"Know where I am? Certainly I do!" he exclaimed. "I've been here before—spent two months here once. And, by the by, we're just in town. Don't you hear the music?" "Yes, but I'd know we were in town without that," I answered.

"Not so deep in town, though," he rejoined, "for there is a 'fandango' up there, my boy. See," he continued, slapping me on the back, "see what a thing it is to travity in good company. We have the entre

"Or." said Jerry, "as they say here, Mucho bueno.' Speak Spanish, my boy, or you will never get along here, for d—the word do any of these people know of Eng lish."

"Well, well, don't swear, Jerry! I'll rub up my Spanish."

Jerry was an Irishman himself by blood, as his name indicates. So my readers will excuse him. At any rate, I did, for in less than half an hour his energetic, though somewhat equivocal, Spanish had given us the entree into the room where was assembled the elite of the city of Merida.

"Here, Tom." said he, dragging me across the room; "come this way, my boy, and let me introduce you."

They were dancing some cross between a cotillon and a reel, as Jerry said, and as we made our way round the figure we passed a group standing in one of the windows, which were all embayed and grated with iron, but contained no glass. A young man with a profusion of gold coins on the outside seam of his slashed pantalcoms and a very heavy ring on his forefinger stepped out and was extremely glad to see Jerry, shaking him by the hand and seeming inclined even to mbrace him. Jerry was glad to see him also and introduced me with a good deal of impressiveness. "Doo Bento de la Torre," he called him and treated him with far more respect than I thought his sinister look warranted.

"Onde esta Carlottata?" Jerry saked. And a slight frown contracted the don's face, but Jerry hurried on, inquiring for his father Don Francisco, and his mother. It had but one room, long, narrow and without light except from the door, and in one corner was built a little fire, where a short fat the prettiest girl in Merida," he added in a woman in white chemise and red flannel petticoat was making tortillas, while we were shown to the other end and told to make ourselves at home on a long bench

The major domo tumbled two of the raw hides down at our feet, and with many carrachos tramped the wrinkles out to make them lie flat and then piled the rest my head.
"Oh, that you shall do certainly," she said, and in five minutes more we had joined the waltzers and were whirling around the long room in the graceful gyrations of that of them in the middle of the room. Coffee, tortillas and dried mutton furnished our repast, and soon afterward we wrapped our "serapes" around us and betook ourselves giddy dance.

This lasted a long time, until I was dizzy, and then we went to a window. Opening to the sheepskins, having previously made arrangements for seats in the diligencia for Merida on the following day.

About daybreak we were roused by a tremendous lumbering at the door, and after a volley of quaint Spanish curses addressed to several mules, each of which he addressed by the name of some saint, a little parchment faced fellow, with jingling spurs, a broad sombrero, a thick blanket and a heavy whip, made his appearance, calling the sheepskins, having previously made the grating, we found ourselves upon a bal-

"In this case, certainly," I replied,
"though not usually, I believe."
Further comments were prevented by an imposing summons from our host, and in 10 minutes we had disposed of a reasonable quantity of the goat's flesh and tortillas, washed it down with some strong coffee and returned to the street, where by this time were assembled several senores, with their blankets covering half their faces and their sombreros the other half, gravely inspecting what Jerry irreverently insinuated should be called a cart.

All our friend Antonio's "lsta, mulas," and "Santas" were not sufficient to raise a trot, and in a "most musical, most melancholy" walk we creaked through the wide oak door of the "Meson Santisgon" or "St SHE INVITED ME TO COME THERE OFTEN tula and la cachucha, and then she essayed to teach me the bolero and laughed sweet to teach me the bolero and laughed sweetly when I failed in the steps. "Come, Tom," said O'Farrell, "we must

Carlotta?"

We both blushed—neither knew why.
But Jerry and Benito both suspected why, for while the former pulled at me the latdoor of the "Meson Santiago," or "St. James hotel." Mother Pepa, whose latitude and longitude differed but little in degree, stood in the paved court, and with means abortive courteries received the guests, who in this country are always

But Jerry and Benito both suspected why, for while the former pulled at me the latter came abruptly up to Carlotta and drew her arm within his. She turned her head and gazed at me as we left, with a long, sweet, inviting look, as if she regretted to be parted and wished to meet again, as I believe she did and am certain I did.

"You're young and green," said Jerry when we reached our room. "The first thing you know that fellow will be hiring some one to assassinate you, as he served me last year, the puppy! Carlotta is his consin and lives with his father. Her parents are dead, and she was afianced in infancy, according to the custom of the country. So, you see, she is just as good as Benito's wife."

"Better, I think," said I. But Jerry turned over and was asleep before I could ask him more. I followed his example, and of course dreamed of a light fairy form "illustrious."

Jerry took her hand and saluted her fat cheek, telling her he was "devilish glad to see her," and I followed the cordial pair into the best room, where a table was already set with red beans, goat's flesh, tortillas and coffee. Jerry stopped at the door and held a short colloquy with the "madre," while I listened to the music—the "diligential" and the "madre," while I have the "madre," while I listened to the music—the "diligential" and the "madre," where the "diligential" and the "madre," where the "diligential" and the "madre," where the "madre," and "madre," a and of course dreamed of a light fairy form with white teeth and black eyes.

WHOLSALE AND RETAIL,

a veil of repose, and the air was as still as we see it on a summer day in the country. The silence was broken only by the humming of bees and the murmuring of the streamlets as they laved the vines which hung in the ripples, swinging lazily up and down. When I placed my foot upon a fast stone, which led across one of these, I heard the echo come back from the wall, and the boy held up his finger to enjoin caution.

I followed him in silence almost to the end of the garden, when, crossing a stream and turning suddenly to the left, he pointed me to a rustic summer house and turned back. Two vines were so bent as to form an opening, and a mass of matted vines hung swinging over it for a shutter.

I drew this aside and found myself in the presence of Carlotts.

She sat half reclining in a hammock of silk cord, swung across from tree to tree, and was dressed in the usual afternoon costume of the country; a loose flowing robe of white muslin, not confined at the waist, but left loose alternately to hide and disclose the sweeping contour of her form. Her hair was arranged in heavy madonna platts, only confined at the end and falling loosely over her spotless neck. She wore small red moroccooslippers, but when I entered one of them had fallen off and was lying on the ground, and the foot from which it had fallen was hanging coquet tishly over the cord of the hammock, and alasl covered by no stocking. She had large, swimming black eyes, a small, pouting mouth, red lips and a clear though somewhat brunette complexion.

"Buenos tardi, senor," she said, at the same time throwing a fold of her robe over her blue veined foot, not, however, until it was plain that she wished me to see it first. "Gentares, senor," she continued, drawing up her feet and pointing to the end of the hammock where I was not long in proper to the hammock where I was not long in the sum of the proper to the hammock where I was not long in could be a sum of the country. "Sentarse, senor," she continued, drawing up her feet, and pointing to the end of the hammock, where I was not long in seating myself. Reaching over the side of the hammock, as took up a small maquer beaket filled with oranges, figs and grapes amiles which only a southern coquette knows how tous. I took an orange, and we began to talk.

"How long will you be in Merida;" she saked.
"As long as I can enjoy myself," I replete, "and that promises a long visit." "bide," and that promises a long visit." "bide," and that promises a long visit." "bide, "and the long will you more than I had imagined." "bide were upon uncertaing round. "As hes Indanged" she pursued.

"Yes, and on the balcony, in the moon light," I nawwerd.

She turned the conversation most abruptly, but in such a manner as to let me see that it cout her an effort. We talked for an hour of half freeth things, the always turned to the appoint to the ground. I was too near her. Her glances and tones were too mucertain ground. I was too near her. Her glances and tones were too mucertain ground. I was too near her. Her glances and tones were too mucertain ground. I was too near her. Her glances and tones w

He was right. I was green.

CHAPTER III.

Time rolled on very pleasantly. The scenes were all new, and I was at precisely the age when our enjoyment is keenest. Jerry was pursuing his own schemes of pleasure in his wild way, and I was left almost alone to find what enjoyment I might. Several times I had met Carlotta in the garden, but the knowledge that Benito watched us closely made our interviews short and stolen. She had told me all her history; how she had been affianced by her parents to her cousin when both were children; how time had revealed to her the dark and unlovable traits of his CHAPTER III. were children; how time had revealed to her the dark and unlovable traits of his character; how with many tears she had made up her mind to the sacrifice; how love for the memory of her dead parents had induced her to do so. But she said she had now determined that no power should force her to it. She did not and could not love him. I pressed her timidly to say whether she loved another, but either she was unwilling to speak or we were always.

Things were in this state on the evening before Christmas. I still lingered on without more plainly declaring what I felt (you see by this time that I was deeply in love), and she was unwilling to forestall my declaration. On that night I went to the Church of the Incarnacion to hear mass at midnight.

With a light Spanish mantle thrown wer my shoulders, I stood among the meeling throng, I confess not overdevout. A crowd of women came rustling in. As they passed me I felt my mantle slightly pulled, and on turning saw the bright eyes of Carlotta bent on me for a moment and them withdrawn.

"Agua, madre," she whispered to her aunt, whom she called mother, and they both knelt very near me. I stepped lightly around them and seated myself on a kind of dais which ran along the side of the church, very near to Carlotta. I had not been there more than five minutes when she looked up with one of those long, furtive looks which are so charming from a dark, liquid eve. It was durk when the store of J. B. Snowball, Esq. Changing her posture, she threw the mantilla close to me. Covering after a moment left the church. My lodgings were only a few steps off, so hurrying over I opened the note. It ran thus: My mother, father and Benito will be in the procession tomorrow at 3 p. m. I shall have a headache, so that I cannot go, but will be at home. Santiago will bring you the key.

quiringly on me, and slightly nodding as a token that I would be there retired from the place.

When I got back to my lodgings, I searched for the note for the purpose of destroying it or reading it again perhaps, but the was nowhere to be found. I hastened back to the church, supposing I might have dropped it there, but I could see nothing of it.

Benito was standing sat, but he did not move, only glancing at me and withdrawing his gaze. He seldom soticed me now; indeed never, except by

Nine-tenths of all the ailments to which the human delicate individual. Nine-tenths of all the ailments to which the human family is heir are dependent on nervous exhaustion and impaired digestion. When there is an insufficient supply of nerve food in the blood, a general state of debility of the brain, spinal marrow, and nerves is the result. Starved nerves, like starved muscles, become strong when the right kind of food is supplied; and a thousand weaknesses and ailments: disappear as the nerves recover. As the nervous system must supply all the power by which the vital forces of the body are carried on, it is the first to suffer for want of perfect nutrition. Ordinary food does not contain a sufficient quantity of the kind of nutriment necessary to repair. the wear our present mode of living and labor imposes upon the nerves. For this reason it becomes necessary that a nerve food be supplied. This South American Nervine has been found by analysis to contain the essential elements out of which nerve tissue is formed. This accounts for its universal adaptability to the cure of all forms of nervous de-

Tangement.
