supplied?

2. Taking into account the existing number of personnel in the Canadian armed forces, would Canada be able to fulfil all such commitments, particularly if more than one arose at the same time and, if not, what plans does the government have to rectify the situation?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty states that "the parties (to the treaty) agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all and consequently they agree that, if such an attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attached by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the north Altantic area". In pursuit of the policy of contributing to the collective effort to maintain an adequate deterrent and defence posture for the alliance all Canada's armed forces are available for defence of the north Atlantic area. Of these the following Canadian forces are assigned to NATO command:

(a) Canadian mechanized brigade group is assigned in wartime to the NATO central army group. The authorized peacetime strength is approximately 3,000 all ranks. In times of increased tension approximately 2,000 additional personnel would augment this brigade group.

(b) 1 Canadian air group is assigned in wartime to the 4th allied tactical air force. Its total peacetime strength of approximately 900 personnel is augmented in times of international tension by over 100 additional personnel.

(c) Canadian Air-Sea Transportable brigade group (CAST brigade group) is assigned to allied forces northern region. One infantry battalion of this group is held at a higher state of readiness for deployment by air to allied command Europe mobile force (land). After Sept. 1, 1980, the CAST brigade group will have a strength of about, 4,000 personnel.

(d) One squadron of CF5 aircraft is assigned to ACE mobile force (air) on the northern flank and one squadron assigned to northern European command.

(e) The maritime forces assigned to allied command Atlantic (SACLANT) consist of:

15 Destroyers
3 Submarines
3 Squadrons ARGUS patrol aircraft
2 Squadrons TRACKER reconnaissance aircraft about 15 Sea King helicopters

One destroyer is assigned to NATO command continuously on a rotational basis. In addition, two support ships which are not themselves assigned to SACLANT are available for NATO operations in the Atlantic. The total strength of committed forces is approximately 5000 personnel.

(f) Canada's share of staffing requirements at our delegation to NATO, on the international military staff at NATO Headquarters and at ACE and ACLANT and some subordinate commands, is 250 personnel.

Within and in conformity with the terms of the North Atlantic Treaty, Canada and the United States concluded in 1958 the North American Air Defence Command (NORAD) Agreement which provides the framework for co-operation in the aerospace defence field and establishes NORAD as a joint command exercising operational control over such forces as are assigned, attached or otherwise made available by the two governments for the defence of the Canadian/US region of NATO. Canada is not obliged by the agreement to provide any specified level of forces to NORAD, but does at this time contribute the following dedicated forces with their personnel and the necessary headquarters and support services:

(a) 3 Squadrons of CF-101B Voodoo interceptors based at Chatham, N.B., Bagotville, Quebec and Comox, B.C.;

(b) 24 long-range radars of the Pinetree line at locations across southern Canada from Gander, Newfoundland, to Holberg, B.C.;

(c) the satellite tracking unit at Cold Lake, Alberta, and the satellite identification and tracking unit at St. Margaret's, N.B.;

(d) the control centre of the 22nd NORAD region at North Bay, Ontario; and

(e) the back-up Interceptor Control Unit at St. Margaret's N.B.

In times of the international tension, a fourth squadron of CF-101B interceptors normally engaged in a training role is also placed under the operational control of NORAD. For the fiscal year 1979/80, the estimated man-years to be charged to these activities are: military, 6,210; and civilian, 2,028. Not included in these figures are the 20 Canadian forces personnel stationed at the four main sites in Canada of the Distant Early Warning (DEW) Line. In addition to the above Canadian-based contributions to NORAD, there are 84 Canadian military personnel employed on NORAD duties in the United States at the NORAD headquarters/Combat Operations Centre complex (Colorado Springs) and at four NORAD region control centres.

CANADA EMPLOYMENT CENTRE—BROCKVILLE, ONTARIO

Question No. 850—Mr. Cossitt:

Have complaints been received from citizens served by the Canada Employment Centre at Brockville, Ontario concerning the managerial organization and the operation of services which they consider insufficient to render proper public service and, if so, will the government undertake to conduct a thorough examination of the office in order to create a more efficient service to the citizens of Brockville and district?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The commission has received complaints on certain aspects of its services provided in Brockville. Steps have been taken to respond to these complaints directly, and correct them where this is applicable. As part of the commission's ongoing CEC review process, management has reviewed the concerns and taken action on issues so identified.

DREE—PROJECTS IN THE CONSTITUENCY OF PEMBINA

Question No. 957—Mr. Elzinga:

1. Since 1974, did the Department of Regional Economic Expansion finance projects in the constituency of Pembina and, if so, in each case, what was the (a) name of the project (b) total cost (c) total contribution by the government?

2. Is the department planning projects in the near future and, if so, in each case, what is the (a) nature of the project (b) estimated amount to be spent by the government?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The response for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows:

1. Under the Canada-Alberta Subsidiary Agreement on Nutritive Processing Assistance.

(a) Legal Alfalfa Products Ltd.	(b) $1,403,078	(c) $117,053.00
Poloway Fertilizer Sales Ltd.	65,474	4,583.50
Falls Holdings Ltd.	23,250	1,511.50
Fort Saskatchewan Bakery Ltd.	9,970	997.00
Champion Feed Services Ltd.	1,568,633	172,549.50
Raven's Poultry Farms Ltd.	379,191	28,439.000
John Wasmuth & Michael Hartley	44,568	5,794.00
Fort Saskatchewan Bakery Ltd.	19,390	1,939.00
Radway Fertilizers Ltd.	61,474	5,225.50

Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration (PFRA)

Water Development Assistance

(a) 892 Wells	(b) $1,471,964*	(c) $367,991
100 Dugouts	249,391	37,390
8 Stockwater Dams	23,300	2,330
5 Irrigation Projects	62,820	3,141
Community Project at Highridge Backflood Irrigation	7,200	3,600

*Because of the time required to research 1,005 project files in this category, total costs have been estimated on the basis of statistics derived over the years. PFRA records show that, on average, total costs relative to grant paid are 4.0:1 for wells; 6.67:1 for dugouts; 10:1 for stockwater dams and 20:1 for small irrigation projects.

Agricultural Service Centre Agreement

(a) Westlock—Consultant's Report regarding water demand projections and assessment of necessary infrastructure upgrading	(b) $17,218	(c) $12,913

2. Canada-Alberta Subsidiary Agreement on Nutritive Processing Assistance

(a) and (b) Five applications for assistance under the agreement have been received by Alberta agriculture and are presently under evaluation. This evaluation has not proceeded far enough to be able to estimate the amount, if any, which might be contributed by government.

Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration (PFRA) Water Development Assistance

(a) and (b) No specific projects are planned for the near future, although the PFRA water development program will continue to respond to the expressed needs of the farming community. An estimate of amounts to be spent is difficult to ascertain, because of the reactive nature of the program and prevailing weather conditions.

CANADA EMPLOYMENT CENTRE—BROCKVILLE INVESTIGATION

Question No. 1,028—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was a special investigation made of the Canada Employment Centre in Brockville, Ontario, in connection with management administration and, if so, was Mr. S. Bernard in charge of the investigation and, if not, who was and what are the names and job designations of the other members on the investigating team?

2. Did the investigation take place on or about May 28, May 29 and May 30, 1980?

3. Was an attempt made to contact Brockville industries or large employers concerning the services of the office and is the government aware that the complaints brought to their attention by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville did not originate from that level?

4. Was an attempt made to discuss managerial administration with individual persons served by the office and (a) if so (i) in what way (ii) how many persons were contacted (b) if not, for what reason?

5. Is the government aware that some of the numerous complaints brought to their attention by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville about the service to the public originated from members of the Brockville city council including the mayor of the city?

6. Did the investigating team contact the Brockville industrial commissioner, Mr. John Broome and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. No. A special investigation of the Canada Employment Centre in Brockville was not conducted. However, a review of the Brockville CEC was made as part of the regular continuing operational review process of the Belleville district. This review was occasioned by the planned assignment of a new manager to that office. Mr. S. Barnard, manager, CEC Belleville was the review team leader. Mr. A. Hamilton, supervisor, programs, Belleville CEC and Mr. R. Daley, acting service unit supervisor, Kingston CEC, were the team members.

2. Yes.

3. Although no attempt was made to directly contact Brockville industries or large employers due to the scope and terms of reference under which the team operated, a review of the CEC service records concerning a representative sample of Brockville employers was conducted. Of the eleven employers in the sample, all had used the CEC services successfully within the previous two years. The CEC manager has recently implemented an accelerated program of visiting employers to promote and market CEC services. The CEC has also initiated a local industrial training advisory committee to advise the CEC on service requirements. Most, if not all, major Brockville employers employing the machining trades are members of this committee.

4. No direct contact was made with any clients served by the CEC due to the scope and terms of reference under which the team operated. The team did review the suggestions/complaints from the public left with the CEC via the "Listening Post". Response to this vehicle of public forum for comments on service was found to be very low and of unexceptional content.

5. Yes.

6. The review team contacted the Brockville industrial commissioner, Mr. John Broome. Mr. Broome indicated that his relations with the CEC have been extremely good. Mr. Broome has never heard a complaint about the CEC from employers and described the CEC image with employers as extremely good.

Question No. 1,030—Mr. Cossitt:

Did any of the investigators, during the recent investigation made by Canada Manpower officials of the Canada Manpower Centre in Brockville, Ontario, contact the editor of the Brockville Recorder and Times or any person at the newspaper to determine whether or not it had received complaints, from individuals who used the office, about the operation of the local Manpower Centre and (a) if so, was it determined that such complaints had been received (b) if not, for what reason was the newspaper not contacted?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The review team did not contact the editor of the Brockville Recorder and Times, as such contact is not within the usual requirements of an operational review.

Question No. 1,316—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the placing on the order paper of question No. 1,028 concerning whether the investigation of the Canada Employment Centre in Brockville had included interviewing the mayor and certain other persons in the municipality were steps subsequently taken to contact the mayor and others and, if so (a) what are all the details (b) what are the names of the other persons contacted and what is the name and job designation of the persons making the contacts?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): (a) and (b) Subsequent to the review of the Brockville Canada Employment Centre, Mr. C. Paterson, director of Employment and Insurance, Belleville district, visited mayor Sheridan on June 18, 1980, to introduce Mr. J. Parsons, the new manager of the Brockville CEC. Mr. Parsons, on June 26, attended a luncheon meeting with mayor Sheridan during which the delivery of CEC programs and services was discussed. Mr. Parsons contacted Mr. A. Keyes, the employment counsellor to St-Lawrence College to ensure that facilities were available to enable Miss Sally Flood, a client of the Brockville CEC, to participate in an industrial maintenance mechanic course. Pat Dingle from the industrial commissioner's office has visited the Brockville CEC to discuss a brochure which is distributed to employers considering locating in the Brockville area. Information on local wage rates was also given. Arrangements have been made with Mr. Trevor Scott, Public Relations, Brockville city hall to meet with Mr. Parsons to discuss the new employment programs announced by the government. Ms. Jeannine LeBranch, payroll accountant for the city of Brockville, wrote to the Brockville CEC on June 13, commending the CEC on its co-operation.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 13 is acceptable to the government.

Madam Speaker: Number 13 is adopted.

VIA RAIL PASSENGER TARIFFS

Motion No. 13—Mr. Benjamin:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence that the Minister of Transport and the Director General, Railway Transportation, Transport Canada had with Via Rail Canada, the Canadian Motor Coach Association and the Canadian Transport Commission regarding Via Rail passenger tariffs.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Irwin: Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion for the production of papers No. 14?

VIA RAIL—RESTRUCTURING THE PASSENGER SYSTEM

Motion No. 14—Mr. Benjamin:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of the documents prepared by the Department of Transport on (a) Via Rail's experience to date (b) some thoughts on restructuring the passenger system (c) the proposed Via Rail Canada Act.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have the answer to Motion No. 14 submitted by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin).

(a) and (b) Transport Canada does not have the documents as referred to in MPP No. 14. A document is in preparation, however, which generally addresses the subjects described above, amongst others.

This document has been through a number of drafts, some of which the member may have seen. Once the document has been approved by cabinet, it is intended to release this information to the public.

(c) A Via Rail Canada Act has never been drafted nor have drafting instructions ever been developed. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

The Constitution

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I believe that I can say on behalf of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) that he will agree to the motion being withdrawn, subject to his right to obtain the document to which the parliamentary secretary has referred, when it has been produced.

Mr. Bockstael: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Irwin: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Stand.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House resumed consideration from Tuesday, October 7, 1980, of the motion of the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien):

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an address, with such amendments as the committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee submit their report no later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as I was concluding my few remarks on this subject last night, my good Tory friend, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), had the wisdom to rise on a point of order and express his concern over the degrading nature of the incident that I had raised.

You will recall that I was reporting to the House on an appearance on national radio earlier last evening by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) during which he rather shockingly misrepresented the contents of this constitutional proposal. You remember, too, that at that time I gave some specific details of the misrepresentation by the Leader of the Opposition. I want my good friend from Esquimalt-Saanich to know that I have had time overnight to reflect on the suggestion he made, and I certainly agree with him. What I was saying on the subject should really not have been said in public. I will take his wise counsel and refrain from further public reference to the incident.

In so doing I trust that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich will, for his part, undertake to raise the matter with his leader, to counsel him and appeal to him to stop the misrepresentation of the detail of this matter. It is degrading, Mr. Speaker, and therefore unbecoming of the Leader of the Opposition. I will take the hon. member's wise counsel. It is advice well given and well taken. I ask him not to be unduly hard on my friend from Yellowhead. Lord knows, he has enough trouble these days, with Bill Davis and Brian Mulroney and the caucus. Besides, we need him. He is the best thing we have had going for us since John Bracken back in 1948.

The proposal that would establish a joint committee whose instructions would be to take these documents as a working paper is a good proposal. It really is the only effective and efficient, yet fair way, to handle a matter of this magnitude, diversity and complexity. Let all of us as members of this House, whether we become members of the committee or just interested observers in the process of that committee, keep in mind that it is, at best, a working paper. It is not the refined, finished document; for that we need the minds of the 25 people who will serve on the committee in the coming months.

For that reason it is perhaps premature for me, or for any member of the House, to address myself in any detail to the content of the resolution. That is, more properly, the job of the committee. I am sure, nevertheless, it would be quite in order for me to comment for a moment on some of the principles embodied in this proposal—patriation with a provision to amend, the charter of rights, entrenchment of equalization in the constitution.

Part of the wisdom of this particular document and the wisdom of those who drew it up, is that it does not address itself in any form or fashion to the substantive issue of distribution of powers among orders of government. For that reason alone the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is deserving of the commendation of this House and the provincial legislatures across the country. I am sure, knowing how close he has been to this subject over the years, that the temptation must have been very great indeed on his part to contrive an omnibus resolution embodying several other issues on which he and this government feel strongly. I refer, for example, to those measures that are required to make this country a truly workable economic union, and measures such as the free movement of goods and services. To the credit of the Prime Minister, he has resisted that temptation. These matters will be dealt with in due time as provided for in the proposal and in full dialogue with the provincial administrations.

It is the proposed charter of rights which I find most gratifying, Mr. Speaker, especially that right which deals with the free movement of people. I realize, in addressing myself to this subject, that it will strike down in Newfoundland, my own province, regulations concerning job preferences for Newfoundlanders. I realize that, but that is as it should be, for two reasons.

In the first place the Newfoundland regulations are morally wrong. They are morally wrong, given the spirit of this country. In the second place they are, in any case, counter-productive. What guarantee does the government of Newfoundland and Labrador have that retaliatory legislation or regulation will not be imposed by other provinces? How long will that take, if we keep applying the litmus test to people coming to Newfoundland and Labrador? If we say to them, "Where are you from?" and they reply that they are from Alberta, or Nova Scotia, do we say that they cannot work in Newfoundland? How long would it be before the government of Alberta would say, "What about the several thousand people in Fort McMurray who are native born Newfoundlanders? How long before we ship them back?" How long would it be, Mr. Speaker, before the number of Newfoundlanders who work with the CPR in Saskatchewan or in Powell River in British Columbia, in Flin Flon and Thompson, Manitoba, or Cambridge and Toronto in Ontario, are told the same thing? I am informed that there are a couple of hundred thousand Newfoundlanders in Ontario alone.

At last count the Newfoundland regulation accounted for exactly 382 jobs for Newfoundlanders. In terms of my point about counter productivity, if that figure is set against the numbers in Powell River, Fort McMurray, Toronto, Cambridge and Flin Flon, I submit that the comparable number would be slightly more than 382. Perhaps I have made my point, Mr. Speaker, about the regulation being counter productive. But apart from that, Mr. Speaker, it is wrong.

I do not want to live in a country where I am told where I can live and where I can work.

Of course, we have to entrench these rights in the constitution. If there was one thing more appalling to me than others at the first ministers' conference last month, it was the sheer number of people who, with straight faces, told us that legislation could better protect our rights than constitutional entrenchment. By way of example, Mr. Speaker, suppose you were the premier of a province. Suppose you were the wisest, most fair, most humanitarian God-fearing premier Canada had ever had. And suppose, because of your humanitarian motives, you introduced the best legislation to protect the handicapped people of this country, to protect the Indians, the Metis and Inuit, to protect the minorities, racial, religious and otherwise, and then, because of your mortality, one day you died or you left office, retired or were defeated. Suppose you were succeeded by somebody who would not necessarily subscribe to your humanitarian view of life; someone who may be more ruthlessly pragmatic about things. What would happen to your legislation then if left to the whim of the majority of that particular day?

That is the kind of reason why I insist and I believe very strongly, with everything that is in me, that the constitution must embody a charter of rights. I do not mean that we should not be able to get at it. This document has a provision to amend so we will be able to get at it in a way that requires due thought, and that requires proper, sober judgment. We will not be able to react to the political whim of the moment or to what appears to be politically popular at a particular time. Of course we must have entrenchment. It is appalling that so many voices are raised against entrenchment.

Last night I was invited by my Tory friends opposite to say a few words about Premier Peckford. I shall be glad to oblige. The Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador is a man whom I know very well. He is a personal friend of 15 years. Indeed, the only job he ever had other than that of a politician, is one which I gave to him. When I was principal of a high school he was the head of my English department. As young care-free bachelors we tripped around the globe together and we exchanged views on many subjects, including especially the subject of politics. I found that he and I share many of the same hopes and aspirations for our people in Newfoundland and Labrador.

• (1550)

Hon. members will understand, therefore, something of the sadness, the crushing disappointment and the jolting shock which I experienced a few weeks ago at the first ministers' conference here in Ottawa when I heard the Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador utter these words, which I quote from a direct transcript of the proceedings: "The Prime Minister and Mr. Lévesque articulated two different visions of Canada." The Premier of Newfoundland said: "I would have to side with the one advocated by Mr. Lévesque."

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Simmons: As a Newfoundlander and as a Canadian, these have to be the saddest words I have ever heard. We all know what Mr. Lévesque's view of Canada is. If there is one single aspect of the constitutional dialogue which is absolutely crystal clear in the minds of Canadians, it is Mr. Lévesque's view of Canada; what he would like Canada to become. The kindest statement of the Lévesque position—and I put it this way so it doesn't appear as though what Mr. Peckford said was taken out of context—is that he believes in sovereignty-association. He believes that Canada ought to consist of a number—be it one, two or ten, it does not matter to Mr. Lévesque—independent electoral units, states or provinces, call them what you will, which would be a free association, one with the other, for certain reasons of trade and monetary policy. That is the Lévesque view. That, I am sad to reflect, is the view of Canada which Mr. Peckford has said publicly he favours.

I want to tell him, and I tell him in sadness, not in anger and not to score political points, that that is not the view shared by the overwhelming majority of Newfoundlanders and Labradorians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: There is no part of this federation which has a more positive view of the federal role than does Newfoundland, and with very good reason. We have been benefactors for 31 years of the amazing wealth of this country. The very prospect of offshore oil and gas off Newfoundland's coast is today a real live prospect, a real live possibility, because and only because of the tax policies of this federal government concerning frontier exploration.

Do hon. members realize the hundreds of millions of dollars of federal tax revenues which have made these discoveries possible? Do hon. members realize that the Newfoundland offshore development would today be nothing more than a pipe dream, nothing short of wishful thinking, were it not for the tax policies of this particular government and our involvement in the matter? Now that this government's policies have ensured that Newfoundland's economic prospects will be better than anybody ever dreamed of, it saddens me to hear those at the provincial government level in Newfoundland wanting to rewrite history, and dishonestly parading the impression that somehow the offshore development is something for which they are responsible.

I have digressed, Mr. Speaker. I was talking a moment ago about Mr. Peckford. Let me tell you, sir, that his heart is in the right place. His immediate agenda for leading our province toward greater prosperity and cultural fulfilment is misguided. I tell him the Lévesque route is a road to disaster. Premier Peckford, I am sad to say, is the victim of some very bad, unwitting advice from the pen and the lips of a few who actually share his dream and share my dream for Newfoundland and for Labrador but who lack the know-how to achieve it. They believe sincerely in their exasperation just like a twelve-year-old boy who by running away from home believes he can somehow solve his problems.

I am a Newfoundlander—

An hon. Member: Not very loyal.

Mr. Simmons: —I am a Canadian, and not necessarily in that particular order. Please do not ask me to choose between the two. I was not born a Canadian, but I am proud to say that I have been one for the past 31 years since 1949 when Canada had the good wisdom to join Newfoundland!

We, in Newfoundland and Labrador, did not vote in 1949 to forfeit our freedom but rather to expand it and to give it some meaning. How free are you when your sons and daughters had to leave their homeland to go to what was a foreign country—

Canada in those days—to get employment and to raise their families or, to what we called the Boston states—the New England states—where there are today hundreds of thousands of native born Newfoundlanders—how free are you if that is the price of freedom? We did not forfeit any freedom in 1949. Let there be no mistake about that. We expanded it and we gave it meaning. We did not abandon our little independent proud fiefdom—our little relic of an almost feudal system. We did not abandon that little powerless, economically impotent fiefdom in 1949 so that we could become one of ten little economically weak fiefdoms in 1980. Because, Mr. Speaker, if you listened carefully to what some of the premiers were saying, and I refer particularly to Premiers Bennett, Lougheed, Lévesque, and Peckford, it is clear that their concept of this country can only be described in terms of a feudal system, in terms of an economically weak fiefdom—or ten fiefdoms—at the mercy all the time of the international community.

On this note I conclude. We, in Newfoundland and Labrador, know where we came from as a people. We were a separate country from 1855 until 1949. We know where we came from and we are very proud of it, but please do not ask us to go back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I simply ask for the unanimous consent of the House—I think the speaker's time is used up—to ask the hon. member one short question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Do I see that the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) is prepared to accept a question, and do I have the consent of the House to proceed with one question? Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what the hon. member had to say. When talking about the premiers, the hon. member for Burin-St. George's said, and I quote—I believe accurately that he did not want to be subjected to "the whim of the majority of the day". I accept that. I think that is a very real danger. If the hon. member is afraid of that, why would he then support section 42 of this particular provision which enables the federal government to use exactly the same tactic?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He brings up an extremely important point. First of all, I am glad to hear that he does agree with me on my concern about the whim of the moment. Section 42, if he would read it carefully, as I am sure he has, points out that not only will there be a simple 51 per cent majority across the nation, but that there will be a 51 per cent majority in each of the defined regions, so that there is there the added protection which these regional majorities would afford. Also, if the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)—I see he shakes his head on that, but I tell him that I have looked at it in the past hour or two because that very section was the subject of some other discussion I had earlier today. I ask him to read that, and if I have not reflected an accurate intent of that I would be prepared to discuss it with him further, either inside or outside the House.

• (1600)

The point I make is that section 42 does require that there be the majority of the several regions of the country defined in that section. Also, of course, notwithstanding what I have said about whims, indeed in contrast to what I said about whims, it is one thing for a legislature in which a premier commands a majority to, this week or this month, react very quickly to a popular concern in the country. It is quite another thing to invoke section 42 after you have gone over a period of months, and I submit years in some cases, through another process of consultation with the provinces and debate in this particular Parliament. In that context, I submit to my friend that section 42 becomes a method of sober second thought or third thought after the other processes have been gone through.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House for the better part of 20 years. During that period of time I have had the privilege of sitting here with six different prime ministers and six different leaders of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. It is a well-known and accepted convention in this House that the members of this place who occupy these particular offices are accorded a respect and a dignity in keeping with those offices. Because we are a civilized Parliament, and because of that convention, in all the years I have been here I have never witnessed such an attack on one of the members of this House who occupies the distinguished position of Leader of the Opposition and former prime minister—I have never witnessed such a scurrilous personal vilification of an officer of this House in all the years I have been here, and I am ashamed that it should come from a member of Parliament from my province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Having sat through the first chapter of the hon. member's speech last night, I intended to treat it with the silent contempt that it so justly deserved. I was somewhat encouraged today to note that he was able to rise to a somewhat higher plane, although at times he did not succeed in doing that. However, I cannot ignore it. I can only deal with it in this way.

The hon. member will not serve himself well by indulging in that kind of personal vilification and scurrilous attack on any member of this House, particularly on a former prime minister and a man who is leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I suggest to my hon. friend that if he aspires to be anything higher than a parliamentary secretary, he better clean up his act. Indeed, I am sure hon. members will understand when I say to them that there was a perceptive rise in the level of debate in the legislature of Newfoundland when the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) resigned to run for this House.

I welcome the opportunity to participate and, hopefully, make a contribution to this debate. It has been described, and I suppose will continue to be described, as an historic debate. Whether it is historic will, of course, depend upon the government.

Along with other hon. members I followed with great interest the developments of the past summer. I was fascinated when hardly a week went by without some news from some major metropolitan centre in Canada regarding Canada's constitution. This, of course, was a part of the government's strategy. I do not fault them on that. They wanted maximum exposure. Indeed, in certain circumstances that is commendable.

They had the committee of ministers, federal and provincial, meet in various cities across the country to try to pave the way for a consensus in preparation for the first ministers' meeting that was to take place in September. All they succeeded in doing, unfortunately, was to agree on a preamble. There were some significant compromises made. Indeed, there were indications of that during the course of the first ministers' meeting. Of course that series of meetings was supported by a government advertising campaign to which reference was made in the House today.

All of it was very carefully orchestrated to prepare the Canadian people for the unilateral action that the government now proposes by the measure before the House. That unilateral action was supported by an advertising campaign and a series of meetings which anticipated the failure of the first ministers to reach an agreement.

I listened with great interest to the speech of my learned friend, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), for whom I have great respect and whom I look upon as a friend. I listened carefully because I was hoping to find within his remarks some hint that the government may be open to meaningful suggestions to change the course of action they set out. I listened because I felt very strongly in my own heart, as I feel today, that if the government is not prepared to be flexible, if it insists on digging in on this measure, on such a fundamental thing as the renewed patriation of our constitution, that will have the unfortunate, regrettable and perhaps even disastrous effect of dividing this country at a time when there is a mood abroad in the country, an element of consensus for meaningful constitutional renewal.

We have come a long way. We now agree there is a consensus on patriation. There is no question about that at all. Whether we patriate with entrenchment is the question. As a Canadian and a member of this House, I would find it repugnant to have such a basic thing as Canadian rights and fundamental freedoms, linguistic rights and the principle of equalization become the subject of a legislative measure of a foreign parliament. My view is that we should agree, and I believe there is agreement that we should patriate and the only body capable of dealing with entrenchment of anything, whether it is human rights, linguistic rights or the principle of equalization, is the Parliament of Canada and the legislative assemblies of the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1610)

Mr. McGrath: Why is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) afraid to entrust to this Parliament of the land, which passed the Bill of Rights brought in here by the late distinguished right hon. member for Prince Albert, the responsibility for dealing with those questions which are within its domain under the existing constitution? Why would this government be afraid to entrust to the legislatures of the land the right to deal with those things which are within their domain under the existing constitution? Those are the questions, sir.

As my leader said so eloquently in his speech during this debate, what the government proposes by this measure is not only to patriate the constitution with human rights and linguistic rights entrenched, but to change fundamentally Canadian federalism in such a way as to give the federal government, in terms of constitutional powers, powers that have no place in a federal system. In other words, the government would be assuming for itself, if it has its way, powers which are normally identified with a unitary state. That, of course, fits in very nicely with proposed section 42 which provides the constitutional means, if the government has its way, whereby the government can bypass Parliament and the legislatures of the country and go directly to the people.

There are times in a parliamentary democracy when a referendum or a plebiscite has its place. I can think of, for example, the question of compulsory military service, to name just one. But to make that an instrument of the constitution would, as my leader has said, and as others are now saying, fundamentally change the whole system of federalism in this country in such a way as to destroy ultimately the federal nature of the country and, consequently, could have the effect of destroying the country itself.

I say that as one who has always been supportive of a strong federal government, coming as I do from one of the so-called have-not provinces. Indeed, the last time we had a chance to debate the constitution in this House I expressed the fear that the provinces, if they had their way in terms of the additional powers they were seeking, could seriously undermine the ability of the central or federal government to carry out the national will and to protect the national interest. I believe in that principle very strongly. I now express the same fear in respect of the federal government, because if the Government of Canada has its way it could, as I have said, fundamentally change the structure of federalism in the country, which could have the effect of ultimately destroying the country as we know it.

We have come a long way in the past few years. Indeed, we have arrived happily at a point in time when there are very few in this country who would not accept the protection of linguistic rights in the constitution. Indeed, I recall as a member of this House the passage of the Official Languages Act. I recall the division that caused in the House at the time. Indeed, that division was painfully felt in my own caucus. However, I would not hesitate to say that I believe one would be hard pressed to find a member in this House today who would be opposed in any fundamental way to the Official Languages Act. That is as it should be, given the fact that this statute, now the law of the land, helps to redress a grievance which went to the very heart of the unrest in Quebec, and the place of French-speaking Quebeckers in Canada.

I also recall, vividly and with personal regret, and this is the first time I have had the chance to say this publicly, that day ten years ago when this government, with the approval of this House, imposed the War Measures Act. It is difficult to find adjectives to describe that measure, but certainly you could describe it as a Draconian measure designed at the time it was drafted to protect the national security in time of war or, in the wording of the act, in the case of what the act calls "apprehended insurrection".

That was not a proud moment for any of us, sir, because, and we did not realize it at the time, that move had the effect of placing the entire country under martial law; placing in suspension the very fundamental freedoms proposed for entrenchment in the constitution by this measure. That involves a question which we will want to get back to when we have a chance in committee.

Proposed section 2 of the bill sets out the charter of rights and freedoms. Who in this House would be against any of these basic human rights and freedoms? We are all in favour of "freedom of conscience and religion", "freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of information", and we are all in favour of "freedom of assembly and of association" and the right to vote. Good heavens, who would be opposed to that?

Whether or not the entrenchment of these basic and fundamental rights and freedoms in our constitution, given our parliamentary system and tradition, is the way to go about it, raises a question that keeps bothering me. I have not satisfied myself on that score.

Having said that, that does not put me in second place to anybody who can speak just as strongly for entrenchment, because I believe just as strongly in these basic fundamental rights and freedoms. I believe with all my heart that this country should never permit the imposition of the War Measures Act in time of peace.

It was fascinating to watch the first ministers, the premiers of the country, together with the Prime Minister discuss through the public media Canada's future. I was touched and deeply moved by the very learned paper presented by Premier Lyon on this question. I must confess I had not given this matter that much thought up to that point in time because I felt entrenchment was so fundamental there was nothing to think about. That argument put forward by Premier Lyon was given equal support by Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan, representing both spectrums of political thought in this country. I found that very interesting. That is not really the point I wanted to make. It has to be said that we all favour some form of protection of these fundamental rights and freedoms.

The point I want to make is that we have to examine this bill in the context of sections 41 and 42 and the power the federal government assumes to itself in terms of the authority it will derive from these provisions of the bill to bypass the legislatures of the provinces on constitutional change. That is a move which, as I have said, will change the very structure of the nation, and which will change the very partnership concept of the nation that was at the root of the agreement arrived at in Charlottetown and in Quebec by the four founding provinces.

• (1620)

I will not go into that argument at this time because it was covered very adequately and very impressively by my leader and, I might say, by my learned friend and colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). My colleagues and I owe the hon. member for Provencher a great debt for the leadership he has given this caucus as our spokesman and chairman on federal-provincial relations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The last time I addressed this question in the House, which was just a few months ago, I made the point, and I repeat it now, that each one of us by virtue of his or her election to this place has three principal responsibilities or three constituencies we have to serve. We each one of us have a responsibility to our constituency. We each one of us have a responsibility to our province and, of course, we each one of us have a responsibility to the nation as a whole. There are times when the national interest has to take priority, and I would not hesitate, if the situation warranted, to place the national interest above my own province or constituency interest.

But there are times as well when the national interest is served, and well served, by a member addressing his provincial or constituency responsibilities, and I believe that such a time is now. That is why I would like to take a Newfoundland and perhaps regional perspective as one who takes second place to none in his commitment to this nation, in my commitment to Canada and in my commitment to a strong, viable federal government able to carry out its responsibilities. I am satisfied that I am serving the national interest when I address myself to the regional and provincial implications of the measure which is now before us.

Sir, I doubt if you would find anyone in this country who would be opposed to the entrenchment of the principle of equalization in any Canadian constitution. That too is a part of the very fabric of the nation. The fundamental concept of equality and sharing is the very root of our federal system, but we must be very careful that we do not entrench in the constitution the very thing which equalization seeks to address, regional disparity, and that is a concern of mine.

When this nation was formed 113 years ago, the Atlantic provinces were relatively prosperous for their time. Indeed, they were prosperous by comparison with the other parts of the nation. Of course those of us who come from the region know all too well the painful history of how we have fallen behind over the past century and how we continue to fall behind, equalization and regional development grants notwithstanding.

What do I mean by the danger of entrenching regional disparity? Over the past century the face of Canada has changed, not only with the addition of new provinces but also with the expansion by the federal government of the boundaries of existing provinces. This has had the effect of placing the maritime provinces, and ultimately Newfoundland, at a serious disadvantage in terms of resource ownership. The benefits of the expansion of these boundaries are now being seen today in other parts of the country, and we are grateful and glad that there is prosperity in those provinces which have had their boundaries expanded.

The Halifax Chronicle Herald spelled it out very clearly at the weekend in a front page editorial, and I quote:

> The maritime claim of today is fair and simple. It asks that it be compensated for earlier oversight. It seeks formal acceptance from the other partners in confederation of the right of the maritimes to consider as theirs that undersea land which is a natural extension of the property above sea level. It asks that the resources in that new territory be the property of the maritime provinces in the same sense that resources in formal federal lands now belong to the central and western provinces.

We have seen the boundaries of Quebec extended by 379,000 square miles to include the great James Bay hydroelectric power basin, which will mean ultimately so much to that province. Of course we have seen the industrial heartland of the nation, Ontario, have its boundary extended by 237,000 square miles to the north and to the boundary of Manitoba. We have seen Saskatchewan and Alberta each given an additional 250,000 square miles which were northern lands under the jurisdiction of Canada and belonging to all Canadians.

Simple justice would indicate that the only way the boundaries of our region can be extended is to include the extension of the land mass that lies underneath the sea to the continental shelf. It is the natural extension of our land mass, yet that simple justice is being denied us by this government.

Back in 1968 my party, under the leadership of the Hon. Robert Stanfield, the distinguished former premier of Nova Scotia, accepted as policy that the mineral rights of provinces on the continental shelf belonged to the coastal provinces. I am proud to say that one of the first things we did as a government under the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and hon. member for Yellowhead was to implement that commitment made to the Atlantic provinces 12 years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I have referred to the case of the maritime provinces, which of course by definition excludes my own province of Newfoundland, but I believe a special case can be made for Newfoundland. That case has been made before at first ministers' meetings and in other forums.

When Newfoundland became a province of Canada in 1949, we entered confederation—notwithstanding the derogatory remarks of my friend, the hon. member for Burin-St. George's, with which he will have to live—as a self-governing dominion receiving our status under the same Statute of Westminster. We carried with us our sovereignty as a self-governing dominion, including jurisdiction over the continental shelf.

There are those, of course, who would argue that we were at the time a colony of Great Britain. That argument, of course, is legally and technically not correct. We were a self-governing dominion, albeit with our constitution voluntarily in suspension—that is, our legislative assembly—but it is interesting to note that five minutes before midnight on March 31, 1949, by letters patent the British government restored full self-governing status and full dominion status to Newfoundland so that we would carry into this nation our sovereignty intact, thereby ensuring that Newfoundland would carry with her these just claims which we now make.

We now know that the continental shelf of Newfoundland, particularly the area of the Grand Banks, contains vast amounts of natural gas and oil. We believe that as a province we must control the rate of development of this important energy resource in order to maximize the economic benefits to our province and, equally, to protect our vital and important fishery resource, which will continue to be the mainstay of our economy, and of course equally to protect our culture and our distinct society and distinct way of life from the economic pressures which would flow from such a development.

We believe that these tremendous oil and gas reserves will give us, for the first time in our history as a province of Canada, a chance to be equal, the same equality enjoyed by the other provinces, an opportunity to create our wealth, a chance to stand on our own feet and, above all, an opportunity to pay back to the nation the tremendous sums of money which have been paid out to us over the past 30 years in the form of equalization and regional development grants. All we ask is an opportunity to contribute to the wealth of the nation while at the same time improving our own economy and giving our people an opportunity to stand on their own feet.

In the words of the premier of our province, "We are an old and a proud people; all we need is an equal chance to prosper". We can have that equal chance if this government would only recognize what we feel is rightly ours, namely, our ownership of the resources of our vast continental shelf, the continental shelf which we brought into Canada when we became a partner in confederation in 1949.

Unfortunately, our claim to offshore oil and gas has been presented to the nation as a greedy and self-serving claim to something which is not rightfully ours. The fact is that if this government were to recognize that jurisdiction, we would not only be able to stand on our own feet economically but we would also be able to contribute substantially to the wealth of this nation by virtue of the tax revenues that the federal government would enjoy as a consequence of such a development and, of course, the royalties that would flow to the developing companies. We would not get it all, nor indeed would we want to get it all, but we do feel we are entitled to our fair share and we feel we are entitled to control the rate of development of that which is rightfully ours.

● (1630)

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to turn, in the few moments I have left, to another area of resource development which touches the heart of the constitutional debate, and that is the vast hydroelectric power potential, both developed and undeveloped, in my province. We have the largest untapped hydroelectric resource in the nation. The mighty Churchill Falls has been harnessed, and of course, as the House knows, Newfoundland is already locked into a 65-year contract with Quebec whereby Quebec is able to enjoy tremendous advantages as a consequence of a contract which was made well before the energy crisis could be foreseen. By the terms of that agreement, Newfoundland's loss in terms of the present day price of electric power is approaching $1 billion annually. That loss, of course, is Quebec's gain and enables that province to export substantial amounts of power at world prices to the United States. It is interesting to note that the Newfoundland government has formally requested the intervention of the Government of Canada with regard to the export of this surplus energy which is going into Quebec from Newfoundland. But that is a matter ultimately for the courts to decide because the Government of Canada has refused to intervene.

The inequity of this situation creates the paradox of a province, which is one of the greatest producers of hydroelectric power in the nation, and indeed in the world, having to impose on its people domestic energy costs which are more related to those of thermal fuel. For example, the city which I represent, St. John's in Newfoundland, the oldest city in the land, has the second highest domestic energy costs in Canada, second only to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. Paradoxically, the city which has the lowest domestic electric energy costs in Canada is the city of Montreal. For example, a monthly electric bill, on the basis of 500 kilowatt hours, in St. John's would cost $27.10, in Montreal the same power costs $16. I seriously question whether the nation can continue to accept within its federal structure such injustice and inequity. However, that is not the question I want to raise; it is one for the courts to decide.

Then we have the question of the undeveloped resources of the lower Churchill, the Gull Island site with the potential of 1700 megawatts, and the Muskrat Falls site with another 600 megawatt potential. The cost of these developments, of course, is staggering. It is $4.3 billion and $3.2 billion respectively. But they give you some idea of the scope of this tremendous renewable energy resource. If one were to translate it into oil, it would amount to 55 million barrels annually for the Churchill Falls development at present world prices, 19 million barrels annually for the Gull Island development at present world prices, and 7 million barrels annually for the Muskrat Falls development.

Forgetting for a moment our contractual problems with the province of Quebec with regard to the Churchill Falls power development, my province—and this is the main thrust of my argument—has been frustrated in every attempt at the development of the lower Churchill by the province of Quebec, which insists on taking all the power at the border point at their predetermined prices and disposing of it as they will.

Notwithstanding the infinite patience of the Newfoundland government and the Newfoundland people in trying to reach an agreement with Quebec, the fact is that these negotiations have broken off irreconcilably and we now find ourselves in the position of having to come on our knees to the federal government to ask for our constitutional rights, to ask for rights which are ours under the existing constitution, to give us a corridor to transmit that power through Quebec to customers in Ontario and New York, just as the federal government does, which has the same constitutional power to provide corridors in the building of pipelines to transmit western gas and oil to the markets of Quebec. It is simple justice and simple equality.

My colleague, the honourable member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), and I did not press this point, and indeed the Newfoundland government did not press it during the period leading up to the Quebec referendum, for very obvious reasons. But on June 20 I asked the Prime Minister in the House if the government was prepared to recognize the constitutional right of the province of Newfoundland to transmit its hydro power through Quebec, just as the western provinces have that right with natural gas and oil. The Prime Minister answered:

> That is the constitutional doctrine in which I have always believed.

I then asked the Prime Minister why he had not acted on the formal request from the Newfoundland government to provide for a corridor through Quebec for the transmission of Newfoundland power to customers in New York and Ontario, and the Prime Minister replied, as reported at page 2316 of Hansard of June 20:

> —such action would only be possible if Newfoundland had the contract for the sale of its power to some other part of the country, and if Quebec were imposing unreasonable charges in the transfer of that power in the sense that it would constitute some kind of tariff or barrier which would be constitutionally inadmissible.

I find it passing strange that no such conditions were placed on the transmission of western oil and gas, and the pipeline is being built to bring those resources to Montreal and Quebec, and rightly so because the Government of Canada has the clearly defined constitutional authority under section 92(10)(a) of the BNA Act and under other relevant sections as well.

On September 4 and again on September 24, the Premier of Newfoundland wrote to the Prime Minister asking the federal government to exercise that constitutional power on Newfoundland's behalf. In his letter of September 24, the premier stated that such an agreement had been signed with the power authority of the state of New York to buy surplus Newfoundland power. The Prime Minister has so far failed to reply to the Newfoundland government, and I consider this to be a shameful abdication of the federal government's constitutional responsibility to my province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The Prime Minister now comes before the House and asks me, as a Newfoundland member of Parliament, to support a measure which would provide for a new constitution for Canada, while at the same time he denies to my province the basic fundamental constitutional rights which are clearly ours under the constitution.

Sure, Mr. Speaker, I am concerned with basic human and democratic rights, I am concerned with the entrenchment of language rights and equality for all our people regardless of whether they are French-speaking or English-speaking. I am concerned as one who comes from an area of high unemployment where the per capita income is still well below the national average. Sure I want equalization entrenched in the constitution, but I say to the House, and I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister, that I cannot in all conscience support any constitutional renewal regardless of whether it was acceptable, or regardless of how commendable, so long as this government fails to fulfil to my province its solemn contractual obligation under the existing constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Sure, I would like to have the luxury of supporting the mobility rights of the constitution. Who could be against the free movement of Canadians in this country? I come from a province which has an unemployment rate which hovers between 15 per cent and 30 per cent—a national disgrace on the fabric of this nation. Our people are not trained. We have the highest out migration rate in the country. We are trying to train our people. They want to stay home and we want to keep them home. We now have the possibility of developing our offshore oil and gas. What do we do? Do we open up these jobs to people who have the industrial experience in other parts of the country and who have the luxury of mobility to come down and take these jobs away from the young Newfoundlanders who have not had the luxury of that mobility and of that training?

I say, sir, that I want a country where my children can move about freely, but I also want a province where there can be equality of opportunity. There cannot be equality if a man is faced with the choice of hiring an experienced rigger from Alberta against an inexperienced rigger from Newfoundland. Once we get the experience, if all things are equal, I would be prepared to put our people on an equal footing with everybody else, but so long as we have our young people unemployed, so long as we have a 30 per cent rate of unemployment, so long as these things plague us, how can you expect me as a Newfoundlander to stand in the House and support mobility? It is not a new concept. This very government has a policy which provides that only native people will be hired north of the 60th parallel on the pipeline. Every municipality has a policy which says that you will hire all your own ratepayers first, and every province has that policy. All we want is the same principle.

● (1640)

I am one who became a citizen of this country by an act of this Parliament in 1949. I want to build in this country a climate of opportunity and freedom for my children. I take second place to nobody. I was denied these opportunities, indeed I was denied these basic freedoms. I had no say when my constitution was suspended in my country, and now I am asked to support what I find personally abhorrent, a measure that would ask that very colonial power to pass human rights and linguistic measures which rightfully belong on the floor of this Parliament and nowhere else. I find that personally repugnant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Let no one think for one moment, because I take that position and because my colleagues may take that position, that we are opposed to constitutional renewal and that we are opposed to unilateral patriation. God knows we want our constitution back here. National pride dictates that we have it back here, but that same national pride dictates that our constitution be framed in our own Parliament, in our own legislatures and nowhere else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant) on a point of order, but as I did earlier with respect to the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons), I should note that the time for debate accorded to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has now expired and it is only with his consent and with the consent of the House I will permit a question.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, I will put my question to the hon. member in English, but he may need Rolaids after a while. It is easy to discuss and comment on the past, but I should like to know from the hon. member what his position would be now if the government had not implemented the War Measures Act ten years ago and if, for example, Place Ville Marie had been blown up killing 5,000 people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tousignant: What would be his position? It is easy to comment on this.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. speaker, I doubt if I would serve the cause of this debate well if I were to get into such a hypothetical question or to deal in any substantive way with the question. I mean no disrespect to my hon. friend. I just do not feel this is the time to go into it.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State, Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I, like all those who have spoken before me in this debate over the last couple of days, express my pleasure and delight at the opportunity of contributing to this very important debate. Indeed I hope in hindsight several months or whatever from now it will be considered an historic debate.

There are several aspects in the proposal the government is putting forward to this House and to the special committee which deserve thorough consideration. I think in total out of the package of 12 issues brought before the first ministers several weeks ago, the constitutional bill being put forward indeed covers three of those issues. As Minister of State for Multiculturalism vested with the responsibility of exercising and attempting to have my cabinet colleagues and, indeed, Parliament, exercise the principle that Canadians of whatever origin are equal in our country and should be treated equally; also as the minister of state responsible for a division or directorate within the citizenship branch of the Department of the Secretary of State carrying out a number of policies to bring various groups and sections of groups in Canadian society up to a level of fair treatment and a sense of full participation and allowing, through those policies, the retention of culture; especially as a fourth term member of Parliament representing the constituency of York West, a very culturally diverse constituency for which I have great pride; and as an observer throughout the first ministers' conference several weeks ago, an observer particularly struck by the arguments put forward by several premiers in the area of human rights—I think those arguments were put forward in sincerity and with good will, but were ones with which I fundamentally disagreed—I want to dwell particularly on the proposed charter of rights and freedoms in the time available to me today. I will do that in the context of the contribution of my colleague who spoke before me, the former minister of fisheries in the previous government. With some passion and, I am sure, sincerity, he expressed his view of how we could move in an area like this in Great Britain rather than in this Parliament. The very essence of that argument is the difference between ourselves and the official opposition. Indeed we believe that this Parliament will approve the principle of entrenchment—we hope it will—and that the Parliament of Great Britain will not question the wisdom of this Parliament, and indeed it will be this Parliament that makes that decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: For more than half a century people of good will in all parties have tried and failed to put human rights in our constitution. I think all of us on all sides of the House have asked ourselves why in the recent months and years that this debate has gone on. I think one of the two main reasons lies in an observation of Stuart Keate, the well-known west coast publisher. He said:

> Canada on any world menu must be considered like a good vichysoisse—cold, part French and difficult to stir.

In the realm of human rights I think the analogy is right on. The subject of human rights does not stir most Canadians. Most Canadians seem to take human rights for granted. As Bertrand Russell said, we have every right in the world until we need them. Only then do we realize that human rights are the stuff of life, our shield against the arbitrary authority of a bureaucrat, a policeman, a magistrate, a school board or a politician; our guarantee of fair treatment in school, office, factory or farm; and that the end of such democracies as Chile and Greece began, as in Hitler's Germany, with violations of human rights no worse than we have known here in Canada.

The other reason we have failed to act will be plain to all who listened to the federal-provincial talks of last month. The majority of first ministers, fervently led by Premier Lyon, vehemently opposed entrenchment. Listening to the premiers gave me a feeling of déjà vu. Human rights have been debated in this House since confederation. Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier could probably speak on the subject without notes, and all that would be different would be the examples they would give in their speeches. The well-known historian Macaulay has written the following:

> The more we read of the history of past ages, the more we observe the signs of our own times.

Our debate continues the arguments of Sophocles and Cicero. Saint Thomas Aquinas talked of a natural law superior to man-made law, which man could perceive in the order of the universe. Out of natural law came natural rights, then the ideals of liberty and equality which, of course, throughout history toppled powerful governments in America and France, and the evolution of human rights in nations such as our own.

There are 2,000 years of history written eloquently in blood, and misunderstanding or non-understandings of human rights are still with us today. The issue is not whether human rights should be protected. The premiers are all committed to protection, but they say among other things that we are already well protected by our present constitution, traditions, and federal and provincial bills of rights.

Let us look at what protection we have now. We have the British North America Act, one of the world's oldest constitutions. It brought to Canada the theory of the sovereignty of Parliament, restrained only by the need of each order of government, federal and provincial, to stay within their allotted jurisdictions. It guarantees some political rights, some minority and cultural rights, and it gives us a constitution of law in a context of British tradition.

What this means was vividly illustrated in 1938 when the Supreme Court of Canada tossed out an act by a Social Credit government in Alberta which some members here will remember. The act required all newspapers to reveal their sources of news and to publish, free, information supplied by the government. The BNA Act gives the federal government the power of disallowance. It can veto within one year any law passed by a province, so Alberta's act was disallowed. When the case came before the Supreme Court, Chief Justice Duff searched the BNA Act to determine if the veto was justified. He found his enlightenment in the preamble, which describes our constitution as being "similar in principle" to Britain's. The Justice said that meant a freely elected Parliament, and that in turn depended on freedom of speech and a free press.

● (1650)

But some experts doubt that this rather creative interpretation of three little words is enough to stop a province from muzzling the press. The words are in the preamble, not in the operative part of the act. The act sets up a federal form of government, not a unitary form as in the United Kingdom; the words "similar in principle" may very well not apply, and probably were not intended to.

As for the power of disallowance, it has fallen into disuse. It was not used in 1959 when the government of Newfoundland tangled with two international unions and passed a law against freedom of association. No Quebec statute has been vetoed since 1911, despite gross violations of human rights. To say that the federal government is reluctant to use its veto power is, to say the least, an understatement. As a safeguard of human rights, disallowance proves the precept that power unused does become power abdicated.

Next, we have the 1960 federal bill, Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights. It protects our basic rights and freedoms, but as has often been said in this house, despite the efforts of a very distinguished Canadian it is little more than another statute. Unlike a constitutional statute it can be repealed any time by any federal party with the majority. It gives people no protection against provincial violations in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

The Diefenbaker bill gives us, for example, the right to the enjoyment of property. But the Hutterites in Alberta have been restricted by Alberta law from enlarging their agricultural communes. Some judges in previous cases have held that the provinces' authority over property and civil rights includes civil liberties. If so, our federal bill of rights is no protection. What about provincial bills of rights? All provinces have them. But they also have the power to amend, appeal or get around them, and with this goes the power of discrimination.

For example, the government of Quebec has a freedom of worship act that dates back to 1851. But for most of three decades, the thirties, forties and fifties, the Duplessis government in Quebec persecuted the Christian missionary society known as the Jehovah's Witnesses. Homes were entered without a warrant, peaceful meetings were broken up, bibles and hymnals illegally seized, women jailed without trial, and hundreds convicted of sedition. When Frank Roncarelli of Montreal, a rich and respected restaurant owner, posted bail for 393 witnesses over a period of two years, premier Duplessis ordered his liquor licence be cancelled. It ruined a family business that catered to distinguished customers like the Barrymores, and forced Roncarelli to take a job as a labourer. It took him 12 years to get back a fraction of what he had lost because he had tried to be helpful and exercise his freedom.

This violation of Quebec's freedom of worship act was finessed through the Quebec Liquor Commission, which could only be used by permission of Quebec's attorney general, who happened to be premier Duplessis, through a magistrate who ruled that the Jehovah's Witnesses were in business and thus required a permit they could not afford, and through a Quebec City bylaw forbidding the distribution of any "book, pamphlet, circular or tract whatever without . . . the written permission of the Chief of Police".

Not only were the Jehovah's Witnesses and their sympathizers outlawed, freedom of the press was clearly in police custody. For when the Quebec Superior Court upheld the Quebec City bylaw as "necessary for the protection of good order", a dissenting judge pointed out that the bylaw could just as easily prevent the distribution of election literature or any city newspaper.

When the Supreme Court of Canada finally overruled the bylaw as infringing on the freedom of worship act, premier Duplessis simply had the act amended. Clearly, nothing but public opinion prevents any provincial government from violating fundamental freedoms. Thus, liberty varies from province to province. More important, there are gaps in the law into which our rights can fall, a grey area between federal and provincial jurisdictions. Indians are frequently victims of this gap. But provinces claim they cannot do anything about it because the federal Indian Act supersedes a provincial bill of rights.

Women, too, have little protection. In the late 1960s, for instance, a policewoman in Sault Ste. Marie sued the Police Commissioner, the Police Association and the city. She claimed she was doing the same work as male policemen and not getting as much pay. The Ontario Supreme Court dismissed her case. In almost every category of work, women doing the same job as men are paid less.

Black and coloured people have little protection under our laws as they exist today. A 1975 York University study found 39 per cent of blacks in Metro Toronto had been barred by colour from buying or renting housing, and 38 per cent had suffered discrimination on the job or in looking for a job.

It is clear only a federal bill of rights entrenched in the constitution would be binding on all levels of government. Nevertheless, Premier Lyon of Manitoba in that much touted speech of several weeks ago argues entrenchment would be "contrary to our traditional and successful parliamentary government". He claims that since Britain has no constitutional bill of rights, Canada does not need one either. Anyone who says we do, he seems to suggest, is denying the genius of unwritten English common law and tradition. On a sentimental level I appreciate this view, as do members on all sides of the House, but I would not want to have to explain it to our victims of discrimination. As logic, to put it bluntly, it is a non-starter.

The reality is that many basic British freedoms are in writing. I think too many members of this House and Premier Lyon have forgotten that. In the thirteenth century England's barons found their ancient, unwritten liberties were being destroyed by the sovereign, so they had them written down in the Magna Carta. Then, in the seventeenth century, public opinion once again outgrew the law as practised by England's rulers, and the law was written down again in the 1689 Bill of Rights. The British have done this again and again, in writing. All Britons are well aware that their rights were bought with the lives of their ancestors. Can anyone imagine Mrs. Thatcher repealing habeas corpus? This and other pillars of freedom have so strong a moral force they are almost as binding in Great Britain as the constitution, as any constitution, and they were, indeed, written in law.

Another misconception is that the British themselves are satisfied with what has been called their miscellaneous, uncollected, undigested mass of statutes, legal decisions and vague understandings. They may not have been dissatisfied before the growth of credit, electronic eavesdropping, and Third World immigration began to change their social mores and practices. Their system worked well when laws were made by Parliament. But now the bulk of all laws, here and in Britain, are made without public debate, and embodied in thousands of regulations that, with the best of intentions, could infringe on people rights. Even in Britain, the bastion of Parliamentary supremacy, the growth of government has coined such phrases as "administrative lawlessness", and British legal experts are now pointing out that, when unwritten codes are weakened, written codes are required.

My third comment on Premier Lyon's trust in English common law is that any comparison is irrelevant anyway. Britain is a small country, Canada is huge. Britain has one government, we have 11. Theirs is a unitary state, ours is a federation. They have a strong family structure, a high tolerance of non-conformity, and a population that is still fairly homogenous. We have two official languages, and one-third of our people represent almost all the nations on the globe.

Mr. Lyon contends our system has worked better than that of the United States, where the existing constitution guarantees human rights. I agree that our record on rights is relatively good. But we disenfranchised Asians at the turn of the century in British Columbia, a decision upheld by the Supreme Court, which shows that Canadian citizenship does not guarantee the right to vote. We have denied Chinese in British Columbia the right to work in certain jobs. But it is true we have not systematically oppressed any minority as the southern United States have persecuted blacks. Nor have we had the problem those states have had.

The United States constitution could not disallow racial prejudice, but it was the United States Supreme Court that in 1944 declared the so-called "white primaries" unconstitutional and stopped politicians from making appeals to prejudice. It was a series of decisions by the Supreme Court in the 1940s that laid the foundation for laws giving blacks equal treatment in factories, streetcars, baseball and hotels. It was the United States Supreme Court that in 1954, in a landmark decision, ended segregation in the schools. Without the entrenchment of rights in the American constitution, the black people would be much worse off, and Premier Lyon should think of that.

● (1700)

We have one vivid example, also cited by Premier Lyon at the first ministers' conference, where racial pressures and responses in both countries were similar. Following Pearl Harbour, in Canada and the United States west coast citizens of Japanese descent were rounded up, dispersed or interned, their homes and businesses confiscated and sold at bargain basement prices. Cars worth a couple of thousand dollars sold for a couple of hundred dollars. The chicken farm and two-storey house of a twice-wounded Canadian World War I veteran sold for $1,492, after which sale expenses and taxes were deducted.

Mr. Crosbie: That is Liberal party history you are reading.

Mr. Fleming: The U.S. Supreme Court failed in this atmosphere of hysteria to uphold the most ordinary rights of citizenship. But after the war the U.S. constitution was invoked to provide compensation for all losses naturally and reasonably arising from the evacuation orders. In Canada there was no compensation unless claimants could prove that the Custodian of Alien Property had acted carelessly, which was never an issue.

In the United States the constitution recognizes an accused's right to free legal counsel at every stage from arrest to appeal. In Canada free legal aid is probably just as available, but the right to counsel has no such broad protection. The American constitution authorizes the court to see whether or not the accused had a fair hearing. In Canada the court only considers if the warrant of commitment is valid, it does not probe into the heart of the matter. And in such areas as women's rights, privacy and pollution, the American constitution has been more effective by far than our statutes.

Premier Lyon and Premier Blakeney might declare that it is too effective. Entrenching rights, they say, would put us at the mercy of the judges who would have to interpret what those rights would mean. They say it would transfer power from elected representatives to appointed officials who could strike down laws which people feel protect their community values. Premier Lyon asked at the first ministers' conference, "Does freedom of expression mean we can't combat pornography?". And he notes that the constitutional right of Americans to bear arms has hindered U.S. gun control legislation. The right to life has been a part of Canada's Bill of Rights for 20 years, but the court has yet to interpret it in relation to the death penalty, euthanasia or abortion; it has left that to our legislatures.

The Chief Justice of our Supreme Court, Bora Laskin, has chided writers who have implied, as he said, "That we have some sort of mandate . . . to overcome what Parliament has prescribed". Laskin says flatly, "We can't do that at all". Our courts do not take power from the people, as the premiers claimed at the conference, and constitutional rights would not give the courts new powers, only new laws. The courts have always decided disputes between citizen and state, and constitutional rights would not change that function. It would not take responsibility from elected representatives, and it would not mean relinquishing democracy. It would merely define the limits of power and thus ensure democracy at a level that it is not ensured at today.

It is, in fact, our governments of elected representatives that have most often infringed on human rights. Those same governments represented by the premiers at the conference should argue that the public wants first to go to government, not to courts. As Premier Lyon says, "We are representative of the people, but we are most representative of the people with the most influence".

The human rights codes and acts of the provinces all contain clauses that allow a cabinet minister to make exclusions in protected areas, and no matter how fair a politician tries to be, we are all subject to pressures that at times can distort our views. These pressures are most in evidence when we most need to keep cool. World War I, World War II and the pre-war and post-war communist scares each gave us hundreds of victims of violated rights. The infamous padlock law of Quebec allowed the attorney general to padlock the home of anyone suspected of preaching communism, and the term was undefined because the then attorney general of that province claimed that communism can be felt.

Families were thrown into the street and dispossessed without trial. Trade union offices were raided, civil liberties meetings were blocked. For a time the Montreal Star would not take a paid ad from the CCF. It took 20 years to get that law repealed, while the anti-communist laws of the mid-fifties of the United States, inspired by Senator McCarthy's demagoguery, were struck down by the Supreme Court in less than half the time.

It is not a matter of how much one dislikes communists. It is always the unpopular who most need civil liberties. Unless we protect minority opinions, we are not protecting any, because majorities are never in any danger. As John Stuart Mill wrote, "Christ was crucified, Socrates condemned, and Galileo imprisoned on the basis of majority opinion". It is the tyranny of the majority that minorities have to fear, not the tyranny of the judiciary.

The constitutional bill would place minority and individual rights beyond the reach of majority opinion, and beyond the reach of political expediency. Rather than lessen, it would increase legislative responsibility, since the constitution would force us to exercise more care in delegating power to administrators. Premier Lyon has tried to turn the virtue of entrenchment into a defect. Opinions change, as he points out, and new rights emerge—rights for children, homosexuals, the handicapped—and entrenchment would prevent further progress. History gives us no grounds for such fears. It has certainly not prevented the growth of liberty in the United States.

In Canada it was common not all that long ago to refuse to sell property to a Jew. A case was taken to the Supreme Court in 1945. Our time honoured right to do what we want with our property had come in conflict with developing views against discrimination. Mr. Justice MacKay invoked the UN Charter with its principles of human rights to show that such discrimination went against public opinion.

Whenever the precise meaning of a statute is in doubt—and words being what they are, it usually is—our judges, as law professor Frank Scott has noted, prefer the one that interferes least with individual freedom. "Courts," says Chief Justice Bora Laskin, "necessarily, are creative". But Premier Blakeney says that the right to go to court is for many people a hollow mockery of liberty, a right only for the rich, that the best way to effect change is to badger and lobby your MP. True, it is cheaper to write to one's MP than to get a lawyer. But if a law has violated one's rights, will that action change the law? As Premier Hatfield has stated, "You don't change laws like that". When sanctions are absent, rights are imaginary.

On the other hand, entrenching rights could not stop a legislator from going to bat for a constituent. It would not stop a constituent from badgering and lobbying. The constituent would have the best of both worlds. Premier Blakeney at the first ministers' conference made one final point; true security is not "entrenched rights protected by a court," he says, "but our country's, spirit of moderation and tolerance". He quotes an American judge who wrote, "that a society so riven that the spirit of moderation has gone, no court can save; that a society where that spirit flourishes, no court need save."

In answer, let me quote another American, a man with some experience in civil rights, Dr. Martin Luther King. He said, "Morality cannot be legislated, but behaviour can be regulated. Judicial decrees may not change the heart, but they can restrain the heartless." In a country like ours, with so many different racial and ethnic groups, rights that depend on public sentiment alone are far from safe. Recent history confirms that a country which is free is safer than a country which is not.

We need an entrenched bill of rights to underwrite liberty and safety in Canada. We need it so that learning the constitution in school will teach children that indispensable spirit of moderation and tolerance. We need it so that our legislators can measure new laws against it, and so that our bureaucrats know what they can and cannot do. We need an entrenched bill of rights because we have had attacks on East Asians in Toronto, and because in one western province alone we have had recently four crosses burn on the lawns of West Indians and Asians who have come to Canada. We need it so all Canadians in this country will know that we all weigh the same on the moral scale. We need it because to become a nation in law we must have an entrenched charter of rights and freedom.

We need that entrenched bill of rights to guarantee in practice what all three political parties in this House endorsed in principle almost ten years ago—the reality of our cultural pluralism, or what many of us call multiculturalism, that each and any of us, no matter our heritage or national origin, no matter our race or religion, we are in Canada all equal.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member to my right begins, I wonder, if there is time, whether the minister would permit me to ask him two short questions?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1710)

Mr. Waddell: I appreciated the minister's speech, as I always do. May I take it that the minister is not committing the government, but personally would be prepared to consider compensation from the Canadian government to Japanese Canadians? Perhaps some sort of fund for Japanese Canadians could be provided, if the matter cannot be worked out with individual Japanese Canadians, for those, as the minister quite properly described them, unjust acts that took place during wartime on behalf of the Canadian government in depriving them of their property.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, when I rise in the House I rise as a member of the government and I must express myself as a member of the government. As I understand it, there is no policy at this time to do what the hon. member suggests. I have often expressed my personal view, as I did in this speech as the minister, of the terrible events that took place at that time. When I look back at history, at a time when I was not here, at this act which I believe was wrong, I agree with the hon. member. I am not the Minister of Justice and neither am I, as minister or as a member of cabinet, in a position to give any kind of assurance, but I think I have expressed clearly my view of what took place after the war and during the war regarding Japanese Canadians.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer and I hope he will take up the matter of compensation for Japanese Canadians with the government.

The minister cited a number of examples of provincial violations of civil liberties such as the padlock law, the press laws in Alberta and others. When one studies civics, history or politics in Canadian schools, examples of provincial violations are given. In light of the recent evidence regarding the War Measures Act to which the minister made reference, is he prepared to say or was he saying that it was wrongfully applied ten years ago? Was that his position?

Mr. Fleming: No, I have not said that, Mr. Speaker. I think we all look back on any event in history that led to the incarceration of people, or the limiting of rights, with some concern. We heard some excellent comments on that from the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I recall, as a journalist at that time, that with the exception of two members of the NDP, all members of this House voted for the imposition of that act.

An hon. Member: No, they did not.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Fleming: I thought that overwhelmingly members on all sides of the House did, but I stand corrected. Overwhelmingly, but not all, an hon. member says.

If the hon. member who asked the question listened to my speech, he will know that I do not think that the position on an entrenched charter of rights or the current situation is absolutely cut and dried. It is still the public will and mood that affects judges as well as it affects legislators. I believe entrenchment of the boundaries within the constitution is a much better protection than simply the will of Parliament at any time.

During the course of my speech I tried to give a number of examples of that and to argue against some of the points made by Premier Lyon. We are human in what we do in this Parliament. We hope that the constitution protects, sometimes, against our weaknesses, with all the good will and good intentions that we have.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member does not want to mislead—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Taylor: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the minister does not want to mislead the House. He expressed the opinion that Hutterian brethren were suppressed in Alberta. Mr. Speaker, since the election of Premier Lougheed in 1971, Hutterian brethren may buy land like anybody else in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that I misled the House. My information is that the current statutes provide that no Hutterite colony may acquire land within 40 miles of any other colony and that the land they bought must be less than 6,400 acres and must have been on sale for 90 days. It seems to me that that is discriminatory.

Mr. Taylor: That was thrown out in 1972—per usual the Liberals are ten years behind the times.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member and the minister can get together behind the curtain and settle this. The hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer).

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, in rising this afternoon to take part in the debate which concerns the fundamental re-examination of our democratic institutions, which concerns the nature of the relationship between the federal government and the provinces, which concerns the rights of individuals, it is difficult for me to find words to convey adequately my sense of apprehension about the changes being proposed by the government.

The resolutions being proposed are pregnant with implications which go to the very root of the social contract which underpins the desire of Canadians to live together.

Today in this country, in the west, there is a legitimate sense of apprehension. There is a sense of resentment, and there is a sense of alienation from central Canada. This is caused, in many ways, by the legitimate perception that central Canada is trying to exclude the influence of the west in terms of our national body, Parliament, and certainly in terms of our federation.

In the last year we had an illustration of this within the province of Quebec which was debated and where there was a decision by way of a referendum, the subject matter of which was the very status of a province within confederation.

Regarding Atlantic Canada today, posited upon foundations of equity, we have heard the demand for offshore resources so eloquently put by my friend from St. John's East.

In my province, Ontario, there is a genuine concern among people and in government about the effect of high oil prices on our economy and industry. There is apprehension and a sense of concern about whether the rapid growth of industry, which has hitherto taken place in the province, will be arrested as a result of the ability of other provinces to attract the same type of industry.

What we have in this country, in my respectful submission, are tensions and concerns which besiege us and which demand the necessary political compromise and which will allow us to live together in a spirit of national community as one people.

What we are searching for, and what it is imperative that we find, is a process of continual renewal that will enable us to reach a consensus to live together as issues transform themselves from day to day, from year to year, from decade to decade.

The constitution we are seeking to amend is based upon political compromise. What could have seemed more improbable in 1864 than George Brown, in what is now Ontario, crossing the floor of the House and, on the basis of an issue of national federation, making an offer to support the Macdonald-Cartier government? What could have been more improbable than that? What could have been braver than Mr. Cartier accepting such an offer in circumstances where there was such hatred between Canada east and Canada west?

The compromises made at the birth of our country by Sir John A. Macdonald with respect to his preference for a unitary state are well known. He believed in a unitary state, but because of the make-up of the country he saw how necessary it was to have a federal union.

The point I wish to make in the most emphatic way I know, is that this nation was founded on agreement reached voluntarily by the Fathers of Confederation. This agreement is the very essence of a democratic constitution with terms to be arrived at by the consent of the parties. It is that consent which makes it enforceable. Without the act of agreement, without an act of consent, and without the voluntary nature of arriving at terms which are acceptable, it is the very denial of freedom which is the hallmark of this country.

The resolution brought forward by the government which imposes an amending formula on our constitution, in the absence of consent, could have the gravest consequences because it will necessarily increase the divisiveness which exists in the different regions of the country. It is an act which negates the desire to work out the political consensus which is the essence and spirit of confederation. It is of dubious legal validity.

If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) truly believes that the course of action he is pursuing is the correct one and if it does have constitutionality, then why will he not refer the matter directly to the Supreme Court as expeditiously as possible and put at rest the legitimate concerns of the premiers and of members of this House? Why will he not do that in order to determine its validity?

Mr. Waddell: He thinks the courts are unreliable.

• (1720)

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of areas to which I would like to address my attention. The first is with respect to the charter of rights, which the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) spoke about at great length. There seems to be an innuendo, certainly from the speech given by the Minister of Justice, to which I listened attentively on Monday, that to oppose or to doubt the value of entrenchment of some of these rights is to doubt or to oppose the rights themselves. This is an absolute distortion of the truth. The Minister of Justice in his speeches this summer and in the speeches he has given in the House respecting this matter, has told us about the nobility of the values espoused in the charter of rights. What I think needs assessment in this House and what the public needs to understand are the implications of entrenchment and the implication of special entrenchment of these rights.

Essentially, members of this House and members of the public must come to grips with and must understand that there is going to be a major shift of power from Parliament and from the legislatures to our courts. We must recognize that fact, and we must understand what its implications are.

The Minister of Justice has quite accurately outlined the antecedents of the codification of rights since 1947 with respect to the bill of rights in Saskatchewan. He has passed on to the Bill of Rights which Mr. Diefenbaker introduced in 1960, which was accepted by this House, but there is certainly nothing new to this. We know that with the Magna Carta there was the desire of the people of England at that time to have an acknowledgement, to have written down and to have a codification of what rights did exist. That same principle and policy prevailed with respect to the petition of rights in England in 1689. We know what happened in France as the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) pointed out in his address to this House. We certainly know that it happened in the United States. But, what are the implications of entrenchment and what are the implications of a bill of rights?

Let us just juxtapose the rights which are in the Bill of Rights with those that are in a charter of rights, and let us compare them. Surely there is no difference in the Bill of Rights between freedom of religion and freedom of religion within the charter of rights. There is no rational impact in terms of difference.

The point is what consequences flow as a result of putting them in a charter of rights which do not exist in a bill of rights? It seems to me the question to which members of this House must address themselves is: are we enlarging the rights of citizens by including them in a charter of rights? Or, are we in effect giving better protection to the people of Canada by embracing them in a charter of rights than that which now exists within the Bill of Rights? What are the implications of this?

There is no doubt that many people view the Bill of Rights on one level as a great success because it did codify the essential beliefs which Canadians have. But on another level, and this is something that one probably does not see except maybe hear from law school professors or in decisions of the court, the Bill of Rights in some ways has not been successful. That is the fault of Parliament, and it was the fault of Parliament at the time it was passed. What members of Parliament did not do was state clearly, as was their duty, what implication follows as a result of a violation of one of those rights, what consequences will flow in circumstances where there has been a denial of some of these rights.

In particular, I would like to address my attention to that question in the context of certain examples. I think it is very important, in terms of the legal consequences that may flow, that before we choose a preference—and that is what we are doing here—we understand exactly what those results are.

Let me give this illustration. Under a charter of rights there can be no doubt, certainly on the basis of the speech which has just been given by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, nor on the basis of the paper which the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave when he was attorney general of Canada in 1966 with respect to codification and a charter of human rights—I have that document, which is public; nor can there be any doubt that they wish an American type of system. What are the ramifications of such, and are they desirable?

First of all, if we had a system in which the primacy is given to the Bill of Rights or to certain legal implications arising from these rights, what happens in circumstances where a man is charged with possession of stolen goods and a police officer makes a technical mistake in a search warrant? A raid occurs with respect to certain premises where, let us say, ten pounds of cocaine are found. The search warrant is defective, the search and seizure are unlawful and, under the charter of rights, because there was an unlawful invasion of rights which we wish to entrench, that man will go free.

What were the circumstances of common law? The circumstances of common law were that even though the search warrant may have been technically invalid, that evidence of finding the cocaine does not become inadmissible; it does not in any way exonerate the offender. The choice we have to make is do we give primacy to these types of rights? Do we understand these types of matters? Say, for example, in a case where a man is charged with an offence and gives a voluntary statement acknowledging the commission of the offence but he is not accorded by the police officer at the first reasonable opportunity his right to counsel—should a man be able to walk the streets and to be exonerated in those circumstances because a police officer has neglected to give that warning, which is a person's constitutional right under the charters of rights?

These are very difficult choices, because there are two rights and there always have been two rights. We have had to balance them. We have had to balance the right of liberty and the expectation that a person's rights are going to be afforded to him on the one hand, and the right certainly that a guilty man should not necessarily go free because the constable blundered. Those are the choices that we have.

There are certain rights that I expect will be entrenched with respect to questions on freedom of religion and freedom of conscience. It may well be that those rights ought to be entrenched. But there are other rights which are contained in these resolutions which cause me a great deal of alarm. I heard mention made of Premier Lyon. I happened to be in attendance on the day when he gave his exposition of his point of view with respect to it. I was very impressed by the reality and the practicality of the submissions he made at the first ministers' conference. Let us make no mistake about it, there will be a major shift out of this House and into our courts. It will be the courts that will be deciding social policy. In this regard, maybe our leading constitutional expert, certainly in the twentieth century, Mr. W. P. Kennedy, in terms of how the British North America Act was interpreted by the courts, said: "Seldom have statesmen more deliberately striven to write their purposes into law, and seldom have they more singularly failed before judicial technique of statute interpretation."

If we are going to entrench rights, if we are going to entrench legal rights, let us at least have the courage to give the courts a proper sense of direction. Let us tell them within the charter of rights what we expect when there is a violation of those rights. We did not do that adequately in the Bill of Rights, unfortunately. This charter of rights is absolutely silent on the point. Certainly the courts have the right to expect that we will give them a sense of direction. If they are to have judicial review with respect to these matters, do we not have the duty to tell them, to argue among ourselves and to vote on whether they are in the circumstances, for example, legal rights?

• (1730)

Are they to take the primacy of those legal rights and knock out the whole tradition of common law, that evidence which is relevant to the commission of a crime may very well be inadmissible on the ground of a violation of some of these legal rights? These are difficult questions, but they absolutely must be addressed.

Resolutions have been put forward without any discussion so far of the implications. This is dangerous. We must at least say what we expect to come out of these resolutions. I find them totally inadequate in that regard.

When talking about the constitution, I would feel personally remiss if I did not state some expectations that I have with respect to this country and some of my personal feelings, because I believe the policy of this House is motivated by one's philosophy. I believe there is an historic rhythm to almost everything in life. I believe there will always be times of prosperity and times when we are not so prosperous. For example, when confederation took place, as a result of my reading of the confederation debates I feel that there was a great expectation that the west would not be annexed by the United States, but would grow and be a place of great opportunity for people in Canada.

What happened? In the first 30 years of this century there was absolutely no doubt that that challenge and opportunity were being fulfilled. Then two factors occurred. One was the drought and one was the depression. Time passes on. In the seventies, as a result of historical accident, energy, which previously we had in abundance, became a scarce commodity. The west, which has an abundance of oil, natural gas and energy, again became a place for prospective prosperity.

The design of this country cannot be to alienate a region of it which is entitled to its own sense of determination in order to improve the standard and attain the aspirations it has within confederation. I might make an analogy that I hope the members from Quebec may appreciate and be more sensitive to than other members. In the sixties, governments within Quebec were certainly federally oriented. They knew that there was a revolution occurring. It was called the quiet revolution within Quebec. There had to be some acknowledgment of some type of singular or special status to acknowledge the history of people who live in Quebec. They said we must have this because it is the will of the people within this province.

What did Anglo Canada do? It probably cast a deaf ear. They did not believe what was happening in Quebec in the sixties. We did that to our great detriment, because there is an evolution to things. We came to recognize in the seventies the frustrations of the sixties and what people were saying within Quebec. We were faced with a government that was determined to separate from Canada as a result of our lack of sensitivity.

By parity of reasoning, may I say to this House that the same phenomenon is occuring in the west. My great apprehension is that the government is insensitive to a sentiment that is occurring in the west. There is a hardening. I am not a westerner, but I have had the advantage of being in the west on a great number of occasions in the last year, for personal reasons.

I have talked to my colleagues in the west. I believe them when in caucus they talk about the sentiment within their ridings. I believe there is a sense of alienation and resentment. I believe there exists a sentiment that a leader could lead them in the same direction that René Lévesque led Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speyer: Does the government, with the majority of seats in this House, have the perception which we lacked in the sixties to stop this in the bud? Does it have the good will? Does it have the humility to be able to talk to western premiers, to understand the sentiments of the west and to react in a sympathetic way to their determination to have within their region a sense of prosperity and a real say about the way in which this federation operates? That is the most important question.

As I said in my opening comments, I am firmly of the opinion that this nation is run on consent. It is run on a voluntary nature. The way in which we enforce the terms of confederation is by the act of consent or agreement. To impose the terms of confederation by acting unilaterally will do nothing except increase the resentment of the people in the west. We do that at our great peril.

I plead with members from Quebec and other members in the government party to try to understand these feelings. In my judgment, we can still negotiate, as Sterling Lyon put it. Why is there the necessity to rush constitutional change? Why must it be done by Christmas time? Why can the Prime Minister not meet and discuss some of these matters which are agitating Canadians?

An hon. Member: Is 53 years not enough?

Mr. Speyer: In those 53 years we did not have the problems in Quebec and the problems that we find in the west. If there is an imposition of terms that are unacceptable, what do you expect the sentiment to be in different parts of the country? I see the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) here. I am not sure what is happening in Newfoundland—

Mr. Crosbie: Neither is he.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speyer: To listen to the arguments which the premier of that province is making on behalf of those people, it is significantly different from what is happening in the west? Those are the questions we must face in this parliamentary debate. The government should have the humility to extend the debate, to see if what they are doing, which is not by consent, certainly not with the consent of the provinces, is legal, because we are a law-abiding nation. There is profound doubt as to the legality of what is happening. What would be the problem with having the Governor General by order in council refer the matter immediately to the Supreme Court?

Apart altogether from the question of whether it is legal or not, there is absolutely no reason to rush into such profound changes in circumstances where we are going to act to the detriment of the community spirit which we all hope exists within Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the debate which began last Monday in the House represents an important period in the political history of our country. In view of its importance and of the interest it holds for the people of Canada and especially the people of Quebec, it is the duty of each member to express his views, give his opinions, show his colours and give the reasons why he believes all Canadians should support the proposed resolution. Nobody has the right to remain uncommitted at a time when the rights, freedom and equality we have fought for over the last 200 years are about to be decided in this House. The most basic and significant reason why we must endorse this bill is that it makes equality between French and English the cornerstone of the Canada of tomorrow. This struggle has been going on for 200 years. It began with the appointment of Jean-Antoine Panet as the first Speaker of the House of Assembly in 1793. This scene, where Francophones chose the first Speaker, after an historical event which gave us a common future with the other founding people, hangs in the National Assembly in Quebec City to remind each and every Quebecker that, so long as this resolution is not passed, the struggle, which began 200 years ago, will continue. In the nineteenth century many other prominent Canadians reminded their fellow citizens of this struggle they would have to continue.

I would like to quote Étienne Parent, one of the great economists of the nineteenth century, who said in 1840, and I quote:

> We ask that the English majority which will be in the united legislature treat the French language the same way the French majority which was in the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, under the old constitution, treated the English language.

What French-speaking people have always been claiming is not a particular status, or favours, nor have they made fancy requests; what they are looking for in Canada is essentially and fundamentally equality. This is what they claimed under Louis-Hippolyte Lafontaine in 1845, when the Parliament of Canada was, as it is today, about to send an address to Her Majesty to ask for the recognition of the equality of French and English and to have section 41 of the Union Act repealed. The representations made by Louis-Hippolyte Lafontaine brought about the inclusion in the constitution of 1867 of this article providing that, in our Parliament, English and French will be two languages which will have equal treatment. At that time several people, George Etienne Cartier first among them, thought that those provisions would be sufficient to enable French-speaking people to assume fully their roles and their responsibilities. In 1963, Lester B. Pearson had to take the initiative to create a royal commission to define, and I quote:

> —what steps should be taken to develop the Canadian Confederation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races, taking into account—

—and he added at that time—

> —the contribution made by the other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada—

That is what we are asked to crown today. In 1969, this Parliament adopted almost unanimously a piece of legislation which crowned all the hopes, that is the Official Languages Act which was passed with the support of all parties in the House. At that time, we all believed that it was the answer to the fears, that it was the hope which was going to bring French-speaking people to assume fully their roles in the Public Service of Canada and to see to it that the public receives in both official languages the services they require from the government of Canada. However, it took a sad story, the story of the Gens de l'air, and nobody in the House forgot it, to demonstrate that this piece of legislation, the Official Languages Act, was not without loopholes, unfortunately.

Is there anyone in this country who does not remember that for a whole week in June, 1976, public opinion had been set on fire against the use of French in air traffic communications? Is there anyone who does not remember that the tribunals had travelled throughout Europe for six months trying to determine the consequences of using French in air communications? Who does not remember the decision rendered by Quebec Superior Court Chief Justice Deschênes stating that the Official Languages Act was fundamental and that nobody, let alone Air Canada, could ignore the equality between French and English? Who does not remember that Justice Louis Marceau reversed that decision in January, 1977, stating that the Minister of Transport had sufficient powers at the time to prohibit the use of French in air communications and that the Official Languages Act could not ensure the equality of French and English?

All those who had believed in the law until then and who had thought that what Parliament had done in 1969 was a dream come true lost hope. In his Annual Report for 1978, the Commissioner of Official Languages had to urge Parliament to legislate again to give the Official Languages Act judicial priority over all other federal statutes. He had to do so again last spring, and I should like to quote him, so that all my hon. colleagues may realize that, among the various steps we are called upon to take, there is one which is directly in response to this admonition by the Commissioner of Official Languages.

The commissioner insists that the Official Languages Act should have judicial priority over all other federal statutes, in case of conflict between their respective provisions. He insists also that the equality between French and English be enforced, that it should apply to all ministers, directors of Crown corporations and agencies, higher officials, and that no one should be allowed to hide behind these statutes and regulations to forbid the use of either French or English. What the commissioner has asked for, Mr. Speaker, can be found in this bill in sections 25 and 16 of the proposed resolution. So I want my colleagues who freely express their opposition to this resolution in this House to be fully aware that the resolution answers the demands put forth continuously for over 200 years by generation after generation of Francophones, throughout this country and in this Parliament.

If the new constitution is to be successful in the future, it will be due to the fact that it recognizes in a fundamental way the equality of French and English within all institutions that come under the Canadian Parliament.

My colleague the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) and myself have introduced several private bills in this House in the last three years to bring in these changes. Two years ago the government announced in the Speech from the Throne that they would fulfil these expectations. Today we have the opportunity to take a decision and I ask hon. members from both sides in the House to give due consideration to this aspect of the resolution. I know it is not perfect and I will elaborate on this later in my speech, but I would like hon. members to be fully aware that all Quebeckers who voted No last May did so with the conviction that a new federalism would start with the inclusion in the Canadian constitution of equality of the French and English languages.

● (1750)

And the critics we have heard in the last few days have jumped on this type of bandwagon. Those who have been saying lately that this move does not meet the expectations of a renewed federalism do not know what has been going on in Quebec in the last four years. They do not know that the new constitution must first establish clearly under what conditions and in which context Francophones and Anglophones will have to keep living together in this country.

This does not mean that the provision contained in this proposed resolution will necessarily succeed in allaying all concerns. The Commissioner of Official Languages once again has expressed other concerns regarding the language of work in the civil service. The proposed resolution does not contain any provision to this effect. Yet, in June, 1973, this Parliament stated, and I quote:

—civil servants should generally be able to discharge their duties within the Canadian government in the official language of their choice.

The conditions in which such a right can be exercised should of course be qualified. There is no Canadian in this House who does not recognize the special geographic conditions of the country, the regionalisms, the special needs of each constituent of our country.

Now that we have the opportunity to solve that problem once and for all, during consideration in committee we will have to ask the commissioner to provide the necessary explanations so that the resolution will finally answer all our expectations.

For several days now, we have heard a number of criticisms about Bill 101 according to which this resolution would undermine Francization efforts in Quebec. During the next few minutes therefore I would like to answer each of those criticisms, because if I were convinced that by passing that resolution we would jeopardize the future of French Quebec, I would be the first to object to it in the House. However, I feel that it is far from endangering the survival and development of French Quebec. The resolution is the specific answer to one of the most harrowing phenomena in Quebec.

First I would like to speak about what is commonly called the Quebec clause of Bill 101. We know that under that legislation Canadians from other provinces who settle down in Quebec must register their child in a French school unless they obtain a certificate proving that they will not remain more than three years in Quebec. The resolution under consideration repeals that clause of Bill 101 and I think that we should be glad about it.

The Premier of Quebec admitted, in 1977, at the time Bill 101 was passed, that that clause made him uneasy. He told us he had misgivings about balkanizing Quebec.

At the Montreal conference in 1978 he was prepared to abolish that clause provided other Canadian provinces reciprocated, that is pledged to guarantee the language rights of Francophones outside Quebec.

Today, we guarantee reciprocity in section 23(2) of the proposed resolution.

Quebec should not come and tell us we are acting against the views it held towards its Canadian partner. When one tries to grasp the extent of the problem, one realizes that the number of people to whom that provision of Bill 101 applies is, all things considered, quite small. In 1977-78, 915 people got a permit to enrol their children in an English school because they were either members of the armed forces, diplomats, students or researchers or other workers from other Canadian provinces coming to Quebec for a definite period of time.

There were 1,541 in 1978-79 and only 994 in 1979-80. Is that a threat to the cultural security of Francophones in Quebec? We must not kid ourselves or kid the people.

To say that this proposed resolution will allow all immigrants to send their children to English schools is really to misread the proposed resolution. And that fear the Premier of Quebec is sustaining in the consciences and minds of Quebeckers must be denounced. Section 23 says that a citizen of Canada whose mother tongue is French or English has the right to send his children to a minority language school. Specifically it means that an immigrant Australian, American, Spanish, Italian or from any country in the world, coming to Quebec is still going to send his children to French schools. That is what Bill 101 says and section 23(1) does not change that at all. Consequently, it is a falsehood, a mistake and a monumental fraud to say that immigrants to Quebec will be entirely free to send their children to English school.

The proposed resolution is that English-speaking citizens whose mother tongue is English, whether they were born in Canada or became Canadians afterwards, will enjoy the opportunity of enrolling their children in a school of the language of their choice. However, Mr. Speaker, one has to be aware of how far-reaching these changes can be. We should not frighten the people to the point where Quebeckers will be faced with something they will no longer be able to control.

If you consider the statistics with respect to immigration in Quebec particularly since the years 1976, 1977, 1978, you realize that in 1976, out of 29,282 immigrants who came to Quebec, 11,991 came from countries where one of the national languages is English. In 1977, there was a big drop and out of 19,000 immigrants who came to Quebec, 5,477 came from English-speaking countries. In 1978, there was an even greater decrease and out of 14,000 immigrants who came to Quebec, 3,685 came from English-speaking countries. We are now witnessing a restoration of the balance of English-speaking immigrants coming to Quebec in proportion with the English-speaking population in that province.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock and, with your permission, continue tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being 6 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

(Editor's note: Pursuant to order made Monday, October 6, p. 3275, the following are the answers to the questions on the order paper then listed.)

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY ON SATURDAY

Question No. 20—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has the Post Office Department been studying ways and means of discontinuing rural mail delivery on Saturdays and, if so, what are all the details?

2. (a) Was a letter written by Mr. G. A. Lambourn on this subject to rural residents in a certain area and, if so, did it ask people to reply to a questionnaire stating "yes" or "no" in regard to their opinions on the subject (b) did Mr. Lambourn's letter state in part "It is felt the same conditions of work should be applied to rural mail contractors" as compared to urban?

3. Did the Post Office Department take into account proper comparison between farm and urban residents such as (a) rural contractors are not on an hourly wage with vacation pay, pensions, etc., but work by contract (b) whether or not elimination of Saturday services would also eliminate newspaper delivery services to thousands of Canadians?

4. Will the Post Office Department reconsider any proposed policy to eliminate Saturday rural mail delivery and specifically, is it aware as to whether or not members of parliament are receiving numerous complaints on the subject?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): 1. Yes.

As part of its ongoing function to evaluate all services provided versus their costs and the changing needs for them. However, no action was taken one way or another until 1977 when in response to requests from many rural route contractors that they be permitted to enjoy a five day work week, a system was established whereby the frequency of rural routes might be reduced provided certain conditions were met; those conditions are that:

(1) The member of parliament in whose area the rural route operates is consulted and in agreement with the conducting of a survey.

(2) A survey is made from which 66.6 per cent or more of the persons affected indicate that they are in favour of the reduced frequency.

(3) The local member of parliament is informed of the survey results and should the required two-thirds of the persons affected have indicated approval—gives his endorsement to the frequency reduction.

2. (a) Yes, his name has appeared on letters sent to persons served by rural route in that district asking whether or not they are in favour of a proposed frequency reduction.

(b) Yes, it is understood that such phraseology was used in Mr. Lambourn's letters. It may be explained however, that action to reduce rural route frequency has almost invariably been instigated by the rural route contractors concerned—who themselves use that phraseology when requesting consideration for a frequency reduction.

3. (a) As indicated in the foregoing actions to initiate rural route frequency reductions had almost entirely been as a result of requests for that action by the rural route contractors concerned. It might be noted in that context that when rural route frequency is reduced from six to five trips per week, payments made to the contractors are not reduced at pro rata (16.6 per cent) but, recognizing that the same amount of mail will be handled over the week, payments are reduced only to the extent of the costs (gasoline, etc. relating to vehicle operation) which will not be incurred by the contractor as a result of the frequency reduction. In no case has a payment reduction exceeded 10 per cent—with the average being much less—when the frequency has been reduced.

(b) As far as possible efforts are made to dissuade a rural route contractor who requests a frequency reduction when it is apparent that the rural route in question is in an area where newspaper delivery is made through the mails. However, if the contractor persists, if more than two-thirds of the affected residents agree to the reduction, and if the local member of parliament endorses the reduction then it is possible that subscribers to some publications will receive delivery on a five day per week instead of a six day per week frequency.

4. Canada Post has no policy at this time to eliminate Saturday delivery except, as noted, where the rural route contractor has requested it, where more than two-thirds of the persons affected indicate that they are in favour, and where the local member of parliament has endorsed that action.

Canada Post has received some representations and enquiries on the status of rural route service from members of parliament.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Question No. 36—Mr. Cossitt:

Is a person required, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, to still be available for work during a benefit period when they suffer a death in the family that requires approximately three days for burial, etc. and, if so, will the government consider amending the act to permit persons on unemployment insurance benefits, three days special absence that will not be counted against them insofar as any declaration about being available for work?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): The requirement of being available for work implies that a claimant must be willing, able and ready to accept immediately any offer of suitable employment. Normally, if a claimant's statement shows that for personal reasons he/she would be prevented from accepting immediate employment, he or she is considered as not available for work in accordance with section 25(a) of the act. However, availability for work is always to be considered in reference to the particular circumstances of each case. Since each case is considered on its own merits, there is no need to change the legislation.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC SERVANTS—COMPARATIVE SALARIES

Question No. 56—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Are there any public servants receiving higher salaries than members of parliament and, if so (a) how many (b) in each case, what is his/her (i) name (ii) job designation (iii) department (iv) salary (v) length of service?

2. Do those receiving salaries higher than members of parliament work longer hours and carry more responsibility than the elected representatives of the people?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Members of Parliament do not receive salaries; they receive indemnities and allowances.

2. The hours of work required of public servants are generally 37½ hours per week. Many senior public servants, however, regularly work hours far in excess of those required, without remuneration. The question of whether senior public servants carry more responsibility than members of parliament demands a comparison of the relative responsibilities of administrators and legislators. Without such a comparison questions of "more responsibility" become meaningless. Mr. T. N. Beaupré in the Report of the Advisory Committee on Parliamentary Salaries and Expenses published in November, 1970, stated: "The position of the federal parliamentarian is unique and therefore, it cannot be easily compared to apparently similar positions in other political jurisdictions, either in Canada or elsewhere, nor to other occupations in Canada". This conclusion is as true today as when it was written. It is apparent that no meaningful comparison can be made between administrators and legislators since these professions are intrinsically different.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Question No. 61—Mr. Cossitt:

1. (a) What ten constituencies have the highest percentage of senior citizens (b) what is the percentage in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville?

2. If the constituency of Leeds-Grenville does not rank in the top ten, where does it rank in percentage of senior citizens in all constituencies?

3. What is the same information as requested in part 1 for the province of Ontario?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports that, according to the latest available data, the 1976 census:

1. (a) The ten constituencies with the highest percentage of senior citizens (persons 65 years of age and over) are in descending order: Victoria, B.C.; Vancouver Centre, B.C.; Langelier, Québec; St. Paul's, Ontario; Winnipeg North Centre, Manitoba; Mount Royal, Québec; Hamilton West, Ontario; Vancouver Quadra, B.C.; Saint Henri/Westmount, Québec; Don Valley West, Ontario.

   (b) The percentage of senior citizens in Leeds-Grenville is 11.9 per cent.

2. Leeds-Grenville ranks forty-sixth in percentage of senior citizens.

3. The ten constituencies with the highest percentage of senior citizens in Ontario in descending order are, St. Paul's, Hamilton West, Don Valley West, Eglinton-Lawrence, Grey Simcoe, Victoria-Haliburton, Parkdale-High Park, Parry Sound-Muskoka, Bruce-Grey, Huron-Bruce.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 74—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the name and salary level of each person working in the Prime Minister's office who has a salary of $20,000 per annum or more?

2. What is the present total complement of the office?

3. What is the projected number of total staff within the next year?

4. What is the estimated operating expenses for all aspects of the office for the current fiscal year?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1.

Name	Level	Salary Range
Viau, Cécile	AS-6	$28,227 - $31,514
Johnson, Edward	SX-1	$33,600 - $46,200
Coutts, James	DM	$62,900 - $78,300
Horvath, Thérèse	AS-5	$24,273 - $27,070
Wilson, George	SX-1	$33,600 - $46,200
Fox, Marie-Hélène	SX-1	$33,600 - $46,200
Fairbairn, Joyce	SX-1	$33,600 - $46,200
Derrick, Ruth	AS-6	$28,227 - $31,514
Axworthy, Tom	SX-2	$38,300 - $52,100
Schulz, Gisela	AS-2	$17,915 - $20,053
Gossage, Patrick	SX-1	$33,600 - $46,200
Perry, Suzanne	AS-8 (PM-7)	$31,400 - $38,800
Coons, James	AS-4	$20,815 - $23,162
Scharf, Diane	AS-2	$17,915 - $20,053
Burelle, André	AS-8 (PM-7)	$31,400 - $38,800
Moore, Jim	AS-8 (PM-7)	$31,400 - $38,800
Poirier, Hélène	AS-2	$17,915 - $20,053
McDonald, Patrick	SX-1	$33,600 - $46,200
Dillman, Peggy	AS-7	$29,283 - $32,900
Matteau, Lucille	AS-5	$24,273 - $27,070
Fournier, Nicole	AS-4	$20,815 - $23,162
Donaldson, Gaie	IS-2	$18,731 - $20,910
Hanrahan, P.W.M.	IS-4	$24,273 - $27,070

2. Fifty-seven.

3. Several positions to be filled; no details available at this time.

4. Estimates tabled in the House of Commons for 1980-81 reflect a total budget of $3,039,000 and 94 person-years.

IRANIANS IN CANADA

Question No. 94—Mr. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the government, how many of the participants in the November 10, 1979 pro-Iranian demonstration in front of the American Embassy in Ottawa, are attending Canadian schools or universities on student visas?

2. How many Iranians, in Canada on student visas, are receiving financial assistance towards their education from the government?

3. How many Iranians, who are not in Canada on student visas, are in Canada on another type of visa?

4. How many Iranians, on a visa, other than a student visa, are receiving financial assistance from the government?

5. Have any Iranians been found to be in Canada illegally?

6. How many Iranians discovered in Canada illegally were receiving financial assistance from the government?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. The Canada Employment and Immigration Department does not know the identity of demonstrators who participated in the demonstration of November 10, 1979, in front of the American Embassy in Ottawa.

2. The Canada Employment and Immigration Department supplies no financial assistance to students in Canada on student visas. Indeed, all students who enter Canada under student visa authorization must be able to prove in advance that they are financially able to pay all costs relating to their education, including fees, tuition and living expenses.

3. As of April 1, 1980, 564 Iranian visitors, not having authorization to study here, were in Canada temporarily. Of this number, 273 had authorization to accept specified temporary employment, while the remaining 291 were merely visiting. There were at that date also 227 Iranians in Canada holding minister's permits and not as visitors.

4. The Canada Employment and Immigration Department is not aware of any Iranians in Canada on any type of visa receiving any financial assistance from the government.

5. Yes.

6. It is possible that some Iranians found to be illegally in Canada might have received financial assistance from the government. However, the Canada Employment and Immigration Department has no way of obtaining this information.

MR. MARK STAROWICZ AND MR. KONSTANTIN GEYVENDOV

Question No. 105—Mr. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the government, did CBC producer Mark Starowicz have clandestine meetings with Mr. Konstantin Geyvendov on at least six occasions and, if so, was he charged under a section of the Official Secrets Act for consorting with an agent of a foreign power and/or being associated with such an agent and, if not, for what reason?

2. What is a detailed description of all connections between Mr. Starowicz and Mr. Geyvendov as known by the RCMP and/or the government?

3. Is the government prepared to request from the CBC an explanation as to why Mr. Mark Starowicz continues as a producer of such programs as "Sunday Morning" which falls within the category of public opinion influencing programs?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Solicitor General and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. and 2. It is considered that it would not be in the public interest to comment on questions of this nature.

3. The CBC was established as Crown corporation for the purpose of producing and broadcasting, independently of political or commercial interference, programs for a national broadcasting service. Within its terms of reference the corporation has the sole right and responsibility for hiring and work assignments.

USE OF COMCEN FACILITIES

Question No. 109—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Are members of parliament entitled to use DOT Telex "Comcen" facilities for the purpose of sending political messages to their constituency and, if so, how many members used such facilities in 1976-77 and what are their names?

2. Since October 1, 1974, did the member for Assiniboia, in the Thirtieth Parliament, use such facilities for political messages or news releases and, if so (a) on how many occasions (b) under whose authority (c) was he billed by DOT or did he offer to pay for its use?

3. Have any members been billed by DOT "Comcen" Telex for use of the facilities and, if so, which members?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The Comcen provides a service to Transport Canada officials and to the office of the minister.

2. In his capacity as a parliamentary secretary, the honourable member for Assiniboia in the Thirtieth Parliament had access, in the normal course, to certain services available through the minister's office, including telex services.

3. Not applicable.

UIC—MATERNITY BENEFITS

Question No. 110—Mr. Cossitt:

Will the government introduce an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act making it possible for women who adopt children to receive the same pregnancy leave benefits as natural mothers and, if not, for what reason is the present situation being continued?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): This question is currently under review. The Unemployment Insurance Act, at present, does not permit the payment of maternity benefits to adoptive parents.

CANADA COUNCIL GRANTS 1978-79

Question No. 120—Mr. Cossitt:

What is a list of all Canada Council grants awarded during the fiscal year 1978-79 and, in each case, what (a) is the name and address of the (i) applicant

(ii) recipient (b) was the amount of the grant (c) is the exact purpose in which the moneys will be used including any specific names or description given to each project?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: See the supplement to the Canada Council's twenty-second annual report, tabled in the House of Commons on July 2.

RETROACTIVE DRAINAGE GRANTS—EASTERN ONTARIO

Question No. 123—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Eastern Ontario Subsidiary Agreement signed December 20, 1979, is the government prepared to give immediate consideration to make retroactive drainage grants for projects already under way in the area in question prior to the signing of the agreement and (a) if so, is this soon to be made known (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The response for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: on April 3, 1980, the Ontario minister of agriculture and food announced that his ministry would provide assistance to eastern Ontario municipalities that had incurred costs resulting from the construction of outlet drains on which work commenced following the termination of the former ARDA program on March 31, 1979, and prior to the signing of the Canada-Ontario Eastern Ontario Subsidiary Agreement on December 20, 1979. It is anticipated that this offer of assistance will be fully subscribed by qualified municipalities.

As a result of this action being taken by the province, the federal government is no longer considering a retroactivity provision under the eastern Ontario agreement.

EMIGRATION OF NURSES

Question No. 129—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In each of the past five years, how many registered nurses and registered nurses' assistants have emigrated?

2. Does such emigration concern the Department of National Health and Welfare and, if so (a) what action does it plan to take to assure that the situation changes (b) have provincial departments of health been consulted?

3. Are steps being taken to provide incentives to registered nurses and registered nurses' assistants to stay in Canada and, if so, what are the details?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. For registered nurses, data are available only from the United States department of justice, immigration and naturalization. There is a delay of two to three years in reporting. The number admitted from Canada to permanent status was:

1975	327
1976	291
1977	533

For the first three-quarters of 1978, the figure is 399, which is almost the same as during the same period of 1977. There are no emigration data on registered nurses' assistants.

2. No official expression of concern has been received from the provincial governments who have primary responsibility for the delivery of health care in Canada. There is no evidence of an over-all shortage of registered nurses or registered nurses' assistants, although there may be some regional and local shortages from time to time. Recent graduates in nursing may be attracted to the United States if they find that Canadian hospitals in urban areas have a full complement of nursing staff.

(a) No particular action by the department is contemplated at this time.

(b) Consultations and data exchange take place on a continuing basis as required with provincial departments of health. The federal-provincial advisory committee on health manpower meets twice yearly.

3. Steps to provide incentives to nurses to stay in Canada are primarily the responsibility of the provinces. No special action by the federal government is considered necessary at this time.

RCMP—INVESTIGATION INTO THE ACTIVITIES OF PROFESSOR HAMBLETON

Question No. 133—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to a question by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville on November 12, 1979 at page 1183 of Hansard, what are the complete results of the RCMP investigation into the activities of Professor G. Hambleton of Laval University?

2. Was the home of Mrs. G. Hambleton, 59 Ruskin Avenue, Ottawa, Ontario entered and searched by the RCMP and, if so (a) what articles were removed from the premises (b) what was the date of the search (c) what is the name of the highest ranking person who ordered the search?

3. To the knowledge of the government, what contacts did Professor Hambleton have with Miss Lijana Galeva and (a) what was the purpose of the contacts (b) is Miss Galeva now living in Yugoslavia (c) did she ever pay any money to Professor Hambleton and, if so, for what purpose?

4. Was Professor Hambleton at one time a member of the Canadian intelligence corps in Germany during 1945-46 and, if so, what were his specific duties?

5. Did Professor Hambleton have any connections with security matters in Canada or with NATO countries as known by the RCMP and, if so, what were they?

6. Was his home in Montreal raided on or about November 4, 1979, and, if so (a) what was the purpose (b) what was seized, etc?

7. Did the RCMP examine his bank accounts and, if so (a) on what dates (b) what are the names of the banks (c) were any items seized or examined including specific cheques payable to him and, if so, what was the amount of each cheque and the name and address of the issuing party?

8. Was Professor Hambleton ever connected with the National Film Board and, if so, what were his duties?

9. To the knowledge of the government, was Professor Hambleton an economic adviser to the government of Peru and Haiti or any other countries and did the RCMP investigate or have investigated by others, anything connected with such activities?

10. Did Professor Hambleton engage in missions to Brussels and Berlin and, if so, what was the nature of such missions and what are all the details of any government connection with such missions?

11. Was the investigation of Professor Hambleton completed by the RCMP and, if so, will charges be laid and, if not, what details led to such a decision?

12. Is the government aware that Professor Hambleton stated to the Ottawa Journal that he had been a communist agent for approximately 30 years and, if so, what action does the government plan to take?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. It is not considered to be in the public interest to reveal the details of the RCMP investigation into the activities of Hugh George Hambleton.

2—10. See answer to part 1.

11. The results of the investigation were provided to the Department of Justice. The Attorney General of Canada on April 25, 1980 ruled that there would be no prosecution of Mr. Hambleton.

12. See answer to part 11.

DREE—MATAPÉDIA-MATANE

Question No. 157—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion announce a DREE grant for the constituency of Matapédia—Matane after becoming minister and, if so (a) how many days after he was appointed minister was the announcement made and on what date (b) what was the amount?

2. How many other grants have been announced or are under consideration for the constituency?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows:

1. (a) On March 10, 1980, seven days after his appointment, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion announced the offer of a grant to Pic-Bois Inc., an offer accepted by the company on February 11, 1980.

(b) $84,200.

2. Six projects were under consideration.

CHIP

Question No. 159—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the CHIP application state that the grant only covers one-third of the labour costs of installing insulation if the work is done by a contractor and, if not, does the government plan to issue new applications stating that the grant will only cover work done by contractors?

2. Will the CHIP grant be paid for labour costs incurred by individuals not considered contractors and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing as follows:

1. This information is not in the present application form nor is it included in the revised version. However, this information will be provided in the related brochure.

2. CHIP grants will be paid for the labour costs charged by individuals as well as contractors, providing the invoice clearly indicates the name of the installer, his address, telephone number, details of work done, date work done, and amount received for work done.

USE OF DND AIRCRAFT—REGULATIONS

Question No. 169—Mr. Cossitt:

1. (a) What regulations are in existence in regard to the use of Department of National Defence aircraft by cabinet ministers or members of parliament (b) who is the highest individual, in each case, who must authorize its use?

2. Did the former minister of national defence issue restrictive regulations for use of departmental aircraft by cabinet ministers and members of parliament between May 22, 1979, and February 18, 1980, and, if so (a) what were the restrictions (b) are they still in force and, if not, on what date were they changed and what changes were made?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

1. (a) Travel on DND aircraft by cabinet ministers and members of parliament is controlled by the Minister of National Defence.

(b) In each case, travel by cabinet ministers or members of parliament requires authorization by the Minister of National Defence.

2. Yes.

(a) The former minister of national defence issued guidelines on travel by parliamentarians on DND aircraft. A copy of the guidelines issued August 24, 1979, is listed below.

(b) Guidelines issued 24 Aug. 79 remain in force.

August 24, 1979

To: All senators and
All members of parliament

From: The Hon. Allan McKinnon, Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs

Parliamentarian travel—DND aircraft

In keeping with the government's restraint programs and because of the many demands being placed on DND aircraft, it has been necessary to establish some guidelines concerning the use of the aircraft so as to ensure that these facilities will remain responsive to the department's needs and that maximum cost effectiveness will be maintained.

With spiralling energy costs and other constraints I have initiated some reduction in flying schedules and more restrictive travel priorities. Consistent with this, guidelines for parliamentarian travel on DND aircraft are as follows:

For international travel

(a) When members are required to travel abroad and wish to use DND facilities, requests should be made by letter to the minister advising as to the purpose of the journey including dates and place of the requirement. Travel requests normally should be made twenty-one days prior to the desired travel time.

(b) Parliamentarians and accompanying spouse may request travel for personal reasons, once only per year on these flights, and booking of space would be required twenty-one days in advance. This privilege, however, cannot be extended to families.

For travel within Canada

(a) Except in special or unforeseen circumstances, it is expected that parliamentarians normally will travel by commercial airlines on domestic flights.

(b) Dependant children within Canada may be authorized to travel on DND aircraft between the member's constituency, the family member's place of study and Ottawa, subject to there being unbooked space to accommodate the request, twenty-one days in advance of flight time. These requests should not exceed two or three per year and it is expected that the occasions will likely be at Christmas, Easter and at the start and finish of the summer recess.

Arrangements have been made within my department to reduce air travel drastically and I ask for your understanding and co-operation to ensure the best use of available flight space.

Yours sincerely,
Allan McKinnon

NATIONAL FILM BOARD GRANTS

Question No. 178—Mr. Friesen:

1. Has the National Film Board produced any film strips or any other material regarding (a) the work of museum/gallery conservators (b) conservation techniques (c) the illustration of major and minor deterioration of works on (i) paper (ii) wood (iii) stone (iv) metal (v) other manmade materials (d) cleaning processes (e) identification of problems (f) arresting techniques (g) problems caused by Canadian climate and particular to Canada which could be used by local and regional museums or galleries to help them make better use of actual visits by conservation experts and, if so, what is a description of each and on what date was it completed?

2. Are there plans to produce items of this nature in the immediate future and, if not, for what reason?

3. Has any section of the department of the Secretary of State commissioned written pamphlets, books or any other type of written documentation on any of the above mentioned subjects and, if so, what are the titles and description of each and on what dates were they published?

4. Has any section of the department awarded grants for the production of materials as outlined in part three above and, if so, what are the titles, authors, description of each item and the date of publication?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Department of the Secretary of State: 1 and 2. To be answered elsewhere. 3 and 4. No.

National Film Board

1. The multi-media studio of the National Film Board prepared some time ago—nearly ten years—an 80-frame sound slide presentation entitled "Behind the Scenes in the Archives" for the internal use of the National Archives. It shows old paintings, books, etc., being restored, cleaned and preserved. The board has not produced any further filmstrips or material since that time.

2. There are no plans to produce items of this nature in the immediate future. The NFB would be prepared to do so if commissioned by the National Museums of Canada or the Public Archives of Canada.

3 and 4. To be answered elsewhere.

National Museums

1 and 2. To be answered elsewhere.

3. The Canadian Conservation Institute, a program of the National Museums Corporation, produces a series of technical bulletins which deal with some of the problems mentioned in the question. To date, the following technical bulletins have appeared:

Technical bulletin 1.	Relative humidity: its importance, measurement and control in museums. May, 1978.
Technical bulletin 2.	Museum lighting. May, 1978.
Technical bulletin 3.	Recommended environmental monitors for museums, archives and art galleries. July, 1978.
Technical bulletin 4.	Care of musical instruments in canadian collections. December, 1978.
Technical bulletin 5.	Environmental norms for Canadian museums, art galleries and archives. November, 1979.
Technical bulletin 6.	The case of black and white photographic collections: identification processes. November, 1979.
Technical bulletin 7.	Fluorescent lamps. January, 1980.
Technical bulletin 8.	The care of wooden objects. April, 1980.

The technical bulletins are available free of charge in both French and English. It is intended to continue this series with subjects of interest to the museum/gallery conservator.

In addition to the above, conservators and conservation scientists from C.C.I. publish the results of their work in the conservation/museum literature.

4. The museum assistance program of the National Museums of Canada awarded a grant of $25,000 in 1978/79 to the University of British Columbia Museum of Anthropology in Vancouver under the special activities assistance program for a study of the current practices, problems and possible solutions in the conservation, storage and display of textiles in museums. Title, author and date of publication are not yet established.

CBC REVENUES AND DEFICITS—1977-78

Question No. 196—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write off?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

		In thousands of dollars
		1976/77	1977/78
1.	Total income (mostly commercial revenue)	98,844	96,035
	See note below.
2.	(a) Payment provided through parliamentary appropriations for capital and operating purposes	414,978*	464,829

(b) None.

(c) The Government of Canada makes no direct investment in the corporation apart from funds provided for operating and capital expenditures.

NOTE: The CBC's estimates are voted by parliament and reviewed in committee. CBC does not spend more than the combined total of what has been voted by parliament and the corporation's commercial revenues. It does not incur deficits.

* The 1976/77 fiscal year includes the 1976 Summer Olympics.

The 1977/78 fiscal year includes the wind-up costs for the 1976 Summer Olympics and the cost of the 1978 Commonwealth Games.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REVENUE—DEFICITS

Question No. 201—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits for the Canadian National Railways?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write-off?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

		(a) 1977	(b) 1978
1.	Total revenues	$2,622,568,769	$2,900,166,520
	Net income	28,018,317	136,105,251
2.	(a)

	Estimated value of grain cars owned by the Government of Canada and assigned to Canadian National	33,400,000	1,500,000
	(b)
	1977 Net increase in loans	48,825,619
	1978 Decrease in loans		31,875,817
	(c)
	1977, additional shares of 4 per cent preferred stock sold to the government	$51,448,697

In 1977, the nature of the government's investment in CN changed as a result of the recapitalization whereby $808.0 million of debt was converted to an equivalent amount of equity. Also, in 1978, the government's investment in CN was reduced by $49,477,000 as a result of taking over CN's investment in Air Canada.

In 1977 and 1978 the value of the government's investment in CN was enhanced by earnings generated and retained in those years, being in the respective amounts $28,018,317 and $108,884,201. CN also paid the government a dividend of $27,221,050 in respect of earnings in 1978.

FEED GRAINS

Question No. 209—Mr. Herbert:

Since August 1974, by year, what were the comparative volumes in bushels for each of the feed grains handled by the (a) open market (b) Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): (a) In so far as Agriculture Canada is concerned:

PROMOTION OF CANADIAN GOODS IN SPORTS

Question No. 228—Mr. Herbert:

1. What percentage of sporting goods used in Canada are processed and manufactured in Canada?

2. What steps is the government taking to promote and encourage the manufacture and use of Canadian goods in Canadian sports?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Statistics Canada and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. 54 per cent of sporting goods are manufactured in Canada.

2. The government, through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has financially assisted many Canadian sporting goods companies with grants, loans and loan guarantees. Product development and restructuring grants to improve competitiveness have been made to manufacturers of hockey sticks, ice skates, cross country skis and ski boots. Loan guarantees and direct loans have also been made to a number of other companies manufacturing these products.

In addition, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion through its Regional Development Incentive Program (RDIA) has financially assisted the establishment and expansion of over 15 firms manufacturing sporting goods.

This government assistance has contributed in establishing Canadian manufacturers as world leaders in the manufacture of hockey sticks, skates and protective equipment and as major cross country ski suppliers to the North American market.

Tariff reductions in materials and parts have also encouraged increased manufacturing of sporting goods in Canada.

DOME PETROLEUM INCENTIVES—FRONTIER INCENTIVES

Question No. 263—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did Dome Petroleum Ltd. make representations to the government concerning frontier incentives and, if so, was there a response?

2. Is the government proceeding to inventory and evaluate the northern resources and, if so, what are the results to date and when can a full report be expected?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is concerned: 1. Prior to the expiration of the frontier exploration allowance on April 1, 1980, the government received a number of representations from Dome Petroleum and other companies concerning such incentives. On April 8, 1980, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance announced that the incentive would be replaced by a program currently being developed, in part as a public response to a number of representations being received.

In so far as the Department of Finance is concerned: 1. Yes, on a number of occasions. The company's proposal were acknowledged and considered. The company was informed on April 8, 1980 that the tax incentive which expired on March 31, 1980 would be replaced with a new incentive program. The new program is currently being developed.

In so far as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is concerned: 1. Yes, Dome Petroleum Ltd. has made representations to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development seeking support for the continuation of frontier incentives. The government's response in the form of a new incentives program, has been announced by the Ministers of Energy, Mines and Resources and Finance.

2. Yes. The Northern Non-Renewable Resources base is continuously being inventoried and evaluated as a part of the ongoing departmental responsibilities. Consequently, estimates of the character and extent of the oil, gas and mineral resources are made available in a number of periodical publications and reports.

The chief publications relating to non-renewable resources are:

North of 60°, Oil and Gas Monthly Activities report

North of 60°, Oil and Gas Activities (annual)

North of 60°, Oil and Gas Technical Reports (periodic)

North of 60°, Oil and Gas Schedule of Wells (periodic)

North of 60°, Statistical Report (periodic)

North of 60°, Mines and Minerals Activities Report (annual)

North of 60°, Mineral Industry Reports (annual)

Northern Renewable Resources

The following is a listing of resources inventory programs and reports:

(1) Northern land use information series mapping project.

(2) Renewable resource inventory and analysis program in the Yukon through the Canada/Yukon Subsidiary Agreement to the Canada/Yukon General Development Agreement.

(3) Soil survey and agricultural land evaluation of selected areas in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

(4) Forest inventories of selected areas in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

(5) Eastern Arctic marine environmental studies.

(6) Canada, Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Yukon River basin report, December, 1962.

(7) Canada, Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, hydroelectric power resources of the Porcupine, Peel and Rat River Region, Yukon and Northwest Territories, April, 1965.

(8) T. Ingledow and Associates Ltd., consulting engineers, hydroelectric resources survey of the central Yukon Territory, January, 1968.

(9) T. Ingledow and Associates Ltd., power survey of the central Mackenzie district, N.W.T., January, 1969.

(10) T. Ingledow and Associates Ltd., power survey of the Liard River basin, Yukon and N.W.T., February, 1970.

(11) T. Ingledow and Associates Ltd., power survey of the Kazen, Dubawnt, Thelon and Hanbury River basins, N.W.T., March, 1970.

(13) Underwood, McLellan (1977) Ltd., power site survey Northwest Territories for the Burnside, Hood, Camsell, Back and Hayes Rivers, March, 1979.

(14) Water Quality and Stream Flow Data Collection

These are ongoing inventory programs which have been underway for several years. Reports are available from the water resoures division of the department in Hull and from the Water Survey of Canada in Hull.

WIDE FLANGE STEEL BEAMS

Question No. 264—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the present proportion of the imported supply of wide flange steel beams as a percentage of total Canadian production?

2. Did the Anti-Dumping Tribunal make a ruling in December 1977 on a complaint concerning wide flange steel beams and, if so, what was the effect of the ruling as it applies to imports, domestic production and the adequacy of supply?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Finance and Statistics Canada as follows: 1. There is only one Canadian manufacturer of wide flange steel beams. Because Statistics Canada publishes figures on the volume of imports of these products, it is not possible to express the volume as a percentage of total Canadian production without revealing that manufacturer's output. The latter information is confidential. Imports of wide flange steel beams in calendar year 1979 amounted to 149,853 (short) tons for a value of $55,476,000.

2. On December 29, 1977 the Anti-Dumping Tribunal issued a finding to the effect that dumped imports of wide flange steel shapes originating in the United Kingdom, France, Japan, South Africa, Belgium and Luxembourg had caused, were causing and were likely to cause material injury to production in Canada of like goods. That finding, which is still in force, contributed to a general improvement in the conditions affecting our domestic production of wide flange steel beams. The hon. member may recall that in this instance anti-dumping duties on imports into certain regions of Canada were remitted for a limited period following the finding. Since then domestic production of wide flange steel has increased, as have imports although more recently there has been a softening in demand.

HEALTH CARE—DRUGS

Question No. 315—Mr. Herbert:

What is the estimated percentage of the total national health care bill that is spent on drugs?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The estimated percentage of the total national health bill that was spent on drugs in 1976 was 10.5. The year 1976 is the latest for which figures are available.

The estimated data for drugs included in that percentage represent all drugs dispensed in hospitals and all drugs, prescribed and non-prescribed, sold in retail stores. The total national health bill used in the calculation is provisional. The numerator in the calculation was an estimated $1,404,112,000 of drug costs, and the denominator was an estimated $13,361,-810,000 of total health costs. A wide variety of sources was used in the calculation; Statistics Canada and the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association were the principal sources for the drug figure, while the total was based on scores of sources. Both figures are constantly being revised as later information becomes available.

PHARMACEUTICAL PRODUCTS

Question No. 316—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past ten years, what was the foreign trade balance or deficit for pharmaceutical products?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports:

Canada's balance of trade in pharmaceutical products for each of the past ten years was as follows:

Years	Imports	Domestic Exports	Balance
	($,000)	($,000)	(,000)
1970	80,918	35,605	-45,313
1971	81,596	31,489	-50,107
1972	95,578	35,745	-59,833
1973	111,369	47,874	-63,495
1974	146,851	53,385	-93,466
1975	169,947	59,179	-110,768
1976	176,585	60,276	-116,309
1977	224,320	65,166	-159,154
1978	249,648	72,714	-176,934
1979	312,638	80,653	-231,985

ANNUAL PHARMACEUTICAL SALES

Question No. 317—Mr. Herbert:

What is the latest estimate of the annual dollar volume of sales of pharmaceuticals in Canada?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: current estimates of retail sales are made by type of store rather than by commodity. Sales for pharmacies, patent medicine and cosmetics stores include many commodities other than pharmaceuticals. Also, pharmaceuticals are sold through other types of stores as well as through outlets which are not retail locations. For these reasons, the question cannot be answered as asked. However, the following information is provided:

(1) Sales of pharmacies, patent medicine and cosmetics stores—1979—$2,398,008,000.

(2) Sales of toileteries, cosmetics and drugs through department stores—1979—$404,454,000.

DONALD MATTHEWS COMMISSION

Question No. 345—Mr. Herbert:

1. Who were the members of the Donald Matthews Commission and were other persons hired to assist in the preparation of the Matthews Report?

2. What amount did each individual receive as (a) remuneration (b) expenses?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. The members and staff of the task force on Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, chaired by D. J. Matthews, were as follows:

DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION

Question No. 380—Mr. Herbert:

1. Which countries having populations over ten million are not presently diplomatically recognized by Canada?

2. In each case in which trade between Canada and these countries exceeds $10 million annually, what was the value of (a) export to (b) imports from, in 1978?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of External Affairs and Statistics Canada as follows:

1. Taiwan (Formosa)

Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea (North Korea)

2. (a) In 1978, exports to Taiwan amounted to $103,211,-000. Exports to North Korea did not exceed $10 million.

(b) In 1978, imports from Taiwan were $397,186,000. For the same year, imports from North Korea did not exceed $10 million.

NATIVE ADULT TRAINING

Question No. 472—Mr. Orlikow:

For the years (a) 1976-77 (b) 1977-78 (c) 1978-79, what amount was spent on adult training programmes for (i) Native people (ii) the rest of the population in the province of Manitoba?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Comprehensive statistics, which would provide information on the amounts spent on adult training programs for all native people, including status Indians, non-status Indians, Métis and Inuit were not compiled before April 1, 1979. However, information on the amounts spent for training courses purchased for status Indians on reserves is available and is as follows:

			(i) Status Indians on Reserves	(ii) Rest of Population
(a)	1976/77	Institutional (CMTP)	$ 924,105	$18,737,920
		Industrial (CMITP)	350,797	1,551,136

		Industrial (CMITP)	184,263	2,762,650

*The payment of U.I. benefits, rather than training allowances, to eligible trainees began in the 1978/79 fiscal year. Because of this, and the fact that U.I. payments to native trainees cannot be specifically identified, comparison with previous years is not accurate.

Question No. 473—Mr. Orlikow:

*The payment of UI benefits, rather than training allowances, to eligible trainees began in the 1978/79 fiscal year. Because of this, and the fact that UI payments to native trainees cannot be specifically identified, comparison with previous years is not accurate.

Question No. 478—Mr. Orlikow:

For the years (a) 1976-77 (b) 1977-78 (c) 1978-79, what amount was spent on adult training programs for (i) native people (ii) the rest of the population in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Comprehensive statistics, which would provide information on the amounts spent on adult training programs for all native people, including status Indians, non-status Indians, Metis and Inuit were not compiled before April 1, 1979. However, information on the amounts spent for training courses purchased for status Indians on reserves is available and is as follows:

			(i) Status Indians on Reserves	(ii) Rest of Population
(a)	1976/77	Institutional (CMTP)	$1,386,227	$128,730,384
		Industrial (CMITP)	86,606	13,724,492

(c)	1978/79	Institutional (CMTP)*	1,198,521	112,911,838
		Industrial (CMITP)	8,957	21,499,008

*The payment of UI benefits, rather than training allowances, to eligible trainees began in the 1978/79 fiscal year. Because of this, and the fact that UI payments to native trainees cannot be specifically identified, comparison with previous years is not accurate.

Question No. 479—Mr. Orlikow:

For the years (a) 1976-77 (b) 1977-78 (c) 1978-79, what amount was spent on adult training programs for (i) native people (ii) the rest of the population in the province of Newfoundland?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The expression native people includes status Indians, non-status Indians, Metis and Inuit. As the status of Newfoundland native people has not yet been determined in accordance with the Indian Act, they are still considered non-status.

The estimated amounts spent for each year specified are as follows:

			(i) Status Indians on Reserves	(ii) Rest of Population
(a)	1976/77	Institutional (CMTP)	$ 69,464	$20,559,218
		Industrial (CMITP)	82,717	1,820,430

(c)	1978/79	Institutional (CMTP)*	42,967	16,625,151
		Industrial (CMITP)	—	2,897,734

*The payment of UI benefits, rather than training allowances, to eligible trainees began in the 1978/79 fiscal year. Because of this, and the fact that UI payments to native trainees cannot be specifically identified, comparison with previous years is not accurate.

Question No. 480—Mr. Orlikow:

For the years (a) 1976-77 (b) 1977-78 (c) 1978-79, what amount was spent on adult training programs for (i) native people (ii) the rest of the population in the province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Comprehensive statistics, which would provide information on the amounts spent on adult training programs for all native people, including status Indians, non-status Indians, Metis and Inuit were not compiled before April 1, 1979. However, information on the amounts spent for training courses purchased for status Indians on reserves is available and is as follows:

Question No. 531—Mr. Orlikow:

For the years (a) 1976-77 (b) 1977-78 (c) 1978-79, what was the (i) hospitalization rate (ii) comparative rate for hospitalization (iii) average time spent in hospital as compared to the rest of the population in the province of Prince Edward Island for status Indians?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): See chart below for hospitalization rates by province for the calendar year 1976 and fiscal years 1977-78 and 1978-79.

NOTE: —Apart from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, there are no hospitalization rates available for status Indians as a separate group.

Statistics Canada began collecting hospitalization rates on a fiscal year basis as of 1977-78.

The statistics for the Canadian population as a whole do not include a number of medical services, e.g. special medical care facilities, community health care centres and mental health. Basically they have taken into account all services covered under provincial hospital plans, e.g. general hospitals, extended care, rehabilitation and specialty hospitals such as neurological and cardiology institutes.

1. Separate rates for the status Indian population are not available.
2. Province of Ontario population source: ministry of treasury, economics and inter-governmental affairs, population estimate for counties, June 1, 1977, (8,373,500).
3. Calendar year 1977.
4. Saskatchewan is reporting hospitalization rates as separations per 1000 population.
5. The information is not readily available from Alberta department of hospitals and medical care. The accuracy of any information that can be provided is highly questionable.
6. 1975 data on status Indian rates are not available.
7. Fiscal year 1976-77 represented.
8. As of this date, Admissions figures are not yet available. Separation rates, which are preliminary to admission figures are quoted here. The differences are usually minimal.
9. Data on N.W.T. incomplete at present.
10. Rates are high due to inclusion of some psychiatric extended care facilities.

CBC—MR. MARK STAROWICZ

Question No. 581—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was CBC producer Mark Starowicz appointed to a senior position with the television news on or about January 1, 1980 and (a) if so (i) what are his qualifications for the position (ii) what are the names and job designations of all those recommending him for such a position (b) if not, is he being considered?

2. Is the government aware as to whether or not security records show that he consorted with Soviet journalist and KGB officer Konstantin Geyvendov and that such facts have been confirmed in the Ontario legislature by the attorney general and, if so, in what way can the government justify the appointment of Mr. Starowicz to a position which deals with the dissemination of news to the Canadian people when he has been reported to have a record of Communist associations?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned:

1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. See reply to question No. 105 answered this day.

In so far as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is concerned: the CBC has announced that Mark Starowicz will be joining the English television network's current affairs department and will be in charge of development of the new program which will follow "The National" when it moves to 10 p.m.

(a) and (b). The circumstances of CBC employees' employment and assignments are among those details of internal management and administration which parliament has not, as a matter of custom, required the CBC to provide. The background to this custom was explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975.

2. First part: to be answered elsewhere.

Second part: The CBC was established as a Crown corporation for the purpose of producing and broadcasting, independently of political or commercial interference, programs for a national broadcasting service. Within its terms of reference the Corporation has the sole right and responsibility for hiring and work assignments.

ANTIBIOTICS

Question No. 597—Mr. Mitges:

What is the Department of National Health and Welfare's policy regarding new antibiotics used for human medication and their use for disease prevention and/or growth promotants in animals?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Before new antibiotics may be sold in Canada, proof of their safety and efficacy must be established. If the antibiotic is used in human therapy, the results of clinical trials are required as part of a submission before the granting of a notice of compliance. If used in veterinary medicine for disease prevention, the submission requires proof of all claims. The new antibiotic could not be sold for growth promotion if it is useful in human therapy.

FIELD CROP ASSISTANCE

Question No. 598—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1977, what amount was paid to farmers in New Brunswick to assist with field crops?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Since April 1, 1977, assistance to farmers in New Brunswick is as follows: $7,475,496 was paid by the Agricultural Stabilization Board. $3,917,600 in repayable advances under the Advance Payments for Crops Program. The repayable advances incurred a cost of $134,360 to the department in interest charges which are not required for recovery from the producers. $31,086 in contributions to premiums under the Crop Insurance Program. $54,931 was provided under the Fruit and Vegetable Storage Construction Financial Assistance Program.

FRUIT FARMING ASSISTANCE

Question No. 601—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1977, what amount was paid to farmers in New Brunswick to assist with fruit farming?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): A total of $2,525.59 was paid by the Agricultural Stabilization Board to farmers in New Brunswick to assist with fruit farming.

HEALTH AND WELFARE (LAWYERS ON STAFF)

Question No. 614—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There is one lawyer employed on staff in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

In addition, there are five lawyers seconded to this department from the Department of Justice.

HOUSING FOR NATIVE PEOPLE

Question No. 651—Mr. Howie:

From January 1, 1978, what amount was (a) loaned (b) granted for new housing units for native people in New Brunswick?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: (a) Under the Rural and Native Housing Program, loans totalling $10,908,000 have been committed for new housing units in New Brunswick between January 1, 1978, and April 30, 1980. This amount represents the federal government's 75 per cent share of capital costs, and does not include the provincial government's 25 per cent share.

(b) No grants are provided for the construction of new housing under the Rural and Native Housing Program.

NOTE: The above figures represent housing delivered to both native and non-native clients in rural areas.

Question No. 652—Mr. Howie:

From January 1, 1978, how many new units of housing have been constructed for native people in New Brunswick?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: a total of 367 new housing units have been constructed/committed in New Brunswick under the Rural and Native Housing Program during the period January 1, 1978, and April 30, 1980. Approximately 110 units were delivered specifically to native clients.

Question No. 653—Mr. Howie:

From January 1, 1978, how many existing housing units for native people in New Brunswick have been repaired or improved by CMHC funding?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: under the Rural Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program (Rural RRAP), 3,689 units have been rehabilitated in New Brunswick between January 1, 1978, and April 30, 1980. A further 55 units on-reserve in New Brunswick have been rehabilitated during the same period. Apart from those 55 units on-reserve, no breakdown of the 3,689 Rural RRAP units, as to native/non-native clients serviced by the program, is available.

In addition, approximately 30 units have been improved under the Emergency Repair Program in New Brunswick since January 1, 1978.

Question No. 654—Mr. Howie:

From January 1, 1978, what amount was (a) loaned (b) granted for the repair or improvement of existing housing accommodation for native people in New Brunswick?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing as follows:

(a) Under the Rural Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program (Rural RRAP), $15,897,000 has been committed in New Brunswick between January 1, 1978 and April 30, 1980. During the same period $232,000 has been committed for on-reserve RRAP in New Brunswick.

NOTE: Under the provisions of Rural RRAP, a certain amount of the loan provided to a client may be forgiven, up to a maximum of $3,750, depending on the client's adjusted income. Latest figures available, covering the period January

1, 1978, to December 31, 1979, indicate a total forgiveness of $8,981,695 for Rural RRAP and approximately $211,656 under on-reserve RRAP for the same period.

(b) Under the Emergency Repair Program, $35,000 was granted to New Brunswick during 1978 for the improvement of existing housing. During 1979, $15,000 was allocated to New Brunswick, however these funds were not used. For 1980, $15,000 has been allocated to New Brunswick but there is no indication yet as to whether these funds will be used.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Question No. 664—Mr. Howie:

Does the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, in investigating applications submitted under the DREE program for assistance, make allowance for facilities to undertake research and development projects and, if so, since December 1978 to date, how many applications for assistance from the Atlantic region have included specifications for research and development facilities?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: the Regional Development Incentives Act (RDIA) enables the department to offer incentive grants to eligible manufacturing and processing operations. Projects which are solely of a research and development nature are not eligible for RDIA incentive grants but may be eligible for a loan guarantee under RDIA. No applications for loan guarantees for research and development facilities have been received in the Atlantic region since December, 1978.

Some applications for RDIA incentive grants could provide for research and development facilities as an integral part of the manufacturing or processing operation. The department does not compile statistics on applications involving an element of research and development.

SISMANS OF CANADA LTD.—GRANTS

Question No. 671—Mr. Nystrom:

In the fiscal year 1979-80, did Sismans of Canada Ltd. apply for federal grants and, if so (a) on what dates (b) on what dates were they approved and (i) in what amounts (ii) what amounts have been disbursed to date?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Department of Employment and Immigration are concerned: no. However, Sismans of Canada applied for contributions under the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program.

(a) Date of application	(b) Date of approval	(i) Amount of application	(ii) Amount disbursed
(1) October 27, 1978	December 15, 1978	$1,797.00	$ 148.79
(2) August 10, 1979	August 24,1979	$1,464.00	$1,262,40
(3) August 10, 1979	August 24, 1979	$2,709.00	$1,927.80
(4) October 29, 1979	December 3, 1979	$2,759.00	$1,883.30

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: in the fiscal year 1979/80, Sismans of Canada Ltd. did not apply for federal grants under the department's programs.

In 1977, however, the company applied for and received a grant of $14,616 for consulting assistance to conduct an operational audit under the Footwear and Tanning Industries Adjustment Program. The grant was disbursed in the fiscal year 1978/79.

In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned: No.

CARIBOU AND REINDEER ANTLER EXPORTS

Question No. 682—Mr. Nickerson:

What was the quantity and value of caribou and reindeer antler exports during the last year for which figures are available and was the material exported in the raw or in processed form?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports the following: separate statistics are not compiled by Statistics Canada on exports of caribou and reindeer antlers. When in the raw, all exports shipments are recorded with a wide assortment of similar products in a general classification entitled "Crude animal and fish products, inedible, not elsewhere specified". If processed or mounted, shipments are also recorded in a basket class "Antiques and collectors' items, not elsewhere specified" and separate figures are not available.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION CONTRACTS

Question No. 702—Mr. Clarke:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, how many contracts were let by the Department of Public Works for professional services, to persons who at any time within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission?

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the National Capital Region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Public Works Canada records do not indicate whether or not persons to whom contracts are let were previously employed by the Public Service Commission. We do, however, have information on former Public Works Canada employees who have been contracted as consultants.

1. Public Works Canada let eight consultant contracts to former employees.

2. The duration of the contracts was as follows:

(a) Less than one year—six

(b) One—Two years—two

(c) Over two years—None

3. There were two contracts let outside the National Capital Region.

4. Total expenditures for these contracts were $42,603.00.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION CONTRACTS

Question No. 702—Mr. Clarke:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, how many contracts were let by the Department of Employment and Immigration for professional services, to persons who at any time within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission?

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the National Capital Region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Fifteen.

2. (a) twelve

(b) one

(c) two

3. Eight.

4. $97,780.98.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE CONTRACTS

Question No. 704—Mr. Clarke:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, how many contracts were let by the Department of National Health and Welfare for professional services, to persons who at any time within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission?

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the National Capital Region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, eleven contracts were let for professional services, to persons who within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission.

2. Contract (a) less than one year—five

(b) for one to two years—six

(c) over two years—none

3. The number of contracts let outside the National Capital Region was four.

4. Total cost of such contracts—$112,282.

MR. DOUGLAS COOPER

Question No. 726—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is, or was, Douglas Cooper a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, if so (a) what ranks has he held and what is his present rank (b) where is he stationed at the present time and how long has he been there (c) what are his duties (d) did he at any time testify at the McDonald Commission and, if so (i) was it in camera (ii) was it in public (iii) on what date?

2. Was Douglas Cooper associated with a group known as the National Criminal Investigation Bureau and, if so (a) what were the duties of this bureau (b) was he its head (c) did it ever make investigations of politicians or high ranking public servants and, if so, who authorized the investigations?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. Yes.

(a) Constable, corporal, sergeant, staff sergeant, sub-inspector and present rank is inspector.

(b) Ottawa; 3 years, 8 months.

(c) Officer in charge security systems branch, protective policing directorate, RCMP "HQ" division.

(d) No.

(i to iii) Not applicable.

2. No.

(a, b, and c) Not applicable.

CN HOTELS DIVISION

Question No. 733—Mr. Clarke:

1. With reference to the Canadian National Railways annual report for 1979 and with particular reference to the detailed report of the CN hotels division, is the division losing an increasing amount of money every year and, if so, considering that there are many other private hotel chains, could the corporation state what rationale they have for continuing in the hotel business?

2. Has the corporation made any projections as to the effect on its earnings of the selling of the hotels division to the private sector and, if so, what are the details of such plans?

3. What is the total market value of all property held by the division?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. The apparent worsening of financing results in 1979 reflected in part write-offs associated with the sale of the Hotel Fort Garry, computer system development costs and disposals of obsolete equipment. Exclusive of these non-recurring items, hotel income for 1979 would show a reasonable improvement.

   While profits dropped significantly in 1976 and 1977 (due principally to an over-supply of hotel accommodation in Vancouver and Montreal), the recent record of CN hotels is generally good and prospects for a stronger financial performance are good.

2. No projections have been made recently as to the effect of disposing of the total hotel interests to the private sector. Corporate planning contemplates that CN will remain in the hotel business and that first-class standards of accommodation can be maintained with an acceptable rate of return.

3. There has been no over-all appraisal of the market values of the hotel properties. The book value at the end of 1979 was $67 million.

   In the final analysis, the market value will reflect annual cash flows and the potential for capital appreciation. On that basis, the market value of the properties held by the division will be significantly higher than the book value mentioned.

FUNDY NATIONAL PARK—BILINGUALISM

Question No. 737—Mr. Corbett:

1. Have any persons lost their jobs for not being bilingual in Fundy National Park since it opened and, if so (a) how many (b) what positions did they hold?

2. Are the employees of the park provided with French language training facilities and, if not, for what reason?

3. If former unilingual employees were willing to take French language training would they be re-instated in their positions and, if not, for what reason?

4. (a) How many bilingual persons have been employed by the park who were not previously residents of the Alma-Hillsborough area before their employment in the park (b) what positions do they hold?

5. Was it a condition of the establishment of the park that local residents and those who lost their property through expropriation would be provided with the first opportunity of employment within the park?

6. What positions in the park require a bilingual status?

7. Do the bilingual employees of the park receive the bilingual bonus and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. No.

2. Employees qualify for training by virtue of the language identification of their positions under the Treasury Board guidelines. The full-time bilingual indeterminate positions qualify (non-imperative) if they have language training entitlement. Employees other than indeterminate do not qualify for language training at public expense.

3. Not applicable.

4. (a) The two full-time bilingual positions were filled by non-local residents, one appointed in 1975 and the other in 1978. Term bilingual employees are hired each year. Of the 17 term bilingual employees hired for the 1980 season, 11 were not residents of Alma-Hillsborough area before employment in the park.

(b)

Assistant chief park interpreter	(1)
Visitor services officer	(1)
Park attendants—information	(6)
Park attendants—campground	(6)
Park patrolmen	(2)
Term interpreters	(3)
	19

5. No.

6. See 4 (b).

7. Only persons employed in bilingual positions for more than six months are eligible for the bilingual bonus (T.B. Directive); therefore only two positions in Fundy National Park qualify. At the present, only one employee receives the bonus. The second position is occupied by a person whose linguistic qualifications are currently under review.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHING INDUSTRY

Question No. 742—Mr. Cyr:

Within the framework of the agreement signed on October 15, 1974 between the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the government of Newfoundland concerning the development of the fishing industry (a) what were the construction costs of the loading docks, wharves and other facilities for the docking of fishing boats (b) regarding certain works, did the department reimburse the province's share and, if so, what amount and percentage of the cost does this represent?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows:

(a) $4,416,500.

(b) No. Under the Canada/Newfoundland Inshore Fisheries Development subsidiary agreement, the department pays 90 per cent of project costs and the province pays the remaining 10 per cent.

DIAND—CONSULTANTS UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 743—Mr. Shields:

Since August 1, 1978, how many (a) administrative (b) policy consultants were under contract to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and/or any boards, commissions or corporations reporting to the department and, in each case, what amount was paid to them?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Consultants under contract to DIAND.

(a) and (b) Department: 96 contracts—Total Cost—$892,406.42

N.C.P.C.: 2 contracts—Total Cost—$ 44,271.00.

The above relates to management consultants as it was not possible to identify administrative or policy consultants per se.

IMITATION CHEESE

Question No. 773—Mr. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the government, is imitation cheese or blends in the butter industry being sold in Canada and, if so (a) will the government take action to put an end to such sales (b) does it consider this a threat to the dairy industry?

2. Does the government have plans to take action in this field and, if so, what are they?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture):

1. (i) Imitation cheese is not being sold in Canada.

(ii) Blends of margarine and butter have been sold for some time in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan.

(a) (i) Not applicable.

(ii) The manufacture and sale of such products is within the purview of the individual provinces.

(b) (i) The introduction of imitation cheese could adversely affect the market for mozzarella cheese, and have other broader and long-term effects.

(ii) Their sales have helped firms increase or maintain their market for butterfat.

2. (i) The government has been making a continuous study of this product and has served as a source of information to the provinces and other interested parties.

(ii) To lessen consumer confusion and in the interest of orderly marketing, Agriculture Canada has suggested a standard which could be subscribed to by provinces. No further action is anticipated at this time.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

Question No. 774—Mr. Cossitt:

Does the Department of National Health and Welfare consider milk or any other dairy product to be a health hazard and does it have any evidence that establishes beyond a doubt that cholesterol contained therein is harmful to arteries and, if not, is it prepared to support the dairy industry by clarifying the subject to the general public?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Department of National Health and Welfare does not consider milk or any other dairy product to be a health hazard. There is no evidence to establish beyond a doubt that cholesterol in milk or other dairy products is harmful to arteries. Based on the available evidence, the Canada Food Guide, published by this department, advises consumption of milk and dairy products as an integral part of a balanced diet.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—STUDY OF RADON GASES

Question No. 786—Mr. de Jong:

Did the Department of National Health and Welfare conduct a study of radon gases in homes and buildings across Canada and, if so, on what date will the minister make such information available to the public?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, a study was conducted during the summers of 1977 and 1978. A news release was published by the department on January 30, 1978. The results of the study are in press in the open scientific literature. A continuation of the study is planned for 1980 at five centres in the prairie provinces and results will be published when available.

CBC FACILITY IN REGINA

Question No. 794—Mr. de Jong:

1. What is the status of the planned CBC facility in Regina at this time?
2. Will the facility be built and, if so, what is the timing on the project?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. The CBC's Regina consolidation project on the planed Wascana site will proceed after the revision of operations requirements, updating of cost estimates and of the schedule.

2. Yes. Tender calls are expected around October of this year. The operational target date is set for approximately early 1984.

NUTRITIONAL SCHOOL LUNCH PROGRAM

Question No. 797—Mr. de Jong:

Were studies undertaken by the Department of National Health and Welfare to study the possibility of introducing a nutritional school lunch program across Canada and, if so, will the studies be made public?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There have been no specific studies by the Department of Natioanl Health and Welfare on the possibility of introducing nutritional school lunch programs across the country. There has, however, been collaborative action with the provinces on this issue. In 1974, a review of existing school lunch programs was undertaken through the federal-provincial subcommittee on nutrition. As a result of the review, a set of "Guidelines for School Food Programs in Canada" was produced in 1976 which was designed to support the efforts of local communities to improve school food services. The guidelines have been distributed to many groups. At the same time provincial departments of health, local school boards, and health units have taken initiatives to provide nutritious foods in conjunction with nutrition education programs. The Department of National Health and Welfare has provided support to two provincial studies which have evaluated the effects of school lunch programs:

(1) The National Health Research and Development Program provided financial support to the home economics department, University of Prince Edward Island, for their study on "Adolescents and Their Food: changes through nutrition education and school lunch". Information on the study is available from the home economics department of University of Prince Edward Island.

(2) The Health protection branch co-operated with community health services, Alberta social services and community health, in a study on "Evaluation of a School Lunch Program in northern Alberta, 1974-1976". Information on the study is available from community health services.

PONCEAU SX AND OTHER COLOURING AGENTS

Question No. 801—Mr. de Jong:

1. Does the Department of National Health and Welfare plan to review the decision to allow the use of Ponceau SX as a dye in foods?

2. Have studies been done by the department in relation to food dyes and, if so, will the Minister release such studies?

3. What is a list of all coloring agents permitted for use in foods, cosmetics and drugs in Canada?

4. Does the government plan to ban the use of Ponceau SX as a dye in foods?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Department of National Health and Welfare continuously reviews the use of food colours as new data become available. The use of Ponceau SX was last reviewed in 1978. The data available at that time did not warrant removal of this food colour from the Food and Drug Regulations in view of its restricted use. There is no new evidence indicating a potential hazard.

2. Yes. Some in-house studies on food colours were conducted and the department continually reviews all new scientific research published in the world literature. The results of the in-house studies are available as publications in the scientific literature.

3. A list of colouring agents that are permitted in foods in Canada is found in the Food and Drug Regulations, division B.16, table III. (Please see list below) A list of permitted colouring agents in drugs and cosmetics is being developed.

4. The data available at this time do not justify a ban on the use of Ponceau SX as permitted under the Food and Drug Regulations. Should new data indicating that the use of Ponceau SX as currently permitted poses a health hazard, the government would take appropriate action, including a ban, if necessary. It should be noted that the use of Ponceau SX is restricted to 150 parts per million in fruit peel, glacé fruits and maraschino cherries only.

TOXIC WASTE SITES

Question No. 804—Mr. de Jong:

1. Did the Department of the Environment undertake a study in Canada similar to the United States Environmental Protection Agency study which recently disclosed that there are over 32,000 toxic waste sites scattered across the USA, more that 800 of which pose "significant imminent hazards" to public health and, if so, how many toxic waste sites were found and what are their locations?

2. How many of the sites are considered to be of a significant imminent hazard to public health?

3. Has any government action been taken to protect Canada's health, now and in the future and, if so, what is such action?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. No. In Canada, such inventories are being undertaken by the responsible provincial departments. However, Environment Canada is following closely provincial progress in locating and assessing existing and abandoned disposal sites. The department is also co-operatively engaged with the Atlantic and the western provinces in studies which are addressing the problems of existing sites and of finding sites for new regional disposal facilities.

2. As far as is known, there are no sites discovered which pose a significant imminent hazard to public health.

3. In the two federal/provincial co-operative studies mentioned above, abandoned and existing sites have been identified in the Atlantic provinces and problems associated with existing sites in western Canada have been documented. Ontario and Quebec are investigating and assessing abandoned sites in their jurisdiction. The federal government is also active in areas of national concern such as compiling a Canada-wide inventory of sources of hazardous wastes, developing a definition of "hazardous waste" for identifying wastes to be controlled, and, a manifest system, through the Transport of Dangerous Goods Act, for controlling interprovincial and international movements, encouraging technology development and developing guidelines for design and operation of facilities to establish uniform basic standards for hazardous waste management across Canada.

MARIJUANA STUDIES

Question No. 812—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1975, what amount was spent by all departments and agencies on studies related to marijuana?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Transport Canada advises as follows: $70,600.

MARIJUANA STUDIES

Question No. 813—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1975, what amount was spent on studies related to marijuana by the Solicitor General's Department?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): In so far as the Ministry of the Solicitor General is concerned: $4,900.

Question No. 814—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1975, what amount was spent on studies related to marijuana by the Department of National Revenue?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): The department has not carried out any studies per se relating to marijuana. The customs and excise division has conducted a number of data research projects concerning seizures in narcotics, which included marijuana. It would, however, be impossible to isolate the costs of the marijuana aspects of these studies.

BANK OF CANADA

Question No. 834—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1978, what amount was spent on interior landscaping by the Bank of Canada and on what projects?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Between January 1, 1978, and April 30, 1980, the amount spent by the Bank of Canada on interior landscaping was $153.9 thousand for capital items which were included in the budget for the Bank of Canada's head office project and $72.9 thousand was expended for maintenance services.

ATLANTIC COAST OIL DRILLING

Question No. 837—Mr. Howie:

From January 1, 1978 to date, how many drillings were carried out off the Atlantic coast in search of oil pools?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: since January 1, 1978, 17 wells have been drilled offshore Canada's east coast including Davis Strait. In addition one well that was in the process of being drilled on January 1, 1978 was finished and three are currently being drilled but have not yet reached their prognosed total depth.

LETTER CARRIERS

Question No. 841—Mr. Howie:

On December 1 (a) 1978 (b) 1979, how many (i) permanent (ii) casual letter carriers were employed by the Post Office Department at Fredericton, New Brunswick?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General):

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS LOCATED IN SIMCOE SOUTH

Question No. 852—Mr. Stewart:

Are any government departments situated in the constituency of Simcoe South and, if so (a) which ones (b) in what locations (c) what is the total square feet of office space occupied by each (d) what is the rent per square foot for office space?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works and National Defence as follows:

The following government departments are situated in the constituency of Simcoe South:

(a) Department	(b) Location	(c) sq. metres	(d)*rent per m^2

RIO SAN LORENZO

Question No. 856—Mr. Crouse:

1. Did CIDA purchase the vessel Rio San Lorenzo and, if so (a) where (b) on what date (c) from whom?

2. In what location, on what date and at what cost was the vessel originally built?

3. Were modifications or repairs effected to the vessel and, if so (a) on what dates (b) what was the nature of the modification or repairs and what was the cost?

4. Were tenders called for the (a) original acquisition (b) repairs and modifications?

5. What agreement, if any, was entered into by CIDA with the government of Columbia relative to the delivery of the vessel and the manner in which it would be used or managed once delivered and did the agreement terminate and, if so, on what date and for what reason?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canadian International Development Agency and the Department of Supply and Services as follows:

1. The fishing vessel Rio San Lorenzo (Gulf Guard) was purchased by the Department of Supply and Services acting on behalf of CIDA on December 12, 1973. The supplier was Breton Trawlers Limited of North Sydney, Nova Scotia.

2. The vessel was originally built by Georgetown Shipyard, Prince Edward Island in 1964. The original construction cost is not known.

3. No data is available on repairs or modifications, if any, made prior to the purchase of the vessel by D.S.S.

Since 1974, the following work was carried out:

1974-75: Repairs, conversion to multipurpose fisheries training vessel. Contract also covered safekeeping and later stability tests. Total cost was $405,843. Shipyard: Breton Industrial and Marine Ltd., Port Hawkesbury, N.S.

1977-78: Repairs, spare parts and supply and installation of fishing gear; safekeeping. Total cost $371,026. Shipyard: North Sydney Marine Railway Co. Ltd., North Sydney, N.S.

1978-79: Repairs after departure attempts and safekeeping. Cost: $70,619. Shipyard: Shelburne Marine Ltd., Shelburne, N.S.

4. (a) Tenders were not called for the original acquisition. CIDA and its consultant Central Design and Drafting Ltd. conducted a search to identify a list of suitable trawlers. DSS technical services division inspected each vessel identified, finding the Gulf Guard to be the most suitable of those identified.

(b) (i) Tenders were invited from 11 shipyards considered capable of performing the conversion and refit work and three only responded, i.e. Breton Industrial and Marine, Port Hawkesbury, N.S., North Sydney Marine Railway Co. Ltd., North Sydney, N.S., and Ferguson Industries Limited, Pictou, Nova Scotia.

(ii) Tenders were not called for the repairs and associated work carried out at North Sydney Marine Railway Co., North Sydney, N.S. because the vessel was not operational, and the work was done in the only ice-free port in the area.

(iii) On completion of the work at North Sydney, D.S.S. obtained for CIDA a certificate of seaworthiness and officially handed the vessel over to CIDA on September 21, 1978.

The contracts with Shelburne Marine Ltd. were issued under CIDA's authority for immediate operational needs and because of the emergency procedures, no tender was issued.

5. The Government of Canada concluded with the government of Colombia an administrative agreement for a professional training program in nautical fisheries. The first agreement was signed in October, 1974 followed by a second agreement in January, 1977. These agreements included the donation by Canada of a fisheries training vessel.

As an annex to the agreements, a plan of operation was prepared in draft form by CIDA. It included the detailed utilization of the training vessel and the modalities of the transfer of the vessel to the Colombian authorities. In June 1979, CIDA informed Colombia that it would not provide the training vessel because of the technical problems. A new version of the plan of operation was signed with Colombia in March, 1980 which excluded all references to the training vessel.

PUBLIC ARCHIVES

Question No. 877—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the government intend to move part of the Public Archives to Hull, Quebec and, if so, what are all the details?

2. Was previous information given that any such move was required for the purpose of more space and, if so, has the government considered using any vacant space not being used now or in the future by the Department of Veterans Affairs located across from the Public Archives on Wellington Street, Ottawa, and would it be government policy to consider such an approach less costly to the taxpayer and more convenient because of close location to persons making use of the Archives?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, the government has approved moving part of the Public Archives to Place du Portage IV, Hull, Québec. See question No. 13 answered July 16, 1980.

2. Yes, consideration was given to the space in the East Memorial Building on Wellington Street across from the Public Archives. This was rejected because of the age of the building and Public Archives' need for environment control. See question No. 13 tabled July 16, 1980.

MRS. GILBERTE PROTEAU

Question No. 878—Mr. Epp:

1. Is Mrs. Gilberte Proteau, President of the Société franco-manitobaine, employed in the Public Service and, if so, what (a) is her (i) position (ii) classification (iii) salary (b) are her duties?

2. For each year 1972 to 1980, did the Société receive funds from the government and, if so, what were they?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Public Service Commission and the Department of the Secretary of State are concerned:

1. (a) (i) Mrs. Gilberte Proteau is a regional officer with the office of the Commissioner of Official Languages in Winnipeg.

(ii) She is a PM-5.

(iii) The salary range for a PM-5 is $25,500-$28,756.

(b) Summary of Duties:

Under the direction of the representative of the commissioner in Winnipeg, receives complaints from civil servants and the general public, carries out investigations, meets with the public and with private organizations to inform them about the objectives of the office of the commissioner, gathers information concerning federal departments and agencies for the special studies branch, represents the office of the commissioner in the region, works with groups interested in the field of official languages.

2. Under the Official Language Minority Groups Program:

Fiscal Year	Amount
1971-1972	$128,940
1972-1973	$152,000
1973-1974	$137,000
1974-1975	$171,000
1975-1976	$176,500
1976-1977	$188,925
1977-1978	$280,000
1978-1979	$397,490
1979-1980	$457,880

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—TRAVEL EXPENSES

Question No. 885—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In each of the past five years, was there a noticeable increase in the amount of travelling expenses on the part of employees of the Department of Employment and Immigration during the month of March and, if so, in each year, what was the total of all travelling expenses for the (a) month of March (b) five years?

2. Were any instructions issued verbally or otherwise to employees to use surplus money allotted for travel in the budget before the end of the March 31 fiscal year?

3. For the same years, how many persons in the month of March were on travel status from headquarters and what were their names, job designations and all the reasons that it was necessary for such persons to travel, including the cost of each trip?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. (a) and (b)

March 1978-79—$1,023,488.18

March 1979-80—$1,165,512.16

The information required to reply for the three fiscal years preceding the above is not readily available.

The above figures reflect total travel expenditures for the month of March as they appear on computer printouts. These figures preclude March travel where the claims were processed in April only. The figure may include January and February travel where the claims were processed in March.

2. No.

3. The information requested is not readily available. Files are kept in such a way that to provide an accurate reply in its entirety would entail a lengthy and costly manual examination of travel files and ledgers for each employee in the last five years. The cost in manpower and time to undertake such a large amount of work would be exorbitant.

UIC—COMPUTER TERMINALS—FRAUD

Question No. 888—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Since the placing on the order paper of question No. 1,327, fourth session of the Thirtieth Parliament, by the hon. member for Leeds, concerning the possibility of ways of defrauding the Unemployment Insurance Commission by the operation of certain terminal computers installed in the Ottawa area, did Mr. J. L. Manion, former deputy minister of the Department of Employment and Immigration, take any specific action?

2. Did he send a team of investigators to the Ottawa West office of the commission at Baseline and Merivale Roads and, if so (a) for what purpose and was one of the reasons to determine the easiness or otherwise of committing fraud with terminal computers (b) on what date did he give such an order (c) on what date did the investigators begin their work (d) was the investigation completed and, if so (i) on what date (ii) will the details be made public and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Certain safeguards have been set up to prevent fraud against the unemployment insurance fund by the operation of computer terminals installed in the Ottawa area. Mr. J. L. Manion, former chairman of the employment and immigration commission, directed that safeguards against computer fraud be developed.

CANADIAN BUILDINGS

Question No. 889—Mr. Flis:

How many major Canadian buildings paid for wholly from public funds were built in 1979 and how many contracts were issued to Canadian and foreign (a) architects (b) engineers (c) designers?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as Public Works Canada is concerned:

Major Canadian buildings paid for wholly from public funds completed in 1979/80—22.

Contracts issued to Canadian

(a) architects—83

(b) engineers—163

(c) designers—6

Contracts issued to foreign (outside Canada)

(a) architects—none

(b) engineers—none

(c) designers—none

In so far as Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is concerned:

1979/80—Six

(a) None

(b) Three contracts were issued to Canadian engineering companies

(c) None

In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned:

Five

(1) Paris Chancery Addition (under construction)

(2) Mexico Chancery (under construction)

(3) Copenhagen Chancery

(4) Bogota Chancery (under construction)

(5) Georgetown Chancery (under construction)

(a) Architects

(1) Fiset Miler Vinois Architects (Canadian)

(2) E.J. Gaboury and Associates (Canadian)

(3) Per Gents, Architects (foreign)

(4) L. Largacha and I. Caro, Architects (foreign)

(5) George Henry and Associates (foreign)

(b) Engineers

(3) Wood Banani Engineers (Canadian)

(c) Designers

None

In so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned:

Four buildings exceeding $1M. in value were completed in 1979/80.

(a), (b) and (c). Four contracts, all engineering and all Canadian were issued in connection with the above construction.

Transport Canada advises that under the Air Transportation Program one (1) major building, consisting of a passenger transportation vehicle garage at Mirabel, Quebec, was built during the fiscal year 1979/80. The number of contracts awarded were as follows:

(a) architects: none

(b) engineers: one (1) to a Canadian firm

(c) designers: one (1) to a Canadian firm

PLANNED PARENTHOOD FEDERATION OF CANADA

Question No. 891—Mr. Flis:

What was the amount of federal funds given to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada for the years 1978 and 1979 and what portion of the funds was used for abortion referral?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned:

1978-1979	$600,000
1979-1980	440,000

The funds are used in accordance with the objective of the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada to provide family planning services and information to all Canadians requesting these services.

In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned:

1978-1979	$59,655
1979-1980	52,004

No portion of the funds was used for abortion referral.

RADIOACTIVE WASTE SHIPMENTS

Question No. 893—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware that the Ogdensburg Bridge and Port Authority has banned shipments of radioactive materials crossing from Canada to the United States via the Prescott—Ogdensburg Bridge and also that some time ago the Thousand Islands Bridge Authority at Ivy Lea, Ontario in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville took the same action and, if so, is it prepared to call a halt to the shipment of nuclear waste to the United States from the Chalk River nuclear installation until a thorough review of waste disposal has taken place?

2. Did Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. use the international bridge at Cornwall, Ontario at any time for carrying such goods to the United States and, if so, is this still the practice?

3. Is the government aware of a statement made by Mr. James McGuiness, executive director of the Ogdensburg Bridge and Port Authority that "we're simply not prepared to handle a nuclear spill" and, if so, what is the government's policy in regard to the statement?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy Control Board and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited report as follows:

1. The government has been advised by AECB and AECL that they are aware of the ban imposed by the Ogdensburg Bridge and Port Authority on the passage of certain types of radioactive material over the Ogdensburg Bridge effective July 24, 1980. This ban does not affect shipments of all radioactive materials but is specific to reactor fuels. This includes fresh uranium fuel as well as fuel which has been irradiated in a reactor and, therefore, contains waste material resulting from the nuclear fission process but in combination with recoverable and reusable material. AECL intends to continue the transportation of spent fuel from the Chalk River nuclear laboratories to the Savannah River plant of the U.S. department of energy in South Carolina as long as the current fueling arrangement is used for the research reactors at Chalk River.

The Thousand Islands Bridge Authority at Ivy Lea has not banned the shipment of radioactive material across that bridge. The authority has required for several years that shipments of all dangerous goods across that bridge are subject to obtaining a permit beforehand.

2. The international bridge at Cornwall may have been used and may in the future be used for radioactive shipments. However, the routes for the shipment of the irradiated fuel from Chalk River to the U.S. processing plant are not made public.

3. AECL advises that its shipping contractor in the U.S.A. has had discussions with Mr. McGuinness on this matter. In Canada, the agency having jurisdiction over the use of a highway or bridge would not be expected to be responsible for cleaning up any accidental spill. If such an event were to occur with the shipments in question, it would be the responsibility of the shipper to handle the situation to the satisfaction of AECB in collaboration with health and environmental agencies.

NAC—PERFORMING ARTS PROGRAM

Question No. 900—Mr. Clarke:

1. Did the deficit of the Performing Arts Program increase by 27 per cent over the last year and, if so, how many National Arts Centre orchestra performances were there during the fiscal year 1978-79?

2. (a) What percentage of the performances were for subscription concerts (b) how many different series were there (c) for each series (i) what was the percentage subscribed (ii) was there an equivalent in the previous year and, if so, how did the subscription rate compare with the previous year's subscription?

3. What percentage of the non-subscription orchestra performances enjoyed less than (a) 75 per cent (b) 50 per cent attendance?

4. Does the opera performance hall have a potential of eight performance blocks per week, including seven evenings and one matinee per week and, if so, during how many of the 416 potential performing blocks was the (a) hall (b) theatre (c) studio not used?

5. For the (a) English (b) French theatre company and for each series, what (i) percentage of subscription sales were enjoyed (ii) was the average percentage attendance for each performance?

6. How many other subscriptions series were there and for each series, what (a) were they called (b) were their rates of subscription (c) was the average percentage of attendance?

7. Since the corporation has nearly 12 years of experience, could the current deficit in the Performing Arts Program be reduced by increased non-subscription use of the facilities?

8. Has the management of the corporation undertaken steps to ensure that the deficit of the Performing Arts Program is reduced, rather than increased, during the current fiscal year and, if so, what are such steps?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the National Arts Centre Corporation as follows:

1. No. The Performing Arts Program deficit increased in 1979/80 by 4 per cent over the previous year i.e. at a rate lower than that of inflation.

2. (a) 60 per cent of concerts were on subscription.

(b) (i) seven
(ii)

	1979/80 Season	1978/79 Season
Tuesday series	69.0 per cent	88.9 per cent
Mini series	51.8 per cent	65.2 per cent
Student series	61.2 per cent	73.0 per cent
Thursday A	74.3 per cent	63.9 per cent
Thursday B	74.2 per cent	81.5 per cent
Family Pops	88.1 per cent	No equivalent
Young people's	60.7 per cent	No equivalent

3. (a) 27.5 per cent of non-subscription concerts attracted less than 75 per cent attendance.

(b) 3.5 per cent of non-subscription concerts attracted less than 50 per cent attendance.

4. The number of performances per week possible in any theatre is limited by:

(a) preparation, rehearsal and performance time

(b) union regulation

(c) cost (e.g. double time on Sunday and some holidays)

(d) audience acceptance of timing (e.g. mid-week matinées)

(e) audience availability for specific presentations

(f) budgetary restrictions

(g) the interaction of the above.

Experience has shown that the maximum number of performances that can be expected per week in the opera is seven, and in the theatre and studio 7.5. The annual average, however, is reduced by necessary maintenance time (three weeks for each house), rehearsal time for the July festival (three weeks) and for the resident theatre company's rehearsal (theatre nine weeks and studio six weeks). Usage for fiscal 78/79 is as shown below compared with potential:

	Potential	Performance Usage	per cent
Opera	322	278	86.3 per cent
Theatre	278	254	91.3 per cent
Studio	300	258	86.0 per cent

5. (a) English (i) 49.2 per cent French (i) 52.7 per cent
(ii) 73.8 per cent (ii) 74.6 per cent

6. There were seven other series.

(a) Name	(b) Subscription Sale per cent	(c) Average per cent attendance
Music for a Sunday Afternoon	52.4 per cent	74.1 per cent
The Masters	73.6 per cent	99.8 per cent
Premiere concerts	34.4 per cent	70.0 per cent
Musical Show series	32.8 per cent	96.8 per cent
Dance Showcase series	53.2 per cent	81.9 per cent
Opera series	30.6 per cent	83.8 per cent
Chamber Music series	39.2 per cent	54.1 per cent

7. No. Over 50 per cent of the events and well over 60 per cent of the tickets offered by the centre are non-subscription and that balance appears very acceptable to the audience. The subscription system guarantees an audience and so reduces the risk of loss particularly upon the introduction of the audience to new or little-known Canadian plays and compositions.

8. Yes. The deficit is nevertheless expected to increase in terms of dollars but to decrease as a percentage of total grant. Ticket prices have been increased by between 10 per cent and 23 per cent; improved sales techniques are being introduced and cost-reduction methods implemented.

FUNDS FOR EDUCATION OF INDIAN CHILDREN

Question No. 905—Mr. Greenaway:

1. Since 1975 to date, by year and by province, which departments allocated funds for the education of Indian children and, in each case (a) what was the amount (b) what amount was applied to students living (i) on (ii) off reserves?

2. For the same years, in the province of British Columbia, what was the break-down of the totals by Indian band?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) and (b)(i)

Please see the chart below of education expenditures for each region.

Each region has defined "on-reserve" to include Crown lands.

Post-secondary and capital expenditures have been excluded from calculations.

(b) (ii) Extensive and lengthly research would be required to accurately determine education funds spent on Indian children living off-reserve. In any case, the amount is minimal—significantly less than 1 per cent in all regions.

2. A breakdown of education expenditures for each of the 195 bands in British Columbia is not available.

Question No. 919—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the date of purchase of CDC Oil and Gas Limited by the Canada Development Corporation?

2. What was the (a) authorized (b) issued capital at the time of purchase and, in each case, has there been any change?

3. Was all of the stock of the company purchased and, if not, what was the percentage and has this changed since the time of purchase?

4. What is the present retained earnings in the company?

Question No. 920—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the date of purchase of AES Data Limited by the Canada Development Corporation?

2. What was the (a) authorized (b) issued capital at the time of purchase and, in each case, has there been any change?

3. Was all of the stock of the company purchased and, if not, what was the percentage and has this changed since the time of purchase?

4. What is the present retained earnings in the company?

Question No. 921—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the date of purchase of CDC Life Sciences Inc. by the Canada Development Corporation?

2. What was the (a) authorized (b) issued capital at the time of purchase and, in each case, has there been any change?

3. Was all of the stock of the company purchased and, if not, what was the percentage and has this changed since the time of purchase?

4. What is the present retained earnings in the company?

Question No. 922—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the date of purchase of Texasgulf Inc. by the Canada Development Corporation?

2. What was the (a) authorized (b) issued capital at the time of purchase and, in each case, has there been any change?

3. Was all of the stock of the company purchased and, if not, what was the percentage and has this changed since the time of purchase?

4. What is the present retained earnings in the company?

Question No. 923—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the date of purchase of Ventek Limited by the Canada Development Corporation?

2. What was the (a) authorized (b) issued capital at the time of purchase and, in each case, has there been any change?

3. Was all of the stock of the company purchased and, if not, what was the percentage and has this changed since the time of purchase?

4. What is the present retained earnings in the company?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): In response to questions 918 to 923 inclusive, concerning subsidiaries of the Canada Development Corporation, it should be noted that the Canada Development Corporation is a corporation in which the Government of Canada, along with more than 20,000 other shareholders, holds an equity interest. Canada Development Corporation is neither a Crown corporation nor an agent of Her Majesty and the government does not have any official knowledge of the corporation or its subsidiaries which is not publicly available from the corporate secretary.

CAPITAL COST OF MONTREAL MUSEUM OF FINE ART AND ONTARIO ART GALLERY

Question No. 925—Miss Carney:

1. What was the amount contributed by the government to the capital cost of the Montreal Museum of Fine Art and the Ontario Art Gallery in 1980 dollars?

2. What was the total percentage of funds pledged by the provincial and municipal governments as well as all private donations for each project?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Department of the Secretary of State:

1. Secretary of State contributed $2,750,000 in capital assistance to the Montreal Museum of Fine Art ($5,932,500 in 1980 dollars) as follows:

Fiscal Year	Amount
1972 - 73	$ 1,250,000
1973 - 74	1,000,000
1974 - 75	500,000

Secretary of State has not contributed to the capital cost of the Ontario Art Gallery.

National Museums of Canada:

1. The Museum Assistance Program of the National Museums of Canada contributed $250,000 to the expansion and renovation project of the Musée des Beaux-arts de Montréal in 1972; that is $489,504 in 1980 dollars.

The Museum Assistance Program of the National Museums of Canada contributed $4 million to the expansion project of the Art Gallery of Ontario in 1975; that is $5,926,354 in 1980 dollars.

2. Records indicate that the province of Quebec contributed 8 per cent of the cost of the Musée des Beaux-arts de Montréal expansion, while the private sector contributed 61 per cent. There is no report of municipal contribution in their records.

Records also indicate that the province of Ontario contributed 59 per cent to the expansion project of the Art Gallery of Ontario, while the private sector contributed 23 per cent. There is no indication of municipal contribution in the files.

The figures given for the Art Gallery of Ontario pertain to phases I and II of a three-phase expansion, the third phase has not yet been undertaken.

1979 SURVEY ON CONSUMERS FINANCE

Question No. 938—Mr. MacKay:

With reference to Statistics Canada's 1979 Survey of Consumer Finances, was the survey rescheduled from May to June due to the May 1979 federal election?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The 1979 survey of Consumer Finances was rescheduled from May to June to avoid any possible impact on response rates due to a federal election campaign.

STATISTICS CANADA—REGIONAL OFFICE REGINA-WINNIPEG

Question No. 939—Mr. MacKay:

With reference to the Statistics Canada regional office in Regina, does it plan to transfer the office to Winnipeg and, if so (a) what effect will this have on the agency's user services and information gathering activities in Saskatchewan (b) how many employees does the agency plan to have in Saskatchewan as of December 31, 1980?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports:

> There is not a Statistics Canada regional office in Regina, but rather a small advisory services office that functions under the management of the Winnipeg regional office. The regional office also includes an agricultural officer.
> Statistics Canada does plan to transfer one agricultural officer from Regina to Winnipeg to improve monitoring of prairie agricultural statistics.

(a) This transfer will not reduce the agency's information-gathering activities in Saskatchewan. The effect on user services is anticipated to be minimum. Arrangements are being made to provide additional agriculture statistics service to users in Saskatchewan from the Winnipeg office.

(b) Statistics Canada plans to have two employees in the Regina office as of December 31, 1980.

MR. CYRIL HODGINS—STUDY—ECONOMIC STATISTICS

Question No. 942—Mr. MacKay:

With reference to Statistics Canada's system of national accounts, what were the findings of Mr. Cyril Hodgins, the independent consultant commissioned to study the statistical and estimation problems in calculating the rate of economic growth in Canada since 1971, with particular reference to the uses of economic statistics by key users?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports:

The findings of Mr. Cyril Hodgins, the independant consultant commissioned to study the statistical and estimation problems in calculating the rate of economic growth in Canada since 1971 with particular reference to the uses of economic statistics by key users are summarized as follows to quote from his report:

"To sum up, in this section the evolution of national accounts data quality and data timeliness issues during the 1970s was reviewed. Throughout that time, the quarterly national accounts were released approximately eight weeks following the quarter's end as compared to about 12 weeks during the preceding decade. The preliminary GNP accounts in the 1970's were characterized by larger and more frequent revisions than they were in the 1960s.

The early part of the decade witnessed a mushrooming of demands for more economic statistics to meet the empirical research demands of computer-based quantitative analysis. Ambitious attempts were being made to construct econometric models which described the patterns of economic interdependence throughout the economy. The quality of disaggregated GNP accounts component series came under close scrutiny as the hypotheses suggested by economic theory were rigorously being subjected to sophisticated empirical testing. The uses to which the accounts data were being applied frequently went well beyond any uses envisaged by those who developed the original conceptual and methodological frameworks for the data's derivation. The proliferation of tabular displays and analytical summaries grounded out by computers and rounded off to the nearest decimal point gave the numbers an appearance of precision well beyond the original understanding of the GNP accounts as "ambiguous measures of economic phenomena".

Through developing its own in-house analytical capability, and through encouraging open dialogue with its principal users, the bureau sought to enhance the quality of the judgements that invariably must be made in the absence of less than complete information, in part because of more timely release. The goal was to achieve a more stable and consistent set of GNP accounts estimates in spite of the fact that more rapid inflation and food and energy price shocks were making the economy a more complicated and probably more unstable target to size up.

Problems for users resulted from the size, frequency and irregularity of GNP accounts revisions. The problems of data reliability were the focus of considerable Statcan attention. Canada was not alone in the international community in this experience. The reliability and timeliness of GNP accounts was a subject addressed a number of times at various international conferences by professional statisticians, including, at various times, representatives from Statcan.

The tarnished record of economic performance throughout the industrialized world during the 1970s prompted widespread reconsideration of many earlier widely-held notions about economic management. In general, evidence mounted in a favour of more stable, longer-term oriented use of fiscal and monetary instruments. The Bank of Canada moved toward tighter management of the growth of the money supply within a specified target range. The Lambert Commission on financial management and accountability recommended the development and use of a medium-term fiscal plan in the formulation and implementation of budgetary policy.

The evolution of ideas about appropriate economic management could have important implications for the measurement of economic activity. In assessing the adequacy of the GNP accounts, the criteria to be used must be derived from the basic approach to economic management that is adopted. With monetary and fiscal policy formulation cast in a stable, longer-term context. The chances for unwarranted actions, whether caused by misleading signals or not, greatly lessened."

STATISTICS CANADA—GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Question No. 947—Mr. MacKay:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1978-79 (b) 1979-80, what was the total number of person-years employed by (i) the government (ii) Statistics Canada in statistical activities?

2. For the same years, what was the total expenditure of (a) the government (b) Statistics Canada for the same purposes?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Treasury Board and Statistics Canada as follows:

1. (i) (a) and (b) Information on the total number of person-years authorized for "statistical activities" in agencies other than Statistics Canada is not available. Although federal agencies other than Statistics Canada do maintain socioeconomic data, statistical use is, in most cases, incidental to the main purpose for collecting the data—the administratioin of departmental programs—for which person-years are authorized.

(ii) Statistics Canada for the fiscal year:

(a) 1978-79: 4819

(b) 1979-80: 4343

2. (a) The costs of statistical activities in all federal departments and agencies, except Statistics Canada, are not available since statistical activities are not identified as a specific line object in the financial reporting system.

(b) Statistics Canada:

1978-79: $119,691,00

1979-80: $110,600,000

RETIREMENT OF AIRLINE PILOTS

Question No. 953—Mr. Flis:

1. Are airline pilots employed by Air Canada forced to retire at age 60 and are pilots employed by Nordair employed until age 65 and, if so, for what reason are Air Canada pilots forced to retire at 60?

2. What are, if any, the mental and physical health standards for each airline?

3. Were any pilots forced to retire at age 60 by Air Canada re-employed by Nordair until 65 within the past five years and, if so, how many?

4. Have any steps or considerations been taken by the Department of Transport to extend the manditory retirement age of Air Canada pilots to age 65 providing that they pass all of the mental and physical health requirements?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows:

1. The mandatory retirement age for Air Canada pilots is 60 years. As a member of the International Air Transport Association, Air Canada conforms to that association's recommended retirement age of 60 years, in common with virtually all North American scheduled airlines.

2. Air Canada's mental and physical standards for employed pilots are no more restrictive than Transport Canada's own licensing standards.

3 and 4. To be answered elsewhere.

The management of Nordair advises as follows: 1 and 2. The retirement age for Nordair pilots, in accordance with the company's agreement with the Canadian Airline Pilots Association, is 60. However, the agreement provides for a retirement age of 65 for a number of pilots who will not have served 25 years before their 60th birthdays. Approximately 12 Nordair pilots fall into this category and they will, therefore, be retired when they have served 25 years or reach the age of 65, whichever comes first. The cut off point for this feature of the contract is December, 1984, after which 60 will be the retirement age for all pilots.

3. No former Air Canada pilots of any age have been hired by Nordair within the past five years.

4. To be answered elsewhere.

Transport Canada advises as follows: 1, 2 and 3. To be answered elsewhere.

4. Transport Canada has no retirement age for pilots. The only age requirement is the minimum age of 21 for the initial issue of the senior commercial or airline transport pilot licences required by Air Canada pilots.

Once he has been issued the licence the pilot can continue to hold it and exercise the privileges of the licence providing he can continue to meet the medical standards and pass the periodic flight tests to demonstrate his competency.

Air Canada like any other airline, or employer for that matter, sets its own conditions of employment, which includes retirement age. Transport Canada has no jurisdiction in such matters. Our responsibility is to ensure that their crews are properly licensed and meet the required standards.

PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS—PEMBINA, ALBERTA

Question No. 959—Mr. Elzinga:

1. Since 1974, did the Department of Public Works finance projects in the constituency of Pembina and, if so, in each case, what was the (a) name of the project (b) total cost (c) total contribution by the government?

2. Is the department planning projects in the near future and, if so, in each case, what is the (a) nature of the project (b) estimated amount to be spent by the government?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes

DSS—EMERGENCY SUPPLY PLANNING BRANCH

Question No. 965—Mr. Wenman:

Is there any Emergency Supply Planning Branch within the Department of Supply and Services and, if so (a) where is it located (b) what is the size of its staff (c) has it been disbanded and, if so, under whose authority?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): There is no longer an Emergency Supply Division within the Department of Supply and Services.

(a) not applicable;

(b) not applicable;

(c) The Emergency Supply Planning Division (ESPD), formerly with security branch, was disbanded on December 31, 1978.

Following a cabinet decision, in July, 1978, regarding reductions in government expenditures, the then minister of the department of supply and services, the Hon. J. P. Goyer informed the president of the treasury board, the Hon. Robert Andras, of his plan to eliminate the ESPD. This recommendation was approved by cabinet in September, 1978.

SALES TAX REBATE ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Question No. 966—Mr. Halliday:

Does the government rebate or in any other way forego the excise tax on building materials used in (a) hospital construction (b) school construction (c) any other types of construction and, if so (i) in what types (ii) what is the average amount of tax rebated over the past five years and what is the estimated administrative cost per annum to the government?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue):

(a) Yes, when the hospital has been certified as a bona fide public hospital by the Department of National health and Welfare;

(b) Yes, when for a school, university or other similar institution;

(c) Yes.

(i) —on a building that is used exclusively or mainly as a public library operated on a non-commercial basis,

—on an incinerator owned by a municipality and used primarily for the incineration of waste materials for the municipality,

—on a building for an institution which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has certified as a bona fide public institution, —on a building owned and controlled by a province for the sole purpose of providing residence for students of a university or other similar educational institution, —on a building owned by a province that is not a party to a reciprocal sales tax agreement with the federal government, —on a building that forms part of a municipal water distribution, sewage or drainage system.

(ii) These figures are not available. Persons entitled to a refund submit claims to the department to recover sales tax. The department receives in excess of 75,000 claims a year on a wide range of goods including construction materials. The claims are not classed by type and the only way to find the average amount claimed and the total annual amount refunded on construction materials would be to analyse the more than 350,000 claims received in the last five years.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—CUBA

Question No. 967—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 45 which stated in part, that Cuba has signed eight loans with the Export Development Corporation for $69.3 million, what (a) is a complete list of all such loans and their purpose (b) was the amount of each loan and the interest charged (c) are the dates the loans were made?

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned:

(a)	(i)	Banco Nacional de Cuba	To finance the export sales of railways and related equipment by Canron Limited
	(ii)	Banco Nacional de Cuba	To finance export sales of three ships (tankers) by Marine Industries Limited
	(iii)	Banco Nacional de Cuba	To finance the export sales of pulp and paper mills by Roy W. Emery Limited
	(iv)	Banco Nacional de Cuba	To finance the export sales of servicing vehicles by Wajax International Limited
	(v)	Banco Nacional de Cuba	To finance the export sales of railways and related equipment by Hawker Siddeley Canada Limited
	(vi)	Banco Nacional de Cuba	To finance the export sales of airport facilities and equipment by Interimco Trading Company Ltd.
	(vii)	Banco Nacional de Cuba	To finance an increase in export sales price of ships (tankers) by Marine Industries Limited
	(viii)	Banco Nacional de Cuba	To finance the export sales of airport facilites and equipment by Interimco Trading Company Limited.

(b)	Maximum Amount of Loan per Loan Agreement Signed[1]	EDC Portion	Bank Portion under parallel Financing

NATIONAL POWER GRID

Question No. 968—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Has the government considered the setting up of a national power grid to encourage the use of renewable hydro energy resources and conserve depletable energy resources?

2. Were planning meetings held to plan the setting up of a national power grid and, if so (a) where were the meetings held and on what dates (b) who attended the meetings?

3. Is the proposal still under consideration by the government and, if so, what action is being taken?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows:

1. The government has not specifically considered a national power grid but has participated in other measures to ensure appropriate interconnection of electric power systems. Electricity production in Canada involves very limited dependence on rapidly depleting energy resources. Interconnections between neighbouring utilities in adjacent provinces have been developed in all parts of Canada in response to the technical and economic opportunities to export or exchange electricity. The only significant gaps that exist are between Alberta and Saskatchewan and between the island of Newfoundland and Labrador. Studies are actively proceeding to bridge these gaps. Commitment has already been made to purchase equipment for an Alberta-Saskatchewan interconnection.

Since 1974 the federal government has encouraged the reinforcement of regional interconnections through the offer of loans at Crown corporation rates to provide up to 50 per cent of the cost of approved projects. To date this program has provided assistance for interprovincial interconnections between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It has also provided loans to Manitoba for the second stage of the Nelson River transmission system between northern Manitoba and Winnipeg. Total loans, advanced and approved, under this program amount to approximately $215 million.

2. Not applicable in the context of the question, however regional interconnection was studied in detail during 1977 and 1978 by the Interprovincial Advisory Council of Energy (IPACE).

3. Not applicable.

CBC COVERAGE—CANADA WIDE SCIENCE FAIR

Question No. 976—Mr. Cossitt:

Did CBC provide television coverage of the Canada Wide Science Fair, or any part thereof, held in Thompson, Manitoba between May 11 and May 18 and, if not (a) for what reason (b) what is the name and job designation of the highest ranking CBC employee who ruled out such coverage?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(a) CBC Television in Winnipeg did not cover the science fair because they had covered a major mining conference two weeks earlier and the cost of mounting coverage of events in northern Manitoba limits the number of trips the station can make to Thompson and other northern locations. However, CBC Radio in Winnipeg (CBW) carried coverage of the fair at least once a day on "North Country", a special radio service to northern listeners, and CBW's driving-home show promoted the event. CBW also carried a special item on "In Town and Out", the Saturday morning program.

(b) It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration as the names of its officers involved in individual program decisions. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975.

CBC—COST OF COVERAGE OF QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Question No. 977—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What was the entire cost to the Canadian taxpayer for CBC coverage of the Quebec Referendum campaign and results including radio and television, technical costs, salaries of assigned personnel?

2. Are figures available showing the breakdown cost for (a) the French radio and television networks (b) the English radio and television networks and, if so, what are such figures?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1 and 2. It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration as the costs relating to individual program projects. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975.

AID TO NORTH VIET NAM

Question No. 981—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the government loan or give a grant, etc. to North Viet Nam and, if so, what (a) is a complete list of all such items and their purpose (b) was the amount of each item (c) was the interest charged, if any, and the terms thereof

(d) was the date in each case (e) is all the information in regard to payments, if required, including anything in arrears?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of External Affairs, Canadian International Development Agency and the Department of Finance as follows: no, Canada did not provide a loan or grant to North Viet Nam.

PETRO-CANADA OFFICIALS

Question No. 982—Mr. MacKay:

1. Does the president and chief executive officer of Petro-Canada maintain a residence in Ottawa?

2. In which city is his regular business office located?

3. Does the corporation maintain an aircraft for his use and for the use of other senior officers and, if so, is the aircraft used weekly to transport him between his Ottawa residence and his Calgary office?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows: 1. The information sought is of a private nature.

2. Petro-Canada's head office is located in Calgary where Mr. Hopper, chairman of the board and chief executive officer, works the majority of the time.

3. Petro-Canada maintains several aircraft for company business, including one that is used primarily for senior and middle management personnel. The aircraft are not used to transport Mr. Hopper or other senior personnel weekly between Ottawa and Calgary.

PUBLICATION "PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT"

Question No. 985—Mr. MacKay:

With reference to Statistics Canada's publication 72-008, "Provincial Government Employment", did the Agency change the publication's statistical categories from time to time, without regard to backward revision and, if so, did such change create problems of historical inconsistencies?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada Reports: Substantive changes were made, effective April 1, 1973, when the employment series was realigned to coincide with the newly codified concepts and classifications of Statistics Canada's financial management system.

These changes resulted in a break in historical consistency. At the time of the changeover, a historical revision was planned but was not carried out because resources for the work were not available. In addition, adjustments are sometimes made when more complete information becomes available.

RCMP DRESS UNIFORMS

Question No. 1,002—Mr. Cossitt:

Do the regular officers of the RCMP appear in their full dress red uniforms in order to add colour to a ceremonial occasion such as state visits by the Prime Minister of Japan and the President of Mexico and, if not, what is the reason?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Yes, members of the RCMP appear in their full red uniforms in order to add colour to a ceremonial occasion such as state visits by the Prime Minister of Japan and the President of Mexico. However, the prime purpose of members of the force in uniform at ceremonial occasions is security, providing crowd control and traffic control. Each ceremonial occasion is evaluated concerning the force's main function which is the personal safety of the VIP and the VIP party. If members are to be near the VIP and not happened in any way from performing their assigned duty, they may be detailed to wear review order of dress (full red uniform). The dress of the members on these occasions is left to the discretion of the security officer who acts on behalf of the commanding officer in that particular area.

VETERANS WAITING PERIOD FOR ENTITLEMENT TO PENSION

Question No. 1,003—Mr. Howie:

How many war veterans have been waiting for more than six months for a board decision to determine their entitlement to a disability pension?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): One thousand eight hundred sixty-one war veterans have been waiting for more than seven months for a decision at the first level of adjudication to determine their eligibility for a disability pension. Statistics are not maintained with respect to those veterans that have been waiting for six months.

Seven hundred fifty-eight war veterans have been waiting for more than six months for a decision at the second level of adjudication, e.i. the entitlement board of the Canadian Pension Commission.

One thousand two hundred nineteen war veterans have been waiting for more than six months for a decision at the final level of adjudication, i.e. the pension review board.

VETERANS WAITING FOR PENSION INCREASES

Question No. 1,004—Mr. Howie:

How many war veterans have been waiting for more than six months for a board decision to determine their right to an increase in their disability pension?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): One hundred forty-four war veterans have been waiting for more than six months to appear before an assessment board of the Canadian Pension Commission for an increase in pension.

One hundred sixty-five war veterans have been waiting for more than six months for a decision at the final level of adjudication, i.e. the pension review board.

DSS—PRINTERS CONTRACTED TO PRODUCE "METRIC MONITOR"

Question No. 1,008—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 91 concerning the "Metric Monitor" which stated in part, "the costs for printing and publishing are decided by Supply and Services Canada on a competitive bid system", in each year from 1974 to date, what are the names and addresses of all printers used by the Department for printing the "Metric Monitor"?

2. In each case, what is the name from whom other competitive bids were obtained and how were they selected to enter a bid?

3. Were calls for bids advertised publicly and, if not, for what reason?

4. In each case, did the lowest bid receive the job and, if not, for what reason?

5. Was political affiliation considered when selecting the bidders?

VETERANS AWAITING ELIGIBILITY AND INCREASES IN PENSIONS

Question No. 1,012—Mr. Howie:

How many war veterans in Canada are waiting for a decision to determine (a) eligibility (b) increases in their disability pension?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence):

(a) 4,081—at the first level of adjudication;

2,885—at the second level of adjudication, i.e., the entitlement board of the Canadian Pension Commission;

1,362—at the final level of adjudication, i.e., the pension review board.

(b) 1,143—at the first level of adjudication, i.e., an assessment board of the Canadian Pension Commission;

262—at the final level of adjudication i.e. the pension review board.

BRAZILIAN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Question No. 1,014—Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore):

Is the government aware that the Brazilian automobile industry began selling cars powered by almost pure alcohol to the general public on April 1, 1980 and, if so, has the government approached the auto industry to investigate the possibility of selling alcohol-powered cars in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: yes the government is aware that automobiles are being powered by alcohol in Brazil.

The government has not asked the industry to sell alcohol powered cars but it has done studies on the feasibility of producing alcohol to be used as a supplement to gasoline in automobiles.

STATISTICS CANADA EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,021—Mr. Neil:

1. How many (a) full-time (b) part-time employees were or are involved in completing a Statistics Canada document entitled "1979 Income Questionnaire" in (i) Saskatchewan (ii) the constituency of Moose Jaw?

2. What is the rate of pay and mileage allowances for each part-time employee involved in completing the questionnaire and the total cost for (a) Saskatchewan (b) the constituency of Moose Jaw?

3. Is the information requested in the questionnaire basically that which is contained in an individual's income tax return and, if so, what is the rationale for the questionnaire?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

1. (a) (i) Two full-time employees in Saskatchewan.

(ii) No full-time employees in the constituency of Moose Jaw.

(b) (i) One hundred thirty eight part-time employees in Saskatchewan.

(ii) Ten part-time employees in the constituency of Moose Jaw.

2. (a) Rates of pay and mileage allowance for each part-time employee for Saskatchewan:

Rates of Pay: Interviewers from $5.30 to $6.30/hour Senior interviewers from $6.75/hour to $7.75/hour

Milleage allowance: 23.5c per mile up to 4000 miles. Total cost for Saskatchewan—$43,000

(b) Rates of pay and mileage allowance for the constituency of Moose Jaw are the same as in 2(a)

Total cost for constituency of Moose Jaw—$2800

3. The information requested in the survey of consumer finances questionnaire includes some items which are not included in an individual's tax return because they are exempt from taxation. The survey is conducted for the purpose of providing income data for families and individuals whatever their income level. Income tax returns are filed by individuals and cannot be grouped into families. They also contain very little information on characteristics which are needed to analyse income statistics (work experience, family situation, etc). Also, individuals at the low end of the income scale may not have filed tax returns and without the income for these individuals the average income of Canadians would not be accurate. In fact many of the social policies developed from these data are geared towards the low income population, and this survey is the only source of income data for this group.

CANADA COUNCIL JOB CLASSIFICATIONS

Question No. 1,024—Mr. Friesen:

1. What are the job classification titles under which an individual would be employed in the Canada Council?

2. How many individuals were employed by the Canada Council in (a) 1979 (b) 1980 to date and by job classification, how many received incomes per annum (i) of more than $60,000 (ii) between $50,000 and $60,000 (iii) between $40,000 and $50,000 (iv) between $30,000 and $40,000 (v) between $20,000 and $30,000 (vi) between $10,000 and $20,000 (vii) less than $10,000?

3. How many individuals were employed by the Canada Council on a contract basis in (a) 1979 (b) 1980 to date and what was the total amount paid for such services?

4. What was the total amount of gross revenues the Canada Council received from sources outside the government?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): The Canada Council provides the following information:

1 and 2. See list below.

3. For periods extending from two months to one year, the Canada Council employed on contract seven individuals in 1979 and eight individuals in 1980 to date (June 24). The total amount paid for their services was $243,626.

4. 1978-79: $9,862,104, 1979-80: $9,628,678.

SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE

Question No. 1,031—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many Canadian widows between the ages of 60 and 65 are not entitled to receive the spouse's allowance and what is the estimated saving in cost?

2. What is the estimated amount that the government contributes to the cost of the provincial welfare payments made to such persons?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. It is estimated that approximately 50,000 Canadian widows between the ages of 60 and 65 are not entitled to receive the spouse's allowance. The estimated saving in cost is in the neighbourhood of $120 million.

2. It is estimated that the federal government contributed roughly $9 million as its share under the Canada Assistance Plan to the cost of provincial welfare payments that may be made to these persons.

ASSOCIATE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Question No. 1,038—Miss MacDonald:

1. What is the job description of the Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs?

2. At what category was he appointed?

3. What is his salary?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. As is and has been the case in similar circumstances in this and other departments and agencies, the associate under-secretary shares all the responsibilities for managing the Department of External Affairs with the under-secretary; his position therefore does not constitute a level separate from the under-secretary's. Emphasis and focus of particular responsibilities will evolve and vary as circumstances will warrant. At present, the associate under-secretary assumes complete line responsibility for all economic matters; in this capacity, he chairs the interdepartmental ADM sub-committee (economic relations) on foreign and defence policy. He also chairs the senior management committee.

2. DM-2.

3. The salary range for that category of appointment is $55,600—$72,400.

TAX CREDIT ON INSULATION

Question No. 1,047—Mr. Riis:

Does the government plan on providing tax credits on the purchase of insulation, or insulation grants to owners of mobile homes who wish to conserve energy and make their homes more energy efficient?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Finance and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: In so far as the Department of Finance is concerned:

The government is currently reviewing various proposals which would aid the conservation of energy. No firm decisions have as yet been made. The government does currently provide exemption from the federal sales tax for insulation material. Assistance is also provided to eligible home owners through the Canadian Home Insulation Program, administered by CMHC. Further tax incentives, if any, for the purchase of insulation would be announced in the next budget.

In so far as the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is concerned: mobile homes are presently eligible for assistance under the Canadian Home Insulation Program (CHIP) and the Home Insulation Program (HIP). Federal assistance under the CHIP and HIP programs takes the form of a grant and is available to owners of all self-contained dwellings, including mobile homes, used for permanent residency, if built before 1961 in the case of CHIP and 1977 in the case of HIP.

"CULTURES CANADA"

Question No. 1,049—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was the pamphlet entitled "Cultures Canada" and bearing "Minister of State Multiculturalism" at the top, published at the taxpayers' expense by the Department of Supply and Services?

2. If the pamphlet was not printed by the department (a) who printed it (b) how was the printing arranged (c) were tenders called or invited and (i) if so, from whom were quotations received and in what amount (ii) if not, for what reason?

3. What was the total approximate cost of the five issues printed to date?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Supply and Services and Secretary of State as follows:

1. No. However, printing of four of the five issues was arranged by the Department of Supply and Services.

2. Issue 1:

(a) Printed through Communications Consultants Ltd., under the previous government.

(b) Issue 1 was subcontracted by Communications Consultants Ltd.

(c) (/i) No.

(ii) Because of the high priority and extremely short deadline for delivery.

Issue 2:

Printed by the Department of Supply and Services.

Issue 3:

(a) National Printers (Ottawa).

(b) and (c) A requisition for printing was received by the Department of Supply and Services from the Department of the Secretary of State. Tenders were invited by telephone from three Ottawa firms listed on an official DSS source list as being competent and capable of meeting this type of requirement.

Quotations were received from two firms:

Name
National Printers (Ottawa)
Lomor (Ottawa)

Issues 4 and 5:

(a) National Printers (Ottawa).

(b) and (c) A requisition for the printing of issues 4 and 5 was received by the Department of Supply and Services from the Department of the Secretary of State. This requirement was negotiated with the previous printer because of the short lead time of two days.

3. Total printing cost for issues 1 to 5 is $5,572.64.

PITNEY BOWES CO.—POSTAL METER DIE

Question No. 1,054—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Does the Pitney Bowes Company currently hold the contract with the Post Office Department to supply a special postal meter die bearing a national unity message?

2. Was information on the availability of the die circulated to Canadian businesses by the Postmaster General?

3. Was the die to have come into use on or before May 15, 1980?

4. Did the government call for tenders when it decided to have the dies made and, if so (a) on what date (b) did Pitney Bowes actively participate in the bidding for the contract (c) did Pitney Bowes submit the lowest bid and, if not, who did (d) what are the names of all the companies that took part in the bidding?

5. What are the names of the contracts that Pitney Bowes has with the department?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): 1. The Post Office Department purchased meter dies, from Pitney Bowes Company and the Frieden Company, bearing a national unity message, for use in government operated postage meters.

2. The dies obtained by this purchase were for government use only. A letter signed by the Postmaster General, urging Canadian businesses to purchase similar dies, was distributed by all meter companies operating in Canada to their respective customers. The Post Office did not contract for, purchase or supply meter dies for use by these customers.

3. In his letter, the Postmaster General suggested that the dies be used starting in mid-May, 1980.

4. (a), (b), (c) and (d).

Tenders were not called for the meter dies obtained for government use by the Post Office. Each postage meter company is the supplier of dies to fit its make of machines.

5. The Post Office does not have contracts with Pitney Bowes.

DSS—SUB-CONTRACTING

Question No. 1,055—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of Supply and Services in an address to the Canadian Manufacturing Association on May 26, 1980 in Hull, Quebec, state, "we have found that significant portions of some prime contracts let to Canadian-based manufacturers are sub-contracted outside Canada" and did he further state that the department would insist on more Canadian sub-contracting and, if so, what steps does the government plan in order to accomplish this end?

2. Is the government considering having clauses inserted in contracts making this an absolute requirement and, if not, what other method will be used to positively guarantee additional Canadian sub-contract work?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes, these statements are correct. As I outlined, the DSS record in support of Canadian industry is that on average, it places in excess of 80 per cent by value of its contracts in Canada with Canadian-based firms. The bulk of the offshore procurement (less than 20 per cent) is for the most part governed by bilateral arrangements on defence with NATO countries. In this context it is important to note that since the inception of such agreements Canada has recorded a net trade surplus on such agreements. Further, where major offshore procurements do take place, such as Aurora and NFA, the government "offset" and licensing arrangements are negotiated to ensure a share of sub-contract work for Canadian firms.

However, it was also realized that significant portions of some prime contracts let to Canadian-based manufacturers are sub-contracted outside Canada and it is in this area of activity that the additional gains may be made on behalf of Canadian industry. Hence the establishment of a DSS sub-contracting program.

The DSS sub-contracting program is a co-operative program between DSS and its major suppliers designed to increase the value of sub-contract awards made to Canadian firms. In terms of what has been achieved to date, the following initiatives have been actioned:

(a) DSS will now require the companies bidding on requirements valued at over $2 million, to submit as part of their bid a "Canadian Business Opportunities Plan". This plan will document the level of sub-contracting in Canada, particularly with small business;

(b) Each major prime contractor participating in this program will appoint a Canadian supply officer with the specific responsibility of increasing the over-all level of Canadian content in government contracts. This officer will serve as the direct link with potential sub-suppliers and officials of my department;

(c) My department will convene a series of trade shows in selected cities across the country at which participating companies will be able to display their products, highlighting business opportunities for all interested Canadian suppliers;

(d) My department will issue an "Information Package" containing program needs, production requirements and business opportunities of a number of Canadian prime contractors who have volunteered such information. In addition, we will publish on a regular basis all forthcoming requirements over $2 million in value that would be of interest to Canadian sub-contractors and suppliers.

ADMIRAL ROBERT FALLS

Question No. 1,191—Mr. Cossitt:

Is the government renting a residence in Brussels for Admiral Robert Falls, Canada's NATO representative and, if so, what is the name of the owner, the address of the residence and any other particulars known to the government?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): The government is renting a residence in Brussels for Admiral Robert Falls, the chairman of the military committee of NATO. The house is located at number 8 Domaine de Fuji—1970 Welembeek, Brussels and is owned by Dr. and Mrs. Buisseret. The annual rental is 2,100,-000 Belgian francs which at the rate of exchange at the time of signature of the lease was equivalent to $81,816.00 Canadian. The lease was effective March 15, 1980 for a nine year and five month period but can be terminated at no cost after each triennium.

DREE—INDUSTRIES IN LAVAL

Question No. 1,193—Mr. Roy:

Over the past ten years, did the Department of Regional Economic Expansion contribute to the establishment or development of industries in the city of Laval and, if so, in each case (a) what was the ratio of investments to DREE grants (b) how many jobs were created?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: For the Regional Development Incentives Program:

CBC—BLACK LISTED MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Question No. 1,200—Mr. Cossitt:

Do the editors of such CBC Programs as the "World at Eight" and the "World at Six" possess unwritten instructions or have they made a decision on their own, that certain members of parliament are in effect "black listed" and that (a) their names are not to be used on news programs unless absolutely necessary (b) their names are to be used on programs if they can in any way be damaged (c) such a policy particulary is to apply to the Progressive Conservative Party members?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: No. No such instructions have been given and no such decisions have been made by any CBC personnel.

CBC—"WORLD AT SIX" PROGRAM

Question No. 1,201—Mr. Cossitt:

Since February 18, 1980, how many times on the CBC program "World at Six" were (a) Liberal Party (b) New Democratic Party (c) Progressive Conservative Party members of parliament mentioned by name?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

> The information requested is not recorded in such a way that it could be extracted without the expenditure of an inordinate amount of time, work and money.

CBC—SUBJECT OF ESPIONAGE ON NEWSCAST

Question No. 1,202—Mr. Cossitt:

Is it the policy of CBC to eliminate, wherever possible, from newscasts, any mention of the subject of espionage, particularly including Soviet espionage despite the fact that such subjects are covered by other news media and, if so, did Mr. Mark Starowitz, CBC producer and future TV news editor, have any input into creating it and, if so, was it before or after his associations with Mr. Konstantine Geyvandov, former Russian correspondent in the Ottawa Parliamentary Press Gallery?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

> No. The content of newscasts is based on the news events of the day plus feature items on specific subjects of general interest.

STATISTICS CANADA—USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

Question No. 1,210—Mr. MacKay:

1. Does Statistics Canada, as empowered by the Statistics Act, impose penalties on individuals refusing to provide their Social Insurance Number (SIN) in response to a questionnaire or survey from the agency requiring such a number?

2. Does Statistics Canada, as empowered by the Statistics Act, establish cross linkages between files containing personal information on individuals without their knowledge and consent, through the use of Social Insurance Numbers to access provincial health, education and justice records and, if so, does the information collected become part of a Federal Information Bank (FIB) under the provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: 1. No.

2. (a) Statistics Canada does, in a very few instances, use the SIN as a record linkage tool to assist in the access and subsequent processing of provincial records for statistical purposes. In the area of health statistics, no regular use is made of the SIN, although a number of research projects in the area of occupational hazards have been undertaken with the use of the SIN. In the area of justice statistics, the bureau receives SIN coded records from corrections institutions in five provinces. The SIN is used in this program to verify information through a follow-up process. However, this corrections statistics program will be phased out by the end of calendar 1980. In the area of education statistics, educational staff records and university student graduation records contain the SIN, where the individual chooses to disclose the number.

   (b) None of the information contained in records described in 2(a) above becomes part of a Federal Information Bank under the provision of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

HEALTH—HOMOCYSTEINE—HEART DISEASE

Question No. 1,213—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has it been determined by the Department of National Health and Welfare whether or not there is any validity to the theory that cholesterol and triglycerides are not the chief culprits in the blood system causing heart disease and deterioration of the arteries but that the main cause is an amino acid called homocysteine which is also present?

2. Is the department aware that Dr. Stephen A. Raymond and Dr. Edward R. Gruberg of Massachusetts Institute of Technology have advanced this theory as well as such others as Dr. Kilmer McCully, Dr. Harry Demopoulos of New York University Medical Centre and Dr. David Wilcken, of the University of New South Wales, Sydney, Australia?

3. Is the department aware that such doctors and others have endorsed taking vitamin B-6 (75 milligrams approximately) per day to eliminate the dangers of homocysteine and, if so, have any tests been conducted in Canada to substantiate this and is the theory of vitamin B-6 considered to be plausible?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The primary cause of coronary heart disease is not known. There is a great deal of evidence that high blood cholesterol is one of the chief risk factors for heart disease. Persons with high levels of cholesterol in the blood have a greater chance of suffering a heart attack than those with lower levels. A high blood triglyceride level without a high cholesterol level is not considered a risk factor for heart disease. The theory that the amino acid, homocysteine, is the cause of deterioration of the arteries and of heart disease is an interesting hypothesis, but has not been substantiated.

2. The department is aware that Drs. Raymond, Gruber and others have advanced this theory. The main proponents of the theory, Drs. Raymond and Gruber, have not published their work in the scientific literature. Furthermore, they have stated that the homocysteine theory is essentially just a theory, that it is not yet sufficiently confirmed by scientific and clinical tests and that much remains to be learned. The department will continue to monitor any developments in this area.

3. The department is not aware of Canadian physicians using vitamin B-6 for eliminating the dangers of homocysteine nor is the department aware of any trials done in this regard. The use of vitamin B-6 is plausible in that vitamin B-6 activates an enzyme which cleaves cystathionine, a toxic product which builds up in the brain and other tissues when the normal enzyme (cystathione synthetase) is missing as in the rare disease homocystinuria. Cleaving of the cystathionine should reduce its toxic effects.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—NATIONAL WARNING SYSTEM

Question No. 1,214—Mr. Wenman:

1. How many warning sirens were in place in 1970 as part of the National Attack Warning System and, how many (a) were installed over the past ten years (b) more are needed today to provide adequate warning for the entire Canadian population?

2. How many fallout monitoring posts are there throughout Canada as part of the detonation and fallout reporting system and (a) where are they located (b) what type of equipment is located in each post (c) on what date were the posts last tested (d) how many of the posts are in establishments operated by (i) the Department of National Defence (ii) other departments (e) how are the federally operated posts linked to posts operated by the provinces and municipalities?

3. Does the Canadian Armed Forces have special units designated to carry out assistance to areas damaged as a result of nuclear attack or fallout and have there been any special exercises carried out to ensure that the troops know how to conduct the type of operation for which they are intended and, if so (a) how many have there been in the past ten years (b) have any involved the participation of provincial or municipal staffs engaged in emergency planning?

4. Have any province-wide radiation defence exercises been held with provincial or municipal persons since 1975 and, if not, have any exercises been carried out on paper with provincial and municipal staffs?

5. (a) What is the operational status of the nine emergency regional headquarters in terms of (i) protection against nuclear-biological-chemical agents (ii) reserves of food supplies (iii) mechanical equipment (b) are three of the nine headquarters temporary ones and, if so, on what date are they likely to be made permanent?

6. Does Saskatchewan have a regional emergency headquarters and, if not, will it be getting any type of headquarters for war emergency operations?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and the Privy Council as follows:

1. 1700

(a) None

(b) Cannot be determined without studies of population and urban-industrial growth since 1970.

2. The Nuclear Detonation and Fallout Reporting System (NDFRS) was disbanded in the late 1960s.

The current system is called the Canadian Forces Warning and Reporting System (CFWRS). It includes all CF bases, stations and units working through a Canadian Federal Warning Centre (CFWC) and ten Provincial Warning Centres (PWC) carry out the DND assigned responsibility for the detection, reporting and warning of nuclear attacks.

The civilian counterpart is called the Civil Radiological Defence (RADEF) system formed in the early 1960s. It is essentially a provincial/municipal system used to provide specialized information about the radiological hazard to governments to allow authorities to impose or lift restrictions on activities within the area under their jurisdiction.

The civil and military radiological data gathered by RADEF and CFWRS is analysed and acted upon at the Emergency Government Headquarters.

3. No. As a result of decisions taken at the Federal/Provincial Emergency Planning Conference of 1969, re-entry responsibilities became a provincial task. Canadian Forces will assist such actions as and when required, once military commitments have been met. The 1969 decision alters the effect of PCO 1041-1965 Civil Emergency Measures Planning Order.

4. No to both questions.

5. Operational Status of Emergency Regional Headquarters

(a) (i) Protection against nuclear-biological-chemical agents

The six permanent regional emergency government headquarters have protection against nuclear fallout only. The three interim regional emergency government headquarters have a fallout protection factor not less than 100.

(ii) Reserves of food supplies

All sites are stocked with a 14 day supply of food.

(iii) Mechanical equipment

Maintenance of the mechanical equipment is conducted regularly.

(b) Permanent status of three Interim Regional Emergency Government Headquarters

The three existing interim regional emergency government headquarters, situated in less populated provinces, are at various stages of operational readiness, however in a period of international tension, these headquarters could be made operational.

6. Saskatchewan Interim Regional Emergency Government Headquarters

The Saskatchewan interim regional emergency government headquarters is situated in Regina and the location is unacceptable. A new site has been surveyed at Moose Jaw and development plans are under way with the Department of Public Works.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—CAREERS IN THE SERVICE

Question No. 1,218—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. How many military college graduates started careers with the Canadian Armed Forces and remained in the service (a) over (b) under six years?

2. Did the Department of National Defence conduct exit surveys upon separation of military college graduates or subsequent exit surveys and analysis following separation?

3. How many graduates have left the service and for what reason?

4. How many aircrew members have left the service for other flying jobs and how many moved to the United States?

Hon. D. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): 1. Since January 1, 1970:

(a) 2115;

(b) 244.

2. No. However, as a matter of policy, all members who request release are required to state in writing the reason for requesting release. All such members are subsequently interviewed by a superior officer and all requests are reviewed at National Defence Headquarters. Special monitoring procedures for military college graduates do not exist. Information concerning the subsequent civilian or foreign employment of released officers is not collected and thus an analysis following separation is impossible.

3. Since January 1, 1970—309

The reasons were as follows:

—on request	259
—not advantageously employable or unsuitable	21
—on medical grounds	18
—death	11

4. Since January 1, 1970—49

Information whether released personnel have obtained other flying jobs is not available. Data whether released aircrew members have moved to the United States is not readily available prior to 1978 and since 1978 no released members are known to have moved there.

ANTURANE

Question No. 1,226—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the drug with the trade name anturane, generic name sulfinpyrazone, used in the treatment of gout, is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware of certain leading American medical opinions that the drug has been found useful in the treatment of myocardial infarction and, that in particular, it assists in preventing further heart attacks and, if so, what are all the details possessed by the department?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In the issue of the New England Journal of Medicine of January 31, 1980, an article appeared in which it was concluded that the drug Anturan—Ciba Geigy (generic name—sulfinpyrazone), was responsible for a marked reduction in sudden death in patients during the critical first six months following their first heart attack (myocardial infarct). The manufacturer approached the United States' Food and Drug Administration (FDA) for permission to use this claim in advertising and labelling. After analysing the individual case report, the FDA refused permission on the basis that there was no statistically significant difference between treated and untreated patient groups in the number of sudden deaths, when the groupings were carefully separated on the basis of the nature of the deaths. In Canada, Anturan has been sold for many years for the treatment of gout. In recent years, the health protection branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare, on the basis of satisfactory submissions of data, has permitted claims for Anturan in diseases associated with abnormal blood clotting. The manufacturer has never approached the department for acceptance of the sudden death claim. Should the manufacturer do so, officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare would then examine the individual case histories and apply appropriate statistical analyses.

GEROVITAL H3

Question No. 1,227—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware of a medicine known as Gerovital H-3 reported to be useful with regard to the effects of aging and a wide range of other ailments and, if so, have experiments been carried out in Canada on this medicine?

2. To the knowledge of the department, is it (a) distributed free in Roumania to everyone over 45 years of age (b) being produced in the State of Nevada (c) will it be permitted for use in Canada and, if so, on what date?

3. To the knowledge of the government, did a number of noted world figures who lived a lengthy lifespan take the drug?

4. Has the department studied the medicine and, if so, what were the results?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes. Gerovital H3 is a pharmaceutical product containing procaine, a well-known local anaesthetic. Clinical trials with Gerovital H3 in depression were approved to be conducted in Canada, but as far as the department is aware, they were never performed.

2. (a) Gerovital H3 was apparently developed in Rumania but the Department of National Health and Welfare is unaware of the manner of distribution of the drug in that country.

(b) No information.

(c) As with any other drug for a new indication, clearance for marketing Gerovital H3 in Canada would require that the manufacturer file with the health protection branch of the department an acceptable submission including substantial evidence of the pharmaceutical quality, efficacy and safety of the product for the indications and under the conditions of use recommended. No such submission has been filed.

3. No information.

4. No.

SECURITY CLEARANCE

Question No. 1,230—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was a new security clearance plan formulated by the Department of Supply and Services, under the former government, and was it about to be issued and, if so, what were all the details of the plan?

2. Has the government taken any steps in this regard and, if so (a) what are they (b) is it adopting any of the decisions of the former government and, if so, on what date will details become known?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

MR. ROBERT MURRAY

Question No. 1,249—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mr. Robert Murray, sculpturer of the works on exhibit in Rockcliffe Park, a Canadian citizen?

2. Did the Canada Council state that the sculptures were being placed in Rockcliffe Park to exhibit works of Canadian artists and did Mr. Lavoie of the Canada Council state that he did not know whether Mr. Murray was Canadian or not "but he at least has strong connections with Canada" and, if so, what are Mr. Murray's strong connections with Canada?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canada Council: 1. Yes 2. (a) Yes (b) Yes (c) Mr. Robert Murray is a Canadian citizen.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICIAL RESIDENCE—SCULPTURE

Question No. 1,253—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is a full description and the designated name of the item erected on the property at the Prime Minister's official residence, 24 Sussex Drive and (a) is it made of steel and, if not, what is the metal involved (b) is it a sculpture (c) what was the total cost thereof (d) who was the artist or manufacturer?

2. Was the item purchased from public funds and, if so, what department or Crown corporation is the owner?

3. Is it the policy of the government to erect "strange" objects on the lawn at the Prime Minister's residence?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1. The designated name of the item erected on the property at the Prime Minister's official residence is TOGIAC;

(a) it is made of steel;

(b) it is a sculpture;

(c) it is being leased from the Canada Council Art Bank for two years at an annual rent of $500.00. The installation expenditures of $500.00 were paid jointly by Public Works Canada and the Canada Council Art Bank;

(d) the artist is Robert Murray.

2. The item was purchased from public funds by the Canada Council Art Bank.

3. It is the policy of the government that the occupant of the Prime Minister's residence select works of art for the grounds according to his personal taste. The sculpture TOGIAC was chosen by the previous Prime Minister and was erected on the present site last fall.

VIETNAMESE REFUGEES

Question No. 1,266—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of Employment and Immigration placing pressure on refugees from Vietnam to repay transportation loans and, if so, have complaints been received that they are not able to make such payments until gainfully employed?

2. Have complaints been received by the department that such refugees have become frightened by letters received from the department on the grounds that in their previous environment, letters from a dictatorial "State" caused them fear?

3. Will the government adopt a different policy towards these people and, if so, what are all the details?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. The commission is required under section 46(1)(a) of the immigration regulations to collect loans from all immigrants. This section states that the first payment is due "on the first day of the month following the month in which the person for whose benefit the loan was made arrives in Canada." However, the initial letter sent to them asks for their co-operation in assessing their financial situation in order to arrive at a mutually agreeable repayment schedule. It also states that, if they are unable to make regular payments at this time or if their financial situation is such that they would prefer to postpone beginning repayment of their loan for some time, they should contact their local Canada Immigration Centre. (See copy below)

2. Although a small number of representations have been received, there is no indication that such letters have caused fear. It should be noted, however, that the refugees are counselled overseas as well as at the staging areas (Griesbach, Alberta and Longue-Pointe, Quebec) on the Canadian way of life.

3. No.

Ottawa, K1A 0J9

Dear: —

Subject: Transportation Loan, Account No. — Amount owing: $ —

I am writing in connection with the loan that the Government of Canada was pleased to advance to you to assist you to immigrate to this country.

Now that you have begun the task of settling into your new life in Canada, we would ask your co-operation in assessing your financial situation so as to arrive at a mutually agreeable repayment schedule for your loan. We would ask you to bear in mind that all repayments which you make will greatly aid Canada's efforts to bring others by replenishing the transportation loan fund.

If you are unable to make regular payments at this time or if your financial situation is such that you would prefer to postpone beginning to repay your loan for some time, you should either write to us or take this letter to the Canada Immigration Centre nearest your home. Immigration officials will then discuss the situation with you.

However, should your financial position allow it, Immigration regulations stipulate that the loan be repaid within a period of — months upon arrival in Canada. To retire your loan within this period therefore would require a monthly payment of $—. The total amount outstanding is $—.

If the above schedule of repayments is realistic, all cheques or money orders should be made payable to the "Receiver General for Canada" and identified with your transportation account No—. A self-addressed envelope, which requires no postage is enclosed for your convenience. We would also appreciate your keeping this office informed of any change in your address.

Your co-operation in this matter is greatly appreciated.

Yours sincerely,
for Chief,
Revenue Accounting.

PENSION APPEALS BOARD

Question No. 1,274—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the required (a) total membership (b) distribution by province of the Pension Appeals Board?

2. What is the (a) name and date of appointment of each member (b) distribution by province of the Board?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) Under the provisions of section 85 of the Canada Pension Plan legislation, the pension appeals board consists of a chairman, a vice-chairman and not less than one and not more than eight other judges.

(b) There is no provision in the Canada Pension Plan legislation for distribution of appointments by provinces.

2. (a) Name	(a) Date of Appointment	(b) Province
Justice M. L. Tyrwhitt-Drake	August 23, 1966	British Columbia
Mr. Justice Jacques Boucher (Vice-Chairman)	March 13, 1969	Quebec

CIDA—PROJECTS IN INDIA

Question No. 1,277—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What CIDA projects, by name, location and type, are being undertaken in India and, in each case, what (a) was the date of commencement (b) is the projected date of completion?

2. In each case, how many (a) Canadian (b) local personnel are involved and (i) in what capacity (ii) for how long have they been involved (iii) for how long are they expected to continue on each project and what is the cost to Canada?

3. In each case, what (a) equipment (b) machinery (c) other material has Canada supplied and at what cost?

4. What CIDA projects, by name, location, type and cost projection are contemplated for India over the next three years and, in each case (a) what is the expected commencement and completion date (b) how many (i) Canadian (ii) local personnel will be involved?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1, 2 and 3. The following projects are currently being undertaken in India by CIDA:

Location:	Hyderabad, India
Type:	Experts, training, scholarships and associated equipment and supplies for agricultural research.
Date of Commencement:	Agreement signed April 1969.
Date of Completion:	1980
Canadian Personnel:	A team of Canadian agricultural experts has been in India since 1969 through successive stages of the project. At present there are five Canadians in the field who will remain until the completion of the project.
Local Personnel:	6 trainees
Project Cost:	Total cost estimated at $5,350,000, allocated approximately as follows: experts $2,205,300; training $57,400; equipment and supplies $3,087,300.

CIMMYT Training

Location:	India and Mexico
Type:	Grant to the International Maize and Wheat Improvement Centre (CIMMYT) in Mexico towards a program of training, consulting services, technical exchanges and equipment in support of wheat and maize research in India.

Oil and Natural Gas Sector Loan

Location:	All India
Type:	Line of credit for the purchase of approved equipment and supplies from Canada.
Date of Commencement:	Agreement signed June 1980.
Date of Completion:	1983
Cost:	$15,000,000
Canadian Personnel:	none
Local Personnel:	none

4. There are several projects in various stages of the planning process. Since those projects are yet to be completely defined and subsequently formally approved by India and Canada it is not possible to provide the specific information requested. In general these projects include: technical assistance for introducing agricultural extension programs in drylands areas; further support for agricultural credit; improvement of production and marketing of oilseeds using the proceeds of food aid provided from Canada; dairy development; provision of equipment and services for mineral development and processing; airport navigational aids equipment; the provision of turbines and generators for a major hydro-electric installation; and equipment for the telecommunications sector.

CNR—FREIGHT TRAINS THROUGH BROCKVILLE

Question No. 1,279—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways issue instructions to freight train engineers, as of June 29, 1980, that they are to proceed through the centre of the city of Brockville at 60 miles per hour on the south track and 40 miles per hour on the north track?

2. Do freight trains, at present, usually stop in Brockville to change crews and, if so, was the change in speed recommended because stops will no longer be made for such a purpose?

3. Did CNR or the government give consideration to the possible results of a derailment at 60 miles per hour particularly of trains carrying chemical cargoes, and the spill over from one train into another train on the other track within the city limits?

4. Will the government and/or CNR issue an order to all freight trains proceeding through Brockville on or after June 29, 1980, to reduce their speed substantially and (a) if so, what will the speed be (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. CN Rail did not issue instructions to freight train neers on June 29, 1980 with regard to the speed that they should travel through Brockville.

2. Since June 29, 1980, some freight trains do not stop in Brockville to change crews. There was no consequent recommended change in speed.

3. Canadian National considers safety of operations to be of prime consideration when establishing or changing procedures.

4. At Canadian National, safety is part of our goal in daily operation and it has not been found necessary to reduce train speed through Brockville as present speeds have not been detrimental to safe operations.

EDMONTON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Question No. 1,281—Mr. Lambert:

1. (a) What is the present status of the project or either section of it arising from the decision of the previous administration to go ahead with expansion and amelioration improvements to the Edmonton International Airport, as to the runways and to the terminal building (b) was there a review instituted of the decision and, if so, for what reason?

2. Is the government aware of the grave inconvenience being caused to the travelling public by the insufficiency of facilities, the long delays occasioned particularly to persons returning to Canada being processed through immigration and customs facilities?

3. What, if any, additional parking facilities for airline passengers, the general public and the increasing volume of employees may be forecast for early installation?

4. Is any serious consideration being given to any multi-storey parking in the immediate vicinity of the International Air Terminal so as to reduce the ever-lengthening walking requirements from ground level parking?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. (a) The project to expand and renovate the air terminal building at Edmonton International Airport is proceeding. Relatively minor changes have been made to the originally approved plans as a result of continuing study of some subsystems and consultation with carriers. The over-all project schedule has slipped three to four months.

A project to repair and strengthen some taxiways is programmed for summer 80/81 and a major project to overlay runway 01-19 and the paralled taxiways is programmed for 81/82—82/83.

(b) No review was made of the decision to expand and renovate the air terminal building other than the normal ongoing attention given to such major projects.

2. The government is aware of the deficiencies in the Edmonton International Air Terminal building and of the inconveniences this causes.

3. A project proposal was developed to add 1020 surface parking spaces to the existing 960 spaces during 1980/81 and

1981/82 at a cost of $4.7 million. Departmental and Treasury Board approvals have not been given to date for this proposal. Forecasts indicate the need for a doubling of parking spaces within the next two years.

4. Consideration is being given to providing a multi-storey parking structure at Edmonton in the future. The Minister of Transport in the previous administration directed that Transport adopt the strategy of providing surface parking expansion first in order to defer the probable large costs of a parking structure for five to six years.

MONITORED CONVERSATIONS—MOBILE TELEPHONES

Question No. 1,282—Mr. Beatty:

1. Does the government monitor conversations to and from mobile telephones and, if so, for what reason?

2. (a) How many employees are employed in monitoring such conversations (b) in what centres are they located and how many are located in each?

3. What regulations, if any, govern the monitoring of such communications in order to protect the privacy of the individuals involved?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows:

1. The government does not monitor conversations to and from mobile telephones. The Department of Communications, however, does conduct routine radio spectrum surveillance programs for the purpose of determining that the technical aspects of spectrum usage are in conformity with national and international regulations and technical standards established to ensure its effective use. Other specific requirements for monitoring are for the mitigation of interference to radio, television or other communication services or the utilization of scanning techniques to establish spectrum occupancy as an aid to the frequency assignment process.

2. A total of 13 people are involved in the department's monitoring program, none of which are employed for the purpose of monitoring the conversations to and from mobile telephones. Such stations are located at:

St. Lambert de Lévis, Quebec	4 employees
Acton, Ontario	5 employees
Fort Smith, N.W.T.	2 employees
Langley, B.C.	2 employees

3. The privacy sections of the Criminal Code (S.178.11(2)(d)) exempts an officer or servant of Her Majesty in right of Canada in respect of a private communication intercepted by him in the course of random monitoring that is incidental to radio frequency management. All personnel performing such duties, however, have signed an oath of secrecy. Additionally, section 9(2) of the Radio Act prohibits the divulging or making use of communications transmitted by other than broadcasting undertakings except under special circumstances. (courts of inquiry, etc.)

NATIONAL DEFENCE—TRANSPORTATION OF MUNITIONS

Question No. 1,288—Mr. Stewart:

1. Are obsolete munitions and rockets being transported through areas of Canada and, if so (a) since what date (b) what are the points of (i) origin (ii) destination in Canada?

2. Is such material transported from CFB Borden and, if so (a) by what means (b) how many times per week or month?

3. What is the safety record of such transportation including the number of accidents that have happened since it began and how many of the accidents could be classified as being potentially dangerous in any way?

4. What is the purpose of the transportation of such material?

5. What tests, if any, have been taken by any department to determine the dangers involved and what precautionary measures should be taken?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

(a) Since the early days of the establishment of armed forces in Canada.

(b) (i) (ii) The points of origin and destination could be any Canadian Forces facility with munitions storage capability.

2. Yes.

(a) Road or rail.

(b) There is not sufficient frequency to establish a times per week or month.

3. There is no record of a transportation accident resulting from the transport of obsolete munitions.

4. Disposal by sale; NATO aid; or destruction.

5. Transportation tests are conducted on munitions on introduction into service. These tests are valid for the srvice life of the store.

POST OFFICE—FLESHERTON, ONT.

Question No. 1,290—Mr. Mitges:

What was the total cost of the recent repairs to the roof, including insulation, of the Post Office in Flesherton, Ontario?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): The total cost of the recent repairs to the roof, including insulation, of the Post Office in Flesherton, Ontario was $3,921.

PUBLIC SERVICE—RECOMMENDATIONS—SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS

Question No. 1,291—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That students hired during their school vacation period be excluded from collective bargaining.

That the review of the Public Service Employment Act determine the process applicable to the appointment of casuals.

That the matter of length of casual service and its relationship to permanent or indeterminate appointment also be dealt with by the review recommended.

That the employer be able to release a casual employee without notice and without redress.

That after working 60 days in any continuous period of 6 months, casual employees be subject to the terms of the appropriate collective agreement.

That after working 60 days in any continuous period of 6 months, a casual employee will qualify for any retroactive pay due for days worked during the retroactive period.

and, if so, did the government implement the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): The government is aware of all of the recommendations by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February, 1976. The government has not implemented these recommendations as they require legislative amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act as well as in some cases, consequential amendments to other acts of Parliament.

The government is currently reviewing these recommendations as well as others related to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, namely those of Mr. Finkelman in 1974 and 1975, by the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability in March, 1979, and by the special review committee on personnel management and the merit principle in September, 1979. It is anticipated that, based on these various reports, comprehensive amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, Public Service Employment Act, Financial Administration Act and other acts will be introduced in parliament in due course.

Question No. 1,292—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February, 1976, as follows:

That where a bargaining agent conducts a strike vote, or submits a proposal for a collective agreement to its membership for approval,

(a) The vote should be carried out by secret ballot in accordance with procedures prescribed by regulations of the Public Service Staff Relations Board; and

(b) A breach of the regulations of the board in this respect should constitute a contravention of the act, and the union or persons concerned should be subject to the appropriate penalties.

That where a bargaining agent conducts a strike vote or submits a proposal for a collective agreement to the member of the unit for ratification, every member of the unit should be entitled to vote, and any act by a union or union official, or any other person, to prevent a member of the bargaining unit from voting should constitute an offence under the Act.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,293—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

Where the action of the employer results or will result in the termination of employment of an employee from a position in the public service, and the reasons alleged by the employer are misconduct, abandonment of position, incompetence or incapacity, the employee should be entitled to grieve the termination action.

Where the employee's grievance has not been dealt with to his satisfaction at the final level, he should be able to refer it to the Public Service Staff Relations Board for adjudication.

The adjudicator should be empowered to rescind the termination where he upholds the employee's grievance, or substitute other action if the employer's action was not well-founded but he should not be empowered to recommend or effect an alternate appointment.

The Public Service Commission should on request reappraise every employee whose employment in a position in the public service has been involuntarily terminated to assess whether the employee is suitable for appointment to another position.

An employee found suitable for appointment following reappraisal should be entitled to have his name entered on any appropriate eligibility list and for a period of time (e.g. one year) enter closed competitions.

Where the employee is appointed within the period referred to above, ordinary rules of continuity of employment should apply to him.

None of the procedures referred to above involving redress of grievance and opportunity for re-employment should apply to an employee who is offered and accepts another position in lieu of termination.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,294—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That the paragraph of the act which defines "person employed in a managerial or confidential capacity" be amended to read as follows:

"persons employed in a managerial or confidential capacity" means any person who

(a) Is employed in a position confidential to the Governor General, a Minister of the Crown, a judge of the Supreme or Federal Court of Canada, the deputy head of a department or the chief executive officer of any other portion of the Public Service;

(b) Is employed as a legal officer in the Department of Justice;

(c) Is employed as an officer or employee on the payroll of the Treasury Board;

(d) Is directly involved on behalf of the Public Service Commission in a formal process of

(i) Appointments

(ii) Consultation, or

(iii) Redress

prescribed by or under the Public Service Employment Act;

(e) Effectively participates in the determination of government policies or programs, or participates in the approval of plans of organization;

(f) exercises effective control over employees;

(g) (i) Is directly involved on behalf of the employer in the process of collective bargaining or consultation prescribed by this act or exercises appointing authority on behalf of the employer; or

(ii) Is primarily engaged in the administration of personnel policies or programs other than a person whose duties are of a routine or clerical nature;

(h) Is a person to whom the persons identified in subparagraphs (c), (d), (e), (f) or (g) are directly accountable in respect of the duties described in such sub-paragraphs; or

(i) Is engaged in confidential duties under the exclusive direction and control of a person or persons indentified in subparagraphs (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g) or (h) other than a person in a support capacity whose confidential duties relate solely to the processing of grievances at the first level in the grievance procedure established under this act, and includes any other person who, in the opinion of the board should not be included in a bargaining unit by reason of a conflict between his duties and responsibilities to the employer and any interest he might have as a member of a bargaining unit.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,295—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That the purpose of the pay research bureau continue to be that of supporting the collective bargaining process, to assist in the resolution of employer-employee disputes in the Public Service of Canada, and where appropriate to provide data to assist the collective bargaining process generally in the public sector.

That the independent character of the pay research bureau which has always been operationally independent of the government, the employer and the bargaining agents in the Public Service of Canada, continue to be maintained under the administrative control of the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

That the advisory committee on pay research established to assist the pay research bureau in the determination of program priorities and methods continue in this role and that the board encourage the involvement of all public service bargaining agents and all public service employers in the work of the committee with a view to widening the support which the bureau provides to the collective bargaining process.

That the pay research bureau's activities, methodology and information receive greater publicity so that its value and importance may receive wider recognition from employees in the Public Service of Canada as well as from the general public, thereby influencing the collective bargaining process and assisting in the resolution of employer-employee disputes.

That wherever possible and without detracting from its primary purpose, the pay research bureau be encouraged to make available its reports for public distribution.

That the pay research bureau be empowered to co-operate with similar agencies in other jurisdictions in Canada towards the most efficient and effective gathering, presentation and distribution of employment data.

That, in order to achieve the aim of the above recommendations, the Public Service Staff Relations Act provide for a Pay Research Bureau, subject to the direction and regulation of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, to collect, analyse, present and make available data relating to terms and conditions of employment and related matters in public and private employment.

That, recognizing the complexity of the issues faced by the Public Service Staff Relations Board in the discharge of its responsibilities including the rendering of arbitration awards within the terms of reference established by section 68 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Board be encouraged to undertake to improve the arbitration process.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, why not?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,296—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That changes in technology, operations, organization or any other dimension of the structure or character of the employer's resources to provide service to the public be recognized as a prerogative of the employer.

That the employer be obliged to bargain the impact of adverse changes on employees which may occur as a consequence of the employer's action referred to above, including the advance notice of such changes and the details to accompany the notice.

That the Public Service Staff Relations Board have the authority and responsibility to provide for a mediator to assist the parties where there are differences.

That the Public Service Staff Relations Board be empowered to arbitrate or to establish an arbitration tribunal to arbitrate unresolved disputes arising out of negotiations undertaken to deal with technological change.

That resort to strike or lockout to resolve technological change disputes be prohibited.

That the statute prohibit the employer from laying off an employee during the period of notice recommended above, and that the parties be empowered to negotiate, and the arbitrator to establish where relevant, the compensation to be paid to employees whose job security will be or has been adversely affected by the changes.

That any agreement reached or arbitration award made as a result of negotiations involving technological change be treated under the law as a "special agreement" (or award) superseding the provisions and term of the ordinary collective agreement entered into by the parties and operative for such period as may be prescribed in the special agreement or award.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,297—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That classification grievances which are not resolved in the grievance process should be referrable to adjudications.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,298—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That, having regard to the established jurisdiction of bargaining agents in the Public Service, bargaining classification standards be interpreted to mean the determination of the relative worth of jobs within an occupational group.

That provision be made in the law for the bargaining of classification standards following the three-year period after promulgation.

That collective agreements incorporating classification standards be treated as "special agreements having their own duration".

That in accordance with regulations made by the Public Service Staff Relations Board, disputes arising in negotiations and involving the development or redevelopment of a classification standard be subject to reference to and arbitration by the board.

That the provisions of the act relating to the appointment of conciliation boards or conciliators not apply in cases of disputes arising out of the negotiations of classification standards, but that the board be empowered to appoint a mediator.

That resort to strike or lockout to resolve classification disputes be prohibited.

That arbitration of the pay plan attached to a classification standard be dealt with by the Public Service Staff Relations Board only with the consent of both parties.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,299—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That the Public Service Staff Relations Board, upon application, and when it finds that there is an unlawful strike or lockout, be empowered to issue a cease and desist order in all cases of violation.

That such an order be filed in court and entered in the same manner as a judgment and be enforceable as such.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, why not?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,300—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That fines levied by the Public Service Staff Relations Board on employees, or officials of the employer, or on a bargaining agent, be recoverable if necessary by an order of the court.

That where the employer is in contravention, the Public Service Staff Relations Board should be required to provide the minister through whom it reports to parliament, with a description of the offence, and the minister should be required to table the Public Service Staff Relations Board's report in parliament within a prescribed period.

That where the action has been taken in the case of the employer by a department or agency, or in the case of a bargaining agent by a component, division or local of the bargaining agent, the department, agency, component, division or local should be identified.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, why not?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,301—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That where "designated employees" have interrupted or impaired services by an unlawful strike or there has been an unlawful lockout and no action has been initiated by the employer or bargaining agent against the contravening parties, then a Special Commissioner whose office shall be independent should be empowered to initiate legal proceedings.

That the Special Commissioner's authority to initiate proceedings be limited to the period beginning 15 days after the date of the alleged contravention, and terminating 45 days later.

That the Special Commissioner should not be able to initiate any action against any person if a proceeding in respect to that offence has already been initiated.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,302—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That unlawful offences under the act be dealt with by identifying the party, the nature of the illegal activity, the available option and the forum before which the hearing would take place, and also the maximum penalties for each unlawful activity.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,303—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That the Public Service Staff Relations Act be amended to require the designation of all employees whose functions involve the provision of services which in accordance with this act are to be provided without interruption.

That the bargaining agents and the employers continue to be required to determine, by agreement, the employees in the bargaining units who are to be designated.

That the Public Service Staff Relations Board continue to be empowered to make determinations regarding the appropriateness of a "designation" where the parties cannot reach agreement.

That, where necessary, the techniques of examination, mediation and reference to established precedent be employed to resolve disagreements in connection with the determination of designated employees and to assist in what will be initially an extensive task.

That permanent lists of designated employees for each bargaining unit be filed with the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

That the Public Service Staff Relations Board establish appropriate processes for ensuring that the lists of positions and incumbents are kept up to date and for dealing with proposed amendments in the lists submitted to it by the employer or the bargaining agents concerned.

That the incumbents of the designated positions be informed by the Public Service Staff Relations Board of their obligation under the act with special reference to the penalties for unlawful activity.

That the proceses referred to in recommendation 20 distinguish among proposals which involve a change in incumbent, a new position comparable to a position previously designated, and a position in respect of which the employer cannot rely on a precedent.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,304—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That three procedural remedies be available for dealing with unlawful actions:

(i) Disciplinary action by the employer, reviewable through the grievance process and adjucation.

(ii) Prosecution of an offence before the Public Service Staff Relations Board and disposition of the case by the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

(iii) Prosecution of an offence in the courts after obtaining consent to prosecute from the Public Service Staff Relations Board and disposition of the case by the courts.

That the statute provide a schedule of offences and penalties applicable to the class of offence.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,305—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That the law be revised to provide for the designation of employees:

To protect members of the public against an imminent threat to their health, where the withdrawal of services would pose such a threat.

To ensure the continuation of important experiments particularly long-term experiments or research where the withdrawal of services would place them in jeopardy.

To maintain the necessary physical environment for the security of national treasures.

To ensure that temperature of all public buildings does not fall below 5° Celsius.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,306—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That the President of the Privy Council, upon the recommendation of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, acting on his own initiative or upon application, may refer a dispute or difference between employer and employee that exists or is apprehended to exist to an inquiry commission for investigation and report to the President of the Privy Council.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, why not?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,307—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That when parliament is dissolved, the governor-in-council be empowered to suspend the right to strike, whenever in its opinion a strike is adverse to the public interest.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,308—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That the general principle of collective bargaining law governing the Public Service of Canada is sound and the rights granted should not be withdrawn merely to overcome inconvenience.

That the bargaining agents, subject to the conditions of the statute and the recommendations to follow, continue to be able to choose arbitration or conciliation-strike, as the method of dispute resolution.

That there is a need for additional procedural and substantive amendments to the law governing the collective bargaining relationship, and more appropriate remedies for unlawful activity.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,309—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That certain revisions to the Public Service Employment Act be made immediately to allow the Public Service Commission to operate efficiently under the present statute and that the Public Service Commission, after consultation with the bargaining agents and the employer, develop proposals for such revisions.

That parliament consider the proposed changes to the Public Service Employment Act as soon as possible, bearing in mind their relationship to changes recommended in the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

Question No. 1,310—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of the recommendation by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee relations in the Public Service in a report to parliament in February 1976 as follows:

That a special task force be established to review the Public Service Employment Act and the role of the commission in personnel management and employer-employee relations in the Public Service; and

That the review include an examination of the role assigned the Public Service Commission and its relationship to the Treasury Board secretariat and the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

That the review entail a study of the relationship of the Public Service Commission and the departments and agencies; and consider the development of an audit system for performance accountability with respect to matters delegated to departments and agencies under the Public Service Employment Act.

and, if so, has the government implemented the recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): See reply to question No. 1,291 answered this day.

PROGRAMS—RENEWABLE ENERGY RESOURCES

Question No. 1,311—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. Are any programs which are designed to promote the use of renewable energy resources underway in the (a) Department of Energy, Mines and Resources (b) Department of Public Works, apart from PASEM and PUSH (c) Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation (d) Department of Agriculture (e) Department of Supply and Services (f) National Research Council and, if so, in each case, what is the (i) name of the program (ii) budget?

2. Are reports available for any or all of the programs?

Mr. David Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is concerned:

1. (a) Yes

(i) Program	(ii) Budget
Forest Industry Renewable Energy (F.I.R.E.) Program	$104 million over five years

Federal-Provincial Agreements for the Development and Demonstration of Conservation and Renewable Energy Technologies	$113.8 million over five years

2. No.

In so far as Public Works Canada is concerned:

1. (b) Yes

(i) and (ii) Apart from the PUSH and PASEM programs Public Works Canada is charged with the Low Energy Building Design Awards Program which seeks to encourage the adoption of energy efficient commercial and industrial building designs and systems, with particular emphasis on benefiting from passive solar heating techniques. The budget for this program is $420,000.

2. Yes, reports are available for the Low Energy Building Design Awards Program.

In so far as the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is concerned:

1. CMHC has no program in operation designed specifically to promote the use of renewable energy resources. The corporation does however collaborate with Public Works Canada in the PASEM and PUSH programs and, through its appraisal technique, makes appropriate allowance for solar energy installations.

2. No.

In so far as Agriculture Canada is concerned:

1. (d) Yes.

(i) Energy under the contracting-out program.

(ii) For 1980-81, 23 contracts at an estimated cost of $476,200.

2. Yes.

In so far as Supply and Services is concerned:

1 and 2. Although DSS acts as a service agency in support of the operational programs of other federal government departments and agencies, it has not been the originator of in-house programs for the use of renewable energy resources.

In so far as the National Research Council is concerned:

1. (f) NRC is responsible for R/D programs to develop technology relating to renewable energy resources. NRC does not administer any programs designed to promote the use of renewable energy resources.

2. Not applicable.

PROGRAM OF ASSISTANCE TO SOLAR EQUIPMENT MANUFACTURERS (PASEM)

Question No. 1,312—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. Since the inception of PASEM (Program of Assistance to Solar Equipment Manufacturers), which firms have been awarded moneys for the manufacture of solar equipment, and what amount per year did each receive?

2. On what date is it estimated that the evaluations which are being made of the Department of Public Works buildings by the firms, and the resultant proposals for the installation of hot water systems on certain of the buildings, will be completed?

3. Will the evaluations and proposals be made available to the public?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1. Firms

Firms	Contract Amount	Crown's Share	Expended 79/80	Expended 80/81*
Amherst Renewable Energy Perth, Ontario	$ 366,042	$ 245,546	$ 86,575	$ 43,783

Total	$3,911,129	$2,527,522	$965,002	$262,543

*To July 16, 1980

2. The solar programs office is charged with the management and administration of the PUSH Program which is expected over the five-year duration of the program to contract over 2000 solar heating systems on federal government buildings (for many departments) and for buildings owned and operated by various Crown corporations.

This is an ongoing process and currently the solar programs office is evaluating feasibility studies, design studies and detailed designs for over 200 projects. These projects are not restricted to the PASEM winners.

The PASEM winners have been given the opportunity to develop turnkey proposals for suitable solar installations to demonstrate their product, state of the solar construction art in Canada as a means of providing base line information in the evaluation of future proposals. These projects are currently being scheduled for completion by the end of September.

3. The proposals and evaluation procedures are not confidential. The solar programs office have a view to educating the Canadian solar design and engineering community.

The general designs and cost estimates of these projects as well as all other PUSH funded projects will be available to the public as part of the information/publication strategy.

PURCHASE AND USE OF SOLAR HEATING PROGRAM (PUSH)

Question No. 1,313—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. Since the inception of PUSH (Purchase and Use of Solar Heating) program, what amount of the $125 million initially allocated has been spent to date?

2. How many purchases of solar space and water-heating equipment were made by the government under PUSH and, in each case (a) what was the dollar amount (b) on what date was it made (c) what type of equipment was purchased and where was it installed?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1. $2,376,000.

2. The following purchases of equipment were made under the PUSH program:

(a)	(b)	(c)
$25,400.00	October 1979	Domestic Hot Water and Space Heating Manager's Residence Gunton, Manitoba
$12,900.00	November 1979	Domestic Hot Water and Space Heating Office and Maintenance Building Haliburton, Ontario
$ 4,000.00	November 1979	Domestic Hot Water Rideau Canal Bldgs. 3 Bldgs. Ontario

The above projects are complete. The following projects are still underway:

(a)	(b)	(c)
$23,000.00	March 1980	Solar Panels Petawawa Ntl. Forestry Institute Petawawa, Ontario
$ 8,540.00	April 1980	Domestic Hot Water CEIC Bldg. Sherbrooke, Québec
$12,300.00	April 1980	Domestic Hot Water Côté Bldg. St-Jean, Québec
$14,000.00	April 1980	Domestic Hot Water Federal Bldg. Granby, Québec
$14,000.00	April 1980	Domestic Hot Water Federal Bldg. Drummondville, Québec

PRINCESS PATRICIA REGIMENT—ALBERTA

Question No. 1,318—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Are the Princess Patricias stationed in Alberta and, if so, in what location?

2. Are members of the regiment drawing welfare payments or have any of them ever done so and, if so (a) how many and what are/were the ranks involved (b) are/were they drawing such payments because of the high rentals being charged to them with a result that they have little left for food, etc. and, if not, what are/were the reasons (c) will or has the government taken steps to correct the situation and (i) if so, what are/were they (ii) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes, Calgary.

2. (a) (b) (c) The Department of National Defence is not aware of any members of the regiment who are or ever were drawing Alberta's social allowance.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Question No. 1,320—Mr. Friesen:

1. What was the Canadian Film Development Corporation's advertising budget for 1979?

2. What is the projected advertising budget for 1980?

3. What amount did CFDC spend on (a) advertising (b) entertainment and accomodation at the Cannes Film Festival in (i) 1979 (ii) 1980?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows:

1. In 1979-80, the Canadian Film Development Corporation spent $54,208 on advertising.

2. The CFDC's advertising budget for 1980-81 is $50,000.

3. In 1979-80: $198,000 In 1980-81: $220,000

(including transportation, accommodation, promotional and advertising expenses—in other words, all expenses incurred for the Cannes Festival before, during and after the event).

NATIONAL DEBT

Question No. 1,331—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the per capita national debt in Canada?

2. In proportion to the population, is Canada's deficit approximately double that of the United States and, if not, how does it compare with the United States?

3. What percentage of the annual expenditures in the current fiscal year will be consumed by interest payments on the national debt?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. The term "national debt" has been interpreted as the public debt of the federal government in the response to this inquiry. The federal government's public debt is recorded on both a gross and net basis with the difference being the net recorded assets of the federal government. The per capita gross debt was $4,169 as of March 31, 1979, and is estimated to have been $4,479 as of March 31, 1980. The per capita net debt was $2,360 of March 31, 1979, and is estimated to have been $2,818 as of March 31, 1980. As a percentage of GNP the gross debt has been reduced from 55.7 per cent in 1962 to 40.7 per cent as of March 31, 1980. Similarly, the net debt has fallen over the same period from 33.4 per cent of GNP to 26 per cent of GNP.

2. The most comparable figures for the Canadian and United States deficits are those on a national accounts basis, where the per capita Canadian federal government deficit was $386 in 1979, while that of the United States federal government was $48. The most comparable debt figures are for the total outstanding unmatured debt. For the Canadian federal government, the per capita value for this series on March 31, 1980, was $3,018. That of the United States federal government was $3,946.

3. In the Minister of Finance's April 21 address, total public debt charges, including commissions, discounts, premiums and servicing costs, were forecast at some $10.8 billion for the 1980-81 fiscal year. This represented 17.9 per cent of the projected total outlays of $60.4 billion for 1980-81. Since that time the Minister of Finance has indicated that the speed of the decline in interest rates is likely to result in debt charges being somewhat lower than in the April forecast. This would result in those charges representing a slightly smaller percentage of total outlays.

MESSRS. FILLMORE AND LEBLANC

Question No. 1,332—Mr. Cossitt:

Were employees named Fillmore and Leblanc released from service in 1979 from Dorchester Penitentiary, New Brunswick and, if so (a) on what dates (b) for what reasons?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): In so far as the Correctional Service of Canada is concerned:

Messrs. Fillmore and Leblanc resigned from the Correctional Service of Canada.

(a) February 23, 1979.

(b) The Correctional Service of Canada considers that reasons for an employee's resignation are personal and respectfully suggest that the best source from which to obtain this information would be the individual himself.

CANADIAN EMBASSY—MOSCOW—LOCALLY ENGAGED STAFF

Question No. 1,333—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 164 which asked in part, the names, addresses, job designations, salaries and reasons for leaving of Russian citizens who have resigned posts at the Canadian embassy in Moscow, what are all the reasons that the government was only able to give the names and the reasons for leaving?

2. Does the government possess the addresses and salaries of Russian nationals working at the embassy in Moscow and (a) if so, what are they (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1.

Employee	Position Title	Salary
Davydova, L.	Commercial Officer	Rbls 4,380 p.a
Fatyanova, A.	Translator	Rbls 3,060 p.a.
Kuritsin, S.	Driver	Rbls 3,240 p.a.
Nuestroyev, V.	Driver	Rbls 3,360 p.a.
Popikov, A.	Driver	Rbls 3,060 p.a.
Mishen, S.	Driver	Rbls 3,120 p.a.
Cherkasova, L.	Consular Translator	Rbls 3,060 p.a.
Nilubov, V.	Driver	Rbls 3,060 p.a.

2. The government does possess the addresses, however, they are not given since departmental policy in keeping with the spirit of the Canadian Human Rights Act is not to provide such personal information on its employees.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION LOANS TO U.S.S.R.

Question No. 1,335—Mr. Vankoughnet:

1. Did the Export Development Corporation provide loans or loan guarantees to the USSR for the purchase of equipment, licenses, services, technical documentation and know-how, to construct, expand and modernize the Soviet auto industry and, if so, in what amount?

2. Will the money be repaid in dollars or by the delivery of products?

3. Is there any provision to ship Canadian cars to Russia?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)): Export Development Corporation states that:

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

DEFENCE—PER CAPITA SPENDING

Question No. 1,338—Mr. Herbert:

1. What has been the estimated per capita spending for defence in each of the past five years expressed in constant dollars and, in each year, what percentage of that cost was spent outside Canada?

2. To the knowledge of the government, what is the present approximate per capita spending for defence by the United States?

Hon. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): 1. The per capita spending for defence has been calculated for each fiscal year and then adjusted to 1979-80 dollars using the Statistics Canada implicit price index for gross national expenditures.

	Department of National Defence	Defence Expenditures NATO Definition
1975-76	180	192
1976-77	183	195
1977-78	189	203
1978-79	192	207
1979-80	182	197

(1) In addition to Department of National Defence expenditures this column includes other government departments expenditures which fall within the NATO definition of defence spending, such as:

accommodation, assistance to industry, medical assistance plans, grants in lieu of taxes, etc.

The percentage of defence expenditures outside Canada was as follows:

1975-6	9 per cent
1976-77	11 per cent
1977-78	13 per cent
1978-79	15 per cent
1979-80	18 per cent

2. For 1979-80 exceeding $550 (U.S.)

FEDERAL SALES TAX—EXEMPTION FOR INFORMATION BOOKLETS

Question No. 1,339—Mr. Cossitt:

Will the government consider the advisability of introducing legislation to make directories, travel guides and tourist information booklets put out by chambers of commerce and which contain advertising exempt from federal sales tax since they are of a non-profit or charitable nature and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): The federal sales tax of 9 per cent is a levy of general application which falls upon most goods. Sales and excise taxes generate a significant portion of government revenues.

The Excise Tax Act does not generally provide exemption from the sales tax on purchases by non-profit or charitable organizations because of the difficulty of identifying persons in those categories.

It would also be difficult to provide sales tax relief for printed advertising matter which is intended to assist the tourist industry without providing similar relief for advertising matter purchased by all other industries. But proceeding in that manner would entail an unacceptable revenue loss.

CANADIAN BANKS—PROFITS

Question No. 1,342—Mr. Flis:

1. What percentage of the profits made by Canadian banks are being re-invested into the domestic economy?

2. What percentage is leaving Canada?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): In 1979, 67 per cent of the chartered banks' after tax profits were earned on domestic business in Canada and 33 per cent were earned from international business. The banks distributed about 30 per cent of their total profits to shareholders in the form of dividends; since 92 per cent of the banks' shareholders reside in Canada and 8 per cent reside abroad, 27.6 per cent of the banks' profits remained in Canada and 2.4 per cent went abroad.

The 70 per cent of profits not paid out as dividends was reinvested by the banks. Last year, 65 per cent of the banks' assets were related to domestic business and 35 per cent to international business. However, since the banks' international assets are generally funded from non-Canadian sources, the bulk of retained profits was reinvested in Canada.

SOVIET MILITARY ATTACHÉS—TRAVEL TO OTHER PARTS OF CANADA

Question No. 1,345—Mr. Jelinek:

1. How many Soviet Military Attachés, restricted to the confines of the national capital region, have asked for special permits to travel in other parts of Canada in the past (a) six months (b) year (c) two years (d) three years (e) five years and what are their names and their position?

2. How many times did each apply and how many applications were (a) approved (b) rejected?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). See list A.

Names and positions are listed in list B.

2. (a) and (b);

Frequency of application is listed in list A and all travel was approved except for one occasion when two officers to the same destination and in the same time frame were denied permission.

QUEEN'S SQUARE—DARTMOUTH, N.S.

Question No. 1,347—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Do any departments occupy space in Queen's Square, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, and, if so (a) which ones (b) how many square feet is occupied?

2. Will other departments be moving into the premises and, if so, how many?

3. How many tenders were called for space for departments in the Halifax-Dartmouth area since June, 1969?

4. Will any further tenders be called this year and, if so (a) for what space requirement (b) for which departments or agencies?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes.

(a) Department of Veteran's Affairs Department of Regional Economic Espansion Canadian Labour Relations Board

(b) 3092.4 m² (33,287 sq. ft.) rentable.

2. There is no commitment to locate other government departments into Queen's Square, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia.

3. 15.

4. The Halifax/Dartmouth accommodation plan is now under review and it has not been determined at this date if further tenders will be called this year. However, pending this decision the following tenders are planned.

(a) 7740 m² (83,313 sq. ft.) rentable.

(b) Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission: Halifax South District Office, area 985 m² (10,602 sq. ft.). Halifax South area only (tenders closed).

Environment Canada: area 2855 m² (30,731 sq. ft.) (tenders called)

Public Works Canada: area 3900 m² (41,797 sq. ft.).

MR. ROSS CAMPBELL

Question No. 1,348—Miss MacDonald:

1. Did Mr. Ross Campbell leave his position as vice-president of Atomic Energy of Canada International and, if so (a) on what date (b) what are the terms of his pension?

2. Is Mr. Campbell presently employed by the government or any of its agencies, or has he been employed at any time since he retired as vice-president of Atomic Energy of Canada and, if so, what are the terms and conditions of this employment and what remuneration does he or did he receive?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

1. Yes, Mr. Ross Campbell left his position as president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited-International.

(a) December 31, 1979;

(b) Mr. Campbell is receiving benefits under the Public Service Superannuation Act.

2. Mr. Campbell is presently providing consultant services on a limited basis in the field of international relations to AECL. He is paid on a per diem rate.

CMHC—RURAL AND NATIVE HOUSING PROGRAM—MINTO, N.B.

Question No. 1,350—Mr. Howie:

In the fiscal year 1979, were any houses constructed under the Rural and Native Housing Program at Minto, New Brunswick, for CMHC and, if so (a) how many (b) from whom was the land purchased and at what cost, in each case?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

CMHC assisted in financing three units under the Rural and Native Housing Program which were built in Minto, New Brunswick during 1979. Details on the land are as follows:

	Vendor	Price
1 unit—Lake Road	L. Dicarlo	$3,500
1 unit—Lake Road	L. Dicarlo	$3,500
1 unit—New Avon Rd.	T. Thibodeau	$3,000

CMHC—RURAL AND NATIVE HOUSING PROGRAM—NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,351—Mr. Howie:

1. Does CMHC have any houses under construction under the Rural and Native Housing Program at (a) Albrights Corner (b) Newcastle Creek (c) Gary (d) Hoytt, in the County of Sunbury, New Brunswick and, if so (i) how many (ii) from whom was the land purchased and at what cost, in each case?

2. Were public tenders called for the construction of the houses and, if not, for what reason?

3. Were tenders called by invitation and, if so, what persons or firms were invited to bid?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

1(a), (b), (c), (d) and (i);

CMHC has assisted in financing the following units under the Rural and Native Housing Program which are either under construction or proposed:

1 unit at Albrights Corner under construction;

1 unit at Newcastle Creek under construction;

2 units at Geary to be built;

1 unit at Hoytt to be built;

(ii) Details on land are as follows:

	Vendor	Price
1 unit—Albrights Corner	David Jordan	$3,200
1 unit—Newcastle Creek	Brian Glen	$3,500
1 unit—Geary I	A & C Holdings Ltd.	$3,200
1 unit—Geary II	A & C Holdings Ltd.	$3,500
1 unit—Hoytt	Ross Kirkpatrick	$1,500

2. In the case of the units referred to in (1) above, no public tenders were called. During the 1979 building season, little response was received in those cases where a public tender technique was used; the response generally coming from the same two or three large modular construction companies. To gain participation from smaller local builders, it was decided to seek bids utilizing the invitational method.

3. Invitational bids were received from two construction companies: Williston Homes Ltd. and Carr & Rogers Construction.

RCMP BUILDING—MINTO, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,355—Mr. Corbett:

1. Is an RCMP building under construction in Minto, New Brunswick and, if so, from whom was the land purchased and at what cost?

2. Did the village of Minto protest the location of the building?

Mr. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): (1) The Royal Canadian Mounted Police Building is presently under construction in Minto, New Brunswick. Two parcels of land were purchased from two parties, Les Religieuses de Notre Dame du Sacre-Coeur in the amount of $6,500. and Louis and Glenna Dicarlo in the amount of $18,500.

(2) The department received the usual approvals from the town, such as the Subdivision and Building Permits, and is not aware of any protests.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—TRISERVICE UNIFORMS

Question No. 1,361—Mr. Blenkarn:

What would be the cost of providing separate distinct uniforms for the Navy, Air Force and Army over and above the cost of supplying one standard uniform for all branches of the service?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): $26,400,000.

CMHC—RRAP AND CHIP PROGRAMS—CONSTITUENCY OF OXFORD

Question No. 1,365—Mr. Halliday:

For the fiscal year (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79, how many persons in the constituency of Oxford applied for assistance and received monetary assistance under the (i) Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program (ii) Canadian Home Improvement Program?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

(i) Data on NHA activity are compiled by CMHC on the basis of municipal counties and not on the basis of federal electoral constituencies. In this instance the federal constituency of Oxford consists of the whole of the county of Oxford. There was no activity under the Rehabilitation Assistance Program in this county during the period 1977 to 1979.

(ii) CHIP statistics are available on a provincial basis only.

CANADA COUNCIL—LIST OF ITEMS PURCHASED

Question No. 1,370—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the supplement to the Canada Council 22nd annual report for 1978-79 which lists a total of $603,300 for the purchase of certain items for the Canada Council art bank along with the names of the artists, what is a complete list and description of the items purchased from each artist including the cost of the item and the Canada Council's plans for its use?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows:

Data concerning each work of the art bank collection is recorded, for working purposes, on a card index. Compiling this information would involve an inordinate amount of staff time and expense. The complete art bank record system is now being computerized so that detailed information of the kind requested by the member will be available in the future.

All works purchased through the art bank are intended for lease to government departments and other non-profit agencies in accordance with established council policy governing the collection.

MOOSEHIDE CREEK—YUKON TERRITORY

Question No. 1,392—Mr. Schellenberger:

Did the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development give its approval for the staking of placer claims on Moosehide Creek in the Yukon Territory and, if so, will the Department guarantee that the claims will in no way contaminate the domestic water supply of the Moosehide Indian Reserve?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The staking of claims under the Yukon Placer Mining Act does not require the approval of the department. Section 17 of this act states that any individual 18 years or older may stake claims upon any lands in the territory with the exception of some areas such as national parks and cemeteries.

If it is determined that the band uses Moosehide Creek for domestic purposes, future use of the creek by miners could be licensed under the Northern Inland Waters Act. The terms and conditions would be such as to protect the quality of the water.

CIDA—LATIN AMERICAN WORKING GROUP

Question No. 1,419—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. In the past decade, has CIDA given any money to the Latin American Working Group and, if so, how much and for what project(s)?

2. In the past five years, has the International Development Research Centre made any grants to the Latin American Working Group and, if so, how much and for what project(s)?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned: No.

In so far as the International Development Research Centre is concerned: No.

UNITED STATES EMBASSY IN OTTAWA

Question No. 1,422—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of External Affairs aware if the United States Embassy in Ottawa has been refusing to accept Canadian postal money orders in United States dollars as payment for various service fees charged by the embassy and (a) if not, will the government investigate the situation (b) if so (i) will the government make public all the reasons that the embassy finds Canadian postal money orders unacceptable (ii) will the department make representations to have the situation changed?

2. Is the Department aware that the latest incident, as of the date this question was asked, occurred on July 9, 1980?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Department of External Affairs can confirm that the United States Embassy in Ottawa does not accept Canadian postal money orders in United States dollars as payment for consular fees.

(a) Not applicable.

(b) (i) It is United States government policy.

(ii) The department will not be making representations to have the situation changed.

2. The U.S. Embassy has advised the department that infrequently instruments of payment are presented that are not accepted. No record is kept of these occasions.

INDIAN CONDITIONS—A SURVEY

Question No. 1,423—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What was the total cost of preparing and publishing the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's publication Indian Conditions—A Survey, prepared by Mr. R. H. Knox, director general, program support, Indian and Inuit Affairs Program?

2. Were consultants contracted in the preparation of the report and, if so (a) how much was each paid by the department and by any other department or agency (b) what were their names (c) who selected them and by what method?

Hon. C. John Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development):

1. Salaries (term employees)	$ 35,538.40
Administrative expenses:	56,886.41
Contracts:	154,515.45
Total cost:	246,940.26

2. Yes, consultants were contracted as listed below:

(a) and (b)

W. Badcock	$ 11,813.05
M. Giuliani	21,100.40
J. Nicholson	35,000.00
G. Cassidy	7,620.00
Systems Approach Consultants Ltd.	6,980.00

Aerographics	23,054.00
C.R.O.P. Ltd.	6,795.00
DOE—Canada Land Data Systems	703.00
	$154,515.45

All contracts were paid by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

(c) Method of selection was as follows:

1. A series of tasks were identified that would require contracting personnel.

2. A short list of names was prepared of suitable individuals based on the recommendations of various components of the Indian Affairs program, including the research and evaluation branches, using criteria including the familiarity with the Indian Affairs Program the experience in the preparation of reports and in the development of government policy, and skills in data analysis and financial analysis.

3. Potential contractors were interviewed.

4. Contracts were agreed based on specific terms of reference identified in relation to each project.

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LTD.—DOMINION BRIDGE CONTRACT

Question No. 1,425—Mr. Cullen:

1. Did Dominion Bridge, when bidding on contracts for construction of F-2 cells through C.E. Lummus for Eldorado Nuclear Limited, have the privilege of conforming, after the close of the bid period, to the conditions of the contract?

2. Were the terms and conditions outlined in the "Scope of Work" submitted by a competitor used as a basis for placing an order with Dominion Bridge?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Eldorado Nuclear Limited reports as follows:

1. No. Dominion Bridge was selected after exhaustive analysis of the bid price and technical capability to perform the work in accordance with the specifications and tolerances required in the fabrication of the fluorine cells.

2. No. The "Scope of Work" and in particular the design of the fluorine cells provided by ENL and Lummus Company of Canada Limited was issued to all companies selected to bid on the contract.

CONSTITUENCIES—TOLL CHARGES

Question No. 1,427—Mr. Halliday:

1. How many constituencies require the payment of a toll charge to telephone between any two points within the constituency?

2. How many constituencies lie completely within an urban municipal boundary?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. The information requested does not come within the administrative responsibility of the government.

2. Ninety-seven electoral districts lie completely within an urban area as defined in section 11 of the Canada Elections Act, which reads as follows: "an incorporated city or town having a population of five thousand or more". A list of the electoral districts involved is attached.

DAY-CARE CENTRES—ONTARIO

Question No. 1,448—Mr. Flis:

Did any day-care centres in Ontario apply to the government in (a) 1978 (b) 1979 for a charitable tax number in order to issue receipts for income tax deductions and, if so (i) how many (ii) by month and number of applications, how much time did it take to process the application?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): While a number of daycare centres in Ontario have been registered as a charity for purposes of the Income Tax Act during 1978 and 1979, the requested statistical data is not available. Statistics on the numbers of applications received and dealt with are maintained, but a breakdown by particular type and geographic area is not compiled.

The time taken by the officials of the department to process applications during the period in question fluctuated between six and ten weeks and depended on the volume of applications being received and the complexity of the application. The department adheres to a policy of processing applications in the order they are received and registration is normally retroactive to the date of incorporation or start of operations.

POST OFFICE—NISKU, ALBERTA

Question No. 1,452—Mr. Schellenberger:

Does the government have any plans to expand the post office facilities at Nisku, Alberta in 1980 and (a) if so, what are such plans (b) if not, is any action planned for 1981?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes.

(a) and (b).

Approval was given in the latter part of 1979 for a new or improved facility in Nisku. It is on Public Works' priority list and they are in the process of negotiating for improved premises at this time.

SOVIET UNION WAR VETERANS

Question No. 1,455—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware that there are a certain number of Soviet Union war veterans who are now residents of Canada but who are not eligible for war pensions because the USSR cut off such pensions when they left the country and, if so, what is the estimated number?

2. Is it a requirement that such allied veterans must live in Canada for 10 years before being considered for any war veterans allowance benefits and, if so (a) will the government give immediate consideration to reducing the 10 year limit to 3 years or less (b) what would be the estimated cost to the government if this extra financial expense was permitted and is it in the neighbourhood of only $250,000 maximum per year?

3. Is it government policy to consider that war veterans of the USSR served as allies with Canada during the second world war and in particular, that those who have emigrated to Canada and become landed immigrants and in many cases Canadian citizens, are worthy of consideration for benefits?

Hon. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. Yes, we are aware that there are a number of Soviet Union war veterans residing in Canada. It is estimated that they are 110 in number.

In accordance with section 50 of the Pension Act, disabled veterans of the armed forces of any of our wartime allies must have been domiciled in Canada at the date of the commencement of World War II to be eligible for any Canadian disability pension benefit.

2. Yes.

(a) No consideration is being given at the present time to reduce the residency requirement. In 1950 the government made provision which extended the definition of "veteran" to include those allies who had resided in Canada for 20 years. In 1960 this was reduced to ten years. This ten-year requirement also exists in similar income support programs such as Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplement.

(b) A change in the residency requirement for this group would necessitate changing it for all allied veterans and as we have no means of determining how many allied veterans would be affected, we are unable to determine the cost of such a change.

3. Any allied veteran, including veterans of the U.S.S.R., who have completed ten years of residency in Canada and who have never served in the enemy forces in World War II, can be considered for benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act.
