Mr. Sinclair: Yes, I will. I would say that the hon. member for Kamloops would make anybody in this house go to sleep except himself, because he loves to hear himself speak.

Mr. Fulton: Of course, Mr. Chairman, the voice of anyone but the Minister of Fisheries would bore the Minister of Fisheries, as we all know from experience in this chamber. But I would say this to the Minister of Fisheries. If he can show me a single case before the war claims commission that has yet been satisfactorily dealt with, I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. McCann: Thousands of them.

Mr. Fulton: Tell me one claim?

Mr. McCann: Thousands of them.

Mr. Fulton: Do not make those broad general statements. Tell me one claim.

Mr. McCann: We cannot both talk at once.

Mr. Fulton: We now have the Minister of National Revenue on his feet.

Mr. Knowles: At least you have everybody awake.

Mr. Fulton: It is the first time we have had the Minister of National Revenue on his feet.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman asked me a question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: The chairman is standing.

The Deputy Chairman: I think perhaps now that the honours are about even—

Mr. Sinclair: The honour is not even, when the hon. member for Kamloops attacks an absent member, not the absent member for Dufferin-Simcoe but one who has now left the House of Commons.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The committee will be quite satisfied if we return to the estimates of the Secretary of State. I would point out, as it is my duty to point out, that the hon. member for Kamloops has the floor at the moment and can be interrupted only with his consent or on a point of order or question of privilege. I think perhaps the committee as a whole will find that we will get along more satisfactorily if one member addresses the chair at a time.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: If I have interrupted the somnolence of hon. gentlemen opposite I apologize.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think we will get any further by endeavouring to—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: I will sit down as soon as he sits down.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think we will really get any further by having too many members on either side of the house assisting the chairman in his efforts to keep order. If the Minister of Fisheries has a question of privilege I will hear it.

Mr. Sinclair: My question of privilege is an unusual one.

Mr. Fulton: They usually are.

Mr. Sinclair: It is unusual because the chairman ordinarily does not intervene in a question between members that arises only because the hon. member has attacked one who is no longer here, as the hon. member for Kamloops attacked the former secretary of state. I at least attack the hon. member here in the house.

Mr. Fulton: Of course the hon. gentleman forgets that the former secretary of state is in the Senate and can reply. The hon. gentleman is not always distinguished by—

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. gentleman resume his seat until I have finished? The hon. gentleman has not always been distinguished by attacking members who are present in their places in the House of Commons.

Mr. Sinclair: Name one.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to have aroused the ire of the Minister of Fisheries whose usual custom it is to go around the country attacking people who are not able—

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Sinclair: Name one.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the hon. member—

Mr. Fulton: —to answer in the House of Commons. I will be glad to answer him any time he cares to make an attack on me.

An hon. Member: This is a waste of time.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, because the attack is hardly worth answering. I quite agree.

Mr. Sinclair: That means you cannot name one.

Mr. Fulton: I do not quite understand what the hon. member means.

Mr. Knowles: What are we discussing?

Mr. Fulton: As far as I can make out, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McCann: You are not making out.

Mr. Fulton: —the Minister of Fisheries is asserting his claim to be prime minister rather in advance because he is now seeking to take under his aegis all departments of government and to answer all attacks that may be made upon the government.

Mr. Sinclair: How silly can you get?

Mr. Fulton: Of course when answering the attacks of the Minister of Fisheries one has to descend to his level.

Mr. Sinclair: That would be very easy for you.

Mr. Fulton: However, I will leave it at that and return to the Secretary of State.

Mr. McCann: You will do better if you do.

Mr. Sinclair: An easier target.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am usually a most moderate man. I do not like entering into these bear gardens, and if the Secretary of State wishes to rise on a question of privilege to reply to the gratuitous attack made upon him by his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, I shall be glad to give him the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Secretary of State has no desire to descend to the level of the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: Of course the level—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —of discussion to which the hon. member for Kamloops descended was that suggested by the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Kamloops is very suggestible.

Mr. Fulton: Let us leave that there. I was suggesting that the Secretary of State, who incidentally is quite capable on his own account of setting his own level of discussion —and I shall have occasion to refer to that in a moment or two—might find it desirable to answer the criticisms with respect to the settlements made as to these dispossessed Japanese properties. I noticed that the Secretary of State, in his reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, suggested that merely because he is now in front of the curtain instead of behind it he disclaims responsibility for anything that was decided, discussed or settled by his predecessor in office. That is of course a principle which is quite inconsistent with the principles and precedents established by other governments, governments of which the minister himself is now a member.

Mr. Sinclair: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: I am always glad to permit a question by the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Sinclair: If that is the policy why does the present Conservative party dissociate itself from everything done by the Conservative party under R. B. Bennett?

An hon. Member: That is a smart question.

Mr. Fulton: The question, Mr. Chairman, carries with it its own answer. We do not dissociate ourselves from what was done before but the fact is that the government—

Mr. Sinclair: Fifteen years.

Mr. Fulton: —of which the Minister of Fisheries is a member appealed all that was done by R. B. Bennett to the Supreme Court of Canada and had it declared unconstitutional. We are not dissociating ourselves from what was done, but the hon. gentleman's party and the government of which he is a member—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: —must assume responsibility for appealing all these measures to the Supreme Court of Canada and having them declared unconstitutional.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Sinclair: I wonder—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Kamloops—

Mr. Fulton: Wait a moment.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: Not until the Secretary of State sits down.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am raising a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: The chairman is on his feet.

The Deputy Chairman: Will both hon. gentlemen sit down? It is, I think, well known to all members of the house that when a member states that he is rising on a question of privilege—

Mr. Pickersgill: I said a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: —he must be heard. It will be my responsibility to decide whether or not it is a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not think you heard me aright. I was rising on a point of order. I have no question of privilege. My point of order is that the estimates of the Secretary of State are now, as I understand it, before the committee, and that interesting as the dissertation by the hon. member for Kamloops on constitutional history may be at some other time—

Mr. Fulton: Who brought it up?

Mr. Pickersgill: —I think most members of the committee would like to get on with the estimates.

Mr. Rowe: That is no point of order. That is just your wish.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let the chairman decide.

Mr. Fulton: Tell your own colleague to shut up.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think there is any question in the minds of hon. members that the point of order raised by the Secretary of State is well taken. I am going to ask the hon. member for Kamloops to come back to the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State, and I am also going to ask all other hon. members, if they feel impelled to interject or to raise a question during the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops, to also confine themselves to the estimates of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Fulton: No one could be more in accord with the ruling you have made, Mr. Chairman, than I am myself. Your Honour will recall and the members of the committee will recall that I had commenced by discussing the dispossession of certain Japanese of Canadian origin of their property, and had gone on from there to discuss the matter of the Canadian war claims commission, which is under the Secretary of State. At that point I was interrupted by the Minister of Fisheries, and having dealt with his interruptions in the manner in which the interruptions deserve, I shall return to the estimates of the Secretary of State.

Having pointed out to the house that the Secretary of State now that he is in front of the curtain disclaims responsibility for those things which were done when he was behind the curtain—

Mr. Fulton: All right—the Minister of Fisheries is quite right. He agrees that the Secretary of State was responsible when he was above the curtain for what was done by the government below the curtain.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister rising now on a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising now on what I think is a proper question of privilege, and one with which I am sure the hon. member for Kamloops will be in complete agreement. I am quite prepared, and I was prepared when I entered this government, to accept responsibility for what this government has done. I accept fully my share of the responsibility for maintaining the position that the government has taken about this matter of Mr. Justice Bird's awards. But what I said was that I could not claim to have knowledge of what was in the minds of the people who made that decision. I did not say I was disclaiming responsibility. I am not disclaiming responsibility.

Mr. Rowe: That is not a point of order, that is a point of responsibility.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: I do not mind the Secretary of State giving the answers to my points on points of order if he prefers doing it that way rather than by replying in due course. The fact is that the Secretary of State has so far refused to review, now he is in front of the curtain, what was done when he was behind the curtain. I have no quarrel with that. I merely state it as a matter of fact. I do believe it is a position that denies the position taken by most democratic governments, and certainly it is a denial of the position taken by the government of which the hon. gentleman is now privileged to be a member. This government has never hesitated, under the well-known constitutional precedent, to accept responsibility for the decisions which were made by its predecessor, whether or not there happened to have been in the meantime a change of government. Every government which has come into office in Canada or Great Britain, every democratic government under our responsible system, has admitted responsibility for and has attempted to discharge the responsibility for the decisions and commitments entered into by its predecessors.

Therefore I do not think it is good enough for the Secretary of State to say that he does not know what may have been done or the motive that may have influenced his predecessor in office, and to state that he claims no responsibility therefor.

Mr. Pickersgill: I accept responsibility.

Mr. Fulton: That is not what the minister said before. He did not know what had been the motives of his predecessor, and therefore he did not care to discuss the decision made by his predecessor. The fact is, he is now Secretary of State of Canada. He has assumed responsibility and he has to answer to the House of Commons, to the Canadian people and to the citizens of Japanese origin who may have had injustice done to them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite prepared to do it, too.

Mr. Fulton: We shall be very glad indeed to hear what the Secretary of State has to say about that. We shall be glad also to hear what the Secretary of State has to say with respect to the claims of Canadians of Anglo-Saxon and other origins who have been citizens of this country for long periods and who have received inadequate treatment by the commission for which he is responsible, namely, the war claims commission. In many cases, to my knowledge, these claims have not yet been finally adjudicated.

I say these things, Mr. Chairman, with some heat apparently. I think the heat was engendered by the interruptions of the Minister of Fisheries, who has now retreated from the house. The Minister of Fisheries has retreated to the position which the Secretary of State used to occupy. The Minister of Fisheries has gone behind the curtains, whereas the Secretary of State is now out in front of the curtains. I have never hesitated in my course—Dracula arises, Mr. Chairman! He seats himself again. Does the Minister of Fisheries wish to say something?

Mr. Sinclair: I have withdrawn from the front benches so that I would not hear the hon. member quite as loudly as I do on the front benches.

Mr. Fulton: I had not observed that the minister had yet been promoted to the front benches, but if the minister wishes to promote himself to the front bench, let him have his day of glory.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Fulton: I was dealing with the Secretary of State, and I wanted to get back to a basis of good fellowship and camaraderie which was established recently during the Easter recess by the Secretary of State himself.

I am a faithful subscriber, Mr. Chairman, to a newspaper which is distinguished by the title the Kamloops Sentinel. During the Easter recess the Secretary of State was out in my city and he gave an interview, apparently, to the press which was reported in the issue of April 23. It is a very interesting report indeed, and I should like to read it to the house. My friends to my left will be interested in this. The heading is "State Secretary Pickersgill claims Social Credit Impact Upon Ottawa 'Absolutely Nil'." The article reads:

The chubby, brilliant and somewhat aloof civil servant-turned-politician who many believe may be the next prime minister of Canada was in Kamloops today visiting relatives.

I can only suggest that those relatives, those who were the beneficiaries of his visit to Kamloops, maintain no delusions on that score.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, the dominion's forty-eight year old Secretary of State—

Mr. Knowles: He does not look it.

Mr. Fulton: We come to this later.

—was to pull out of the city tonight heading for Ottawa after a combined holiday and speaking tour that began at Victoria a day or so before Easter.

The rather boyish-looking and rotund Secretary of State talked of many things . . . of shoes and ships and sealing wax and cabbages and kings.

I am reading from the article, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sinclair: That will get you nowhere.

Mr. Fulton: The article continues:

He has an easy and informal manner, although with his proven record of scholarship, he leaves an impression that while he is speaking his mind is soaring away above such mundane matters as politics.

I may point out to the committee that this was written after the minister had come out in front of the curtain. The article continues under the heading "trade mark".

Conservatively dressed—

Well, of course, I should pause here to remark that the hon. gentleman has conservative antecedents.

. . . in a dark grey suit and with the habit of toying with his eyeglasses, Mr. Pickersgill must be a cartoonist's delight.

Of course, that reminds us of the cartoons during the last federal election in which the hon. gentleman was portrayed as claiming the origin and beneficence of having introduced the family allowance program.

Mr. Sinclair: The Tory party always objected to family allowances.

Mr. Fulton: That was a parentage which was strongly disputed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Sinclair: The Tory party obstructed the marriage. Family allowances were a political pariah, according to the Tories. They had no share in it.

Mr. Fulton: The Tory party has—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps I am more sorry than the rest of the committee that it becomes necessary for the chairman to interrupt so often this evening, during the discussion of this particular item. I rise at this time because I feel impelled to draw two matters to the attention of the committee. The first is that matters such as the responsibility for family allowances are not before the committee at the moment. The other matter causes me more difficulty. The estimates of the Secretary of State are before the committee at the moment. And the manner in which the Secretary of State and his officials conduct his department are also before the committee at the moment.

Mr. Sinclair: Excellent!

The Deputy Chairman: But there is a long citation in Beauchesne which states, in part:

The rule relating to personal reflections occurring in debate, may be stated thus, namely: That it is doubly disorderly for any member, in speaking, to digress from the question before the house and to attack any other member—

And so on.

I would suggest to the hon. member who has the floor at the moment—and I am sure he will agree—that there is a difference between discussing the administration of a department and discussing something which does not have to do with the minister's conduct in office or in the house, but his conduct elsewhere as an individual. I did not interrupt the hon. member when he began reading the article because I had no reason to believe that he might not be coming to something which dealt with the administration of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Fulton: I shall now.

The Deputy Chairman: So far he has not. I hope this will be the last time the hon. member will oblige me to insist upon asking him to restrain his remarks to the item before the committee. He knows as well as I do that he is unrestricted in his criticism of the Department of the Secretary of State, and I think he will be willing to remain within the limits of the rule.

Mr. Sinclair: I hope so.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you, I shall indeed. I wish to say that the Tory party has never yet stood in the way of an honest marriage.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: Order.

Mr. Fulton: And if the Secretary of State wishes to make an honest woman of the Liberal party, and come back to the ranks—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —we shall not stand in the way of that union. However, Mr. Chairman, your ruling prevents my pursuing that line of discussion any further. But I do wish to make some remarks which are immediately germane to the Department of the Secretary of State, and which have to do with a remark the Secretary of State made out in my home city of Kamloops—because here, I assume, the Secretary of State was speaking within his knowledge as a minister of the government and as the Secretary of State of Canada.

There was an interview with respect to myself, and the newspaper article goes on in this way:

The Secretary of State—

And I blush to say this; but this is the way it reads—

The Secretary of State praised E. Davie Fulton, the Kamloops M.P., with reservations. He said Mr. Fulton was too bright, as he put it, to waste as much time, as Mr. Pickersgill claimed he did, on "picayune" matters. He did not elaborate.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I withdraw that, sir.

Mr. Fulton: Well, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State almost disarms me. But since he made the remark with reservations, I notice he has not withdrawn it without reservations. So I think I am at liberty to comment upon it. It so happens that I am now on my feet discussing the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State.

An hon. Member: Since when?

Mr. Fulton: I would not have used those words myself; they were used by the Secretary of State. It so happens that amongst the responsibilities with which I have been entrusted by my colleagues is that of the supervision, so far as our party is concerned, of the Department of the Minister of Justice. He is not here; but I am quite sure the Secretary of State would not characterize that responsibility as picayune.

Another of the responsibilities with which I am entrusted is that of supervision on behalf of my colleagues, and in co-operation with them, of the estimates and the legislation of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: And I am sure the Secretary of State would not characterize that responsibility as picayune.

Mr. Harris: I interject at this point only to express the hope that when my hon. friend comes to deal with my estimates he will deal with them in order, as he is not now doing with those of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Fulton: I really think the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is a little sensitive. I was not trying to deal with his estimates at the moment. I was trying to deal with the Secretary of State. I was paying him the compliment of suggesting that the Secretary of State would not have characterized his department as a picayune one. And I was going on to point out that, among other things, for which I have had some responsibility at this session, is—

Mr. Sinclair: Point out, or drag out?

Mr. Fulton: I am not going to dwell upon that.

Mr. Sinclair: He could talk a month.

Mr. Fulton: Among the other matters with which I have been entrusted is the Department of the Secretary of State. Therefore inasmuch as I am quite sure the Secretary of State would not have characterized as picayune those other matters of responsibility with which I have been charged, I can only assume that he applies that description to his own department.

Well, I looked up in the Oxford English dictionary—and the Secretary of State who is an Oxford graduate will therefore appreciate the source of my authority for the definition—

Mr. Knowles: He did not write the dictionary, did he?

Mr. Fulton: I looked up in the Oxford dictionary the definition of the word "picayune". He can find it in the library of parliament, page 1495, column 3, as follows: Picayune (as a noun) the U.S. 5-cent piece or other coin of small value; hence, colloquially, an insignificant person or thing.

I would not have used those words myself to describe the responsibilities of the department with which the Secretary of State is entrusted by this government. But apparently that is the word with which he himself chooses to define that responsibility. Then it goes on to say that, as an adjective, the word "picayune" means mean or contemptible. So that, apparently, the Secretary of State has taken it upon himself to come to my own city and to state there that I have been charged with the responsibilities of dealing with a department, with the activities of a cabinet minister, which, according to his own definition as it is set out in the Oxford dictionary, is mean or contemptible. I would not have used those words, myself; and I doubt if the Secretary of State had them in mind when he used the words.

Mr. Sinclair: For his department, or as a member of the cabinet?

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the Minister of Fisheries has not been attending very closely.

Mr. Sinclair: Very carefully.

Mr. Fulton: The Secretary of State said that I was concerned with picayune matters. One of the matters with which I am concerned is the department of the hon. gentleman himself, and I do not care to follow it very much further. But I do feel that the hon. gentleman, perhaps having described himself by a dictionary definition as picayune Pickersgill—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —should deal with the criticisms which have been made of the department up to this moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word about the one point that the hon. gentleman took an hour to make, namely, that the war claims commission, presided over by the chief justice of Prince Edward Island, is not doing this work efficiently and fairly. I do not think that is a charge that is worthy of the hon. member. I do not think it is a charge that on reflection tomorrow he will be very proud of having made. The fact of the matter is that Chief Justice Campbell is following the rules laid down by Chief Justice Ilsley in the report which laid down the principles on which those claims should be dealt with, a report which was accepted by the government, in which the chief justice of Prince Edward Island, at considerable inconvenience to himself—and which he had no obligation whatsoever to do—has undertaken to do as a patriotic duty.

It so happens that the claims that Chief Justice Ilsley said should be dealt with first were the claims of those persons who had been prisoners of war. Almost all of those, except where certain evidence is not yet available that is absolutely essential to a proper adjudication, have already been dealt with and a great many of them, as the Minister of National Revenue attempted to point out when he was not treated very politely by the hon. member for Kamloops, have been paid.

It may be that there are some claims of a complicated character, where the facts are hard to establish and not very well known—these cases do exist; they are inherent in the nature of the situation. Documents were lost in those tragic events in Asia nearly a decade ago. In some of these cases it is very difficult to form a proper adjudication, but I can assure the committee—and I suggest to any member of the committee who has any doubts on this point that he go and see Chief Justice Campbell and ask him about it—that he is pursuing this task with zeal, with vigour and with a sense of justice that is worthy of the best traditions of our bench.

It is true that no property claims have yet been adjudicated, and for the very good reason that Chief Justice Ilsley said we should deal with claims for personal maltreatment before we dealt with property claims. If there is any hon. member who thinks that is a wrong principle, let him rise in his place and say so.

Mr. Green: There is one point in connection with handling these claims that I should like to draw to the attention of the Secretary of State. Apparently when Chief Justice Ilsley made his report he suggested that to qualify an applicant must be first of all a Canadian citizen; he must have been a Canadian citizen at the time that the loss or injury occurred and also at the time of the presentation of his claim for adjudication. These two recommendations are fair enough; but he went on to define what the time of application should be in the case of those who had already applied, and as I understand it his finding was that the time of application would be taken as the date on which a commissioner was appointed.

The commissioner was not appointed for some months after Chief Justice Ilsley had made his report. The setting of the time in that way has had a very unfair result in some cases. One case has been drawn to my attention where the person concerned was a Canadian. He was treated very badly by the Japanese; returned to Canada in 1942, and was called here to Ottawa in order to give his version of what had been done to the prisoners by the Japanese. He filed a claim, and then later filed an official claim in 1945. His health had been so undermined by the treatment he received that he was advised by medical men to go to the United States. Incidentally, this man is also a doctor. He went to the United States, and in order to practise there he had to take out United States citizenship. He took out that citizenship in 1951, a short time before Chief Justice Ilsley had made his report. The result is that now he cannot qualify for any compensation. He was a Canadian citizen at the time he suffered the injury, but by the time the commissioner had been appointed in 1952 this Canadian had become a United States citizen, and he cannot qualify for a claim against the United States government because he was not a United States citizen at the time he suffered the injury.

This is a case where the man is entirely innocent. He has done nothing wrong, and I think the arbitrary setting of the date of application as the date on which the commissioner was appointed was not right. The order in council should at least have contained some exception so that where a Canadian had filed his claim earlier, believing that he was meeting all the requirements, he should not be ruled out simply by this arbitrary provision that the date of filing his claim shall be taken as the date the commissioner is appointed. Is there not some way by which a proviso can be written into the order in council which would meet a case of that kind?

I need only cite the facts for hon. members to see that this is an unfair result, and the last people any of us want to see injured are those who actually suffered at the hands of the Japanese. As we all know, they suffered perhaps more than any other Canadian citizens during the war years. I hope that something can be done to meet a situation of this kind.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, Mr. Chairman, I will not speak in detail, but in a general way I am familiar with the particular case to which the hon. member referred. So far as I can judge from my recollection—I have no papers under my hand—what he has said agrees with the set of facts represented to me. This is the kind of case which was in fact considered by Chief Justice Ilsley specifically in his report. He specifically recommended the exclusion of those cases. The government accepted the Ilsley report. We have varied the report in one respect, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra knows. It could be varied in another—there will be some review when these matters get a little further advanced—and if the government then comes to the conclusion that any substantial amount of injustice has been done by this rule there certainly will be a review of the matter. But I think all members of the committee would agree that the first persons who should be considered—and this is in accord with the Ilsley report—are those who were Canadian citizens and still are Canadian citizens.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has said that the first priority was given to cases of claims for personal injury.

Mr. Pickersgill: Prisoners of war.

Mr. Fulton: Prisoners of war, so far as their personal sufferings are concerned, are relatively easy to deal with; but I know of cases where there is a mixture of personal injury and property damage. With respect to the cases that I have in mind neither branch has been adjudicated. I ask the minister what is being done to settle the jurisprudence, if you like, in dealing with these cases.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, I am sure the members of the committee will appreciate that I have no degree of familiarity with the detailed operations of this commission. No one would expect me to have. I would think that if a claim or a partial claim—perhaps I am unwise in saying this—were partly for personal injury and partly a property claim and both were made at the one time as one claim it would not be adjudicated in two parts. It might be so adjudicated if there were some representations made. If the hon. member for Kamloops will bring the particular cases he has in mind to my attention I will be glad to get specific explanations in these cases for him just as quickly as I can.

Mr. Fulton: I am gratified to have the minister's assurance. However, there is one other point I would like to bring to his attention without going into detail. The recommendation of the commission was that the authority for a claim or the basis for a claim be on a decision as to whether or not a person was a Canadian at the time when the injury was suffered. I would suggest to him that if he examines at least the tentative rulings which have been made, and I am not prepared to say they are final rulings, he will find there is a tendency on the part of the commission to impose undue technicalities, if you like, in the way of the establishment of the basis of Canadian status on the part of the claimant. I would suggest that the commissioner, Chief Justice Ilsley, left those words in a rather general way and I would suggest to the Secretary of State that they are being interpreted by the commission in a rather narrow and technical fashion. He might well ask the commission itself to undertake a review of the interpretation of Canadian status of all claimants with respect to these things which the claimant must prove in support of his Canadian status before his claim will be recognized.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the first time that this suggestion has been made to me but I shall be very glad to look into it.

Item agreed to.

418. Companies branch, $81,495.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, having had some experience in a similar department in another field I appreciate something of the work of this branch. I would be interested to know from the minister what number of incorporations have been made in the past calendar year or fiscal year.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not carry these figures in my head but I am informed that there have been 838 under part I, and 36 without share capital under part II of the act.

Mr. Michener: Perhaps what I have to say, Mr. Chairman, relates to two or three items and possibly I can discuss them all at this time. This branch, first, is a revenue-producing branch as well as a spending branch and I have taken the trouble to total up the revenue from companies' trade marks, patents, and another small section known as copyright and industrial design. It appears that the revenues amount to about $1,500,000 which is about 57 per cent of the estimates which the minister is now submitting to the committee, and it therefore comes near to paying its way. Two of these items produce a surplus. I note, for example, that according to the estimates trade marks will cost $877,000 and the estimated revenue is $758,000. I would suggest to the minister—and I think this refers to the copyright office—that the privilege of a patent or copyright is a very valuable one to those who acquire it and perhaps that is one of the services which might be regarded as worthy of putting on a self-paying basis. I would ask whether the minister has considered increasing the fees in this office so as to put it on a parallel with the other two branches both of which are paying their way so that all three of these branches, which provide a very useful service, would all pay their way.

I ask that because I note that the percentage of increase for this department for this year is 12 per cent if one deducts the unusual expenditure of $1 million last year provided for coronation expenses. That 12 per cent increase is somewhat in excess of the percentage of increase of that useful index known as the gross national product, and perhaps the minister would care to comment on that point.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have no wish to cast any reflection upon the hon. gentleman but perhaps, like most hon. members, he has had to be absent from the house at times and he may have been absent on the day on which this matter was previously discussed and failed to notice that parliament during this session passed a bill increasing the fees. My officials assure me that the increase in patent fees will be enough to produce a surplus next year and I will be very disappointed if there is not a surplus.

In the case of the companies branch I felt the hon. gentleman might have had some criticism to make, because I had some to make when I became minister. I felt they were deriving an undue revenue by not dealing with these matters as expeditiously as they could. It was not because the officials were not zealous, because they are zealous, but because they had not enough staff. It seems to me that if a government undertakes to provide a service, and to exact fees to pay for it, it should give that service. I have no apology to make for the increases in staff in this revenue-producing branch of the department. I think they all ought to pay for themselves, but they should not be regarded as profit-making and enough staff should be provided to deal with the work expeditiously. I am sure the hon. member will agree with me.

Mr. Michener: Just to ensure that I understand the minister correctly, do I understand that these particular fees are based on the fees as approved this session?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, that is right.

Item agreed to.

420. Bureau for translations, $1,076,997.

Mr. Macdonnell: I would like to ask the Secretary of State a question, if I may. When the increase in this department was noted a year ago the Secretary of State at that time said that most of the increase was due to the Department of National Defence, the work of which had been transferred. Would the Secretary of State now say just a word as to the reason for this substantial increase?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Greenwood is perhaps more conscious than most of us of the fact that expenditures tend to increase. He keeps that in his own mind and in the minds of most other hon. members. I am informed that the largest part of this increase is due to the salary increase given to civil servants effective December 1 last.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know whether the Secretary of State is in a position to do so, but if he is I would like him to comment on a suggestion which has been made on several occasions previously. The suggestion is that in the same way as there has been established and put under his authority a bureau for translations responsible for the translations of all departments, there should also be a bureau for publicity responsible for the publicity of all departments, so that if one of his colleagues comes and says, "We have a publication with respect to the treatment of hog cholera which we think should be publicized as being of general interest", then the bureau might undertake to do so. If another department comes and says "We have a treatise on the home freezing of apples that we think is of interest to the people; would you publicize it?", this bureau might undertake it in the same way.

As I understand it, the bureau for translations was established with a view to economizing on the cost of translating which up to that time had been carried on in separate departments under their own control. I want to ask whether the minister does not think that a bureau for publicity might exercise an over-all control and a very healthy limitation upon the amount of government publicity and the cost of government publicity.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if it is not unparliamentary, my comment on that suggestion would be "God forbid". I am not and never have been an advocate of thought control. I think the only proper kind of control of government publications outside each department is the control exercised by the treasury board. I would hate to see one minister set up as the censor of another.

Mr. Fulton: What has the minister to say about the bureau for translations? Does his department not exercise control over what shall be translated and what shall not be translated?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. The bureau for translations provides a translation service for each department of government and for parliament. It translates what it is given to translate. It does not decide that something is worth translating or something else is not worth translating. It is simply a service.

Mr. Fulton: Is there not considered to be a saving in having it centralized in one bureau?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in one case it is suggested that a qualitative judgment be exercised and in the other—

Mr. Fulton: No. Taking the minister at his own word that he does not exercise any discretion as to what shall be given publicity and what shall not, may I ask this question? Would there not be the same measure of saving and economy which is now felt to be made by having a centralized bureau for translations? Would there not be some measure of economy by having a central bureau?

Mr. Pickersgill: In that sense there is already the printing bureau which is responsible to me.

Item agreed to.

Patent and copyright office—

423. Copyright and industrial designs division, including a contribution of $2,100 to the union office for the protection of literary and artistic works, $22,068.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to ask a question with regard to the Copyright Act and I wish to preface my remarks by reading briefly from last year's Hansard when the estimates of the Secretary of State were under discussion. At page 5304 of Hansard of May 13 of last year this question was asked:

Mrs. Fairclough: I wonder if the Secretary of State will say whether be contemplates providing Canadian composers with means for copyrighting their original musical compositions?

Mr. Bradley: I do not know that there is anything to prevent a Canadian composer from copyrighting his production now.

Then there was a further question and Mr. Bradley then replied as follows:

Mr. Bradley: As a matter of fact copyright exists without registration, and I do not understand why the particular case to which my hon. friend refers cannot be straightened out.

Then the hon. member for Hamilton West who had been questioning him said this:

> This is not a particular case. I have been all through it, and I tried very hard to get Canadian coyright for an original composition. You just cannot get it in Canada.

I now come back to where I started. I want to ask the minister if he will just explain briefly the procedure which is followed. I have been reading the Copyright Act. I take it that there must be some procedure necessary—it is quite clear from the act that there is—but what I am not clear about it is just exactly what evidence is given by the department to the composer on the strength of which he is evidently able, according to the terms of the act, to seek legal remedies if his right is infringed. I repeat my question. I am asking for guidance as to the procedure which needs to be followed and as to the document or whatever it is which is obtained by the grantee for use in evidencing his rights.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to improvise a little bit, Mr. Chairman. I have not the advantage enjoyed by the hon. member for Greenwood who is a lawyer. However I do not think that advantage helps much in this case. As I understand it, copyright is inherent. You own the copyright if you produce the thing, regardless of whether you register it or not.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask a question just there?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: You say you own the copyright if you produce it?

Mr. Pickersgill: If you produce the article, the music or the writing or whatever it is, the copyright is your property without regard to anything you may do at the copyright office.

Mr. Macdonnell: If you produce it?

Mr. Pickersgill: If you write it down on a piece of paper, it is yours; you own it.

Mrs. Fairclough: But how do you prove prior claim?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. lady could be patient for just a moment or two I will come to that matter. I was coming to it next. Of course you can defend that right in the courts without having anything to do with the copyright office at all. You can simply go to the courts and if you can prove that you wrote the thing in the first place, or that you composed the music in the first place, then it belongs to you, it is your property and it does not enter into the public domain for a certain number of years. I do not profess to know how many years that is.

The object of the copyright office is to facilitate the proving of the fact of ownership, and there is there the facility for registering these claims of ownership in order to help prove ownership and to make it easier to collect royalties. I do not think the hon. member for Hamilton West last year was quite right in saying that you could not establish the copyright. I know there is a great deal of feeling that a Canadian composer cannot profit from his copyright or that it was very difficult unless he joins one of these associations which hold copyright to get any benefit from copyright. I have heard this contention. This is something that has been alleged to me, and is one of the things that I hope is going to be elucidated by the royal commission which was set up last week under Chief Justice Ilsley.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I just read briefly from section 36 and confirm my understanding that there is a register. Subsection 1 of section 36 of the Copyright Act reads as follows:

> Every register of copyrights under this act shall be prima facie evidence of the particulars entered therein and documents purporting to be copies of any entries therein or extracts therefrom, certified by the commissioner of patents or the registrar of copyrights, and sealed with the seal of the copyright office, shall be admissible in evidence in all courts without further proof or production of the originals.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite so.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is that a proper and normal way of proceeding or is it not? The Secretary of State a year ago seemed to me to cast doubt on that method and it is for the purpose of being clear on it that I am raising the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is a convenience that anyone can use who wants to do so. A professional writer would do it, I imagine, almost automatically; but I doubt whether the hon. member for Greenwood has ever taken the trouble to copyright his speeches.

Mr. Macdonnell: Quite right.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that they belong to him and if someone reproduces them without his permission he would have a cause of action. Whether or not the courts would decide that the damages were great, I do not know. I would think they would consider that far from its being a damage, it was an advantage to him. I know that that is the view I take. If anybody, even the hon. member for Kamloops, will reproduce to a larger audience the things I have said to an audience of one, in my view it is free advertising.

But to come back to the point and to be a little bit more serious about this matter, may I say this. My understanding is that the registration of copyright is simply to facilitate the proving of ownership. It has been suggested that there is, in the music-producing world, a combine or combination which, if a composer does not belong to it, is able to make it almost impossible for the composer to get any profit out of any music composed in Canada. Whether or not this is true I have no means of knowing. I have no doubt that the people who make that allegation will make representations to the Ilsley commission, that the people against whom the allegations are made will attempt to rebut them and that, in the next year or two, we shall have something to guide us in this matter which I confess I have not at the present time.

Mr. Fulton: I do not wish to give any wider publicity to the remarks of the Secretary of State, but I appreciate the remarks he has made. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to give us a progress report? Is there anything on which he would desire to report progress with respect to the commission recently established?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I understand that Chief Justice Ilsley is coming to Ottawa on Saturday to hold the first meeting of the commission which, considering it was only appointed on the 10th is, I believe, rather expeditious, and what hon. members would expect of Chief Justice Ilsley.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I want to say a word to confirm what the Secretary of State has just said about copyrights. He is perfectly correct that under the act a copyright subsists in any original artistic, literary or scientific work and that the registration is just a convenience to prove prima facie in court ownership of the copyright. It also must be used, under a further provision of the act, in the case of a licensee who wants to claim damages from the original author.

Mrs. Fairclough: I really had not intended to enter this discussion tonight but I do have in a file on my desk the correspondence which I had with the department subsequent to my inquiry of last year, and I cannot conceive what good the registration is if the registry office does not keep a record of the actual content of the work, manuscript or whatever it may be. In circular No. 105, which was sent to me as an example, the final paragraph reads as follows:

> Copies of the works are not required for registration of copyright and, if received, they will be returned to the sender.

I know from experience that is not the case in Washington. If you have a musical work you make a copy of it, send it to Washington and register it there. If my memory serves me correctly, you are protected for something like twenty years. I am not a lawyer either so I find it a little difficult to wade through all this stuff, but as nearly as I can tell all you can register in Canada is a name. You write to the department and say: I have a composition which I call "All of the King's Men". They say: "All right, that is yours, nobody has that name ahead of you and you are protected on that name". But it could cover Beethoven's fifth symphony or anything else as far as the department is concerned. There is not a thing on record to indicate to them what it covers.

Consequently the person who seeks to protect his own composition is not protected at all because anyone can say that it is not the composition he has protected under that name. That is something that I think should be corrected. I think our own composers should be protected against the stealing of their works.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will make a point of bringing the remarks of the hon. member to the attention of Chief Justice Ilsley and I am sure they will be considered.

Mr. Fulton: I hope that private members on the government side will observe the precedent established by the hon. member for Ottawa East and correct, enlarge upon and direct the remarks of cabinet ministers in the future.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Fulton: It is a good precedent.

Mr. Sinclair: Better advice than they will get from you.

Mr. Charlton: There is one point which I think the Secretary of State should explain. It seems quite obvious that there is quite a considerable increase in postage for each item in his department. The increase amounts to some $6,860 in all, and with the exception of two items where postage is not mentioned there is quite an increase in each one. Will the minister explain why that increase is necessary?

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope it is not because of all the mail I send to Newfoundland.

Mr. Charlton: Of course that is not an explanation. When the cost of postage goes up from nothing to $3,500 in one case there is a reason for it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand it is because of a change in the accounting system of the Post Office Department. They used to provide the service free and now they charge it to the government departments.

Mrs. Fairclough: I hope I was responsible for that.

Mr. Charlton: That is not the whole explanation because there were items for postage rates in previous years.

Mr. Harris: You will find these items in all the estimates this year.

Mr. Fulton: You do not find the explanation given by the Secretary of State.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: You do not find the Secretary of State—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, I think the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand should be allowed to ask his question.

Mr. Fulton: He was and you were not answering.

Mr. Sinclair: You have not got a monopoly here. You should be the whole Tory party.

Mr. Charlton: The Secretary of State should also be allowed to answer the question and the Minister of Fisheries should not try to answer for him.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Charlton: I do not think the whole explanation is that you did not pay postage before because items for postage have appeared in other years.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I read what I have in my notes which I assure the hon. member is all I know about the subject. The money required is to provide for the cost of registered mail, special delivery, parcel post, air mail and all mail addressed for delivery outside of Canada, the United States and Mexico. This increase results from the discontinuance of free postage credit and postal meters for prepayment and dispatch of the above mentioned mail.

Mr. Sinclair: Good business.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot add anything to that. If the hon. member needs any more information I will try to get it and give it to him tomorrow.

Mr. Charlton: I take it that this is for mail sent outside of Canada. Is that true?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what it says here.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Public archives and national library.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it is now after ten o'clock.

Mr. Sinclair: Let us get it through.

Mr. Fulton: It is after ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might appeal to the good sense of the hon. member for Kamloops, who has just called it ten o'clock, and suggest, without stressing the point, that on another occasion we did go to some trouble to arrange the business of the house to meet his convenience and ask him if he would not consent to go on at this time and finish these particular estimates.

Mr. Fulton: I think we carried item 730 on a previous occasion. I was not objecting to carrying items 728, 729 and 730.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is perfectly correct. Item 730 was taken on another day to meet the convenience of certain hon. members. I wonder whether the committee would agree to go on for a little while with the archives and the other small items I have.

Mr. Fulton: Which items are they?

The Deputy Chairman: Public archives and national library, resolution 350, to be found on page 50.

Public archives—

350. General administration and technical services, $297,020.

Mr. Herridge: I want to say a few words on this item because I am very interested in the work done by those connected with the public archives and the national library. First of all may I say that I think the majority of members appreciate the valuable and excellent work being done by our dominion archivist and his staff. I am interested in history myself and on a good number of occasions they have rendered me very quick and courteous service in looking up matters that were of particular interest to me or some of my constituents. I think the dominion archivist and his staff are doing excellent work in collecting and preserving the records of this country. That is a very much more important matter than many Canadians realize at this time, although I am pleased to note that more and more people are recognizing the good work being done by our public archivist. They are doing that work with the co-operation of quite a number of local organizations, historical societies and individuals throughout the country who spend a great deal of time gathering material and facts concerning local history and preserving them to that extent.

Earlier this evening one hon. member spoke about a system of awards. May I say that I support a system of awards as outlined which would recognize outstanding service in this country by outstanding Canadians and ordinary people. In this connection I suggest that there are many people in this country—you find them in the little communities all over Canada; you find them in various communities in British Columbia, they are relatively few in number—who have worked for years and taken the trouble to collect local historical documents, keep records of organizations and things of that sort; relics that are of increasing value as the years go by. Many of them are making contributions to local historical societies and also making their contributions to provincial and dominion archives. I believe there should be some appropriate system by which recognition is given to the willing and co-operative service rendered by these individuals.

I would ask the Secretary of State to consider whether it would not be possible for either the historical sites and monuments board or some other recognized authority to devise some system of certificates that could be awarded to people who had made outstanding contributions to preserving history, even in the local or community field. I think official recognition would be a good connecting link between the individuals who do this kind of work throughout the years, and the more or less official bodies, the historical societies and our provincial and national archives.

I have just another word or two to say, Mr. Chairman. From time to time we hear in this house criticism of the expenditure of public funds for archives, for libraries, for paintings, for the development of music, of art, and culture in other directions. We are not very far from the pioneer stage. Some of our more practical people, sometimes people who are more or less over-infected with bourgeois opinions, resent expenditure of public moneys on these things. We in this group take the opposite view. We believe that a vote for expenditures on these things is a vote for progress and the development of our civilization.

In that connection I just want to mention something I noticed in a recent issue of the New York Times. It is dated May 16, and is an article dealing with the amount of money being spent by the government of Turkey on music and activities of that sort. I wish to quote a few figures which I feel should shame Canadians who are opposed to the expenditure of money on such things as archives, national libraries, books, music and so on. I quote:

> Turkey has had a state opera since 1949 and its government has appropriated $3,300,000 for the building of a new opera house in Istanbul. Besides this the government gives $750,000 a year to the state theatre and opera in Ankara; $350,000 a year to the Turkish philharmonic, and about $150,000 a year to the Turkish national conservatory where the 300 students, besides getting free tuition, are also provided with board, lodging and clothing.

Mr. Fulton: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: I do not like the hon. member for Kamloops to say ten o'clock. As one of my colleagues said quietly, some contributions made to the debate this evening would cause one who gives any thought to the question to come to the conclusion that Mr. Cecil Rhodes failed somewhat in his attempt to civilize the colonials by granting scholarships. Now, Mr. Chairman, that comment is intended to be in good humour and spirit.

Mr. Fulton: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: I suggest that if this government were to perhaps spend a similar amount on the things that I have mentioned there would be a strong protest from some people. However, I think we can learn a lesson from the amount of money spent by the government of Turkey upon such things as music, libraries, museums and activities of that sort. I am very pleased to see the increased amount that is in the estimates, and I trust that next year there will be a further increase. I notice there is an increase this year of $14,816 for the archives, which is little enough for the very important work to be done by our dominion archivist and his staff.

Mr. Macdonnell: As one who benefited from the generosity of the late Cecil John Rhodes, I rise with some hesitation after what has been said by the previous speaker. I understand we have agreed to discuss this item and I want to say a word about it. We spend a good many billion dollars for a certain type of protection against danger which confronts us, but it remained for a distinguished soldier to remind us this week that in the last analysis the final protection is not going to be tanks and guns, it is going to be the things for which libraries stand. Therefore, I believe it is well we should pause at this moment and not cry ten o'clock when people are talking about libraries. I should like to endorse what has been said.

Mr. Fulton: Since there seems to have been some reference to the cry of "ten o'clock" I make no apology whatever for the fact that I have suggested, when my hon. friend was discussing what was spent in Turkey for matters of public archives, and so on, that it was not germane to the discussion of the estimates of the Secretary of State. If I am uncultured and uncouth, if I have not benefited—

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: —by the education to which I was exposed overseas, I do ask my hon. friend not to lay the blame on Cecil John Rhodes, but to lay the blame right here.

Mr. Macdonnell: I did not hear my friend say ten o'clock.

Item agreed to.

National library—

351. General administration, $102,998.

Mr. Knowles: Can the Secretary of State say a word as to what is the status of the national library? I realize that when we talk about the national library we are talking about two things; one, the institution, the collection of books and so on, and the other the building. Perhaps it is the latter that I had in mind in my question. What is the status of that aspect of the matter?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course the hon. member, who is an expert on the rules, realizes he is out of order. The question should have been asked of the Minister of Public Works. However, I shall do my best to reply. Plans are being prepared for a building, and a site has been chosen on which one of the oldest, if not the oldest, of the temporary wartime buildings is now situated. It is hoped that it can be torn down by the time plans are complete, and we can proceed just as expeditiously as, in the circumstances, would be possible with this project which the government has no desire to delay.

Mr. Knowles: What is that site?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the No. 1 temporary building.

Item agreed to.

352. Payment to the national library purchase account for the purpose of acquiring books, in conformity with section 12 of the National Library Act, $40,000.

Mr. Hamilton: I notice that this is the last item of the minister's estimates—

Mr. Knowles: There are two more.

Mr. Hamilton: I have a general question dealing with the operations of the department. Would the minister prefer to have it now or on the last item?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think perhaps the hon. member had better ask the question now if it is in order. The estimates of the Secretary of State have been completed and we are now dealing with the various agencies for which he speaks in parliament.

Mr. Hamilton: Since this is the last item under that category perhaps we could deal with it here; I refer particularly to the sometimes careless and irresponsible way in which certain questions which are placed on the order paper in this house are handled, specifically by the Secretary of State. I have one example here. I am quite happy to see the Minister of Fisheries is in the house as well because he got into the act as he seems to do on a number of occasions. This question referred to government publications. Perhaps we should define our terms so the Secretary of State and myself will be talking about the same things.

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid the hon. member is definitely out of order in discussing that matter at this particular time. The estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State as such were passed some little time ago. The Secretary of State officials have left the chamber, and the resolutions have been sent away from the chamber. We have before us now only the vote for the public archives; and we may, if we reach them, have the votes for the chief electoral officer and the civil service commission. I am afraid I must rule at the moment that the hon. member's question is out of order, because it is. But perhaps I might make the suggestion that he raise it when the items for legislation, including the operation of this chamber, are before the house. They have not yet been called.

Item agreed to.

Civil service commission—

77. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $2,300,379.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, as the committee has come to expect, I rise each year to urge upon the Secretary of State the appointment of a woman to the civil service commission, if and when the next vacancy occurs. But on this particular occasion I feel I must bring to the attention of the committee one or two things that have occurred recently and which seem to me to bear out my contention that there should be a woman on that board.

I hold in my hand a sheet from the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, June 9, in which appears a group photograph of what is described as 31 branch heads in 20 civil service departments undergoing a special experimental course on government administration at Kemptville agricultural school. I point out that in this photograph there are no women present.

I was intrigued by this. I had seen previously the announcement of this school which was to be set up over a period of four weeks and which, I believe, terminates on June 18. I made it my business to inquire into the matter and found that although there are a number of women in the same grade of posts as those who were at the conference none of them found her way to that conference for this instruction on administration. That is just one item that has come to my attention.

The other one I think is a little more serious because, while the one I have just mentioned could have developed through oversight or failing to realize that there may have been some administrative officers in the civil service who would have been eligible but who, for one reason or another, found they could not attend, nevertheless in this other case there is obviously a definite instance of discrimination. I bring this to the attention of the Secretary of State to support my contention that one of the commissioners should be a woman, someone who can understand the conditions under which women in the civil service work.

I have here a letter which came to me from the city of Toronto. In it is set out the case of those students who were enrolled in the course at the University of Toronto which is known as the course on political science and economics. The third-year class in this course is made up equally of girls and boys. Early this year the Department of Citizenship and Immigration circularized the third-year students and offered summer employment to six undergraduates, and permanent employment to an unspecified number of graduates.

The type of work indicated was that for which these students were preparing themselves. And so, all the members in the third year applied for this summer employment. Application forms were transmitted to the civil service commission, and the applicants awaited results. I am informed that this particular third-year class had been headed by several girls, that the boys, in the main, were in the intermediate class between the top grade and the lower grade, and that there were no boys at all in the top grade. Yet not one of those girls was interviewed, not a single one. All the boys in the class were interviewed.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope my hon. friend the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is listening.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think it is his responsibility; it just happened to affect his department. Once the Department of Citizenship and Immigration had signified its willingness to give employment, I think the matter passed out of the minister's hands and became the responsibility of the civil service commission. From then on I do not think it was the minister's department which was responsible.

However the point is that if girls are not to be considered for these posts, then why have them take the course in the first place? Why let them waste their time? Why would not the president of the university, the deans of faculties and the heads of courses be advised that under no circumstances would women be given recognition by the government of Canada in these posts? Why send a circular to the whole class and say, "We will employ half a dozen undergraduates for summer employment and employ a further number of graduates"? After doing that, why say "We will interview only boys from that class"? It seems to me perfectly ridiculous. When these girls in the class made their complaint to the civil service commission the replies they received were evasive in the extreme, and to this day they have received no satisfactory reply.

This is just one more example of the discrimination which is exercised to some extent. I do not know how widespread it is, but I do think there is a misunderstanding of the role which these women graduates can play in the public service of Canada.

Once again I urge strongly that when the first vacancy occurs on the civil service commission preference should be given to a woman commissioner to fill that vacancy. I am sure the Secretary of State will agree with me that in the civil service of Canada we are not lacking in competent women who could fill that post.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I must defend my political reputation by saying a word or two in reply to the hon. member. In the first place I find myself, I will not say in complete agreement with everything she said, but quite sympathetic to everything she said. I certainly agree that there are plenty of women in this country just as competent to be civil service commissioners as are a great many of the men in this country. I agree furthermore that women, whenever they have the qualifications, should not be discriminated against. For my part I have always been rather a feminist, and I never have found any reason to change my views.

Now having protected my present position I think I ought to protect my future position by saying that the Secretary of State really occupies a very peculiar position in relation to the civil service commission. The civil service commission is not responsible to the government, but to parliament. The Secretary of State is only a sort of connecting link or, perhaps, a drain pipe between the civil service commission and parliament. And I will draw to the attention of the commission the hon. lady's remarks, although I do not think it will be necessary because I am sure they will have been drawn to their attention already. They will also see what I have said in encouragement of what she has said.

As to future appointments, of course the Secretary of State does not even recommend appointments to the civil service commission. I just say that so if the hon. lady's wishes in future should not be carried out by a government of which I might be a humble member, she will not hold me politically responsible.

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course not. On the other hand, the commission itself does not appoint its own members.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite; they are appointed by the government.

Mrs. Fairclough: These instances which I have described here tonight merely substantiate my claim. I did not expect that the Secretary of State would have any jurisdiction over those particular instances. I know that is a matter for the civil service commission; but I still say that until one of these commissioners is a woman, the women in the civil service will not have a sympathetic ear at the highest administrative level, and thus of the actual commission itself.

The day will come, and I would think not too far distant—probably before the Secretary of State presents another set of estimates in this house—when there will be an appointment to that commission. I want to say right now that if or when that appointment is made I hope the Secretary of State will not come to this house and make apologetic remarks for having appointed another gentleman to that commission. I hope that his search, or the search which is apparently now being made by the government, by its representatives or by whoever is responsible for the appointment of commissioners to that commission, will extend among the women who are giving service to this government in the civil service at the present time and that it will not be confined merely to the male members of that service.

Mr. Michener: I suppose this vote is for the personnel department of government. I suppose you might call the commission that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman realizes it is not a department of government at all, and is not even responsible to the government.

Mr. Michener: Whether it is responsible to the government or not, it is the commission which selects and appoints a good number of the civil servants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Michener: Can the minister give us information as to the number of civil servants who are appointed by the civil service commission because I know that some are and some are not? I should like to have the figure of those who are appointed by the commission and also the figure of the total payroll of those who are appointed by the commission. That may take a little while to get, but it is a condition on which I will permit this item to pass.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might crave the hon. gentleman's permission, without prejudicing the passing of this vote, to put that on Hansard the next time we are in committee, because I would not like to give any figures I might have now or any offhand information about figures of this kind because it is very important that if they are given they should be right.

Mr. Michener: That is quite satisfactory, Mr. Chairman, if it is done in that way.

Mr. Fulton: Let the item stand.

Mr. Michener: No; I shall be quite satisfied to have the information.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should be glad to give it on the orders of the day.

Mr. Michener: The information I want is the number of civil servants, in round figures for whose appointment the civil service commission is responsible, and the total payroll of that group of civil servants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite.

Mr. Michener: Would the minister add the balance of the payroll?

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. Pearkes: I will not delay the committee for more than a couple of minutes, but I do want the minister to draw to the attention of the commission—I think that is the right phrase—representations which have been made to me by a group of ex-service men that they might be entitled to the veterans preference in the same way as other veterans who have served in the Canadian forces or who have served in the Imperial forces and had prior domicile in Canada are entitled to a preference. There are a number of men who served in commonwealth forces other than the Canadian forces in world war II who have come to Canada, who have lived in Canada for five years and have now taken out Canadian citizenship. Will the minister ask the commission to give consideration to the desirability or the possibility of granting that group of men, now that they have lived in this country for five years and have become Canadian citizens, the same veterans preference as the men who served in the Canadian forces?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would rather doubt whether it would be competent for the civil service commission to do that. I would think that is something that would have to be done by parliament. The hon. gentleman has made his representations, and members of the committee have heard them, and I shall see that my colleagues are advised of them.

Mr. Knowles: There are some figures that I should like to ask the Secretary of State to obtain as well. If he wishes to deal with them in the same way as he suggested in reply to the hon. member for St. Paul's that would be satisfactory. He will find that on previous occasions I have asked for the break-down of civil servants into several groups: permanent, temporary, temporary-permanent and others. I wonder whether he can produce those figures for the present time, and also the same figures for say five years ago, in order to show what the trend is? And if at the same time he would give the total number of people employed by the government on a prevailing rate basis I would appreciate it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be glad to do the best I can. As far as these figures are concerned, I think the hon. gentleman knows that there would not be a strict compatibility any more because under the new set-up the main difference between permanents and temporaries as to whether they were under superannuation or not has been, if I may use a vulgarism, largely washed out. It would be very hard to draw the kind of line suggested, but in so far as it can be done, in so far as I can figure out any way to get the information, I will be glad to comply with my hon. friend's request.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have one other matter. I realize that a question was placed on the order paper earlier this session in regard to this. Can the Secretary of State tell us why it was necessary to issue a questionnaire to retired civil servants inquiring into particulars of any employment which they may have taken subsequent to their retirement. I know that this particular questionnaire caused a considerable amount of concern among some of these people. If they had served their time with the government and retired on superannuation my own opinion would be that it is none of their business whether they took subsequent employment or not.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite sure that no such questionnaire was issued by the civil service commission. It may be that is something that had something to do with the operation of the superannuation act. I shall be glad to draw the hon. lady's question to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and suggest that he reply on his estimates.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do apologize. Now that I have looked at it the second time I see that the questionnaire is headed "The Department of Finance".

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: I move that the house do now adjourn. Tomorrow we shall take the amendments to the Bank Act which were made in the Senate; then the resolution with respect to the Judges Act. I have reason to believe that hon. members opposite will find it convenient to pass it through all stages with little or no debate. Then we shall take the estimates of the departments of trade and commerce, veterans affairs, mines and technical surveys, legislation, fisheries and any others we may have time for.

Mr. Fulton: When shall we have the privilege of having the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration? We are all so extremely anxious to hear from the minister on that.

Mr. Harris: I realize that the house is anxious to support the minister in the policy he has adopted over the years. Had I had my way they would have been before the house some time last week.

Mr. Fulton: Which of your cabinet colleagues is opposing bringing them on?

An hon. Member: The hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. Fulton: Am I one of his cabinet colleagues?

Mr. Sinclair: You are the devil's advocate of the cabinet.

Mr. Harris: I know hon. members opposite will not take this in anything more than a helpful sense, but I have a good many requests for special consideration on special days and many hon. members have spoken to me before the hon. member for Kamloops and I feel I will have to carry out these engagements.

Mr. Knowles: I hope the minister will not take our silence a moment ago as indicating that we necessarily agree to the proposition that the Judges Act might be put through all its stages in one day. We may agree; but let us not take it as being agreed tonight.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.43 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 17, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VISIT TO OTTAWA BY SIR WINSTON CHURCHILL AND MR. EDEN

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I should inform the house about the exchange of messages with London concerning the visit by Sir Winston Churchill and Mr. Eden to Washington at the end of next week. As soon as we heard that a date had been set for that visit we made inquiries through the office of the United Kingdom High Commissioner here in Ottawa and through our own High Commissioner in the office of commonwealth relations in London as to the possibility of their coming to Ottawa on the occasion of their visit to this continent.

Yesterday morning I received personally from Sir Winston Churchill a very cordial message in which he said he always enjoyed a conference in Canada but could not make any plans at the present time. Following that message I had this message sent to the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations of the British government:

> Having heard that Sir Winston and Mr. Eden are coming to Washington, my colleagues and I would like to assure them that, if it were convenient for them to visit Ottawa on their way back, they would be most warmly welcomed and that we would much appreciate the opportunity of hearing direct from them their appreciation of the present situation.
> I quite understand, however, Sir Winston's difficulty about making plans at present for such a visit and I would not like him to feel any embarrassment if circumstances made it necessary for him to decline our invitation at this time.

This morning I received this personal message from Sir Winston which I am glad to communicate to the house:

> So glad to get your telegram. I have every hope of coming to Ottawa for a day or a day and a half during the 29th of June, 30th of June and 1st of July, if it is convenient to you. Mr. Eden, to whom I have spoken, will be delighted to come too. I do not want any public meeting but we shall be honoured to meet your cabinet.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Prime Minister whether it would be feasible to have any sort of commonwealth conference at that time in view of the fact that Sir Winston Churchill will just have completed very important discussions with the President of the United States?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. I think this means that we will have an opportunity of hearing from Sir Winston and Mr. Eden their appreciation of the situation as they see it at this time. There would be no opportunity for bringing representatives of other commonwealth countries here, and that would not conform with the tone of this exchange of messages. I understand the visit Sir Winston and Mr. Eden are making to Mr. Eisenhower is an informal personal week-end visit, and that Sir Winston and Mr. Eden hope that it may be possible for them, on their way back, to spend a day or a day and a half here having the same kind of informal discussions with us about the present situation.

QUESTIONS

PROPERTY LEASES, C.B.C.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. In how many cases has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation renewed its lease or signed new leases covering buildings and property, since the 1st day of January 1954?
2. Where were such properties located, what was the previous rental and what is the new rate of rentals?

Mr. McCann:

1 and 2. Since January 1, 1954, the corporation has arranged to continue occupancy of space at two locations. A lease for space at 660 Howe street, Vancouver, B.C., was renewed at the same rate of rental as under the previous lease. Negotiations have been concluded with local municipal authorities for a new lease for studio and office space occupied by station CBV in the Palais Montcalm in Quebec city. As already announced locally, the new lease is for 5,858 square feet at a rental rate of $8,000 per annum. The previous lease was for 4,600 feet at a rental rate of $2,500 per annum.

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS—LABOUR RATES

Mr. Hansell:

On what basis, or what formula is used in determining rates of pay for tradesmen and labourers employed, irrespective of those in the armed services, where contracts do not apply, on buildings coming under the supervision of: (a) Department of Transport; (b) Department of National Defence; (c) Department of Public Works?

Questions

Mr. Gregg: The rates of pay of government employees so described is based upon surveys of wage rates paid, in the area of their employment, by private employers to employees engaged in comparable work.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS AND EXTENSION OF HOURS ON AND AFTER JUNE 17

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Thursday, June 17, 1954, in addition to the hours of sitting as provided for in special order of the house made May 27, 1954, the house shall also sit from 7.00 o'clock to 8.00 o'clock, p.m., on each sitting day; and that on Saturday, June 19, 1954 and every Saturday thereafter, until the end of the session, the hours of sitting of the house shall in every respect be under the same rules as are provided for other days, and the order of business and procedure on Saturdays shall be the same as for Thursday.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question arising out of this motion? I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Harris) whether, in view of the fact that the extension of the hours of this house and the inclusion of Saturday sittings will mean that a large percentage of the employees of the house work 60 hours a week as against 38 hours a week in the ordinary civil service, what arrangements are being made by way of compensation for the extra time or for time off? There should be some.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Acting Minister of Public Works): I am not familiar with that matter, Mr. Speaker, but I will ascertain the answer and give it to my hon. friend.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS TO INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Harris: Last night, in announcing the business for today, I omitted to include the amendments made by the Senate to the Income Tax Act. It would be greatly appreciated if, after disposing of the amendments to the Bank Act, we could proceed with the amendments to the Income Tax Act.

POTATOES

REQUEST FOR CHANGE OF DATES FOR IMPOSITION OF IMPORT DUTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. As I did not give him notice, he may take this question as notice and reply at a later date. Has the minister had from the British Columbia coast vegetable marketing board representations urging that the dates for the imposition of the import duty on early potatoes be changed because of the lateness of the season in British Columbia?

[Mr. Hansell.]

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the department had a message similar to the one which I am sure the hon. member has had, as well as other members, from the British Columbia district and have looked into it. The arrangement is a matter of international agreement, and the dates set are statutory so that they could not be changed at this time without negotiation with the parties concerned.

THE BANK ACT

PROVISION FOR DECENNIAL REVISION, EXTENSION OF CHARTERS, ETC.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 338, respecting banks and banking.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

INCOME TAX ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 467, to amend the Income Tax Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should give a word of explanation.

Mr. Knowles: And tell us what they are.

Mr. Abbott: They are routine in character. They were made at my suggestion. One relates entirely to the coming into effect of a section which increases from 20 per cent to 30 per cent the tax on shares redeemed at a premium. The section is a new one, as the house will recall. It was found that the date originally fixed for coming into effect would have adversely affected certain taxpayers and would have a retroactive effect which was not intended. That correction was made at my suggestion.

The other amendment was also made at my suggestion. It is a clarifying amendment to the section dealing with the mutual insurance companies and was to make it quite clear that the coming into effect section relating to the non-resident mutual insurance companies did not affect the resident mutuals. I can assure the house they involve no fundamental question of policy. They are matters as to which I think it was quite appropriate for the amendments to be made in the other place.

Mr. Macdonnell: In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, in view of the ample assurance given by the minister that there is no question of policy involved, it seems to me that we have no other course to follow than to agree. But it seems to me that we are acting in haste when we are asked to agree to something which we actually have not seen.

Mr. Abbott: If there were any question of policy involved, we would not have made this request.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that we have not yet seen yesterday's Votes and Proceedings which would tell us what these amendments are, may I ask if I understood the minister correctly when he indicated that there were only the two amendments?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: I would perhaps clarify that. Perhaps there may be consequential amendments to the sections but the substance of the two amendments is as I have indicated.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE SALARIES FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for an additional judge of the court of appeal for British Columbia and an additional judge for the trial division of the supreme court of Alberta.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: I think we should have from the minister an assurance that both these additions have been requested by the province concerned.

Mr. Garson: Yes; that is right. Indeed we cannot make the appointment until the provinces concerned have first created additional vacancies. Therefore in the nature of things they are bound to have been approved by the provinces.

Mr. Green: Is there any other amendment in the bill?

Mr. Garson: No.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Judges Act

Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 478, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: By leave shall—

Mr. Knowles: Despite the simplicity of this bill I do not think we should pass too many things without at least having a chance to see them.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Exhibitions—

430. Exhibitions generally, $325,962.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find the vote on page 57 of the blue book and the details commencing on page 493.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to ask the minister if he will make some comments on the trade fair. I remember that a year ago he gave us some interesting comments showing the extent to which the attendance had been by people from outside the country and inside the country. I should very much like to hear his assessment of it perhaps in that way and others this year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am sorry to say that we have not the analysis of this year's fair at hand at the moment. But as far as exhibitors are concerned, slightly more than 50 per cent of the exhibitors were Canadian. In my opinion that is about the right proportion.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the minister give a comparison with the figure for last year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is about the same ratio as last year, in fact 52 per cent Canadian and 48 per cent foreign in both years. The attendance of buyers for the first week was a record. The second week was rather disappointing. There were not as many buyers in attendance the second week as we had hoped but, as I say, the first week was a record. We have made a careful detailed analysis of the results every year and we make up our minds from such analysis about the future of the fair. It has been announced that the fair will continue next year. Last year the total attendance of the business visitors, the buyers, was 26,853. This year it was 25,049. The number of buyers is down a little. As I say, the second week was disappointing. The decrease was in large measure due to a drop in buyers from the United States. Last year we had 2,183 buyers from the United States and this year 1,839. But in general, we believe that in many ways this was the best fair we have ever had, and we are hopeful that next year will show an improvement in the attendance of buyers.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister add a word as to the composition of the foreign exhibitors, whether they were pretty well identical with last year and whether there was any noticeable change in the nature of the exhibits that would indicate a change in trade trends.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am informed that the pattern of this year's fair was very similar to the pattern of last year's. There was no difference that would indicate a trend of any kind.

Mr. Macdonnell: For example, Germany and Japan?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Germany and Japan were exhibitors last year and they were exhibitors on about the same scale this year.

Mr. Nesbitt: I think the minister is to be complimented on the very fine showing at the international trade fair. There is one question I should like to ask. Can the minister tell us whether or not there was a doctor on the premises at the fair?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am told that there was no physician there.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is my understanding, and in view of an incident about which I have been informed I suggest it might be a good idea in the future to have a doctor available on the premises rather than just the services of the St. John Ambulance people.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I will be very glad to pass on that suggestion to the management of the fair.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—
435. Administration, $198,949.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to have the minister say something about the dominion bureau of statistics. I have received great help from it myself and appreciate its value very highly. There is one thing, however, which has been mentioned in the house before.

The Chairman: Order. May I ask hon. members to please maintain silence. It is impossible to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Macdonnell: I am speaking loud enough. The trouble is that other people are speaking too loud. I want to raise the question of the extraordinary discrepancy which exists between the figures put out by the dominion bureau of statistics, being a part of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the Department of Labour in the matter of employment and unemployment. It seems to me to be obvious that unemployment is one of the most important matters which face us at the moment, and it seems an extraordinary thing to me that we have this terrific discrepancy in figures. It has been explained in a way but not in a way with which anyone in my opinion should be satisfied.

One department uses the phrase "persons without jobs and seeking work", and the other uses a different phrase which I forget for the moment. We get figures not varying by 10 per cent or 20 per cent but sometimes by 50 per cent or more. It may be satisfactory to the departments concerned. They may have their ways of making their own mental reservations and explanations, but surely it is entirely unsatisfactory from the point of view of the public. Certainly it is entirely unsatisfactory from the point of view of labour because it means that they never have firm ground on which to discuss the matter. It is one thing to discuss the question of unemployment with the government if unemployment is 10 per cent. It is an entirely different thing if it is 5 per cent.

Further, I have been reading in the Labour Gazette for April a very interesting article about seasonal unemployment. There is a long discussion there and some suggestions are laid down as to how seasonal unemployment shall be assessed. Of course seasonal unemployment is the reason that has been given for the situation, but we are now in June and I do not think that the defence of seasonal unemployment can be of any further value. I would ask the minister to give us a full explanation of why the difference does exist. I am not blaming the dominion bureau of statistics at all. I assume it is done under instructions because they have got to be given a policy in order to work out a figure. I assume they are under instructions as they quite properly should be. I understand for example that they do not include figures of people temporarily out of work; people who have been let out but with instructions that they are to come back at the end of thirty days.

But these people are certainly out of work at the moment, and I take it also that even if all of them go back at the end of thirty days it is not reasonable to assume that the same thing has not happened to a lot of others in the interval. In other words, the thing rolls around. I understand that the Department of Labour does include those figures, and if they do I take it that is on the assumption that if you have tens of thousands of people temporarily out of work in May you are not going to find a situation in June where all those tens of thousands of people have come back and where no others are in the position that the first lot were in during the preceding month.

In other words, so far as my judgment goes, I find the figures of the Department of Labour very much more realistic than those of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I think we should try to get to the bottom of it because it is a very important matter. The minister accused me the other day of being a pessimist. I hope I am not. Pessimists are a nuisance to everybody, and I do not want to regard myself as being in that category. I want to be a little optimist, but on the other hand I cannot go around like some members of the house and, when I am asked the reason for my faith, just say: "Well, C. D. said so". There are a lot of people in the house who think that when they have said that, the matter is settled. To me that is a very important piece of evidence, but I do not regard it as absolutely the last and final word, not necessarily.

Therefore I hope the minister will have regard for my weakness, for my quality of optimism which is not so great as his and which wants to be optimism plus reason. I should like an attempt to be made, which I have not heard done before, to reconcile these two figures and to make sense of them because, as somebody said, at the moment there seems to be a kind of cold war between these two departments.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I presume my hon. friend prefers the Department of Labour figures because they suit him better as a basis for argument, but he is really making an analysis of two different things. The Department of Labour figures show the number of people looking for jobs on a particular day. There would be no harm, and it would be quite in order for my hon. friend to go to the nearest labour office and put his name down as one seeking a job. He might find a better one than he has.

Mr. Macdonnell: Not after all we members have said about being fully employed.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Probably the bureau of statistics would put him down as employed, even though he might be seeking a job. There, you have the situation.

Mr. Knowles: He is a sort of temporary permanent.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, quite right. We have a situation where people register for jobs while they are employed. We also have a situation where a man will retire from the railroad on a pension and then put himself down as seeking a job. Would you list him as unemployed? The bureau of statistics would refer to him as a man outside the labour force. He had retired. Nevertheless, the labour department would include his name as an applicant for a job.

I do not believe there is any harm in telling the house as a matter of interest that by arrangement with the labour department we had a survey made of a list of those applying for jobs as registered in the labour department. We did not inform the field men that there was anything particular about the list we sent down to them, but they thought the results were sufficiently odd to warrant a special report to the Ottawa headquarters. The report said that they found the list most extraordinary; actually over 50 per cent of the people on it were out of work, and they thought the department should know!

The labour survey is made on a scientific basis, and it follows the approved sampling methods of the bureau of statistics. Over 30,000 families are called upon each month, and it is a different 30,000 each time. A report is based on the findings of that survey. If the man is unemployed and seeking work on the day the survey is made, then he is registered as unemployed. A list is made up by expanding that sample survey to cover the working force of Canada. I may say that the bureau of statistics survey is much more complete than the surveys upon which unemployment figures are based in the United States. This survey of 30,000 out of a working force of 5 million is a very much larger sample than is used in the survey of unemployment in the country to the south. We believe the results are correct, so far as it can be determined by sampling methods.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister has just explained that in sampling for the purpose of labour statistics different people are interviewed each time. I should like to make some representations to the department on behalf of a group of people who have found that they suffer considerable inconvenience because of being on the list for sampling, and not being able to get off the list. I am not talking about labour statistics; I am talking about statistics that are sought from various industries through surveys by the bureau of statistics. I realize that when you seek to produce statistics by the sampling method you must select certain people out of each industry for which the survey is conducted who can supply you with the material.

The part to which I object is the fact that some small industries or comparatively small restaurants, with one or two persons in the office, are periodically required to make returns to the bureau of statistics. Despite the fact that they protest that their office staff is not adequate to keep this up indefinitely, they simply cannot get off the list. In some cases, it goes on for a long time. It does not seem right to me that a few people should be saddled with this job of providing statistics for the bureau, while a great many people in the country go scot-free. If you have a small office staff, it is an expensive procedure. It sometimes means you have to hire extra help in order to supply these figures. I am sure many of these people realize the importance of supplying the figures, but they do believe they are being discriminated against.

If they were put on the list for a year and then removed, there would not be too much complaint. However, when they are put on the list indefinitely and they realize they are being forced to supply information to the bureau that their competitor is not forced to supply, they believe there is just cause for complaint. I ask the minister, therefore, to inquire into this matter to see that some people are not forced to continuously supply information.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would say at once that any information that is gathered by the bureau is entirely confidential. Not long ago we had a case which may interest the house. We were asked by another government for information that the bureau of statistics had. We consulted the bureau, and they said we could not disclose it even privately to another government. It was gathered as private information and could not be released to anyone for any purpose, so the information was not given. There is nothing guarded more carefully in government circles than information gathered by the bureau of statistics.

Every effort has been made to cause the least possible inconvenience in obtaining the statistics that are considered necessary in carrying out the functions of the bureau. We have now on the questionnaire list business firms of less than $50,000 capitalization. The form for such companies has been simplified so that only one question is asked, and that is quite a simple one. In the case of labour statistics, if anyone objects to answering the questions we simply drop their name from the list and pick another name. I am told that the bureau receives remarkable co-operation from the public in gathering information, and finds very little resentment about giving the information that is required.

I must say I have received no complaints that I recall about any demand from the bureau for information. I am sure our chief statistician will keep in mind the suggestions of the hon. member for Hamilton West to make certain that sampling lists do not include the same name too long. I am told that is not the practice. The practice is, where sampling is performed, to change the lists frequently. I am sure the dominion statistician will look into the complaint and make sure the inconvenience is minimized to the greatest possible extent.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister must have misunderstood me with reference to the first part of his remarks. I was not talking about the confidential nature of the reports at all. I was making, more or less, a representation on behalf of these small companies. I know, and the minister knows, that if you have a sizeable staff it is easy to juggle jobs around so that someone can compile these statistics. It is, however, a real hardship on the little fellow. Despite the minister's assurance, I know of a few cases where names have been on the list for a long time, and despite their protests. I take it that what is required is that they make a written protest, and their names will be removed, but that has not been the experience of some of these people.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The head of the bureau of statistics tells me that he would like very much to have the names of those people, for his confidential guidance. Perhaps my hon. friend would pass those names along.

Mrs. Fairclough: I shall do so.

Mr. Knowles: May I join with the hon. member for Greenwood in paying tribute to the excellent job done by the dominion bureau of statistics. I have seldom if ever known an instance where the bureau was unable to supply information I have tried to get from them. In fact often when one seeks certain information he gets more than he asks for. In short, they do an awfully good job.

In this connection I was a bit surprised the other day to find that certain questions

I had placed on the order paper were answered by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production, apparently on behalf of the dominion bureau of statistics. They were questions relating to records concerning charges and offences under the Criminal Code. I fully expected my questions would be answered by the Department of Justice but, as it turns out, the answers were given by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Obviously the answers given by the bureau were somewhat limited. It was pointed out to me in the information I received that only such information as it is felt necessary to keep for statistical purposes is kept by the bureau. What I am saying, Mr. Chairman, is not by way of criticism of the dominion bureau of statistics. I had thought these records would be kept by the Department of Justice, but it appears that this is being done by the bureau of statistics.

I would hope that another look might be taken at the questions I put on the order paper to see whether the bureau might not enlarge the categories of statistics it keeps in relation to matters coming under the Criminal Code. Apparently the job is already being done by the bureau. This is just a suggestion that the field of information in connection with which statistics are kept regarding the Criminal Code might be enlarged.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am sure the dominion statistician will take note of my hon. friend's remarks, and do what he can to amplify his records.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, may I join with the other hon. members in congratulating the dominion bureau of statistics upon the job it is doing. I know, too, that they are always open to suggestions to improve their work.

I had the pleasure of attending the first trade fair held in Toronto, and also of attending the last. I was greatly pleased with each of them and must commend the minister upon the improvement that has been made in the fair in a short number of years.

My reason for speaking now is to suggest to the bureau that they make a survey showing the number of miles travelled by workers to and from their work, in the large cities, and another survey showing similar information for the medium sized cities and towns. I believe the information obtained would help us realize that centralization is not a good thing for the country.

A short time ago I read in the press the report of a speech made in Montreal, I believe, by the president of General Motors. In his speech he was chiding the highways department for not having better roads to assist labourers who travel perhaps 50 miles to and from their work. With all due respect for presidents, in this instance I begin to think that this particular president should be shown a few things.

My point is that in the smaller towns the workers have to travel only short distances, at the outside taking up perhaps only 15 minutes of their time. Walking to work they meet each other—"Hello Bill; hello Jack"—and it is not just a rat race such as we see in the larger cities. People working in those factories enjoy their work a great deal more than those who work in the city.

I believe if this survey were made it would enlighten us and would convince us that there should be more decentralization of industry, thus making everybody happy.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, in view of what was said a short time ago by the hon. member for Greenwood may I take this opportunity to say just a word about the points he brought up, particularly considering the very fair way in which he dealt with the matter.

Prior to a year ago last fall in the Department of Labour we had been publishing every month figures showing the total number of those seeking employment across Canada. At and prior to that time we in the Department of Labour, as well as my colleagues in other departments, felt that although a true total of workers so listed was coming out of the adding machines in our U.I.C. offices it did not give a clear picture either in winter or in summer.

Consequently we had a very careful study undertaken. Part of that study included a cross-check in different parts of Canada referred to today by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. A check of listed unemployed was made to find out if they were actually unemployed. I must say when the results of that check came to my attention it was a surprise as well as a bit of of a shock to me.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, what was found is not surprising when we realize that in our 230 offices, particularly in the winter months when our staffs are busily engaged in interviewing applicants for work and looking after all those complex matters entering into the insurance plan, there is not the time for the staff to con over the lists of applicants to find out by telephone, by letter or by wire which ones may have got work somewhere else, which ones may be listed at other places, and all those pieces of information which would be necessary to strip the lists down to applicants still wanting jobs.

As a result of that, beginning a year ago December, I believe it was, it was decided that the quarterly announcement made by the dominion bureau of statistics should be enlarged and, if you like, sharpened up, and made into a monthly report based upon the survey the minister outlined a little while ago.

The suggestion was made that the results of that survey, with the new total, might be the only monthly total issued. My personal view was that it would be wrong to do so—and I still feel that way—because ever since 1941 the monthly list showing the total of persons seeking employment has gone out to the public. We have had that for every month. We have not had any other yardstick for every month, except the information we have had only since a year ago last December when the list was begun by the dominion bureau of statistics.

So it was decided in the middle of the winter a year ago last January to issue this as a joint release, providing for the public all the information we had on the subject, including the total number of persons seeking employment as of a given date. The one which will come out within a week will be as of approximately May 20, just as the one which came out around May 20 showed the total as of about April 20. In other words, the figures are about a month old.

Now, there is another factor affecting the total number who are seeking employment. Particularly in the winter months we have found in the cities and towns a keen interest on the part of everyone as to how the picture was going with regard to that city, town or province. By the very nature of it, the dominion bureau of statistics' plan is a nation-wide one, and so are the conclusions drawn from that. In the city of Toronto, for instance, the only indicator on the employment situation there today, as compared with three years ago this date, would be that very general one coming from the Department of Labour. I want to take advantage of being on my feet at this time to scotch completely a suggestion that has been made in some quarters that this combined release was over the dead body of the Department of Labour or the Minister of Labour. It was nothing of the sort. As a matter of fact it was we who suggested that the study take place and we have co-operated and will co-operate in every way to provide the best information we can. On the one hand, a careful survey is made by D.B.S., an agency of government that has had great experience and in which all the members have complete confidence; and, on the other, a simple total through U.I.C. of those who are applying at any given time.

I should like to tell the committee that if it is possible to narrow the gap or give more precise information, we will certainly do it. I can tell the committee that I have gone over the comparable reports which are issued south of the line from month to month, and I must say that the three or four that are produced there do not add any more precise information than we are giving. I am sure it will be realized by the hon. member for Greenwood that it would be impossible, even if you carried out a complete census in Canada, to say exactly how many men and women are unemployed on this 17th day of June. By the time the callers went around to the doors and found out, the figures for people behind them on whom they had called would be out of date before totals could be got. We have got to give the best information that can be made available.

Mr. Mang: I should like to ask a question on this item. To what extent does the bureau of statistics gather information in the rural areas of a province like Saskatchewan? The reason I ask the question is that in my area there was a man going around visiting ever so many farms. He called on the fourth or fifth one in the areas surrounding the villages, and he also made a canvass of the villagers in that area. He took one out of so many houses as he went down the street. To what extent is that being done throughout Saskatchewan? Those statistics were gathered from a good many people who would probably list themselves as unemployed on the farms because they were under the impression that if they listed themselves as unemployed they would get a job in town in the winter or in the logging camps, or something of that nature. That would affect the unemployment picture. They are not unemployed now of course. My reason for asking the question is to find out how that might influence the unemployment picture. Does the bureau of statistics have quite a group of men doing that type of work in Saskatchewan? The man I have in mind lives on a farm. From time to time he jumps in his car and goes around and gathers this information.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am told that we do make a survey of rural Saskatchewan. I am told that a man who is living on a farm which he owns is not counted as unemployed just because he is not as busy at that time of the year as he is in other times of the year. If he were away from home and working as a logger and were out of work as a logger, he would be registered as unemployed. In that class of labour, that shifts between the farm and the forest industry, there is bound to be a discrepancy in labour figures. In my own district many loggers live on little farms and their business is logging. Nevertheless, if they are not logging at the time of the survey, they would be registered as unemployed in that area.

Mr. Noseworthy: Has the minister anything in the form of a break-down with regard to the amount of expenditure by the educational branch of the dominion bureau of statistics? Can he give me the number of people employed by that branch? I used to be in much closer touch with that branch before I came here than I have been since. My experience was that that was one branch of the dominion bureau of statistics which was financially undernourished. What is the situation at the present time?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am told that there is a new director of the educational branch who has just been appointed. A provincial conference has been held to get the requirements and the views of the provinces on the proper way to compile information. I am told that we are now in the process of expanding that branch to give complete coverage of that division of our statistics.

At the moment, eleven people are employed in the branch.

Mr. Noseworthy: Just one more question. Two years ago a good deal of consideration was given to the possibility of having some office, or someone in the educational branch of the dominion bureau of statistics, act as a sort of co-ordinator of information, or an information office for the various phases of educational work that is done by different departments of government. I realize that some publications are published by various departments of government that provincial departments of education might not be very anxious to have distributed within the schools because of the propaganda nature of the publication. But there is an immense amount of valuable factual material about Canada published by various departments of government such as the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Labour, the Department of National Health and Welfare, and a number of others that publish an enormous amount of material that would be almost invaluable in the schools.

When I was teaching, my difficulty was to find out from what departments this material was available and just what the material was. I know that for some time teachers' organizations have advocated the setting up of some central clearing house in the educational branch of the dominion bureau of statistics that could give to the educational workers and teachers across the country some guidance about material, for instance, from the film board or from any other department. Is anything being done along that line, or is each department simply producing material that lies in storage space until it becomes outdated and then is sent off to an incinerator or sold as scrap paper?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, I am told that we have had several requests from the provinces along the lines suggested by the hon. member. The new director of the branch is studying the matter and it is believed that within limits we can give that service. All the provinces think it is a desirable service and attempts are being made to organize the bureau to provide it.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, there are a few brief remarks I would like to make on this item. During the recent discussion in this house on Bill No. 7 dealing with the Criminal Code the question of death on the highways was discussed from time to time and some intimation was given that perhaps next session a further discussion of the matter of traffic fatalities and problems relating thereto would be undertaken. I believe the minister even intimated that there might possibly be some sort of conference with the attorneys general of the various provinces in view of the jurisdictional problems which arise relative to this question.

In view of the fact that the question of accidents and death on the highways has become increasingly grave in this country, I am wondering whether the minister might consider recommending to the dominion bureau of statistics that they compile more complete figures with respect to motor vehicle accidents and traffic offences throughout the country.

The figures we have at present in the Canada Year Book are meagre when one considers the magnitude of the problem involved, and though I realize it may be a difficult and expensive job in obtaining this information I think in view of the fact that this is such a major problem it might be well worth while.

For example, there is no break-down of the type of traffic offences. The Canada Year Book at page 304 gives by province the number of convictions against breaches of the traffic regulations, but it does not give any break-down of the variety of accidents, whether they are due to careless driving, speeding, failing to stop at a stop sign, or merely neglecting to have a licence renewed.

I think there might be other interesting break-downs such as the age groups of the persons involved in traffic accidents; and another and very important break-down would be one showing how many involve repeated offences. Another break-down might be the number of traffic offences involving liquor, and how many accidents involve more than one automobile.

I would like to recommend this to the minister because I feel this problem will have to be considered either in this house or in conjunction with the various provincial legislatures, and in order to assess the problem and discuss it intelligently we will have to have a much better break-down than is provided by this department. I do not mean that as a criticism of the dominion bureau of statistics, but this important problem exists and must be faced and I think if we are to deal with it the bureau should attempt to expand its facilities in order to gather this information.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, the bureau can only collect this information in co-operation with the provinces and only to the extent that the provinces themselves keep records on a reasonably uniform basis. I am told that a few years ago a conference was held with the provincial attorneys general, or members of their staffs, and an undertaking was given that statistics would be compiled in a manner in which they could be used by the bureau to compile a national record. However, that undertaking has not been carried out. I am informed that the estimates we are now considering provide for another meeting with the officers of the provinces, and another attempt will be made to obtain accurate and complete records kept on a uniform basis for compilation by the bureau of statistics. I am hopeful that we can improve the situation.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear the minister say that because, for example, apparently there are no figures available for the province of Quebec, which in population is the second largest province, and without these figures we will be very much at a loss.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw to the minister's attention two questionnaires which are handled by the customs and immigration officials at border points. One questionnaire deals with Americans or foreigners leaving this country and asks them how much money they have spent here, and it is very difficult for them to give an accurate estimate. The questionnaire has its nuisance value and it irritates. The other questionnaire is directed at Canadians re-entering Canada and asks a similar question. I would say that in about 80 per cent of the cases the answers are not correct. It is not compulsory to give an answer to this question and the persons involved do not have to supply this information. I know that in my own case on several occasions when I have been re-entering Canada and have been asked this question I have tried to answer correctly and I have later found out that I was very far short of the amount I had actually spent. For example, when you are motoring in the United States your gasoline and oil are checked against your credit card and you do not have to pay for them immediately. On another occasion Mrs. Lennard spent some money which I knew nothing about at the time. I might add that during rush periods where people are crossing the border in large numbers the officials do not have the time to be bothered asking these questions, and on other occasions I know that most of the answers are incorrect. In my estimation the department is not obtaining the information it seeks and the whole thing is a farce.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knowles: Tell us about Mrs. Howe.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am afraid I could not answer that question with regard to her expenses. However, I would point out that the tourists' expenditures are a very important item in the balance of payment figures. The bureau adopts the method which it believes is most likely to give fair results. My hon. friend from Wentworth might be under a bit in his estimation of the amount he spent but others might be boasting a bit and perhaps the average would be fairly close to the mark. I think we all realize the difficulty of getting absolutely accurate figures on tourist expenditures either in Canada or outside its borders. The bureau, in collaboration with the customs and other agencies of government, pursues every avenue that seems most likely to give reliable figures. The dominion statistician informs me that he believes that after all sources are used, the figures are reasonably accurate. In any event they are used in international trade references.

Mr. Rowe: They are only an estimate in any event.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is all.

Mr. Hahn: In connection with that same idea, may I ask if it would not simplify matters if, when you report you are going across the line, you were given a simple form which you could turn in on your return to the border. This procedure would facilitate not only the getting through of the individual who might have been across the line but also the work of the customs officials who already have it completed and have not 20 or 30 people rushing around them trying to get forms at one and the same time.

Mr. Lennard: I might say that such a procedure might curtail some spending on the part of visitors to Canada, if they thought they had to account for every cent they spent over here. We need their dollars.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. I think there are two sides to the question of the advisability of doing that. The matter could be looked into, to see whether that would help the situation. We always like to give the impression that Canada is a free economy, which it is, and to impress on visitors that this information is obtained only for statistical purposes.

Mr. Hahn: I am not getting at the fact that Canada is not a free economy. I believe these people who use the port of Blaine as an entry, or Douglas in our own case which is the name of it in British Columbia would not feel that way about it. What I am thinking about is this group which comes across the border on Sunday. We have possibly two or three miles of them. We have at Douglas an excellent staff which certainly gets them through as quickly as possible. When that zero hour, however, hits, it is difficult to get them through. We have many harassed individuals at the border wondering why they are not being permitted to go through more quickly, when all they have to do is to say "I have not bought anything", but you are just waiting in a long line while the other individuals who definitely want to give the information properly can be dealt with in the proper fashion. They would be only too hapy to fill in such forms. I meet dozens of them from time to time who say: If we just had this before we got to the border, we would not be spending half an hour around here trying to figure out exactly what we did spend.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The dominion statistician now has the hon. member's suggestion. He says it is well worth looking into. I am sure he will look into it.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sorry to be so, shall I say, stubborn. I notice that the minister was addressing two audiences in Montreal yesterday. I am sure none of them gave him anything like the trouble I am giving him. In fact, I have no doubt that they applauded him to the echo. I most certainly hope that what he said there is going to turn out to be correct.

I am grateful to the Minister of Labour for his contribution and for the spirit in which it was made, but I must confess that what the Minister of Labour said really underlined my trouble in this matter. As I understand it, we have two parallel lines—yes, they are parallel; parallel lines never meet—of inquiry going on. One is what you might call a scientific inquiry made by the dominion bureau of statistics. I presume that is a natural way for it to operate. But the other seems to me to be a much more human kind of inquiry. It shows the people who come in and say they are out of work and are seeking employment.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They do not say they are out of work. They do not need to say they are out of work.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister can correct me on that point, and I accept the correction. My point is that while the Minister of Labour has admitted that there may be errors, nevertheless when he talks about 230 separate offices which are trying to get a real picture of the situation, I confess I do not find it easy to wash out that error. If the difference between them were 10 per cent, 15 per cent or 25 per cent one would say: There is room for a margin of error. But I want to read the figures from last January. As I understand it, here you have unplaced applicants in January last, as the Department of Labour figure it, numbering 523,000 people. Persons without jobs and seeking work—that is the D.B.S. figure—number 280,000. There is nearly 90 per cent of difference if my pencil has not deceived me. It seems to me to be an extremely disturbing situation. I am not going to be cynical and say that it is convenient to have two figures when labour makes any complaint about the situation. I am not going to indulge in any talk of that kind. But to me it does not make sense that we can have these widely divergent figures. Let me ask one thing. Am I correct in understanding that this figure of 280,000 persons without jobs and seeking work does not include people on temporary lay-offs? Is that right? Will the minister tell me whether that is right?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No; it is not.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then the minister will explain just why it is not right because I believe it has been stated in the house, and has not been denied before, that it does not include that figure. I will wait for an explanation of that. I am also wondering about this figure that I have now read. I am sorry not to have a more recent one; it is as far back as January. Perhaps we could get the corresponding figure for today or at any rate for a much more recent moment. I feel that this is an important matter. I earnestly feel that the present situation is entirely unsatisfactory.

I have one further thing to say before I sit down. After all, labour now has highly competent economists and statisticians who follow these things. I believe that their figures are not to be lightly regarded. I further believe that they are of the view that the Department of Labour figures represent the situation much more realistically than do the others. It is easy to say. "Of course; they take the larger figure". That perhaps would be their tendency. But nevertheless they are not taking it blindly. I believe they are trying to assess things as well as they can. I believe that they believe that the labour figure gives a much more realistic figure. If it does so, I earnestly suggest to the minister that as to these two parallel lines, which are a fairly wide distance apart, it does not really make sense to let that situation continue.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The trouble arises out of the fact that my hon. friend uses the "applications for employment" figures for purposes for which they were never intended. For example, I had a chauffeur about six months ago. He told me that he did not like living so far out of town and that he had applied to the Department of Labour for a job. I said, "That is fine". Then he said that he had a job and that he was leaving me. I said, "Are you going to leave that application in at the employment office?" He said, "Oh, yes; I might get something better." I saw him only two or three days ago. I said, "How are you getting on?" He said, "I like my job fine." I said, "Is your application still in at the employment office?" He said, "Oh, yes." There is no way of policing the fact whether a man who is applying for a job gets a job under his own steam or not. If he gets a job there is no compulsion to go back and take his name off the register. It is simply a list of people who say that they are available for work if a job is offered to them. If they are not available, of course, their names are struck off. There is another angle, as I said; for example people who retire from the railroad. They are entitled to certain unemployment benefits. They register as available for jobs and collect their benefits as long as they last. In most cases they would not take a job if it was offered to them. Nevertheless, if they do not apply, they are not entitled to the benefits.

Mr. Knowles: That should be corrected, should it not? If they were offered jobs and did not take them, their unemployment benefits would be cut off.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes; that is true. But nevertheless until they are offered a job they are on the list and get unemployment insurance. There are many reasons why many more people apply for jobs than are represented by people out of work and seeking work. Take for example a man who is laid off for a week for one reason or another. Is he registered as unemployed? While he is unemployed in a certain sense, he would not take other work if it was offered him because he is going back to his old job. I think if my hon. friend pays strict attention to the labels at the head of these lists his confusion will be less acute than it seems to be at the moment.

Mr. Macdonnell: Worse.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am told that the new figures of those unemployed and seeking work will be out next Wednesday. We do not have the figures at the moment, but I am told that it is going to show a very remarkable drop in the numbers that were shown on the last report.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not going to pursue the matter further. I am grateful to the minister for suggesting that I myself might seek useful work when I leave here, and that is an idea worth considering.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You would certainly be registered on one list if you did.

Mr. Macdonnell: I merely wish to make a comment in answer to the argument which the minister has just made. If there are people on there who should not be, there are a lot of people not on there who might be, so that matter may wash itself out. But I still leave the comment that I hope these parallel lines will somehow or other meet, and I press it no further.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I want to make it clear that they cannot possibly meet.

Mr. Macdonnell: Come closer together.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Some classes of people are on the one list who are not on the other list.

Mr. Barnett: It appears to me that a further question is raised by the story the minister has just told us about the case of the chauffeur which might well be answered while we are on this point. It really has to do with the figures of the Department of Labour. How long is a name carried on the list of persons seeking employment after the last time that person reports to the office? I think that would be useful information to have while we are on this matter. If a name is left there indefinitely, obviously the lists might very well be far out of line.

Mr. Gregg: If an applicant comes in and says, "I have got a job", or "take my name off", that is that, and the same applies if he writes or informs the office in any other way.

In the smaller areas the offices can get bona fide information whether an applicant has a job. If so, they strike him off. With respect to the larger offices, it is not very often in the wintertime, as I pointed out earlier in my remarks, that the staff has the time to go through the list and strip out all those who they know are not in reality applicants for jobs. An attempt is made from time to time to keep the lists revised so that they will represent live applicants.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have one more request I should like to make which has to do with the publication of the consumer price index for the city of Hamilton. The bureau has been requested on former occasions to publish this index and has given what amounts to a reasonable explanation why it has not considered it necessary. But I should like to point out that it would be extremely valuable to industry and labour alike in Hamilton where so many wage contracts are negotiated and where the consumer index plays a very appreciable part. I ask the minister to ask the bureau to reconsider their decision in this matter and to include the city of Hamilton in the consumer price index publication at an early date.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That matter has caused some concern. At the time the new price index was introduced certain labour contracts were based on the old index and we undertook to publish the old index for a year in the expectation that wage agreements would in the meantime be negotiated and established on the new basis. That happened except in the automobile industry, I believe, and we continued to publish the old index for a period beyond the year to suit the automobile industry. I believe that General Motors was the only one that had not transferred to the new index. However, it is my understanding that every wage contract in the country today is based on the new index, and I must say I have not had any request for the old index for some time. The publishing of two indices is expensive. At one time we considered making General Motors pay for publishing the old index but it was quite a sizeable bill and we decided not to do that.

Mrs. Fairclough: I did not ask for the old index. I asked that the city of Hamilton be included in the publication of the consumer price index.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, I apologize. The chief statistician says that he can probably do that. He will certainly look into the matter and, without making a definite commitment, I think it is probable it will be done.

Item agreed to.

Board of grain commissioners—

438. Administration, $179,361.

Mr. Nicholson: My question is hardly relevant but in view of the fact that the minister was absent yesterday afternoon on very important business I should like merely to ask a question without starting a debate. Could the minister state what the initial price for wheat will be for the 1954-55 crop? If he cannot state it this morning, I wonder whether he could do so before the end of the session. Could he also indicate whether all the 1953 wheat crop can be accepted at the present initial price? If he cannot make a statement now, I would appreciate it if he would do so before we finish.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A good deal of point has been made that in other years we announced the initial payment early. We did that with the thought that it might influence the planting of wheat, oats and barley, that is, that it might influence the farmer as to how he used his cultivated land. We have always had in mind how we would like him to use his cultivated land. That is why we gave a guide. This year we do not have any guide. We thought that each farmer had better figure that out for himself. I must say I was surprised to find how few people seem to be interested in the views of the government on how they should use their land.

Mr. Rowe: The blind leading the blind.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is no purpose whatever in publishing that price today. It is not going to be used by anybody. It is not going to influence anyone's planting plans because they have done their planting or if they have not they have summerfallowed.

Mr. Knowles: They have got to do some of it over again, because of flooding.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We are anxious to get all the information we can with a view to setting the initial prices as high as we think can reasonably be done. It is proposed to publish the prices towards the latter part of July so they will be effective on the first day of August. My hon. friend is only asking out of idle curiosity. It is not going to help anybody or hurt anybody or change anybody's plans.

Mr. Nicholson: In our part of the country there is a great deal of land they have not finished seeding yet.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not think that would change their plans very much at this stage. They have probably bought their seed anyway. In any case, the initial prices will be published in advance of the time when they will be used. As far as the second part of the question is concerned, my hon. friend knows as well as I do that the present initial price will be paid on all grain that is delivered to country elevators before midnight on the 31st July, 1954.

Mr. Rowe: On that point I should like to ask the minister whether there are any signs that the uncertainty of government policy so far as announcing the price is concerned has encouraged summerfallowing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, I think the only man who is uncertain about government policy is my hon. friend. Certainly I am not uncertain about government policy. If my hon. friend will read Hansard carefully or attend and listen carefully there will be no reason, I think, for him to be uncertain.

Mr. Rowe: A lot of farmers are uncertain.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): In view of the statement the minister made in answer to the hon. member for Mackenzie that the initial price for the 1953-54 crop will be paid for wheat delivered up until the 31st July, I should like to ask the minister what will be the policy with respect to wheat on the farms after that date. He must know that many farmers will not have had the privilege of delivering equal quotas and that there will be a lot of grain left on the farms. What will be the policy in respect of wheat remaining on the farms on July 31?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The wheat remaining on the farms on July 31, 1954, is no different from wheat remaining on the farms on July 31, 1953, 1952 or 1951. I will admit there is more of it, but there is always wheat remaining on the farms on July 31 of every year. The policy this year is going to be no different from the policy last year or the year before. If the hon. member will ask some of his friends who are farmers, they will be able to explain it to him in greater detail.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I quite realize that, but the point is that this year the quota is going to be very low. I wonder whether the minister might state whether or not he expects the quota to be increased over the various provinces before that period.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The quota is changed from time to time, and I expect that the seven bushel quota will be uniform across the country. I expect there will be changes in quotas. For instance, within the last week there was announced an additional quota of another three bushels of oats per acre seeded to oats. I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, so I do not know what the demand will be for wheat from week to week. If there is a demand for a certain grade, there will probably be a special quota issued for that grade. Whether or not the seven bushel quota will be increased, I do not know.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the minister a further question concerning the allocation of box cars. I have received representations from the various wheat pool organizations and from different elevator points in my constituency. Can the minister state whether or not the allocation of box cars is going to be made more satisfactory, so that the farmers may be able to deliver grain to the elevator of their choice? There seems to be quite a lot of resentment on the part of farmers that they are not able to deliver grain to the elevator of their choice, simply because of what they say is the discriminatory allocation of box cars.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am not sure whether or not my hon. friend attended the meetings of the agriculture committee. If he did, he heard this subject discussed for days by all the experts in the country. The farmers' organizations could not agree on the method they wanted used. I may say at the moment, and I am confining my remarks to the moment, the allocation of box cars is decided upon by the organizations themselves. For instance, if grain is needed, it is ordered forward so much from the Saskatchewan pool, so much from the Manitoba pool, and the pool itself decides what elevator will deliver that grain. I think that allocation has worked out very well indeed. The fact that we will be able to complete the seven bushel quota, and I think we will, is an indication that all the authorities, the transport controller, the board of grain commissioners, the wheat board and the elevator companies themselves, whether farmer owned or privately owned, have co-operated in working out the quota system in an equitable way and in working out the distribution of cars among elevators in a way that would make the distribution possible.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to make a brief statement taking exception to the minister's remarks to the effect that the allocation of box cars has been satisfactory. This would not seem to be in agreement with the letters that have come to my office from various parts of my constituency. Only yesterday I had a letter from the local wheat pool at Creelman, indicating they are not satisfied at that point with the allocation of box cars. I should like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that under the present method of allocation of box cars the farmer is not allowed to deliver grain to the elevator of his choice. In Saskatchewan we have a situation where the farmers are more and more desirous of delivering their grain to the pool elevator system but are forced, because of the allocation of box cars, to deliver to the line elevator company. I do hope that next year we shall find the government taking steps to meet this situation, so that the farmers will be able to deliver their grain to the elevator of their choice.

Mr. Harkness: When the board of grain commissioners and the transport controller were before the agriculture committee, we were told that every effort was being made to allocate box cars to those points where the five bushel quota had not been filled, and particularly areas where there was a very large amount of No. 2 wheat for which there was difficulty in finding markets. I wonder whether the minister could tell us now if that plan has been successfully completed and all those points have now had their five bushel quota?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes; I was advised last week that practically all the five bushel quota points have been cleared. Nearly every point in western Canada has completed its five bushel quota, and is working either on a six or on a seven bushel quota at the moment.

Mr. Harkness: There were a number of people about ten days ago, of whom I am aware, who had not been able to get in the five bushel quota because of the difficulty in the elevator over grades. They happened to have a grade of wheat which could not be taken in. Can the minister tell us whether any special allocation of box cars will be made in order to look after cases of that kind? I know there are a few.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The elevators themselves can do that if there is a demand for a particular grade. If a man wanted to deliver, say, a third of a car of rye somewhere and the elevator is not handling rye, I think he might have difficulty in doing so. Generally speaking all except the odd lots are being taken care of. We did manage to move the No. 2 northern wheat, which was a problem. We found a place for that, and we are cleaning up the major problems across the prairies. There are minor problems with which I cannot deal, but with which I am sure someone will try to deal. It may be a little difficult and a little slow.

Mr. Harkness: I was not urging that the minister should deal with these things himself, but the board of grain commissioners and the wheat pool can deal with these problems. In view of the present situation and the difficulty farmers have had generally in securing cash because of the limited amounts of grain they have been able to deliver, and in view of the grade difficulties in particular elevators that have prevented some farmers from delivering their five bushel quota, it seems to me a particular effort should be made to ensure that enough grain is moved out of the elevators at these points to straighten out the problem. The farmer has nowhere else to go with his grain, and the man who has been unfortunate enough to have a grade that could not be delivered should not be discriminated against.

Mr. Studer: If I understood the minister correctly, he mentioned that elevator companies were apportioned the wheat board orders and then cars were allotted to the amount of those orders. Are those orders allotted to the various companies and the pool on the basis of a percentage of their past handlings or on the requirements of the wheat board at the moment?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They are allocated on the basis of the wheat pool requirement. How the requirement is divided amongst the elevator companies, I am not sure, but I believe it is on some historical basis. The whole matter is being studied with a view to deciding on a method of allocation for next year and consideration will be given to the representations made in the agriculture committee. I would not care to say what the situation is at the moment, but I shall be very glad to give a report on it after the beginning of the next crop year, when the new system will be in force.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, for three days we had a long and thorough discussion of the problem of wheat prices. I am wondering if the minister would mind checking with me to make sure that I have gathered exactly the right picture as to the disparity between the condition of the American wheat farmer and the condition of the Canadian wheat farmer.

If I have the picture correctly, the American wheat farmer is practically sure of getting $2.21 a bushel. The move the United States made to increase her export subsidy by ten cents did not affect the American farmer's well-being at all. That is, he did not lose a cent. Any money that was lost would be lost by the American people as a whole. In other words, the American people as a whole came to the aid of their farming population to the extent of ten cents a bushel, in order to enable the exporting of that wheat. Do I get the picture right there?

If I am wrong I hope the minister will check me up immediately because, although I thought I knew the exact situation before we began the discussion, I am not sure now that I have everything clear. But up to the present time my picture is correct, is it not?

Now, in Canada this is the position: In the first place the Canadian government, instead of making the decrease of 10⅛ cents a bushel apply only to what is exported, as the United States did, has made it apply to every bushel of wheat in the Dominion of Canada, whether sold for export or not sold for export. In other words the Canadian government has levied—and I think that is the kindest word I can use; there are worse words that come to my mind, such as "robbed" and two or three others—but they have levied on the farmers of western Canada the sum of 10⅛ cents a bushel on every single bushel of wheat the farmer has on his farm, in the elevator or anywhere else.

Now, that just is about the picture, is it not?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Do you want me to answer?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, I would like to have an answer.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have never known my hon. friend to be so completely wrong as he is on this occasion.

Mr. Blackmore: That is what I want the minister to straighten out.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): And I shall be glad to do it.

The position in the United States is that there is a support price for wheat. If a farmer can deliver his grain into approved storage—and there is an "if" there—and if he has not exceeded the acreage planted to wheat which he is allowed under the restriction of acreage regulations, he can borrow against that grain $2.21 a bushel. There are several "ifs" in there. As a matter of fact great quantities of free grain come on the market. They are sold by producers and are traded on the open market, and are at present selling for about $1.95 a bushel.

The millers buy their grain on the open market. They are paying about $1.95 at the present time for the grain they mill into flour, in spite of the fact that if the wheat can be put into approved storage the government will lend $2.21 on that wheat. Only certain wheat qualifies for the loan. But if it can qualify, then as I say the farmer can borrow that amount against it. It is an irrevocable loan, and if you just walk away and leave the wheat you have your $2.21. If the price goes up you can go and redeem the wheat by paying off the loan, and sell it for the higher price. That is the American system.

What has been the result? The result is that it has been exceedingly profitable for the big and highly mechanized farmer to produce wheat. You see plains in Texas which were never used for that purpose before, where the soil is not suitable for the growing of wheat but where, when fertilizers are used in great quantity, wheat can be grown. And they do grow wheat on those plains, and they get a very large production of a soft variety, which is not particularly suitable for merchandising. The effect of that policy is to bring in all sorts of marginal land which, on the basis of returns at market prices, would not warrant farming for wheat. That has been the effect in the United States, and we in Canada feel the brunt of that policy.

In Canada the government does not merchandise wheat. The hon. member says that the government takes away ten cents from the farmer. Well, the farmer never had that ten cents. The farmer grows the wheat and it is marketed by the wheat board. The commissioners of the wheat board are paid by the farmers, and the report is made to the farmers. The board is advised by an advisory board which contains representatives of various farm organizations, as well as representatives of the millers, and of the users of wheat. The board is a farmer organization created to market the farmers' wheat —and to market it to whom? To market it to everybody.

The government enters the picture when it provides financing for the wheat marketing operation. At the moment the government is guaranteeing something over a hundred million dollars in bank loans to the wheat board. It also does its best to find markets for wheat, and to create trade policies to enable markets to be found for the wheat. And, as I say, we are successful, in that, in every market of which I am aware, we have sold at least our usual proportion of the market. The difficulty is that this year, as a result of a good crop in Europe and the using up of reserve stocks, the total amount of wheat going into international trade is very much less than it has been for several years.

When the hon. member says that the government takes ten cents from the farmer he should keep in mind that the government does not market wheat at all. The government does not have anything to do with it. It is the farmers themselves who are marketing their wheat produced in western Canada. I hope my hon. friend understands what I have said, although it may be too much to expect. But I hope he will not say again that the government is taking ten cents away from the farmers.

Mr. Blackmore: Probably the minister expects me to be a little more intelligent than I am, although I had thought I was fairly intelligent when it comes to understanding these things. It is just a matter of getting—

An hon. Member: Money.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, money, the most important thing to understand in the world today. And, when you want to say anything, say it so I can hear it; don't murmur in your beard so we cannot hear what you say.

Nevertheless the move made by the government—and I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself was the one who announced the move—of a reduction of ten cents—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I set my hon. friend right on that?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The reduction in the price of wheat was announced by the Canadian wheat board at one minute past one on Monday, the market having closed at one. It was announced in Winnipeg; and next day I announced it in the House of Commons. So let us not say that I announce the price. I announce it only after the board has made an announcement. And I gave all that information to members of parliament so that our friends could rise and make eloquent speeches for their constituents.

Mr. Knowles: At what time did the minister know the board was going to make that announcement?

Mr. Blackmore: All this I greatly appreciate. The minister will realize that I did not make one of those speeches yesterday. I am seeking to get the exact facts so that everybody understands them. Then, after that, I shall make what I consider to be appropriate comments. Nevertheless the ordinary farmer producing wheat in the United States is able to store his wheat, as I understand. The minister spoke of approved storage. Have they a serious problem of approved storage in the United States?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Very serious.

Mr. Blackmore: Quite as serious as the Canadian farmers have?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, just the same.

Mr. Blackmore: So that there is a vast amount of wheat still on the farms?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: And no payment possible?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh well, they can sell their wheat on the Chicago grain exchange. They can do that. It does not require to be in storage for that. They just have to be prepared to deliver the grain when the contract calls for delivery.

Mr. Blackmore: On the Chicago grain exchange. Is the price on the Chicago grain exchange pretty well covered by this $2.21—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Blackmore: —effective guarantee?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Blackmore: How much does it fluctuate, in a general way?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is about $1.95. It has been as low as $1.92; it has been as high as $2.40 or $2.50, but at the moment it is about 26 cents or 27 cents below the loan value of the wheat, provided that you can deliver that wheat into approved storage and provided that your total acreage does not exceed the amount that you are authorized to plant in wheat under the department of agriculture regulations.

Mr. Blackmore: Then, if the farmer has played the game according to the rules, he has pretty well that $2.21 guarantee, I would imagine. What I am saying to the minister now is based on what I read in the newspapers in the west.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It depends on what newspapers you read.

Mr. Blackmore: I read pretty well most of them. When I go into a thing I generally go into it. I am not just quite sure of this. I am sure the minister told us a number of things today that did not come out in any of the debate we had during the last three days, not that the minister was trying to conceal it in any way. At least, if these things came out I did not hear them. I am not quite clear about the farm storage. Is there any way in the world whereby farmers in the United States can have approved farm storage?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A farmer can build approved storage on his farm, get it certified by the department of agriculture, and use it just as you can build a public elevator if you want to here in Canada and get it licensed and you can store grain. That can be done on one side of the line just as well as on the other.

Mr. Blackmore: Does the United States government help the farmers with loans at reasonable rates of interest?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Farmers who desire so to build on their farms?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They have had programs of that kind. I think there was a program three or four years ago to assist farmers in building approved storage. We assist grain companies or groups of farmers to build approved storage; that is, to build public elevators in this country. We assist them by giving them accelerated depreciation.

Mr. Blackmore: Suppose that a farmer in a given area was unable to get his grain in a public elevator, shall we say, in the United States, and he desired to build approved storage on his farm. He is free to do that, and he would get assistance from the government to do that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I don't know.

Mr. Blackmore: I understand that something like that is the case at present, but one can never be sure when he is reading the newspapers. One can never be sure that they have just the right picture or are giving the whole picture. That is why I am asking the minister. My understanding is that there is a good deal of assistance given farmers in the matter of building on their own farms approved storage, and that once a farmer or a group of farmers in a neighbourhood have built an approved storage on their farms they can get $2.21 loan on their wheat and go on with the program that the minister has suggested. I am correct in that, now?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: So far as my understanding goes, that is so. That means that practically any farmer or any group of farmers in the United States are able to obtain approved storage in which they can store their grain, thereby qualifying for $2.21 loan. I would be correct in assuming that from what I have read? Would the minister tell me if I seem to be wrong in that respect?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If he can deliver grain into approved storage he gets the loan, as I understand it.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Blackmore: But my point is this. If there is no approved storage available nearby he can get money with which to build storage right on his farm?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He can do that in Canada, too.

Mr. Blackmore: How long has it been since a farmer in Canada could get that kind of assistance from the government?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We do not—

Mr. Blackmore: Where is the farmer in Canada who can build approved storage on his farm now?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A great many farmers have built approved storage on their farms.

Mr. Blackmore: With government assistance?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The government will assist at the moment by way of accelerated depreciation.

Mr. Harkness: What is meant by approved storage?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The department of agriculture in the United States approved it.

Mr. Harkness: I am talking about Canada.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In Canada it is licensed by the board of grain commissioners.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the minister should say that any Canadian farmer can build approved storage, because there is no way of approving storage on his farm that I know of in the way of ordinary buildings or anything along that line. The minister is now talking about the building of country elevators.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Certainly.

Mr. Harkness: That is a different thing altogether. The minister made one statement a little while ago that I really must take exception to. He said the wheat board was a farm organization. The wheat board is no more a farm organization than the board of transport commissioners is an organization of the employees of the railway companies. It is an agency of the government. It is set out in the wheat board act, and the members of the wheat board are not appointed by the farmers; they are appointed by the government. The policy followed by the wheat board is dictated by the government.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Let us be accurate, Mr. Chairman. By what authority can the government dictate to the wheat board? Have you read the wheat board act?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I have read the wheat board act, and I have also heard the evidence of the wheat board officials before the agriculture committee on several occasions.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Can you quote that evidence? If you have heard it you must be able to quote it.

Mr. Harkness: Let me finish.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Let us get the record clear as we go along.

Mr. Harkness: The record is absolutely clear, Mr. Chairman. There is no question about that. A while ago the minister said that the wheat board announced this price of a drop of ten cents a bushel but that policy I am quite sure was dictated to them by the government.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are quite wrong. My hon. friend is making a false statement.

Mr. Harkness: Have I the floor, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Calgary North has the floor. The hon. member for Calgary North will admit, as other hon. members would, that it has been the habit, particularly in committee, when one hon. member thinks that another hon. member has misquoted or misinterpreted, to rise immediately and endeavour to set the record straight. He can do that only with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Harkness: The difficulty here is that I had not finished my statement, and the minister did not know what I was going to say. When I had made part of my statement he misinterpreted what I was saying and immediately rose to his feet and interrupted me. The point is this. I said that as far as this ten-cent drop is concerned the minister said the wheat board announced it at one minute after one o'clock, and then he announced it later in the house. I do not think he wants any of us to believe that he did not know anything about it until the wheat board announced it. As I say, as a matter of fact, I do not think there is any doubt about it, this was the policy which was adopted really by the minister and the government, no doubt on the recommendation of the wheat board.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have denied that and I deny it again.

Mr. Harkness: I do not doubt for a minute it was on the recommendation of the wheat board. As far as policy is concerned, as I say, in the meetings of the agriculture committee, the officials indicated very clearly that these policy questions are settled by the government. Every time a member asks questions of the officials of the wheat board, of Mr. McIvor or anyone else, which impinge on matters of this sort, the answer invariably is that that is a matter of government policy and they should direct such questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). They say that the government announces policy and that they cannot say anything about it. One gets that sort of answer in regard to any question about future prices, the likely initial price, or interim payments. To all questions of that sort you get the answer that it is a matter of government policy and the Minister of Trade and Commerce must answer such questions and it is not for the officials of the wheat board to make any statement in that regard.

In view of that situation I think it is ridiculous for the minister to come in here and try to persuade hon. members that the farmers' organization makes its own rules and decisions and it can do what it likes and do what the farmer wants done.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: As I have already indicated, the wheat board is an agency of the government and its policy is directed by the government, for it is the same as all other government agencies in which the policy is directed by the government.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Item 438. Shall this item carry?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Before this item carries I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to a Washington dispatch appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail where it indicates that the Eisenhower administration has apparently agreed to sell $1 billion worth of surplus farm products and in addition, according to the report, is intending to give away $300 million worth of surplus farm commodities. Does the minister care to comment on this dispatch, because apparently already the United States Senate has passed a bill which would provide for the disposal of $500 million of farm products. I should like to know whether or not the minister feels this will undermine the price structure of Canadian farm commodities and perhaps will necessitate a further decrease in the price of wheat to Canadian farmers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We have known about the contents of the bills that are before congress for a long time. They are not dissimilar to the provisions that are in force at the present time. Naturally we do not like give-away programs in other countries, but the Americans have used these programs with great discretion. I know of no serious result to Canadian agriculture from the operation of the bills up to the present time. That is all I can say.

I should like to say a word about responsibility for fixing the prices of Canadian grain. If my hon. friend will refer to the wheat board act, and will look at section 5 of the act with regard to sale and disposal of grain, he will find that in subsection 1 it provides as follows:

Subject to regulations, the board shall sell and dispose of grain acquired by it pursuant to its operations under this act for such prices as it considers reasonable with the object of promoting the sale of grain produced in Canada in world markets.

I hope that will dispose of that problem. The hon. member is quite right in one particular, namely that in fixing the initial price the consent of the government must be obtained because the initial price is a contract on the part of the government to pay that price throughout the year. In other words, it may involve the public purse. But the price at which grain is sold is entirely a matter for the wheat board and has been so treated by this government and, I think, all ministers of trade and commerce since I have been in the government; that is for the past nineteen years.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I cannot accept that as being the case. In the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on agriculture and colonization this year, at page 19 we see this, as the minister says. We are talking about wheat policy:

Under the authority of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, as amended, the board administered an annual pool . . .

And so on. Then it goes on to say this:

By order in council P.C. 3381 June 23, 1952 (Canadian wheat board regulations) the initial price for wheat delivered to the board between August 1, 1952 and July 31, 1953 was established at $1.40 per bushel . . .

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Harkness: Yes; the minister says that is the case. Then he says they have got nothing to do with setting the price. The next thing it goes on to say is this:

Under order in council P.C. 3381 June 23, 1952 the board was required—

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

And I call attention to the words "was required".

—to sell wheat for domestic use at the same price as it sold wheat for export under the terms of the international wheat agreement.

In other words, under government policy, the board was required to sell wheat at this international wheat agreement price which at that time was quite a bit below the class II price for wheat or in other words, what wheat could be sold for in the open world market so far as there was an open world market. As a result of that, of course, the farmers in western Canada had to subsidize the price of bread in Canada to the extent of the difference from time to time between the class II price and the international wheat agreement price. That situation no longer prevails but it prevailed until a comparatively short time ago. It was done under an order in council and was part of government policy. That is just one example of how the price at which the board is required by the government to sell wheat works out.

As far as the general contention I make is concerned, I do not think there is any doubt about it that this is a government board. A number of us from time to time have argued that it should be a producer-controlled board. Without going into that matter at all, there is no question that it is not a producer-controlled board. It is a government-controlled board and naturally when the government decides a matter of policy, whether it is selling price or anything else, the board, if it gets its order to do this, that or the other, has to carry it out. I do not think there need be any argument about that matter.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I can assure my hon. friend—I have already done so—and I hope he will take my word for it, that the board has never contravened this section of the act which provides that the board shall sell wheat at a price that they determine.

Mr. Harkness: Here is a specific case where it was required by the government to sell wheat at a price less than that which could otherwise have been obtained.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): No, Mr. Chairman. I think that statement of the minister must be challenged. From what he indicated before the recess at one o'clock, I gathered that the Canadian wheat board carries out a policy in its own discretion, as one might say. I think we should have a clarification of that matter. I have always felt—and I believe it is agreed—that the Canadian wheat board follows out government policy. I should like an answer from the minister as to whether it was not the decision of the Canadian cabinet that the wheat board would lower the price by 10⅛ cents on June 7. After all, as the hon. member for Calgary North has just stated, some of us think there should be more adequate producer representation on the Canadian wheat board. In my opinion it does not function as a producer board but rather functions as a board set up by the government to carry out government policy. I think I must challenge the minister on that statement.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, I can answer categorically. The price of wheat was never discussed in cabinet. I myself happened to be in the southern United States just after the cut in the United States wheat prices took place, and I was told upon my return that the wheat board had also cut its price. That was the first I had heard of it. I assure you that the price of wheat is never discussed in council. If I am around, I am usually told in advance as a matter of courtesy. But certainly it is never a matter of government decision.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I accept—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Do not argue about that, because I have told you a fact.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I accept the minister's statement, Mr. Chairman. However, I should like to ask him if the advisory committee which has been set up and which has among its personnel some what might be termed farm representation, convened or met when the Canadian wheat board lowered the price of wheat?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Blackmore: No, Mr. Chairman. It is a fairly safe assumption, as the hon. member for Moose Mountain has indicated, that the farmers did not ask the wheat board to cut the price. Consequently, when the wheat board acted, it was not acting as an agent of the farmers, under the direction of the farmers. Well, if the wheat board acted upon its own authority and responsibility, then it acted on that responsibility realizing that in so doing it would be responsible to parliament through the appropriate minister who in this case is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell me where there is anything wrong with that reasoning? I think he will have to agree that is absolutely correct.

When I first rose I asked if it were not true that the American farmer was getting $2.21 a bushel, that he was being helped by the people of the United States generally to the extent of 50 cents a bushel on all wheat going into the export market. The minister can hardly question the accuracy of that statement. Of course he went into a lot of details; but nevertheless, fundamentally and basically, without all the frills, that is a statement of fact.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I can give my hon. friend a statement of fact. He did not mention the export market when he asked if farmers in the United States were getting $2.21 a bushel. If he had asked whether wheat going into the export market was subsidized to that extent, I would have said yes.

Mr. Blackmore: There must have been something left out in my wording because it certainly was in my mind to ask just that. What I wish to make perfectly clear to all the Canadian people east and west and in every direction, if it is not clear to them, is that the United States farmer is receiving essentially $2.21 a bushel for wheat while the Canadian farmer has now been cut to $1.72⅞ per bushel, if I remember the fraction correctly. Practically every person who has ever been in the United States knows that the cost of production is lower there than it is in Canada. Practically everyone knows that the cost of living, the cost of commodities generally, with some exceptions, is lower there than it is in Canada. That is all that is necessary to show what shameful discrimination has been practised against producers of wheat on the Canadian side of the line contrasted with what is given producers of wheat on the United States side of the line. That is the first matter.

I should like to go on to the question of keeping our price competitive. From what I have read it is true that all the farm organizations, all the newspapers in the west, the grain handling companies, wheat pools and others are behind the minister when he says that Canadian wheat must be kept competitive on the world market. The minister is backed by the people in that respect. I am not saying that is not necessary but I am going to raise this question. Suppose that all the wheat that Canada is going to sell in the next six months is 150 million bushels. I think the minister will be quite happy if he can sell as much as that. All that was necessary in order to keep the price of that wheat competitive was to provide an export subsidy of 10 cents or 10⅛ cents per bushel on that wheat. In other words, there was no reason at all for cutting the price domestically in Canada or cutting the price of wheat in our elevators or on our farms. All we needed was to pay an export subsidy.

I wonder whether the minister would question that. If we had provided an export subsidy in the same way that the United States did we could have kept the price of Canadian wheat right where it was a month ago and could have still made our wheat as competitive in the world market as it is today. Is that not so?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The government of Canada with the consent of parliament can give $15 million to any class of people it likes; but I cannot imagine just why it should give $15 million to people who, we were told in the house, are enjoying the most prosperous period in their history. We are told by our socialist friends that Saskatchewan, for instance, was never more prosperous, and I believe it. In my opinion that is a fact that does not need denying. Just why we would pick out the wheat growers of Saskatchewan to give $15 million of the taxpayers' money to, I do not know. Perhaps my hon. friend would elaborate on that when he carries on with his questioning.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes. The minister's hon. friend will elaborate on several things before he gets done. I am perfectly prepared to do so. I gather from what the minister said that if the Canadian government had seen fit to give an export subsidy of 10 cents a bushel on wheat going into export it could have kept Canada's wheat price competitive without lowering the price of wheat anywhere in Canada. I think the minister will agree with that. The question he raised was whether or not Canada could or should do it. I will deal with that in a minute, but let it be known and recognized throughout Canada that our wheat could have been kept competitive by an export subsidy which would not have had to be paid on the hundreds and hundreds of millions of bushels that are in store in Canada, but only on that portion going into the export market.

That is the first thing to get perfectly clear. If all our producers really realized that, I am not so sure that they would be entirely behind the minister's device in respect of keeping Canada's wheat competitive on the world market. I want to draw the minister's attention to this consideration: We have the Bank of Canada. The reasons for having the Bank of Canada are numerous, but I gather that money could have been borrowed from the Bank of Canada by the government to grant that export subsidy. It could have been borrowed at no cost to the government because even if it were borrowed at interest the interest paid by the government would have gone back into the Bank of Canada.

An hon. Member: Funny money.

Mr. Blackmore: Never mind a lot of nonsense! Remember, what we are doing now is not funny. By the time wheat goes away down in the price war with various nations of the world it will be anything but funny. Incidentally, is there any reason for calling Bank of Canada money "funny"? If there is, we had better revise the Bank of Canada Act. The point is that exactly the same money that is coming out of the Bank of Canada today would be used. Is there any reason why such borrowing could not have been done? If there is, let some of the wiseacres whom I hear having something to say get up and explain. Personally I think there is no technical or economic reason why that could not have been done.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think my hon. friend is perhaps the only man in Canada who understands this debt-free money. The rest of us think money is something that has to be earned, is hard to get and is a valuable commodity. My hon. friend does not think so, but I do not think we can settle that today.

Mr. Blackmore: You see, the minister is quibbling. He is trying to sidestep the issue.

Mr. McIvor: No.

Mr. Blackmore: The simple fact is that every dollar that comes out of the Bank of Canada in the regular way is a sound dollar according to Canadian standards. If the millions of dollars that would be necessary to provide an export subsidy on the price of Canadian exported wheat in order to keep it competitive in the world market were created by, and taken out of, the Bank of Canada, every dollar would be sound. I challenge the minister or anyone else in the house or in the country to prove it would not be sound.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member is free to prove it and I will challenge him to prove it.

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Blackmore: Anybody, yourself or fifteen like you. This is the matter that faces us. This is the problem we have got to settle. It is just as simple as that. Now, we say that money has to be earned, and yet it must be granted that the banks create money! Surely, the minister knows that.

Certainly, he knows it, and for years and years in Canada when wheat harvesting and marketing time came, the banks were empowered to expand their money, to print $5 bills, $10 bills, $50 bills and $100 bills, to buy that wheat and put it into the export market. No one will question that who knows about banking at all.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Blackmore: I know the hon. member would like to see the item carried. He would like to get this hot potato off his hands. What has been the procedure for generations in this country could certainly have been employed in dealing with this matter of subsidizing exports and we would have been saved the enormous losses which have already been suffered in the last few days all across western Canada.

Now, the next thing I should like—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I suggest that my hon. friend might take that considerably further. I do not see why he just associates that kind of money with wheat alone. Why not associate it with everything?

Mr. Blackmore: With what?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): With every transaction as well as wheat; why not remove the necessity for suffering or struggling or any cause for discomfort? Why not use this money created by the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Blackmore: Because the Bank of Canada could not safely create money beyond the productive capacity of the nation, beyond the goods and services that are in the nation.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A man who does not work still has productive capacity. Why should he not be granted the benefit of this great discovery?

Mr. Blackmore: All of this is sensible questioning we will grant, but the simple fact is there are in Canada millions of people who are working and willing to work and who are producing goods in great quantity. They have produced so much we are now laying them off by the thousands and saying we do not need them any more. Let the minister answer that. Out in the west we have wheat to such an extent the government does not know what to do with it. There is no difficulty of getting the goods produced. The goods are right there, not only the wheat but a great many other commodities. Bearing that in mind there is just no way in the world of economically explaining why the Bank of Canada could not be used to pay such export subsidy on Canadian wheat as will enable the government to keep it on a competitive basis in the world market.

There is one more thing I wish to mention, and that is the matter of farm storage and the payment for wheat stored on the farm. I have said already—in fact, I think I will read what I said in the committee concerning what I think of the government's policy in dealing with wheat this year, and what I think of the wheat board—that the wheat board, in my opinion, has done a magnificent job. Here are my words, as I read them from page 140 of the minutes of the agriculture and colonization committee of this year:

> Even if it were, what would it indicate? I think personally that while it is fine to be critical, it is fine to be appreciative. As far as I am concerned I think that the wheat board has done a magnificent job.

Now, that is what I said about the wheat board. Two pages later on I made this statement:

> When I said a few minutes ago that I thought the wheat board had done a magnificent job, I did not mean by that that I expressed approval of the way the government has managed the wheat situation in the west this year.

Then farther down, I said:

> Under the conditions that now prevail, what the government has done in making farmers provide storage at their own expense and then hold the grain with no reward whatsoever, and in preventing them from receiving the money that they have already earned 18 months ago, is simply an outrage which cannot be expressed.

I just wanted to make that quite clear. A few minutes ago I think it was made quite clear that in the United States any man who desires to provide acceptable farm storage on his own farm can obtain money to do so and receive $2.21 a bushel for his wheat. If a similar privilege were extended to Canadians, you would find acceptable storage on a large percentage of Canadian farms and payment to farmers for wheat stored on farms and we would soon have a recurrence of prosperity in the country.

Where would the money come from to enable the farmers to build those bins and to be paid for that wheat therein stored? There is no reason under the sun why that could not come out of the Bank of Canada. When the minister thinks he can explain that away, and not just try to laugh it off or quibble it off, but explain it in a genuinely responsible manner such as we have a right to expect, then we shall be getting somewhere. Why could the Bank of Canada not be used to finance the building of suitable storage on the farms of western Canada to enable the farmers to receive the $2.21 or, in Canada, the price prevailing on June 6? We have not asked for as much as the United States farmer receives. But perhaps our farmers could receive the price prevailing in August of last year.

I hope that is fully understood. No matter how any person may be disposed to look at the problem now, I ask him to contrast the possible effect of these measures I suggest in Canada with what might happen if you had a genuine price war. Remember, the Argentine has been subsidizing wheat export for some time. The United States gave as a reason for her move the fact that the Argentine was subsidizing many of her farmers' exports. Where does the Argentine get the money to subsidize exports for her farmers, when Canada cannot? It was said to be a fact that she was selling so much wheat in foreign countries, the United States was forced to do something. Just suppose that continues? Australia has already lowered her price. And suppose this price cutting practice extends all over the world. Suppose Russia enters the field and begins to subsidize grain so as to put it on the export market? This thing could go on until the price of wheat went down to $1.25 a bushel or some similar price. Just imagine what that could do to the Canadian economy, if it goes farther than that, as it could very well do, with the world wheat supply in surplus. Those are things which we have to bear in mind before we decide whether or not the government has adopted a wise policy.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I shall leave the rest to the future. No one except the people in this house, so far as I know, and certainly no one in western Canada has anything but the gravest anxiety over this whole situation; the effect which a fall like that could have on our industry all through Ontario and Quebec is a terror to contemplate.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to comment on the statements made by the minister, particularly the question as to why the Canadian government should pay a ten-cent subsidy to western farmers at a cost of somewhere around $15 million. I believe that such a statement might well provoke a 40-minute speech from a member coming from the prairies. However, I just want to say that this problem has been debated for the last two days, and I have no intention of reiterating what I said during that debate.

The minister said also that those of us coming from Saskatchewan have intimated that we have had one of the highest periods of prosperity in our history. Well, that is probably true, but in the last two years our cash income from agriculture in the prairies has decreased by some 30 per cent.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Where, in the prairies?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): In addition to that we have had a situation where the farmer's costs have been going up and his cash income has been going down. We have not the complete picture for the last year, in the fiscal period ending March 31, but I am sure when the information is available we will find again that the cash income to the agricultural producers has decreased. Nevertheless I do point out that the western farmers during the period of control, when we were selling to the wheat board after 1943, could have enjoyed higher prices, but were content to take the stabilized price for wheat. And we have always agreed to that sort of bargain. We do not want high prices, but we do feel that when there are large stocks of wheat, then the producers in western Canada should be protected.

Then I might say the minister's statement that the wheat board operates and sets policy without consultation with the government will be found nothing less than completely astounding not only to Canadians generally but to western farm organizations who have always felt, I believe, that the wheat board did operate under and carry out government policy.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Just to keep the record straight I might say that last year the returns to the farmers of western Canada for wheat, oats and barley were the highest in history.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I cannot allow to go unchallenged the minister's statement that the farmers of western Canada are better off now than ever before. The Minister of Agriculture made that statement in a long and specious speech in which he tried to substantiate it, when his estimates were introduced. That statement is not correct. All we have to do to show that it is not correct—that, indeed, the very reverse is true—is to look at the budget figures produced by the Minister of Finance. If we turn to page 3760 of Hansard we find that the net income received by farm operators from farm production in 1951 was $2,142 million and that in 1953 it was $1,642 million, or an even $500 million less than in 1951.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Does my hon. friend suggest he is referring to the prairies?

Mr. Harkness: This is for all the farmers in Canada; but there has been a bigger loss on the prairies than there has been in the eastern part of Canada—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is your statement.

Mr. Harkness: —so far as farming is concerned. In 1952 the net income was down to $1,909 million, which is exactly $267 million more than was received last year, in 1953. In other words, in one year—1953—the farmers were worse off to the extent of $500 million, or roughly 25 per cent, than they were in 1951, and $267 million worse off than they were in 1952.

Since that time the price of grain has been going down. There is no question that the returns to farmers this year will be considerably down from the figure of $1,642 million last year. Therefore any statement that farmers in western Canada are better off now than they have ever been before is absolutely ridiculous, and the figures put out by the Minister of Finance show that it is ridiculous.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has used as his authority for the statement something said by the Saskatchewan government. Any statement made by the Saskatchewan government—made, no doubt, to boost their position with the people of Saskatchewan; made, in other words, for political reasons—is about the worst argument the minister could use to support a statement in the House of Commons. I am surprised he would use it in trying to support a completely untenable position.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I notice that the federation of agriculture for the three western provinces has asked the minister to make a statement with regard to the initial payment. Perhaps I should read what appears in the Manitoba Co-operator. It says:

> The federations of agriculture of the three prairie provinces June 9 asked the federal government to indicate immediately that Canada does not intend to participate in a "fire sale" of wheat. It can make this clear to the world, the federations believe, by making an immediate announcement that the initial price for the 1954 wheat crop will be maintained at $1.40.

Does the minister consider that there would be any objection to making a statement of that kind? It would certainly relieve the anxiety.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I replied to that wire from Mr. Ball, although I forget exactly what I said. My hon. friend perhaps was not in his seat this morning when I explained in some detail why it was not wise to make a statement at this time. Seeding is already or shortly will be completed. It would not influence planting, and I think it is in the interests of the producers to be sure that as many as possible of the facts are in the hands of the government before initial prices are set. Nothing will be gained by setting a price before midnight of July 31, 1954; but we intend to set a price before then. The later we wait, the more facts we will have to give us a basis for that price.

Mr. Ferguson: I have listened to the debate which has taken place in the last two days. I hope this is not a repetition of the old familiar music that preceded what happened after 1930 in the Dominion of Canada.

On every hand we have an abundance of everything. People want to work, and they are willing to pay. They are willing to give service for what they receive. During the war we spent hundreds of millions of dollars for munitions. Today we have an abundance of wheat we do not know how to dispose of. The province of Ontario is teeming with foodstuffs in all the fields, east, north and south. Our cattle are standing up to their knees in lush pasture. Beef prices have dropped by 35 per cent. People are unemployed across Canada. The shipyards at Collingwood and at Midland are virtually closed down. What is the cause of all this?

Let us pray to God that what we are seeing now is not a repetition of the thirties. Let the Canadian people dispose of their heavy surplus, rather than let it rot and deteriorate. We threw our munitions away; we got rid of them, and put them to the use we thought was proper. Let us give some of our surplus away to a starving world. Let smiles come to the faces of Canadians when they think of their action in disposing of their surplus. Let them do something of which they can be justly proud. There are people who need these foods we have in such abundance.

Our trouble in Canada is that of getting rid of what we produce. How the communists must smile when they look west of the iron curtain to the North American continent! How they must smile when they see us sitting here in parliament, worrying and fretting about how to keep our people going in all walks of life! This applies not only to the western wheat farmer. Surely the simplest method in the world would be to get rid of that surplus for the benefit of those who need it, and get back to a position where we can produce again from the fertile land with which God has blessed this country.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain the situation at the port of Vancouver in two particulars. When he spoke on February 18 outlining a change in the price of wheat it was indicated that the price at Fort William-Port Arthur would be lower than that at Vancouver. One of the arguments he used in support of that policy was the fact that the port of Vancouver was working at full capacity. As reported at page 2197 of Hansard we find him saying—

While the port of Vancouver has been working to full capacity—

And so on.

When he had completed his remarks I asked him whether the government had in contemplation any extension of the grain handling facilities at Vancouver. His reply was as follows:

I have had no information of any contemplated increase in facilities.

Yesterday I asked the same question of the Minister of Transport when a vote for the national harbours board was under consideration. My question is reported at page 6087 of Hansard. I asked this question:

Then I understand the board is making no recommendation whatever for any increase in grain handling facilities at Vancouver; is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: There has been no recommendation made to me for that purpose.

From these two answers I take it that there is no intention of increasing the grain handling facilities at Vancouver at least in the near future. I believe that the people of that city are worried about that fact, particularly in view of the statement made by the minister in February that the port was being worked to capacity. Mind you, there were expressions to the contrary by different people on the coast, but I am not in a position to know whether the minister's statement is entirely accurate or not.

That brings up one other question I would ask him to deal with today. I refer to this new policy of setting a different price at Vancouver from that at Fort William and Port Arthur. In answer to a question asked on March 1, which is to be found at page 2520 of Hansard, the parliamentary assistant set out that this policy of having an equal price on the west coast and at the lakehead had been effective from September 27, 1943, to February 16, 1954, which of course was the date on which the minister announced the change in policy. On the coast we have always understood that it would be set government policy to maintain the same price both east and west; but when the minister was questioned on it on February 22, as found at page 2303 of Hansard he said:

The purpose was to equalize prices at destination—

In other words, no longer at Vancouver and at Fort William and Port Arthur, but at destination.

—and that will be the purpose in the future.

I should like the minister to make it clear today whether or not that is government policy; whether this new course is to be followed in the future. I believe there has been some decrease in the difference between the two prices since the change was made in February, but we should like to know whether the government intends to follow the plan of keeping equalized prices at destination rather than at Vancouver and at the lakehead.

I point out to the minister that it is a much longer haul from the west coast to the United Kingdom. It takes far longer to get the grain around, and that of course is a handicap for us. It is very difficult for anyone on the west coast to see any justice in fixing a lower price at Fort William and Port Arthur than is set at Vancouver. To us it looks like a pretty clear case of discrimination.

I hold in my hand an editorial from the Vancouver Sun. The Sun of course is a Liberal paper. The minister smiles. As it happens, I have to run in the city where the Sun is published and at election time it certainly is a strong government supporter. I must admit that it is an outstanding paper, one of the finest papers in the country, and is not afraid to take a stand against the government when it thinks the interests of Vancouver are at stake. That has been its history as long as I can remember and I give the paper great credit for it. Here is this editorial in the issue of February 19, 1954. It is headed:

Wheat price-rigging aimed to kill port grain trade.

Incidentally, all three Vancouver papers have come out and have taken the same stand on this question.

The Sun detects an eastern conspiracy to deprive the port of Vancouver of its geographical advantages in the grain trade. We call upon the provincial government and every business organization in British Columbia to demand redress.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe told the Commons yesterday—

This was the day after the minister's first announcement. I continue:

—that the federal government has cut the price of grain at lakehead and east coast ports "to equalize grain movements".

In plainer language this means that the government is rigging prices to divert business away from Vancouver. Prices will remain high enough at Vancouver so that it will no longer be cheaper to ship from here by water than to pay high freight rates on the long rail haul to the eastern seaboard.

Commons heard Mr. Howe explain that the United Kingdom has been buying all its wheat at Vancouver and shipping it through the Panama canal.

Obviously the federal government couldn't fill in the Panama canal—so it's done the next best thing. It's made a price differential in favour of the east to enable the United Kingdom to buy at Montreal or Halifax at the same delivered cost. And get quicker delivery too.

This is just about the most barefaced piece of discriminatory manipulation that could be conceived.

These are pretty hard words from a friend. I continue:

Why in the name of a united nation shouldn't Vancouver be permitted to perform the economic job for which nature fitted her?

Then the Sun went on to deal with those statements that no more grain could be handled at Vancouver and therefore the price had to be lowered at Fort William and Port Arthur so that the over-all sales of Canadian wheat would not be kept down.

The Sun puts no credence in the excuse that "Canada has been losing business because Vancouver shipping facilities were plugged."

If that was the real reason the government could easily remedy it. It could instruct the national harbours board which runs the port of Vancouver, to build enough facilities to handle the traffic. Perhaps some artificial stimulation of the eastward business might be justified in the interval while the unplugging was proceeding. But that would have been a temporary measure to ease a temporary difficulty.

The government doesn't contemplate that at all. Mr. Howe says not a word about increasing the handling capacity of this port and not a word to suggest that the discrimination isn't permanent.

The Vancouver Sun worked and fought for twenty years to develop Vancouver as a world grain centre.

As a matter of fact it was many years before the people on the west coast could persuade the rest of the Canadians that wheat could be shipped through the Panama canal.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I was not one of them; I was building elevators there in 1916.

Mr. Sinclair: And good elevators, too.

Mr. Green: I hope the minister will now be able to persuade his colleagues in the government to get back to the policy of having the same price at the two points.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister did not discriminate against Fort William.

Mr. Green: I continue:

We were among the first to recognize Burrard inlet as the natural funnel through which must flow the produce of Alberta and western Saskatchewan farms.

We were told that wheat going through the Panama canal would be ruined because it was down near the tropics, and all this sort of bunk, in order to prevent the wheat being shipped from the west coast. I continue:

Now that the prosperous trade has been built up Vancouver simply can't permit the flow to be dammed at its source either by eastern influence or at the caprice of a government wheat marketing monopoly.

The wording of that editorial of course is very strong, but it represents the feeling of the great majority of the people on the coast, no matter what their political allegiance may be.

If this policy of setting a different price at Fort William and Port Arthur as compared with Vancouver is merely temporary, then I can see not a great deal of reason to complain. But what does worry me is whether or not it is to be the permanent policy. It seems to me that if this is to be permanent policy it fails to take into consideration the fact of the longer time required in getting grain from the west coast to the United Kingdom, which is a drawback in the minds of the buyers in the latter country, and it fails to take into consideration the geographical facts of this nation. The original policy, I think, was the correct one. The price should be the same at Vancouver and at the lakehead. I hope the minister can assure us that that policy is to be continued and that the change made this spring was only of a temporary nature. Perhaps the minister can deal with the two points I have mentioned.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is entirely confused. The present policy at ports is covered by legislation as provided in the Canadian Wheat Board Act. It provides that the initial price for the delivery of grain at Fort William, Port Arthur, Vancouver, and Churchill will be the same. That covers the price on the delivery of the farmers' grain to the ports only. There has never been a policy of selling at the same price out of these ports. Those selling prices have always been different and the difference has been the amount the traffic would bear and it relates to the competitive price of wheat out of these ports.

At the time we revised the wheat price there was a premium of ten cents per bushel on barley out of Pacific coast ports, and whenever Churchill opened we got a very substantial premium on wheat out of the port of Churchill. Usually we made an adjustment on wheat when a premium was warranted and we would hold the price at Fort William and put a premium on at Vancouver. Since we had been selling heavily out of Vancouver which is a port where grain can be handled for transit for a much longer period, we did not think the condition of the market was such that it would warrant putting a premium on at Vancouver and charging that premium on the sale of wheat to Japan and South American countries.

We felt that the demands of the market were such that a cut in price at Fort William, holding the Vancouver price steady, would be the best way to make an adjustment, rather than to hold the price at Fort William and put a premium on the grain out of Vancouver, although one is much the same as the other.

I know of no continued policy for the selling price of wheat out of these various ports in Canada on a uniform basis. I know that the delivery price of the farmers' grain to these ports is uniform. That is provided in the wheat board act. But certainly the same shipping price out of these ports is not warranted. Let us suppose that we make Vancouver the only port and say that Fort William and Port Arthur are obsolete, and we move all the wheat through Vancouver. What would be the effect on the producers? At the present time the producer in Regina is paid an initial price of $1.40 less freight to Fort William. If Fort William was closed he would be paid the initial price less the freight to Vancouver, which would be a very much larger deduction. Now, let us take the situation at Winnipeg. The initial price there would be $1.40 less freight to Vancouver, which would certainly eat up the 40 cents and probably a bit more. We are accepting eastern grain at Vancouver at the present time to relieve congestion, but normally we cannot accept grain at Regina for shipment to Vancouver at a price based on the Fort William delivery of $1.40 less freight. We cannot accept grain on the basis of Fort William and then ship that grain to Vancouver at a very much higher freight rate. It may be good for the producer at Vancouver but it certainly is not good for the producers as a whole to sell grain at a price that is not warranted by the physical facts.

My hon. friend will therefore see that the only practical way in which to market wheat in Canada is to use all the ports based on the greater return given to the farmer and to prevent that return being swallowed up in freight rates. It is necessary to keep the ports competitive. They always have been kept competitive and they cannot operate otherwise. As long as we have a condition in this country under which it is to the advantage of the buyers abroad to buy all the grain out of one port, then we will have to sell all the grain out of one port and be prepared to make uneconomic hauls inside Canada. There is an extraordinary situation this year and because of that the people of Vancouver are complaining they are being discriminated against, but they have handled 25 per cent more grain through their port than ever before in history. If that constitutes discrimination, then it is a very strange form, and if I were a Vancouverite I would hope that that kind of discrimination would continue.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Green: I would like to point out to the minister that I think he is in error about the amount of grain handled through Vancouver. I believe they have handled more this year than last but I do not believe it equals the record of grain handled in the best crop year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, yes.

Mr. Green: That is not the information I have. It is higher than it was last year but at one time the port of Vancouver handled over 100 million bushels.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This year it has already handled 100 million bushels, which is 25 million bushels ahead of last year, at this time, and this year they will handle at least 135 million.

Mr. Green: Well, if they do handle 135 million that will not be anything like double—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is not enough? Tell that to the C.C.F.

Mr. Green: The minister should not get annoyed and try to kick me around, because I will not take it from him. He can try it on some other hon. members. I am asking questions in a perfectly—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are making statements.

Mr. Green:—straightforward manner, and I do not intend to be kicked around. That is not the way we make progress in this house. On February 18 the minister said this, as reported at page 2197 of Hansard:

> It has been our policy to price our wheat for export the same at all three points.

That was a statement of policy made by the minister. The minister walked into this house with a written statement and it therefore was not a case of speaking off the cuff.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What is the date?

Mr. Green: This was a statement made by the minister on change of price on February 18 of this year. He read that statement to this house.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What was the date?

Mr. Green: February 18, 1954, at page 2197 of Hansard, and the part which I have quoted will be found in the second paragraph. The first half of the paragraph reads as follows:

> The new prices that have been issued do not really represent a lowering of the prices. We have three marketing points. One is Vancouver, another is Fort William-Port Arthur and the third is Churchill. It has been our policy to price our wheat for export the same at all three points.

Either the statement the minister made then was wrong or the statement he made today is wrong, and I would like him to clarify the situation because this is of vital importance to those of us who represent the west coast. I would like to know from the minister which statement is correct.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have found the reference and it must have been in relation to the current period and not over the years, because we have had premiums on wheat out of Vancouver. We have had premiums on wheat out of Vancouver because we could sell it higher at Vancouver than out of Fort William. That has happened within my recollection. I think that what that statement refers to was that at that time we were selling wheat at the same price out of Vancouver. Although strangely enough there was a ten-cent premium on barley shipped at that time out of Vancouver. As I mentioned, there was a correction. There is no seven cent spread today. The price has been adjusted in order to make the wheat from the two ports competitive in the British market.

Mr. Green: Well, that is why I think it is unfair. The wheat legislation all refers to prices at Vancouver or at Fort William-Port Arthur.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): These are the farmers' prices.

Mr. Green: That can be found throughout all the legislation. It has always been the same and on the same basis the minister's parliamentary assistant, in giving the written answer to which I referred, confirmed the policy contained in the minister's statement on February 18. The parliamentary assistant to the minister, in giving the written answer to which I referred, confirmed the policy which I read from the minister's own statement of February 18. These were the questions asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia and the answers given:

> Wheat—Prices at Vancouver and Fort William
> Mr. Argue:
> 1. When did the Canadian wheat board first establish the price for wheat at Vancouver on the same basis as at Fort William-Port Arthur?
> 2. Has the wheat board selling price for wheat basis Vancouver exceeded the selling price basis Fort William-Port Arthur?
> Mr. Dickey:
> 1. September 27, 1943.
> 2. Yes. Since February 16, 1954.

So the minister's own department has given an answer that there has been a difference in the price only since February 16 of this year, two days before the minister made his statement. Obviously the policy has been changed. The minister may speak about the premium on barley—I do not know anything about that—but so far as wheat is concerned, the policy of this government has been that the price should be the same at these two exporting centres. I hope the minister can assure us that that will continue to be the policy once this temporary difficulty is over.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The explanation is that the date he has given, namely, September, 1943, was the date on which the wheat board took over all stocks of grains in Canada and sold them as stocks owned by the compulsory pool. At that time wheat was at the maximum under the agreement. We could not sell above the price in the agreement to agreement countries. We were selling higher to class II countries. If he would look at class II prices at that date, he would find that there was a premium. But selling at the maximum rate under the agreement, wheat could be sold at either port regardless of the differential in freights and otherwise. That is the reason why the price was held. When we came off the ceiling, when wheat was no longer competitive at the ceiling, then we had to make the ports competitive in order to allow them to function. I think that is the explanation.

Mr. Green: From now on the price is not to be kept the same at Vancouver and at the lakehead?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not necessarily. The price will be higher at Vancouver or it probably will be higher if ocean freights go down; or it may be higher if ocean freights are very low, as they are today. In any event, it will be competitive so that grain which normally moves on a freight rate favourable to Vancouver will continue to be sold from the port of Vancouver, and vice versa.

Mr. Green: What about the grain handling facilities in Vancouver?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Vancouver is a port open the year round. It does not require great storage facilities. I should like to see another few million bushels of storage there, although this year—which, as I say, has been a record year for the port of Vancouver—we have had no difficulty at all with storage. The purpose of additional storage would be to take care of slides in the mountains or interruptions of transport in one way or another. However, our stocks at Vancouver have been kept steady, at least about 12 million bushels. Normal stocks in Vancouver are about 8 million bushels, which is a good cushion having regard to the business we do there. At the moment there seems to be no present need for additional capacity at Vancouver.

Mr. Harkness: The minister stated that the price which it was laid down in the grain act—I think it is in the wheat board act—should be the same at all three ports, is the price paid to the farmer. Actually, however, the price paid to the farmer is the Fort William price less the freight.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, no.

Mr. Harkness: It is certainly the case in Alberta.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, no.

Mr. Harkness: When I take my grain into the elevator—and it has always been that way—the price I receive is the price minus the freight to Fort William. That is the price to the farmer. That has always been the case. They never take off what the freight is to Vancouver. It is the Fort William price minus the freight to Fort William. In other words, the whole thing is directed in the way of Fort William-Port Arthur and it works to the advantage of the Manitoba and Saskatchewan farmers as compared with the Alberta farmers, actually.

The minister said that if you had the price the same at Vancouver and you took the freight from some place in Manitoba or in eastern Saskatchewan off that price, these people in Manitoba and Saskatchewan would be at a great disadvantage or that they would suffer. That is quite correct. But that is the position we in Alberta have been in right along. Our natural shipping point is Vancouver. I do not think there has ever been any year that all the grain we produced in Alberta went to Vancouver. As a matter of fact, from the cost point of view I think the breaking point is somewhere along the Alberta-Saskatchewan border. It is cheaper to ship from that point east. It is cheaper to ship to Vancouver from approximately the Alberta-Saskatchewan border or a little way inside Saskatchewan. For all Alberta and a small part of western Saskatchewan it is cheaper to ship west. Nevertheless, not all of the grain by any means in that area has always gone to Vancouver. A good deal of it has always gone east. As I say, the price that the farmer receives in Alberta is the Fort William price less the freight. If we could get the Vancouver price less freight we would always have been better off. As I say, the thing has always been pointed in the direction of Fort William-Port Arthur to the disadvantage of Vancouver and to the disadvantage of the Alberta farmers as compared with farmers in the other two prairie provinces.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend will find that he is wrong. If he is in the area where there are preferable rates to Vancouver, his grain will have the advantage of that lower rate, even though the grain goes to Fort William. During the war years when there was not so much grain moving to Vancouver, the grain in western Alberta was sold on the basis of the freight rate from the shipping point to Vancouver, even though the grain went to Fort William. The minister earlier included Churchill with Fort William, Port Arthur and Vancouver, as I understood him. There is on the order paper Bill No. 441, which I understand the minister is not supporting and which would put Churchill in the same position as Vancouver, Fort William and Port Arthur. I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to check his remarks when he is reading to see whether he said that—

Mr. Knowles: Maybe the minister has changed his mind.

Mr. Nicholson: —or whether he just anticipates that Bill No. 441 is going to pass so that the farmers in the area where there is a preferred rate to Churchill would be in the same position as are the farmers in western Alberta who have the advantage of the lower rate from the shipping point to Vancouver, even although the wheat may go to Fort William or Port Arthur.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend has scored twice. He has pointed out an error on the part of the hon. member for Calgary North and he has pointed out an error on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Of course the price at any point in Alberta is based on $1.40 less the freight to Vancouver.

Mr. Harkness: Then I have been badly gypped every time I have sold grain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Grain shipped to Churchill is subject to the Fort William price less freight. We have debated that point here. Churchill is not a delivery point. If wheat were selling at the maximum, we could not get more for wheat than the maximum under the agreement. We could not get more for I.W.A. wheat at Churchill than we are getting at Fort William or at Vancouver. But the price of grain in the country is not based on the Churchill price. My hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. McIvor: I can see a considerable change coming. When the St. Lawrence-great lakes waterway is opened Vancouver will have to look out.

Mr. Quelch: I wonder whether the minister can tell us what the effect of the 7-cent cut was upon the competitive position between Canada and the United States of America? In other words, could that have had any effect upon the United States of America making a reduction of 10 cents?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The American prices at their ports were out of line as were ours. When we cut the Fort William price 7 cents, they cut the price delivered at a few ports along the Atlantic seaboard, possibly New York and Baltimore.

Mr. Quelch: That is at the time we made the 7-cent cut?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the minister explain why Canadian wheat via the St. Lawrence was quoted on the Baltic exchange at £28.10s.2d. compared with £27.14s.6d. via Vancouver? Can the minister give any reason why on the Baltic exchange in London the price of Canadian wheat via the St. Lawrence should be roughly a pound higher?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The price at Vancouver in spite of the cut, which is now 6 cents, is still a more attractive price if shipped from Vancouver, but there is a time element that more or less balances and then there is a slight difference in the quality of the wheat, Manitoba wheat as against Alberta wheat.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): What government elevators at the lakehead are loaned or rented to private companies? Can the minister give us some details as to the contracts with these companies, the revenue received and the reason why the government does not operate these elevators under government control?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is only one elevator owned by the government at the lakehead which is leased to private interests. That is the government elevator near the boundary between Port Arthur and Fort William. It is in Port Arthur. The reason it is leased to the private trade is the old matter of diversions. The government had no country elevators, no collecting points for grain for its own elevator and to get grain it had to pay diversion charges to country elevator interests that were in a position to supply grain. It was found more profitable for the government, and there seemed to be no purpose in doing otherwise, to lease the elevator to a grain company that had its own system of country elevators, and that has been done. It has been leased for the past twenty-five years, I believe.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Would the minister indicate the name of the company and the revenue received?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The McCabe Grain Company. The lease is for ten years. The basic fee is $75,000 a year. In addition, the lessee has to pay a quarter of a cent per bushel on the excess over 9 million bushels received, the lessee has to pay 7·6 per cent on capital expenditures, the lessee has to provide the insurance, the lessee has to pay taxes, rates and assessments and the lessor has to pay for maintenance expenses.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The answer of the minister would seem to indicate that the construction of this elevator by the government has not on an amortized basis brought in any revenue or that the contract is one resulting in a profit to the government. Is that true?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The elevator was amortized years ago. It was built in 1913, over forty years ago. It is the first elevator I ever worked on. The simple fact is that in recent years the government was never able to net as much as $75,000 a year by operating the elevator on its own account.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): At this period in our history we are making certain efforts to safeguard our people and our economy in case of a future war. We are spending a lot of public money on civil defence, and in my opinion, inasmuch as it would be one of the main things that would affect our people, perhaps attention should be given to the distribution of storage of our Canadian wheat. When I think how vulnerable we would be with the government having only three main storage centres for our stocks of wheat it seems to me rather important that consideration be given to storage by the government in various sections of the country. If the government has given any consideration to the matter, would the minister comment on the feasibility of large storage on the prairies under government sponsorship or ownership. My mind goes back to what we sometimes term the hungry thirties when we had to ship back to the prairies seed and feed for our livestock, and I suggest that it would seem to be rather important that the government should give consideration to this matter.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The government of course has government-owned storage on the prairies. It has 5½ million bushels at Saskatoon, 5½ million bushels at Moose Jaw, three or four million bushels at Edmonton, about the same at Calgary and a couple of million bushels at Lethbridge. But the fundamental fact is that storage is storage no matter who owns the wheat. I do not know that grain stored in a government elevator is any more valuable than grain stored in a private elevator or any less liable to damage. With all the precautions that Canada can take by way of civil defence, I think diversity of grain storage is almost completely taken care of by the present situation. Grain is stored everywhere. You could knock out any large section of the country and it would not make the slightest difference. It might make the burden of the wheat board a little easier, but that is about all. I suggest that is not a problem at the moment.

Mr. Harkness: I note that there was an excess of revenue over expenditures in the neighbourhood of $280,000 to $290,000 last year with respect to the government-owned elevators. Can the minister tell us what the revenues were from the elevators operated by the government and what they were from the elevators leased by the government? How many elevators does the government now operate through this branch? Is it two or three?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The board of grain commissioners operates elevators at Prince Rupert, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Edmonton, Calgary and Lethbridge.

An hon. Member: Churchill.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Churchill is not operated by the board of grain commissioners. It is operated by the national harbours board.

Mr. Harkness: Its revenues do not enter into this picture?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not Churchill.

Mr. Harkness: You operate six?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. We made $200,000 odd out of six elevators. If we had seven we would have made another $75,000.

Mr. Harkness: How much of the profit came from the six elevators operated by the government and how much from the ones they lease?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is $75,000 from the one leased and the balance of the profit comes from the ones we operate.

Mr. Harkness: That is a profit of about $200,000 from the six you operate.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Regier: I listened with a good deal of interest to what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra had to say, and I have also followed this matter with interest for a good number of months now. I am afraid that to the people of British Columbia this issue will still be about as clear as mud. It is as muddy as are the waters in many of the eastern Canadian rivers. We have a great deal of respect for our responsible elected public officials at home, and when city councils, aldermen and so on express their opinion that this is a measure of discrimination we have to pay a good deal of attention to them. I regret that the reply we have thus far received has not convinced me, and I am sure has not convinced British Columbia, that this is not a measure of discrimination.

It is very well known from one end of Canada to the other that the most expensive way of moving Canadian wheat to world markets is via the great lakes route. The hon. member for Fort William assured us a while ago that all this would be taken care of after the St. Lawrence seaway was built.

Many of us out west are really wondering whether this is a measure designed to tide over eastern shipping interests until the great St. Lawrence seaway is completed. Over the past number of years we have seen a reduction in the ocean-going rate. The farmer of the west fought a long and hard battle to find an alternative route by way of Hudson bay, and then saw the efforts of the government directed towards not using these money-saving facilities. When world events and conditions now make it less costly to ship our grain through west coast ports to the markets of the world, again the government hand moves and uses its influence and power to force grain to go by the more expensive eastern route. The people of western Canada are not going to be satisfied until they receive a clear explanation. I sincerely hope the minister will be able to make a much clearer public statement.

I may be dumb, but I do know that the city council of Vancouver is not dumb. The city council of Vancouver has publicly stated that in their opinion this is a measure of discrimination against the shipping facilities that now exist on the west coast.

Item agreed to.

Canadian government elevators—

441. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $299,000.

Mr. Harkness: I notice that this item is for the construction and acquisition of buildings and works. Is it implied that during this current year the government is proposing to acquire lands and start the erection of another elevator, or is that implication incorrect? If so, for what is the $299,000?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This vote covers the following items: Moose Jaw, new building for an addition and extension to structure, $35,000; a septic tank, $5,000; Saskatoon, completely new building to replace old contractor's shed, $80,000.

Mr. Harkness: What kind of shed was that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): An old contractor's shed; sewer and water main, $29,000; Prince Rupert, dust-tight switch room, $25,000; power wiring, $8,000; dust control system, $124,000; engineering contingencies, $15,000.

Mr. Harkness: Unfortunately, it would appear there are no new buildings contemplated. If it is not for that purpose, it is really for repairs and some small buildings around the elevators which are in existence. This will not increase the storage capacity in any way. I am disappointed in that because, as we have indicated here and in the agriculture committee, we believe that is a necessity at the present time. The larger crops we are producing now call for more storage space. I believe it is time the government started a construction program so far as these elevators are concerned. The elevators in existence were constructed at a time when the average crop was around 300 million or 350 million bushels. During recent years the crops have been in excess of that, in fact, almost double.

It is not to be expected these very heavy crops will continue, but I do not believe there is any question but that, with improved methods of cultivation and the greater use of fertilizers, Canada is going to have an average crop considerably higher than it was when these elevators were built. In other words, over a long period of time we are going to have bigger crops than we have previously had, and therefore more storage space will be required. I would hope the government would proceed at once to initiate a program of increasing storage space by building more elevators.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I might point out that the government is building elevator space at Churchill, at Montreal, and at Halifax. The work happens to be under the national harbours board.

442. International economic and technical co-operation branch, including the administration of the Colombo plan and of certain United Nations co-operation plans, $118,486.

Mr. Green: Can the minister explain how this staff is divided between the Colombo plan and other assistance plans?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I might explain that the funds for the Colombo plan and the approval of projects comes under the Department of External Affairs. I am sure that a full explanation was given in the committee on external affairs. The Department of Trade and Commerce is simply the administrator of the program. If the Department of External Affairs approves certain projects, the Department of Trade and Commerce undertakes to carry out those projects.

Mr. Knowles: And your administrator does a very good job, too.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think so. I think he is a very good man. We have not very much to do with assigning the nature of the plan.

Mr. Green: The item reads, "and of certain United Nations co-operation plans". What are those plans?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There are certain United Nations scholarships that are paid for by United Nations which we administer, as I understand.

Mr. Green: Does that include technical assistance to the underdeveloped countries?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes; we administer that.

734. To provide hereby, notwithstanding anything contained in the Financial Administration Act or any other act or law, for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to Junio Moreira, a former locally engaged employee, of a pension in accordance with the terms of Argentine law, from January 1, 1953, at an annual rate of 16,785.08 Argentine pesos, notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of April, 1954, which is, $1,250.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister offer a word of explanation for this item? It seems to be a new one.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am told that this man is a long-time employee of the department, and under Argentine law he would be entitled to a pension. He is not pensionable under any plans in Canada, and if we wanted to exercise our immunity we would not have to pay him a pension. There is no fund in Canada which could appropriately pay him a pension. Naturally, we believe that, being good employers in the Argentine, it is proper that we regularize his pension which he would have obtained if he had been employed by a private employer; that is the pension we are granting him here.

National research council—

289. Salaries and other expenses, $14,294,367.

Mr. MacLean: Has the minister any statement he would like to make of a general nature concerning the research council?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We had a fairly long debate on the national research council recently, and I do not think I could contribute anything new.

Mr. Barnett: When we were considering the estimates of the Minister of Transport, I asked a question concerning the removal of Ripple rock and was informed that this was not a matter that came under his department. I understand that the project now comes under the direction of the national research council. I was wondering whether the minister could give us a statement on the present situation of the project? If the minister is not in a position to give us details, can he tell us when he expects results of the findings in connection with the experimental borings that were conducted? He will recall that the question as to whether certain means could be employed for the removal of Ripple rock was the subject of investigation. Perhaps this is the proper place to ask the question.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am told that the investigation that has been going on for over a year is not completed even yet. One method of removing the rock, by tunnelling, is feasible if there are no fissures in the rock. If there are fissures in the rock it cannot be tunnelled. I am told most of the drill holes are now in, but the information is not consolidated, and I am not in a position to say what the recommendation of the research council will be. However, I shall make a public statement as soon as the council has submitted a recommendation to the government.

I may tell my hon. friend something which I think he suspects, namely that attempts have been made for many years to find a feasible way of removing Ripple rock, but to date we have not found a feasible plan.

Mr. Knowles: It is in good hands now.

Mr. Green: I understand they put a diamond drill under the channel, and then up under Ripple rock. They have had a core of the diamond drilling for some months. I asked the minister about it earlier in the spring. My information is the core proves that they can tunnel without danger from fissures.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I hope that is so, but they have not so reported to the government. The report has not yet been received.

Mr. Green: There has been no official report to the government?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. Green: What about the research they are doing in connection with the improvements at Vancouver harbour?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A model has been built on the campus of the University of British Columbia, and I am told a report is expected shortly. A model study of the harbour is being made.

Mr. Green: If both these reports are favourable, will it take long to get started on the work?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): To do the actual work in the field, do you mean?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is a matter for the Department of Public Works. I should not think it would take too long—perhaps two or three seasons.

290. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $1,787,265.

Mr. MacLean: I notice there is a large reduction in the item this year. I presume it is because some building program is nearing completion. What is the change in the building program?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The construction program is as follows:

|---|---|
| Building research laboratory and equipment | $128,000 |
| Radio and electrical engineering laboratory and equipment | 90,000 |
| Plant engineering and transport building and equipment | 450,000 |
| Central warehouse building at Montreal road, and equipment | 250,000 |
| Acoustic field station and equipment | 24,000 |
| Alterations and extensions (including revote of $246,000) | 644,950 |

Item agreed to.

Atomic energy control board—
292. Grants for researches and investigations with respect to atomic energy, $300,000.

Mr. MacLean: What grants are given to universities or other institutions for research under this item?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The grants are as follows:

|---|---|
| McMaster University | $18,000 |
| Queen's University | 15,000 |
| University of British Columbia | 20,000 |
| University of Saskatchewan | 15,000 |
| McGill University | 70,000 |
| University of Alberta | 10,900 |
| University of British Columbia | 25,000 |
| Queen's University | 14,100 |
| Atomic Energy of Canada Limited | 100,000 |
| Other grants | 12,000 |

Mr. MacLean: I have a question regarding Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I notice in the last annual report the following paragraph:

> The company has been named the custodian of the Sir Frederick Banting fund. Grants from this fund may be made only on the recommendation of a committee appointed by the government for this purpose, and are limited to projects in the field of atomic energy in its broadest sense.

I take it this fund is separate.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. MacLean: What amount has been granted from it, and what is the situation in connection with it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The Sir Frederick Banting fund was raised privately, chiefly by a number of corporations, as a memorial to Dr. Banting. The custody is in the hands of a committee representing the donors. It was formerly administered by the national research council and it was felt by the donors that it would be more appropriate to the purpose they had in mind to turn the fund over to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to be used for special research in atomic energy problems. But the projects covered by the fund are outside the normal work of government in that field.

Mr. MacLean: Can the minister indicate what progress is being made in the production of so-called cobalt bombs? Has a further supply been made available; also radioactive isotopes for research and other projects of that nature? In what quantities are they being made available, and is priority given to institutions in Canada for radioactive isotopes which may be required from time to time by universities and other research institutions?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I understand that the market for radioactive isotopes is pretty well taken care of by the existing supply. I do not know of any particular delay in getting delivery now if anyone wants to order, whether outside or inside Canada. As my hon. friend knows, a new facility is being erected to process isotopes; that is a fairly busy occupation.

Mr. MacLean: What is the position regarding the cobalt bomb? Have any of them been made available to additional hospitals in the last year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, as they are ordered by hospitals they are being supplied. The closing down of the pile at Chalk River interrupted the supply to some extent, but some have been produced. Indeed they are dedicating a new machine at Port Arthur next week. From time to time new facilities are being established.

Mr. McIvor: I do not want to let this opportunity pass without expressing the appreciation of the citizens of the lakehead of the cobalt bomb addition to the general hospital. This shows that those in charge of research are not considering atomic energy for war purposes only. This is just an expression of appreciation on behalf of our citizens up there.

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited (research program—

293. Current operation and maintenance, $8,379,765.

Mr. Green: This is for current operation and maintenance of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I understand that some changes have been made in the United States atomic energy law. Can the minister tell us whether or not those changes will make it easier for Canada to get information from the United States concerning the atomic energy developments? The McMahon act, as the minister knows, was very strict about exchanging information, and I think has interrupted atomic energy development to some extent. It was hoped that those changes being made this year would improve that situation. Can the minister tell us whether or not that is so?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): So far as I know there have been no changes in the atomic energy law of the United States as yet. There has been a good deal of discussion about changes, but there has been no actual change in the law. The exchange of information is still limited, as it has been, although the wish has been expressed by the President and by other authorities that there be a relaxation.

Mr. Green: Is there any legislation before congress now on this question?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, I believe there is.

Mr. Green: Is that legislation of a nature that will make the exchange of information easier?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, in a good many fields it would make it easier. I am not very familiar with the draft legislation. It can be quite different from the final legislation, but that is the purpose of the legislation, to make the exchange of information easier.

Mr. Green: Does this vote include the cost of operating the new plant at Port Hope for refining the uranium oxide into uranium metal, or is that process not to be under way during the present fiscal year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The operation at Port Hope is a part of the Eldorado operation, which needs no assistance. They just built a $22 million plant at Beaverlodge without any assistance from this government.

Mr. Green: Will this new refining plant be completed during the present year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It will be completed during the next year.

Mr. Green: I have had complaints from an irate shareholder in one of the privately-owned mines in the Beaverlodge area to the effect that the government mill is not taking in the ore from the mines operated by private companies to the extent that it should, and is holding up the development of the area. I do not know whether that statement is correct or not. Perhaps the minister can tell us what the situation is in that regard.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The refinery is busy handling the ore from its own operation and ore from every other operation that I know in the area. There may be some development ore that the company is not in a position to handle, but it is trying to keep up with the requirements of the field. I believe further expansion of capacity is under way at the present time or will be under way shortly. But a process of that kind has to be geared to a particular type of ore. It is a chemical process, and changes in the process may be necessary in order to handle ore from another section of the field. It may be that that is a factor; but I believe that Eldorado is attempting to handle the situation to the best advantage for all concerned.

Mr. Green: Can the minister have that situation looked into?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, I will be glad to do that.

Item agreed to.

294. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment and to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to undertake construction of works at Deep River for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, $4,805,010.

Mr. MacLean: What do the works and buildings which are authorized to be built by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at Deep River consist of? Are they laboratories or accommodation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Just housing.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MacLean: What public buildings in the way of schools, laboratories and so forth are provided at Deep River at government expense?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): All the schools. It is a government town. The government own everything in town, shops, schools and so forth.

Mr. MacLean: Are the inhabitants of the town responsible for erecting any community buildings of any sort at their own expense?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The residents provide certain recreational facilities, skating rinks and playgrounds. The scientists are there only temporarily. They are here today and gone tomorrow, you might say, and the only practical way to run any community of that kind, with that type of employee, is to operate as a government town, and that is being done and has been done from the start.

Mr. MacLean: I take it, it is felt that the same principle should apply in the case of Deep River as applies to married quarters on military stations and that sort of thing?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. MacLean: The facilities are provided?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Mr. Green: The explanation of this vote on page 359 says that it covers a portion of the cost, 26 per cent, of new reactor representing facilities to be used for research purposes. The balance of the cost of the new reactor is provided under loans, investments and advances. Is that reactor for the development of electric power?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This is the new experimental reactor which is now under construction and which will be used for experiments associated with power development, but this is not the reactor which will be built solely for power. We are attempting to build a homogeneous reactor. The reactor now under construction is primarily designed to produce plutonium and isotopes, and to be suitable for certain experiments associated with the production of power.

Mr. Green: Then, in addition, there will have to be a power plant constructed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Mr. Green: Is there provision in these estimates for the construction of such a power plant?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, just for the studies at present under way which are part of our scientific program. It is hoped that the cost of the power plant will be borne largely by the users of power. The Ontario Hydro Electric is very much interested. But we are not making financial provision in these estimates for the construction of the power plant.

Mr. Green: When will this new reactor be completed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Early in 1956, I am told. It has been changed a good many times to keep up with progress in the field since it was first started and, of course, the conception of using it to develop the power pile has introduced changes, but I am told the present date is early in 1956.

Mr. Green: How soon after that date will the power plant be constructed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We cannot say. The power pile is in process of study and as soon as everyone is satisfied that we have the right type designed we will start building the plant.

Mr. Green: It will be some time after 1956?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You mean before we start with the construction?

Mr. Green: No, before the power plant is completed.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, yes, it would be after that.

Item agreed to.

538. To provide for working capital advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, subject to such terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve, $5,319,000.

Mr. MacLean: Would the minister briefly explain the large increase from $300,000 last year to about $5,319,000 this year? I am not being critical in any way because the increase is probably fully justifiable, but I would appreciate it if the minister would give a word of explanation.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has two operations, one a scientific operation which is paid for out of government estimates. The other is a commercial operation which is expected to be self-sustaining. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to the fact that a portion of the cost of the new pile is being paid for out of the estimates, but another portion is being capitalized. This particular vote is simply an advance to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for working capital to enable it to pay its bills until the product can be sold commercially, when this money will be recovered.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us what the total cost of the new reactor will be?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am told it will be between $35 million and $40 million.

Mr. Green: What are the figures on the power plant? Or is it too early for that yet?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is too early for that.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

507. Departmental administration, $2,214,867.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members will find this resolution at page 67 and the details commencing at page 570.

Mr. Brooks: Is the minister going to make a statement now or later?

Mr. Lapointe: No, Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to make any statement at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting here waiting for these estimates and it has been a long, long, day waiting for them to come. I think we are all pleased that there is a change in the consideration of the estimates. I have nothing against the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but it does seem to me we have discussed wheat for practically 50 per cent of the time. I have heard about the price of wheat, storage of wheat, the sale of wheat, and what ports it will sell from, at least four or five times, and it becomes rather boring when you hear it about the fifth time. One of the sad features about the whole thing is that I do not think all the discussion has helped to arrange for the storing of one bushel or even the sale of one bushel of wheat.

Getting back to the estimates on veterans affairs, I am a little disappointed that the minister has not seen fit to give us a general statement on veterans affairs on this first item, though I know that as the discussion continues and as we deal with the different items we will probably get all the information we require.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, we have already had a committee on veterans affairs and in that committee and in the different bills which have been before the house there has been quite a discussion already on the different phases of veterans affairs. With regard to the committee, Mr. Chairman, I might say that we are all very pleased that there was a committee set up this session. The minister and other hon. members will recall that we asked for the setting up of a special committee on veterans affairs at the beginning of the session.

On numerous occasions we have also requested that a standing committee on veterans affairs be set up. It is nice to sit on the veterans affairs committee. You meet not only members with whom you have been associated on former veterans affairs committees, but also new members and, more particularly, you again meet the representatives of the different veterans organizations and you hear about the problems of the veterans from one end of the country to the other. You also meet the officials from the different departments and through them you get a very good picture of the situation as far as veterans problems are concerned.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, when the committee was first set up we were very much disappointed with the terms of reference as far as that committee was concerned, and at that time we tried to have the terms of reference enlarged. Most of us who sat on committees in 1945 and 1946 remember how broad the terms of reference were at that time. We could discuss practically any and all problems relating to veterans affairs. Since 1946 our terms of reference have been much more restricted, until now it hardly seems to be a veterans affairs committee at all. We are restrained from discussing some of the main problems affecting veterans and we are told that practically our only duty on the committee is to review such legislation as the government may see fit to send to us. This is something which rather irritates, indeed exasperates, the members of the committee, but I will have more to say about that matter later.

We are now considering the estimates of this department. I do not think there was ever any great objection to the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs. The only criticism that we have seen to what is being paid out to veterans in the matter of pensions, war veterans allowance and hospitalization and under the Veterans Land Act is not as to the amount. There has never been any objection to the amount but sometimes there is objection to what we think is the cost of administration. Even to that there has never been any great objection. The attitude of the members has, in my opinion, reflected the feeling or the opinion throughout the country, namely, that all we do or all the money we spend with regard to veterans affairs or for the veterans of this country is money well spent. I do not think there has ever been in this country a feeling that too much has been done for the veterans of Canada who, on two occasions, made great sacrifices not only for their own homes but for the homes of the people of this country and of those living in other democratic countries.

We have often heard the statement made—although I think those who make it have probably never really made a study of the veterans legislation in other countries—that the legislation in Canada is the best in the world. This statement is glibly made in the House of Commons by members who, I venture to say, have never even read the legislation of the United States, for instance, or that of Australia, New Zealand or some of these other countries.

A few years ago I had the opportunity of reviewing the legislation in the United States and also some of the legislation in Australia. While our legislation compares favourably—in some matters it is better and in some it is not as good—I would doubt whether the people in the United States would agree that we in Canada have the best legislation. It is a matter of comparison. Then again, why should not Canada have the best legislation? Why should not Canada, for instance, have much better legislation for veterans than have countries like Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Italy or any of those old countries?

Canada during the last war particularly did not suffer as did any of those old countries. France was devastated. Great Britain's cities and towns were ruined, and she spent practically all her finances in order to carry on the war. The same thing is true of Italy, Germany, Japan and all these other countries. In contrast, we here in Canada in no way suffered any of these tragedies, such as the destruction of our cities, our means of communication, transport and so on, as did these other countries. I therefore contend, Mr. Chairman, that the only countries with which we could make a comparison are such countries as the United States, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, which countries were not devastated as were the old countries of Europe and Asia.

With regard to paraplegics, for instance, I noticed the other day a statement to the effect that in the United States they receive something like $340 a month and are also provided with a car. Then a few months ago I noticed an article in some magazine with regard to old soldiers' homes in Australia. Here in this country we have a few old soldiers' homes, but I do not think we have anything that can compare with the old soldiers' homes in Australia or with the way in which the Australians are looking after their old veterans in that connection.

As to the matter of pensions, I suppose we have pensions comparable with those provided in any other country, but what has been the basis for the setting of the rate of pensions in this country? It has not been the highest salaries paid; not by any manner of means. We do not expect it should be and the veterans do not expect that it should be. It has not been the average salary. We all know that the pensions in this country were based on the salaries or wages which labour was receiving in this country, and those of the unskilled and cheapest labour at that. As to the young man who had left college, school, farm and so on and who went to war, if they were killed their families receive pensions; but the amount they receive would not in any way compare with the provision which would have been made for the wives and children of these men had they not been killed. The same thing applies with regard to the men who were wounded and maimed. We speak about their receiving a 100 per cent pension. What is the amount of a 100 per cent pension? I think it is $125 a month. The cheapest labour in this country today will receive $125 a month.

I am not mentioning these things, Mr. Chairman, in order to belittle our system in this country. I do so just to point out that, when we hear people say that we have the finest veterans legislation in the world, we should not take the statement too literally but should warn our people that they must not be too smug in this matter. Suppose we had the best legislation in the world. That is not the only consideration. I think that what we should give to our veterans is the best that we can afford to give them. The provision we make should not be based on what is done in other countries, but rather it should be the best that we can afford to give in this country. In that connection I should like to state that our veterans and veterans organizations in this country have always been fair in their demands. I have been amazed and well pleased at the moderate demands made by veterans when they come before veterans affairs committees. After the first war and even after the recent one, the veterans of Canada never tried to raid the treasury of this country, as was done by veterans in another country which I could mention.

We also speak of hospitalization. As far as veterans are concerned, the hospitalization in Canada is good. There has been an evolution. But again I ask this question: Should it not be good and should it not be the very best we can give? These young men were maimed and wounded not for the benefit of themselves but rather for the benefit of this country. Many of them since the first war and now the second war have had to spend all their days in hospital. I remember, when I was in England after the first war, visiting a hospital in the southern part of that country. In the wards of this hospital were some 25 or 30 young men on water beds. I was told by the nurses there that those young men would never be moved off the beds they were on at that time. There are thousands of our young men in hospital who have been there since the first war and who will be there for the rest of their lives; and that statement now applies with regard to young men who were in the second war. I therefore say that in the matter of hospitalization, while we are proud of our institutions, there is every reason why the very best should be given to these men.

It is not my intention at this time to discuss the bills that were referred to the veterans affairs committee. They were thoroughly discussed in the committee and in the house. The committee considered Bill No. 82, having to do with the War Service Grants Act, Bill No. 101, which gave the Korean veterans the same benefits as those extended to veterans of world war II, amendments to the Pension Act and amendments to the Veterans Land Act. In my opinion the most important bill which the committee had before it was that dealing with the Veterans Land Act.

We realize that housing for veterans is one of the big problems in Canada today. I was favourably impressed with the officials who administer the Veterans Land Act and who gave evidence before the veterans affairs committee. I was impressed with their earnestness and sincerity and what I believe to be their great desire to help veterans through the Veterans Land Act and to make the new amendments a success so far as housing is concerned.

I come now to a matter which was a great disappointment as far as many members of this committee, in fact I think all, were concerned. I think I can say that all members of the house were greatly disappointed that no amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act were presented for consideration by the veterans affairs committee. As far as I am concerned, when I understood the committee would be set up I thought that the main problem which would come before it would be the matter of the war veterans allowance. It is not necessary for me to go into the history of war veterans allowances. The pages of Hansard for the past twenty-four years are filled with the history of this legislation, one of the finest acts that we have in our veterans legislation.

But it was felt by members that the legislation had not kept pace with the requirements of veterans allowance recipients. I would say that 75 per cent of the letters members of parliament receive and 75 per cent of the complaints received from veterans organizations throughout the country arise as the result of inadequacies in the War Veterans Allowance Act. There are two great weaknesses. The first is the basic rate which today is $50 for a single man and $90 for a married man. The second great weakness is the ceiling on income or the amount of permissive income.

The War Veterans Allowance Act was considered by the veterans affairs committee of 1952, and we were surprised that these problems were not definitely solved at that time. True, the war veterans allowance was increased by $10 but the ceiling on income was reduced instead of being increased. Many hours were spent in the committee considering the matter. Many representations were made by veterans organizations pointing out these two great weaknesses in the War Veterans Allowance Act. Since that time they have increased instead of decreasing. After two years, when a veterans affairs committee is again set up for the express purpose, we thought, of reviewing and solving the problems of veterans, nothing is done respecting the problem which I and veterans throughout the country consider the most important.

The members who were on the 1952 committee will recall that at that time the Canadian Legion and every other organization strenuously objected to the bill then being considered. They pointed out that the basic rate did not even provide a bare subsistence for these older men who are unable to work and have no other means of support. They pointed out that $50 a month was not even sufficient to meet their barest requirements. As far as the ceiling on income of $120 a year is concerned, it meant that the veteran who had a small pension could not receive his pension and the benefit of the war veterans allowance. It did not permit the retired workman who had a small annuity to have the advantage of his annuity as well as the war veterans allowance. It did not even permit the war veteran recipient with two or three spare rooms in his house to rent those rooms and receive compensation for them in order to assist in meeting the expenses of the home. It did not even permit the man who had a small piece of ground in the country or near a town to take advantage of his garden or his few cows or hens without having some reduction made in his war veterans allowance.

I say that this ceiling has worked and is working today great hardship on the war veterans allowance recipient. In the special committee this year we heard again the evidence of the representatives of the different veterans organizations. Having in mind the many letters that we are continuously receiving from veterans all over the country and the personal knowledge which I venture to say every member of the house has, having in mind the original intention of the War Veterans Allowance Act which was to assist men over 60 years of age who on account of war service were pre-aged some ten years, taking into consideration also the advanced age of these men of the first war, their average age today being 64 or 65, some of us who were members of the committee felt that we should make representations to the house asking that the terms of reference of the committee be enlarged so that this matter might be considered, especially when we saw that no bill was forthcoming from the government. I took the opportunity to move the following motion in the special committee and I should like to read it now. It reads as follows:

> That this committee submit a report to the house requesting that the terms of reference of the committee be enlarged to enable it to consider the War Veterans Allowance Act and make recommendations in respect thereof, at this session of parliament.

After considerable debate in the veterans affairs committee the chairman of that committee, for whom I have a very kind regard on all occasions but this, I am satisfied went out of his way to make what I consider a very unfair, illegal and unjust ruling, as far as this—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member will be able to make his point quite satisfactorily without casting reflections upon the conduct of the committee.

Mr. Brooks: I am giving my opinion, Mr. Chairman. I will say this. He gave a ruling which I feel was unjustified and which, if the rules were properly carried out, cannot be justified. He gave a ruling entirely contrary to a ruling that has been made under similar circumstances in a previous committee in 1951, when we had terms of reference almost identical with those which we had in 1954. At that time a study of the War Veterans Allowance Act was permitted, although that was not in the terms of reference. The only difference between the terms of reference in 1951 and in 1954 was that in 1951 there was included an item from the estimates. The chairman said that because there was this difference in 1951, the statement of the chairman in 1951 was correct for the particular terms of reference at that time, but would not apply to the terms of reference in 1954. As I say, there was no difference—

Mr. Tucker: The hon. member was not there. I pointed out also that the terms of reference in 1951 also conferred the power to make recommendations which our terms of reference did not include.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps it might be advisable if I were to point out to the committee at this time that what is under discussion is the departmental administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs, and not the conduct of a select committee of this house. The last thing I want to do is to endeavour to curtail any fair criticism any member may wish to bring about veterans legislation, existent or non-existent. I am going to ask him to do that without criticism of the conducting of a select committee set up by this house, and particularly of the conduct of the chairman of that committee.

Mr. Green: Surely you are not ruling that we cannot discuss the proceedings of a committee that has made a report to the house. This committee dealt with veterans affairs and a report has been brought in and tabled concerning certain recommendations. The proceedings are all printed.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra must have misunderstood me. I did not make the suggestion that the proceedings of the committee could not be discussed. I referred in particular to existent and non-existent legislation, which is the point the hon. member is now making. The manner of the conduct of a select committee of this house, not its findings but its conducting by its chairman, can only be discussed in this house on a substantive motion. That is not a question of departmental administration. I feel the hon. member whom I interrupted realizes quite well the point I am trying to make, and will see that I am not endeavouring in any way to interfere with the course of his argument. I am just endeavouring to head him off, before perhaps we might find we have overstepped the rules.

Mr. Green: This is important because we all have a right to speak on this first item. I submit to you we have a right to discuss what took place in a committee. The reports are available, and every word is printed. Surely Your Honour is not ruling that we cannot refer to these printed reports.

The Deputy Chairman: No, I am not.

Mr. Green: May I finish?

The Deputy Chairman: I say he cannot discuss the conducting of the committee or criticize the conduct of the chairman of the committee on the estimates.

Mr. Green: That is not what the hon. member was doing. He was dealing with actions taken by the committee. Surely he is quite in order in doing that.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member for Royal realizes the point I was endeavouring to make.

Mr. Brooks: I have heard a good many committees discussed during the discussion of the estimates, the agriculture committee and other committees. I was suggesting that we felt the war veterans allowance should have been discussed. I feel that we made every effort we could to have the terms of reference of the committee enlarged so the matter could be discussed. We felt the war veterans allowance was the main problem that should have been before the committee. As I say, that resolution came before the committee and was ruled out of order. I shall make no further comment upon the chairman's ruling.

The veterans affairs committee submitted a report to show that the members felt that the consideration of war veterans allowances was probably the most important matter that should have been considered. In one paragraph of the report they said that, in addition to representations in respect to the said bills, representations respecting changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act, to raise the amount of allowance possible thereunder and also raise the level of permissive income, should be made. We felt also that that was not sufficient, and we had good reason for so thinking. In 1952, after certain motions were turned down in committee, we expressed the pious hope that is expressed in this report that the war veterans allowances would be considered by the government. The matter has not been considered for two years, and the same recommendation was made two years ago, yet there is still nothing done. We felt that to make such a recommendation now was no assurance either to us or to the veterans that anything would be done.

Hon. members may say, why the great hurry? As I pointed out, the recipients of the war veterans allowance are not young men. Today the average age is between 64 and 65. These men are growing older every day, and they are dying off very quickly. A month or a year or two years means a great deal to them. Anyone who reads the Legionary, as I am sure most do, knows that there is a page called the "Last Post". On that page you can see dozens of names every month of men, between the ages of 64 and 68, who have died. Brigadier Melville, the chairman of the pension commission, told us that the death rate of the veterans was increasing very rapidly. He was amazed by the great number of widows who were applying for pension. We were told also that the paraplegics of the first war have all passed on, that none of them is remaining. So I say we felt that in pressing for this to be done now—not a year or two years hence—we were carrying out what we believed were the wishes of veterans bodies, and also what should be done to give justice to these veterans. In this connection I should like to read a paragraph from the Legion brief of May 19, 1954:

> It is the earnest hope of the Canadian Legion that the present committee will realize the need and assume the responsibility of recommending immediate action in this matter.

And the matter concerning which they ask for immediate action is that of war veterans allowances. I am not going to labour the point further. I do not think it is necessary to do so; but by failing to enlarge the terms of reference of our committee and failing to allow us to consider a bill amending the war veterans allowances, I feel a great injustice has been done by parliament so far as the recipients of war veterans allowances are concerned. I express the hope that between now and next November the government will see fit to correct this great injustice. And if it is not done at that time, then one of the first things we will have to do at the next session of parliament will be to discuss the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Knowles: Why not do it before this session ends?

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I shall take a few minutes on this first item, because it is about the only place I can say what I want to say.

Two principles arise out of the last veterans affairs committee that should be brought home clearly to members of the House of Commons. The first of these is the value of the committee itself, and the second is this warning: Don't tie the hands of the committee before you set it up.

Ever since I have been in the House of Commons I have been of the opinion that a continuing committee on veterans affairs, operating as a standing committee of the house, would serve a very useful purpose. It could review and consider week by week or month by month, in company with representatives seeking veterans legislation, what might be wrong with the present legislation and what new legislation might be required. In this way there could be a continuous survey of veterans problems.

While it was handicapped in one respect, this committee demonstrated that when its hands were not tied by previous decisions it was flexible and realistic and could do some good work. I shall not discuss the four bills which came before the house more than to say that the committee made amendments to those bills simply because it was not hamstrung before it began its sittings.

For example, under the War Service Grants Act veterans who served in Korea and had enlisted prior to 1950 found, upon being discharged, that they were not entitled to unemployment insurance. Through the chairman and the parliamentary assistant this matter was brought to the attention of the committee. The proposal was a reasonable one and it was not long before the parliamentary assistant had consulted his minister and others and returned to the committee with an amendment correcting this injustice.

Then there was another amendment to the same act in connection with which we were not hamstrung by previous decisions. I refer to the application of gratuity credits to dependent parents. When the matter was discussed in committee the act was changed from a provision whereby the parent had to be wholly supported by the deceased veteran to one whereby only partial support was necessary. I know of several cases in which I was interested where the difficulty was cured by this amendment.

When the Veterans Land Act came before the committee it was amended in 15 places. This shows that if the committee is permitted to work without restriction it can and will do a good job. In this connection I should like to straighten out something that appeared in a newspaper report dealing with the first principle I stated when I stood in my place: Don't tie the hands of the committee before you set it up. This report appears in the Ottawa Citizen of Friday, June 11, 1954, at page 5. It is a Canadian Press dispatch and while I do not know who wrote it, I am certain no one in the parliamentary press gallery wrote the headline, which states "Second Veto for Raise in Vets Pensions". That headline is absolutely incorrect. Then I shall refer to the first paragraph of the dispatch which, also, is in error. It states:

> For the second time in two days, Walter Tucker (Liberal, Rosthern), chairman of the Commons veterans affairs committee, yesterday ruled out of order a motion aimed at increasing war veterans allowances.

The paragraph is in error when it states the motion was to increase war veterans allowances. It was for a completely different purpose, that of asking the committee to broaden the terms of reference.

Mr. Knowles: Asking the house.

Mr. Gillis: To ask the house to broaden the terms of reference. The rest of the story is all right. Then, I should like to say a few words on the other principle: Don't tie the hands of the committee. The matter of broadening the terms of reference was raised by the hon. member for Royal. As he said this afternoon, the committee had before it a proposal from the chairman to write into its report a recommendation that the government give greater consideration to war veterans allowances in respect of those who served in the merchant marine during the last war. Under his authority the chairman was not permitted to accept the motion of the hon. member for Royal. I have served on that committee long enough to know the rules.

However, he found himself in this position; a much less favourable one. Before the matter came to the committee at all, the Legion had approached the cabinet, and the cabinet is the government. It was indicated in the press that the cabinet, with the Prime Minister as its spokesman, had definitely said there was to be no change in war veterans allowances at this session of the house. That was a pretty definite government decision.

On two occasions the house had ruled out of order a proposal to broaden the terms of reference of the committee when the matter was under discussion. I like to be fair in these matters. In what kind of a position did we place the members of the government who were members of that committee, in deciding to broaden the terms of reference or increasing veterans' allowances, when three decisions against that proposal had already been made; one by the cabinet and two by the house before the committee had an opportunity of discussing it at all? From my own experience on that committee in the last fifteen years I am reasonably sure that if that committee gets any proposition, and if they are not hamstrung before they start, they will do a reasonable job in the best interests of the veterans of this country.

In the committee, as I stated when the hon. member for Royal moved his motion, the easy thing for an opposition member to do is to rise and beat the chairman, because the chairman is helpless. He has no alternative. He goes as far as he can under the rules and regulations that apply to that committee. There is no doubt in my mind—and there was no doubt in my mind—that the hon. member for Royal was out of order.

Mr. Brooks: That is not the attitude you took in former veterans committees.

Mr. Gillis: But the circumstances were different this time. Three decisions had been made by the government and hon. members. That is what I am objecting to.

Mr. Brooks: No decision was made on this.

Mr. Gillis: There were two decisions made.

Mr. Brooks: Not on this.

Mr. Gillis: Two of them were made in this house and one was made by the government as announced by the Prime Minister to the Legion. I hope we have learned a lesson from that, so that when we set up that committee we set it up free to deal with veterans problems, without having three strikes on it before it starts to discuss the proposition. I have said that a good many times and I reiterate it now. Let us not get the committee in a position where people are fighting for the political advantages. Let us set it up free and unrestricted, and let us not examine legislation that has been conceived by someone else. Let us look at the legislation as it is and let us, along with veterans organizations, determine what is fair and reasonable in the matter of changes to be made. Then I think we can keep veterans affairs out of politics and the veterans will get a better deal all-round.

There are lots of places where I can fight politically with the government, in the house and out of the house, but there is one problem in this country that I have never for one minute tried to capitalize on politically, and that is veterans affairs. It should be outside of that; it is too big for that.

I do not forget the 1951 and 1952 committees when the War Veterans Allowance Act was before them. The main emphasis at that time was on permissible earnings, casual earnings; the right of the veteran to hold his veterans allowance and at the same time take some employment that would increase his income and enable him to augment the veterans allowance, instead of immobilizing and penalizing him if he took employment of any kind. I do not agree with the hon. member for Royal when he says nothing was done about that other than expressing a pious hope. At that time the main emphasis was on casual earnings. He will remember, as I remember—

Mr. Brooks: The main emphasis was on the ceiling, and it is today.

Mr. Gillis: It is the same; there is no difference. It is a difference in words. At that time the department dug out material as far back as 1919, and we gave that problem a thorough overhauling. I hold in my hand directive No. 25, issued in 1953, which shows that substantial changes were made in the casual earnings and in the methods of going off veterans allowances, taking employment for part of the year and going back on the allowance again without any difficulty. I am not going to read it. I am sure every member of the veterans affairs committee must have a copy of this directive. Substantial changes were made.

Previous to the changes being made, as indicated in the directive, I received many letters on this matter of casual earnings, asking that the ceiling be raised and wondering why they were immobilized, asking that they be permitted to take employment for a month, two months or three months of the year, and so on. They said, "if I take a little job on an elevator or selling tickets at a theatre, or some kind of employment that a person can get in the summertime, why should I be deprived of my veterans allowance?" I have had no complaints since that was straightened out in accordance with the directive. Then the main issue became that of raising the basic rates.

As far as I am concerned, if we had a chance to discuss and vote on that, there would be no question where I stand. I am sure there is no doubt in anybody's mind, in this house or outside of it, who knows me as to where I would stand on that matter; but that matter was not before us and we could not get it before us. We were prevented from getting it before us largely by the action of this house in making two decisions against it before it ever got to us.

I have another directive in my hand which is along the same lines. It has to do with casual earnings as they apply to farmers in the computation of their income. I am not going to read it because it is available to all hon. members. It is the issue of May 3, 1954, and is directive No. 6. It is worth having in your file. Anyone who is interested in veterans affairs should have both of these directives in his files. These directives are all supposed to go out to the district offices, which are responsible for advising the veterans in the district, but quite often this material gets sidetracked. When I saw this I suggested in the house that revisions should be made so that the branches and people in the area at least would become familiar with it.

These are some of the things that that committee did. I am arguing for that committee. I am not defending the government, but I am arguing as to the value of that committee. I am sure the hon. member for Royal did not mean what might be taken out of his remarks if you did not know him: a straight condemnation of a committee of this house by a man who has been a member of it for some considerable time. He said that it is of no value and that instead of setting it up as a continuing committee as a lot of us want to see done, the government should say: let us get rid of it; it is no good anyway, since some of the older members have said so.

Mr. Brooks: I never said that.

Mr. Gillis: I know the hon. member did not say that, but that could be read out of what he said; that it is of no value; that it only issues pious hopes; that it has not done anything and it has never done anything; why should we be wasting our time? If I ever get the idea that the committee is a waste of time, I will not be a member of it. I will not be wasting my time on it. I consider it one of the most valuable committees in the House of Commons.

Mr. Brooks: If it is not hamstrung.

Mr. Gillis: If it is not hamstrung. Let us not help to hamstring it the next time by voting on something in this house that we should do in the committee.

While I am talking about veterans allowances I would like to say this to the minister. There are two points about veterans allowances that would not take very much money to straighten out, and they are outstanding grievances. One is the veteran who served in England during the first world war. That veteran should be entitled to war veterans allowances. England was not a theatre of war during the first war; it was a theatre of war in the second war. A veteran who served in the second war and who got to England, and who may be 30 or 35 years of age, may some day receive veterans allowances. The man who served in England and stayed in England through no fault of his own, because he was ordered to stay there, sees, when he reaches the age of 60 or 65, the young veterans drawing allowances to which he himself should be entitled. He feels it is a pretty rank piece of discrimination. I say that something should be done to correct that.

Now, the second point, and this is an outstanding grievance, relates to the widow of the imperial veteran. With the deadline of 20 years residence there were many of them who were perhaps three, five, or eight months short of being residents in Canada for the regulation 20 years. That widow is living alongside Mrs. Smith who was lucky enough to have a husband who lived in Canada for the full 20 years and who therefore receives the full war veterans allowance. But the woman next door, because her husband happened to be taken away a few months before, does not qualify under that deadline and she cannot get the war veterans allowance.

There would not be very much money involved in alleviating the condition of such people. When you talk to people in that category and tell them you are in favour of putting $100 million into the Colombo plan they come right back and say, "Why not start a Colombo plan for us?" The amount of money involved would not be so great when one considers that this is really an outstanding grievance.

I would suggest that when the government considers the report of the committee, which suggests that the war veterans allowance should be considered in the matter of increasing the rate, that these two points I have just mentioned, both of which are outstanding grievances, be given further consideration. That is all I am going to say at the present time, Mr. Chairman, but I may have some further remarks to make on certain other items.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, when the veterans charter was first introduced in 1945 I believe it was the finest program for the re-establishment of veterans that could be found in any country in the world. As time went on, of course, it became necessary to make adjustments to that charter and for that purpose the veterans committee has been set up to deal with the amendments and bills referred to it from time to time. In the early days the terms of reference of that committee were wide open and we had the right to discuss any feature of the veterans charter but, unfortunately, during the past few years the terms of reference have been tightened up and our action has been limited to the bills referred to us. As a result of that it has not been possible for the committee to deal with what might be considered the major grievances in the veterans charter and that, of course, is the war veterans allowance.

I want to deal with one or two of the bills which were referred to the committee and deal first of all with the Veterans' Land Act. When the Veterans' Land Act was before the house I suggested to the minister that the superintendent should be prepared to give us a complete review of the operations of the department. At this time I would like to commend the very fine report that was given to the committee by the superintendent of the Veterans' Land Act. It was a very comprehensive report; it showed that the program is working, I think, very satisfactorily; and it showed there are very few veterans in arrears. I think at the same time we must keep in mind the fact that generally speaking crops have been good and prices have been satisfactory. It is quite possible that if we run into a few crop failures and prices happen to fall the situation might not be quite so satisfactory.

The main criticism I have heard of the officials of the Veterans' Land Act has been that they have been a little bit too tough; that they are a bit too conservative in their appraisals. The superintendent himself admitted before the committee that there is probably some justification for that criticism. On the other hand, I would not be too critical of the superintendent on that ground because I have in mind the criticisms we have made throughout the past about the officials of the old Soldier Settlement Act. That was constantly criticized on the grounds that the settled veterans were put on land for which they had to pay too high a price, and that they should never have settled veterans on land of that type. I presume that the present superintendent is going to try and make sure that that type of criticism will never be levelled against him in the future.

Now, one of the amendments under the act provided for an additional loan of $3,000 which I think is a good thing. On the other hand, I regret that the government set the rate of interest at 5 per cent instead of 3½ per cent. I hope the government even at this late date will reconsider that action. The reason given was that the main purpose of the additional loan was to make it possible for the veterans to get loans they were not able to get as veterans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and as the rate of interest was 5 per cent under the Farm Improvement Loans Act the rate of interest for this additional $3,000 should also be set at 5 per cent.

But that ignores one very important fact, namely, that the Veterans' Land Act has nothing whatever to do with the Farm Improvement Loans Act. It also ignores the fact that when the Veterans' Land Act was established and the veterans came back from overseas many of them were encouraged and advised by the officials of the Veterans' Land Act not to settle right away but to wait. Prices were high and they were advised to hold back in the hope that the prices would fall and they would be able to make a better deal with their $6,000. But what happened?

Prices went up by about 50 or 60 per cent and as a consequence of the veteran having taken the advice of the officials of the Veterans' Land Act—and I am not criticizing these officials because most of us thought the same thing—the veteran found himself in a far more difficult position. Whereas with his $6,000 he might have been able to settle on a good holding in 1943, 1944 or 1945, by 1947, 1948, 1949 and onwards, the price of land had gone up by 50 per cent and in some cases 100 per cent, along with the price of everything else, and so it was practically impossible for the veteran to become re-established with $6,000. In most cases the veterans who did manage to become re-established had a certain amount of capital of their own and in some cases they were helped out by their parents.

Now we find a situation in which it is desirable to make an additional amount of $3,000 available. According to the superintendent and the minister the purpose is to make it possible for the veterans to obtain additional land and improve their property. The government realized they needed to expand their holdings and with the price of land being high it had not been possible in many cases for the veteran to get a large enough holding. As a result of the price of land increasing this $6,000 was not sufficient to enable the veteran to buy a sufficient amount of land which could be considered as an economic unit. We are therefore allowing the settler to have an additional $3,000. But that being the case what justification can there be for setting the rate of interest at 5 per cent instead of 3½ per cent?

This grant is being made in order to make it possible for the veterans to establish an economic unit, but I would again point out that it has nothing whatever to do with the Farm Improvement Loans Act and I therefore hope the government will give further consideration to that matter and make the rate of interest 3½ per cent across the board. As things stand now we will have the veteran paying 3½ per cent on some of his loan and 5 per cent on the balance.

As I said, I think the officials implementing the Veterans Land Act are doing a good job. They have a reputation today of being tough but the time to be tough is, of course, when prices and crops are good and when farmers are prosperous. If the time comes when conditions are bad I hope the minister will encourage his officials to be a little more lenient in order to make things a little easier for those in that position. I agree the time to be tough is at the beginning and then loosen up later on.

[Mr. Quelch.]

I now want to say a few words with regard to the Pension Act. A great deal of concern was expressed by the Legion in their brief over the delay in awarding pensions. It will be recalled that the act, as originally sent to the committee, instead of improving that situation, worsened it. Fortunately, the government decided to agree to an amendment to the bill and the situation was put back as it was before the bill was drafted. But it still does not go as far as the Legion asked that it should go. The Legion asked that the pension be awarded from the date of application. I hope the government will see fit to give further consideration to that matter at some future date.

I now want to come to the question of the main grievance against the veterans charter today, namely, the grievance against the war veterans allowance. There again I want to state that I am not for one moment criticizing the officials of the war veterans allowance board. I think Colonel Garneau has done a good job. I have never heard any criticism against him or his officials. I think they go as far as they can go under the act. In my opinion the trouble is that, the act being what it is, they are not able to go far enough.

There has been some criticism of the chairman of the committee for ruling a certain amendment out of order. Generally speaking, I think he made a good chairman. I think most of the members of the committee will agree with that statement. Personally I am not overcritical of him for having ruled out of order that motion to get the terms of reference widened. Even if that amendment had been allowed, it would either have been voted down by the Liberal members of the committee, or if it had not been voted down by the members of the committee, I presume it would have been voted down when it got into the house, because two amendments that had been moved at the time the committee was set up had already been voted down. While it might have been a good political move to make, I do not think it would have done much good even if it had carried in the committee.

When the War Veterans Allowance Act was before the committee in 1952 the allowance was raised from $40 a month to $50 for a single veteran and from $70 to $90 for a married veteran. But at the same time the amount of the permissible earnings of a married veteran was reduced from $250 for the year to $120. That reduction caused a great deal of hardship for the small pensioner —that is the war disability pensioner—or for the person with a small superannuation allowance or any other type of pension. What it meant was this. A married veteran with a disability pension of $30 a month did not receive any help whatsoever as the result of increasing the war veterans allowance from $70 a month to $90 a month, because the ceiling permitted was $1,200 for a married veteran. That was my main criticism at that time, namely, that although we had increased the allowance from $70 a month to $90, it would not help the small disability pensioner in any way, shape or form.

I think the tragic part of the picture with regard to the War Veterans Allowance Act is that it does not today provide enough for a person to live on. Furthermore, it denies a veteran the right to help himself by adding money to his income in order that he may have a fairly decent standard of living. It makes it impossible for a veteran to help himself. The recipient of the war veterans allowance today is therefore forced to exist on a subsistence standard and there is nothing he can do to help it.

Not only is there nothing that the veteran can do to help himself, there is nothing that his relatives can do to help him and there is nothing that his friends can do to help him. If they start to make money available to him, then the amount of his allowance is reduced by that amount, unless the matter is hidden, unless he conceals the fact that help is being given to him. Moreover, if it becomes disclosed at a later date, the allowance is cut down and the amount of overpayment is charged against his future allowance.

Mr. Quelch: Yes; even old age security is of no help to him. I think all of us know of many cases of real hardship. Veterans have come to us and said that their sons and daughters wanted to help them and have asked the question: How can they help us without our having the allowance cut down? There is no way they can help unless it is done by not disclosing the fact that help is being given. Yet no member likes to encourage a recipient of war veterans allowance to do anything that is not legal because if he does so, and it is found out, of course naturally the member of parliament would be blamed for having given him a bum steer. I myself have been in that position on several occasions, but I have been discreet. I would say that the officials are very sympathetic. They use good judgment. If there is one department that bends over backward to try to help the veteran, it is the branch of the war veterans allowance.

Another highly unsatisfactory condition is that today we find that old age pensioners in some provinces are getting a far better deal than are the recipients of the war veterans allowance. For instance, in Alberta and in British Columbia that is the situation. I do not want anybody to bring politics into the matter. It just happens that Social Credit governments are in power there. That is not the reason I am referring to the matter. I am merely mentioning that in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia a married couple receive an old age pension of $110 a month whereas recipients of the war veterans allowance receive $90 a month. That is a rather bad situation, where a civilian can receive $20 a month more than a war veteran; therefore the war veterans allowance should be increased. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Old Age Security Act are not altogether dissociated from each other. There is a connection between them, whether we like it or not.

First of all, let us remember that the war veterans allowance is not available to all disabled veterans. It is available only to those veterans who actually served in a theatre of war. Very often there is a narrow margin between a veteran who is able to get a pension and a veteran who is not able to get one and who has to accept the war veterans allowance. I can see that at times it must be an extremely difficult thing for the pension commission to decide what veteran will be able to get a pension and what veteran will have to depend upon the War Veterans Allowance Act for his living. Of course, the pension commission is allowed to use the section with regard to benefit of the doubt in order to help it in that matter. I can quite well see where, at times, it must be a hard decision for the pension commission to make.

In this connection it is well to remember that in the year the War Veterans Allowance Act was first established—I have forgotten the exact date, but it was in the 1930's—it was established upon the presumption that a veteran had pre-aged by ten years. I have not the statement here but I read the statement by the former prime minister to that effect. The veteran having pre-aged by ten years, it was decided to allow the veteran to have the old age pension at the age of sixty instead of waiting until he was seventy. That being the case, and the war veterans allowance having been established on that basis, what possible justification can there be for maintaining a means test upon the recipient of the war veterans allowance at sixty when the recipient of the old age pension at seventy has no means test upon him?

On that basis war veterans should automatically have the means test lifted at 60. Otherwise the presumption basis means nothing.

That could mean a great deal to the recipients of war veterans allowance because the majority of the war veterans are over 60 years of age. I have here a statement which was made by Colonel Garneau in 1952. According to that statement at that time the actual percentage of veterans under 60 years of age compared with those 60 years of age and over was in the ratio of 25 per cent to 75 per cent. The percentage with respect to widows on allowances under 55 years of age was 16·58 per cent and for those 55 years of age or over 83·42 per cent. These figures total approximately 32 per cent for those under 60 years of age and 68 per cent for those 60 years of age and over, taking in all recipients.

That would mean that if we recognize that veterans of 60 receiving the war veterans allowance should have the means test lifted entirely, 68 per cent of the recipients of the war veterans allowance would have the means test eliminated. I think all members would agree that would make a tremendous difference to the war veterans today. In the first place it would mean that all those receiving disability pensions would be able to get the full amount of the war veterans allowance. All those getting small incomes from other sources would be able to get the full amount of the war veterans allowance. I hesitate to go one step further and say that it would mean that they could also draw the full amount of the old age pension at 65. I am not going to say that because I do realize that there seems to be a duplication there, and if you are going to argue that the one is based upon the other I do not see how you can say they can get both.

Mr. Knowles: Retired judges get both.

Mr. Quelch: But by the time they reach 70 we should be prepared to give them both the allowance and the old age security pension which is contributory.

Mr. Knowles: Retired judges get two pensions. Some senators get both their indemnities and the pension.

Mr. Quelch: Yes, but I am using an argument which I will admit does not work very well in that direction. However, I believe it is a most important argument to use. First, on the basis of that presumption, the veteran at 60 is certainly entitled to have the means test lifted, and by the time he is 70 I think we could very well pay him the full amount of the old age pension and the war veterans allowance. However, I admit I have not made a very good case for the latter although I have made an excellent case for the first proposition, namely, that the means test should be eliminated.

The Legion has not gone that far. They have not asked that the means test be eliminated entirely. They have asked that the means test be raised to the approximate level of the income tax exemptions. They suggest that the ceiling on permissive income in the case of the single veteran should be raised to $1,200 and the ceiling on permissive income in the case of the married veteran should be raised to $2,000. The justification for that of course is that when that exemption was established under the income tax it was established on the basis that a person with an income of less than that could not live on less and therefore should not be taxed. For the same reason, if a single man cannot live on less than $1,200 a year and a married man cannot live on less than $2,000 a year, then the ceilings on income should be raised to those amounts in order to make it possible for the veteran to live a decent life. No veteran can live a decent existence under the miserable ceiling now prevailing.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in 1952 the committee made a recommendation regarding the war veterans allowance which reads as follows:

> Your committee further recommends to the government continued and sympathetic study of the needs and requirements of recipients of war veterans allowance, keeping in mind the recommendations of veterans organizations in that respect and particularly with regard to permissive income.

This year the committee made what is in reality a similar recommendation. It asked the government to give sympathetic consideration to the recommendations of the veterans organization. I hope the minister and the government will give the matter further consideration and find it possible to go at least as far as the recommendation of the Legion, even if they are not prepared to adopt my proposal to wipe out the means test at the age of 60.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the last words I will be privileged to say in the house at this session will be along exactly the same line as my first words in the house, the strongest appeal I can make for some consideration for people on war veterans allowances, both with respect to the limit of the allowance and, in particular, the ceiling on permissive income. I want to take the few minutes before six o'clock to talk a bit about the work of the special committee.

I was trying to think the other day of just what we had done in this session of parliament and what we had left undone, whether I was proud of having done anything or ashamed of having done something. I was trying to total up the things that really mattered, and one small thing came to my mind. I had the privilege of writing a letter to the minister with regard to adopted children of war pensioners. I tried to use what influence I had to get him to put them on a par with natural children, and I think the greatest thrill I got at this session was to see the minister take steps a few days later to make provision for that in the law.

I hasten to add that hon. members on this and the other side of the house, who for so many years have fought so well for the veterans, no doubt suggested that long before I did, but perhaps I just happened to write at the particular time. I want to pay tribute to two members of the veterans affairs committee for the work they did. In my humble opinion the finest job was done by our chairman, the hon. member for Rosthern, who did an extremely difficult job to the satisfaction of all concerned. I also got a thrill when on the last day of our sittings I heard the clerk say that we have the highest rate of attendance of any committee of the house. I admit that a good many of our sessions were pretty hot, but I think if members of the four different political parties will look back on the work that was done in that committee they will agree that we were all trying to achieve the same purposes.

We have heard today about a resolution that was ruled out of order. I have not heard anything yet about the one that was ruled out of order by the same chairman the day before, and which happened to be a resolution moved by two British Columbia Liberal members, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. Its purpose was to more or less implement the proposals in the Legion brief for higher war veterans allowances and a higher permissive income.

The second hon. member to whom I want to pay my tribute is the modest member for Cape Breton South. A few weeks ago I heard him make a speech on international policy which I thought was one of the most important things I had heard in the house this year. Although it did happen to be an expression of C.C.F. international policy, it was an important speech, and if I were a Russian diplomat I certainly would have paid very close attention to it because it seemed to me to be a speech coming from the heart of an honest man. The work done by the hon. member for Cape Breton South in the veterans affairs committee this year was a peace-making job.

We were faced by a practical difficulty. The terms of reference of the veterans affairs committee were narrower than most members of the committee wished to have. I know quite well every member of that committee would have been delighted had we had before us the War Veterans Allowance Act, and had we been able to make recommendations for concrete increases in those allowances and in the ceiling on permissive income. Some hon. members may recall that I ventured to suggest when we were unsuccessful in having the terms of reference widened, that we would find ways and means of discussing the war veterans allowance. This turned out to be the case because in the debate we had over the precise form in which we were going to lend our moral support to the Legion brief I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the chairman, as well as one or two other members of the committee from other parties, put their heads together, and we all know what the end result was. The end result was that in the second to the last paragraph of the final report of the veterans affairs committee we gave our wholehearted support to the Legion brief and the submissions they made for increases in the war veterans allowance and a rise in the ceiling on permissive income.

I want to say also that I thought the work of the veterans affairs committee this year showed itself as very valuable. I heartily support the proposal made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South that this veterans affairs committee be made a permanent standing committee. We should not have to have it set up specially every year. I shall cite just one small example of the benefits we have this year from this committee. The hon. member for Cape Breton South discovered that there was a weakness in the Unemployment Insurance Act, in that it excluded certain categories of veterans. He took that up with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and we all know the sequel. The sequel was the introduction of a new bill to remedy this grievance.

I must say that I go home from this session with mixed feelings. I am frankly disappointed that the government did not feel able to completely accept the recommendations of the Canadian Legion concerning war veterans allowance, and particularly in regard to their feeling on permissive income. I could not agree altogether with the hon. member for Acadia, for whom I have great respect, about that business of the old age pension. I believe that if the permissive income were not even put as high as the Legion requested, which was $1,200, if it were even set at $1,080, that would solve the difficulty because that would amount to $40 a month. This would mean that a man could draw his $50 a month that he now draws, and when he gets to age 70 he would automatically be entitled to the old age security pension without any deduction because he would still be under the ceiling.

I want to say once again, Mr. Chairman, just as strongly as I can that I urge the minister and the government to give sympathetic consideration to the people on war veterans allowance. I say that not just because there are hundreds of them in my riding or because we have thousands of them in British Columbia. When I wake up in the morning and begin to read the newspaper and I see, for instance, that last night in some little rooming house perhaps in one corner of my riding some old worn-out ex-warrior turned on the gas, I must confess I do not feel too happy. Usually, when they examine his accounts they find that he just could not get by on $50 per month. I, for one, have no hesitation whatever in saying that in the two far western provinces, Alberta and British Columbia, the fact that the old age pensioners draw $55 a month is a real source of grievance to the people who served their country in time of war and who are now forced to live on $50 a month.

Once again I urge the minister to continue to give sympathetic consideration to this proposal. I cannot state publicly that I know where the minister's sympathy lies in this regard. May I urge upon the minister and the government again, as I have so many times before, to continue to give to the war veterans allowance every sympathetic consideration. In addition to that, in the coming months they should give even extra consideration to what seems to me to be by far the most important part of this whole question, and that is the ceiling on permissive income. I have no way of knowing what was in the minds and hearts of the people who had to make a decision that this government was not able to afford an increase in veterans allowances this year. I, for one, might hazard a guess that had the Legion not asked for an over-all rise from $50 to $60 per month, but had confined their request to the more important grievance, the low limit on permissive income, perhaps we could have obtained at least one of the things which I think every hon. lady and gentleman in this house wishes as much as every other.

Mr. Nesbitt: Since we are sitting again at seven o'clock, may I call it six o'clock?

[Mr. Philpott.]

The Chairman: May I remind hon. members that pursuant to special order the committee will resume at seven o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks on this first item in the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs. First of all I should like to compliment the minister on the veterans legislation that was put forward by the government, considered by the special committee on veterans affairs and subsequently passed.

I should like to mention particularly the amendments to the Veterans Land Act, because I think these are certainly very beneficial to the veterans who served in all fields of hostilities, and they are most commendable. I would say the same with respect to the amendments to the Pension Act, with the exception of that one section which had to do with the setting of the salaries of the commissioners. And of course I cannot refer to that at this time. In any event, on the whole the legislation referred to the special committee was commendable.

For a few moments I should like to deal with two recommendations set forth in the brief of the Canadian Legion and which thus far have not been acted upon by the government. The first item in this connection has to do with the submission by the Canadian Legion with respect to dependent parents. The fact that the government recognized that a dependent widowed mother should be placed on the same footing as a widow was recognized in the original legislation. However after 1951, when changes were made in pension rates, the pension of a widow was raised to a maximum of $100 a month from $75, whereas that of the widowed mother remained at $75. Without going into the details in the Legion's brief I would say that in my view they presented a capable argument on the point, and showed that pensions for widowed mothers of veterans should be increased at the same rate as widows' pensions were. As the principle was recognized in the first place I cannot see any logical reason for not continuing it.

The matter of war veterans allowances has been probably the most contentious in the field of veterans affairs during this session of parliament. All of us realize that the special committee on veterans affairs had very limited responsibilities. It considered only certain legislation proposed by the government, and its activities could not extend beyond that. When the various government bills referred to this special committee were being considered evidence was heard from various veterans bodies, and from others; and inevitably, of course, the matter of war veterans allowances did creep in. My recollection is that at one time or another most members of the committee expressed the view that war veterans allowances should be increased, or that they were sympathetic toward such increases.

I agreed thoroughly with the remarks this afternoon of the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he said that the activities of this special committee should not have been hamstrung from the start, and that a standing committee on veterans affairs should be established. I hope this will be done at the next session of parliament.

However a most interesting situation arose when the hon. member for Royal, if I may coin a phrase, tried to "unhamstring" the activities of this particular committee. The hon. member made a motion which, in effect, attempted to enlarge the activities of the committee, in which he suggested that parliament be requested to change the terms of reference of the committee so that the subject of war veterans allowances could be considered. It was interesting to note that all government members on the committee as well as two members from one of the other parties to my left voted against this request.

Mr. Philpott: May I ask a question? That is not right, at all. The government members voted to uphold the ruling of the chairman, who had dealt with points of order for about two hours, and gave a ruling showing how the amendment was clearly out of order. In view of the fact that we had expressed our hearty support of what the thing was supposed to be doing, I think everybody understood exactly what the score was.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member for Vancouver South said he wished to ask a question. I would like to know what his question is.

Mr. Philpott: Was not the vote to which the hon. member referred a vote to uphold the ruling of the chair, and not on the substance about which the hon. member is talking.

Mr. Nesbitt: The vote certainly was to uphold the ruling of the chair; that is true. But in effect what was being voted on was a motion by the hon. member for Royal to request parliament to extend the activities of the committee. And I believe the hon. member for Vancouver South knows perfectly well that that was the effect of the motion. It is true of course that from a technical point of view we were voting to uphold or to reject the ruling of the chairman. In effect however what happened was what I have just mentioned.

In his remarks this afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver South referred to an earlier motion by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard with respect to war veterans allowances, and which members of the government party from British Columbia were prepared to support. The motion was ruled out of order at that time. The only observation I have to make is that when it was ruled out of order I failed to understand why the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard did not appeal the chairman's ruling, which he was entitled to do, and which the hon. member for Royal actually did when his motion was ruled out of order. However all these facts are available to hon. members, and I can see no point in continuing the discussion further. Everybody who reads the report of the special committee on veterans affairs can see what occurred; but I just mention this in passing. It seems strange to me that some hon. members, who I am sure were genuinely sympathetic—in fact I think most members of the committee, if not all, were generally sympathetic—to war veterans allowances, failed to act in this matter when the opportunity to do so arose.

In their brief to the government the Legion set out clearly, concisely and reasonably the reasons why they felt war veterans allowances should be raised from $50 a month to $60 a month for a single man and from $90 a month to $120 a month for a married person; and also that the ceiling on permissive income should be raised. I believe the amount suggested was from $750 to $1,200 for a single person and from $1,200 to $2,000 for a married person. It is my understanding, and I am open to correction on this by the minister, that the suggestions made by the Legion would cost about $3 million a year, which does not seem to be a very extravagant amount. I am quite sure that most citizens would not object to paying another $3 million a year to help our older burnt-out veterans.

In his budget speech this year the Minister of Finance announced that owing to certain tax reductions there would be a decrease of $36 million a year in income. Without going into details, these tax reductions were brought about by the removal of taxes on fishing rods, golf clubs, electrical appliances, perfume, pinball machines and things of that sort. I do not think there is a citizen in Canada who would object to having taxes to the extent of $3 million remain on pinball machines, perfumes, golf clubs and so on, if some of our older veterans who are not able to support themselves could be paid the war veterans allowance. For that reason I feel that it certainly should have been considered by the government.

Of course there are many sad individual cases of people who need increases in war veterans allowances, and one could cite them at great length. To illustrate the fact that I honestly believe that war veterans allowances ought to be increased, I should like to read a section, and only a section, of a letter that I received recently. The writer of this letter is a Mrs. A. Williams who resides at rural route No. 1, Drumbo, Ontario. I shall quote only the pertinent parts of the letter. They are as follows:

> There is, however, one thing of interest to me, that of the veterans allowance. As a receiver of this allowance, I would at this time like to explain, if I may be permitted a little of your time, that the general public are wrongly informed of this. A while ago great write-ups in the news that the veterans were getting an increase (33⅓ per cent) in their pensions. This covered all pensioners whether receiving $100 or $20 pensions, this they did. Then more write-ups that the government were increasing the veterans allowance from $40 to $50 single men and from $60 to $90 for married. Naturally the public were under the impression, the vets were being exceptionally well cared for. I am just one of many, but would like to explain just how this worked in our case. In 1950 my husband, unable to work, applied for the veterans allowance. He was receiving a small pension of $28. When the inspector found that I couldn't work either, owing to a heart condition, they allowed him $66.66, which they said was the maximum, making our total $94.66 per month. In 1952 they gave the 33⅓ per cent increase and then the increase in veterans allowance. So we receive $34 pension now and $66 veterans allowance (66 cents less veterans allowance), making now $100 per month, but where do they get a raise in veterans allowance? Naturally the public figured we received an extra $30 on top of the $60 we were already receiving, which if it really were so, would only be $130 per month. I am sure there are many others like us, and we trust this matter will soon be passed in the house, for I assure you it is most difficult to manage with taxes, insurance and living, etc., increasing and no increase in income to cover same.

Without taking up any more time, may I say I have no doubt that other examples will be cited during the remarks this evening. I should like to mention one further matter. I am sure the government is aware of the fact that most of the recipients of war veterans allowance are not young men. They are men of 50, some are getting close to 60 and others are also getting close to the time when they should receive old age pensions. In view of the fact, as has already been pointed out, that many of these people are passing away, and passing away rapidly, the government should bring down legislation, if at all possible this session, and if not at this session at the beginning of the next session, to increase the war veterans allowances, as has been recommended by the Canadian Legion.

This matter was not lightly gone into by the Canadian Legion. They have looked into it very carefully, and I cannot see that in any way the requests of the government are unreasonable. The request of the Legion should be given most careful consideration and legislation along these lines should be brought down as soon as possible before any more of these burnt-out veterans pass away.

Mr. McIvor: I have just a few words to say. We should give credit where credit is due. The government has done a fine job in helping the young men of the second world war. Many of us know young men who had not completed their education but who had hopes of doing so, and when the war broke out everything went by the board and they went overseas. The way in which these young men were sent back to school is an outstanding epic in the history of Canada. Some of them graduated in arts; some of them graduated in law and medicine. It is a credit to the government, but it is no more than the young men deserve.

I have had a little to do with the present Minister of Veterans Affairs. In the last ten years I have spent some weeks in Maniwaki, P.Q. There was a veteran there of the first war, an outstanding bushman who knew bush work, who was a specialist. When the second war broke out he was practically told by the enlisting officer that he was not doing his duty unless he used his gifts to head up men in the forestry battalion. He went. Eight years ago I advised him to get a pension. He was not fit to work. He could not hold his job. But there was a streak of independence in him which would not allow me to help him get his pension. Not six months ago he was unfit to work and was not able to take care of himself. I placed his case before the minister and he was received into hospital. He is now getting a pension which was his due. It is a credit to the minister.

I would like to add my tribute to the land settlement committee for the work it has done. I recommended a farm to the land settlement committee at Fort William. I took the man's word for it that it was fit to support a man, his wife and family. The committee then asked me to go out and see the farm for myself. There was a fine house on the farm, good stables, and some equipment, but it amounted to only 40 acres. That farmer did not sell his farm to the credit of the land settlement committee. Of course, I lost a friend, or perhaps he was a friend. The land settlement committee has done a fine job and it is too bad it was not permitted to do the same kind of job after the second world war.

I heartily support the plea for an increase in the war veterans allowance. These men have given their best and they are not the men they were when they went overseas. They deserve the best this country can give. I also support the plea made on behalf of veterans who have reached the age of 60 and who served in a theatre of war; I do not think there should be a means test in their case when they reach the age of 60.

When I was home at Easter I spoke to a man who had four Christmas dinners in the trenches. You can visualize that man now with his feet all wet, sleeping in his clothes, with no comforts, and not knowing when he would be called across the river Jordan. I think we can rely on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to see to it that our veterans get a pension without a means test at the age of 60.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not see any reason why the veterans affairs committee should not be appointed permanently, because it is practically always the same members who serve on that committee. It is a very important committee and I just wish to say that I appreciate the services of the chairman. I also appreciate the services of the chairman of the pension board for the treatment given veterans at the lakehead—when I have presented cases for their consideration. I have failed in only one case, and cases are brought to my attention almost weekly.

I remember one case in particular—and I hope to revive it again—concerning a man who was in the first world war. One doctor, who was a specialist in his own line but who was not a soldiers' doctor, found he had shrapnel in his liver and being a Scotsman he went to work when he was not fit and finally had to be taken to the hospital. That man never got a pension and after a little while he passed on. In addition, his widow never received a pension and I hope some day that that woman will be treated as she ought to be.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who was very glad the government finally responded to the pleas of members of the house in regard to the setting up of a special committee on veterans affairs this year. Once again I wish to associate myself with other hon. members who not only this year but throughout the years have suggested that this committee should be a standing committee of the house which could deal with the rapidly changing circumstances we meet from day to day which in turn call for a regular review of veterans legislation each year. Such a committee would give the veterans' organizations an opportunity to appear before it and bring to the attention of the committee the changes which may be necessary to make legislation more effective and serve veterans and their dependents to better advantage.

Before continuing I must say that the chairman of the committee in general did a good job indeed. All the members of the committee expressed that view before the committee concluded and I wish to say, in connection with the votes on the disputed amendment, that he is to be congratulated on doing his homework. I expressed my appreciation before and I might add here that he took a very long time to explain the reasons for his decision, he was very fair indeed in connection with the votes, records and conduct of the proceedings.

The committee did very good work on the four bills which were brought before it. I am not going to deal with them now at length. There were some very helpful amendments to the Canadian Pension Act, the War Service Grants Act, the Veterans Benefit Act. In dealing with these bills I know all the members of the committee appreciated the assistance given by the officials of the department.

I might add at this point that we are not criticizing the administration's officers. We are not criticizing their administration when dealing with the estimates. We are dealing with the question of legislation and criticizing the government on that score. In my opinion, and I think I am expressing the views of the members of the committee, the administration of our veterans legislation is in excellent hands so far as the officials are concerned and here I am referring to the Canadian pension commission and the war veterans allowance board and all the other administrative officers. I am sure the members of the committee appreciate the work they are doing to give effect to the will of parliament.

What we are trying to do this evening is to get the government to improve that legislation. As we have said before, we have excellent veterans legislation and I think without question it is the best in the world. But, as one hon. member said previously, that is not the sole standard. We should give what the Canadian nation can afford and within that amount do the best we can for veterans and their dependents. That is why we are urging certain amendments to the legislation this evening.

Before leaving the question of the four bills dealt with in the committee I wish to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Acadia with regard to an amendment to the Veterans Land Act. Generally speaking the amendments provided a great improvement in the act and will be of benefit to large numbers of veterans in Canada who have been unable to obtain satisfactory sites for home building under the present legislation. There are two points in particular on which I wish to support the hon. member. We are very sorry that the administration of a certain section of the act, after the preliminary work is done, is to come under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Not that we are critical of that corporation, but the Veterans Land Act administration has a good record on behalf of veterans all across the country, and I am quite certain that the veterans of this country who are taking advantage of that act, or desire to take advantage of it, would prefer to come under the direct, efficient, and fair administration of the officials in charge of the Veterans Land Act administration.

I would like also to support the hon. member for Acadia with respect to his criticism of the increase in the interest rate. Now, the committee was helped a great deal by the representations made by the various national organizations, namely, the Canadian Legion, the British Empire Service League, the National Council of Veterans, the Canadian non-pensioned veterans widows and the Canadian merchant navy veterans association. Before passing on I want to say that I think it is only fair to express some admiration for the very valiant little body of widows who come to Ottawa once a year to present their views to the committee or, if the committee is not sitting, to the minister, his officials, or various members of parliament.

I shall always have the great distinction, Mr. Chairman, of having been the chairman of an unofficial veterans affairs committee called together by government and opposition members at which these ladies made their representations last session. I think at the time the minister was somewhat concerned about what was going on. One of the dear old ladies said to me, "What shall we do?" She said, "We want to have our say". Others said, "We have briefs". I said, "Do not turn up with a brief in your hands; keep it in your handbag. If Colonel Brooks asks if you have any representations to make, you can pull it out and make your representations". Everything went off very well indeed in that unofficial committee. I think these women all deserve a great deal of credit for having an interest in this question. I know they have been of assistance to the minister's officials on occasion because of their close association with veterans and their dependents in necessitous circumstances.

The Legion, as usual, made its excellent representation. I think all members of the committee would agree that the Legion has made a great contribution towards the development of veterans legislation in this country. I am sure that is a view that is accepted by all members of the committee. The record of the Legion proves that it has always had a sense of responsibility which included their responsibility to the veterans and their dependents in this country and as well their responsibility to the Canadian people, the taxpayers of Canada. On that account I think their representations are listened to with particular care. Whether people say so or not, they recognize that the Canadian Legion do not make representations to the cabinet, to the veterans affairs committee or to any other persons unless they are based on extremely strong grounds indeed. That is the foundation of the representations made to date.

The Legion came before this committee after making representations to the cabinet early in November. Certain officials of the Legion came before this committee and made further representations and they made an exceedingly helpful submission indeed. They dealt particularly with the necessity for an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act to increase the amount payable to single people to $60 a month and to married persons to $120 and to raise the permissive income.

I said that the Legion has a strong sense of responsibility. We all recognize that fact. They do not ask for something that the people of Canada cannot afford to pay or for something that is not badly needed. In addition to that consideration, the fact that their representations express the opinions of the rank and file and of many people in Canada is indicated by the resolutions that members of the House of Commons have received, not only from Legion branches—which is to be expected—and other veterans organizations but from women's organizations, from chambers of commerce and from other community organizations who recognize the need for some assistance to the veterans at this time, as well as letters from their own constituencies. I am sure every member of this committee has received a continuing correspondence which indicates the need for amendment of the legislation. The hon. member for Vancouver South, when speaking this afternoon, indicated the need by mentioning certain facts. I think he mentioned the fact that one old veteran had committed suicide by gassing himself.

Mr. Herridge: More than one, the hon. member says. He also mentioned that their papers and correspondence indicated that the major cause of their trouble was economic, in that they could not exist on the present war veterans allowance.

Then there are the newspaper editorials. When you find large daily and weekly papers throughout Canada supporting the plea of the veterans, not on one occasion but repeatedly, there must be some extremely sound grounds for the representations of the Legion and for the representations that members of the house have made for amendment of the War Veterans Allowance Act. Newspapers try to reflect public opinion and, in order to maintain a certain popularity, to express in editorials and news items opinions that reflect what the people are thinking in the areas which they serve.

Before concluding I want to deal briefly with one editorial and to indicate the situation in British Columbia. I know that British Columbia is a bit of a thorn in the side of the minister and some members of the government with respect to veterans affairs but that is because the British Columbia people are the most progressive people in Canada. They are always looking ahead, and seeking improvements.

Mr. Brooks: Modest people.

Mr. Herridge: I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I was pleased to be associated with the hon. member for Royal in doing the things the people of Canada want us to do in this respect.

Here is an editorial from the Vancouver News-Herald of Wednesday morning, May 12. It is headed: "'Burned Out' Veterans Living in Squalor; will Ottawa continue to be Callous?" Then we have another one here dated May 20—which shows that it is a current issue in British Columbia—which is headed: "In Their Time of Need, Ottawa Fails the Men who gave all but Life for Nation". Then there is another editorial of a subsequent date in similar vein. But I want to read this small news item which is headed: "Burned Out Vets Get Help Offers". I may say that this is from the News-Herald of May 20 of this year. It reads as follows:

The News-Herald is being flooded daily with calls from Vancouver citizens interested in the plight of "burned out" veterans, telling of tragic cases or offering help.

The offers, from people in all walks of life, are only a drop in the bucket when one considers there are 10,000 men and women in Vancouver being forced to live on the $50 a month granted "Old Sweats" by the Veterans Allowance Act.

They cannot all be helped privately. Many will be forced to continue their pitiful existence: People like Fred B.

Fred is 61 and an accountant. Out of his $50 pension cheque he has 17 cents to keep him until the end of the month.

"I don't want charity from the government or anyone else," Fred maintains. "I want a job. Surely there is some place where my experience and ability would be valuable.

All the veterans allowance does for me is to keep me alive so that I can suffer the pangs of hunger over a long period and worry myself ill.

When the government can find time to discuss and endorse the raising of politicians' salaries,—"

I agree with that.

"—you'd think they could spare a little time to consider the plight of men and women in positions similar to my own.

When an election comes around we are the people. We are voters, 'loyal constituents,' the hand of friendship is held out. Once the owner of that hand is elected he proceeds to use it to pat his fellow party members on the back or to wave us aside as he says, 'Sorry, can't worry about you burned out bums this session.'"

We are extremely anxious to see something done about these unfortunate comrades this session. One could go on and read endlessly letters and news items that indicate the plight that many veterans and their dependents are suffering at the present time.

When we came to discuss this matter in the veterans affairs committee many of us realized that a unanimous resolution was adopted by the special parliamentary committee on veterans affairs in 1952 urging action on the war veterans allowance, that nothing was done to increase the over-all allowance for all who are entitled to receive war veterans allowance in Canada but only certain minor adjustments were made which were of benefit to the persons concerned. But even those adjustments are totally inadequate under present conditions. We felt that the Legion's representations to the committee—we had full knowledge of the situation as had all members of the House of Commons—further emphasized the need.

Because we know of the situation in the country, we felt that something should be done this session, and we felt that something should be done because the government has said "No". I do not believe in lying down when the government says "No". I believe that that is the time to start working all the harder. I am convinced that the work of the members of the House of Commons in connection with this legislation will finally produce results. Because the government said "No" to this crying need on the part of veterans and their dependents in Canada, the hon. member for Royal moved his resolution urging that a recommendation be included in our report that the house extend the terms of reference of the veterans affairs committee—

Mr. Gillis: That was not it at all. The hon. member wants to be correct on that point. That was the motion that the hon. member for Royal moved. The hon. member for Royal moved that the committee would go back to the house in order to have the terms of reference extended.

Mr. Herridge: That is just what I am saying.

Mr. Gillis: That is not what the hon. member said.

Mr. Brooks: Oh, yes.

Mr. Herridge: Pardon me; that is exactly what I said, namely that it be included in the report made to the house to ask the house to extend our terms of reference.

Mr. Brooks: Exactly.

Mr. Gillis: No, Mr. Chairman. Of course the chairman should be correct in this. There was already before the committee a report suggesting that very thing, namely, that the government give further consideration to the matter of the war veterans allowance and the merchant services. The motion of the hon. member for Royal had no reference at all to the report that the chairman had already read to the committee.

Mr. Brooks: I want to correct the hon. member, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gillis: I am correcting him now.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member needs to be corrected also, because there was no report before the committee at all.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Royal just made a political motion; that is all.

Mr. Brooks: I object to that. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has supported these so-called political moves at every meeting of the veterans affairs committee. My motion was not political. As I pointed out there, if there was anything to be gained by playing politics the government would be the first to play politics and the first gainers would be the veterans. We had nothing to gain at all. The hon. member says that it was a political move, but may I say that time and time again since 1940 he has supported motions of the same kind in the veterans affairs committee. It is said that the hon. member is looking for a senatorship, and it has been noted that he has been showing more consideration for the government, especially in the veterans affairs committee, than he ever showed before.

Mr. Gillis: The only suggestion I ever heard about a senatorship came from the communist press, and it would seem that my hon. friend is trying to help his own party by using their smear tactics in the house.

Mr. Harkness: Anybody who says you are using smear tactics is using smear tactics himself.

Mr. Gillis: I am more interested in getting something for the veteran.

Mr. Brooks: You did not show it in the committee.

Mr. Gillis: The motion of the hon. member for Royal was an impossibility and he knew it.

Mr. Brooks: I did not know it.

Mr. Gillis: I was interested in getting a report back to the house that said something about the matter rather than having six or seven opposition members vote for something that would have no effect whatsoever.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was just dealing with the historic sequence of the motion moved by the hon. member for Royal prior to any report being made by the committee. I am not going to outline that any further.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, if the matter is in doubt I think that exactly what did happen should perhaps be put before the house. The draft report, which was drawn up by myself at the suggestion of several members of the committee, was before the committee and it was finally adopted in exactly the same form. It appears in volume No. 14 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the veterans affairs committee. The draft report was before the committee and it recited the fact that representations had been made urging changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act to raise the amount of allowance payable thereunder and also to raise the level of permissive income. We recommended that the government give sympathetic consideration to such submissions. To that there was an amendment moved that we ask for an extension of our terms of reference so that we could consider the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Gillis: At this session.

Mr. Tucker: The argument of the hon. member who has just spoken was to the effect that even if we got the terms of reference extended we could not make a stronger recommendation than we were proposing to make and he suggested that if we endorsed the report unanimously it would be much better than passing a resolution to extend the terms of reference. That is exactly what the hon. member for Cape Breton South pointed out.

Mr. Brooks: Did the hon. member who has just spoken say that my motion was an amendment to the report? It was not an amendment to the report at all. It was moved before the report was considered.

Mr. Tucker: The draft report had been handed to the members of the committee.

Mr. Brooks: The motion was made before that time.

Mr. Tucker: Then the motion was made by the hon. member after that draft report was before the committee.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank the chairman of the special committee for the information he has given. That is exactly what I was explaining. I have a pretty good idea what happens in the committee and what goes on, and I am simply mentioning—

Mr. Gillis: You were away for most of it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Cape Breton South said that I was away for most of it.

Mr. Gillis: That is right.

Mr. Herridge: I am never away from the house or a committee unless I am ill or on some official duty. I was away from a few meetings on account of having to open an airport in my constituency, and I regretted having to be away at that time. Possibly the hon. member means on that account I overlooked some of the discussion.

Mr. Gillis: That is right.

Mr. Herridge: That may be right, but anyway my point is that the hon. member for Royal moved this motion and we saw fit to support it because it asked for action this session. I am not going into the question of the chairman's ruling or anything else, and I am not going to deal with that point further because what we are anxious to do is to get some action on the part of the government to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act. It is the sense of urgency and the need that caused members to urge action at this session.

Mr. Brooks: You do not get it by lying down to the government either.

Mr. Herridge: No. The time is short. These old veterans are getting older and older. They are dropping off and many of them will not have the opportunity to receive the benefits of the legislative amendments that are required. That is why we fought for action at this session to increase the amount to $60 for a single veteran and $120 for a married veteran and to raise the permissive income, and we will continue to fight on behalf of our less fortunate comrades. This afternoon an hon. member suggested a figure of $3 million. I am not sure whether that is correct, but whether it is $3 million, $4 million or $15 million what a pitiful little sum it is out of our total production and wealth that is required to make happier the lives of these veterans and their dependents for whom we are fighting tonight and will continue to fight. They have not many more years to live, but I trust the government will take action soon so that many of them will enjoy the benefits of the legislation for which we are asking.

Miss Bennett: Mr. Chairman, I have been rather late in making remarks in the house but sometimes it is better to be late than a little too early. I am very happy that the first remarks I make rather extemporaneously should be with respect to the veterans of this country and in connection with a subject that is very close to our hearts. It has really done me a great deal of good to see how the house has considered these matters before it and the importance that various hon. members have placed on the subject that we are discussing.

In listening to the hon. members who have spoken one point comes to my mind that I do not think has been raised and it has to do with veterans pensions and allowances as they concern dependent parents. We have been speaking of the pensioners themselves and of their widows, and I should like to say a few words about dependent parents. What I am going to say arises out of my own experience with two cases that have come to my attention within the last few months. Not long ago a mother came to me whose son had been killed in the first world war. Over the years she has been receiving a pension of $40 a month on behalf of her deceased son. She became eligible for the old age pension and received the pension. In due course she was notified that she would no longer be eligible for the pension awarded her under the veterans legislation. That was a very great hardship because I think the understanding is that the old age pension comes as something extra, something to help men and women to have a little extra in life.

The effect of not raising the exemption for veterans and the allowances they are permitted to have before the pension is taken away from them is really to penalize the veterans, and I think we are also penalizing the parents because we are making it a penalty to receive the old age pension.

It is fundamental that the minister and the government should consider this question and place it in its proper perspective. I believe the parents of sons who have gone overseas, and who have not returned, people who have given everything they have to this country, are still entitled to receive the reimbursement for the actions of their sons and daughters, and at the same time should be entitled to the pension every other man and place it in its proper prospective. I country receives. On behalf of these parents I ask that this matter be given consideration by the minister and by this government.

Mr. Hosking: I do not intend to take up very much of the time of the committee this evening, but there is one point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. It concerns the bachelor who has earned rehabilitation credits, but because of the regulation controlling these rehabilitation credits finds it impossible to draw them. If a person has no dependents, it is not much satisfaction for him to take out insurance that can be paid only at his death or at a time when he is so old it is not of much value. If he is living in a boarding house there is nothing that he can buy for which he could use his re-establishment credit. If he is not working at a job where he requires an automobile or some other equipment necessary for the job, he cannot spend the credit on that.

There must be some people who are in a position where they cannot draw their re-establishment credits. I would think that at this time it would be proper, when most of the veterans have re-established themselves, that those who have not used their re-establishment credits and who cannot draw them by reason of the regulations, should be permitted to use those credits to purchase a 20-year endowment insurance policy. A change could be made in the regulations to permit the veteran to do this. Then, he would have this money, along with some more he might have added to it, upon which to draw. I would sincerely recommend to the minister that for the sake of the veterans who are entitled to re-establishment credits, and who have been unable to draw them, a change should be made in the regulations.

[Miss Bennett.]

Mr. Hahn: I was pleased to see that the Department of Veterans Affairs saw fit to change so many of the acts applying to veterans at this session. This gave veterans an opportunity to take advantage of the improvements in these acts. I am pleased also to see that we have such a stalwart in the person of the hon. member for Fort William, who is so interested in helping people. I believe we could all say it does not matter who it is; he is always ready to assist the war veterans or anyone else out of his great generosity. I should like to say that I hope the government itself will endorse some of the things he advocates, and that he can get a little closer to the heart of the government so that we can get a little more for these war veterans who are on allowances. For a few moments I was afraid we were going to hear the truth about the truth about the truth about the War Veterans Allowance Act, similar to what we heard in connection with the wheat situation a few days ago. However, we finally got that straightened out, and the facts were put properly by the chairman of the committee.

I am not a member of the veterans affairs committee, and therefore have a possibly somewhat different point of view in connection with this War Veterans Allowance Act. I am the representative of the New Westminster riding which probably, on a per capita basis, has a greater number of recipients of war veterans allowance than any other riding in the dominion. There are approximately 9,200 war veterans in the province of British Columbia who come under that act. I would say that represents about a quarter of the total in all of Canada. Because of the fact we have a fine climate and everything that goes with it on the lower mainland, most of them apparently have settled in my particular riding. The hon. member for Fraser Valley says the same is true of his riding.

Possibly I should take a moment or two to draw your attention to the history of this particular subject, but I do not believe it is necessary. All of us are familiar with how the resolution was introduced, how everyone tried to take part in the debate and how we were stopped; how the terms of reference were limited and the matter was referred to the committee for study. We were all very frustrated by the thought we were not going to be able to do anything for the war veterans before the estimates came down, and such proved to be the case.

Then some hon. members, including myself, gave notice of a resolution asking that this question of the burnt-out pensioners be raised. The purpose behind such a resolution—I am not going to discuss it at any length—was to draw the attention of the government to this problem in the hope that if they did not do something this year they would do something next year. I will not be like the hon. member for Assiniboia and sit down, but if the government will promise to do something about the matter I shall remove my resolution from the order paper tomorrow.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, presented a resolution along similar lines to the veterans affairs committee. I would have you note that they are members of the party that is in power. I might say there were literally dozens of people in this house who, during the throne speech debate, indicated the desirability of increasing the war veterans allowance. Now, because of the fact that the terms of reference to the veterans affairs committee were so limited, there was a great deal of disappointment expressed amongst three groups of people particularly; members of parliament, the war veterans themselves, and the people of Canada as a whole. The members of parliament were somewhat disappointed because every party in this house has indicated from time to time that they wanted an increase in that allowance. The veterans themselves felt that they were not "off the beam", and that they were not asking too much in their brief.

The fact is that they had been assured during the recent election campaign that everything would be done to institute these particular claims. Many of the claims were endorsed by members of the Liberal party in British Columbia. I must say that those gentlemen had the decency to stand up and reiterate those requests. The people of Canada do feel quite badly about this. They feel, and I would number myself amongst the group, that we have broken faith to a large degree with the war veterans. We have promised them something in the way of assistance for the past two years, and they are still looking for it.

This government has been frank in telling the veterans when they first came there would be nothing for them. As a result of that each one of us was deluged with a large number of letters asking that we entreat the government to take another look. I am sure the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs received the same letters and telegrams, or copies of them, that were received in my office. And still the answer was, no. Some of the letters read: We do not have enough food. Or they might read: We have enough food and enough money for taxes and utilities, but we have nothing left to buy clothing. The story is a difficult one, and I received telegrams from every branch of the Legion in my riding—and there are 8 of them. I am sure every branch in Canada must have sent telegrams to the minister asking him to help them get this allowance.

Why did not the minister entertain the question, or take another look at it? Was it a question as to whether the government could afford to spend $3 million? Well, the answer is this: Can we afford democracy? In many instances these men, while they did not give their lives, most certainly were willing to do so if need be. Yet, at their request, apparently we are not willing to give them a decent living.

I do not want to go into the gruesome details about suicide, and the like, which have been mentioned. But that is some indication of the need. The question could be asked: What can we give? There, again, they were willing to give their lives. What prayers did the people of this country offer when the Germans were standing at the gates of Paris? The people were ready to give practically anything so long as the boys would stand there and either hold the line or push the enemy back. Those men were not found wanting; but apparently now we, as a parliament, are found wanting. Perhaps I should not say "parliament"; I should say the government. I know parliament would endorse this plea if hon. members were given the privilege to vote upon it.

In connection with the problem one must keep in mind that there are several different types of veterans, each of which must be dealt with on his own merits. I should like to read to the committee two brief articles appearing in issues of Corps-Vet, a magazine published in New Westminster. I suggest these articles will indicate to some degree the nature of the problem in my riding. I know the minister is familiar with some of the facts, but I do not think he knows all of them. There is one of which I would ask him to take particular notice—because we have many grave problems there. The article to which I shall refer first is written by J. H. Thompson, who is secretary-manager of the New Westminster Legion. If I were to give him a title I would call him Mr. Canadian Legion. This article is headed "Jungle Town", and states:

> As we go to press the population of our little known "Jungle Town" thrives with activity—or perhaps I should say, inactivity. The inhabitants are a motley bunch—human flotsam—who at the first hint of winter's snow hit the road for the Pacific coast. Here, along the dikes of the Fraser river, they share their frugal and miserable existence with the old-timers who have been established for many years in the area. They are the personification of the seedy side of our enlightened race.

Some are alcoholics who, in a few short years, become winos and rubby-dubs—the drinkers of extract and shaving lotion. Others are ex-convicts, petty thieves or just plain deadbeats—while a small minority are simply broke with no place to turn for assistance. From November to March they live in near animal fashion in shanties built from tar paper and box wood—many without the luxury of a floor while the river provides their plumbing and fuel supply.

Through necessity they share their worldly wealth—which is food and wine. Forage parties are on the prowl every day—some depend on the more simple and direct method of begging coins from citizens on the street—others line up at the welfare agencies for a small grocery order. If the "loot" for the day is good, some of the groceries are converted to cash for the purchase of wine and extracts and the celebration is on. A few days later they emerge from the shacks weak and exhausted—sick in body and mind—then the cycle starts all over.

You might well ask—"Who are these characters? Where do they come from? Have they always been misfits in our way of life? and What are the authorities doing about it?"

Each and every one has a story to tell—sordid—but human nevertheless. Many came from good homes—others from the tenement and skidrow districts of our Canadian cities. To the vast majority the key that opened this depraved life for them was alcohol—and yet we know that each and every one of these derelicts who allowed alcohol to ruin their lives, did so for a reason. We do know that close to forty per cent of Jungle Towners are veterans. A few years ago the veterans from world war II in this category were exceptional, now they outnumber the old diehards.

This problem is, and will remain, a challenge, not only to the authorities but to the legion. After two world wars we realize only too well how messy wars can get—and it's not all on the battlefield. No two humans will react to warfare in a like manner—some can go through it and become readjusted to normal peacetime living without any trouble—others may take years to become rehabilitated.

I shall not read further, but I believe placing this article on the record has served a useful purpose. Some years ago veterans of world war II were the exception in Jungle Town, whereas today 40 per cent of them are veterans. Certainly they are there in greater numbers than the diehards. This article appeared in the issue of February, 1954. Then I would quote the following article from the issue of June, 1954. It is headed "Too Little", and states:

Charlie had served his country well—perhaps too well—for in so doing the effect of battle fatigue through two major wars had taken its toll . . . Charlie and his wife found they were obliged to exist and raise their young family of four youngsters on the war veterans allowance.

In desperation, like many more in this low income group, they moved their few worldly possessions from the city to a small acreage in the country where land was cheap and taxes low . . . and where a small garden and a few chickens can do wonders to fill the tummies of four growing youngsters. With the small nest egg he had somehow managed to set aside, a small two room shack was laboriously erected. Charlie was no carpenter and his health was rapidly becoming a problem. However, necessity won out and at last they had a roof over their heads.

From this humble beginning they planned and tried to save every odd penny to enlarge their home—sleeping six in a small bedroom left much to be desired. Finally by scrounging and more sacrifice the long planned-for addition was started and the frame work erected and then fate once again stepped into the picture.

I should add that this man was one of the war veterans who would be entitled to an increase in the war veterans allowance. He went on to try to complete the building of this shack, but failed. He could not do it himself. It was a case of the Legion stepping in to help. The article goes on to say:

As we go to press the job of rebuilding their home is completed but for many months—perhaps years—our service bureau will be giving this family a friendly and helping hand . . .Charlie has finally answered the last roll call and passed on to a more pleasant and peaceful life.

This man tried to help himself. He is the fellow we should be interested in, and we should be interested in him right in this parliament; to assist him in every way, shape and form to become a citizen who wants to continue to feel that Canada has not let him down.

These men could not come to Ottawa. They sent their emissary, and the emissary has had to go back and say, "The job was not accomplished. It was not completed, so far as war veterans allowances are concerned." That is the part that those veterans are particularly interested in. I would tell this government, which has been so often aptly likened to the ostrich, which has so large a body and has so little sight, that it has denied us the privilege of discussing this vital question until the dying days of this session. We are justified in saying that this question should have been brought to the attention of the house when we asked for it, and it should have been discussed earlier.

So far as the increase itself is concerned, it may be argued from time to time that it is supposed to be equivalent to the old age pension, it is supposed to take its place. I point out to the minister that in Alberta and in British Columbia today the old age pensioner, if he is that destitute, is entitled to $40 plus $15 a month, or $55 a month, which is more than we are giving to our war veterans, the men who helped to defend our country.

In connection with these other items, I heartily endorse the idea that the permissive income should be increased. I do not understand just exactly why there is a ceiling on the permissive income. It may be possible to explain it, and I should like to hear the explanation. I shall be glad to listen to it. It should be increased from what it is today to $1,200 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man, which is barely sufficient to keep body and soul together when one can receive such a low permissive income.

One other question has been raised, namely, the eligibility of the imperial war veteran who has married a Canadian. I have a case in mind of an imperial war veteran who married a Newfoundland girl quite a number of years ago following the first war. This particular man has lived on and off in Canada and in Newfoundland. He has also been in the United States, but he has not been here for the full 20-year period and therefore he is not eligible, even though his wife is a Canadian by birth. I do not think that that is quite playing the game. The reason for the man to come to Canada originally was that he wanted to be a Canadian. I think the 20-year period is too long. Other instances were pointed out earlier. A widow does not become eligible because her husband may have died before he had put in the 20-year period, and therefore she never becomes eligible even though she may be a Canadian by birth.

In conclusion I should like to summarize my suggestions as follows: First, increase the allowance as requested by the Legion to $60 and $120 respectively, second the permissive ceiling should be increased; third, make the Canadian imperial war veterans of world war I eligible for the burnt-out pension and the allowance before they have resided here 20 years; I would say that possibly 10 years is sufficient; fourth, a permanent committee on veterans affairs should be set up.

I see no reason for not setting up a permanent committee on veterans affairs. I do not believe anyone does. This problem has to do with war veterans allowances. Those are not all the veterans problems we are going to have. There are many committees that we name each year that never meet. If we do not need to meet we will not meet. Certainly we should have a standing committee on veterans affairs.

My fifth suggestion is that this government take notice now of this problem and at the earliest possible date implement the increase in the allowances along the lines of the war veterans request. My final suggestion is that in future the committee be not hamstrung in its terms of reference because if it is set up for the purpose of discussing veterans affairs or any other affairs, let it discuss all of them.

Mr. Enfield: I do not want to let this opportunity pass, even at the risk of prolonging the debate a little, without paying tribute to those who were responsible and still are responsible for the administration of the Veterans Land Act. I had the pleasure of sitting on the veterans committee. It was my first committee, and I must say that I found it a most valuable experience. I think members of that committee were unanimous in their endorsation of the brief we had presented to us by the director of the Veterans Land Act, Brigadier Rutherford.

I would like to spend a few moments discussing that briefly. I am particularly interested in this because in my riding I have some 1,124 different small holders units constructed under this act, and it is a very vital part of York-Scarborough. There must have been some moments of anxiety when the Veterans Land Act was first introduced. It was said primarily to be a scheme to settle the veterans on the land, I think probably with tongue in cheek. Everyone knew that it also was a housing program, particularly in the metropolitan areas. In some cases, and perhaps in most, that is what it has really developed into. Of course problems arise in that connection when you get away from the original principle of an act. However, the act has been a tremendous success. We know that as of December 31, 1953 some 63,000 veterans were settled on holdings, either as full-time farmers or on small holdings in Canada.

The soundness of the scheme depended on two things. First, you had to have a well drawn and executed act, well administered, and, as I said, we have had unanimous endorsation in that regard. On the other hand, the other factor has been the veteran himself. In this regard we have found our veterans to be most industrious, most capable and most ingenious in utilizing the benefits given to them under this act. They literally carved themselves a home out of the wilderness in some cases. As I say, under the benefits of this act the veterans have really come through in a grand way, and I am happy to see that we are extending the benefits of the act. I hope we shall see many more veterans take advantage of the extended provision that we are providing under the new amended bill.

The figures in connection with the settlements under the act do make wonderful reading. We find that of the 63,000 who were settled under the act, only 114 have been put off owing to non-compliance with their original contract. Of 26,500 small holders, as of April 30, 1954, only 44 of them were in any way in arrears on their payments. I really do admire the veterans for the way they have carried out their part of the agreement. Only 44 out of 26,000, that is fewer than 2 per thousand, had in any way fallen into arrears in regard to the small holdings and payments on their mortgages.

As I say, in my riding I have 1,124 of these; in Willowdale, about 433, in Agincourt and Scarborough, about 372; and in Highland Creek 319. I have been out to these holdings several times, particularly in the Homeland subdivision in Scarborough, and hon. members would be very proud of the way these veterans have kept and developed their homes. They are men who work during the day. In some cases they have 2 acres, and in many cases one-half an acre; in any event, a large area of land. They have planted grass seed; they have developed gardens and they have really turned those areas into beauty spots. They deserve a great deal of credit. This is reflected in the increased value of the land. When the land was purchased the original cost was about $300 million. That was the estimated cost of the actual land when it was first purchased all across Canada, but the present estimate of the appraisers in the department is something more than $500 million. This, of course, is due to improvements made by the veterans and the natural increase in the value of land around metropolitan areas.

This brings up the problem that one finds in metropolitan areas. When you have land appreciating in value the interest and taxes on that land, or the municipal assessment increases, and in some cases the veterans have found it, I would not say hard but they have complained about the increase in municipal taxes on large holdings such as they have. However, I was pleased to note that during the last session the Ontario legislature amended the Ontario municipal act wherein it was provided that any municipality may pass a bylaw giving special consideration to veterans settled on these subdivisions in regard to municipal assessments and taxes. In that connection the townships of Scarborough and North York and in fact most other municipalities in metropolitan Toronto have taken action and the veterans find themselves assessed on something that is more like a rural assessment basis than the usual metropolitan rates, so that the problem has been partially overcome.

But the veterans, I understand, have been very fortunate in most cases around Toronto because the land values have increased so markedly that it has been possible for veterans to sell their complete holding and obtain enough money to help them out of their total indebtedness under the act. He can sell part of the holding if he does not require it, and that has been done. As a matter of fact, if this is done before the ten years expires under his contract the veteran finds in many cases that he gets such a good price for the land that he can cheerfully forgo the $1,400 additional grant to which he is entitled if he carries out the contract in full.

However, the surprising thing is that even under such circumstances, when the land is so valuable, the veteran has not been subdividing the land. That has been my experience. They are accustomed to living in these spacious and beautiful surroundings on which they have worked so hard, and it would be difficult, although the value of the land has skyrocketed, for them to give up this land even though by the sale of it they would be in an extremely good financial position. I think that shows a very good attitude on the part of the veterans.

As we all know, part II of the act now allows veterans to obtain assistance in building their own homes with a 10 per cent down payment either in cash or kind and the maximum amount of the loan under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is $8,000. I believe we will find a great many veterans taking advantage of this section of the act. There are many veterans who find themselves saddled with an expensive home and they will be able to sell that home and build their own home under part II of the act as long as it is approved by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They can take the equity out of the home they sell and put their own, shall we say, sweat, into building a home of their own and save $2,000, perhaps more, and so put themselves on a sound financial basis. I know that many veterans in Toronto have been looking forward to a scheme such as this. The important part of this scheme is the supervision and assistance they will receive in acting as their own contractors. This has proved very successful under the act so far. We have about 6,000 homes in Canada built entirely by veterans acting as their own contractors, and about 1,700 to 2,000 are under way at the present time.

I think we can depend on the veterans to make the new part II of the act work just as well as they made the old provision work under the old act, and I look forward to very many years of pleasant association with veterans in my own riding under this scheme. I want to pay tribute to Mr. Rutherford and his office staff for the manner in which they have carried out the provisions of the act. They have helped in no small measure to make it work successfully and I know they will carry on doing so.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the veterans affairs committee at this session did, I think we will all agree, a very good job on the bills which were submitted to it. I am not going to take up the time of the committee to go into what was done in regard to these bills, including the Veterans Land Act, except to say that we received an extremely good briefing in regard to the matter and an extremely good picture of what was done under the Veterans Land Act and what the officials hoped will be done in future.

As a result of the evidence made available to us by the various veterans organizations and by way of consultation with the members, I think we succeeded in dealing with the bills effectively. Amendments were made, I think, to all the bills which were presented to us and in fact there were quite a number of amendments to some of them. I think as a result of these amendments the legislation was considerably improved.

There were, however, a few deficiencies in the amendments to the Veterans Land Act which I am sorry to see the government did not correct. I agree with other hon. members who have already pointed out that the rate of interest should have been lowered and could have been made the same as on the small holdings and farms secured under the Veterans Land Act. I think the down payment for houses should be considerably lower in some cases. Under the present provision there is an inflexible down payment provision. I do not see any reason whatever to insist on that provision. The thing could have been made flexible to enable those veterans who wanted to build a home under the act to do so. If there had been a flexible down payment many more could have taken advantage of the act.

Now, the outstanding thing as far as veterans affairs are concerned this year, and the one thing above all others of interest to veterans, and on which they want something done, is a matter which we were not allowed to discuss and on which we were not allowed to make recommendations in committee. That is the matter of war veterans allowances. I think there is no question about the fact that the rate of the war veterans allowance should be increased and the amount of allowable income should be increased. That has been dealt with by a number of people and I am not going to go into the various reasons which could be advanced as to why this improvement is imperative. I would say that a large number of veterans receiving the war veterans allowance are not receiving enough to support themselves and they are having an extraordinarily difficult time. In many cases they are unable to get enough to eat after they have paid their rent and so forth. This is undoubtedly a situation which should not have been allowed to continue, though it appears the government is quite prepared to allow it to continue beyond this session.

The position in Alberta and British Columbia has already been mentioned. The amount of war veterans allowance vis-à-vis the old age pension is such that you have a situation, I am told, where a German soldier who fought against our troops in the first war is receiving more money under old age pension than the Canadian soldier who fought against him. I am told that in one case that situation actually exists, and it is a situation which can exist so far as quite a considerable number of people are concerned. Despite that the government has taken no action to correct the situation. Anyone who comes to this country and lives here for 20 years and reaches the age of 70, no matter from where he comes, qualifies as a citizen, and such a man is now in a better position in Alberta and British Columbia than is the veteran of the first war who, as I say, may have fought against those people in that war. This is a situation which naturally causes bitterness. How can you expect the people who fought for this country in the first war, when they hear of a situation such as this, to be anything but bitter about it, particularly when they themselves are, as I say, in some cases not receiving enough income to be able to get enough to eat, really.

During this debate the members of this party have been accused of playing politics in the matter of the war veterans allowance. I take grave exception to that accusation, whether it has been made directly, as I think it was in one case, or whether it has been put out by inference. The people who are playing politics in this matter are the people on the government side of the house. They are the people who are trying to play politics with regard to the matter. As a matter of fact, these members are saying that this thing must be corrected, that they would like to see the war veterans allowance increased and that they would like to see the allowable earnings increased and so forth but that there is nothing they can do about it as the government says "No."

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, some of the speeches I have heard in connection with this matter here in this chamber and in the committee appeared to me to be nothing else but sickening hypocrisy. I feel strongly on this matter. When people come out and say: Oh, yes; I am entirely in favour of increasing the war veterans allowance; I am entirely in favour of the Legion brief and so forth, and then demonstrate that belief by voting against every possible motion which would cause it to be implemented, then, as I say, it just does not add up.

The hon. member for Vancouver South, in speaking this afternoon, said he was delighted that the first speech he made in the house was in favour of the war veterans allowance and that this, which would be his last speech, was on the same subject, and that he gave his unqualified support to the Legion brief with regard to an increase in the war veterans allowance. He demonstrated his unqualified support of the Legion brief by voting against every motion in the House of Commons and every motion in the committee which could have implemented that Legion brief. That was how he demonstrated his unqualified support for this increase.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I strongly supported every practical motion in the House of Commons and I shall continue to demonstrate, as I have during long years past, my support of the cause to which my hon. friend has been so recently converted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: He was here long before you were.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is not a question of privilege; this is a speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I demand that the hon. member state his question of privilege or sit down.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member for Vancouver South was not even here.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am asking for a ruling. The hon. member is making a speech.

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member kindly allow the hon. member for Vancouver South to state his question of privilege?

Mr. Philpott: And in the veterans affairs committee on the day before I also upheld—

Mr. Rowe: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, what is the privilege?

Mr. Philpott: I strongly supported the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond in favour of raising the war veterans allowance.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is no question of privilege; it is a speech. I object very strongly.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Calgary North made the assertion that the hon. member for Vancouver South had voted in certain ways, as I heard the expression of the hon. member for Calgary North. The hon. member for Vancouver South quite properly rose and indicated how he voted.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, may I say that that is no question of privilege.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of fact. This is not any question of privilege or anything else. It is a question of fact. In the House of Commons we had a motion that the veterans affairs committee have its powers increased in order that it could deal with the war veterans allowance and the hon. member voted against that motion. In the committee we had a motion to the same effect and the hon. member voted against it. I do not care what excuses he gives and so on. Those are the facts.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege may I say that I did not vote against it.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member later wants to try to refute what I am saying, he can make a speech. He is at liberty to do that. In the meantime, I do not think he should be rising on these false questions of privilege.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege may I say that at no time did I vote against the widening of the terms of reference.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member may quibble as much as he likes. The record is there. The record of the House of Commons is there.

An hon. Member: Read it.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harkness: The record of the committee is there. I will leave the matter to the judgment of the veterans of this country. In his speech this afternoon the hon. member said the government was not able to increase the war veterans allowance this year. He says they are not able to do it. My goodness, Mr. Chairman, what does he mean by saying that they are not able to do it? There is no question at all of ability to do it. It is a matter of refusal to do it. Any statement along that line indicates, as a matter of fact, the true interest of the hon. member in the welfare of the veterans allowance recipients and the desire which the hon. member has to have this allowance increased. He says the government was not able to do it. As was pointed out previously, it would mean a mere matter of a few million dollars. Yet he says the government is not able to do it! The government refuses to do it; the government will not do it, and that is the only reason it is not done. No question whatever of ability to do it is involved in the matter.

I must say that I was also disappointed in the hon. member for Cape Breton South this afternoon.

An hon. Member: That is going to hurt his feelings.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Cape Breton South said he had voted against this motion made in the committee by the hon. member for Royal because of a former vote in the house and because the Prime Minister said that nothing would be done this year about the war veterans allowance. He said that in the committee and he said it again today. For a man who used to be such a bonny fighter as was the hon. member for Cape Breton South to say that he could not support this motion—which really meant an increase in the war veterans allowance—because the Prime Minister, forsooth, had said he did not want it this session, is difficult for me to understand.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has certainly changed.

An hon. Member: Wrong again!

Mr. Harkness: On what sort of question is the hon. member up on his feet? Is this a point of order, a question of privilege or just a speech?

Mr. Gillis: I am just going to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Harkness: That is fine.

Mr. Gillis: This is one hon. member who I think is inclined to be fair. I should like to ask him if he has read the record. If he has read the record he will know that the motion was on a ruling of the chairman and that it had nothing at all to do with the subject he is talking about.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member knows that there is no use asking me if I read the record. He knows that I was there every minute during which this discussion went on. I know the whole discussion. I heard the whole thing and so on. What the hon. member is doing is quibbling over a technicality. That is what he is doing. He knows as well as does every other member of that committee that the vote essentially was an effort—the last one we could make—to try to get the war veterans allowance increased at this session. As a matter of fact, because the Prime Minister said there would be no action on it this year, the member said: "Oh well, I will vote against it". This is not typical of the hon. member as I have known him in the nine years that I have been a member of the house.

Mr. Rowe: What reason would there be for that?

Mr. Harkness: I am not imputing any reasons or motives at all. I merely say that I am disappointed. I was disappointed that the hon. member should express the views he did in that regard and then turn around this afternoon and accuse the hon. member for Royal of playing politics with this matter.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: The thing is completely ridiculous.

Mr. Pouliot: Royal always does play politics.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad to say that the hon. member for Cape Breton South did not take this defeatist attitude in 1948. As a matter of fact, the prime minister of that time, Mr. Mackenzie King, announced in the house in 1947, to begin with, after a great deal of pressure had been put upon him to take action, that pensions would be increased 10 per cent and that was all. Then we went home for Christmas. There was a great deal of agitation and many representations made, and when we came back after Christmas the prime minister had weakened and he got up and said that he had reconsidered the matter and that the pensions would be increased 15 per cent but that that was the absolute limit. Standing right there he said that under no circumstances would they be increased more than 15 per cent. Did the hon. member for Cape Breton South take a defeatist attitude? Did the rest of us take that attitude? No, Mr. Chairman. When the committee met we went to work on this thing and insisted—

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member asked me a question.

Mr. Harkness: No, I did not ask him a question. If the hon. member wants to ask a question he can do so in a minute. I want to finish what I am saying.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harkness: I want to finish what I am saying.

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member for Calgary North also take his seat. May I remind hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: That is a better ruling.

Mr. Harkness: As I was saying, the prime minister said that 15 per cent was the absolute maximum. The members of the veterans affairs committee did not accept that as final. They did not say: Well, the prime minister said that is final and we cannot go any further. We pounded and pounded away at the matter.

Mr. Gillis: You did not force any votes in the house on it.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact we moved motions in the committee. The hon. member for Royal moved that the pension should be increased by 33⅓ per cent, and that is what the veterans are receiving now. At that time that motion was defeated but a motion that they should be increased by 25 per cent was passed unanimously by the committee. The matter came back to the house and that recommendation was adopted. Instead of what the prime minister had said the pension was increased by 25 per cent. If we had had the defeatist attitude at that time that the hon. member for Cape Breton South has shown on this occasion the veterans would have had an increase of 15 per cent in their pensions instead of the 25 per cent which they got and the 33⅓ per cent which they have at the present time. The only way you can get things is to fight for them. As far as I am concerned I am going to continue to fight for an increase in the war veterans allowance and in the ceilings and I am not going to be deterred by what the Prime Minister or anybody else says.

An hon. Member: Have your own way.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, unless the government comes around to making this change in the fairly near future they are going to have a much greater storm on their heads from the veterans of this country than already exists.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I will not take very long. I do not think I can clear up the misconception that seems to be abroad about the particular vote that was taken in the committee, but I should like to express my point of view. To me it was not a vote on the merits or demerits of the veterans allowance act at all. If it had been I believe that every member of that committee would have been in favour of taking some action about the war veterans allowance. It was a vote to sustain the chairman's ruling, the chairman having ruled that we did not have the power to deal with a subject that was beyond our terms of reference. I listened very carefully. I think the chairman took about an hour and a half to quote citations and to explain similar situations that had happened in the past. I also listened to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and others who expressed different views. After listening carefully I came to my own personal conclusion that the chairman was correct, and for that reason I supported him. But I supported him on that point only. If the War Veterans Allowance Act had been at stake I would not have supported him. I supported him because I considered, excellent chairman that he was, that he had given a true and faithful interpretation of all the authorities he quoted.

But I felt then and still do that the minister and the government were remiss in their duty in not referring the War Veterans Allowance Act for the consideration of the committee. On behalf of the veterans of my constituency I must register a protest and express their great disappointment that this subject was excluded from the consideration of the committee. The plight of veterans widows should also have been referred to the committee for attention. I fail to understand why the minister did not include these matters in the terms of reference. The minister has been questioned about these matters but so far he has refused to commit himself one way or the other. Before the session is over I think he should definitely say what he intends to do for the war veterans of Canada so that the Legion and others who are anxious to have something tangible done soon will know where they stand.

I am sure that the minister must be aware of the distress and dissatisfaction of the veterans and their widows. The average member of the house receives many letters and telegrams on the subject. Therefore it is quite safe to assume that the minister would receive a great deal more and should be thoroughly conversant with the difficulties faced by the war veterans and widows who are forced to live on a substandard diet in a country as rich and prosperous as we claim ours is. It puzzles me why the minister, being aware of their plight, ignored the whole problem when setting up the terms of reference of the committee.

It cannot be said that we cannot afford the cost. Another member referred to that. It cannot be said that the burden is already too great because I would point out that the total cost of administering the veterans affairs department, providing for all pensions, disability pensions, widows pensions, war veterans allowances, providing for the upkeep and administration of the various hospitals and other buildings, the administration of the pension commission, welfare services, soldier settlement services, the Veterans Land Act, rehabilitation benefits, re-establishment credits and numerous other items, including the minister's own salary, only amounts to a slight fraction over 5 per cent of the federal budget this year.

To my mind that is a very small price to pay to look after Canadian veterans of three wars whose sacrifices have made it possible for us to enjoy our lives and possessions in peace. In spite of the increased cost of living and the greater need of these veterans, particularly the burnt-out pensioners about whom we have been talking, the department has actually reduced its estimated requirements for the current year. I cannot understand that. The government is in the happy position, with an expanding economy and surpluses, of being able to share our wealth with other less fortunate nations, some of whom were our enemies not long ago. I do not criticize them for that. I think we are doing a kindly act, but surely if we can do that Canada's defenders deserve more than a brush-off when they ask to have their problems reviewed by the special committee on veterans affairs.

The previous committee was unanimous in recommending that something should be done for veterans allowance recipients. The members of this committee, too, I believe were unanimous in their sympathy for the recipients of war veterans allowances, but their hands were tied by the government. I am not blaming the chairman of the committee. I believe if he had had it in his power he would have extended the powers of the committee. I submit that the minister and the government deliberately tied the hands of the committee so that they could not deal with this subject.

The chairman of the committee did include in the report a request for sympathetic consideration of war veterans and the merchant marine. Possibly he was exceeding the terms of reference by going even that far, I cannot say. But I sincerely hope that the minister will pay attention to that recommendation, as well as to the numerous briefs presented to the committee on the subject by the various organizations.

In my opinion the work done by the committee was excellent as far as it went. Several desirable changes were made in the bills before us, and accepted by the government. This proved one thing conclusively to me, and that was that the good work done by this committee should be continued by the formation of a standing committee. I am sure the minister would gain valuable assistance in the administration of this department, and definitely the veterans would secure valuable aid in solving their numerous problems. I wholeheartedly support the Canadian Legion brief. These people have done an excellent piece of work in presenting it, and trying to solve the problems in the way they have recommended.

I should like also to draw one other thing to the minister's attention. This matter cannot wait for attention by the standing committee, but is urgent and touches on the plight of the widows of veterans who die while in receipt of a pension for less than a 50 per cent disability. I have a letter here from the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Legion drawing attention to the widows' position. I should like to quote it.

> We would point out that, as the whole intent of the Pension Act is to provide benefits strictly in accord with the degree of war disability, it would seem quite evident that at present most of the trouble as far as the widow is concerned, lies in the fact that there is too great a difference between the benefits provided for a 50 per cent and a 45 per cent disability.

A person with a 50 per cent disability gets a 30 per cent increase between the ages of 55 and 59 years; but a 45 per cent pension gets no increase. This ultimately hurts the widow when, on the death of the veteran, the pension is under 50 per cent. It is extremely hard to believe that if a 50 per cent disability can prove so burdensome with advancing years as to warrant three successive 10 per cent increases, a 45 per cent fixed assessment is entirely unaffected by age and so warrants no increase.

It should be pointed out that where a widow is left when the pension is at 50 per cent, she receives $100 per month; but the widow of a pensioner who dies with less than a 50 per cent disability pension, say 48 per cent or 49 per cent, gets nothing at all. Where children are left under similar circumstances, the children of the veteran on a 50 per cent disability pension get pensions at the orphan rate, which is double the 100 per cent rate, but the children of a veteran on a 45 per cent disability pension receive nothing.

With all due respect to the minister, I believe he should pay urgent and special attention to these widows, who are numerous. I am sorry they are numerous. They are numerous because of the hard classification that the pensioner has to undergo to get a pension at all. Possibly there are far too many veterans who get less than 50 per cent, and so far as the widows are concerned more generous treatment should be accorded to them. I hope that the minister will take that under advisement.

Mr. Pearkes: In listening to the discussion of this item today and the debates that have taken place earlier in this session on the question of veterans, I believe two points stand out and should be emphasized. The first of these is the success that has been achieved by the special committee on veterans affairs, not only this year but in previous years. The success has been achieved in spite of a certain amount of internal wrangling in which there has been a difference of opinion as to the best approach to achieve the one aim of every member of that committee, namely, the improvement of the position of the veterans. I honestly believe that considerable progress has been made by these veterans affairs committees over the period of many years. I sincerely hope that they will continue, and if there is a certain amount of internecine strife it is only because various members of that committee are so anxious to achieve something for the veterans that they believe the means they are advocating are the best way in which to achieve those ends. When you get people really worked up in their effort to try to do something for the cause, it is inevitable that there is a certain amount of heat engendered, but that is very largely on the surface. There is a genuine effort by all members of the committee to achieve a great end.

The second point that I think should be underlined is the fact that the committee this year was rather restricted in its terms of reference and therefore was not able to examine as many of the problems facing the veterans as most members of the committee would have liked to have the privilege of doing. Of course chief of all those problems that had to be omitted from the discussion was this question of the further assistance that was necessary for the recipients of war veterans allowances. I am not going into the details of that allowance or of the requisites which are necessary in order to really place these old sailors, soldiers and airmen in a position in which they can live with dignity during their remaining years.

Some reference has been made to the change in the casual earnings earlier in this session. I know the minister will recall that I raised the question with him before Christmas, as to the exact meaning of the definition of casual earnings as given in the directive which was then in existence. I expressed my appreciation to the minister for having looked into that question, and having produced the new directive to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred earlier. The casual earnings, and the expansion of the definition of casual earnings are only half the battle because the majority of the recipients of war veterans allowances are not in a position to go out and augment their allowances by undertaking work even of a casual nature. Many of those who are partially crippled, and are in receipt of a pension, of course are not in a position to augment their allowance in the least.

I merely mention that as being one of the items of unfinished business which remain today, so far as veterans affairs are concerned. And I want to offer to the minister this evening what appears to me to be a practical and timely suggestion as to the way in which these two items to which I have referred—the success of the committee and the amount of the unfinished business—can be harmonized in the future.

I would call attention to the fact that the veterans charter was drawn up and published nine years ago; it will be ten years when the next session of parliament will be called. And I would call attention to the final paragraph of the foreword written for the veterans charter by the then minister of veterans affairs, the late Hon. Ian Mackenzie, than whom no one worked harder for the veterans. This is what he wrote:

> Not for ten, perhaps twenty, years will it be known how much ex-service men and women have been able to contribute to a Canada at peace as a result of these re-establishment measures. When that accounting is made, I know the program laid down in the veterans charter will appear in true perspective as a social investment of unmatched success.

And then, in the closing chapter he had these words:

> The veterans charter is, therefore, not only an expression of the gratitude and generous thought of their compatriots but it is a long range plan to utilize the best minds and talents of a generation in such a way as to make an ever growing contribution to the Dominion of Canada. A contribution that in its fulfilment would enhance the social, economic and cultural advance of a nation which twice in its short history had thrust upon it a battle for survival, and under the threat of conquest had still the moral courage to plan for a nobler fulfilment of its destiny.

Those words were written ten years ago. Since the veterans charter was introduced there have been many amendments to some of the bills embraced within it. There are actually 19 different acts in the charter affecting the welfare of the veterans, and in addition there are a number of regulations.

But, as I say, this was drawn up 10 years ago; and if we allow our minds to turn back over those ten years we will see that we have a very different world today from the atmosphere in which the charter was prepared. Ten years ago we were basking in the sunshine of the San Francisco agreement in which there were to be united nations, where five great powers were going to see that there would be no more war. That was the atmosphere in which the charter was drawn up.

We have passed from the high explosives age to the atomic age of today. But we have also made progress in many other lines. I would call attention of hon. members to the progress which has been made throughout Canada in many lines of social security, and the assistance given to those who are less fortunate than the majority. I would call attention to the assistance given under the various schemes for national health, given not only by the federal government but by many of the provinces. In those days there were no provincial health insurance plans.

Therefore I am going to suggest that next year, when parliament assembles for its next session, there should be a complete review of the veterans charter in order to bring it up to date, in order to consolidate the different acts, and in order to bring in all the different amendments so that they may be embodied in the acts. Let us see that those 19 acts are related one to the other, and also related to conditions as they exist in Canada today.

Now that the first ten years have passed we have reached the time for the first accounting, to which the late Ian Mackenzie referred. I believe we shall find that in very large measure the charter will appear in true perspective and that it will be considered an unmatched success. But we are not going to stand still. Conditions have changed in the last ten years. Now is the time for us to have that review so as to bringing the veterans charter up to date, so that it can be related to conditions as they are in Canada today, and so that a committee, set up early in the session, would have the opportunity of reviewing all those acts of parliament which have reference to the veterans of this country.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I feel it is always wise for one to give expression to any words of commendation he may feel before proceeding to words of censure or criticism. Therefore this evening, rising to take part in this debate, I should like first of all to let the Minister of Veterans Affairs know that we appreciate deeply the readiness with which he and his department deal with all veterans problems we bring to their attention from time to time. Personally, I have always found them to be more than ready and willing to investigate any particular case, to report upon it and to let us know the situation as it really exists.

We are also very happy in respect of those measures passed at this session of parliament. I may say that already some of the veterans in my own riding are receiving benefits from some of those measures, or they will be in the near future. Therefore first of all I commend the minister and his department.

Having done that I feel I am now free to go ahead and voice any criticisms I have with just as great emphasis as I have used in my commendation. It is not my purpose tonight to deal at length with veterans legislation in general. The hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for New Westminster have set forth clearly our attitude with respect to veterans legislation in general. However I do feel that up to the present time the government has failed to deal with those problems that are of special concern to veterans organizations across Canada.

Speaking in the house some time ago I gave expression to that conviction, and since that time the conviction has been strengthened further by a considerable number of communications I have received from individual veterans and from branches of the Legion in various sections. I hope the saying is still true that the constant dropping of water wears away the rock—and, applying it in this instance, that the constant emphasis and re-emphasis of these particular issues will soften the heart of the government. I do not say the heart of the minister because I believe that he personally would be most happy if he could do something further for the war veterans who are not on the allowance at the present time. But I do trust that the continued re-emphasis of these particular matters will somehow encourage the government to take time off to reconsider them and give further attention to the plight of the war veterans.

The first one of course, as I have already said, is the war veterans allowance, which is recommendation No. 1 in the brief presented to the Prime Minister of Canada and the cabinet by the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League on November 10, 1953, which states:

> That the basic rate of war veterans allowance be increased to $60 per month for a single veteran, and $120 per month for those who are married.

The government has already given us to understand in no uncertain terms that they are not going to consider the raising of the war veterans allowance at this session. Some time ago this matter was brought to the attention of the government and it was sidetracked on several occasions. Just recently I received telegrams from various Legion branches in my own particular riding. I should like to refer to a telegram that I received from W. Cross, zone commander, New Westminster and district zones of the Canadian Legion. It is dated May 21 and reads as follows:

> Canadian Legion delegates from South Burnaby, New Westminster, Mission, Haney, Port Coquitlam and Port Moody branches representing 4,200 members met last night in South Burnaby branch 83 and passed unanimous motion deeply deploring Prime Minister's callousness over plight of thousands of veterans. Have wired Prime Minister. We in your constituency demand your support of Canadian Legion brief and urge you do your utmost to have War Veterans Allowance Act given full consideration this session.

I would have been as happy to see the word "request" used in the telegram instead of "demand", but the word "demand" was used. Perhaps some hon. members will recall that I brought this to the attention of the house just before the orders of the day on May 21, and asked whether the Prime Minister had received a telegram in this connection and whether he was prepared to make any statement in regard to its contents. Mr. Speaker gave me to understand that that was not the proper time to bring a question of that kind to the attention of the house, and suggested that it would be more appropriate to ask it in the veterans affairs committee or when the estimates of the Minister of Veterans Affairs were before the house. I understand that this is the proper time to refer to it. However there was no opportunity for a statement to be made at that time. I want to bring to the attention of the committee, of the minister and of the department the fact that we are still definitely interested in and concerned about this particular matter, and request that it be given full consideration, and that something further be done for those who are recipients of the war veterans allowance.

I will not refer to the veterans affairs committee. I was not a member of it, but I read some interesting things that came out of it. I was surprised at the attitude of some of the members of that committee, but I do not want to be ruled out of order at this time. Therefore I shall not make any further comments in that regard.

The second recommendation in the Canadian Legion brief to which I have referred reads:

> That the ceilings on total permissible income under War Veterans Allowance Act be increased to $1,200 per year in the case of a single recipient and $2,000 per year in the case of those married.

[Mr. Patterson.]

I want to lend my support to that recommendation as well and to ask the government whether they will not just bend a little. I do not think it is asking very much, but I would request the government to bend a little and yield to the requests of the Legion in this particular respect.

I stated some time ago that I could not understand why the government refuses to raise the ceiling on permissive income. We all recognize that as it stands now it is entirely inadequate to permit of a decent standard of living. In a letter which is quoted in the October issue of the Legionary, and which was sent to the Prime Minister by C. B. Lumsden, dominion president of the Canadian Legion, we find the following in the first part of it:

> For some years we have been asking for a revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act which would raise the ceiling on permissible income and permit an increase in the basic allowance for those with no other means of support. To us the moral and sociological reasons in favour of these changes seem overwhelming and our members find it difficult to understand why our representations have not been accepted.
> There is little that we can add to the briefs previously presented. We would merely like to reiterate that as the act stands at present it tends to defeat its own objectives. If the allowance is intended to assist the aged and needy veteran, the low permissive ceiling prevents him from supplementing this allowance sufficiently to enjoy a reasonable standard of living. If it is intended as a subsistence allowance, it is far too small.
> The taxation laws of Canada consider that an income of less than $2,000 is too low for a married man to pay income tax. Yet war veterans allowance expects a married couple to live on $1,200 a year.

There is more to the letter but I will not take the time of the committee to read it. I should like to suggest once again that the government give consideration and take action as soon as possible to accede to the request of the Legion. These are the two matters to which I should like to refer. I know other speakers have already emphasized them, but I want to give them my support at this time. I urge the government to yield on these two important and very necessary requests.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I believe that there are 243 members of this house who not only would offer no objection but who would welcome it wholeheartedly if tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock the Prime Minister were to announce on behalf of the government its desire to bring in an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act, and were to ask the house for unanimous consent to put it through all stages at one sitting. The legislation would be passed before one o'clock tomorrow.

I use the figure of 243 members advisedly. There are 265 seats in this house. We are missing two whom we lost a short while ago. There are 20 members of this house who are in the cabinet. That leaves 243 of us who are private members. I suggest that all 243 of us would readily agree to such a request if the government were to make it tomorrow morning. I urge that consideration be given to that proposition.

It has been suggested by a good many members during the course of the debate today that something must be done about this matter as soon as possible, and certainly at the next session of parliament. I see no reason why it should not be done at this session even yet, certainly before we reach prorogation.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, this debate is a demonstration of the way in which parliament sometimes works. As I have already said, we are 265 members when we are all here, but for those of us outside of the cabinet all we can do is make speeches, move amendments, ask questions, and do all the other things we can to try to persuade the government to bring in legislation of this kind.

When it comes to legislation of almost any kind, and particularly when it comes to legislation involving the expenditure of money, that must be brought in by the government. Those 20 men in the cabinet—and I am referring to the 20 who are members of this house because although there are 21 members in the cabinet one of them is over in the other place—occupy a key position. What it boils down to is this, that 11 of those 20 occupy the key position. Eleven out of those 20 would constitute a majority. What the other 243 members of this house are doing is making appeals of this kind in the hope that we can yet persuade 11 out of those 20 to agree that something should be done about this matter at this session of parliament.

Let it not be said that it is too late. As a matter of fact, during this very week a piece of legislation is being put through, notice of which was not given until Monday. I realize that it turns out to be an uncontentious piece of legislation. I refer to the proposal to amend the Judges Act—but not to increase the salaries of judges—and I would point out that notice of that intention was not given until Monday of this week. Unanimous consent has not yet been requested for the purpose of speeding up the progress of that legislation. If it goes through its normal stages at the speed permitted by the rule book it could be through by Friday of this week. In other sessions there have been instances where items of legislation have been brought in near the end of the session and have been put through all their necessary stages. That could certainly be done with this piece of legislation and I urge that even yet consideration be given to it. I do not know of any reason why a cabinet meeting could not be held tonight or tomorrow morning in time for the opening of this house at eleven o'clock. If the cabinet cannot meet before tomorrow morning, we are meeting Saturday and that would be a good way in which to start Saturday sittings in this session, namely, by having amendments brought in to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, reference has been made quite frequently this evening to the report of the veterans affairs committee. I do not think the recommendation to which reference has been made has yet been put on the record in its entirety and I think we should have that part of the report before us in its exact terms. Before reading it I would like to point out that this is from the fifth report of the special committee on veterans affairs which was presented to the house by the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Rosthern, on Friday, June 11. The part to which reference has been so frequently made reads as follows:

> In tabling herewith a copy of the evidence adduced, your committee desires to draw attention to the fact that the submission by the Canadian Legion, the National Council of Veterans Associations and the Canadian non-pensioned veterans' widows, each contained, in addition to representations in respect of the said bills,—

That refers to the four bills which were before the committee.

> —representations urging changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act to raise the amounts of allowances payable thereunder, and also to raise the level of permissive income.
> The Canadian Merchant Navy Veterans Association, in their submission, laid most stress on a wish that those who served during world war II in dangerous waters receive the benefits of the Veterans Land Act.
> Your committee recommends that the government give sympathetic consideration to the said submissions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I rather share the views of those who have characterized that last sentence as something in the nature of a pious hope or a pious prayer, but at least we do know that after all the arguments were over in the committee that report was adopted unanimously.

Now, who made up that committee? It was made up of private members chosen from amongst the 243 to whom I referred a few minutes ago, representing all the parties in this house. I submit that the fact that those members representing the various parties in this house agreed unanimously on this report makes it crystal clear that not only those members in the committee but the entire 243 support that contention that the government should give sympathetic consideration to these submissions. The first of these submissions was that the War Veterans Allowance Act should be amended to raise the amount of the allowance payable thereunder, and also to raise the level of permissive income.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I could but I do not think it is necessary to go into the merits of the case itself. The reason why it is not necessary is because it is so obvious, and because it has been made so many times this afternoon and evening. But I feel I would like to pinpoint the fact that here is an opportunity for the government to recognize the way in which parliament properly works. Here is an opportunity for the government to recognize the wish of the 243 of us who are here, and respond to the unanimous feeling of the private members of this house.

I know there has been no vote in which the 243 members have had a chance to express themselves, but I think I am perfectly justified in contending that the unanimous support of this report by members representing all parties means that the 243 of us would welcome action on this matter at this session, and I hope that even yet, before we reach the day of prorogation, something will be done about this matter.

For my part I support the contention that has been made by the Canadian Legion that the amount of the allowance should be increased to not less than $60 a month single and $120 a month married. I agree too with the contention of the Legion that if it is not possible to remove the means test altogether then at least the level of permissive income should be raised to $1,200 a year single, and $2,000 a year married.

I think particular notice should be taken of the fact that amongst those who appeared before the committee were representatives of the Canadian non-pensioned veterans widows association. As hon. members know there was a time when there was no provision for non-pensioned veterans widows and then the time came along about 1943 when, by an item in the estimates, there was a special allowance for these women. In due course their allowance was made statutory by their being brought under the terms of the War Veterans Allowance Act. Therefore when we are asking for these increases under the War Veterans Allowance Act we are quite properly asking for an increase, not only for the war veterans themselves who are the recipients of those allowances but for the widows who qualify under this same legislation, and I wish to support their other requests as well.

I wish to indicate once again my support of the contention which has been made repeatedly, and made many times today, that something should be done about that cut-off date with respect to the widows of imperial veterans. It seems to me that some change in that provision should be made so that it will not be necessary for the veteran to have lived in Canada the full 20 years in order for his widow to qualify. This provision results in many cases of hardship, which could be avoided by changing that 20 year provision.

I support the contention made earlier today that surely the time has come when the United Kingdom might be recognized as a theatre of war so far as world war I is concerned. This has been a sore point for a long time. The number affected by it is dwindling all the time. It has become more of an issue now that the United Kingdom has been accepted as a theatre of war in world war II. I submit that to make this change would have value not only in terms of the dollars that would be available to many of these veterans or to some of their widows as the result of the change but as a boost in morale to our older veterans generally. I hope that even yet that change might be made.

As I have already indicated, Mr. Chairman, the case for amending the War Veterans Allowance Act in terms of substance, in terms of the merits of the matter and in terms of what our veterans deserve has been made so well at this session and at other sessions across the years that it is hardly necessary to repeat it. I urge as strongly as I can, and as seriously and as earnestly as I can, that this matter be not left over as an item of unfinished business for another session but that something be done about it at this session. I see no reason why the Prime Minister should not announce the desire and willingness of the government to bring in such a bill tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, it has been significant that throughout the debate this afternoon and this evening, practically all of the attention has been focused on the war veterans allowance. I think I have never before seen a debate on veterans affairs proceed in that way. There is, of course, a reason for this fact. The plight of the war veterans allowance recipients and of those who might qualify if the restrictions were not so severe is the most serious situation facing the veterans of Canada today.

These men must have been fighting men. No one can qualify for the war veterans allowance unless he served in a theatre of war, with the exception of those who are in receipt of a pension for a disability or an injury suffered in England or in Canada during the first war; and of course there is a similar eligibility for the veterans of the second world war.

Mr. Brooks: And those with dual service.

Mr. Green: Yes; there are also the men who had dual service. These men have a good claim to consideration by the government because, as I have said, they have been our fighting men. Not only have they a good claim but there is great importance to this question because time is so vital. They are now reaching an age when many of them are dropping off. Within the next year probably many hundreds of these men will die. They are facing not a deadline such as that which has been written into the Pension Act, but a death-line. Hence time is of the utmost importance.

There is one thing that stands out clearly today and it is that there will be no action whatever to help these veterans at the present session. Next year something may be done for them, but it is absolutely clear that nothing is to be done at this session. That fact, I submit, is the tragedy of this whole situation.

The primary responsibility for failure to act at this session rests squarely on the government. Recommendations were made to them unanimously two years ago by a special committee on veterans affairs set up in the session of that year. I have here a copy of the report which was dated June 18, 1952, and contains this recommendation with regard to war veterans allowance:

> Your committee further recommends to the government continued and sympathetic study of the needs and requirements of recipients of war veterans' allowance, keeping in mind the recommendations of veterans' organizations in that respect and particularly with regard to permissive income.

Some of us on that committee had tried to get through a resolution which called for action at the session of 1952, but the best we could do was this recommendation which I have read. It was made unanimously. Every member on that committee supported that recommendation. However no action has been taken by the government during the intervening two years, with the exception of some modification in the definition of what constitutes casual earnings.

Then recommendations on this question were made by the Canadian Legion every year. On November 10 of last year they submitted to the cabinet a brief which contained their recommendations, once again, for improvement of the War Veterans Allowance Act. They asked that the maximum payment to the single veteran be increased from $50 a month to $60, that the maximum payment to the married veteran be increased from $90 to $120, and that the ceiling on permissive income should be $1,200 for the single veteran and $2,000 for the married veteran.

Then we had put on the order paper, early in the spring, the motion for the setting up of a committee on veterans affairs. The government chose to word that motion in such a way that the committee had power to deal only with what bills were referred to it; and the Prime Minister announced that there would not be any amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act at this session. There was therefore no prospect of having the War Veterans Allowance Act referred to the committee.

During the debate in the house on the setting up of the committee we sought to have the terms of reference widened in order to enable the committee to deal with the war veterans allowance, but the government refused to accept that suggestion. I had thought that as a result of the debate in the house the government might change its attitude.

I think perhaps that change of attitude might have taken place if private members on the government side of the house had taken a determined stand asking that the terms of reference be extended. However, only one or two of them did so. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, I realize that it is a great deal more difficult for a supporter of the government to rise in his place and criticize the government than it is for those of us who are on the opposition side to do so. However, in this instance I feel confident that if the Liberal members had been a little bit tougher at the time of the setting up of that committee we might not today be placed in the unfortunate position that nothing is to be done at the present session in the way of improving the war veterans allowance. I therefore repeat that the primary responsibility rests squarely on the government.

I do not blame the veterans affairs committee to the same extent, but I say that our committee on veterans affairs lost a splendid opportunity to bring about improvements. We heard representations from the Legion although the terms of reference were not supposed to include consideration of the war veterans allowance. We also had a brief from the national council in which they regretted that the war veterans allowance could not be considered at this session. When we came to consider what action should be taken by the committee some of us tried to put through a motion which would have had the effect of asking the house to widen the terms of reference. That motion read as follows:

> That this committee submit a report to the house requesting that the terms of reference of the committee be enlarged to enable it to consider the War Veterans Allowance Act and make recommendations in respect thereof at this session of parliament.

That motion was ruled out of order by the chairman of the committee. He needed a good many law books and rule books and a very long argument in order to arrive finally at the decision that the motion was out of order. However, he did so rule. But I point out, Mr. Chairman, that every committee is master of its own fate. The members of that committee had the power to overrule the ruling which had been made by the chairman, and an appeal was taken to the committee as a whole against that ruling. We voted on that appeal. The government members lined up solidly behind the chairman. There again I can see a reason for their doing so. I regretted that they did, but it was much easier for those of us in the opposition to vote against the chairman's ruling than it was for the supporters of the government.

But quite frankly I find it very hard to understand why the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary saw fit to vote in support of the chairman's ruling because if it had been upset there is no doubt that the motion itself would have carried and we would have come back to the house with a recommendation that the terms of reference of the committee be extended so that it could consider the question of the war veterans allowance. However, they voted that way. Their colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West, voted the other way. He justified his position in the committee and has done so in the house today.

In the final analysis a report was brought in by the committee to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred, and it does contain this reference:

> Your committee recommends that the government give sympathetic consideration to the said submissions.

That included the submissions on the question of the war veterans allowance. I believe that the report should have gone further and that it should have recommended that legislation amending the War Veterans Allowance Act be introduced at the present session of parliament. However, we do have this report recommending consideration. It has the value of placing before the government again the need for considering the question of the war veterans allowance, but it has the terrible weakness that no possible action can be taken at the present session to help recipients of the allowance. That, I think, is one of the saddest situations in which I have seen the veterans of this country placed since I came here in 1935.

This is a dangerous situation for the veterans of Canada for another reason. I believe that the government is refusing to do anything about the war veterans allowance because it is government policy to treat the war veterans allowance recipient on the same basis as ordinary civilian welfare cases. I believe that is the secret of the refusal of the government to listen to these various recommendations. Just a few days ago a bill was passed in the house known as the Disabled Persons Act. It is significant to note that the maximum amount that a disabled person who qualifies under the act can get is $720 a year if he or she is single and $1,200 a year if married. There you have the same ceilings that exist in the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Then we go back to 1951 to the Old Age Assistance Act. There again there is a ceiling of $720 for the single recipient and $1,200 for the married. Thus it becomes perfectly clear that the plan is to keep these old front-line soldiers on the same basis as civilians who are getting benefits under these civilian acts. As hon. members have pointed out, one result of that is that in British Columbia and Alberta today the civilian is getting more than the war veterans allowance recipient.

But the fundamental mistake in the government's policy is that the claim of the war veterans allowance man is completely different from that of the civilian. The civilian gets these payments as a matter of welfare. The war veterans allowance man gets them because he risked his life for his country. His claim is for services rendered and he should not be put on the same basis as the civilian. He has a claim as of right. I believe that every member of the house down in his heart knows that such is the case and that there is that great distinction between these two groups. I believe it is a tragedy that the government is failing to recognize that difference and is forcing these war veterans allowance men to remain in the same position as welfare recipients.

That is not what the members of the house wish, no matter to what party they belong. It is not what the newspapers of this country wish. I daresay there have been editorials in every leading paper in Canada in favour of doing something for these fighting troops. It is not what the Canadian people wish, whether they be young or old, whether they be old comrades of these war veterans allowance men or whether they be civilians. They want to see these fighting men treated in a fair way and treated on the basis of having earned the right to receive this help from their country. I do not believe there is a person in Canada who would be unwilling to see money put out to increase the war veterans allowance to the amount set by the Legion and to raise the ceiling on permissive income to the amounts the Legion requests.

There you have the reason why this is a fighting issue. This issue is not going to be allowed to drop by members of the house who have taken their stand for years, or by the newspapers of the country or by the veterans organizations. I hope that the Canadian people will insist that the just claims of these veterans be recognized. I can only add in closing that I think it is a terrible tragedy that nothing is to be done for these fighting men at the present session.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like at the start, Mr. Chairman, to heartily endorse the suggestion made by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because I am quite sure he was right when he expressed the view there is not a single one of the 243 private members of the house who would oppose this measure. In fact, I would think this would be an opportunity for some of them to get up and say if they do oppose that suggestion. I do not see any of them getting up, so I presume we can take it for granted that they all agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Speak now or forever hold your peace.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am at a loss to understand why this government periodically persists in doing something so stupid as they have done with regard to the war veterans allowances. There can only be one of two reasons that makes them decline the demands of not only the veterans organizations but of the citizens of Canada. I am quite sure there is not a member in this house who does not feel a sense of shame when he reads in the newspaper the sort of case referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South. There can be no member in this house who tonight does not feel a sense of shame when he knows that if the government persists in its foolish, stupid opposition, before the house meets again there are going to be many more old men and old women who are going to turn on the gas. We all know that. They are going to turn it on and stick their heads in the oven. I would not consider it advisable for any member to treat this matter with levity, because it is not such a matter. It is a matter for shame for all decent Canadian citizens.

As I say, there is only one of two reasons. One is that they consider the veterans of two world wars do not deserve any greater measure of generosity than parliament has already granted them. I doubt if there is any member of this house who would have the foolhardiness to rise and suggest that that is a reasonable cause for the government's position. I doubt if there is anyone here who would have the temerity to get up and say that the man who risked his life for Canada is not worth more than he is getting now under the legislation. There may be some, but I doubt if there are any in this chamber who would dare get up and say so.

I am not suggesting that all those who joined the armed forces and fought in Canada's wars were heroes. We were not heroes. They are few and far between. It is time, however, I believe for this government to be reminded of the fact that every man who joins the armed forces of this country takes the risk that he is going to lose his life in that service. He takes another risk, too, in fact it is almost a certainty. He runs an almost certain risk of damaging himself physically or psychologically or both. It has been stated that most of the veterans of the first world war can be considered medically some ten years older than their calendar age. I do not know whether or not that is true, but I have heard that reported on many occasions. I am quite sure a very large majority of those who went through the four years of the first war came back to Canada impaired in some way in their health. I doubt whether that is the reason the government is declining to do this.

The only other reason is that we cannot afford it. I do not know what it would cost to implement the demands of the Canadian Legion. I do not know whether it would mean adding 50 per cent or 100 per cent to the present expenditure of $27 million on war veterans allowances. But even if it cost 100 per cent more, even if it means our bill for war veterans allowance will be doubled, and we will have to spend another $27 million, I think that is a very weak and shaky reason for refusing to do it. This $27 million is a lot of money, and of course the government may perhaps hesitate to ask the taxpayers of Canada to dig into their pockets to find another $27 million.

On the other hand the government apparently had not the slightest hesitation or compunction in not asking but forcing the taxpayers of Canada to dig into their pockets to the tune of $277 million, since the Department of Defence Production was established, as an allowance for write-offs on income tax for those firms that are patriotically providing the sinews of war. The amount is reported here as $277 million that has been accorded these people by way of additional benefits in income tax write-offs since the Department of Defence Production was established in 1951. The government had no hesitation whatever in digging into the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer to the tune of $48 million in order to make grants of additional working capital for one year, 1953, to those firms that are producing the sinews of war which may be used by future generations of Canadian veterans who will have to get along on $40 per month.

I am going to suggest that the government had better tell the people of Canada very bluntly and plainly just why they consider that the gentlemen who own the industries, many of these industries which were apparently built by public funds and which provide the sinews of war, are more worthy of aid from the public treasury than are the men who came back from two wars. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, how much we are paying in the way of profits on the expenditures we are going to make this year of $160 million on naval equipment; $80 million on army equipment and nearly $447 million on air force equipment, a total of some $688 million on military equipment for which orders are being placed this year according to the estimates before us. I wonder what percentage of that is going in perhaps not exactly justifiable profits to those who own those industries. I wonder whether perhaps we might consider that one per cent or two per cent of that volume might be exceptional profits, profits to which one could reasonably take exception.

If they were, of course, and if we decided not to give it to those operating these industries we would have ample funds to implement the Legion's demands. This would allow some sort of justice to be accorded to the old men, who once were young and who in the days of their youth gave their services to the people of Canada.

Mr. Lapointe: In rising to speak on this item of the departmental estimates, Mr. Chairman, I feel that at the very beginning I should offer my thanks and those of the government to the members of the veterans affairs committee who this year have made a thorough study in their usual efficient manner of the legislation referred to them by this house. I recognize that on this committee there are some veterans, not of wars but of the committee's work, and there are also some new members who made a fine contribution.

I would like to thank at the same time the various veterans organizations, the Canadian Legion, the National Council of Veterans Associations, the non-pensioned widows and the merchant seamen who came before the committee, presented briefs and made representations in their usual constructive manner.

Since the debate began this afternoon many subjects have been discussed by hon. members who have participated. I believe some of these matters could be answered more appropriately when we are discussing the specific items in the estimates dealing with the matters concerned. However it is obvious that the whole debate has centred on this very serious question of war veterans allowances. Observations have been made which I believe call for some rectification on my part, or at least for a statement of certain facts which may have been overlooked in discussing the matter.

I am not saying for one moment that the matter has not been discussed properly by hon. members. However I do feel that certain terms used in the house and outside of it with reference to war veterans allowances have been somewhat exaggerated, and that the use of words such as indifferent, callousness and stupidity as regards this administration is indicative of a lack of comprehension of all the implications of this particular question.

I do not want to go over the whole history of war veterans allowances. However I do believe that in order to understand exactly the position of the government in considering this question the picture should be made clear. I say this because to many of us who are familiar with veterans legislation, such as members of the committee who have been sitting for some years and following that legislation, it appears very clear; to some members of the press who have followed it it is also clear. However, at least to myself and others who are receiving representations from outside, and who are reading certain editorials in the press, it is plain there is uncertainty in the public mind as to what war veterans allowances are. In many people's minds there appears to be confusion between war veterans allowances and disability pensions.

I say this because I have received many letters in which it is pointed out that something should be done about raising the war veterans allowance for the old wounded veterans. In other words, in the minds of many people there is no appreciation of the fact that war veterans allowances and pensions for disability incurred during service are two different things.

The war veterans allowance was instituted in 1930. I thought the hon. member for Acadia stated the situation very clearly this afternoon. It was created for the purpose of looking after the older veterans, and making available to them the old age pension, as it was called at that time, ten years before any other citizens were eligible to receive it, on the basis that active service in the front line would cause pre-ageing by ten years in any man who had been called upon to perform in the front line. Consequently those who could qualify under the original act were veterans who were sixty years of age, and those who, being under sixty years, could be certified to be totally disabled and incapacitated. No others qualified. The benefit given at that time was that they could receive the equivalent of the old age pension, under the same conditions of a means test and, as I have said, ten years sooner.

What has happened since then? Well, of course the act has been widened, and new groups have been admitted. Widows and dual service veterans have been brought in. Veterans have also been made eligible whose circumstances were such that as a result of the combination of their financial circumstances and their physical condition they have found it impossible to find work in the labour market.

Furthermore, all through the history of this legislation the amount paid by way of war veterans allowances, and the ceilings imposed under the means test, were always parallel to those of the old age pension, for the reason given this afternoon by the hon. member for Acadia—that at the very beginning it was stated that the purpose of the legislation was to make old age pensions available to older veterans ten years before other citizens in this country were so eligible.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra says he knows the secret as to why the government will not accede to the demands being made. He said it is because we are assimilating these veterans into the civilian population, and giving them the same treatment as civilians. There is no secret about this. That has been said right along, ever since the act was created. I repeated it last year and I said that I could not see how a major change could be made in this legislation which would break the ties that have existed between war veterans allowances and old age pensions, a relationship which has always existed between those two pieces of legislation.

Mr. Pearkes: Remove the means test.

Mr. Lapointe: I shall deal with this matter.

What is the situation at the present time? I should like to give a few figures in order to show that in spite of what has been said here tonight the government has considered this question very seriously, that there are important factors to be considered before making any changes in the legislation, and that the implications may well be more far-reaching than is understood by at least some hon. members opposite.

At the present time the estimates indicate that the item for the war veterans allowance, together with the assistance fund, total $27,715,500. This amount has been increasing in the last ten years. I believe that ten years ago it was about $14 million. However this increase is a normal process. Another factor which must be considered in the cost of war veterans allowances is that the recipients of the allowance are also entitled to free medical treatment. And, although the money expended for medical treatment for the recipients of the war veterans allowance does not appear in a separate item in the estimates, the cost in the last fiscal year was $8,992,850, or just a few thousand dollars less than $9 million. This sum should be added to the $27 million I have just mentioned.

What would happen from the point of view of increasing liability if at the present time increases, as some have been suggesting, were adopted by the government?

It has been suggested that the allowance should be increased from $50 to $60 for a single recipient and from $90 to $120 for the married recipient, and at the same time the ceilings should be raised to $1,200 for the single recipient and to $2,000 for the married recipient. That alone, sir, would increase the present liability for war veterans allowance by over $16 million. That is, it would increase the expenditure for the present year by 60 per cent, on the basis of the present number of recipients; but to that must be added an estimated $2,500,000 for additional recipients, which must necessarily follow from the fact that the ceiling is raised. As hon. members know, every time the ceiling is raised in legislation such as this new groups of people qualify and the expenditure is thereby increased. Therefore, at the present time, to give the increases both in the amount and in the ceilings that I have mentioned would raise our present liability for war veterans allowances to an amount between $46 million and $47 million. This is far from the $3 million that has been mentioned by certain members. And I can assure this committee that these estimates are very conservative indeed.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question? Can he break that down into the amount that it would cost to increase the ceiling on permissive income?

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry, I have not the figure which would show the increase in cost simply by increasing the ceiling to $1,200 and $2,000; but I have had computations made, and to raise the ceiling from $720 to only $840 for the single person and from $1,200 to $1,440 for the married person would cost approximately $4 million, and that is of course without increasing the amount of payment to the present number of recipients.

It has also been represented that besides the increases which we are asked to grant, the benefits of the act should be made available to veterans who served in the United Kingdom only during the first war, in the same way as those who served in the United Kingdom during the second war receive them. Well, there again, Mr. Chairman, that item alone is estimated to increase the annual liability by $5,670,000.

Therefore, the points that I have mentioned, namely, increasing the amounts, increasing the ceilings and making the allowance available to world war I veterans who served in the United Kingdom only, would increase the annual liability at this time from $27,750,000 to over $52 million, or an increase of approximately 95 per cent. Whether that should be done or not is certainly a matter to be decided only after serious consideration. I am simply putting these facts and figures before the committee so that it will be realized that before taking a major decision such as this the government has some very important factors to consider.

There are other aspects of the question which I believe the government and the committee must consider also, and they should be put on the record. There is the effect that the increase in ceilings would have, and I am speaking of course of the suggestion to increase the ceilings to $1,200 for the single recipient and to $2,000 for the married recipient. At the present time a single man receiving war veterans allowance, if he can supplement his allowance, can receive up to $720, which represents a disability pension of about 50 per cent, the full pension being $1,500. A married man, if he supplements his allowance, can receive the equivalent of what a married 60 per cent disability pensioner receives.

I should like to point out that ever since this act was put on the statute books of Canada there has always been a correlation between the war veterans allowance and the Pension Act; that is, the amounts paid under the War Veterans Allowance Act have always borne a relationship to what could be paid under the Pension Act. If the present ceilings were raised, it would mean that a single veteran could get the equivalent of a 75 per cent disability pension, although he might not be pensioned at all, and the married veteran could get up to the equivalent of a 95 per cent disability pension. A 100 per cent disability pension, as hon. members know, is $2,040.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the minister this question? If the rate for a single recipient of war veterans allowance is raised to $60 that certainly is not 75 per cent. Did the minister say that?

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry; I did not make myself clear. I was speaking of the proposed ceiling of $2,000 for the married recipient.

Mr. Brooks: The government does not pay that.

Mr. Lapointe: No.

Mr. Harkness: That is what he is able to earn.

Mr. Lapointe: That is correct. In other words, the 30 per cent disability pensioner who is single could supplement his disability pension and receive the same amount as a 75 per cent disability pensioner, the amount coming both from the pension commission and the war veterans allowance board. The married 25 per cent disability pensioner could supplement his disability pension through war veterans allowances so that it would be the equivalent of a 95 per cent disability pension. I am simply pointing that out because it is certainly not the usual relation that has existed between the payments made under the two acts. Whether this is desirable or not and whether the seriously disabled veterans of this country and the public would like such a state of affairs to exist is something which the government must necessarily take into consideration.

Mr. Brooks: But all the veterans are asking for it.

Mr. Lapointe: I have heard many representations. There is another aspect which must be considered and which may be of some interest to the committee; for instance if the ceiling of $2,000 was put into the act many veterans in steady employment, including some who are permanent lower grade employees in the civil service, would be supplementing the regular salary which they are earning with the war veterans allowance. I know that in the Department of Veterans Affairs there are very many classifications of employees in the lower grades who are receiving salaries under $2,000. These employees, if married, would be supplementing their salary. It may be said that they should be receiving more, but I would suggest that the War Veterans Allowance Act was not conceived to be an instrument through which such adjustments should be made.

Not only that, but a great number of retired civil servants who have 20, 25 or more years' service in positions paying $3,000, $3,500, and up to $4,000 would be able through war veterans allowance to supplement their superannuation of less than $2,000 to which they are entitled under the Public Service Superannuation Act.

As a matter of fact in my own department I have found that in the last year there have been 66 employees with salaries of $3,000 or under, who were retired after having completed an average of 22 years service in the department. Now, under the Public Service Superannuation Act their retirement pension will average $805 per year. Each one of those who was a veteran who had served overseas would qualify under the provisions of the act, thus enabling him to supplement his superannuation to the amount of $2,000, which, in many cases, would be the equivalent of the salary at which he retired.

I am simply putting these facts before the house in order to emphasize that this matter has been under consideration, that the government has given the subject a thorough study, and in fact is still doing so. I can assure hon. members that the recommendations made by the veterans affairs committee to the effect that this matter should be considered with sympathy by the government will receive the attention of my colleagues and myself. In fact, this legislation, as well as all other veterans' legislation, is continually under survey within my own department. I give it all the consideration possible within my own limited capacity, and it is also given consideration by my colleagues. That is evidenced by some of the facts which have been mentioned here today.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and the hon. member for Cape Breton South made reference to the new instructions which have been issued defining casual earnings for the purpose of the War Veterans Allowance Act and I suggest that anyone who reads these instructions will agree that this is not a definition which shows any lack of generosity, or indicates callousness on the part of the government. It is a very generous definition and one which will benefit a great number of recipients. The same is the case with regard to instructions on farm income.

Mr. Quelch: Would the minister put the definition regarding casual earnings on the record?

Mr. Lapointe: I would be very glad to do so but it is a rather extensive statement.

Mr. Quelch: There is no necessity to read it.

Mr. Brooks: The minister can have unanimous consent to put it on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister unanimous consent to place this definition on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lapointe: The definition is as follows:

Re: Casual earnings

The board has made a study of all cases which have been submitted by the district authorities in accordance with W.V.A.B. directive No. 17-1953 as amended and the chairman's letter dated August 24, 1953. As a result of this study the following instructions, which will supersede previous directives on the subject, are issued to cover all types of cases and the district authorities can now deal with them on the basis of the formula outlined hereunder.

Casual earnings exempted as income by Sec. 6.(d) of the War Veterans Allowance Act in respect of recipients under Sec. 3. of that act fall into four principal categories.

(a) Earnings by a recipient and/or his wife for work of an irregular nature commonly termed "odd jobs", i.e. small jobs complete in themselves for one or more employers.

These earnings are fully exempt.

(b) Earnings by a recipient and/or his wife resulting from part-time regular employment such as a caretaker for a church or school, a canteen attendant, a crossing guard, self-employment at home on a part-time basis, etc.

Earnings under this category may be exempt in an amount which will not exceed an average of two dollars per diem for 25 working days in any month.

(c) Earnings by a recipient and/or his wife resulting from full-time temporary employment of limited duration such as at summer camps, guard duties, collecting tickets at race tracks, replacing a regular employee on holidays, harvesting or other similar activities of relatively short duration.

Earnings under this category may be exempt for a period or periods of employment which do not exceed a total of 12 weeks in any V.A. year. Where such period or periods exceed 12 weeks in the V.A. year only the amounts earned during the first 12 weeks may be exempt and the other earnings will be considered as income.

The district authorities will suspend payment of the War Veterans Allowance as soon as full-time employment is reported by a recipient and will make the necessary adjustments in accordance with the above principles when such employment is terminated.

(d) A remuneration earned as a result of some isolated deal such as receiving a commission for helping sell or buy a property of or for a friend, provided such transaction is unusual, personal and direct between the recipient and the person concerned and not performed as an agent or sub-agent of a real estate firm or dealer.

Earnings under this category are fully exempt.

There may be some exceptional cases which the present directive does not appear to cover. If so, district authorities should refer such cases, with full particulars, for decision by the war veterans allowance board.

Cases which have been decided in accordance with former directives and which, if dealt with under the present directive, could be changed, may be reviewed, providing no adjustment shall be made for deductions on account of earnings prior to September 1, 1953.

As regards farm income which I understand was often a source of difficulty, we have a new definition which I think meets the demands made by the various veterans' organizations. Perquisites are no longer taken into consideration in computing the income of the farmer. Under the new formula 25 per cent on the first $1,000 gross income of the farmer veteran is considered as income, 40 per cent on the next $1,000 gross income, and 50 per cent on the third $1,000 gross income is considered as income under the act. If he prefers, he can keep an accounting of his farm operations and his net income would be established by his own books. Our own field man operating under the Veterans Land Act would help the veteran in this particular work.

I am simply mentioning these facts to show that the government always has under consideration the interests of the recipients of the war veterans allowance. Decisions in this regard are most important and have many serious implications. For the reasons I have mentioned, the government has not found it possible at this time to recommend the increases which have been requested.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Quelch: Will the minister deal with this one point? On the basis of the presumption that a veteran has pre-aged by ten years, and in view of the fact that at the age of 70 the means test has been lifted for the civilian, why has not the means test been lifted at the age of 60 for the veteran?

Mr. Lapointe: For one thing, I think the government would have to consider that most veterans are still working at age 60. Furthermore, I must point out to my hon. friend that this would mean that every veteran who, at one time or another, had spent one day overseas would automatically get war veterans allowance upon reaching the age of 60, whatever might be his financial circumstances. To me it is the equivalent of what is usually known as a service pension. In the past there have been discussions as to the desirability of having service pensions; that is, that every man who, at one time or another during his life, was in the active forces of Canada, by the fact of his service, whether he needed it or not or whether he was disabled or not, should receive a pension. When these discussions took place I believe the veterans organizations themselves did not press that point. They thought it was better to ask for appropriate disability pensions and various other means of assistance.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. Hansell: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: If the item is not being carried, Mr. Chairman, may I point out that it is after ten o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: I do not want to delay the committee, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I think there is perhaps at this time, on this day, some merit to what has been said. I want to make it clear that, in so far as I am concerned, the committee will sit only with unanimous consent. Is it the desire of the committee to complete this item tonight or is there to be further discussion?

Mr. Hansell: I should like to speak for a few minutes on it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: Then, Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: I believe that there are others in our group and some of those in the other groups who also wish to speak.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall start with the Department of Agriculture. Before the day is ended I hope that we shall find enough time to complete the veterans affairs items and to go on with mines and technical surveys.

It being thirty-five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 18, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SECRETARY OF STATE—REPLY TO QUESTIONS ASKED ON ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the other evening when my estimates were under discussion, I undertook with the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to reply to certain questions about the civil service commission about which I did not have information available at that time. I think the easiest way for me to reply, if you will permit me to do so, Mr. Speaker, is to read a letter I have received from the chairman of the civil service commission. It replies to both questions and I think that it contains practically all the information on the subject that can be put succinctly. The letter reads as follows:

June 17, 1954.

Dear Mr. Pickersgill,

With reference to the questions of Mr. Michener and Mr. Knowles last evening as to the number of "civil servants, in round figures, for whose appointment the civil service commission is responsible, and the total payroll of that group of civil servants", as well as "the balance of the payroll", and also "the number of permanent and temporary civil servants", the latest available information as contained in a memorandum of the dominion bureau of statistics for the month of February, 1954, shows that in the "classified" positions of the service, which are almost entirely composed of the appointments under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission, there were 135,884 employees with a payroll for the month of $34,819,104. Of these 76,938 were temporary and 58,946 were permanent employees. The comparative figure for 1949 was 123,924, of whom 86,015 were temporary and 37,909 were permanent.

In the remaining section of the service there were 22,245 prevailing rate employees, 10,861 casuals and 1,770 ships' crews, with a payroll for the month of February, 1954, of $6,850,943.

Yours faithfully,
C. H. Bland,
Chairman.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GENEVA CONFERENCE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER ATTENDANCE BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the turn of events in France and the possible bearing of that turn on the discussions with regard to Indo-China and other international problems, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs considering returning to Geneva?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not given consideration to that matter. The Korean part of the talks, as the hon. gentleman knows, has been completed, and that is the part of the conference with which we are most directly concerned. I do not think it would serve any useful purpose if I returned to Geneva for the continuation of the Indo-China talks.

REPORTED REQUEST BY UNITED STATES TO SEARCH SHIPS OF FOREIGN REGISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have not been able to give him any notice but he will understand why when I ask my question. Has the Canadian government received any representations from the United States government with regard to the reported demand or request of the United States authorities to search ships of foreign registry?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No request of that kind has been addressed to the Canadian government by the United States government.

AIRPORTS

YORKTON—REPAIRS TO RUNWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport or, in his absence, to his parliamentary assistant. What steps have been taken to have repairs made to the runways at the Yorkton airport where they have been rendered unsafe by the recent rains?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I am informed that the runways at Yorkton airport suffered some damage during the spring break-up and that T.C.A. had to suspend its service at that point pending the necessary repairs. I understand that these repairs have now been completed and that the service has been resumed.

I wish to add that our engineers are at present carrying out a complete survey in order to ascertain whether further repairs are needed. As soon as a report is received, everything possible will be done to carry out this year whatever additional repairs might be deemed to be necessary.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENTS TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the unanimous and wholehearted wish of all private members of the house, will the government even yet reconsider the matter of introducing legislation at this session respecting the War Veterans Allowance Act?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—
1. Departmental administration, $432,490.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find the vote on page 4 of the blue book and the details commence on page 76. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, when the committee last considered this item of the estimates on April 30 numerous members joined in expressing their pleasure at the fact that the Minister of Agriculture was restored to health and was back in the house. I should like to join those members in expressing my pleasure that the minister continues in good health and I hope he will for many long years. In his speech on April 30 the minister quoted quite a number of statistics regarding cash income from the sale of farm products for the last ten years. From these figures one would be led to believe that the agricultural industry in this country is quite prosperous, and the impression was left that it was not only prosperous in a general way but prosperous all over the country in every particular.

When I visited my riding not long ago I happened to meet a neighbour of mine who is a farmer. He went to town with me and on the way he said: "I am going to town because I have sold some of my cattle in order to meet the next payment on my farm improvement loan for my tractor." I asked him how it came about that he was selling cattle to meet this obligation, and he said that it had been a tough year. I said to him: "That cannot be so. The Minister of Agriculture says it is a very prosperous year and he has statistics to prove that you never had it so good." The reaction of my friend was rather astonishing or surprising. He was moved to quote Disraeli. I do not know whether he was conscious of quoting Disraeli but he said: "There are three kinds of lies; there are lies, damned lies and statistics."

That made me realize the importance of examining very carefully statistics which are put forward to support any argument. In the light of whatever knowledge I happen to have regarding statistics I thought it wise for me to examine the figures which had been given by the minister. I also thought it wise to try to increase my knowledge of statistics and the traps into which the unwary may fall if they try to follow statistics without examining very closely what they really mean. I remembered H. G. Wells' comment on our modern civilization when he said that statistics will one day be as necessary for efficient citizenship as the ability to read and write.

With the large volume of statistics that is being thrown at us by government bureaux and other organizations in recent years, I think that time has already arrived. After all, we must have very sceptical minds in order to deal intelligently with such things as advertisements for tooth paste, travel circulars, claims for patent medicines and some statements which are made by chronically optimistic cabinet ministers.

Therefore in self-defence I felt it was wise for me to try to learn a little more about statistics. In line with that idea I got a book which might help me to interpret statistics a little more accurately. I should like to quote from the introduction to the book. In one place it says:

> The secret language of statistics, so appealing in a fact-minded culture, is employed to sensationalize, inflate, confuse and oversimplify. Statistical methods and statistical terms are necessary when reporting the mass data of social and economic trends, business conditions, "opinion" polls, the census. But without writers who use the words with honesty and understanding and readers who know what they mean, the result can only be semantic nonsense.

The author goes on to say:

> This book is a sort of primer in ways to use statistics to deceive. It may seem altogether too much like a manual for swindlers. Perhaps I can justify it in the manner of the retired burglar whose published reminiscences amounted to a graduate course in how to pick a lock and muffle a football: The crooks already know these tricks; honest men must learn them in self-defence.

It is in self-defence that I have resorted to this book. Incidentally, the title of it is "How to Lie with Statistics". I do not mean to imply that dishonesty has been used by any cabinet minister. I think statistics are legitimate material for supporting an argument, but nevertheless by that very fact it becomes necessary for those who are required to present and support the other side of the argument to try to interpret these statistics intelligently. I should like to refer briefly to the speech that the minister made on April 30. It appears on page 4280 of Hansard and reads in part as follows:

I have in my hand a summary table, "cash income from the sale of farm products and from supplementary payments over the years, from 1942 down to the present". I have had those years following 1942 divided into three-year periods; my reason being that we have considered, in arriving at conclusions, that it is not advisable just to take one year and compare it with other years before or after.

It is much better to take three-year periods and compare one three-year period with a like three-year period. From 1943 to 1945 we had income from farm products in the east amounting to $655 million the first year, $703 million the second year and $770 million the third year, or a total of $2,128,562,000. Following the same plan, in the next three-year period we had in the east $2,871,173,000. But I think it probably would be better if I were to take east and west side by side rather than to go through one list and then the other. Therefore going back to the first three-year period, income from farm products amounted to $2,128,562,000 in the east and $2,858,770,000 in the west. In the next three-year period the figures are $2,871,173,000 in the east and $3,348,716,000 in the west. In the third period, from 1949 to 1951, the figures are $3,605,406,000 in the east and $3,952,669,000 in the west. So far as the last period is concerned, we have only gone through two years of it and the figures are $2,444,668,000 in the east and $3,129,903,000 in the west.

I have made an estimate of what the amount is likely to be over the three-year period, and at this time I will read the total amounts for all Canada in each of the three-year periods. They are: from 1943 to 1945, $4,987,332,000; from 1946 to 1948, $6,219,889,000; from 1949 to 1951, $7,558,075,000; and for the last period of two years $5,574,571,000. If I were to add to the last figure the estimate for the present year that total would be $8,200 million worth in each for farm products.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in examining those figures we must realize that, in the first place, in each case we are given two different bundles of figures; one for all of western Canada and the other for all of eastern Canada. Those figures are quite accurate: I do not reflect on them in any way. But it must be realized that they do not express in any way agricultural conditions in certain smaller areas which are bundled in with an area that may be prosperous. There is no reference to each year. There again, we have the statistics in a bundle and we have the figures for three years together. We may have a very bad year that will put a lot of farmers into bankruptcy, but when you lump that one year in with two other years that have been relatively good the result looks acceptable.

You will notice also, Mr. Chairman, that these figures are for cash income. There is not necessarily any relationship between a farmer's cash income and his profits for a year. There is no indication, either, of the number of farmers amongst whom this amount of money was divided. The minister gave no figures, and I have none, to indicate the number of farm operators who had to share this total cash income. There is no indication of the number of people who were fed from the products of the farmers who received this cash income. Our population is going up very rapidly. Canadian farmers are feeding 15 million people in Canada this year, at least to a great extent. Our food is not all produced in Canada, of course, but the major portion of it is. A number of years ago the population was much smaller, so the amount of food produced for the cash received has gone up and therefore the cash receipts should naturally go up in proportion for the individual farmer to be as well off.

Then, another thing of which we should take note is that so far as the figures for 1954 are concerned the minister made an estimate. He extrapolated two figures for last year and the year before and said they are probably such and so for the present year, and arrived at a figure for the three years in order to convince the farmers that they are prosperous. It may be possible to do that in some areas, but I am afraid the minister will not succeed in the area from which I come. In this area the small operator is in a continually worsening position. The big specialists who produce milk for cities and operate on a large scale near the city are getting a bigger and bigger slice of the cash income for farm products.

What I am chiefly concerned with, of course, is agricultural conditions in my own province of Prince Edward Island. I should like to put some figures in that regard on the record. The first thing I want to indicate is the cash income for 1951, 1952 and 1953. The figures in all cases are for three years. Incidentally, these were the figures the minister gave for all Canada. The figures for Prince Edward Island are as follows: for 1951, $26 million; for 1952, $31 million; and for 1953, it was down to $22 million, a drop of about 30 per cent in one year.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): Where did you get those statistics?

Mr. MacLean: I got them from the dominion bureau of statistics report on farm net income for 1953.

The net income for those three years is $17 million, $20 million and $12 million, that is a drop of 40 per cent in one year in the net income. After all, that is what the farmers' profits are.

Now, on the other side of the ledger, let us examine what has been happening to the farmers' operating costs. This applies to Prince Edward Island. We will start out with taxes. In 1951 the taxes were $475,000; in the next year, $516,000; and last year, $540,000, a continual increase. The figures for hired labour are as follows: $2,756,000; then, it went up to $3,168,000 and in 1953 dropped back to almost the 1951 point, $2,754,000. Then, we have interest on indebtedness, and I think these are significant figures. In 1951 it was $316,000; next year it rose to $325,000; and last year it was $346,000. The cost of tractors increased from $324,000 to $415,000 and then to $469,000. The cost of fertilizer increased from $1,962,000 to $2,684,000, and last year it was $2,844,000. The figures for building repairs are as follows: in 1951, $1,075,000; 1952, $1,358,000 and last year $1,425,000. There is a steady increase in that item.

Mr. Gardiner: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether my hon. friend would object to reading now what I said about the potato crop?

Mr. MacLean: I am sorry; I had intended to refer to that. I have it marked in his speech, and I thank the minister for having mentioned it. At page 4281 of Hansard the Minister of Agriculture made reference to the situation regarding the potato growers of Canada. He said:

> I think I should say a few words with regard to potatoes. There has been a situation in Canada recently which is quite different from that to which we have been accustomed. We are finding it more difficult to sell our potatoes in Canada than we have done for some little time. We had to sell our potatoes at the level which has been set under the measures we took from time to time to establish floor prices. We had to establish a price in relation to potatoes grown in the maritime provinces part of which are exported, and we have not been able to hold that price at the level which was established earlier, with the result that there is a possibility that the government may have to take some loss in connection with potatoes this year.

In fairness I wish to point that out—and I could quote further if the Minister of Agriculture wishes—to express our appreciation of the potato growers of the maritime provinces generally, and of my province in particular. Perhaps I should not say that I speak for the other maritime provinces, because they may not agree with me in this; but I do appreciate the effort which has been made by the federal government to stabilize the price of potatoes.

I cite these figures, not to be unnecessarily critical of the minister or of any other individual, but to try to bring to the attention of the public the fact that agriculture is not in a healthy condition in my province. I would like every citizen in this country to realize the seriousness of the situation, when agriculture is not healthy in every part of the country. This is particularly true of Prince Edward Island because we depend almost entirely on agriculture for our income. Of course we do have considerable income from the fishing industry as well as from the tourist industry; but those three combined are about the total. We have nothing to fall back upon worth speaking about.

Therefore when our agricultural industry is not prosperous it has a very depressing effect on our whole economy down in that province. The result is that debt increases; and it is a fact that the farmers in my province are continually going out of business. As farmers who have farmed all their lives reach the age of retirement, in many cases their farms are not turned over to the young men, or are not operated even by neighbouring farmers. They just become abandoned land.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): They were leaving the farms in good times, not only in your province but in Ontario as well. In good times they have been leaving the farms and going into industry.

Mr. MacLean: That is true; it is a general situation.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): And it is not any worse in the maritimes than elsewhere.

Mr. MacLean: I am not suggesting that it is. I am only saying the situation does exist in the maritimes, and in my province in particular. I think it is unfortunate because, as farms become abandoned, they place heavier carrying charges on the remaining operators, especially in connection with community facilities such as power, telephones, schools, churches and the like. I do not think there can be a healthy agricultural community made up of patches of large farms with abandoned areas in between.

It has been said that the farmers have been gouging the consumer for food, and the consumer is paying an unnecessarily high price for his food. It is said that the cost of living is going up unnecessarily, and that this is partly due to increased food costs. My contention is that the agricultural industry has made itself more efficient over the last few years at a rate which cannot be matched in many other industries—indeed, if it can be matched in any others. The average farmer is producing more per acre and per man than ever before, and the Canadian people are buying food at a smaller expense, so far as the farmer is concerned, than they ever had before. But there are other factors. The costs of processing and distribution have gone up alarmingly. Part of that is due to the fact that people want their food processed and canned, and practically ready to eat, when they take it off the grocer's shelves, whereas a number of years ago they purchased their food more in the raw state, and had to do more preparation at home before it was ready to eat.

I should like to point out that when a person buys a meal in a restaurant or eats a meal at home which has been purchased at a grocery store, the farmer gets an extremely small slice of the total cost. The mounting costs of food are due to the costs of processing and distribution. These costs may be justified, but they should be explained. And it should be explained to the Canadian people that the high cost of food is not because of the price the farmer is getting for it—in many cases, at any rate.

This was brought home to me forcibly by a friend of mine who was an official in my province of the Department of Agriculture. He attended a conference here in Ottawa last year, and while travelling to Ottawa he and his wife went into the dining car to have dinner. He said, "I was faced with a dilemma because most people quote prices in dollars—and that is fair enough, of course—but we in Prince Edward Island have come to think of potatoes as our official medium of exchange. It is from potatoes we have to earn our living. So when we went into the dining car I was faced with the problem of whether to buy a fifteen-bushel meal for myself and my wife or a twenty-bushel meal. We settled for a fifteen-bushel meal and I gave the waiter a three-peck tip, when I left.

The point is that the Canadian consumer is getting excellent value for the amount of his money that gets through to the primary producer, and the primary producer is more efficient than he has ever been before. But he is squeezed between lower prices on the one hand and rising costs on the other. He has to be efficient to survive. Competition is keener in the agricultural industry than perhaps in any other industry in the country; and anyone who is not efficient just cannot compete. It is important that the Canadian consumer be made to realize that, and I think it would be advisable if advertising were done by the Department of Agriculture, and perhaps by the industry, or various segments of it, to make people realize the excellent value they are getting for their food dollar.

Perhaps because of high-pressure advertising Canadian people have been led to believe that they should get the necessities of life cheaply. This is especially true of food. They expect to get those necessities so cheaply that they can save enough money to buy the luxuries that are pushed at them through high-pressure advertising in the press, and over the radio and television. Canadians will pay 35 cents or more for a quart of beer, but they will complain if the price of a quart of milk increases from 21 cents to 22 cents. And so it is, all down the line. The Canadian people should be disabused of this notion they have that the high cost of food is owing to the farmer gouging. That is not so. The Canadian farmer is more efficient than he has ever been before. He is more efficient than his opposite number in almost any industry. I would say to the Canadian people that when they complain about the high cost of food they should analyse the cost and see what causes it, and not jump to the conclusion that it is the farmer who is getting the benefit, because it is not always so. I do not think the farmer is getting his fair share of the benefits that come from his produce.

In that connection I should like to recommend to the Canadian people a brief quotation from Artemus Ward, and also to other people who read statistics and are exposed to them from time to time. He said:

> It ain't so much the things we don't know that get us in trouble. It's the things we know that ain't so.

Mr. Herridge: We have had a very thorough discussion in this house on the wheat marketing problem. While I recognize the importance of a satisfactory solution to that problem, and sympathize with the growers of wheat, I want to take about five minutes to bring to the minister's attention the particular problems that face the fruit growers of the interior of British Columbia.

I am quite sure the minister cannot complain about the amount of talking that has been done on behalf of the fruit growers during this session.

An hon. Member: Or elsewhere.

Mr. Herridge: Or elsewhere; quite correct. I think they are quite modest in the representations through their organizations, and the members representing fruit growing constituencies confine their remarks to the necessary comments.

I particularly wish to bring to the minister's attention the fact that the fruit growers of British Columbia, as a result of organization, and particularly good leadership, have done all they can within the limitations of present legislation, provincial and federal, to help themselves. This has been their policy all along. They believe in self-help, in doing all they can for themselves, and I am sure the minister will agree with that statement. I want to mention, particularly, the leadership at this time. We have been most fortunate in British Columbia in the leadership of the fruit growers organizations. At the present time we have Mr. Garrish, president of the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association, who as a grower has had a long experience in production and wide knowledge of fruit marketing problems; Mr. A. K. Loyd, chairman of Tree Fruits Limited, is a grower of long experience, with very extensive knowledge also of domestic and international marketing problems so far as fruit is concerned. Then we have Mr. L. R. Stevens, secretary-manager of the Okanagan Federated Shippers. He has a particular knowledge of marketing and also a particular knowledge of the application of dumping duties, particularly with respect to the soft fruits and their effect upon the growers' income in British Columbia. The growers of British Columbia want the government to do what they can to help them to help themselves in two particular respects at this time.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the British Columbia fruit growers operate in the farthest north section of this continent for apple and soft fruit production on a commercial scale. In fact, British Columbia is between 400 miles and 500 miles north of the centre of the United States soft fruit producing area. That presents a particular problem for the soft fruit producers of British Columbia. This means that weeks before British Columbia fruits and vegetables appear on the Canadian market the California product is being shipped into the western Canada markets and providing the Canadian consumers with an opportunity to do their canning often quite early in the summer. I maintain, the growers maintain and their leaders maintain that for this reason alone British Columbia fruit growers believe they are entitled to particular and careful consideration in the application of dumping duties; that is the day to day situation must be watched very carefully. I see I have the support of the hon. member for Kootenay East in this respect.

They do not believe in the government permitting unfair competition when Canadian crops are in good supply. That is all they are asking for. The government should watch this dumping situation very closely and see that dumping duties are applied in a flexible way in the interests of the British Columbia fruit growers when Canadian production is in good supply. Sixty per cent of Canada's imports of fruit and vegetables come in duty free; so U. S. producers have a fair situation in that regard as far as the quantity admitted from the United States is concerned. Potatoes are free for forty-six weeks of the year, and then pay a duty of $7.50 a ton for the rest of the year. On the other hand, the United States have a tariff of $7.50 the year round against potato imports, and if the quota of table potatoes is over 1 million bushels, I am informed that the tariff is then raised to $15. I think we have been particularly fair in this respect.

I want also to bring to the attention of the minister another fact to illustrate how the growers of British Columbia have tried to help themselves. It may interest the members of the committee to know that the fruit industry in British Columbia was the only section of agriculture in Canada which, prior to the Geneva conference on trade and tariffs, got Canadian and United States interests together and decided on a course of marketing action to the advantage of the growers of both countries. As the result of consultation, common sense and a degree of compromise in that regard, I am informed there was agreement to ship a certain quantity and variety of apples particularly to eastern markets. That is a trend that should be developed. This action is an excellent demonstration of what can be done, when producing groups on both sides of the line get together and face their common problems.

In addition to urging very careful consideration of the necessity for the application of flexible dumping duties at the right time, the fruit growers of British Columbia want the government to give particular attention to taking every advantage of every opportunity to get our fruit into the United Kingdom market again. While they appreciate the difficulties of the United Kingdom government, the increase of apple production in the United Kingdom, and the fact that the growing of certain varieties that we have been in the habit of growing in previous years, has affected the British Columbia growers market. We urge the minister to do all he can to secure a market in the United Kingdom for even a few million boxes of apples. The recapture of a portion of the United Kingdom market would have a most beneficial effect upon the tree fruit industry in British Columbia and I understand the maritimes. We grow certain varieties of apples in British Columbia to better advantage than they can be grown anywhere else on the North American continent. The Cox Orange is grown better in British Columbia than anywhere else on the North American continent, because of certain climatic conditions. We also have other varieties, Newtown pippins and other varieties of that type, that are popular in Great Britain that we grow to particular advantage. On behalf of the growers organizations I do urge the minister and his officials to do everything they can to recapture some of the market for Canadian apples in Great Britain.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, this question of the importation of potatoes has, I am fully aware, been discussed by me in the throne speech when I first raised the question and later on when I asked questions about it. In view of the fact that recent representations have been sent to the Minister of Agriculture and others I feel that I must heartily endorse what the hon. member who has just spoken said. While I do not find myself too often on the same side as the hon. member for Kootenay East, I see that we are in agreement on this question at least. We must try to give a certain measure of protection to this industry if it is going to continue.

At this particular time I should like to draw a note to the attention of the minister that appeared in the Country Guide of April, 1954, of a different tenor. It is not too amusing when one considers its far-reaching implications. The heading is, "The Disguised Potato". The article says in part:

> Capping it all is the "Case of the Disguised Potato", which is causing agricultural sleuths a good deal of concern on the local markets. United States shippers have been trying to pull a fast one on British Columbia housewives by offering an "early, red-skinned" potato that showed a remarkable talent for sprouting when displayed on the stands. Investigation revealed them to be old-crop, white-skinned potatoes which had been dyed red and then waxed to give that new-potato look. Potatoes with make-up! Shades of Max Factor—what won't they think of next!

Well, they certainly have the new look if they are red. You can understand the feelings of many British Columbia housewives who thought they were buying new potatoes and discovered they had bought potatoes with make-up. I think that potatoes should not be allowed to come in in disguise, and certainly they should not appear in that condition on the market and be sold to housewives as new potatoes.

As regards the other matter of importation duty, I would strongly urge the minister to discuss with the Minister of National Revenue the desirability of trying to get the act changed in time for next session because I am sure such a change would meet with universal approval, and certainly we would support it. That change should embody a more elastic provision. Such tariff should come into force when the second early potatoes come in from the United States. This would certainly seem to remedy the difficulty. Our British Columbia early potato growers have their potatoes arriving on the market when the second earlies from the United States come on our market, with the result that the United States first earlies are put on the British Columbia market at a dumping price. Unfortunately, that dumping price is not one that can be considered as such because the United States has dropped the price on their home market, and therefore this does not come within the dumping regulations. Other potatoes are not yet on sale, and having been stored they have that greenish look. The result is that when they are put on the market they merely cut down the price to which the British Columbia grower is legitimately entitled for his first early potatoes and he is placed in the unfair position of having to compete with the United States product.

Now, another product which comes in under a similar category is the turkey. We believe that the turkey raisers have a legitimate complaint and we think they should have some further protection on the turkey market. We find that the consumption of United States turkeys in Canada has increased considerably because our industry is not getting the form of protection to which it feels it is entitled. One might ask why United States turkeys are being permitted into this country and how the United States turkey producers can raise and sell them so much more cheaply if the price of feed and other grain is the same as it is in Canada. The reason for it is that in the state of Oregon, for example, the banks own a large number of these ranches by way of loan and they force the turkey raisers to sell their turkeys and flood the market from time to time by giving notice that they intend to recall their loan, with the result that these producers have to sell their turkeys in the nearest market which is accessible, and that happens to be the Canadian market. In certain areas we find our own markets being flooded with birds being dumped from across the border, although they cost the United States consumers the same price; and that is where our difficulty originates. The effect of that is felt by the grain growers of Canada. They probably have not thought of this angle, though I think it is worth considering.

Last year about 250,000 United States birds were sent into Canada. The consumption of that number of birds would indirectly affect the use of five million bushels of feed grain.

Now, five million bushels of wheat and other grains is not a tremendous amount out of our colossal surplus of 700 million bushels, and I quite realize that, but at the same time every five million bushels helps and we know that these imported birds consume that amount of grain.

I hope the minister will use his influence with the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance, in considering the problem of potatoes and turkeys, to see whether we cannot have a greater amount of protection for the British Columbia industry.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order: I do not wish to interfere with the desire of hon. members to express themselves at this stage, but of the last two speeches one has dealt with fruit and the other with potatoes and turkeys, and I think it would be better if we could withhold the discussion on these matters until we come to the items covering them. I know it has always been customary to allow a general discussion on the condition of agriculture, but when it comes to dealing with such things as the sale of turkeys and fruit I think we should reserve that until we come to the item dealing with them so that I can give whatever information is available and deal with questions in a manner which would be helpful. I am suggesting that, and I hope hon. members who have something to say about a particular item will reserve their remarks until that item is called.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the subject of wheat would be relevant to this discussion. My name has been mentioned by the last two hon. members who have spoken and they have indicated that they support me, perhaps more than I support them, in the matter of dumping duties and tariffs on soft fruits and vegetables at this time of the year. I want to say that I certainly support the plea for protection on behalf of our growers who supply fresh fruit and early vegetables, not only because a tariff is necessary to protect them at this time but because I know that their products are of superior quality when they reach the market. A large number of people are inveigled into buying products that are old and somewhat withered although they might appear to be new vegetables.

On the other hand, just yesterday I received a telegram from a hospital society in my riding which wanted to know why a duty was put on new potatoes at this time while they were unable to obtain that product on the local market or from British Columbia producers. I took this matter up and I understand it is an automatic impost having regard to the fact that there are fluctuations in the seasons, and for that reason it is statutory and also prevents the suppliers from stocking up and selling at a later date as fresh vegetables the products which have been harvested some time before.

Mr. Hahn: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he be in favour of my proposal that the government refrain from imposing this duty until United States secondaries come in? That, to my mind, would assure that Canadian first earlies would be available for this hospital.

Mr. Byrne: I think that is probably a reasonable suggestion. As I said, my riding is so diversified that it is difficult to know just what is going to work in the best interest of the entire area. It might be interesting just at this point to tell you that last fall I was asked by the miners' union to journey to St. Louis, Missouri, to speak on the resolution that was being presented to the government of the United States asking that they do not introduce any further tariffs on lead and zinc. I gladly took that opportunity and I know that the resolution passed unanimously. I therefore cannot come out too strongly—after that decision which I think was the right one—and ask that impositions be put on materials and foodstuffs that the working people are required to purchase. However, I think there is a happy medium that we can reach. I think the farmer and the industrial worker must appraise their various situations and see that one does nothing that is going to injure the other. It is for that reason that I am on my feet on this occasion.

In the past few days, Mr. Chairman, we have had a great deal of discussion during which the opposition, and more particularly the C.C.F. opposition, have asked us to put a floor price on wheat. Such a floor price, in effect, at some stage or other would mean a subsidy. Reference has been made to a $65 million payment which was made by this parliament some years ago and which I voted to grant. While no one admits that it was a subsidy, however we may look at it, in effect it was a grant in lieu of certain payments which the farmers felt should have been made. They maintain that their price was stabilized at a certain given period and that they could have received a higher price if it had not been stabilized. But of course those who speak only for the farmers neglect to remind the House of Commons that for many years industrial wages were stabilized and that the prices of industrial products were stabilized. For instance, in the particular industry in which I work, all during the war there was one set price. Almost at the opening of the war a price was set. The product remained at that price throughout the war and the wages of the people working in that industry remained almost static. It is for this reason that I say we want to work together and that no one should do or say anything that is going to injure the other.

On December 2 of last year I took exception to a statement that had been made by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort. I regret that he is not in his seat at the moment. However, we cannot pick and choose our time for making these replies but must make them as the opportunity presents itself at any given time. I took exception to the statement that he made with regard to the price of fertilizer. I think I can relate this question of fertilizer closely to the price and the cost of production of this extremely important product that we have been discussing for the past few days, namely, wheat. As with any other product, if you raise 20 bushels to the acre it costs you a certain figure, having regard to the cost of the seed, the wear and tear on machinery, the over-all cost of the land itself and of harvesting. It costs almost as much to raise 20 bushels as it does to raise 40 bushels. That fact has been brought out in the house, I think. I know that on a recent trip to the west I visited in southern Alberta and discussed this matter with some farmers. They said that the crops they have had during the last three years have not cost them nearly as much to produce —that is, per bushel—as did the crops during the previous ten years. They therefore could conceive of receiving a lower price without there being any such catastrophe as has been indicated here, or without any disastrous effect on their economy as a result of receiving a slightly lower price. When I say this I am going to give some advice, perhaps. Even if I had not had some experience in the growing of wheat, I would consider myself qualified to do so after sitting here for the last five years and hearing the discussions, which are many, with regard to this question.

The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort indicated that the fertilizer industry was gouging the farmers.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Hear, hear.

Mr. Byrne: He indicated that the cost of fertilizer was almost double or three times what it was in relation to wheat in 1939. The hon. member says "hear, hear".

An hon. Member: There, there.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort said that the figure I gave of 100,000 tons of fertilizer being used on the prairie provinces in 1953 gave an increased production of 35 million bushels was incorrect. The hon. member maintained that the most this could amount to would be 15 million bushels. Incidentally, he said that these figures are from the dominion bureau of statistics and cannot be denied. My purpose in rising today then is to deny that very statement he has made.

One hundred thousand tons of fertilizer will fertilize about 5 million acres, at the recommended amount of 40 pounds to the acre. With the hon. member's figure of 15 million bushels, this would amount to an average increase of about 3 bushels to the acre, or less, having regard to the amount applied in different areas. It would be extremely difficult for a sales manager of a fertilizer company to convince the farmer that this increase would be of very great assistance to him.

The hon. member stated that these were figures from the dominion bureau of statistics, taken, of course, from the experiments of the federal experimental farms. I do not know how the figures became so twisted but it is possible that the plots used by the dominion experimental farm would be areas that have been from time to time built up—that is, the soil itself would be built up—to such a condition, because of crop rotation and so forth, that the introduction of fertilizer would not have a great effect. I have here a report of the Dominion of Canada information service, No. E-97, on the subject of fertilizers for northeastern Saskatchewan. The report was released on March 22, 1954, and reads in part as follows:

> Ammonium phosphate 11-48-0 has been applied to cereal crops grown on summer fallow at the experimental station at Melfort for the past 14 years. Agronomist B. K. McDonald says a summary of these results on Melfort silty clay soil for wheat has shown an average yield increase of 6·0 bushels per acre for wheat, 12·5 bushels for barley and 8·2 bushels for oats when the 40 pound rate of 11-48-0 was used. These yield increases have given net returns of $5.50 per acre for wheat, $6 for barley and $2 for oats.

Now an hon. member stated that these statistics cannot be denied. I wonder if he would take the word of the University of Saskatchewan and accept the results they give in a table I have here with respect to the use of a similar type of fertilizer. This circular was issued by the department of soils, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, in February, 1952. A rate of application of 25 pounds per acre in 1941, a dry year, produced a result of 2·8, and in 1942, a moist year, a result of 11·3. The average from 1939 to 1943 was 7·9 bushels. That of course is for wheat.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the hon. member indicate where that test was made?

Mr. Byrne: If you will allow me, I will finish this table first. A rate of application of 50 pounds per acre showed an increase of 4·5 bushels in 1941, a dry year, 13·4 bushels in 1942, a moist year, and from 1939 to 1943 the average was 10·2 bushels per acre. These tests were made in various areas throughout Saskatchewan. They were not in any one particular plot.

Mr. Nicholson: The first one was at Melfort. Would you indicate where the second one was?

Mr. Byrne: There are several distinct areas. But I have figures showing an even better yield from other areas. This is on summer-fallow in Saskatchewan in the dark brown area. I am sure the hon. member knows more about the areas of Saskatchewan than I do. I know one of course very well, Maple Creek, the area from which the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek comes. Perhaps some would attack the use of fertilizers for large crops there in a very dry and sandy soil. However, the hon. member knows the areas better than I do. In the dark brown soil zone 71 tests made with a 20-pound application produced an increase of 4 bushels per acre, and with a 40-pound application 5·5 bushels per acre. In the black soil zone 83 tests showed an increase of 5·2 bushels with a 20-pound application and an increase of 7·2 bushels with a 40-pound application. There is another area called the degraded black and grey soil zone. With a 20-pound application there was an increase of 4 bushels per acre and with a 40-pound application an increase of 6·2 bushels.

Mr. Cardiff: Forty pounds to the acre?

Mr. Byrne: Forty pounds to the acre. In saying this I want it to be understood that I want to co-operate in every way to assist the farmers. There are a large number of farmers in my own riding. But I do think that the facts should be kept straight. In that way we can assist one another. If the fertilizer industry continues to expand, as I hope it will—and I see no reason why it should not—if the farmers are acquainted with the facts and are desirous of raising the largest amount of grain or other products they can on the smallest acreage, then they will be able to do so by making use of fertilizer.

I am sure the house would be interested to know something about the situation in Kimberley where this fertilizer is made. At the present time one unit is supplying the market, but there is a potential market on the prairies four times what we have now. This one unit leaves a residue, from the processing of iron sulphides, of about 200 tons of pig iron daily when it reduces the iron tailings from the Sullivan mine to produce sulphuric acid for the production of fertilizer. I had the interesting experience of visiting the laboratory of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys the other day and I saw steel being made out of this pig iron. On a second trip I saw the steel being rolled out, and from all appearances it is going to be the finest of steel. Of course that requires a good deal of experimentation, but it is hoped that we will be able to make steel of the very finest grade.

We hope to expand the industry and by so doing we will be able to pay more taxes and provide more jobs. If a subsidy should become necessary for certain farm products we will certainly be glad to pay it, but I say: Live and let live. The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort also said when he was home at Christmas his neighbours were pledging themselves by way of a petition to refuse to buy fertilizer. I do not know whether or not the hon. member signed the petition. I suppose it was a bit unfair to delve into this matter further, but the hon. member said that he had delved into my figures so I took the opportunity to examine his. I find that despite the fact that such a petition was circulated in that area asking the farmers not to buy fertilizer, a syndicate known as Cariboo Farms, and I believe owned by Bryson Brothers, took delivery of 11 tons of fertilizer this spring. If the hon. member encouraged other farmers to sign the petition and signed it himself he nevertheless did not see fit to abstain from buying this material, which apparently gives pretty fair results.

There is another matter that I should like to discuss at this time, the question of the extension of the P.F.R.A. into the province of British Columbia. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, as the name implies, provides assistance only in the prairie provinces. Now, British Columbia's population is rapidly expanding, and we hope it will continue to do so. We have some extremely arid areas in the province. Recently, of course, as on the prairie provinces, there has been sufficient rain to grow hay crops and so on, but the rainfall is not dependable. I feel that in order to supply this ever-expanding population we should have this very fertile soil under irrigation. We have other areas also, of course, that are in need of reclamation. I see no reason why, now that we have these very large wheat surpluses, we should not look towards the development of other crops. Certainly in British Columbia, where we have a much longer growing season, we could undertake more diversified crops. There is no argument against giving assistance, as has been done on the prairies. I am looking forward to having the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act changed at an early date to omit the word "prairie" and make it just the farm rehabilitation act.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder whether the minister could indicate if he has reports concerning the flood damage in northeastern Saskatchewan during recent weeks, and if so the extent of the damage done? My information is that seeding was delayed for a very long time, and that flood damage has been very serious over quite an extended area. I would appreciate it if he could make some statement as to the extent of the damage, and whether any benefits might be available to the people in the area under federal legislation?

Mr. Gardiner: Going back to what I said a few moments ago, I will be in a position to do that when we get to the item covering it, but not on this general item.

Mr. Nicholson: The other matter I was going to raise concerns policy, and I think perhaps this would be the appropriate time to take a minute to do so. I do not plan on reopening the wheat debate. An editorial in the Leader-Post the other day suggested that wheat production is still profitable at the prevailing price, and what is more, farmers could augment their returns from feed grains by feeding livestock and selling them on the hoof instead of selling the grain. I am sure the western farmers will appreciate that free advice, as will eastern farmers.

However, if that advice is to be taken seriously, the minister should give some indication that the government is prepared to stand by somewhere along the line. The Leader-Post also mentioned that the request made here in parliament would entail an average annual handout of probably $50 million per year to the Canadian wheat producers.

Mr. Gardiner: I think if we are ever going to get through with this discussion we have to have some rules. The marketing of wheat does not come under this department at all. It has been discussed now for several days and I do not think we should discuss it again on the estimates of this department because this department does not handle the marketing of wheat.

Mr. Nicholson: No, I am aware of that. I am saying that if farmers have to go into livestock, the government should indicate that livestock prices are not going to go down the way they did during the thirties. I may say that during my sojourn on the farm I acted on some advice the minister gave from time to time that it would be a good idea to sell some of the damp and tough grain back in 1951 as livestock. We therefore bought from one of our neighbours his herd of cattle, and we have had the company of those cattle now for three years. I was just checking the prices listed by the bureau of statistics the other day, and I find that the price in November, 1951, for medium cows was $23.07, and in this year it is $11.56; for yearlings, common, $13.50 now and in 1951, $29.46.

The point I am making is that if our neighbour would like to have those cattle back now we could give him two head for every one we got from him, and we would not charge him anything for the feed or for the company of the cattle during that period. If he should buy them back and keep them for another two or three years, I wonder if at the end of that time he would need to sell us twice as many as he is getting. We have had very good luck with cattle, but I think the government should indicate at some point whether or not they are going to give some protection to farmers in all parts of Canada. If there is not going to be a floor for grain a very large number of farmers are going to be obliged to go into livestock. It is quite possible there may be a further drop in the price of livestock. Could the minister indicate, even if he is not prepared to give some assurance, that if a large volume of this grain goes into cattle or pigs the bottom will not drop out of the cattle market altogether?

Mr. Fulton: I just wanted to say a word or two of a general nature on this matter. Perhaps the point at which the hon. member for Mackenzie stopped is as good a one as any for me to start, because I intended to ask the minister if, during the course of his estimates, he would say a word about departmental policy with respect to livestock marketing. The figures given by the hon. member for Mackenzie give an indication of the general experience across the whole of the country. They vary a little from market to market and they may not be necessarily in accordance with the present price in Vancouver, where our livestock is marketed in the main, but they indicate the experience we have been having in British Columbia. Our experience has been that during the last two years cattle prices have been halved; actually, it is a decline of 100 per cent although it depends upon which end you start from. Some might say it is 50 per cent decline.

Inasmuch as farmers' costs have not come down—at least, I have not any accurate figures to show whether they have gone up or remained stationary, but by and large I think it would be correct to say they are the same, if not higher than they were two years ago. It will be seen that the substantial decline in price represents a serious problem to the livestock producers of British Columbia. They would like to hear from the minister some forecast of the government's policy with respect to livestock marketing.

Unfortunately, I am not able at this time to discuss the problem with respect to grading, as I should like to do, but I suggest there are certain weaknesses in the grading system. These weaknesses result in a very large spread between the returns to the farmers for the cattle in comparison with what the packers get for the different grades themselves. I have on the order paper a resolution which precludes me from going into detail on that matter at this time, although I hope next year to follow up that resolution and have a discussion of the problem. Perhaps the minister might say a word or two on that subject when he deals with the general one, as I hope he will, of the government's policy with regard to the marketing of livestock.

I should like to say just a word or two in support of what was said by the hon. member for New Westminster in connection with the potato situation. I will keep my remarks quite general; but I think it is proper to make them here because this is a problem requiring co-operation between this department and the Department of National Revenue.

In the constituency I represent, the potato growers operate under two different marketing boards, depending upon where they are. But, by and large, in the Kamloops and Ashcroft districts they operate under the interior vegetable board, whereas in the Pemberton district, with which the minister is particularly familiar they operate under the coast vegetable marketing board. But the problems of marketing and the difficulties with which they are confronted, as a result of the importation of American potatoes, are very much the same.

When I was down at Pemberton last summer they told me it was a great pity that the benefits which it had been expected would be derived from the extensive and generally successful reclamation works carried on by the Department of Agriculture under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration were not being realized because of the difficulties they were having in marketing their potatoes.

The solution seems largely to lie in an intelligent and flexible application of the seasonal duties against the importation of American potatoes. I suggest a fixed seasonal duty is not of much value in assisting our growers because of the difference from season to season in the period during which potatoes come on the market. From year to year the season varies, and the time at which our potatoes come on would be as early in some cases as July or the end of June, whereas in other years they would not come on until well into July, or perhaps August. I do not know whether my dates are exactly correct, but I mention these dates to point out the variation in the dates in which potatoes are offered as between one part of the riding and another.

If a protective seasonal duty is fixed absolutely it will not take account of seasonal climatic variations between one year and another. I would therefore ask the Minister of Agriculture if he would bring the influence of his department to bear on the Department of National Revenue so as to have the application of that protective measure made more flexible.

My understanding is that at the present time it is fixed by statute and, as such, it is not of much benefit to us. I do not think it would have any adverse effect either on consumers or on American producers if it were made more flexible. It would simply enable the growers to take account of seasonal variations from year to year.

I have had telegrams—and I am sure other hon. members on both sides of the house in all parties, including the minister have also had them—indicating that this year, because of the lateness of the season, the protection fixed by statute coming into effect on certain fixed dates is not going to be of any assistance to them. I am hoping therefore that we might be able to persuade the government to amend the act so as to provide for a flexible period, but at no higher rates. We are not asking for higher rates; we are asking only that the season during which these rates are applicable be made more flexible. I would hope the minister would give some indication as to whether his department can make any progress with the Department of National Revenue along these lines. I hope he will be able to say something which will reassure the producers of livestock who, in my section of the country at any rate, are very much concerned as a result of the decline in prices—a decline which has not been accompanied by a corresponding decline in their costs of production.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I think I should say just a word on this matter of potatoes. A resolution did come in about a week ago from British Columbia—I do not remember the exact date—suggesting that the dates, which now stand at June 15 to August 1, should be changed to July 1 to August 15. I have had that matter submitted to our officials and have asked them to take it up with other departments to see what can be done about it.

I am somewhat surprised to hear that these things are set by statute, because such matters are submitted to me from time to time for my opinion. If they are controlled by statute I do not see how my opinion could have much effect.

However, I shall look into the matter. We now have it under consideration, and we will see what can be done about it.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks at this time regarding the value of extended research in the agricultural industry. As most of us know, agriculture is still the backbone of our Canadian economy, and this economy to a very large extent is dependent upon the farmer as the greatest consumer of the products of industrial labour.

It certainly follows that any reduction in farm income will be felt by way of reduced incomes of people living in cities and towns. Figures offered by hon. members have shown that farm income has been reduced in the east by approximately 35 per cent and in the west by about 15 per cent in the last several years. This would seem to be an average reduction of income of about 25 per cent.

Cheap food and a high level of employment do not go together at all. Any depression, which nowadays, I believe, we call a recession, is always preceded—at least that has been so in the past—by a mounting surplus of agricultural products. This is well exemplified in Canada at the present time by the very large surplus of wheat and by a surplus of milk products.

I think we have to face these facts in order that we shall not repeat some of the mistakes we made in the past. At the present time, despite government statements to the contrary, there is little doubt that many of us would agree that Canada is at present still faced with a rather dangerous economic situation. I should like just for a few minutes to make a few remarks to indicate what has led up to this potentially dangerous economic situation—and I shall not describe it as a crisis. We can go back a little while to cost-plus government contracts, necessary as they may have been in the production of implements of war, and describe them as probably the greatest single factor in starting the long inflationary spiral of prices which brought about increased wages, increased costs, increased taxes and demands for subsidies.

I believe we would all agree that the current problem facing agriculture today could be solved if some way could be devised to get rid of the surpluses of farm products now piling up in Canada and—this is equally important—in the United States. It is quite true that international markets indicate a demand for farm products, but they also are faced with the problem of little or no money, with the result that farm surpluses both here and in the United States are simply not moving into the markets where they should be moving.

This problem was recognized a few years ago when it was suggested that a fund be established under the United Nations to provide for the distribution of surplus agricultural production, under the United Nations, to countries where these products were needed. This was then and certainly is today a very good idea. But unfortunately it is one which it is very difficult to implement. As a result, nothing has been done about it. I have heard people argue this point—and I suppose it can be argued in the present instance—that there has never been a true surplus of farm products in the world because there have always been people without enough food. But the fact remains that huge surpluses are now piling up on this continent, and are having a disastrous effect upon our economy—and will have an even more disastrous effect in the future.

The basic problem is not only whether other nations want or need our food or whether or not our farmers can produce it—they certainly can—but whether or not people in those other countries can pay for it and pay for it in some form of currency that we can use. It is this problem which has had such a devastating effect upon our most stable export markets in the past and which I am sure is evidenced by the record of our lost markets in the United Kingdom. Here in Canada our comparatively small population, combined with the high fertility of our soil, gives us a very heavy dependence on export markets. We have found by experience many times in our short history that one of the major problems in building dependable export markets for foodstuffs is the ease with which most importer countries can either do without, buy elsewhere, or themselves increase their domestic food production.

Take as an example our market for agricultural products in the United Kingdom. For years Canadian farmers were the largest exporters of food products into the British markets, selling as they did the big proportion of their imports of oats, wheat, wheat flour, bacon, cheese, condensed milk, apples, salmon, lumber and many other products. From supplying 96 per cent of their total imports of oats, 27 per cent of their total imports of beans, 43 per cent of their total imports of beef and 83 per cent of their total imports of bacon, today we sell hardly any of these products and the volume of our exports has also been seriously reduced.

True, it made good economic sense for Canada to produce large quantities of a variety of food products to supply the British market, but the bald fact is that economic considerations of national importance to the United Kingdom have made it difficult for them to buy from us and pay for it in currency we could use; in other words, it is the sterling problem which has been mentioned so often in this house. Nor could we as a nation, much as we desire to help other countries and especially the United Kingdom, be expected continually to give away our products whether by direct gifts of money or as produce. The economic realities of this fact were clearly expressed by both countries, the United States and the United Kingdom, as one of trade, not aid.

Our experience in selling farm products in the British market conclusively proves another problem confronting agriculture and that is that, for many reasons, economic considerations do not have the same practical effect on the international trade in foodstuffs as they do on trade in other materials. We find that barter deals, bulk buying, price supports and other devices really do not give any assurance of stability of markets for the producer.

As we lost the British market for our primary producers, we were able during and after the war to find export outlets in the United States, and this was also accompanied by a highly speeded-up increase in home consumption. High levels of employment in Canada resulted in greater demand at home for the produce of our farms. This, coupled with the increased exports to the United States, meant that for a while the full impact of the loss of British markets was not felt.

Today, however, we are confronted with the unpleasant fact that these alternative markets are rapidly dwindling. High costs of production in Canada, due to high taxes, higher wage levels than in countries competing with Canadian textile industry and others, such as Japan, Belgium, Germany and so on, have made it increasingly difficult to sell our manufactured goods both abroad and at home. The Minister of Labour has not given out the most recent figures of those seeking jobs, but the ones that were available a month ago indicated that there were over half a million persons still seeking jobs in Canada, which is a much higher number than those seeking jobs in other years, not to mention those on short work weeks, which has reduced the earning power for the industrial worker and has accordingly seriously reduced his ability to buy not only manufactured goods but farm products as well. Here is a very important fact, and I think it ties in particularly with the Canadian situation.

Increasing surpluses in the United States, arising in part at least from the fact that they too have lost export markets abroad, have resulted in embargoes being placed against imports of agricultural products from Canada. Our alternative market for dairy products formerly sold in the United Kingdom was shut out by the United States embargo against their import. This was later followed by our government's voluntary agreement with the United States to restrict our export of oats to that country until October, 1954, when the situation will be reviewed.

Like Canada, the United States today is confronted with a tremendous surplus of primary products for which there appears no immediate export market. It is expected that at the end of this crop year the United States government will be holding in storage approximately $5,500,000,000 worth of surplus produce purchased by the government but at present without demand in any export markets able to pay prevailing prices for their purchases. I understand that in the United States of course they have schemes for subsidizing exports to help matters at home, but I do not think that has any particular effect on the basic principle and the basic danger involved. Indications point to a desire by the government of the United States to distribute some of these huge surpluses to other countries under its system of aid to combat communist aggression. We have seen examples of that in the past. This of course increases the difficulty of selling our farm products abroad because if countries can get food for nothing, why pay for it? While it is not conceivable that such a policy would be followed as an accepted policy of dumping, the fact remains that whatever action is taken along this line will be adversely felt in Canada.

We are also confronted with the problem of surpluses rapidly accumulating. We have not yet sold one bushel of last year's wheat crop. If the minister is able to make some comment on that later, certainly we shall welcome it. This is only one product surplus in the United States. In addition to that we are apparently now being faced with the possibility at least of a price war on the international wheat market, which we have heard so much about in the last few days. The question is, what will happen to the export markets we are now supplying? Can these nations be expected to buy from us at prevailing prices if the same or substitute products can be secured for less money or, as mentioned before, for no money at all elsewhere?

If we take the long-term view on a suggested solution to the problem of markets for our agricultural products, it seems to me wise for us to start and consider now how, with the exception of wheat, and possibly a few other products, the output of our agricultural industry can be largely consumed at home.

True, over the years the population of Canada will increase and steps are being taken along that line now. But what we are interested in at the moment is not something that is going to take place ten years, twenty years, thirty years or forty years from now, but something that will take place shortly. It is true that our population may be 40 million people fifty years from now, but that is not going to answer the questions confronting us at the moment. We should direct our attention now to the possibilities ahead in the field of speeded-up research to find industrial uses for Canadian agricultural products. During the last ten years we have experienced a tremendous increase of industrialization in Canada. The demand for raw materials for industry has increased to a point that would not have been imagined ten years ago. Most of these raw materials came, of course, originally from the soil. It is quite true that climatic conditions in this country prevent many of these raw materials from ever being produced in Canada. Nevertheless, the fact remains that that quantity of raw materials needed by industry could be produced by the primary producers of this country if the facts were properly made known to them. In other words, some of the land area of this country, now devoted to the production of food products, of which there is at present a surplus supply, could profitably be directed to the production of new and different crops for which available home markets do or could exist in Canada.

The reasoning behind this proposal is very simple. All over the earth man cultivates only about 1,500 species of plants. Botanists have already named over 300,000 species. In the United States, where great strides are being made to find industrial uses for agricultural productive capacity, the commercial agricultural production of that nation comes from fewer than 300 species of plants and by far the most of it from fewer than 30 species, notwithstanding the fact that there are over 15,000 kinds of plants native to North America north of the Gulf of Mexico.

It is quite understandable that in the past man cultivated only a few species of plants because until the last century man was pretty well limited by what he was able to handle and utilize. Today, however, engineering science has provided machines to do work previously considered impossible and chemists have given us the means to convert various kinds of plant material into useful commodities previously unknown. Examples of this are many and obvious. But, Mr. Chairman, I see my time is running short and I do not think I will take up the time of the committee to go into the long list of examples I have here. In this country no real effort has yet been extended towards any systematic examination of species of plants that will grow in this country to determine their inherent chemical composition and potential uses.

In industry today we do not need more production of those things we now have in surplus supply and for which there appears to be no immediate export market available. But we do need more effort expended to find out how much more of the raw materials used in industry we could and should produce on the farms of this country.

I believe that this question should become a matter of study and consideration by every farm organization in Canada. Certainly, speeded-up research at government levels to find out new and profitable uses for agricultural production should be provided at once. By such action the, shall I say, productive might of the agricultural economy of this country can be directed in the way of producing those things for which available markets exist in the immediate foreseeable future.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two questions I would like to ask related to a matter I brought up last Tuesday and which caused some discussion. I want the minister to settle the matter and I think this is the only item under which I can bring the matter up. It deals with the food and agriculture organization. The minister, when he spoke on Tuesday, made it clear that he thought I had gone out of my way to try to discredit or misrepresent him on this matter. I want to make it absolutely clear to the minister that he is quite wrong in this and that there was nothing further from my mind. I have always had a very high appreciation of the work the minister has done in the interests of western Canada. I have expressed that appreciation in the house and also in the constituency which I represent. But that is not to say I am not to be allowed to criticize certain policies for which the minister is responsible, and I try to do that in a fair manner.

I want to say a few words regarding the point he raised. When I spoke last on this subject I pointed out that the minister had always supported the policies of Sir John Boyd Orr, and then I went on to point out the origin of the work the Canadian Federation of Agriculture had done, and the work the international federation of agricultural producers had done, and then I pointed out what had been done by the body of six experts appointed by the FAO council and that their proposals had nothing to do with Sir John Boyd Orr.

I then pointed out that the minister had opposed them and I said the minister voted against their proposals. That is where the minister challenged me and that is where some statements were made that had perhaps better not have been made. I thought I was being absolutely correct when I made that statement and I think I can prove I am correct.

Mr. Gardiner: What are you trying to prove as being correct? You quoted me as saying I had voted against it.

Mr. Quelch: Merely that I was not the one who induced the minister to make the statement he did. I quoted the minister as saying he had voted against the international commodity clearing house. The minister in his speech said he was wrong in making that statement; but I was hardly responsible for that, and I did not induce the minister to make that statement. What led me to say that the minister had voted against it was the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture on previous occasions. It is not the first time the minister has stated in this house that he voted against it. Right back to 1951 the minister has been making statements of that kind, and just to make absolutely clear to the minister what he has said I will quote part of his speech as reported at page 2086 of Hansard for December 17, 1951, when the matter was under discussion. I hope the minister is not going to criticize me for not quoting his entire speech. The minister made a rather long and rambling speech on that occasion, but I will just quote part of what he said regarding this matter:

> All Canada ever did in the matter was to say that it would be an impossible position for Canada to head a group of nations who would find it impossible to finance such a proposition, so Canada could not vote for something she could not possibly carry out. Canada voted against that.

That is why I jumped to the conclusion I did, though the minister has now made it clear that no vote was taken; so I will not repeat the statement that the minister voted against it.

Since then I have had an opportunity of going into the report of the council and while it is clear that no vote was taken it is nevertheless clear that the proposal was rejected. The minister in his speech from which I just quoted did say that he voted against it.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not.

Mr. Quelch: His position at that time was that he was not going to be put in a position of supporting a proposal if that proposal was not going to be supported by the other nations, because if he did that Canada would be left holding the bag with the other nations refusing to support her. That may be a good reason. But, on the other hand, suppose the other nations had taken that attitude and said they were not going to support it because the other nations were not supporting it, and "we do not want to be left holding the bag". But that is not the reason given by the report of the conference.

Mr. Gardiner: May I just ask the hon. member to correct a statement he has just made. A moment ago he said he was not going to say any more that I voted against this, but in his second subsequent sentence he repeated the assertion again that I did vote against it.

Mr. Quelch: No, I am merely quoting the minister as to what he said at that time and as to why I said he voted against it. I am not saying now that he voted against it. I have quoted the reasons given by the minister three years ago and I took it from that that he voted against it because he said that Canada was not going to be left holding the bag.

Mr. Gardiner: Just check Hansard and you will find that what I said a moment ago is correct.

Mr. Quelch: That is not the reason given in the report of the conference.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, before the lunch recess I had been referring to the international commodity clearing house and the fact that when the food and agriculture organization conference in 1949-50 rejected the proposal of an international commodity clearing house—and let me point out that, when I say that, I am quoting the exact words of the director general in his report for 1949-50—a committee on commodity problems was set up or was appointed. I was especially interested in an article in the March, 1954, issue of Memo which is an FAO publication. The heading is "Special Measures to Dispose of Farm Surpluses Suggested". I will just quote a short paragraph:

> The long-term solution to the problem of food and other farm surpluses lies in increased consumption through higher incomes and the increased demand that will result from the growth of population. A selective expansion of production and the adaptation of farm production to changing needs must also operate in the solution.
> In the short-term, however, there is great need for specific action to dispose of existing supplies and to prevent new surpluses from accumulating.
> This was the finding of the 8-nation working party on agricultural surpluses which met in Washington from February 23 to March 18 to explore all possible ways of dealing with the current surplus problem.
> The working party urged that governments give special consideration to these five methods of surplus disposal: . . .

Then it gives the five proposals, three of which are as follows: Sales on concessional terms for three different purposes; second, sales against importers' currencies, to be used for special purposes; and third, holdings, or segregation, of stocks. I suppose it could be argued that we have already put into practice some of these proposals. We are doing some of these things today. Especially interesting is proposal No. 2. I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce sitting there. He has already expressed, I would say, almost contempt for the suggestion that anything could be accomplished by accepting other nations' currencies in payment for our surpluses. But I see that this is a recommendation that has now been made by the eight nations, and I think that Canada is one of those nations to put forward this proposal. I am therefore interested in knowing whether or not the Canadian government endorses these proposals. Personally, I think they are fine suggestions.

It is interesting to note that the United States were putting into practice the second suggestion back in 1951 under the security act and that now, under the new proposal they are making, they are proposing to go a great deal further; that is, they are proposing to accept foreign currencies and to use them not merely for the purpose of building up nations' defences but for a wide variety of purposes. If the United States are prepared to sell their goods on that basis, it seems to me that it is going to put us in a difficult position if we refuse to do likewise. The question I should like to ask the minister is this. Just how is a report of that kind dealt with? Will that be considered and be either accepted or rejected by a vote in the agricultural conference, or is it just a series of proposals made to the member nations, leaving it up to each individual nation to decide whether or not they want to act on those proposals, either in part or in whole, independently of one another? The minister might answer that question at his convenience.

I should now like to raise one other question which is also related to farm products, but is of an internal character. As the minister knows, there is in western Canada today a great deal of interest in the subject of marketing boards. The minister knows that in Alberta the enabling legislation was not passed largely because the government apparently was not at all sure that the farmers were in favour of such action. However, I understand that this summer a large series of meetings will be held and that an attempt will be made to get the farmers to indicate whether or not they are in favour of marketing board legislation or rather enabling legislation. If the farmers express an opinion that such action should be taken, I believe that probably a plebiscite will be taken, and provided a majority of the farmers vote in favour of the proposal, then I suppose that enabling legislation will be put into operation.

That being the situation, I can envisage that when I get back home, if I am attending any of these meetings, I am going to be asked a number of questions. I should like to get a little bit of information from the Minister of Agriculture so as to try to make sure that my answers will be correct. In the first place, am I correct in believing that, if these boards are set up, they will be entitled to a guaranteed initial payment up to possibly 80 per cent of the average price of the past three years? I believe the act provides for 80 per cent, although I understand the general practice is to make the initial guarantee up to 60 per cent. Furthermore, would they be entitled to a support price under the Agricultural Prices Support Act if the price of commodities falls to the level set by the formula under the Agricultural Prices Support Act? In that connection, is the formula that the minister explained to the house a year or so ago still in operation? Is the support price under the Agricultural Prices Support Act based upon the three base years, 1943, 1944 and 1945? If I could get an answer to those questions, I think it would help a number of us in dealing with this question when we get back home.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, Mr. Chairman. I wish to ask one or two questions of the minister with regard to professional services. There is a scientific service and an economic service. Let me say this at the outset. Although I am lamentably ignorant about science, I believe I know enough to know how important a part it plays in agricultural production. For example, my friend the hon. member for Huron this morning was pointing out to me that in his part of the world there is a blight on the cedar trees at the moment and that investigations will be going on with a view to discovering the cause and finding a cure. My question is merely this. I do not mean to suggest for a moment that there needs to be less work done. I want to ask whether there is any danger of such a thing as overlapping. We all know that people become enthusiastic in what they are doing and wish to expand their operations. To show what I mean I shall read just a sentence or two from the annual report of the director of science service for the year ended March 31, 1953, which I think is the last year for which a report is available. This is what he says:

> . . . but greatly improved laboratory facilities and more highly trained staff have resulted in a much healthier balance between applied and fundamental work. The amount of scientific work completed, during the year under review, is recorded by means of the lists of published research papers, numbering 284, at the end of this report. The value of a more comprehensive and scientific approach to economic problems is becoming increasingly apparent in the amount and quality of the applied phases of the work.
> During the year five new, modern and well equipped laboratories have been completed.

And so on. I have here also the report of the minister with a list of publications. I will read just two or three of the names: "Studies on the Treatment of Contaminated Combs and Honey with High Velocity Electrons". I have no doubt that the hon. member for Middlesex East will know all about that and will be making full use of it. There are other reports listed here, and I come to one with a name so long that I can only take a run at it. It is called, as far as I can pronounce it, "the nonmutagenic action of p-p'-DDT and y-hexachlorocyclohexane". I have no doubt the minister knows all about that. I am only mentioning it to ask two questions. First of all, how is the distribution of a thing like that arranged? Second, and much more important, I want to ask this question. I have already referred to the great expansion of the minister's department, and I have said in the house before that any man worth his oats in any job seeks to expand his department. He would not be worth his oats if he did not do so. There are various scientific agencies throughout the dominion. We have the universities and various provincial organizations, and I should like to ask the minister this question. When some new scientific work has to be done—and let me repeat that I believe in this work fully—is any attempt made to take stock of the situation and to allocate the work among the various research bodies that are capable of doing it, or is there a danger that when we have this healthy and growing organization it grows just because it likes to grow and without full account taken of the various organizations which are engaged in this kind of work? I would be glad if the minister would answer that when he speaks. I would be glad to know more about the number of scientists and whether full account is taken, in a discriminating way, of the amount of assistance which can be obtained from outside the department.

I also want to raise some question with regard to the economists. If my memory serves me correctly, there are 55 economists in the department. As I pointed out, there are really 56 because the minister is an economist too. I have here a list, which I do not propose to read, of publications of the economics division, and there again I want to raise the same question. It often occurs to me that there are two ways of looking at expenditures. One way is: Will the expenditure serve a useful purpose? The second is: Can we do without it?

We undoubtedly and naturally have been going through a period of high activity, of high government income and high productivity, and I think it would be almost inevitable that the test of public expenditure which has been applied pretty definitely is: Can we make any use of it? Will it give any good result? My question is whether the need which constantly faces us of trying not to let our expenditures get away from us—and we certainly have high taxes from which many people suffer—is having any effect on the professional services maintained by the department?

Mr. Gardiner: The question raised by the last speaker is one which I have referred to two or three times since eleven o'clock. I have said that the answers to this question will come on the items either of science service or experimental farms. The work is being carried on in those two sections.

Mr. Macdonnell: I did not mean to ask the minister to do it now.

Mr. Gardiner: I was hoping he did not expect me to. I think two of the speakers who have spoken so far today, the first one and the last one before the hon. member took the floor, raised general questions which there probably was not much opportunity to discuss on the items. But the others were questions which I think could be much better dealt with on the items and I do not think I should proceed to answer them now and make remarks with regard to something which will be discussed a little later on. I hope that the general item can be passed now and that we can get to the other items and discuss them quite fully.

Mr. Zaplitny: I have a question to ask which deals with policy rather than administration, and I believe this is the proper place to discuss it. When the minister is replying to the question asked by the hon. member for Acadia I should also like him to indicate the procedure followed under the co-operative marketing act with respect to the agreements between the federal government and the boards as to setting the initial price, so that it may be on record.

The other matter to which I want to refer very briefly is the question of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I have had some correspondence with the minister on that subject, and as recently as the 9th of June I had a reply to one of my letters in which the minister indicated that it is not the intention of the government to introduce legislation at this session to widen or amend the act in order to make it apply to a greater area than at the present time. In that letter reference is also made to the fact that it would not be wise to do so until agreement has been reached between the federal and provincial governments regarding financing in general.

That is the particular question I should like to have cleared up. I should like to know what agreement the minister has in mind and whether any negotiations are being carried on now between the provinces and his department with respect to the act and financing in general or are contemplated in the near future. I should also like to know whether any representations have been made to his department more recently than the ones emanating from the conference of the four western ministers of agriculture roughly six weeks or two months ago where it was unanimously recommended that the provisions of the act be made applicable to all agricultural areas of the four western provinces.

I could go into detail a great deal more but I will refrain from doing so in the interests of getting the explanation from the minister that much sooner. As the minister is no doubt quite aware, the situation in many parts of Manitoba, particularly in the area which I represent, is almost as serious, judging from press reports, as it was last year. Farmers of that area who suffered almost a total loss last year are facing the same situation this year on account of the flood waters. I realize that not all these difficulties can be cleared up by projects under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act but a great deal could be done. It now appears quite clear that this is not something that happens only once in twenty or twenty-five years. It has been happening with greater regularity, and in recent years it seems to be snowballing.

There are reasons for that. One reason is the greater amount of precipitation, but there are others, and I hope that the minister can indicate that at least plans are going forward and negotiations are being held or are contemplated for this year in order that something may be done at the next session of parliament to widen the provisions of the act to include a greater proportion of the three prairie provinces. We certainly appreciate the work that has been done under the agreements between the provinces, municipalities and the federal government since about 1948. They have been of a great deal of benefit but, as I have pointed out to the minister before, the weakness of these agreements lies in the fact that the weakest link is the municipality. The assistance is based on what the individual municipality can contribute as its share of the total cost of the project. Unfortunately some municipalities which have the greatest difficulties in connection with flood waters are the least able to provide any funds. As a result there is a very severe limitation on what can be done under these agreements. I hope that the minister will clear up this question in replying to the general questions asked.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to emphasize again that I am sure it is not fair to other members for me to discuss this question at this stage. The two items to which there has been particular reference are P.F.R.A. and marketing, and they are both provided for in the estimates. There may be members who are not in the house at the moment, but who expect to be here when those items are considered. It would not be fair for me to start answering questions, and to discuss those items, without those members here, because we would probably have to go back over it all again. I am quite prepared to discuss them fully when we get to the item but I wish you would let us get to the item.

Mr. Zaplitny: That suits me fine; I am not insisting that the minister answer these questions now, but I did indicate that these questions having to do with policy rather than administration should be asked now.

Mr. Gardiner: No, the item we are discussing is administration. Questions concerning policy with regard to the different items should be asked when those items are being considered.

Mr. Zaplitny: My understanding is a little different. We are dealing with general agricultural policy under the item of administration. I recall that in previous years when we attempted to discuss that general policy under a particular item, we were told it should have been raised on the general administration item. However, I shall not quibble about it now if the minister is willing to answer later.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I wanted to add my five cents' worth to this debate on agriculture. I was greatly impressed by the speech of the hon. member for Queens this morning, when he referred to the various claims that could be proven by statistics. One of the questions that I asked, and that he failed to answer, was who was the author of that book on statistics. I believe if I asked the farmers and my constituents, nine out of ten of them would answer that the Minister of Agriculture was the author, and he would probably take that as a compliment.

You can quote all the statistics you like, but if you go back to the farmers and ask them if they are as well off as the minister would lead them to believe they are, they will vehemently deny it. Of course, I suppose there is a certain amount of logic to that. There is no other business in the country that judges its progress on a gross income basis, and no matter how much the gross value of agricultural products may be, the cost of production is the factor that decides whether or not at the end of the year you operate at a profit or a loss. Statistics have proven that the income of the farmer has gone down some 24 per cent, and his cost of production has gone up at least 3 per cent or 4 per cent. How he can be better off than he was in other years under those conditions is more than I can understand.

There are two or three things that I am going to mention that will indicate why many industries today find themselves operating on short time or with a lesser number of employees. I do not need to go out of my own county to point that out. One day last week I was in Strathroy. I understand that one of the factories there is operating only two days a week. No doubt the employees in that small plant have a lot less money to spend; and consequently, whether it is automobiles, clothing or food on which they spend that money, they are spending less. There are some other factors that indicate just why there is not as much money being spent. The reports of the dominion bureau of statistics on carloadings indicate that they are down considerably. I do not know that I really need to go into that, because I believe the house and the minister understand the situation. The report ending March 31, 1954, showing the cumulative totals for the first quarter of the year, indicates a 10·2 per cent drop.

The principal source of the decline in the three months total loadings are: grain, down 39,000 carloads; lumber, timber and plywood, down 6,400 carloads. In so far as commodities moving in less than carload lots are concerned, the number of carloadings of these mixed items is down 20,000 carloads from the total of a year ago for the same period. There were 173,176 cars loaded in the three-month period a year previous, and this year for the same period the loadings are down 20,700 from that figure. I believe that indicates, just as well as anything that can be used, the present situation because that is a barometer of the business of the country.

Then, another alarming feature is the fact that imports from foreign countries are up while exports are down. Every time we buy something from abroad we hire a labourer in that foreign country to produce that article. While we have unemployment here in a good many industries, we have become so tied up with our international trade relations that countries with depreciated currencies are able to produce these goods and sell them in the Canadian market much more cheaply than we can. These nations are anxious to get into the Canadian market because of its dollar values.

Another factor that has not helped us has been the fact the United States has not lived up to its commitments so far as GATT is concerned. I am not going to go into the details of that. The United States dollar policy has certainly been detrimental so far as the sale of Canadian farm products in the world export markets is concerned. Along with this dollar policy, the practice of extending credit to nations in Europe that are in need of these goods has meant those nations will buy in the United States in preference to buying in Canada. Another indication of the trend of events is the number of commercial failures in Canada. I am not going to go into that, but the percentage is up.

Last Wednesday I asked the minister a question concerning the establishment of a floor price for Ontario wheat. I am going to read the minister's answer. I am quoting from page 6049 of Hansard for June 16, 1954, where the minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, there is nothing done under the wheat board in connection with that price. The price in that regard is set otherwise.

For some time now we have listened to a debate on western wheat. All of the Ontario winter wheat buyers know quite well the wheat board, as the minister said, has nothing to do with the setting of the price for Ontario wheat. I have here a clipping from the Chatham Daily News of July 21, 1950. The parliamentary assistant will remember a meeting held at that time when it looked as though the price of Ontario grown winter wheat would decline from $1.90 to $1.60. There was quite a protest meeting and some suggestions were made as to what should be done to protect the farmer from a considerable drop in price. The price drop at that time was about 30 cents a bushel. Up until recently the price of winter wheat was ranging around $1.55. On Monday of this week I was speaking to one of the grain buyers in my county and he advised me that, so far as he could ascertain at the moment, the opening price would be somewhere around $1.25. Today I again telegraphed to some of the buyers, but so far have had no reply from them. That indicates, anyway, the thinking of the grain trade.

When we are dealing with the price of wheat I just wish to point out, as some of the other members did, that while the consumer thinks the price of food is high, he very often does not realize the percentage of the food dollar that actually goes to the producer. What I am about to quote is taken from the Saint John Telegraph-Journal. Dealing with the food dollar it says:

> The farmer's share of a 14-cent loaf of bread is 2¼ cents or 16 cents of every dollar spent on bread.

No doubt there are many other farm products in respect of which the percentage of the consumer's dollar that goes to the producer is higher than it is in connection with bread. Supposing the price this year for eastern grown winter wheat is $1.25, the reduction in price will be about 20 per cent. Is the price of flour ground from that wheat going to drop by 20 per cent? I doubt it very much.

Consequently the class of people in the country who are to take all the squeeze will be the producers, and the consumers will not have any of the benefit. I am afraid of that; and I doubt very much whether the price of pastry, of bread, or of flour will go down by 20 per cent.

Then, I come to another subject that a good many farmers are not too happy about, and that is the grading of farm products. I think most of them believe grading has done a good deal to improve the quality of the products they put on the market. Because of grading, in many cases the product goes to the purchaser in better condition, and he receives it in better quality than in years gone by.

However, the objection of many farmers is that the grading does not carry through to the ultimate consumer, although in some lines it carries through better than in others. On the other hand the farmer finds that most of the products he has to buy are not graded. Consequently he has no way of knowing whether the product he is buying is good or not, except by depending on the integrity of the companies manufacturing the product. And hon. members know as well as I do that that varies from time to time.

Many of the things the farmers buy are dumped in this country. We heard something about dumping this morning. I am quite sure many of the products would not be purchased if the country of origin were shown on the manufactured goods dumped in here. I have textiles in mind particularly. I am certain that if they were subjected to the same scrutiny and tests to which farm products are subjected, they would not grade No. 1. Some of the products that are dumped in here are certainly not first quality. That was indicated very clearly the other evening by the hon. member for Kootenay West when he pointed out that government inspectors in the Department of Transport dealing with radio interference were quite prepared to jump on the farmer, the blacksmith or the carpenter whose motor might be causing interference, but they shied away from doing anything with the Kootenay power company. And that happens right down the line.

The inspectors jump on the farmer because he is an individual and does not wish to cause trouble; but so far as the grading of their products is concerned, the big companies are not bothered. Perhaps I might mention two or three items the farmer has to purchase which might be looked into. I would refer particularly to lumber, light bulbs, shoes, work clothes, and particularly some of the feeds and minerals that are sold to farmers. I hope some changes will be made.

I turn to one item of production with which I am familiar, namely honey. I say the grading of honey is not what it should be, and recently there have been some disputes about grades. I know that from three samples taken out of one five-pound pail of honey we got three different reports from three different sources. I know also of two different samples taken from a five-pound pail that were sent to the same graders, and two different answers were received back.

Furthermore, many of the farm products today are graded after the farmer has parted with them, and he has no chance in the world of disputing or questioning the grader's report. Consequently, he finds himself in a very bad bargaining position. I shall not say any more about that because I produce honey, and some persons might think that I was trying to use some influence in respect of a product in which I am particularly interested. So I will drop the subject right there.

I have made reference to an article appearing in the Chatham News. I shall not review the whole of it, but it discusses floor prices. To the great majority of Canadian farmers the administration of the floor price program promised in 1945 has been a disappointment and a dismal failure. Whether or not we agree with the principle, so far as the farmer is concerned that program has not lived up to expectations.

I have here an article from the Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Grower entitled "Who Gets the Consumer's Dollar?". I am not going to take too much of the time of the committee, but I would point out that from a 20-ounce tin of tomato juice selling for 12½ cents the farmer gets only 1·8 cents. So that the farmer can scarcely be blamed for the high cost of food.

Recently when the standing committee on agriculture met we had a most interesting talk from Dr. Dimmock of that department in which he dealt with soybeans. I believe the committee appreciated what he had to say, and that a good deal of useful information was gained. In previous years when there were only one or two buyers and processors of soybeans, the growers in western Ontario, particularly those in southwestern Ontario, had difficulty in getting their crop to market because, as was pointed out, they were all harvested in a very short space of time, freight cars were not available, and they had difficulty in unloading at Toronto.

I wish to point out to the committee and to farmers in general that in this past year when an independent grain company engaged in the buying of soybeans, loading them on a boat at Port Stanley, no difficulty was encountered so far as freight-car, grading or unloading facilities at Toronto were concerned. That just goes to show what can happen when there is a bit of competition in any business. It livens it up and gives to the seller a better market at a higher price. I am pretty certain in my own mind that the farmers in that area stood to gain anywhere from 20 cents to 30 cents a bushel because of the competition that developed at that time. That same company is expanding its facilities at the port, and is planning to export not only soybeans but corn and wheat. A lot has been said about the part that the soybean growers association took in the marketing of that crop, but a lot of credit should be given to this private grain company which developed the market overseas and are proceeding to develop it further. We shall have a competitive market for that farm product in southwestern Ontario.

I just happened to mention the grading of lumber. I hold in my hand the Ottawa Journal of May 26 of this year. It says: "White pine grading studied by dealers". The story goes on to say that one of the firms today was trying to educate its dealers across the country in the proper grading of its products. That is one reason I mentioned the grading of the things the farmer has to buy.

In conclusion, may I say I have a Canadian Press dispatch which is headed: "Government unworried over lost markets, Gardiner". Perhaps he is not, and perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not, but every farmer in the land is worried and I hope that the government will do something about it.

Mr. Blackmore: Just to make sure that I shall be in order on a certain item I should like to ask the minister whether or not I would be in order under item 21, or under some other item, to discuss two questions that are of vital importance to us today in Canada. The first one is whether or not the minister has a policy in respect to the expanding or contracting of production of various agricultural products for the production of which Canada is fitted; whether he has any plan in determining whether or not we are going to limit the production of wheat or any other commodity, or expand the production of certain commodities. Second, whether he has any policy in respect to storing any particular kind or kinds of non-perishable commodities such as beans, corn and the like. Would I be in order if I asked those questions under item 21?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the hon. member would be in order in discussing it under production, or certain features of it under marketing, and they are items still to come.

Item agreed to.

3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister tell us how many meetings have been held by this advisory committee in the past year?

Mr. Gardiner: We have two meetings a year, and two meetings have been held within the last twelve months.

Mr. Charlton: Two meetings each year?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the general practice, and if they want more we have more.

Item agreed to.

4. Contributions to commonwealth agricultural bureaux in a total amount of £43,959, notwithstanding that payments may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of January, 1954, which is, $120,393.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister tell us whether this commonwealth agricultural bureau has anything to do with the FAO organization, or is connected with that organization in any way?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it has nothing to do with FAO. This has been in existence for a long time and was in existence before there was any FAO, and is still operating.

Mr. Blackmore: Can the minister give us an idea just what this particular organization has done for us during the last year and what it is contemplated it will do for us next year?

Mr. Gardiner: The general position is that there is a bureau set up that operates from Britain, and the different parts of the commonwealth contribute all the information that they have to that bureau, and when we want to get information with regard to what is going on in other parts of the empire we can get it there, and others who need it can get our information there. This bureau operates for all of us.

Mr. Blackmore: Is there any thought of co-ordinating the efforts of the various members of the empire or the commonwealth?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the way it is done now. They are co-ordinated into this bureau, which has a central office. We all co-operate by putting our information there so that they can all get it.

Mr. Blackmore: In what way have we actually co-ordinated our efforts in regard to certain commodities, for example, wheat or butter or cheese? Have we actually co-ordinated those efforts? If so, how comes it about that Australia and Canada are competing with each other in cutting the price of wheat?

Mr. Gardiner: They have all been considered, but wheat is probably an item that is more immediately to be considered by the council which is meeting over in Britain, which has under consideration that very matter. They probably will give more consideration to it than this particular bureau, but this bureau gathers information with regard to fighting parasites, fighting rust, for example, which affects wheat, and all that kind of thing, and making any information there is available to all parties.

Item agreed to.

6. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $1,514,806.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us what is contemplated this year along the line of the construction of new buildings, works and so forth for scientific purposes of the department?

Mr. Gardiner: The official who was here this morning told me he could not be here this afternoon and said he understood that some question was to be raised with regard to this particular item. The increase in this vote has to do with the cost of constructing an addition to the building which houses the commonwealth mycological institute, and is a non-recurring item. The mycological institute is one of the 12 CAB organizations located in the United Kingdom. It publishes the abstracting journal called the Review of Applied Mycology, informs member countries of outbreaks of plant diseases throughout the world, maintains stock cultures for identifying plant diseases, and acts as a general information centre for mycologists and plant pathologists.

The various bureaux located in the United Kingdom are housed at universities and agricultural institutions at a nominal rental. In the case of the mycological institute, the building is the property of the commonwealth agricultural bureaux, having been constructed out of moneys provided by the old empire marketing board, and is not attached as the other bureaux to any established institution. It is located adjacent to Kew Gardens, however, and has an excellent working arrangement for the use of the Kew library.

The problem of providing additional space was discussed at the 1950 review conference. While the conference voted to raise the capital cost of £55,000 by contributions from the commonwealth countries, Canada and the Union of South Africa reserved their position on this vote.

Subsequently all other commonwealth members of the CAB have approved of contributing their share, estimated on the same basis as the general contributions. The United Kingdom will therefore provide 43 per cent, Canada 17 per cent, and the remainder is distributed proportionately around the commonwealth.

The present building and the addition will remain the property of the commonwealth agricultural bureaux, Canada thereby having a 17 per cent interest in the total investment which is estimated at £196,000.

This item will not recur in next year's estimates, and does not establish a precedent for the launching of a building program for other units of the CAB. That is the explanation of the expenditure we are making this year and we will not be having that vote again next year.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister was answering something in connection with item No. 4 about which we have not yet asked. What I asked was for the construction under item No. 6 which is the item we are on at the present time. There is an expenditure under this item of $1,514,000, and in fact it is down about $250,000 from last year. I was wondering what construction is being provided under this item.

Mr. Gardiner: There is quite a long list here and I do not know exactly what my hon. friend wants to know.

Mr. Harkness: I do not really want the entire list. I wondered if there were any new laboratories being built which would assist our services materially.

Mr. Gardiner: There are some items on which we still have to spend money. There is only one new building included in this item which is being built at Winnipeg. What I think my hon. friend has in mind is the situation at Lethbridge, which I know he has discussed on a number of occasions.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I was interested in that.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that has now been completed.

Mr. Harkness: But, Mr. Chairman, there is no breakdown given here and all we have is the bulk item. It seems quite a lot of money and I thought that perhaps new buildings, laboratories, and things of that sort were being undertaken by the department. Apparently this is for additions and things of that sort.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps I had better read the details so that you will have a general idea. At Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, under item 12, there is an extension to be made to the pumphouse at Upton farm, and reconstruction of a temporary header-house adjoining potato indexing greenhouse. Then the paving of a roadway, and a parking area at the new laboratory building. The cost of these items will be $12,000. Then at Kentville, Nova Scotia, there is a new item of $22,000. This item provides for the construction of a greenhouse at this location. A new laboratory building, headerhouse and one greenhouse were erected at this establishment over a period of three years and it is considered that with the addition of one more greenhouse, the requirements at Kentville will be adequately met for the next few years. Then there is an item with regard to Fredericton for a new modern science service laboratory and other items at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Quebec city, St. Jean, Ottawa, Belleville, Ontario, London, Ontario, Harrow, Ontario, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Lethbridge, Alberta, and the acquisition of equipment $75,000.

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister say what is being done at Lethbridge this year?

Mr. Gardiner: At Lethbridge there is an amount of $48,300 dealing with a feeder shed required to conduct a program of experimental livestock insect control. The procedure will involve a considerable number of livestock which must be maintained on laboratory grounds under specific conditions that are subject to manipulation according to experimental design. Then there is an item covering the construction of a direct road between the main buildings at Lethbridge and the livestock insect establishment. That amounts to $5,000. Then there are miscellaneous items amounting to $1,300 providing for automatic power vents to greenhouses and complete screening of living suites.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister to give some details of the expenditure at the new science service laboratory at London, Ontario. Are there any new experiments and research being undertaken there and any extension of the present buildings or additions to the staff?

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps I had better just read the item and give the hon. member the information in that manner. At London, Ontario, there is a revote of $20,000 and a continuation of $42,500, making a total of $62,500. An amount of $55,000 is required to complete plant growth chambers, construction of which was commenced in 1952-53. A total of $215,000 was provided during the current year, that is 1953-54, for this project. Of this amount, $50,000 was a revote of 1952-53 funds, the entire amount provided in that year. It is estimated that $20,000 will remain unexpended at the end of the current year, 1953-54, and a revote of this amount, together with an additional $35,000, will be required to complete the work. The installation is extremely delicate and complicated and has presented difficult engineering problems as construction work proceeded. Most of these problems have now been solved and it is considered that the research results will more than justify the capital outlay. The remaining $7,500 is for the purpose of completing benching and cupboard work in 17 rooms of the main building and in the new headerhouse.

7. Bacteriology and dairy research, $213,395.

Mr. Cardiff: Can the minister explain the expenditure under this item?

Mr. Gardiner: The chief functions of this division are carried out chiefly in co-operation with the experimental farm service and science division of the service. They deal with the dairy bacteriological pure milk production development, and economic methods for maintaining milk quality; also the problems of manufacturing butter and cheese; control of defects in commercial products such as butter, cheese, milk, and powder, and methods for the evaluation of quality in milk dairy products.

Mr. Cardiff: Would that have anything to do with the equipment the dairy men have been forced to put in recently to take care of the milk before delivery?

Mr. Gardiner: My understanding is that this comes under the control of the milk board and they are, of course, provincial, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. Yuill: I would like to ask the minister a question in regard to what research has been made in combating Bang's disease within the last year.

Mr. Gardiner: I wonder if my hon. friend would wait until we get down to the production services and the health of animals?

Mr. Yuill: Which item is that?

Mr. Gardiner: Item No. 24.

Mr. Charlton: What developments have there been in determining whether butter had been adulterated with vegetable oil products? There was some difficulty about that last year and perhaps the minister can tell us the latest developments.

Mr. Gardiner: That method has been developed in the health department and is applied by them. Of course they make investigations on our account also. But they are able now to determine whether or not there is vegetable oil in butter.

Mr. Charlton: It is carried on under the food and drug section? Part of the experimental work would be carried on there, would it not, with regard to the tests?

Mr. Gardiner: The food and drug section of the health department—not the health of animals but the health department—under the Minister of National Health and Welfare work together on the matter.

Mr. Charlton: Quite rightly.

Mr. Gardiner: We have discovered some cases in which an attempt was made—and carried out, as a matter of fact—to mix vegetable oils with butterfat and to produce what they called butter. We have had some difficulties in connection with the matter.

Mr. Cardiff: Are they able to detect whether butter has been adulterated with margarine or has been mixed with margarine?

Mr. Gardiner: Margarine, of course, is made from vegetable oils largely and they can detect the vegetable oil content.

Botany and plant pathology—

8. Operation and maintenance, $1,403,534.

Mr. Blackmore: Under this item, would the minister care to discuss the progress being made with respect to stem rust in sunflowers? I understand there are one or two varieties of rusts which have done considerable damage to sunflower culture in Canada, especially in Manitoba.

Mr. Gardiner: Epidemiology, and varietal susceptibility studies of downy mildew of sunflower are being conducted at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere to determine the means of dissemination of the causal fungus and the relative resistance of different host strains.

In Manitoba, the peak sunflower acreage of 60,000 acres in 1949 was reduced to 5,000 acres in 1953 because of severe losses from rust and, to a lesser extent, from unfavourable growing conditions in some of the intervening years. The most promising solution of the rust problem consists in the breeding of rust resistant varieties, which has recently been undertaken at the Morden experimental station. Assistance given to this work involves the testing of numerous varieties and new hybrids for reaction to rust and, furthermore, a study of the rust organism to determine to what degree specialization for pathogenicity exists in it. Studies thus far carried out indicate that most varieties are susceptible in early stages of growth but that a few develop some resistance in later growth stages. No evidence has yet been found for specialization in pathogenicity within the rust.

Plant disease surveys have shown that Sclerotinia wilt occurs throughout the sunflower area and is severe in occasional fields. All varieties appear to be susceptible to this disease but a considerable measure of control can be obtained through suitable cultural practices and appropriate crop rotation. Several other diseases have been found but none of them is of economic importance at present.

I will see to it that this item gets into the hands of Hansard. The words will be correct when they are in Hansard even if I have not pronounced them correctly.

Mr. Macdonnell: I could at least spell them.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to the production and distribution of the new Selkirk wheat. I have had some complaints about the distribution.

Mr. Gardiner: Would my hon. friend wait until we get to experimental farms?

Forest biology—

13. Operation and maintenance, $1,923,859.

Mr. Cardiff: Would this item have anything to do with trying to find out about the blight or disease in cedar trees that is prevalent this year?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. It will include that. That work will be carried on there.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister tell us something about this new insect that is bothering Scotch pine?

Mr. Macdonnell: Give us the name first.

Mr. Gardiner: Can the hon. member tell us by name what the insect is?

Mr. Charlton: There are a great many people who wish they knew what it was and how to stop it.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a little bit difficult to find it in the book here without the name because we have it indexed only according to names. I am told by the officials that an investigation is being carried on with regard to it. However, the results up to the moment are not such that we are able to give anything very definite with regard to it.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister explain the purpose of the increase in this vote? Can he tell us what work it is being expended on?

Mr. Gardiner: That is an increase of about $200,000.

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: On page 87 of the estimates, of which the hon. member no doubt has a copy, he will find the items given there. There is quite a long list of them. I do not know that I need read them. There is only one increase in the personnel.

Mr. Herridge: Is any particular new project being undertaken which causes the increase?

Mr. Gardiner: I will read what it says here. The over-all increase in this vote amounts to 8 per cent and can be attributed to the normal increase in salaries, material costs and travel. Some expansion work on projects has taken place but generally speaking such expansion has been as a result of more efficient use of present facilities and an increase in capital assets provided under other votes.

Item agreed to.

15. Plant protection, $838,448.

Mr. Cardiff: Will the minister explain some of the work carried on under this item?

Mr. Gardiner: The chief part of the work is the checking of everything that comes into the country in order to prevent the entry of plant diseases along with the plants that are being imported. It has to do with the difficulty with which we are all familiar that we have when we come to the Canadian boundary after making a trip to the United States. We may buy some vegetables or fruits while we are in that country, and when we come to the boundary line we cannot understand why we have to eat all of the product if we want it at all rather than bring it into the country. That is a constant trouble with us all, but the greater part of the work has to do with that operation.

Experimental farms service—

16. Experimental farms service administration, $181,201.

Mr. Decore: I should like to draw a matter to the minister's attention which I have raised on the floor of the house on previous occasions from time to time. I hope in bringing it to his attention now my persistence will not be regarded as a nuisance. I refer to the need in the northeastern part of Alberta for an experimental farm, experimental substation, or whatever you wish to call it, but some type of project which, combined with research, experimentation and demonstration, would assist the farmers in helping to solve their farm problems.

The minister will recall that he paid a courtesy call to the Vegreville constituency over a year ago. He will remember that at that time various delegations from miles and miles around made representations to the minister with respect to the need for such a project in that area. Generally speaking, we in western Canada have to contend with the cost of production. We are situated far from the markets. We have the problem of the cost of transportation. Therefore it is imperative that the cost of production be minimized so far as the farmer is concerned if he is to remain in business.

With regard to my constituency or north-eastern Alberta generally, I should like to point out to the minister, and I think he is aware of the fact, that it is an area where the people engage in very extensive mixed farming. Time and time again, year after year, farmers from that area have received recognition in international fairs for their cattle exhibits and their grain. Year after year they have received world recognition by winning the oats championship or the barley championship. Just last year a farmer not very far from Vegreville received such recognition.

As I say, that area is definitely interested in mixed farming and there is a need for this type of thing. The reason I bring this matter to the minister's attention again is that the nearest establishment of this type is at Lacombe which, for most of the farmers in my area, is more than 200 miles away. The Lacombe experimental farm is doing very useful work, but for many farmers it is difficult to go that far in order to be able to see on the spot what is going on. Therefore I hope that the minister has given this matter consideration with a view to the establishment of some such project in that area. I am not saying that it has to be as big as the Lacombe enterprise. Neither, of course, would I like to see it as small as the demonstration farms. I should like to see something in between, and I am sure that such a project would receive the widest co-operation and support from the farmers of that area and that it would be a success. Has the minister given this matter any consideration?

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member has said, this question was raised last year, I think, when my estimates were being considered, and I believe the year before. The representations made to me when I was in Alberta the summer before last were to the effect that they wanted an experimental farm. I had to say to them that we had an experimental farm at Lacombe, another one in the far northern part of Alberta and also two in the southern part, and that it was thought that was about all we required at the present time in order to take care of the situation in so far as experimental farms were concerned. But then it was suggested to me that there should be something in the nature of a demonstration station, as my friend says, although we call them officially illustration stations.

The question has been discussed and the discussions have led to the consideration of where the station should be. I think some agreement has been reached between the people who live in the immediate area referred to and those who live across the river, I believe it is. The soils are somewhat the same, and the question is being considered now as to where a station of that kind might be located. The actual location has not yet been determined but an effort is being made by the officials to locate a place where it can be properly established in order to carry out the activities which are thought to be essential there.

Mr. Decore: Do I understand that the minister has in mind the acquisition of land, or is land going to be rented from some farmer? What has the minister in mind?

Mr. Gardiner: We have in mind the possibility of having to purchase land in that locality in order to get what is required. The general policy is to rent land, but on this occasion it is thought, after some investigation having been made into the matter, that it may be difficult to get suitable land with a person on it who is prepared to carry on in that way. If that is found to be the case it may be necessary to purchase land and to put someone on it.

Mr. Decore: How much land does the minister have in mind?

Mr. Gardiner: I think the hon. member is getting too much into details now. That is a matter which is left largely to the officials to investigate and to make inquiry as to how much they require for what they intend to do.

Mr. Decore: Can the minister say what type of program will be carried on at this project?

Mr. Gardiner: That is not really the minister's job. The question whether there is going to be a station there is. The kind of program which will be carried on will be that which practice has indicated should be carried on with that kind of set-up.

Mr. Charlton: Rumours persist, and I have heard them in many places, that there is some thought of moving the central experimental farm from Ottawa. Has the department any such idea in mind? Is it considering changing the location of the farm by moving it farther out from the city?

Mr. Gardiner: No consideration has been given to the possibility of moving the farm. There are people making suggestions all the time, of course. We listen to them, but any suggestions that have been made that anything along that line should be done at an early date have always been replied to in the negative. We do not intend to do that kind of thing. Many people have taken the position that this farm, so far as agriculture is concerned, provides opportunities that no farm in any other place could. There are so many people who come to Ottawa who probably would not go out of the city ten miles to look at an experimental farm, but in this case the farm is right here. These people are told by everybody that it is one of the beauty spots of the area and they go there. If they are farmers, they get a great deal of good out of it. If they are people from urban centres throughout the country they also get a great deal of good out of it. They find there are many things they can learn that they can apply on their own home properties which are very helpful. From that point of view we think the farm is in a good place.

In addition, I find that no matter where I go, whether I am in Europe or in Washington, a great deal of attention has been paid to keeping areas in their natural state. For example, when I go to London and look out over Hyde Park, I wonder why we do not have areas like that in our cities in Canada? The experimental farm in Ottawa is the nearest approach that we could possibly have to that. Even if it becomes necessary at some time to move some of the activities a little farther away, I do not believe that farm should be closed up or eliminated by allowing people to build on the area, or doing anything else with it. I believe it should remain there just as it is now.

I might say that I agreed when the hon. member for Greenwood was speaking that we might deal with his question either under science services or under experimental farms. In answer to his question I want to say that there has been quite a lot of discussion over the years as to whether or not research work in the Department of Agriculture, either under experimental farms or under the sciences, should be carried on by this department or by the research people. Any decisions that were made about it were made before I came here. I do not wish to take any credit for having that work done as an increased activity on the part of the Department of Agriculture, as was suggested. This decision was made before I came here.

I was on the committee of council for some years that had to do with research. I think I am still on it because of the fact that agricultural research does come into the picture. We have always taken the position that the research work which is of benefit to farmers is better conducted on the experimental farms because the farmers can go there and see the results of it. It is much better to have it done there than to have it at some centre which is controlled by the research council. It is for that reason we have conducted the research out there. We have not thought we were overlapping in doing that kind of thing. We thought it was very necessary that work be done as close to the farmers as we could get it, in order to make it possible for them to see it.

The best illustration I have of what I am trying to say is that I can still remember when I was a boy in Ontario they used to organize trips to the Guelph farm. The hon. member who sits behind you will recall that.

Mr. Cardiff: They still do.

Mr. Gardiner: The young people of the counties of Huron and Bruce used to go down to the Guelph farm for a day. They used to talk about it from the day they went down until the day they went down there the following year. The older members of the family always encouraged the younger member to go. With that idea in mind, we think it is well to have this research work carried out on the experimental farms in so far as that is possible. Then, the people can see the results of it and go back home and put some of these things into general use to help farming operations. That is the one real reason why we keep the research in the agricultural department. We do not think we are overlapping in a way that is costing the taxpayer too much for the service that is being given.

Mr. Macdonnell: I would not disagree with one word the minister said about doing the work he has described, and which is visited by practising farmers at Guelph and other places. I take it that the pamphlet to which I referred this morning, the name of which neither the minister nor I could pronounce, referred to fundamental research. It does not seem to me the minister's answer covers that at all. I noticed his wording. He referred to research that was being done by them or by the research people in the department and I take it the "them" meant outside agencies or by the research departments of the provincial departments of agriculture. It seems to me the minister's answer has not covered at all what I understand is correctly described as fundamental research. Just from reading the list from which I took a couple of names this morning, it seemed to me a considerable amount of that was fundamental research, and therefore my question is still unanswered. Is the fundamental research, as well as the special research for this or that problem, being done in the federal Department of Agriculture without regard at all to the possibility of there being other agencies that might do it?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, if the hon. member means provincial agencies or those who are operating in connection with our university staffs, that kind of thing, there is every co-ordination of those services. They have access to everything we do and we have access to everything they do. We work hand in hand in doing that kind of work. If we require something done for which we have not the official or the expert, and one of the universities in Canada has them, then we get in touch with those people. There is co-operation between the two groups. I do not think any overlapping will be found.

Some of these things, like mycology and so on, that have to do with diseases of plants, are dealt with in this research work that is carried on on our experimental farms to show people how to proceed in handling them as a result of the research on that problem.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister's last answer does come exactly on the point to which I was referring. I just want to be sure that this is the position. Can I take it not merely that the department is ready to make use of the research facilities here or there, but that when a bit of research is to be done there is really a definite procedure by which consideration will be given to whether it can be done adequately elsewhere in Canada at the moment? It is so easy to go on adding new facilities and, as I say, building up a department of which a man becomes proud so that he naturally wants to extend it. Can I take it from the minister's answer that there is real co-ordination and co-operation in the sense that when a job is to be done full regard is had as to whether at the moment it can be done anywhere else in Canada adequately?

Mr. Gardiner: Absolutely; you can take that as absolutely correct. I am not taking credit for it. It has been that way ever since I came here and was built up that way before I came. There is absolute co-ordination in the work as between the provinces, the universities and ourselves.

I was down, for example, at Guelph about two weeks ago and the officials out there spent all afternoon taking me around to show me the things that we were helping with and the things upon which they were working along with us. In that connection they impressed on me the importance of seeing that our votes in connection with these matters were kept up to the usual. I quite understand that that farm is not part of the organization of this government, but of the Ontario government, but their officials and ours work hand in hand on all these things. Any money they put into this is spent to good advantage, and what money we put in is spent to good advantage, too.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister's assurance is far-reaching. I can only hope he has not been infected too much by the optimism of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Nicholson: I want to draw the minister's attention to the applause he received a few minutes ago when he intimated the experimental farm at Ottawa would not be made available for subdivision. I think it is a great pity that in the development of Canada we have kept so little park land in our centres. I am sure I speak for every member in the house when I say that the experimental farm at Ottawa is one place that every person who visits Ottawa likes to see, and agrees is a place that should give us a great deal of pride.

The idea has gone abroad that farming is a very prosperous business in Canada, and I believe the minister himself must take some responsibility for creating that impression. I should like to suggest that consideration be given to having the experimental farm service set up a number of experimental farms in the maritimes, in Ontario, the prairies and British Columbia, to demonstrate just how profitable farming is with present costs. I realize that in the past experimental farms have been chiefly concerned with the development of new varieties in a good many fields, and that service has been helpful. Up until now we have not had direct assistance in demonstrating how profitable it is to go into hog production, cattle production or wheat production. It would appear to me that now, when nearly everybody else expects a 40-hour week, the Department of Agriculture should set up some experimental farms and pay reasonable wages on a 40-hour week basis, and demonstrate over a period of five years just how profitable this business of cultivating the land and producing food for the nation can be. Would the minister indicate whether he has considered that proposal, and would be disposed to use some of this appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, we have 228 illustration stations across Canada, some in all the provinces. We have a number of experimental farms, some in each province. I believe there are four in Saskatchewan and four in Alberta, and others across the country.

It has been argued on the floor of the house—and there is no use my saying it has not been considered, because before I was in the government, some years before, I sat in the gallery and listened to a discussion on the floor of the house in which members were saying that the government of that day should make those experimental farms pay.

I believe, in principle, that any member would give the same answer to that question as was given on the floor of the house at that time, namely, that if you are going to carry on experimental work you defeat the very purpose of the operation as a farm if you pay attention to trying to make it pay. You might try to keep down the cost of carrying out experiments, and that sort of thing, to the point where it would not cost too much. But to try to make it pay a profit would be most difficult.

In connection with our 228 illustration stations our procedure is this: As a rule we go on the farm of a farmer in a district who is known to be a particularly good one. Perhaps in a hundred cases out of a hundred he makes his farm pay. That is, he is known to be able to make his farm pay in the district where he lives—because he is that type of farmer. We go to his farm and rent some of his land. We ask him to do certain things on the land in order to indicate to people the results of experiments we have carried on at the experimental farm.

We have the farmer sow a certain variety of grain, perhaps, and then at a certain season, after the grain has matured, we invite all the people in to see it. Our cereals man would be there—if a cereal were involved—or, if it were livestock, our livestock man would be there. One of those men would go to the farm and invite the neighbouring farmers to come in. He would lecture them right alongside the plot, showing them how everything is done to get certain results. The farmer who has visited the plot will take back home with him the knowledge he has gained from that visit and will apply it in order to help him on his own farm, so as to make it pay.

But I am afraid that if we were to try to demonstrate that we were making a profit from the 10 acres, 20 acres or even 50 acres of which we get control, as part of a farming operation, we might have difficulty.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

I might say in this connection that I had a suggestion made to me one time in Alberta—and I shall not use any names in what I have to say. I was travelling on a train with a certain gentleman who said, "The farmers in Alberta do not like the oil development on their farms." He was one of the oil men himself, and made the suggestion that probably the oil people might be able to gain a little more favour with the farmers if they were to select some of the most successful farmers in the district and help them to demonstrate ways and means in which they had made their farming operations successful.

I must say my reply to that gentleman was that that was exactly what we were trying to do in our illustration stations. I did not know just how it would be looked upon by the farmers themselves, if the oil people were doing it, and my reply was that they would have to find that out. My own view is that the weakness in the system, even as we apply it, is that some people find it difficult to agree that the other fellow is doing a better job than they are. And to the extent that that is true, it is sometimes difficult to have your suggestions applied. Generally speaking, however, it has been pretty successful across Canada, and I do not know that we would want to change it.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I do not suggest in any way that what is being done should be discontinued. I think that any effort to make an experimental farm pay, when research work is being undertaken, would be very difficult. But with a fairly large vote, and with an economics branch in the minister's department, I think that department could demonstrate on a half section or a quarter section basis how mixed farming might be undertaken or conducted over a five-year or ten-year period. Profits and losses could be set out carefully, so that people would know exactly what went into the operation by way of land, interest, taxes, wages and the like, so that at the end of the year there would be a balance sheet to indicate how profitable or unprofitable the operation had been.

Mr. Gardiner: That was done in Saskatchewan. Perhaps I could refer to it, because it does not concern either the government there now or the government of which I was a member when I was there. It was done when the Anderson coalition government held office in Saskatchewan. They selected a number of farms over Saskatchewan, one of which I remember was near Lockwood. I remember it very well, because I was teaching school there when they were homesteading. The land was of a type which, when broken up, would grow some of the finest crops for two or three years that could be grown anywhere. But it turned out to be comparatively light ground.

The objective they had in going there and buying that farm, one which for three years had paid very well and then had run into financial difficulties, was to see if it could be operated in a way which would make it profitable. I am not sure what is being done on that farm now, but I think most people were convinced that that land could not be operated profitably. Probably it was a good thing to prove that fact. However, there may be less expensive ways of proving it than that—I do not know.

Mr. Cardiff: Two years ago I had occasion to visit the experimental farm at Ottawa. Looking at some of the pigs they had out there I must say I do not think I ever saw worse pigs in my life. Perhaps they were experimenting with them, but the impression I got when I left was a very poor one, and I am sure other people who visited there must have gained the same impression. I have not visited the experimental farm for a year or so, but I hope they have a better class of pigs out there now to show the people.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course my hon. friend understands that some years ago it was thought by some members that we should import Landrace hogs, and try them out on the farm. We did that. After they had been there for some time and it had been demonstrated there was no advantage in them over the Yorks, an attempt was made at crossing them. We got certain results by doing that. Then, too, the Chester white was brought there for similar purposes, and there has been a crossing of those. I agree the results we have had are not too good. But it is not doing any harm to anyone, and proof has been found that what some people thought might be helpful was not helpful, and it is being done away with to a certain extent.

Mr. Cardiff: It left a very poor impression on visitors, who say, "Those pigs around there!" Anyone who knew anything about pigs certainly would not have them on his place.

Mr. Deslieres: The minister has said that there are 228 illustration stations throughout the country. Has the department given consideration to the erection of such a station in the eastern townships, particularly in the constituency of Brome-Missisquoi?

Mr. Gardiner: There do not appear to be any in that county. There is one at Compton. There are some near to it, but none in the county.

Mr. Deslieres: There is no question that there should be one. Is the department taking into consideration the erection of such a station in that county?

Mr. Gardiner: There is an experimental farm at Lennoxville, of course, which is not so far away, and there is this illustration station at Compton, and there are some others. The question arises as to whether there is a different type of soil located in other areas over a large enough area that would require another station there. That is the real point.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I join with the hon. member for Mackenzie and the minister himself in their lauding of the beauty of our experimental farm at Ottawa. It certainly is a pleasure and a thrill to go through the grounds over there. However, about two weeks ago I had occasion to visit the farm with one other hon. member. While we were not fortunate enough to see some of the officials there, we went through some of the buildings and saw the hogs they have at the experimental farm. I do not want to be too critical but in looking over the hogs it seemed to me that they would not give one an incentive to go into the production of hogs. The condition of the hogs was very bad. I wonder whether there is a reason for that. Were these hogs being specially fed in an effort to determine something in respect to formula feeding, or is there some other reason for it? This is something that should be looked into. Certainly there was every indication that there was something wrong with the production of hogs over there.

Mr. Gardiner: It will be recalled that some years ago some of us had black hogs, some had red hogs, some had white hogs and so on. I have just forgotten the year when the department undertook to produce one type of hog across this country that would produce a type of bacon that would be satisfactory to Britain.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): If I might interject, I may not have made myself clear. I am not referring to breed. I am referring to physical condition.

Mr. Gardiner: I am coming to that, too. Our real work on the farms for many years was developing this type of hog that we now have right across the country. You will scarcely ever see a hog on a farm today that is not a white York. The white York is a different type.

Mr. Harkness: Every Tamworth breeder will be down your neck.

Mr. Gardiner: You may have the odd Tamworth because you think that his nose is not the same as the York, but most of the people have Yorks. These were bred by our experimental staffs on the experimental farms to begin with, and then they were spread all over the country until today we have them everywhere. To come back to the hon. member's point, he says there is nothing there to encourage him to start to raise the particular kind of hog that is there. Well, the particular reason for that is that we have got to a different stage in the experimental work. We are now examining to find out whether cross-breeding will result in a better type of hog than we have at the present time, and that work is being done at the experimental farm here, and on the farm at Lacombe in Alberta. They are trying to cross-breed; they are trying to inbreed them, and as every breeder of stock knows, sometimes you get bad results in inbreeding and sometimes you get an improved line by inbreeding. So far as the hogs are concerned, apparently it is not doing as well as it does in some other types of livestock, cattle for example. That is being found out and as it is being found out, people are being warned against that kind of thing. We do this much better at the experimental farm. We find out the weaknesses as well as the strong points, and that should indicate to farmers what they should not do as well as what they should do. Therefore you will find there some hogs that have been the result of that kind of experimenting that would not encourage the hon. member or any other farmer to get that particular breed for their farms.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): May I be permitted to ask the minister another question in line with the answer I have just received? This question has to do with dwarfism in certain cattle breeds. Is the department doing anything to investigate methods by which that might be controlled or eradicated in the production of beef cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, we are doing some investigations on how that can be eliminated and prevented from showing up in herds. I cannot say that I have anything very much to report at the moment. Progeny tests are the means by which it is done.

Mr. Herridge: Under this item I want briefly to bring to the minister's attention the excellent work being done by the Summerland experimental station which has been operating for many years and has been of great value to the fruit farmers, farmers and livestock people, vegetable growers and so on in the interior of British Columbia. That work is very much appreciated by all the farm organizations, farmers and fruit growers in this area. The Okanagan conditions are dry land conditions, and are very much similar to those in the North Columbia valley in East Kootenay. I want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that in Kootenay West there are different climatic conditions. The minister would know what I was speaking of if I referred to Kootenay West as the Garden of Eden. We have a great variety there, greater rainfall conditions, and they vary over a few miles. Well, the results that have been obtained at Summerland with respect to certain fruits, livestock, legumes and things of that sort are applicable over a wide area. Some of the results cannot be used in Kootenay West because of the different climatic conditions. At the request of the farmers' organizations and fruit organizations in the district I am going to ask the minister whether he would establish two or three illustration stations. I understand they are quite inexpensive. For instance, one in Inonoaklin valley, which is a dairying valley, some twelve or fifteen miles long, for the dairymen in that area, and one say in the Lardeau valley, which is new country opening up, and one in the Kootenay lake area, dealing particularly with fruit-growing conditions, would be of great help.

In recent years newcomers have come into the area, and it is the old story of history being re-lived. They have been spending their time clearing and developing small farms and planting the wrong varieties, and doing the things that should not be done, and they are doing it because they have not the experience and have not taken advice. If there were two or three illustration stations of that sort, particularly in those districts where climatic conditions vary so much in a few miles, it would help the farmers greatly.

In addition to that, while the Summerland experimental station is a beautiful place to visit, large numbers of people cannot travel great distances through the country. It is very awkward. A few illustration stations well located and well advertised could be the centre around which the local farmers' institutes and farmers' organizations could have their annual events, and so on, particularly their summer events. I do ask the minister and his officials to give consideration to my suggestion.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand there are 23 illustration stations in British Columbia. There is one at Creston, with which I know my hon. friend will be familiar, though it is slightly different from the regular illustration station. I have been there myself and I must say it is doing particularly good work. But British Columbia is a little different from the other areas about which I have been speaking. Take the prairies, for example. It is very much a matter of difference in the soil and that is the situation we face in British Columbia. You have a mountain range on one side and the soil condition on one side may well be the same as on the other side. But the fact that you have a mountain range on the west side and a range on the other side makes quite a difference and there is always the necessity for different treatment within limited areas. But we have been giving consideration to the possibilities mentioned and will continue to do so.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, at this moment I would like to take a little time to express as a farmer my appreciation and I think the appreciation of all farmers, certainly within my own province, of the excellent liaison maintained between the practising farmers and the officials of the minister's department, especially in the science service division and experimental farm service. I know that in my own province at least the men who are responsible for carrying out the program of the department are men who have devoted their life's work to the betterment of agricultural conditions, and it is not an exaggeration to say that they are men who are dedicated to their profession. I think it is only fair that I should add this word in appreciation of the fine work they are doing.

A few moments ago mention was made of the fact that considerable work has been done with regard to the development of an improved type of bacon hog all across the country, and much outstanding work has been done in that regard in my own province. If I were to pick out any one in particular I could think of one man who has done excellent work in that connection and, one might say, given his life to the improvement of the type of bacon hog which is produced in Canada. He has also done extensive work on the question of advanced registry and developments related thereto with the result that in my own province the number of hogs graded "select" is much higher than in any other province of Canada. That is just an indication of what can be done through the devoted efforts of one man.

I want to support what other members have said with regard to retaining the experimental farm. I know the minister will strongly resist any move which might develop to have that beautiful and worth-while experimental farm subdivided for building or anything of that sort. I think it would be a tragic loss not only to the city of Ottawa but to the agricultural industry generally and to the many people who benefit through having an opportunity to visit the farm out there.

While I am on my feet I would like to ask the minister what attention has been given to experimentation with regard to the adaptability of certain breeds of cattle and other farm animals to this country, especially with regard to those which have not already been generally introduced here. I am thinking of breeds of cattle which are foreign to us. Although it may be said that the British breeds of cattle are excellent, nevertheless there is a possibility that certain characteristics existing in cattle in other countries, and I am thinking especially of the Brahman cattle, may be crossed with the British breeds for certain purposes, and also with some French breeds of cattle such as the Charolaise.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to the point the hon. member has raised I might just say that we are doing a little work on that at our farm in southern Alberta with Brahman cattle and crossing them with some other breed. I do not know whether that is done with the object of getting better breeds or for producing steers to fight at the stampede but in any event we are doing work with that breed of cattle.

I might say that when I was over in Europe last year at the FAO conference I was very much surprised to see one of the largest animals I have ever seen in the way of cattle in the old white breed they had in Roman days. They still have them there and they are very big cattle. They also have a brown type of cattle which came down from the north. I saw both of them, and both are very large animals, though I do not know if they would help our breeds here if we crossed them. I think, though, it would be a worth-while experiment.

Item agreed to.

Branch experimental farms, substations and illustration stations—

19. Operation and maintenance, $6,351,995.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to pay my tribute to the superintendent of our substation at Fort William. That station is attracting more interest every year and this man not only runs the substation with great benefit to the community but he is also an expert in other fields and his services are much in demand by the community as a whole. He is very helpful and very patient and very considerate to all those who want to benefit from his advice. He experiments in grains, grasses, fruits and vegetables with great success.

Item agreed to.

Production service—

21. Production service administration, $84,843.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I spoke some time ago about the desirability of discussing two important matters. I presume this would be the item under which they could best be discussed. People from coast to coast in Canada today are wondering what is going to happen to agriculture unless something is done to regulate the amount we produce.

We are spending great sums of money through the Colombo plan and the United States point four program and through other agencies in fitting other nations to produce their own foodstuffs. That is the objective at which we aim. We say that if we can just get into India, Burma, Pakistan, the African countries, and other countries all over the world and assist them in producing their own needs then we shall not have to worry about supporting them. But we have overlooked this important fact: Once we have them producing all their own needs, or a major portion of them, they will have little need for our production. The result will be that we will have more difficulty in finding foreign markets for our own production.

Now, I am wondering, presuming matters develop in a normal sort of way, whether the minister has a policy or is formulating a policy in accordance with which we would be able to introduce—I do not like the word "limit", and I do not like the word "regulate", because both those words connote a certain amount of telling people what they should or should not do—but some sort of modification of our production so as to take some precaution to see that we do not produce too much more than we ourselves can consume or sell abroad, and, along the same line, probably changing our wheat production or a certain amount of it to the production of oats, barley, rye and other commodities for which we might have a good market. As I read the news, we have no difficulty in disposing of our oats and barley but we are faced with disaster if things go in the right direction, or rather in the wrong direction, in respect of our wheat. If we could manage so that we could produce more oats and more barley and less wheat, probably we might be better off. I believe I have said sufficient to indicate what is in my mind, namely the matter of regulating production so as not to produce more than we can use and can sell, beyond a certain limit, at least.

Along with that question goes this one. Are we planning to save up supplies of non-perishable goods? By that I mean goods that are non-perishable within limits, of course. Roosevelt used to talk a good deal about an ever-normal granary. He had a good idea, I think, in times like these. Are we planning in such a way that, in case disaster were to strike us—which it could easily do, as everyone knows—we would have in store in safe places all the oats, barley, rye, flax, mustard seed and various other kinds of seed that we would normally use, all the wheat we would normally use for a considerable length of time, as well as all the honey, sugar, soya beans, corn, peas and all that sort of thing, all of which we could so easily store?

Of course I do not wish to be an alarmist any more than does any other hon. member of this committee. But we might just as well face possibilities. There are plenty of indications that the Russians have the cobalt bomb. All hon. members know that if the cobalt bomb were used there would be little production of anything for a considerable period of time after its employment. As the minister can quite readily see, what I am wondering about is whether or not he is drafting a plan—along with the provinces, of course—under which we could preserve a considerable amount of these commodities.

As the minister and hon. members of the committee know, I gave a speech on November 17 in which I proposed that we institute an arrangement by which we would establish storage facilities on the farm—storage facilities that were acceptable and approved—under which the farmers could store their excess wheat, receive payment for that wheat stored in those facilities and be paid storage on the grain in those storage facilities just as the grain would have storage paid on it if it were in an elevator.

If we would make that sort of arrangement, I am quite positive that we could store with perfect ease on our farms all the wheat we have and that we could pay for that wheat so that the farmers would be able to carry on. Then we would have no pressure for selling abroad, something which is likely to drive governments, and people too, into a sort of panic.

While we are talking about wheat, may I say that I fail to see how we could store anything of greater intrinsic value than wheat. It seems to me that a nation which had its full wheat supplies for seven or eight years stored up in safe places would be in a most fortunate position. The wheat so stored would not be on the open market at all. It would be recognized that it is bought and paid for and that it is not for sale on fire-sale terms. To illustrate the value of such a thing as that, all we have to do is to refer to the way in which our wheat board has managed large wheat supplies with great skill and judgment in times past. We have had vast accumulations of wheat in times past, as in 1943 and 1944, and those accumulations worried us. But the wheat board just held on until, by and by, conditions arose which used all that wheat. I fail to see why we would be doing an imprudent thing if we looked upon our wheat supplies in some such way at the present time. But as the minister well knows, if we have to rely on the big elevator companies to provide the storage for that wheat, we are going to oblige the elevator companies to build far more elevator capacity than they would be able to use under ordinary circumstances, and consequently incur an overhead which would constitute a serious liability. But if the farmers were building bins on their farms, there would not be the overhead, the need for the high degree of insurance, or the obsolescence that will be noticeable in the elevators. In those and many other ways this kind of instrument would not constitute an overhead that would threaten to impair our economic position.

That is the way I see it, and no matter how carefully I examine it nor from how many angles I look at it, the whole concept looks to me to be worthy of serious consideration. If we had similar means whereby we could store all the oats, barley, rye, flax, soya beans, sugar, honey and the other things which we could store in this country, we could then in adequate measure divert our attention from the production of wheat to the production of these other commodities, could store several years' supply of those commodities and thus would be so much the more in a safe position in respect of supply.

I just wonder what the minister has been thinking along this line. Of course, he would not take any measures of this kind without careful consultation with all the provincial governments. Any move to modify crops, plantings and so forth would be made entirely with their understanding and through their agencies among the people in the provinces so that we would work this thing out without anything like dictatorship or telling people what to do. It looks to me as though we would certainly be much safer in following a line of producing a wide variety of commodities and of storing them than we would be by running a risky business such as that which we quite obviously have been running in respect of wheat.

The question will arise as to how we can pay for all this. People will say this: You see what is happening in the United States. The Americans have a vast supply of goods which it is beginning to cost them so much to maintain that they are trying to get out from under the cost; hence they are beginning to force their way into the world markets and they will probably wreck the whole of the world's markets.

I do not wish to enter into a prolonged or detailed discussion of this matter but I would just make this point. If we go down to the United States and see what their constitution tells them they can do, we will realize immediately that if use were made of the constitutional power which is given to congress by the constitution, there would be no difficulty whatsoever. Their constitution says specifically that congress shall coin money and determine the value thereof. There have been presidents of the United States who have used that power. One of them was Abraham Lincoln. If the United States would use that power today to pay for the wheat, to pay for the storage and the storage facilities with money out of the national credit they would immediately get out from under the grievous weight of the burden of supporting their great surpluses.

Looking at it in a very general sort of way, it does seem clear that the United States, with all her tremendous industrial potential and her vast wealth, should be able to store wheat as well as Joseph did in Egypt for seven years. It would be hard to give a reasonable explanation why what the Egyptians could do in Joseph's time could not be done by the United States today, and so with Canada.

While I am on the matter, may I say that the same power to create money is in the hands of the parliament of Canada and was used under the finance acts of 1914 and 1923, as I have outlined in speeches on the floor of the house much to the annoyance of a great many of my colleagues, I know, but nevertheless probably containing the germ of a solution to a problem which to them at the present time is utterly unsolvable, using the orthodox economic system under which we now operate.

May I ask the minister if he would tell us what he has in the way of plans as regards policies for the regulation of the production of this nation and for the storing of goods for this nation in preparation for any time of grave peril.

Before I take my seat may I draw this to the attention of hon. members. They have all thought about it many times and in thinking about it they have been filled with dread and have turned away from it. Suppose an atomic war should be waged in Europe and terrible destruction of supplies resulted in Africa and other places. Think of the tremendous need there would be for the food which we have now and can store. We could probably save the lives of millions if we could only make use of the blessings God has given us by abundant crops in the last three or four years. Now that I have said all that, the minister might talk for a while and tell us what he has in mind for modifying the production of crops, what he has done and thinks can be done, what he contemplates and what he has in mind for the storing of crops.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I rather hesitate to say again what I have said every year, I think, since 1939. We have had a plan all the time. The trouble is that some planners do not regard it as a plan with which they can agree. When I came here nineteen years ago and took this position I was told by Britain that we could not produce enough bacon to feed Britain, that we could not produce enough dairy products and other things to supply that market, and that therefore they were going to get them somewhere else. That, in a few words, is what we were told back in 1936. The war came in 1939 and we established a plan under which we set out to prove to the British that we could produce the food and, as every member of the house knows, by 1943 we were producing 700 million pounds of bacon for Britain, 85 per cent of all they were consuming. Then they took the trouble to send a man over here to say after the war was over they had to go back to the old method of dealing.

If hon. members do not realize that the government did something about that, well, I feel sorry for them. We held a meeting in the first week of December of every year, and we are still holding it, to indicate to farmers the things that they might produce to advantage in this country. Immediately after that statement was made by the British we communicated it to that meeting in December and suggested that we were not going to be able to sell so many hogs after the war was over and we were not going to be able to sell dairy products in the same quantities.

We did not have to do any more than tell the farmers that. We did not have to tell them what to do about it. They did the job themselves, and it has been done year by year until by the time we got into the position where Britain would not take our bacon we were not worried whether or not they did. That was not just done by nobody doing anything about it. The gentleman who is sitting here at the table has been the chairman of all these meetings except the last one, and on that occasion he was sick. I should not say he was sick, but he went out and tried to do something that a man of his age probably should not do and he was under the weather for a few days and was not able to be there. Nevertheless we held that meeting and discussed the whole question again, and the result is to be found largely in figures which I have here. I will only use two sets of them, cattle and hogs.

I will not go back too far, just to 1939, the year the war started. Net marketings of cattle were 1,026,000 and the domestic disappearance was 986,000 and exports 218,000. The price at Toronto was $6.77 a hundred or 6·7 cents a pound. Then I will take the year to which I referred, 1943. We marketed 1,072,000 cattle, not very many more, and the domestic disappearance was 1,006,000 and exports were only 90,000. Coming down to 1953, net marketings were 1,546,000, or 50 per cent more than they were in the last year I gave, but domestic disappearance was 1,470,000. You will note that in 1943 it was 1,006,000. In 1953 it was 1,470,000, or almost 500,000 more were consumed by the people of this country.

The other part of the plan was to make it possible for them to buy and consume. To mention only two aspects of that part of the plan, there was the extension of old age pensions and the payment of family allowances to every family in the country at an average rate of $30 a month. The purpose was to make it possible for people to eat our farm products. In addition, wage increases made it possible for considerably greater consumption.

What was stated by someone a little while ago is quite true. Of course there are more people in the country now than there were then. That also helps, but the whole thing was part of a plan to have production equal consumption or, to put it the other way, to have consumption equal production, and it almost does. Exports of cattle in 1953 were only 123,000 head, with 50 per cent more cattle. In 1939 we exported 218,000 head before the war started at all. In 1944 we exported 280,000 head, in 1948 732,000 head and last year only 123,000 head. There are no surplus beef cattle in this country, and there is no surplus beef in this country. The plan worked out in so far as beef was concerned, as is illustrated by these figures.

Now, coming to hogs, I said a few minutes ago we had a very high production in 1943. The inspected slaughterings of hogs back in 1939 was 3,793,000 head; coming down to 1943, it was 7,174,000; and in 1944, it was 8,766,000. Now, that is the year our friends came here and told us they were not going to be able to take our hogs in the years after the war. They did not tell us we had better do something about it. We knew we had better do something about it, so by the year 1949 the inspected slaughterings were down to 4,099,000. In 1952 they were back up to 6,234,000 and this last year they numbered 4,611,000.

In so far as consumption is concerned, may I say that in 1939 it was 2,302,000 head; 1943, 2,778,000; 1953, 4,314,000. These figures show that this country consumed twice as much as we were consuming, or practically twice as much as we were consuming back in 1939. All of this was part of a plan. In 1939 hogs were selling at $11.88, and in 1953 they are $30.40. This illustrates what the plan was, or at least it illustrates how it worked.

An hon. Member: Did you have a plan in 1939?

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly, we had a plan in 1939, and because my hon. friend did not think it was a plan he did not come back after the next election. I would suggest he follow the plan this time. Those are the facts with regard to two of the most important products. We could go through the others and come to similar conclusions in regard to those. We have a plan, and the plan has been working ever since 1935 when we first came here as a government. It has developed from that up to the point where it has brought production up to where it is today, that is the production of all commodities of which we can dispose either at home or somewhere else. There are people here who say that we depended on the United States market. We do not sell any hogs or hardly any in the United States market. We sell a few cattle in the United States market, but we are not selling anything like the number we did a few years ago. We sold over 500,000 a few years ago, and last year there were 123,000 sold outside of Canada.

Now, that is the plan, and the plan is working. In so far as storage is concerned, we have been encouraging the building of cold storages across Canada. Away back at the beginning of the century, we started to subsidize the building of cold storages. When I came here in 1935, I was told we ought to stop that policy. This idea got into the minds of people because the production in Canada was not sufficient to utilize the cold storage facilities we had. We had almost been convinced we ought to stop it when the war came along. Since the war, and while the war was on, means were developed of making use of the cold storage facilities such as the world never dreamed of before in connection with frozen products. Now, instead of starting to slow up that policy, since the war we have been stepping it up. Two years ago we changed the policy from a support of 30 per cent of the cost of cold storage spread over four years to a 33 per cent payment in full the year the plant is built. We are, therefore, getting more and more cold storage facilities right across this country.

Well, now, that is the system of storage that has been provided for our perishable products. When we come to the non-perishable, I am in complete agreement with my hon. friend when he suggests that we farmers would be better off if we had enough storage on our own farms to store all our own grain. Personally, I believe that the most expensive way of storing grain is in a company's elevator. Because I believe that, I have enough storage space on my own farm to store all my own grain. I do not put it into the elevator until I am going to sell it. It is not a matter of paying for storage in an elevator. There are many other farmers in western Canada who follow that practice. The trouble is that many of the people who talk about this problem are the people who have not any grain to sell and never did sell any. Those of us who produce grain on our farms know what we are going to do with it, and know where to store that grain and how to look after it.

For example, a short time ago somebody started to say that we ought to have a battle with the United States over oats. I believe that the last thing in the world we ought to start a battle over with anybody is oats. In this country we cannot feed livestock without oats. There are other countries where you can, but it is an entirely different thing from feeding barley and wheat. If you feed barley and wheat, you have to have about as much oats to feed as you feed of those two grains in order to keep your stock alive while you are fattening them. The best practice to follow in western Canada is a practice I learned about the third year I was in the west. I went out in 1901 to help harvest the crop in the fall of 1901. In the summer of 1904, I helped a man for whom I was working build a barn. When we got the barn all built, and it was 84 feet long, he put a bin 16 feet wide right up the whole length of the barn.

Naturally, I said to him, "What are you going to do with that"? He said, "We have a good crop of oats this year, and I am going to fill the bin full from one end to the other." He did. I was back there in 1934 to visit the people on that farm, and they told me that was the first year that the bin had ever been empty. He used it, from one end down to the middle, to feed stock, and the next year he started from the other end and worked down to the middle. He always had a year's supply of feed oats in that bin right down to this period during which we had crop failure. Well, that is the only way to farm in western Canada. It is the only way to feed.

When I was out west last week I saw an item in the newspaper inserted by some people. I presume some of the members in the opposition would say it was inserted by someone on instructions from this government. It was not. The item said that there is not enough oats coming into Fort William, and we want more. I got right up on the platform and said any farmer who would ship oats out of Saskatchewan now either to Fort William or anywhere else does not know what good farming is, if he is feeding any livestock. Any farmer who kept oats down to this time of year kept the oats because he believed he needed them for feed. If he shipped them out now, and what could happen to our crop between now and the time it is harvested happened, that fellow would be without oats. Without oats he cannot feed even this wheat that is piled up there and part of which could be used for feed. These are some of the facts in connection with carrying on agriculture in this country.

We hear talk about what some other country ought to do. Certainly it is necessary for us to go down to Washington from time to time to talk to them. Certainly it is necessary for them to come up here from time to time to talk to us. The United States Secretary of Agriculture came up here one year and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I met him. We were having a terrible row about our potatoes going down into the United States. When the secretary was here I said to him, "Why, you are getting many potatoes down there from Canada; we are getting many from you." He looked surprised and said, "Is that true?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Can you give me the figures?" I said, "Yes." "Well", he said, "I'll guarantee you when I take these back and give them to the senators who have been talking about it, and show them that they did not know what they were talking about, you will not hear any more about it." And we did not hear anything more about it that year.

And so I say again in connection with these matters such as oats, and wheat we can send down to the United States, as well as what they can send up here, that we have got to get together on this subject and talk about it, get them to understand our position, and get to understand their position. Then the question of storage, the means of financing, the price we are going to get for the commodity and everything else will be on a better level than if we had not discussed it with them.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

I think we have had a plan which has worked out very well, and we are in a position today where we have not surpluses such as are being talked about on the other side of the house. We do have one surplus in wheat; and the reason things have come along in the way in which they have is that we believe you can store wheat to better advantage than you can store any other agricultural product. So if we have wheat in greater quantities than we need it in Canada or greater quantities than the world needs it at the present time, it is one commodity that you can put behind an inch board and pile it up as high as you like, and it will stay there in good condition for ten years or more. They tell us it stayed in the pyramids from the time they were built until now, and that you can take wheat out from there, plant it, and it will grow. If that is true, then it is one product you can bank on when you are talking about storage. And I agree with hon. members that if we can get the storage on our farms and elsewhere it will help everybody to carry on.

Mr. Blackmore: I think we have profited a great deal from having the minister announce on the record that he agrees we should have wheat stored on the farms. The minister knows, of course, as everybody else in the house knows, that there was just one flaw—

Mr. Gardiner: There is only one word in what the hon. member has said that I would not use. I would not say they "should"; I think it would be to their best advantage if they did.

Mr. Blackmore: There is one flaw in the illustration—and it was an excellent illustration—in that the man who was operating the farm and storing the oats evidently was not dependent upon the immediate sale of those oats to provide him with the money to finance his next year's operations. He was probably dealing in livestock and selling it as a cash crop, or probably he was producing butter or cheese or some other commodity from which he was getting money he needed to carry on.

Of course the minister knows as well as I do that the big difficulty out in the west now, particularly in my area, is that no matter how much wheat they have stored on the farm—even behind inch boards—it is tied up until they can sell enough wheat to get the money for next year's operations. If the minister can tell us what solution he has for that problem, then I can assure him that many of the farmers in my area would cheer as soon as they heard the news.

As I have said, there are a great number of farmers in my area who have plenty of wheat to enable them to pay off all their bills and finance their operations; but some of the saddest stories I have ever read are coming to me in letters from men who have done their very best. These are right good men who have wheat they cannot sell. They cannot borrow money on it; not enough to carry through beyond just getting their grain in. One writes me that he has exhausted—

Mr. Gardiner: May I say at once that the reason I did not deal with that subject is that it is not under my department, at all. We have already discussed that question for two days, and come to some conclusion about it. I do not think under the rules of the house it is proper for us to discuss it under these items.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not propose to violate the rules. But the simple fact is that the conclusion we came to through those days of discussion was just simply pathetic; it just left the farmers, the wheat producers of Canada, right out on a limb, with the possibility of stark ruin facing them. The minister knows that, and I do not propose to enter into a discussion about it.

The reduction of 10⅛ cents constituted practically the total profit on the production of the wheat farmers now have, which means that all their work for two years or so has been at a loss. I can understand the minister's reticence to enter into a debate on this matter. However, although the matter does not come under his jurisdiction, may I say it comes under the jurisdiction of the government of which he forms a part, and in which he must have a potent voice. So we will leave it there.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Earlier I asked the minister a question with respect to the production and distribution of Selkirk wheat. I have had complaints in connection with the distribution of it. Would the minister explain how it was produced, how many applicants received some of the wheat, and whether any of it went to the United States.

Mr. Gardiner: As hon. members know, Selkirk wheat is a wheat which was produced in the last few years to offset the new rust which has come into being, starting down in South America and moving north, until it has now come part way across the United States, and we even had some of it last year in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. To answer the first question, the wheat was produced by taking a sample which an elderly gentleman had produced in Manitoba, a gentleman for whom we provided a gratuity this year. It was produced in one of those accidental ways in which men of that type get certain varieties of cereals. We crossed it with other plants until we got what is known as Selkirk wheat. When that was developed we took some of it down to California and increased the quantity of it by growing it in what are our winter months so that during the succeeding season we had a very considerable amount of this wheat which we otherwise would not have had. Then we brought it back to this country and distributed it among people who had been accustomed to enlarging the quantity of wheat, so many bushels to each one, and also we sowed quite a bit of it on the lands that we are putting under irrigation out in Alberta, at Bow River and elsewhere. We grew the wheat there; we grew it at the experimental farm and elsewhere until we had a considerable amount. Then we distributed it this year to persons who desired to get it and who after they were checked were found to be people who could handle a quantity. We gave them six bushels each and they are now attempting to produce wheat which they themselves can use in succeeding seasons as seed wheat.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): This wheat was given only to registered or certified seed growers, is that correct?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that was what was done in practically every case. There may have been some few cases of persons who got it who had not been producing certified seed, but very few, if any. The wheat was given out, so far as possible, to the persons that the hon. member has indicated. They are now producing and they will not only supply themselves, but they will supply neighbours and others. A check will be kept on what is done with the wheat and where it goes, and it will be distributed over the west. It is hoped that there will be a considerable amount of that wheat produced next year.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Can the minister tell us why there was a delay in the delivery? In some cases it was after the normal seeding time before some farmers received it.

Mr. Gardiner: There may be some cases but I really never heard that complaint at any time. I can hardly understand why that would be a complaint this year, because the great complaint out west is that the farmers did not get their crop in until about one month later than usual. Therefore I do not know how it could have done very much harm. Of course down in the section where my hon. friend is located it is just possible that they did get their crop earlier than they did in some other places, but most of them did not get it in until quite late.

Production service—
Health of animals —

24. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $5,540,940.

Mr. Nowlan: There is a matter which I should like to draw to the attention of the minister on this item. It is a matter with which I have had some correspondence with his officials in the past, and as a result I have received some co-operation. I know that representations have been made by other organizations as well. It is true that this is a matter that affects a local area, but it is important enough to be brought up at this time. I am referring to a situation which was created in an Annapolis county. In that county some years ago, through negotiations which were entered into between farmers, the department of agriculture of the provincial government and this department, arrangements were made for Bang's disease eradication in that county. Probably a different arrangement was made from what had been made before. Perhaps it was one which the department entered into with some mental reservation, but the letter I have here from the deputy minister said that representations were made from the provincial government and they felt they should co-operate with what was a very well organized scheme. In other words, what happened was that all the individual farmers in that county were so well organized through public meetings at schoolhouses and every other organization was brought into play that we did achieve in that county what I am told is a hundred per cent eradication of Bang's disease, and that county was declared a disease-free area. I am told by the officials of the department that it was the only one in Canada that did achieve that distinction. That happened in the years 1948 and 1949.

Since then the department has decided that it was impossible or unwise to maintain this policy with respect to all of the farmers in the area, and it is being restricted, I believe, as a general principle, to farms on which there are ten or more in a herd. I can quite appreciate that in many cases that is perfectly all right, and it would sound reasonable to farmers in areas where large herds are maintained. I suppose that 60 per cent of the farmers in that county have fewer than ten head of cattle on their farms. Up until a year ago all of those people were boasting of the fact that they had a certificate such as I hold in my hand showing that they were in a Bang's disease-free area. I have a letter which I received this morning, and it is typical of what is going on throughout the country. This is a letter addressed to a certain farmer in the county; as a matter of fact, it is addressed to Mr. Robert E. Mason, and reads:

Dear Sir:

I am in receipt of a report covering the re-test of your herd under the—

And then there is a very long word which I would have great difficulty in pronouncing. I continue:

—Brucellosis policy of this division, and it is noted that your herd proved negative.

In other words, clear. The letter goes on:

Due to the fact that your herd contained less than ten head your certificate is being forwarded to Ottawa for cancellation.

That letter is going out to everyone who has fewer than ten cattle. A year ago they decided not to carry on the tests at all. Owing to representations, in which possibly I had a little part to play as well as others, the department is carrying on the tests this year. They are carrying on t.b. tests and Bang's disease tests together, but this is the last time in which they are going to do that. The farmers are being told that the whole situation will have to be changed, I suspect largely because of a shortage of veterinarians. I imagine, if the facts were known, that is the reason rather than as a matter of economy; but this was an agreement. Agreements were entered into between the farmers and the department. It is true that the department did not sign, but I have a copy of one here which was signed of one of the hundreds of thousands that were signed by the farmers throughout that county.

When you think of the tremendous amount of organization that went into that drive, and you can imagine how difficult it is to organize farmers, it is too bad that a change is being made. When you can organize rural districts of this sort and get a hundred per cent co-operation, such as was received down there, and get the assurance of the government that this program is going to be carried on, it is a great disappointment when a change is made. We are now told that the program will have to be dropped in so far as herds of fewer than ten cattle are concerned. I know that technical reasons can be given for that. I know the minister will say that we have calf vaccination and that there has been such a wide degree of acceptance of this policy that probably we are going to be in pretty good shape anyway. Certainly, that county is going to be in far better shape than before this program was initiated. The fact remains, as I say, that probably 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the farmers will lose the benefit of this. They are losing the certificates which they have valued, and they have the feeling well, after all, this is an undertaking into which we entered with the government and now it is being broken.

And that is the frank summation of it all. If I am right in the information which I received from the department's officials, this was the one area in Canada where this situation was achieved and because of the tremendous degree of co-operation which was received and the great amount of hard work that was put into it, I wonder whether the minister cannot have the situation reviewed and have this policy which was inaugurated kept on for a while longer. The farmers have gone a long way to maintain this policy but now, as I understand it, the certificates are being picked up and they are being told that this is the end of it.

I would ask the minister to have this situation reviewed and see if it cannot be kept on for another two or three years, and by that time the situation will be so clarified that the farmers will accept this statement of the change in policy as one which would be fair and reasonable. I think this should be supported after the great deal of work which went into it during the years 1948-49.

Mr. Gardiner: I think the best thing I can do is just to read the directive to the district veterinarians and indicate the reasons why certain things have been done. This reads:

> At the conference of district veterinarians held in Ottawa from September 23 to 25, 1954, it was the opinion of all present that the conducting of annual retests on small herds was costly and time consuming.

I think perhaps the second reason is stronger than the first if the idea was to get over the initial difficulty and get the declaration made as soon as possible. It continues:

> Therefore, in accordance with the agreement reached, on and after November 1, 1952, a herd must contain a minimum of 10 head of cattle to be eligible for acceptance under the policy and that this number must be maintained at each subsequent annual retest.

That reason, of course, is tied up with the first covering cost and time consuming factors. And again:

> Owners whose herds at present are under the policy will be given one year from the next annual retest to meet the above requirements and must be advised by the divisional veterinarian conducting the retest who will make a notation to that effect. Herd owners who cannot comply will have their agreements and certificates cancelled. This will not apply to federal government owned herds or licensed artificial insemination units. Agreements covering jointly owned herds will be accepted.

In Nova Scotia where areas have been provincially established for brucellosis control by individual signed agreements and reactors' slaughter without compensation, the department will continue to conduct laboratory tests but will not provide federal veterinarians for collecting blood samples.

Now, I think it will be seen that the plan is not brought to an end but that federal government activity in connection with the provision of veterinarians is discontinued. I presume that has something to do with the way in which veterinarians operate in that particular province. I have some sympathy for what my hon. friend has said but since we have gone so far with it, and apparently it has worked so well, if anything can be done to see it is maintained at the present standard then it ought to be done.

Mr. Nowlan: I would just like to add one further word. In the first place the minister probably knows, and if he does not I would remind him that before the scheme was brought into effect one of the conditions the farmers had to accept was that they were to pay for three tests on their own by privately operating veterinary surgeons. The farmers accepted that and expended the money in good faith. It is true they got the results of these tests, but many of them would not have paid out that money for three separate inspections had they known this was to take place. But they had the three tests made and then called upon the departmental veterinary to make the fourth and final test. These farmers were therefore called upon to make a substantial investment in the scheme when they had not intended to do so, and they made that agreement in good faith with Her Majesty the Queen as represented by the right hon. gentleman sitting across the way, though I am quite sure, in view of what has taken place, it is not one with which he would wish to associate himself. I would point out too that when the minister quotes from the memo in which it was said that many of the farmers found it difficult to live up to the regulations that there is another clause of the regulations which was distributed to the farmers and which states:

> 8. The veterinary director general may in his discretion cancel a certificate issued under these regulations whenever he is of opinion that the holder thereof has violated any of the provisions of his agreement, the act or these regulations or has failed to comply with any directions made pursuant to these regulations.

Certainly if any of the farmers violated the agreement the certificate should be cancelled and I do not believe any of the farmers would object to that. But do not let us cancel them by saying that only a few of them were able to comply with the regulations. That is evading the question to say the least. If you are going to cancel the scheme—and I trust the minister will give further consideration to this matter as he has done in the past on other matters—then I trust he will take a very careful look at some of these clauses. Before he closes the volume and says this book is lost, then I would ask him why these certificates should be cancelled simply because a man happens to have eight or nine head of cattle.

Mr. Gardiner: That was agreed to by all of them. I am not conversant with all the details.

Mr. Nowlan: That is not my information.

Mr. Gardiner: But they all know what the regulations were.

Mr. Nowlan: Not according to this.

Mr. Gardiner: That is what I am told.

Mr. Nowlan: That is the whole argument. This was entered into in good faith by all these farmers, but now we are told that because a man may have three or four head of cattle, the certificate is to be cancelled. We are told that because of the difficulty of administration a man must have 10 head of cattle. I wish to protest against this. These men are to lose this certificate in the same manner as other people might lose a licence, and they are to be sort of blacklisted. I suggest that a man who obtained this certificate in good faith should not have his certificate cancelled and I would ask the minister to give this the most careful consideration to see if there cannot be some amelioration of this situation.

Mr. Gardiner: I just wish to correct a statement I made earlier. I find on checking that it was our own officials who agreed to this, and the other people were not there at that time. I would say further that as my hon. friend has brought this matter to our attention we will give it every possible consideration. I have a good deal of sympathy for the question he has raised.

Mr. Charlton: I think even if there was an agreement entered into certainly you could not control brucellosis by eliminating the small herds in that county. It is quite ridiculous. If there was an agreement made with that county then I say along with the hon. member who has just spoken that it should be left up to them. I understood the minister to say these small herd owners would have their certificates sent back to them when they sent samples in. I take it these samples would have to be drawn by accredited veterinaries and they would pay the cost of drawing that sample and if they were sent in they would be tested free by the department. Just to have the samples sent in by anyone would certainly be, I think, a questionable practice.

Mr. Yuill: Mr. Chairman, on item 7 I asked the minister a certain question and I was asked to wait until this item came up. My question is what progress has been made in combating Bang's disease? I have some supplementary questions. Where does that research take place, and are there any statistics available to indicate what success has been achieved? While I am on my feet I would just like to include in that the question of another disease.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, we have been carrying on research work in connection with Bang's disease over at the animal diseases research institute at Hull ever since I have been here and indeed some time before that. That is for more than twenty years. One of the members—I do not know whether he wants to say anything about it himself or not—sent me down this note:

> My herd has been accredited since 1923, thirty-one years, and the stipulation at that time, 1923, was ten head including a bull.

So it has apparently been that way for a long time. It does not just apply to Nova Scotia but applies apparently quite generally. I just wanted to make that known.

Mr. Charlton: That is t.b. accreditation?

Mr. Gardiner: No. The hon. member keeps cattle and I think he understands the difference between Bang's disease and t.b. I am sure the member who sent me down the note understands the difference between Bang's disease and t.b. I would hope that he was speaking of Bang's disease when he said this. As far as the other matter is concerned, I think I have given the answer. Experiments are carried on over at the institute at Hull.

Mr. Byrne: I have a matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. In the Roosville area of British Columbia there is a disease called vibriosis ravishing the breeding stock. I understand that the method of eradicating this disease is by either disposing of the sires or by artificial insemination. In range cattle this is quite a costly undertaking, inasmuch as the cattle are not confined as they would be in the dairy industry. The farmers are therefore finding great difficulty. While the provincial government has undertaken certain steps, representations have been made to me to the effect that there should be some contribution by the federal government in the way of grants or some similar assistance. Will the minister make some comment on this matter?

Mr. Gardiner: What is the disease?

Mr. Byrne: Vibriosis.

Mr. Gardiner: The health of animals division have a report on the condition which exists there. They say it is not a reportable disease and therefore not one that we have been dealing with directly. However they are keeping a check on it. If it begins to make great difficulty I presume that more attention will be paid to it. However I imagine that it will be done through representations from the provincial department. We help in every way we can in these matters having to do with disease; but the diseases that are not reportable are, in the first instance, the responsibility of the agriculture department in the province. If they call upon us for assistance they always get it.

Mr. Charlton: Now that the veterinary director general is sitting in front of the minister maybe he could tell us when the first listed herd certificate was granted in Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: The doctor tells me that it was back in about 1923—he has not the exact date here—when they had the first herd.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No. I want to ask the minister a question based on sessional paper No. 28-A. The question asked was this, and I think this item is as good a one as any other on which to raise the matter:

> In how many cases, giving department vote number, and total amount of money involved in each case, were executive orders issued in each of the fiscal years ending March 31, 1949, to March 31, 1954, inclusive, temporarily or otherwise, supplementing votes of money by parliament?

I have here, under the Department of Agriculture, under the various years, quite a number of items. I notice, for example, item 17 in the year 1951; that is production service. Then there is an item there of some $50,000. There is a whole list of items. It is about the principle that I want to ask. Let me make one further explanation. This answer gives, in the left-hand column, the number of the vote, then in the middle is given the amount and then in the right-hand column is given the number of the supplemental vote; the heading is "Supplemented by vote" and below are given the numbers of the supplemental votes. I want to make my question clear. I have been familiar with the procedure of governor general's warrant by which, in an emergency, money could be got when parliament was not available. Will the minister explain the exact nature of these items and whether this money is taken and spent before there has been any appropriation by parliament, or whether the supplemental estimate comes along first?

Mr. Gardiner: The position is this. We have supplementary estimates for this year now before us. There is a list of items starting with the science service, then the production service, marketing service and special. There are items under all those headings that are voted now and we must have the vote before we can spend the money.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then what the minister is saying to me is this. He is telling me that this is not a case where money is used before it is voted by parliament?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is my question.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): No, Mr. Chairman. There is one question I should like to ask with regard to item 24. What experimentation or research is being carried on to control range paralysis or leucosis in poultry.

Mr. Gardiner: We are not carrying on any particular work with regard to that matter at the present time. Most of the work that is being carried on is being carried on provincially. I presume what my hon. friend has in mind is this matter of putting turkeys up on wire and that kind of thing in order to prevent them from getting the diseases they are accustomed to get, by keeping them off the land where it is infested with it and so on.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): That was not what I had in mind, Mr. Chairman. In Middlesex and in some other places some of the poultry producers have complained that this disease is becoming serious and that so far there is no known cure for it. While there may be some experiments which are being carried on at Guelph or elsewhere, there is no official word or nothing to guide the poultry raisers as to what action they should take.

Mr. Gardiner: We have a man named Moynihan who is studying this disease in collaboration with provincial authorities and others. Beyond that, nothing is being done here.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): There is no progress to report as yet?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Harkness: I notice that the cost of this brucellosis vaccine is $110,000. Can the minister tell us where that vaccine is purchased and how much it costs per shot? Is any of it produced in the laboratories of the departments themselves?

Mr. Gardiner: It is produced in the Royal Connaught laboratories in Toronto.

Mr. Harkness: What is the cost per shot?

Mr. Gardiner: About 37 cents; in that neighbourhood.

Mr. Yuill: The minister has not answered one of my three questions. I wonder whether he would be good enough to answer the first one particularly. What progress has been made in combating Bang's disease? The other matter that I am particularly interested in is whether or not there are available any statistics to indicate the progress made in combating that disease.

Mr. Gardiner: I remember that a few years ago we did not accept the idea that inoculation was very helpful but after the experiences which they had in the United States we decided that it was helpful. The plan that is provided now is that the provinces do the inoculating and we supply the serum that is used for that inoculation. It has been carried on right across the country and has had very beneficial results. It is a preventive rather than stopping the disease after it gets under way.

Mr. Charlton: I do not like to go further on what we were discussing a few moments ago, but the minister used a letter on accreditation from some member of the house against the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not use it against him.

Mr. Charlton: You used it to prove your point, and I think it is misleading because there is a difference between accredited herds and listed herds. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings was talking about brucellosis. That had nothing to do with accredited herds. A listed herd is a herd that is tested for brucellosis. I do not believe they were listing herds as far back as 1923. We had one of the first listed herds in our county and I know that was not until after 1930. I would not say it was the first, and I would not say it was after 1930 they started, but I do not believe it goes as far back as 1923.

Mr. Gardiner: They were doing something about these herds in 1923, but the listed herd name was not used until some time in the thirties, I understand. There had been a great deal of work done in connection with Bang's disease before I came here twenty years ago. I remember that one of the chief subjects of discussion at that time was what we were going to do about cattle with Bang's disease. It was entirely new to me. That is one of the reasons I remember it so well. It was not a thing that affected us in the west very much, but the dairy farmers down here were very much worked up about it. They came here wanting the plans which had been followed up until then changed. I am not in a position to say how far back those plans went, but they certainly had been doing a great deal about it.

Mr. Charlton: I appreciate the fact that much work had been done, but what I asked the minister was when they gave their first certificate for a listed herd.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, I do not think any great point is going to be served by proving that it was one year or another. I just gave you the information that a member had sent to me, and he is just as good a cattle man as my hon. friend. I merely gave you the facts as he gave them to me.

Item agreed to.

25. Compensation for animals slaughtered, including compensation for eggs destroyed from infected premises under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $482,550.

Mr. Charlton: I understand that the condition in Ontario now is that each county can be designated an accredited area in Ontario. Are there any counties that have not been tested yet for tuberculosis and, if so, where?

Mr. Gardiner: They have all been covered once. Some of them have been covered twice, some of them three times and some of them more than that. As my hon. friend knows, before they are declared to be pretty well clear they have three tests.

Mr. Charlton: Then it is not true to say that the entire province of Ontario is free of tuberculosis.

Mr. Gardiner: I would not say it is tubercular-free but it has had one test at least. That one test may show there is a certain percentage of cattle that go down under the test. Our experience has been that when we make the second test there are usually fewer, and finally you get to where you do not find any. Then it is free.

Mr. Charlton: I realize that, but there is a percentage where you do not require any tests for five years. My understanding was that the reason they had arrived at that stage was that the counties had not required any tests for five years. That means we can certainly not hope to be free of tuberculosis for a number of years, but there are places where it is less than one-half of one per cent.

Mr. Gardiner: One-half of one per cent will accredit them for three years and two-tenths of one per cent or below will accredit them for six years. Then you have to have a test again.

Item agreed to.

26. Livestock and poultry, $1,644,413.

Mr. Charlton: The minister made the statement a moment ago that we are not sending any hogs to the United States. It is true that we are not sending any hogs—

Mr. Gardiner: A few but not many.

Mr. Charlton: —other than for breeding purposes, but the minister left the impression that we were not sending any hogs. Probably some people would think that we were not sending any pork either. I think that that is very misleading. I should like to know how much canned pork, cooked pork and processed meats have been sent to the United States in the last year and if it is not a fact that much of our best bacon is going to the United States right now?

Mr. Gardiner: The position in connection with hogs is that our hogs have been higher in price than they are in the United States so hogs just do not go to the United States when you can get more for them at home as hogs. It is true, however, that there are certain cuts that can be sold in the United States. The year we had the foot-and-mouth disease we had estimated that we would sell 50 million pounds of cuts in the United States, and of course when the foot-and-mouth disease epidemic came we could not sell them and we had to can them and do other things with them. But there are certain quantities going to the United States in the form of different cuts and there is a certain amount goes over as bacon but nothing like the amounts that we used to ship out of this country as bacon. Most of our bacon is consumed here. There is nothing to prevent it going to the United States if you can get as much money there for it as here. But when anyone looks at the price of hogs at Toronto and then looks at the price at Buffalo or somewhere else he will find a very good reason why they do not go there.

Mr. Charlton: Fifty-five million pounds of canned meat were exported last year.

Mr. Gardiner: That 55 million pounds of canned meat contained part of what we canned the year before because of the foot-and-mouth disease, but that has nothing to do with the ordinary shipments across the line. We figured on shipping 50 million pounds as cuts. We could not ship them so we canned them but we did export a considerable quantity of canned meat during that period. What we usually figure on sending is 50 million to 60 million pounds in some form or other, but not as hogs.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): When I tell the minister that I am very interested in the matter of fertilizer he will recognize that when I was here from 1945 to 1949—

The Chairman: Order. Is item 26 carried?

Item agreed to.

27. Plant products—seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $40,000 to Canadian seed growers association, $1,483,598.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): When I was here from 1945 to 1949, I think in each of those years I made a speech and tried to indicate to the government the serious condition existing with respect to the production and sale of fertilizer in Canada. Before I go into the matter I want to reply to the hon. member for Kootenay East who this morning took exception to what had been said by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort in a speech earlier in the session. The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort pointed out that the prices of fertilizer were such that in many cases it was not economical for farmers to use it.

In substantiation of his argument he indicated that in his constituency of Humboldt-Melfort there was a petition being circulated by farmers to more or less boycott the purchase of fertilizer. In bringing that to the attention of the house the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort was trying to indicate that the price of fertilizer was so high farmers were in many cases taking action to boycott the purchase of it.

Now, whether or not the hon. member for Kootenay East was attempting to mislead members of the house, I cannot say. Certainly if the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort used fertilizer on part of his land, he felt it was necessary. I want to say to the minister and to the house that there can be no doubt farmers are concerned about the price of fertilizer in Canada today. In this respect the minister knows quite well—I do not think it is an exaggerated statement—that every Canadian farmer was betrayed by the Liberal government when they sold the fertilizer plants which, during the war period, were owned by the Canadian government and paid for by the Canadian taxpayers. These plants were sold to private industries at fire sale prices. All this is a matter of record and it is not my intention this afternoon to make a lengthy speech on the matter, other than to indicate that contrary to the wishes of organized agriculture in Canada and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture as well as the wheat pools, and in spite of the assurances given by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the fertilizer plants belonging to the Canadian people at Welland, Trail and Calgary were sold to private enterprise.

I am very concerned about this because we hear a lot these days about the government's program to conserve our natural resources. Indeed, they have set up an individual portfolio for that purpose. Coming from an agricultural area, and having been interested in this matter, I cannot see how the government could allow the situation to exist whereby the agricultural land could deteriorate because of the lack of fertilizer. I know well that more and more farmers have become accustomed to using fertilizer. They would like to use it, and in many cases are still using it even though the price has now gone up to $120 a ton for 11-48 which is sold on the prairies. At the same time I know that many farmers, because of the price of fertilizer in relation to the cost of production, are turning away from the use of it.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the government should look into this matter; that the whole production, sale and distribution of it should be investigated in an effort to provide fertilizer at more reasonable prices. I know that during the latter part of the war period this same 11-48 was sold on the prairies at $63.50 per ton off cars. Indeed, that price existed until 1945. It went up then, of course, and the government had to step in in 1947 and ask the firms producing fertilizer to put their prices back again. Now, it has gone up, without any government control, until now this fertilizer is selling around $120 a ton in the western provinces. I feel that the farmers have a right to complain about the policy of the government in not at least taking into consideration the representations made by organized agriculture to at least keep one of these industries under government control.

The minister knows full well that in the past I have quoted commitments he and the Minister of Trade and Commerce made to the effect that one of these plants would be kept by the government so we would not have a monopoly in the production of fertilizer in Canada. That is all I have to say today in this regard, Mr. Chairman. I only hope the government will take some action and that some investigation will be made concerning this important matter.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Charlton: Does the inspection of canned dog foods and canned cat foods come under this item or are there any regulations governing canned dog or cat foods?

Mr. Gardiner: If they are produced in inspected plants, they would be under general inspection, but other than that I do not know of any unless there are provincial regulations.

Mr. Charlton: Of course the meat that is put into them, if it is purchased from inspected plants, naturally would be inspected. Is there any regulation at all governing the canning of dog foods?

Mr. Gardiner: The officials tell me, not to their knowledge.

Mr. Charlton: Would it come under the health of animals or fertilizers and foods?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I shall try to find out at the dinner hour.

Item agreed to.

28. To provide for grants to fairs and exhibitions in accordance with the regulations established by order in council of December 22, 1952, P.C. 4602, for payments on account of agreements in force on December 31, 1953, with exhibition associations covering the construction of buildings and other major undertakings; and for a grant of $50,000 to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, Toronto, and freight assistance on livestock shipments for exhibition thereat, $856,957.

Mr. Harkness: Under this item there used to be a list of the various grants made to the different exhibitions, but that is not done any more. It is all in a bulk item. I notice that the vote is up by $200,000. In looking at the details for the item, I think that increase is chiefly due to grants that have been made for buildings. I wonder whether the minister would be able to give us a break-down of this item? I should particularly like to know the amount given under this vote to class A fairs in western Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: The grant to class A fairs is now up to $3,000 and the amount for capital expenditure is $20,000 under one vote. The grant to class B fairs is up to $1,800. We did have a plan that is not entirely completed whereby you could capitalize the regular grant for class A fairs over a period of 10 years. Under that policy the fair and province or municipality usually put up a similar amount, so they could spend three times the amount we put up for a building. A similar plan was followed for class B fairs. There will be a considerable part of these expenditures still to be met and they are voted from year to year. Last year, we made provision for these latter amounts to be capitalized over a period of years, and that simply meant we did not make any further grant to the fair during the time the capital grant was being paid. As my hon. friend has said, it is here in the form of the amount to class A fairs and the amount to class B. Those two are put together, and the figures given are those found in the back of the book.

Mr. Harkness: They used to be listed separately; the amount for Calgary was so much, and the same for Edmonton, Saskatoon, Regina, Brandon and so on.

Mr. Gardiner: The amount to those class A fairs would be $3,000 each.

Mr. Harkness: They will each get $3,000?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: And how much do each of those five fairs get, if anything, out of this $500,000 building grant?

Mr. Gardiner: We will dig up that information during the dinner recess.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, could we have an understanding on one point. I know some hon. members have appointments but, due to the sausage machine production line from six to seven o'clock it is impossible to be here promptly at seven. I wonder if items 30 and 31 might be allowed to stand with the understanding that we would discuss them later, perhaps after eight o'clock.

Mr. Gardiner: We will let them stand until after eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

Mr. Purdy: I was also interested in item 28, particularly that part having to do with the grant of $494,000 to assist in the building of premises of various exhibitions. I am particularly interested in two exhibitions in my own riding, that of Windsor in Colchester-Hants and the central Nova Scotia at Truro. Perhaps hon. members would be surprised, after the gloomy remarks of the hon. member for Queens this morning with respect to agriculture in the maritime provinces, to hear that we really do have agricultural exhibitions in that area. However, I am happy to say that the Hants exhibition at Windsor is the oldest exhibition in North America. This year they are having the 189th consecutive agriculture show at Windsor.

My purpose in rising is to ask the minister what, if any, sums in that amount of $494,000 are to go to either or both of these exhibitions. I understand that this year the central Nova Scotia exhibition is erecting a new building costing a considerable amount of money. I am hopeful that some federal grant will go into that show. I believe that Windsor has already received a considerable sum for their new premises. Can the minister give me the amounts that are to go to these two famous shows in Nova Scotia? Last year we had the extreme honour of having the Prime Minister visit our central Nova Scotia exhibition and we hope the Minister of Agriculture will be able to pay us a visit during one of the shows this year.

Mr. Gardiner: Truro got $4,000 out of that amount of money and Windsor got $7,033. The answer to the other question asked by someone on the other side of the house, I think the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand, is: Truro, $4,000; Lachute, $2,268; St. Hyacinthe, $3,945; Three Rivers, $4,000; Sherbrooke, $4,450; Galt, $1,096; Lindsay, $2,145; London, $21,000; Ottawa, $4,500; Peterborough, $4,000; Toronto, $4,000; Simcoe, $20,937; Brandon, $21,000; Regina, $4,000; Saskatoon, $4,000; Calgary, $3,500; Vancouver, $21,500; Edmonton, $11,000. Those that received over $4,000 received it for capital expenditures in addition to the grants that were spent that year.

Mr. Purdy: Is it right that toward this $100,000 building for the central Nova Scotia exhibition the federal contribution is going to be only $4,000? They are putting up a new central building to cost $100,000. Surely there is some mistake there.

Mr. Gardiner: If there is it does not show it in the records here. If the building was put up—

Mr. Purdy: The building is going up this year.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, I beg your pardon.

Mr. Purdy: The arrangements were made last year.

Mr. Gardiner: If they were made last year and if they had a capital expenditure they can go along with $20,000 and they will get whatever is coming this year, too.

Mr. Purdy: There must have been some definite arrangement or they would not have gone ahead with this capital expenditure.

Mr. Gardiner: It is quite certain it is signed if they have gone ahead. If it was $20,000 then they will continue on until it is completed. It was the hon. member for Calgary North who asked the question about the fairs.

Mr. Harkness: On what basis are those grants for capital assistance given? I notice that Calgary is the smallest of any of those class A fairs in western Canada, although it is much the biggest fair of any of them.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course the arrangement is they can get the $20,000 if it has not been paid before. I would take it that one of the reasons why Calgary is one of the biggest fairs is that quite a bit of this building has been done in the past, and they are still using that accommodation, but that was all that was paid there last year. That does not mean they did not get as much as the others. London has $21,000 and Simcoe has $20,000; Brandon has $21,000 and Vancouver has $21,500; Edmonton has $11,000. These are all grants that have come under part of the arrangement that had been made previously or because they had not had payments before.

Mr. Harkness: My question was, on what basis are these grants made?

Mr. Gardiner: As I explained it this afternoon, grants are made to a grade A fair of $2,500 plus—

Mr. Harkness: I am talking about the capital assistance grants.

Mr. Gardiner: The capital assistance grant can be $20,000. But these particular figures are more than the capital payment. I understood my hon. friend to ask for the entire payments they received last year.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I asked about the whole payment and you said they received $3,000.

Mr. Gardiner: Calgary had no capital payment last year.

Mr. Harkness: I then asked about capital assistance and I understood from what the minister said that they received $20,000 in a year if they did a certain amount of building. Is that correct?

Mr. Gardiner: No, not every year. When they get it once they are through.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the minister a question. There is a tendency in our modern society to increase sales by selling tickets with a car as a prize, and sometimes these affairs take place every night. I just wanted to ask the minister if he agrees with this sort of thing and thinks it is in the interests of good husbandry, or any other kind of industry. Port Arthur does not agree with it, though Fort William does. I do not.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: Usually I either buy a ticket or have one given me, but I have never won a car yet.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that items 30 and 31 are to stand until later.

33. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $450,538.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, in the details relative to this item at page 107 there is a cold storage item in the amount of $254,667. I wonder if the minister would tell me the total cost of that cold storage and whether it is for a co-operative or otherwise. It concerns the Mount Royal, Empire Cold Storage.

Mr. Gardiner: I might first answer the other question about dog and cat meat. I understand there is no provision in our legislation for that, and as a matter of fact it is excluded from the fees.

Mr. Charlton: Then there are no regulations covering that?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: I would seriously urge the government then to consider this matter because some of the existing dog and cat foods are probably below standard and I think they should be investigated.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no provision for checking cat and dog food. My officials looked it up over the dinner hour and that is what they tell me.

Mr. Charlton: I think there should be, and they might well be brought in under the act.

Mr. Gardiner: I will take that into consideration.

Mr. Charlton: I would be pleased if the government would consider the matter and try to do something about it.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know the reasons why they have not been covered but there must be some reason.

Mr. Charlton: I asked a question regarding the Mount Royal, Empire Cold Storage grant covering about $250,000 and I wonder if the minister could give me that information.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a limited stock company and not a co-operative.

Mr. Charlton: What is the ordinary grant?

Mr. Gardiner: The ordinary grant would be 33⅓ per cent of the cost.

Mr. Charlton: And the regulation is that a certain percentage has to be for public storage?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: That is the only stipulation?

Mr. Gardiner: The entire storage has to be for public storage.

Mr. Charlton: The entire storage?

Mr. Gardiner: We pay 33⅓ per cent. It is custom storage. That does not mean that everyone has a right to store their products there. But they can store them there at a certain rate. A joint stock company owns this particular storage and not anyone can store there. We say it has to be opened for that kind of storage.

Mr. Charlton: Then the entire storage space has to be available for public storage. I understood that it was just a certain percentage.

Mr. Gardiner: I was under that impression too but they tell me that is not the case.

Mr. Charlton: Has the regulation been changed?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: Can an individual get this grant if 100 per cent of the storage is available for rental to the public?

Mr. Gardiner: That would be all the more reason for them receiving it. The only reason a person would not receive it would be if he used it all for himself and if he had the kind of business where he used it all for his own product and it was not available to others. That is the principle behind it, although I do not say that a man could not store his own products. If he is using it for his own products there might not be any space available for the public.

Mr. Nicholson: This would appear to be a very large item concerning the city of Montreal. I wonder how the Minister of Agriculture happens to be making such a large grant in regard to Montreal. What about Canada Packers in Toronto? Would they come in under this sort of grant from the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, Canada Packers have not had any assistance. Nearly all of these cold storages are in urban centres. I cannot recall any at the moment in country districts. There is probably one for apple storage in Quebec out in the country, but nearly all the others are in urban centres. There are some at London, Ontario, some at Montreal, some at the city of Quebec, and so on, and in our part of the country there are some at Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton, and Calgary which are used for the storage of farm products. But they are not necessarily in the country. In this case, butter, cheese, apples, and everything of that sort from that area are stored in Montreal.

Mr. Charlton: I wonder if the minister would say whether the storage owned by a co-operative would be considered to be publicly owned. If the co-operatives received this grant would they be able to store their own products in this kind of storage?

Mr. Gardiner: If it is a co-operative in every sense of the term it is very likely. In so far as its operations are concerned, it is not storing its own products but the products of the people who belong to the co-operative.

Mr. Charlton: It is considered as such?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Then that is a method by which the co-operatives can get out from under the regulations. In other words, their products belong to individuals and do not belong to the co-operative which has received the grant.

Mr. Gardiner: The regulations define what constitutes a co-operative but I would say that the government of the day which handled this matter, and that was long before my time, were concerned in all probability with supporting the co-operatives and special reasons are put in for some individuals who start a cold storage and the regulations largely apply to them.

Mr. Charlton: What I was trying to get at was whether, if an individual had the grant, it would be 100 per cent that would have to be available to the public or whether there would be a different regulation for a co-operative, for instance.

Mr. Gardiner: No, there is no difference; the regulations are the same.

Mr. Nicholson: Other grants made were at Summerside, to Amalgamated Dairies Limited; to three co-operatives in the province of Quebec; at Eastend, to the Eastend Locker Plant Co-operative Association Limited in Saskatchewan; and at Cawston, to Similkameen United Growers Co-operative. All those co-operatives together received less than half of what has gone to this joint stock company. It seems to me that this is a new precedent. I do not recall ever having noted as large a grant as this. Probably I am wrong, but the minister will correct me. It seems to me that if a privately owned firm in Montreal can get a grant of a quarter of a million dollars, Canada Packers probably should be entitled to several millions because they store farm products. I wonder whether the minister could tell us whether there have been larger grants previously.

Mr. Gardiner: They are entitled to the same, no matter where it is. They are entitled to one-third of the cost. If a concern out in Eastend or some place else has capacity available to them, that is what it will get. But in Eastend they will only want capacity for the size of the community in which they are. They are not going to spend as much as they are going to spend in Montreal where goods are stored from all over Canada. Butter is shipped down from the co-operative in Saskatchewan and it is stored in Montreal because they can sell it in Montreal. They do not ship it to Eastend or places like that. But Eastend gets one-third of the cost, just the same as they get one-third of the cost in Montreal.

Mr. Nicholson: Will the minister say what is the largest grant that has been made?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know; something over $1 million.

Mr. Nicholson: A single grant?

Mr. Gardiner: Not a single grant.

Mr. Nicholson: What is the largest single grant?

Mr. Gardiner: It would be a third of whatever the cost is.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the minister indicate what is the largest single grant?

Mr. Gardiner: I cannot tell the hon. member that. It is back over twenty years.

Mr. Nicholson: The minister's officials should be able to tell whether or not this is the largest amount that has been paid out to date.

Mr. Gardiner: I am quite sure it is not because I recall one going through a short time ago which was over $1 million. Three times this one would not be a million.

Item agreed to.

34. Fruit, vegetables and maple products, and honey, including grant of $5,000 to the Canadian horticultural council, $1,328,444.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister why it is that the government still supplies pails and so on free of charge to Quebec producers of maple products.

Mr. Gardiner: That question, of course, has been quite naturally asked during each of the last three years, I think. I have explained that this was something we started before the war, discontinued during the war and then tried to complete after the war. I have been a little bit concerned as to why it has been necessary to carry it on so long. We had notified them at one time that this would be the last payment. Some representations have been made to us to the effect that we might have to carry on for one more year in order to clean it all up.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

The present position is—and it has been that way since back about 1937—that the Quebec government are replacing pails which were used to gather sap and pans and to boil down the sap and which were covered with some lead covering to prevent them from rusting. It was found that when the sap was allowed to remain in those buckets or in the pans under certain conditions it caused lead poison to enter into the sap and that poison was found in the syrup. We undertook to assist the Quebec government in getting that equipment replaced. They were to pay a third of the cost, the farmer was to pay a third of the cost and we were to pay a third of the cost. It is on that basis that we are still paying this $100,000 this year.

Mr. Cardiff: Is that privilege granted to any other province?

Mr. Gardiner: Any province that asks for it. Quebec is the only province that asked for it.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring a certain matter to the attention of the minister. It concerns the manner in which some of the fruit and vegetable inspectors are retired. I think this matter should be looked into so there is no recurrence of the incident which I should like to relate to the minister. The incident is as follows. It concerns one Wilfred Corp who lives in the north part of my riding. He has been a fruit and vegetable inspector for nearly 24 years, or since 1930. I understand that he never had a day's sickness and that he carried out the job very well. I have seen the man. He appears to be about 50 or 55 years of age; much younger than he actually is.

As I understand it, under the regulations in this matter, people in this type of employment are employed until they are 65, and then at that time or before they reach the age of 65 they are allowed to make application to continue their employment. I will deal with the details of that matter in just a moment but I think it might be as well to tell the story from the beginning. I have here a number of letters to which I should like to refer. The first is a copy of a letter written by Mr. Corp to one Mr. Eardley, who is fruit and vegetable inspector at Ottawa. It reads as follows:

Tavistock, Ontario,
January 5, 1954.

Mr. E. A. Eardley, Chief,
Fruit and Vegetable Inspection,
Department of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Eardley:

Since I am nearing retirement age and, I believe, legislation has been passed whereby the time may be extended if so desired, I should like to know just what the procedure is in this connection, as I should like to continue in the service.

Since my health is good and, I believe, I have not lost a day due to sickness in twenty years, I feel that I can still fulfil my duties to the satisfaction of the department.

I should appreciate hearing from you in this connection. Please advise what steps I need to take if this letter is not sufficient.

Yours respectfully,
Wilfred Corp.

The next letter in this connection is dated January 7 and is from Mr. Eardley, to whom the last letter was addressed. This letter is dated Ottawa, January 7, 1954, is addressed to Mr. W. Corp, fruit and vegetable inspector, Tavistock, Ontario, and reads as follows:

Acknowledging your letter of January 5th regarding your approaching retiring age and your desire to have your employment with this department extended beyond such age, the new legislation regarding extensions beyond the age of sixty-five has not yet been definitely passed on to the different departments and we are therefore not clear as to what the new provisions are. Certainly it appears at the moment as if this matter of extensions will not be as simple as has been indicated in certain press dispatches.

Your request will be kept in mind and when we are clear as to the new provisions we will get in touch with you and you will then be able to re-submit your request, this time through supervising inspector Frank Strong and then the district office in Hamilton.

E. A. Eardley,
Chief, Fruit and Vegetable Inspection Service.

The next letter is dated March 4, 1954, is addressed to Mr. W. Corp, Box 123, Tavistock, Ontario, and reads as follows:

I have just received word from our Ottawa office that your employment as a fruit and vegetable inspector terminates on March 23, 1954.

That is approximately 19 days from the date of this letter. It continues:

There is apparently no extension after one reaches the age of sixty-five except under exceptional circumstances. You also have nine days leave coming to you and it must be taken before March 23. It is quite possible that owing to weather conditions, we may be able to fill those nine days in between inspections. I will be up some day next week and we can talk matters over and probably clear up any problems that may arise.

Yours very truly,
W. F. Strong,
Supervising Inspector.

That was on March 4. On March 11 there is a letter written by Mr. Corp to Mr. E. G. Paige in Ottawa. It reads as follows:

Tavistock, Ontario,
March 11, 1954.

Gentlemen:

On January 5, 1954, I wrote to Mr. E. A. Eardley regarding an extension of employment after reaching retirement age. His reply on January 7th stated that as soon as he had something definite from the civil service he would let me know and that I might then make application through Mr. Strong, supervising inspector and through the Hamilton office.

However, to my surprise, instead of this course being followed, Mr. Strong notified me on March 4th that my services as fruit and vegetable inspector would conclude on March 23rd.

As stated in my letter to Mr. Eardley on January 5th, I am in good health and feel that I should be able to continue as an inspector for some time to come and hereby make application for an extension of employment as fruit and vegetable inspector.

In years gone by I have inspected as many as 42 cars in one week with rarely a rejection at destination points. Since the district has been divided, my work is considerably lighter.

As I understand that others have been granted extensions, I trust that you may see fit to reconsider the notice sent me on March 4th.

Yours respectfully,

The next letter—there are only three more—is dated March 17, 1954. It is addressed to Mr. Wilfred Corp and it is from Mr. J. G. Taggart, the deputy minister. We are going up the line. We started at the bottom but we have now got to the deputy minister. This letter reads as follows:

Mr. Wilfred Corp,
Tavistock, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Corp:

It has been brought to my attention that you will reach the age of 65 years on March 24, 1954, and at that time will be eligible for three months of retiring leave to be followed by superannuation as a result of over 13 years of service as a faithful and conscientious employee of this department.

The new Public Service Superannuation Act does make provision for the extension of employees beyond the age of 65 provided that they are willing to continue and are physically fit to do so, but serious consideration must be given to the problem of the development of staff to carry on the work of the department in the future. In making a decision with respect to extension of any employee's service, the first consideration must be given to the department's needs.

The question of whether or not you should be asked to continue beyond the age of 65 years has been discussed at length with the appropriate officers of the department. After most careful consideration, we have come to the conclusion that it would be best for you to proceed on superannuation in the normal manner.

Yours very truly,
J. G. Taggart,
Deputy Minister.

With this letter there was attached a copy of order in council P.C. 1953-1863. That is the way it is referred to, and I presume it is order in council 1863 passed in 1953. The pertinent part reads as follows:

16. (1) Notwithstanding subsection (2)—

I will read it in a moment.

—a contributor shall cease to be employed in the public service upon attaining sixty-five years of age unless

(a) the contributor advises the deputy head of his department, in writing, not later than thirty days prior to attaining such age, that he desires to continue to be so employed;

(b) the contributor is certified by a qualified medical practitioner, upon examination not less than thirty days prior to attaining such age, to be physically fit to continue to be so employed;

(c) the deputy head, upon receiving from the contributor the advice referred to in paragraph (a), approves, in writing, that the contributor continue to be so employed; . . .

Paragraph (d) is not relevant because it deals with people who receive over $8,000 a year. Subsection 2 says:

(2) The deputy head of the department shall, not later than six months prior to the time when the contributor reached sixty-five years of age, notify the contributor by registered mail of the provisions of this section respecting employment in the public service after the age of sixty-five.

I should like to point out at this time, as must be very evident, that the first communication Mr. Corp had informing him he was to be retired was on the 5th of March and it indicated that he was to be retired on the 23rd. In order to apply to remain in the service he would have had to advise the deputy head of the department within thirty days, which was not possible, and he would also have had to have a physical examination at least thirty days before, and since he did not know he was going to be retired, although in January he had written asking for information, he had no opportunity. More than that, it would seem to me that before the man could be retired the condition precedent which is quite clearly set out in subsection 2 would have to be observed.

It says that the deputy head of the department shall, not later than six months prior to the time when the contributor reached 65 years of age, notify the contributor by registered mail of the provisions of this section. The whole purpose of putting that in there is to give the contributor or person who is to be retired ample warning of the fact he is to be retired so that if he wishes to comply with the terms of subsection 1 of section 16 he will have an opportunity of doing so. The purpose is so that he will have plenty of opportunity to make up his mind whether he would like to continue. If so, he would then have a chance to make application to the head of the department and would have plenty of opportunity to get a physical examination.

In this particular case Mr. Corp, not knowing about the regulations, wrote the department in January asking what he was supposed to do. He wanted to know if a letter would be sufficient. He received a letter in a couple of days saying that the department was not quite sure, that they did not know what they were supposed to do although the order in council was certainly passed in 1953 and this correspondence took place in 1954.

This man wrote again and nothing was heard. He waited all during the rest of January and February and then on March 5 he received a letter saying that his services were no longer required and that he would be retired on March 23.

He had no chance to do any of the things that are set out. It is my submission that the department is entirely in the wrong, that they had no right to let this man out under these conditions and have not carried out the condition precedent of giving him six months notice. I know that section 16, subsection 1 starts off with the words "notwithstanding subsection (2)" but just the same the whole sense of the two subsections taken together is that it is impossible to carry out subsection 1 without the department having previously carried out the terms of subsection 2. In this case the matter was aggravated further by the fact that the man had written to the department, had asked for but had received no information.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Nesbitt: Oh no, it is not.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): What happened to Mr. Corp's predecessor?

Mr. Nesbitt: There is one final letter which I intend to read. It is dated March 31, 1954 and is addressed to Mr. W. Corp, Tavistock, Ontario. It is from the deputy minister, Mr. Taggart, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Corp:

Following receipt of your letter of March 19, 1954, further consideration has been given to the question of your superannuation or extension upon reaching the age of 65 on March 24, 1954. I regret to advise you that it is still the department's decision that you should proceed on superannuation in the normal manner.

It is regretted that you were not notified earlier but this delay was due to some misunderstanding with respect to the interpretation of section 16 of the public service superannuation regulations. The regulations however do not require the department to give you six months' notice of termination of employment, but rather to notify you of section 16 (1) respecting employment in the public service after the age of 65. The complete wording of this subsection is as follows: . . .

Then section 16, subsection 1 is set out but subsection 2, which is the important one inasmuch as it is the condition precedent, is not set out at all. I will be quite blunt. I have had some correspondence and some words with the minister's secretary and his parliamentary assistant. They indicated to me that they thought it best to allow this man to retire, despite these circumstances. I was informed that was the usual practice, but in the very next county to mine there is one man who I believe is over the age of 65 and is still continuing as a fruit and vegetable inspector. If the minister wishes his name I can give it to him, but I do not want to mention it now.

Mr. Cardiff: Was he a Liberal?

Mr. Nesbitt: That I could not say. I do not wish to give the name. It is not exactly fair because naturally this man is not in the house. He has been given an extension, and he will be retiring shortly. The point I would like to get at is this. If the department lays down regulations as to the procedure for retiring people, why are those regulations not followed out? When they are not, it is an easy way of getting rid of people and providing somebody else with the job. I should like the minister to tell me who is now to get the job Mr. Corp held for nearly 24 years? I would hope also that the minister would make a check that this kind of thing does not continue in the future.

Mr. Pallett: I rise at this time to ask the minister a question concerning the Ontario food marketing terminal. This terminal has been built after years of labour and co-operation and is a splendid example of the result of co-operation between the government and the growers and the wholesale merchants, who worked together towards a common end. The effect of this market will be to enable the fruit and vegetable growers of Ontario to put their products on display under first class conditions, and perhaps therefore obtain higher prices than they would otherwise have obtained. It will permit the movement and delivery of articles more quickly within the Toronto market, and under more favourable conditions. Will the minister tell me if he has any arrangement whereby services may be provided for those growers who may at some time wish to export directly from that market?

Mr. Gardiner: The marketing centre at Toronto is one which we have been talking about for a long time. We have also had under discussion a similar set-up for Montreal. I believe both of those plants were talked about before the war and considerable negotiations had taken place suggesting that the provincial governments and this government should contribute something toward the building of those plants. Nothing had been arranged before the war, and the matter was again taken up and gone ahead with after the war.

I am quite certain there has been no undertaking on behalf of this government to pay anything towards them whatever. If there is no provision for our paying anything, of course, we would not have anything to say about the conditions under which the market operates. It will be a matter entirely between the city of Toronto, I suppose, the government of Ontario and the organization that is setting up the market. We would not have anything to say about that.

Mr. Pallett: I gather then that you have no marketing agency, and do not propose to have any marketing agency set up in that market with respect to the export of fruit and vegetables? That will depend solely on the operations of the Ontario government?

Mr. Gardiner: We have an organization, of course, with regard to the export of fruit and vegetables from this country to the United States or any other country. It is not necessarily associated with any market set-up such as you have in Toronto.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to inquire from the minister about a problem that has come to my attention just recently concerning the importation of cherries from Italy for use as maraschino cherries. As I understand it, within a reasonably short space of time the inspection has become considerably more rigid, I believe under an agreement between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Health and Welfare. The problem that I have in mind has to do with the establishment by the department of a stated tolerance of infestation. Just recently a shipment was returned to Italy because the infestation was found to be quite severe. I understand that about 70 per cent of these cherries that come in are entirely free of infestation, and the suspected percentage of the remainder only runs around 2 per cent or 3 per cent. In rare cases, some of them are rather badly infested.

However, the difficulty is that the exporters themselves have no rule by which to go on; there is no published or expressed rule laid down by either department, with the result that the exporters are a little loath to ship unless they know just what standards they may be required to meet. It seems to me that no great harm could come from at least laying down some sort of standard to which they would know they must adhere, rather than having shipments coming into the country all the way from Italy, being turned back and the exporter paying the freight two ways. Quite apart from the inconvenience to the exporter in this matter, of course there is the resultant inconvenience to the importer who is likely to find himself, over a period of time, without a source of supply.

There is the inconvenience, not only in the matter of cherries but other things as well, such as olives and so on, of having shipments held up for a considerable length of time while they are being examined. Sometimes these examinations do take a considerable length of time, and freight, storage and other charges are accumulating against the importation. I should like to ask the minister if his department will seriously consider placing a reasonable tolerance on these goods so that both the exporters and importers alike will have an idea of the standards to which they must adhere.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that the infection in this particular case is the result of the fact that an insect has laid its eggs in the cherry, and they produce an insect. There is no tolerance in connection with that. If the insect is an insect we do not want in this country stinging cherries, it is just about as bad to have three or four as it is to have 50 because they will increase very rapidly. The intention is to keep them out altogether.

Mrs. Fairclough: But these cherries are in brine. Surely the insect would be dead by this time. I am not disputing that there may have been ample reason for sending back the shipment I mentioned; that was not the main point. I merely gave that illustration. I understand that one of the reasons the shipment was turned back was that it showed traces of insects having been there which were no longer there.

Mr. Gardiner: I understood at first that these cherries were fresh cherries, but you say they are in brine. I am informed the real reason for turning them down is that they were not fit for human consumption, the same as if there was a worm in an apple or some other fruit. For a person to get even one of them out of a lot is going to cause considerable complaint, and therefore they are not permitted in. There is no tolerance allowed in connection with the matter. I can have the hon. member's suggestion that some tolerance be allowed considered. However I assume it has been considered many times before.

Mrs. Fairclough: No; the information I have is that the regulations have been tightened up considerably in the last little while, and that there have been shipments let in with some traces of infestation. As I said, quite a bit of the remaining 30 per cent would probably have only 2 per cent or 3 per cent infestation. One source of information indicated that the high was 15 per cent, and another that it was 26 per cent. It is simply ridiculous to allow imports that are in that condition.

But where the infestation has been only 2 or 3 per cent, in the past they have been allowed in without any complaint. I cannot see why there should not be a standard set so that these exporters will know the standard to which they are required to adhere. I am also informed that this is a bad year in so far as cherries are concerned, because of the weather conditions. Possibly by another year the condition would have cleared itself up, and there would be an almost perfect crop. At the same time there would always be a certain amount. The very fact that most of the shipments which come in are about 70 per cent free indicates that it is not a great problem at any time. The great problem is that the exporters should know what they are required to produce.

Mr. Gardiner: I presume they understand pretty well now, or there would not be a complaint about it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Apparently not.

Mr. Gardiner: The fact that they have had them sent back indicates what the amount of the tolerance is. I would rather hope that there is not much likelihood of people on this side complaining so much about getting fruit into the country which is not entirely free of that kind of thing. I know we would raise quite a bit of trouble about it in this country if we were getting in apples, cherries, or any other fruit that was affected in the same way. If we were told after, "You let other fruit in from outside similar to this" I am sure it would raise trouble. In any case I will have the matter inquired into, see what the reasons are and whether any change can be made.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister will find the situation is slightly different from what he imagines, I believe, if he will inquire into the matter.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I set out before the minister a regrettable set of circumstances concerning a certain man who, I suggest, has suffered considerable injustice. I wonder if the minister could give me some assurance that he will look into the matter and try to get to the bottom of it.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I quite understand the story that has been told, although I had not heard it before. These matters come along from time to time, and usually I have to sign them. Sometimes I do not, but it may be that I did sign this one. If I did not, then it was signed by someone acting for me.

Since the age limit of 65 years was put in —and that has applied all the time I have been here, and I do not know how long before—persons have been retired at the age of 65. After all until this last year there was no special provision made. Anyone could be retired at 65, and anyone could be allowed to continue on until the age of 70. The fact that conditions were put in last year did not make it any easier for a man to be retired. In fact there were conditions put in which made it somewhat more difficult for him to be retired.

All that had to take place before was to have an official in the department recommend such a person for continuation in office, on the ground that there was no one prepared to take his place, or that he was still in good health and able to carry on. Then that matter would come to me as minister. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred no one would have written in to me about it. I would not know the individual, or anything about him at all, other than that he had reached the age limit for retirement. Sometimes it has been asked that a person's time be extended for another year. For a time we had a rule that it could not be extended more than six months at a time. Then for another length of time we had a rule that it would not be extended more than one year at a time, and it never was for more than a year.

Then the legislation came along and, as I understand it, the legislation says there must be six months notice. It so happens that it did not come into effect until January 1, and this man had been notified before that date.

Mr. Nesbitt: No, he had not been.

Mr. Gardiner: I understood from what the hon. member said that the order in council was passed before that.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps I should clear that up. I realize the facts are somewhat complicated. What happened was that apparently this order in council was passed in 1953.

Mr. Gardiner: What was the order in council in 1953?

Mr. Nesbitt: Setting out the regulations and the conditions precedent—in other words the procedure—with which a person who wished to remain on after the age of 65 years had to comply. There were certain things the department had to do. The department was to give notification six months in advance of the retirement age that such a person was to be retired at a certain age, and if the person wished to remain on he had to inform the department thirty days before the retirement date, and had to have a medical examination.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand now that the regulations were drawn up in 1953 and applied when the act came into force. The act came into force on January 1. So far as this man was concerned, there was not any six months period to carry that out.

My understanding of the case is that there were several men below him who were younger and who, until someone did retire, would have no opportunity for promotion. The promotion in this case was possible because those persons were there. The officials in the department simply took the position that this man should be retired and the other men advanced to his position. I must say I cannot take very strong exception to that procedure. However, I shall look into it and see what happened in this particular case.

I looked into one case within the last three weeks concerning which someone from the other side of the house had written to me. This individual had been dropped off and the case was reconsidered. The circumstances were not just the same as the one the hon. member has brought to my attention. There were not so many other persons available, or who were in a position where they had to be held back so long as this man was kept on.

However I shall have the matter investigated, and if there is any possibility of doing something about it, I shall have it done. But there may be the possibility that there would be no opportunity to do anything.

Mr. Hosking: I will talk it over with Clark Murray and keep you informed as to his opinion of the situation.

Mr. Quelch: I wonder if the minister could answer the question I asked about livestock marketing. What governs the amount of the initial payment under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act? The act states up to 80 per cent of the average cost per year. What determines whether it would be 60 per cent, 70 per cent or 80 per cent?

Mr. Gardiner: Under the co-operative marketing act of 1939 it is provided that any organization may apply for the right to operate with the assistance of that act. The act provides that the board which is set up to handle the operations of the act may guarantee up to 80 per cent of the average price of the last three years in order that the organization may go to the bank and make arrangements for an initial payment on the product. The limit is 80 per cent; but anyone who desires to operate under that act, either by correspondence or by coming here and meeting the board, puts up a case for their particular product. The officials here naturally try to keep the guarantee down to where the government is not likely to be liable for any payment.

Then the arrangement as to what the percentage is to be is made. Some percentages have been down as low as 25 per cent, and one has been up to 80 per cent. That was in respect of Ontario cheese. The board that handles cheese in Ontario has had to guarantee 80 per cent of the price of the last three years. In that case 80 per cent of the price was 24 cents. They got a guarantee at the bank from this department. They went to the bank and borrowed sufficient money to make the initial price, based on the 24 cents, to the cheese producer. Then they go ahead and sell the product and at the end of the period we must pass an order in council giving them the authority to pay out anything that they have left before they are able to pay it out, and they pay that out as an interim or a final payment. That is the basis on which it works. It is a matter of agreement between the persons who come here and ask for it and the board who handles it.

Mr. Quelch: This is the only other question I want to ask. I noticed that when the minister was in Saskatchewan the press carried a statement that no support price would be allowed to the livestock marketing board. Does that mean at this time? For example, if the price fell and a support price was given to the packers, would that apply also to the marketing boards then?

Mr. Gardiner: No, no; I did not say—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; just before the minister replies may I say I think the question the hon. member for Acadia is asking comes under item 35.

Mr. Quelch: No, item No. 40, agricultural products board.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand we are at item No. 34. Item No. 35 is a livestock item; item No. 34 has to do with fruits and vegetables. I would like to dispose of it.

Mr. Pallett: I have a question on item No. 34. Can the minister say whether or not consideration has ever been given to setting up farm marketing agreements similar to those set up in Ontario under the Ontario farm marketing act with respect to fruits and vegetables sold for processing. I refer specifically to those fruits and vegetables that are taken interprovincially for processing, and therefore at times in the past they have escaped the requirement of being sold on grade. Can the minister comment on that?

Mr. Gardiner: Arrangements were made during the war under the contracts which were made at that time under which we assisted in Nova Scotia in the matter of having apples canned and dried and sold as dried apples; in other words, having them processed in different ways. But that was an arrangement made under the War Measures Act during wartime, and continued in so far as that kind of assistance was given after the war. But there have not been any other arrangements of that kind at any time.

The other matter that the hon. member for Acadia asked about is in this position. I am not sure that I completely answered his question.

Mr. Quelch: This comes under the next item.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. My hon. friend said that I had said something when I was out in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Quelch: The press carried a statement that the minister had said that there would be no support prices under livestock, and I do not know whether that meant at this time on account of the fairly high price of livestock or whether the minister meant that even though a situation developed where a support price was paid to the packers it would not be paid to the board.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee please help the chairman to keep livestock away from the fruits and honey?

Mr. Pallett: The minister answered one-half of my question and not the other half. The second half was in respect to maintaining the grade of the fruits and vegetables that are transported interprovincially for canning. Are there any provisions by which the consumers can be protected in the purchase of canned goods where the raw fruit is carried from one province into another and processed there? Within certain provinces there is protection, but I wonder whether there is any protection when the fruit is taken from one province to another for canning purposes?

Mr. Gardiner: No, we have no regulations or grades for fruits that are to be canned; that is, we have grades of apples that are sold fresh and grades of other fruits, but not if it is to be canned.

Item agreed to.

35. Livestock and livestock products, $1,470,981.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to ask whether the same formula is in operation now as the minister mentioned some three years ago: that is, the base for 1943, 1944 and 1945. Is that changed?

Mr. Gardiner: That still stands. I cannot guarantee that in every case we have been exactly able to meet conditions, but that does stand. With respect to the other matter, it was not a case of saying that it could not apply on the request that was made. I met the farmers' union executive in Saskatoon when I was west, and they indicated that they wanted to set up a marketing board under the provincial act. They asked me if the government here would agree to setting a floor price under cattle and hogs. I said we already had a floor price under hogs, 23 cents. I said, so far as cattle were concerned—and I think I reported it to the House of Commons after I came back—if we set a floor price which was higher than the United States price we would have United States cattle coming over here and it would do us more harm than good. If we set one which was lower than they were able to get in the United States, we would perhaps be criticized for that. I said, I did not think it was sound to ask us to put a floor price under cattle because the floor price was now up to the price in the United States, and it is in all probability higher than anything we could put on.

Then, the next question was: Well, is there any way in which we can get any assistance under the existing law? I said: Well there is an Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act which makes it possible for you to get up to 80 per cent of the average price of the last three years, and you can operate under that. Well, now, my understanding is that the next day when they went before the open meeting of the farmers that is what they recommended. The other statement I made was with regard to the fact that they were told that this application which had been made to me could not be accepted by the government here.

Mr. Quelch: On the other hand, if a situation developed where the market price fell below the support price and you started to take the surplus from the packing plants, would you also do the same thing for the marketing boards?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not understand.

Mr. Quelch: Would you take the surplus off their hands in the same way that you would take it off the hands of the packing houses?

Mr. Gardiner: The provision at the present time is that we do not take anything off anyone's hands. We go on to the market and offer 23 cents at least for hogs and we have been there all the time. If anybody else will pay more than that, we do not get any hogs. Therefore we have not had any since the beginning of last year.

Mr. Quelch: Would it not be different if we had a compulsory board?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the compulsory board would be a provincial thing and the actual request made to us was as to whether we would allow the provisions which are already there and the authority we have in connection with interprovincial trade to be transferred to some board they might set up in, say, Winnipeg, to handle stocks arriving there, and I said that every organization that had applied for that assistance had received it and I did not know any reason why they would be turned down.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I have had repeated complaints from the canners of chicken to the effect that they are required to can their products in a can of a certain size, the regulations governing which are, I believe, laid down by the Department of Agriculture. United States competitors are allowed to put cans of an odd size on the market in competition with our own producers. One specific case is that the Canadian canner has always to conform to a seven-ounce tin, but the United States producer can compete in the same market with a five-ounce tin which the Canadian canner is not allowed to use. The United States produces a product which looks like a bargain until you read the small print and, in fact, it is not a bargain. The Canadian producers feel it is unfair that they should be subjected to a regulation which does not apply to their United States competitor. I understand the minister's department has no jurisdiction over imported products but I bring this to the attention of the minister in the hope that he will see fit to discuss it with his colleagues with a view to seeing whether the American import can be subjected to the same regulation as is applied to the Canadian product. Would the minister like to comment on that?

Mr. Gardiner: We established the present regulations in 1943 and I believe there were some regulations prior to that. But these regulations were established at the request of those who were concerned with that trade. The objection was raised that the cans carry small print and usually one does not read it and it is only after you get home that you find you have not got as much as you thought you had. The canners here asked that that be made impossible here and that there be a certain size of can named in the regulation. I think everyone will agree that is probably a good thing, but we have no way of telling the United States that their producers cannot ship their cans in here unless they are of a certain size. We can only say that we think our products are such that you know what you are getting when you buy them, and hope that our people will buy them in preference to the United States product. Our department certainly cannot stop it although I can discuss it with my colleagues. Even then I do not know whether we can stop it.

Mr. MacLean: There is no objection to the particular size of the can. It is just that the United States producers can come in with a slightly smaller can and complete with our own producers. Two things might be suggested. One, that there might be an agreement made with the United States government requiring their producers to put their products for export in a certain size of can, or two, the department could make the regulations which apply to our producers the same as those which are applied in the United States with regard to the size of the can.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, I feel certain this is the item on which I wish to ask a few questions. The first is, how much pork was canned according to the specifications of the agricultural prices support board during 1952, and also in 1953? Second, how much was sold? Third, how much is still held? Fourth, what is the loan or pork subsidy, or whatever you like to call it, up to date? Before the minister replies I would also like to ask a few questions regarding beef. How much beef was processed, and how much was purchased and held alive? How much was sold, and how much is still on hand? Finally, what was the loss on that deal?

Mr. Gardiner: If the hon. member will wait a moment I will give him the exact figures. Perhaps in the meantime we could pass on to another item.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow up the matter raised by the hon. member for Acadia in connection with the livestock marketing board. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether the organizations in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, or any of the other provinces, have negotiated with the board in any way in an attempt to arrive at an initial price which could be guaranteed by the board and whether the negotiations have reached the stage where the price was actually discussed?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not think they have got to that stage as yet. As the hon. member knows, the board has to be set up under the provincial act and they have not accomplished that up to now. So far as I know there have been discussions in Manitoba between the farmers' union and the Manitoba government and in Saskatchewan between the farmers' union and the Saskatchewan government, but they would not make any application to us until the board is set up.

Mr. Zaplitny: The board must be set up first?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: Following up the remarks made by the hon. member for Queens on the matter of the importation of canned chicken, I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that the United States department of agriculture certainly requires exporters of canned goods from this country to adhere to the regulations set down by their department and I would think that we could make our own regulations apply in the same way.

Mr. Gardiner: When we were shipping canned pork into the United States we had to conform to the labels and markings they required and things of that kind and it was a matter of negotiation because we wanted to sell our pork there and we wanted it to go into their market at a price satisfactory to them, otherwise they would have added duty and we would have received no more for that pork. Therefore, we made that arrangement, and one part of it was that we put a certain type of label on the cans.

Mrs. Fairclough: But, Mr. Chairman, this is not a matter of canned pork. It is a matter concerning anything shipped to the United States in cans and our exporters have to conform to their regulations in so far as the size of the can and the labels are concerned. That applies equally to fish, fowl, fruits, vegetables, and practically everything that we put in cans.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand they have to approve these things but we do not necessarily have to change the labels on all types of foodstuffs. Their regulations are intended to prevent their people being misled, and that is why they raised the objection.

Mrs. Fairclough: I must say I support the representations made by the hon. member for Queens because, as some of the officials of the minister's department know, I had a good deal to do with the department before this standardization was put into effect back in 1943, if that is when the minister said it was.

Mr. Gardiner: I think it was 1943; yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: It was quite a hectic job. As he said, the motive was to try to get around misrepresentation. But what is the good of getting around misrepresentation on the part of canners and packers in this country if we are going to permit shippers in the American market to undercut our own people?

Mr. Gardiner: I will take up the matter with the other departments.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Cardiff: No, Mr. Chairman, the item is not carried.

Mr. Gardiner: As to canned pork the amount is 98,294,076 pounds. It is all sold or arranged for. It has perhaps not all been shipped but it is all sold. The total received for it was $27,262,756.90. The loss was $31,911,076.48. That is the pork. I am getting the same figures for the beef. It was all bought in 1952. None of it was bought in 1953.

Mr. Cardiff: I did not know whether any was processed in 1953.

Mr. Gardiner: As to beef of all kinds—of course, this was quite a different deal, as is understood; it was largely frozen meat—the amount was 94,434,988 pounds; the amount received was $10,516,511.19. The loss there was about the same as that for pork; it was $33,408,941.15.

Mr. Cardiff: Thank you.

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister tell us whether there was a different price for quality or grade? In other words, how much a pound did we get for canned pork as it was sold, and to what countries was it shipped? Some of it was shipped to Russia, I understand, and some probably to other countries. Can the minister give us the information with respect to that matter?

Mr. Gardiner: There were 60 million pounds of it sold in Canada and approximately 4 million pounds in the United States. The remainder of it was sold in other countries.

Mr. Nowlan: As to the 60 million pounds sold in Canada, was that for local consumption?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that was for local consumption.

Mr. Charlton: What was the total amount that went behind the iron curtain? Was it just this last 9 million pounds?

Mr. Gardiner: We have no direct information on that. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the other day, that department issued a permit to Canada Packers to ship some to Czechoslovakia, I think it was, which probably would be behind the iron curtain. But we sold the product to Canada Packers. We sold it to a number of different sources but some of it was sold to Canada Packers. The condition put on the sale was that the product had to be sold off this continent. That was done in order to meet regulations in the United States and so on and also to avoid its being distributed here at prices at which it was sold. It went to European countries largely. It was sold by local people. The amount that went to Czechoslovakia I think was sold by Canada Packers. I am not certain whether any of the others sold any there or not so I will not attempt to give any figures as to just what was sold.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this is a point that the minister himself has now brought out in some detail. After all, this relates to arrangements made by his department. Can the committee not now have figures as to the sales to the countries beyond the iron curtain? He has mentioned Czechoslovakia. He has not mentioned the 8 million pounds sold to Russia. Can the minister give us the figures for the sales to countries beyond the iron curtain and the arrangements that were made in each case?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. The Leader of the Opposition is perfectly correct. The product was handled by our prices support board in our department. But when it became a matter of its being shipped out of Canada there had to be permits from the Department of Trade and Commerce. In so far as we were concerned, there were 12 million pounds sold to Canada Cold Storage; there were 9 million pounds sold to Canada Packers and there were 13 million pounds sold to a combination of Canada Cold Storage and Canada Packers. Then there were 300,000 pounds sold to Vianda Limited of Switzerland.

Mr. Campbell: Can the minister give the prices received along with the quantity?

Mr. Gardiner: The first sale was at 15 cents; the second was at 15¾ cents; the third one was at 16 cents and the fourth one was at 16·65 cents.

Mr. Drew: Where is the head office of Canada Cold Storage?

Mr. Gardiner: Montreal.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask whether the minister knows whether Canada Cold Storage is affiliated in any way with Canada Packers? Is Canada Cold Storage Company a regular packing company operating in Canada the same as is Canada Packers or are they a selling agency only?

Mr. Gardiner: No, they are not a packing plant at all; they are a storage concern. So far as we know they are not associated with Canada Packers.

Mr. Drew: The minister has explained very simply that these transactions are carried out, of course, by the prices support board which actually bought the meat in the first place and arranged for its storage. Will the minister suggest to the committee that discussions did not take place with regard to where this meat was going before the sale took place? Before I ask that the question be answered, may I say that what I mean by that is this: Was there not discussion as to the destination of this meat before the arrangements were made for the sale of it?

Mr. Gardiner: We knew that the first 25 million were going to West Germany, that is, the 12 million and the 13 million, before it left our hands. We did not know where the 9 million were going. We made it a condition that it had to go off this continent, but we did not know where it would go. After they got it we could not impose any condition that they could not sell it in one place or another.

Mr. Drew: As I understand it, the figures that the minister has given are 12 million to Canada Cold Storage at 15 cents, 9 million to Canada Packers at 15¾ cents, 13 million to Canada Cold Storage at 16 cents and 300,000 to a Swiss firm at 16·65. Is that right?

Mr. Gardiner: That at 15¾ was what was sold to a combination of companies, Canada Cold Storage and Canada Packers. That is the 13 million pounds at 15¾. The amount sold to Canada Packers alone was sold at 16·65.

Mr. Drew: Is that the 9 million?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the 9 million, and the 300,000 was sold at 16 cents.

Mr. Drew: Does the minister inform the house that at the time the sale of the 9 million at 16·65 was effected it was not then known that a permit was to be granted for the export of that to Russia?

Mr. Gardiner: The fact is that so far as the 9 million pounds are concerned Canada Packers, so far as we knew—and I think it is correct—bought it on speculation. They probably knew at what price other sales had been made and they bought it on speculation. We did not know where they were going to sell it. So far as I know they did not know, and eventually they did get an offer from Czechoslovakia, I think it was, and they got a permit from the Department of Trade and Commerce. That was simply a permit to ship, as I understand it, to the country to which it had been sold. We had no idea where Canada Packers was going to sell it before we sold the 9 million pounds to them. We just made the condition that it must be off this continent.

Mr. Drew: Just so we will understand this clearly, what was the date of the sale of the 9 million pounds to Canada Packers?

Mr. Gardiner: January 25 by tender.

Mr. Drew: What was the date of the application for a permit by the Czechoslovaks in relation to the sale which went to Russia?

Mr. Gardiner: I have not got the exact date. I do not suppose the Minister of Trade and Commerce has either, but I am told it was either towards the end of March or in April.

Mr. Drew: But before that meat left it was known that the destination of the consignment that was being bought by the Czechoslovakian representative was in fact Russia.

Mr. Gardiner: When they got a permit to ship of course they got a permit to ship it to some place—Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Drew: That is all I want to know. At the time the government gave the permit for the sale of that 9 million pounds it was known that the destination of that order arranged through Czechoslovakian agents was Russia.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not think it was Russia, I think it was Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Gardiner: Which some people have said is behind the iron curtain.

Mr. Drew: People do not say; the minister knows it is behind the iron curtain.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know it was Russia.

Mr. Drew: Unless Czechoslovakia has been freed today it is still behind the iron curtain.

Mr. Gardiner: It would not be Russia, it would be Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Drew: There has been no question so far about the fact that the destination was Russia. Does the minister suggest that the destination of that pork was not Russia?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is a system of area control and the regulations are uniform for the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. Certain items are listed as strategic. No permits can be issued for them. Certain others are listed as subject to permit. Canned meat happens to be listed as subject to permit. We got an application from Canada Packers to issue a permit. I cannot say whether the destination was Czechoslovakia or Russia. I think it was Czechoslovakia. They are exactly the same as far as area control is concerned. They are both behind the iron curtain and both subject to area control. We consulted with those who maintain the area control, found that it was perfectly in order to issue a permit, and the permit was issued.

Mr. Drew: I have no desire to create any uncertainty about it, but I have reason to believe that Russia was the destination of that 9 million pounds, and I am not basing that upon press reports or otherwise.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no question from what the minister has said that it could go to Russia from Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Drew: I ask the government if there is any question about the fact that this was in fact consigned to Russia. I only do it so that we will understand what the transaction was.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would be glad to find out, but frankly I do not know. I did not sign the permit.

Mr. Drew: So that we will understand this, and inasmuch as the Minister of Trade and Commerce still has certain items, may I ask him to find out the date of the application, the name of the purchaser, the name of the consignee and the information that was given as to the place where the pork was to be delivered.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I will do better than that. I will file a copy of the export permit.

Item agreed to.

36. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000, $100,000.

Mr. Charlton: Item No. 40 has to do with the agricultural products board and then there is a board under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. Would the minister say what this item for the marketing of agricultural products includes?

Mr. Gardiner: I wish the hon. member would look up at the microphone. I could hear him better when we did not have these machines.

Mr. Charlton: What comes under item 36?

Mr. Gardiner: Item 36 is marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000. Under that item we can appoint persons to do marketing for us, the expenditure not to exceed $6,000, without going to the civil service commission. That is all that means, and the item provides $100,000 to be used to assist in marketing farm products.

Mr. Charlton: In what way is it used to market farm products? The Agricultural Prices Support Act administration markets farm products. Then there is the agricultural products board under item 40. What is the object of this? Do they do the same work as the agricultural prices support board?

Mr. Gardiner: The greater part of this amount is used for advertising farm products. We advertise, for example, that butter is better. We used to have that advertisement in every store where butter was being sold, meaning of course that it was better than some other things sold there also. We paid for that, and we have had similar advertisements in connection with other products. This is the vote which provides for that.

Mr. Michener: Can the minister say how long this provision permitting employment of salesmen for agricultural products outside of the civil service regulations has been in effect?

Mr. Gardiner: It has been in effect ever since that vote has been in here. I am not sure that the amount has always been $6,000. But with an amount of $6,000, if we employed one person that amount would not provide for his employment for more than a year, and it would probably be for a part of a year.

Mr. Michener: Perhaps the minister could inform the committee as to the number of people who are now employed and paid under this grant and the longest term of service of any of them now employed.

Mr. Gardiner: The figures are given on page 111 of the book of estimates. It shows that casual assistance amounted to $4,800, and it was $4,800 last year; travelling expenses, $2,400, and it was $2,422 last year; telephones and telegrams, $200 last year and we estimate the same this year; publication of reports and other material, $5,000 last year and we estimate that for this year; advertising and other publicity, $35,000 each year; office stationery and supplies, $200 each year; marketing projects, $52,300 this year and $52,278 last year. Then, there is $100 for sundries.

Mr. Michener: The details on page 111 do not seem to indicate that there is anyone employed.

Mr. Gardiner: The first item is for casual assistance. It does not mention any one person, but that is the amount that was spent.

Mr. Michener: That is the total amount for salaries for the whole item. There is not a large staff maintained?

Mr. Gardiner: No. As a matter of fact, we might employ a person to go out and put in these ads or draft these ads for us, something of that kind.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask what advertising was done? Was it to sell products the government owned or to stimulate the purchasing of various products?

Mr. Gardiner: It is to stimulate consumption of a product of which we might think, if it were not stimulated, we might have a surplus. For example, we put advertisements right across the country to the effect that "butter is better". We thought we had some butter to sell.

Mr. Ferguson: The government had butter to sell.

Mr. Gardiner: No, not necessarily the government. We thought if it were not sold it would pile up, and we would have a surplus of it so we tried to advertise it.

Mr. Ferguson: That is another benefit for the farmer.

Mr. Gardiner: It could be the storekeeper who had butter or the person who had it in storage, not necessarily the farmer.

Mr. Ferguson: The greater portion of the interest would be to sell that butter for the dairy farmer. They would be the parties to reap the benefit, not the storekeeper. No storekeeper would keep enough butter on hand to be worried about storage. These advertisements would be primarily of help to the farmer in the sale of the product. I do not believe the farmer or the public are aware of that fact.

Mr. Gardiner: No, the request was not made by the farmers.

Mr. Ferguson: No.

Mr. Gardiner: It was something that the people who are interested in producing butter and delivering butter discussed with the government. I believe they actually did have a certain amount put on butter in Ontario for that purpose. They took a cent a pound off the payment that they got, and then we put in an extra amount in order to make the amount greater, and the ads were put out all over the country.

[Mr. Michener.]

Mr. Ferguson: I am in entire agreement with advertising these products. The fruitgrowers of California do the same thing to stimulate the purchase of their products. I am just wondering if every department in government as well as the Department of Agriculture have little caches of money hidden away with which they could carry that idea a little farther. I am glad to see the farmer get it, and particularly the dairy farmer. Does the same condition apply to almost every department of government? Do they have a $35,000 item with which they can say we can just help along Joe, and then he will vote for us for sure? If that is the case, it is a very handy sum of money.

Mr. Gardiner: I just want to say one thing. We have advertised a lot of things like onions, potatoes and so on. I want to assure my hon. friend that the item has never been hidden away. It has been stuck right out in front every time, and has been voted upon.

Mr. Ferguson: I should like to see an ad from another department that would read, "Buy your ships and build them in Collingwood". We hear talk about prices dropping by 30 per cent, but in our shipyards there has been a drop of about 100 per cent and that affects my home town. It is pretty near time this government did something about that.

Mr. Dufresne: I should like to know if the Department of Agriculture ever sold meat or butter at military camps for consumption by the armed forces at very cheap prices?

Mr. Gardiner: The only meat that we have sold so far as I can recall is some of the beef that we accumulated when we were fighting foot-and-mouth disease. I do not believe it was sold at lower prices. I think it was sold in competition with others. Everyone had to bid for it. When we had that meat, we put in bids and sold it.

Mr. Dufresne: Has the minister any idea of the price at which it was sold?

Mr. Gardiner: The beef, I understand, was sold at around 30 cents.

Mr. Dufresne: I have asked this question because I am informed that at Valcartier Camp near Quebec some surplus pork and beef is being sold now to private enterprise in the city of Quebec at about 18 cents a pound. I should like to know from where that surplus comes?

Mr. Gardiner: We would not know anything about that. The hon. member had better bring that up on the defence estimates and have it answered.

Terminable services—

37. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $17,000,000.

Mr. Cardiff: Each year this item for freight assistance on western feed grain comes before us, and generally it is extended for another year. I hope it will be extended again. We in the east like to take advantage of that if we can. If it were not for the fact that we receive some assistance in connection with western feed grain we would not use nearly as much as we do. I have asked quite a number of questions tonight, and up until now I have not been critical of the minister. I am going to be critical at this moment because the minister represents the Dominion of Canada, and he is responsible for the policy that is formed by the government.

If the western farmer were getting what we have to pay for this grain I would not think so much about it, but he is not getting that price. We are paying too much for the grain at this end. There is a large disparity between what the western farmer gets for the grain, and what we have to pay for it. I should like the minister to tell me why there is such a difference in the price?

Mr. Gardiner: As I understand the question, Mr. Chairman, it is why someone pays the western farmer a certain price for his grain, and so far as we are concerned it is the wheat board—with others buying oats, barley and so on—and why it costs the farmer in the east so much more to get it? Well, I do not know that it is up to me to explain that. It is not anything over which we have control. We pay a very considerable part of the freight from Fort William to the east; and to the extent that the freight is paid it tends to put the price down, not up. When it gets into the hands of the dealer in Ontario, Quebec or the eastern provinces, or in British Columbia they do all kinds of things with it.

In the first place as a rule they grind it, and then they mix it with other kinds of feed to suit different animals at different ages. Then they put it in a very fancy bag, as a rule, with all kinds of inscriptions on the bag. We have no way of checking that, to find out what these costs are.

When I see a man with a trailer behind his car taking home five or six bags, sometimes I wonder why it does not cost him more, because there is so much cost in doing it that way. When I was in Ontario they took the feed home, and many of them still do. Some of them have trucks today and take it home by the truckload. Others took it home with a team and wagon, a real load of it. And it is very difficult to understand how the cost could be other than a high cost if you put only five or six bags on a trailer behind a car every time you want a little feed. If you run into town with a trailer and pull it out every few days, it is bound to have a high cost.

Mr. Cardiff: That is not the answer at all. No doubt there are those who do that, but that is not the answer. The fact of the matter is that we have to pay too much for this, and there is too great a spread. I think the Minister of Agriculture is responsible to some extent.

Mr. Gardiner: No, he is not. The minister of agriculture in Ontario is, but I am not.

Mr. Cardiff: Oh, well, now you are the minister acting for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: I have nothing to do with the miller in Ontario. He gets the grain and it is his grain. If he is going to sell it to a farmer in Ontario I have nothing to do with it. That is provincial.

Mr. Cardiff: The dominion government controls this whole thing.

Mr. Gardiner: No, they do not.

Mr. Cardiff: You could have control over it if you wished to use your facilities to control it. And that is one place where you have fallen down, when you do not protect the farmer in every part of Canada. We have had ministers of agriculture from the west—

Mr. Gardiner: You are telling me one of two things, either that the farmer out west is getting too little for it, in which case I am not getting him enough, or that the fellow down here is paying too much for it.

Mr. Cardiff: That is true.

Mr. Gardiner: You will probably have to split it in the middle.

Mr. Cardiff: If the farmer in the west were getting a high price, it would not be so bad. But he is not getting the price. They are not getting any great amount of money after they have grown it out there. And when I get it in Ontario I have to pay more than I can afford to pay for it as feed, to feed it at a profit. And we would produce far more hogs and far more cattle if we could get it, perhaps more than you would want.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister knows that I have spoken on this subject every year since I came to the house. When I first came here it was a matter of an interim vote in the supplementary estimates. I remember two years ago I asked the parliamentary assistant—the minister was away and perhaps I took an unfair advantage—when this would become part of a permanent government policy, and he intimated that perhaps it had. The fact that it is now in the main estimates indicates that it is now permanent government policy. I do wish to say I appreciate the fact that it is contained in the main estimates today, rather than have to wait six months as we have heretofore to find out whether it is to be voted or not. This is welcomed by the farmers in the east.

I can tell the minister that last July and early August I was engaged in a certain field activity, as were other hon. members in the house including, I presume, the right hon. gentleman. And more than one farmer to whom I happened to go during those hot July days said, when I asked him if he would vote for me, "Well, if you can tell me why middlings are so blinkety-blankety high I will vote for you". I said that if we were elected and Jimmy Gardiner was not I would reduce it.

Mr. Macdonnell: After all, the minister has here a vote of $17 million, which is a lot of money. How is that money allocated? One can understand the purpose of it; but does not the minister's department supervise the allocation of it? And to that extent is there not a certain control over the trade?

Mr. Gardiner: We check it carefully. And I must say that if what my hon. friend said a moment ago could be proved I would have great difficulty in having this vote accepted by the government. I have not had it proven to me, nor have other members of the government had it proven to them, that somebody is getting away with some of the freight payments we have made.

Mr. Nowlan: But you suspect it.

Mr. Gardiner: And they would have to be getting away with it in order to bring about the condition described a moment ago. I do not really think it could be proven, and my reason for saying that is that these other costs are added on. It may be argued that they do not need to be added on at all and should not be there; but that is not the way we check. We have checked the question as to whether that grain left Fort William worth a certain amount of money, and when it got into the hands of the dealer it represented a certain amount there.

Now, if you begin adding all these other things—mixing, and adding fishmeal and a lot of other things—and sell it out at so much per hundred pounds it is difficult to get back to the price as between the western farmer and the farmer who bought the grain here. But if the idea that has been suggested could be proven, I am afraid no freight payments would be made.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Cardiff: We are not kicking about the freight payments. You have said it is the dealer who is responsible. All right; we will find out if it is the dealer who is responsible. But if it is not the dealer, then somebody else is. And I would like to know who it is.

Mr. Gardiner: That is exactly what I said at Niagara Falls. The farmers were all there, and they were arguing this question for an hour—that the thing to do was to prove that the dealers were responsible, and then something could be done about it. Some of them thought they were, and kept insisting that they were. I say that if you are going to try to judge that, it can be done in the province of Ontario, by the government there, or in any other province.

Mr. Zaplitny: Would the minister give the actual figures paid out for this freight subsidy in the last five years?

Mr. Gardiner: I have the figures here since we started. We have paid out a total of $208,711,753.87.

Mr. Zaplitny: What years does that figure cover?

Mr. Gardiner: I believe that averages $6.16 a ton. The figures for the last five years are as follows:

|---|---|
| 1949-50 | $16,764,004 |
| 1950-51 | 15,637,786 |
| 1951-52 | 14,999,239 |
| 1952-53 | 20,465,579 |
| 1953-54 | 16,724,647 |

I should add that part of the figure for 1953-54 is a forecast.

Mr. Campbell: This complaint of the eastern farmers regarding the cost of feed to them is not something new; it has been going on for a good many years. I am wondering whether the department could not encourage some form of co-operation among those eastern farmers so they could buy their grain direct from the wheat board in carload lots, bring it into their district and distribute it themselves. I think it would cut down the cost of the feed by at least one-third.

Mr. Gardiner: There is nothing to prevent any group of farmers down here from getting together and buying direct from the wheat board or from any other organization such as the pools out there. That could be done. But the individuals have to take the initial action in connection with it.

Mr. Charlton: The only difficulty as I have stated before on many occasions in the agriculture committee, is that your delivery date must be extended to almost three or four months when ordering from the wheat board direct or from any other branch. The only way you can get feed and get it at the time you want it is to get it through the dealers. If there is any way in which the wheat board can guarantee a reasonable length of time for delivery I am sure many farmers would buy direct, and many groups of farmers would buy direct, but they have not been able to get delivery of it probably for months after ordering. That is why they will not buy it.

Item agreed to.

44. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,899,245.

45. Major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,077,747.

Mr. Drew: I wish to make some remarks in regard to item 44. A few days ago we were discussing wheat and, as I mentioned at the time, that seemed for a while to develop into a private war between the members on both sides of the house from the province of Saskatchewan, although there were members from other parts of the country who had a very real and deep concern in this subject. There have been occasions when one of the most important questions arising under this present item seems to have been regarded as a private subject of dispute between members of this house coming from the province of Saskatchewan. I am referring to the question that has been before us on different occasions regarding the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project.

I wish to speak not merely as the Leader of the Opposition but as a member of this house representing an Ontario constituency. I regard this as a question of concern to every Canadian. It is important that we recognize it as a subject that is of interest to every Canadian. During the present session we have been discussing on different occasions the development of the St. Lawrence waterway and power project. On other occasions we have been discussing developments in other parts of the country, and I say to the credit of the members coming from parts of the country distant from the St. Lawrence seaway and power project that I have heard at no time any suggestion that this should not be supported because it was not something that brought an apparent immediate advantage to their own constituencies.

As Canadians in this house we have welcomed the information that came to us that the St. Lawrence waterways and power development would be proceeded with. As Canadians we have welcomed other developments that contribute to the general advancement of Canadians. I suggest that this long debated and very long discussed question of the South Saskatchewan dam will best be examined in the right perspective if we remove it from any suggestion that it is only a question of direct interest to the people of Saskatchewan. I prefer to believe that this is a matter of just as direct concern to the people of the rest of Canada as is the St. Lawrence waterway. True, it is not as large a development; true, the amount expended would not be as great; the electric energy produced will be, in relative terms, comparatively small. The amount, however, would be very large for the area that would be affected and the benefits would be immense to the country in which the development would actually take place. We have before us now under item 44 the provision of $3,899,245 under the heading "Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage". Perhaps it would be correct to bring together the three items, 44, 45 and 46 which are in some measure related to each other.

Mr. Harkness: Not item 46.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that it is primarily the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. Gardiner: If the hon. member will permit me, it is item 45 under which the South Saskatchewan river project comes, not item 44.

Mr. Drew: They are related items. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage of course is the—

Mr. Gardiner: It is the $7 million item that it comes under.

Mr. Drew: —item covering the operation of the rehabilitation act which is the act in relation to which certain inquiries were made. Item No. 45, "Major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces" amounts to $7,077,747, and would be the item that would directly relate to this project. I recognize that. However, it is convenient if we may proceed on that basis to discuss the subject of these two items together, because the one item relates to the act under which certain inquiries have taken place, and the other is in regard to the allowances made with respect to these projects. I mention that because the engineers working under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act have been doing work in regard to this project which is in fact the basis on which much of the discussion has taken place. In fact, it was the information obtained by the engineers working under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which was largely the basis of the consideration given to this problem by the commission which was appointed to inquire into this subject.

Mr. Gardiner: I have no objection to the two of them being discussed at one time on the understanding that when we get through with them we shall have the two of them passed and we shall not come back to something else.

Mr. Drew: I am quite agreeable to doing it either way. I do it this way because there is a related aspect between these two items. It is under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act that much of the preliminary work has been done in regard to the project covered in item 44 that I am actually discussing—

The Chairman: Is it agreeable to the committee to discuss items 44 and 45 together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drew: Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe it would be desirable to go over as briefly as possible the history relating to this particular project. I do not intend to go back to the early discussions held long years ago, though I could do so for while I would not match my memories of Saskatchewan with those of the minister, who has lived there so many years and has grown up with the developments in the province, nevertheless my memories go back many years to the time when I first heard this project being discussed.

However to bring this up to the time when legislation was actually put on the statute books under which consideration was given to this project, I would mention that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was enacted in 1935 by the Conservative government under Mr. R. B. Bennett. I do not think this is something about which there will be any disagreement between myself and the minister. In fact, to some of the hon. members who have engaged in earlier debates may I just say that I am putting this on the record so as to remove some of the confusion in the Liberal folklore which has been built up on this subject. That act was put on the statute books primarily with the idea of retrieving certain prairie land, especially those of Saskatchewan, from the severity of the drought which had visited those areas.

The building of a dam on the South Saskatchewan river was a local dream of some new development made possible by the fact that the constant flow of the Saskatchewan river between high banks obviously invited the construction of a dam which would permit the development of power as well as irrigation. The building of a dam on the South Saskatchewan would permit the development of a great deal of power in that province and it would be of benefit to well over half a million acres in an area which today is one of the really tragic areas of Saskatchewan and of western Canada.

In that area, as the minister so well knows, there is tragic evidence of homes in which people lived and brought up their families. There are abandoned schools, abandoned churches, and there is the appearance of desolation in many parts of that area which we know perfectly well from the reports before us, and from the evidence of the experimental work which has been carried on, could be made rich productive areas with effective irrigation.

There is, in fact, some experimental development near Outlook in Saskatchewan where some of the finest crops, in a small area of course, are being grown where experimental irrigation has been carried out. As the minister well knows, there are within that area some beautiful homes and some substantial growth of trees which demonstrate beyond all question what can be done with that dry soil if irrigation is carried right through that area.

Now the purpose of this project is to obtain the power, not only for general use but to operate the pumping equipment for the irrigation system and in that way provide the power as well to irrigate an estimated 450,000 acres of land in central Saskatchewan.

This calls for the construction of a dam 205 feet high across the South Saskatchewan river near Outlook at a site at the mouth of Coteau creek. Associated with this plan of irrigation, and inseparable from it because the power is needed for the irrigation project, is the development of 150,000 horsepower from the water head that would be created by this dam. Part of this power would be used to pump water to heights from 15 to 120 feet to irrigate approximately 307,000 acres of the total area. The project also contemplates the provision of water for domestic use, which is greatly needed, in the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina.

This particular part is in an area that is generally known as the Palliser triangle. It was first explored between the years 1851 and 1860 by Captain John Palliser of the Royal Engineers. Warning of the problems ahead was given in his report in which he declared this to be an arid area unpromising for human habitation. It has since then been called the Palliser triangle because of his report.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this possibility has been considered for a considerable time. Engineers working under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act have been examining that site for years, testing the foundation, and carrying out experiments as to the way in which this dam could be constructed. They have reported that this is a practical project.

They have reported that the dam can be constructed. They were right there on the spot near Coteau creek and tests have demonstrated to the satisfaction of the engineers that the foundation is suitable and that there are no practical engineering difficulties standing in the way of the construction of this extremely important dam.

However, in this case the government was not satisfied to take the evidence of its own engineers. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that unless the minister is prepared to say that he is not satisfied with the engineers, who will be paid by the very money we are requested to provide at this time, then it would be proper for him to have accepted their recommendation in regard to the construction of this dam. Either those men were competent or they were not. If they were not then other engineers should be found to do the work. I believe they were competent. I believe the money should be provided for the continuance of their services. I believe those were men who knew best what could be done. Those are the men who have been right on the spot where this project is to be constructed. Those are the men who have examined the structure of the soil and the manner in which the material right there can be used for this particular purpose.

Instead of going ahead on the basis of the recommendation of the engineers who were operating under this department of government a royal commission was established to find out whether this should be proceeded with. But we have no evidence before us, Mr. Chairman, that this government at any time found it necessary to appoint a royal commission to find out whether they should proceed with the St. Lawrence waterway. I do not recall any separate royal commission established to find out whether they should proceed with the deepening of the Welland canal on the most recent occasion that they did so. I do not know that there is any evidence before us that other major enterprises have been subjected to a royal commission of inquiry. On the contrary, the government has said with some pride that it accepted the recommendation of the officials and engineers employed for the particular purpose. Why was it in this case that they were not prepared to accept the recommendations made by the engineers so long engaged in the study of this particular project?

Mr. Chairman, the report of that royal commission raised no question about the engineering possibility of this project. It raised a certain question about costs, however. It is significant that in their approach to this subject those who conducted this inquiry were largely dependent upon the information given them by the very engineers whose recommendations we already have before us. From time to time we have asked questions as to whether the government was prepared to proceed with this project and the government has said on many occasions that it had not yet become convinced that this project was a practical possibility or that the time was right to undertake it.

Mr. Chairman, I need not put on the record again the amounts required to construct this project, according to the estimate of the engineers. They are before us; they are on record. I think those figures are just as reliable as are the figures before us with regard to the St. Lawrence deep waterway or the power project associated with it. I think they are just as reliable as are any of the other projected figures we are called upon to consider from time to time. I will say without any hesitation that the engineers who prepared the estimates in this case have had a much longer time to examine the subject and to study the figures they presented than have those who presented other figures upon which we have been called upon to pass.

I think we should also bear in mind the fact that we are not dealing alone with the construction of a dam; we are not dealing alone with the availability of 150,000 horsepower of electricity. We are dealing with the reclamation of soil which we know to be rich, productive soil if a water supply is made available, and we know that it can be made available in this case. I am not suggesting for one moment that we should disregard costs. I have not yet come to the point where I am prepared to accept the simple statement of the government "What's a million anyway?" I believe we should examine not only millions but single dollars. Nevertheless there are certain things which should be examined in this case or certain values which cannot be disregarded by any Canadian in coming to some conclusion on this subject.

It will be of immense importance to all of Canada if that heartland of southern Saskatchewan is made as productive as we know it can be made. A gesture of this kind should be welcomed—and I am sure it would be—by those from the maritime provinces who seek—and have obtained in certain cases, but not in as many as they would like —certain consideration there; by those from Quebec who have received consideration for certain projects; by those from Ontario who at this very moment are receiving the support of all members in this house for a project which will benefit Ontario but which will also benefit the whole of Canada; by those from Manitoba and Alberta where they already know the great prosperity brought to the Lethbridge and Taber districts of southern Alberta by irrigation of this kind as well as by the people of British Columbia. They all should, and I am sure would, welcome a gesture of this kind as evidence of the feeling of all hon. members that the welfare and advancement of the province of Saskatchewan is a subject of common concern to every hon. member in the House of Commons as it is to every Canadian.

Let me now see why it is that there is so much difficulty in getting action. Why is it that there has been so much stalling on this matter? Why is it that so many explanations have been given as to why it has not been done? Why was a royal commission used to smother this project instead of proceeding on the recommendations of the engineers, as has been done on other occasions? Mr. Chairman, we have had many explanations but I must confess that hope must be stirring in the minds of some because we have a new statement from the Minister of Agriculture. I find that in Saskatoon on June 10 the Minister of Agriculture held out hope with regard to this project. It was a new hope; it was a new picture. Some of us had not heard this before. Speaking in Saskatoon with regard to this subject, the Minister of Agriculture is quoted in the Regina Leader-Post as saying —and I quote the words given in quotation marks in the article—as follows:

> We have been doing all right at clearing obstruction out of the way. There were four when we started discussions and there is now only the one left—the question of power development costs—

Mr. Chairman, some of us will remember that Scotch song, "Last night there were four Marys; tonight there are but three". Now we have it down from four to one in this particular case; we have the four difficulties, which are not mentioned in detail, reduced to one, namely the question of power development costs. That matter is not important; I concede that; but it is a subject that has been known for a long time. Then we come to a quotation that I think requires some explanation. The minister is reported as saying—and again I give what appears in direct quotation marks in the article—as follows:

> I am the advocate of the dam, but I am not the government of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, if those words have any meaning at all they mean simply this: I want the dam but the government will not agree to it; and since I am not the government of Canada, my wishes cannot be carried out. While we are discussing this subject, let us have an explanation as to whether there is a difference of opinion in the government with regard to this matter. We are not prying into the affairs of the government. I am putting before the committee the words which appear in quotation marks and which, unless he has been misquoted, represent the position of the minister:

> I am the advocate of the dam, but I am not the government of Canada.

I repeat that those words mean nothing unless they mean that while the minister advocates the dam, the government does not advocate it.

This project, Mr. Chairman, is one which would provide, on the one hand, irrigation which would create a rich, productive area. This irrigation would once again bring happy homes to those farms which are now, for all practical purposes, in many cases abandoned. It would once again open these schools and bring into existence new and better schools. It would again bring into use these churches in which people have worshipped in the past. It would bring to that area a spirit and a confidence that would have an impact, not only upon that area itself but upon the rest of the province. Above all, it would stand as evidence of the belief of this House of Commons, representing all parts of Canada, that the welfare of the central part of southern Saskatchewan is a matter of common concern to all Canadians.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend is through quoting the article, I have only one criticism to make of what he said. He referred to it as a speech delivered in Saskatoon. It was not a speech. I was being questioned by a reporter of the Star-Phoenix.

Mr. Drew: Of course, I simply have the information that is contained in the article itself, and it begins with these words:

> Agriculture minister J. G. Gardiner said Thursday night there could be no decision regarding the proposed South Saskatchewan river dam until the question of power development costs had been decided.

With respect to whether it was in the form of an interview or a speech—

Mr. Gardiner: I did not make any speech in Saskatoon at all.

Mr. Drew: I assume the minister is just as accurate in a press interview as in a speech.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I am not objecting to that. I just want to point out that it would not be correct to say that I made a speech there and said that. I did not want that quoted across the country.

Mr. Drew: I naturally accept that. I simply have the report before me and I have quoted the opening paragraph that gave me the impression that it was a speech or press interview that is given as the statement made by the minister. Of course, if it were in the form of a press interview, it would still represent a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture with respect to a subject that is now part of the general consideration before us. I do emphasize what I said before, that I am not suggesting that we should disregard costs. The costs, however, are not prohibitive. The costs are relatively small compared with those of a number of projects that have been undertaken by the government. They are comparatively small compared with the costs of projects that have been undertaken by single provinces in the development of their own resources.

I believe this is a practical project. I say so in the belief that the engineers' recommendations are made by men qualified to make such reports, and also because of such personal examination as I have been able to make on the site of the projected dam. There is this further aspect of the subject. Not only would it provide irrigation but it would also provide basic power for a larger power network in that area. We all know that if you have a fixed amount of continuous hydro-electric power at a low rate you can make that the basis of a largely extended use of electric power through a grid where the peak loads will be maintained by supplementary production by diesel engines, steam engines or other equipment.

In a case of this kind needed power would be made available to an extended area of farm land as well as municipalities during the off-peak period and the peak loads at higher cost could be supplied in the way I have suggested. In that way there would be a reasonably low over-all cost of power through an extended part of that area. This belief has been put forward on many occasions and I wish to say, not only as a member from Ontario but as the Leader of the Opposition, that we believe the time is long overdue for a definite decision that this project will proceed. We ask the government now to declare that it will proceed and we ask that it be done both in the interests of the people in that area and in the general interests of the whole of Canada which will benefit by the improvement of the economy of that part of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to speak for a minute or two on this subject. I appreciate very much what the Leader of the Opposition has just said. There is one issue in Saskatchewan where there are no politics. Whether the member be a Liberal, a Conservative, a Social Crediter or a C.C.F.'er, they are all in favour of the South Saskatchewan dam. I know that the Minister of Agriculture has received much criticism because he has not built the dam. As a matter of fact I do not know whether he deserves all the criticism that he has received because I know that he wants the dam. I know that he cannot sell the idea to the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and a few more of his colleagues, but I also know that there is probably no one in Saskatchewan who has pushed the South Saskatchewan dam any more than the Minister of Agriculture. I wish that we in the C.C.F. and Conservative parties could help him.

I can tell the Prime Minister that so far as the building of this dam is concerned there is no issue in Saskatchewan. We think it would be a good thing. In the 1930's we had the most fantastic drought that anyone could imagine. You could drive your car down the main street of a town and you could not see the end of the engine because of the dust that was blowing. We have got lots of moisture out there at the present time, but we are afraid that these same conditions may return.

In Texas, Wyoming and other states of the southern United States they have had drought. We believe that it may return to our province. That is why we are all very anxious that the dam should be built. I am not going to say much more, but I should like to say that this is a project which is in the national interest. We had fantastic relief costs during the depression and will have them again if the dam is not built. We know that if we are going to have some stability for agriculture we need to have the dam built. I hope that the Prime Minister will give consideration to doing something about this irrigation dam. It is not a political matter. It is something that everyone in the province wants.

Mr. Campbell: I am sure that when the people of Saskatchewan read tomorrow what the Leader of the Opposition has said about the South Saskatchewan dam they will appreciate it. My mind goes back a few years when that grand old Conservative, Mr. John R. MacNicol, was sitting in the house. He probably knew more about irrigation than any man who sat in the house during the years he was here. There is no question that the people of Saskatchewan want and need the dam. They need it not only for farming but for power purposes. The power load in Saskatchewan has been mounting very rapidly and the power commission can hardly keep up with the demand. Last year 5,500 farms went on service and this year there will probably be 6,000.

I rode across that territory on horseback in 1905. At that time you could run a mowing machine over it and you would not get a load of hay. I wish that the Minister of Agriculture would take the Prime Minister through the Lethbridge country where they have irrigation on a similar type of land so that he could see what has been done there. We could not only take care of quite a few thousand more farmers but we could help to stabilize the whole economy of the country through that part of the country producing foodstuffs. They would be produced year after year. The farmers would not have to depend on rain.

I wish that the estimates of all departments would be brought down earlier. I think this is a subject which we should spend two or three days discussing. These estimates should not be introduced when everybody is sick and tired of sitting here and wanting to get home. These estimates should be brought down early enough so that we would still have a little pep left in us and could take some time to try to persuade the other members of the cabinet besides the Minister of Agriculture who, I am quite sure, wants to see the dam built. I earnestly suggest that the government bring down their estimates earlier next year so that we can have two or three days' debate on this project.

Mr. McIlraith: Will you let us get them through if they are brought down?

Mr. Studer: Mr. Chairman, those of us who have been living for a great number of years in the dry areas of Saskatchewan cannot refrain from offering a few remarks about the advantages of irrigation in a province such as Saskatchewan. I believe that the only way we learn is as a result of the experience of the past. It should not be necessary to go further than the experience of the 1930's to prove the advantages of water when dry conditions are prevalent in our part of the country. History has shown us that this condition recurs from time to time. I believe we should take those lessons that we have learned in the past into consideration in developing a program for the future that will eliminate those trials through which the people of Saskatchewan have had to pass as a result of the unfavourableness of natural conditions as they have existed from time to time.

At the moment we are utilizing much of the time of this House of Commons in trying to find a solution to the problem of what could be called, perhaps, overproduction. I believe some of this time should be utilized in considering what happens when there is no production in this country. Our experiences in the 1930's certainly showed us that the greatest problem we have in this country is the problem of non-production as a result of climatic or other conditions that may prevail in this country of ours. I would much prefer to be in the position of endeavouring to provide a solution for the matter of production than to solve the trials and tribulations of a condition of non-production.

After all, it is in production that the wealth of Canada lies. There is only one source of wealth throughout this country, and that is production. We in Saskatchewan, as a result of past experience, wish to be in a position where we can contribute to the wealth of Canada through production, and thus stabilize the economy of this country through a continuity of production. In an area such as we have in Saskatchewan, this can result only through the proper utilization of water. The marriage of water with the soil is what results in production. This is the fundamental basis of irrigation projects throughout the world, and it is for that reason we are advocating consideration of this measure in the House of Commons. We think it is necessary for the general good of Canada because it will stabilize the continuity of wealth through production.

It is food that is essential to the people of this country. I believe it would be to our advantage to learn what action we can take, as a result of what has happened in the past, to safeguard the future. We are talking about rain in the west at the moment. It appears as though perhaps there is too much of it. However, over a period of years there has never been too much rain in Saskatchewan. Climates change, perhaps slowly sometimes and perhaps rapidly, but history repeats itself. The records we have from the beginning of time prove the fact that history repeats itself, and what has happened in western Canada in previous times is going to happen again. It is going to happen because we cannot change climatic conditions. It has been upon the production of Saskatchewan that much of the economic welfare of Canada has depended.

East of the Rocky mountains in Saskatchewan we have a condition that is not only peculiar to the Palliser triangle, to which reference has been made, but continues down through the length of Montana, Wyoming, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, part of Texas, Oklahoma, and new and old Mexico. These are the drier areas of the North American continent. I do not know of anything that is in existence at the present time that is going to give us any hope that these climatic conditions will change. The time when we need consideration is the time when nature is unkind to us. At the moment perhaps we could forgo some of the plenteous production we have, but the time this country really appreciates production is during the dry periods, and we have had those periods in the history of our country.

We have listened to the reference to what has happened in Texas recently. During the past year over 19 per cent of the seeded wheat acreage in Texas had to be abandoned because of drought. In western Canada we have been endeavouring since 1930, as a result of our experience, to build up our economy so that what happened before shall not happen again. We want to be in a position so that if these conditions do recur we will be able to carry on production and provide the essentials for the economy of Canada. It is essential for us to supply this new wealth that is absolutely necessary from year to year. This question, therefore, bears some relationship to the economy of the whole of Canada.

We in the west are agreeable to contributing to the fullest extent possible to anything that will advance the general interest of Canada, be it the Canso project in the maritimes, the St. Lawrence project or any other project that will affect the future welfare of Canada. We ask the rest of the people of Canada to give consideration to that which is of advantage to us to maintain our living in western Canada and so that we can contribute to the welfare of Canada. Everyone knows that life is non-existent without water. It is necessary for the existence of people, necessary for the existence of livestock and necessary for the existence of industry. Perhaps if there is one reason why there is a lack of industry in western Canada it is because of the lack of water which is so essential thereto.

Life is non-existent without water, and neither grain, cereals nor grass can grow without water. All flesh that is in existence in the world is grass. If grass failed for one year in the world life would be non-existent, and that is why we in western Canada, after our experience of the 1930's, realize the importance of water to the economy of Canada. It involves the life and existence of the people of Canada as well as the people of the world.

Most of the other countries recognize the importance of the existence of water. I have been living in western Canada and in southwestern Saskatchewan for 35 years. In the springtime when the water rushes away from the melting snows because of the chinooks or as a result of the natural development of spring into summer, every one of us who has lived in that country resents every drop of water that leaves that area. We resent the loss of the overflow that runs away in one direction into Hudson bay and in the other, because of the division of the land, into the gulf of Mexico. This water that is the lifeblood of existence to people flows away, and we watch it flow away with the deepest of emotions, realizing as we do that the water should be impounded and used for the development of the country and of the people of the world.

We hear a lot of talk about the underprivileged countries. We hear about the help we should give those people in a country like India, for instance. Well, Canada has one-half of one per cent of the irrigated land of the world. India has 55 million acres of land under irrigation, and we think of India as an underprivileged country. India is preparing right at this moment, in the Sutlej river project and the Bakra dam a $3 billion investment to provide irrigation so that they may provide food for their people. Five big projects are being developed in India. And in Pakistan, which was included in India before the division took place in that portion of the continent, at the present time they have 37 million acres under irrigation.

I have here a list of all the irrigation projects of all the countries of the world, including those supposedly underprivileged countries, showing that they have made developments through irrigation to the extent of the water they have available.

Many people are of the opinion no doubt that if all the water in western Canada were utilized for purposes of irrigation, all the land could be irrigated. But only one per cent of the total land area of Saskatchewan could be irrigated if all the water were utilized that flows down all the rivers in Saskatchewan in any one season. Hon. members will be interested to know that eight times as much water flows down the Ottawa river passing these houses of parliament as flows through all the rivers in southern Saskatchewan. So that will give an idea of the value of water to an area situated as is the province of Saskatchewan. We watch the flow of water down the Ottawa river and pay no particular attention to it. We see the water flowing through the St. Lawrence, and we think, "Well, that is just a means of commerce, whereby the ships can deliver the products of our country to other parts of the world." We pay no particular attention to it.

But in western Canada our rivers are the life of our people. Let us not for one moment anticipate that things are going to continue at the level of production they have reached in the last few years. We would like to have it continue as such. If it were not for the irrigated land in the world civilization would cease to exist, because that irrigated land makes life among the people possible. There are over 188 million acres of irrigated land throughout the world which provides a livelihood for its people. We here in Canada have only one-half of one per cent of the total. And we are a progressive nation!

I would suggest that there is a great future for Canada, but we have much to do. We have heard much discussion about costs. There have been discussions through various channels of government, through commissions and committees, and the P.F.R.A. organization. I suggest that this investment is one that would repay the whole of Canada. I do not want to be a member of a government or a member of any organization that is going to go through the thirties again, or that would not at least in some way, shape or form endeavour to make some contribution to prevent a repetition of what we experienced during those years.

Down in southwestern Saskatchewan we do not have to explain our experiences of the past or what happened in those years. No one believes us when we tell them that there were months when we could not mail letters, that there were months when instead of waiting for box cars to take out our production or our wheat, as we do today, we were waiting for box cars that would bring relief to southwestern Saskatchewan. That is what we were waiting for from Ontario and Quebec, and other parts of Canada. We were waiting so that the people throughout Canada would recognize our terrible plight, a situation in which we had to sell our stock for as little as one cent a pound because there was not enough feed in the country to maintain more than one adult animal and two calves because that was the limit set by the government. No one in Canada could supply the feed for all that country that was suffering from drought.

Two-thirds of the people of Saskatchewan were on a relief basis. It cost the Dominion of Canada $200 million for that experience; and we want to see that that is not repeated in the future. Why should we not learn by experience? The people of Saskatchewan are right, and they are right in more ways than one. I think the Saskatchewan government is doing a service for the people of this country when it is offering to pay for the power that is inherent in or would be delivered through the building of the dam.

This would be a project different from any other in western Canada in that it would have both power and irrigation in connection with it. I would not hesitate for one moment to say that a Saskatchewan government may build it, itself. And if it did, I think everybody in Saskatchewan would be behind it. But that would not be a fair thing to do. The dominion government has been responsible for the impounding of water throughout Canada, and the provincial government has been responsible for the utilization of water after it has been impounded. I think the least the Dominion of Canada could do would be to accede to the general situation prevailing throughout Canada, and that would be to grant its proportion of the cost of building a project that would be the very lifeblood of the people in western Canada, as history may well prove.

Irrespective of what we do, we are going to save money. We will save the millions that have been spent in western Canada for relief. And remember this, that there is a possibility; no, not a possibility, there is a definite probability of the development of half a million acres of irrigated land through this Saskatchewan river project.

Incidentally, this development would not help us in southwestern Saskatchewan, because our elevation is too high. We are at an elevation of around three thousand feet, and it is difficult to make water run uphill. But I am thinking of the drought years in the economy of Saskatchewan and in the economy of the Dominion of Canada, when those 500,000 acres could average 20 bushels to the acre when there was no rainfall. This would mean an enormous advantage to the Dominion of Canada.

So there could not be any loss. I do not know of any losses in these so-called underprivileged countries through their irrigation projects. They have suffered no loss through those projects. The laws of water flowing on land are the natural laws, as natural as man and wife. They are as natural as life itself. One might say they are as natural as death or as birth, or as anything else in this world. The two have to go together.

I do not want to be a member from Saskatchewan if we do not develop that which is right on our doorstep. The water is there. Every year it flows out of Saskatchewan. It is of very little use when it arrives back in Hudson bay, or in the ocean. Nature has to absorb it again in clouds, bring it back to earth and spread it over the land—and no one has been able to explain how this is done. But it is done through the design of God who has ordained that there shall be millions, billions, trillions of tons of water spread over the country so that things may grow, and so that people may earn their livelihood through their labours.

Had this irrigation dam been built, what happened in the thirties would have been prevented. Prices were low, and all the rest of it, but there is no substitute for production. One cannot receive a price for anything unless he produces it. So the first essential is to produce. And one acre of irrigated land, we are told, will sustain 20 acres of dry land and make it possible for those other 20 acres to produce.

So let us consider what half a million acres of irrigated land will do in sustaining the economy of western Canada throughout dry years. It will eliminate resettlement in those years. We know that 5,574 persons had to be moved out of southwestern Saskatchewan, to be resettled elsewhere, on account of the drought. It seems to be money lost to have to resettle people when they can be sustained in their own environment and have an opportunity of making their own living. Trainloads of food were brought into western Canada, even from as far away as Quebec. The need for much of that could be eliminated.

I would suggest that one-half of the people of Saskatchewan were on relief in 1937. It was not an economic situation as much as a lack of production. There were no gardens; there was no wheat; there was no grain; there was no livestock. Nothing can exist without water, and we wish to eliminate that lack in the future. I do not think it is beyond the capacity of a young and growing country like Canada to make it possible for a portion of the population of this country to continue to contribute to the welfare of all our people. It has been proven by organizations such as P.F.R.A. that this irrigation development is possible. There may be persons who doubt that because of what has happened in the past in regard to power developments, as to whether coal or water may be the most economical method of developing power in the future, but that is part and parcel of the development of all our country. Wherever you find water, people and the necessary ingredients to develop industry there you will find it.

We in Saskatchewan have had a great lack of power. Water is the first essential. Give us the water and we shall have everything else. Therefore I would suggest to the federal government—

Mr. Nicholson: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Studer: —that we give all the support we possibly can to western Canada in the development, not of something that applies to us as individuals so that we as individuals may prosper, although it should be the object of all of us to prosper through what we contribute to the rest of the Dominion of Canada. We have no right to accept the benefits of what others produce unless we produce ourselves. We have no right to expect to enjoy happiness if we do not contribute to happiness. I think that from the short-term and long-term point of view we can contribute to the welfare of all the people of Canada by giving more consideration to what is involved in the building of the South Saskatchewan river dam than we have in the past.

Indirectly we have been contributing to the building of that dam. There is the development of oil in Saskatchewan. During the last seven years Alberta has obtained over $270 million from the development of oil. Through their natural resources they contribute to the building up of additional natural resources. Saskatchewan government officials and members have claimed that Saskatchewan has 40 per cent of the oil of western Canada. Well if that oil is a natural resource it may perhaps contribute to the building up of other natural resources, the building of the dam.

The Chairman: I hear some members saying "ten o'clock". Is it agreed that I rise, or is it agreed that we shall continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: Rise.

Mr. Studer: In conclusion I would say that everyone would benefit from the building of that dam.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps hon. members do not know, but the hon. member who has just taken his seat came all the way back from Saskatchewan to deliver this speech. He has been at home trying to get his seed in under very difficult circumstances, and he came back because he thought this question was going to be discussed. I suppose he is just as anxious to get back and finish his job as anyone. I wonder whether hon. members would allow him five minutes or ten minutes to finish up, as he wants to finish.

Mr. Fulton: Until a quarter past ten.

Mr. Studer: Mr. Chairman, I was luckily just at the end of what little contribution I am able to make. The minister was kind enough to mention that we came back from western Canada. There were several meetings that we had to attend in western Canada in the last week, including a meeting of the cattle growers of southwestern Saskatchewan, which was most interesting, and several other meetings. Incidentally, they were not political meetings. I have before me a list of political C.C.F. meetings that are being held in Saskatchewan during this week, but that does not enter into the picture.

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; it is ten minutes after ten. In view of the fact that we have had a very long day—

An hon. Member: You do not like it.

Mr. Nicholson: We asked the staff of the house to come back at seven o'clock, and without unanimous consent I do not think we should get involved in a political discussion at this time. I myself will be very glad to take part in the discussion when the estimates are called again. I think you might call it ten o'clock.

The Chairman: The hon. member is quite right. Unanimous consent is required to continue. I understood unanimous consent had been granted.

Mr. Nicholson: I understood that unanimous consent was that you rise and report progress.

The Chairman: The Minister of Agriculture rose to his feet and requested a few minutes more for the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I understood that unanimous consent had been given to him to continue for a few minutes.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member was given an opportunity to discuss water, but I think it was not understood that he would start in to tell of some of the political C.C.F. meetings that are being held in Saskatchewan at the present time. We are celebrating the tenth anniversary of the election of the C.C.F. government. I think we should not at this stage get started on that sort of discussion.

Mr. Studer: They are not celebrating that now.

The Chairman: Do I understand that the hon. member has unanimous consent to proceed?

Mr. Nicholson: No, not to make a political speech. We will give him a chance to finish his speech when we return to the minister's estimates later.

Mr. Studer: I am sure none of us would want to interfere with or enter into any political discussion at this time. I just thought that perhaps the Saskatchewan river dam was more important than the provincial constituency or the C.C.F. conventions in Saskatchewan at the moment. I should like to apologize for referring to that. I do not wish to detain hon. members. I was going to talk a little about what could be saved by the federal government in connection with what has been expended in Saskatchewan, but I think that is something that we can give consideration to under less strenuous conditions than have existed during the past week. Hon. members have been sitting long hours, and I shall refrain from continuing my remarks at the present time.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall start with veterans affairs. I have some reason to hope that the first item will be carried without further debate, or very little in any event, and that perhaps we can complete the items by one o'clock. Whenever we complete them we shall go on with health and welfare. In any event, we shall go on with health and welfare at 2.30, to be followed by fisheries, legislation, post office, citizenship and immigration. On Monday we shall take the amendments to the Judges Act; then national defence and defence production.

Mr. Fulton: I was beginning to be afraid the house might close before we got to the minister's estimates.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to delay the discussion on this but is it not likely that we would finish the Department of Agriculture more quickly if we proceeded with it tomorrow morning rather than to have some delay before calling the department again?

Mr. Harris: I doubt it very much, Mr. Speaker. There have been a considerable number of expedients adopted over the past few days to arrange the business for today, tomorrow and Monday, and the best solution seems to be the one I have indicated. I would be happy if agriculture could be disposed of in one hour in the morning but I really do not believe that.

It being twelve minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, June 19, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—LOANS IN REGINA, ETC.

Mr. Ellis:

1. How many loans have been approved by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Regina, under the new National Housing Act as of June 1, 1954?

2. How is the lending value on a house established (a) when the house is built for speculative sale to the general public; (b) when the house is built as a result of a contract entered into by the home purchaser and contractor?

3. Does Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation exercise any control over prices charged by builders for homes financed under the National Housing Act?

4. Are chartered banks permitted to require a deposit of from $300 to $400 over and above the down payment before approving loans for home construction under the National Housing Act?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have given undertakings to insure 24 loans.

2. (a) The lending value on a house including land is established by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation after appraisal of the applicant's plan, specifications and the location of the proposed structure. The rates used in the appraisal are computed for each branch office and are based on a fair cost for the area.

(b) Same as for (a).

3. The maximum selling price for houses built by builders for sale and financed under the National Housing Act is determined by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and is generally in the same amount as the lending value. The amount of the loan is conditional upon the sale of the house to a home purchaser at a price not in excess of the maximum selling price so determined. If the house is sold by the builder at a price exceeding the determined selling price, the amount of the loan is reduced to not more than 90 per cent of the approved loan.

4. Under the National Housing Act an approved lender is not restricted from taking additional security. Where the applicant is building his own house, by contract or otherwise, it is the policy of most approved lenders to require that the applicants have cash or its equivalent available in excess of the difference between the estimated cost and the mortgage loan, to meet the contingency that most houses cost more than home owners expect. The amounts of this requirement vary and are determined between the borrower and the approved lender.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

MANUFACTURING, INVESTMENT, PRODUCTION, ETC.

Mr. Dinsdale:

For the period 1947 to the end of 1953:

1. What is the dollar value of total new investment in manufacturing in Canada, and what percentage of this in each of the provinces?

2. How many new manufacturing plants have been established, and what percentage of these was established in each of the provinces?

3. How many new jobs have been created in manufacturing in Canada and what percentage of these jobs have been created in each of the provinces?

4. What is the total dollar value of production from Canadian manufacturing industries, and what is the percentage of this production figure in each of the provinces?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Return tabled.

NATURAL GAS

DECISION OF FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION AGAINST EXPORT TO NORTHWESTERN STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Could the Minister of Trade and Commerce give the house any information concerning the decision of the United States federal power commission announced yesterday which appears to make it impossible for Canada to export natural gas to the northwestern states? I have in mind particularly whether the government has given consideration to making any protest to the United States government in view of the fact that the decision seems to be based in part at least on broad government policy, and also whether this need necessarily prevent Peace river gas being supplied to British Columbia?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The ruling of the federal power commission has been brought down denying the application of Westcoast Transmission Company Limited to supply gas to the Pacific coast states. I suppose the finding of the commission is comparable to a finding of the board of transport commissioners in Canada, namely, it represents a judicial decision. I hardly think a protest by this government would be effective. I have not seen the judgment but I am told that the chairman of the commission made a report in which he dissented in part from the finding and suggested that Canada apply for permission to export gas to the inland empire, that is the area around Spokane. I have not read the report, but I was informed of that fact by one of my officials.

The government of Canada did everything possible to facilitate the application. Any suggestion from the company that government action would help was followed by action on the part of the government. I myself called on the federal power commission in the hope that I could resolve any doubts they may have had about the Canadian position. I had a very satisfactory interview with the full commission.

Answering the second part of the question, there is nothing to prevent gas being transmitted to Trail and Vancouver except the question whether the volume of gas will be sufficient to allow the gas to be delivered at a price that will be interesting to the purchasers.

Mr. Herridge: I was very interested in the minister's explanation. In view of the great need for co-operation between Canada and the United States in the development of the resources of northwestern America, particularly the resources of the Columbia river, can the minister say whether the federal power commission gave any consideration to the necessity for this very close co-operation between the two countries when dealing with this application?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I suppose the doubt expressed by the federal power commission about the wisdom of having a source of supply outside their own country is similar to doubts I have heard expressed in the House of Commons about the wisdom of bringing gas to Toronto from Buffalo. Such doubts are somewhat natural. I was hoping that the geographical and other facts of the situation would overcome that natural feeling. Apparently they did not. However, the matter will be explored and if there is anything the government can do to improve the situation I can assure you that it will be done.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister if he would feel himself in a position to comment on the likelihood or possibility of some tie-up being made of the Pacific Northwest Company's pipe line with Westcoast Transmission so that even though the pipe line in the Pacific northwestern states was that of the Pacific Northwest Company, Westcoast's line might bring gas down from the Peace river through British Columbia to supplement it in the feeding of that market, which would of course have tremendous advantage for us in the interior of British Columbia?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That would seem to me to be a possibility, but it is a matter for private negotiations. As I read the newspaper statement, the decision is based on the fact that the federal power commission did not like to make a foreign source of supply the sole source of gas for the area. Possibly, if the area has a domestic supply, that can be supplemented later by a supply from Canada. Obviously, that is a matter for private negotiations.

Mr. Fulton: But there is no difficulty in the way from this end?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

[Later:]

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? I was puzzled by what he said about the decision being a judicial one. Would he add a word of explanation to that? It would seem to me as if, in effect, although superficially it is different, it is a matter of trade policy. Does the minister not agree with that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The federal power commission is a court, having the jurisdiction of a court, just as the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada is a court, having the powers of a court. I understand that the findings of the federal power commission represent a judicial decision just as the findings of the board of transport commissioners do. I believe the two are on exactly the same footing.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would it not be necessary, going behind that, for the federal power commission to be reaching a conclusion on instructions received from the government as a matter of policy?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I cannot say as to that; that is a matter within the United States. Certainly I think that we in Canada could not influence the situation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GUATEMALA—INQUIRY AS TO SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs any comments to make on the situation in Guatemala? Has the government been able to ascertain whether it is a civil war or invasion? Has the government any information as to the source of the arms being used by the so-called invaders?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to ask a question supplementary to the one asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Has the government made any inquiries with regard to the situation in Guatemala?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are trying to find out what is happening.

[Later:]

GENEVA CONFERENCE—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, supplementary to a question and answer of yesterday. Is Mr. Ronning still at Geneva, and if not have we a Canadian delegation there? If so, who is heading it now?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On the termination of the Korean talks at Geneva, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ronning, who was the acting head of the delegation, returned to his post as Canadian minister to Norway. We have a delegation remaining in Geneva to follow the Indo-China talks, and that is headed by Mr. John Holmes, assistant under-secretary of state for external affairs.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

POSTMASTER, YORK, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Haldimand): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General? On May 19 a motion for papers standing in my name was passed, and I wonder when I could get a return of those papers?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I shall be glad to investigate the matter and produce the report as soon as possible.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of press reports from the 47-nation conference now taking place in London in relation to the international wheat agreement that representatives of the importing countries are seeking a new agreement and that Canadian representatives are understood to express approval of the proposal, can the minister inform the house about the present status of those negotiations?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The meeting of the international wheat agreement countries, Mr. Speaker, is purely a routine meeting. I understand, though I have not been officially advised, that at the meeting a proposal was made that discussions take place in the near future about a further agreement; that is an agreement to succeed the present agreement when it expires within two years. The thought has been expressed that the new agreement might replace the last year of the present agreement. I have no official information on the subject. Canada has not given its delegate instructions on the point, and he has not asked for instructions, from which I take it that the proposal is only in the discussion stage at the moment.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that we have had so much discussion concerning wheat marketing, and that there have been some indications of discussions relating to a change in the agreement prior to the ordinary termination and a possible relationship of that to price, could the Minister of Trade and Commerce take this as notice of a question to see if information could be obtained through ordinary government channels so that the house could be informed on Monday regarding such information as may be available?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I assume that by Monday we will have information from our delegate. If it is information that bears on the price of wheat or the duration of the agreement, I shall be glad to make a statement.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): May I ask a supplementary question? In view of the small percentage of the agreed imports by importing countries having been taken up, and as this vitally affects Canadian exports, is the minister considering going to London to take part in the discussions before the meeting adjourns?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think it should be made clear that, unless wheat is put at the floor price specified in the agreement, there is no obligation on the member countries to take their full allotment. I have tried to make that clear on a number of occasions. The choice we have today is whether or not we will offer wheat at the floor in order that countries will be required to take up their allotment. My feeling is definitely against doing so, but until we do offer wheat at the minimum there is no obligation on those countries to take any more wheat than they desire to take for their own reasons. The fact of the matter is that every country within the wheat agreement had a good crop last year and the requirements for wheat from outside sources are down.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NESBITT—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF HON. MEMBER FOR WELLINGTON SOUTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture, or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. In view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking) as reported at page 6255 of Hansard for June 18, 1954, would the minister care to make a statement as to whether or not the hon. member for Wellington South has certain patronage arrangements in my riding?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): There is no politics whatever in the Department of Agriculture.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Treatment services—

512. Hospital construction, improvements, new equipment and acquisition of land, $5,300,000.

Mr. Harkness: This item is for hospital construction, so I should like to say a word about the situation in Calgary in connection with the Colonel Belcher hospital, a veterans affairs hospital. This hospital is in process of being considerably enlarged, so that it will take in more than a full block. There is a piece of property, the Hull estate right next to it, that has just been put on the market. I would ask the minister if he would consider whether the Department of Veterans Affairs would buy this property to make a park outside as a place where patients in the veterans hospital could go, and where they might take their wheelchairs, or such other means as they have for getting around. There is a park right across from the veterans hospital, but it requires crossing a heavy traffic artery. There is a subway just below leading into the centre of the city, and the traffic there is extremely heavy.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

As a result the veterans from the hospital do not use Central park in Calgary to any extent, because they find it impractical to use it.

The other piece of property to which I am referring is in the other direction and would be right next to the hospital. I should think it would be a most desirable move if the department would secure that piece of property so that it could be used as a park by the veterans in the hospital, and also would be available for future building purposes if required.

Mr. Lapointe: I thank the hon. member for advising me of that situation and I shall be pleased to have the officials of the department look into the matter.

Mr. Jones: Has the minister considered building a hospital in Saskatchewan for the mentally disabled. I understand there are about 400 of them, and that Saskatchewan is the only province that does not have suitable mental care provided by the D.V.A. I understand the situation in that province, so far as the mentally disabled are concerned, is somewhat pathetic, as they are scattered all over the province, and not in any separate institutions. In view of the fact that every other province has such care I suggest the mentally defective in Saskatchewan should be treated in the same way.

Mr. Lapointe: I am afraid the information the hon. member has concerning institutions for mental patients is not quite accurate. Actually we have two psychiatric institutions, one at Ste. Anne de Bellevue in Montreal and the other at Westminster hospital, in London. Some of the other large hospitals have psychiatric wards, but the only mental institutions are the two I have mentioned. However, in the other provinces, we have arrangements with the provincial authorities whereby they make available to the Department of Veterans Affairs facilities in their mental institutions, at the charge which is current in the province for such institutions.

Mr. Jones: In asking my question I have before me a letter from the Saskatchewan hospitals branch of the Canadian Legion at North Battleford in which it is claimed that in all other provinces, to the best of their knowledge, there are at least parts of hospitals—indeed if not whole institutions—set aside for this purpose. They make reference to the Shaughnessy hospital in British Columbia, the Colonel Belcher hospital in Alberta, the Deer Lodge in Manitoba, the Sunnybrook in Ontario, as well as the Westminster in that province. Then they also refer to the hospital at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec. They claim that Saskatchewan alone has no hospital of this kind.

Mr. Lapointe: I am afraid that in this instance the branch of the Legion is wrong.

Mr. Michener: Would the minister give information as to the number of beds occupied in hospitals, on an average.

Mr. Lapointe: We have Camp Hill hospital at Halifax with an operating capacity of 550 beds, of which at the present time 416 are occupied. There is Lancaster hospital in Lancaster, a municipality which has just been recently organized near Saint John. In that hospital there is a capacity of 400 beds of which 362 are occupied at the present time. There is Ste. Foy hospital in Quebec city. This is a new hospital opened only a few weeks ago. It has a bed capacity of 275, of which 132 are now occupied.

Then, in Montreal, there is Queen Mary veterans hospital with a bed capacity of 700 beds of which 489 are occupied. There is also the hospital at Ste. Anne de Bellevue with a bed capacity of 1,135 of which 1,094 are occupied. There is the hospital at St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, which is, in fact, a hospital treating tuberculosis. It is being handed over this summer to the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the patients at St. Hyacinthe will be cared for at Ste. Anne de Bellevue; so that the bed capacity at Ste. Anne de Bellevue will be slightly increased. The hospital at St. Hyacinthe had a capacity of 200.

Then, in Ottawa, we have the Rideau health and occupational centre with a capacity of 150 beds, of which 117 are occupied. At Toronto there is Sunnybrook hospital with a bed capacity of 1,650 of which 1,235 are occupied. There is also the Red Chevron at Toronto with a bed capacity of 165, with 139 occupied. In London, Ontario, there is the Westminster hospital with a capacity of 1,522 of which 1,237 are occupied.

In Winnipeg we have Deer Lodge hospital with a bed capacity of 850 of which 627 are occupied. In Regina there is the veterans home with a bed capacity of 62, and 63 occupied. Just where that one bed comes in, I cannot say; it must be in the hall.

Mr. Harkness: Out in the corridor.

Mr. Lapointe: There is the veterans hospital at Saskatoon with a bed capacity of 125 with an occupancy of 118. At Calgary there is the Colonel Belcher hospital with a bed capacity of 425 of which 338 are occupied. At Edmonton there is the veterans home with a capacity of 70 and 72 occupied. So that here, again, there must be two out in the hallways.

At Vancouver there is the Shaughnessy hospital with a bed capacity of 1,100 of which 906 are occupied. There is the veterans hospital at Victoria with a capacity of 300 with 247 occupied. There is the George Derby health and occupational centre at Burnaby, British Columbia, with a capacity of 215 beds, of which 169 are occupied.

Then I must explain that in addition to these institutions we have what we call contract hospitals. For instance, here in Ottawa, we have the veterans pavilion at the Civic hospital, where we enter into a contract with that particular civil hospital for the treatment of veterans. We have a similar arrangement at Regina, Edmonton, Newfoundland and Charlottetown.

The total bed capacity in departmental institutions and contract hospitals, if I may use that term, shows an operating capacity of 9,974 with an occupancy at the present time of 7,935, or an average of about 80 per cent.

Mr. Gillis: Is there any intention on the part of the department to establish a nurses' residence at Camp Hill hospital in Halifax? I do not want to go into the details of the thing, but the nurse who has to room out and take a couple of meals in hospital, for which she is charged, I understand, and lose the time that she has to put in to get out, to get through the traffic and to get back to work, is working under a handicap. I am of the opinion that there is a sufficient number of nurses there to have proper residences provided for them and better arrangements with regard to meals, and so on.

Mr. Lapointe: No such plans have been made up to the present time. As a matter of fact, I am informed that the majority of nurses do not want to reside in the hospital, but prefer to live outside. However, I shall be glad to look into the situation, and certainly we have no intention of creating any hardship for the personnel of our hospitals.

Mr. Gillis: I would be glad if the minister would do that, because the system is antiquated; it is out of date.

Mr. Harkness: I have a matter that I should like to bring to the minister's attention under this item. I refer to the provision of a veterans pavilion at the Lethbridge hospital. I believe the Lethbridge branch of the Legion and some other branches of the Legion in southern Alberta, as well as other bodies, have made representations to the minister in regard to the desirability of providing a veterans pavilion at the Lethbridge hospital which would serve a good many of the people in the far southern part of Alberta. At the present time they all have to go up to the Colonel Belcher, where they are separated a long distance from their families and so on. The population of that part of Alberta of course, owing to the irrigation schemes which have gone in there, has been increasing rapidly and they believe they have a sufficient number of veterans to justify the provision of a veterans pavilion at the Lethbridge hospital. Can the minister tell us—he was going to consider this—what has been the result of the investigation, if any, into the matter?

Mr. Lapointe: Some time ago representations were made to the effect that a veterans pavilion should be set up at the Lethbridge hospital. I think those are the representations to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Lapointe: At that time we did make a thorough investigation. The result of that investigation was that the patient load in such a veterans pavilion would not be sufficient to warrant the expense of setting up one. My hon. friend says that circumstances may have changed because of various developments, and I shall be very glad to look into the question again, to find out the best way of giving the best treatment to the veterans of that region. The department certainly will look into this matter very seriously.

Mr. Michener: I have another question along the line of the last. Do the accounting practices of the department leave the minister in a position to estimate the cost of maintenance per bed? Has that cost been compared with the corresponding cost in the public civilian hospitals as a method of testing the departmental costs?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, there is a thorough system of cost accounting with respect to our hospital operations, and the daily rate per person is calculated for each institution. The comparison of such costs is made with civilian institutions; but, of course, in our accounting we take into consideration certain services which are not usually considered in the cost accounting of civilian institutions, because they charge their patients for such items as laboratory tests, X-rays and medical services. Under our system we include all these items in the daily rate for each patient in a hospital.

Mr. Michener: Can the minister give us the average cost per patient per day say over the last year?

Mr. Lapointe: The daily rate broken down for 1953 was $12.55 per patient. To give a basis of comparison with civilian institutions, I might add that the rate in general hospitals in Ontario, where we do have patients receiving treatment under contracts with these hospitals is $13.31 per patient day, exclusive of the cost of medical services.

Mr. Michener: Does that figure of $12.55 include medical services?

Mr. Lapointe: It does.

Mr. Noseworthy: In the figures that the minister gave us a while ago, it was indicated that there are somewhere around 2,000 unoccupied beds in military hospitals across Canada. Has any consideration been given to the possibility of making some of those unoccupied beds available to the civilian population? In Toronto, for instance, there is a desperate shortage of civilian beds. There are thousands of civilian patients on waiting lists to get into hospital. These military hospitals are maintained at the public expense. Why should there be several hundred unoccupied beds in Sunnybrook hospital, while thousands of civilian patients in Toronto are seeking hospital accommodation. Sunnybrook hospital has, I suppose, some of the best equipment, and probably the best staff in Canada, for certain types of rehabilitation work. I do not know whether that is used to the fullest extent, but it would seem to me that it should be possible to make some arrangements with municipalities whereby people who want hospital accommodation should be able to get it when hospital accommodation is being unused a few blocks away.

Mr. Lapointe: That matter has been looked into very thoroughly. At the beginning I should say that it is not considered that a hospital should at all times be a hundred per cent occupied. There has to be some flexibility. I gave the figure for the occupancy as at the end of April this spring. Our peak load is in the winter, and possibly the figures for January would have shown a higher rate of occupancy. On the other hand, July and August will show less.

The matter of making use of any spare facilities in the hospitals, as I said, was studied very thoroughly. It was made the subject of a thorough investigation by officers of my department and of other departments. The possibility of making some of that accommodation available is rather remote. It must be understood that these hospitals, modern as they are, with the best personnel and equipment, still cannot handle certain patients. For example, they have not the facilities to look after children and certain other types of patients.

Mr. Noseworthy: They have plenty of beds.

Mr. Lapointe: It would be very difficult, for example, to take care of women patients in these hospitals.

Mr. Noseworthy: They might admit other male patients.

Mr. Lapointe: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to continue. I will try to make my case clear and if he is not satisfied he can speak when I have completed my remarks. We have found it rather difficult to operate under the Department of Veterans Affairs such hospitals where the bulk of the patients would be veterans and where others would be civilians, so that we have evolved another scheme. I am glad the hon. member has mentioned this question because it will enable me to make a short statement in regard to some changes in the terms of our treatment regulations, to ensure that full use of the beds in our hospitals is made. We have come to the conclusion that we should amend the terms of the regulations so that veterans who wish to make use of the hospitals for treatment for non-pensionable disabilities can do so more easily than they can now. At the present time a veteran, if his income is below a certain ceiling, can obtain full treatment in the veterans hospitals free of charge. If his income is above that ceiling he is charged the daily rate which I mentioned a few moments ago in answer to a question by an hon. member. The department has for some time been studying a change in the regulations regarding assistance to veterans in the low income group for treatment of non-pensionable disability in our departmental hospitals. For some time it has been suggested that it would be desirable to get away from the principle of a fixed income ceiling and instead introduce the principle of a sliding scale so that while the lowest income group would pay nothing for treatment, those with a higher income would pay part of the cost of their treatment. The amount they would pay would be related to their income on a sliding scale.

The problem of working out such regulations was difficult but we eventually arrived at a definite plan which has been embodied in order in council P.C. 1954-849 which amends the terms of the present regulations.

Briefly the plan is that a single veteran whose income is less than $800, and a married veteran whose income is less than $1,200, will pay nothing for treatment. If their income is higher than that they will pay the cost of their treatment on a percentage basis up to one per cent of their income for each $100 income in excess of the amounts just stated. I might add that in computing income, allowance is made for dependent children and for wages lost owing to illness during the time of hospitalization and convalescence. As an example of how this new plan works, if a married veteran with two children, earning $50 a week, had a severe illness and was hospitalized for two months, with a further one month convalescence, he would have to pay no more for his treatment in the hospital than $45. If he had to pay current expenses in a civil hospital, such an illness might very well leave him with a bill for $600 or more, apart from his own doctor's fees and extras.

It is expected that in many cases the veterans will be able to pay these charges for their treatment under this plan from prepaid health and hospital insurance.

Naturally, I cannot possibly explain all the details of this scheme without speaking at considerable length. I would say, however, that it is the intention to give adequate publicity to the new plan so that veterans who might benefit from it will be aware of their eligibility.

The department is confident that it will be possible to give treatment at a reduced cost proportionate to the veteran's ability to pay, and I might mention that many of the veterans who need this assistance were formerly ineligible under the previous regulations. We expect that with the implementation of these new regulations we will fill the empty beds which we may have in our hospitals at the present time.

Mr. Green: Would it be possible for the minister to put a copy of that order in council on Hansard? I think it would be very helpful if it appeared as part of the discussion.

Mr. Lapointe: I am very sorry, but I have not a copy of that order in council here at the present time. I will be very glad to make it available to hon. members through the facilities of the department.

Mr. Green: I understand it applies only in the case of a pensioner. Or does it apply to any veteran?

Mr. Lapointe: It applies to any veteran who has served in a theatre of war or who is in receipt of a pension.

Mr. Green: How would that apply in British Columbia where a provincial hospital insurance scheme covers all hospital costs?

Mr. Lapointe: That is being looked into at the present time but I am afraid I am not yet in a position to answer.

Mr. Bell: Could the minister tell us whether, if the army, for example, found it necessary to use one of these military hospitals on a large scale, there would be an accounting between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Veterans Affairs for the use of these beds. I know that at Camp Gagetown they have had to use the Lancaster hospital at Lancaster. In this connection I am wondering if the cost per day would be comparable to the cost just mentioned in the case of the non-pensionable veterans. In other words, what is the comparison between the rates army men would have to pay and the amount paid by civilians going into these military hospitals?

Mr. Lapointe: The arrangement in existence between the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of National Defence is that our institutions are used as base hospitals for the armed services for members of the armed services who need hospitalization. They are sent to our institutions and the Department of National Defence is charged the daily rate of $12.55. The same service is given to the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister has indicated that the department has not found it feasible to have civilians and veterans together in the same hospital. Under what conditions can a veteran secure admission to one of the department's hospitals? In other words, can an individual get in regardless of having a disability pension, and does disability status secure admission?

Mr. Lapointe: I gather my hon. friend wishes to know who is admissible to veterans hospitals. First, every pensioner is entitled to hospitalization in a veterans' hospital for treatment of his pensionable disability. Every indigent veteran with meritorious service, service overseas, is admitted free into our hospitals. Every recipient of war veterans allowances is entitled to free treatment and hospitalization in our institutions. Finally, any veteran may, by paying the daily rate of $12.55, be hospitalized in our institutions for any condition whatsoever. Of course, as I mentioned before, if he goes in for a condition for which he is pensioned, he does not pay.

This is where the new regulation which I have just mentioned comes into play. Until now, those veterans who were indigent or who were in the very low-income bracket could get free hospitalization if their income was $1,200 or less. If they were over that ceiling they had to pay the full daily rate of $12.55. Under the new regulation establishing a sliding scale, it will make it possible to give treatment at a very low rate to a group of veterans who formerly would have been barred.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have one more question. Why should veterans who are not admissible to these hospitals without paying the full daily rate of $12.55 have to go to public wards of civilian institutions and be supported by the local municipalities? Why should they not be taken care of in military hospitals even though they can pay the $12.55 a day?

Mr. Lapointe: In the same way, why not? Does my hon. friend mean to tell me that from the mere fact that someone at one time has served in the armed services of this country, the Department of Veterans Affairs should be responsible for his hospitalization for the rest of his life, for any condition whatsoever not related to his service? That would be the result of what my hon. friend is now suggesting. To start with, I am afraid we would not have the facilities to be able to deal with all those veterans, and in the second place, I am afraid we would be entering a field which is definitely not that of the federal government or of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Noseworthy: I would still think it is much more the responsibility of the federal government to look after these veterans who have given service in any war than it is the responsibility of the municipality.

Mr. Lapointe: It is the responsibility of the Department of Veterans Affairs to look after the treatment and hospitalization of every veteran who has served and who has suffered injury or wound through his service. That responsibility is being well discharged. But, as I said, the fact of having served at one time in the armed services of Canada does not make the Department of Veterans Affairs responsible, for instance, for hospitalizing someone who is run over by a street car on Sparks street after having attended the sittings of this house.

Mr. Ferguson: I agree with the minister's statement, and I speak as a veteran. I do not see why the taxpayers should subsidize a healthy veteran simply because he has had the honour to fight and to defend his country, but I also say that veterans who have suffered owing to service should be looked after 100 per cent on all occasions. But I cannot stand for the veteran who is a loafer and a bum being looked after by the Department of Veterans Affairs. He has no more rights than has any other citizen. It was a privilege to fight for your country, and there is no charity coming to that gentleman to whom I have referred simply because he was a veteran. He had a great honour accorded to him, and he does not deserve any more consideration than does any other citizen. He should not get charity from the Department of Veterans Affairs. What we should be doing here is demanding that the veterans who deserve treatment, through incapacity owing to service, receive 100 per cent treatment at all times. However, a loafer who served in the army should not be entitled to anything.

Mr. Blair: May I suggest to the minister that these regulations be posted in Legion halls and some places where veterans can get to know what they are. I have had inquiries coming to me all the time. The general public think that any veteran is eligible. If that matter were better known to the public, I think it would relieve a great deal of the trouble. As far as veterans in hospitals are concerned, there is only one point. A veteran who is not disabled and is not eligible for free treatment may enter a veterans hospital. I should like this matter to be explained to the veteran. It is amazing the number of inquiries I have had. Another matter came up as to the number of beds. It is probable that you have spare beds. I forget what the percentage is. A hospital is normally considered to be full even if there are vacant beds. In civilian life, a hospital is considered to be full, I think, when about 80 per cent of the beds are occupied. I think it is normally considered to be full at that time.

Mr. Lapointe: I certainly will be pleased to take the means to publicize these new regulations. I should explain to my hon. friend that the order in council was passed less than two weeks ago and this is the first occasion I have had to make it public. I have already discussed the matter with various organizations, including the Legion, and they will help in making this public to all veterans.

Mr. Blair: There are just the two points. The general public think that any veteran should go into a veterans hospital and get treatment, and the veteran does not understand that he can get treatment at a hospital even whether the question of means comes into the matter or not, or whether he can pay for it or whether he cannot. There is this misunderstanding, and a clarification of the whole situation by an announcement from the minister would help a great deal in clearing up this misunderstanding throughout the country.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: The hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the minister—

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is not the hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. Gillis: He is following up his previous question.

Mr. Noseworthy: Following up my previous question, may I ask if the minister will give us again the figures as to beds available and beds occupied in Sunnybrook hospital. I did not write them down.

An hon. Member: The figures will be in Hansard.

Mr. Lapointe: Operating capacity, 1,650; number of beds occupied, 1,235.

Mr. Noseworthy: My point is that in the Toronto area there is a desperate shortage of hospital beds. I am sure that in the Toronto area there are veterans who, if they knew they could get into Sunnybrook and receive treatment, even at the price they have to pay in the civilian hospitals, or I think the rate is a little bit cheaper, would be there instead of in civilian hospitals. They just do not know that they have that privilege. Our civilian hospitals are obliged to take veterans in while many civilians in the area are unable to secure beds. It has just been suggested that if the information the minister gave to the committee this morning were made generally known throughout the country, it would help to relieve the situation to some extent.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I will endeavour to take the means of making all veterans familiar with these regulations. I might point out, however, that at the present time in Sunnybrook there are 38 patients who are veterans and who are paying for their treatment.

Mr. Michener: As one who is interested in hospital operation, I am pleased to have the explanation of the cost system and to learn the basic rates that have been fixed. There are a number of other questions that occur to me on matters which I think would be of interest. However, I do not want to take the time to inquire about them. For example, the $12.55 per day rate is, I suppose, for ward accommodation; or is it for single room accommodation or is there one basic rate?

Mr. Lapointe: It is any accommodation. It is the rate for all accommodation. The hon. member has been in some of our hospitals and he knows that in some of them there are large wards and in others there are only small wards with no more than four beds. In the newer hospitals there are no large wards. There are usually rooms with four, two beds, or one. The rate is for accommodation anywhere.

Mr. Michener: If the minister has a statement giving a break-down of the elements of the rate of $12.55 would he put it on Hansard? It would be interesting to have it there and it would obviate any further questions.

Mr. Blair: Is it not true that the rate of $12.55 includes treatment? It pays everything, including all costs of treatment.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, it does. I am afraid I have not got a break-down here, but I could make it available easily to my hon. friend.

Mr. Michener: Perhaps I could have a copy of it at some time in the future.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: I think it is important that we have this point thoroughly understood. Does the rate of $12.55 per day cover ward costs, nursing service, X-rays, all the technical examinations that you undergo in a hospital? Is that all-inclusive? That is the rate today in the average hospital just for the ward space without any of the technical services. I think we had better be careful about this. We know that the subject of a national health program is to be discussed today, and it would be very interesting to have the figures for which the hon. member has just asked. It would be a great guide to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: Leave me out of this.

Mr. Knowles: He needs guidance.

Mr. Lapointe: This is the situation. The rate of $12.55 is the rate computed for every veteran who is receiving treatment in our hospitals at departmental expense. In the case of the veteran who goes into a hospital and pays, the rate is $11.55, and he has to pay his own doctor.

Mr. Gillis: He has to pay the doctor.

Mr. Lapointe: He has to pay the doctor himself. The rate of $11.55 covers all the services of the hospital, treatment, X-ray, laboratory, everything, but he has to pay his own doctor. In the case of the veteran who is being treated at departmental expense a dollar is added to the rate of $11.55 which covers the cost of medical care.

513. Prosthetic services—supply, manufacture and administration, $1,009,024.

Mr. Harkness: I notice that the department has a revenue of $380,000 from the manufacture of prosthetic appliances of various types. I am glad to see that there is some revenue, but my understanding is that prosthetic appliances are supplied to veterans free of charge. How does the revenue come into the picture? Are some of these appliances sold to concerns for general distribution throughout the country? Is that the source of revenue, or is it the case that veterans are to some extent not supplied with prosthetic appliances free of charge?

Mr. Lapointe: Prosthetic services are of course given to all veterans who are in need of these free of charge. We have a rather large factory in Toronto, and also factories in some other centres. We also do work on a cost basis for certain institutions and organizations, and we are paid for it.

Mr. Harkness: That is for civilians?

Mr. Lapointe: For some civilians. We do work for the Department of National Defence, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, as a matter of fact, all governments in Canada. We do work for the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian paraplegic association, the war amputations of Canada, various provincial workmen's compensation boards, the Red Cross Society of Saskatchewan, the British ministry of pensions and for other allied governments who may have patients living in this country.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister indicated that veterans going into our hospitals pay for their own doctors.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Noseworthy: Are veterans who go into veterans hospitals permitted to have the services of doctors of their own choice or must they take the hospital doctors?

Mr. Lapointe: They must use the doctors accredited to our hospitals.

514. Veterans bureau, $518,325.

Mr. Herridge: Some years ago, particularly after the conclusion of the second world war, there were complaints in various parts of my constituency about the time taken by the veterans advocate to prepare veterans cases. The reason was of course that visits to the interior were too infrequent. Only the larger centres were visited. The Legion branches in my constituency have asked me to express to the minister their great satisfaction with the way the service is working now. The visits are much more frequent. The veterans advocate visits many of the smaller places, and the Legion particularly appreciates the services of the men who have come into the district in the last two or three years and who, at considerable personal inconvenience, have visited veterans living in the backwoods, some miles along the trails, and that sort of thing. They appreciate very much the excellent service being given by the men responsible for it in the interior.

Mr. Gillis: At the meetings of the veterans affairs committee the Legion gave some six or seven examples of cases of delay. Many of these were veterans bureau cases, and having listened to the evidence and the representations made before the committee I wonder whether the bureau today is equipped to handle the large volume of work that has been given to it since the end of the second world war. When the veterans bureau was first set up it was set up to deal with the problems of world war I veterans and it was doing pretty well until the end of the second world war. The cases I listened to led me to believe that perhaps much of the reason for the delay goes back to the veterans bureau.

There are two factors involved in delay in bringing a pension case to completion. One of the main factors is the gathering of evidence and the second is the fact that it is medical evidence. A large number of disputed cases involving different diagnoses by different doctors create difficulty for anyone sitting on a board and for the pensions advocate. There is a lot of work involved in preparing such cases for presentation to the pension commission. I am going to take the district of Halifax. I should like the minister to tell us the number of pensions advocates in that office now and the number there in 1945. Would he also give the number of staff in that advocate's office in 1945, and the number there today? It is a branch of the administrative staff of veterans affairs to which little attention has been paid since 1945. I am just wondering whether it has been organized and given the necessary staff to handle the new problems arising out of world war II and the Korean conflict.

Mr. Lapointe: I am afraid I have not before me figures to give the details concerning a particular district, such as Halifax. I could give the over-all picture, but I cannot give it for the particular districts. In all, we have 32 pensions advocates throughout Canada. The complete staff working in the pensions advocates' district offices throughout Canada in 1952 was 150, and it is now 145. There has been very little change. We have never pressed them to try to reduce their staff. I am glad, however, the hon. member did mention, while bringing this matter to my attention, the difficulties which do exist in preparing some of these cases.

In some instances, the pensions advocates are working under difficult conditions. I know in my own district an advocate might have to prepare a case in the Gaspe peninsula. He has to get hold of the witnesses, and there may be some considerable delay because he will go down there and find the witnesses are working in the bush on the north shore. He has to find the right moment of the year to go down there to try to gather that evidence, and then when he is ready to put his case before the board he finds that his witnesses are gone again. We are endeavouring, however, to find a formula which will expedite these cases as much as possible.

Mr. Green: I notice there has been a reduction in the staff of the veterans bureau from 157 during the last fiscal to 144 during the present fiscal year. Why was that reduction made? The unfortunate fact, from the point of view of the veteran, is that he can only get a retroactive pension up to eighteen months where there has been administrative delay. It is for that reason there is great importance in getting this work in the bureau done as quickly as possible.

Mr. Lapointe: I am told that the actual reduction was only five people, because although the establishment was 157 it had not been filled. There were five individuals who retired and we were advised by the chief pensions advocate that it was not necessary to replace them at this time.

Mr. Green: Would the minister—

Mr. Lapointe: My hon. friend will realize that it is quite possible—I do not know who the five employees were—there might have been a clerk grade 1 in one district office who retired, and that would not necessarily mean a pensions advocate. I do not know.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to ask the minister whether or not a pensions advocate has to be a lawyer?

Mr. Lapointe: No, the pensions advocates are not necessarily lawyers. The act does not call for the pensions advocate to be a lawyer. Actually all of them except three are lawyers, and whenever a vacancy occurs now we do make it a requirement that the candidate should be a lawyer. Originally many of them were not, and I might say that some of the pensions advocates who have done the best work for the veterans before the pension commission were never members of the bar.

Mr. Gillis: I know that as a result of the desire of the department it has been pretty well mandatory that a lawyer occupy that office. It has to be someone who is capable of assessing evidence, anyway. The evidence a pensions advocate has to assemble is medical evidence, and there is no one who can dispute medical evidence or confirm medical evidence except a doctor. I am wondering whether the pensions advocate has at his disposal some doctor whom he can consult as to the value of the medical evidence he is preparing in a case that is going before the appeal board. In the final analysis, when these cases get into the hands of a pensions advocate for appeal, they are appealing to the last court. The advocate has to be very careful in preparing his evidence and making his case, because when he is finished the door is locked.

I will add this, that in most of the cases I have seen the pensions advocate has been accused of taking a long time in getting it ready. I did not consider that was a criticism. I considered that the time occupied in assessing the evidence, or in getting the evidence, was time well spent. For example, a doctor who may be a material witness for a pensioner in Nova Scotia or Quebec may now be practising in New York, and it is not easy to get the evidence. I have been wondering whether the pensions advocate has someone at his disposal in the area in which he is working whom he can consult as to the value of the medical evidence he is preparing for the appeal board.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the pensions advocates have at their disposal the professional advice of any member of our treatment services branch or any of our specialists.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask the minister whether the pensions advocate can consult with an eminent doctor who is not connected with the service in any way? Would the department pay the doctor's fee?

Mr. Lapointe: If it were necessary, and we did not have the professional people—which I would doubt very much—we might do so. It may be possible that in certain areas at one time we did not have the qualified professional people. We would authorize the pensions advocate to consult the proper person, but normally he would use the specialists which we have in our hospitals. Of course, if in gathering evidence on behalf of the veteran, the veteran tells him that at one time he was treated for a certain condition by a civilian doctor, undoubtedly the advocate would communicate with the doctor and discuss the case with him.

Mr. Ferguson: I know a particular case where a veteran had his ailment diagnosed as attributable to a certain injury he had received overseas. The man contended that his case had been wrongly diagnosed by the army medical officers. It took 20 years to prove that his contention was correct. It was only because I was able to consult a medical doctor in Toronto as a result of the evidence he had given me that they agreed finally with this man's contention, and the pension board did change the category of his pension. It was increased considerably.

But if one has to go back to the pensions advocate who has considered the first diagnosis, you get the same reply all the time. Yet there may be cases where outside doctors should be consulted. They might take a different viewpoint, and their judgment might be correct.

Even if it is necessary to obtain the services of outside doctors I am sure the people of Canada want to know whether the veteran's contention is the correct one, or whether he is in error. We should leave no stone unturned to obtain correct evidence and to have proper analyses, so that there may be proper diagnoses in cases of this kind. We know there have been cases where assistance from outsiders has been most beneficial.

Fortunately the doctor I consulted in this instance was willing to give his service free of charge. However, there may be cases where a veterans advocate should obtain corroborative evidence to support the contention of a veteran who is attempting to prove his case, and there should be no limitation on the services a veterans advocate could seek, on behalf of a veteran. And a proper fee should be paid for such service. I am positive no member of the medical profession in Canada knowingly would give bad advice, and that he would not support a veteran unless he was firmly convinced as to the correctness of the veteran's contention. If there is a policy whereby an advocate is limited to certain restricted medical evidence, then I think that is a bad policy.

Mr. Shaw: A minute ago the minister said that some of the best pensions advocates we have ever had were not lawyers. Then he proceeded promptly to assert that henceforth it will be required that when a vacancy is being filled a lawyer will be appointed to such position. I would like to know why, in the light of what he said earlier.

Mr. Lapointe: I believe I did not say "all" of the best ones, but rather that some of the best have not been lawyers. I am sure my hon. friend would agree that they would have been extremely superior had they also been lawyers.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was about to ask the same question that has been asked by the hon. member for Red Deer, because the minister's statement struck me as being illogical.

I must endorse what the minister has said about pensions advocates because, from the first world war right through to the present, some of the best pensions advocates we have had have not been members of the legal profession. I should like particularly to refer to the late David Markham, in British Columbia, who rendered such excellent service, and died on the job.

515. War veterans allowance board—administration, $145,860.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, we had one difficulty in Vancouver during the last Christmas season which I believe could be overcome if action were taken by the Department of Veterans Affairs. For many years veterans on war veterans allowance have been able to get work with the post office during the Christmas rush, and whatever they have received for such work has not been deducted from their allowances.

Last year orders seemed to have been given by the postmaster in Vancouver that no one over the age of 60 would be given work. I raised the matter on the floor of the house and the Minister of Labour indicated that he knew nothing about an order of that kind. I believe the Postmaster General said the same thing, or at least that he would have it investigated.

I am told that order stood all through the Christmas rush and that these men were not taken on. It seems to me that it is most unfair, because the rule does not apply across Canada. I see no reason why the postmaster at Vancouver should be allowed to make a ruling of that kind—if, in fact, he did so. The injury was done, and the result was that some of those veterans had a poor Christmas because they were deprived of work they had been getting for some years.

Would the Minister of Veterans Affairs take up this question with his colleague the Postmaster General to make certain that in the coming Christmas season these veterans will be permitted to get work they have been having for so many years. I think it is rough treatment to turn them down only because they have reached the age of 60 years. Of course that is the age at which most veterans qualify for war veterans allowance. Very few qualify under that age. This is an injustice that should be corrected.

Mr. Lapointe: I thank the hon. member for having drawn this situation to my attention. I certainly will make sure that the matter is discussed with my colleagues in other departments who might be concerned. As my hon. friend knows, it has always been the policy of the Department of Veterans Affairs to encourage temporary employment of older veterans, and we intend to continue that policy.

Mr. Green: I believe the action of the Post Office Department in this instance was directly in conflict with the policy of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Lapointe: That does happen in the best of governments.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, the other night when we were discussing the first item in the minister's estimates there was considerable debate on the subject of war veterans allowances. At the adjournment hour I rose to speak, with a desire to follow the general line of discussion. However, we rose at that time and reported progress. Since that time I was informed that the minister was anxious to have the first item passed, and I agreed to that procedure in the light of the fact that there were other items on which this matter could be discussed.

I believe that what I have to say can properly be said under item 515. The matters of war veterans allowances, and the disappointment experienced because the terms of reference, in the recent parliamentary committee, were not broadened to include a discussion of war veterans allowances were gone into at considerable length, and I do not think I need take very much time in covering the matter again, or even in amplifying what has been said already.

There is not much left to say on the subject. The hon. member for Acadia, who represented this group in the war veterans committee, discussed the subject fully the other day, and paid particular attention to the permissive income feature. The hon. member for New Westminster followed in the debate and placed on record some further suggestions. The hon. member for Fraser Valley, also from this group, spoke on the subject. I rise at this time to support those members who have spoken on the matter and their desire that the war veterans allowance should be increased. I recognize that this is a matter of government policy. The previous speakers have not criticized the administration in any respect. In fact, all speakers have had the very highest regard for the administration itself, both the minister, who has a grasp of the entire situation in his department, and the officials who are under him in that department.

We are dealing with this matter as government policy, and it is government policy that we wish to criticize. When the resolution to set up the committee was on the order paper some months ago, I understand, a delegation from the dominion command waited on the Prime Minister and some of his cabinet, and requested that the matter of war veterans allowance should be included in the terms of reference of that committee.

I understand the Prime Minister was very frank with the delegation from the Legion command, and that is commendable. There is no use beating about the bush. If government policy is as it is, those responsible for pronouncing that policy might just as well come out and say so. The Prime Minister is to be commended on not hedging on the matter. I believe he told the command that government policy was such that they would not make an increase in the allowance; that to include it in the terms of reference would mean that they were giving some little hope that it might be done, and to give such hope would be misleading. Therefore the answer was no. He could not be any more direct than that, he could not be clearer, and he could not be any more honest than that. That was the right thing for him to do as far as his attitude or comment was concerned; but we criticize the answer he gave because we believe it was the wrong one. He should have been willing to permit the terms of reference to be widened with a view to recommendations being made, and the government should have been prepared to meet those recommendations.

We all have a great regard for the veterans. We know that when the veterans were called to the colours, either by conscription or through voluntary enlistment, they did not begin to weigh the consequences of their post-war life, and what they would get out of it afterwards. I wonder whether one might draw on his imagination. If a young chap went into a recruiting office and said: "I would like to join the forces, but there are a couple of questions I should like to ask before signing my name on the dotted line. Should I join the forces and play my part in the protection and preservation of democracy, if I offer my life for my country, what can I expect my country to do for me when I return?" If that recruiting officer had been able to look into the future he would have had to answer something like this: "Well, I have it on the highest authority that we will not do much of anything for you until you are in desperate need, and then we shall give you a subsistence allowance; but even then it will have to be under the means test." The young chap might have said: "Since my people are able to take care of me, what then?" The answer would be: "Well, that is what they should do, and if they take care of you and give you anything, then I am afraid we shall have to take that off your allowance." The young man might then reply: "Suppose I come back safely and I die and leave a widow, what is going to happen to her?" The reply might be: "Well, the same thing would happen to her as would happen to you. If she is in need we will look after her, and if she is really in need we will see that she gets something, and of course that too will be under the means test." You can carry that illustration along as far as you like and then ask the question, would the young chap volunteer if he had been told the truth?

Mr. Ferguson: I hope so.

Mr. Hansell: I hope so, and I think he would, and I would not argue that case because I think anyone who wanted to volunteer had no thought of weighing the consequences of the post-war life. Nevertheless, when we look at it in that way the only conclusion we can come to is that any person who was called to the colours or enlisted, and went out and offered his life for his country, should be adequately cared for upon his return when the need arises.

On the basis of that we have a perfect right to say now that this matter of war veterans allowance should be continually studied. I know the minister will reply that they are continually studying the position of the war veterans in respect to allowances, but it should go further than that. The interest should be of such a character that a veterans committee of this house could sit down and discuss every possible veterans' problem and then come to the government with every possible recommendation. The government should weigh those recommendations and say: We will do all we can for those veterans. They should assume that that which is physically possible should be made financially possible.

I will not say anything else. I rose to support the previous speakers who have put on the record the desire of this group and others who have put on the record the desire of their various parties. Yesterday on the orders of the day the Prime Minister was asked if he would still consider the matter. He gave the answer as a definite no. Well, we can conclude that at this session nothing is to be done. Might I urge the government to take this matter under very serious advisement during the next few months, and at the commencement of the next session come down with a program of allowances that we shall indeed be proud of. Might I urge the government to do that? It would be one of the finest things that happened in this session if the minister could rise before the items are concluded and say: we expect to do something within the next session of parliament.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sure the minister will receive some satisfaction from the fact that there has not been any criticism of the administration of this important department of government. Most of the discussion has been about this controversial question which we are now discussing. Since coming back to parliament in 1953 I have had very few complaints from the various Legion branches in my constituency. Apparently there is quite a marked improvement over conditions of some years ago. I think that members in all sections of the house have made their remarks in the hope that the minister might have a larger share of the total national budget for his particular department.

During the early years of the war we had a visit from the then minister of finance in New Zealand, and I have never forgotten the policy of the New Zealand government as he outlined it to us then. He said they were going to do everything in their power to see that those who went to war would not be worse off than if they remained at home. Secondly, that no one who remained at home would be better off at the end of the war because he remained at home.

The present Minister of National Defence was a private member then, as I was, and I was interested to hear him speaking in Montreal shortly after he became Minister of National Defence and he pointed out that the goal of this government was exactly the policy outlined by Mr. Nash.

However, I do not feel that the government of Canada has dealt as generously with the Minister of Veterans Affairs as with his colleague the Minister of National Defence. I followed the minister very closely the other night, and he stated that the proposal made by the Legion would increase our liabilities by about $27 million which would be an increase of about 95 per cent. I think we must ask ourselves whether the Canadian economy will stand an additional burden of $27 million to discharge our responsibilities for war veterans allowances. I realize it is easy for members in opposition groups to recommend increased expenditure all along the line. But I think it should be stated that the Canadian Legion is a non-partisan organization and it is comprised of honest, stable citizens who do not recommend expenditures which are unreasonable.

I have in my hand a report of the Department of Defence Production for the year 1953 and I find that this department points out that up to the end of 1953 certificates had been issued covering some $665 million of capital investment in facilities for the production of both basic materials and defence supplies, and thereby allowing additional benefits by way of income tax write-offs amounting to $277 million. It adds that the Canadian government defence procurement expenditures during the year totalled $1,174 million, slightly up from the amount for the previous year.

Now, no hon. member of parliament has criticized this expenditure. But I think that if we are going to spend $2,000 million for defence purposes it must be agreed that Canada must discharge its responsibilties to the veterans of world wars I and II and the Korean war.

I found myself in a position where I was too young for the first war and too old for the second war, and so I think I can say that those of us who remained at home found ourselves in the most prosperous period in Canadian history. I believe at this stage that to increase compensation to veterans to the extent of $27 million is not going to place an unreasonable drain on the Canadian economy.

Following the line of the remarks made by the hon. member for Macleod, I think that our treatment of soldier settlers after the first world war is not a performance of which we can be especially proud. I remember a delegation coming to Ottawa during the war years trying to get legislation to relieve them of their farm indebtedness. These men stated they did not think they would be a good recruiting team to go across Canada to outline what their experience had been farming in Canada after they had "made the world safe for democracy". I remember one time I found myself in a veterans affairs office making representations on behalf of the widow of a very close friend of mine. This chap was the principal of a school and he enlisted and gave his life for his country while in the service of the air force in Egypt. At that time his widow found her income drastically reduced. She had a young son to support and she found it necessary to seek assistance to go to business college to supplement her income. The veterans affairs officer was very sympathetic and he told her that if she had lost her husband during the first war the pension would have been much less. I shall never forget her reply. She said: "If my husband had remained as principal of the school I would not now be in a position where my income was cut so drastically that I could not support the young lad and give him the kind of education he would have had if his father had remained at home". I do not think anyone would try to defend the position in which that widow found herself, because she is now very much worse off because her husband gave his life for his country.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the Minister of Veterans Affairs that he should not give up despite what the Prime Minister said yesterday. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked:

> In view of the unanimous and wholehearted wish of all private members of the house, will the government even yet reconsider the matter of introducing legislation at this session respecting the War Veterans Allowance Act?

The Prime Minister's very definite reply was "No". But the cabinet as a whole must take the responsibility for making a decision on this matter. I personally believe that, with our Canadian economy as it is, no hon. member can suggest that an additional $27 million per year would place a strain on us which would have disastrous effects. I hope the minister will carry out the undertaking he gave the other night to the following effect, as reported at page 6197 of Hansard:

> I can assure hon. members that the recommendations made by the veterans affairs committee to the effect that this matter should be considered with sympathy by the government will receive the attention of my colleagues and myself.

As there is not much sign of the house winding up in the very near future I hope that over the week end the minister will have an opportunity to discuss this matter with his colleagues and decide whether a larger share of the total national budget cannot be made available.

General Gruenther was here a week ago and I feel sure that if he had submitted that NATO required an additional $100 million a year the Canadian government would have given very serious consideration to finding that amount of money. I think that, in accordance with the request of the Canadian Legion and the suggestions made by the committee, this matter should receive the sympathetic consideration of the government.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I have been reading the statement made by the minister on the subject of war veterans allowance as reported in Hansard for Thursday. Unfortunately I was absent from the house over the past two days because of very important business in Manitoba and this is the first opportunity I have had—

An hon. Member: For whom did you vote?

Mr. Dinsdale: —of making a statement on this important subject. Looking at the minister's statement, I find there are many points which are helpful and enlightening regarding the question of war veterans allowance. My observation, however, is that it is unfortunate that such a statement was not made before the special committee which recently concluded its deliberations. Special committees are called together for the purpose of dealing with matters which are more or less contentious, and I do not think any hon. member will take exception to the statement that the subject of war veterans allowance is a rather contentious one at the present time. It is not possible to come to the close grips necessary in any discussion that arises out of the minister's statement to the committee of the whole on Thursday last. After my experience while sitting in the committee, I came away from the committee with a feeling of frustration with regard to this subject of war veterans allowance. Unfortunately the elucidation given by the minister has not dissipated that feeling because I feel certain that there is much more to be said on this subject that has received such great emphasis during the past three or four years by the veterans of this country and by those who are interested in veterans' welfare.

One point I should like to make particularly is the interpretation given by the minister with regard to the purpose served by the implementation of the war veterans allowance legislation back in the year 1930, I believe it was. In his statement, as reported at pages 6194 and 6195 of Hansard, he emphasized that it was legislation to provide for a premature old age pension at age 60; that is, it was considered that veterans, as the result of their war service, had aged prematurely by at least 10 years. Throughout the minister's statement he emphasized the continuing connection between war veterans allowance and the principle of old age payments.

It is true that he points out that the bounds of the war veterans allowance have enlarged considerably since the legislation was originally introduced, but in the argument supporting the government's present stand on the matter he comes back repeatedly to the comparison between war veterans allowance and old age pension legislation. It seems to me that in the application of the war veterans allowance legislation down through the years it has been expanded to include marginal disability cases as well as those who come under the terms of premature ageing. In many cases of disability that show up years after the veteran has been discharged and has returned to his civilian pursuits, it is almost impossible to rule whether the disability is the result of war service. This statement is particularly true in the case of functional or hysterical disorders. During the sitting of the committee I attempted to discuss this matter and I found that there was much hazy thinking on the matter of disabilities other than direct physical disabilities. Since the committee rose I have been checking the Pension Act, and I have discovered that section 32 of that act deals specifically with these problems in subsections 2, 3 and 4. Subsection 2 reads as follows:

(2) When in the opinion of a medical neurological expert an applicant for pension or a pensioner has a disability that is purely functional or hysterical no pension shall be paid, but such member of the forces shall immediately be referred to a neurological centre for treatment.

Then in subsection 3 the act goes on to enlarge further on the point. Subsection 3 reads as follows:

(3) In cases in which the functional or hysterical disability disappears as the result of treatment the commission may, in its discretion, award a gratuity in final payment not exceeding five hundred dollars but no pension shall be paid.

Then subsection 4 reads as follows:

(4) When as the result of treatment the functional or hysterical disability has not disappeared a pension shall be awarded in accordance with the extent of the disability, if the applicant or pensioner has not unreasonably refused to accept or continue treatment.

In some of the cases which have become eligible for war veterans allowance and with which I have come in contact, I would come to the conclusion that they are victims of hysterical or functional disorders or, as the psychologists put it, they are victims of neurotic difficulties. It seems to me that because of the vague handling of the problem in the Pension Act the interpretation of the War Veterans Allowance Act in practice has been extended to cover this particular problem group. That being so, I think the terms of the act go far beyond the comparison that has been drawn between war veterans allowance and old age pension. In view of this conclusion, I maintain that the demands which have been put forward for several years now by the Legion are not unreasonable. If we literally interpret the war veterans allowance as being comparable with the old age pension and all veterans automatically become eligible at 60, resulting in an expenditure of some $27 million, under the proposed increases as the minister indicated in his statement the other evening, perhaps it would be necessary to review the interpretation of the legislation and to draw the lines more clearly so that adequate payment might be made to those marginal disability cases to which I have referred, particularly those suffering from functional or hysterical disability.

Unfortunately, discussion of this subject in the committee of the whole does not provide the opportunity to go into the detailed discussion that would have been possible had the minister made his statement in the special committee and had we been able to have a thorough give-and-take discussion there on this important matter.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

Supply—Health and Welfare

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Department—

247. Departmental administration, $1,150,272.

Mr. Blair: Does the minister wish to make a statement?

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Blair: It is unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot devote more time to a department as important as the Department of National Health and Welfare. In view of the large amount of money expended by this department, it would be impossible and futile, within the space of four or five hours in an afternoon, to attempt to investigate the financial end of the department's operations. It is true that a large proportion of the money expended by the department is statutory. I refer to the money expended on old age pensions, the new disability pensions and family allowances. These are purely statutory, and if there were any question about them it would be as to the adequacy of the administration.

Therefore I believe that the average member, in going over the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, simply takes the attitude that money spent for health is money well spent and leaves it to the minister and his officials to carry out this work. With an important subject of this kind it would be better if we could have a committee so that we might be able to spend a longer time in examining these estimates. There is nothing so important as national health and welfare, and it would be most helpful if we could spend further time not only in investigating the financial aspect but in making recommendations to the minister. I am sure the minister would be glad to hear them, and we would also be able to hear more from the minister on points of interest involved in the consideration of his estimates.

There is one thing that is always very important in the consideration of these estimates, the investigation and inquiry into the causes of mortality in the dominion in the last year. These do not seem to change very much from year to year. Some changes are taking place with new types of treatment, but we note that the same old enemies are at the top of the list. I refer to cancer, heart disease and the so-called vascular diseases. Changes are taking place with respect to them, and we cannot always trust statistics to show the true picture because people are living longer and it is only natural in their old age they should fall prey to some form of disease. There has to be something that carries them away.

Therefore while the statistics on cancer may seem to indicate that its incidence is greater, it is only natural that people living to an old age will develop this disease or others, particularly heart disease. With reference to heart disease, I should like to emphasize the necessity for some form of accelerated research into the many causes of sudden death by coronary disease not only in Canada but in other countries. Research is being conducted but there is a need for acceleration of the investigation of something that is really becoming a problem. Frequently our attention is directed to the fact that some person has passed away with coronary disease. In the newspapers we only see the names of people whose passing has drawn the attention of reporters. We know that public men are passing away early in life from coronary disease, and I should like to suggest to the minister that every dollar that can be spent on accelerated research into the cause of death from coronary disease should be spent because it is becoming a problem.

In looking over the causes of death in the Dominion of Canada, I was struck by the large number of deaths from accidents. It may be that part of what I am going to say was discussed at the time of the consideration of amendments to the Criminal Code. I am referring to traffic accidents, but in view of the fact that accidental deaths are now the fourth cause of death in Canada I think it well that something should be placed on the record in this regard. I do so for the reason that I believe that consideration of this matter in the federal parliament on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare may add some impetus to doing something about it.

I wish to place on the record certain statistics which I think are rather frightening. I also wish to read a short extract from that highly reputable magazine, The Canadian Doctor. It is true that some 5,000 accidents occur through other causes, but industry is striving very hard to avoid accidents. Organizations like the workmen's compensation boards are making inquiries into the causes of accidents in industry and are doing everything possible to cut down the mortality and injury rates. However, traffic accidents seem to be increasing. Two days ago the hon. member for Oxford asked one of the ministers for statistics regarding traffic accidents. The minister did not have them available, and I do not think they are issued by the dominion bureau of statistics. Therefore, with the permission of the committee, I am going to read a short article from The Canadian Doctor.

[Mr. Blair.]

The article was written by a highly reputable medical practitioner, Dr. Harold Elliott, who is a prominent Montreal neurosurgeon, and I note that the article commences with a quotation from certain remarks made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I do not know where he made these remarks. Possibly it was in the course of some address that he delivered, but I must say that I agree with him. It was a very suitable introduction to the short article on the unenviable record of the Dominion of Canada. In the minister's statement I find these words:

> In the past fifty years our general mortality rate has been reduced by one-third, placing Canada fourth among the nations of the world.

This is the important sentence.

> Were it not for the increasing toll taken by accidents, our general mortality rate would be even better.

Accidents, as I said, are the fourth ranking cause of death in this country. I wish to read the article, and I will ask the permission of the house to place the statistical records on Hansard. The article reads as follows:

> Last May in The Canadian Doctor Dr. Harold Elliott, prominent Montreal neurosurgeon, attempted to bring home to Canadian medical men in general the appalling and steadily mounting mortality rate from automobile accidents and stir them, as dedicated to the preservation of life, to a sense of responsibility for concerted action which would reduce this. As pointed out by him, a total of 2,500 automobile passengers killed and approximately 54,000 injured in 1952 ranked this as one of the leading causes of death and maiming in the dominion. One is not surprised at the statement of the world health organization, made after the first international study of transport mortality covering fifteen countries, that "mortality from transport accidents represents one of the most important causes of death at certain ages" but it is distressing to find that Canada has almost the worst and least enviable record in this regard.
> Twenty-two types of transport accidents are analysed in the W.H.O. study. The motor vehicle comes far ahead of all other means of transport as a cause of death. Far lower in the statistical scale are railway accidents, followed by road accidents caused by non-motor vehicles, and water transport accidents. Aircraft accidents appear at the bottom of the list and mostly affect personnel in military aircraft.
> A comparison between the death rate caused by transport accidents and that resulting from disease shows that in a number of countries transport accidents rank with tuberculosis as a killer, especially of men; they are far more dangerous than many diseases such as nephritis, diabetes, and sometimes influenza. And transport accidents kill more men than women.
> But it is among the young, where the general death rate is naturally low, that traffic is the number one killer. In certain countries one fourth, one third, or even more young people who die between the ages of 15 and 24 are killed in transport accidents. In this age group males are more likely to be killed than females, the proportion reaching as high as five to one.
> What it is wished to emphasize here is Canada's unenviable record internationally in this regard. Those who were appalled at the Canadian situation as presented by Dr. Elliott must be further shocked to learn that both as regards general transport deaths and deaths from this cause in the age group 15 to 24 Canada has one of the worst records in the world. It should prove further disturbing to doctors and bolster the argument they concertedly make themselves responsible for doing something about it.

I am going to place these tables before the house. The first table shows the proportion of deaths due to all transport accidents compared with general mortality, from all causes, in percentage. I wish to remind the house of that sentence: "compared with general mortality, from all causes, in percentage". The table is as follows:

| Males Age Group 15 to 24 | | Females Age Group 15 to 24 |
|---|---|---|
| Per cent | | Per cent |
| 43·2 | New Zealand | 4·5 |
| 34·2 | Canada | 15·2 |
| 34·1 | U.S.A. | 12·3 |
| 30·8 | South Africa (European population) | 2·8 |
| 29·7 | Denmark | 6·9 |
| 27·7 | England and Wales | 6·5 |
| 23·1 | Germany (Fed. Republic) | 7·2 |
| 21·1 | Switzerland | 5·0 |
| 19·7 | Netherlands | 3·8 |
| 16·9 | Scotland | 3·10 |
| 12·3 | Italy | 2·2 |

I point out the fact that Canada is the highest of all countries with a rate of 34·2 for male deaths between the ages of 15 and 24 and 15·2 for females. When we read of the holiday accidents in the United States we think the toll is very high, but it is ·1 per cent higher than in Canada.

I point out that the other table may be more interesting to hon. members, and that is the rates per 100,000 of population. I fancy I can hear some hon. members saying that the other rates were high for the populations, so I bring them down to this table showing the rate per 100,000 of population. The table is as follows:

Transport Mortality
Rates per 100,000 population

| | Total Average | Males | Females |
|---|---|---|---|
| Australia | 20·9 | 49·2 | 10·1 |
| Canada 1952 | 25·4 | 39·6 | 10·9 |
| Switzerland 1951 | 20·2 | 33·9 | 7·1 |
| South Africa 1950 (European population) | 20·1 | 33·4 | 6·7 |
| Germany, Fed. Rep. 1951 | 19·3 | 33·2 | 7·1 |
| New Zealand, 1952 | 18·1 | 30·5 | 5·6 |
| Denmark 1951 | 15·1 | 24·5 | 5·9 |
| Scotland 1951 | 13·4 | 22·2 | 5·4 |
| England and Wales 1951 | 12·8 | 20·7 | 5·5 |
| Netherlands 1952 | 12·7 | 20·7 | 4·8 |
| Italy 1951 | 12·2 | 20·8 | 3·9 |
| Finland 1952 | 11·8 | 19·1 | 5·2 |
| Japan 1951 | 9·5 | 14·9 | 4·2 |

I again remind the house that this is put on a percentage basis per 100,000 of population.

It may seem unusual to some people that I have brought this matter before the house during consideration of the estimates of national health and welfare. I know that the minister has not any responsibility with regard to these casualties, but on the other hand we are considering the dominion estimates for the Department of National Health and Welfare and this cause of death is fourth in the list of mortality rates. While this subject was under discussion some weeks ago, and we had a fairly long debate in connection with it, I hope that bringing before the house this casualty rate will cause something to be done about it and institute some form of program across the whole of this dominion with a view to cutting down this cause of death, which is fourth on the list of mortality tables.

In the matter of health and welfare, I have always been rather jealous of the position of the provinces. The control of health matters is within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but sometimes across the country a misunderstanding seems to arise as to who is doing the greatest work in that connection. Sometimes, in my jealousy over the position of the provinces, I feel that the federal government is taking credit for some of the things the provincial governments are doing.

I should like to put on the record the position with regard to hospital grants. Many times during the last few years I have mentioned the amount of money that the provinces are spending. The federal government does not match the total amount of money spent by the provincial government. It is true the federal government gives matching grants for hospital construction, but in connection with the work done in my own province the provincial government spends $2.57 for every dollar spent by the federal government, that is so far as 1953 is concerned. The federal government does contribute thousands of dollars for hospitals, but does not contribute towards the maintenance of the hospitals. The Ontario government, for instance, makes a grant of $8,500 for beds in mental institutions, but the federal government only contributes $1,500 towards that work.

It is true the federal government does contribute money towards mental health, but I want to place on the record the fact that the provinces are still doing a tremendous job in the advancement of health projects.

While I am speaking about this matter of the work done in the provinces in relation to the work done by the dominion, I wish to bring before the house one item which I feel should have consideration from this committee. I refer to the question of the growing number of mental cases in this country. I was struck by a statement that came from the dominion bureau of statistics indicating that patients in mental hospitals and psychiatric units outnumber all other patients in hospitals by more than 10 per cent. At the end of 1952—and that is the last date for which the complete figures were available—there were 61,925 patients in mental hospitals, while the number of all other patients in public hospitals was 54,284. I shall repeat those figures: 61,925 mental patients, and all other patients in hospitals numbering 54,284.

This brings us to the question of the shortage of beds in mental institutions, and the difficulty of obtaining treatment for cases in those institutions of those we have found it necessary to send there. While I am not in active practice at the present time, people still come to me and ask me if I can do anything to help get a patient into a mental hospital, because the waiting period is so long.

It is difficult to treat a mental case in a private home, but sometimes these patients have to wait some considerable time before beds are found available. If we are going to deal with this question, and if we keep in mind that 10 per cent of mental cases over all other types of cases in hospitals, then we have to do a great deal, and possibly something more than we are doing at the present time. A great deal of good could be accomplished by the extension of mental health units. I note—and I agree with the procedure—that the federal government is giving grants for that sort of thing. But we have to go much farther. While the provinces with the larger populations are making beds available, and trying to accommodate these people as rapidly as they can, one wonders if it would not be good policy to have smaller hospitals, or branches of psychiatric units attached to our larger hospitals. Thereby something could be done by way of early treatment.

It is known at the present time that there is more to the treatment of mental cases than just the matter of custodial care. An increasing percentage of these people are coming out of the hospitals in a cured condition. If we could have smaller psychiatric units attached to our larger hospitals there would be a chance to treat these cases earlier, so as to try to bring the disease under control. A great deal of work could be done among younger people in the mental health units.

I am aware that the government in my province has been working on this scheme, and has been doing good work in treating the cases early and attempting to make cures. I now go back to the information given out by the dominion bureau of statistics regarding mental disease. Perhaps I might quote from a newspaper article based on a statement made by the bureau of statistics, as follows:

> Advances in combating infectious diseases in prolonging life expectancy, and in the general improvement in physical health have not been matched by comparable reductions in the incidence of mental disorders. Indeed, the successful control of a number of deadly diseases has served rather to accentuate the seriousness of mental illness as the cause of much suffering and unhappiness, and from another viewpoint, a great wastage of our human resources.

I hope that in Canada we can institute a program. While I realize that health is within the jurisdiction of the provinces, I believe we can do something to combat a condition in which, as I repeat, the number of patients in mental hospitals is 10 per cent higher than the number of admissions to ordinary hospitals

I am not going to talk about the incidence of some of the diseases we have covered in years gone by. As I said in the beginning, the percentages per population are probably getting better. In the past I have criticized our rate of infant mortality as compared with that in other countries. I must say however that this rate is improving; and I give credit to the research done on the subject. Advances in forms of treatment as well as new drugs have helped a great deal.

At this time I should like to pay tribute to the people who are working on this problem. I refer particularly to the general practitioners who are meeting the problem of treating these children, in infancy, and at early ages. I think much of the progress we are now making in the matter of infant mortality is due to those practitioners, and we can congratulate them upon the work they are doing. But last year I was alarmed, as I have no doubt were also the minister and the department, by the growing incidence in the outbreaks of poliomyelitis or infantile paralysis. I have here the record of poliomyelitis in Canada for 1953. The information is given by provinces, and I note two things about it. First of all, the greater number of cases occurred in July, August, September and October, and even into November, and that they occurred in the western provinces.

We have not yet got the answer to poliomyelitis, but some wonderful research is being done throughout the world, and particularly in Canada. I refer to that being done at the Connaught laboratories in an attempt to prepare something that will cope with this disease. But, so far as cure is concerned, we must go back to the therapeutic measures which have been instituted to try to stop the horrible crippling that occurs.

In this connection I would refer again to the work being done in Ontario. I would call the attention of hon. members to the excellent results obtained when Ontario instituted a program under which every case of poliomyelitis or infantile paralysis becomes a ward of the province for treatment purposes. From the time a case is diagnosed, the province takes over all the treatment. Looking back on the results obtained years ago, before this program was instituted, I find it amazing to note some of the recoveries that have been made. Not only is it important that these young people should be spared the crippling effects of this disease, but it is important from the standpoint of the state.

Only a few days ago we were discussing a bill with respect to disability. We were proud and pleased to vote money to disabled persons by way of pensions. But I suggest that the program which has been instituted in Ontario, to which I have just made reference, could be carried out in all the provinces of Canada. So far as can be done by way of treatment, it would go a long way toward clearing up the crippling effects of this disease.

I should like now to say a few words with regard to hospitals. The financing and building of new hospitals requires a great deal of money. Sometimes it is difficult for the public to understand why there is this constant demand for more beds, more accommodation. But I am going to place before the committee some of the statistics from my own province so that hon. members may have some of the facts in connection with hospitalization. It is not generally understood why there is such a demand, but certain facts stand out. Our population is not static. Every year there is an increase in population and that increase means that we must have more hospital accommodation, more hospitals for treatment of that increased population.

I should like to point out that advances in medical science, new forms of treatment, have made it imperative that these people be treated in hospital. That means that hospitals that were once adequate in size must be enlarged, and for those rapidly growing communities hospitals must be provided. It requires a great deal more money now to construct new buildings than it did years ago. The costs have risen very sharply. The assistance from the federal government and the provincial government constitutes really only a small part of the actual cost of the hospital facilities. The citizens themselves and the municipalities have to share in the cost of providing hospital services for their own communities.

What is the position of the municipalities? It is true that a certain amount of money will be raised for this purpose by appeals to the public. On the other hand, the municipalities find it very difficult to finance the building of new hospitals or the expansion of existing hospitals, and very often the maintenance of older existing hospitals.

In the consideration this morning of the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs certain figures were placed on the record regarding the cost of hospitalization. I take these figures from the Ontario records. The average length of stay in hospitals now is shorter than it formerly was. It is 9·23 days; but the average cost of a patient in a hospital per day to provide for his treatment is $12.58—these figures refer to the year 1952—as opposed to $11.54 per day in 1951. There is an increase of $1.04 within one year. Out of this amount—and I am referring to Ontario; I am not acquainted with the records of the other provinces, but I think the comparison will be practically the same in all of them—of $12.58 per patient per day, the patient pays only $8.83. The difference has to be made up by grants from the various governments, federal, provincial or municipal, or from another level, namely, donations from the people who are interested in hospitals.

Something further is happening; more people are going to the hospitals because it is increasingly difficult to get help in the home or to get nurses. And, as I said, much of this treatment that is now given has to be given in hospital. We have arrived at the stage where practically 90 per cent of the babies are born in hospitals. The expenses have gone up. At the end of 1952 there were 9,855 more employees on hospital staffs than in 1947. In the matter of wages and salaries, they have increased. I often hear people say: why are hospitals costing so much? Why this constant appeal to the public? Since 1941 wages and salaries have gone up 150 per cent. Not only that, but food costs have gone up 200 per cent, and the hospital cost for drugs and medical supplies rose in that period of not quite ten years by 114 per cent. Therefore one can understand quite readily, when I make this appeal for more money for the hospitals, that there is a reason, and these figures should be placed on the record so that people can understand why hospital costs have gone up.

I now come to the question of nursing staffs and nurses in Canada. I hear the statement made that we generally suffer from a shortage of some 10,000 nurses in Canada, although I know somebody said that the distribution was at fault. It is difficult, but it is costing the hospitals something to give nurses an education. Again I turn to the records of Ontario, which has about 5,000 nurses in training at all times. But so far as the hospitals are concerned, it represents an expenditure of $1,500,000 on education, for which those hospitals receive no educational grants. The position of the hospitals is increasingly difficult, and any person who has had any experience on the board of a hospital trying to finance a hospital and keep out of the red will know it is a very difficult position. Many of the municipalities are very much worried in trying to maintain hospitals, although the demand for more hospitals and more hospital beds is constantly before us.

I am not going to speak on the matter of the statistics of this department any further, sir, but at this time I wish to bring before the committee a few remarks on health insurance. I am going to ask the minister one question only when we come to the item on health insurance studies, and that is this. What is the minister doing and what has been accomplished? Will the minister give us a full statement on the studies that are being made? I bring this question of health insurance before the committee because in the past statements have been made in regard to a vote that was taken here in December, 1953, on the amendment to the speech from the throne that was introduced by the C.C.F. party. I have found a certain amount of propaganda going out that the Conservative party voted against health insurance. I thought I explained to the house at that time that we voted against socialized medicine. I made it very clear at that time—

Mr. Gillis: What is the difference?

Mr. Blair: There is a large difference.

Mr. Gillis: Explain it to us.

Mr. Blair: I will, shortly. I made it clear at that time in the latter part of my speech that every party in this house is committed to health insurance. I admit, sir, that any form will produce and do some good, but we are committed to a form of contributory insurance. It is not sufficient to say that every form is the same. There is a great deal of difference in them, and the more you study them, the more do those differences become apparent. In the first place, one must realize that health is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. One cannot get around that. The second thing is that if you are going to make health insurance succeed at any time, one of the most important things to remember is the matter of doctor-patient relationship. That must be preserved, no matter what happens. No health insurance scheme can be effective unless the doctor-patient relationship is preserved. The views of the doctor on this matter are very important. I say that not because I belong to that profession; but I hold that we must receive their help, their co-operation, their good will and their agreement before any form of health insurance can be a success. Our idea of health insurance is not state medicine. We believe in a minimum of controls, not a maximum.

We want this to be a free form, a free plan. I do pay tribute to the many forms of free insurance at the present time—Blue Cross, and some of the forms that have been instituted by the doctors themselves. They are doing marvellous work in this country. Therefore those facts become very apparent in the consideration of that question; but there are certain facts regarding state medicine, and I wish to place on the record the views of a very important and outstanding man from England, Dr. Reginald Hale-White, who addressed the Canadian Medical Association at its convention last week. I quote from a dispatch from Vancouver regarding a speech he made out there:

> Dr. Reginald Hale-White of London says socialized medicine in Britain leaves "much to be desired, because it is not giving the general public its full worth."

And remember, sir, I stated that any plan will do a certain amount of good, but we in Canada are looking for the best plan. I continue with Dr. Hale-White's statement:

> The doctor, on the council of the British Medical Association, is representing the BMA at the Canadian Medical Association convention here.
> The service in England, he said, "is costing the public $1,400 million a year.
> "It is not at all what the politicians said it would be," he said, "and it should have been introduced gradually, instead of with a bang, as it was."
> Dr. Hale-White listed four complaints against the medical scheme, which has been in effect since 1948.
> They were:
> 1. The introduction of the scheme led to the belittling of the general practitioner, because the government stressed that the public would have access to the best specialists under socialized medicine.
> 2. People began bothering the doctors and hospitals with trivial matters.
> 3. The time a doctor could give his patients was being challenged by paper work necessary under the scheme.
> 4. Hospitals became cluttered with cases that should have been handled by general practitioners but were not because of lack of time.
> The doctor, who is leaving Friday for a cross-Canada tour and then home, warned that these are some of the things that should be watched under any national or provincial hospital insurance plan in Canada.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that this party is in favour of health insurance. We are opposed to state medicine. We believe a contributory plan could be introduced which would cover the situation without having state medicine in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all members of the house will agree that we have come this afternoon to a discussion of one of the most important functions of government. That applies to the work being done by the federal Department of National Health and Welfare. It also applies to the work being done by the various provincial departments of health and also the great amount of work being done at the municipal level. I think also of the great deal of work in the field of health care that is done by the school boards and school districts of this country.

As I say, we feel that this is one of the most important functions of government at all levels of government in Canada. I do not want anyone to infer from what I have just said that despite its importance there has been no discussion of health and welfare matters at this session. I do not rise to make the charge that it has been left to the dying days of this session. That would certainly be inappropriate for a department and a function of government which is so important, and we made sure that these matters were discussed all through the session.

The fact is that we have had quite a number of discussions during the course of this session on matters that come within the purview of this department. The hon. member for Lanark referred a few moments ago to the amendment which was moved by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, which was the subject of discussion during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The words in question were these:

> We further represent that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial participation.

In addition, we have had discussions spread through the session on a number of other matters that come under this department. We have had two or three discussions on the subject of old age pensions, including both old age assistance and old age security. Indeed, on May 31 there was before the house in my name an amendment to the motion to go into ways and means dealing with old age assistance, old age security, and blind pensions. We have also had a discussion on the question of family allowances which was precipitated by a private member's motion presented to the house by my deskmate, the hon. member for Assiniboia.

As the hon. member for Lanark pointed out, we have also had a discussion on disability allowances arising out of the legislation which the Minister of National Health and Welfare at last introduced in connection with that matter. In addition to these formal debates, Mr. Chairman, there have been repeated questions throughout the session on matters relating to health and welfare which bear witness to the tremendous importance of this phase of government.

I think too of the meetings that have been held during the course of the session by the voluntary committee on health to which both senators and members of this house belong and at which we have had some very interesting lectures, including one a short while ago on the very important question of poliomyelitis.

I think it is true to say, Mr. Chairman, that parliament generally has been conscious throughout this session of the importance of the work of this department. I believe in fact that the department of health and welfare includes amongst its many divisions one division which is one of the oldest functions of government. I refer to the division which deals with food and drugs. In other words, it was recognized quite early in the history of this country that one of the jobs that had to be done by the federal government was that of taking protective or preventive measures for the health of the Canadian people. We have gone a long way since those early days when the extent of the responsibility for health was confined to that negative or preventive field covered by the protection of food and drugs. We have come to recognize that with an economy such as ours, and with the growing extent to which our society is one in which we are members one of another, it is our responsibility to provide for the health and well-being of the members of the community to the very limit of our capacity.

I welcome, as do all hon. members of this group, and as do all hon. members of the house, the progress we have made in that direction even though we might spend most of the time when we talk of these matters emphasizing the distance we have yet to travel. But welcome though we may the progress that has been made in the past, we feel that there is not really time enough to sit around rejoicing in that progress when there is so much yet to be done.

Having said a few things about the department in perhaps a little more complimentary vein than that in which I am usually known to indulge, as the minister will confirm, I might add that we feel a great deal of good has been accomplished in the field of health and welfare, particularly since health and welfare was set up as a department by itself. It took a few years after the original organization of this new department for it to get into its stride, and such moves as it has made were made we think in response to pressures put upon the government from this house and in response to the pressure of public opinion.

Perhaps the most significant forward step in the field of health taken by the department is that which was taken in May, 1948, when the health grants program was launched. I will not allow the minister to forget that the prime minister of that day declared on that occasion that the health grants program was to be the basis for a nation-wide program of health insurance. I hope the day is not too far off when there will be built the superstructure for which that foundation was laid. Under that health grants program a great deal of assistance has been given in the construction of hospitals. Let us give credit to all those to whom it is due in that connection. Let us give credit to the federal government for the appropriation of federal public money for this purpose. But let us give credit also to provincial governments and to all others who have contributed toward increasing the number of hospital beds in this country.

In addition to the building of hospitals that has been done under the health grants program, there were other grants—there are a good many of them now—such as the crippled children's grant, the grant for the combating of cancer, the grant with respect to mental diseases and so on. We think too of the tremendous amount of research that is being done under the various grants. Some of it is done directly by the department and some of it involves money being made available to institutes or to organizations able to carry on research in the fields of cancer, poliomyelitis, multiple sclerosis or others of these diseases which, even to our medical people, are still a mystery and the solution to which would mean so much to the health of our people. We welcome the work that is being done under the health grants program; but, as I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will not think that I am going to stop there. I shall continue to remind him of what Mr. Mackenzie King said, namely that one of the reasons for initiating this health grants program was so as to lay the foundation for a nation-wide program of health insurance.

Mr. Martin: I thank the hon. member for those kind words.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Gillis: Be careful; do not lead with your chin.

Mr. Knowles: I hope the minister will express that appreciation in a practical way by fighting still harder within the cabinet of which he is a member for the right to introduce at an early date a nation-wide health insurance program.

I also want to say, Mr. Chairman, that one of the other forward steps that was taken by this department during the last few years was that which was taken when the means test was removed from the old age pension at least at age 70 and when we got started on a new concept of old age security as a right belonging to the people of this country rather than as a matter of charity. I am not going to take the time to repeat the speeches I have made on that question times without number in this chamber. I just want to add to my appreciation of what was done by saying that we want that principle, the principle that social security is a right, to be extended still further. As I indicated when I moved an amendment to the motion to go into ways and means on May 31, we believe that the amount of the old age pension should now be increased to not less than $60 a month, and we feel that the means test should be removed at age 65. We indicated also, with respect to that other forward step, namely the disability pension, that it too should be raised to the figure of $60 a month.

In connection with the progress that we made a few years ago with regard to our old age security legislation, and recalling the work of our committee which recommended the abolition of the means test, may I take a moment to refer in passing to a couple of items that I noticed in the press a short while ago. I may be getting off base a bit but it is late in the session, so why not? I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I shall never forget the real assistance that we had in our committee on old age security from one of the present minister's deputies. I refer to the deputy minister of welfare, Dr. George F. Davidson. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is very ably assisted by two deputy ministers, namely Dr. George F. Davidson as deputy minister of welfare and Dr. G. D. W. Cameron as deputy minister of health.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I knew the minister would agree with me.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member may be accused of looking for a seat in the Senate; he had better be careful.

Mr. Knowles: Not I. It is only proof of the importance of the work of this department that it has to have two deputy ministers. What I saw in the paper which disturbed me a bit was a rumour that we might lose Dr. Davidson from the Department of National Health and Welfare. There is no doubt that he could do a good job in the position to which it was rumoured he might move, but I must say I would be sorry if we lost him from this important Department of National Health and Welfare. However, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not able to hold Dr. Davidson against the inducements or blandishments that may be offered to him by one of his colleagues, I was also interested in noting in the press the rumour—one of those informed guesses, as it were—that if that happened the Prime Minister might then have the opportunity to appoint the first woman to become a deputy minister under this government. I am glad that she is within the sound of my voice and knows that if that happens it would have my approval. From the applause of other members I gather that the appointment of Miss Olive Waters as deputy minister of welfare would be approved generally in the House of Commons.

Mr. Macdonnell: Are there any other appointments?

Mr. Knowles: Not today. Perhaps that is enough along that line, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of National Health and Welfare may wonder whether I am not feeling well, having got this far in my speech without having something critical to say. I now come to that point. I have already indicated that we feel that greater effort should be made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to persuade his colleagues that the time has come for increasing the amounts paid under various social security acts. I refer to old age pensions, blindness pensions and disability allowances. However, Mr. Chairman, the gap in our social security program which is the most serious of all—the one which I regret has not yet been filled—is that of national health insurance. As I have said already, Mr. King made it clear in May, 1948, that that was the purpose of the health grants program, namely to lay a foundation for nation-wide health insurance. Someone may say: That was only six years ago; what is your hurry? The minister knows that I must remind him again that national health insurance was first put into the Liberal platform in 1919. That was 35 years ago.

Mr. McIvor: And it is still there.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Fort William says that it is still there. I suggest to the hon. member for Fort William and to members generally on the other side of the chamber that the time has come to take that plank out of the Liberal platform and put it on the statute books of Canada. Thirty-five years is a long time ago, Mr. Chairman. I can remember back that far but I cannot remember much farther back.

I submit that the time has come for definite action on this question. As a matter of fact, a new generation of Canadians—indeed a new generation of Liberals—has grown up which is now getting interested in this question. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Montreal Gazette of Monday, May 31, 1954. The heading is "National Insurance Advocated". The first paragraph reads as follows:

> Ottawa, May 30—CP—Canada's young Liberals Saturday urged the government to implement a national contributory health insurance plan in co-operation with the provinces.

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Fort William, one of the young Liberals over there, says "hear, hear". I am glad to know that there is still support in the Liberal ranks for this plank of national health insurance. The hon. member for Lanark says he is going to ask one question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare when we get down to that item. I ask him the same question. What are you doing about this? When are we going to get national health insurance? Surely the minister and the government generally are not going to argue that they have got to wait any longer to ascertain public opinion in connection with this matter. Surely they must know that people all over Canada today are conscious of the heavy costs of medical expenses. They are conscious of how these expenses bear down on them when they have to be met. They are conscious of the fact that a great many people do not have the medical or hospital care which they should have because of the heavy cost.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has had some part to play in having sickness surveys made, and I have been interested in some of the facts that have been brought out by these surveys. For example, I hold in my hand a portion of the dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin for September 21, 1953, which shows several breakdowns of a sickness survey, the results of which had been announced at that time, and this one interested me in particular. Out of 1,322,000 family units with incomes less than $1,500 nearly one-fifth, 19·8 per cent, spent nothing on health care compared with 7·7 per cent of 1,864,000 with incomes of $1,500 to $2,299, 4·3 per cent of 833,000 with incomes of $3,000 to $4,999 and 3 per cent of 271,000 with incomes of $5,000 or more.

May I pick out two figures there to make a comparison which drives home the point I have in mind. The point is that of those family units whose incomes are $1,500 a year or less nearly 20 per cent have spent nothing in the whole year on health care, but when you take those with $5,000 a year or more there are only 3 per cent who spent nothing on health care.

Mr. McIvor: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not think that the young Liberals showed good sense when they supported national health insurance in co-operation with the provinces instead of the dominion going it alone?

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact that was the gist of the amendment which my leader moved last November 16. It asked for a nation-wide health insurance program with provision for provincial participation. That appears to be what the young Liberals supported in their motion the other day, but the hon. member for Fort William voted against it when we moved it in the house last year.

Mr. McIvor: Want of confidence.

Mr. Knowles: There is the old dodge, want of confidence. We think that the health of the people is more important than the survival of any particular government. I was pointing out that of those family units whose income is $1,500 a year or less nearly 20 per cent spent nothing on health care whereas of those whose incomes were $5,000 a year or more only 3 per cent got through the year without spending anything on health care. We all know, Mr. Chairman, that it stands to reason that the people with low incomes are not going to be healthier than the people with higher incomes. The reverse is the case. What it means is simply this, that the people with low incomes cannot afford the health care that they so sorely need.

Surely it has been recognized by everyone, young Liberals and old and Canadians generally, that the only solution to the heavy cost of adequate medical care is to put it on an over-all or universal basis. We have had that brought out in other ways during the course of this session. I am not going to revive the debate we had a few days ago on a form of life insurance when the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant both drove home the point, and did it very well, that the only way you could make sure that an entire group would have a certain amount of insurance protection was to put it on an over-all or universal basis. They both said that that was the only way to make sure they would all have it. They said it was the only way to make sure that the cost of it would be kept down. That principle applies to health insurance for the nation as it applies to life insurance for a limited group of people.

I do not feel it is necessary to argue the principle of this matter. What we seem to have to argue for is to get action out of the present government. The only reason I can see for the government holding back is that the government might have the false notion that the people of Canada do not want national health insurance. I am convinced that they do. As the minister will recall, during the course of this session he and I were privileged, along with one or two others, to participate in what I thought was a very interesting "Citizens' Forum" discussion which was carried by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In terms of "Citizens' Forum" discussions it was one of the most interesting in which I had ever participated. We did not do much preparation in advance. We were not too sure before we started what line each of the participants was going to take. The Minister of National Health and Welfare surprised me a bit. I found he was pretty well on my side, that the two of us were arguing for some form of nation-wide health insurance as opposed to a differing point of view which suggested that it should be done on a voluntary basis. The minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I think it is fair to say that he took the position that, some advantages though there might be in voluntary plans, they could not possibly cover the entire nation, could not possibly cover all the people of this country, and that sooner or later we had to get some form of nation-wide health insurance with government participation, including both the federal government and the provinces.

I am not going to bore the house with what the minister and I had to say on that occasion, but I was more than interested in a broadcast which was given in the "Citizens' Forum" series on Thursday, April 1, 1954, during which C.B.C. speakers summed up the reaction of the forum groups across the country to a number of "Citizens' Forum" discussions that were conducted during the course of the 1953-54 season. I found that the "Citizens' Forum" groups provided some very interesting information for the C.B.C. people when it came time to report on the discussions. For example, I find this, which was said, as I say, over the C.B.C. on April 1 of this year:

Saskatchewan is the only province where a majority of the groups feels that present services in their community are fairly adequate. Everywhere else—even in large cities like Montreal—there would appear to be a good deal of dissatisfaction and concern. Listeners don't criticize the existing medical and hospital plans, as such. Indeed, some point out that they are rendering excellent service. But they don't believe that they provide for the people who really need protection most. The costs make them quite out of reach for poorer families—they argue—and they're uncomfortably high too for many in the middle income group—who have always had the worst of the medical deal —according to some maritime listeners.

That is just a sampling or a collection of opinions from across the country, indicating that the people who listened to our broadcast generally felt that the services we have now got are not sufficient and that the main problem is cost. Then I come to this interesting paragraph:

Under these circumstances it was interesting to see the reaction of the B.C. forums to the topic "What Health Plan for Canadians", and especially to the question of government participation in such a scheme. Surprisingly enough, every one of the forums—

The reference is to the British Columbia forums.

—favoured a compulsory national plan to cover every Canadian. The only disagreement was over the best method of collection of the necessary fees. While 60 per cent favoured the use of premiums, 20 per cent wanted the costs to come from general taxation. But the point that snagged all of the discussions was that though all Canadians are in need of medical care, not all are equally able to pay. Any health plan must cover this latter part of the population, but without imposing higher expenses on the rest of the people. We are all looking forward to the day when a government can solve that one.

My reason for reading these one or two excerpts from this summary that was given over the C.B.C. is that I think it gives, as nearly as one can obtain it, a report of what ordinary Canadians are thinking about this question of health insurance. I believe these excerpts which I have read represent pretty well what the average Canadian is thinking. He thinks the health services we have got are fine as far as they go. Many Canadians feel great debts of gratitude to doctors who have ministered to them and have saved their lives. Many Canadians are grateful for such hospital services as we have in this country. But Canadians generally are also very much aware of the heavy costs of medical care and how unfairly those costs impinge upon those in the lower and middle income brackets. You find, therefore, an increasing number of Canadians with the very strong feeling that the only possible solution to this matter is a nation-wide program of health insurance.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark on this question. Earlier in my remarks today I read the amendment of my leader, moved on November 16, and I still find it difficult to know why he and his colleagues voted against these words:

We further represent that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to recommend legislation establishing a nation-wide health insurance program, with provision for provincial participation.

Quite a few social security measures as well as other measures, Mr. Chairman, have got started in this country precisely on that basis, on the basis of federal legislation making possible provincial participation as and when the provinces wished to come into such a plan. It was that way we got old age pensions in the first place. Not all the provinces came into the plan at the start. I believe it was more than a decade before all the provinces were in the original old age pension plan. Without bothering to produce other instances in the interim, I point out that only a week or two ago we passed another social security measure on that same basis. I refer to the bill providing for allowances for disabled persons. It is a federal measure with provision for provincial participation, and it will come into effect only in those provinces that are prepared to join in it and to pay their share of the costs. At least in respect of that measure we have reached a point where Canadians in other provinces are not going to be told they have to wait longer because all the provinces are not ready.

Why can we not apply that same principle, that same modus operandi, to this question of health insurance? If there are, as I believe, a number of provinces whose people would like to see a health insurance program started, let us have exactly what we asked for in that subamendment, despite the fact the Liberals and Conservatives in this house voted against the proposal that there be federal legislation setting up a nation-wide health insurance program with provision for the provinces to participate in it, and to administer it, when the provinces are ready to do so.

The minister and members generally know of my own keen interest in social security matters. They know that I never miss an opportunity to advocate higher old age pensions and other forms of social security involving the placing of actual dollars in the hands of those who need them. I am not announcing anything when I indicate I shall continue to advocate increases in those other social security measures. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that, in my view, when we are dealing with health insurance we are dealing with the most important item in an over-all social security program. It is the most serious gap in our program at the moment. It is the matter about which something must be done.

I urge upon the minister, as strongly as I can, that he carry on his fight. I believe he is fighting for it inside the cabinet—goodness, that must be an awful place to fight—and I urge him to carry on the fight for this most important improvement. Surely, with all of the capacity that we have for producing wealth, with all of the capacity we have for arranging our economy so as to meet the needs of defence or some of the needs of peace as they come along, it does not make sense that we have not found a way to devote an appropriate portion of our national wealth to the provision of the best possible health care for all our people.

Let us not have any quibbling about the cost of it. As the hon. member for Mackenzie said this morning when we were talking about burnt-out pensions, if a request came along, even before the end of this session, for another $100 million or $200 million or even more for NATO, the government would consider it very seriously. I would not be surprised if they asked for it before the end of this session. Why quibble over a corresponding amount that could be devoted to such an important question as this? It is not a case of giving our people something for nothing. All the wealth of this country, all the money this government or any other government has to spend has been created by our people through their work and their toil. They deserve, because of their work and toil and because of the wealth they produce, immediate action to make sure that a proper portion of that wealth will be devoted to this most important cause, the care of our health. I insist that the time has come for action by this government on the question of a nation-wide health insurance program.

Mr. Shaw: My remarks, Mr. Chairman, should not occupy the house for more than a few minutes this afternoon. After all, thus far during the session, we have had an opportunity of discussing a number of matters which would properly fall within the scope of this department. Moreover, with respect to the question of health insurance, we did have an extended debate during the month of November. However, I do intend to make a passing reference to that in a moment.

Previous speakers have indicated their belief in the importance of the Department of National Health and Welfare. We concur in those observations. We have said upon more than one occasion in this house that it is our belief that the health of the people is the nation's greatest asset. We are convinced that without good health all else would be of little avail. We are convinced also, and are not overlooking this fact in any way, that vast strides have been made in this field of health and welfare in Canada. When I was speaking in this house on November 26 last, I emphasized that belief of ours.

After all, when one stops to consider what is being done by the federal government in national health and welfare, by the provincial governments of the ten provinces, by the municipalities, by the voluntary health organizations, by the doctors, the nurses and those administering the hospitals, one cannot help realizing that the picture is a vastly improved one as compared with that of not very many years ago. And in speaking of the federal government, the provinces, and the like, I should have pointed out that it is not only a question of their working individually and independently to a certain degree, but of all of them working co-operatively to accomplish this most desirable result.

Having said that, however, I must hasten to add that there are some things which do not concern us very greatly. The hon. member for Lanark referred to the importance of research, and in doing so made mention of the infant mortality rate within this nation. I am not certain of the figures to which I shall refer. It may be that I am quite wrong, but I read recently that among the nations of the world we rank thirteenth, so far as infant mortality is concerned. In other words there are 12 nations with lower infant mortality rates than we have.

That staggers me. After all, when one stops to consider the very nature of this nation, the high standard of living we enjoy within the nation, our expanded facilities for health services, and the like, he cannot help asking himself why we should be thirteenth. I would ask the minister to deal with that matter during the consideration of these estimates. I am confident that others have been staggered by that information.

The hon. member for Lanark referred to another point to which I shall now turn. Anyone who will pick up a newspaper will observe the number of persons in middle life who, to use a common expression, just drop dead from heart condition. I wonder what research has been conducted in that field. Only a day or two ago I picked up a local newspaper and, on various pages of that newspaper, I found deaths recorded. I knew none of these people. One young man was 41 years old, another was 43 and a third was 47. Upon reading reports of these deaths it became clear that these three at least—and there may have been others in the same issue of the newspaper—simply died suddenly as a consequence of heart disease. I would ask the minister to indicate to us just to what extent that particular aspect of our national health problem is being attacked, right at its roots.

I have certain ideas, myself. I am sure the minister had, too, when he engaged in his particular program of weight reduction. I have tried to follow the lead and with very happy results. However, I do hope the minister will comment upon that aspect of the whole problem.

I am not going to make reference to many other subjects, apart from that of health insurance, because I do know there will be opportunity to deal with most of them under the individual items. Each time I hear health insurance discussed I become just a bit more confused. I ask myself this question: Is it health insurance, or is it sickness insurance that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is actually talking about? I have been compelled to come to the conclusion that he is talking about sickness insurance, provision for people who become ill, rather than health insurance.

The most important problem facing us in Canada is not the sickness aspect, important as it may be: it is the cause of illness, the prevention of illness, which in my view is of prime concern. That is why, whenever we have talked of any health program in Canada, those of us in this group have laid emphasis upon the preventive aspect, that of teaching the people how to live so that they may not become ill. Because, after all, when people become ill the problem has been created and the damage has been done.

Let us not concentrate our attention upon sickness insurance, but rather upon a broadened health program which shall have as one of its prime purposes that of keeping people well. I agree with the hon. member for Lanark that we do not want what I believe both he and I call state medicine. I realize that state medicine will offer certain things. For example, I would not want the British program as it stands today. While there are aspects of it that are good, I see serious weaknesses in the British scheme. And certainly I think some of its weakness has resulted from the fact that the state has gone altogether too far into that field.

We realize fully that at least for people in certain parts of the country hospital costs are extremely high. One thing that bears down upon my mind when I am here in Ottawa is the knowledge that if I become ill I shall have to pay a very heavy cost for the privilege of occupying a bed in one of the hospitals. That is not such a heavy burden when I am at home because I can have that accommodation for a dollar a day.

I mention that for this reason. It occurs to me that costs to individuals who occupy hospital beds could be reduced by methods other than that of putting into effect an over-all sickness insurance scheme. I feel that grants payable to hospitals—grants which, after all, come out of the contributions of all the people of Canada—should be used toward reducing the cost of hospitalization to those requiring it. That scheme prevails in certain parts of Canada, without premium charges being imposed upon individuals as such. And when I talk about premium charges I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I am a bit confused as to whether he does actually advocate a contributory scheme or whether he advocates a scheme which would be financed out of the general revenue of Canada.

Today in connection with health insurance he quoted with approval certain statements, and throughout those statements I noticed the word "contributory" was rather heavily underlined. Yet I reminded him that last November 26, in introducing their amendment, they said, "We believe the plan should be financed out of the federal treasury"—or "out of the general revenue of Canada". I believe that was the actual expression used.

Mr. Knowles: All of which comes from the contributions of the Canadian people.

Mr. Shaw: Yes, that is true; but let us not forget that there is a fundamental difference between financing out of the general revenue, the consolidated revenue fund, and imposing a premium levied upon individual Canadians, earmarking those premiums and then paying them out for services rendered. In the discussion of this whole matter let us not forget that there are certain group insurance plans in operation in Canada. All of these apply to groups, but there are certain others such as Blue Cross. If consideration is to be given to this problem, then consideration might be given to this question of subsidizing certain of the schemes in order that the cost may be brought down to where it can be handled by the rank and file of the people of our country.

This might be of interest to hon. members. I recall that at least thirty years ago in the town in which I resided a voluntary organization of citizens came into being. The doctors worked closely in connection with this voluntary organization. Each family paid $25 into the scheme and each family was entitled to all medical services, apart from the treatment of venereal disease. I think that was the only exclusion. Today, after more than thirty years, that scheme is still in operation although—and I am speaking from memory now—I believe the charge per family is now $35. It is wholly voluntary. The family comes in under the scheme of its own free will. If it does not, it pays normal prevailing charges. Naturally, they have to pay before a certain day each year. The doctors voluntarily came into the scheme; there was no pressure in any way whatsoever. In fact the doctors had a good deal to do with initiating the scheme. There is nothing to prevent the doctors from taking cases outside the scheme. It is still in operation, and I think operating satisfactorily. In fact, speaking from memory once again, I believe there are two such organizations within that community, a town of about 2,500 people. It also takes in the surrounding community. I have often wondered—

Mr. Martin: That is Stettler?

Mr. Shaw: No, Cardston, Alberta. There may be others in Alberta. The hon. member for Acadia says something similar is operating in Drumheller. It occurs to me that probably there is a field that the medical profession should explore. Perhaps they have already done so, but to me it offers much; it guarantees freedom to patients and to the doctor. The hon. member for Lanark, as a representative of the medical profession, indicated that he wanted those things preserved, and certainly I do, too.

Certainly I think the medical profession of this country realize that they are under pressure. I think a good many of them do realize that this pressure is bearing in from all sides, and just when the Minister of National Health and Welfare or his government may weaken, I do not know—weaken in the sense that they may be prevailed upon to go a whole lot farther than they should go into this field of national health insurance.

I say to the medical men, much is going to depend upon you. I commend the type of scheme to which I referred. There may be others which are even better, but let me repeat what I said earlier. We feel that medical and hospital costs could, generally speaking, be brought within the Canadian people's ability to pay, without the regimentation of those Canadian people, without setting up another broad comprehensive administrative organization, costly as they all prove to be sooner or later. Let me say this to the minister. I trust that he as Minister of National Health and Welfare will never be guilty of simply foisting a scheme upon this house and say, take it or leave it. I trust that, if this health insurance study program advances to the point where the minister and the government may think "Well, now, it is time to do something", they will follow the same course of procedure that was followed in consideration of old age pensions, and that a committee of this house or a joint committee of both houses will be set up and be permitted to make a comprehensive study, and call in witnesses.

I am not too impressed by what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said about the views of these forums. I should like to know the membership of these forums. I should like to know where they are located, not only provincially, but where within the provinces. I cannot put too much value on that report until I know more about it. But I do know this. If a joint committee is set up—and I have served on a number of those joint committees—all interested national organizations are allowed to appear and make their representations on behalf of the people of this country. If that is done we shall find out pretty definitely what it is that the people of this country desire.

I know that a petition was circulated in the country not very many years ago. I saw a pile about two feet high on one of the desks of this house; but, Mr. Chairman, that did not impress me, because I for one was never told just exactly what the individual who signed was told or asked. Not only that: it is very easy for one to say, Yes, I want health insurance. But it is quite a different thing when it comes to discussing health insurance or a health program with him and finding out just what particular program he wants.

I stated last November, when we contemplated voting for the C.C.F. subamendment, that we did not want it thought for one moment that we were accepting any specific program that they or anybody else might come up with. We wanted a broadening of health services across the country. I think all hon. members desire to see something like that, but it certainly did not commit us to any specific program.

I should like to see someone in this house, who really wants health insurance, get up some time and give a fairly comprehensive outline of that which he wants us to accept, because the term "health insurance" can mean just about all things to all men, and I should like to know a little bit more about the details of any proposals.

We have said—and I shall repeat it quickly—we believe firmly in the maintenance of individual responsibility, self-help, as it were. I know that the people of this country desire to help themselves. They want to retain that. Certainly, we want to retain the freedom of the doctors and the nurses and the hospitals, and the administrators of the hospitals in the sense that they are elected representatives of the community.

I have laid emphasis before on preventive medicine. In spite of all that has been done, we have slipped back as far as preventive medicine is concerned. I am not depreciating for one moment what the minister's department has done in this field; I am not depreciating for one moment what the provincial departments have done. But I still say that we are lagging behind as far as preventive medicine is concerned, with the result that all across the country people are talking health insurance when they mean sickness insurance. Well, let us attack this thing at its root; let us concentrate more and more on keeping people well.

I am going to say something in a moment about voluntary organizations, and it will be in connection with that. I have said that no matter what program is brought in, whatever services are extended to the people of this country, such can be financed by the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities. Decentralize administration as far as it is possible to do it. Let us have administration on the lowest possible level. Precedents have already been established in this field. Health grants are paid to the provinces for hospital construction. I believe the province matches that dollar for dollar, and the two put together will not build the hospital, and therefore the municipality—if it happens to be a municipal hospital—or whatever the local supporting body may be, will put up the remainder. That hospital is administered at a local level under the provisions of the provincial act. I have always felt and still feel that we should keep the administration there as close to the people as we possibly can if for no other reason than that when things do not go as they should the administrators will be close enough to be kicked where they will feel it most.

I said a moment ago that I trust we will not come into this parliament some session and have some scheme of health insurance suddenly slammed before us. I think the minister followed the proper course in consideration of the old age pension and, for example, in consideration of the veterans charter. This is another field in which that procedure should be followed.

From time to time in this house the minister has paid tribute to voluntary health organizations in this country, but I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that the minister's actions are certainly not a true reflection of his statement in this respect. Indeed, I do not have to go beyond the item provided in these estimates for the voluntary health organizations in this country. One would have to be blind to fail to see the important work that has been done and is still being done by these organizations in this country. But instead of the government creating the impression that they are finding less value in the work of these organizations as time goes on they should, in my opinion, convey to us their belief that these organizations can play an even more important part in the future. Some of these organizations are getting less in grants than they got years ago and some of them operate from year to year with what is nothing more than a paltry sum.

The minister must know that there are more people to be served by these organizations and he must know that their costs, including even postage, have gone up. He must know they are obliged to pay sales tax on many of the things they use to carry out these services. What the minister is indicating is that they should do as much today with their present revenues as they did years ago. That, of course, is fantastic. It seems that the minister has lost part if not all of his appreciation of our voluntary health organizations. Perhaps there is some other explanation but I for one simply cannot understand the present attitude.

The minister, with all the additional burdens which have been placed upon his shoulders, including civil defence covering an amount of $6 million in the estimates, should be tickled to death to see the voluntary organizations taking over more and more of the work in the field of health and welfare which they are perfectly competent to do. I do not think they are looking for any glory. But if there is any glory then the minister can share it.

I think I have given a fair expression to my views on this matter but when we come to deal with these items the minister should anticipate that I am going to put some rather searching questions to him. I said at the commencement of my remarks that while I may criticize I can also pay tribute. Vast strides have been made in this country in the field of health and welfare and I say that with conviction. I will give the minister all the credit in the world for the accomplishments which have been brought about. I think his heart is in the right place but we will still hope that he will not allow any group or body in this country to push him or his department into what I call state medicine.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I have just a question or two to ask the minister. We have all heard about the prevalence of cancer, heart disease, infant mortality and tuberculosis, but we have heard nothing about the causes. I know it is not popular to state what the causes are but I will give my own explanation. Today we spend $868 million on liquor. I know a person can take a drink without hurting anyone. We also spend $465 million on tobacco. A person can take a smoke and not hurt anyone. But we know that many of these illnesses come from hangovers. Lots of people in Canada do not touch drink, but there are many who do and there are lots of these hangovers which hang, as I have found from experience in dealing with many of these people. I say that the $868 million spent on liquor is the cause of mental illness and t.b. and it certainly is the cause of a lot of heart-burning.

My friend the former member for St. Boniface, Dr. Howden, now Senator Howden, told me "Put this in your pipe and smoke it. There are a lot of people who will suddenly drop dead because they are heavy smokers." He said that one of the greatest causes of heart trouble was the use of tobacco. I congratulate the minister on having organized some research along these lines. We are spending $1,333 million on something which does not do anyone any good and we could have health insurance for that amount of money. But my question is, can the minister give us the outstanding causes of cancer, t.b., heart trouble, and infant mortality?

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that if the minister could answer the questions posed by the hon. member for Fort William he would not be sitting here but in a laboratory somewhere drawing a lot of money. However, the figures the hon. member gave in regard to expenditure on liquor and tobacco perhaps add up to the principle enunciated by the hon. member for Red Deer, that this is a matter of individual choice. You can drink or smoke yourself to death if you so desire.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Gillis: It is a question of individual freedom and of course we might as well smoke here as in the hereafter.

Mr. Pickersgill: We may do both.

Mr. Gillis: It is rather unfortunate that a debate such as this, which means so much to the people of Canada, should take place in the dying days of the session when so many things which are not so important to our people are dragged along from day to day resulting in a great waste of time.

At the outset I want to say that when the hon. member for Lanark was talking and I asked him to define "state medicine", I was not being offensive. He is one member in the House of Commons whose opinion I value highly on any subject pertaining to the health and welfare department. But I have heard that term thrown around rather loosely not only in connection with health insurance but in connection with many other matters. Any time that the suggestion is made that the government should be interested in any particular matter, someone starts to say, "Oh, that is socialism". I think that propaganda about "state medicine" emanated largely from the American Medical Association, but nobody ever defines it much. It is just a catchword that has been thrown around without anyone stopping to consider exactly what it means.

To my mind the situation in Canada today with regard to the health of our people and their ability to get any kind of health services, after at least 50 years of our present medical set-up, is such that it makes necessary some form of concerted action on the part of governments to try to sort out some kind of mechanics whereby it will be possible to bring to the people who need it the medical science that is now available. It has certainly been proven that neither the voluntary health organization nor the free, unrestricted system that many people like to claim is best has measured up to the requirements. There is a big gap there and that gap must be filled by someone. That someone must be the organization which has the facilities, the finances and the personnel with which properly to plan that over-all scheme. For my money, the only agency in Canada that is able to fill that gap is the federal government. We do not need to quibble about that matter; that fact has been fairly well proven.

As to the matter of money, although we used to quarrel about this question I do not think we should quarrel about it any longer. Before the last war a million dollars looked like a great deal of money, and money was a mysterious, elusive thing that was hard to get. But when that war broke out we did not have any difficulty in getting money. It is too bad we could not drive that principle home to Malenkov and all others who try to make war.

I was just looking at a return that was tabled in the House of Commons for the hon. member for York South on the cost of the last two wars. We spent $22,482,036,080. That figure does not take into consideration the interest, nor does it take into consideration the loss of life: 60,000 young Canadians in the first war and 45,000 in the last. That is just the actual money involved.

Mr. Nicholson: Dollars and cents.

Mr. Gillis: Yes, dollars and cents, without counting the interest. We now find ourselves in this position, in the kind of world in which we are living. If we are forced into that kind of thing again, we will not measure in terms of dollars and cents the services this country will render in that field.

I was looking over—and this is a good witness to call—the monthly letter of the Royal Bank of Canada. They are not particularly radical; they are not socialistic. This letter was put out in January. It was their contribution to national health week. I should like hon. members to remember this when we think in terms of government, the state and the nation. In the first paragraph of that news letter they had this to say:

> Conservation of life is foremost among material things in the minds of men. Benjamin Disraeli, one of history's most distinguished practitioners of political science, remarked: "the health of the people is the foundation upon which all their happiness and all their powers as a state depend."

Unless you have healthy people, you have not a healthy nation. When we are talking about this subject, let us remember that fact and put it in its proper perspective. In the final analysis, the most important subject that the House of Commons can consider—and let us divorce it from dollars and cents—is the health of the Canadian people. How good is that health?

This monthly letter of the Royal Bank gives us a few figures. I think they fairly well pinpoint the fact that the great majority of Canadians cannot afford any kind of health services. They give us some dominion bureau of statistics figures, and I am going to quote them:

> Out of an estimated 4½ million family units, there were 621,000 which spent nothing for medical, dental, hospital or any other sort of health care during that period, while 757,000 spent less than $20. Beyond that sum the figures were:
|---|---|
| between $20 and $49 | 938,000 |
| $50 and $99 | 994,000 |
| $100 and $199 | 839,000 |
| $200 and $499 | 343,000 |
| over $500 | 63,000 |

I think those figures reveal the fact that almost half of that group are getting no medical care whatsoever. As to the group in which from $200 to $499 was spent, I think those figures represent the average that should be spent by every Canadian family. No family which is not spending that amount of money on checking up on the teeth and proper examination—and this is where my friend's preventive medicine comes in—is spending what is necessary. That is the amount of money necessary to be spent in any family if you are going to call a doctor in for the ordinary ills of children from a year old up to about 15 years of age, when you must get their tonsils fixed up, their eyes looked after and their teeth properly cared for. If you are getting away with $200 to $400 a year, that is about normal. You are not spending what you should spend, but that is about the average that I think should be spent. Look at the terrific number of people who are spending under that amount and who are not able to spend anything.

I want to tell my hon. friend, for whom I have a great deal of respect—and he is a good friend of mine—that the only way to have preventive medicine is to have a system whereby the average family can call in a doctor when slight signs of some disability appear. It is too late for this to be done when there is a raging fever or when some disease has become fully developed. The only way in which to get preventive medicine is to make medicine and doctors available to people for proper examinations before real trouble develops.

With respect to the ability of the provinces to handle the problem, it has been the policy for some considerable time to let them look after it. But the provinces are not able to take care of the problem, and I think that has been very clearly demonstrated in the national health grants. I have in my hand the answers to two questions asked by the hon. member for York South, which answers were given on January 25, 1954. He asked two questions which make clear the ability of the provinces to look after health services even with the grants made at the present time. These were the questions:

> 1. What is the amount that was available for each province for each year since 1948 under the federal health grant program?
> 2. What is the amount that was actually paid to each province for each year since 1948 under that program?

The figures are given for all the provinces but I am not going to take the time to put them on the record. Over the period from 1948 to 1953 the total amount of money advanced to the provinces under the health grants was $93,981,553. What amount of money was available? The amount available to the provinces during that period was $167,407,851. Over $167 million was available under these matching grants and the provinces only took something over $93 million. They are not able to match the grants dollar for dollar as is mandatory.

Mr. Martin: This is a very interesting speech the hon. member is making, but there are only three matching grants. The others are non-matching.

Mr. Gillis: I am talking about matching grants.

Mr. Martin: Of all the grants there are only three that are matching. The others are all outright.

Mr. Gillis: That is right. But these figures clearly show that the federal government during that period had some $167 million which was available to the provinces under the matching grant scheme but all the provinces were able to take was something over $93 million of the amount that was available. That points up the fact very clearly that the provinces do not have the resources to co-operate with the federal government in building up a program across the country. I also have the Ontario figures here because I thought that was one province that would have been able to take all the money available to it. However, it did not. From 1948 to 1953 the total amount of money Ontario received was $25,409,171, but the amount that was available to them was $52,298,392. That province was not able to take some $26,889,221 that was available to it by way of grants because they did not have sufficient revenue in their own province. You can see that a huge amount of money was available for health services from the federal government if the provinces had been able to take advantage of it.

Mr. McIlraith: Or chose to take it.

Mr. Gillis: That is right, either the one or the other. But in my opinion these figures definitely dispel the illusion that a solution can be found under any kind of scheme other than an over-all national health plan worked out in co-operation with the provinces, with the administration left to the provinces and the financing and direction left in the hands of the federal government, because they seem to be the only agency that has the money to do the job.

Voluntary organizations were perhaps all right at their inception, but the health problem has increased to such an extent that they are no longer able to do very much about it. I am not going to criticize any particular organization but I am going to give an example right in this city. I am going to take the case of the civil servants, most of whom live in Ottawa. They have the Blue Cross and civil service plans available to them, but after having insured themselves for hospitalization they find themselves in the position that they cannot get into a hospital. At the Civic Hospital there is a waiting list of from 1,500 to 1,700, and at the General Hospital there are another 1,500 to 1,600 applications. Bed space is not available.

These organizations are selling hospitalization insurance and they are not able to provide hospitalization. You will find many civil servants in this city who are paying for both the Blue Cross and the civil service health plans, but when there is illness in the home that requires hospitalization they are not able to get a bed in a hospital and therefore they have got to make a little hospital in a room at home. They call a doctor and they pay $3 for each visit he makes. They hire a nurse if it is necessary. They are not protected against the cost of such an illness at home even though they are paying under two hospitalization schemes.

If the patient is in a hospital the doctor's fee is paid while the patient is hospitalized, but if the organization that is selling the insurance cannot provide the hospital space they do not pay the doctor's fee for attendance on the patient in his own home. I say that these organizations are selling a commodity that they are not able to deliver. While there are many good people at the head of these organizations, and while their intentions are good, the problem of health so far as hospitalization and doctors are concerned has increased to such an extent that these organizations are not able to deliver the goods. In my judgment the only answer is an over-all health program.

With respect to the question of the name, I am not particular what you call anything if it provides the service, and I do not care much what somebody thinks about state medicine, nationalization and so on. I say that because the great majority of the people who use these terms loosely are merely repeating propaganda they have been subjected to over the years without taking very much time to think the matter through or to read authoritative works on the subject.

Let us take an example we have right in Canada. Let us take our veterans hospitals throughout the country. I am sure that no hon. member would say that these hospitals are state controlled and subject to dictatorship and regimentation. In every province of Canada the best hospitals are the veterans hospitals. No private hospital has the equipment you will find in the veterans hospitals, and in each one of these hospitals they have all the necessary services. They are built near university centres. They have the services of the university people and the best doctors in the Dominion of Canada who are found in the areas adjacent to these hospitals. That is paid for out of the consolidated revenue fund. On this question of contributory or non-contributory, I may say that is contributory. The taxpayers of Canada contribute towards it. We have a graduated tax structure in Canada under which he who makes the most pays the most. It is as close as you can get to a taxation system for that purpose of helping to pay for these hospitals. These hospitals are working well. They are fully staffed, and their services are unlimited. Improvements are made from month to month as they come along and new equipment and new techniques are adopted.

In considering other institutions, I do not need to go outside of my own area. We have had a panel system operated on a co-operative basis for a good many years. In this instance, we are paying to keep well. We pay the doctor and the hospital approximately $130 a year between the two of them. We pay that when we are well, and when we are sick both the doctor and hospital are available to us for as long as we are sick. There is no limit to it. These institutions are certified, they are up to date and they meet the requirements. While that is so, the report on them for the past twenty years has been one increase after another in the rates. The services and equipment are deteriorating and the hospital is going further and further into debt all the time.

The hospitals in that area today are in the position where they are asking for either the provincial or federal government to help them to keep their doors open and maintain some kind of service. In the face of that, something has to be done. The only agency of which I am aware is this agency, the federal government.

Now, if anyone wants a definition of the kind of thing we have in mind by way of a national health service for this country, I may say that my conception of it is the sort of thing that has been done in our veterans hospitals. If we can do that for the veteran population, there is no reason why we cannot do it for the civilian population right across this country. I hope the time is not far distant when, instead of those inside this house or outside of it quarrelling about terms and about regimentation, we try to get our heads together and develop a system in this country whereby we can make the benefits of medical science available to all our people.

I recall that in 1944 I had the privilege of visiting France for a short time. I spent an evening at a big military hospital near Saint-Malo. There was a group of Canadian doctors there, and before we left there was one little fellow who sat down and said, "I should like to talk to you fellows before you go". He asked what progress we had made in Canada on this question of an over-all medical scheme and I said, "We are doing a lot of talking about it, but we have not done very much about the actual mechanics of it". He said, "I hope you will". "You know," he said, "before I came into the army I was practising medicine in a city in Canada and I specialized in abdominal surgery. I had a little office to myself. I was not on the hospital board, so I could not work in a hospital. I had two miracle bottles, one on this shelf and one on the other shelf, and when people came in to see me, I knew a lot of them needed surgery. I could not afford to give it to them, and they could not afford to buy it. When the war broke out my qualifications were checked, they sent for me and I went down to Ottawa. I put on a uniform and they made me a lieutenant colonel. I came over to England, went into a hospital and found myself with nurses at my disposal. I found myself with laboratories, technicians and all kinds of equipment of which I had dreamed. My wife was receiving an adequate allowance and I was receiving a salary cheque. I no longer had any economic problem, and I began to think in terms of a doctor. I was really a doctor. I had heard a lot about the question of state medicine before I came into the army, and I was scared to death of it, but I am convinced this is it; this is the kind of thing about which the people were talking. I hope when the war is over you will not scrap all this wonderful equipment we have built up, so that when I leave the army I will have to go back to those two miracle bottles". That was his conception of it, and it is true. I say that merely for the purpose of trying to get this business of terms straightened out.

I do not think there is any quarrel amongst very many of us in this house about wanting to get something done. We will not get anything done as long as we continue throwing this kind of talk across the house to the minister, who I know wants this sort of thing done as badly as any of us. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was quite right when he said the minister has to fight the treasury board on this question. I do not believe money should be considered when we are considering health. I believe that medical science in Canada is available in abundance if we would only unharness it from the economic disability under which it now exists. I believe the federal government can do the job if some of the provinces would give up this wish to preside over a little domain they have.

I rose, Mr. Chairman, with the intention of saying something else, but in listening to the discussion I was led to make these remarks. The subject I wanted to discuss is one that I know the minister would rather leave until another time. However, it is so quiet this afternoon, and everyone is in such a receptive mood, I feel it would not be a bad time to get it on the record and let other members think about it. I believe it would be very helpful to the minister. I have another thing in mind. On March 12 the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys suggested to me that I might leave a certain discussion on his estimates until the item for the coal board was under consideration. I have been waiting since March 12 for a statement of policy on that subject. While I have all the faith in the world in the honesty and integrity of the minister, I still believe this is a very good time, in this quiet atmosphere, to get this subject off my chest.

I believe it is important because, like health insurance, the matter of civil defence is a controversial subject. It is mentioned in all the newspapers, and has been debated in the British House of Commons. I have read a lot of statements about it. The statement that impressed me the most was made by Sir Winston Churchill to his own House of Commons. He warned them not to fool themselves by scrapping everything they had built up by way of civil defence. He told them not to adopt an attitude that because this atomic bomb or hydrogen bomb is a desperate weapon we do not have to do anything about it except to sit around and commit mass suicide. I disagreed with the minister—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to interrupt him at this time, not with the slightest intention of making a ruling. I understand quite well that we are considering the first item of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I was going to suggest to the hon. member that the subject of civil defence is such a wide and specialized one that if we held our discussion on item 288, which makes provision for more than $6 million, we would then have consecutive and concentrated debate on that one subject; whereas if the hon. member raises the subject now, while the next two or three speakers may not refer to it, it may be referred to again by others, and the debate would not be devoted solidly to that subject.

The hon. member is certainly within his right if he prefers to discuss the matter now, but I do feel that if we could hold this discussion to one particular time it could be carried out more satisfactorily.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I always try to accommodate the chairman and obey the rules of the house. I appreciate fully what you say. However, on the first item of the minister's estimates you will find there will be all kinds of discussion on all kinds of subjects.

Mr. Martin: May I make one observation, because I know my hon. friend is interested in this subject. I would have no reluctance whatever to having this item discussed under the general item, but I think in fairness I should say that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration did say, when today's business was being discussed, that there would be agreement to discussion of the estimates of this department on the understanding that, because of the absence of certain hon. members, there would be no discussion of the specific item of civil defence at this time.

If my hon. friend were to proceed to speak on civil defence, then he would put me in a position where I would find it very difficult to make a statement of policy, or whatever reply should be made, in the absence of those hon. members. I just offer those observations for the consideration of my hon. friend who generally—not only generally but always—is co-operative.

Mr. Gillis: I appreciate the minister's position. It may be that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration may have made an agreement with some hon. members who are absent from the house. Likely they will be back on Monday or Tuesday. But I have not made any commitments on that score. If the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration wants to blame me for it, I am quite prepared to take the blame. But let me say that any hon. member who wants to be away for a day or two has no right to expect me or other hon. members who are here to sit around the House of Commons waiting for him to come back to speak on any subject.

So long as my forty minutes last, I am going to discuss this subject now. I like always to bow to the will of the Chair, and I like to accommodate the minister. But this is a subject concerning which I have done considerable thinking. I might point out to the minister that I was invited to go back to my riding in connection with matters that were very important to me, but I did not go. And I did not go for the simple reason that I was expecting subjects in which I was interested to come up in the house. I had four invitations to be away—one to open a hospital, another to attend a mock parliament, which the hon. member for Nanaimo very kindly took in my place, and there were two other functions. But my place is here; and there is no other member in the House of Commons who can make an agreement for anyone else, or who can say that members who are here are not to be permitted to discuss certain subjects.

I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, but this subject is one—the only one—in the minister's estimates that I wish to discuss. And as I am within my rights I am going to say a few words on it. And I want to say those few words for this reason, that this matter now is a controversial one—as to whether it should be under the Department of National Defence or under the Department of National Health and Welfare.

We will soon be discussing the estimates of the Minister of National Defence, and this subject will get a drilling there also.

I have thought out pretty carefully what I have to say on this subject, and because I have wanted to be careful I have made some notes. Civil defence is directed toward providing protection and security for our people in the event of war, just as the other social measures that come under the minister's department help to provide some measure of security and protection in time of peace. And on that point, as to whether it is the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare or that of the Department of National Defence, in my judgment it belongs definitely within the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Civil defence is essentially a humanitarian activity, directed toward saving life, not taking life. For this reason it is a most appropriate responsibility for the department of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. And there is another consideration: civil defence is primarily a civilian activity. While it must be closely co-ordinated with military preparations, it is not properly a function of the armed forces.

National defence, in so far as military requirements are concerned, is a national concern and, as such, is a purely federal responsibility. But civil defence is the joint concern of federal, provincial and local authorities; and in the final analysis the main burden must rest upon the individual community, since for the most part civil defence is a matter of utilizing to the best effect a community's own services—police, fire, hospital, welfare and other facilities already in existence.

Because of the co-operative nature of civil defence, concerning as it does all three levels of government, it seems appropriate that this matter should come under a department of the federal government that, perhaps more than any other, has a record of successful co-operation with the provinces in so many areas of health and welfare activities.

Civil defence in Canada is now five years old. I do not think many Canadians would claim that we have as yet developed anywhere in this country civil defence organizations that could cope successfully with the full effects of modern warfare. But I do believe that most fair-minded persons would concede that very considerable progress has been made over the past few years. For this progress, the credit must go in large measure to the leadership provided at the federal level.

Members of the House of Commons had an opportunity to visit the new civil defence college at Arnprior a short time ago. I did not have the privilege of making that visit. On the morning I was supposed to go the committee on veterans affairs was to meet, and the chairman of the committee suggested that any members who had planned to take the trip should postpone it because important matters were being discussed by the veterans affairs committee. But my friend, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, made the visit and took notes of it. Upon his return he briefed me very thoroughly; and I am sure that before this debate is concluded he will have something to say as to the facilities available there.

I understand those facilities will provide for the training of approximately 2,000 persons a year. It should be acknowledged however that these 2,000, in turn, are able to train many additional thousands in their home provinces and communities. I have made some inquiries and I find that in my own province of Nova Scotia 235 persons have been trained in civil defence, many of these at federal schools and at federal expense. Perhaps this is not a large number, but it provides a useful nucleus around which to build an organization.

Another field in which leadership is coming from Ottawa is in the matter of providing certain types of equipment for training purposes which I am told now exceeds $2 million. Many of the activities now being undertaken will have peacetime value. For example, the federal authorities have agreed to pay a share of the cost of standardizing hose couplings in any province wishing to go ahead with such a plan. I am told that in some provinces there are as many as 70 or 80 different sizes, shapes and threads of fire hydrants and fire hose couplings. Obviously, without standardization one community is helpless to answer a call of a neighbour who happens to have a hose of a different size. This program would be most advantageous for normal firefighting purposes, quite apart from its civil defence application.

I note in the estimates that the grants to the provinces have been increased from

$1,400,000 to $2 million. We welcome this substantial increase in federal aid available for civil defence. However, from the information I have I understand that only a small proportion of the money available was actually taken up last year. It is the same thing over again as the hospital and health grants. The provinces find themselves unable—

Mr. McIlraith: Or unwilling, which?

Mr. Gillis: —to take the money that is available because they just have not got the facilities to handle it. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to tell the committee what steps he proposes to take to encourage the provinces to make fuller use of this additional money for civil defence. I want to say to the minister I am not expecting an answer now. At any time it is convenient to him, before his estimates are disposed of, I shall be quite satisfied to get an answer to any question I am posing at this time.

Every hon. member will have been concerned over reports we have had in recent months on the destructive effects of the latest weapons devised by science. Many people are suggesting that the H-bomb and similar weapons make civil defence planning useless. The wider area of destruction that is now possible means that communities round and about the target area must be organized to come to the help of the stricken community. This means that in communities, large and small across Canada, civil defence activities should be stepped up rather than curtailed.

The senior governments are now giving good leadership, and it is up to the authorities in individual cities, towns and villages to take whatever steps are needed to bring their local plans and programs to more adequate levels. Naturally we do not agree with everything done by the federal government in this field or in any other; but it is only fair to commend the minister on the realistic way in which this problem has been tackled over the past three years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, whether I put these remarks on the record at this time, or whether I did it next week, my reason for doing so would have been the same. I was alarmed over the attitude taken in many communities in Britain, the attitude of abandoning civil defence altogether, and that there is no defence against the hydrogen bomb. Then, there is the growing feeling in at least some sections of the press that we are wasting money on civil defence and all that kind of thing. Well, I am not one who is convinced that we are going to live in peace for the rest of our natural lives. With the arms build-up that there is in the world today there is always the danger of someone getting trigger-happy.

As far as civil defence in Canada is concerned today, it is a matter of coming in to do rescue work. If Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto were hit, it would not be a matter of what is available in the city that counts, but what is available in the surrounding area and the availability of the equipment that will work in any section across Canada. The standardization of hose couplings is very important, and if we never have a war, the type of training that these men and women are getting today in the civil defence schools can be used in this country or in any other country for a good many years to come. Disaster can happen anywhere. The burning of the Noronic in Toronto harbour caused such casualties that it required a lot of trained assistance along those lines. Then there are mine explosions. We have had too many in Nova Scotia in the last three years, three of them to be exact, with a great loss of life. A condition of that kind requires the immediate help of those trained to assist in a disaster of that kind. Earthquakes are still not ruled out. Bad fires still break out in many communities, and the more people we could have trained in the field of civil defence work at the present time the better it would be for Canada. This should be done not only in anticipation of war; it is good training to be carried out at any time.

I am sorry I was not able to co-operate with you, Mr. Chairman, in making those remarks at this time, and I am certainly sorry I was not able to accommodate the minister. This is one subject in his estimates that I have done some thinking about, and I felt that at this time it was my right to put my thoughts on the record.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to—

Mr. Martin: May I make a suggestion to my hon. friend? We have had a general discussion now, and the estimates of this department, as the committee knows, particularly those members who have been here for some years, are particularized. In view of the general discussion, would my hon. friend not find it convenient to discuss whatever he has in mind on the various items as we come to them? I think we would make more progress in that way. I make that suggestion to my hon. friend, if he would acquiesce.

Mr. Hansell: May I make a suggestion to the minister? The hon. member for Fraser Valley has other engagements today. It is Saturday, you know, and tomorrow is Sunday, and he would like to discuss something on this item. I do not think he will require any more time than just once.

Mr. Patterson: I appreciate the minister's attitude, and I assure him that the remarks I shall make are going to be brief. One of the matters is not referred to at all in the estimates and I believe there is a separate section dealing with the other. However, I want to say how much we do appreciate the legislation brought in dealing with matters of health and welfare in our nation. I was thinking just recently of the legislation in regard to the disability pensions. At the moment right across Canada there is a great deal of joy and satisfaction that that particular matter has been dealt with.

However, as I looked over the estimates I failed to find anything at all with respect to assistance to the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society. Some time ago I had quite a number of communications—

Mr. Martin: That is under health grants. We give quite substantial grants to them.

Mr. Patterson: I do not see it listed at all.

Mr. Martin: It is under health grants; it is almost $80,000.

Mr. Patterson: Is it listed as a separate item?

Mr. Martin: No; it is under the general grants. We make many of these. The hon. member will find it when we come to them.

Mr. Patterson: Some time ago I had a considerable number of communications with regard to the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society. Those who were suffering from those diseases and had received the benefits of the treatment from that particular organization urged me to give my support to any matters that came up in this particular respect, and to urge the department, the government and the minister to do all they possibly could to assist this worthy organization in carrying out their splendid work.

I am very happy that this item is included although I fail to see any reason for it under this particular heading. There is one other matter to which I wish to refer and to which reference has been made on a number of occasions. I would again urge upon the government and the minister the importance of giving further consideration to the matter of old age pensions.

In the Montreal Gazette of April 7, 1954, there was an article which presented very vividly the plight of many of those who are on old age pension. The article is headed, "Starved Woman's Case Shows Pensioners' Plight". I would like to read a few brief excerpts:

> Out of her $40 old age pension each month, $35 was taken to pay the rent.
> The remainder, five dollars, bought a month's "supply" of food.
> Her plight, by no means an isolated case, has focused attention on the struggle of unattached pensioners to subsist on their monthly allotment.

The article then goes on to quote Mr. G. B. Clarke, general secretary of the family welfare association, as follows:

> "There is no doubt about it, $40 per month is a Godsend to old people living with their families, or for those who have some additional income.
> "But in this day and age, it is impossible to live on $40 alone. I would say $60 would be the very minimum for a month."

Then further down in the article we have this brief statement:

> There are many old people on a bread and tea diet in this city.
> And they are the most pathetic cases, living out their old age in want and poverty.

Then I would like to refer to an editorial taken from the January 20 edition of the Vancouver Province:

> Now that the federal cabinet ministers and members of parliament have arranged among themselves for a handsome increase in yearly income . . . they might give some thought to the plight of people vastly poorer off than they—people who are really suffering.

I do not quote this editorial in any spirit of criticism because I am sure the house will remember that our group gave its support to the increase made at that time. However, I think I am justified in drawing the plight of these people to the attention of this house. Further on this article states:

> But in the cabins and bare apartments and chill furnished rooms where some thousands of old age pensioners drag out a sorry existence, there is not even an appearance of comfort. There is just enough to get by with at the best of times, and in these freezing winter days, any penny that goes for extra heat must be deducted from the allowance for food. How could it be otherwise on a pension of $40 a month? How could it be much different even in those provinces where the pension is augmented a little?

I might point out that in British Columbia there is a $15 supplement to the pension from the province. The article continues:

> If the country can afford to double the salary of a member of the Commons or the Senate, it can afford to be just, if not generous, to the people who have worn themselves out making this country and have won little or nothing for themselves in the making.

I thought it advisable to bring that to the attention of the minister to emphasize again our plea on behalf of those who are living on the old age pension. Of course there are many other cases we could draw to the attention of the government, but I feel one is sufficient, and I would just like to place myself on record this afternoon as requesting that further consideration be given to our old age pensioners. I appreciate the courtesy extended to me by hon. members in permitting me to make these remarks at this time rather than later on in the discussion.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry not to defer to the suggestion made by the minister but I promise I shall not take any longer now than I might do later on, and I will not be any duller now than I might be later on. I would like to have the same confidence as the hon. member for Cape Breton South that the quiet and peaceful atmosphere in this house means that everyone is listening. At any rate, there is a kind of calm which it is suggested to me will not be continued if we sit tonight.

I want to say a few words following what the hon. member for Red Deer said in regard to encouragement to the voluntary organizations. When we spend $816 million in the department and, I think, something in the nature of $150,000 for the voluntary organizations then there seems to me to be a terrible disparity. I want to make some suggestions to the minister along that line. The hon. member for Cape Breton South told us to forget about regimentation, get our heads together and do something. My comment on that is that I think we have got to be very clear in our own mind as to what we believe is a proper division between government activity and the activities of the voluntary organizations, and it is because I think there is a danger that the voluntary organizations—

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member permit me to give an illustration of the difficulty? We are now talking about assistance to voluntary organizations. But in the estimates my hon. friend will find there are grants to the national Health League of Canada, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and other voluntary organizations, and from the limited number mentioned by my hon. friend he concludes that the grants to the voluntary organizations are very limited. But that does not give a true picture and it is only when we get into the estimates that a true picture can be given. For example, take the national health grants but under that item there are grants of $3 million to the voluntary organizations. That would not appear except when we are discussing the national health grants program. Consequently I think my hon. friend will find that he will obtain more information in the way I have suggested. I do not want to ask him to fall in with my suggestion if he feels he cannot do so, but I thought I would explain the situation.

Mr. Macdonnell: Again I am sorry I cannot defer to the minister, but I might encourage him by saying that I shall be reasonably brief. One of my reasons, and I think this will make him smile, is that I have not yet abandoned hope that something might be done for some of these organizations which in the midst of the universal plenty in the department are actually getting less than they got 20 or 30 years ago. It is because I wish to raise certain points which arise in my mind in regard to this that I might seem to the minister to be rather disobliging.

Now, monopoly is monopoly wherever we find it. It could be under the aegis of a socialist government, and we have an indication this afternoon that the hon. member for Cape Breton South would like it that way, or it could be under the aegis of a government that does not call itself socialist. I am sure it is not displeasing and indeed comforting to the minister to feel that over $800 million is flowing out from his department in a kind of beneficent stream which goes into hundreds of thousands of homes. I do not suppose there is any reference to authorization by the Minister of National Health and Welfare when the cheques are received, but still the people do know it, and they associate these cheques with the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Now I think this comforting thought might very easily develop into a belief that what is done by the minister in his department is really better done than it can be by anyone else, and it could easily run into the feeling that, after all, "what are these private organizations. They are very small potatoes, so why bother about them." It is because I want to suggest to the minister that the voluntary organizations are very much worth while, not only by reason of what they themselves do but by reason of what they assist him to do that I want to read onto the record one or two opinions of people whose opinions the minister will value more than he will value mine.

I think there are two main reasons for keeping these voluntary organizations alive and vigorous. The first one is to keep alive in the community those feelings which are represented by voluntary organizations, namely a sense of responsibility for other people and a quickening of the sympathy and understanding which is necessary if the community is to be the kind of vital community which it should be. In this connection I want to make reference to one or two short quotations from a book by Sidney and Beatrice Webb who, of course, approach this matter strongly from the socialist point of view but who have one or two extremely interesting things to say about the important place left for voluntary organizations. I say again, Mr. Chairman, that it is only because of the fact that it is quite possible for this consideration to be lost sight of or to be underestimated that I take a few minutes of the time of the committee.

It is interesting to go back into the nineteenth century and to realize the two extreme and contrasting attitudes which there were in existence at that time. I am quoting now from page 222 of this book entitled "The Prevention of Destitution":

> There are still many good people among us who instinctively resent any discouragement of the personal impulse to give alms or to perform "good works" as a religious duty by which we "acquire merit" or do glory unto God, quite irrespective of the effect really produced upon the recipients and beneficiaries. To them, at least in theory, personal charity is everything. On the other hand, there are still amongst us representatives of the unspoken views of the "early Victorian" economists, who regard every kind of philanthropic action as a hideous mistake, calculated to undermine the independence and lessen the energy of the poor, and even to promote the survival of the unfit. To them, personal charity and government provision are, at least in theory, alike anathema.

We have got away beyond the idea of charity in this matter; we have got beyond it to the point of the rights of the citizen in the community, and we are now conferring benefits on the citizens of the community, not as a matter of charity but as a matter of right, which we all accept. It is because, in that situation, I think there is so much that can usefully be done by the private organizations that I wish to read another short paragraph from page 250 of the same book. The writers have just referred to the responsibility which must rest on public authorities for dealing with various types of need. Then they say:

> On the other hand, though the public authority concerned must be responsible for the adequate treatment of all the cases needing attention, this does not mean that it need do, for all cases, everything that needs to be done. There is, as we shall see, an enormous part of the work which voluntary agencies can do better than the public authorities, in which they can bring to bear their specific advantages on particular cases or classes of cases, or in particular parts of the treatment of all cases. In every branch of social work, with regard to every conceivable class of case, there is the utmost need for the initiative, the inventiveness, and the practical experimenting which voluntary agencies have so much at their command.

I might read more, Mr. Chairman, but I am trying to keep this speech as short as I can.

I now wish to read an extract from an article by a man well known to the minister as well as to all who are interested in social work. I refer to Philip S. Fisher who has occupied many important positions in the field of voluntary effort. He says one or two things that I wish briefly to quote. At page 27 of Canadian Welfare of May 1, 1953, he states:

> May I give you my definition of welfare? Whether it is case work or group work, whether it deals with indigency or sickness or maladjustment, the function of welfare is to make a dependent person less dependent.

Then, a little later on, at page 28 he states:

> I suppose of all the differences between government and voluntary operation, the most fundamental is that a government has the power of coercion whereas a voluntary operation must rely on co-operation. Frankly, I recognize that the power of coercion must exist in certain areas, but no one will ever make me like it, or make me believe that it should be used except in situations where all other means towards uniformity of action will fail.
> I value tremendously the freedom of will and freedom of action used, not in the direction of irresponsibility, but in the direction of voluntary collaboration for the benefit of the community.

And finally, from page 31:

> If a government department spends $10,000, it presumably gets $10,000 worth. If it gives $10,000 to a voluntary agency, that frequently breeds an expansion of service, and of giving on the part of volunteers, with the result that twenty, thirty, forty or fifty thousand dollars may be available for welfare.
>
> More than that, government support is a moral endorsement which can be very helpful to a volunteer operation. Here is an area where government can give leadership in advance of public opinion—at least as long as the stakes are reasonable.
> As a quid pro quo, there is one service which private organizations can often perform for government departments, that is, the service of interpretation and support. Who better than the private agency can help the public agencies in interpreting their functions to the public, and in promoting their budgets? Government grants to private agencies can be good for government departments as well as for the agencies they help.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer briefly to one or two comments made regarding one of these agencies in particular, namely the Health League of Canada. Its grant has been grievously cut down. Out of a great many statements in support of the league, I wish to read briefly from three. The first is from Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour:

> In this, however, as in the other activities of the league, I believe that constructive and valuable work is being done, and I have therefore no hesitation in joining in the representations which you are making to the Hon. Paul Martin, Minister of National Health and Welfare, in this connection.

Second, I wish to read a short quotation from Msgr. Ferdinand Vandry, rector of Laval University. I have the pleasure of knowing him. He is a wise and eminent citizen of our country:

(Translation):

> In order to continue to fulfil its duty with efficiency, this organization needs considerable additional revenue. Accordingly I would be very happy if the Canadian government could see fit to give in accordance with the recommendations contained in the brief of the Canadian health league and to raise the annual grant from $10,000 to $25,000 in favour of this meritorious organization.

Mr. Martin: Very well spoken.

Mr. Macdonnell: Ah! thank you, sir. (Text):

I venture to translate that quotation as follows: In order to continue to fulfil its duty with efficiency, this organization needs considerable additional revenue. Accordingly I would be very happy if the Canadian government could see fit in accordance with the recommendations contained in the brief of the Canadian health league to raise the grant in favour of this meritorious organization from $10,000 to $25,000.

Finally, I wish to read as my third quotation one from Mr. B. K. Sandwell:

I desire to extend my unqualified support to the brief of the Health League of Canada and to the league's request for the increase of its government grant to $25,000.

I am convinced that this expenditure, made through a voluntary society, will produce far better results in the education of public opinion on health subjects than any direct action by the government itself, and that these results will amply justify the grant—as indeed the results in past years have more than justified the very moderate grants which the league has received.

I just wish to end where I began. The minister is going to point out that my figure of $150,000 is not a fair comparison with $816 million. I shall of course accept the minister's correction when he gives it, but when he has made that correction I am sure that having regard to the totals involved the grants to these organizations, assuming that they are doing good work, are beggarly in the extreme. To be able to say with truth that the national health league gets half, I believe, of what it got many years ago can only be construed, so far as I can see, to mean that as we have extended public participation in welfare we have sought to dry up and lessen the work of the voluntary organizations. I hope that is not so.

Mr. Martin: You would be surprised at how much of our money goes to voluntary organizations.

Mr. Macdonnell: I hope that is not so. I hope the minister will be able to satisfy me it is not so. I have to say to the minister what he already knows, that there are some very responsible people who feel most disappointed at the attitude of the department.

Indians and Eskimos health services—
261. Operation and maintenance, $15,440,038.

Mr. Hahn: As the hon. member for Red Deer said, Mr. Chairman, I want to give you a chance to catch your breath. However, that is not my prime reason for rising at this time. The hon. member for Fraser Valley, who had to leave a few moments ago, asked me to draw an article in the Chilliwack Progress to the minister's attention and to get information first of all as to whether or not the matter referred to has been approved by the government. The Chilliwack Progress of Wednesday, April 14, 1954 has this to say:

Authorization of an additional expenditure of $15,451.33 for improvements to the Coqualeetza Indian hospital brings the total expenditure on the institution to $624,451, it was announced today by George Cruickshank, former Fraser Valley M.P.

It goes on to say that the minister will be there to open the new wing officially. I was asked to ask the minister whether the government had authorized this expenditure, whether it had been approved and whether we are to consider in future that defeated candidates are the official spokesmen so far as releases from the minister's department are concerned.

Mr. Martin: We are going to complete the work at Sardis at a cost of some $340,000, and the Coqualeetza hospital will have the very doubtful honour of being reopened by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Hansell: What about the latter part of the question?

Mr. Hahn: Are we to consider that in future Mr. Cruickshank will be the minister's spokesman for that area?

Mr. Martin: I will have to give consideration to that important matter.

Mr. Studer: How do they do it in Alberta?

Mr. Michener: I have been interested in the treatment of the item having to do with provision for increases in salaries which appears in all of the departmental estimates. I notice that it ranges from as low as 3 per cent in some of the branches of the minister's department to 9 or 10 per cent in other cases. I also notice that the allowance for increased pay does not seem to vary very much depending on the increase or decrease in staff. Would the minister say something about the method of making provision for increases in pay generally in the national health branch?

Mr. Martin: Our salaries, like the salaries of any other department, are generally fixed by the civil service commission. We do not have any control over the situation except to make recommendations with respect to the length of service and the grade of the official. The salary range itself is something that is not determined by the department.

Mr. Michener: I assume these estimates are largely to cover routine promotions according to principle and scale depending on seniority.

Mr. Martin: And the general salary increases throughout the government service.

Mr. Michener: And 8 per cent is roughly the average throughout the government service under such items.

Mr. Martin: That is right. The only salaries we would really control would be those of the two deputy ministers, the minister's private secretary and that sort of thing, but generally speaking the situation is as I have outlined.

Mr. Michener: My calculation of the numbers employed in the health branch last year was 2,751 and there is an increase of 155 or thereabouts for this year.

Mr. Martin: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Michener: This item having to do with Indians and Eskimos health services may be the opportunity for me to satisfy my curiosity about the cost of the hospital at Moose Factory. Can the minister tell me that?

Mr. Martin: About $2 million.

Mr. Michener: And it is now in operation.

Mr. Martin: Yes, and it is one of our most successful ventures. I only wish we had built the hospital twice the size and capacity.

Mr. Michener: Has the minister had any regrets about having built it on the island rather than on the mainland?

Mr. Martin: No, I think the recommendations made by the Department of Public Works and certain ecclesiastical authorities resulted in a very wise decision.

Mr. Michener: With respect to the question of cost accounting in these hospitals, which I also raised this morning on the veterans affairs estimates, I notice that the minister's department has quite a number of hospitals which I take it are operated mostly for the benefit of Indians, with perhaps some for Eskimos. According to the public accounts they had some 1,744 beds in the year ending 1953, and the total cost of operation was given as $4,500,000 which, according to my figures, works out at about $7 a day. I would be glad to have from the minister the exact figures of the cost of operation per patient day of the hospitals which are provided for in this grant.

Mr. Martin: We estimated the cost as approximately $6. The extra dollar would be for public health services generally.

Mr. Michener: That is about half the cost of the veterans affairs hospitals. Perhaps the minister would like to say something about the difference in service.

Mr. Martin: I do not think there is any difference in service except that our general salary scale for professional people is not as great as it should be, not as high as elsewhere. During the time I have been minister the budget for Indian health services has risen from about $1 million to a little over $16 million. My hon. friend, who has had very distinguished service in government, will appreciate that one has to keep within one's allotted budget.

Mr. Michener: But these figures would be comparable with those for veterans affairs, and the complete range of hospital services necessary for the patient are provided at something less than $7 per patient day. Am I correct in estimating that the corresponding cost at Moose Factory hospital is $9.50 a day?

Mr. Martin: I do not think it is that high, but it is a higher cost. As my hon. friend knows, it is a very costly operation situated where it is. It is not a nursing station. It is a large hospital in a region more thickly populated with tubercular people than almost any region in Canada.

Mr. Michener: Would that be about the figure?

Mr. Martin: I do not think it is quite that high, but it is higher than the average. I will give my hon. friend that later before my estimates are finished.

Indians and Eskimos health services—

264. Health insurance studies and administration of the general health grants, $99,337.

Mr. Nicholson: In view of the fact that we have voted over $20 million in the last while I am sure the minister will appreciate having a few comments on this item. I should like to support the suggestion which has come from several parts of the house that we reach these estimates earlier in another session. I believe that if we could get consent to have these estimates referred to a special committee it would serve a useful purpose. I was a member of the party that made a tour of the laboratories earlier in the session, and I found those visits very valuable. I should like also to thank the minister for arranging the exhibition at Lansdowne park.

Mr. Martin: Thank you for going.

Mr. Nicholson: I feel that all members who are interested in health would find it very helpful if officials from the department could be brought to one of the committee rooms here where we would have several hours in which to hear about the important work the minister is doing in the field of health.

We have had some discussion about health insurance studies. I appreciate the fact the minister cannot go much faster than public opinion will permit, but I think he can go faster than he is going. I realize that there is a good deal of opposition, particularly amongst the medical fraternity in Canada, regarding any form of socialized health service. We faced this problem ten years ago in Saskatchewan, but we have made a good deal of progress. However we have not been able to introduce a complete scheme of socialized health services because we believe in democracy and we cannot carry out that sort of program without the co-operation of the doctors.

I should like to tell the house about some of the very important fields in which we have introduced socialized health services. I refer to cancer, t.b. and mental diseases. Saskatchewan is not the only province that has introduced socialized ideas in connection with t.b. The C.C.F. government cannot claim the credit for that. When the first sanatorium was built in Saskatchewan many years ago—

Mr. Nicholson: Yes; I appreciate that voluntary comment from the minister. He had some new ideas regarding the treatment of t.b. He thought that the cost factor should be reduced to the minimum. When the first sanatorium was built we had a marked drop in the death rate from t.b. When the cost was reduced from $2.50 to $1 per day, there was a further drop in the death rate. Then when free treatment was introduced we had a further drop. For years Saskatchewan has had one of the lowest death rates from t.b. anywhere in the world.

I should like to submit to my medical friends that today the doctors and nurses in our sanatoria in Saskatchewan are held in very high regard by the citizens of Saskatchewan and elsewhere. I believe that, on balance, they probably have as high a standing as any doctors in the country. The same thing applies to cancer.

I am sure that many of the members will recall the former hon. member for Melfort, Mr. Percy Wright, who was here for many years. I am sure he would not mind my saying that he recently underwent a serious operation for cancer. Mr. Wright has been in the fortunate position during his lifetime of being able to have the best medical service available anywhere in the country. Some eight or nine years ago he was advised to go to the best surgeon in Canada, the late Dr. Roscoe Graham in Toronto. He went there and underwent a successful operation. But when an operation for cancer was necessary he wanted to know whether Rochester, Toronto, Montreal or Saskatoon would be the best centre to which to go. He went to some of the best authorities in Saskatchewan, who said that making a decision as to where he should go is rather important and one should make the final decision oneself. Some of his medical friends, who were not personally interested in the case said, "If we were in your position we would stay right here in Saskatoon because we believe the people here who have been specializing in cancer have had advantages that are not found elsewhere." Mr. Wright accepted that advice, the operation was performed in Saskatoon and I am happy to say he has been enjoying very good health.

Socialized services in Saskatchewan in the field of cancer have provided for our people services which we believe cannot be surpassed anywhere in Canada. The same thing is true of mental illness, which is a very costly type of illness. In many places in Canada people who have the misfortune to become mentally ill find that all their earthly possessions are used up before they are able to earn again. In Saskatchewan those who have the misfortune to require treatment for mental illness find that the entire cost is carried by all the citizens of the province.

There is one further service I should mention, and that is the air ambulance. Again we are proud of the fact that we are the only people on this continent who have the good fortune to have a publicly-owned and operated air ambulance service available for anyone in the province if a doctor or nurse or justice of the peace or any responsible citizen expresses the opinion the air ambulance service is necessary. There is a $25 fee charged for the ambulance, with a trained nurse to go with it. It is available to go anywhere in the province to move a patient to the hospital. If the patient cannot pay the $25, the air ambulance makes the trip in any event.

I suggest that having experimented in these several fields we have come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when we should make some further progress. I might mention that I live in a municipality which has had socialized medical services for quite some time. This was a depression development when the municipality found itself in a position where it was liable for indigent cases. The doctors were being paid $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000 a year for looking after these indigent patients, upon a fee for service basis. Some of the members of the council thought if they were going to have to pay out that amount of money they should make a bargain with the doctors to pay whatever would be necessary so that everyone in the municipality would be able to have medical treatment. Again the present C.C.F. government cannot take credit for the development.

At one time about one-third of the rural municipalities in the province had municipal doctor schemes. In our municipality we have two doctors on salary. I appreciate the arguments advanced that the individual must be permitted to select the doctor. We are in the position where we can select either of two doctors, and we realize that if it were not for the municipal scheme these young doctors would probably be in Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver, where they know larger incomes are available. The young doctors out of college have been able to go to these municipal appointments. They have been able to have plenty of work from the time they come into the office. I want to tell the house that there have been very few criticisms about the quality of the service.

I have the highest regard for my neighbour, the hon. member for Lanark, who has given me some valuable training in the field of medicine since I first knew him, and who has never charged me for that medical advice. However I did not ask for any personal advice. I am sure that the people in his community have a very high regard for him. If I were to take sick tonight, and if I could get to my own doctors in Preeceville, I would rather call them than any doctor in Ottawa. I am not saying there are not doctors in Ottawa who are not as trustworthy as the Preeceville doctors, but I happen to know and trust them. If they thought they should operate, they would say they should, but if they said, "we would advise you to go to Saskatoon or Regina", I would accept whatever advice they gave. I think there has been very little criticism on the part of taxpayers about the quality of the service, or on the part of the doctors on the ground that people have been abusing the service. So I suggest to the minister that he move more quickly in trying to educate public opinion in Canada regarding the need for an over-all health program.

Then, there is one other matter that I planned mentioning earlier. I am sure the minister will allow me to bring it in here. I was down to Montreal—

Mr. Martin: Could we carry this item first? I assume the hon. member is referring to the neurological centre?

Mr. Nicholson: What item would that be?

Mr. Martin: The next item.

Mr. Shaw: Possibly the minister does not have to be reminded that the hon. member for Lanark did request that he make a rather detailed statement on the progress that has been made in connection with health insurance studies. I notice that health insurance studies and the administration of general health grants are grouped together. I assume the same persons who are administering the general health grants are making studies with respect to health insurance. What I do wish to know is this: Is it possible to break down that item of $99,000 in order to show what part of it is being spent for the carrying out of health insurance studies, and what part is being spent for the administration of health grants.

Mr. Martin: That is hard to do.

Mr. Shaw: I realize that as it is put together here there might be some difficulty. And for that very reason I am going to suggest to the minister that possibly something could be done about separating these two costs. It is hardly fair to say to me or to another hon. member, "Well, because the same people are doing two different things we cannot tell you how much it is costing us to have them do one thing". And since, in my mind, these two things are related, but to a degree are still separated, I think there could be some justification in asking that consideration be given to some method of breaking this down so that we could know what it is costing the taxpayers to have studies made with respect to health insurance.

Mr. Michener: I find in the details recurring references to educational and informational publications, and educational and informational material, other than publications. These items are scattered through the estimates of the health branch, and I daresay they will be found also in the welfare branch. I have seen many departmental publications and I have an idea what they cover, but it would be interesting to know the cost of that kind of general information. Would the minister give that information for both branches of the department?

Mr. Martin: We have passed that item. It would come under the general administration grants. We have passed that, and we are on a particular item in connection with which there were two informational votes, one for $5,250 to provide a film for wide distribution on medical and allied professions, and a statistical report amounting to $5,750. Our total vote—and we have passed it—is slightly less than last year, by some $4,000.

The total amount for publications for the department as a whole is $453,000, which does not include the much bigger item of civil defence, which is in a class by itself.

Mr. Michener: That is the amount for this item.

Mr. Martin: No, for the whole of the publication services.

Mr. Michener: Of the department?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Michener: Both branches?

Mr. Martin: Excuse me, I was wrong in my former answer. It is the whole thing. It includes civil defence. Civil defence is $117,500, and it is $335,000 for both health and welfare publications.

Mr. Michener: The item is No. 264. What I want to get is the total for the health branch of the department and for the welfare branch.

Mr. Martin: I have given that. As I have said, we passed it. I wish to be as courteous as I can; but we are now dealing with a specific vote in connection with which there is an informational vote of a little more than $10,000. Strictly speaking my hon. friend is not permitted, under the rules of the house, to discuss anything but that specific vote. However, I appreciate his position. The total vote of the department, inclusive of civil defence, as I gave it a moment ago, is $453,000, in the field of publications.

Mr. Blair: In connection with health insurance will the minister tell us how health insurance studies are progressing. Have they arrived at a conclusion, or are studies being made in the branch?

Mr. Martin: I can say briefly that the health insurance studies division is continuing its studies of this important problem. Not only have we made studies of costs situations in our own country, but we have had some of our officers go to the United Kingdom and Scandinavian countries. Dr. Jackson, who sits in front of me now, has made some of those journeys. He is recognized as one of the outstanding experts in the country.

In addition to that we have carried on and are carrying on assessments of the most important national sickness surveys, five interim reports on which have already been given. This matter is receiving our fullest consideration, and we have been discussing voluntary plans that are carried on outside the auspices of the government, schemes in two of our provinces; and on the ministerial level we have had discussions with the various provincial ministers of health, including some provincial premiers. And I can say at this time that so far as the provinces are concerned, I know of only one provincial government that would be prepared to embark upon a scheme along the general lines that have been indicated here this afternoon. And I say "general lines" because we are not particularizing.

Mr. Knowles: It is precisely because I thought the minister might make some reference to the stand of the provincial governments that I made reference earlier today to what I think might be called the grass roots views—and I refer in particular to the views of the very intelligent and well-informed people who listened to our broadcast a few months ago. I suggest that their views, and the views of the people in the country generally, might be ahead of the views of provincial governments. On that basis I would like to put to the minister just one simple little question: When is the government going to bring in health insurance?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I think this is the time, before six o'clock, to put this statement on the record, so that it will be there. This is the statement of the Prime Minister on July 9 last when, speaking for this party, he said:

> The Liberal party is committed to support a policy of contributory health insurance to be administered by the provinces. But, under our federal system, to get health insurance started the people and the governments of the various provinces have to take the initiative in working out plans adapted to local conditions.
> We are ready to assist in a sensible and practical nation wide scheme, but that depends on satisfactory agreements with the provincial governments.
>
> I am more convinced than ever that this is a field which should, as far as practicable, be left to provincial administration. Conditions differ vastly from one province to another, and services which are suitable for one region are quite unsuitable to another. We now have had a great deal of experience with health schemes of all kinds in this country, including full-fledged hospital insurance in two of our provinces.
>
> But I do not think it would be fair to the taxpayers of Canada in all the provinces to make federal contributions to provincial schemes in only one or two provinces.
>
> Federal contributions should be regarded as a supplement and an evener-out, when most of the provinces are prepared to undertake satisfactory schemes.
> And it is Liberal policy to go on improving federal health grants which have done so much to place all the provinces in a better position to discharge their primary responsibility in this important field.

I can add no more to that.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I regarded that statement at the time it was made—incidentally, it was made during the course of last year's election campaign—as one of the truest statements that was ever made by a politician in the midst of a political campaign. The Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal party, told Canada that the Liberal party was committed to a program of health insurance. That was then true for 34 years; it is now true for 35 years, that the Liberal party is committed to health insurance. But when is that commitment going to be implemented?

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

General health grants—

265. To authorize and provide for general health grants to the provinces, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory upon the terms and in the amounts detailed in the estimates and under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, to make commitments for the current year not to exceed a total amount of $48,433,939, $31,750,000.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, this vote has to do with the federal health grant to hospitals and at the present time the grant set by the federal authority is $1,000 per bed for active treatment, and $1,500 per bed for chronic, convalescent, mental and tuberculosis beds. That figure was arrived at when the former prime minister, the late William Lyon Mackenzie King, was in office, and he indicated that it was to be an assistance grant. At that time there was a shortage of something like 60,000 beds in this country, and I think he quoted that figure at that time.

Now before I go any further I would like to commend the people in the various communities throughout the dominion for the work they are doing in attempting to build hospitals. They are carrying out an extremely difficult task, particularly when people are being asked to contribute to every form of society under the sun. I see the minister nodding his head and I think that indicates he is aware of the difficulty.

Since the act came into effect 100 beds have been provided in the mental hospital in my own riding, as well as 169 at the Royal Columbian hospital, 48, I believe, at the Langley hospital, and there have been additions at the White Rock hospital though I am not aware of the exact number. That would indicate that the population is growing in my riding and of course hand in hand with that must go a greater need so far as hospitalization is concerned. But it is very far from true that the supply is keeping pace with the demand.

In the case of British Columbia and particularly the lower mainland the population has practically doubled within the past 20 years but certainly the number of beds for hospital purposes has not increased proportionately. Earlier in the year, speaking on the budget debate, I raised the question of the old age pensioners, and I indicated that we had to face hospitalization problems because about 6·84 per cent of the population of the riding were elderly people in receipt of old age pensions. The comparative figure in the province of Alberta is 4 per cent, Saskatchewan 4·5 per cent and Ontario, with all its wealth, has a figure of 5·3 per cent. What I am indicating is that people of that age, as everyone is aware, are more in need of hospital assistance than anyone else and we have a greater problem proportionately speaking than any other area in the Dominion of Canada.

We therefore require more assistance. In fact, the North Surrey people have been trying to build a hospital for a matter of 10 years now and each time they reach the point where they think they will be able to complete the hospital the costs go up and the actual need increases because there are many more hundreds of people in the community. Actually they have reached the stage where they have found it absolutely impossible to go ahead with the building of the hospital. This thing has been snowballing and is continuing to do so. It may be said that this is true of only one locality but I do not think that is correct.

The price of a hospital bed unit some years ago was $3,000, and in 1948 that cost had risen to $5,000 or $6,000. I understand the price today is $11,000 and the people I have mentioned are no nearer their goal today than they were 10 years ago. They are perhaps worse off because the area now requires a very much larger hospital.

The people in that area have been asked to vote money for a municipal hospital but even if they do so it will by no means be large enough to meet our needs. The White Rock hospital board has indicated that they realize that their hospital is too small already, and added to that the Langley and New Westminster hospitals are trying to raise funds in order to increase their size.

In view of the fact that a large number of people come to our province from other provinces to spend the latter part of their days in that region, these people feel that they should receive some further consideration, and they feel that the hospitalization vote is much too low. I believe there is some merit in their argument, particularly when we consider that every person in the dominion is paying only one cent towards the federal grant. They feel it should be something like two and a half cents per person. If that were done they would then become eligible for the $2,500 grant per bed. The present act says: "The hospital construction grant is to be distributed on the basis of $1,000 per bed for active treatment beds or bed equivalents in the case of health facilities, $1,500 per bed for chronic, convalescent, mental and tuberculosis beds, and $500 per bed for living quarters for nurses. The provinces are to match or exceed the federal contribution which shall in no case exceed one-third of the actual total cost."

Instead of the federal government paying one-third of the actual cost with the present cost at $11,000 per treatment bed, it means that the federal authorities are paying $1,000, which is one-eleventh, the provincial government is paying one-third, and the bulk of the cost of looking after our senior citizens is left to our municipalities. I have called attention to the fact that these elderly people are adding to the burden on the community, but we must shoulder that responsibility. In doing so, however, we require to build new hospitals and in order to do that we must have more assistance. I am sure the minister is well aware of that and while people may say that there are many people who require help I think some regions are more in need and deserving than others. I would like the minister to reply to my suggestion that we should receive at least $2,500 per bed.

Mr. Studer: In connection with agreements for grants for health services throughout Canada, I have been somewhat interested in the grants as they pertain to the various provinces and how they have been equalized, met or matched, as we have been speaking about them, in the various areas. From the trend of the conversations today, it may appear as though there were no health services in Canada available from the federal government; and again from other trends it would appear that if there were, they were not sufficient. From what the figures show it would appear to me that in some of the provinces the federal government is considerably ahead of any of the provinces with regard to national health. It appears to me that the provinces could perhaps exert themselves to grant to their people national health services that the federal government is prepared to grant and is granting and matching the amounts that have been made available. In the grants to Saskatchewan, for crippled children, for instance, I notice that $31,874 is available and the amount matched or expended was only $24,230. The amounts available and expended are as follows:

Amount Available and Expended
1953-54

Saskatchewan

| Grant | Amount Available (a) | Amount Expended |
|---|---|---|
| Crippled children | $ 31,874 | $ 24,230 |
| Professional training | 31,874 | 22,739 |
| Hospital construction | 2,066,522 | 499,585 |
| Venereal disease control | 31,874 | 30,647 |
| Mental health | 372,459 | 338,891 |
| Tuberculosis control | 236,535 | 236,523 |
| Public health research | (b) | 26,664 |
| General public health | 411,500 | 352,289 |
| Cancer control | 210,244 | 210,244 |
| Laboratory and radiological services | 252,900 | 154,483 |
| Medical rehabilitation | 33,134 | 4,042 |
| Child and maternal health | 32,895 | 30,830 |
| All grants | $3,711,811 | $1,931,167 |

(a) Includes transfers of funds between grants
(b) Unallotted by province

The total of $1,931,167 used is a little over one-half of the entire amount available. So, having regard to the discussions, Mr. Chairman, I wonder where the federal government is at fault. Some suggestions have been made that the provinces perhaps have not sufficient funds to meet what the federal government offers. According to a return, to be found at page 5689 of Hansard of June 9, as to the amount of money that is being spent in Saskatchewan by the federal government, we find that the amount is $139,918,000, which includes the $26,121,000 grant through the dominion-provincial agreement. It would seem to me that these grants that are apportioned to the provinces under the dominion-provincial agreements should be utilized for the purposes of health.

The federal government have taken over taxation in the fields of income, corporation and succession duty taxes in most provinces and are paying in lieu thereof certain amounts of money over and above what they would receive if the federal government did not have that jurisdiction. It figures out on this basis. For every man, woman and child in Saskatchewan $33 is taken out of the province of Saskatchewan in taxation, from all federal sources. But handed back to the province from all sources, again from the federal government, is $74 for every man, woman and child.

An hon. Member: In Saskatchewan.

Mr. Studer: In Saskatchewan. So one would imagine that this province that is supposed to lead the world in health, or at least makes that claim, would have a better record than the one we see here. It is not much better than that of Ontario which used approximately half of what was allotted to them. However, the point is this. If Saskatchewan had the income tax field and the succession duty and the corporation tax fields, that would be where they would obtain their money to meet the cost of social services, health services and the education of the people. The federal government has taken over those fields and hands them back double over and above what they would have received and they should in turn use that income tax money which is more than the equivalent of what they would otherwise have for the furtherance of public health in that province.

Under this national health insurance or national health plan I wonder how far the federal government can go before the provinces are prepared to agree with them or what kind of agreement the federal government can make with the provinces, when we have had agreements for five years under this national health plan which I have already spoken about. Not only have we an advanced program here in Canada but it is an advanced program that all countries of the world will admit once they have acquired the information necessary to realize what Canada has been doing in leadership in that connection.

Only recently new grants, together with what I have mentioned here, are being added. One is of $11 million and is going to be expended for better health care for mothers and children; there is another grant for better health care for the disabled and better facilities and services to help doctors diagnose their patients' illnesses. In every field the dominion is prepared to take the leadership and to provide it in the amounts that are allotted to the various provinces.

I want to know what share are the provinces prepared to accept. What I want to know is why the provinces do not utilize this dominion-provincial agreement money to the full extent that they should, in the places where they should, namely, in the fields of national health and education. If they did so I am sure there would certainly be a national health insurance plan in Saskatchewan that could possibly be looked up to by all of the world. In any agreement that may be entered into in any future national health plan I would want to be assured that the various provinces are going to spend the money that has been granted them for the purposes for which it should be expended and not utilize that money for other purposes within the provinces so as to be in a position to reduce taxation within their own province and then make additional claims on the federal government.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Studer: I am not saying that they are doing that. However, I would like to know why only the $10 million mentioned in the provincial treasurer's report of 1953, or rather in the budget speech of the provincial treasurer, is being allotted for the department of public health, exclusive of grants under the hospital services plan, and why that amount should not be increased and other moneys utilized that they are receiving from federal government sources, in the form of this $140 million running through the field of taxation in Saskatchewan.

They tell me that the amounts that are expended for building hospitals has to come under this 3 per cent tax that they have in Saskatchewan, as are other services and grants that are rendered for our taxes. This all involves added taxation revenue for the province. I would hope that in any future plan, as I have outlined, the provinces would fully co-operate and utilize the money that all of the people of Canada are so willing to expend on that great necessity, namely, public health, and utilize it to full advantage for the benefit of all of their people.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, it will be noted that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has been away for some time, but he has been able to make a political speech again tonight on a matter—

Mr. Studer: I do not make them in the province of Saskatchewan when I should be here in the House of Commons. I can tell the hon. member that.

Mr. Nicholson: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I have not been in the province of Saskatchewan making speeches. I have been here.

Mr. Studer: I did not say that I was referring to the hon. member.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Nicholson: I have been here doing my duty. As to these matching grants that the hon. member has been mentioning should be made available, may I say that instead of having matching grants, I think these grants should be made available where there is need. I think that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek would agree with me when I say that all the people of Canada are enjoying the benefits of the leadership we gave ten years ago in setting up new hospitals and giving our people better health services. At that time it looked as if we might form a government in Canada and the government of the day decided they had better get into the field of health and get some credit for participating in what everyone in Canada considered was a must. I am sure the hon. member will agree that income taxes, succession duties and corporation taxes are collected in large centres like Toronto or Montreal on profits that are built up by all the people of Canada. When we buy our farm machinery we make it possible for International Harvester or Massey-Harris to build up taxable incomes which are payable in Ontario. I think it is only fair that revenue from that sort of income should be made available for people in all parts of the country.

I do not apologize for my province in any way. It has been our misfortune that we have had tariffs that have built up these large fortunes in central Canada. However, I think it is not appropriate that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and I should extend our political argument at this time. I have in my hand the very popular book, "The Canadian Mother and Child". Perhaps the minister will say how many hundreds of thousands of copies have been distributed.

Mr. Martin: The figure is 1,300,000.

Mr. Nicholson: I am very sorry to find that a book that was distributed free for many years is only available now at a charge of 25 cents. However the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan is paying the federal government for it and it will be distributed free in that province. I am very sorry that the minister, with the very large appropriation he has, could not have continued to make this book available to Canadian mothers in all parts of Canada free of charge as was the case in the past.

Mr. Studer: Page the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre for his saving and economy drive.

Mr. Nicholson: My reason for rising on this particular item is to inquire whether the department could not treat the Montreal neurological institute on a more generous basis. The minister was in Montreal, as I was, on November 20. He was able to get into television there, while I had the pleasure of a seat in the gallery. I am sure he was impressed with the very able remarks by Dr. Alan Gregg who was the guest speaker on behalf of the Rockefeller foundation. Dr. Gregg said:

> In but very few if any of the enterprises to which the Rockefeller foundation has been privileged to contribute in the last twenty years have the results equalled those you have created here in this neurological institute. If I were asked to name a single grant that the medical sciences division of the foundation has made since 1931 that I consider ideal in purpose, in performance, in local response and in national and international influence, and in the character of our relationships maintained from the very beginning, I would say without a moment's hesitation the grant to the neurological institute of McGill University. But that is only one way and perhaps a trivial one of expressing the admiration and the satisfaction the Rockefeller foundation has for what you have created here. More rare still is the compliment I would offer you, not without some fear that it will fail its target, in saying that in this neurological institute, the staff, the chief and the trustees are so beautifully fused into one shining amalgam that if I were to name one to thank I would be naming you all who have worked with him, for him and through him, and if I were to name all of you it would come to the same thing—for you are all the neurological institute of McGill University, each to the other, responsible, essential and inseparable.

I am sure everyone in Canada would echo Dr. Gregg's appropriate remarks about Dr. Penfield and the institute. But I was quite disturbed when Dr. Penfield gave a review of some of their work during the year. The minister will recall that Dr. Penfield said:

> It was back in 1950 at a crucial interview that the turn came in the tide of the economic affairs of this institute. Conditions had been going from bad to worse and it appeared that the doors of the hospital portion might have to be closed. We must, it seemed, get support for clinical deficits and we must rebuild and expand. There was no other way.

Dr. Penfield outlined his visit to Mr. Duplessis together with that very good friend of the institute, Mr. McConnell, and the provincial government undertook to provide $90,000 annually on condition that the friends of the institute would also do something. But it amazed me to think that as recently as 1950 Dr. Penfield, with his international reputation, had been placed in the position of having to go with cap in hand to try to get additional revenue so that their work might be carried on. In the very interesting report he gave of the work they have been doing it was made clear to me that this is one place in Canada where generous federal grants should be made.

I understand that Dr. Penfield has given up some of his activities now in the hope that he can find additional revenues so that their research work can continue. It would seem to me that with the very large amounts of money available for all sorts of things in Canada the minister should be able to give some undertaking so that this institute, which has done such outstanding work, could carry on indefinitely without these worries about balancing budgets.

On the day of the opening along with the minister and others I visited the new wing and I found there were patients there from every province in Canada and from a number of other countries. I wonder whether the minister could not indicate whether or not this would not be an appropriate field for the federal government to make a grant on an annual basis so that the work that is being done by Dr. Penfield and his associates may continue unhampered by lack of financial resources.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to speak on these items as they come along unless I really have to. I do not suppose that any estimates have been passed at this session with as few observations on the part of the minister as has been the case today. The only reason I rise now is that the hon. member has touched a point on which I am very sensitive. It is regrettable, as several hon. members have said, that these estimates are always discussed at the end of the session. I think it is most regrettable, although it is nobody's fault, because I am not given the opportunity of really explaining what I think the people of this country are interested in. The fact that the hon. member could make the speech he has just made is confirmation of what I have said.

This government is proud of what it has done for the neurological institute, and Dr. Penfield would be the first to say that that is the case. I am sure the hon. member made the speech he did not because of ill will but because he was not informed as to the situation. I am sure that the neurological institute would have found it very difficult to operate at all if it had not been for the combined efforts of the federal and provincial governments a few years ago. An annual operational grant of $40,000 is now given by the federal government to the neurological institute under a national research council vote. In addition, we made a grant to the neurological institute of a little over half a million dollars, $400,000 of which was for some very valuable equipment that is now in the institute.

While I am on my feet, I want to pay a tribute to a very outstanding Canadian citizen, Mr. J. W. McConnell. I suppose I know more about his benefactions than any other man in Canada, not only for the neurological institute but for many other health projects in Canada.

Mr. McIvor: I know.

Mr. Martin: I think he might not like my having said this publicly, but I feel his generosity deserves this mention.

Mr. Hahn: Before we carry this item, would the minister indicate what consideration, if any, would be given to the plea I made a few minutes ago concerning an increase in the hospital grants?

Mr. Martin: I can offer my friend no encouragement on that particular whatever. This is a field that normally belongs to the provinces. We assist the province of British Columbia in its health budgets to the total of about $4 million. We have also helped with the building of over 5,000 hospital beds in British Columbia. In the city of New Westminster we have helped with the building of nearly 500 beds. Any new moneys that may be made available we propose to use in fields in which the provincial governments feel they cannot undertake a more particular responsibility.

Mr. Hahn: Would the minister let us know how much closer we are to meeting the shortage we had some years ago when we were about 60,000 beds short in the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. Martin: In less than five and a half years, through dominion, provincial, voluntary and municipal efforts, we have built almost 60,000 additional hospital beds in Canada. Our objective was 40,000 in a five-year period. We estimate now that there is, generally speaking, a shortage of about 23,000 hospital beds in Canada.

Mr. Yuill: I have a small problem, Mr. Chairman, in so far as assistance to hospitals is concerned. It seems to be common in the national parks. I refer to Seaton hospital in Jasper national park. Because of the natural growth of the personnel in the park and the town of Jasper, plus the increasing tourist trade, it became necessary to build an addition to Seaton hospital at a cost of around $70,000. There is a very peculiar situation there. The people of Jasper have been denied the right to form a municipality, and thereby have authority to sign an agreement with the provincial health authorities and in that way qualify for the normal $1,000 per bed grant that is traditional across Canada.

I do not know whether or not there is a solution to the problem. In my opinion, however, the matter might well be handled in this way. The taxing agencies within the park for school purposes have a system of bookkeeping set up there, and I would suggest the minister give sympathetic consideration to the idea that they be permitted to collect sufficient revenue, taxes if you will, from the people of Jasper so that they may be able to avail themselves of this $1 per day hospitalization. I have communicated with many of the people, and I am quite sure they are quite willing and anxious to avail themselves of that $1 per day hospitalization. The technicality involved is the fact that there is no authorized signing authority.

I believe that the parks administration could enter into that agreement and with very little extra cost or labour collect the necessary money to equal the three mills or whatever it may be and thereby get the people of Jasper and the Sisters who are responsible for operating the hospital what appears to me to be at least a square deal. It seems rather ironical that because we have dual control or lack of it, I do not know which, they are denied the benefits of this $1 per day hospitalization. I should like to ask the minister if there is any possible way by which you could give the necessary consideration to seeing that that is carried out.

Item agreed to.

Grants to health organizations—

266. Canadian Mental Health Association, $10,000.

Mr. Shaw: I presume I might just as well ask the minister a question or two here as elsewhere. There are possibly 13 organizations that receive grants from the federal government. I indicated this afternoon that for the first 12—the 13th being a new one—the grants are the same this year as last year, and possibly have been the same for years. The minister indicated this afternoon that the mere fact grants are made to these organizations would indicate the government considered them deserving organizations. If they were deserving of this amount last year or a few years ago, certainly favourable consideration should now be given to increasing those grants, principally because the grants mean less to the organizations now than before.

I understand that taxes are up, and that these organizations pay a sales tax on the paper that goes into the publications they send out. They pay postage, and those rates were recently increased. I should like the minister to indicate to this committee just why it is that full recognition has not been given to these organizations, and why such recognition has not been reflected through some increases in the amounts. This afternoon the minister said something to the hon. member for Greenwood when he was speaking about this, but it was one of those semi-private conversations and hard as I tried I could not hear what was said. I should like to have the minister comment, even though I appreciate he prides himself on not having said very much while these estimates have been before the committee. I would not expect him to think he might be as fortunate from here on.

Mr. Martin: When I was talking about the brevity of speech, I was not only speaking about requests from this side. I have to operate within a budget, and we have established the principle of making grants to organizations on the basis of their national character and the assistance that they receive from the provincial governments. My hon. friend well knows that the grant for the Canadian National Institute for the Blind is larger this year than it was six years ago. The same is not true in the case of a number of other organizations. I do not want to specify any particular organization, although I am sure we all have in mind the one that is mentioned.

I have told the Health League of Canada that we would be prepared to give consideration to an increase in their grant provided we saw evidence of a willingness on the part of the provincial governments to bear their share towards the operations that are said to be undertaken all over this country.

Mr. Shaw: Would that apply to each of the other organizations listed?

Mr. Martin: That would apply to each of the other organizations. Now, on the general subject: I have made much in statements in public of the desirability of voluntary effort. We have laid down as the policy of this government that the federal government should not undertake anything in the field of health or welfare that might more properly be done by the provinces. We feel that nothing should be undertaken by the provinces, although that strictly is not our legal concern, if it can more properly be done by the municipality, the private organization, the family or the individual. That is our general philosophy in the matter. And to give evidence of the sincerity of this view, under the national health grants over $5 million of the money appropriated last year has gone to voluntary organizations of one kind or another—the hospitals, the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society, and so on.

One hon. member from British Columbia, I believe it was the hon. member for Fraser Valley, wondered why we had not given anything to the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society. Last year we gave that association over $135,000 to carry on its operations through its various branches. So I think it would be fair to say that we have recognized the importance of the voluntary partnership in this important matter.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Macdonnell: No, it is not carried. I must say that the minister's statement is most unsatisfactory. I attempted to make some comment this afternoon following the hon. member for Red Deer. To be told in one breath that the minister is really interested in the work of these organizations, and then to realize the trifling amounts they get—and I am not attempting to assess what they do at all; I have nothing to do with that—I am bound to say that these amounts are utterly inadequate. Certainly they are not large enough, if the government considers these organizations to be of the value which the minister's words would seem to indicate. So far as I am concerned, the words and deeds do not match at all, and I am terribly disappointed in what the minister has said. I do not think he should ask anyone to accept it. I do not accept it. I hope these organizations will be able to do something to make their wishes felt. I feel in the strongest possible way that what is being proposed is utterly inadequate.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, may I make it clear that I am not satisfied, even though I did not rise and say anything further. The minister and hon. members in the committee should know how I feel about this matter. I say there is justification for an increase in these grants, because of the increased cost and the wider varieties of work these organizations are doing, in the sense that there are more people in the country. I said this afternoon that I felt we were not doing enough in the field of preventive medicine. I certainly believe that these organizations could play a most valuable part in that particular field, and I am not picking out any specific field. The minister mentioned one organization. I hold no brief for any particular organization. I look upon them as a group of organizations engaged in a particular kind of work.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I rise to take part in this discussion because I find myself completely and utterly bewildered by some of the statements I hear coming from seats to my right and, may I say, a seat in front of me. On the one hand I hear people getting up decrying the evils of state medicine and regimentation. On the other hand, from the same place, I hear people getting up and saying that these organizations should not, really, be voluntary organizations at all, that the government should pay for them.

Now, that simply does not make sense. I am not saying that I oppose the government when it indicates that it has an interest in these organizations and feels they are doing a good job. In a sense this parliament has bestowed its blessing upon them. But to argue, on the one hand, that a thing should be voluntary and to argue, on the other hand, that it should be paid for by the government seems to me nothing but a lot of nonsense. I think these people should make up their minds where they stand.

If we are going to have a compulsory health plan paid for entirely from Ottawa, then let them come out and say so; but, on the other hand, if they believe that there is room for a voluntary effort on the part of individual Canadians, let them recognize that it should be a voluntary effort and come from the hearts of the people. I must say I find myself quite confused by some of the conflicting arguments I hear from every side.

Mr. Shaw: May I point out that if the hon. member for Comox-Alberni cannot recognize a voluntary organization as continuing to be a voluntary organization, even though it may receive a gift, then all I can do is express sorrow for him in his lack of capacity to understand the situation.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I make one comment. In my experience the hon. member for Comox-Alberni usually has had his mind well tuned to the facts. But it seems to me that, as has been indicated, in this instance he completely misunderstands the situation. Nobody suggests that these organizations should be wholly maintained. In the one case with which I am familiar I think they get from the government somewhere between 10 per cent and 15 per cent of their budget, or even less than that. I do not think there is anything derogatory about a voluntary institution asking for help. I agree that if a voluntary organization came to the government and asked it to carry the whole load, then I think the hon. member's remarks would be just as well-directed as I now consider them to be ill-directed.

I should like to have one or two facts with regard to these grants before we pass on. Do these figures, these amounts, go back a long way, or have they gone up or down? In other words what do they represent in the work of these voluntary institutions, as compared with five or ten years ago, in view of the changing costs?

Mr. Martin: Well, the World Federation for Mental Health is new. And it does not represent the full amount of assistance in the mental health field because under the health grants we are giving to the Canadian Mental Health Association assistance in connection with their operations in Alberta and in British Columbia. There is another $10,000 in the case of those two provinces. Then, my hon. friend will know the record with respect to the Health League of Canada. May I say I was in error. I had told him privately that that amount had always been the amount of the grant. I find at one time it was $20,000; but in the period between 1931 and 1935 the government of that day cut the amount from $20,000 to nothing. I am not saying what that government was. The amount has since been restored and in 1946 was raised to $10,000. Then, the inclusion of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind represents a very substantial increase. In the case of the Canadian Public Health Association the amount remains stationary.

With respect to the Canadian Tuberculosis Association there has been no increase. The St. John Ambulance Association had an increase in 1950. The vote for the Canadian Paraplegic Association is new, having been put in six years ago. The grant to the Canadian Ophthalmological Society is new this year.

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall make only one comment. I recall when the government reduced the grant. It was a Conservative government and was done at a time when, as the minister knows as well as I do, we were going through desperate difficulties. Those difficulties were described last night by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

I am just pointing out that the minister is continuing at a low level, at a point 50 per cent of what it had previously been, a grant which was reduced 22 years ago, at a time of great difficulty when, no doubt, every conceivable economy in every direction was being made. I am glad the minister corrected what he said earlier. I can only hope that he will not continue to feel that that is a fair way to deal with these organizations, if that is a fair illustration.

Mr. Hahn: The minister indicated that last year's grant to the arthritis and rheumatism association was $135,000.

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Hahn: Is it the same amount this year; it is not included in the list as such?

Mr. Martin: It does not appear; it is under the national health grants made to the provincial divisions of the association.

Mr. Hahn: Would there be any large grants to organizations along that same line?

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Martin: Yes; we give the Canadian Cancer Institute almost twice that amount and also the heart foundation both in Montreal and Toronto.

Item agreed to.

National Physical Fitness Act—

283. To provide for the administration of the act, the sum hereby provided, notwithstanding sections 8 and 9 of the said act, to be credited to a separate account in the consolidated revenue fund, to be subject to section 35 of the Financial Administration Act and to be paid out by the Minister of Finance upon the requisition of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, $78,141.

Mr. Macdonnell: Am I correct in assuming that this item involves a grant of $78,000 under the National Physical Fitness Act that was buried the other day. We gave it a quick burial. May we have an explanation?

Mr. Martin: The hon. member will know that we had an agreement with one of the provinces that came to an end only in December 1953. It was a ten-year agreement, and but for that I would have earlier recommended to my colleagues and, subject to their acceptance, I would have brought into this house a suggestion that we repeal the National Physical Fitness Act much earlier than we did. That explains why the action taken a while ago was not taken earlier. However, we have to consider our relations with the provinces, and in view of that terminal date, in the meantime not knowing what the outcome would be, we have carried on the agreement. We have signed agreements with all the provinces to carry on the grants for another year, ending in 1955. At the end of that time the grants will cease and we shall no longer be committed to the principle of making grants to the provinces. That is of course apart altogether from the operations of the national physical fitness division which is not covered by the legislation, and at the end of this year we shall have to see to what measure of liquidation we can bring the operations of that division.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the minister say a word about one item here? As I understand it, this act has been at the point of death for some time, and its uselessness presumably recognized, so why are we voting $17,000 for educational and informational publications under this act, even with the explanation the minister just gave us? What is the money going to be used for? The figure of $17,700 for educational and informational publications apparently is under the National Physical Fitness Act.

Mr. Martin: These are commitments made last year for various publications.

Mr. Macdonnell: These were made last year, but the approaching demise of this act must have been contemplated.

Mr. Martin: It was certainly in my mind. If my hon. friend will look at section 4 of the act he will see the extraordinarily wide powers given to the national physical fitness council, powers that extended to not having to report to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, although the latter was obliged with respect to some of their commitments to seek a vote in this parliament.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the minister's explanation is satisfactory. Although the act has been repealed, apparently the same amount of money is being voted to carry the thing on as when it was in full operation last year. Surely if the act is expiring rapidly and if this is still being continued to some extent because of the agreement with the provinces, this $17,700 for educational and informational publications and the next item of $7,300 for educational and informational material other than publications, are not required this year and therefore should be dropped.

Mr. Martin: I cannot say any more than I said a moment ago. Agreements with the provinces are not to run out until 1955, and this was an estimate of what was formulated in the light of a continuing obligation. That obligation comes to an end in 1955, when we shall be in a position to deal with this particular item.

Mr. Harkness: Does the agreement with the provinces call for an expenditure of $25,000 for educational and informational publications and other informational material?

Mr. Martin: The commitments made last year do.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says there was a contract. Is there any contract or agreement with the provinces that $25,000 worth of these publications and other educational material will be supplied? Either there is or there is not. What are the publications?

Mr. Martin: Some of these are publications we had in the process of printing, bills for which are coming in currently. I cannot give my hon. friend the names.

Mr. Harkness: Bills are coming in currently. Are they against last year's operations?

Mr. Martin: Yes—some are.

Mr. Harkness: Surely the department is not going to ask for another $25,000 for publications unless they have an agreement with the provinces that they must supply them. The minister has not told us that they have any agreement that they must supply those publications.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to emphasize the same point. We should have here a definite contract produced, a statement that there is an obligation clearly existing which cannot be got out of, that we have to go ahead and spend this money. After all this act is quite dead. These expenditures are covering a year, only two months of which has elapsed. Unless we made a firm contract with a province on the basis of which it is going to go ahead and incur expenditures, regardless of the termination of this act, then surely the hon. member for Calgary North is right, and we should have distinctly before us what it is, and this item should stand over.

Mr. Fairey: May I say a word on this vote? Since I had something to do with the operation of this particular act may I suggest that in certain provinces the act is still in effect, and the obligations of both the dominion and provincial governments continue until those agreements expire. Therefore the expenditures that were estimated for last year, let us say, in the province of British Columbia, will be duplicated in the coming year because the act is still in effect in that province. That is why the same amount is required in the estimates this year as last year, and will be so required until the agreement expires.

Mr. Harkness: That does not meet the question at all. I asked the minister definitely whether there was a contract to supply $25,000 worth of those educational publications, and he has not yet said there is a contract.

Mr. Martin: I have said there were certain commitments. There were no contracts in the sense of a consideration passing from one party to another, but we have verbal understandings with the provinces in connection with these publications. We are writing to the provinces seeking to extricate ourselves from the obligation in the light of our over-all policy with regard to the act. It would be certainly wrong on my part, having in mind our general intentions, not to have budgeted for these amounts, in view of these understandings with the provinces.

Mr. Harkness: Has the minister succeeded in extricating himself from $5,000 or $10,000 worth of these expenditures?

Mr. Martin: I am hopeful of doing so. All I can say is that in one breath I am accused of overexpansion and overspending and in another breath on another item I am accused of being too parsimonious.

Mr. Harkness: I have not accused the minister of one thing or the other. This is the first time I have said anything on these estimates today and what the minister means by this statement in reference to the questions I asked I do not know, but his remarks are completely inapplicable. He still has not given any satisfactory explanation of this item.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to know what the minister can give us on this. He says he is trying to extricate himself. So far so good, but in the meantime I do not think we should vote this rather tidy sum without some indication as to how much of it is really being used. The interpolation from the hon. member from Victoria did not seem to me to add anything to the situation. I can understand if there were commitments which had to be carried out but the minister has indicated already that having regard to the situation he is certain to cut down some of the commitments due to the fact that the act is no longer in operation. But that is an unsatisfactory situation.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if I could help to extricate the minister from the difficulty in which he is—

Mr. Martin: The minister is never in any difficulty from which he has to be extricated.

Mr. Harkness: You have not told us how the extra amount is to be allocated.

Mr. Martin: I cannot give understanding.

Mr. Knowles: I trust these two hon. members will pardon me if I interrupt their tête-à-tête. I think I might perhaps clarify the situation by reading clause 2 of Bill 475 which we dealt with a few days ago. This was the bill repealing the physical fitness act. It reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding section 1, the said act continues in force for the purpose of carrying out and giving effect to any agreement made with a province under section 7 of the said act and in effect at the coming into force of this act.

Does that not cover the situation?

Mr. Macdonnell: That merely indicates that the minister will have the legal right to extend the agreements which are in effect but that is not what we are looking for.

Mr. Harkness: The whole point is this, that the next item deals with assistance to the provinces amounting to $157,670.

Mr. Martin: These are grants to the provinces.

Mr. Harkness: But this is under the National Physical Fitness Act and it is $7,000 more than last year for an act which is now declared to be null and void, and that is in addition to those grants which are more this year than last year in spite of the fact that the act has been repealed. The minister is extricating himself by saying in addition to this he has all these other items for educational publications and he still insists on putting this through when the act has been nullified.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend obviously does not understand the operation. The vote to which he refers deals with contractual obligations entered into between the dominion and the provinces under the National Physical Fitness Act. The other vote has to do with publications and educational material committed to by the national physical fitness council operating under the act. Now the 10-year agreement with Saskatchewan ended in December and that gave us an opportunity of declaring our over-all policy. But in fairness to the provinces and so they would not be caught unawares, and after discussion with them, we agreed to carry on the agreements for one year only and to extend those agreements to the year 1955.

Mr. Harkness: If the minister could tell us what was agreed to with each of these provinces in the way of educational publications that might clarify the situation. We will start with British Columbia, Alberta, and then work eastward.

Mr. Martin: These are commitments in most instances made by the national physical fitness council and not by the government or Minister of National Health and Welfare. I said a moment ago that if my hon. friend will look at section 4 of the act he will see the very wide powers under which the council acts. First of all, there is the reprint of a book to which the hon. member for Greenwood drew my attention some weeks ago, entitled "Posture's Important When You're Growing Up", $5,000; reprint of guide for leaders, a handbook for voluntary leaders in small communities, $5,000; production in the department of simple folders and leaflets on various subjects such as play areas for children, stage settings, etc., $4,500; recreational facility film strip, $2,000; preview film library service, $2,000 and miscellaneous displays to be used at British empire and commonwealth games, $2,000.

Mr. Harkness: There is no commitment to any province in that. This is evidently just a general program laid down in spite of the fact that the act has come to an end and the minister is going ahead with it in any case. In other words, he is going to throw away the money because it is available.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not think the minister should try to satisfy us with that pleasant smile of his and by reading that list of publications. He has referred my hon. friend for Calgary North to section 4 of the act but what we are concerned with here are the agreements. And the agreements with the provinces came into effect when the act went into force. That presupposes first an agreement and secondly that it is in effect now. I think the minister should tell us what agreements were made with what provinces. The mere fact that he cracked some jokes about some publications does not mean anything and has no connection with the agreements. We are dealing with agreements which came into effect with the coming into force of the act and I think the hon. member for Calgary North is right and the minister knows he is right. The minister always extricates himself very adroitly from a bad situation. This time he should tell the committee the nature of the agreements which are in effect at this time with the provinces. That is all we ask.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin: I have nothing more to add, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, apparently the situation is that in spite of what the minister has said there are no agreements in connection with this expenditure, and particularly in regard to the publications he is going to go ahead with the program when the whole scheme has come to an end. This story that this is due to contractual obligations just does not stand up because he cannot tell us what these contracts were or anything else in connection with this matter.

Mr. Martin: There is nothing I cannot do that I have said I can do and no amount of frivolity on the part of the hon. gentleman can alter that fact. I am prepared to enter into the amusement just as genially and vigorously as he is, but let me tell him when he asks for the agreement that we can make available to him copies of the agreements with the provinces. Indeed I have copies of the agreements made with seven of the participating provinces which terminate in 1955. We can send down to the department for them but I cannot say any more than I have already said on that particular point.

Mr. Harkness: The minister seems to think this is a matter for levity. I did not approach it in a spirit of levity and I do not think he has any right to get up here and attempt to get out of his inability or refusal to answer questions by saying that the questions were asked in a spirit of levity. There is nothing particularly funny about $78,000 which relatively large amount is being expended on something which is a completely dead horse.

Mr. McIvor: I do not think the minister should run away from his obligations. I think he should stick to the obligation he has made.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, Mr. Chairman. The minister cannot wheedle us quite as easily as he thinks he can. The minister could undertake to give us the details of these agreements. He has made no statement which would allow anyone to understand what these agreements are. The minister admits there are agreements and we have asked him to tell us what they are. He has not told us and we are being asked to make an assumption. I am not prepared to do that.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. I suggest that it be allowed to stand over unless we get further information.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister said he could produce these agreements. I think they should be produced, Mr. Chairman. You will also notice that those agreements he has referred to are only agreements under section 7; that is, contractual obligations for the printing of comic books or whatever they may be, these various things.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I did not say there was any contractual obligation with regard to these agreements. I said the contractual obligation was under the National Physical Fitness Act in respect of grants that are provided by statute to the provinces pursuant to the act of 1943. What I said with regard to commitments was that they were not in the nature of legal commitments. I explained that there was not the usual form of consideration and so on. We naturally do not carry these agreements around with us. I will be glad at some subsequent date to table them. They have nothing to do with this issue. They are in the usual form under which we agreed, under authority of section 7 of the National Physical Fitness Act, to make certain grants to the provinces.

Mr. Nowlan: What I say is that we should have tabled the agreements under section 7 of this act with which we are concerned, and no other obligation whatsoever. The parliament of Canada has seen fit to pass Bill No. 475 on the recommendation of the minister. In that bill—it is not yet an act, I suppose, because it has not received assent —the minister and the department can authorize only commitments or obligations entered into under section 7. If the minister says that these obligations are entered into under section 7, and he is tabling them, well and good. But so far the minister has not said that. I think we are entitled to have the agreements tabled.

Mr. Martin: That is clearly the case. I thought I had clearly indicated that I would table them.

Mr. Nowlan: No.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, it is carried subject to these agreements being tabled.

Mr. Martin: I shall be glad to table them on Monday.

Item agreed to.

285. Assistance to schools of social work, $32,370.

Mr. Knowles: I just want to say that I am glad to see this item restored in the estimates. I am sorry that it was missing for a year or two. Can the minister make any comment on the fact that although the item has been restored it is only $32,370 whereas it used to be of the order of $100,000?

Mr. Martin: This is only for the province of Quebec. As my hon. friend knows, the former grants were absorbed by the general grants made to universities, a system of allocation that was not acceptable to the government of the province of Quebec. In view of the fact that we were not able to make grants to universities directly from the federal government to the province of Quebec and having in mind the urgency of training in schools of social work, this item was put in the estimates in the amount indicated.

Mr. Knowles: Is a corresponding grant to schools of social work in the other provinces included in item 119 under finance?

Mr. Martin: They are covered by aid to universities, whatever item it is.

Mr. Knowles: That is it; item 119.

Item agreed to.

Health services—
685. Administration of the Food and Drugs and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine acts—further amount required, $22,900.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask a question on this item and to bring a little matter to the attention of the minister. While it came up in the discussion of the main estimates, I happened to be called out for a moment or two. Before I do that, I should like to endorse what others have said in respect of these important estimates coming before the committee at such a late time in the session.

Mr. Martin: I fully agree.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear the minister say that he agrees. Here is a department spending over $812,000,000. I believe that the minister—and I am quite sure he is willing to do so if there is time—should have the opportunity to explain a great deal of the details of these estimates. That is something which it is not possible for him to do under these circumstances. I am always extremely interested in having an explanation of these important items and I always enjoy the minister's explanations. I must say that I regret that I have not had that opportunity today.

I happened to cut this article out of a newspaper recently. I have not the date of it and I forget which paper it was, but I think it was the Journal. I want to bring this article to the minister's attention. It is headed "Raps 'Dishonest' Practice by Drug Supply Houses" and it reads as follows:

> Kitchener, April 8,—(CP)—Dr. John McKelvey, professor of obstetrics and gynaecology at the University of Minnesota, Wednesday criticized the "dishonest" practice of drug supply houses in connection with iron supplied women during pregnancy.
> Addressing the Kitchener-Waterloo Academy of Medicine's clinic day gathering, he said only iron salt is needed to combat most anaemias of pregnancy but drug firms insist on mixing in other expensive ingredients.
> He said that, as a result, the treatment costs $60 instead of about $1.50.

That is a fairly wide margin of profit. The article continues:

> "These treatments are dishonest and the drug companies know they are dishonest", he said. He added that doctors should share some blame for the situation because they continue to prescribe them after medical science has proved them outmoded.

I do not know whether the minister's officials have noticed this newspaper comment. I would ask the minister whether it has been brought to his attention, whether he can give me any explanation of this statement and whether he will tell us what his department has done about it.

Mr. Martin: I could not hear very clearly what was going on. Does this article refer to something in the United States?

Mr. Herridge: No. It does not say clearly. It is a gentleman from the United States speaking at Kitchener, but it does not say clearly whether it refers to the United States.

Mr. Martin: All I can say is that, as my hon. friend knows, we have amended the Food and Drugs Act. By the way, I may say that the act will be proclaimed as of July 1. Some of these measures will, I hope, enable us to give a stronger and more enforcing quality to some of the things to which my hon. friend has referred. We are doing our best, at any rate.

Mr. Herridge: I will send the clipping over to the minister.

Mr. Knowles: The minister answered one question I was going to ask. He has said that the new Food and Drugs Act will be proclaimed on July 1. May I ask him whether satisfactory arrangements have been made for the recruiting of sufficient personnel to carry on the inspection work that will be necessary under the new act?

Mr. Martin: Yes, I think we are making progress in that matter.

Mr. Knowles: Does that apply in particular to cheese factories?

Mr. Martin: I would not say it applied particularly to them, but we are making progress in the selection of inspectors.

Mr. Knowles: May I also ask what steps are being taken to administer the sections of the new act having to do with advertising for various products. The minister may recall that earlier in the session I put some questions on the order paper relating to advertisements for toothpastes. As a matter of fact the minister's answers were at least partly satisfactory. They seemed to me to reveal recognition of the fact that some of the advertising of products of that kind is exaggerated, if not misleading. I wonder whether the department has set up whatever staff is necessary to check on this kind of thing and to make sure that our people are not misled with regard to such products?

Mr. Martin: Under the Food and Drugs Act we have a division that enjoys generally the full co-operation of the industry in these matters. There are some people, of course, who are abusing the privilege which comes from a co-operative endeavour such as this one we are seeking to establish. But I think that we are making considerable progress in arresting people like that who do not recognize that they have responsibilities to the public.

Mr. Knowles: You have good people in this division.

Mr. Martin: Oh, yes.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

General services—

130. Information and educational service, including grant of $3,000 to Nova Scotia fisheries exhibition, $185,500.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find the vote on page 21 of the blue book and the details commencing at page 188. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I assume that the minister is going to be present?

Mr. Harris: I am present, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drew: Is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration going to answer the questions?

Mr. Harris: No. I will answer any questions for the moment, but the Acting Minister of Fisheries will be here before the first question is asked.

Mr. Drew: Who is the Acting Minister of Fisheries?

Mr. Harris: The Secretary of State.

Mr. Drew: The old salt. Mr. Chairman, this house should not proceed until the minister responsible is in his seat.

Mr. Harris: If we wait for one minute he will be.

Mr. Knowles: While we are waiting, I wonder whether I could once again make the suggestion that perhaps for the balance of the evening we could do our own messages and let the page boys go home. It is Saturday night.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Could we not go home and do our messages too?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, with all respect to the Acting Minister of Fisheries for whom we are waiting, unfortunately I was not able to be here when this department was first called but while lying in the hospital I had the opportunity of reading the very interesting, very long and very detailed statement of the achievements of the Minister of Fisheries in administering this department, all of which was interesting and all of which was creditable to his administration, and he is the man who has the knowledge about the situation. After all, the fishing industry is of some interest to people on the east and west coasts of this country, and I think the Minister of Fisheries should be here to deal with it himself and to answer questions. I am sure the acting minister could convey memoranda to him but that is not good enough in dealing with a department such as this, and I do not think the proceedings should be carried on in that way.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I wonder what has got into the opposition tonight. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance was able to take care of certain matters, as have other parliamentary assistants, so why not let the parliamentary assistant carry on?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think it is appropriate that this matter be dealt with immediately. This is the longest session in the history of this parliament.

Mr. Harris: By no means.

Mr. Drew: If there is one that was longer then I stand to be corrected. I was accepting a statement I saw a few days ago that it was the longest. However, it has been long for no other reason than the complete inefficiency with which the business of the house has been presented during the whole session. There has been a course of planned confusion and over and over again the opportunity—

An hon. Member: I do not know what you would do without the Journal.

Mr. Drew:—to deal with matters of very great importance—

Mr. Knowles: Here is the old salt.

Mr. Drew:—has been denied by the devices that were followed to postpone proceedings in this house. We now find ourselves dealing with estimates—

The Chairman: Order. May I interrupt the Leader of the Opposition to indicate that the Acting Minister of Fisheries is here and that we are now discussing item 130.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, that in no way affects the comments I propose to make.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, if my hon. friend proposes to go on with a general debate about the business of the house it will naturally follow that I will answer him and we shall have a lengthy debate on that point. I suggest we could have that debate much better on another occasion when I am sure more than the two of us would take part in it, and that we might confine our remarks now to the item before us.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with a subject tonight that is of very considerable importance not only to the people of the two seacoasts—perhaps I might say the three seacoasts—but also to the people along the inland waters who are affected by the operations of the Department of Fisheries. There is no valid reason why the minister charged with that responsibility should not be here when we are taking up the items having to do with the Department of Fisheries. The remarks I am making apply with equal force to any other department. Anything that I say is no reflection on the parliamentary assistant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: The parliamentary assistant, however, for very obvious reasons cannot speak on behalf of the government. On different occasions in the past statements have been made by parliamentary assistants which aroused some comment in the house. The government has been very careful to point out that parliamentary assistants do not speak with responsibility on behalf of the government. It should be remembered that the only assurance hon. members can have with regard to answers given is that the minister is a member of the privy council and speaks on behalf of the government.

No matter what the good will and good faith of the parliamentary assistant may be, he is not in a position to bind the government by his statements. Therefore answers given in the house by any parliamentary assistant do not have the sanction of the combined responsibility of government under our traditional parliamentary system. If we are to proceed on the basis of answers being given by the parliamentary assistant, then in any case where any question arises whether the statement is made on behalf of the government there should be agreement in advance that the item will stand until such time as the minister can be present to answer that question.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, I am temporarily vested constitutionally with authority to act for the Minister of Fisheries in every capacity the Minister of Fisheries has, and I am quite prepared to do so and to accept that responsibility here and now.

Mr. Drew: Then is it the intention of the Secretary of State to answer every question in connection with the estimates now before us?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly not. I will make use of the services of the parliamentary assistant as provided for by parliament when provision was originally made for parliamentary assistants, but I will take the responsibility for what is done.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman, that is not our parliamentary system. That is not the system that we have been accustomed to.

Mr. MacNaught: On a point of order, during the session of 1948 when I was appointed parliamentary assistant to the then minister of fisheries, Mr. Mayhew, we followed that practice throughout the whole time our estimates were before the house, and nobody raised any objection on that occasion. Mr. Mayhew sat by me. I answered all questions respecting the Atlantic coast and Mr. Mayhew dealt with the Pacific coast. No one questioned the propriety of it then, and in sessions thereafter we followed the same practice.

Mr. Drew: The parliamentary assistant will be well advised to let some member of the government speak on behalf of the government.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, may I do so immediately and say that the present situation was well known to hon. members opposite. For something like two weeks now it has been known that on this particular day the Minister of Fisheries would be absent. I have called the Department of Fisheries on at least five or six occasions and it was fully understood that this procedure would be followed. I would expect hon. members opposite to accommodate the leader of the house by warning him in advance if they were not prepared to go on with this particular item at this time. This is the first I have heard of any such argument.

Mr. Drew: There was no notice to the house that the Minister of Fisheries was going to be away.

Mr. Harris: Of course not. I do not say all these things in public that are said in private, but if we cannot arrange matters in that manner then I am not going to try any longer. There has to be a certain amount of arrangement of affairs and at no time that I am aware of have I been lacking in courtesy to hon. members opposite in attempting to meet their wishes, and in particular with respect to the business for this day.

I quite realize that all hon. members are not cognizant of these things and if they feel that they have not been properly arranged of course this is the only time that they could make an objection, but at the same time I would hope that we could avoid these difficulties before the event rather than at the time. If my hon. friend takes the view that an acting minister, with a parliamentary assistant here, cannot answer, then I must confess that the business of this house will be held up at some length on occasion because I can well recall former occasions when I acted in the absence of a minister on the estimates. This is an entirely new proposition that I am not prepared to argue on its merits at the moment. I would hope we would be able to proceed with the items on the statement made by the Acting Minister of Fisheries that he will accept responsibility.

Mr. Drew: Let there be no suggestion there is any breach of understanding or that there is any question about the attempt that has been made from time to time to facilitate proceedings in the house. I, for one, urged that there be a wide understanding between both sides of the house as an alternative to any rigid pattern in dealing with matters of this kind. We now have the minister who informs us he is the acting minister. I would point out that since the time mentioned by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration we have, on different occasions, been called upon to discuss the responsibility of parliamentary assistants. We are not in any way challenging the statement of the government in respect to them. The position of the government has been that parliamentary assistants cannot bind the government.

My remarks were directed to that point, that it was evident the parliamentary assistant proposed to take up these estimates. The Secretary of State has now stated he will assume full responsibility. I would point out, further, that we do not want a return to the position explained by the parliamentary assistant, where the parliamentary assistant is speaking with authority on behalf of the government. Now that the Secretary of State is prepared to take full responsibility, I think we can proceed. If there is any comment on any specific item which needs the minister's attention, we could defer the item until the return of the minister and we could deal with it on that basis.

Mr. Harris: Just so that we will not have any difficulty in this house, it must be remembered that on the last item of national health and welfare I asked one of my colleagues to telephone the Acting Minister of Fisheries to have him here. There was no intention of proceeding with this department until he had arrived. Because the hon. members on the other side were generous enough to pass that final item a little quicker than I expected the minister had not arrived when this item was called.

Mr. McWilliam: I wish to make a request of the minister's department that he give further consideration to extending the educational services to maritime fisheries, and in particular a program of education designed to fully inform and bring home to the fishermen the devastating results that will follow if the present tempo of illegal fishing for lobsters, quahogs and salmon continues. We need a process of education that will turn the fishermen towards becoming conscious of the dangers of this procedure and will enlist their co-operation in taking strong means to stamp out the illegal fishing carried on by poachers, who are a small minority of the fishermen. Such a program would aid in the propagation of the species. The educational program should point out that some of our maritime fisheries are reaching the point of exhaustion, and the co-operation of fishermen is necessary to assure the success of a conservation program.

Mr. MacNaught: In reply to the hon. member for Northumberland, I might say that that is a point that is receiving consideration of the department, and has been receiving consideration for some months now. An active program is under way; literature and pamphlets are being prepared and sent out to the various fishing communities showing the effect of catching small lobsters, for example, and the effects that will follow from taking fish that are too small or immature. I assure the hon. member the matter has been given very active consideration.

Item agreed to.

131. Markets and economics service, $239,500.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to venture just a comment on this item. As I said on the opening item, I was very pleased to read about the development which had taken place in the industry, with particular reference to this innovation of what I think is called fish sticks or the new method of selling fillets of cod and other groundfish. According to the minister this type had attracted a tremendous amount of attention in the United States. As a matter of fact I have heard from him, and from others, that the demand was so great that the United States buyers were worried about being able to buy larger quantities of this fish rather than being worried about sales.

Having read of that, and heard that, there was a feeling that some of the problems of the fishing industry might be solved, so I was rather shocked to read in the press that apparently representations had been made to the President of the United States by the tariff commission that duties should perhaps be increased on the importation of Canadian fish. I could not reconcile the very glowing picture painted by the minister the other night with this account which I read afterwards in the press. I presume one explanation might be that the recommendations of the tariff commission had taken place before the importation of these fillets had increased to the tremendous extent it did. Either the United States is not as dependent on this as we were led to believe or else the tariff commission has made a serious mistake in making recommendations to the President or else the newspapers are reporting wrongly.

[Mr. McWilliam.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Since this is a matter that involves another country as well as our own, perhaps I should answer. I may say that as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has said the tariff commission of the United States is reported to have made a recommendation to the President. As the Prime Minister informed the house on two different occasions, the Canadian government has made very strong representations on this subject. There are some encouraging features about the situation.

No action has been taken by the U.S. administration, though a report appeared in the press that recommendations had been made. In the second place, I was informed by the Minister of Fisheries himself after he returned from Cleveland, where he was the guest of a meeting of the fish trade association, that although a year ago the trade association had supported the application to the tariff commission for a restriction on the importation of these fresh frozen fillets, this year they had refrained from doing so. I understand there is divided opinion in the United States industry. Some of those who do the actual fishing, I understand, are still in favour of protection, but there are a great many United States processing firms who now get a large portion of their fish from Nova Scotia and Newfoundland in block form. Their business would be seriously interfered with if these supplies were cut off. I think we have reason for modest hope that the views we have put forward, and the views that many people in the industry in the United States have put forward, will prevail in this matter.

I certainly hope so because it would be quite disastrous, were the contrary the case, to the riding that I happen to represent, and to the whole Atlantic area. I may say, sir, that what the hon. member has said is quite correct. The demand for these fish sticks is growing more rapidly, I am told, than the demand for any other food product on this continent at the present time. I can assure any hon. member in the committee, on either side of the house, that having eaten almost a pound of them myself for dinner tonight—

An hon. Member: At one time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, at one time—that they are simply delicious. They taste like fish that has just come out of the water. I strongly recommend these fish sticks to every member of the committee.

Mr. Nowlan: I am sure the people of Canada should see the radiant smile on the face of the minister. Were they to do so they would realize what a wonderful advertisement it is for these fish. I quite agree with him that they are good.

I have one other question. Without going into too much detail in a field into which I do not wish to trespass, can he indicate, either as a result of the experience of similar recommendations in the past, or as a result of inquiries the government has recently made, when one might expect some answer would be given with respect to recommendations made by the American tariff commission to the President of the United States.

Mr. Pickersgill: We hope no action will be taken. I think there is one very reassuring thing. I had the record examined recently and I find that the present administration in the United States has not yet accepted a single recommendation that involved action under the escape clause in GATT. I am sure everyone in the committee hopes that record will continue.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, perhaps this is a department into which a landlubber should enter with caution. But being fond of fish, perhaps I may offer that as a reason for asking some questions. I refer to the matter of publications and general publicity in the department. At page 188 of the estimates I find reference to the publication of reports and other material, and the amount is $20,000, the same as last year. Then there is an item for films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity for an amount of $89,700, an increase of about $36,000 over last year. What is the anticipated additional publicity and what films and displays are contemplated. Generally speaking, what is the total of this department's budget for publications and publicity?

Mr. MacNaught: The total for the Department of Fisheries is $89,700, and the increase is largely accounted for by the fact that a special film is being prepared relating to fisheries. That accounts largely for the increase.

Mr. Michener: Could we have the price of the film, the subject matter and information as to who is preparing it?

Mr. MacNaught: The national film board is doing it, and it relates to methods of fishing, processing and marketing.

Mr. Michener: Is that for the information of fishermen, or for the advertising of fish products throughout the country?

Mr. MacNaught: It is mostly educational.

Mr. Michener: What is the total budget of the department, in all branches, for that kind of work?

Mr. MacNaught: I have given that figure, $89,700.

Mr. Michener: I see that amount in one item; but I find other items for publicity. What is the departmental total?

Mr. MacNaught: There are other details throughout the various items dealing with the publication of reports. But that is not in the sense to which the hon. member is referring. The publication of reports is informational publicity. The total amount for the item to which the hon. member has referred is $89,700.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, there is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. MacNaught: On item 131?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes, I think it can be dealt with here. I can speak on some other item, if that is the wish of the committee.

Mr. MacNaught: It will be satisfactory if the hon. member speaks now.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Before I proceed to my remarks on this subject I wish to say that I was greatly interested in the discussion which took place tonight when the Leader of the Opposition mentioned the fact that we were discussing a matter which was of great importance to the Canadian people. It is always good to realize that the fishing industry is recognized as a major rather than a minor industry in this country. I am always more than pleased to hear remarks of that kind.

For a few moments this evening I should like to bring to the attention of the department a change which I believe should be made in the lobster regulations, and one which I feel is long overdue. I refer to spawn or berried lobsters which become berried after they are impounded in licensed pounds which are licensed by this department.

Realizing that there might be some opposition to this change I should like to give the committee some information in connection with this industry. Lobster pounds are a great asset to the lobster industry. During the fishing season the operators purchase lobsters to be impounded, or stored, and sold after the season closes. This has a most stabilizing effect. Without these pounds, or storage facilities, of necessity all lobsters would be offered on the open market at whatever price might be offered by dealers in all parts of the United States, particularly, because over 90 per cent of the lobsters we produce are sold in the United States.

One can imagine what would happen in western Canada if storage were not provided for wheat and other farm commodities. The same condition would prevail in the lobster industry without lobster pounds, or the facilities for holding them over different periods of time. Again I wish to make a few comparisons to emphasize the importance of this industry.

The impounding of lobsters by pound operators is a great gamble. You are dealing with live lobsters, a most perishable commodity, unlike farm commodities. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are invested by private enterprisers—not by the government—without any government guarantee as to price, or financial support, or anything else. Should some sort of malady strike the lobster industry, as has happened within the last few years, these operators would be obliged to take the full loss which, as I have said, would amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

A few years ago thousands of lobsters died in the pounds of Charlotte county, and in the state of Maine. We have yet to understand why it happened; but it did happen. The operators at that time lost hundreds of thousands of dollars, but the total loss was absorbed by the pound operators. They did not ask for government assistance. No appeal was made to the government in any case for assistance of any kind. They took their loss and stood on their own feet.

When the foot-and-mouth disease appeared in western Canada—and I suggest this is a very fair comparison—a much different view was taken. I am not saying this in any critical sense. Each and every one of us stood in our places in the House of Commons and did everything that was possible to help in that situation. I would do it again if necessary. But I just wish to make this comparison to show that these men today, the private enterprisers in this business, act in a different fashion. It is true that they are trying to make a dollar for themselves, but at the same time they are giving financial assistance to the lobster fishermen of the maritime provinces and they are receiving very little by way of assistance.

Every farmer in western Canada was fully paid for his losses when we had the foot-and-mouth disease in this country; and for that I congratulate the government upon its speedy action. Then when disaster struck the hog raisers in Ontario a year ago, again the federal government came to their assistance and the losses were sustained by the taxpayers of Canada. Again I wish to congratulate the government on the action taken in that connection.

When there is an overproduction of butter in Canada, the government purchases the surplus and furnishes cold storage. At the present time I believe there is about 30 million pounds in this position, with a guaranteed price to the producer on that butter held in storage. Again I congratulate the government on their efforts to stabilize the situation. I could also mention the $20 million which we voted just two years ago when the wheat was under the snow in western Canada. I stood in my place here and voted for that assistance to the farmers. When it came time to seed the next spring it was discovered that less than $1 million was used. Assistance of this kind has never been provided to any branch of the fishing industry.

In this industry it is a case of supply and demand, and those individuals who are making every effort to stabilize this industry receive very little encouragement. During the spring lobster season, which is in operation right now, hundreds of thousands of lobsters go into the pound for storage, to spread the supply over the twelve-month period, rather than putting them all on the market at one time, which would have a very ill effect in so far as price to fishermen is concerned. The fisheries inspector or inspectors supervise the purchase of these lobsters to be sure that each and every one is of a legal size. They are present when the lobsters are placed in the pounds. No berried or spawn lobsters may be purchased or stored in lobster pounds at any time. Every effort is made by the pound operators to comply with this regulation, and at great additional expense to themselves all the males and females are separated and placed in different compartments of the pound. It means an enormous amount of work and a lot of expense.

The approximate date that spawn or berries would appear on female lobsters is known to these owners. If they sell every female before that date and kill them before the berries appear, they have the full support of the federal government; but if some are left until after the spawn appears, any junior officer of the department has full authority to liberate every spawn lobster that may be found in the pounds, without paying the owners one single penny. We must remember, however, that these lobsters were legal lobsters when purchased. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were involved in the purchase of female lobsters during the open season, a legal procedure in every way. They were carefully inspected and passed as legal lobsters by authorized officials of the fisheries department.

In my opinion, once legal lobsters are purchased and placed in pounds they are the property of the owner. No one should have the authority to liberate a single lobster without paying the full price. The department may argue that this would encourage illegal fishing of female lobsters. I have heard that argument used. Illegal fishermen who fish for lobsters do not fish for female lobsters only, and if they catch a berried lobster the berries will be removed before it is sold. This is a very simple operation. But no fisherman is going to bring a berried or spawn lobster to a dealer and sell it. They will be removed before he brings it in. Any illegal lobsters caught in the area in which I am interested are sold on the other side of the border in the state of Maine. There, there is no restriction in so far as the lobster season is concerned. They fish twelve months of the year. It is very simple for fishermen to take their catch over the border at any season, and dispose of it at prices which would be comparable to the prices they would receive in Canada.

The department might also suggest that the change I have suggested would give pound operators advantages which are denied individual fishermen. Again I would say that you were giving the pound operator nothing. It is a matter of justice, and you are giving him the privilege of protecting his investment of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

As I stated just a few moments ago, lobsters are a most perishable article, particularly in cold weather. In the wintertime the lobster is a most delicate thing to handle. The loss sometimes is tremendous. These operators are using their own money. They are building pounds which are of great benefit to every lobster fisherman in the maritime provinces. They purchase lobsters, which are not berried at the time they are purchased. They are placed in pounds. They have paid for them with their own cash. They are impounded legally because they are inspected when they are put in there. But if berries appear on thse lobsters when they are in these pounds fo rthree months, any officials of the fisheries department can go to the pounds and liberate 10,000, 20,000 or 50,000 without paying the owner and the operator one single dollar.

I hope the department will see fit to make a change in this regulation. As I stated at the outset, it is long overdue. These men are free enterprisers. They have done a lot for the lobster industry. They have done a lot for the fishermen of the maritime provinces. I believe they must have some little consideration.

The regulation that we have on the statute books today could be changed very simply. All that it needs to improve the situation is to put at the end of the sentence: "except in licensed pounds". These pounds are licensed by the federal government. The licence fee is paid by the operator. I am not one of the legal profession, but I do believe that if an officer went into a legal pound today and found berried lobsters it would be hard to find a jury in the maritime provinces who would condemn the pound operator. He bought them legally; he impounded them legally and they are his own property. I believe it is time that some consideration was given to these men who are, as I say, free enterprisers, doing so much to build up this industry, and some little encouragement should be given to them.

Before I resume my seat I want to emphasize this once more. We will find some fishermen who will be opposed to this suggestion. I have fished lobsters myself. I have some idea about the industry. I have spent many hours around lobster pounds, putting lobsters in and taking them out. I have seen the loss involved in the handling of lobsters, and I realize the great risk that is taken by these men, these free enterprisers. A regulation that gives a government department authority to seize and release anything that belongs to these men, that they bought and impounded legally, is something that should be adjusted, and adjusted without any great delay.

Mr. MacNaught: The matter brought up by the hon. member for Charlotte is one that received the attention of the department about two years ago. At that time the department convened a meeting of all interested parties, but no unanimity could be arrived at. I might say that it is a matter of considerable controversy. The department is prepared at the present time to convene another meeting as soon as possible to see if the viewpoint of the persons opposed to the change in the regulations has changed and, if so, then a satisfactory change in the regulation may be arrived at.

Mr. Bell: I have a matter that I would like to bring up. It concerns the salmon weirs in Saint John harbour. I think I can relate it to fish economics and to this item. I mentioned it when the estimates of the Department of Transport were before the committee, but I do feel that some action should be taken. Perhaps it would be up to the Department of Fisheries to press for some remedy. It concerns the weirs on the west side of Saint John harbour. I understand that they are auctioned off in three-year lots to fishermen by the national harbours board. They set an arbitrary reserve price at this auction. Perhaps they do not have the knowledge that the Department of Fisheries would have as regards the economics of the fishing and as regards conservation, and consequently when the price is not met they simply say: let the weir go, and we will not bother to use it for another three years. Three or four fishermen have brought this to my attention. They feel that a study should be made by the Department of Fisheries of the reserve prices that seem to be set arbitrarily. In some cases they feel that they are much too high. If they could be brought down to lower figures then the weirs could be worked. Some are not as profitable as they used to be in the past but the fishermen feel quite strongly about it because there is some revenue there for them and they do not like to see the weirs lying unused simply because the department really has not the full knowledge of the salmon in Saint John harbour. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would like to comment on this and say whether he will look into the matter and take some action because if it is left up to the national harbours board I feel the situation will go on indefinitely and these weirs will be of no value in another five years.

Mr. MacNaught: I can well understand the concern of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert in connection with these fishing weirs. As he said himself in his remarks, they are on the property of the harbours board but I can assure him the Department of Fisheries will be only too pleased to look into the matter and discuss it in all its aspects with the Minister of Transport.

Item agreed to.

132. Administrative expenses of the Newfoundland fisheries board, $25,450.

Mr. Bell: I am wondering about the increase in regard to the Newfoundland fisheries board, perhaps merely out of curiosity. But I understand that with the reorganization of NAFEL and the new plans to hand all the marketing over to the fisheries board and hence the Department of Trade and Commerce there will be some changes in the Newfoundland fisheries board. In that event surely the board's duties would be cut down and the administrative cost would be less.

Mr. MacNaught: These estimates were prepared last October before the change mentioned by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert took place and any economies made by the changeover will be reflected in next year's estimates.

Mr. Bell: Could the parliamentary assistant tell us what the fisheries board will be doing now? To what extent are their duties and expenditures to be cut down? I understood when the announcement was made that the NAFEL organization was being completely changed. I realize this is not a government body but this is quite important and I would like to know what is being left of the entire organization.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I should say a word about this, Mr. Chairman. The functions of the Newfoundland fisheries board with respect to marketing were transferred from the board to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but it also had other functions. The Fisheries Act has never been proclaimed in Newfoundland and the law of Newfoundland with respect to fisheries is still the old law that existed before confederation. The fisheries are administered through the Newfoundland fisheries board which is an agency of the Department of Fisheries of Canada and it has all the functions of the fisheries department to perform in so far as Newfoundland is concerned, or at least a substantial part of these functions. There may have been a few things not done before confederation that are not done through this agency but most of them are, and the only way in which the board's duties have been lightened is by transfer to trade and commerce of the supervision over NAFEL which, of course, is a private agency, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Item agreed to.

133. Industrial development service, $1,000,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of curiosity I notice that although on the face of it there appears to be a considerable decrease in this item over last year's estimate, I see on looking at the details that although there was $1,250,000 appropriated last year the total expenditure was only $350,000. Despite that the appropriation this year is $1,000,000. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would care to explain.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not really intend to usurp the function of the parliamentary assistant but as the questions seem to be mainly about Newfoundland, a subject in which I have a lot of interest, I cannot resist the temptation to answer. The fact of the matter is that it was rather expected that certain developments with respect to the fisheries could be carried on a little more rapidly than in fact proved to be possible last year. As the hon. lady no doubt knows, there was a joint committee set up by the federal government and provincial government under the chairmanship of the chief justice of Newfoundland and they made a report some time during May last year. This vote is not entirely for Newfoundland. There are certain other developments elsewhere, although the major portion of it is used in Newfoundland. The purpose there is to get on with development work in co-operation with the province, but as quite often happens in developments of this kind the planning takes a good deal longer than people expect.

Mrs. Fairclough: It seems to me that the minister has succeeded in spreading a nice thick blanket over this item because the amount for this year is still three times the expenditure which they were able to use last year. Just what type of development is anticipated that would run into $1,000,000?

Mr. Pickersgill: As I indicated a moment ago, it is not all for Newfoundland. There are some developments in other provinces. But there is one development in particular which is perhaps of more interest to me than most of the others. It is proposed to establish an experimental dryer at a place called Valleyfield or Badger's Quay. I am not well enough acquainted with the geography of the settlement to know where one ends and the other begins, but the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, who is a constituent of mine, no doubt knows the area even better than I do. I have seen it from a ship, from the air, and from the ground and it is a very promising area for fishery development. This experimental dryer which is to be established there is going to mean perhaps as much to the salt fishery as the experimental farm means to agriculture, and it is intended to experiment not merely with drying fish but also with packaging and with new methods of preparing the product to see if a higher class of product can be produced which will appeal to a better market than has been the case for salt fish in the past.

Mrs. Fairclough: From my rather scanty knowledge of the fishing business it seems to me that this is an industrial project. Or is it a basic government research project intended to aid the industry generally?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very pleased the hon. member has raised that point because there has been a great deal of misunderstanding about this very point in Newfoundland and elsewhere. The federal government does not participate in the financing of commercial plants and the object of this vote is not to set up a government owned industry. It is to assist the fishing industry to develop a new type of plant for the processing of salt fish and to assist in the expansion of the fresh fish industry, and an experiment designed to assist the industry in getting into new and more profitable markets. Unfortunately, because of exchange and other difficulties, the markets for salt fish have been very unsatisfactory for the last five or six years, though there are distinct improvements this year as a result of the agreements with Spain and Portugal and as a result of the improved exchange situation in Brazil, and also as a result of the arrangement my colleague the Minister of Public Works recently concluded with Italy. However, it is felt that there is still plenty of room for improvement in the industry both in producing a good product and in finding good markets and getting what I think is called in the trade "market acceptability". I do not care much for such phrases. It is for the purpose of assisting the industry to improve its methods that this vote is used.

Mrs. Fairclough: Either I did not make myself clear or the minister did not quite understand me. I did not for a moment mean to infer that this amount was going to put the government into the processing business or anything like that. What I intended to intimate was that this type of work, if I understand accurately the type that the minister has described, is the type of research that is usually done by the industrial firms themselves. I wonder whether this is a departure on the part of the government. If so, will the knowledge so gained be available to all of the fish packing industries in Canada, whether they are on the west coast or the east coast, or is this something that is primarily for the benefit of Newfoundland?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I will not say it is not primarily for the benefit of Newfoundland.

Mrs. Fairclough: Be careful.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not solely for the benefit of Newfoundland. In so far as it is related to the salt codfish industry—and it is primarily related to that industry—I do not think it would be of much benefit to the west coast. But anything that is done by the federal government is done for the whole of the industry. In fact, when I was in Newfoundland last August, after the election—because unlike the hon. member for Hamilton West, I had to do my campaigning after the election instead of before it—I spent a week end at Clarenville. There were half a dozen of the leading fish processors of Newfoundland there at Clarenville the first evening I was there. They spent the night there and went on the next day to Bonavista where the government has been experimenting with mechanical drying of codfish and has had some quite marked technical success. We are now trying to see whether we can get costs down so that it will be a commercial success as well.

Practically everyone interested in the processing of salt fish in Newfoundland was going down to spend the week end to examine this whole process. I was still at the same hotel when they came back at the end of the week end and I heard what they had to say about it. They went there sceptical. They came back much less sceptical. It is a new process. If it is really successful it is going to be of great help to the industry.

But it is like something else that I was fairly familiar with a long time before I became very familiar with Newfoundland. I lived in Winnipeg when the rust research laboratory was first established on the university grounds there. For a long time a great deal of money was spent without any assurance that it was going to be the immense boom that rust-resistant wheat has proved to be to the wheat industry. It is the same kind of thing that is designed for the salt fish industry.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to say a word on this matter. Listening to the discussion and the explanation of the acting minister made me think back to this industry in my own county. For many years the fishermen who are interested in the dried fish industry were obliged to dry all their fish with the sun. They had nothing else to depend on but sunshine by means of which to dry the fish. Along those coastlines we have a great deal of damp weather. We came to the place where the markets were demanding a drier fish than we could produce. The moisture content of the fish which we were trying to cure in the Atlantic provinces did not meet the standards in the West Indies and other countries to which we were shipping dried fish. It became necessary for those who could afford it to instal dryers which are most expensive. I know of men on the three islands in my constituency who are in that business and who were obliged to take what we call the green fish to Saint John or to some other part of the province or of the country in order to have them dried, because they could not afford to put in the equipment which would do it properly.

This matter which is now being discussed is along that same line. In Newfoundland there is a great deal of dampness. The fish they are producing must be dried to a much greater extent than they were 10 years ago or 20 years ago. We do not get sufficient sunshine to cure them. The only alternative is to instal dryers, and they are most expensive. This experimenting which they are doing in my own area—I cannot speak for Newfoundland—has been most helpful to the industry. Today we have perhaps 12 installations of dryers where 10 years ago we had none. As the fishermen are able, they will provide these additional dryers which are most necessary if you are going to stay in the dried fish industry.

I hope that the department will continue on with these experiments in that line. In my opinion items in connection with the biological board and items like the one we are now discussing come exactly in the same category as do our experimental farms in agriculture. I believe these men should be encouraged. If we are going to build up this industry—a thing that I have talked about in this chamber on many occasions—we must provide a better product. When we provide a better product—and that is being done today; the product today is much better than it was two years ago or five years ago—a great many of our worries in connection with the fishing industry will be solved, in my opinion.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to detract at all from the assistance that is being given to the fishermen. I see that the next item is a bounty of $160,000. On looking into the bounty I find that it is paid not for catching predatory fish or something of that kind—

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Is the hon. gentleman speaking on item 133 or on the next item?

Mr. Michener: On item 133.

Mr. Pickersgill: All right.

Mr. Michener: I am not sure. I am speaking on this item of $1 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Michener: The bounty which I find in the public accounts was paid not for the destruction of predatory fish or the catching of big fish but for the—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid the hon. member will find that the bounty has nothing to do with the item that is now under discussion.

Mr. Michener: I appreciate that fact. It is just a preliminary expression of good will towards the fishermen. I have no objection to it. I appreciate it is paid to the fishermen and boat owners directly. The item under discussion for $1 million is described as providing for technical services to fishermen and fishing industries. In this chamber I dare say members have become accustomed to very scanty descriptions being given, but when public funds to the amount of $1 million are to be voted on a resolution which is in such indefinite terms as that, particularly after the explanation which has been made by the minister, it seems to me that it is time for the committee to intervene. I would suggest that this item should not be passed in its present form.

Perhaps my nature is unduly suspicious but my suspicions have not been allayed by the statement of the acting minister, or by the fact that the acting minister is here to deal with this item, or by his statement that his electioneering goes on after the campaign. I would be disposed to question this item as being something in the nature of a blank cheque for the acting minister, and it is a fairly substantial one. It seems to me that if the committee is to be asked to provide funds for technical assistance to the fishing industry, for some specific project, it is all very well; let us pass it. But if it is to be described in general terms and put into effect, it leaves the matter open really for the department to spend this money in any way it sees fit. Particularly as this item appears to be intended largely for the province represented by the acting minister, I suggest that it should not carry without more detail being given.

Mr. Ashbourne: I should like for a moment to speak on this item because I realize what has happened since Newfoundland entered into confederation and became a part of this great Canadian nation. At the time the discussion was going on as to whether or not Newfoundland would become part of Canada one of the arguments used was that in becoming part and parcel of this great nation we could look for greater expansion and also for greater aid and help in industrial matters such as the fisheries. I do not want to repeat what I said the other night when the Minister of Fisheries was here. I realize that tonight he is in Newfoundland, and while he cannot answer questions of hon. members of the house he is answering the questions that are no doubt being put to him by various fishermen there who are greatly interested at this time of the year. Only this morning I received a telegram from Newfoundland saying that the fish had struck in there. Although there has been plenty of ice on the northeast coast from Labrador down to cape Bonavista for several weeks, it seems that the ice has moved off now and we are glad to hear that the fish have moved in. In fact one trap set and hauled yesterday morning produced 25 barrels of fish which was good news to the fishermen and good news to me because the season is rather advanced.

The point I should like to make is that we were hoping that by becoming a part of this great nation we would receive every assistance possible in order to utilize to the fullest these great reservoirs of food off the east coast in the Atlantic. I realize what an important item of food fish is and how necessary it is for the body to have a certain amount of protein. We realize that the eating of fish is an admirable way of providing the necessary protein for the body.

But in order to do this thing scientifically, in order to get the very best advantage and the greatest amount of money out of our food resources, naturally some experimentation must take place. I think the Acting Minister of Fisheries has already explained the situation very well. This vote is provided in order to carry on experimentation. Our traditional markets were in the Mediterranean; for centuries past they were provided with fish by the fishermen of Newfoundland in order to supply their needs. That was also true of the West Indies, and there was a time when Newfoundland shipped something over 400,000 quintals of fish to Brazil in one year.

We know that a lot of that has changed with the changing times. Today we have refrigeration and we know that the food value of fish is much better in the fresh form than when it is salted, put out to dry and cure and has to withstand the various vagaries of the weather. The salted fish had to be transported for thousands of miles, then at times taken into the hills and delivered to the people who had to eat the fish perhaps months after it had been caught.

In order to change this situation and bring about a new era through a revolution, so to speak, in fishery development, naturally some money had to be spent. I believe that the committee will agree that this is a move in the right direction. By having mechanical dryers, which have been explained by the hon. member for Charlotte, they will be able to do away with the old method of the fishermen and their wives spreading fish by hand. Now the process will be mechanized, and it is hoped that a larger volume of fish will be caught and processed and a greater number of dollars brought into the Canadian economy than was the case with flake dried salted fish. The end result before was a rather indifferent quality of fish, and we are hoping now that there will be a greater standardization of quality and thus a better article of food.

Of course this can only be done on a large scale by having such things as mechanical dryers. We have been delighted to hear the results of the efforts of the Minister of Public Works and the deputy minister of fisheries in concluding trade agreements in Europe. We are delighted that they have made agreements to sell fish from Newfoundland to Portugal, Italy and Spain. We realize that we are dependent upon these foreign markets, but we find that today the situation is different from what it was before we entered confederation because we now have to sell for dollars where before we could sell for sterling. We could arrange sales in sterling in the soft currency markets. The result has been that we have found that there has been a certain lessening of the exports of fish because of the inability of these countries to provide dollars to buy our codfish. Therefore we have to change from salt fish to a certain degree and move in the direction of fresh fish.

There are physical handicaps which will prevent the full utilization of fresh fish plants on the whole of the Newfoundland coast. There are areas where it will still be necessary to salt the cod as it is caught. As I said before, the purpose of the experimentation is to perfect mechanical dryers operated through power. The exposing of Newfoundland fish to the beneficent rays of the sun makes it a very good article of diet. It may be possible through experimentation to develop a method of treating the fish with ultra violet or other rays if the necessary electrical power is available, but these things are matters for research and experimentation.

Personally I am very glad to see this vote. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton West, the full amount of the vote was not expended last year. I think we can take it for granted that all expenditures under this vote will be carefully scrutinized and that it will react to the benefit of Newfoundland and other fishermen.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I should perhaps say a word in reply to the hon. member for St. Paul's. I think the best way I can do it is by reading two or three extracts from a statement made on October 1, 1953 after a joint discussion between representatives of the government of Newfoundland and the federal government. It reads in part as follows:

> The policy of the federal government was outlined as one of undertaking experimental and exploratory work in determining location of fish populations; of experimenting in mechanized handling and processing of light salted fish on which so many shore fishermen depend; of providing normal federal programs such as the construction and maintenance of harbour works and aids to navigation. The federal government will not finance the construction of commercial plants; the facilities of the industrial development bank and other national legislation like the Cold Storage Act are of course available in Newfoundland as elsewhere.

[Mr. Ashbourne.]

That is a general statement of policy. The actual operation of the program in Newfoundland for this current year was indicated to be as follows:

> 1. The construction of a breakwater, necessary dredging, wharves and breastworks—

Some of these things of course are not in this vote but are in public works.

> —as the federal part of a plan for all-round community development at La Scie that will cover salt and frozen fish and fish meal operations.

It is not expected to do that in one year. It is going to be installed over several years.

> 2. Construction and operation of a federal experimental salt fish plant in the Valleyfield-Badger's Quay area to handle northeast coast light salted fish.
> 3. Small-scale centralization and partial mechanization of individual fishermen's curing operations at Quirpon, to serve the fishermen of that area; a similar small-scale development is being planned for Seldom-Come-By.

That place is in my constituency, but is not my motto.

Mrs. Fairclough: You might consider it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I continue:

> The extension of small community development to other places will depend upon the success of these experiments.
> 4. Construction of a fishermen's wharf in St. John's to serve a fresh fish market, which will be provided by provincial or local authorities.

The market itself will be provided locally. Certain indications were given of the normal federal services which would be provided to speed up development.

In order to make this not seem as though it were entirely Newfoundland, perhaps I should complete my answer by giving a break-down of the other allotments. They are as follows: Technical services to fishermen and the fishing industry, $196,000; demonstration and exploration in Newfoundland—that is in connection with long-lining, a certain type of fishing that is still in the experimental stage—$130,000; fish drying experiments, Bonavista, Newfoundland, $200,000; economic survey, Newfoundland—that has been going on for a number of years and this is just this year's commitment—$12,000; herring exploration, maritimes, $40,000; scallop exploration, maritimes, $50,000—I might note there that a new bed was found in the St. Pierre bank last year; shrimp exploration, British Columbia, $12,000; the Valleyfield fish drying experiment I have already mentioned, $300,000; savings gear experiment, Newfoundland, $10,000; midwater trawl development, British Columbia, $10,000; fish liver hydrolysate (maritimes), $20,000; motorized boats for schooners, maritimes, $20,000; tunnel-stern boats, maritimes, $5,000. In Newfoundland, I may say, the term "maritimes" is used to mean the other three Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Michener: I should like to say that my objection was not to the program which the acting minister has now outlined and which I am very glad to have on Hansard. It does give some reasonable explanation for the very large sum. My objection was the blank cheque. The acting minister will agree with me that it is the duty of the opposition not to assume this blank cheque is going to be filled in with the appropriate items.

Mr. Pickersgill: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am interested in this Valleyfield project. I understand that the minister has inferred it is going to cost considerably more than the money provided this year, which is $200,000, if my memory serves me well. What does the minister expect the total cost of this project will be when it is completed?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is expected to complete the plant within this fiscal year, and $300,000 is the estimated cost of the complete plant.

Mrs. Fairclough: Has part of it already been built?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, none of it has been built. The site has been chosen and some of the marine works have been surveyed. The last report I had on it was that it was hoped construction could start probably in October. It is not desirable to start construction except for the outside shell until the end of the fishing season because one of the incidental advantages of this kind of program is to do the work, so far as possible, during the winter season when the fishermen cannot fish. I am sure all hon. members will approve of that.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is still an item in public works estimates referring to this project.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are some marine works required.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the minister know how much the over-all project will cost?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have not got it at my fingertips, although I should have because it is in my riding.

Item agreed to.

Field services—

134. Field services administration, $701,900.

Mr. Nowlan: On this item of field services administration, protection branch, I should like to say a word about a matter which was raised on the first item and discussed at some length. Hon. members may recall that the matter of the operation of trawlers and draggers off our coastline waters was raised at that time, and without repeating what was set forth in Hansard then I may say that we know there were two different conditions under which our trawlers operate. The small ones operated within three miles of our coastline or up to three miles from our coastline, and United States vessels can operate within three miles of our coastline. Canadian-built draggers and trawlers over 65 feet are compelled to remain out over twelve miles from our coastline. This matter was discussed at some length in the house and naturally different views were expressed with respect to it. Some hon. members took the position that this was an injustice to Canadian trawlers in the sense that United States vessels were allowed to operate within three miles of our coastline.

The suggestion was made, therefore, that our department should abrogate this decision and allow Canadian trawlers also to operate within three miles of our coastline. As you are aware, those trawlers which are built with Canadian funds have a condition endorsed on their certificate saying that they must operate outside the twelve-mile limit. I would say, superficially, that that appears to be a proper condition and should continue, whereas some others say that since United States vessels operate within the three-mile limit these Canadian trawlers should also be permitted to operate within the three-mile limit. My answer to that is this. This regulation was not promulgated for the benefit of the trawler operators. It was done to protect the inshore fishermen. Although we could not control the United States trawlers under international law, we could control our own. Our government said, and I say quite properly, that these trawlers should be kept beyond the twelve-mile limit.

I want to express my own protest against any suggestion of abrogating our decision. At the moment the situation for the inshore fishermen is not happy. These United States trawlers are operating within the three-mile limit of our coastline. Sometimes on a foggy night or perhaps if it is not so foggy but the patrol boats are not very near, these United States trawlers quite often can be seen within three hundred yards of our coastline. Our lobster fishermen lose their traps and our inshore fishermen lose their gear because of the operation of these boats. My suggestion is that instead of abrogating this decision so the Canadian trawler can operate within the three-mile limit, we should through negotiations through the Department of External Affairs enter into some arrangement whereby the United States trawlers can be kept farther out instead of permitting the Canadian trawler to come closer to shore.

I realize that that is not something that can be accomplished overnight. I am sure the acting minister knows of operations that have taken place in certain countries under which new principles have been laid down for the establishment of inland waters. I believe these new principles are now before the international courts or they have been referred there for settlement. It is quite possible that in the relatively near future we may find international law will permit us to extend our inland waters farther out than the three-mile limit, possibly by adopting the headlands method or the cape to cape method as one country has done. Various expedients have been adopted. If we could establish a different basis for outlining our inland waters than is presently the case, then I believe we would be able to protect our fisheries. I am sure the hon. member for Charlotte would agree with me in that.

I would point out to the Secretary of State, who has more than an academic interest in this because he knows the political history and background of this country, that the particular waters in which he is interested are around Newfoundland, but the ones in which I am interested are in the bay of Fundy.

The situation with respect to that particular water is different from that of any other water on our coastline. Years ago when the British government was in charge of our external relations it took the position that the bay of Fundy formed part of the inland waters of Canada. They maintained that position. And one can go back to the records of the old discussions and the exchange of correspondence between London and Washington and find that position reiterated time and again. The Americans, on the other hand, said it was part of the high seas, and refused to accept that policy.

In the end it was agreed to disagree. Great Britain refused to concede that it was part of the high seas, and the Americans refused to concede that it was part of the inland waterways of Canada. And there the matter stood for many years. One might suggest that there is a proscriptive right; at least the Americans have been allowed to come into those waters. And I am not suggesting for a moment that they should be excluded.

But I do say that our Department of Fisheries should take a very dim view of any suggestion to allow American trawlers to operate within three miles of our coastline. This matter should be kept in abeyance for a few more years until the international situation is cleared up. Because the plight of our inland fishermen today is serious indeed. They cannot operate against the operations of these trawlers coming along the coastline. I know one must not stand in the way of progress. I am not suggesting that in the matter of our high seas fisheries, or deep water fisheries, we should go back to the schooner days, or any of the methods which were used 20 or 25 years ago. But there are along our shoreline little villages and large villages in which there are thousands upon thousands of people who have lived there for generations, and who are living there today, and whose sole existence is being threatened by the operations of these trawlers.

This is not only true in the bay of Fundy. I see the hon. member from Halifax in his seat. I am sure he will agree with me that, for instance, in the waters of St. Margaret's bay, the same situation exists. Last year I was approached by many fishermen in that district who wanted protests raised with respect to this. They said they were sitting on the shore with rifles in their hands taking pot shots at American trawlers coming within the waters of St. Margaret's bay.

I am sorry to have spent as much time as this at this late hour, but I was rather intrigued by the suggestions which were made. I say it is a matter of absolute injustice to thousands of people along that coast line, and I wish to express my protest again with respect to a suggestion which was made in my absence.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I have a few questions to ask on the subject of conservation. I shall not speak about the general subject of conservation, because we all realize the importance of it. However we are worried about two or three of our fish products in the bay of Fundy.

First of all, I should like to refer to the clam industry. I am referring particularly to the soft-shelled little neck clams. In Charlotte, and to a lesser degree in Saint John county, there has been a serious depletion in clams. I understand various meetings were held last year asking for a closed season in this clam industry to which I have referred. It was the unanimous opinion of a meeting held in August of 1953 that a closed season should be demanded. I say that we are worried about the serious depletion of clams, and I am wondering what new action has been taken or what inquiries have been made.

I realize that these regulations changes are controversial. Can the minister tell me the position as to the possibility of closing the season for clams?

Mr. MacNaught: This question is now under study by the research board, and officials of our department. No firm decision has been made in the matter, but it is receiving very intensive consideration at the present time.

Mr. Bell: I should like also to refer to the lobster industry, with which the hon. member for Charlotte dealt earlier. In this connection the worry is the same, and concerns undersized lobsters. Perhaps I might read a headline which would explain the situation. This is a headline appearing in the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, stating "Maritime Lobster Fishermen Want 'Get-Tough' Policy Used Against Poaching, Taking Undersized Fish". Then the article goes on to explain what happened at the meeting. It says that representatives from the three maritime provinces asked federal authorities for stricter enforcement measures that would deter an increasing black-market operation, which has created a dual price structure on lobsters.

Again I would ask what new action is being taken in connection with the lobster industry. I realize these are continuing problems, but unless new action is taken each year the thing goes on and on, and nothing is done—and then we will not have an industry.

Mr. MacNaught: As the hon. member for Charlotte has said, this is a continuing problem and one that has been bothering the department for many years. This year a greater effort was made to train the protection officers in the better enforcement of their duties. I think, if we may judge from letters we are receiving at the present time in the department, a better job is being done this year than has been done for many years. At least we hope that is so. But, as the hon. member has mentioned, it is a tremendously difficult job. There are so many ways of circumventing the protection officers, and it is such a lucrative business, that the incentive for illegal practices is very great.

Mr. Bell: Then, I should like also to refer to the small herring industry. I have here a report which indicates that small herring taken in New Brunswick waters, or waters of the bay of Fundy, are used in the United States for fertilizer and oil. This may be surplus; it may be a wasted part of the industry that would not be sold. But it seems outrageous to me that our good fish, particularly the small ones, are being commercialized in this way in the state of Maine, and indeed throughout the New England states .

I should like to hear whether any investigation has been conducted into the matter, and whether there is any truth in this report. If so, what measures are being taken to correct this serious outrage?

Mr. MacNaught: I should suggest that it would be difficult to prevent fishermen from selling where they can get the best price. I think the problem is one of economics. If the fishermen find it more profitable to dispose of their fish to American processors, then I do not think we would be justified in interfering.

Mr. Bell: That was not my point. It is not so much a matter of economics. I am simply saying that this procedure does not seem right. Perhaps if better marketing prices could be obtained for these fish they would not have to sell them as surplus in that way. I take it that the price offered for the herring is not a competitive price under present market conditions. It is simply a left-over price that is given.

In other words, when they see that the herring catch cannot be sold, they dump it on the market in the United States. I am simply suggesting that the whole problem should be investigated, and then it would not be necessary to waste the catch in this way.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to say a word on that point. There is no doubt that last year thousands of tons of small sardines were sold for fertilizer. They were sold in that way because they were too small for canning purposes. When the fish struck on the coastline they were mixed with silver hake, squid and other fish of no value at all. Our fishermen who had waited four or five months to make a few dollars could see a chance to make a few dollars by the sale of fertilizer. There are two sides of the question. Some will argue that small fish should not be taken out of the water. The man who needs a dollar argues, they are mine; I have caught them and I feel I should be given the opportunity of disposing of them if I can get something for them. Thousands of tons of what we would call brit, small herrings, went through as fertilizer. If the department should come out and say to the fishermen, you have got the fish but you cannot sell them, it would be a tough one to put over with them.

Again, these small fish would have been big fish some day and would be worth a lot more money so that the value would have been very much greater. These are the two sides to the question. It is one that would be most delicate for the Department of Fisheries to deal with, I would say.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I feel in somewhat the same situation as the hon. member for St. Paul's in that it is perhaps unusual for a dry bob—I think that is the word one might use—to get mixed up with the fisheries estimates. But I want to transfer the discussion to the Pacific coast for a moment, but not quite to the coast. Any complaint I have relates to the protective regulations which at present prevent sport fishing for certain types of salmon in our inland waters. It has been a sport for many years in certain reaches of the Fraser river, as well as the Thompson river, to fish for the salmon as they come up the river and while they are still in good condition. That is some considerable time before they reach the spawning beds, at which time they would not of course be fit for consumption; indeed, they would not be any sport to catch.

I might say that I have taken this matter up with the department but regret to have to report that no conclusion has been arrived at. Last year a notice was posted at Lillooet, British Columbia, which is in my riding and where there is quite a favourable stretch of water for fishermen. This was over the printed signature of the deputy minister. The regulation is dated March 2, 1953 and prohibited everyone except an Indian from fishing for, catching or killing a sockeye, pink or chum salmon by any means in the non-tidal waters of the province. In my correspondence with the department I pointed out that in the first place when you are fishing for these types of fish which are legitimate to catch you are fishing with a lure, and unfortunately the sockeye, chum and pink salmon are apparently unable to read the deputy minister's notice, and therefore some of them are ill-advised enough to take those hooks. The notice goes on to say that anyone taking such fish shall return them to the water immediately and if possible uninjured. When you tag a twelve-pound or a fifteen-pound salmon and get him in your boat where you can unhook him and possibly have to gaff him in the process, it is rather difficult to return him to the water uninjured.

Mr. Knowles: You are not even uninjured yourself.

Mr. Fulton: As I pointed out in the correspondence, firstly it is impossible to avoid hooking these fish if you are fishing for this species which you are allowed to fish.

Secondly, the result of such regulations, if enforced, would be to deprive anglers in the interior of a perfectly legitimate sport. They are fishing for fish in good condition. Thirdly, the type of fishing which was described was fishing with lures, and not jigging or gaffing. It was genuine sport fishing which was the only type sought to be exempted from this regulation.

Fourthly, the enforcement of the regulation could only have the effect of ensuring that there would be returned to the water a number of fish which were bound to die.

In their reply the department made the point that the fish were on their way up to the spawning grounds and that owing to the increase in population and the opening up of certain areas of the province it was found that increasing numbers of those fish were being caught. They go on to say:

> Reports of increasing evidence of mutilation and destruction of salmon on or approaching the spawning grounds made clear the need for additional special protection for these spawning stocks.

They also said that in their opinion these particular types of fish, that is, sockeye, pink and chum salmon, are not sport fish. I referred the matter back to the angling association which had taken it up with me and asked them for their opinion, and they report as follows:

> In our opinion here, the sockeye is a sport fish. It takes a lure. It treats the fisherman the same as other fish do in that if he has not got the proper lure on his line, then no fish. It is quite true that some are snagged. This of course can and has happened when fishing in lakes and in the salt water. We can produce concrete evidence that at least 60 per cent of the fish are caught by the mouth.

This indicates of course that it is genuine sport fishing. The letter goes on:

> You can rest assured that at least 99 per cent of all the fish we have caught by angling are in a prime condition. It has been found that those that are not in a prime condition will not take the lure.
> I personally have had present persons who are in the fish canning business when a fish has been landed. The expression used by them was: "These fish are in prime condition, as good as we get on the coast.

The department promised to look into it and bring it to the attention of the minister on his return to Ottawa. I regret that I have not had any further answer. I hope that they still have the matter under consideration, but I would add in conclusion that it seems to me to be a matter that justifies review because I hardly think that the number of fish taken by genuine anglers could do conservation any harm. I am not talking about netting or those who may be prepared to indulge in improper forms of fishing and try to sell them commercially. That can easily be done. It does seem to me unfair that a perfectly legitimate and well-recognized form of sport fishing should be denied to those who live in the interior of our province and who, if this is denied to them, are going to be condemned to eat canned salmon for the rest of their lives.

Mr. MacNaught: This is purely a problem of conservation. I can assure the hon. member for Kamloops that it is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. Fulton: I say this with due respect; the simple fact is that I took this up first last August, and I would venture to suggest that the consideration must be approaching some finality at the moment. I hope the parliamentary assistant will assure me that we can expect a decision shortly.

Item agreed to.

Protection branch—
136. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $490,000.

Mr. Nowlan: This item deals with the construction of works in connection with the protective services. I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant to a matter which has achieved considerable prominence in the press in the maritimes within the last few weeks. I am very sorry indeed that the minister himself is not here, because when he was here and replied to the various speeches which had been made, as I recall it, he gave a lecture on what he termed the birds and the bees, and he directed it primarily to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. If the minister were here tonight, and if he had read the press on what has happened in Nova Scotia, it might be advisable for him to write a second volume on the birds and the bees and advise us more explicitly than he did that night.

At any rate the department has supervised the construction of a fish ladder at a hydro dam on the Gaspereau river. For some strange reason, after the fish ladder was put up it was found that there was not enough water going down the ladder to enable the fish to go up. I do not have to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that a fish trying to go up a dry fish ladder is busier than a one-armed paper hanger with the itch. He does not accomplish much more. The result was that there were thousands and tens of thousands of papa fish and mama fish swimming around at the mouth of the ladder.

There was a long line waiting to go up the ladder. The mama fish, being in that condition euphemistically known as a delicate state of health, were rather large and slow and they stayed relatively still. The papa fish being more slim and active managed to swim away. In the end departmental officials got worried about it and tried to encourage the mama fish to go up the ladder. But they would not go because in fact there was not enough water. So they obtained trucks and tin cans and nets and tried to scoop up the fish. As I said, the mama fish being rather slow did not get away and they dumped them into the tin cans, put them in trucks and drove them up around the ladder and put them back in the water again. Many of the papa fish, being pretty active, got clear. The very interesting question being raised now down in Nova Scotia is what sort of volume the minister would write now on the affairs of the birds and the bees, and they are wondering whether he got enough papa fish in the tin cans and whether the mama fish in the tin cans were very much use after being put in the tin cans. It is questioned whether the mama fish were very useful after being put in the cans.

This raises a very interesting problem. I wonder how many hon. members saw the last issue of Weekend magazine, which was carried in most newspapers across the country, for it showed some coloured photographs of the Gaspereau fish caught in the Gaspereau river, which happens to be in my constituency. The farmers there with their scoop nets actually work for a few weeks in the spring and some years make as high as $10,000 in catching the Gaspereau fish going up the river. If two years from now there are not going to be any fish coming up the river, the farmers who have hitherto earned a fair competence from the fish in that river are going to take a very jaundiced view of the situation.

You can speak about it in a humorous way, Mr. Chairman, but after all this is a serious matter. I think quite frankly it reflects on the service in some way. The fish ladders should certainly be constructed in such a manner that water would be flowing down at all times. The fisheries officials should have seen to it that some remedial steps were taken because there might be almost irretrievable damage done to this most valuable industry which means tens of thousands of dollars to the people in my own constituency. I do hope the minister will see that something is done about this. I know this must have been brought to his attention because it got headlines in the press for some days and the news item was spread all over the country. Farmers came from other parts of the country hoping to scoop up the fish. This is a serious situation and I hope it will be rectified before another year has passed.

Item agreed to.

Business of the House

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of hon. members that we rise and report progress?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: May I just confirm that resolution 136 is carried and resolution 137 is the next one to come under discussion.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, earlier this evening there was a slight exchange between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and myself with respect to whether this was the longest session parliament had seen. In case anyone is really aiming at a record I might mention that he will have to stay here another four weeks.

On Monday we shall take the amendment to the Judges Act, as I indicated the other evening, then the supply motion, the departments of national defence, defence production, and national health and welfare. It is understood, Mr. Speaker, that there will be no debate on the supply motion and perhaps we could finish all these departments by Monday night. In order to give hon. members an understanding of the work which is before them I have prepared a very tentative schedule and I would like to place it before them so they may be made aware of what there is yet to do.

If we have disposed of all these items on Monday then on Tuesday we will deal with veterans affairs, legislation, privy council, finance, justice, and national revenue; on Wednesday there will be labour, mines and technical surveys, agriculture, fisheries, and legislation; on Thursday there will be post office, citizenship and immigration and any supplementary estimates which have not been dealt with, and appropriation bills. It will therefore be seen that if we adhere to the program we can complete our work by Thursday night.

Mr. Fulton: Why this sudden modesty on the part of the minister? Yesterday the minister said we might take his department today if we disposed of the others. Now it is to be put off until the last day.

Mr. Harris: The minister has had his estimates here all evening waiting patiently to be called. I hesitate to say this as I have said it before but it was in order to meet the wishes of hon. members opposite that Monday was set aside for other departments.

Mr. Fulton: What about Tuesday?

Mr. Harris: Other departments.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

It being nine minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 21, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

REPORT OF BOARD OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS ON LEVEL CROSSINGS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I beg leave to table, Mr. Speaker, a copy, in English and in French, of the report of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada on the railway-highway problem in Canada, made pursuant to order in council P.C. 1953/52 of January 14, 1953. Copies of the report are being made available for distribution.

AGREEMENTS MADE WITH PROVINCES UNDER NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS ACT

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I indicated on Saturday, Mr. Speaker, I am now tabling a copy of an agreement made under the National Physical Fitness Act between the government of Canada and the provinces, and also a copy of the annual report of the physical fitness division for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954.

QUESTIONS

EXPORTS OF FARM PRODUCTS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What were the varieties and kinds of farm products for which export permits have been granted since the first of January, 1954?

2. What was the quantity and sale price of each of such varieties and kinds of farm products for which such permits were granted for shipment, sale or consignment to (a) U.S.S.R.; (b) Hungary; (c) Roumania; (d) Bulgaria; (e) Poland?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Butter, canned pork, malt, hops, white sweet clover seeds, grass seeds and powdered whole milk, wheat, oats, barley.

2. (a) 7,400,000 lbs. canned pork*. Barley 344,467 bushels; (b) 131,100 lbs. white blossom sweet clover seed; (c) 2,200 lbs. Canadian slender wheat grass seed; (d) no export permits were issued for farm products; (e) no export permits were issued for farm products.

*Note:
Since in each instance there was only one exporter, in accordance with government policy the prices paid are not made public.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES PASSES

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. Were any flying passes issued by Trans-Canada Air Lines, during the 12 months ending March 31, 1954? If so, how many?

2. How many of these passes were (a) permanent; (b) temporary?

3. What are the names and addresses of all persons who received permanent passes, during the 12 month period ending March 31, 1954?

Mr. Dickey:

1. T.C.A. figures are compiled on a calendar year basis. The following is for the year 1953: Yes. 1,660 other than passes issued to T.C.A. employees.

2. (a) Permanent — 13; (b) Temporary — 1,647 (one trip only).

The foregoing temporary passes were issued in accordance with a policy agreed between the air transport board and scheduled carriers and authorized by the air transport board by which each carrier is granted a monthly quota of trip passes for promotional and public relations purposes. These quotas are related to the total business volume of each carrier.

MILEAGE 87·1, FRANK, ALBERTA

Mr. Hansell:

1. Was there ever a railway crossing established at mileage 87·1 Crowsnest subdivision, Canadian Pacific Railway at or near the village of Frank, Alberta?

2. If so, was this crossing a public or private crossing?

3. Was the crossing abandoned? If so, when and by what authority?

Questions

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. The board has no record of a crossing having been established at mileage 87·1 Crowsnest subdivision, Canadian Pacific Railway Company, at or near the village of Frank, Alberta.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

OLD AGE SECURITY—LIENS COLLECTED

Mr. Hansell:

1. How many liens have the government collected on estates of old age pensioners under the Old Age Pensions Act, since the Old Age Security Act came into force?

2. What is the total amount collected?

3. What amounts were collected from each province?

Mr. Martin: I should explain to the hon. member that it would take quite a long time to answer this question because we have to ask the provinces for the information. This is a matter over which they have control.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps I shall talk with the minister and we will have the question dropped later. It could stand for today.

Mr. Speaker: Question stands.

HOUSES BUILT BY C.B.C.

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation built any homes in the past three years for the purpose of renting to any of their officials or employees?

2. If so, how many?

3. What was the cost and location of each?

Mr. McCann:

1. No.

2 and 3. See answer to No. 1.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

R. F. WELCH CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways paid any money to the R. F. Welch construction company, during the past five years? If so, what amount?

2. What is the nature of the work done by that company for which such payments were made?

3. How many people are usually employed by this company on Canadian National Railways work?

4. Have any immigrants been brought to Canada during the past five years to work for this company? If so, how many?

5. Is there any working agreement between the department of immigration or the Canadian National Railways and the R. F. Welch construction company for bringing immigrants to Canada?

6. Does the R. F. Welch construction company maintain an agent in Italy for the purpose of securing immigrants for Canada?

7. Dose this company maintain an office in Halifax for the purpose of securing employees from among the immigrants who come to Canada?

[Mr. Hansell.]

8. Does this company maintain an agent or office at the union station, Toronto, adjacent to the government immigration office?

9. Does the government exercise any supervision over the wages paid and working conditions provided by this company on Canadian National Railways contracts?

10. What is the hourly rate of wages paid for Canadian National Railways contract work by this company?

11. How do these wages compare with the wages agreed upon in the Canadian National Railways contract with the Maintenance of Way Workers Union?

12. Does the R. F. Welch construction company enter into any contract with immigrants regarding employment?

13. If so, what are the terms and conditions of these contracts?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

ARMED FORCES—LAYCOCK REPORT

Mr. Dinsdale:

For a copy of the Laycock report on the subject of recreation and related services for Canada's armed forces.

Mr. Campney: I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that there is no report known by this title in the files of the Department of National Defence. Dr. Laycock was associated with Professor Hendry in the studies which he made for departmental officials at the request of the defence research board, and assisted in the preparation of Professor Hendry's report. Any work done by Dr. Laycock was, therefore, included in Professor Hendry's report, the question of producing which has already been dealt with by the house. I suggest under such circumstances the hon. member might, therefore, withdraw his motion.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the fact that the defence estimates will be discussed later during the day, I am quite willing to take such action.

Mr. Speaker: Motion dropped.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GUATEMALA—INQUIRY AS TO FOREIGN INTERFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence it might perhaps be regarded as notice. In view of the statement by Mr. John Foster Dulles last Tuesday that the great majority of the Guatemalan people have both the desire and the capability of cleaning their own house, can the minister inform us as to whether or not there has been any attempt at foreign interference in the dispute on behalf of either side?

Mr. Roch Pinard (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): In the absence of the minister, Mr. Speaker, I shall follow the hon. member's suggestion and take the question as notice.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO ESTIMATED SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance of which I have given him notice referring to the April returns of receipts and expenditures of the federal government, showing a surplus of $29 million as against $79 million a year ago, a drop of some $23 million in the revenue and an increase of $24 million in expenditures, will the minister say whether it is possible to make any comment in the light of these early figures concerning his estimate of a surplus of $4 million for the full year?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I do not know that there is any special comment I can make. It is for the first month of the year. Defence expenditures were some $24 million higher this year than they were last year in the same month. They were rising last year, but they have levelled off now. The revenue, as my hon. friend has pointed out, is some $20 million odd lower, but there is no reason as yet to revise the estimates which I gave in my budget speech.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF NEW CHIEF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the Prime Minister say at what time the new Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada will be notified of his appointment?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There will be no one notified of the appointment until the appointment has been made, and it is not intended that there be any appointment made today. There could not be one made today because there is no vacancy today.

Mr. Knowles: There will be tomorrow.

INTERNATIONAL BANK

ISSUE OF BONDS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have one further question to ask of the Minister of Finance. Would the minister comment on the news item in the Montreal Gazette of June 18 concerning the issue of $25 million of world bank securities in Canada? There are various comments made on this, and it seems to me it would be a matter of some interest if the minister would make his comments.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The only comment I believe I can make is this. This is the second issue of bonds which has been put out by the international bank for reconstruction and development in Canada. Speaking from memory, I think the first was some two years ago for $15 million, and this one is for $25 million. The institution is familiar to all members of the house. The bonds are first class securities—putting in a little plug for them—and they are eligible for investment by Canadian insurance companies. I have no other comment to make on this issue.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Has this loan any connection with any of the loans made by the world bank to Canadian companies, or is that purely accidental?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think so. So far as I am aware, the world bank has made no loans to Canadian companies, except the loan made some time ago to Brazilian Traction in Brazil. The Canadian money market is perfectly free. The Canadian government has no control over the issue of securities by the world bank, although under the articles of association the Canadian government is required to agree to the floating of an issue in Canada, as is the case with every other country which is a member of the bank under the Bretton Woods agreements.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE SALARIES FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 478, to amend the Judges Act.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to place one fact on the record. As will be recalled by members in the house, I asked on several occasions when we might expect this measure, and it was clearly indicated, by the nature of the question and from reports that appeared in the press, with the customary guiding phrase, that they were from a reliable government source, that this contemplated a general revision of judges' salaries.

I wish to point out that, because of the understanding that this was the situation, this matter stood until the resolution was presented last week without any knowledge on my part, or on the part of any of the other members of the opposition, that a general revision was not contemplated.

I wish to say quite definitely that I was not aware until the resolution was on the order paper that the general revision which had been talked about in the press and had been discussed for some time was not contemplated in the amendments before us.

The amendment before us for second reading is for the specific appointment of two judges, which I believe, we will all agree, is an appropriate addition to the bench. And, so far as the amendments are concerned, it is our intention to support them.

So far as the other subject is concerned, we are coming to the end of the session without even consideration of something that has been very much in the minds of the public and of a number of members in the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Salaries of judges of Court of Appeal.

Mr. Fulton: I wish to make one observation and express the hope—perhaps it is a forlorn hope, but I think it should be expressed again, in the light of past experience—that, in making appointments to fill vacancies indicated in the bill before us, the government will depart from the practice which has been followed generally in the past, and will broaden the basis of selection of lawyers to be appointed as judges.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member mean, when he refers to broadening the base, that judges in British Columbia should be chosen from outside the bar of British Columbia? I cannot see any other way the base can be broadened.

Mr. Fulton: The Secretary of State is not usually so slow on the uptake. He knows perfectly well what I have in mind. I have in mind that no longer should it be felt that the past political affiliations of those who are being considered as candidates should be the main qualifying factors, and that consideration, I am suggesting, should be discarded as the basis of selection in this instance.

I am convinced that one of the reasons why there has been some difficulty—a difficulty expressed by the minister on previous occasions—in finding suitable candidates who will accept appointments to the bench is that the minister confines the area within which he makes his selections too closely to those who are politically acceptable, instead of using as a basis for selection those who are qualified by experience, temperament and capacity for such appointments.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a brief comment. We are prepared to support this bill. Had it contained what we thought it was going to contain we would have opposed it. And in that connection may I say, by way of comment on the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition, that I hope there will be no upward revision of judges' salaries until something has been done for our burnt-out pensioners on the war veterans allowance.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Garson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Hon. Brooke Claxton (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

239. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $300,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $4,577,641,724 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $2,711,822,159 will come due for payment in future years), $1,865,819,565.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I had addressed a few remarks to the committee before the adjournment some time ago. I wish to continue those remarks today and to start out by emphasizing the fact that under the estimates now being given consideration almost half the total expenditures by the government are provided.

It does not seem to me that during the time this subject was under discussion before there was any tendency on the part of the minister to take the House of Commons into his confidence as to the situation with which we are in fact confronted. There were generalities about the excellent morale of our men and women in uniform. There were sweeping statements about our ability to accept our responsibilities in defending this country against air attack. There were sweeping assertions as to our assumption of the responsibility at this time; but the fact is that at no point in his remarks did the minister say what he would have said, and that is: I regret to inform the committee that for reasons I shall now put forward the reserve forces, which are the backbone of the defence of Canada, are now confronted with serious problems; that we are not getting the men we need; that in many cases units are unable to go to camp with more than a fraction of the strength that has been authorized, and that in some cases units of great importance to the defence of Canada are actually going on parade with more officers than men.

Had the minister then explained to us what the reasons are for that situation, I am sure that hon. members of this committee would have been ready to join in any positive effort which could be made to meet that situation in the face of the gravity of the world picture now before us.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that you will permit me to read into the record a short summary of Soviet military power, prepared as appendix "A" to the report of the deputy supreme allied commander in Europe which was presented on May 24 last. I suggest that I be permitted to do this, because otherwise I would simply summarize paragraph by paragraph this short appendix. I believe it is in the most compact form possible, and therefore I propose that, with the consent of the committee, for the sake of brevity rather than otherwise, I be permitted to read this into the record. I do so rather than ask that it be printed because the facts are facts which should be in front of hon. members of the committee in dealing with this subject. I repeat, this is an appendix to a statement prepared by Field Marshal Montgomery and presented in the form of an address on May 24 and appearing as appendix "A" to that address:

1. From 1947 to the present time, the numerical strength (175 divisions) of Soviet ground forces has remained fairly constant. Nonetheless, significant changes have been made in favour of increased mechanization with sturdy and efficient modern equipment. Sixty-five divisions of the present establishment are tank and mechanized divisions. Moreover, the rifle divisions have been provided motorized equipment; they also have organic tanks and additional artillery . . . Thus, the mobility and firepower of all Soviet divisions have been increased through the introduction of improved weapons and equipment.

2. The U.S.S.R., Eastern Germany and the East European satellites today have over 6 million men under arms. Approximately 4·5 million of these are in the ground forces. A high state of preparedness is maintained by a rigorous training program.

3. The number of satellite divisions has almost doubled since 1947, bringing their total to about 80 divisions.

4. The U.S.S.R. has a ready-made spearhead for a rapid advance into western Europe. The spearhead is composed of 22 Soviet divisions in Eastern Germany, the bulk of these armoured divisions with nearly a complete complement of tanks and self-propelled guns. Behind this spearhead there are an additional 60 Soviet divisions located in the eastern European satellite countries and western U.S.S.R. (This does not take into account satellite divisions.)

5. Their mobilization system is exercised periodically to insure its effectiveness, and by M 30 (30 days after mobilization day) the Soviet and satellite ground forces could number 400 divisions.

6. The numerical strength of the Soviet air forces in recent years has been constant, having been stabilized at about 20,000 aircraft, but the rapid increase in the Soviet air potential is illustrated by the rate of changeover to jet aircraft. In 1951, about 20 per cent of their fighters were jet types. By early 1954, almost all of their fighters were jet types.

7. A similar development has occurred with respect to their light bombers. In early 1951, jet light bombers had not been introduced into operational units. By 1954, well over two-thirds of their light-bomber forces were jets.

8. In the medium-bomber category, the Soviets have doubled, since 1951, the number of TU-4s (similar to the U.S. B-29) in operational units.

9. Still newer types of jet fighters have recently appeared. Newer types of medium and heavy bombers, including jet models, also have been observed.

10. The development of a comprehensive aviation-training program has been one of the most significant contributions in the Soviet post-war program to improve the capability of the Soviet air power.

11. The program for airfield construction is still in progress, with attention recently being directed to fields with very long runways. In the past three years the Soviets have about tripled the number of major airfields in eastern Europe which will accommodate jet fighters.

12. In the past, the combat value of the satellite air forces has not been significant. In 1951, their aircraft were obsolete. By 1954, the numerical strength of the satellite air forces had been doubled with nearly half being jet fighters. Their facilities were improved and training had reached a fairly satisfactory standard.

13. The growing complex of airfields throughout eastern Europe, the aircraft-control and warning systems and anti-aircraft artillery dispositions of the Soviet bloc are rapidly becoming capable of providing an effective air-defence belt along the western perimeter of the U.S.S.R.

14. Since the end of world war II, the Soviet armed forces have improved their potential for the use of airborne troops and weapons.

15. The principal naval threat is the Soviet submarine capability. The Soviet navy has over 300 submarines in service, of which about half are large or medium ocean-going types. The current large-scale naval construction program lays emphasis on the continued production of large ocean-going submarines.

16. Soviet submarine stockpiles, considered together with a considerable air and naval mine-laying capability, constitute a growing threat, particularly against the LOC (lines of communication) of allied command Europe.

17. Full credit must be given the Soviet bloc for having developed a strong capability in the special fields of atomic, chemical and biological warfare as well as in the field of guided missiles.

18. The Soviet economy has maintained a level of military production sufficient to provide equipment and supplies for the Soviet and satellite forces and still pursue a program of stockpiles.

19. To illustrate the magnitude of their total equipment stockpile, the Soviets have more than enough tanks, mortars and anti-tank guns for some 300 odd Soviet divisions. Their stockpile of field artillery and anti-aircraft artillery is several times that required to supply those divisions. Annual production of these items is continuing at a sizeable rate.

That is the carefully calculated statement by the man most competent to analyse Soviet military power at this time, Mr. Chairman. May I just for a moment again refer back to the last paragraph of that statement that the Soviet forces have more than enough tanks, mortars, and anti-aircraft guns for some 300-odd Soviet divisions, and then may I emphasize these words:

> Their stockpile of field artillery and anti-aircraft artillery is several times that required to supply those divisions.

That is the cold, chilling reality with which we are confronted at this time, Mr. Chairman, when we discuss the estimates for the Department of National Defence.

As though that were not sufficient warning in itself, we then find that even within these past few days there have been further warnings of the rapid increase, not only in the enormous reserves of manpower, but in the supplies and quality of weapons for the Soviet forces. At Quantico, Virginia, only last Saturday, President Eisenhower was present at a meeting of senior staff officers and officials concerned with the general problem of defence, and at that meeting those who were gathered there were informed by the people best qualified to make a statement on the subject that Soviet production is not only expanding rapidly but that the lead in quality and technical novelty of weapons which have given the western allies their supremacy, in spite of a very great disparity in manpower, is rapidly closing in. They warned, in the presence of President Eisenhower, that the Soviet forces both Russian and satellite are closing in very rapidly in the quantity, quality, and originality of design.

Those are the facts before us. Only yesterday in the celebration of air force day in Moscow, more than 600 planes of the largest and most modern jet type took part in a demonstration of Soviet air power. Those who listened to the radio description of that event heard that this was the largest demonstration of its kind that had ever taken place in the world in peacetime. They were told of the dropping of paratroops, and of all types of artillery of normal field standards, to give support to infantry and other lighter troops who were dropped by parachute.

Never in our history at any time, Mr. Chairman, have we been confronted so openly and with such accurate knowledge with the necessity for devoting whatever money we spend to the most effective defence possible, and with the necessity that our defence dollars produce defence and not just broad and sweeping statements about the general characteristics of our weapons, supplies, and organization.

Let us see what our position is. As of April 30 our active forces numbered 113,478. But, Mr. Chairman, that represents very largely the executive staff and various office employees necessary not only for the active forces, but also for the training, administration and supply of the reserve forces. It would be wholly wrong to think of those figures of active forces as fighting forces. We do not know exactly how many of those can be described as fighting forces.

It is fighting forces, after all, that General Montgomery is talking about when he speaks of six million men under arms. He is not talking about office staff or chauffeurs waiting outside the parliament buildings to take non-military personnel to various non-military engagements. He is not talking about various details of that kind.

He is talking about six million men under arms. He is talking about 400 divisions in the field capable of going into battle within 30 days. He is talking about 300-odd Soviet divisions fully equipped, and not only with an adequate stockpile but with several times their requirements behind them for military purposes. These are the realities. When we examine it from that point of view, let us remember that with the enormous amount of money we are expending, and with all the satisfaction we may express in the training and morale of the young men and women in uniform, it is still a comparatively limited force compared with that reality.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the spokesman of our party, General Pearkes, has on more than one occasion emphasized our belief that there should be a reorganization of our forces in keeping with Canada's own particular military requirements, not only for the defence of our own vast territories, but to play our part in the over-all obligations to NATO which we have assumed. He has made it clear that he believes that the more we concentrate on air and airborne forces, the more we shall be capable of meeting our demands within our own boundaries and, in the unhappy event that the necessity should ever arise, of extending our effectiveness to distant points in other parts of the world.

On several occasions, Mr. Chairman, we have sought to obtain the report prepared by three senior officers of the armed forces in regard to the reserves. Let it be remembered that, while we talk of the active forces in Canada, the backbone of our defence is the reserve. We have never pretended at any time that we are a nation that seeks to maintain a standing army or a standing military force of air, land and naval units capable of meeting the demands of war. We have relied throughout the years on the strength of our reserve forces. That has been the backbone of our defence. It is the backbone of our defence today and it is the strength of the reserve that we should examine and about which we should have all the available information that can be given to us. We have asked several times for the production of that report. We have been told that this is a secret report; that it is a confidential report. But that, Mr. Chairman, is eyewash. That report is no more secret than was the report which was prepared twenty years ago and which formed the basis of the reorganization of the land forces of this country at that time. That report is no more secret than were the recommendations which were carried out twenty years ago and under which there was a conversion of half of our infantry units to artillery units, armoured units and other units of various types. That report was made public. That report was made public in detail. It was made public in detail for several reasons. It was made public because, as a result, it made it possible to obtain the support of the members of the house for the principles laid down and also to obtain the support of the general public, particularly the public in those communities where reserve units carry out their training. By making the general nature of that report public, support for the general plan of reorganization was gained in those communities which have a proud tradition of military training. Only one detail of that reorganization program was kept secret. That was the part which referred to the specific units which should be converted or discontinued. I think the same principle could well apply to the present report.

There are obvious reasons why it is not desirable to present detailed recommendations with regard to the conversion or discontinuance of specific units until a general principle is settled and has gained support. If that procedure is followed, in the very nature of things the local pride in a particular type of service is bound to assert itself, often without due regard to the advantage there may be in the unit's becoming part of a particular type of military service.

Mr. Chairman, I would certainly urge as well as agree to the idea that any recommendations with regard to specific units be withheld just as they were withheld twenty years ago when there took place at that time the sweeping reorganization which alone made it possible to mobilize on an effective basis in 1939. Let us, however, have the rest of the report. Any report can have the word "secret" or "confidential" put on it; but that does not mean that it is in fact secret or confidential. The members of the House of Commons have a right to know what assessment has been made of the strength of our reserve units, of their effectiveness at this time and of the possibility of suddenly mobilizing a force in the event that danger presents itself on a greater scale than that on which it is presented at this time.

I recognize that this matter presents one of the fundamental problems confronting every democratic legislative body. The balance between wide-open disclosure of all information and a measure of secrecy which denies to the members of the elected legislative body adequate information for informed discussion is one which today is engaging the attention of all those who are concerned about the effectiveness of our democratic system. Without in any way suggesting that it is our right, our duty or our prerogative to speak in critical terms of any other legislative body, I think it is appropriate that we should say that here in this chamber and in the parliament of Canada we certainly do not agree with certain propositions which have been put forward in Washington in recent days with regard to the full disclosure of all documents, no matter how secret those documents may be.

The proposition that any document made available in the utmost secrecy to a member of the executive or exchanged between governments should become available to any member of the elected body is, of course, one that would be intolerable to contemplate under our system. In fact, let it be said right away that proper discussion between nations becomes more difficult when there is any uncertainty about the completely confidential character of those documents. But let it also be said right away that where there are truly secret documents—for instance, such documents as relate to secret military developments or to the assessment of new military power upon a highly confidential basis—they most certainly should not be disclosed. Having said that, however, we should not be placed in a position where, in the name of secrecy or confidential documents, we in this committee and in the House of Commons should be denied information that every member has the right to have.

This matter goes to the root of the whole effectiveness of the democratic system. The question before us is as fundamental as is democracy itself. The free election of men and women to sit in the House of Commons and be members of the parliament of Canada offers to the people of Canada no assurance that we shall, in fact, have either democracy or freedom unless those who meet here as representatives of the people have before them, for their knowledge, information and advice, the essential facts with regard to any matter brought before the House of Commons for consideration. We have not that information today. I hope the minister will not insult the intelligence of the members of this committee or the good sense of the people of Canada by suggesting that we have the essential information which makes it possible to discuss in a well-informed way those items that call for an expenditure of some $2 billion during the current year.

We can obtain some of the facts in spite of the government's determined effort to hide them from us; and let no mistake be made about it, they are determined efforts, successfully carried out by the weight of their superior majority. For example, in the face of these cold and chilling facts that are presented in appendix "A" to the last statement of Field Marshal Montgomery, we are told about our ability to meet an air attack. We are also told that we rely on our reserve anti-aircraft forces to meet that attack. Do hon. members of this committee know the strength of our reserve anti-aircraft forces? I happen to know the situation with regard to one of the best. They have less than one-tenth of the weapons they should have. They cannot even train effectively with that small number of weapons. They cannot train effectively because under the system they now have they often find they have more officers than men on parade. That would not be so if there were a sense of reality, of urgency and of duty in relation to the operation of these reserve units. When I state that fact I do so simply because of personal contact. I have stated already with respect to a group of field artillery which is generally regarded as one of the best in Canada that in this year, when we are told that there are six million Soviet men under arms, that group, one of the best in Canada, will fire with 24 guns instead of 124. That group will go to camp in no single case with one of the regiments up to strength.

I am not talking about even full reserve field strength, as the minister implied in earlier remarks, nor am I talking about military strength for active service. I am talking about the reduced strength which has been established for training purposes. Not one of them will come up to that reduced strength, and some regiments will not even go as a single battery but only as troops of a battery because of their inability to man the guns, and that in this year 1954 when we are told that the military strength of the Soviet forces is mounting all the time.

There is another aspect of this problem which extends generally throughout the army. Because decisions have not been made with regard to the report to which I have referred, there are some units in a state of uncertainty today because they do not know what kind of units they are going to be. I know one of the best infantry units in the country that is scarcely able to train at all at this time because of the uncertainty as to what kind of unit it is going to be. These are merely examples which I put forward from personal contact. I do so with full responsibility as a member of this house. The members of the house should have before them a complete and detailed statement of the situation with respect to every reserve unit of the land, sea, and air forces right across Canada today. Without that, the estimates now before us and the general statements made are, in substantial measure, largely meaningless.

At this stage of the session, Mr. Chairman, it is still possible for the minister to say that in view of the situation that has developed it is his intention to present what has come to be known as the general's report. It is possible to place before this committee, this house and the parliament of Canada the essential information that has been found. Let us hope that, confronted with the threat of military might greater far than was ever presented by nazi Germany up to September, 1939, we will have reality and not blind generalities with regard to what we can do. I hope, in answer to demands of this kind, that we will not have statements by the minister that he is proud of the quality of the training, of the effectiveness of the brigade in Germany, of the brigade in Korea, of our naval units on the seas of the world, of our airmen who fly the aircraft that we are getting in increasing numbers.

When I say I hope we will not hear that, it is not because we do not want to hear it. We have heard it already. We believe it and we believe it just as much as the government. We on this side of the house have just as much reason to be proud of the young Canadians in uniform as has any member on the other side of the house. Without reducing this to personalities may I simply, for the purpose of the record and for the knowledge of that younger generation who may not be aware of the facts, remind the house that the military spokesman of our party, General Pearkes, carries on his breast more decorations for valour than are worn by any other infantry officer in the units of the commonwealth today. I mention that not to glorify his military achievements, glorious though they are; but a man who wears the ribbon of the Victoria Cross, that highest of all decorations for valour, a decoration difficult to win and live, a man who wears the C.B., the D.S.O., the Military Cross and the many other decorations awarded to him for his service on the field of battle, a man who has risen from the rank of private in an infantry unit to divisional commander, is not a man who is going to place before this committee, this house, this parliament or the people of Canada any argument or any single statement that would reflect on the young men in whom he himself has such a deep and abiding pride.

Without extending it beyond that, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the same applies to a large percentage of the members of this house who have, in one service or another, done their best within their limited capacity to serve their country in time of war. I would not feel myself worthy of the remarks I am making if I did not concede and say with admiration that the Minister of National Defence himself is one of those who served gallantly on the field of battle, and from that service I would hope that he would be prompted to recognize the deep and grave concern of those of us who have seen the penalty of unpreparedness in the situation with which we are confronted in this country at this time.

As one whose contact with the reserve forces goes back for more years than I like to recall, I say without any reservation that on a comparative basis, in spite of the enthusiasm, the quality of training and the efforts of those in the reserve forces today, there has been no time in the last fifty years when the reserve forces of Canada were less capable of immediately assuming the responsibilities they would be called upon to assume in the event of a sudden emergency. Surely that is not a situation we can contemplate with satisfaction. Surely that is a situation which should be fully examined, fully disclosed to us. Instead, we are simply told that under terms of secrecy and because the word "secret" or "confidential" appears on the document, we cannot have the findings which have been made.

This is becoming a habit, Mr. Chairman. It is not only in the case of the report to which I have referred that this same attitude applies. Only this morning an effort was made to obtain information respecting some inquiries that have been made, and that was denied on the ground that it was made in relation to other findings which have also been denied. That is one original way of denying information—deny the blanket and you deny everything under it. That is exactly what we have before us now. Then let us see some of the reports that there have been in regard to the various aspects of the military service. There was the Mainguy report on the navy; there was also the Gordon report on the national defence department within a limited field. There was the MacNab report; there was the Currie report; there was the Hendry report; and also there is the report which is known colloquially as the general's report and which perhaps is more accurately known as the Kennedy report from the name of the very distinguished general who acted as chairman of that committee.

During this past session, motion after motion has been presented to this house calling for the production of reports, including the Kennedy report, and they have been voted down by the solid voting strength of those supporting this government. So far as the supporters of the government are concerned, they are prepared to accept these blind assurances that all is well, in the face of the knowledge of many hon. members on the other side that all is not well and that we should have the information which is not available to us today. So far as the supporters of the government are concerned,

> Theirs not to make reply,
> Theirs not to reason why.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that no one is under the impression that any statement in the Currie report has been challenged because of the fact that the government still is able to exercise such a sweeping majority for the suppression of all information in other cases. Not one word of that stands effectively challenged. The rails were stolen; the horses were on the payroll—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: The horses were on the payroll—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Drew: —just as they were found, Mr. Chairman, to be on the payroll, by a man declared by the Minister of National Defence himself to be the best qualified for that inquiry. The tawdry objections made by members opposite, in sounds that will not be recorded in Hansard, merely indicate the extent to which the Liberal mythology has already written off the Currie report.

Mr. Claxton: May I rise on a point of order?

Mr. Drew: No, on a question of privilege, but not on a point of order. If it is a question of privilege, that is a different thing.

Mr. Claxton: The Leader of the Opposition is not chairman of this committee.

Mr. Drew: No, nor are you.

Mr. Claxton: I should like to rise on a question of privilege to say that the question of the horses on the payroll was effectively dealt with in this house once and for all by the Prime Minister. Despite that fact the Conservative opposition has continued repeating this story about them. However, it was effectively dealt with once and for all in this house.

Mr. Rowe: What point of order is that?

Mr. Drew: That is exactly the kind of answer, Mr. Chairman, that should make every hon. member in this house concerned about every answer given by the minister, because that is not so. The statement he has just made is directly contrary to the facts. The statement he has made is contrary to the Currie report, which stands unchallenged. The statement made by the Prime Minister disposed of this thing in no way. The statement by the Prime Minister skirted around this question, and the fact that the Minister of National Defence would give this absolutely misleading answer is one reason why we should have before us now every word in the Kennedy report, and not rely upon his interpretation of it. If he is not capable of interpreting the Currie report correctly at this time, he is no more capable of interpreting the Kennedy report to us.

Let us remember, Mr. Chairman, that it was not only horses on the payroll. Let us remember the whole siding that was stolen. Let us remember the hobby horses that were made; let us remember also the fraudulent invoices and the disappearing cement and the general's fish pond and everything else found in that report which stands, unless the minister is prepared to get up in this house and say he does not believe Mr. Currie.

Mr. McCann: And include the Ontario highways.

Mr. Drew: The sound effects from the C.B.C., Mr. Chairman, are not an appropriate background for the consideration and discussion of national defence.

Mr. McCann: Just as important as yours.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that in this house the minister is much more important because he has behind him a majority that will deny to this house any information he wants withheld, including information about the C.B.C. He is, therefore, very important in this house, particularly when he is backed up by this majority.

Mr. McCann: You ought to get a few backers.

Mr. Drew: That is the only thing that does give him importance. Certainly, we concede that as long as he is in a position to deny to this house, through the majority that supports this government, the information we should have, then he is very important indeed, and important mainly because of his capacity to deny us effective information.

Hon. members in this house who were not members before, Mr. Chairman, should read the Currie report and read also the statement of the Minister of National Defence that Mr. Currie or Colonel Currie or Brigadier Currie, as he may properly be called, was declared by the minister to be the best qualified man in Canada. Unless the minister says he does not believe him, then let every hon. member in this house accept that report; and because we did get so much information in that report, let the minister extend the information and tell us, not in the refined version but in its original form, the details of the Kennedy report.

In this whole subject a very successful device has been employed. Either the document has the word "confidential" on it, a very easy word to write, or it is not in the public interest to disclose the document. This is a very easy device with which to suppress effective information. The fact is that one thing that has so lengthened debates in this house—

An hon. Member: George Drew.

Mr. Drew: The distinguished hon. member opposite says "George Drew". I know the minister would prefer that the opposition remain silent and that we just meet here like the Soviet parliament, listen to what the politburo tells us, and then go home; but we do not intend now or any other time to accept that interpretation.

Mr. McCann: We will stay for the summer, if you want.

Mr. Drew: We intend to fulfil our function as an opposition, in spite of the difficulty of obtaining information. But we do make it clear to the people of Canada who send us here that one of the things that have lengthened this parliament is the fruitless effort that has been made by the opposition to obtain the kind of information that, as members of parliament and in consideration of the rights of the people, we should have in discussing these vitally important subjects before us.

At what point, Mr. Chairman, is the information going to become available? We made the proposal last year that this gentleman, whom the Minister of National Defence described as the best qualified in Canada, should extend his report to every branch of the Department of National Defence. Do not let any member of the government, and above all the minister, say to this house that this reflects on any member of the armed forces. The highest tribute we can pay to the members of the armed forces is to insist that they have the training, the equipment and, above all, the reserves behind them that they are entitled to have as young men and women who have accepted the heavy obligations they have assumed in the uniform of Canada.

What we argued last year, what we have argued this year, and what we will still contend, is that even if the Minister of National Defence is not prepared to appoint Mr. Currie to conduct such an inquiry, then he should appoint some other individual or group of individuals, with the same freedom Mr. Currie had, to examine the organization of the Department of National Defence, and of general defence organizations throughout Canada.

After all, is there a single member in the House of Commons who believes for one moment that the very substantial savings which resulted from the Currie report would ever have been made if that inquiry had not been conducted in that way? There is no hon. member in this House of Commons, including those on the other side of the house, who thinks for a moment that this would have been done. And yet, let hon. members recall this, and particularly those who were not in the house when that report was discussed, that the inquiry conducted by Mr. Currie and those associated with him dealt only with one segment of one part of one branch of the service. It dealt with less than a twentieth of the army organization, alone. Now, if that much was found which called for substantial savings, and very sweeping reorganization such as was recommended in the Currie report, then surely there can be no hon. member who would suggest that tremendous savings would not be made by a similarly objective inquiry carried into the whole organization.

Do not suggest that anyone in proposing this is seeking scapegoats, any more than those members of parliament who support a Companies Act which calls for regular audit would suggest that there is something inherently dishonest in business when they make it an absolute requirement that every year there shall be an independent audit of the books and of the organization of a company. That is done as an ordinary and sensible and businesslike recommendation. There is no suggestion that there is any natural tendency to impropriety in the handling of business of that kind. With the very best of intentions and of business purpose, any rapidly expanding organization is bound to break out at the seams. Any expanding organization calls for examination and review.

That is what we have asked for, and I repeat that request now. We are coming toward the end of the session; but such an inquiry could be conducted under an appointment made by the government while the House of Commons is not sitting. Such inquiry would produce information which, if it were placed before members of the house, would make it possible for us to deal with this problem next year in a way that has not been possible previously at any time.

We have here a long series of items. It is not our intention to continue repetitive inquiries in regard to those items in the unavailing thought that by such inquiry we might finally break through this veil of secrecy which has been thrown around the real details in the Department of National Defence. Nothing will be served by that procedure. Nothing will be served by constant requests for the examination of this item and that. We admit right now, and without hesitation, that by the method the government has followed, and by the use of the guillotine, which has been employed over and over again by the full weight of the government majority to stop inquiry, to close the door to the receiving of information, and to withhold reports, we are not in a position to discuss this subject as we should discuss it. We know that perfectly well. But I have just offered a few examples of things that are known to me. I have offered a few examples that are known to hon. members on the other side of the house, in their own constituencies, in regard to actual conditions of the reserve force in their constituencies.

I would hope that we might have the refreshing experience of seeing one or two, or more, members on the other side of the house getting up and explaining that in spite of the high quality of the officers, the N.C.O.'s and men, and in spite of their earnestness, the reserve units in their constituencies in many cases are not able to meet the opportunities presented to them.

Mr. Ferguson: They are too interested in the Senate and parliamentary jobs, and assistants, to do that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this talk about secrecy, this talk about confidential information is nothing but a farce. This talk about information which cannot be disclosed to the elected members of the people is nothing but an attempt to hide information which would simply whet the appetites of hon. members—and I hope hon. members on the other side of the house—for still more information.

Each one of those reports being withheld contains findings which explain where substantial savings could be made. Each one of them does. Let us have those reports. Let us have the Kennedy report. And, Mr. Chairman, unless the Minister of National Defence is prepared to say that Field Marshal Montgomery was exaggerating the gravity of the situation when he made his statement on May 24 last, appendix "A" to which I have put on the record, then let the Minister of National Defence now tell us that there will be an examination of the whole organization of the Department of National Defence, such as produced the savings about which he boasted following the Currie report. And then next year we would be able to come back here and really deal with these vitally important items, with knowledge of what lies behind them.

Let the public know today that the veil of secrecy thrown around the Department of National Defence by this government precludes the effectiveness of detailed questioning. Let us remember that we have a right to that information, because we are not dealing only with some two billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money: we are dealing with nothing less than national survival itself.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I agree with some of the things the Leader of the Opposition said, when he referred to the personalities of two of our distinguished members. But there is a lot I do not agree with in what he said. I do not agree with his statement that guns, armament, fleets and material things are the only things necessary to win a war.

Mr. Drew: And neither do I, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Ferguson: Nobody else does.

Mr. McIvor: What was it that beat Hitler? It was not because he had a great fleet of submarines, the best in the world; it was not because he had more aeroplanes than all the allies put together, perhaps twice over; it was not because he had big guns and arms and armament, the best in the world. What beat Hitler? It was not his lack of preparation. We have heard from the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, may I ask—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: No; the hon. member has asked a question, and I can answer it in a few words if he wants it answered. I will answer it very quickly, if he wants it answered.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Leader of the Opposition knows that the hon. member for Fort William can be interrupted only with his own consent, and if he does not sit down he does not indicate that.

Mr. Drew: That is quite true. I merely said if the hon. member is really asking a question I can answer it very quickly.

Mr. Croll: You have all the answers.

Mr. McIvor: I will make myself pretty clear before I am through, I hope. I asked the question, and I am asking it of myself. What beat Hitler? One of the first things that beat Hitler was when he went out and murdered the Jews by the thousand for no other crime than that they were efficient and good businessmen, and that they believed in one God. "Thou shalt not kill." And he who breaks the Ten Commandments will be broken by them. Napoleon said, Talk not to me of Providence: Providence is on the side of heaviest battalions. But Providence was not on the side of heaviest battalions when he attacked Russia. When half a million of the flower of France were frozen to death in their saddles, Providence was on the side of the thin, clear, cool air of Russia. Providence was on the side of the snowflakes of Russia and not on the side of the well-equipped army of France.

The Leader of the Opposition said a good deal about information. If the Ministers of National Defence were not capable of keeping the information that should be kept they should not be there. What does Russia want to know? They want to get all the information that the Department of National Defence has, and I do not think they should have it. I admit that we have only 15 million people in Canada, but when we have 113,000 in the armed forces, that is not too bad.

Mr. Ferguson: That is Liberal defence; that is not defence of Canada.

Mr. McIvor: The hon. member can rise in his place in a moment or two. I am not through yet, but I shall soon be. What beat Hitler? Headquarters asked the Christian church in Canada all over for their co-operation, and after that co-operation what happened? You could see Hitler making his mistakes after Dunkirk. Why did they not wipe out the remnants of the British army in that area? They had enough aeroplanes, but they did not do it. What they did was to attack Russia, the second big mistake. The next mistake they made was when Japan was induced to make its attack on Pearl Harbor. You could see things coming along.

I can say, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of National Defence has done a fine job in preparation. I have read the white paper. I have not gone on all the trips that we might have had, to see what the Department of National Defence is doing. We went to Petawawa, and to me it was a wonderful revelation to see what they were doing. We went out to the airfield in Ottawa and we saw what the aeroplanes were doing. The Minister of National Defence has done a splendid job. There comes a time in preparations when you cannot prepare any further and then the Man above comes in and He does His work.

Mr. Winch: I desire to say a few words on this matter. I do not expect to be very long, but I do want to add my contribution in stating that I fail to understand the reason why at the present time the elected members of this House of Commons, and thereby the true representatives of the people, are not taken more into the confidence of the minister and of the government as to the defence situation in this dominion at the present time, and as to the value that is being received for the expenditures of over half of our national budget.

I can remember when Canada was at war, Mr. Chairman, and there was an enemy on the western coast. The members of the legislature of British Columbia were very disturbed about the situation because they were almost in the dark as to what it was. Therefore, the members of the legislature of British Columbia raised their voices and demanded that they be taken into the confidence of the military authorities as to what was going on in British Columbia and as to what our position was.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there we were at war. There was a demand, if you like to put it that way, or more politely a request, that the members of the legislature be taken into the military confidence. What happened? Within the matter of seven days Mr. Hart, as the premier of British Columbia, and I as the leader of the opposition in British Columbia, and representatives on the floor of the legislature, were called together by the general in charge of the Pacific command, and he sits right here on the floor of the house, General Pearkes. He can tell you that what I am saying is correct. We were taken into the confidence of the general in charge of the command. We were told what was going on; we were given a demonstration of what could be done. I can remember we said: In the event of an air attack, a bombing attack on Victoria, how soon can you have a scramble of air fighters so as to meet those bombers? We were given an actual demonstration right then and there. We were not told what someone in a certain office told him; we were given a demonstration, and we knew right to the second just how soon a bombing raid could be met. I am not going to go into details, but I am going to say this on my responsibility in this house. As a member of the legislature of British Columbia in time of war we knew the situation, we knew the number of troops, we knew the number of ships and sailors and aircraft and fighters, and so on.

In view of that experience, I must admit that I cannot understand why at this time the members of this House of Commons cannot be taken into the confidence of the government to a far greater extent than they are at the present time. If there is some reason why it cannot be done in the open, then I say at least it should be done in camera. I have been amazed that we cannot get information from the minister or from the government on our own affairs here in the realm of defence in Canada, and yet just a few days ago we could meet—yes, in camera it was—and we could get information on what is going on in Europe under the NATO troops, information of vital importance, of vital interest. If the commander in chief of the NATO forces could see fit to take the members of parliament at least in part into his confidence, then why cannot our own minister of defence in Canada take his own members of parliament, the members of parliament of Canada, into a far greater confidence than has been done hitherto?

I do want to say a word in particular about the reserve army, because honestly I will admit I should like to know a lot more than I do at the present time about that army. I have a great deal of pride in that body of men. I had the honour of being a member of the reserve forces in the city of Vancouver for a number of years, and I think that it certainly redounds to their credit that they do their eight hours of work in the factory, in the shop or in the office and then turn out two or three times a week at night and week ends and give up their annual holidays so as to go to the training camps. I was not very high; I was only one of those two-pip miracles. However, I was a training officer and in the two or three years I was in the reserve army I got to know the problems we run up against. I know of things that went on that we just could not understand, things which just about sent the training officers out of their heads. We had such things as changes in orders, changes in rules, changes in equipment, and we never knew exactly where we stood. There may have been reasons for them but I know that was the situation then and I would like to know whether these problems have been met, and I want to know whether we can obtain the information which is contained in the Kennedy report.

I do not think I need add any more, and certainly there is little need to be emotional about this. I would say, however, that the reserve army must be efficient and in view of the key information given to the elected representatives of British Columbia in time of war I cannot understand the hesitancy of the Minister of National Defence in making more information available to us at this time.

It is all very well for the minister to take up that attitude here in Ottawa, but in a matter of a week or two when we return to our constituencies we are the ones who are going to have to answer the questions about this and we cannot do it unless we are given that information by the executive. I sincerely hope that after due deliberation and perhaps a little more serious thought the minister will consider taking the people's elected representatives a little bit more into his confidence than he has done up to now.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think it seems obvious, Mr. Chairman, that members of this committee find it difficult to discuss the subject of national defence in a vacuum of information. It also seems obvious that the reason for the extended discussion on this matter is due to a lack of specific knowledge of the affairs of the department. I know that I personally have tried on three occasions to scrutinize the items in the estimates so as to come to grips with some of the underlying difficulties. But I have found it almost impossible because we have been dependent upon the vague statements to which reference has already been made on numerous occasions in this house. I have searched through the white paper and according to that white paper all is well in the department. I have examined the minister's statements and according to these statements everything is rosy in the defence garden.

Unfortunately that conclusion does not jibe with the reports I have received through personal contact with certain branches of the services, and also from the numerous letters which reach me particularly with regard to our reserve forces. This has been particularly true since the announcement of the completion of the Kennedy report. When queried for information, I find myself in the same position as other hon. members in this house, forced to say, "I am sorry but we have no information. We are merely members of parliament and apparently not to be taken into the confidence of the government in regard to these important matters."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am rising to speak at this time because of a special interest in a subject with which I think it will be impossible to deal during the discussion on later items. I am especially concerned with the government's decision to deny these reports to members of parliament, because I am the victim of one of these refusals. I refer particularly to the Hendry report. I have been on the trail of this report for a long time and I have had to work on the basis of trial and error because there was no specific information available. In fact it was only indirectly that I learned such a report existed. During the pursuit there were times when I almost had it. Those most intimately connected with its preparation were of the opinion that there was no secrecy involved and that any revelations concerning it would not place our defence preparations in jeopardy.

At one time, when I thought I was going to receive this report, those whom I contacted said that as a precautionary measure they would have to consult the Department of National Defence. It was there that this cloak of secrecy descended upon what is a harmless and innocuous report in so far as military strategy, secret weapons and arms development are concerned.

If there is anything vital to the defence program of this country, civil defence as well as armed defence, it is the matter of comprehensive welfare planning. In this connection it is not only this matter of denying members of parliament access to reports which disturbs me. The shroud of secrecy around the department goes much further than that. During recent months, for example, I have been in touch with some of my old air force buddies still active in the service. One particular incident would have been amusing if the implications behind it had not been so serious. We had not seen one another for a long time so we had lunch together in the parliamentary restaurant. This officer was ticked off for consorting with a member of the opposition. I think that is carrying the shroud of secrecy too far. It is this accumulation of frustration resulting from the denial of reports as well as other instances of police state tactics which bring me to my feet at the present time.

Then, there is the matter of our contacts with the reserve units. Some hon. members of this house maintain reserve contacts. I do not know whether my experience is exceptional, but I have found it very difficult to get into close contact with the work which is of the greatest interest to me and work for which my background, training and preparation in military matters best qualifies me to pursue. This seems to be particularly difficult if one happens to be a member of the House of Commons, which to my mind is the exact reverse of the principle which should prevail in a democratic society. My background happens to be that of an all-weather night fighter pilot, but when I turn out for reserve training I am put on personnel work dealing with personnel problems which crop up fairly regularly under the present military scheme of things.

The only conclusion I can draw from this, Mr. Chairman, is that the government, in defence matters, is more afraid of the opposition than they are of any potential enemy. I have said this before and I repeat it now. I am quite sure that if there is any state interested in attacking this country, then they know far more about our military potential and preparation than do the members of the opposition in this House of Commons. That situation naturally arouses our suspicions. If we are sent here by our constituents to represent them in running the affairs of this country, then we must become suspicious when we are denied access to the details concerning a department which is one of the biggest spending departments of government, and which, in the present uneasy state of affairs existing in the world—and which state of affairs is likely to continue for some considerable time—has a great measure of responsibility for our security. I have come to the conclusion that an attitude of this kind can only suggest that the government is more afraid for the security and defence of the Liberal party than they are for the security and defence of the nation. That is not a particularly healthy attitude in view of the emergency or the crisis, on the level of external affairs, that at this time confronts Canada and all the nations of the western world.

In the discussion this morning it has been pointed out that Canada's defence force is and always will be essentially a civilian force. That is something that has been so in more primitive, and earlier, experiences of military activity in this country. It certainly is much more true in the face of the kind of warfare confronting us in this twentieth century. The advent of the H-bomb and similar weapons of total destruction means that everyone, more or less, is in the front line. All we can hope to do in maintaining a defence force, a group of professionals, is to support a nucleus who, in the event of an emergency, would be able to bring into a state of rapid preparation and mobilization the much larger force that would be needed.

If we are going to maintain the interest of the public or if we are going to maintain the interest of the civilian soldier, the reservist, in defence matters, to me it seems logical to believe that we must take him into our confidence. It seems to me that the government must take the citizens into their confidence, must place all the facts before them, must present them repeatedly—and shock them if necessary—with the challenge of the urgency of the moment. That is why I have pursued this subject of welfare. I do not want to look at it in any narrow or restricted sense at all. But in a democracy where you have not the totalitarian or authoritarian machinery with which to do what should be done quickly in the face of a crisis, you have to depend upon high morale and esprit de corps among the citizenry generally. They must be inoculated with a deepseated conviction concerning their responsibilities in these matters. If we are going to be able to carry out our defence program successfully, it seems to me that such a happy state of affairs can arise only from the existence of a well-informed public.

From that standpoint alone I think it is unfortunate if not tragic—in view of the continuing emergency confronting us—that we as members in the first instance are denied access to those documents that have been referred to. Perhaps it is unfortunate that the Currie report, or what has sometimes been referred to as the bootleg copy of the Currie report, was revealed to the members of the House of Commons because, since the revelations that were made in that Currie report, the defence department has buried its head in the sand even deeper than before. I cannot imagine them denying access to the members to such a harmless document as the Hendry report on welfare services had they not been, having regard to the implications of the Currie report, unduly disturbed for the security of the Liberal party.

If I needed to quote any example as to the proper attitude that should be taken in maintaining the necessary interest in defence matters in a democratic society, I think I need only refer to Sir Winston Churchill, the British Prime Minister. All during the twilight period before world war II he was the voice crying in the wilderness. Because he was not in tune or in step with the prevailing or predominating attitudes toward external affairs in the western world at that time, he was not very popular politically. He represented the "blood, sweat and tears" philosophy. Of course that philosophy, at any time, is not very sweet as far as the electorate is concerned. It does not help in the necessary process of obtaining votes. However, he was right. Because he was right, when the crisis eventually came he was called upon to assume responsibility. The story is well known to all the free peoples of the western world.

Like the hon. member for Vancouver East, I was greatly impressed with the frankness with which the problems of defence in relation to the present world situation were dealt with by General Gruenther. It was a straightforward and frank appraisal, as contrasted with the "gobbledygook", the circumvention that goes on in this chamber with regard to defence matters in relation to Canada which, in the matter of population, is a relatively small segment of the whole NATO defence program at the moment. I suppose it is inevitable that Canada remain ambivalent and vacillating with regard to these matters. I suppose that attitude is inevitable in view of our pre-war record, and in view of our post-war record for that matter because, after the war, we immediately indulged in wholesale rapid demobilization. Then along came Korea and we were forced to assume what has been referred to by the Minister of National Defence as "crash planning" in order to meet the immediate challenge of the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. But in this year 1954 I think the time has now long since passed when we should break away from crash planning and should begin to look into the future—the long haul and the long pull —with regard to defence matters.

I do not want to speak for too long on this matter. However, surveying briefly what has been accomplished in the field of defence at the expenditure of some $5 billion, may I say that the emphasis, as I review the situation, has been on supply and construction and it looks to me as though personnel problems have been minimized. I am just going to refer briefly to what has taken place in the air force and also to what has taken place in that closely related field of radar defences. Then finally I shall make some brief references to the situation so far as materiel supply is concerned.

The heart of our air force defence program has been the development of the all-weather fighter, the CF-100. That of course is logical in view of the challenge with which Canada would be confronted by any possible air attack. We have now arrived at the stage where a token force of CF-100's is operational. I would suggest that we cannot go very much further than the preparation of a token force so far as the all-weather fighter is concerned mainly because technological changes in aviation are taking place so quickly that a new type becomes obsolescent almost before it is ready for operational duty.

That is a difficulty that goes right back to world war II. From actual experience with a night fighter squadron, I remember that one of the biggest bugbears we had to face was the constant reconversion to new aircraft and the extensive retraining in the use of rapidly developing airborne radar equipment. We have arrived at the stage where we have a token all-weather fighter force. This does not solve the problems of reserve squadrons because it is very difficult for reserve squadrons to maintain the efficiency necessary to cope successfully and to keep themselves up to an operational level so far as the all-weather jet fighters in service at the present time are concerned. I suggest that matter needs to be given serious consideration because if the reserves are the backbone of the defence of this country we are far from reaching the desirable state of preparedness that is mentioned so freely and glibly in the white paper report.

As to radar, I think the statement has been made in the house that we are now in a position to intercept nine out of ten enemy aircraft.

Mr. Claxton: No such statement was made.

Mr. Dinsdale: As I read the record that is the implication I got from the minister's statement. That statement has already been repudiated, and well it might be because no fighter-radar combination could possibly achieve that degree of success in coping with the difficulties involved in night operations, particularly bad weather operations. It is true that the two must be developed hand in hand. All-weather fighters and the radar establishments are integral parts of the same system. Indeed, had it not been for the rapid development of radar or radio-location, as it was known in Britain, at the beginning of world war II it is doubtful whether the German luftwaffe could have been driven back during the crucial days of the battle of Britain. The secret of the operational use of radar was very carefully kept until the end of the war.

I remember that popular thinking during the war regarded members of night fighter units as individuals wearing mysterious dark goggles and eating great quantities of carrots in order to improve their vision at night. In my three years overseas I never saw any carrots. In fact, our staple vegetable diet was brussels sprouts which do not have any necessarily beneficial effects so far as night vision is concerned. It was due to the presence of a very efficient radar system that the battle of Britain was won which gave the allies an opportunity to prepare to meet the eventual onslaught of the nazi forces across Europe.

I mention that point merely to indicate the contrast today so far as this subject is concerned. We have very elaborate information on our radar establishments. In fact, Roundel, the official air force magazine, was even pinpointing these units for us a short time ago. Yet we are denied access to a report dealing with the broad subject of welfare for the troops as well as the problem of integration of military forces with the civilian population.

I am not going to elaborate on that theme any further. It seems to me that what we have achieved thus far is that we have spent large sums of money on material and equipment, and we have not yet come to grips with the real problem of any defence force in a democratic state, the problem of challenging the ordinary citizen so that he becomes keenly aware of his responsibilities in these matters, particularly in the face of the total war which threatens us at the present time.

It is almost one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and before proceeding with one or two specific points on the subject of welfare I should like to call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

---

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Dinsdale: When the committee rose at one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was just coming to the concluding portion of my remarks concerning the general problem of welfare services as they relate themselves to the armed forces. The theme I was endeavouring to develop was that in defence matters as well as in any other public affairs in this country, there must be the closest possible co-ordination and co-operation between the government and the people of Canada.

I have just one further observation concerning the major emphasis that has been felt in defence planning in this country. Since the Korean incident we have been straining every resource and every fibre in building up the materiel demands of our defence effort; constructing permanent buildings, developing new types of aircraft and so on almost ad infinitum. But I do feel we have been neglecting the most vital part of the whole structure, that is the problem of personnel. It is a fine thing to have the best housed, best clothed, and best paid defence force in the western sphere of influence, but that does not necessarily mean that we have the most efficient defence force.

It occurs to me that the Roman legionnaires, at the time when the Roman empire was most vulnerable, could boast of all those things. They had the best equipment, the best materiel and all the other physical factors going towards the preparation of a defensive force. The one thing they lacked was good morale, the esprit de corps, and certainly there was very little integration and co-ordination between the civilian population and the military elite.

It seems to me, from the limited opportunities I have had of looking into our defence program, there is a lack of close integration. Elaborate training programs are carried on to meet the demands of technological warfare, but not much is done by way of endeavouring to integrate the military training programs with the needs of the civilian population. That is just one method whereby there could be closer relationship. It has been customary in any war effort to which Canada has made a contribution to make use of the civilian resources, buildings and so forth, to the maximum in order to effect complete mobilization. I sometimes compare the lavish sums of money that are spent in this process that has been described as "crash planning" in our defence build-up, with some of the financially restricted educational programs in civilian circles. The educational institution with which I was once connected, for example, carries on its whole year's work on a budget of $200,000, merely a drop in the bucket when compared with the lavish expenditures we find taking place in our defence planning. Yet that institution has made many outstanding contributions to the public life of this country. The student body has included such people as the premier of Saskatchewan, the premier of Manitoba and no less a personage than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am referring, of course, to Brandon college. I am raising that point to indicate that while heavy expenditure is necessary to meet the defence challenge of the moment, and we are spending billions, as the record indicates; let us not be entirely preoccupied with the urgency of the moment, a tendency of all governments. Let us look into the future and consider the commitments of long-term planning.

I feel that this is where the subject of welfare planning comes into the picture, Mr. Chairman. As I have indicated, I am not referring to the provision of recreation programs only, or providing canteens, which is basic to any military welfare program. I am concerned with the broader problem of bringing together the special needs of the military community and the special needs of the civilian population. So long as we are dependent on a civilian military force, these two aspects of our defence program will have to work as one.

In a letter from the defence minister last January refusing me access to the Hendry report, this report is described as a special report prepared for the confidential information of those concerned. I cannot conceive of any group who should be more concerned about this matter than the members of this house. Our whole problem of raising the morale and esprit de corps of the people of Canada to meet the challenge of the moment is of vital concern to all the people of this country.

There has been a lot of discussion in the press concerning incidents that crop up in military camps from time to time. There has been resulting criticism laid at the door of inadequate welfare and recreation facilities. I am not going to harp on, or labour, that particular point, because those incidents will occur in any large military force where you have a group of men who are uprooted from their regular community ties. Special social problems and personal behaviour problems are bound to occur under such circumstances. These have to deal with the narrower welfare approach. Routine recreation programs are necessary, as are canteens. Those things are basic and almost axiomatic; we have to provide those services in the regular civilian community. There has been a tendency in recent years to increase the contribution the public bodies make towards welfare programs of this kind in order to offset the impact of commercialized recreation, which I feel sometimes should be spelled "'wreckreation", rather than in the traditional manner of "recreation".

A comprehensive welfare program that is going to deal with the larger problem must tie in the voluntary groups. Indeed, in any crisis it is usually the voluntary groups who carry the main burden of responsibility and, in turn, it is these voluntary groups who, by means of their close contact with the civilian population, are able to arouse the necessary enthusiasm and interest among the citizenry generally in order to have them make a worth-while contribution to a welfare program. Again, it is through the voluntary groups that the contact with the home can be made and maintained. At the moment the Department of National Defence, so far as I can gather, is moving forward in all these categories. The routine recreational program is being strengthened, canteens are being provided, and an attempt is being made to work more closely with the voluntary groups. I do understand however that, so far as home contacts are concerned, we are still pretty well dependent upon the Department of Veterans Affairs to investigate the home situation and to make its report. Unfortunately the difficulty there arises from the fact that, having examined the situation and having given their report, they have no service to provide. As we know, the Department of Veterans Affairs is restricted in what it can do. So the net result is that they suffer from paralysis of analysis. All they can do is outline the problem. They have no resources for assisting in the solution.

There is another matter connected with this subject of welfare suggesting the tendency to segregate civilian from military needs. Right across the country there has been a tendency to carry on a program of segregation between the military camps and the civilian population. I was not in on the preliminary post-war discussions of mobilization for defence planning in Canada, but it seems to me that to segregate military formations, and to isolate them in self-contained army, air force or even navy encampments, is working against the real needs of a comprehensive and all-out defence program which would tie in our civilian population so that, if a crisis ever came, they would be aware of the problem and fully alerted to the responsibilities relating thereto.

Summing up, I would say there are immediate plans that have to be made to meet what has been called the demands of creeping mobilization, which has been the defence program up to the present time. We have been adjusting ourselves slowly to the needs of this creeping mobilization. The situation has improved slowly. I am sure that had we had access to reports such as the Hendry report, we might have been able to make complimentary remarks concerning what has been going on, because no doubt the report contains a thorough examination of the situation. But we are working in the dark. We can give our viewpoint and express our conclusions only from a very restricted background of knowledge. That is the handicap under which we are working at the present time.

In addition to immediate plans, there is the need for long-term plans for total mobilization, if that desperate situation should ever develop in this country. It seems to me that, so far as welfare needs are concerned, here is where we are weakest. There is no group engaged in comprehensive over-all planning. The chaos which would result from a lack of co-ordination and integration, and because the situation has been obscure, owing to the attitude of the defence department in trying to assure us that all is well, would produce a very difficult situation, if a major crisis ever developed.

In connection with all these matters I maintain that the House of Commons should be taken into the confidence of the cabinet and its advisers. If anyone is vitally interested in these matters, then surely it should be the elected representatives of the people. Defence planning must take in the whole of the population.

I hope that some discussion along these lines will take place when we are dealing with civil defence. There needs to be co-ordination and complete integration if we are going to be in a position to meet the defence challenge of the moment.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say only a word or two in the discussion of the first item of the estimates for the Department of National Defence, although I claim no expert knowledge in matters of national defence. I have never been a member of the armed forces. Apart from the occasional hunting trip I have never fired a gun, and I do not claim to be an expert on these matters. Nevertheless I think something should be said on one or two points.

I listened attentively this morning to the leader of the official opposition who, in many respects, seemed to be giving quite a speech. I did think however that in some respects it was a bit weak. Because I support the Leader of the Opposition in some of the things he said, I would not want the minister or the government to gain the impression that I supported him 100 per cent. For instance, I saw no particular reason for bringing up the old story about the horses on the payroll.

I was here in the last parliament, of course—as I have been for a number of years. We all heard the story about the horses; and, frankly, I must confess I was pretty well satisfied with the Prime Minister's reply. I thought he replied conscientiously in the matter. Further, a committee of the house was set up and had every opportunity in the world to go into the subject. They had before them the man who was responsible for the Currie report. I had expected some fireworks in that committee, but there did not seem to be very much by way of an explosion at that time. I must confess that, after all the hullabaloo that went on about these things, I thought our Conservative friends fell down just a little bit in carrying out any vital investigation during the sittings of that committee.

For the Leader of the Opposition to bring in that matter this morning, after so long a time has passed by—for after all this was a matter that was brought up in a session previous to the last election—was rather small potatoes. I think it weakened his whole argument because I felt, well, now, surely he has something more important than that to bring up at this time. It is true, and I do agree with him, that since we have an expenditure of about $2 billion for defence, we have every right to know that it is efficiently spent; we have a right to know that we are getting a dollar's worth of efficiency and effectiveness for every dollar spent.

If there are any documents that might be regarded as secret, if those documents apply to such matters as defence strategy or some particular piece of equipment that it is not wise for the enemy to know about—and I doubt there is very much that they do not know about—if there is anything of that kind, I can quite understand how certain documents might be regarded as secret. But if those documents are involved with government policy, or the general conduct of the Department of National Defence, then I do not believe that any documents should be secret.

What I rose particularly to talk about was this. I wonder just how enthusiastic the people of Canada are in subscribing to the annual revenues of this country to the tune of $2 billion for defence. Are they enthusiastic in coming through with that much money for the carrying on of this department? I cannot answer that myself, but I do believe that you cannot go farther in defence expenditure or in anything else, as far as that goes, and have the support of the people, without carrying the people along with you, and letting them know what the score may be.

I am just wondering whether we have done a good job of really conditioning our people to what might be regarded as necessary in respect to our national defence budget. We use the term "national defence budget" but in reality it is a military budget. We use those terms because we do not like to have any connotation which might indicate that we are aggressive. But in reality it is a military budget, just as much a wartime budget as if we were in a war, although we are now living in peace and there are no particular shooting wars. Have our people been conditioned properly to understand even the potential powers of the enemy and the necessity of such vast expenditures for a small nation of 15 million people? I am inclined to think that instead of conditioning the people to withstand a formidable enemy, in many respects we have been conditioning the people to accept the enemy and accept them on their terms.

It seems to me that in the matter of public relations in this respect we have fallen down completely on the job. It seems to me that we have been playing cat and mouse with those who we know are our enemies, and more often than not we have been the mouse, and we have not gained many victories over the cat.

May I put it this way. Any gain geographically or in any other way that the Soviets have made has not been owing to any military successes. It has been owing to a type of propaganda, and yet they have gobbled up half the world without even firing a shot. I am not saying they have not aided and abetted other countries behind the iron curtain, but they themselves have been able to stay out of any military complications. They have done it by carrying on a real psychological warfare, both in the diplomatic field and in the field of propaganda throughout the world.

What are we doing psychologically to weaken them as they have been doing to weaken us? What are we doing psychologically to weaken the Soviets and those other powers behind the iron curtain? Well, they have certainly not overlooked the opportunity to weaken us within our borders. The object of their psychological warfare is their destruction of western democracy. This is all involved in a matter of defence. I should like to know what we have actually been doing to weaken communistic dictatorships in the communist countries. We might boast that we have the atom bomb. So have they! We might boast that we have certain strategic bases and positions. So have they, to a very large extent; and, as far as I can understand it, they can match us man for man and gun for gun. But there is one place in which they cannot match us, and that is in the exposition of our way of life as compared with theirs.

I know what might be said. Well, we have to be careful because that would not be diplomatic protocol. All I would say to that is, how much do they care as to what is diplomatic protocol? They are out for the destruction of our way of life. I am going to suggest that the Department of National Defence take over the international short-wave service and really use it to engage in psychological war; for that is what they are doing continually. If it is not used for that purpose, to my mind it serves no purpose at all.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take up much time of the house in speaking on the estimates for national defence. However, there are one or two things about which I think I should express an opinion in view of the speeches which have been made here today. One matter I would like to suggest the minister should take under consideration is with regard to the pay for reserve forces who are employed by the dominion government. When I was on the city council of Guelph in 1948 we decided that the employees of the city who went to military camps for training as members of the reserve army should have their pay made up by the city so that they would not lose any money. I supported that because I thought it was the proper thing to do, and I would urge our government to give such a scheme their consideration today.

I would not suggest that they treat the taxpayers' money lightly and just go ahead and pay wages to these men to the same extent as they receive in their civilian job, although there are provincial governments, for instance the one in Ontario, which do. I do not think our government should take such a free attitude with the taxpayers' money that they are prepared to pay anything. Indeed, if my suggestion is accepted I would suggest that a further restriction be incorporated. I think it would be helpful to our reserve army if we made up that proportion of the recruit's pay so that he would not lose any money while attending camp, but in order to qualify for that allowance the recruit must turn in a report from his O.C.

verifying that he had attended a certain percentage of the regular drills. This percentage could be set at 75 or 80 per cent. If a recruit did that, then I think the government would be justified in making his pay up so that it would not be any hardship for his family if he attended a reserve army camp for training.

As most hon. members are no doubt aware, I represent the dominion artillery city, Guelph, and as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out early this morning, artillery is a very important arm of the services. Of course, everyone knows that the engineers are the backbone of the army, but since I represent an artillery city I would concede that they take second place. I was—

Mr. Ferguson: What about the S.R.D.?

Mr. Hosking: I will come to that in a moment. I was touched by the magnificence of the address made this morning by the Leader of the Opposition. I envy his masterful style, and the cadence of expression he can get into his voice, but I want to tell him it has been my experience that the men in the army we used to refer to as "barrack room lawyers" were not very much admired. They used to say that the barracks were no good, that the officers were no good, the grub was no good, and in fact everything connected with the army was no good; and it has been my experience that they exercised very little influence for good on the morale of the troops.

If we are trying to get boys to join the reserve army it is hardly fitting for the Leader of the Opposition to stand up here and say that on reserve army parades there are more officers present than men. I do not believe that would inspire one single person in the Dominion of Canada to join a reserve army unit. That type of propaganda has never been made in my hearing by his supporter, the hon. member for Simcoe North. I have listened to him on several occasions both inside and outside the house, and he has always claimed that the army training he received was something of which he was proud. He makes the kind of speeches that will inspire our boys to join the reserve army.

If the Leader of the Opposition is really interested in getting men to join our reserve forces, that is the sort of attitude he should take, and he should not suggest that we have an army of thieves, a reserve army comprised of people who will not take part in their parades, and that more officers are present than men. He should leave out all these arguments, of the type which are used by the barrack room lawyers to make out a very bad case for conditions in the army.

It would be far better if the Leader of the Opposition listened to the hon. member for Cape Breton South when that hon. member told us about his experiences and the good times that were had in the army. Everyone who has been in the army knows it is not all hard work. There is plenty of hard work but there are good times in the army too. There is good fellowship, great experiences, and good training. Those are the things that will attract recruits, not the sort of dissertation indulged in by barrack room lawyers, who always annoyed those charged with the responsibility of doing a job when we were overseas. I do not think any reasonable person either in the army or in civilian life would expect a training unit to have a full complement of guns on exercise. When the Leader of the Opposition mentions this fact he gives the impression there is not sufficient equipment for the troops who attend army reserve training camps to enable them to obtain a good training.

Mr. Harkness: Neither there is.

Mr. Hosking: That is not the case. Here again I must refer to my artillery friends, for the officer commanding that unit told me they had the very best of equipment, food, and conditions in camp. They did not come back and report to me that the food and conditions were bad and they were short of guns. In fact, they told me the absolute reverse of that, and the people who criticize and who are always complaining do very much to break down the morale of our troops. I do not like to hear it and I do not think it is a good thing for our country.

We have difficulties enough in inspiring in our people a belief that our country is worth fighting for and that it is necessary for a certain number of citizens to assume the responsibility of defending it. Those are the principles on which our democratic people join the army. The socialists, who want to see everyone's service paid for, will never inspire anyone to join the army, and under their system it is impossible to get good troops. The only way to get troops in a socialist country is to conscript them, and the same is true of a dictatorship. This is also true whether in time of peace or in war.

However, in a democracy there is every good reason to fight for one's country; that is the reason why people join our reserve army and fighting forces. It is certainly not for any of the other reasons which have been mentioned.

There is one other point I would like to mention. If it is agreed we are going to have a large standing army for years, in this country, I think the Department of National Defence should give serious consideration to taking over some of the construction work which is done for the dominion. I am quite convinced that there is no better proving ground for tank operators, tradesmen and men of the ancillary services of the army than in construction work. If the personnel of our army were to build a trans-Canada highway from one side of this continent to the other, we would have the best trained troops that it would be possible to have. By doing this work, there would be an opportunity to teach discipline, there would be opportunities for various members of the army to show their ability, and there would be an opportunity to train the troops to do things. The United States army does that. The United States army engineers do a great deal of the civil engineering work for that country south of us. We are going to have construction work here for years and years to come. With the deepening of the St. Lawrence seaway, there will be ports and docks to build. In a great deal of the construction of that seaway itself there will be work that could be done by army personnel. Where could we get a better place in which to train troops including our electricians, our mechanics, our signallers, and all the special units. There would be a wonderful opportunity to make use of the available army manpower that we apparently must have in this country for many years to come. I would ask the Minister of National Defence if he would not give serious consideration to this suggestion in order to see that the troops we must have in this country would get some practical and useful work which would make them better fighting troops if and when they are required to do the job for which they were signed up.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am taking part again in this debate owing to the completely unsatisfactory statement which the minister made on May 21. As reported at page 4992 of Hansard, in reference to the fact that I had mentioned armour, he said this:

> This matter has already been dealt with in the house on April 15, 1953, on December 1, 1953; and on several other occasions we have gone over the same ground.

The implication conveyed by this sentence is that the subject of armour has been completely dealt with in the debates here in the house. The implication is that the minister has covered the ground fully and carefully with regard to armour. The actual fact is that no such thing has been done.

If you look at the first reference which he gave, Mr. Chairman, that of April 15, 1953, you will discover that we were then discussing the suggestion which had been put forward by the opposition for the employment of an armoured brigade in Europe instead of an infantry brigade, and that the minister simply dismissed the idea out of hand. His second reference is to December 1, 1953. His reference is correct in this regard, namely that the matter was fully covered; but it was fully covered only by me. I made a speech on December 1. The minister did not do so. I dealt with the necessity for armour in the Canadian army and lamented the fact that the armoured corps was being sadly neglected. I appealed to the minister to put his mind to the problem of employing the armoured personnel carrier in order to save the lives of Canadian infantry soldiers. That was the speech of December 1. The minister had no part whatsoever in the discussion that day. He had spoken in the debate on the speech from the throne on November 26 and in the course of his remarks he did not once mention armour.

When I spoke on this matter last month, again I dwelt on the subject of the neglect of the armoured corps and I was ably supported by the hon member for Calgary North and others. I suggested to the minister that, if it was not possible to adopt our earlier suggestion of maintaining an armoured brigade in Europe and an armoured brigade at home, rotating the two, in order at least to get the army back into proper balance we should maintain an armoured brigade at home, and that that would require activating another armoured regiment, brigading it with the Royal Canadian Dragoons and the Lord Strathcona's Horse, setting up brigade headquarters and carrying out here in Canada armoured brigade training. The minister completely ignored this suggestion. He paid no attention whatsoever to it. The statement on May 21 refers to the impossibility of rotating the armoured regiments. Let me just read his statement so that you will see what it is:

> I should like to point out that it is impossible to work our present armed forces, with their commitments in Korea and in Germany and the requirement of having a mobile striking force of airborne troops, and still have two armoured regiments rotating abroad. You just cannot figure out mathematically a way of using the same manpower to do that complicated operation. Once you train a man for armour, you do not want to use him in the infantry and vice versa.

Mr. Chairman, this is one of the typical statements of the Minister of National Defence. He has acquired a national reputation for statements of this nature which are all-embracing, comprehensive and completely meaningless. He has completely evaded the issue. At no time have I suggested that an armoured regiment be maintained overseas and be rotated with the other armoured regiments at home. I talked in terms of an armoured brigade. At no time have I suggested that you should train a man as an armoured corps man and then use him in the infantry or should train a man in the infantry and then use him in a tank. Only the minister could come forward with a suggestion of that nature. It has no meaning. It is confusing. It may confuse the general public. It may confuse those who have no knowledge of the army. However, it certainly has not confused anyone here on the opposition side. It beclouds the issue unnecessarily. What a suggestion to make! The minister has told us that we cannot do this because it involves training a man for armoured vehicle purposes and then sending him overseas and using him as an infantryman or of training a man as an infantryman and employing him in a tank. That is utter nonsense.

In completing his statement with regard to my request for greater use of armour, the minister said this:

> Also, of course, an armoured brigade would cost about $100 million more than a corresponding infantry brigade.

That is the end of the quotation. There is no break-down made with regard to the number of vehicles required or the number of men, nor is there given any estimate of the cost by regiment or anything of that nature. It is just one of those general statements. The minister says it will cost $100 million more for an armoured brigade than it would for an infantry brigade. Earlier the minister had said that the cost of the present infantry brigade in Europe, to maintain it there, was approximately $60 million a year. The implication then is that an armoured brigade similarly placed would cost $160 million. I suggest to the minister that he produce his figures to indicate how he arrives at this grand total. For one thing, based on the figures found in the handbook for war establishments published by the Department of National Defence, an armoured brigade would require 500 fewer men than an infantry brigade, and if you work out the cost of 500 men on an annual basis with their pay and allowances—the figure given to me last year was something in the neighbourhood of $7 per man per day, but it must be higher now—you would effect a saving on pay and allowances, even accepting that figure, of $1,500,000 a year as between an infantry brigade and an armoured brigade. That is without taking into account such matters as married quarters and schooling for children, because obviously there would be fewer married quarters required and fewer children to be educated if you had 500 fewer men overseas.

Let us consider the question of equipment. An armoured brigade requires 232 tanks. Some of these tanks are used for different purposes, some are small and some are large; but for our discussion here I think it would be fair enough to consider that they might all be Centurion tanks, the gun tank that was the normal equipment of our armoured regiments. The cost of the Centurion tank is roughly $100,000. Two hundred and thirty-two, the equipment for a brigade, would give you a cost of $23 million. It is not a recurring annual cost. Tanks do not disintegrate and become unusable in just one year. They last for a very long time. The reserve army regiments of the armoured corps are using for training purposes tanks which must be at least ten years old. The minister may remember that in the year 1940 at Camp Borden the first Canadian armoured brigade used for training purposes tanks which had been manufactured by the United States in 1918. They served a useful purpose. They were still serviceable to a certain extent over twenty years later.

Therefore the expenditure of $23 million to equip a brigade fully with tanks is not an annual recurring expenditure. How then does the minister get the $100 million more for an armoured brigade than for an infantry brigade? Even though we make a generous allowance for other things, spare parts and so on, and take a figure of say $30 million, there is a discrepancy of $70 million for which the minister has to account. I hope he will give us an accounting rather than brush aside an armoured brigade on the implication that it is prohibitive in cost. It is not prohibitive in cost, and in any case it would not mean at this time an additional $30 million added to the national defence budget, because surely we have come close to the end of some of the stockpiling that is going on of soft goods and things of that nature and can divert to actual fighting vehicles some of the money which has been set aside for other matters.

The minister in his statement has, I think, confused the issue completely. I have maintained that the Canadian army is out of balance. Other nations are still maintaining their armoured formations—the United States, the United Kingdom. Canada has fallen behind. We have produced an infantry army with the supporting arms, artillery and engineers, and it is a good army for infantry work. But that is the type of army we had from 1914 to 1918. It is not a modern mobile force, and it is a modern mobile force that is the requirement at the present time.

But the minister refuses to consider this problem. He is content to let the armoured corps remain at the strength of just two regiments, content to raise and equip infantry formations, and is not taking the precaution to see that those infantry formations are protected against loss of life. The experience of the last war showed very clearly that infantry can be protected against unnecessary loss of life, particularly in an advance. In the course of my remarks in the house during the last three years I have repeatedly referred to Canada's great discovery and invention, the armoured personnel carrier, which has been neglected by the Canadian army since the war. I cannot understand why that should be so. But I find that in the United Kingdom they are providing armoured personnel carriers for the protection of their infantry. In the United States they are doing the same thing. It is astonishing to turn to the issue of Life of June 7 of this year and find pictures and an article with regard to an armoured personnel carrier that has been devised and is in use in the United States army, and for which they are appropriating the sum of $50 million.

It is a very wise investment indeed, and I should like to read a sentence or two from the article to indicate what is involved. Appropriately enough, they are calling these vehicles "lifesavers", which is what they are. Here is the description:

> The M-59 "lifesaver", a boxlike vehicle with tread to carry it over bad terrain and armour to ward off machine gun bullets is the United States army's latest and most promising attempt to adapt infantry to mechanized and atomic war. Carrying a squad of nine riflemen, it can keep up with tanks and take infantry across open ground which would be suicidal in foot attack. It also enables friendly artillery, firing ahead of infantry, to keep shelling until the last moments since shell fragments also bounce off the M-59. In atomic warfare, where mobility under fire is the key to ground tactics, the M-59 lifesaver would be invaluable. It has been called a "mechanized atomic foxhole", its armour providing protection against radiation and heat flash and its 30-m.p.h. speed permitting quick dispersion.

I think it is a rather sad reflection on the Department of National Defence that Canada, the country which produced the armoured personnel carrier, should now be last in the field, and that we have to turn to the United States and the United Kingdom to discover what is being done along this line. But that is necessary for infantry tactics on the battlefield if our purpose is to save the lives of infantrymen. I submit that the lives of infantrymen have been sacrificed needlessly in two or three wars in which Canada has been engaged, and that fact is known to all. But Canada discovered a means of saving the lives of infantrymen in the last war and should adopt that means now for the protection of our men.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Again I say that the minister has neglected to deal adequately with this particular matter. I went to some length, when I spoke on this subject last May, to point out that we were failing to train the high command properly if we did not provide armoured formations within a brigade so that they could become accustomed to using armour, artillery and infantry in conjunction; and until we do provide armoured formations in adequate number we will not train the high command properly. From that we will suffer serious results because it is essential that those who are placed in command of armies know how to use properly all arms of the services. Unless we provide an armoured brigade, train it on a brigade level and provide it for the training of divisional and corps commanders, there will be little effective training of those who will attain high command in our Canadian army.

You see what we have done, Mr. Chairman. Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Macleod was asking if we were getting a dollar's worth for a dollar expended in national defence. I have intimated people would be satisfied if that were the case. I think we cannot get a dollar's worth for a dollar expended because we are out of balance so far as the Canadian army is concerned. We are producing an army in the 1914-18 pattern, and conditions of warfare have changed and are changing very quickly since the development of atomic weapons. Those people who are in command in Europe over our NATO forces are asking for mobility and more mobility. In a newspaper not long ago one of our own distinguished generals commented upon and stressed the necessity for mobility of troops in the field. What are we doing about it? You are not very mobile on your flat feet. You have to have tracked armoured vehicles, tanks and armoured personnel carriers, if you are going to make your infantry forces mobile and if you are going to protect them. We are not, therefore, keeping up with the times and the responsibility rests with the Minister of National Defence.

I think it is a pretence to suggest that our brigade in Europe, fine as it may be as an infantry brigade—I think it is one of the finest because it has so many veterans of the second world war and Korea in its ranks—is an effective fighting machine against the type of attack which may be launched against that brigade by the Russians. You have only to recall how the Germans swept through Europe in 1940, with a very small mobile armoured force, to realize the truth of my remarks. The Germans were opposed at that time by infantry forces similar to our infantry forces.

Infantry forces of that nature are ineffective against powerful armoured formations. You have to have tanks and a preponderance of artillery if you are going to resist armour. We have committed our infantry brigade over in Europe to a very great hazard. I am surprised the Minister of National Defence does not recognize that and does not take effective steps to put the brigade in better condition to resist attack.

I shall conclude these remarks, Mr. Chairman, with a reference to the white paper. The white paper lists three objectives of our defence policy, namely defence against direct attack on Canada; implementation of undertakings for collective security, and the build-up of our organization for total war. In my opinion, the minister has fallen far short of achieving any of these objectives. The second one, in my opinion, should be rewritten and instead of saying, "implementation of undertakings for collective security," which is an odd and general phrase that might mean anything, I think we should say, the provision of fully equipped and highly trained forces and formations of armour, artillery and infantry suitable for modern mobile warfare in order to implement any undertakings by Canada for collective security.

Mr. Herridge: I do not intend to detain the committee very long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: Some hon. members say, "hear, hear", that is a good way to extend debate. First of all, I want to make a reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Wellington South. He made some rather caustic comments about the principles of socialism, and then went on to say there was a good deal of happiness found in the army. That statement is quite correct, and I agree with it. Why is there a great deal of happiness found in the army? It is because of the sense of security provided by an assured income, permanent employment, good housing, clothing always provided and three good meals a day for certain. I must admit that so far as Canada is concerned, these things are provided in good quantity and quality. All the socialist wants to do is to provide the same sense of security to the whole population in Canada which many do not enjoy now.

Mr. Studer: The same is true of being in jail.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek suggesting that being in the army is like being in jail? I am amazed. How is that condition obtained? It is the result of government organization and government action. From time to time we in this group are asking the same things for those people who do not enjoy similar security.

Strangely enough, I disagree with the hon. member's comments in one respect, but I support them wholeheartedly in another. The hon. member suggested we could use some of the members of the permanent forces for construction purposes, the building of roads and bridges. Speakers at a recent conference in Canada concerning our renewable natural resources suggested these men could be used for fire-fighting purposes. Here we are in Canada lagging in the building of the trans-Canada highway, lagging in the building of roads and bridges everywhere, and we have this great force of excellent men available who, no doubt under present conditions, will find themselves in the army for a number of years. I believe the hon. member's suggestion is an excellent one, and I support it.

These men would gain experience from useful employment that would be of great advantage to this country. I have had letters from men in the forces who tell me they get tired of digging a hole and filling it in again, of building a bridge and pulling it down, and of doing all those things that are necessary to train engineers, and pioneers over and over again. I feel the hon. member made a very good suggestion. We could perhaps rotate a proportion of our armed forces and use them in construction of trans-Canada and other highways that are so necessary at the present time. At the same time they would be gaining experience that they have to gain in other less useful ways.

I was very pleased with the minister's reply to my brief comments in the debate when the estimates were before the committee on a previous occasion. He told the house there were no members of the defence forces who served in the second world war, and who committed offences, that were still in jail. I was very glad to hear that indeed. I wish to make another brief appeal with respect to officers and other ranks who were dismissed from the forces and who lost permanent pension rights and other rights as a result of military offences which, in some cases, would not be serious offences in civil life. In my opinion these men should receive at least equal consideration to those in the R.C.M.P. I will quote from a Canadian Press dispatch in this respect. The dispatch is headed "Misconduct Mounties given Pension Break". It reads:

> Seven members of the RCMP discharged since 1949 for inefficiency or misconduct will have their pensions restored in part under legislation introduced in Commons.
>
> The bill changes an RCMP pension plan, in effect since 1949, to allow a partial pension to be paid to members of the force discharged for inefficiency or misconduct.
>
> Justice Minister Garson informed the house that the measure will be made retroactive to cover seven members discharged for those reasons in the last five years.
> He said the change is being made to put insurance plans in line with the former pension plan under which those discharged for inefficiency or misconduct were eligible for half-pension until the age of sixty-five and a two-thirds pension after that.

I feel that if the Minister of Justice can give former R.C.M.P. personnel a break in that respect our defence minister should give those men who are suffering from their misdemeanours under military law a break. Therefore I appeal for a reconsideration of their cases.

I want to mention another little matter that rather intrigued me. I am speaking as a sort of backwoodsman without any knowledge of the details of present military life. I was interested in a press dispatch in the Ottawa Citizen of June 16, 1954, headed "Not Permitted to take Salute". Then, it goes on to say:

> The dispute centres around a plan that the mayor would take the salute of the Cameron Highlanders regiment in a ceremony at city hall square on July 1.

I want it to be understood that I am not taking the mayor's part or anything of that sort, but in my opinion there is a principle involved here.

> The army has advised that the mayor cannot take the salute—that this honour is reserved to the Queen, her official representatives, the Minister of National Defence and senior army officials.

I did not know this privilege was so limited, because I have seen mayors take the salute before. Senator McGeer while mayor of Vancouver took the salute on one occasion in the city of Nelson from the armed forces present. My question is this: Upon what regulation is this ruling based? When the minister is replying I would like him to answer this question: Does this ruling preclude the Prime Minister of Canada or the premier of a province from taking the salute from a regiment? I cannot understand in a democratic country why the Prime Minister or a premier of a province would be denied taking the salute from a regiment of our armed forces, because of regulations. I get the very strong suspicion that this is a musty old tradition that has come down from the Victorian period, and that some obscure and unknown official of the armed forces has dug it up from the dusty files to thwart the wishes of the present mayor of Ottawa.

Mr. Knowles: Some people would like to give her a 21-gun salute.

Mr. Herridge: As a matter of fact, I may not leave Ottawa until midnight July 1, because I want to see the ceremony.

I come now to my last point. We in Canada look upon our defence forces as a citizens army, whether these citizens are in the permanent force or the reserve army. At this point I wish to pay tribute to the members of the reserve army who give their evenings and summer holidays over to training in the reserve force. I think they should receive every encouragement. I know the two or three units in my district struggle along under considerable difficulty and, particularly in Nelson, with very little accommodation and equipment. But these few men at least carry on a very useful work, and I should be very pleased to hear what is going to be done in the future to improve the position of the reserve army, and support their efforts.

Canadian citizens who fought in the first and second world wars did so for the defence of this country, because they had a general understanding of and respect for democratic principles and democratic ideals—and that means a great deal in any army. They had faith and belief in certain principles, which gave weight to their blows against the enemy. And, because of that strength, engendered by such principles, a totalitarian dictatorship was defeated.

I wish to see our army maintained as a citizen army and I would hope it will continue to be composed of people who believe in democratic principles and in democratic ideals, and who are willing to defend this country because they believe in those ideals. I believe the hon. member for Macleod made reference to the same subject, that our army should be composed of persons of that kind.

However, I have been a little bit disturbed by reports I have received, and to which I am rather inclined to give some attention. I would ask the minister three questions which I trust he will answer when he replies in this debate. First, are German immigrants being brought into Canada who served in the armed forces of the Third Reich, who are not citizens of Canada, but who are being enlisted in the armed forces of this country? If so, in what numbers?

Mr. Ferguson: They are being enlisted now. And it is a good thing they are; they are good fighters.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member can make his speech later.

Mr. Ferguson: I am informing you.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to say this, that if I depended upon the hon. member for Simcoe North for my information, I would be misinformed very often.

Mr. Ferguson: You would be more accurate than you are now; you would not make as many mistakes.

Mr. Herridge: My second question is this: If so, were any of these men who have been enlisted in the armed forces of Canada awarded the iron cross or other decorations, personally, by Hitler, because of aggressive action against the British or Canadian troops?

My third question is this: Have any of these men asked permission of their commanding officers to wear these decorations on Canadian uniforms? That is all I have to say at the moment. I believe the hon. member for Simcoe North is ready to speak.

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, I am. I am not sure whether the Minister of National Defence got this preferred position near the closing hours of the session so that it would be run through in as few hours as possible. But in my opinion this is one department that should have had a full-scale discussion. It is one department of government that is spending many more millions of dollars than any other department.

One of the motives which prompted me to stand as a candidate for parliament was that I enlisted in the first war, and at the time I enlisted I had great faith in the government. I thought: Well, we have a good minister of national defence in Sam Hughes. He has all the information available from that great British war machine. But it was not very long before I realized the truth of the situation.

The British government had been forced into war by the kaiser, and there was never any group of people more unprepared to meet that war than the people of the British Empire. That war was not necessary; it was absolutely unnecessary. But we always sat back and said: Well, we will not believe the facts we see; we will not believe the kaiser has built an army so large that the only thing he can do is to start a war.

No, we were not prepared. Men were sent overseas with insufficient ammunition in their pouches to defend themselves. I served one whole winter, personally, in the trenches as second in command of a company. There was only our company commander, with myself, in those trenches during the entire winter on our piece of front line. In March seven or eight officers came to reinforce the company.

Many situations are similar today. At the time of the last war I talked to the manager of the Hotchkiss company of France. This man was an Englishman. When France was taken by the Germans he paid a visit to Canada, and during that visit came to my home. I said to him, "Well, the French capitulated." Bear in mind that this chap was an Englishman. He said to me, "I do not blame them, at all."

Let us be frank about it. At that time the great braintrusters in England said to the French, "You build the Maginot line and you can hold the Germans there. We will be prepared to stop any German rush on the beaches."

What was the result of the preparations for defence? Well, the Germans came down through Holland and Belgium. They circled around the Maginot line and came in behind it on the beaches. This man was one who had aided Lloyd George tremendously in the first war in the production of munitions. He was not just some man who was shooting off his mouth concerning something he knew nothing about. This man just escaped from France with his life when the Germans came in. He told me there were only about 27 anti-aircraft guns in the whole of the British Isles when war broke out—or maybe it was 28.

Knowing these things to be true, and knowing from personal experience that we have never been prepared, I have always felt that as members of parliament, irrespective of politics, we should come to Ottawa and offer our little bit, for what it may be worth, as the representatives of the people in the constituencies of Canada. We should do this irrespective of politics, so that, with an open mind, the minister would be able to accept advice, even from opposition members, if it was worth while. Members of the Liberal party should realize what they owe to their constituents, not just during a war but before it starts, to make sure of one thing—that Canada is prepared, so far as she can go.

Do not bother so much about what the other fellow is doing. The Americans may be adequately prepared; the people of England may be, or they may not be. We have an obligation here in Canada, as a group of people sent to Ottawa, to look after the rights of the people and to prepare ourselves. We can aid very little when the minister hides behind the iron curtain as far as information regarding our armed forces is concerned. We as members of parliament duly elected from every section of this country are big enough and ugly enough to take the cold facts whether we are adequately prepared according to conditions in the world today. We are either prepared or we are not prepared. We can take it on the end of the nose if we need greater taxation, greater expansion, greater sacrifices now before the war starts rather than months after it starts.

Down in Barrie we have an armoury that was built in 1910. It is not big enough for sea cadets or the flying corps cadets to train one-tenth as properly as they should train, to say nothing of men in the militia. We find this government building—what they call armouries in certain communities. In my opinion they are glorified bar rooms for leading citizens to consume liquor in for hours at a stretch.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. gentleman any personal experience?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, I have, and enjoyed it. I am not a hypocrite like some people I know but it was not built intentionally for my enjoyment or for the enjoyment of anybody else. It was built to train troops, or else take the name "armoury" away from it. Why do we not get down to facts? Why try to satisfy a handful of people in the militia in a small community by putting up a luxury building with beautiful furnishings, lovely drapes and a bar, and have the members of that particular section of the militia go out and solicit people to come in and have a drink of liquor in those places? They are now competing against the veterans' beer parlours. These are the facts. They are known to everybody. I have no objection to drinking liquor, not at all. I have drunk it on every occasion all my life, and I will continue to do so, if that is any answer to you.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Be careful.

Mr. Ferguson: That has nothing to do with the question of preparedness. We are not prepared in this country. If the minister is properly prepared for conditions which might arise he should be the proudest man in the Dominion of Canada, and he should come out and say, This is what we have; we defy any enemy. This is what we have in this country. We have adequate places in which to train people; we have adequate camps. We have no trouble with recruiting; we are proud of our army and the people of Canada are proud of the army. Young men are falling over themselves to belong to a group of Canadians of whom they should be justly proud. Young men wearing the Queen's uniform have every right to stick their chests out and hold their heads high, and say: We are members of the armed forces.

We should have no difficulty with recruiting; but as long as the minister is going to permit senior officers to take an emblem off the caps of a certain branch of the forces—the hon. member from Newfoundland throws his head back, guffaws and laughs. That is symbolic of his party, Mr. Chairman. That is exactly what the minister has permitted in the air force. When the minister laughs about the removal of the crown from the caps, I say it is not helpful to this country. The crown is a symbol, and thank God most of the men and women of the country are very proud of it. But there are some who throw their heads back and grin when the crown is mentioned.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the time when your friends took it off the motor licence plate?

Mr. Ferguson: Two wrongs never made a right. You are now talking about a piece of tin plate on the back of a motor car. That has no comparison with Her Majesty's forces in the Royal Canadian Air Force of Canada.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): A very poor answer.

Mr. Ferguson: Don't bring the crown on the cap badges down to the level of a licence on an automobile. That is about the size of your mentality. I ask the minister whether he has had sufficient time to obliterate the slur which was cast on Her Majesty the Queen of this empire by the abolition of that crown without her consent? This matter was brought up on a previous occasion and the minister said he would make a statement. I was interrupted by the Speaker of the house when I mentioned it before and I was not permitted on that occasion to speak regarding the removal of that cap badge. Is it permanently removed? Was permission granted? If so, was permission granted by Her Majesty the Queen? What good reason can the minister give for taking off the crown? He should give a reason for taking "Rule, Britannia", the theme of the navy, out of the navy. It is just one thing after another, tearing down the traditions of the British Empire and everything that we have to fight for. The regiments of this country have become famous because they are affiliated with the famous British regiments who defended this empire before a Canadian soldier ever stood up in the Dominion of Canada. Go out to the Toronto exhibition, at Fort York, and take a look at the little cemetery there, forty feet by forty feet, and read the names of the men in the regiments who defended muddy York in 1812. Every single one is a British regiment.

We have men who joined regiments and fought in the South African war, the first big war, and in the second war, who were proud to wear the kilt, who were proud to wear the riflemen's uniform when there was tradition behind them. You take tradition out of the army and you have no army. You have a machine which cannot stand up against enthusiasm and esprit de corps. I say this to the minister. It is not too late to give back to these men the crown, the symbol of the Queen of this empire. Put it back on the cap badges. If it was too heavy for some of the fragile young women to wear in the service, what are we running, a military establishment, a flying corps or what?

I hold in my hand a big file of protests. There are letters and telegrams from all over Canada protesting the action of a senior officer of the R.C.A.F. in taking the crown off the cap badges of our air force. We are the only air force in the commonwealth that took the crown off. I think it is despicable, but it is in keeping with many actions of the minister in obliterating the things that we hold dear, the tradition of the great British Isles and the regiments that we have been affiliated with and which built up the great Canadian armies of the past, that have fought for these things and that have stood for this type of character that we have in Canada. Do not keep on taking these traditions away from them. Give them back if you possibly can.

Mr. Claxton: If there is no further general debate I should like to pay hon. members opposite the courtesy of a reply. With regard to what the hon. member for Simcoe North said, I have nothing to add to what was said in the house with regard to the badge on some of the caps of the R.C.A.F. This matter was explained at that time. I have nothing to add to it. If it becomes desirable in the view of the services and of the department to make a change, then the change will be made and announced in due course.

It is of course ridiculous to say that any slur was cast on the Queen. I would like to add this. I have not interfered in any way with the traditions of the armed forces, and have done everything possible during the time that I have had to do with them to build up in them a feeling of affection for and pride in their own country. It may be recalled that the ships of the Royal Canadian Navy carried maple leaves on their funnels during the war. Soon after I came into office I found that when the ships were being repainted the maple leaf was being painted out. As soon as I found that out I told them to paint the maple leaf back on and keep it on, and that has since happened.

I found officers and men in certain components of the armed forces no longer wearing the name of the country on their shoulders. When I found this out I directed that all officers and men of the services were always to wear "Canada" or "Canadian" either on their shoulders or shoulder badges if the name was not clearly written on some other insignia they were wearing. I can add that they are just as proud of their country as I hope all hon. members are. They have shown their devotion to their Queen and country by their service at home and abroad. They also showed that in the part they took and took magnificently in the reception of the Queen, then Princess, during the royal tour of Canada, and in the splendid ceremonies of the coronation abroad and at home they were second to none in their loyalty to the Queen and in their pride in their country.

Mr. Ferguson: No one mentioned loyalty to the Queen. I was talking about cap badges.

Mr. Claxton: Now, Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition referred to a matter that I will certainly not deal with at this time beyond saying that the answer to the question he raised can be found at page 893 of Hansard for January 12, 1953, where it will be found that the position is precisely as it is stated to be.

Other hon. members requested information and I repeat what I have said before on many occasions, namely that I do not think any parliament in the British commonwealth has ever had so much information about defence in all its aspects as this parliament has had over the past several years. This charge today was pinned on a refusal to table two reports, one of which was referred to as the Hendry report and the other a report on the reserve army. It was suggested that there was nothing secret in these reports. Whether or not there is anything secret in these reports can really only be ascertained by those who have seen them. But the point here is not whether there is anything secret in the reports but whether the reports were designed for the information of the officers of the armed services, the officials of the department, or members of the government in order that they might decide, on the basis of that information and advice, what action they should take.

It is a fundamental rule of our parliamentary democracy, as practised at Westminster and here right down through the years, that members of the government are entitled to have frank and full information from those reporting to them, and they are entitled to ask whom they want for advice. They are entitled to treat that advice as confidential for two reasons. There is no reason why they should disclose the basis of their action. The second reason is that the people who give them that advice are entitled to have its source treated as confidential because they are not here to speak for themselves. On the basis of that advice the government makes its decision, announces it to parliament, and is responsible to parliament for that action, the policy adopted, and answers for any of the civil servants or officers involved. That is our system and in order to enable it to work it seems to me it is essential that members of the government, like members of the armed forces and officials in government departments, should be able to get advice, information, and assistance on a confidential basis. The thing is just as simple as that.

Now, sir, there are a few other points some of which I think might more properly be dealt with as we come to the details of the estimates, but I would like to refer here to the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre with regard to armour. As he pointed out, this is a favourite subject of his. He has brought it forward on at least three occasions and he does not appear to be satisfied with the answers I have given. I do not need to tell him that I do not pretend to be an expert in armour. In the first world war, in which I took a small part for a short time, I saw some tanks in the distance and they were mostly bogged down and stayed bogged down. That was my only personal experience of that operation. But in this we must take the advice of responsible officers of the department who have the advantage of conferring with the officers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and we must work out with our allies in that organization the type of balanced force which will enable our country to make its particular contribution in the most economical and effective way it can and at the place where it is most needed. The hon. member disclaimed knowledge of there being rotation of armoured regiments in Europe and he said that we required an armoured brigade group. But that makes it just about three times as impossible. An armoured brigade group is a difficult thing far us to maintain abroad in peacetime. It is difficult because you have to have tanks in Germany; you have to service them in England; and then you require very nearly the equivalent number of tanks in Canada where almost inevitably they will never be used in war but must be available for training purposes. It is also difficult because of the very much larger number of men who would be involved, and of course there would be an impossible mathematical problem involved in rotation. I will just say a word about each of these.

With regard to the number of men, we are talking here not of a brigade, as I understand they were organized during the second world war, but of a brigade group, that is, something which might operate in a fairly independent way and which would have to have all the supporting services that an infantry brigade group has at the present time. Then it would have to have special services appropriate to the maintenance of tanks, as well as regiments of tanks. The number of men, I am told, who would be involved in such a formation in Europe would be 6,899, and the number of men involved in an infantry brigade group is 5,933. Now, the expenses to which the hon. member referred were not the cost of maintaining either an infantry brigade group or an armoured brigade group in Europe for a year. That was the one-time cost of equipping it and the cost of maintaining it for a year.

In the case of an independent armoured brigade group the one-time cost was $120,800,000 and the cost of an infantry brigade was $45,525,000, whereas the estimated annual recurring cost of an armoured brigade was $39,600,000 and an infantry brigade $29,762,000, so that the differential is rather less than the $100,000,000 to which I referred. Now let me state the reason why it is mathematically impossible for us to do what is suggested with an army of about the size of the present one. At the present time, we have to have three infantry battalions in Korea. They are rotated as units each year. We have to have three infantry battalions as part of the mobile striking force, and that operation has to be carried on continuously. Then we have three infantry battalions overseas in Germany as part of the first infantry brigade there. So that in those formations, in the first Canadian infantry brigade in Korea we have three battalions, three in the mobile striking force and three overseas in Germany. That is nine battalions of infantry to carry out rotation annually for units to Korea and once every two years for units to Germany, and to do this on a basis which ensures that in between service abroad the unit will have at least eighteen months in Canada, requires that we have six more infantry battalions, or a total of fifteen infantry battalions. Also that number of battalions will enable us, at the end of the Korean war, to constitute an infantry division at full strength with some reinforcements in addition to the mobile striking force. However, if we put into Europe an armoured brigade group of three regiments, then we cannot interchange those regiments with infantry regiments. I would say you would have to have at least five armoured regiments in Canada to do the job. That would mean seven or eight armoured regiments and three airborne infantry battalions in the mobile striking force which would not be interchangeable with the regiments in Germany. Then you would have to have four and a half or five infantry battalions to rotate with the infantry battalions in Korea. In other words, you would require a larger number of major formations; you would not have the same interchangeability and you would have this greatly increased expenditure.

There is another reason and that is, of course, that in the event of a war I think everyone would contemplate that we would be expected to have at least the equivalent of a division in Europe in D-plus the time of transportation. In order to supply the tanks of the infantry division in D-plus the time of transportation we must have the tanks already in Europe. We are building up mobilization stores of heavy equipment for that purpose there. This will bring home to hon. members just how complex is this business of building up forces in peacetime, with the enormous quantities of expensive and heavy equipment required, on another continent 3,000 miles away. No other country I know of feels it necessary to build up mobilization stores to meet the challenge of an emergency in a country abroad.

The hon. member for Kootenay West referred to Germans enlisting in the armed forces of Canada. We have taken into the armed forces a very small number of German immigrants. Each case is considered on its own merits. It is only done on the specific personal permission of the chief of staff of the service concerned. There is just as much screening as possible. I know of none of them having an iron cross for any reason.

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister look into the matter?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. If such a man were foolish enough to ask an officer if he might wear the iron cross, I think the officer would speedily tell him "No", in extremely emphatic terms. It is almost unthinkable that anyone should have the silliness to ask the question.

I think I have covered most of the points raised by hon. members. If there are any that I have not covered, I shall be only too happy to be reminded now or else I can deal with them when the details are before us for consideration.

There was one series of observations made, I think, by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin when the defence estimates were before us on May 20 and 21. He said he had been told that the troops in Korea had been furnished with quonset huts shortly in advance of and probably on account of the Prime Minister's visit and that the broadcasting station had been out of order and was only put into order before the Prime Minister's visit. May I say that the quonset huts referred to were ordered for the whole commonwealth division about eight months before the Prime Minister's visit and the last huts were delivered some months before his visit. There is nothing in that. The radio station was brought into operation about Christmas, 1953. I am informed that it has been out of operation for less than an hour and this was for technical reasons but that otherwise it has been in operation and that there is nothing the matter with it.

I also want to assure the hon. member for Kootenay West that there is nothing in the rather amusing story he told about coffee on the minister's pants. There is also nothing in the account he appears to have got that a general notice or order was posted with regard to the carriage of coffee. Some person thought it was desirable to cut down this kind of transportation around the building—and I believe it is desirable—and he posted this up for his own staff.

I hope there is nothing in the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon to the effect that some officer was ticked off for talking to a member of the opposition. I have never heard of such a thing. I cannot imagine any officer acting this way. I do not know of any more delightful thing than to talk to members of the opposition. I hope the officers of the armed forces talk to them still more, so that thereby they would be able to make most interesting and valuable contributions to our debates and would feel that our officers were good at their jobs.

Mr. Ferguson: I should like to ask the minister this question. Is it necessary to obtain Her Majesty's consent to the wearing of the crown by any regiment, before the crown can at any time be put on any part of the uniform?

Mr. Claxton: That has been the case for some years past, but I understand it was not always the case.

Mr. Ferguson: I have a supplementary question. When the crown is once up, is it necessary to ask Her Majesty's permission to take the crown down?

Mr. Claxton: Certainly not.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister one question—

Mr. Claxton: I should perhaps make the situation clear to the hon. member because I know he is keenly interested in it. The reason why permission is asked of Her Majesty for the use of the crown is so that the sovereign and those personally advising her may have complete control over the conditions in which the crown is used.

Mr. Ferguson: That is what I would think.

Mr. Claxton: For instance, over the size and the shape of the crown. For example, since the present Queen became queen there has been a direction that the crown used should be a different type of crown from the one used previously. That will be gradually replaced. But there is no suggestion, no order and no regulation to the effect that when you do not use the crown, you must ask her consent.

Mr. Ferguson: But when you use the crown and you have had that permission granted, the minister says her consent is not necessary—

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Ferguson: —and that the crown can be taken down by the wish of any senior officer in the armed forces.

Mr. Claxton: The crown is not taken down. There was no crown taken down here. What was done was that a new badge was adopted without a crown for a certain limited use.

Mr. Ferguson: I call that "taking down".

Mr. Herridge: The minister did not answer my question with relation to the regulation with respect to saluting. Do the regulations preclude the prime minister of Canada taking the salute from any regiment?

Mr. Claxton: No. The regulations were revised quite substantially some years ago. They are the same in all commonwealth countries. They generally provide for a long list of persons being given military honours. There is a general catch-all for them, but mayors of municipalities are not included. I should make it plain that the mayor of Ottawa never complained to me or raised with me or anyone in the department the question of receiving the salute. What has obscured the situation, I think, is that the arrangements for the ceremony to take place on July 1 provided that a unit of the Canadian reserve army would be present, that His Excellency the Governor General would be present, and that the unit would naturally give military honours to His Excellency the Governor General. It is completely unthinkable under military practice and tradition that either before or after the Governor General receives military honours the same unit on the same parade should give military honours to anyone else.

Mr. Herridge: But the regulations would not prevent the Prime Minister receiving the salute?

Mr. Claxton: Oh, no, but not on that same occasion. On the other hand, military honours are, generally speaking, given to people who have to do with military things, and of course to members of the royal family because they are members of the royal family. As a matter of courtesy the practice has grown up in recent years of prime ministers and similar people receiving military honours. That is a rather recent development that has come about in the last fifty or sixty years.

Mr. Herridge: Who drafts the regulations?

Mr. Claxton: They are passed by the governor in council.

Mr. Herridge: For each country?

The Chairman: Order. In order to make for an orderly discussion, is it now the desire of the committee that I call the headings in the blue book?

Mr. Churchill: May I take a minute to comment on the minister's statement and to say that I recognize the hopelessness of attempting to debate the question of an armoured corps with the minister. Our minds are certainly not at one with regard to the matter. I am not the least bit impressed with his advisers, and I regret that in the figures he has now placed on Hansard he has used the basis of an independent armoured brigade group which was not the subject I was talking about. I was talking about an armoured brigade, and naturally his figures are different from mine. Consequently he makes the picture appear much blacker, much more prohibitive in cost because he is talking about a different thing.

But, as I say, I recognize the hopelessness of continuing a discussion along these lines. I further regret that the minister has not dealt with the question of the maintenance build-up of the armoured corps in Canada and with the introduction of the armoured personnel carrier to save the lives of our infantry overseas.

Mr. Claxton: I beg the hon. member's pardon. With respect to the armoured personnel carrier, I should tell him that we are by no means satisfied with the carriers so far developed in any country. With support from the British and United States armies, we are initiating a development program to see if we cannot develop a more satisfactory infantry carrier than has yet been devised, and that work is under way. I think the account in Life of what they have in the United States is rather glowing.

With regard to the other point, if the hon. member would not like us to have an armoured brigade group abroad then I assume he would be prepared to have Canada take the consequences and have the supporting services for our armour that he would propose to have abroad supplied for us by the British or American forces. I am sure they would not do it.

Mr. Churchill: With respect to the minister saying that I would not wish to have an armoured brigade group overseas, may I say that I have not said anything of that nature whatsoever. But when for the purpose of argument I discuss an armoured brigade and give figures with respect to an armoured brigade I think the minister, if he is refuting my charges with regard to the number of men and the cost, should use a somewhat comparable formation and not an armoured brigade group.

Mr. Claxton: That formation would be totally unacceptable to the Canadian government, the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people because it would not be a self-supporting independent Canadian unit.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to ask of the minister a question which I do not think comes properly under any particular item. I wish to raise the question of Canadian morale, and I should like the minister to follow my reasoning closely in order to see if it seems sound. If I have got the right idea concerning our preparations for war, we are arming with the ultimate purpose of meeting and beating communism. Is that correct? We are looking to an ultimate showdown with the communist conspiracy which rules Russia.

Mr. Claxton: That is not our object. Our object is to try to avoid another war by showing the communists that they cannot win, and to maintain the strength of our economies during that period. That means a lot more than military preparedness. We look forward to the time when the communists may be persuaded by peaceful means to change their attitude so that we can live in the world together without the necessity of having these armed camps on each side by which the communists are deterred from war through their fear that they will not win and through which we hope to achieve our desire for peace.

Mr. Blackmore: I agree utterly with the minister's general ideal, but while we have been looking forward to this idyllic situation he dreams of, we have lost something like 700 million people to communism. It seems to me the conclusion must be obvious that the Russians have no such idea as that of settling down to live with us on this planet. They have made declarations time and again that capitalism and communism cannot live together. Surely we are not stupid enough to be impossible of teaching in these matters!

If that is the case, then let me ask one other question. I think the minister would agree that, in our hope, which is perfectly righteous and with which I completely agree, that ultimately we can bring Russia to reason, we should be preparing, in case of need, to do everything in our power to defeat Russia. That is correct, is it not? The minister is aiming at that purpose. If we have to fight, he intends that we shall be able to meet the foe and defeat him. I think the minister has no reservations to make on that statement.

If this is the case, everything that takes place in Canada which tends to weaken the Canadian morale to fight communism, is working diametrically against the purpose of the minister. Would that be correct? I assume the minister's omission to reply is tantamount to acquiescence in what I say. Has the minister given thought and study, as part of the over-all problem of making ready this nation to meet and defeat the communist conspiracy, to what is going on in Canada tending to weaken the Canadian morale to fight against communism? Has he taken any measures?

To clarify, may I illustrate? In dealing with the C.B.C. the other day I referred to Bill Boss. Bill Boss has been writing articles which have appeared in so many of the newspapers of Canada that I am tempted to suppose they have appeared in all of them. Almost every one of these articles has tended to make people believe that communism was not so bad after all, and that possibly it just was not worth while taking serious measures to get ready to fight communism. Has the minister given any attention to articles like those written by Bill Boss?

Mr. Claxton: Certainly in my quality as a member of the government, a citizen of Canada and a member of parliament I give consideration to all such things. As Minister of National Defence, however, that does not come properly within the scope of my department and should not be discussed on these estimates. I would suggest to the members of the committee that, in accordance with the understanding we have had and now that the hon. member has, I think, made his point, we should go ahead with consideration of the main headings of the estimates.

Mr. Blackmore: That would be fine, but there are two or three other matters that have to be taken up, too. I suggested something the other night upon which I still have not had an opportunity of elaborating, and upon which I intend to elaborate to the bitter end. It is that the C.B.C. is indoctrinating people in Canada with communism, and because of that—

The Chairman: Order. May I point out to the hon. member that we are now discussing the estimates of the Minister of National Defence, and he has nothing whatever to do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. If the hon. member wishes to continue, I would ask him to direct his remarks specifically to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Blackmore: What I am having to say, Mr. Chairman, is specifically connected with defence in Canada, whether or not it has to do with the Department of National Defence. No one with any sense of reality will question that it has to do with the defence of Canada; that must be quite obvious.

I do not propose to follow this matter to any great extent today, but I do suggest that unless the minister, somehow or other, is, by the cabinet, given some means whereby he can co-ordinate the efforts of all the departments of government in the general direction of total preparation for total war against the communist conspiracy, then his efforts are being defeated. Now, that must be serious. If we are spending $2 billion per year of the taxpayers' money that we can ill afford, if we are spending that to prepare to defeat the enemy, and then we are allowing our efforts to be neutralized through the back door and through the basement windows, and a half dozen other means, where is the consistency in our procedure?

I would say with all deference, Mr. Chairman, that certainly we must look upon this whole matter of preparedness as a whole matter. We have the Department of Defence Production, and certainly that enters directly into the general over-all preparedness of Canada; certainly our finance department is working in that direction and many other departments must be co-operating. I just wanted to know whether the minister was looking into this communist propaganda matter at all.

[Mr. Claxton.]

May I suggest to him, in all seriousness, that there has been no more steady supporter of the Minister of National Defence than I. He knows that. Certainly, no member of the opposition has stood more earnestly behind him than I have. I say to him that I believe he means business, that he really intends to defeat the enemy if he has to. May I, as one of the most sympathetic of all opposition members, tell the minister he had better look to all these matters, such as that of indoctrinating the Canadian people with communism, and he should see that something adequate is done to offset the stream of communist propaganda that is pouring into this nation from four or five different sources. Otherwise, we are just wasting our time in preparing an army.

All we have to do is take one simple illustration. We had this year a proposal—though it was not, I grant, seriously brought down by the dominion government—implying quite definitely that we should recognize red China. It was fairly well understood. Now anyone knows that recognition of red China would be taken as a definite step forward by Russia. Russia knows that, whether or not we do. Every one of such little steps plays an important part in the over-all picture. I believe I have made quite clear what my meaning is. I hope I do not have to raise this matter again, but if I have to do so, I certainly will.

The Chairman: Shall I now proceed with the headings?

Mr. Shaw: I do not want to delay consideration of this matter, but I should like to remind the minister that when the estimates were before the committee on a previous occasion a few weeks ago, I brought up the matter of protection against fire at the Royal Canadian Air Force stations and other military establishments across Canada. We had two fires, and we will probably have more. These things do happen. I am vitally concerned about the nature of the fire protection, particularly the program respecting fire watching that is established at the stations.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member did ask me about this when we were discussing the estimates on May 20 and May 21 and I prepared an answer for him which I omitted to give just a few minutes ago.

Mr. Shaw: If the minister would care to answer a little later, I am quite prepared to wait.

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps I could answer when we come to the air force item.

Mr. Shaw: Yes.

The Chairman: Shall we take departmental administration, as the item is found on page 287 setting out the details?

Departmental administration.

Mr. Pearkes: It is not our proposal to carry out a long series of unrelated questions on these various items under the different headings which you will call. You will recall that the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this morning that in the past we had not achieved much success in getting information by that procedure, nor had we earlier in this session, for the same reason, asked that a committee be set up under defence expenditures. There will be some questions which we will feel are pertinent, and about which we must ask for further information.

Under this first heading of departmental administration I note there is an increase of $550,000 for civilian personnel. When we recall that this is at the end of a three-year program during which there has been a build-up of defence services going on, one might at least have expected a levelling off of expenditures in other than what might be termed the actual fighting services. I am surprised to see that there is this increase in expenditure for civilian personnel. Nor can it be passed off by the suggestion that it is due entirely to the introduction of the five-day week. I noticed that there was an increase from 277 to 362 civilian clerks, and it is quite obvious that increase far exceeds the number which would be necessary to compensate for the introduction of the five-day week.

I noticed that the second item following the item covering the salary of the deputy minister covers a special adviser to the Department of National Defence. I imagine that is the special adviser on civilian personnel. Quite obviously he is imbued with the idea of increasing the number of civilian personnel which are included in the department. Then we have been told several times that the peak has been reached in so far as defence construction is concerned.

I am surprised to find that there is for the first time a real estate appraiser being appointed for the Department of National Defence. Could the minister enlighten us as to why it is so necessary to increase the strength of civilian personnel there? Then, again, I notice an increase in accountants from 14 to 31. I am referring to civilian accountants. We do recall that there was some criticism a few months ago of the accounting system in the army, when it was disclosed that there were no less than eight different accounting systems. One can understand that there must necessarily be some difference in the system in the various services, and even in the arms of those services. But is this an attempt to straighten out the accounting system by doubling the number of accountants this year?

Mr. Claxton: Answering the first question put by the hon. member, the adviser on civilian personnel ceased to be associated with the department on March 31, 1954. In any event he had nothing to do with the establishment specifically, and certainly was in no sense an empire builder.

Mr. Pearkes: Then why do you need the item for $13,500, if he is going to cease his duties?

Mr. Claxton: He came in after the book was published last year and went out after it was published this year.

Mr. Pearkes: So you do not need the money?

Mr. Claxton: That is correct. But as the hon. member knows, these details, after all, make up a total approximating two billions of dollars, and they are put here for the convenience of hon. members.

Then, with regard to the increase in staff: the number of civilian staff proposed to be increased amounts to 49, of which 10 are for the staff of the associate minister, formerly paid by the Department of Justice; 2 are for the deputy minister's branch. These are for new positions in the United Kingdom on account of our increasing activities there; 34 are in the directorate of civilian personnel, and 3 in the chief auditor's branch. The total is 49, representing an increase of $136,210. Then $200,000 is provided for the increase in civil service salary rates.

Mr. Pearkes: What about the real estate appraiser? Can we dispense with him, too?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Pearkes: I notice that the salary is $7,200.

Mr. Claxton: This is a reclassification. The same man is doing the same work under a reclassification.

Mr. Pearkes: Has there been any revision in the accounting system which would justify doubling the number of accountants?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, the number of accountants on the chief auditor's staff is being increased. That has been sought for some three years, and it is in order to have a more effective check.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, as I have when other estimates were introduced, I want to protest on this occasion about the way in which these estimates are presented to us. I have never been able to find out whether it is the responsibility of this department or that of the Department of National Revenue for the way in which these estimates are presented to us.

Let me give an illustration. We have here for the Department of National Defence 36 pages of details. Something more than 30 pages of these are concerned with details pertaining to civil employees. We are told exactly how many charwomen are employed in the three services, and what pay they receive. We are told how many office boys are employed, and the pay they receive. We are told how many messengers are employed and how many typists, and whether they are of grade 1, grade 2 or grade 3, and their pay.

For the army, for instance, we have 8 pages devoted to an itemized statement of civilian employees, and we are told that the total civil salaries and wages enumerated on those 8 pages amount to $40 million. Then the next item which deals with pay and allowances of the army amounts to $128 million, and it is dismissed with only three words. In other words, for an expenditure of $128 million there are only three words of explanation, but there are 8 pages of details for expenditures of $40 million.

I find that all the major items are detailed in the same way. For instance, the amount for clothing and personal equipment comes to over $12 million.

So far as the air force is concerned, 5 pages are devoted to enumerating expenditures on civil salaries amounting to $31 million, but there are only three words for an expenditure on pay and allowances amounting to $120 million. There are about five words for an expenditure of $107 million for the construction of buildings and works, and only three words for an expenditure of $305 million for aircraft and engines.

And so on, all down the line. One expenditure of $30 million is given only one word—"ships". I do not know how these estimates originated, or what purpose is served in giving us all this detail about civilian employees, right down to the last charwoman, and then disposing of the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars for construction, shipbuilding, aircraft, pay and allowances without any detail whatsoever, with the exception of two or three words.

I suggest someone could give some consideration to giving us estimates in a form in which they would be more useful and beneficial to members of the House of Commons than they are in their present form.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Then, I have one other matter I wish to bring to the minister's attention—and there will be others when we reach other items. I refer to the regulations formulated by somebody in the defence department with reference to the deduction of income tax from the pay of men and women in the forces. The administration of the income tax legislation rests with the Department of National Revenue, but that department says the regulations were drawn up by and presented to it by the Department of National Defence.

The regulations were designed for the convenience of collecting income tax from members of the forces. If a man remains in the forces, and as long as he remains in the forces, the regulations seem to work very satisfactorily. My complaint is that if a man is discharged from the forces at any time during the year he is given no statement of what his income was for that part of the year, nor of the taxes he paid for that part of the year. It is a closed book. He goes back into civilian life for a part of the year. He may get married in the latter part of the year. Were he a civilian he would be entitled to marriage status, but he is not permitted to take his whole year's income. That half or the part of his year's income that was earned in the services is a closed book. He starts over as though he were a different individual altogether. It seems to me as though it would be feasible for anyone who is discharged at any time during the year to be given, as is a private civilian, a statement of his earnings for that part of the year that he was in the forces, and a statement of his deductions so that he may incorporate them when he comes to make up his income tax for the year. And if he has paid more taxes than he should have paid, he would then be able to get a refund on the same basis as the civilian taxpayer. As it is, he cannot. I have given some study to this and I find that the only ones who profit by this practice are the higher paid officers. They may stand to profit by closing up that part of the year in which they were in the services, and starting over again as civilians. The ones who lose in every instance are the privates and the non-commissioned officers and those in the lower ranks. They are the only ones who stand to lose by this regulation. I suggest to the minister that consideration be given to finding ways and means whereby any man being discharged from the forces during the half of the year be given the statement of his income and the taxes paid for that part of the year so that if he desires to do so he can incorporate it and make a return for his entire year's earnings.

Mr. Campney: With respect to the first point raised by the hon. member, I understand that the Department of National Defence, until some years ago, did not give all the details of the civil administration staff as they do at the present time. They now do because it was desired to have this department use the same form of set-up in the estimates as do the other departments.

With regard to the second point in respect of the income tax statements and deductions, I understand that this department worked out the existing income tax regulations in conjunction with the Department of National Revenue, but I shall certainly be glad to look into the observation the hon. member has made. I am not aware that it is so. I am not aware that people who leave the services are not in a position to deal with their income statements and their income tax as in other cases of severance.

Mr. Knowles: Included in the details we are looking at on page 287 is an item listed as "Director of bureau of current affairs." I presume it is that bureau that is responsible for the production of the very interesting series of booklets entitled "Current Affairs for the Canadian Forces." I chose my words advisedly when I referred to this series of booklets as very interesting. I should like to go further and offer my congratulations not only to those who are at the head of this bureau, but to the various writers who have been enlisted to write the different booklets that have been produced. Obviously, I am leading up to a criticism, but for the most part they are well done. Particularly is that the case when the booklet deals with some other country or something entirely apart from Canada. On the whole, I would say a very useful bit of educational work is being done through this series of booklets. In fact, I find them useful to file away. They contain in very brief form very worth while and helpful information. I felt, however, that this one which I hold in my hand, which is volume 6, No. 3, February 1, 1954, did not quite measure up to the standards of other booklets in terms of objectivity. It is entitled "The Canadian Budget." I do not know who wrote it, but it is well set up, in the sense that it is broken down into four general aspects of the problem. The first chapter of the booklet is entitled "What is the budget and why is it important?" The second chapter is entitled "What do you get for your taxes?" The third chapter is entitled "How do you pay for federal services?" The fourth and final chapter is entitled "The budget before parliament."

The first three chapters measure up to the standards of objectivity pretty well, except that I notice interesting comments as to the fairness of the present tax set-up in Canada, with which all hon. members in the House of Commons, and with which all Canadian citizens might not fully agree. However, I was prepared to forgive what I felt to be that lack of fairness, but as I got to chapter 4, which was entitled "The budget before parliament", I thought that this would be a chapter in which it would surely be admitted that the parliament of Canada is not a one-party affair. I thought it might at least be admitted that there were other people in parliament besides those on the government side. Not so, for I found that the story of the budget before parliament, as set out in this booklet, was merely the story of what the Minister of Finance had to say. The reference in this case was to the budget speech of 1953. That was the budget speech about which it was easier to write an interesting story—that was the one just before the election—than would have been the case this year. In any case, the brief summary of the minister's speech is a fair summary. It gives plenty of credit to the minister for the proposals that he made. It points out that he moved that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means to consider his resolutions. At the end it says, and I now quote:

> Thence, concluding his remarks, he summarized the tax changes and moved a series of resolutions to amend the various tax acts.
> The general debate which followed this budget speech took place upon the minister's motion to go into committee.

If my memory serves me correctly, there was an amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood, to which there was a subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. If I recall correctly, there were about a hundred or more speeches made in 1953. Believe it or not, I did not make one that year. I had to be away for part of the time; therefore I have no personal interest in this matter. But it does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that this booklet did not measure up to the others in terms of giving an objective picture of the subject matter on which it was written. Surely it would not hurt our forces to let them know that this is a democracy and that there are opposition parties in this house as well as the party on the government side.

I recall the excellent booklets of a similar nature that were put out during world war II by the wartime information board. As a matter of fact, I still find occasion to quote from some of them. They were very well done, in terms of giving all sides of the subject. I simply make the plea that this bureau, when it writes about Canadian affairs and about things in which there are admittedly political involvements, use the same amount of objectivity that it uses when it writes about the affairs of countries outside of Canada.

Mr. Campney: I thank the hon. member for his general words of approval and approbation. These booklets are proving to be extremely useful. I think the effect of them has been extremely good, and I am glad to realize that the hon. member has the same feeling. On the occasion which his critical eye detected it may have been that the hundred speeches to which the hon. member referred submerged the author's sense of objectivity and led to some minor lapse. Seriously speaking, I do appreciate what the hon. member has said and I can assure him that every attempt will continue to be made to make these articles both factual and entirely objective.

Inspection services.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the subheadings which looks extremely encouraging. The total expenditure is down by about $1,100,000 and the number of employees by about 250. It appears as though some real effort has been made in the inspection services to institute some form of economy, and it is one of the few special items in the entire defence department in which this appears to have been done. I hope that this indeed is the case and that the reduction is a real reduction and has not been accomplished merely by transferring all these people to other departments and thereby building up the expenses under another heading. I wonder if the minister would just comment on that because not only have the number of employees been reduced but all the major items, including professional and special services, travelling and removal expenses—in the latter case a reduction of $500,000—appear to have been cut down. Could the minister tell us whether this has been a real saving?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, I can give the hon. member that assurance. The inspection services, which are now at their post-war peak load, handle contracts amounting to $1,092 million, and with a greater continuity of work and better training it has been possible for about the same number of men to do the job.

Mr. Harkness: I am very glad to hear that, Mr. Chairman, and I would think that what has been accomplished in this particular branch might very well be accomplished in a lot of other administrative branches of national defence, and of the three services as well which are covered by the general administrative item on which we have just concluded a discussion. I hope that when these items come up next year we will see the same sort of reductions in these other administrative branches that we have seen this year in the inspection services.

Royal Canadian Navy—Active force and general.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, during the debate on this topic in May I made some observations in connection with destroyer-escort vessels and the delay there had been in the production of the first of that type of vessel. I also dealt with the very considerable increase in the estimated cost. Speaking during 1951 the minister intimated that the cost of the vessels would be in the neighbourhood of $8 million. I understand that the cost of that vessel has now increased very materially and they have now become extremely expensive. On May 21 the minister indicated that plans were under way for the construction of a ship which would be very much less expensive, easier to build, and which would carry out the same sort of task as that for which the destroyer-escort vessels were to be built. I would like to know what percentage of the $93 million devoted to ships will be included for the completion of the 14 destroyer-escort vessels.

I wish to raise the point again as to whether it is really necessary to go ahead with the completion of these very expensive vessels. I know there is value at certain times in the desire of the armed services to try and get a superlative weapon, and here no doubt we are getting, or are laying plans to get the very best escort vessel in the world. But it is also the most expensive vessel of any of the navies of the world, and I wonder whether we should go on with this particular type if we can get a cheaper vessel which will do the same work.

As I explained on May 20, we are going to need many, many more escort vessels than was first appreciated owing to the increased range and manoeuvrability of the modern torpedo. Again, on May 20 I called to the attention of the minister the fact that the Royal Navy of the United Kingdom is now concentrating its efforts on helicopters for anti-submarine operation, and that these helicopters are being equipped with dipping asdic which will enable them to report on the presence of submarines. There was a short article recently dispatched from Portsmouth, England, in which it was stated that in the exercise which will be carried out this summer by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, naval squadrons in the Mediterranean will operate with helicopters fitted with these dipping asdics for the location of submerged hostile submarines. Of course, the great advantage of the helicopter is that it is not vulnerable to the submarine, whereas the escort vessel, no matter how expensive, is still vulnerable to submarine.

The same article goes on to tell about a new device for locating submarines which will be attached to Fairey Gannets. I think this device is called a sonobuoy and the Fairey Gannets are to replace the Avenger in the Royal Navy. My questions are these. How much of the money allocated for the construction of ships is still earmarked for the completion of the 14 destroyer-escort vessels? Can the minister give us any information regarding these newer and cheaper escort vessels, plans for which he said on May 21 were being considered?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member on several occasions has referred to our shipbuilding and conversion program and perhaps I should say a few words about it now. This program upon which we embarked in 1951 involved the construction of 35 major vessels of five different types, ranging from destroyer-escorts to gate vessels, and 41 auxiliary craft of eight different types. The conversion and rearmament program covered 40 major vessels of six different types, ranging from "Tribal" class destroyers to "Bangors". In a good many instances this conversion was a fairly thorough job. For example, the work on H.M.C.S. Algonquin, which was completed in March 1953, took about one and a quarter million shipfitting man-hours.

It is a major operation to convert these "Tribal" class destroyers into modern escort vessels. This is a sizeable program and must be viewed in relation to Canada's shipbuilding and refitting abilities at that time. Moreover the program had to be fitted into the operation of three ships in the Korean war in which eight destroyers engaged, and that involved a good deal of work and refitting and also a good deal of deployment of especially experienced personnel.

With regard to the new anti-submarine escort vessels, I should draw the attention of the committee again to the fact that our major role at sea in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is anti-submarine work. That is recognized by us all. In fact, that function and coastal defence are our only roles. Our fleet is being built up, renovated, trained and manned for this purpose. Included in the submarine threat to which the Leader of the Opposition and others have referred is, of course, the fact that the Russians have a number of high-speed, long-range submarines. The threat is much greater today than it was at any time in the first or second world wars; that is, the power of the enemy to employ high-speed submarines at long range, for long periods of time, is greater than it ever was in either war.

The number of long-range high-speed submarines the Soviet union has cannot be disclosed. It is still, I am glad to say, relatively small. Our anti-submarine escort vessel is designed as a ship—and it is one of the few ships designed for that purpose—to be able to hunt those high-speed submarines. On that account it must have the very expensive characteristics of great speed, lack of vibration, low noise level, non-magnetic features and the like as well as a very full set of electronic and electrical equipment. It is an extremely complicated and advanced ship. We designed it after co-operation and consultation with the British navy and with expert assistance from civilian firms.

Delays were caused by a number of factors, including the extremely complicated nature of the ship. In the second place, I think was the fact that we rather underestimated the amount of electronic and electrical work of a new character and the great demand that would be made on engineers in those professions, both in the navy and in civilian firms. Then too we had complicated problems of engineering, engine design and the like. However, it was announced that the first of these ships would be launched in 1951, and it was launched in 1951. The first of them to be completed should be completed next year, rather more than a year behind schedule. That is the target, but really the targets were the best guess we could make, in the light of lack of any experience in building a ship of this kind.

The hon. member has referred to the expense of the ship. It has cost a great deal more than was estimated. That fact is partly owing to the increased costs and partly owing to the fact that this equipment is so special and so new and that it takes a great deal of time to fit it into the ship. He spoke about the possibility of dropping the thing now. These are really our front line anti-submarine vessels. It would be an appalling waste to stop them now. We do not propose to build any more of them. These add greatly to our ability to discharge our role under SACLANT in convoying across the south Atlantic. They are counted in with our forces at least at a later stage and we propose to go through with the project. We do not know yet whether they will prove to be as successful as we expect but, from indications, we are very hopeful.

With regard to the construction of another anti-submarine ship of lesser cost, we are proceeding with designs and specifications for such a ship and they ought to be completed next year. We have no intention of entering upon the construction of any such ships until the designs are thoroughly completed, the specifications are drawn up and everything possible done to ready the work. However, it is not yet decided whether or not to proceed with the construction of ships of this new class.

The hon. member referred to helicopters. We have a number of helicopters in the navy. We are forming a group of anti-submarine helicopters this summer—we hope to get delivery of the new helicopters probably in July—and it will form the first anti-submarine helicopter group.

As to sonobuoys, we have been working closely with the British and Americans on this matter. Our new anti-submarine aircraft, the S-2F, like the "Avenger", is designed to use the sonobuoy. I can tell the hon. member that just last week there was a conference here in Ottawa of the representatives of the Royal Navy, the United States navy and the Canadian navy, under our auspices, working on standardization in this field.

Mr. Pearkes: I am not critical of the policy or of the advice that the minister received in 1951. I admit quite frankly that these destroyer-escort vessels seemed to be the answer to the submarine menace in 1951. But since then we have advanced considerably. Not only have we advanced but, as I said before, the range and the manoeuvrability of the torpedoes are matters in which tremendous strides have also been made. While it was a sound policy to start on the building of these destroyer-escort vessels in those days, I now question the advisability of continuing with the construction of this particular type of vessel. We shall have the pilot model commissioned in the near future, but the other vessels are far from being completed. While it may be an appalling waste, as the minister said a few moments ago, to stop construction of this particular type of vessel, if the policy under which these vessels were constructed is now proved to be out of date, I suggest it is going to be an even greater and more appalling waste if we continue to develop all these fourteen vessels only to find, before they are launched —and certainly before they are commissioned—that, because of the advance in the trend in anti-submarine methods, they are obsolete. I know that these trends and changes take place. All too frequently the design of an aircraft, a ship or a gun proves to be out of date before that particular weapon is produced. I do not think anybody is to blame for that. But if it becomes clear that a type of vessel, aircraft or gun is not going to be able to play the role that it was intended it should play when it was first designed several years ago I think it is highly questionable whether it is advisable to continue with the construction of vessels of that type or other things which are not nearing completion at the present time.

Mr. Claxton: I can assure the hon. member that his premise has no foundation whatever. These vessels are not out of date. They are not obsolete. They are not obsolescent except in the sense that every article of military equipment in the long run becomes obsolete. These are the last word. They are being equipped with the most modern and advanced electronic submarine detection devices. They are equipped with the most modern anti-submarine weapons and guns for anti-aircraft work as well as anti-submarine work. It is still fundamental in our concept of anti-submarine warfare that it should be fought by surface vessels and aircraft working together in teams. This is the leading element in this important part of the team. I should also add that both the British and the Americans are proceeding on the same assumption, that we need surface vessels for this operation and that it is a team operation.

They are also proceeding with the construction of ships along these lines. I do not think they are quite as far advanced and I do not think their ships will have quite the performance that ours have. That is our hope, but from the reports I have received we will have the leading vessel of this type at the time necessary to do the job.

Mr. Nicholson: My question involves the navy, army and air force, but perhaps the minister might answer it at this point. Some of my medical friends advise me that with a medical service provided for each of the three services during the war we had a good deal of overlapping. It was difficult to get one set-up at that time but it was their hope that in peacetime it might be possible to have one central organization to provide medical services for all the armed services. However, I note from the telephone directory that we have a medical director general for the navy, a director general of medical services for the army and a director of medical services for the air force. Would the minister indicate what progress is being made with a view to bringing these services together?

In a place like Halifax, for example, an excellent naval hospital was built during the war. It hardly seems necessary that similar hospitals should be available for the army and the air force. With such a shortage of medical doctors in the country I would think we could have a better medical service with fewer personnel if these services were combined. My understanding is that that was achieved some time ago in connection with the dental services. Could the minister indicate the number of medical officers we now have for the navy, army and air force and also what progress is being made with respect to combining the services?

Mr. Claxton: I have not the figures of the medical personnel gathered together for the three services, but I can give that to the hon. member later. As to the elimination of duplication, that has been our aim since the reorganization began in 1946 and 1947. At times we have considered amalgamating the three medical services but on further reconsideration it did not seem that any great economy would be effected, and that a great deal would be lost in the way of tradition, pride of service and the like. However, we have eliminated all duplication that has been found. For example, the naval hospital at H.M.C.S. Stadacona in Halifax looks after army and air force personnel. Similarly, the air force hospital at Rockcliffe looks after navy and army personnel. The army hospital at Winnipeg looks after personnel of all three services. In this tri-service operation as between the services there is no paper work, payments backwards and forwards, forms and so on.

All three services have common medical practices. They have a single medical stores which is run by the army and a single dental service which is operated by the army. To further effect co-ordination we have recently set up a civilian committee called the armed forces medical council with Dr. J. A. MacFarlane, dean of the faculty of medicine of the University of Toronto, as chairman. He devotes a great deal of his time to this matter. The other members are Dr. G. E. Hall, president of Western Ontario University, Dr. Mathieu Samson of Quebec and Laval University and Dr. W. C. Mackenzie of Edmonton. They are a very outstanding group. They have made a report on this and other subjects and are now carrying it through with the full co-operation of the armed forces. Acting as full-time secretary of this council is Brigadier Crawford, who is deputy director general of medical services of the army.

One of the main objectives of this activity is to eliminate duplication. We now think we are getting to the place where we will have enough doctors for the three services. We are still short, but with the recruits from abroad, whom we are continuing to get from the British Isles, and others brought in through university plans we should be able in time to overtake this deficiency, although it is still considerable.

Mr. Bell: I should like to refer to the matter of seaward defences. We learn from the white paper that installations have been made at Halifax and also that plans are going ahead at St. John's, Newfoundland and Esquimalt. I believe that Sydney also comes under present plans. I am interested in the position of Saint John, New Brunswick, so far as seaward defence plans are concerned. We in Saint John have always felt that we were in a fairly strategic position. We have a drydock there, and it is the largest manufacturing city in the maritimes. It has also been understood that if any sort of concerted attack were to be made on the maritimes it would be natural that the enemy forces would come to Saint John. Perhaps they would cut off Nova Scotia at the neck of land between the two provinces. I am interested in hearing from the minister whether the plans of the first and second wars have been changed in the light of present warfare, or are we still to be included in these necessary defences on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. Claxton: Seaward defences are being constructed at the places we consider to be the most vulnerable. I should point out that even if you have seaward defences fully constructed it takes some hours to put in the installation. The nets, booms and buoys deteriorate rapidly if left in sea water. The state of readiness in any event is relative. We are getting equipment. At Saint John equipment will be made available out of funds that are provided in these estimates, but it is not our present intention to make a permanent installation there for the reason I have stated. In addition, we have finished the program of construction of gate vessels.

Mr. Bell: May I ask the minister if he does not think that Saint John is just as important as Sydney or St. John's, Newfoundland?

Mr. Claxton: It is not nearly as exposed.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister comment on my remark that Saint John is in a vulnerable position due to the fact that an enemy could cut off Nova Scotia at the neck. That has always been our impression. There were submarines in the bay of Fundy in the last war, and I never heard of any actually creating any danger to Halifax harbour.

Mr. Claxton: Sydney is designed for seaward defence now because that is where we have our whole reserve fleet in storage.

There are now something like twenty odd vessels. I am informed there will be a total of twenty-nine. It also will be our secondary base on the Atlantic for naval operations; so that it requires special treatment and will be regarded as particularly liable to attack; both for those reasons and on account of its location. Saint John does not fall within that category and the question of vulnerability is a relative one. We have to do the most vulnerable things first.

Mr. Bell: May I ask the minister if he does not think Saint John will be of increasing importance because it will be a seaport for the new army camp?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, I quite agree.

Mr. Bell: May I ask that serious consideration be given this matter of Saint John because we feel we are being overlooked in this respect?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Earlier this year the Department of Public Works called for tenders for the construction of a new naval dock in Esquimalt harbour. The newspapers at the time said that this was connected with the seaward defence of Esquimalt harbour. At Easter the tenders were all returned to the various engineering firms that had submitted tenders. Is it the intention of the department to go ahead with the construction of this new wharf? If so, what was the reason for suddenly cancelling the tenders and returning them to the firms concerned?

Mr. Campney: The jetty at Esquimalt to which the hon. member refers was undertaken as part of our seaward defence, and was designed and to be constructed by the Department of Public Works as our agent. The designs were completed and tenders called, but further studies of the harbour and the nature of the bottom of the harbour led to some doubt as to whether the present design would be suitable. Some further investigations were made and it was decided to redesign, in part at least, this jetty. The jetty will be built as proposed, but it will be delayed for some time until these designs have been drawn to the satisfaction of the Department of Public Works and ourselves.

Mr. Pearkes: I want to ask a question under this heading in connection with the supply of naval fuel. I put a question on the order paper the other day, and was surprised upon seeing the answer to find that bunker fuel and diesel oil fuel was being supplied from foreign crude oil, and then it was being delivered direct to Esquimalt by tankers coming from California. While I imagine that the source from which this oil is obtained may be a question to be answered by the Minister of Defence Production, I should like to know what is to be the future of H.M.C.S. Dundurn, which is a Canadian naval tanker on the Pacific coast. Are we going to allow that tanker to remain idle in Esquimalt harbour or what is its future?

If we are having oil delivered from foreign sources instead of from Canadian sources in Vancouver where the Dundurn would be able to move the fuel from Vancouver to Esquimalt, I wonder what is the future for that vessel. I intend to ask the Minister of Defence Production about the source of supply. It seems an extraordinary thing that we should build a pipe line from Alberta to Vancouver, and then have the government turn around and buy this oil direct from California.

Mr. Campney: As regards the source of the fuel oil for naval vessels in Esquimalt, I understand we did not specify the source, but merely gave the specifications and the Department of Defence Production made the purchase.

With regard to the Dundurn, I understand that she is used in the harbour for fuelling the larger ships instead of sending them to the jetty. She is not generally used to transport oil from Vancouver or other sources. I understand if oil is purchased from Vancouver, it is delivered by the tanker of the company which sells the oil.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the future of the Dundurn assured then?

Mr. Campney: Yes, she will continue as at present.

Mr. Harkness: It seems to me extremely regrettable, after this pipe line was built from Alberta to the Pacific coast with defence as one objective, that the government buys oil from foreign sources. The pipe line was built to obviate the long and hazardous route which this oil would follow from the Middle East. Just after the pipe line had been in operation a short time the Department of National Defence starts buying oil from foreign sources, thus increasing the difficulty this pipe line has been meeting in any event due to a tanker war. This war has made it possible to deliver Middle Eastern oil at a cost slightly below that delivered from Alberta. The situation is not going to continue very long, I understand, but I say it is regrettable and it is not in the interests of Canada generally, including defence policy, to use these other sources which would not be available in time of war. We should patronize our home industry and particularly this pipe line.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we pass on to the next heading?

Mr. Harkness: No. Under this particular heading I note that the total number of employees has increased. The cost of these employees has increased some $4·5 million. I would have thought that the same thing could have been done in this branch of the department as was done in the inspection branch. The number of these civilian employees might have been reduced or at any rate might have been held to the same level instead of being increased by a little more than 12 per cent over last year. I am not going to go into the numerous cases in which those increases have taken place, but I should like to call attention to one or two instances that I believe are completely unjustified.

According to the details on page 294 the total number of clerks of various classes is going to be increased and this year will be 1,651 compared with 1,335 for last year or an increase of 316 clerks. Now, surely all that indicates is a great multiplication of the paper work. This is the very thing we have been complaining about for so long and the minister agreed that it should be cut down. Here we find one of the surest means of increasing it, a very large increase in the number of clerks. It is extremely difficult for me to see how an increase of that sort is jusified.

Then the only other item I will mention is mess men. The number is increased from 44 to 130. I presume these are the men who wait on the troops at dinner and things of that sort. It is difficult also to understand why there should be an increase from 44 to 130, three times as many mess boys in one year. From those two examples, and the general 12 per cent increase in personnel, it does not appear that any effort has been made to economize so far as civilian personnel are concerned. The total increase in personnel in the navy is not going to be very great and it does not seem to me to justify anything like this large increase in the number of civilian and administrative personnel.

Mr. Campney: As is obvious, I suggest, from information given the house thus far, the navy is increasing the number of ships and the number of servicing stations necessary to service those ships. This increase of personnel, amounting, roughly, to a thousand—

Mr. Harkness: Is the associate minister referring to civilian personnel?

Mr. Campney: Naval personnel.

Mr. Harkness: But I am not talking about naval personnel; I am talking about civilians. The increase is over 1,200.

Mr. Campney: I was going to give information as to the civilians.

Mr. Harkness: Under the naval branch?

Mr. Campney: Yes. The increase in civilian personnel which will be required during the present year is made up of approximately 200 people who are now manning the principal stores depot at Montreal, which was recently put into operation for all naval supplies; over 100 who will be required in the maintenance of ships in inactive reserve at Sydney—security, fire and various servicing activities; something over 100 in Ottawa, at headquarters, to meet the needs of the increasing expansion and about 300 each on the east coast and a similar number on the west coast in the dockyards, stores departments, armament depots, and in the magazines which either have been or are being constructed and put into operation to serve the fleet, as it increases in number.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has not met my criticism, I am sorry to say. I do not want to take up more time, but I would refer to it in this way: A department store, for example, may have 500 employees and is doing $5 million worth of business. If the number of customers increases, and the value of the business also increases, we will say to $7 million or something like that, they do not have to have a very great increase in the number of clerks in the store. In other words once you have your basic set-up in an organization you can handle quite a bit more business without any great increase in staff.

In other words, my general criticism is that the number of personnel is increasing every year. If this happened in only one year it would be a different matter; but it is going up, up, up, up every year. Here we have another increase from last year, when it had already built up to 10,000 people.

Furthermore, what the minister has said does not explain this increase. For instance, a quarter of the total increase is made up of about 300 clerks. What he said does not meet my general criticism and does not explain why there should be this great increase in the number of clerks, people who handle paper.

Mr. Campney: Well, I mentioned a moment ago that the navy is increasing quite rapidly. Naturally once a ship is in commission we must take care of its contracts and all its day to day activities. There is office work in connection with that, and also more work in the servicing departments—armament depots, ammunition stores, etc. Naturally the staff will increase slightly each year until we reach a fixed position in the navy. I suggest that is obvious. First of all we must have a substantial nucleus to serve the navy generally, and then we have all these specific services to meet the needs of ships individually and collectively as they become more numerous on our east and west coasts.

Mr. Harkness: The fact that the number is increasing like this—and there can be no doubt about it—indicates that there is not proper control being exercised and no real effort being made to hold down these administrative expenses. I am very concerned about this matter, and have been for some time. We have been told what was accomplished in the inspection branch, in spite of the fact that the work of that branch, as the minister said, is now at its peak. In spite of that, the number of people employed has been greatly reduced. I am only too glad to give credit to the department for having accomplished this. I have already complimented them upon it, and I will do it again. But having been able to accomplish this in the inspection branch when things were at a peak, I cannot see any reason at all for this very large increase in civilian employees generally of the navy. And I refer particularly to this terrific increase in the number of clerks.

Mr. Campney: I might say that it has always been the practice of the navy to operate all their shore establishments with civilians. In connection with the big naval stores depot at La Salle, brought into service not many months ago, I might mention there are 400 civilians employed there, and probably only six or eight naval personnel. It is the practice of the navy to operate their shore establishments to a great extent with civilians. As the requirements become greater and as the fleet grows this will be reflected in the increased number of civilian employees.

Mr. Harkness: Why is it necessary to have 300 more clerks? This general talk about building up the navy does not answer my question at all; it does not get to the nub of the matter. Why is it necessary to have an increase of 316 clerks? That is about 25 per cent in one year.

Mr. Campney: Depots consist mostly of clerks for servicing and accounting.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: But the depots have been there right along.

Mr. Campney: No, some of them have been enlarged and some have just been built. At least one armament depot has just come into use. I am trying to say to my hon. friend that these servicing establishments on both coasts, and in various parts of the country—at least some of them—are just coming into commission now. Some have had to be enlarged.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions, and they apply equally to all three services. Perhaps the minister in replying could answer with that in mind, and save duplication. My first question relates to automatic punch card machines which are used for personnel records. Are they owned by the department, or are they rented? If they are rented, are they all rented from the same source? If so, what is the rental?

Mr. Claxton: Subject to some exceptions, I believe generally they are rented, and obtained from three sources: International Business Machines, National Cash Register and Burroughs.

Mr. MacLean: Then in connection with travelling and removal expenses in the case of postings overseas to Europe: I have had complaints from servicemen going to Europe that there is a wide discrepancy in the standard of accommodation supplied to various personnel of equal rank in equal circumstances. What standards are required of the shipping companies, or whoever supplies this accommodation, when troops are being posted either to or from Europe?

Mr. Claxton: The question of transportation is almost entirely army and air force, which we have not reached yet. We shall get it for you and answer it later. The entitlement for all three services is on a uniform basis. While standards are laid down uniformly, inevitably the type of accommodation, and sometimes transportation, depends on availability. If we were to wait until the wives and children all got the same they might be disappointed in not getting there. Therefore it is sometimes better to take poorer accommodation in order to get them together just as soon as possible. It is largely a question of availability.

Mr. MacLean: I presume some minimum standards are required.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. MacLean: At the bottom of page 298 there is an item "Major procurement of equipment". Ships, aircraft, engines and so on are mentioned. Aircraft and engines are up from roughly $1,500,000 to $23,500,000 in round figures. Can the minister put something on the record with regard to the replacement program of naval aircraft?

Mr. Claxton: This is a very fair proportion of the total cost of getting new suit of aircraft for the Magnificent's successor, H.M.C.S. Bonaventure. We are replacing the Avengers with the S-2F aircraft and we are replacing Sea Furies by jet Banshees. Most of these have been purchased. We are also buying a considerable number of helicopters. That accounts for the cost.

Mr. MacLean: In the case of removal and travelling expenses for civilians, I notice the item is down considerably from $750,000 to $498,000. My question is not with regard to the amount. I take it that civilians are generally speaking locally employed. What are the circumstances under which it is necessary to post civilians who are employed in the service from one area to another, and therefore require removal expenses?

Mr. Claxton: Transportation allowances are provided for civilians employed in outlying districts, and also some provision is made for transportation of children of service personnel to schools. But generally speaking what the hon. member says is correct. There are no large movements of civilian personnel from place to place, but there is a considerable removal of supervisory personnel. Some of the naval magazines and depots are not close to major centres. One thinks of some of the wireless stations, Renous, depots in New Brunswick, and there are three ammunition dumps or depots in British Columbia. This also includes a considerable amount for reallocation of personnel consequent on the establishment of the new naval depot at La Salle, near Montreal.

Mr. Harkness: The general picture presented here is somewhat interesting. The total amount to be expended this year is just $5 million more than the amount that was expended last year, and, as I pointed out before, this is the same amount as the increase in the cost of civilian personnel this year amounts to. Apart from this increase in the cost of civilian personnel there will be no increase by and large as far as the cost of the navy is concerned. We find an item of $23,500,000 this year; whereas last year it was only $1½ million for aircraft and engines which my colleague has just been talking about; which means that some $22 million at least has been pared off the other items. I notice it has come chiefly off the other items which are important as far as a fighting navy is concerned; that is, the things that they fight with. For example, signal and wireless equipment are down nearly $7 million. Armament equipment, guns and so forth are down $4 million. The ships are down $1 million. Then we find that ammunition and bombs are down nearly $8,500,000. Therefore, some of the other items which are not fighting items, you might say, are up. It would appear that the items for the navy this year, that is, items of fighting equipment such as bombs, ammunition, guns and so forth are all down really very materially. Can the minister explain why that is? It is all right to build up all these big civilian staffs, and so on, but when it actually comes to the navy doing the work for which we maintain it, the important things for them to have are ships, guns, planes, ammunition and so forth, to run them. As I say, it appears from this that these are the very things by and large in which there has been quite a large reduction. Non-essential items have gone up.

Mr. Claxton: It is explained to me that in the case of those items of fighting equipment that the hon. member mentions, the changes are owing to different changes in the time of placing and getting delivery of contracts. We have got ammunition; we need lots of it. We have got electronics; we need lots of that. I am only mentioning these as illustrations. The hon. member did not mention clothing and personnel equipment which is down from $7 million to $2,500,000. That is because we were able to get quite a considerable proportion of these so-called "soft" things, and they are on hand. There is no particular significance in this except I should tell the hon. member that the navy and the other two services work out, through their chiefs of staffs, with the deputy minister and others the proportion of the defence dollar that is allotted to them, and then they have to divide that year's money so as best to carry out the program and keep that phase together. Therefore next year it may be that some of this no doubt will be up again.

Mr. Harkness: Just one comment—

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

---

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing the item under the Royal Canadian Navy—active force and general. Is this discussion concluded?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman, I had just risen in order to make a brief comment on what the minister said in reply to the very brief observation I had made that the total cost for the navy is up by some $5 million and that that is accounted for almost entirely by the increase in civilian personnel. I asked why it was that there had been considerable reductions in the fighting equipment for the navy.

Without going into the minister's reply I would like to comment that I think this is a good example of the fact that the expenditure of more money does not necessarily mean we are getting more defence. In spite of the fact that we are spending more money under this particular heading the actual amount being spent for ships, guns, and other things which make the navy an effective fighting force is being reduced, and unfortunately I believe that has been the situation for quite a number of years in most of the branches of the department. One of the chief arguments we have advanced here over the last four or five years was that that was what was actually happening, and that the very large sums of money which have been spent have not produced for us the fighting force to which we are entitled for the large amount of money expended.

Mr. Gillis: I would like to get some idea from the minister as to what kind of machinery exists between the defence purchasing department and the Department of National Defence. Defence purchasing in Canada means quite a lot of employment in Canada, and I would like to give a case in point. There is a large naval base at Sydney, Nova Scotia, and in that area about one mile from the base there is a large wire and nail mill. At the present time there is a bad unemployment problem there. Last November I found that large shipments of nails brought from Hamilton, Ontario, were being used at that naval base at a time when nails were being manufactured in that area and when half the men in that factory were unemployed. I was just wondering where the economy is obtained by purchasing nails for the Department of National Defence in Hamilton, Ontario, and shipping them 1,400 miles for use in a spot where there is a nail mill in operation working half time.

I would like the Minister of National Defence or the associate minister to give me an explanation about this because it is pretty poor planning. It may be bad salesmanship on the part of the company which manufactures these nails, but if it is I would like to know. I know for a fact that many kegs of these nails come from Hamilton because I not only looked at them myself but I took one of the covers with me in order to make sure I would have the evidence if I was questioned. If this is the kind of way in which materials are purchased, without regard to employment conditions in the area, and regardless of the fact that you can obtain the materials cheaper and at the same time assist that area in the matter of employment, then I think there is poor planning somewhere between the Department of National Defence and the defence purchasing department.

Mr. Campney: I wonder if the hon. member could tell me whether the nails he mentioned were obtained from a contractor or were being used by the navy.

Mr. Gillis: I do not know for certain. The base is a naval base and it is under the Department of National Defence. I do not know whether a contractor purchased these nails but in any case that contract would be let by the Department of National Defence and I think there should be some understanding when letting these contracts that the materials that are available in the area in which the work is being carried on should be given first priority, other things being equal. I thought it looked pretty bad to see a nail mill working half time while a project which was under national defence was using nails they had dragged 1,400 miles across the country which would bear the additional burden of freight. I think it adds up to poor salesmanship somewhere.

Mr. Campney: It is my understanding that as regards the procurement of goods for the Department of National Defence by the Department of Defence Production we prepare a specification for the required goods and we make what is called a contract demand on the Department of Defence Production. That department is then charged with the responsibility of procuring these materials, having regard to the specification, price, delivery terms, and so on. Procurement of the goods having been completed, we then inspect them, accept them and pay for them. Under those circumstances I presume there are a number of considerations which actuate my colleague, the Minister of Defence Production, in securing the goods for which we have made a contract demand. The only variation there might be with regard to this particular case, and of course I am not aware of all the facts, is that we might have sent nails to our own naval base from some of our stores at some point or other for use by the navy. That might have happened, but generally speaking

I think the procedure is as I have outlined it, subject to anything my colleague might say on the matter.

Mr. Gillis: When the estimates for the Department of Defence Production come up I hope I will be able to get a run-down answer to this question.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult for a layman to venture into the field of questioning military expenditures, but I think even a layman is entitled to ask a question about civilian expenditure. I am coming back to the matter the hon. member for Calgary North has already ventilated and to be found in the details at page 298. I note there is between $4 million and $5 million apparently additional on the civilian part of the staff. That seems to me a lot of money. We think it is a lot of money in Greenwood. I would like to ask the minister what steps are taken to satisfy the department that those men are needed.

I heard of one industrialist who approached his staff with a very crude and simple test. He divided his staff into those that produced and those that did not produce. The only producers in his mind were the people who produced the things that you could handle. He regarded all his office staff as non-producers and he was accordingly critical of them. In the same way it seems to me that as laymen we are entitled to be extremely inquisitive and curious about the civilian staff. This businessman I speak of is reported to have been made the head of a certain company and to have begun by firing all the clerical staff and then taking them back one by one as they were proved to be needed. That is a crude illustration of what I have in mind. In any event it is a crude illustration of the feeling one has in surveying a military establishment, with all the civilians that are in it.

Even those of us whose experience of war is not as recent as it might be can remember the scornful way in which we used to talk of the paper war and speak of all the people who never got outside of the office and who were on lines of communication. Now in peacetime I suppose you not only have those people but you have out-and-out civilians.

I want to ask the minister this question. I have raised it before. It is not new. In some departments recourse has been had to people whose business is organizing efficiency. I should like to ask the minister whether any recourse has been had to efficiency experts in this instance? They have been used in certain departments. At one time when I raised this question I was told that such assistance was not used in large organizations in civilian life but only in small ones. That statement is manifestly wrong. Actually they are used more in larger undertakings than in smaller ones. I should like to ask the minister whether, if that is something that has not been done, it will be done. It seems to me that the onus is absolutely on the department, when they come along with between $4 million and $5 million for additional civilian assistance, to explain why. If any other department came in here with $4 million additional for clerical assistance, I think we would be absolutely outraged. I realize that the military establishment is huge. It may be that if we knew all about it we would be satisfied. But that item of nearly $5 million raises a big question in my mind.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I would repeat first just briefly what I observed when this matter was raised by the hon. member for Calgary North. First, the naval establishment ashore is primarily and almost entirely civilian. As the navy grows and the shore establishment grows, naturally the civilian component of the shore establishment increases. I am informed that when a branch which has been established or which has increased its facilities wishes to have new personnel to meet that need, that branch makes an application to the naval complement committee at headquarters who as specialists review the applications carefully. If it is approved by the naval complement committee—and only to that extent because the committee has powers and facilities to investigate and if necessary to reduce the numbers required—the requirement then goes to the civil service commission. The commission also has its own methods of investigation and of satisfying itself as to the need. When the application has survived those two reviews—if it has; I refer to the need of the branch as set forth in the requirement—it goes to treasury board. From my experience serving on treasury board that body is not in any sense a rubber stamp. It also has its own methods of investigation both here and at other places. It is only when treasury board has approved the setting up of an additional civilian position or a number of positions to meet an established need in a certain place that those positions are filled.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am still left with this basic question. The minister has mentioned this naval committee. As I understand it, these additional requirements are first of all endorsed and approved by what the minister called a naval committee. What would be the personnel of that committee? Is it composed of naval officers?

Mr. Campney: It is a joint committee composed of navy officers and civilians in the department.

Mr. Macdonnell: No one has more respect than I have for naval officers but I do not imagine that naval officers have spent much of their time in being trained for office management. At any rate I would hope that they have not. I would hope that sea duties are what they have been trained in. It is therefore all very well for the minister to say that this matter goes to two or three bodies, each of which scrutinizes it, including the civil service commission and the treasury board. I know the treasury board is always held up as being a most formidable body, and I have no doubt that it is. Nevertheless, if the thing gets a bad start—if you have the original recommendation made without the thorough scrutiny which I am asking for, if indeed it is not being made now—if you get it started without a proper scrutiny, it seems to me that from then on everyone else is beaten. They are not going to send down and make an entirely new investigation of the duties. Surely the civil service commission is not going to do it all over again and treasury board is not going to do it all over again. I am not quite sure whether the minister is differing with me or whether he is going to say that they do that, but I still feel uneasy and that somehow or other this matter is not getting the scrutiny that it should get.

Mr. Campney: I might just point out to the hon. member that it has just been brought to my attention that very recently, as a result of a survey by the naval complement committee, over 80 applications were turned down. I think this committee is a thoroughgoing and rigorous committee. Any application must pass that committee before it even goes to the civil service commission, much less the treasury board. I am informed that the naval complement committee is extremely strict and looks into the situation most thoroughly.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have one final question, or at least I hope it is final. The minister said that the increased staff on shore had to take care of increased personnel and increased units afloat, if I understood him correctly. Can he indicate what, in the last year, has been the increase of the service personnel as distinct from the administrative? When I say "service" I mean really "service".

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Campney: As between March 31, 1953, to March 31, 1954, in the naval strength there was an increase of practically 1,500.

Mr. Macdonnell: What percentage is that? I do not want the total. What would that be in percentage?

Mr. Campney: From 15,546 on March 31, 1953, to 16,955 on March 31, 1954.

Mr. Pearkes: What is the civilian increase?

Mr. Harkness: The civilian increase was nearly 1,200.

Mr. Campney: That is naval personnel.

The Chairman: Shall I pass on to Royal Canadian Naval Reserve?

Mr. Macdonnell: Just a minute. This is very interesting. My understanding is there has been an increase of about 1,200 in the civilian personnel and 1,500 in the service personnel. Am I correct? There again there may be things which I do not understand which will make it clear, but it is very unconvincing to me that to look after the needs of additional service personnel you need almost man for man to look after the administrative duties. I would have thought that the various branches would have been set up and that one man ashore could somehow or other do a little more than look after a man and a quarter afloat.

Mr. Campney: I mentioned several reasons this afternoon why the total number of civilian personnel has increased. For example, we have opened a very large and extensive stores depot at La Salle which has necessitated 200 more personnel. We have extended our facilities at Sydney where the inactive reserve of the fleet is being stored. This has led to the necessity of security and fire protection personnel, dehumidifying plants and various other services which account for about 100 personnel. We have had to create about 300 new positions on each coast due to the establishment of new armament depots, stores depots, new and larger magazines, and various other installations to serve the growing fleet on each of these coasts. These developments have made necessary an increase of something over 100 personnel at headquarters. These increases make up approximately the figure the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. Pearkes: What is the total number of civilians employed with the navy?

Mr. Campney: As of April 30, 1954, the total number of civilians employed by the navy was 11,559.

Mr. Harkness: That does not include dockyard workers.

Mr. Campney: I understand it does.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on now to the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve?

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to leave this request with the minister, and I am not asking him to accept or reject it now. I ask that some outside scrutiny be introduced within the next year to make a report on the tens of thousands of civilians working for the armed services.

Royal Canadian Naval Reserve.

Mr. Harkness: I note that the number of people on the permanent staff has approximately doubled, from 94 to 184, but the pay and allowances for the coming year will be just under $2½ million whereas last year they were $3 million. In other words, apparently it is anticipated that the number of people in the reserve will be fewer than last year because the pay and allowances are considerably less, but the regular staff has increased. Would the minister explain that inconsistency?

Mr. Campney: I understand that the difference arises from the fact that while it was estimated last year that the pay and allowances would be $3 million, we actually spent $1,719,000. In making the estimate for this year, and allowing for the expectation of some increase, the figure was reduced to $2,499,000.

Mr. Harkness: I take it from that that the naval reserve was very much weaker last year than it was anticipated it would be, that the numbers fell off considerably. Can the minister tell us what the situation is at the present time in that regard and whether the department thinks there is any possibility of there being a sufficient number of people to use up anything like this $2½ million for pay and allowances?

Mr. Campney: All I can say is that we overestimated last year, and the estimate this year has been made as realistic, in the light of all the facts, as we can made it.

Mr. Harkness: Is it correct, as would seem to be the case from the minister's answers, that the number of people in the naval reserve fell very considerably last year? It must have because the amount of pay and allowances used was only half what was estimated would be needed.

Mr. Campney: It did not fall; it did not grow as rapidly as we had hoped.

The Chairman: Royal Canadian Sea Cadets? If there are no questions we will pass on to Canadian army, active force and general.

Canadian Army—Active force and general.

Mr. Churchill: I have several questions to ask but I will start with an easy one so that we will get into the army picture. My first question concerns the size of our force in Korea compared with the size of our force in northwest Europe. In view of the minister's statement this afternoon with respect to brigade groups, could we have the picture clearly as to those two forces? I understand that in Korea we have an infantry brigade incorporated within the commonwealth division. In Europe we have an infantry brigade group able to operate independently. In the words of the minister, I think he said at one time it was almost a small division. My question is what is the difference in the number of personnel as between these two formations?

My second question is this. Has the infantry brigade incorporated within the commonwealth division in Korea been able to function to the satisfaction of that division and the Department of National Defence? Then I come to my third question, and I do not want to labour this point. If the infantry brigade incorporated within the commonwealth division has been found a satisfactory answer to some of our commitments abroad, could not an armoured brigade incorporated within a British armoured division perhaps be the answer to this problem of the armoured corps?

Mr. Claxton: In answer to the hon. member's questions, I can say that the British have two armoured divisions in Germany and they have none in Korea. In Korea we have operated exceedingly happily with the commonwealth division. It has worked out very well. They were all infantry with a component of armour. But in Europe the British formations are organized as divisions, and it would be very difficult indeed to integrate an armoured brigade group into one of their divisions. I am advised it could not be done, that it would have to be an extra unit and it would have to have the extra supporting services that I referred to before.

Mr. Churchill: Are the figures available with regard to the difference in size of these forces?

Mr. Claxton: They are very much the same.

Mr. Churchill: My other question has to do with the rifle. Some time earlier in the house I asked a number of questions concerning the adoption by Canada of the Belgian rifle, which has been adopted as the standard infantry weapon for the United Kingdom. The minister's reply to this question indicated that tests were being conducted in Canada of the FN rifle, and that if they were satisfactory an announcement would be made in due course. Is the minister prepared to give us a full statement now with regard to this question of the rifle?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, to bring the house up to date I may say that the Belgian FN rifle has been adopted by the British army, and they are obtaining some quantities for further trial and testing. We have not yet decided to adopt the rifle. We are subjecting it to further tests. We have placed an order for a number that are being delivered to us. Simultaneously the United States have had some FN rifles which they have subjected to Arctic trials, and trials under northern conditions. As a consequence of this, I think some modifications will have to be made.

In the meanwhile our role in the picture is that we are, through Canadian Arsenals Limited, arriving at engineering designs and production designs and specifications for the production of the rifle according to the standards that have been agreed upon by the British, Canadian and United States teams. This work is being pushed by the Department of Defence Production through Canadian Arsenals Limited. If it were decided to go ahead with the production of the rifle, there will be no delay in connection with the work. In that connection work is being pressed forward in the production of drawings, designs and engineering specifications. We are getting rifles from Belgium for that purpose. My colleague the Minister of Defence Production has had officers in Belgium working with Canadian army officers and with Fabrique Nationale, the original producer of this rifle. The work is progressing satisfactorily.

How soon it will be possible to announce the final results, I do not know because it will depend on the tests. We have been very anxious in this not to get too far ahead of any country in the decision to adopt the rifle. We have been very anxious indeed that Great Britain, the United States, France, Belgium and ourselves should adopt the rifle as standard, and we have done everything possible to that end. The discussions started really in 1946 in what is called the A.B.C. committee, composed of United States, Britain and Canada and in April 1951 these considerations seemed to be getting nowhere, when the British announced their intention to go ahead with their own rifle, the EM. I made an appeal, which I think has been reported to this house, to the then minister of defence in Britain and the secretary of defence in the United States, that we should meet once more at the ministerial level with very high ranking officers and have another look at the matter.

I am glad to say the meeting took place in Washington on the first and second of August, 1951. Since then we have been working progressively towards a solution of that very desirable objective, the adoption of a common rifle. In the meantime, however, we have agreed on a common round; that was announced by me at the meeting we had in Paris of the North Atlantic council in December. This work is also proceeding. The experts met in Quebec and Ottawa, and arrived at the final specifications for the round. Those were agreed to and the round has now been agreed upon. While it has been a long struggle, I am happy to say we are making considerable progress. I believe we will arrive, not only at a uniform round but also a uniform rifle.

Mr. Churchill: There are some circumstances in regard to the question of the rifle which I think need clarification. There was a debate in the British House of Commons some time ago in connection with the decision there to adopt the Belgian FN rifle, whereas earlier the British government of that period until 1951 had decided the British EM2 rifle was the most satisfactory weapon. The adoption of a rifle is an important matter. The Lee Enfield rifle, which has been the standard rifle for over 50 years now, is an indication of the length of life that may be expected of a rifle used in the army. When the time comes to adopt a new type of rifle, the greatest care is necessary to ensure that it is the most satisfactory.

After the conclusion of the second world war the British, as I understand from reading accounts, asked for a new rifle which would be automatic or semi-automatic and which would be, if possible, shorter and lighter than the Lee Enfield. From that point inquiries have been made and studies made in order to arrive at the type of rifle that would be most suitable for modern requirements. Modern requirements seem to point to the use of a rifle which is automatic, shorter and lighter. The result at the moment is that the Belgian FN rifle does not meet all these requirements. In some respects it does not seem to be the equal of the British EM2 rifle.

My concern about this was aroused by reading certain accounts as to Canada's position in the matter. I believe Canada's position is quite clear with regard to the standardization of the round, now standardized at ·30. I think there could be no dispute about that at all, and that is a major advancement. The NATO countries have agreed to use the same type of ammunition. Our record does not seem to me to be quite so clear with regard to the rifle. We appear to have adopted a negative attitude in so far as that was concerned.

I notice reports from the British House of Commons regarding the Canadian stand on the rifle, and accounts in the press, which seemed to indicate that if our representatives had taken a definite stand the British EM2 rifle would have been selected. For example in the House of Commons at Westminster on February 1, 1954, during the debate on the adoption of the rifle, Canada came into the picture on several occasions. The discussion is found at page 55 of the British Hansard for that date. The subject was mentioned by the prime minister and then Mr. Shinwell had this to say:

> The position of the United States was as the right hon. gentleman has stated, the position of France was that she had no opinion at all, and the position of Canada was as stated by the then, and, I think, present minister of defence, Mr. Brooke Claxton, that he was quite unconcerned about the size of the round or the type of rifle as long as Canada had the opportunity of producing whatever rifle or whatever round was decided upon.

And then at page 93 Mr. Shinwell, in answer to some further point in the debate, has this to say:

> Where does standardization come in? The French have not expressed their willingness to accept it. What about Canada? The prime minister talked about Canada and I said in an interjection that I had had discussions with Brooke Claxton, the minister of defence. He said to me, "I am not going to take sides. What we are concerned about is who is going to produce the rifle and the round."

Then at page 97 Mr. Head, speaking for the government, said this:

> The point is that Canada has stated that for her government to manufacture a rifle which has been turned down by the United States would be a course which they could not accept.

That seems to indicate that the Canadian position has been that of a person on the sidelines, and in a measure unconcerned with regard to the type of rifle which might be placed in the hands of Canadian troops. It would indicate that rightly, and naturally, Canada was interested in the standardization process, and still more interested in the matter of production—and not without reason, because the British look to the American continent for the production of rifles.

Nevertheless I think Canada's position is a bit weak in this, when we seem not to have put forward our own view with regard to the type of rifle that would be most useful and suitable for our infantry. And that is the point that bothers me. Why could we not determine and make our choice among the various types of rifles that are available—the Belgian FN, the British EM2, the modifications of the Garand that are being carried on in the United States, and perhaps others. Canadians are as familiar as any soldiers in the world with the type of rifle that would be most suitable for modern warfare. I discussed with a brigade commander who had a long and honourable career in the second world war in northwestern Europe and he told me that at one stage during the course of the conflict he was attempting to get his entire infantry component of the brigade equipped with a carbine, or a Sten gun, or a Thompson submachine gun, rather than the Lee Enfield rifle. The reason was that, in the type of attack they were carrying on, with so much night action, the shorter weapon, and the automatic weapon, was what was desirable. He failed to achieve his object. I asked him what would be his suggestion at the present time, and he said, "By all means something that is short and light and automatic".

Now, it is the opinion of fighting troops that that is essential in this matter. Too frequently, in such experiences as I have had, decisions are made by people who have not actually used weapons in the field. What I wonder is whether we have made a complete study of the rifle we have adopted now, which might well be the weapon in the hands of our forces for the next fifty years; because we cannot change from year to year the production of a standard weapon such as a rifle. You have to produce them in great numbers.

I tried to find out earlier if we had made comparative tests between the Belgian rifle and the British rifle, both adapted to use the common .30 round. However I did not get a complete answer to that question. Apparently we had observers at various try-outs of rifles. But some of those try-outs —and this is where the difficulty comes in—some of those trials which took place in the United States and Britain were between the British rifle using the .280 and the Belgian rifle using the .30. Now that they both use the same round, comparative tests should be conducted to determine which of the two is more satisfactory.

Or perhaps some other rifle would be much more satisfactory. I have been saying that Canada has played a strange part in this matter of the standardization of the rifle. She has taken a rather negative attitude, and that negative attitude may have been the decisive factor.

I have a newspaper report here which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of February 25. It is a dispatch from London to the Canadian Press referring to the estimates submitted in the British House of Commons, and is in these words:

Because the FN was the type of rifle favoured by the Canadians and is also being ordered for trials by Americans, it was decided that its adoption was the wisest course in view of the greatly increased prospects of North American production. Neither Canada nor the United States would favour the adoption of the British EM2.

So Canada has weighed the balance in this matter. And the British, whether they have preferred their own EM2 rifle because of its design and weight and other important factors, would have preferred their own rifle if it could be produced in this country. Yet we are obliged, so far as I can find out from these records, to favour the Belgian rifle because the United States rejected the British EM2 and Canada played no active part in the deliberations. I think it would have been better for Canada to have played a much more active part in this than simply to have stood on the sidelines—not interested in the rifle, but interested only in the production thereof.

I do not think that is good enough. I believe Canadian military people have sufficient experience to determine the best rifle for Canadian use, without having to adopt something that is produced by some other country. And Canada might very well have come up with some other idea. The standardization of the rifle is important; but more important is the standardization of the round, which has been achieved. And it might well be that, for Canadian purposes, something different is desirable. Are we facing up to the realities of this, or are we simply going to wait and see what the United States does?

Now, let me point out that according to a report published in the Gazette of May 10, 1954 bearing a New York dateline and written by Hanson W. Baldwin of the New York Times service, it states, under the heading "Standard Rifle Far Off":

Belgium's rifle is lighter than the M-1—

An American model.

—and fires in bursts at a rate of about 700 rounds a minute. But the FN, in later tests, did not meet trials in severe cold in Canada as well as the M-1 and T-44; there were more malfunctions and some breakages.

Well, that seems to cast some doubt on this rifle, which for some reason or other has had to be adopted by Britain, and has been rejected by the United States.

Mr. Claxton: What does the hon. member mean "rejected by the United States"?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: I am quoting from what I read in the British Hansard and from those reports. The minister has corrected me. The United States is still continuing tests with regard to the Belgian rifle. In so far as these reports are concerned, the United States has been reluctant to accept it. The Winnipeg Free Press of February 25 commented in an editorial on the Belgian rifle and had this to say dealing with remarks made in the United Kingdom. I quote:

Judging by Sir Winston's words, the attitude of the Canadian government was decisive. He might have been tempted to take a chance if Canada had favoured the British rifle. But without either Canada or the United States he was adamant.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the situation. I think it is a confused one with regard to the question of the type of rifle that might be adopted for the Canadian army in the future. We are in between the two larger powers, the United Kingdom and the United States, and we seem to have sided in a negative way with the United States which, according to the gentlemen in the United Kingdom, has affected their decision with regard to the type of rifle that has been selected.

I would have felt happier about it if Canadian tests had been conducted with both these rifles or others, and if a full disclosure of all these operations with regard to the rifle had been made to us earlier and if a full understanding of this problem had been presented. At the moment it seems to me to be a bit confused, and the attitude of Canada does not seem to me to be as creditable as it might have been had we taken a more positive stand with regard to this particular matter.

Mr. Claxton: If the hon. member is confused I am not surprised because he has indicated that confusion throughout his whole speech. He has referred to a matter which has been the subject of discussion and a released statement, which is well known. Yet he attempts at this time to confuse this committee and to confuse this most important issue.

The point that Canada made throughout was that it was vitally important, in the interests of our common defence in NATO and as between Britain, United States and Canada particularly, that we should agree on a round and on a rifle. If anyone takes issue with the part that Canada played in aiming at that objective, then I take issue with him and so does every Canadian and so does every American, and so does everyone who lives in the British commonwealth and in the NATO countries. That was a desirable aim, and we aimed at that right through. We found that the British were not going to adopt an American or other rifle. They felt in April, 1951 for reasons of their own that they should adopt the EM rifle and they so announced. Then I felt that in the interests of combined action and union between the three countries, but particularly in the interests of Canada, which is a surplus producer of arms, we should try again to see if we could not arrive at an agreement. Is that sitting back on the fence or of taking a backward position?

I sent a telegram—and I have the permission of the British war office and also of the secretary of defence to produce it—that in the interests of our unity we must agree on a round and on a rifle. If we could not agree on that, then what sense was there in NATO at all? This was fundamental. If we could not agree on a common hand weapon, then our whole alliance would be subject to very grave criticism. Anyway, in consequence of the Canadian intervention, we had this meeting at Washington. They suggested that it should be held at Ottawa. I suggested that it should be held at Washington. The United States was represented by the Hon. Frank Pace, former secretary of the army, and by General Joe Collins, the chief of the general staff. Britain was represented by the minister of defence, the Hon. Mr. Shinwell, accompanied by lieutenant-general, as he then was, now General Whiteley. France was represented by His Excellency Jules Moch, accompanied by a high ranking French officer. I was accompanied by Lieutenant General Simonds. We met during two days. We heard the experts describe their rifles. We received the reports again. It became perfectly evident that there had not been as full an interchange of information at various levels as there should have been. In consequence of those two-day discussions it was decided that we should have a fresh look.

In answer to the hon. member, may I say that this meeting took place on the initiative of Canada. At the end of the meeting the secretary of the army of the United States said that he was grateful to the Canadian minister and to the Canadian team for the part they played in initiating this discussion and bringing them together. Then at our suggestion the discussion was transferred to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's standing group. They agreed to a team of four on which we were represented by Major General Graham. That team brought in a report. Further studies were continued, and the result was an agreement on the round was announced at Paris, in December. When I was asked whether I would announce this agreement, it was done because the initiative was taken by Canada and followed up by Canadian generals and Canadian technicians in bringing the various groups together. The fact that I was asked to announce that agreement, and also to propose to the North Atlantic council that we should agree on this round as the standard round, has indicated that Canada was taking no backward part.

Then we came on to the rifle. If the British have adopted the FN rifle it is because the British chose to adopt the FN rifle. We do not influence the British. They make their own decisions. When that decision was announced and discussed in the house in the debate to which my hon. friend referred, some statements were made that seemed to me to have just about as little understanding of the real issues involved as those made in the speech we have just listened to from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I did not say, as quoted, that we were not concerned about what rifle or what round. How could I say that? Who in Heaven's name would ever say that? What I said was that what we were concerned with was that we should get agreement between the British, the Americans, the other countries and ourselves, and I said we would help to get that agreement. I said also that we were more interested in this than probably any other country of our size, because other countries would look to us as sources of supply, not only in the event of an emergency but in the event of the continuation of a cold war. They would expect us to supply them with rifles of one type or another, and it was of tremendous importance, in their interests, in the interests of the French, the British and everyone else, that whatever rifle was adopted would be one which would be adopted for common use and also if possible for common production in the United States, in Canada and in other countries.

We have been and we are still working towards that end. The record is totally against the view advanced by the hon. member. We have been constantly pressing to achieve an agreement on the rifle and I still hope that that agreement will be achieved. If there was anything wrong with the FN why did the British adopt it? If there is anything that requires to be corrected in this rifle on account of these Arctic trials then these corrections are and can be made and I hope they are being made successfully. If, on the other hand, it turns out that the FN is not the ideal rifle then it is still the best rifle that has yet been produced and it can be further developed. We are in the position where we have not decided to take the FN because we want to see the results of the trials and we want to have user trials. We then want to go into production on whatever rifle we decide to produce.

All things considered I think it would be very desirable that we go into production on the FN rifle even if the United States does not choose that rifle, because it is a very good rifle and it is very desirable that the British should have an alternative source of supply outside of the United Kingdom. As everyone knows we supplied them with many hundreds of thousands of small arms during the war and with many billions of rounds of small arms ammunition. It is of vital importance that as far as possible we should work together. We have succeeded, in company with our allies and partners, in getting an agreement on a round. That is a great achievement and we now hope to succeed in getting an agreement on the rifle.

Mr. Churchill: The minister thinks I am confused about this matter but I am not the least bit confused. I know what I am talking about in regard to the rifle and the round, and the confusion has arisen from the lack of information as supplied by the Department of National Defence. The minister confused the issue a little more just recently by discussing at great length the standardization of the round, for which I gave him full credit in my introductory remarks. The standardization of the round was made following that conference in 1951, and at that conference the British rifle, which was under consideration, was using ·280 ammunition and the Belgian rifle was using ·30. Canada came down in favour of the ·30 ammunition and the NATO countries followed suit. We have standardized on the round and to that there is no objection.

But now the issue has advanced one stage further and it was with that further development that I was dealing. The issue has gone from that to the type of rifle to be adopted for the Canadian army. You can have a standardized round and a dozen different makes of rifles and machine guns all using that type of ammunition, and if you have the same ammunition for the NATO forces it might be better to have the same rifle. Nevertheless, if you have different makes and model of rifle each using the same type of ammunition you are on very sound ground indeed, and there is no confusion in my mind in that regard. There is no dispute on that point. We have standardized on the round.

But when it comes to the choice of rifle the evidence from the British Hansard indicates that Canada's attitude was decisive with regard to the British having to adopt the Belgian FN rifle and—

Mr. Claxton: That simply is not true either in regard to the British Hansard or in regard to the Canadian attitude. It has been shown to be completely untrue in the British Hansard, and all we have there are unproven statements.

Mr. Churchill: Well, I deserve thanks from the minister for giving him the opportunity to correct the British Hansard which has put him in a very bad light.

Mr. Claxton: I am correcting the hon. member's interpretation of British Hansard.

Mr. Churchill: It is not my interpretation. I have read the words of Mr. Shinwell and Mr. Head, and I shall not read them again, as some hon. members here are suggesting. The words are there and I am not interpreting them. I am simply stating what I saw there and the press reports interpret them in much the same fashion. But let me give the words of the minister himself in order to see whether the issue has not been confused by the Department of National Defence. On March 3, 1954, I received an answer to a question which I placed on the order paper. Here was my question:

> 1. Did the Minister of National Defence or any representative of his department recommend the adoption of or indicate a preference for the Belgian FN rifle at any conference of NATO countries on the subject of the standardization of weapons?
> 2. If so, when and at what conference?

Here is the answer, Mr. Chairman.

> 1 and 2. Discussion at NATO meetings took place on the round but not on the rifle and the answer to this question is consequently "No".

I was trying to get information when I put that question on the order paper and that was the answer I received. In other words, we decided on the round but we made no commitments on the rifle. Now the minister is asserting that the situation is the opposite.

Mr. Claxton: The answer is precisely as declared there. There is no commitment on the rifle.

Mr. Churchill: But the minister said the rifle was discussed at this conference and apparently it was just the round. Who is providing the confusion? That is the situation, Mr. Chairman, and I think our position could be made clear if Canada took a somewhat more positive stand with regard to this very important—

Mr. Claxton: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? When the British have refused to adopt their own EM2 rifle would he ask us to adopt that rifle when neither the British, the United States, the Belgians, the French, nor ourselves have adopted any one of the United States types? Would he not agree that the right course was for us to wait and see the result of the user trials?

Mr. Churchill: Obviously, Mr. Chairman, the right course is to depend on the user trials which, I would hope, would be conducted by Canadians on all of these rifles firing the standard round. I hope we are not depending on other countries to make user trials and that these trials will be conducted under such conditions that we will be absolutely certain the proper rifle has been selected. We have a record in Canada of adopting a rifle which proved to be ineffective under battle conditions, and battle conditions involve mud and difficult weather conditions under which some rifles will not operate. Is there not a chance that unless we ourselves determine that this Belgian rifle is the most effective that we might make the mistake of adopting a rifle which would not stand up under difficult conditions? And what about the statement I read from that New York report to the effect that this rifle has not stood up under some of the Arctic trials? Are we trying out other rifles under the same conditions; is every country giving them the same test, and is Canada undertaking these tests?

Mr. Claxton: I can assure the hon. member that we will make our decision on the basis of tests and trials by Canadians as well as by others working in this partnership.

Mr. Harkness: During this debate and in speaking in previous debates the minister has always expressed a high degree of satisfaction with the condition of the Canadian army. I refer particularly to the organization, the adequacy of equipment and so forth. I think we are all agreed on the high calibre, on the whole, of the officers and men in the Canadian army, and that all wish to pay tribute to them whenever the opportunity presents itself. However, in view of these numerous statements by the minister which are echoed by the people on his side of the house —the ones who have spoken in this debate today—I should like to devote some time to an exercise which was held last year, called Buffalo IV and which was heralded widely in the press as the largest peacetime exercise in the history of the Canadian army.

These exercises or schemes are put on, of course, to give training to the troops and also as a test of their efficiency from various points of view as for example, their efficiency as subunits, as units, as formations, the efficiency of the various officers in exercising command, tests of weapons and so on. As I say, this exercise which was heralded as the largest army exercise in peacetime as far as Canada was concerned was held last year in August.

There was a great deal of laudatory comment put out by the P.R.O.'s and so on. However, there attended at this exercise a reporter for the Calgary Herald by the name of Jim Senter who wrote four articles which were published in the Herald—I do not know what other papers they may have been in—giving his impressions of the exercise. I may say that I think he is particularly well qualified to give his impressions of this exercise. He went overseas. He happened to be in the same unit that I was in. He became an N.C.O., subsequently was put up for a commission and later served as a commissioned officer in the artillery. The particular article that I will start with, quote from fairly briefly and comment on is headed "Manoeuvres Reveal Weaknesses in Army; Many Improvements Considered Urgent to make Army Effective Defence Force". The article then goes on to say:

> Exercise Buffalo IV, the biggest peacetime workout of the Canadian army, has passed into history and, with its passing, five basic weaknesses of the army stand revealed.
> These weaknesses are to be found in the armoured corps,—

My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has spoken about this matter at some length today and previously.

> —the artillery,—

About which the Leader of the Opposition had something to say.

> —the signal corps, the supply services, such as the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, and the reserve army.
>
> Basically, these are shortages of men and equipment but there is more to it than that.
> There is the lack of proper training, units employed out of context, improper thinking, units that don't exist that should exist and units that have failed to be expanded in proportion to the increasing needs of the Canadian army.

The article then goes on and elaborates on those various points. I am not going to take up the time of the committee to go into all those matters. The point I want to make is that the rosy picture painted by the minister, particularly as to the situation in the Canadian army, is just not borne out by the exercises which have been held and by the facts, as far as competent observers who had the opportunity to look at them have reported. The organization of the army generally, as has been stressed by my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, is wrong, in my opinion. Certainly the equipment is not adequate and in many cases it is much out of date. This article goes on—it is talking about the armour to begin with—to say this:

The Strathconas—

The Strathconas are the armoured regiment in the west and are an exceptionally fine regiment. I have the honour of belonging to their mess as an honorary member and I have had the opportunity to observe them at their exercises at Sarcee and they are extremely fortunate to have a training ground right at their back door. I think they are in a high state of efficiency. The article continues:

—who supplied the armour for Buffalo IV, could provide only half their full strength for the exercise. One of their squadrons is now in Korea and the second is just now coming off leave, having only recently returned from Korea.

This left two squadrons for the exercise and, of these two, one—"C" squadron, the first Canadian armoured unit to go to Korea—had to act in what is a new role for the Canadian army: heavy gun tanks . . .

The role of the heavy gun tanks is strictly defensive. It calls for a 65-ton tank mounting a gun ranging in size from 120 to 185 millimeters. Present thinking seems to favour the high velocity 120-mm.

Such a tank mounting such a gun certainly does not exist in Canada, and it is doubtful if a good version of such a weapon is to be found anywhere in the western world. "C" squadron had to use the obsolescent Sherman tank mounting a 76-mm. gun to simulate the role.

In their heavy gun tank role, the tanks were responsible for the divisional anti-tank defence—

I should like to stress that statement, that they were responsible for the divisional anti-tank defence. To continue:

—and provide depth and greater hitting power to the anti-tank screen provided by the infantry anti-tank platoons and the field artillery.

They are sited so that the enemy tanks in the offensive—

And so on. We do not need to go into that. To continue:

Though this role is new to the armour, it is not new to the Canadian army. In the second great war it was performed by anti-tank regiments using towed and self-propelled guns under the command of the artillery.

Aside from the fact that equipment for the heavy gun tank role does not exist . . . the biggest lesson learned here was that normal tank squadron and troop administration methods aren't enough.

I should like to follow up a bit this matter of anti-tank defence. It happens to have been the particular arm of the artillery in which I served for most of the war. Hence I have a certain amount of knowledge of it. About two or three years ago apparently a decision was taken—though it was extremely difficult to get the minister to admit it—that the anti-tank role would be taken on in future by the armoured corps and there would cease to be artillery anti-tank units. However nothing firm really has happened about the matter since so that for the past two years or more the anti-tank regiments in the artillery—and those are the reserve anti-tank regiments, of course, because there are no permanent force ones—have been sitting there. They had their anti-tank weapons taken away from them. Some were given 25-pounder guns, some were given other guns. They are just sort of marking time not knowing what they would do.

In the meantime, nothing was done in the matter of building up anti-tank forces amongst the armour. The total result is, as is indicated here, that even the permanent force armoured regiment have had no training in anti-tank war. In spite of the fact that anti-tank defence was demonstrated during the last war as being one of the most important elements in the modern army, we have absolutely no anti-tank elements in our army at the present time. It was the lack of sufficient anti-tank weapons which enabled the German break-through of armour to take place in the overrunning of France in the early part of the war. It was the existence of a screen of German anti-tank guns which prevented our own armour from breaking through the German defence when we attempted it to begin with outside of Caen.

First the British army and then the Canadian army were foiled to a large extent by a screen of anti-tank guns. In spite of all the lessons of the necessity of anti-tank guns, particularly self-propelled anti-tank guns, the Canadian army has absolutely none now. The two regular force armoured regiments have had no training in the role, and as is indicated here this test showed that their troop organization and so forth was not of a kind that would enable them to carry out that role successfully. I will read further. He elaborates on that.

Mr. Claxton: Who is "he"?

Mr. Harkness: I indicated that. This gentleman is Jim Senter who is either with the brigade in Europe or has just returned from there.

Mr. Claxton: A newspaper reporter, a reporter for the Calgary Herald?

Mr. Harkness: Yes. As he says here, this does establish that normal tank squadron and troop administration methods are not enough to enable them to carry out this difficult role. He continues:

Normally, a troop commander has his tanks close together and he can handle them and fire them from the turret of his command vehicle. In the heavy gun role, the tanks are widely deployed, dug in and lying doggo. For better efficiency in fighting his tanks and in the administration and supply of the needs of his men, guns and vehicles, it is better that the troop and squadron commanders operate from a separate small headquarters of their own, leaving their command vehicles to be fought by a non-commissioned officer. These were lessons learned by the anti-tank regiments during the last war, and, for some reason, not passed on to the armour for the proper handling of their new role. Why has the armoured corps not been expanded to proportionate size with the rest of the army and why are the heavy gun tanks not available?

Those are two unanswered questions and two questions which of course I think the minister should answer. I should like to say a little more about the present anti-tank role which the armoured forces have taken on. As the result of some five years' experience during the last war I found it was a very difficult matter to train officers and men to deploy and handle anti-tank guns properly. Even after the long period of training we had in England a considerable number of guns were always badly placed. As a result some of course were lost and others would not have been effective if a tank attack had been made through their positions. It is a branch of army work which people just cannot walk out and do. It takes a lot of training and, as is indicated in this article, you need an administrative set-up within the troop and within the regiment so that the troop commander can control the placing of his guns and the squadron commander can control the deployment and fighting of his troops.

The way the armour is organized at the present time they just cannot do it. The squadrons which are with the troops in Korea and Europe at the present time have apparently been given this role and they are not able to carry it out because they are not organized properly for the purpose and they have not been trained for it. I repeat that we are really left without any anti-tank defence. In other words, from that point of view we have not a modern army at all or anything like it.

So much for that subject. There has been a good deal of talk about whether there is or is not sufficient equipment. Certainly there is no anti-tank equipment. That is one thing we are definitely short of. Here is another article about the same exercise which is headed, "Reserve Army Gunners Find Weapon Shortage". I wish to deal with this now because it also concerns the regular forces. That happens to be the heading of the article but it deals with the regular force gunners as well as those of the reserve force. The dispatch is from Wainwright and reads as follows:

Perhaps the most shocking disclosure to come out of the Canadian army's recently completed exercise Buffalo IV held at Wainwright military camp, is the ragtailed state of the divisional artillery . . . Two regiments of artillery were deployed for the manoeuvre and, for lack of better names, were known as—

We do not need to go into that. The two regiments were made up of detachments from four of the reserve force units. This was their summer camp. I continue:

In all, reservists contributed by these four regiments totalled twenty-eight officers and seventy-two other ranks—

The total war strength of course of these four regiments would have been approximately 3,200 men all told. However they were only able to muster for this exercise 28 officers and 72 other ranks, and this constituted summer training. I continue:

Added to the reservists was a parachute battery from Canada's airborne brigade, "Z" battery, R.C.H.A.—

That was formerly an anti-tank battery but it is now converted to a parachute battery.

—which, normally, uses 4·2 in. mortars, and regular army gunners from the 119th and 129th light anti-aircraft batteries, Victoria. The anti-aircraft gunners were given a two to three week conversion course from ack-ack to field artillery before proceeding to Wainwright for the exercise.

In other words, in order to hold this exercise in the western command and to put out in token form two field regiments to represent the divisional artillery—of course they would not because there would be three field regiments which would be backed up by a medium regiment—they had to bring in this regular force parachute battery and detachments from two ack-ack batteries on the Pacific coast.

This afternoon the hon. member for Wellington South said that there was plenty of equipment, that these people in the artillery units were all right and so forth. This article gives some idea of the number of people they can get out for summer camp. I will go on to something about equipment. He continues:

Cutting echelon groups to a minimum and eliminating wagon lines, cooks and tradesmen wherever possible, this left more than enough gunners and specialists to man, control and fire the some twenty-three 25-pounder field guns provided.

Why there were 23 provided I do not know. Twenty-four is the number for one regiment, not two regiments. I presume the reason there were 23 was that was all they could dig up in the western command to take out on the exercise. He continues:

It comes as something of a shock when it is realized that, of these twenty-three guns, only eight could be fired in a live shoot.

Mark you, there are 23 guns on the exercise representing the divisional artillery, one gun short of the number there should have been for one field regiment, and of these 23 guns only eight could be fired. The others were there really as dummies on which people could do gun drill. Only eight could be fired in a live shoot. He continues:

The remaining fifteen had to stand idle in their gun positions. For the most part, these guns had not been calibrated. "They want reserve army men to come to camp and they can't even give us enough guns when we get here", said one reserve officer with considerable bitterness. I know a lot of reserve army gunners who won't be here next year."

As we have continually pointed out in the house time after time, there is one of the reasons why more people do not go to summer camp and do not turn out for the reserve forces. It is all right for the minister and the member for Wellington South to say that there is all kinds of equipment for these reserve force units, but when you discover what actually happened in this biggest exercise ever held in peacetime by the Canadian army you find that they only had eight guns that would fire for the entire divisional artillery. Naturally men are going to be disgusted. That kills their morale and they say "the heck with it, we will not come back." That is the kind of thing that kills morale and points up the terrible situation that exists. We ask that it be corrected. The article continues:

In some cases, three guns had to simulate a battery. During live firing, which occurred on only one day of the whole exercise, and that toward the end, gun crews had to line up and wait their turns at the guns.

Now, that was a fine exercise, was it not? Here is the biggest exercise ever held in Canada in peacetime and these gun detachments had to be brought from wherever their guns were and lined up one behind the other to take a turn at firing a few rounds of ammunition. That is extremely realistic training. It is certainly the type of training that is going to encourage people to join or stay in our reserve forces.

There was bad feeling over this among members of the reserve army as they felt they should have been given preference over the regular gunners in the firing practice. As it was, the reservists claim, it was the other way around.

In other words, instead of giving the reserves, who were out there for summer training practice, an opportunity to fire live ammunition, it was given chiefly to the regular army gunners. Perhaps that was the only practice they had, too; I do not know. It was felt the regular army had priority. I shall not go on with the rest of this article, but I should like to read one or two more sentences:

What makes all this so depressing is the thought that the gunner representation on "Buffalo IV" represented the artillery resources of western command, the largest and probably the most important command in Canada.

I cannot resist reading the final paragraph:

In spite of everything, however, the gunners were reasonably well on their toes. And, as this reporter wandered about through the exercise area, the gunners were the only people who met him with levelled rifles and demanded to see his credentials.

In other words, the gunners are always on the job in spite of the difficulties imposed by this government or any other.

An hon. Member: Did they have rifles or broomsticks?

Mr. Harkness: They had rifles, but probably they would not fire.

The Calgary Herald commented on this editorial—

Mr. Claxton: I think "editorial" is the right word.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad the minister says it is right.

Mr. Claxton: I said that I think "editorial" is the right word for this so-called report. I was referring to this so-called report of what happened and the hon. member said this "editorial" and I agree with you that it seems to be editorializing.

Mr. Harkness: The reporter was giving his impression, and if the minister had been listening when I started he would have heard what this reporter's qualifications were.

Mr. Claxton: I asked, and the hon. member told me.

Mr. Harkness: I outlined the whole thing at some length before that, and just told the minister his name. The editorial is from the Calgary Herald and it speaks of this exercise in these words:

It was designed to test a division in a defensive role . . .

The first, and biggest, thing wrong with the whole operation was that there was no division to test, defensively or otherwise . . .

Operation Buffalo IV was supposed to be a western command exercise. Scraping the bottom of the barrel in both the regular and reserve army, western command fielded about one half a division. To make the exercise possible, other commands had had to be called in to help. The signals system alone required 900 men. The combined resources produced about 300. Food had to delivered by trucks in the field because there were neither sufficient men nor vehicles to provide a proper field ration and feeding system . . .

It is a waste of words to say again that this is a shocking condition to find in Canada's army in these times. It is past the shocking stage. It is enough to make anybody's hair stand straight on end, whether it is regarded from the standpoint of national safety or from the mundane angle of $2 billion a year being spent on a travesty of defence like this.

As I say, that shows the picture presented by a competent reporter with a military background, and without any axe to grind, except he is still a member of the reserve forces and so far as I know desires to improve the reserve and regular forces of this country. As the editorial says, it is indeed a shocking picture.

While I am on my feet, I should like to just indicate some of the things this same reporter found in the Canadian brigade in Germany, from where he has just returned and upon which he wrote another series of articles. I have one here which appeared in the Calgary Herald of Friday, June 4, and it is headed "Equipment Shortages Plague Canadian Troops in Germany". The heading, of course, was put on by the newspaper but the dateline is Soest, Germany. We have been told by the minister that we have all kinds of equipment, and so forth; no difficulties along this line; everything is rosy and everything is of the best. I am not going to read all this article, but I am going to read about a few of the shortages this reporter found and for which there seems to be absolutely no excuse. Here is a quotation from one of the men who said:

We can send 80 jet fighters to the Netherlands, but we do not even have shoe laces or stoppers for our own water bottles.

Then, the article goes on:

The shortages are to be found in transport, weapons and clothing, and much of the equipment at present possessed by the brigade is old, worn out and obsolescent.

And the thing which makes the Canadian soldier so angry is that this is supposed to be a show brigade. They are the only true NATO troops in the area, but they still have the worst equipment.

To be found close by are both the British and the Belgians. Both are occupation formations, operate under reparations and have the power of requisition. The Canadians, however, are NATO troops and, as such, pay their own way out of Canadian funds.

Yet, the British equipment is something out of this world—a dream to behold—and the Belgian units all have brand new transports and the finest weapons. But Canada's stuff is old and worn out and any large scale move means a widespread dotting of broken down Canadian tanks and trucks.

Just to look at the question of military transport, an item of vital importance to any military formation:

Military transport for the Canadian brigade totals approximately 1,800 vehicles of every kind for all units. In addition to these, extensive use is made of the German Volkswagen as "runabouts" within the brigade area.

"It would take 200 three-ton trucks to carry all the spare parts used by military vehicles since the brigade came overseas last fall" said one officer who was in a position to know . . .

Everywhere within the Canadian brigade area in Germany today, transport is critically short in supply. "It's not that there is anything wrong with our maintenance, it's just that the breakdowns occur more rapidly than the repair services can fix them", another officer added.

"The vehicles are just old and worn out. They were not new when they came over here and they have travelled all over Europe, from Normandy at D-day to Berlin. We put in a new engine today and the vehicle is running fine. Tomorrow the rear end drops out."

And, as they look at their broken down vehicles, spread over the autobahns and by-roads of Europe, the Canadian soldier sums it up nicely. "It's embarrassing", they say.

The article says that weapons are another item of great concern, and talks about rifles. It reads as follows:

The rifles, for example, are worn and pitted, and, in many cases, have been re-blued over the rust. Bren guns, too, are badly worn and, in the case of one unit, out of approximately 80 Bren guns provided for in establishment, only ten could fire when first taken over by the unit.

Then the article goes on to deal with various other items of equipment. I am not going to take any more of the time of the committee to read this. There is a report by a responsible and competent observer, concerning what he saw in the early part of this month when visiting our brigade in Germany. The truth of the matter is that I believe we have had a situation with regard to this brigade in Germany misrepresented to us. I cannot say anything else. Quite evidently, the brigade has old equipment. It has rifles which, in many cases, probably if safe to fire at least are not going to be accurate because they are pitted and rusted.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Dickey: Did the hon. member hear the commander of the NATO forces, General Gruenther, speak the other day about the Canadian brigade; and does he believe that a competent and brilliant staff officer of his type would have said what he said about the Canadian brigade if what the hon. member says about it were true?

Mr. Ferguson: Oh, you think generals know everything about it.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Ferguson: All the experience he has—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I heard the report, and I think the report was absolutely correct. As I said at the beginning, I think there is nothing wrong with the commanders, the officers or the men; I think they are absolutely splendid.

Mr. Claxton: Everything is right except the shoe laces.

Mr. Harkness: But according to this report —and I have confidence in it—the equipment those people have been supplied with is not up to scratch.

Mr. Dickey: Have you no confidence in General Gruenther's report?

Mr. Harkness: General Gruenther said nothing about equipment. He never mentioned equipment. He said the brigade was a fine brigade.

Mr. Dickey: He spoke of the brigade as an operational brigade, and that includes equipment.

Mr. Harkness: I have no doubt they are fine men. But it is made clear from this report; and I challenge the minister to deny the accuracy of this report—

Mr. Claxton: I do accept the challenge, and I deny it.

Mr. Ferguson: All they do is challenge.

An hon. Member: Why don't you prove it?

Mr. Harkness: The minister challenges it. Are not those vehicles the same vehicles that we went to France with, in the invasion of the continent, during the last war, or that we went into Italy with, the year before that, in 1943?

Mr. Dickey: No.

Mr. Harkness: Are they not the same vehicles? I challenge the minister.

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Harkness: What vehicles are they, then? I am asking the minister: What vehicles are they, then?

Mr. Ferguson: It is not in the public interest to tell!

Mr. Harkness: Let the minister tell us what vehicles they are.

Mr. Dickey: Sit down, and let him have a chance.

Mr. Harkness: Now, look, Mr. Chairman, the minister dare not say that they are not the same vehicles. He dare not say it, because they are the same vehicles. He started out to say it. I asked what vehicles they were, and he is not able to tell me. They may be vehicles which were used in England during the war; but they are either vehicles we used in England during the last war, or the vehicles we left in France and Italy, one or the other. And if the minister wishes to say something, I will sit down.

Mr. Claxton: Yes. I am afraid I cannot dig up the vehicle number of every motor vehicle in the armed forces. We have 31,000 of them. I will tell my hon. friend that the vehicles that went abroad with the 27th brigade to Europe were either new or as good as new—completely rebuilt motor vehicles. They were as good as could be found anywhere for any purpose at that time, and they went abroad in perfect condition.

Mr. Harkness: When?

Mr. Claxton: They may have had some use, but they were well maintained. We have some motor vehicles of new types we have been producing, and we have proposed to issue them as the old ones wear out. Of course that is natural enough. Why should it not be?

Mr. Ferguson: Good old rebuilts! The old rebuilts with the Canadian army!

Mr. Claxton: Would you like us to throw away every motor vehicle?

Mr. Ferguson: Would you buy a second-hand car? You know you would not.

Mr. Claxton: We have to rebuild and rebuild. And we rebuild them just as well as they can be rebuilt. And if they were not rebuilt my hon. friend opposite would be the first to complain about our throwing away two-year-old models.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite apparent that these vehicles are vehicles which were produced during the war, and which were used during the war. There may be a few of them that were not used at all, as the minister says, but they were vehicles produced during the war, and they were vehicles for the most part used during the war. Whether they were used in Canada or in England or in Italy or in France does not matter. The fact is that now they are worn out. They have had all that wear, and they have been repaired and repaired and repaired. And I am glad they have been repaired. But apparently they have reached the stage where it is not economical to repair them any more.

It is all very well for the minister to say, "We will keep on repairing them, to save money". But if you have ever had a fleet of trucks, and in that fleet you have a truck with a great number of miles on it, you know it is not economical to repair it any more. You are just throwing money away. You are far better off to get rid of it and get a new one. And I think, from what I can make out, that that is the situation with regard to these vehicles with the brigade in Europe at the present time.

Mr. Dickey: Never mind the expense!

Mr. Harkness: We could save money, but not by attempting to repair worn-out trucks.

Mr. Dickey: What about worn-out arguments?

Mr. Fleming: Or this worn-out government.

Mr. Harkness: Your argument is as worn-out as the trucks, and has as many holes in it.

Mr. Dickey: Don't go away mad.

Mr. Harkness: So far as the other shortages are concerned, I have not the slightest doubt that they existed. The minister does not seem to know at the present time whether they existed or not. I would think it would be up to him to see if that is the situation; and I will be interested to see if it is correct. He should try to find that out, instead of getting up as he did a while ago and making the blunt assertion that none of this is correct. Here is an observer, a competent man with considerable background. There is absolutely no doubt that he is not the type who would send in an utterly false report about these things he saw. He is giving a news report on it. And if the minister followed the reasonable procedure he would find out to what extent this is old and worn-out equipment, and to what extent proper equipment is supplied to these troops.

Mr. Claxton: I do not know how far I need to go in following Mr. Senter in his trip around the world. But it does indicate how difficult it is to answer the reports of a reporter as quoted by a member. There used to be a pretty good rule that you could not read newspaper reports in the house, because they are not evidence.

Now, with regard to what he said about this exercise—I was not there and I have never seen the report to which reference is made, and to which the hon. member referred. It must have escaped me. But I can tell him I am informed that this exercise was not the biggest exercise ever held in peacetime.

Mr. Harkness: That is how it was advertised in all the papers.

Mr. Claxton: I am not responsible for the papers.

Mr. Harkness: Your P.R.O.'s are, though.

Mr. Claxton: Not at all. He says that there was no divisional artillery. This was a brigade exercise, with only three battalions who were to go to Korea. They are in Korea, and so far as I know they are doing excellently. They were the three battalions of the R.C.R.'s, the P.P.C.L.I.'s—no, the Black Watch and the Second Queens—

Mr. Ferguson: Who else, tell me?

Mr. Claxton: And the Fourth Guards. These are very good battalions. They had a brigade exercise, but for the purpose of holding the exercise within the framework of a division they asked some reserve units to come in to form up the framework of a division. Any hon. member who served in any armed force in any war knows that you have exercises at the divisional level with sometimes no more than 150 officers present. That sometimes is done.

Then, the kind of remarks the hon. member has made about equipment—I just do not understand them, because we have no end of 25-pounder guns. We have given away probably a thousand. We have a surplus still, and they are available at command headquarters, as is all other equipment, for use by the reserves, as they can be used to advantage by them. It is not distributed to units beyond their capacity to use, store and maintain it, and that makes sense too, and that is because the reserve forces want it that way.

With regard to this business of equipment of the brigade overseas, I think the senior member for Halifax made a very good intervention, but the hon. member for Calgary North said that I should have made an inquiry and got a report. But I got a report of all this as soon as I saw the Senter piece. But I should like to refer to this against the background of the previous Senter piece:

> Canadians draw Soviet interest as commonwealth exercises open.

That is the first part of it.

> Canadians beat "desert rats", dominion's brigade in Germany excels in week-long commonwealth army exercises.

That was the second article:

> Calgary units star in "War".
> Canadian infantry put on good show against crack British in German scheme.

That was the third article. It was in this latter one that he dealt with equipment. Perhaps I will agree with the hon. member when he says that this was a good job and a very authentic and reliable reporter with regard to the first three articles, but when he comes to the fourth I must only assume that he has picked out bits and pieces of the kind of talk that you get around if you look for that kind of talk. This again is significant. I have the word of the chief of the general staff that any shortages that developed would be of a temporary nature only, and would represent only the time necessary to call on reserves on the continent or in the United Kingdom.

Then a very big thing was made of the shortages of shoe laces. Well, now, shoe laces are not a very important element in fighting, but still it is a very important element in veracity, and I took this one up, too, and I had a signal sent across to the other side asking: "How many shoe laces have you got?" That is the kind of thing we are led into by this kind of talk, and I think it is a waste of public money. However, I found out that I have here from Brigadier Anderson in West Germany, a very fine officer commanding the brigade, information that we have a total of 5,206 pairs of shoe laces in the brigade, and I assure the hon. gentleman that there is no shortage.

Mr. Harkness: The point is, when did they get them, after this article was written?

Mr. Claxton: They could not get them after. The hon. member made some remarks about anti-tank activities. Our troops are trained in anti-tank activities, whether they are armour, artillery or infantry, and that is about the biggest single item, the biggest single aspect of the field training that they have to do. How he can say they are not trained in anti-tank activities, I do not know, because he must have known. I have been at exercises at Wainwright and Petawawa and he must have been; I have seen them in Germany and seen them constantly in films that have been taken—there is a major field of continuous anti-tank activities. We try to have the latest types of training work, the latest type of dropping is practised, and they use the best kind of equipment.

Mr. Harkness: On the basis of some five or six years experience of this, I can assure the minister that his remarks that everybody is trained in anti-tank activities and so forth merely indicate his complete lack of comprehension in regard to the role of these anti-tank guns and the methods of handling them, deploying them and everything else. When he says the infantry, the armour and everybody else are trained in the matter of anti-tank defence, he is talking about the medium anti-tank defence of a particular area where the platoon is or the company or anything else along that line. The very fact that he made that statement shows that he knows absolutely nothing of what I was talking about, just absolutely nothing.

Mr. Dickey: Do you know?

Mr. Claxton: I do not know what the hon. member is talking about.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Harkness: The minister's remarks prove that he does not know, or he would not have made the remarks he did.

Mr. Claxton: He talks about heavy anti-tank guns. We have anti-tank guns as a part of the tank equipment in the Centurions, and they occupy today an anti-tank role. That is their role. If he is talking about something heavier than that—

Mr. Harkness: No, I am not talking about that. They are not organized to carry out the role. That is what I was saying, they cannot do it.

Mr. Claxton: They are doing it steadily.

Mr. Harkness: They cannot do it effectively.

Mr. Claxton: They are doing it steadily.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, he says they are doing it steadily. It is indicated in this article that an organized tank troop, tank squadrons cannot carry out that role effectively; it just cannot be done.

Mr. Churchill: I have a subject here in which the minister is thoroughly informed, but he should give some information to the committee on this. This is the last topic I propose raising, and I shall be as brief as possible. A major decision was made in regard to the units within the Canadian army some time last year, and the Regiment of Canadian Guards was organized in October. On November 26, when the minister spoke in the House of Commons and gave a review of the situation in so far as national defence is concerned, he did not mention this major decision, nor did he mention it on May 20 when he spoke in this particular debate, and I wondered at his reticence in regard to this matter.

Why should we not be informed when a new departure is entered upon, a new active regiment is formed? I put some questions on the order paper to elicit information. The minister will recall that subsequently I asked him about the order of seniority of the regiments. There are not very many of them but at the moment he could not recall what it was, and yet a major decision to create the Regiment of Canadian Guards was made some time last year and this new regiment was named first in the seniority list. That is a complete departure in recent times from the army tradition, and some explanation should be forthcoming.

Well, the only way we have of getting information here is by questions on the order paper or by asking the minister. I did what I could. I asked him to name the infantry regiments in the Canadian army, when they were formed and to give their battle honours. Of course the committee will recall the astonishing information which came as a result of these questions. The answer as to the infantry regiments is as follows, and I think their names should be recorded.

Mr. Claxton: What is the date of that?

Mr. Churchill: March 10, 1954. My question was:

What are the infantry regiments of the Canadian active army?

The answer was:

The following are the infantry regiments of the Canadian army, active force: (a) The Regiment of Canadian Guards; (b) The Royal Canadian Regiment; (c) Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry; (d) Royal 22e Regiment; (e) The Queen's Own Rifles of Canada; (f) The Black Watch (Royal Highland Regiment) of Canada.

Then I asked for the dates when these regiments were originally formed. The answer was:

Their dates of original formation are: (a) October 16, 1953;

That is the Regiment of Canadian Guards. The Royal Canadian Regiment, December 21, 1883; Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, August 10, 1914; Royal 22e, October 22, 1914; Queen's Own, April 26, 1860; the Black Watch, January 1, 1862. My third question was:

What are the battle honours of each regiment?

The answer to that I will not read in full but part of the answer reads:

(a) The Regiment of Canadian Guards: none.

So here we are faced with this situation. The first regiment in seniority of the infantry regiments in the Canadian army is the Regiment of Canadian Guards, organized in October, 1953, carrying no battle honours. If you look at these other famous regiments you will see that their battle honours run from 20 to 27 and that is not counting the battle honours which will be accorded them after the second world war and for Korea. The older regiments have a great tradition behind them. I shall not dwell on the statement on the value and importance of tradition made this afternoon by the hon. member for Simcoe North in very fine terms. It is important, as he pointed out. Here we have a new regiment the first of the line and the senior regiment of the Canadian army with no tradition behind it.

Mr. Ferguson: Shame.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder why the minister in organizing this new regiment did not bring behind it some of the other regiments which have an honourable history in the Canadian army. He could have incorporated the footguards, the horseguards, or the Canadian Grenadier Guards. These names are not unfamiliar within the army. Why were they not made a part of this regiment and their battle honours carried over so that men serving in this new regiment would have something behind them which would serve as an inspiration?

I shall not read a newspaper report, Mr. Chairman, but I would like to refer to an advertisement which has been put in the newspapers and which is the responsibility of the Department of National Defence. It reads:

Applications now being accepted for the new Regiment of Canadian Guards.

And then listen to the sentences which follow: "Second to none on the parade ground." That seems to be the first matter of importance.

Mr. Ferguson: Never fought and were never defeated.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder if this is a great inducement—

Some hon. Members: Quack! Quack!

Mr. Ferguson: Listen to the crows.

Mr. Churchill: Then it goes on to say:

Incorporating the colour and smartness of military tradition at its finest, the Canadian guards ranks first among the army's regular infantry regiments.

Further on it says:

Right now there is a requirement for young men who would like to share in the colourful dress and ceremonial activities of the new Canadian guards.

Mr. Ferguson: Chocolate soldiers.

Mr. Churchill: I was a bit shocked in 1946, Mr. Chairman, when I returned from overseas to see advertisements appearing in our newspapers and carried on buses urging young men to join the forces and offering them security. I think that was a remarkable statement to be put out, to urge young men of 18 and 19 to enter the services in search of security. Fortunately those advertisements disappeared and were replaced by others which made a different appeal to the young and active members of the population. This advertisement for the Canadian guards is reverting to that type of thing which appeared in 1946, and which places the emphasis in the wrong direction.

I do not know whether the men who are in the Regiment of Canadian Guards have been drafted or in what manner it has been formed but I hope the minister will give us a complete statement. My sympathy goes to those men who will be attempting to do their duty as they see it and who have back of them no tradition. It could have been arranged that they had something back of them in the way of tradition. But instead of that the emphasis is put on the parade ground and on ceremonial drill. In this century during which we have had war for most of the time we have no time for that type of emphasis. There is a place for ceremonial drill, for fine trappings and for good appearance for men in the armed services, but surely the emphasis should be on other matters. The emphasis must be on fighting quality and the men who enter the armed services must be prepared to risk their lives, and they will risk their lives if back of them they have a tradition within their regiment to look up to and which will comfort them in time of peril. Let me just quote from Field Marshal Sir William Slim, former chief of the imperial staff:

> One vital element in army life is pride of regiment which is still the foundation of the British soldier's stubborn valour.

Pride in regiment is an important thing. I am not unaware that regiments formed in time of war and placed on active service can very quickly acquire esprit de corps and build up a tradition such as was done by the Royal 22nd and the Princess Patricia's in the first world war. I have known regiments in both world wars, hastily formed and put into action which soon developed a fine esprit de corps and a magnificent tradition. But it is only on the battlefield that that can be developed and it seems to me to be rather a mistake to organize now, out of the blue, a regiment such as this and giving it the rather famous name of the Canadian guards with the implication that it is—and I believe it is to be—affiliated with the guards of Great Britain. That famous name is being used and yet behind this regiment there is nothing in the way of tradition. It will be difficult for the officers and men serving in the Canadian guards when they come in contact with some other regiment just to rest on their laurels as being a great parade ground regiment or a regiment expert on ceremonial duties. They have no tradition behind them of service on the battlefield and I think they are being placed in an awkward position. My sympathies go out to the officers and men who are at present serving in that regiment.

There is still time for the minister to do something about it. He can make the necessary arrangements to incorporate in that regiment some of these others regiments in Canadian history which have an honourable record. I do not know why the minister should not explain to the house at an early date when decisions such as this are taken so as to avoid misrepresentation, if you like, and misunderstanding, and to avoid criticism. We would gladly have heard him on November 26 with regard to this major decision, but not a word was said and we were dependent on the press and advertisements in the newspapers for information of this nature.

I hope the minister will tell us the purpose behind this and what he proposes to do to give this regiment something more than is implied in the advertisement to which I referred. It cannot compete properly with these other famous regiments, with their great tradition behind them, on such a slim basis as that. It has been named the senior regiment in the Canadian infantry and these other regiments with a much longer service have been overlooked. I hope that it is not intended to be just an imitation of the guards of England who are held in the highest respect among fighting men throughout the world. I hope it is not that. We do not want in this country an imitation of something elsewhere. We have our own products.

But as I say, the word "Guards" has been used in the Canadian army for many long years by those other regiments that I have mentioned and we could quite properly use it if we incorporate them in this formation in some way. But at the moment the impression abroad is that this is some new regiment designed to be second to none on the parade ground, designed to be first in executing ceremonial drill, with no fighting tradition behind it and not being prepared for battle. I think that the wrong type of suggestion is being made to our young men to join that regiment. I would not have taken this time on this subject, Mr. Chairman, had the Minister of National Defence earlier in the year taken the house into his confidence in this matter and given us the information which we deserve to have.

Mr. Claxton: I think I should answer the hon. member, Mr. Chairman. He says he did not get any information. A release was issued in my name announcing this decision. I should say it would be in October, 1953. The regiment came into existence. They started work. Then the hon. member asked a question which was answered on March 10, 1954 giving him the information. But then all this kind of thing that he has just said was raised by another hon. member on May 21, 1954, as reported at page 4974 of Hansard. It is all there. Why he should be so greatly concerned about the matter, I do not know.

I can tell him that the regiment of guards is going great guns. It is derived from some famous units of the Canadian army. The first regiment of the guards is derived from the third battalion of the R.C.R.'s. The second regiment is derived from the third battalion of the P.P.C.L.I. The third regiment is derived from the first infantry battalion which is in turn derived from five famous units of the reserve forces. The fourth guards battalion is derived from the second Canadian infantry battalion and is now on service in Korea.

As far as I know the question has been raised—and I think I am right—only by the hon. member for Peel, I think it was, and this hon. member who has raised the question tonight. I have not had a single word of complaint from either the old battalions or the new. They are getting along well. They are working well. They are doing their job. They are good Canadians. They are going to be good soldiers. They have a fine background of tradition through their origin. By what other name you could call them to suit the Canadian scene at that particular moment, I do not know.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, when you take an unknown regiment and put it at the top of the list of Canadian regiments and put last the famous Queen's Own regiment of the city of Toronto and the little black devils of Winnipeg, I think some comment should be made. The minister said today he was talking about many well known Canadian regiments. Let me remind the minister that those regiments were Canadian in Canada before he was ever thought of as a Canadian.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Ferguson: The Liberal crows from Toronto are not men enough to get up on their feet and defend the great and famous Queen's Own Rifles of Toronto. My great-grandfather fought in that regiment for twenty years, or rather served in that regiment for twenty years. I had the great honour and privilege of serving with the black devils of Winnipeg.

An hon. Member: Bragging.

Mr. Ferguson: That is not bragging. Let us have the facts truthfully about it and they will learn something if they try it. I resent the fact—not only with respect to my regiment but with respect to the Queen's Own in which my great-grandfather served—that we bring up a new regiment or a new name, try to put tradition behind that regiment and call it the first regiment of Canada.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member is helping a lot.

Mr. Ferguson: They threw the torch for you to carry, you Canadians. The men who died in Flanders fields threw the torch to you. When we have a Minister of National Defence who throws that torch in the gutter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferguson: Do not "oh, oh" me. You will not stop me from telling the truth.

An hon. Member: This is all nonsense.

Mr. Ferguson: Oh, do not be so ridiculous.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: They handed on the torch for it to be carried by the veterans in the first war and the veterans in the second war. Let me say this to you men in the house tonight who served as soldiers in the first and the second war. You are letting the torch down as long as you let a man like the one we have today, as the head of our Department of National Defence, lower the name of the men who died and the regiments for which they fought, and put them down at the very bottom of the list as far as the standing of Canadian regiments goes. It is something that is on their conscience, as it should be. You men belong to a different party from that to which I belong, and sit on the opposite side of the house. I am not talking for a political purpose. I am talking about a disgrace that has been brought on the name of famous regiments in this country who protected this country so that we tonight can sit in parliament.

An hon. Member: Woof!

Mr. Ferguson: It is time you learned something about the traditions of Canada rather than talk about things you do not appreciate. You know nothing about Canada's traditions or how the soldiers died and bled on the battlefield.

Mr. Dickey: I know more about it than you do.

Mr. Ferguson: Then why do you not voice your truthful opinion instead of being a rubber stamp for the government?

Mr. Dickey: Why do you not?

Mr. Ferguson: You never heard a shot fired in your life. You never fought and never were wounded. That is your record. Yet you have had more to say than any man in the Liberal party. We expected more than that from you. I am fighting for these men who gave their lives in defence of this country and so made it possible for you to sit in parliament and drag their famous names down to the lowest standing among the Canadian regiments. We have a Minister of National Defence who forms a guards regiment out of a hodgepodge of other regiments which nobody knows very well and he puts down at the bottom of the list the famous rifle regiments of Canada, the Queen's Own of Toronto and the little black devils of Winnipeg, famous regiments of this country who fought a hundred years ago in defence of this country, from famous regiments of the old country, the Black Watch—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferguson: You do not like it, you men of the Liberal party. Shame on you. You have not the gumption to stand up and even defend the dead soldiers. You sit here and you let the Minister of National Defence take all their traditions from you. You are afraid to stand up and be men, every one of you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferguson: There comes a time in every man's life when he has got enough and says, "So far I will go and no further". But here we find a man who takes the "Rule, Britannia" out of the navy, the crown off the royal flying corps badges and forms a new regiment, calls it the guards and tries to justify his stand by saying, "We have put in one common cauldron some Canadian regiments". But he has by-passed regiments that are now in the permanent forces of Canada and has put the famous rifle regiments at the bottom of the list of Canadian regiments. The Minister of National Defence, supported by you Liberals, you Canadians, has done it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferguson: All right. It will never be said that Julian Ferguson would ever be so subservient to any party that he would sink into that kind of mire, thank God.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): I object strongly to the attack by the hon. member for Simcoe North on the senior member for Halifax whose father is now lying in Flanders fields and has lain there since world war I.

Mr. Ferguson: The father handed on a torch which he should now be carrying. I am not standing on my father's glory. I am standing on the glory of the men who died, including his father for whom I have every regard.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: Not only his father. Don't you try to defend him, Mister.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to the reserve force?

Mr. Pearkes: Before we deal with the question of the reserve force I should like to say that the units of the reserve forces have contributed to the various units of the active forces. There has been a good deal of difficulty in raising the units for the new active forces, and in order not to emphasize too much the decision which had to be made as to the order of seniority of the various units of the forces I think a fair effort was made by the personnel of the defence department to try to give credit to the many units which have a long record in the Canadian army. Rather than single out two or three units in order to perpetuate them in the active force, the decision was made to create this new regiment of guards. I do not quite know how a different decision could have been reached had the desire been to give credit to the great many units of the reserve army. I am not going to say any more about that matter. Coming to the question of the reserve army—

Mr. Macdonnell: May I interrupt the hon. member for a moment? I have one question respecting the active army. May I ask it now, or will it be understood that I can ask it later?

Mr. Pearkes: All right.

Mr. Macdonnell: What forces of the Canadian army are stationed in the Yukon? What is their role, what is their equipment and what is the estimated cost of maintaining them for a year?

Mr. Claxton: There are two sets of activities centred in the Yukon. The first is the part played mostly by the Royal Canadian Engineers in the maintenance and operation of the northwest highway system. The second is the operation of the Northwest Territories and Yukon telegraph system. The first has been carried on since the highway was handed over to the Royal Canadian Engineers in 1946, I believe. While we do not keep the accounts segregated that way any longer, my recollection is that the cost of maintenance and operation of the highway system is about $6 million a year. That would cover about 1,200 miles and it covers a good deal of replacement of capital installations such as bridges, culverts and the like on a more permanent basis. We are doing a steady program of replacement.

The Northwest Territories and Yukon telegraph system supplies all the telecommunication services, civilian and military, in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Speaking again from memory, I believe there are twenty-one stations in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. They carry all the military traffic, all the government service and most of the commercial. My recollection would be that the amount of revenue they take from handling commercial traffic varies but averages approximately $500,000 a year.

They handle a good many hundred thousand messages for the armed forces, weather stations and other government services, so that these are two very considerable operations, one by the engineers and the other by the signals.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would I be correct in summarizing what the minister has said in this way, that the units there are purely technical, engineers and signals, and that their duties are to maintain roads and communications? That tells the whole story of the troops located there, does it?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, if the hon. member is talking about the army only. There are of course some elements of Canadian Rangers and some reserve force elements, but I am talking about the active force army.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think the figure the minister gave for the road was for the upkeep on the road. Is that intended to cover also the cost of these units or can he segregate the cost of these units? That is the figure I seek, not the maintenance of the road but the expense of the units themselves.

Mr. Claxton: Pay and allowances for the Northwest Territories and Yukon road system for 1953-54 amounted to $572,000, and for 1954-55 they are $581,000. A total of seven officers and 178 men are engaged in this operation. With respect to the northwest telegraph system the cash estimate was less than I said because it does not include some capital expenditures. This is just pay and allowances. For 1953-54 the pay and allowances were $1,215,000, and for 1954-55, $1,550,000. There is a total of 60 officers, 400 men and 322 civilians.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister give us the rank of the commanding officer?

Mr. Claxton: Brigadier.

Mr. Macdonnell: What is the relationship of this to the Department of Public Works? There was a report that the Department of Public Works had taken over the highway and there seemed to be some misunderstanding about it.

Mr. Claxton: The Department of National Defence and the Department of Public Works are considering whether or not it would be a good thing for the Department of Public Works to take over this operation. We have had it in defence for the last eight years. It has now become stabilized, and more and more it is becoming essentially a civilian operation. We feel that it might be more economical and practical for it to be taken over by the Department of Public Works. Discussions are going on towards that end. No details have been arrived at, but I think it is moving along in the direction of the Department of Public Works taking it over.

Mr. Montgomery: A few minutes ago I understood the minister to say that the third battalion of the guards regiment was formed by five reserve units. Would he give us the names of those reserve units?

Mr. Claxton: It was formed from the 1st Canadian infantry battalion, which formed part of the 27th infantry brigade in Germany, and it in turn was formed out of five companies formed from five reserve units. I do not recall them. I can get them for the hon. member very easily.

Mr. Montgomery: If the minister will do that, it will be all right.

Mr. Dinsdale: During a parliamentary visit to the service college at Kingston I noticed that some research was taking place there. I am interested in knowing if that research is paid for out of the general appropriations for defence research, as indicated on page 36 of the white paper, and which involves the sum of $50,400,000. I should like to know also if the research is pure research or is connected with some specific problem?

Mr. Claxton: The Royal Military College is, I think it is fair to say as a generalization, on the same footing as a university. The personnel of the staff is comparable with that in most universities. In order to have a good staff you must have research done, and they must have facilities for doing research. A lot of the staff are highly qualified scientists and they would not stay at the university unless they did research. It is, therefore, very much in the interests of the college that they should do research. Part of this research is done on college time and paid for out of the vote. In addition, some of them, in the same way as the average professor at other universities, may receive grants from the defence research board, for work during the summer months.

Mr. Dinsdale: I take from the minister's remarks that grants to the service college in this respect would be on the same basis and in the same proportions as grants to the members of the staff of any university doing work for defence research?

Mr. Claxton: The same considerations would apply.

Mr. Harkness: I think there is a matter I should like to mention upon which the minister and I can agree more readily than the other matters I have mentioned. I refer to some complaints I have in regard to mail. I understand that so far as mail to Korea is concerned, there have been no complaints. Practically everyone has been well satisfied with it in recent months. There was some delay, but in recent months I believe the situation has been improved.

There have been, however, some complaints in connection with mail to Europe. I understand that the Canadian army postal corps looks after the mail for both the army and the air force in Europe. I understand they do an extremely good job of it and there is no complaint from that point of view. I understand, however, that the mail sometimes comes later than some people feel is necessary because of the fact that all the mail going to Europe has to go via T.C.A. even though there are R.C.A.F. planes going over. Although it would provide better service the mail cannot go via R.C.A.F. because it would mean competition with T.C.A. When the minister replies, I should like him to comment on that. I ask him if that is indeed the case, and if it is the case, I would ask him if he could not get that corrected so the service would be improved.

Another complaint I have received concerns the price of mail. The complaint in this regard is that Canadian rates are much higher than those of the British or United States servicemen alongside of whom the Canadians are serving. The British get ordinary letters for twopence-halfpenny and send air mail letters for sixpence for the first half ounce. The United States servicemen get their mail at the regular civilian rate of 6 cents. The Canadian rates are 5 cents for ordinary letters, which is twice the British rate, and 15 cents for a half ounce air mail. This rate is equivalent to one shilling threepence or three times the British rate. This is not a very important matter, I realize, but it is these little things, I have found in my personal experience, that cause a lot of trouble. These things such as the type of food, the way it is being prepared or served, some of these complaints over mail, are the things that cause a lot of trouble completely out of proportion to their own intrinsic importance. If one looks after a lot of the little things, very frequently you will have a unit in which there is no trouble and where the spirit and morale is very much better than it would be if you let a few of these little things go along with a lot of people labouring under a sense of injustice.

In addition to that, there is another complaint. I am informed that so far as the mail in Canada is concerned people on a station have to get their mail through the station post office. They cannot have a box there or anything along that line. The mail is put in a rack and they have to go and pick it up. They are not allowed to have the mail delivered to the general delivery in the place where they happen to be or to have a box there. This is another matter that is not very important, but as I say it is the small complaints that cause difficulty. They are matters which I believe the minister should investigate. I have received representations on the actual conditions that exist, and he may perhaps get them corrected.

Mr. Claxton: I agree with the hon. member about the importance of mail. This is something we have been trying to look after very carefully. I must say that I have had very few complaints, generally speaking. The mail seems to have been very well delivered. I have had no complaints at all about delivery to Europe.

Mr. Harkness: I said my reports on the Canadian postal corps were excellent. Everybody agreed they did a good job.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to look into it. If the R.C.A.F. do not carry mail to Europe it may be because their airlift is fully occupied by their own loads. We have hired a good deal of T.C.A. airlift service to Europe to service the R.C.A.F. abroad. There may be something also in connection with licences to carry mail or something of that kind.

Now, with regard to rates, I am very surprised at the complaint. I have never heard the suggestion before that rates were other than reasonable. Ordinary letter rate is 4 cents to the orient.

Mr. Harkness: I was talking about Europe.

Mr. Claxton: The air mail rate to the Orient is 7 cents for the first ounce. The air mail rate to Europe is 15 cents each half ounce.

Mr. Harkness: That is what I said.

Mr. Claxton: The forces letter rate is 5 cents, which would seem to be a very reasonable rate, in view of the distance to Europe.

Mr. Harkness: The point is, as I understand it, that the people in Europe have to pay the regular rate. They do not get a forces letter rate, as the British do.

Mr. Claxton: They get a forces letter form for 5 cents, and it carries a lot. This rate is much less than the United States, as I understand it.

Reserve force (including Canadian Officers Training Corps).

Mr. Pearkes: I was going to speak on the reserve forces.

Mr. Claxton: If we have reached that point I believe I should make a statement. In my opening speech on May 20, and again in reply on May 21, I said that I would make a statement on the reserve forces at this time when we came to this item. It would seem to be the most appropriate time to do so.

The reserve army, or the non-permanent active militia, as it was called, played the major role in the build-up of the Canadian army during the great war 1914-18 and the second world war, and contributed greatly to the fine record of Canada in both these wars.

Since the end of the second world war, and particularly during the last five years, there have been a number of developments which must be taken into account in considering the organization of the reserve army so as to be best prepared at any given time to meet an emergency if and when it should occur.

These developments include the war in Korea; commitment of an infantry brigade to the NATO forces in western Europe; rotation requirements; increasing emphasis on continental defence; a tenfold increase in the size of the regular army since 1939 and an even more considerable increase in its fighting effectiveness.

It has come to be generally accepted that if there were a third world war it would fall into two or more fairly well-defined stages, and the requirements of the Canadian army in the first stage could only be met by full-time or regular forces.

The role of the reserve force of the army today is, therefore, to provide a partially trained and equipped force as the nucleus of units to be mobilized and brought up to strength in the case of an emergency. The effectiveness of the reserve force depends upon a strong hard corps of volunteers, and it also depends on the active support of Canadian people throughout the country.

In May of last year the chief of the general staff, on the recommendation of the conference of defence associations and with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, established a committee of distinguished soldiers for the purpose of examining, reporting and recommending on the organization, training and administration of the Canadian army reserve force with a view to improving its effectiveness.

This committee was headed by Major General Howard Kennedy, C.B.E., M.C., and had, as additional members, Major General E. J. Renaud, C.B., C.B.E., C.D., and Major General H. F. G. Letson, C.B., C.B.E., M.C., E.D. The wide experience in civil and military affairs of the members of this committee and in particular the close association of Major Generals Kennedy and Letson with the reserve force over a period of many years, made them particularly suited to study and advise on problems of the reserve force.

Before beginning their survey, this committee was thoroughly briefed concerning peace and wartime plans for the Canadian forces. In the course of its examination and study the committee visited reserve force units from coast to coast, both at their local headquarters and during annual camp. Discussions were held with senior reserve force officers of all corps. The recommendations of the committee, therefore, were based on long experience and on close and comprehensive study on the ground of conditions and problems.

The report of the committee was submitted to the chief of the general staff in January last. It has been examined by army headquarters and discussed in detail with the conference of defence associations, as well as the general officers commanding the five army commands.

It should be observed that no particular reference is made to the various types of training—at summer or other camps, corps schools, week-end training at areas near unit headquarters, et cetera—because great latitude is already allowed each command, area and unit, so as to enable each unit best to meet local conditions.

As a result of the report and the detailed study and consideration which followed, it has now been decided to take the following steps:

1. There will be an extensive reorganization of militia units to relate them more closely to possible wartime requirements, effective peacetime training and local support. This reorganization includes:

(a) Present brigade and other formation headquarters will be replaced by a new type to be known as militia group headquarters;

(b) as the anti-tank defence role has been transferred from the artillery to the armoured corps, a number of artillery units will be converted;

(c) excess anti-aircraft will be converted to other types of artillery or amalgamated with units of other corps;

(d) as coast defence has become the primary responsibility of the navy and air force, the coast defence units will become harbour defence batteries;

(e) as the type of training in field park squadrons is not suited to the reserve force, field park squadrons of the reserve force will be converted to or included in field squadrons;

(f) two of the signal regiments are to be amalgamated to form one signal regiment;

(g) the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, and the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps will be reorganized to reflect as closely as possible the potential support in their localities;

(h) there will be a number of changes in infantry formations.

2. The Canadian army (reserve force) is to be renamed the Canadian army (militia).

3. The Canadian army (active) will be known as the Canadian army (regular).

4. There will be an adviser to the chief of the general staff in militia matters. The officer to be selected will be a senior officer with extensive service in the reserve. The first officer appointed is Major-General H. F. G. Letson, C.B., C.B.E., M.C., E.D.

5. A new directorate combining militia and cadets will be set up at army headquarters.

6. Accommodation and training facilities for the militia are being reviewed and new construction and additional facilities will be progressively provided as funds permit.

7. Steps are being taken to explain, emphasize and enforce the obligations which a man undertakes on joining a unit of the militia.

8. Minimum attendance, equivalent to 15 days' training, will be necessary before a member of the militia is entitled to receive pay.

9. The foregoing provision must be taken with a new bonus to be paid to each individual attending annual camp, provided he has attended not less than 75 per cent of local unit training in the six months preceding summer camp.

10. Training standards will be amended to enable a militia soldier to obtain his qualification in stages and to receive credit for any stage reached.

11. Field summer uniforms are to be issued for wear at camp and local headquarters training in warm weather.

12. Qualification badges in various military trades and specialties will be worn on uniforms as well as chevrons to denote length of service in the militia.

13. Full-time assistance is to be provided on an increased scale to aid militia units in their administration.

14. Unit allowances are to be simplified and consolidated to reduce the work involved in bookkeeping.

15. Grants for bands will be increased and provision of suitable instruments will be accelerated under a replacement program.

16. An allowance will be made for a dress uniform for bands.

17. In order to provide assistance in arranging local publicity for militia units, each HQ and major unit will be able to have an additional militia officer specifically for public relations duties.

18. There will be a substantial increase in grants to army cadet units and additional clothing will be provided for them.

19. Officers, serving in various honorary appointments, many of whom have done much to promote interest in the service, will be eligible for the Canadian forces decoration.

20. Income tax will now be deducted at source for all members of the militia unless a member claims that his total net taxable income is below the minimum taxable and requests that no deductions be made.

The action outlined here has been considered with the committee and is in accordance with its views.

In dealing with this matter, I should like to emphasize that the steps being taken with respect to the army reserve force are in effect the views of the reserve force itself, as ascertained and weighed by the committee under Major General Kennedy.

I should add that while the committee under Major General Kennedy made recommendations with regard to specific units, of necessity the list of specific units that were to be affected was not put before the conference and therefore was not specifically approved by it, though the conference did approve, in principle, the general steps I have outlined.

Not only is this the case but the changes recommended have all been discussed with the conference of defence associations, representing the twelve different corps associations. This body, which represents every single unit in the reserve forces, has unanimously approved the committee's recommendations to which I have referred, thus indicating that these recommendations have the active support of all its member corps.

The changes proposed are planned to tap the resources of interested and available personnel so as to provide the best basis for the build-up of forces that may be required in the second or later stages of another world war. The over-all number of units will be substantially reduced. It is expected that at the outset these changes may result in some reductions in the total number of officers and men on strength. But it is expected that they will result in more effective use of personnel.

It is hoped to work all these changes out so that there will be as few as possible actual disbandments and no loss of existing support or local interest. Further consideration is being expedited in the hope that all necessary changes will be satisfactorily completed at an early date. The reserve force associations have promised their strong support in carrying all this into effect.

In conclusion, I should like to appeal to the House of Commons sitting in committee and to the public generally to support the steps to which I have referred. They are designed to meet anticipated changes in the needs and requirements of the service and to produce increased efficiency and effectiveness of the reserve force of the army, henceforth to be known as the Canadian Army (militia). The support of the reserve force associations will, I am sure, ensure success in carrying out the new policies and changes which I have announced but the degree of that success will rest primarily on the popular support accorded it throughout the country. If this support is not continuously given many of these improvements and changes will be largely vitiated. The role, importance, and potentialities of the reserve force must be understood and acted upon.

The militia units will in no small degree be community units. Community organizations can do much toward educating our youth in the value of our free institutions. They can point out that it is the duty of each individual Canadian to do what he can to safeguard these institutions by service in the regular or reserve forces. Employers and trade unions can assist by encouraging young men and women to join the militia and by making it possible for them to acquire the necessary training and particularly practical training at summer camps.

The citizen who plays his part in Canada's militia is serving the interests of his country at the expense of his own free time. He must be made to feel that the public appreciates the effort he is making in peacetime just as much as the appreciation shown to those who participate in active service. All our citizens can thus contribute to creating the realization in our youth that service in the militia is an honourable duty which all should discharge in order that as many Canadians as possible may be made ready to defend their country.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, of course you will realize it would be extremely difficult to comment adequately upon this important document which we have received only just this minute. In fact very few hon. members have even received a copy, and have to depend upon what they heard the minister say. I cannot help expressing regret that earlier publicity has not been given to the findings of this committee. As long ago as January of this year I asked the minister whether he intended to table the Kennedy report. He said he was not prepared to do that as it was a report prepared at the request of the chief on the general staff but that he would—and these were his words—report to the house very shortly. Well, a good many months have gone by since then, and there has been much uncertainty amongst the units of the Canadian Army (militia), as it is now to be called, because of this long delay.

We are told that the recommendations of the report, which the minister is prepared to accept, have been concurred in by the various defence associations. Of course no reference was made to the recommendations of the report which the minister is not prepared to accept, and that must unfortunately remain a closed book because we are not privileged to see the report. I hope they are not extensive because, as the minister has said, the success of the reserve army, of the militia unit, depends entirely upon the public support that they receive. We all believe that a reserve force is necessary.

General Gruenther has emphasized the importance of the reserves. Well, we cannot have an adequate and an efficient reserve force unless not only members of parliament but the whole public get behind those units. I feel sure that members of the house from every party and group will give support to the units of the reserve force.

If there is any comment at the present moment as to the recommendations of this report, I think it is likely to be upon the fact that we really do not know what the Kennedy report says and what their main recommendations or what the other recommendations are that the minister is not prepared to accept.

In those items which were mentioned I note with particular satisfaction that there is to be an adviser to the chief of the general staff on militia matters. The emphasis on our forces has veered in recent years from the reserve forces to the active forces. Remember that in the days before world war II there was a very small active force and the energies of the Department of National Defence and the staffs across the country were mainly directed to increasing the efficiency of the reserve units. After the second world war that emphasis was changed, and there has to a certain extent been a neglect of the reserve units. By appointing a particular adviser to the chief of the general staff and a man of the experience, both with the reserve and in special duties, of Major General Letson, we may rest assured that the requirements of the reserve forces in the future will be vigorously presented to the chief of the general staff.

As far as I can gather from recommendation No. 9, it would seem that there will be a bonus paid now to men who have completed a certain percentage of their training in camp. That is dependent upon their having carried out a certain number of days' training prior to moving into camp. I think that the change of name and change of status of the brigade commands is a step in the right direction, because quite obviously those brigade commands could not assume the ordinary duties of a brigade headquarters on mobilization. They were not called upon to do so during the mobilization of 1939. Specially selected officers from the country as a whole were chosen for brigade commands and brigade staffs.

I know of no one single recommendation which will meet with greater approval amongst the personnel of the reserve forces than will the last one with reference to income tax. Members on this side of the house have repeatedly asked that some relief should be given to the officers and men who have contributed so much of their time. I am pleased that when an actual canvass was made by these three retired generals they sensed the wish of the reserve unit and they have been able to have the government accept a recommendation which will relieve the officers and men from income tax payments in part on their reserve army pay.

I do not intend to comment further on this report at the present time. I am pleased that it has been referred to the defence associations. In fact, it is quite obvious that the defence associations a year ago really initiated the idea that such an investigation should be carried out. The fact that the various corps associations approved the recommendations of the investigating committee, which have been accepted by the government, indicate that they are prepared to accept those recommendations and to stand behind the plans of the department to try and make the reserve forces more efficient.

I think it is of the utmost importance that the names of the units which are to change their corps or be disbanded or in any way affected be published at the earliest possible moment. I had hoped the minister would have been able to attach as an appendix to this report a list of those changes. There is merely the announcement that there are going to be many changes and that will continue the uncertainty. Until the changes are published it will be very hard for the commanding officers of the various units to proceed with the training programs.

The one point which strikes me as perhaps not being as sound as I would like to have seen it is the fact that a reduction is being made in the number of anti-aircraft artillery. I should have thought that the reserve army would have been called upon to play a major role in the defence of this country and provide anti-aircraft defence for the localities in which they are stationed. We have heard a good deal about the need for increased emphasis being placed upon civil defence, and the dangers to which this country might be subjected in the event of a third world war. It would seem to me that anti-aircraft artillery units should work in close co-operation with the civil defence organizations of the land, and therefore I am surprised to hear the minister state—and I think I heard correctly—that there was to be a considerable reduction in the number of anti-aircraft units in the reserve army.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, since the minister has just made this statement tonight I have had no opportunity of studying it and I propose to make only one or two brief comments on it, particularly in view of the fact that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, despite the extremely short notice, has covered the report very well. Following the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition this morning, however, the minister stated in connection with the Kennedy report that there was no reason why the officials of the government should disclose the reasons for any action the government might take. I presume he had in mind the fact that he was going to give us this report tonight and his remarks struck me as rather peculiar because I have always understood that one of the duties of the opposition was to ask questions in regard to the reasons why the government took any particular action, and that one of their functions was to secure and probe into these reasons. I think the statement the minister made to the effect that there was no reason why the government should disclose reasons for any action they may take is directly contrary to our ordinary democratic procedures and the way in which we carry on government in this country.

I am extremely glad we have had this report. From what I could gather as the minister read his statement there are going to be quite a lot of changes which will help improve the reserve forces, which is an aim for which I think we are all striving. However, I am sorry we have not got the Kennedy report itself so that as a result we could form our own conclusions on the evidence presented by units all across Canada and gathered by the three generals who conducted the investigation. In other words, I think we in this house are entitled to have the reasons why the decision which has just been announced was arrived at and to know the basis on which it was arrived at. However, I am glad we at least have the statement made by the minister. One thing I noted in particular was that a definite decision has been taken to transfer the anti-tank corps at divisional level to the armoured corps, and that a number of anti-tank units will be transferred from artillery to the armoured corps. I am sure the artillery will very much regret losing those units but it will be to gain the advantage of armour and certainly I think it is a proper move to make. I think the self-propelled anti-tank guns in use today can be of better use in the armoured corps than in the artillery, and I think a move in this direction should have been made long before this. As I pointed out earlier, for the past two or three years we have not had any anti-tank units or components in our army at all, and I am extremely glad that we are now going to have these units as part of the armoured corps.

The Chairman: Does that conclude the discussion on reserve army?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say a few words on the reserve army. I refrained this morning from saying anything about the reserve army although I am interested in it. We have a battalion in my area which gained fame during the last war and during the previous one, and I might say to the minister that there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction during the last few months and a lot of rumours due no doubt to the fact that this Kennedy committee has been going around and the officers and men do not know what is going to happen to them. As my colleague said a few minutes ago, I think it is important that the list of these battalions or regiments that are going to be maintained be posted soon. A great many of these units right now do not know what is going to happen. The officers are having a difficult time to get men out. The men are wondering whether the unit is going to be disbanded.

You would be surprised to know, Mr. Chairman, how much information about this report is around the country. How much of it is authentic is what we do not know. I think it is most unfortunate that the government do not see fit to inform members of parliament of the true facts about a report like this. We are the people who are approached when we go back to our constituencies. When we go to our homes these people want to know what is going on in Ottawa. They almost think we are not around in the house and that we do not even ask the department what is going on. When we tell them that the department will not disclose these facts, they are amazed. I want to bring out that point.

I think we are entitled to this information and that we should receive it at an early date. If you expect us and the public to give you the support which you need to have a successful reserve military force, you must pass out the information. That is the first lesson that we all learned in the army. You cannot carry out any successful exercise unless everybody is in the picture. You just cannot take out a few staff officers and a lot of brass and carry out a successful exercise. Anybody who is in the army will agree with me on that point. Everybody must be in the picture.

I believe we should have good reserve forces. I believe that they really will be the first line of defence in case of trouble. The active forces you have are all tied up and they will continue to be tied up, and they will be the last troops to get to the vital places where defence is necessary. Defence is therefore going to fall back on what you are now going to call the reserve or the militia group. You therefore need the support of the public, and you will not get that support unless you put the public in the picture. If you do not put the members of parliament in the picture, you will not get the public in the picture. I therefore think it is important that we be told all the facts and that we be told them at an early date so that we can talk intelligently, so that we can help you, so that you can help the public, and so that we can get together and in cooperation have a good reserve unit.

I know that for a number of years before the last war it was not easy to get a reserve unit up to strength or up to standard. I was one of those who had the experience of spending not only a little bit of money and time but quite a bit of it. I may say that I never regretted it because we had a battalion which, when the war broke out, was one of the best in our brigade. It was selected, thank goodness, because of the fact that it had won the brigade prize for a number of years. That was not done by sitting back and not putting the public in the picture. You cannot expect to have a good reserve unit unless you have the businessmen, the ordinary farmers in the community and all the people behind that unit. In order to do that, you must give some support to the officers and to the members of parliament, the members of the legislature and the businessmen in that community.

I may sound a little bit drastic in this matter but really and truly I have sat back since the war and noticed the reserve unit going down and down. It has been going down because it has not been getting the support of the public; and it has not been getting the support of the public because nobody has ever come down to our area and invited to a meeting the ordinary citizens and the ordinary farmers from which we have to draw our recruits, the people in that community. Nobody has ever asked them to a meeting to explain what the reserve army is for or what role the reserve army is expected to carry out in case of an emergency. Unless you are prepared to do that, you will not get a good reserve unit. I plead with the minister.

Under this reorganization I hope that unit in my area will be one of the units that will be retained. I do not know whether it will be retained or not. It could be possible that it will not be retained. I suppose that better units will be selected. Maybe that matter has all been decided. But if it is retained you could have a good unit, if you give us some support. If you put us into the picture you will get my support and you will get the support of many other reserve officers who are there. At the moment they will not do one thing because they do not know —and this is a fact—what role the reserve army should be playing. I claim that is the fault of the army. It is not the civilians' fault. I can be backed up in that statement by many other officers with good service in the last war and in the first war and who did good service in the reserve units between the wars.

I impress this point upon the minister. You have got to pass on all the information that you possibly can. If you do that you will get the support of the people who will make a good service unit. Pay is not going to bring them in. Pleasure is not going to bring them in. Security is not going to bring them in, except the type of security that you have got to impress upon those young men. You must impress upon them that they need this training to protect their wives and families in case of emergency. That is the type of training that will bring them in. You have got to give them enthusiasm, not for the few dollars they will earn but because they really believe in a cause, because they believe there may be another war, and that if there were another war their service would be needed. I believe it is needed. I believe that is the type of training these young men need.

Royal Canadian Air Force—regular and general.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, will you call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Dinsdale: Are we carrying on, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Shall the hon. member have leave to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Winch: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Macdonnell: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, on the item before the committee I have just a few brief questions. Perhaps I can present them all together and the minister can deal with them in the same form. My first question concerns the problem of recruiting for the R.C.A.F. in particular but it relates also, of course, to the general problem of recruiting in the other branches of the services. A few weeks ago—to be specific, on May 17—I received from the Department of National Defence a reply to a question on this aspect.

[Mr. Montgomery.]

Unfortunately I did not make myself too clear at the time. Perhaps I can have this evening an enlargement upon that reply.

I asked the minister this question: In the case of veterans of world war II re-enlisting in the Canadian armed forces is any reference made to world war II records for screening purposes? In reply to that question I received the answer "Yes". I should like to go a little bit further and to ask the minister whether, in the case of these veterans of world war II re-enlisting—whether it be in the air force or in the army —any reference is made to the records of the Department of Veterans Affairs. If that is so it would avoid a situation that crops up periodically in our defence forces where an undesirable recruit seems to slip through the screening net, with considerable embarrassment to the department as well as to himself. I would appreciate it if the minister could reply to the extended question I have presented to him this evening.

I have also been interested in the wash-out rate among aircrew in particular. It has been suggested from time to time that because of the difficulty of obtaining a desirable type of recruit for aircrew training the wash-out rate is unnecessarily high among our R.C.A.F. recruits. Is it possible to give any information on this score and any statistics which will present a comparison of our wash-out rate with that of trainees from the other NATO countries participating in our air training scheme?

Recently the Department of National Defence has extended its excellent program for training university students in the various branches of the services. I note that on page 27 of the white paper, I believe it is, the total figure is given of the number of students taking part under the R.O.T.P. scheme. The figure for the R.C.A.F. is 1,984. I believe this scheme was further extended recently making it possible for university students to have a short experience in the armed forces during the summer recess with the hope of encouraging such students to participate in the more extensive R.O.T.P. scheme. Does the figure of 1,984 for the air force include this special group or does the total figure of officer cadets for all the armed forces that is given in the white paper, 6,955, include this particular group?

I also note that the expenditure for film displays and other material of that kind is up from $935,000 to $1,509,000 for the current year. This would suggest that the Department of National Defence is contemplating a more vigorous recruiting program than hitherto. It also suggests that perhaps the recruiting program has not been going as well as anticipated with the result that the department considers there is a necessity of giving further publicity to this important aspect of our whole defence program.

Mr. Claxton: In answer to the hon. member's interesting questions, he asked first whether, in the case of veterans of world war II desiring to enlist, any reference is made to their records in world war II. I am informed that when they apply to join one of the forms they sign is a form dealing with their previous war experience. That form is referred for further inquiry to the Department of Veterans Affairs which keeps the records of veterans of the first and second world wars. My understanding is that the answer is yes, but I do not want to suggest for a moment that this is done sufficiently rapidly to screen out people who may have had bad records. An effort is made, but this is a very large-scale operation. We are dealing with another government department, and I am not sure whether or not that is done in time to turn down a man on the score that he has had a bad record if he does not disclose it himself. However, a check is made.

The hon. member also asked about the wash-out rate for aircrew. This rate is not given in any country. We have checked this, and I think hon. members will appreciate the reasons for not doing so. I am not in a position to give any comparison between the wash-out rate for R.C.A.F. and other trainees. This is a matter which is receiving continuous consideration by everyone concerned in our air force and the other air forces, and we are working together very closely on it. I must say personally that I am reaching the point where, having had some experience and having discussed the matter extensively with experts in this field in other countries, I am beginning to doubt whether increasing the level of selection produces a corresponding decrease in the rate of losses in training. You get to a point where, whatever the rate of refusal on selection is, statistically the rate of losses in training appears to be just about the same, so that you could select out too high a proportion without getting corresponding returns. However, that is an idea of mine. Other people are testing the matter scientifically.

The hon. member also asked whether in the figures given in the white paper for R.O.T.P. personnel we include any of this new group he mentioned. I was not able to hear precisely what he said. If they are officer candidates from the universities or the service colleges then they are included. If, however, they were previously officers and are taking refresher courses they are not included in that figure. The figure in the white paper is for officer candidates only.

The hon. member inquired about the expenditure in an item on page 317, I believe. I understand he was referring to the item for films, displays, broadcasting, advertising and other informational materials, $936,000 for this year and $936,700 for last year. It is very much the same figure. We feel it is desirable to maintain advertising at about the same level, but I can assure the hon. member and the house that this matter is being reviewed within the next two or three weeks to see if we cannot effect some further reduction in recruiting expenses. We have some experience in this regard. We did make a substantial reduction in March, April, May and June of 1950 and the rate of recruiting slipped very materially. We were about reaching our then targets or coming within sight of them. Then we had the Korean affair and it was necessary to build up the program again. Personally I am rather opposed to making too sharp a drop until we see whether or not we are maintaining our present levels in the services and increasing them slightly towards the targets.

Of course, hon. members should appreciate that as we attain our target, not that we will ever have any fixed target because we will be changing from year to year, but as we reach about the targets we will see that wasting will exactly equal intake and intake will equal wastage. We shall have an exact equilibrium. People will talk then about our high rates of wastage. Our aim will be to maintain our intake at precisely the level necessary to meet wastage. As long as we do that, we will be meeting the target.

Naturally, we will always be striving to keep down wastage in order to keep the men of experience. Actually our wastage rates for the three services are I believe very favourable. Let me put it this way, our rates of re-engagement for the three services are very favourable. I have got the rates for other countries and for ours, and they are improving in our country or holding their own, while relative to the others with which we are familiar, they are very much better. This is a good position, but I should like to see it still better.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to ask one further question concerning the use of D.V.A. files. Can the minister indicate whether it has been the practice to refer to D.V.A. files since the beginning of recruiting in connection with the Korean campaign or recruiting since Korea or is it a new practice that has been added in recent times?

Mr. Claxton: This is relatively recent.

Mr. Winch: I have just one short question. I am not going to raise the matter which I understand is being discussed between the Department of Transport and the minister of defence, the matter of the skyways for the various planes, but I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the hundreds of millions of dollars Canada has invested in aeroplanes. Surely we do not want to see them damaged if it is at all possible to escape damage. We all know that accidents will happen, but why invite accidents?

The question I should like to ask the minister is: Is it not possible to issue and enforce orders that R.C.A.F. planes shall not deliberately buzz the major cities of the Dominion of Canada? I was home over the Easter week end for a few days, and not one but a number of aeroplanes zoomed and buzzed the major city of Vancouver. It was really frightening. The roar of the planes was such that you would have thought a plane was in trouble and coming down. All the windows rattled. People by the thousands dashed out of their homes to see what was happening. I did myself. Here were a number of planes, five or seven, zooming back and forth over the city of Vancouver. If there had been a slight defect in the plane, the pilot and crew were absolutely doomed, as was the property and lives of the people of Vancouver. Why is it allowed to continue? Can it not be stopped?

Mr. Claxton: Both the Royal Canadian naval air arm and the Royal Canadian Air Force have to fly by the rules regarding civil aviation. They are just as much subject to those rules as commercial aircraft, and that applies to low flying or flying on certain levels, flying by instruments and everything else. They are completely subject to the same rules. I can assure you that in the case of the two service air forces, these rules are strictly enforced. Whenever any infraction is found, severe disciplinary action is taken. When this happens a man may be dismissed from the service, and then very frequently I have representations made that he should be restored.

I know of the incident in Vancouver to which the hon. member referred. It was drawn to my attention before. This was an occasion when the naval air arm had been out doing some exercises at Patricia bay. On the way back from Patricia bay to the east they, as a way of celebrating the Queen's birthday, did a flypast over Vancouver. They understood that this had been advertised and cleared with the local people, the newspapers and so on. Apparently it was not, and it was a surprise. This was planned and organized as a patriotic demonstration, as is done on numerous occasions. We had a magnificent flypast over Ottawa on the occasion of the coronation when 140 aircraft went by. Some of them were below ordinary flying height, but very little danger is involved in that. However, it is disturbing and I am assured there was a misunderstanding about it, otherwise it would not have occurred.

With regard to other matters, we simply are not in a position to say to the R.C.A.F. that they must not fly in or out of the airfields that have been built for the R.C.A.F. at vast expense to the Canadian people, whether they be at Moose Jaw, Saskatoon or any of the other places. Each of these airfields probably represents an investment of $30 million. They have to be located near a city and they are operated as safely as possible. At some of these airfields the trainees rise and descend at the rate of more than one a minute, so that the air may at times be infested with Harvards. If the weather is clear, there is no reason why that should represent a hazard.

In the case of the Moose Jaw business I have nothing to add to the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce who made the statement for the government in that connection. We are looking into it and we are hoping to arrive at some very sensible and reasonable provision which will make it less likely than the almost mathematical impossibility that a collision should occur. It is almost impossible to conceive that a collision should have occurred between those two aircraft in broad daylight; yet it did; that is being investigated.

Mr. Shaw: Earlier in the day the minister indicated his intention of placing on the record a statement regarding fire-fighting equipment and facilities.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, I did. The hon. member asked me about fire in R.C.A.F. hangars, and I promised to give him and other hon. members at various times, information about it. I thought it would be best if I dealt with all the questions at once. At the present time we have 187 hangars for storage or maintenance work. Of this total only 26 were constructed after the second world war. The new hangars are all of fire-resistant construction. The 161 older hangars cost a total of approximately $14 million when they were constructed. They were, of course, rushed up and were of temporary wooden construction. They have lasted much longer than planned, and many of them are still capable of being used, particularly in view of the fact to replace them all with modern fire-resistant types would cost approximately $177 million today. You get into a position where the interest on the cost of replacement would be far bigger than the average amount of fire loss on this account, which has been about $700,000 a year.

Consequently, we have a replacement program with which we are proceeding, but on the basis of economy we would not be justified in tearing down these old hangars and replacing them even if we had the productive machinery and resources to do it at once.

Mr. Shaw: I should like to stress, of course, that I did not at any time suggest they should tear down the old hangars and replace them. Would the minister indicate the system of fire watching that is maintained? If he recalls, when I was speaking previously, I quoted an editorial from one of the Calgary daily papers in which it was indicated that to the best of their knowledge an adequate system of fire watching was not maintained. I believe they pointed out that with the amount of investment in government hangars they would be warranted in having one person on duty at all times. We realize fully that when a fire starts in a hangar, at least if it makes any headway at all, it is just about impossible to stop it. But it does seem to me that if someone is on the spot at all times that a fire might very easily be detected in its very early stages, and there would probably be some opportunity of stopping it. Just what is the policy with respect to that?

Mr. Claxton: At each air station they have a service fire-fighter squad which is highly trained and fully equipped. In this case it was on the scene of the fire within a minute of discovery. In addition, there are fire prevention services and patrols. They are arranged in accordance with the regulations laid down by headquarters of the three services and with the work of the fire marshals. If we had men constantly on duty at each of say six hangars it would mean 24 men a day, and would amount to a good deal of money.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I have had some complaints from officers who served in the air force during the second world war and then went into civilian life, some of them working for various government departments. They were then called back into the service at the time of the Korean crisis. They were given leave of absence by the departments for only four years. Now they are in the position of either leaving the air force and forfeiting their gratuities—that is, if the air force would let them go; and the air force is under no obligation to do so—or, having overstayed their four years' leave of absence from the department of government, they have lost their jobs in civil employment. What liaison is there between the Department of National Defence and other departments of government?

Mr. Claxton: This is the first time the question has been brought to my attention. I will look into it.

Mr. MacLean: Thank you very much. As a matter of fact I have taken it up with the department concerned. Now, I have a question regarding civil employees. I notice there is a very large increase in some classifications of employees. For example typists, cleaners and helpers. I suppose these are civilians who are employed to replace service personnel?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. MacLean: In the case of cleaners and helpers, for instance, the number has increased from 39 to 482, as set out at page 315. Then, there are other large increases in some other trades, although those increases are not as great as the one I have indicated.

Mr. Claxton: This is largely a reclassification by the civil service commission of a number of messmen positions to those of cleaners and helpers.

Mr. MacLean: And I notice the same thing in connection with the corps of commissionaires. Is this just a reclassification?

Mr. Claxton: We are trying so far as possible to replace service personnel by members of the corps of commissionaires.

Mr. MacLean: I believe it is the intention of the air force to move the wing in North Luffenham to the continent, if that has not already been done. Is it the intention to retain North Luffenham as a Canadian air force station, or will that be returned to the R.A.F.?

Mr. Claxton: It will be returned. We do not propose to make the move until the station at Marville in France is built and ready for habitation. Then the move will be made. It was first planned that this move would have taken place in December, but that would not have been a very good time to make a move. As it happens the station is not likely to be ready. Married quarters will not be quite ready and the move will not be made until March or April.

Mr. MacLean: Then a further question. I notice that in the reserve air force there are a group of civilian employees for whom there was no item last year. What is the explanation of that? Is it considered now that it is beneficial to employ civilians in reserve squadrons? I am referring to what appears at page 318.

Mr. Claxton: These have been carried here as part of the active force increment with the reserve squadron.

Mr. MacLean: Would the minister be kind enough to make a very brief statement as to what progress is being made in two regards, first as to the equipping of squadrons stationed in Canada with CF-100's and the other as to the equipping of squadrons overseas with Orenda-powered Sabres.

Mr. Claxton: With regard first to the equipping of squadrons with CF-100's, I may say that is continuing. As I said before, I expect all the regular squadrons to be equipped with CF-100's will be organized and in existence, and at least partly equipped with CF-100's, by the end of this year.

The delivery of Orendas for the F-86 is going on apace. Aircraft are being flown across. They are being put on stations. We will be making aircraft available with the J-47 engine when they are released and available for mutual aid.

I think hon. members would be interested in a fact that I believe I can give safely now. I refer to the figures of aircraft we have disposed of to other countries. We transferred to Great Britain 370 Sabres with, of course, American engines and other government-found property representing about 30 per cent of the cost. We sold to the United States 60 Sabres for use in Korea, and 60 for transfer by them to Great Britain. We have now allocated to Greece and Turkey 82 each. If my mental arithmetic is right that represents a total of 594 Sabres that we have made available to other countries, in addition to those necessary to equip ourselves.

We have already produced, of this leading aircraft of this type, over 1,100. And when you speak about the Russians having 20,000 front-line aircraft, of which 50 per cent are jets, it must be kept in mind that we have produced 1,100 of this type alone.

Mr. Fleming: There is one matter, Mr. Chairman, I wish to mention. It has been the subject of correspondence between the two ministers and myself and relates to the construction by the Department of National Defence at the R.C.A.F. station on Avenue road in Toronto of a large three-storey building, which looks like a factory.

This property was sold by the city of Toronto to the crown in 1940 at the urgent request of the government. It is the old Eglinton Hunt Club property. The city conveyed the property at the request of the Department of National Defence to the crown in 1940, in view of a very urgent plea from the department to make the property available for use in connection with the activities of the Department of National Defence. It has been developed as an R.C.A.F. station; not, of course, an operational station, but known as No. 1 A.T.S.

Last year, without any intimation to the property owners in the neighbourhood, the Department of National Defence erected on what had been the parade ground on Avenue road this building to which I have referred. It is not yet completed. It is a high, three-storey, red brick building, which has all the appearance of a factory. This building is erected in a residential area. All the property in the area is zoned, and the zoning restrictions are quite severe, in the general interest.

But when the Department of National Defence apparently decided that it needed more accommodation it gave no thought whatever to the effect the erection of this ungainly building was going to have upon property in the neighbourhood.

I may say to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that the effect of the erection of that building on that site in a residential area has been to depreciate the value of other residential property in the immediate neighbourhood quite substantially. You can just picture, Mr. Chairman, how you would feel if, living in a residential area, there was built right across from you a tall three-storey building, that has the appearance of a factory. That is how these people whose property has been damaged by the erection of that building feel over what has been done there.

The department can quibble and say: we are not bound by residential restrictions. They can go further and say that when they obtained the property at a very low price, indeed much below the actual value of the property in 1940, from the city of Toronto, it was made possible for them just to go ahead and use the existing buildings for the purpose of an R.C.A.F. station. That is a very different matter, Mr. Chairman, from coming along now and erecting an entirely new building on these premises, one, as I have indicated, which has lowered the value of properties in the neighbourhood very severely.

I brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of National Defence last year when the construction was commenced, and the minister's letter indicated that he would look into it. Then some time later I received a letter from the Associate Minister of National Defence saying in effect that these restrictions did not apply to this property. That is not the spirit of the agreement by which the property was conveyed to the crown in 1940. It happened that at that time I was chairman of the property committee of the city when the crown's representatives came before that committee and asked the city to convey that property. There was no suggestion then about erecting new buildings on the property. There was a temporary building put up there for the accommodation of personnel during the war. People did not object to that because it was a temporary building. There is nothing temporary about the building that has been erected now. It is a permanent three-storey brick dwelling, higher than any building in the neighbourhood and damaging all those affected.

Then the associate minister wound up his letter of December 17, 1953, by saying:

> While the Royal Canadian Air Force does not wish to interfere with the activities of the community which it serves, it is felt that as reasonable people the citizens of Toronto should be prepared to accept any disadvantages there might be to having this situation in operation as such disadvantages are more than offset by the advantages accruing to the municipality through R.C.A.F. activities.

Mr. Chairman, that is no answer to the complaint of persons whose properties are damaged. The city of Toronto will be second to no municipality or community in this country in the support and loyal assistance that it gives to any activities of the armed forces in this country. It will be second to none in doing its part but, Mr. Chairman, it is a very different matter that citizens of a whole municipality, in this case a million people or more, are prepared to do their part from saying that people in the neighbourhood must submit above all others in the city to the damaging of their properties, and the subtraction of substantial amounts of money from their investments. Some of those people in the neighbourhood affected have invested their life savings in their homes.

I wish to raise again the complaint that I made last year which produced no effect as far as the department is concerned, and to say that I think the department has been very thoughtless, very unfair, in the way it has gone ahead with a project which has brought this damage upon the value of homes in the neighbourhood.

Mr. Claxton: I appreciate the point made by the hon. member. We have been criticized for having too good a building in Washington and not a good enough one in Toronto. I venture to say that if you look at the unit cost of the two buildings, you will find that they are within five cents or ten cents a cubic foot of each other. However, the one in Toronto is unquestionably on too small a lot. I think that really is the point about the building. That is all the area that there was to put it on, so it was put rather flush with the street and interferes with the street line. I certainly would like to have seen it put on a larger lot.

Mr. Fleming: That is not part of the point at all. The point is that this building was erected in a residential area. You do not take three-storey buildings with a factory appearance and erect them in a residential area. I have made a complaint, and I could put it very strongly. I think the department has been very thoughtless and very unfair to these people concerned in going ahead and putting up a building of that kind in the heart of a residential area of the city and in that way inevitably causing damage to the value of their properties. There is no member in this house who would feel otherwise than these people do if the Department of National Defence just went ahead in a residential area right across the road from them and put up a big three-storey brick building that just looks like a factory or warehouse.

Mr. Claxton: It is an office building.

Mr. Fleming: From its appearance it might be a warehouse or a factory. I may tell the minister that this thoughtless action has damaged the value of homes and has subtracted a good many thousands of dollars from the investment that these people in that neighbourhood have in their homes. I raised the objection at the time when I thought it might still have been considered before the building was fully erected. Nothing was done. The plans were carried through and the building is now virtually completed. I think it is most unfair that the crown in a situation of this kind should take advantage of its own immunity from the effect of municipal bylaws in the case of property that it owns in a residential area. This property should never have been developed in this way, and the crown should never have erected this building on the property.

Mr. Harkness: There is one matter I should like to ask the minister a question about. It concerns the notification of next-of-kin when there has been an air crash, and then the subsequent putting out of the information generally. I realize the fact that the next-of-kin must be notified before the information as to who has been killed in an air crash is released, but there is quite a bit of delay before the name is released generally or the names of people who have been killed in one of those crashes. During that intervening time a great deal of mental anguish is caused to parents, wives and so forth, of men who are serving in the same area. For example, a flash comes over the radio that there has been an aeroplane crash in New Brunswick at a certain station, and everybody who has a son or a husband serving there immediately wonders whether it is his son, her husband and so forth. Until the general news is put out as to the name of that person these people of course go through great agonies of mind. As I say, I appreciate the next-of-kin must be notified first, but I wonder whether it would not be possible to expedite this matter and get the general information out so that everybody knows it, and all the relatives know what their situation is more rapidly than has been the case heretofore. It would be a great help to morale and so forth if that could be done.

Mr. Claxton: That is appreciated, Mr. Chairman. As soon as an accident does occur every effort is made through every suitable means to notify the next-of-kin. The best possible means are chosen. If there is an air force padre in the neighbourhood he is at once put on the job by long distance telephone and signal. If not, some other minister, clergyman or priest who has had service connections or an officer commanding, or other suitable person, but we do try to give the first communication to the next-of-kin by word of mouth in person. I find, through a great deal of experience in this, that it is very desirable. Only last week we had a case where it was not possible to do that, where the next-of-kin learned through other sources in advance, and it created very unfortunate and unnecessary shock. As the hon. member said, the next-of-kin must be notified first. We try to do that with the utmost speed, but we have in mind the considerations the hon. member has brought to our attention.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps the minister did not get my point. I was concerned with the relatives of the people who have not been killed.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, who might have been flying.

Mr. Harkness: Who are extremely worried that it is their relative who is concerned in this crash. My whole point was to try to get out the general information more rapidly than is being done.

Mr. Claxton: I appreciate that.

The Chairman: We shall now turn to Royal Canadian Air Force (reserve).

Royal Canadian Air Force (reserve).

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the problem of the reserve in relation to the army has been mentioned earlier this evening and many of these factors relate themselves to the air force because, as has been pointed out, the reserve is the backbone of our defence program. One of the encouraging developments in our air force defence has been the establishment of at least an operational wing of CF-100 fighters. When I say an operational wing that is merely a guess because there is no specific information in the white paper as to the exact number of squadrons which are available for operational work today. But on page 7 of the white paper in the last sentence of paragraph 14 we have reference to the fact that auxiliary squadrons will in due course be converted to CF-100 fighters. I am wondering just what time element is involved in the phrase "in due course".

There have been one or two incidents in Canada during the past two years which have suggested there is a great deal of dissatisfaction among the members of the reserve serving in auxiliary squadrons concerning the type of operational equipment available to them. Their complement consists of Mustangs and Vampires both of which are obsolete and were obsolescent during world war II. It is therefore imperative, if the reserve squadrons are the backbone of our Canadian air defence, that this re-equipping process be brought forward as quickly as possibly. I trust it will be possible for the Minister of National Defence to give us some further details in this regard. I am sure it would mean much to the morale of those who are trying to do a job with equipment that is obviously far from being adequate.

On page 318 of the estimates relative to expenses for the reserve forces I note, and I believe I am right in these figures, that the expenditure last year was $5,750,400, and this year the estimated expenditure is $3,537,000, a decrease of some $2 million covering the activities of the reserve squadrons. I am wondering what this decrease represents. Does it mean that the reserve squadrons are not operating at full strength? I note also that pay and allowances are down and I would like to know how that saving indicated in the blue book is made up by the department.

I notice also that the item for expenditure on the air cadet corps is down slightly from $447,200 to $412,000. The air cadet movement is one of the best sources for potential recruits to the regular Canadian air force. Finally, on this matter of the reserve forces, there is a reference made under this section to a certain contribution made to various military groups and I wonder if the air force association is included in these grants. I have scanned the estimates and I have not been able to locate any reference to grants in aid of activities of this kind. I trust they are being given some support because the air force association, which is made up of thousands of R.C.A.F. veterans of world war II, is a reservoir for auxiliary service personnel. It is out of the air force association that the participants in the mobilization assignment training program are largely recruited, and these air force associations right across the country are taking advantage of every available opportunity to promote the welfare of members of the R.C.A.F.

In my final word on reserve matters I would like to refer to a communication I received from the minister after our discussion on last year's estimates. Because we adjourned earlier last year than this year it was not possible for the minister to reply verbally to a question I had asked concerning the disposition of reserve units across the country. The minister in his reply dated May 15, 1953 indicated that it is contemplated that several reserve radar units would be established. During the past two years I have urged that an opportunity be given to our air force association wing in the city of Brandon to make a more positive contribution to the defence of Canada. We have one of the best wings in the country but up to the present time its contribution has been restricted largely to maintaining interest locally in air force matters because there has been no possibility of establishing a more or less active reserve unit in the city of Brandon. It occurs to me that one of these radar units, particularly a light warning set, would perhaps meet the need of an air force association such as we have in the city of Brandon. It would not involve too many personnel and would also provide basic training in a most important aspect of air force defence, that is in connection with our radar units. In his general statement the minister made reference to the fact that in the next decade we will be approaching the push button stage of aerial warfare and that, of course, means that radar will be the chief means whereby this will be accomplished. I would appreciate the minister making some comment on the questions I have raised. I would appreciate it if the minister would make some comment on those questions I have asked.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I will answer the hon. member very rapidly. With regard to R.C.A.F. associations grant, if he will look at page 322 of the estimates, he will see provision for grants of $15,000. The reason for the reduction that there is in the air cadet appropriation is that this is more realistically related to what is intended for this year.

With regard to auxiliary squadrons, we expect to begin the equipment of existing squadrons with CF-100's in 1955. But preliminary to that we plan this summer to start trying this out with a single squadron on an experimental basis. The problems involved in this operation are extremely complicated. In order to have the squadrons work with CF-100's, it will probably be necessary to have about half the strength regular force.

With regard to Mustangs, Mitchells and Vampires, may I say that Mustangs are very good aircraft for catching the kind of bombers that might come over at this particular period. Mitchells are going to continue to be used for the operation of cleaning up any landings that might take place. They are very good aircraft for the purpose. With regard to Brandon having an air station or reserve flight or something of the kind, I think the air force's answer to that would be that it has been found generally desirable to locate these air control and warning units, large or small, at places where active flying is carried on so that they can train on active flying by the R.C.A.F. and where there is not too far away a radar station which they would be mobilized to assist. Those two conditions do not exist at Brandon yet. However, we have to take it into consideration.

Contributions towards the military costs of NATO.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to speak on this item of NATO but to say that I think we have had a fairly full day. Here is NATO with an appropriation of $12 million. I think it is about time we called it a day and called it ten o'clock.

Mr. Harris: Before we do so, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I appreciate the fact that we have had a full day, but it seems to me that hon. members are in excellent shape to contribute to the debate at this time rather than at another time.

Mr. Harkness: We are very co-operative tonight.

Mr. Harris: You certainly are. I think the hon. member for Macleod could probably get the ear of the committee at this moment with a great deal of attention and that what he was about to say on NATO would be the local logical conclusion to many of the things that have been said here. I wonder whether he would reconsider so that we might finish this department tonight?

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be unpopular; I like to be co-operative. It is not a matter of wanting to say anything. I am so tuckered out that I cannot listen.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mutual aid.

Mr. Michener: Before this item is concluded I should like to ask about a project which the department seemed to have under way a short time ago, that of making the Long Branch rifle ranges available, by finding other property, so that they might be used for a housing project or other uses of that kind. Can the minister say how that matter stands?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. About five years ago I was brought into the picture with regard to Long Branch. We decided then, as a matter of policy, to co-operate with the provincial government, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the local community in working out a complete plan under which we would give up Long Branch in exchange for an equally good and convenient bit of land on which to have a range. Owing to one reason or another that kind of arrangement was not carried out. I have since announced repeatedly that we are willing to go through with it so that the department of defence would have equivalent ground for the job somewhere else. We even went so far at one stage as to take expropriation proceedings to secure ground north of Toronto. I thought this was being done without objection from the local community. There were very few farmers concerned. However, in the end they objected strenuously and we dropped the matter. Now we are exploring the possibility of seeing whether, with the improved transportation facilities in Toronto and area, it may not be possible to use Borden. That suggestion is being explored.

Items agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Claxton: If you have not left the chair, Mr. Chairman, may I express to hon. members appreciation for their co-operation.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Saturday evening I set out the agenda for this week. Subject to any unexpected changes we shall follow the order of departments as I set them out. That would mean that tomorrow we would begin with defence production, then take national health and welfare and follow with those that were indicated for tomorrow in the statement I made on Saturday evening.

Mr. Hansell: Might I ask the house leader this question? Since we were co-operative in allowing this big item with regard to NATO to pass and in view of the fact that there are many items here that could conceivably come under defence production, I am just wondering if he would like to co-operate with us a little bit and might suggest that we might be able to discuss this item on defence production.

Mr. Harris: I am not sure that I understand what my hon. friend is referring to. But certainly, at any rate, he has banked a little bit of good will on my part tonight.

Mr. Knowles: Banks have been known to go broke, though.

It being twenty minutes after eleven the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

239. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $300,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $4,577,641,724 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of when it is estimated that $2,711,822,159 will come due for payment in future years), $1,865,819,565.

General services—

240. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $237,725.

241. War museum, $24,690.

Pensions and other benefits—

242. Civil pensions, as detailed in the estimates, $2,977.

243. To authorize in respect of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force on leave without pay and serving as instructors with civilian training organizations operating under the British commonwealth air training plan who were killed, payments to their dependents of amounts equal to the amounts such dependents would have received under the Pension Act, as amended, had such service as instructors been military service in the armed forces of Canada, less the value of any benefits received by such dependents under insurance contracts which were effected on the lives of such members of the Royal Canadian Air Force by or at the expense of the civilian organizations, $4,356.

Defence Services Pension Act—

244. Government's contribution to the permanent services pension account, $36,734,187.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 22, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

WAR CLAIMS

ORDER IN COUNCIL AMENDING REGULATIONS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to table a copy, in each of the official languages, of the order in council passed yesterday amending the war claims regulations. Perhaps I might be permitted to say, by way of explanation, that it does two things. It changes priority for payment of claims so that small property claims under $2,500 can be paid as soon as they have been properly processed. Nearly all the personal claims, except those that are difficult to adjudicate, have already been paid, and the government is now satisfied there will be funds available to pay the small property claims, without jeopardizing any of the personal claims.

There is another section which extends the time for making a claim to September 30 of this year. I found on checking the other day that there were 15 or so of these claims that had come in too late. Some of them had come early in January, although the deadline was December 31. It seemed to be rather unfair, when some of these claims were for small amounts, and were really compassionate cases, that they should not have their claims adjudicated. I do not expect there will be any further extension. It is intended that this will be the final date for receiving these claims.

PIPE LINES

WESTCOAST TRANSMISSION COMPANY—DECISION BY FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce about a report appearing in this morning's paper to the effect that Westcoast Transmission has decided to appeal the recent decision of the federal power commission. Is the minister in a position to inform the house as to what are the rights of appeal—what further stages of appeal there are available—or, in other words, when we might expect some finality to the matter?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I, too, read the report in the newspaper. I understand that a finding of the federal power commission can be appealed; but I have no idea what the grounds of appeal are—whether on questions of law, as might be the case were it our board of transport commissioners, or whether on grounds of fact. In any event, I have no knowledge of the process in the United States. I can only say that I read the report.

Mr. Fulton: You do not know whether it can go to another court, or whether this is to be the final one?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, I do not know that.

WHEAT

POSSIBLE CONTINUATION OF SEVEN-BUSHEL QUOTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister say whether the seven-bushel quota will be continued for a short period beyond July 31 at any delivery points where space has not been available by that date?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I do not care to comment on the situation that will face us on July 31. It is the intention to see that everyone can deliver his wheat on the basis of the seven-bushel quota; but what mechanics will be necessary to make that possible, I cannot say.

STORAGE OF ONTARIO WINTER WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister assure the house that normal storage facilities will be available for the Ontario winter wheat crop?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. I telephoned Winnipeg and I was assured both by the transport controller and by the board of grain commissioners that every effort would be made to see that storage for the Ontario crop is provided.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

The Chairman: Resolution No. 78. Hon. members will find the vote at page 12 of the blue book, and the details commencing at page 152.

78. Departmental administration and payments to Canadian Commercial Corporation and other corporate agencies for services provided in connection with defence purchasing and production, $6,446,812.

Mr. Fleming: Is it the minister's intention to make a statement reviewing the operations of this department?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Yes, it is. A good deal of information concerning our defence production program was made available during the recent debate on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. In addition, hon. members have been provided with an excellent white paper tabled by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, as well as the annual report of the Department of Defence Production, which was tabled in March.

However, I believe that I might usefully say a few words about our major procurement programs in order to indicate the scope and nature of our industrial potential, and to outline the activity of the Department of Defence Production.

As nearly one-half of the purchases of defence equipment are made on behalf of the R.C.A.F., it is appropriate that I start with our aircraft program. Without going into detail on the program itself, I would like to make a few general comments regarding our development and production policy in the aircraft field.

Hon. members have stressed the viewpoint that we should make every effort to correlate our research and development activities with those of our allies, particularly the United States and the United Kingdom. With this, the government has always concurred and much is being done along these lines. As a matter of fact, when the Right Hon. Duncan Sandys, minister of supply in the United Kingdom government, was in Canada a few weeks ago, this subject was given a great deal of attention. Because of the nature of our aircraft industry, we are in a good position to pool our industrial knowledge with our allies. Nearly every one of our important aircraft or component companies is affiliated with an outstanding American or British firm and therefore is in a position to draw on the information available to the parent company. This is true of Canadair, a subsidiary of General Dynamics; A. V. Roe and Canadian Steel Improvement, members of the Hawker-Siddeley group; Fairey Aviation, de Havilland, Sperry Gyroscope, Lucas-Rotax, and so on.

Our aircraft program is a good example of how we utilize all available know-how and developments. After the R.C.A.F. establishes an operational requirement, a survey is made of planes either in production or at the development stage, both in the United States and in the United Kingdom, as well as in Canada. If, as a result of this survey, undertaken jointly by D.D.P. and D.N.D., the R.C.A.F. is able to find a plane that suits their needs, we are asked to take the necessary procurement action. Normally, we have two alternatives—either to purchase from another country or produce in Canada.

Naturally, we prefer to manufacture in Canada, for reasons that I need not go into at this time. However, if Canadian production would not be economical because of the limited requirements, we do not hesitate to import. This latter policy has been followed in the case of the Banshees, the Neptunes, and the helicopters which we have ordered from the United States.

Where Canadian production appears feasible, such production may be based either on a licensing agreement, from another manufacturer or design and development by a Canadian company. In the first instance, the department secures a licence agreement, and a Canadian manufacturer is given a production order. This was done for the F-86 Sabre, for the T-33, and now for the Bristol Britannia. It is true that by following this practice we eliminate development costs. On the other hand, we are faced with licence fees that are in reality a payment in support of the development staff of an aircraft industry in another country. There is no question that aircraft design and development is expensive. However, if we are to attain any degree of industrial maturity, we must encourage a certain amount of this type of development in Canada. This we have done, with a good measure of success in the case of the Canuck fighter and the Orenda engine, but we are limiting our activities to those areas in which we have a special interest and where Canadian requirements indicate the desirability of an independent approach.

On the subject of Canadian aircraft production, there is one statement which I believe will be of interest to the committee and that is that every firm with which we are doing business is producing according to schedule. These schedules are drawn up by the department with a number of factors in mind. First, of course, come the requirements of the armed services; second, the availability of components, particularly imported components; third, the question of plant loadings in order to avoid peak employment followed by heavy laying-off of help, and finally and of the utmost importance, the level of economic production.

During the first two years of the aircraft program, our major concern was to get production started. This entailed the selection and, in several instances, the creation of facilities. It meant securing complicated machine tools and a number of key materials which were in short supply throughout the free world. Finally, good management teams and skilled labour forces had to be developed. Having completed the build-up of a sizeable aircraft industry in Canada, it has been possible during the last year to place even more emphasis on economy of production. Recent studies show that on any basis of comparison, our major airframe and aero-engine producers compare favourably with the best on this continent from the point of view of efficiency and economy. This is not only a credit to the producers of the aircraft and engines—it applies equally well to our component manufacturers. Today, we have virtually no airframe, aero-engine or component production in Canada on a cost-plus basis. In most cases, we have incentive type contracts, and, as a result, costs to the government are steadily decreasing.

Other characteristics of our aircraft industry today are its diversification and its dispersal across Canada. Apart from airframes, we are producing both jet and reciprocating engines. Components in production include engine blades, precision bearings, aircraft fittings, fuel systems, and a fair range of aircraft instruments. Considerable work is also being done on materials required to meet the exacting requirements of high speeds and temperatures. Titanium in particular is receiving a good deal of attention.

As far as dispersal is concerned, we have tried to ensure that our aircraft facilities are located in such a way as to service aircraft no matter where they are located in Canada. As a result we have important plants in Halifax and Amherst, Nova Scotia; St. Jean, Quebec; Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Fort Erie, Fort William, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

Now I would like to turn to our shipbuilding program. Without going into detail, this program may be divided into four parts, that is, frigate conversion, the Arctic patrol vessel, the minesweepers, and the destroyer escort vessels. What may not be realized is that these four parts of the program actually represent four major and complex development projects. The basis on which we decided to embark on this development and production program is the same as the one we used for the aircraft program when we found no one else producing a plane to meet our requirements. After looking around, we found that no one else was working on the type of ship that we needed to perform our anti-submarine role, and so we had to do our own development. Furthermore, we decided that production in Canada, including the major components, was desirable in order to maintain a nucleus of a naval shipbuilding industry which would be available in time of emergency.

Considerable progress has been made. The original conversion program will be completed this year, and from a design and construction point of view this has been practically equivalent to producing new ships. The Arctic patrol vessel will be commissioned next month. Of the original fourteen minesweepers, all have been launched, ten have been delivered, and the remainder will be completed by this fall. As some of these ships are being made available to our NATO partners under the mutual aid program, replacement orders have been placed with the shipyards. These will be of an improved design and able to cope with the latest developments in magnetic and acoustic mines.

We now have some cost experience in the production of this type of ship, and we are therefore anxious to place incentive type rather than cost-plus contracts for these additional minesweepers, thus ensuring the greatest possible economy of production.

On the other hand, it must be recognized that it is more difficult to establish a satisfactory target price for a ship, when only one or two are built in any one shipyard, than for a production line item, such as aircraft or ammunition, where it is reasonably easy to establish basic costs, learning curves, and so forth.

Some hon. members have commented on the apparent delays in the escort vessel program. This has been a very challenging undertaking. This ship is new, it is amazingly complex, and it embodies the latest developments of both the United States and the United Kingdom. It is designed to fulfil an anti-submarine role and during the last few years there has been a great deal of development in the field of submarines and torpedoes. Hence, the design of our anti-submarine vessel has been subject to constant change in order to keep pace.

When one considers the small number of qualified people we had in Canada in 1950 to cope with essentially four separate naval design projects, it is interesting to compare our performance with other countries that have had a great deal of experience in this field. Both the United States and the United Kingdom have recently commissioned new ships which, from a design and construction point of view, may be considered comparable to our escort vessels. The United States experience was that six years elapsed from the commencement of design to the delivery of the prototype. A similar program in the United Kingdom took six and one-half years. The design work on our escort vessel began in 1949 and the first delivery is expected next year—in other words, just under seven years. I believe that any discrepancies between actual and forecast performance are due not so much to abnormal production difficulties as to unrealistic forecasts.

Turning to guns and ammunition, there is one point that I would like to make clear. It will be recalled that approximately three years ago a decision was taken to standardize to a large extent on United States army equipment rather than the United Kingdom type which we had previously used. From a production point of view, this created a number of special problems in the guns and ammunition field.

In the United States, the requirements of Korea sparked an intensive drive to update and improve their basic weapons and ammunition. Consequently, instead of adopting equipment that was of a fixed design and in current production, we found ourselves trying to reproduce guns and ammunition that were undergoing rapid and radical development. As a result, there were inordinate delays in securing complete manufacturing drawings. This situation has now improved greatly. However, it has also been necessary to acquire detailed manufacturing data. This is being accomplished by our Canadian producers visiting production sites in the United States, and in this connection we have had the very best co-operation.

I do not want to leave the impression that we are not actually producing in these fields. Several natures of ammunition are being supplied from Canadian production to our own services, to the United States, and to our NATO allies as part of our mutual aid program. Production at the small arms plant of Canadian Arsenals at Long Branch is going very well. Sorel Industries have completed a large order of 120 millimeter guns for the United States army and are producing three-inch 50 calibre guns both for the Canadian and United States navies in advance of agreed schedules. However, in some instances, progress has been slow, but I hope that I have given the committee some idea of the special problems that we have encountered.

The final important segment of our production program is in the field of electronics. Canadian industry has continued to expand its facilities for the manufacture of electronic defence equipment during the past year. This expansion has paralleled an unprecedented increase of commercial facilities for the manufacture of home television sets, with an estimated output of 450,000 units for the current year, as compared with approximately one-tenth of this output three years ago. These additional facilities for both defence and commercial work have broadened the available sources of supply for the department, and it has been possible to obtain competitive tenders on much of the equipment required by the services, with resultant economies.

Naturally, a great deal of our activity in this field is in connection with our aircraft, ship, and gun programs. However, with the additional emphasis being placed on continental defence and interception in the north, there are heavier requirements for Canadian radar and communications equipment. In all discussions with the United States authorities regarding joint plans for northern defence we have insisted that the Canadian electronics, communications, and construction industries be given full opportunity to participate in the program, irrespective of the basis of cost sharing between the two countries.

Apart from the production aspects of the program, there are two other main facets: construction and general purchasing. Defence Construction Limited, as hon. members will recall, has been responsible for defence construction, but in the past it has to a large extent utilized the services of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to supervise the actual projects. Although this arrangement proved eminently satisfactory, the recent amendments to the National Housing Act placed an additional work load on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and, consequently, it was deemed advisable for Defence Construction Limited to take full responsibility for defence construction with the exception of the married quarters and school program, which will remain with C.M.H.C. The Department of National Defence estimates indicate that a large portion of our defence construction now either is completed or will be completed this year. However, there are a number of projects just getting under way, Gagetown being the most important.

Hon. members who have properly stressed the importance of getting the best return for our defence dollar will be glad to know that in the last few months we have noted increasing competition for defence construction contracts, a condition that will inevitably bring about lower costs.

We have made excellent progress in the field of mechanical transport. By the end of the last fiscal year, that branch had placed orders covering most of the armed services' requirements for military and special purpose vehicles and, as a result, its major function became the procurement of commercial type vehicles. Inasmuch as this is the type of procurement normally carried out by our general purchasing branch, it was decided, in the interests of economy, to merge the two branches into an augmented general purchasing branch.

In the first two years of the program the major work of this branch was in connection with the initial outfitting of the troops and the building up of clothing and equipment stockpiles. This has now been largely completed and current purchases are mainly to satisfy maintenance requirements. On the other hand, as additional vehicles, ships, and aircraft are brought into service, requirements for fuel and maintenance equipment have increased. Another important phase of the work of the general purchasing branch is the procurement carried out through its district offices. As service establishments are developed across Canada, the local purchasing activities of the 14 district offices located across Canada from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia, have increased. In the first three months of 1954, these district offices have issued nearly 35,000 purchase documents, covering contracts totalling in excess of $14,500,000.

By far the greatest change in the defence production scene during the last two years has been in the field of strategic materials. It will be recalled that when the accelerated defence program was launched three years ago, strategic materials were generally in short supply and, through the agency of the international materials conference, international allocations were established for a number of commodities. This, of course, necessitated controls over production and distribution in Canada and in order to administer these programs we had at one time a materials branch, consisting of six divisions covering steel, non-ferrous metals, chemicals, petroleum, newsprint and priorities. Gradually, as circumstances permitted, we relaxed controls and decreased the personnel of the branch until, by the end of the last calendar year, we were able to abolish all controls and the materials branch itself.

This brings us to the organization of the Department of Defence Production. After its establishment on April 1, 1951, it reached a peak strength of 1,762 on June 30, 1952. On May 31 of this year, the number was 1,539. This reduction was largely due to the abolition of the materials branch to which I have already made reference. For the information of the committee, charts indicating the organization of the department as of June 1 have been distributed to all hon. members.

When the Minister of National Defence was discussing his estimates, he spoke of the long-range planning of the NATO alliance, which has been described as the "long haul" approach. He also indicated that, although modest reductions in defence budgets were possible during the next few years, current commitments and the need to maintain our position of active and effective preparedness would require substantial defence expenditures for a number of years.

This obviously means that there will be a continuing requirement for an efficient procurement organization. In the early stages of the department's history, we secured the loan of a number of experienced men from industry, who either directed our various production and material branches or provided valuable assistance in other capacities. At one time, we had as many as 99 so-called "dollar a year" men in the department. Today, only two of our branches are being directed by other than career civil servants, and the total number of industry men on loan has been reduced to 10. These men from industry, who have given generously of their time and experience, have made a very real contribution to the defence effort. But it is obvious that, in the long run, we must depend on career civil servants to staff a government department.

We have been making every effort to develop a sound organization on this basis. However, we find that, because the life of the department is limited to five years under the terms of the Defence Production Act, there is a tendency for some members of the staff to seek other employment that apparently provides more security. Furthermore, we have found that the temporary nature of the department is often a deterrent to well qualified men who have considered joining us.

Under these circumstances, I believe that it is appropriate to announce now that it is the government's intention to seek, during the next session of parliament, an amendment to the Defence Production Act which will put the life of the department on a more permanent basis.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee has listened with interest to the review which the minister has just read concerning the operations of the Department of Defence Production and some rather significant changes that have appeared in the program of that department and the conditions with which it has to deal in Canadian industry. I am sure that the committee was glad also to hear what the minister read to us concerning deliveries and also concerning the emergence now of increased competition. I think no one will be surprised at that situation having regard to the fact that competition now is so much keener throughout Canadian industry in general. So far as the government purchasing program is concerned, it is a factor that will undoubtedly react to the advantage of the taxpayer. As I proceed I hope to make a comment concerning the announcement in the final paragraph of the minister's statement, which, it seems to me, is of no little importance.

The estimates of this department this year call for an expenditure of $40 million as against appropriations for the year ended March 31, 1954, of $73 million. On the surface this represents in the appropriations of the department a reduction of $33 million which parallels a simplification of the task of the department and an advance in the government's purchasing program on account of defence.

The task of the department is indeed an important one. This department came into existence on April 1, 1951. It has therefore now been in existence for approximately three years and three months and the expenditures on account of defence which have been made through this department in that period are now approaching the $5 billion mark.

The minister has made a comment upon the reduction in the staff of the department this year. There has, of course, been a notable reduction in the tasks, functions and difficulties of the department as a result of the developments within the past year or fifteen months. The minister has made reference to the marked improvement in the supply of strategic materials, which improvement made it possible on December 31, 1953, to discontinue the remaining controls and indeed the materials division of the department.

The temporary nature of the department, to which the minister made reference, has unquestionably been a factor in the minds of some of the senior men in the department. No one needs to have many contacts with men holding responsible senior positions in the department in order to realize that what the minister has called the temporary nature of the department has had an unsettling effect on the minds of many of those senior officials with regard to their continuation in the service of the department. I am not going to attempt to pass judgment upon the amendment which the minister indicates the government will introduce at the next session of parliament. However, I say this. It is a most interesting announcement and the problem with which, I take it, the amendment is intended to deal is a significant one to which attention must be directed.

Our thoughts in relation to our task as a committee of supply this morning are, I think, related not simply to the matters of supply of materials to which the minister has made reference or to improving deliveries. In addition we are concerned about the policy followed within the department. The minister has not made any extended comment on the policy within the department. I propose to speak briefly concerning various phases of that policy as we have known it in the past and to ask the minister, at the appropriate time, for an adequate statement as to policy and as to whether in this and other respects there has been any change or development in the policy of the department.

My first question is in relation to policy as it affects the Department of National Defence. Recently we have spent several days reviewing the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Yesterday we spent an extremely long day, completing that review only at a late hour last night. It is not my intention to go over any of that ground, but as to the relationship between these two departments there is much that the committee yet needs to be told.

Is the relationship between the two departments what it was when the estimates of this department were before the House of Commons for review a year ago? That is my first question in this regard. We were told by the minister himself a year ago on a similar occasion that in effect the Department of Defence Production has nothing to do with and takes no responsibility in relation to quantities or, indeed, the nature of purchases, and that it simply accepts requisitions from the Department of National Defence and then proceeds to fill those requirements by purchase or by contract. The relationship between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production was significantly stated by the minister on May 7, 1953, at page 4923 of Hansard, in these words:

> It would upset the relations between the two departments if we questioned the requirements of the services, and it is not our business to do so. If the services say they need a gold-plated piano, it is our duty to buy it.

I ask the minister if the relationship between the two departments is today as it was on May 7, 1953. Is it still the function of the Department of Defence Production simply to receive requests from the Department of National Defence and to fill them willy-nilly without question? Indeed, Mr. Chairman, with all apologies to Tennyson and "The Charge of the Light Brigade", one can say that the function of the Department of Defence Production, as indicated by the minister in this passage last year, might be put in this way:

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to build and buy.

When expenditures of some $5 billion are made in a period of three years and three months I think the house is entitled to expect scrutiny of these purchases, not simply the terms on which the minister's department is purchasing them but as to the necessity for these vast purchases that have been made. In no other way is there going to be any pretence of protecting the interests of the taxpayers.

The next question I wish to ask in relation to the policy of the department as to where they are making their purchases and as to what direction, if any, they are seeking to give to their purchasing policy. Last year the minister declared the policy of the department in this respect to be, first, to purchase in Canada where possible, that is to say, where goods are available on the same or, I take it, approximately the same terms as they can be purchased from abroad; second, to direct purchases to the United Kingdom, and in the third place to the United States. I ask if that is still the policy of the department. I do not think there will be any quarrel with that as a statement of policy, but we will wish to know a good deal more than we have been told either in the statement read by the minister this morning or in the annual report of the department for the calendar year 1953 as to what has been done in fulfilment of such a policy.

The report of the department for the calendar year 1953 contains at pages 45 to 51 some statistical information concerning purchases by the department either by way of defence orders or defence procurement expenses as well as approved projects for capital assistance. As to purchases in the United Kingdom, I think I do not need to labour the point that here is one place where we can at the same time purchase wisely and assist our export policy. Purchases from the United Kingdom have this double advantage under present conditions.

I referred a few days ago to the statement made on April 14 by Mr. James S. Duncan, chairman of the dollar-sterling trade council, in which he drew attention to the advantages that would flow to Canada in seeking to increase her export trade if we could transfer even a modest percentage of our present huge purchases in the United States to the United Kingdom. These were his words:

> Based on last year's trade pattern, if we could transfer only 7 per cent of our imports from the United States to the United Kingdom, it would eliminate Britain's trade deficit with us and put her in a much better position to buy our products.

Mr. Duncan went on to state that the purpose of the dollar-sterling trade council is to assist in this 7 per cent transfer of Canadian imports from the United States to the United Kingdom. It was graphically put by Mr. Peter Thorneycroft, president of the British board of trade, in his recent visit to Canada when, indicating Britain's wish to increase her purchases from Canada and also her capital investments in Canada, he said in a picturesque phrase, "You cannot invest a deficit". It is hardly to be expected that Britain, looking at our trade relationships in the past, is going to arrive at the point where she sells to Canada more than she buys from Canada. Historically Canada has had a substantial export surplus in her trade relationships with the United Kingdom just as in her trade relationships with the United States historically she has had an import surplus. But much could be done to the advantage of Canada to reduce the extent of Canada's export surplus with Great Britain by transferring much of our purchases abroad from the United States to the United Kingdom. Here in the matter of defence procurement we have an opportunity to help to rectify that balance. To the extent to which purchases are not possible in Canada, then certainly every opportunity should be given to make those purchases in the United Kingdom rather than elsewhere. Looking at the figures contained in the report of the Department of Defence Production for the calendar year 1953, we can only conclude that the purchases made by this department and the orders placed in the United Kingdom are disappointingly small.

Looking at the tables beginning at page 46 of the report in relationship to total Canadian defence orders, we see that in the year 1952 Canada's total defence orders amounted to $1,409 million. I will give simply round figures. Of that total 90 per cent were placed in Canada, a total of $1,262 million. Orders placed in the United States come next, $78 million, or 5½ per cent. Orders placed in the United Kingdom were just $63 million, or only 4½ per cent of the total. If we look at the 1953 figures we will see that the total of defence orders was substantially reduced last year. The total dropped from $1,409 million in 1952 to $811 million in 1953. That of course is to be explained by the fact that these are defence orders placed and the bulk of the placement program of course was accelerated in the year 1952.

Of these orders in 1953 we see that $716 million worth were placed in Canada, or 88½ per cent, in the United States $61 million or 7½ per cent of the total, and in the United Kingdom just $33 million, or only 4 per cent of the total. The total of defence orders placed in the United Kingdom compared with the United States was indeed small enough in 1952, $63 million; in 1953, out of a smaller total, that figure had dropped to $33 million or just one half of the total of orders placed in the previous year.

If we look at the expenditures on defence procurement, for which figures are also contained in the tables on the pages I have mentioned in this report, we will see that in 1952 the expenditure totalled $1,095 million, of which, according to my arithmetic, 86 per cent were placed in Canada, 12 per cent or $132 million were expended in the United States, and only 2 per cent or $22 million were placed in the United Kingdom. In the year 1953 the total of expenditures on defence procurement had increased to $1,174 million, of which 85 per cent was placed in Canada; $130 million or 11 per cent were placed in the United States and $49 million or 4 per cent were placed in the United Kingdom. It is to be seen that while the actual expenditures on defence procurement in the United Kingdom were doubled in 1953 over 1952, nevertheless the total figure in 1953 of $49 million of expenditure on defence procurement in the United Kingdom is still a very small fraction of the total, being only 4 per cent.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Will my hon. friend tell me where he is getting his figures, Mr. Chairman. My figures show that in 1953 $33 million was expended in the United Kingdom and $61 million in the United States.

Mr. Fleming: The minister is away behind me. I had already dealt with Canadian defence orders. He is reading the figures on pages 46 and 47 of the departmental report. I went on from there to deal with the figures for defence procurement which are to be found on pages 49 and 50 of the report. He will see the figures I have been dealing with latterly are the figures for defence procurement.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, I see.

Mr. Fleming: There has not been any unwillingness on the part of the United Kingdom to extend its sales of defence materials or equipment to Canada. On the contrary there has been evidence of the appreciation in the United Kingdom of the opportunity that exists and the desirability, in the interests of the United Kingdom as well as of Canada, of taking every advantage of the opportunity that exists through this vast spending program.

I have in my hand a Canadian Press dispatch, dated May 20, 1953, from Ottawa, and it reads in part as follows:

> The British government today announced it is taking new action to step up Canada's defence orders with Britain, the United Kingdom information office here said. First of a number of measures will be the assignment of two officials to Canada to deal with requirements of the Canadian armed forces that could be supplied by Britain.

And so the dispatch proceeds. One can find other dispatches emanating from United Kingdom sources of high authority, indicating the wish of the United Kingdom government and of United Kingdom manufacturers to meet the needs existing in Canada wherever there is an opportunity given to them of doing so. Here is a golden opportunity where we are making the purchases anyway, and it does not mean any further drain upon the resources of the Canadian taxpayer, either by way of loans, gifts or preferences, in aiding Britain. In the case of goods or equipment that cannot be found in Canada, let us direct those purchases to the United Kingdom, and in that way furnish the United Kingdom with the needed dollars with which she may increase her purchases from Canada of wheat and other goods which we have here in such surplus supply.

To the extent to which this large spending program has progressed wherever purchases have been made in the United States that could have been made in the United Kingdom, we had lost what I think, and perhaps all members will agree, is a valuable opportunity to help Britain increase her purchases from Canada. The minister made an interesting speech in Montreal last week indicating a degree of concern which we have not always found present in the minister's speeches, about the desirability of closer trading relations with the United Kingdom. Here is an opportunity, without putting any additional burden upon the Canadian taxpayer, in cases where purchases cannot be made within our own borders, to help ourselves by making these purchases from United Kingdom sources rather than from the United States and elsewhere.

I point out at the same time, Mr. Chairman, that it is evident from the report of the department that our expenditures in the United States are very great, whether by way of defence orders placed or procurement expenditures and orders. The total orders and expenditures in the United States in 1953 have held up more than the orders and expenditures made either in Canada or in the United Kingdom.

I am next led to ask about the position and policy with respect to the purchase of machine tools. We had some discussion a year ago in connection with the estimates of this department as to the progress in connection with the acquisition of machine tools and the policy in reference to the place of the purchase of those important factors in our defence program. If one looks at page 21 of the report, one will see that in 1953 "the United States remained the largest single source of supply for machine tools". Page DD-16 of the public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, seems to bear this out. It would be interesting to know in this connection to what extent the department has been acquiring small machine tools from German sources and whether those purchases could have been made from United Kingdom sources.

I next turn to the subject of capital assistance. Capital assistance has played an important role in the defence program. The minister had, I believe, nothing to say in his statement this morning concerning capital assistance. We had questions to ask and something to say on this subject last year. The estimates of the department indicate that the program of capital assistance faces quite a substantial curtailment this year. The amount asked in this connection this year is $25 million as compared with $60 million for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954. Last year we sought to ascertain how the program of capital assistance, under the government's administration, was dovetailing with what appeared to us in the official opposition to be a necessary policy with respect to our defence program in this regard.

I have indicated how, in our view, purchases which we must make abroad could, with great advantage to Canada, be made in the United Kingdom.

I should like now to say that, as to purchases within Canada, there is great advantage to be derived from the widest possible dissemination of those purchases throughout Canada with a view to distributing the advantages that come from a program of this kind. No one is suggesting any serious departure from the rules of economics or of sound buying; but, Mr. Chairman, the minister has never yet convinced us that within the scope of purchases being made within Canada he is taking advantage of the opportunity that is placed in his hands of bringing advantage to provinces other than the central provinces in the distribution of these defence orders.

Here was an opportunity, perhaps the opportunity of a lifetime—an opportunity at any rate which has not existed at any time in Canada's history, with the exception of the period of world war II—to assist in strengthening the economies of the other provinces by placing defence orders there. Think what it would mean to the economy of the maritime provinces, the economy of Manitoba and the economy of other provinces, by way of strengthening secondary industry in those provinces and providing a broader foundation for economic life in those provinces, if to a great extent this program of defence purchasing were distributed with advantage to those provinces, rather than having it concentrated in central Canada.

The information on the subject is deplorably scant. Last year one turned to the public accounts, for lack of any other authentic source of information. I pointed out last year that, if one is to judge by the head offices of the corporations with which these defence orders were placed, the program was largely confined to the central provinces. The minister took issue with that basis of determining where the orders were being filled. He said, "You cannot tell, entirely, from the location of the head offices of companies, where orders are being filled or where subcontracts let by those contractors are being placed". That may be so. But if the minister has a better or a more reliable way of determining where the advantages of this defence purchasing program are being distributed, then I wish he would tell the house about it.

This morning he said something very brief and very vague about the distribution of purchases. Let us have more information on the subject. We have had enough discussion and enough consideration of the subject in times past to want some detailed information about it. Indeed when from time to time we have asked for information of this kind we have been put off with vague generalities to the effect that the department does not keep records in that way.

On what sound statistical information has the minister made this vague statement this morning about the distribution of the benefits of the purchasing program within Canada?

Until he does give some proper information in this respect, I can only refer to the public accounts in relation to his department, and note from that source that for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, we find at pages DD-3, 4 and 5, looking at the provision for "capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by private contractors engaged in defence contracts, or by crown plants operated on a management-fee basis, or by crown companies under direction of the Minister of Defence Production, subject to approval of treasury board", that, out of a total of allotments of $110 million, and expenditures of roughly $78 million, the number of companies or contractors receiving capital assistance was 84. The information discloses that the head offices of 73 of these 84 companies were located in the two central provinces, with only three in Nova Scotia, one in New Brunswick, three in Alberta, two in British Columbia and two in Manitoba.

That does not contain very eloquent testimony either to the success or, indeed, to the effort of the government in seeking to distribute those purchases more widely throughout Canada. I live in one of the central provinces. I know there are advantages in the matter of the fulfilment of orders from the fact that there is a concentration in those central provinces of industrial capacity. But, Mr. Chairman, speaking not as a central Canadian, but as a Canadian, I say that here is a great and extraordinary opportunity given to the government to strengthen the economy, particularly the secondary industry, in the other provinces, and I am thinking particularly of provinces such as the maritimes, Manitoba and others. I am afraid that, in the light of available information, it looks as though the government is allowing this opportunity to slip away without advantage to these other provinces whose economies could be strengthened in the course of a program of this kind, without putting the slightest additional burden upon any Canadian taxpayer.

In this program upon which we are embarked we wish to see, so far as possible, that purchases are made within Canada, when the supply is available here. If that is our position, then why can we not, to a far greater extent than is indicated by these figures, direct those purchases so that they will be of general advantage to all of Canada?

In conclusion I come to several matters of a more specific nature. Those of us in this part of the house have always been concerned about the provisions of section 17 of the Defence Production Act, as it is set out in chapter 4 of the statutes of 1951, second session. This is the statute that established this department, and from which it derives its wide powers. Under section 17 (1) (e) of this statute, we see that—

> (e) a contract may be entered into by the minister without the approval of the governor in council if > (i) in the opinion of the minister, the contract must be entered into immediately in the interests of defence,
> (ii) the estimated expenditure, loan or guarantee does not exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, or
> (iii) competitive tenders have been obtained and the lowest tender, involving an estimated expenditure not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, is accepted.

This section, of course, covers more than purchases without tender. But the provisions of the section have always been so broad that each year we have made it our business to look for an extended and detailed report on the subject. What is the extent to which the department is making purchases now without calling for tenders? Now that the early feverish haste in launching this program of defence procurement may be said to have passed, is it not possible to proceed by more orthodox and established methods in making purchases or awarding contracts?

In this regard one listened with interest to the statement of the minister this morning that the department is now departing from its previous practice of awarding contracts on a cost-plus basis. That was welcome news, particularly to those of us including yourself, Mr. Chairman, who during the 1953 session served on the special committee on defence expenditure. We were not the least bit happy about the wide extent to which contracts were being awarded through this department and its corporate creations on a cost-plus basis. To the extent to which the department is now awarding what the minister has this morning called "incentive contracts", in place of cost-plus contracts, we shall acclaim that as a step forward. We wish to know more about it; we wish to know how far this trend has gone. We do not make any attempt to disguise our dislike for the kind of contracts that have been awarded by the department in the past.

In the next place, Mr. Chairman, we want more information about the operations of the revolving fund within this department. Section 16 of the Defence Production Act makes provision for "a defence production revolving fund". In that fund there is a working capital of $150 million turning over in the department today. The annual report of the department on this point is very sketchy indeed. We ask for more information on that point.

We next ask for more information concerning the policy of the department in relation to disposal or retention of crown assets. I am thinking in this respect in the first place, but not entirely, of crown-owned plants.

Within the past year a very large plant has been disposed of by the government. Last September an announcement was made that the government-owned Orenda jet engine plant at Malton had been sold to the A. V. Roe Canada Limited at a sale price of somewhere, according to newspaper reports, between $17 million and $17,500,000. According to the newspaper reports the original cost of the plant was $35 million, and the government—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleming: —retains ownership of about $17 million worth of equipment in the plant.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The cost the hon. member gave included the equipment. The equipment was not sold.

Mr. Fleming: Yes. That is what I was saying. That is the burden of the report which I have just been reading. The plant was sold for a price, as mentioned here, of between $17 million and $17,500,000. The total cost of the plant and equipment was $35 million and the government is retaining ownership of about $17 million worth of equipment in the plant. That is a very substantial sale, Mr. Chairman, and it naturally leads one to ask questions as to the policy of the government in this respect. Is it policy to dispose of crown-owned plants? If so, what are the terms or objectives which guide the government in relation to sales? In this case the sale was made to the corporation which was managing the plant on a management-fee basis. One can see that if the government did decide to dispose of the plant, that corporation was the natural purchaser if terms were reasonable and every effort had been made to assure that the taxpayers' interests were adequately protected in the sale.

I ask the government as to policy in this respect. Are other purchases in contemplation? What steps are being taken to assure that in the case of disposals of plants the full value of those plants is being realized in the sale price?

I ask generally about policy in regard to sale of crown assets. I have referred particularly to crown-owned plants. In conclusion I turn to crown-owned assets of another nature. We have a corporation which functions under this department known as the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. Its function, as it has been described in times past, is to dispose of crown assets that are surplus to the crown requirements. We have been assured in the past that before any steps are taken through that corporation to dispose of crown assets every proper inquiry is made to determine whether those assets are required not simply in this department but in other departments of government.

Here is a department that is expending billions of dollars of the Canadian taxpayers' money, because this money has all come out of the taxpayer; none of it has been borrowed; none of it is to be paid for by future generations; all of it is being paid for by the taxpayers of 1951, 1952, 1953 and now 1954.

What is the policy in this respect? How is the policy being administered by the department? Well, I hope the case to which I am about to refer, Mr. Chairman, is not an example of the way in which the government is discharging its responsibilities in this respect. I hold in my hand an invitation to tender, issued by the Department of Defence Production, and dated March 30, 1954, inviting the submission of tenders for certain "automotive spares (bearings)", the tenders to be addressed to the secretary of the department at Ottawa and to be received by him not later than four o'clock p.m. on April 27, 1954. Attached to this invitation to tender are three sheets setting forth a considerable number of bearings, all identified by certain well-recognized trade designations. In most cases the bearings specified are either SKF or Timken bearings. In some cases they are either Timkens, Hyatts, New Progress, or Bantam and some other bearings, but many of them are Timken bearings, each of which bears a number designation which refers to and identifies a standard form of bearing produced by the Timken Roller Bearing Company. They are completely standardized, as all hon. members will appreciate. Every one of them has a trade number identifying it. The quantities required vary greatly. I have not counted them but I presume there are about sixty different types of roller bearings that were to be purchased in accordance with this tender. The quantities purchased of each kind of bearing rise from 3 of a minimum to, I think, a maximum of 28,365. Therefore in the total number of bearings on which those in the trade are being invited to tender we have some scores and scores of thousands of bearings. In other words, this is not a small matter.

I also hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, an advertisement put out by a Toronto firm which is engaged in the sale of used automobile parts as well as new ones. This firm put out a letter to the trade dated March 30, 1954, advertising for sale "bearings Timken, SKF, Hyatt" and many others.

They are said to be available at a special discount which is described as 75 per cent off the current Canadian price list as shown, and even less if they are to be used in manufacture, and you give your sales tax licence number. Then this paragraph follows:

All bearings are genuine, brand-new, government surplus in absolutely first-class condition and are unconditionally guaranteed. Many are still in their original packing, while others have been carefully and expertly repackaged where necessary.

I have not seen these bearings, Mr. Chairman, but I do know that the firm which has put out this statement to the trade, this printed sheet to the trade, is a reputable firm.

Mr. Dickey: Can the hon. member supply the name of the firm?

Mr. Fleming: Do you wish me to give it or shall I send it over?

Mr. Dickey: Whichever you like.

Mr. Fleming: I will send it over to the minister. When this firm refers to a government surplus of bearings I am quite sure they are making a truthful statement as to the source of their purchases. To that statement from that company there is attached a list of bearings, and I have been comparing the two lists and I find there are many of the same kind of bearings quoted in both lists.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In what year did that transaction take place?

Mr. Fleming: I gave the date of the invitation to tender, Mr. Chairman, and it was March 30, 1954, and the time for the submission of tenders was to close at four p.m. on April 27, 1954. The letter to the trade put out by this firm is dated March 30, 1954. In other words, it was put out at the same time as the government through the minister's department was inviting the trade to tender on the very same kind of roller bearings. I will just run through a few of them, Mr. Chairman, and I shall be glad to send these papers over to the minister for examination. The following are the numbers given of the standard Timken roller bearings: 2793; 2924; 23100; 23256; 28682; 31593; 41286; 53176; 59187; and 59200. These numbers appear on both lists, Mr. Chairman, and therefore it is evident that on the very day the Department of Defence Production was inviting the trade to tender on large quantities of new roller bearings a firm in Toronto was issuing to the trade a printed list of the bearings that it had available, including a number of the very same kind as those for which the government was inviting tenders and on which this firm is offering a 75 per cent trade discount and stating that these bearings are:

. . . genuine, brand-new, government surplus in absolutely first-class condition, and are unconditionally guaranteed. Many are still in their original packing, while others have been carefully and expertly repackaged where necessary.

No one, Mr. Chairman, expects the minister to be a superman or the department he heads to have superman wisdom or efficiency. But I think we are entitled, as a House of Commons being invited to vote billions of dollars of the Canadian taxpayers' money, and hard-earned money in practically every case, to expect a higher degree of efficiency than is displayed here, particularly when the government is disposing of surplus and then turning around and purchasing the very same thing by public tender and, as we well know in such a case, at a substantially higher cost.

I repeat what I said in introducing my review of the information in reference to this case, namely, that one hopes this is not an example of the way in which the operations of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and the purchasing activities of the Department of Defence Production are correlated, because there is no evidence here of any correlation whatever. So, Mr. Chairman, we will expect something much stricter, much tighter, and much more efficient in the way of the administration of the department than that case indicates is the situation.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member be good enough to send over the documents?

Mr. Fleming: Yes. I am sending over to the minister, Mr. Chairman, the entire papers to which I have referred. There are some seven or eight pages.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that the powers wielded by the Department of Defence Production are very great. When you place it within the power of a government department in peacetime to make purchases in a matter of three years aggregating a figure approaching $5 billion, I do not need to tell any hon. member of this house that you are placing in the hands of the government, and particularly in the hands of the minister who heads that department, vast powers over the economy of this country.

It is an unhappy circumstance that the world being the kind of uneasy, turbulent, and unsafe place in which we find ourselves, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to undertake a defence program as vast and costly as this one is. But the very least that the House of Commons ought to do in these matters is to insist upon the observance of sound and fair policies in these matters, and that the vast economic power which is placed in the hands of the government under this program shall not be arbitrarily wielded to the disadvantage of individuals in Canada. Where there are advantages they should be widely distributed, and where orders are to be placed they should be placed on a fair and equal basis. The last thing in the world that could be justified is any form of discrimination or the wielding over the heads of manufacturers, and through them their workmen, of powers of this kind in an unfair manner.

And so, Mr. Chairman, while we have indicated the importance we attach to the functions of this department, we do call for a strict scrutiny. It is perhaps unfortunate that this year there has not been a committee charged with the responsibility of reviewing the transactions of this department. The fact is that we have had many committees this year, they have been discharging a heavy responsibility, and there is a limit to the number of committees that can operate efficiently in a single session. But apart from that, Mr. Chairman, I shall not need to remind you, as a member of the defence expenditure committee in 1953, that we had some very disappointing and frustrating experiences on that committee. The committee was not permitted to extend its review back beyond April 1, 1950, and the committee was never permitted to review the estimates of the department for the current year. It was permitted to review nothing but expenditures made in the past.

As a means of testing the propriety and fitness of the estimates of expenditures for the current year it had no competence whatever, for it lacked all power. The kind of committee that is needed, Mr. Chairman, to review the type of expenditure that is being made through this department on behalf of the Department of National Defence, expenditures that amount to very close to half of the national budget, is the type of committee which has an opportunity to review the estimates of expenditure for the current year and the proposed expenditure, not simply the expenditure made in the past. In that way and in that way alone will parliament really be in a position to discharge its duty to review the operations of this department effectively.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I was interested to hear the minister tell us that the policy of granting cost-plus contracts has now yielded place to the granting of another type of contract which I believe he referred to as an incentive contract. Not only would I be interested but I would be relieved by that statement were it not that I remember hearing of other types of contracts that have been let by this and other governments which, in my simple-minded manner, I had imagined were in effect cost-plus contracts but as to which I was told I was quite mistaken and that they were, on the other hand, what were known at that time as target contracts.

They were an extremely interesting instrument of agreement, Mr. Chairman. Apparently a target contract was something like this. There was a certain figure at which it was presumed a contractor was supposed to aim; and when, as inevitably happened, he aimed at this price and hit not the bull's-eye but a point away out on the outer part of the target, then the procedure was to move the bull's-eye out to where he had hit. For instance, I recall asking earlier in the session a question about certain naval vessels that we had been constructing. I was interested in them because last year I was working in the yard that was producing these vessels and we saw them. They were these quite small wooden minesweepers. We had discovered that the target price had been $925,000. Later we heard rumours that it had been increased to $1,600,000. Hence I put a question on the order paper when I became a member—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not think my hon. friend wants to mislead the committee. There was never a target-price contract placed for a minesweeper until these last three months. My hon. friend is talking about estimates of costs. He is not talking about contract price, and I wish he would not call them that.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): All right, Mr. Chairman; we will call them estimates of cost. The estimate of cost was so far out that, instead of costing $925,000, they were to cost $1,600,000, according to the answer I received in reply to the question I put on the order paper.

I recall also that in that same year there was another naval vessel for which a contract had been let, namely the Algonquin. I was greatly interested in that vessel because it was tied up on the other side of the dock from the vessel on which I was working. It had been there for many months—for many years, as a matter of fact—undergoing reconstruction or reconversion. I recall that in the little house organ of the company for which I was working, and which had the contract for the Algonquin, there appeared last year a little article on the completion of H.M.C.S. Algonquin. In this little house organ it was pointed out that owing to the increase in the costs of production and, of course, the cost of labour, it had been necessary to spend on the completion of the Algonquin more than had been the original estimate. But the company patted itself on the back that in spite of those greatly increased costs, the Algonquin reconversion was going to cost only $4 million. That might have been all right, Mr. Chairman, except that my friend the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich—he at that time was my predecessor as the hon. member for Nanaimo—had an attack of curiosity at that time and he put on the order paper a question asking how much the reconversion of the Algonquin had cost. Most unhappily for the editors of this little house organ, a few days after their statement that the Algonquin reconversion unfortunately was costing more than had been expected, and that it was going to cost $4 million, there appeared in the press the answer to my hon. friend's question indicating that the cost had been $5,275,000. Therefore, as I say, Mr. Chairman, I would have been happier at the minister's statement were it not for these little doubts I have in my mind as to whether there is any real distinction—or whether it is not, after all, a distinction without a difference—between these two types of contracts to which there has been reference.

Then there is another question that is in my mind when I read the report of the Department of Defence Production and when I find on page 14 that up to the end of 1953—I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong; I am assuming that is the period from the establishment of the department to the end of 1953—certificates had been issued covering some $665 million worth of capital investment in facilities for the production of both basic materials and defence supplies, thereby allowing additional benefits by way of income tax write-offs amounting to some $277 million. This is a reference, Mr. Chairman, to what is commonly known as accelerated depreciation. Of course it may be that that has been necessary in order to ensure the production of defence materials. However, when I read that I was reminded of another instance in which the taxpayers of Canada were asked by this government to forgo some of their legitimate income in order to aid another struggling company to produce materials for Canada's war effort. I refer to the Aluminum Company of Canada.

On that occasion we afforded them these additional benefits—as they are referred to in the report of the Department of Defence Production—to the tune of $177,359,956.06. Mr. Chairman, it may perhaps have been necessary to do that. Perhaps it was necessary because we were asking the Aluminum Company of Canada to expand their facilities to an extent that would be far greater than anything for which they could find use after the war. In fact, as I recall it, that was the idea that was presented to the people of Canada. That is why they were asked to forgo approximately $177,000,000 of income in order that this company might be enabled to meet our wartime needs.

Mr. Chairman, somebody again made an estimate that was very wide of the mark. Hardly had the war ended than this same struggling company brought their approximately $177 million plus several hundred million dollars more up into British Columbia to expand still further their facilities in a period that we have been given to believe would not provide any market for the expanded facilities at Arvida. Therefore, as I say, I have some doubts as to the possible necessity for this relinquishment of $277 million worth of income to the federal treasury.

Then in the next paragraph we are told of the $48 million that is being granted by way of capital assistance to private industry. Again, it may perhaps be necessary to grant this assistance to firms in order to get them to produce the materials that we require for our defence expenditures. But, Mr. Chairman, surely there is a reasonable case to be made out for this government's retaining, on behalf of the people of Canada, an equity in those industrial facilities for which we are providing the capital. Surely that is not an unreasonable proposition.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We own the facilities.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I beg your pardon?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We own the facilities.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The major portion of this type of assistance was granted in 1952. If you own the facilities, to whom were you giving the assistance?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We were giving it to ourselves. Any money that is advanced as capital assistance is advanced for the purpose of providing a facility to be owned by the crown. If it is a building, the building is owned by the crown. If it is a machine, the machine is owned by the crown.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I certainly withdraw everything I have said. I am extremely glad to hear that. I was afraid that this was the same sort of assistance we had given to the aluminum company. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not, however, so particularly interested in these aspects of our defence production program. I do not think, for instance, there is anyone in this chamber, including the minister himself, who can tell us with any assurance that our $2 billion that is going to defence expenditures is being spent in the wisest manner possible. I think that is entirely a matter of opinion. I think the opinions may be based on very little information, and it may not be possible to get the information. Let us agree that they are doing the best they can in that regard; but let us, on the other hand, proceed to get some incidental benefits out of these wasteful and misguided expenditures, if there are any such in this department.

To that end I should like to direct the attention of the government to the policy that is now being pursued by the government of the United States. I have in my hand defence manpower policy No. 4 as revised on November 5, 1953. This defence manpower policy directive from the office of the President of the United States is designed to ensure that defence expenditures in the United States are placed with certain objectives in mind, one of them being the objective of maintaining, as they say here, "management and employee skills necessary to the fulfilment of government contracts and purchases", the idea being that there should be a consideration of the needs of industrial development and industrial employment in various parts of the United States in the placing of departmental orders. Paragraph 2 of this directive has this to say under the heading "purpose":

> It is the purpose of this defence manpower policy No. 4 to direct attention to the potentialities of areas of substantial labour surplus, hereafter referred to as labour surplus areas, for the placement of procurement contracts or the location of new plants or facilities, and to assign responsibilities to specify departments and agencies of the government to carry out the policy stated below.

I may say that the definition of a labour surplus area for the purpose of this directive is an area in which the labour surplus is 6 per cent or over and an area in which there appears to be no immediate sign of improvement. With respect to the purposes the directive goes on to say that they are:

> (b) To maintain productive facilities;
> (c) To improve utilization of the nation's total manpower potential by making use of the manpower resources of each area;
> (d) To help assure timely delivery of required goods and services and to promote readiness for expanded effort by locating procurement where the needed manpower and facilities are fully available; and
> (e) To reduce the vulnerability of defence related and essential civilian industries to air attack in the event of war.

That last point is, I think, a very important consideration. It is only about a week or two ago that one of the military correspondents, I think it was Hanson Baldwin of the New York Times, pointed out this rather ominous fact, that one of the ways in which the Soviet union is gaining superiority over the United States and North America is that it is providing fewer effective aerial targets than we are on this continent, that they have been pursuing a deliberate and conscious policy of dispersal of industry all across the Eurasian continent. Here on this continent, unfortunately, we pursue a rather haphazard policy of allowing industrial development to take place wherever immediate existing economic circumstances cause it to arise, with the result that we have located in the lower Ontario area, as the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out, a concentration of industry which provides an ideal target for aerial attack.

I believe that here we have an opportunity not merely to disperse our industry or to develop industry across the country but an opportunity to do something that our American friends have not done hitherto and that they are now apparently trying to do, a rational reorganization of their industrial potential. I think we have an opportunity that we perhaps could have in no other way of really developing the productive capacities of this country in relation to population, resources and climate in a way in which no nation has hitherto had. I would urge very strongly on the minister and the government that they make this consideration one of their major considerations in the placement of defence production orders, and particularly in the decision as to areas in which there shall be investment in new productive facilities.

The history of the United States shows quite plainly that its modern industrial potential was developed in two major periods, that period comprised in the first world war and the period of the second world war, when enormous expansions and developments of American industry took place under the stimulus of defence production expenditures. It may be of course that informally our government is doing that type of thing, but the Department of Defence Production has received no direction from this parliament to follow out precisely the sort of program that is now being pursued in the United States of America.

Since the session began we have had a series of visits from representatives of the unemployed, who are now such a source of anxiety to us. We have had, moreover, appeals from members from different parts of the country with regard to the necessity for economic rehabilitation. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Cape Breton South will be dinning the necessities of his part of Canada into the minister's ears before this debate is over. I can think of no better way in which the government could combine the carrying out of its responsibilities for defence production with its more basic responsibility for the material welfare of the whole Dominion of Canada than by giving consideration to the deliberate development of industrial potential in those parts of Canada which are now either declining industrially or have not hitherto had any important industrial development.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate on the defence production estimates I wish to address my remarks to three matters particularly, the first of which is a question of policy. I should like to know how government policy in the matter of purchases differs today from what it was during the war years. I contend that industry has a right to know this. During the war, when we were very hard pressed for materials, goods and production, there was a definite policy of assistance. That certainly saw us through the war and was an excellent measure. The same minister is in charge of the department today. He did such a good job at that time that I was hoping that I could say that he had been able to continue to do so.

Today, however, it seems to be a matter of looking for the cheapest market. I am thinking particularly of an answer I received to a question I put in the house one day respecting the use of British Columbia plywood in the building of keels for six minesweepers that were built at Bellingham, Washington. I finally received the answer. It indicated that an eastern firm had been given the contract, that it had been sublet to a Bellingham, Washington, firm, and that was all there was to it. I am not too happy about such a situation, especially in view of the fact that I understand a New Westminster firm submitted a tender which must have been refused. If it is going to be the policy of this government to buy wherever the market is cheapest, I believe that those men who are particularly interested in building up industry in our country should know about that.

The second factor also concerns policy, but is a matter of a more localized nature. There are very few west coast firms that receive contracts from the defence department. I am given to understand the reason is that our prices are too high. I wonder why that is the case? Is it the cost of labour or are there some particular factors that are involved? I should like to remind the minister that British Columbia dollars are poured into this particular government in some volume. While our bids might be high, on occasion they must be close enough to warrant spending more dollars in British Columbia for defence production than have been spent in the past.

There is one important factor in which I am rather interested in this respect, and that is to what degree have studies been made with a view to manufacturing an article on the western coast instead of manufacturing it in the eastern part of Canada and sending it to the west coast. We know that a good portion of this material must be sent to the west from time to time, and therefore it might just as well be produced at that point. What thought has been given to sending raw materials to the west or to the far eastern coast for that matter, and manufacturing the finished product that might be needed at that point rather than building it in various parts of the country and sending it to either the eastern or western coast. In the explosive world in which we live it could prove most unfortunate, and would be most unrealistic, to put all our eggs in one basket.

The third point I wish to mention is a major one in the minds of members from British Columbia and Alberta. It concerns the construction of a pipe line from the Peace river area in Alberta and British Columbia into the Vancouver district. I noted with some concern, as did most of the British Columbia members, I am sure, the decision of the federal power commission that they would not accept Westcoast Transmission Company's offer to build a line into the Pacific northwest. I was happy to note, though, that there is a 30-day waiting period for reconsideration of this decision. I would urge the minister to give consideration to our request and try to do something as quickly as possible, before this 30-day period is up, to enable this line to be built.

I do not believe that it is proper that the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta should be made to suffer because the Westcoast Transmission people probably did not make as good a case as might have been made in trying to persuade the United States authorities to permit them to supply gas. On June 19, I believe, the hon. member for Macleod sent the minister a question in respect of this problem, and later the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra raised the question on the floor of the house. I am sure none of us are too happy about the responses we have received. I should like the minister to ask the United States authorities to review the whole situation with a view to either changing their decision and accepting this Alberta-British Columbia gas or else permitting us to build an auxiliary line into that area to augment the supply from New Mexico. If this attempt fails, then a conference should be called of the provincial governments concerned and the federal government, as well as the authorities who are in charge of investing large sums of money with a view to building the gas line from the Peace river country into the lower mainland of British Columbia.

I have considerable information on this project. I might point out to the minister that as late as April 12 or 13, 1954, a three-day conference was held at Portland by the Pacific northwest trade association. All delegates attending that conference were very anxious to have the gas line run from the Peace river country into the lower regions of British Columbia and on into the states of Washington, Oregon, and down into northern California. If the minister is not aware of it, and I am quite sure he must be, the membership of this particular group reads like who's who in the business world. There were 32 members from trade or gas companies, the British Columbia electric, and so on, from Vancouver; 23 members from Portland, Oregon; 50 members from the city of Seattle; 20 members from the city of Spokane; and there was a supplementary list of upwards of 150 or 200 delegates, all of whom are industrialists in the Pacific northwest.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps this would be a convenient time to interrupt the hon. member and call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

---

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, before the lunch hour I had suggested three alternatives with respect to the proposals connected with the building of this gas pipe line, and I had begun to review particularly what the Pacific northwest trade association had to say respecting the building of this line. Their resolution No. 11 had to do with the extension of the line, and reads as follows:

> Whereas, S.1287 has been introduced in the Senate of the United States and reads as follows: That section 3 of the Natural Gas Act is amended by inserting between the second and third sentences thereof a new sentence as follows: It shall not be deemed to be consistent with the public interest to authorize the exportation or importation of natural gas in any case where the commission finds that such exportation or importation will result in economic dislocation, unemployment, or injury to competing fuel industries in the United States; and
> Whereas, this type of legislation would seem to be against the aims and objectives of the Pacific Northwest Trade Association and would set up regulations which would tend to restrict the normal interchange of goods and services between the United States and Canada, and;
>
> Whereas, British Columbia and Alberta may prove to be the most economic sources from which Oregon, Washington, Montana and Idaho can obtain a supply of natural gas;
> Be it therefore resolved, that the Pacific Northwest Trade Association go on record as opposing this bill and notify the congressional delegations of Oregon, Washington, Montana and Idaho of this action along with the committee of interstate and foreign commerce of the Senate to whom this bill has been referred.

I consider that a very important resolution in view of the fact that it was passed at that meeting. The resolution, which was passed practically unanimously, was endorsed by the Northwest Pipe Coating Corporation, the Seattle Gas Company, Puget Power Company, Boeing Aeroplane Company, Pacific Power and Light Company, Portland Chamber of Commerce, Portland Gas and Coke Company and the Eugene Water and Electric Board.

You will note that practically all the firms having to do with power in the Pacific northwest, including our own from British Columbia, were very interested in having this gas legislation passed as proposed.

Now, I would not go as far as the Vancouver Sun has gone in its editorial of June 19 of this year, in suggesting reprisal action; but I think that sometimes it is necessary to suggest what action we might take to reciprocate in respect of their thoughtless treatment of our request that gas be piped into the northwestern United States. On the point the Sun has this to say:

> Ottawa must demand immediate reconsideration by top U.S. administrators of the perverse ban clamped on B.C. natural gas entering Washington and Oregon by the U.S. federal power commission. Our government should bluntly remind Washington, D.C., that Canada could play at economic nationalism to great U.S. disadvantage.
> Ottawa could point out that B.C. is in no mood to harness its Columbia river water to supply desperately needed hydroelectric power to the U.S. northwest when FPC can't trust us to serve gas consumers fairly in the same area.

I would like to remind this government, particularly the minister now before the committee—because he was minister at that time—that when the Anaconda mine required a large supply of natural gas there was no question of the fact that Alberta could supply the gas in the quantities required. Nor was there any suggestion at any time that the supplier might be unreliable. At the time the request was made to supply the Anaconda mine in the United States with gas, that line was built and the export permit was given.

There has been no difficulty in so far as the shipments of gas are concerned into that part of the United States.

The transportation of gas is so important in the defence set-up of the Pacific northwest that, if we are going to try to keep our industries in operation, it is important that this exchange be continued. As I said earlier, I would not go so far as to suggest that what the Vancouver Sun suggests by way of reprisal should be endorsed by parliament. However, I think it should be drawn to the attention of the United States authorities that the two of us can very handily play at the same game.

The following is a press report which has since been substantiated by the fact that we could not send our gas into the United States. The following appears in the Vancouver Province of June 19, and refers to one of the larger consumers of the product in Portland. The press article says:

> Charles Gueffroy, president of Portland Gas and Coke Company, Portland, Oregon, biggest potential customer, said his company will not sign anything but a "pay as we use at an agreed price" contract with Pacific Northwest, the winning pipeline. "Without our contract I doubt if Pacific can get financial backing," he said.
> Mr. Gueffroy said the decision "injected unfortunate international aspects and I predict that even the White House will take note of it."

It can be seen from this one large consumer just how essential it is that a gas line should be built. I know our minister is well aware of the situation. He is aware of the fact that it is very necessary to the people of British Columbia, if we are to carry on the industrial development we have been expecting to carry on. I believe he knows of the development that is taking place in my own riding, where some $70 million is being invested by a British syndicate looking after the estate of the Duke of Westminster. That site alone will probably account for some 80,000 families in that riding in the not too distant future, when the ultimate goal of complete industrialization is reached.

The matter, of course, has to do entirely with policy. And I come back to that, because I feel that to a certain degree our government has been neglectful of letting our policy be made known to the Americans, particularly when they expect us to help them. When they expect that, then naturally we expect that they will give some help to us. This matter of trade, whether in connection with gas for defence purposes, or for any other purpose, is a very far-reaching one. A policy whereby we allow Texas gas to enter the Niagara peninsula for only five years might well have its effect upon the Pacific Northwest decision made by the commission, because we have given our approval to bringing gas into that area.

By the same token I think we should expect further consideration from the proper authorities in the United States, when we bring to their attention the far-reaching effects on our defence production alone, if for no other reason. The same is true of the United States. We should bring to their attention the far-reaching consequences of this matter on our defence production alone if for no other reason than that the safety of the United States and of Canada might well depend upon this gas.

The hon. member for one of the Kootenay ridings mentioned the other day the steel industry that he hoped would be built in his riding. Certainly, anyone who knows the worth of steel and the fact that coke and coal are found in the region, together with gas, which could be supplied to that region, knows that it would be a tremendous boon to that area. It is more essential to bring this about now than ever before. I request the minister to try to get in touch with the proper authorities in the United States with a view to getting them to change their decision in respect of bringing gas into the northwestern United States. Let us build our line. If that is impossible, then give us the assurance that the United States people will use our gas to supplement their own. If that is not done, then the third proposal should be undertaken. We should go ahead and build a gas line from the Peace river country into the Vancouver market with the help of Canadian industrialists and investments by the public, as well as the help of the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Green: On Saturday last I asked the Minister of Defence Production a question with regard to this decision which has been made by the United States federal power commission, and he gave a satisfactory reply. I realize the minister is just as much concerned about overcoming this difficulty as are those of us who represent constituencies in British Columbia.

Since Saturday I have had an opportunity to read the west coast press and I think I can say without exaggeration that there is great concern, great worry there over this situation. In any event, I have never seen the press upset so quickly as they have been over this particular decision. As the minister knows, the opening up of the Peace river district of British Columbia and Alberta is dependent to a very large extent on the possibility of exporting the gas. If no way is found by which that gas can be got to market, then the development of that northern portion of Canada will be delayed for a generation. That will be particularly tragic, because much of our danger comes from the north. If there ever were an attack on this country it would come from Siberia or over the pole, and that northern country is of the utmost importance from a strategic point of view as well as in many other ways.

As far as British Columbia is concerned, there has been a great deal of publicity about natural gas being available. That publicity has been going on for several years, and to a remarkable degree the people have the idea that the economic development of the province depends to quite a large extent on getting gas from the Peace river. It is felt there that every part of the province would benefit; of course the central part of the province would, including such centres as Prince George and Kamloops. Then, there is the Okanagan valley and the Kootenay country where the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company is located at Trail. That company would be as large a consumer of natural gas as greater Vancouver. Down in the lower mainland of the province the British Columbia Electric Railway Company has been planning to use this gas, and many schemes have been on the drawing board which are based on the use of Peace river gas.

I believe it would also be possible to pipe the gas over to Vancouver island, and there it would be a fine source of power. They have not too much electric power there, and the natural gas would be of great benefit.

I notice in the press that the former premier of British Columbia, the Hon. Byron Johnson, said that he had in mind the provincial government taking part financially in the construction of this natural gas pipe line from the Peace river, in the event of the decision of the United States federal power commission being unfavourable.

I had not realized that before, but I think that he had planned to provide over half the capital for the construction of such a line. The present provincial government is very deeply committed to the project. I fancy that it too would be willing to help in the construction of a line.

I believe that if a line were built now it would not be very long before the Americans would be scrambling to get the gas. It could be finished before the line from the San Juan basin comes through, and apparently the reserves in that area of the United States are not very extensive. I was given that impression by a statement made by one of the directors of the Westcoast Transmission Company as reported in the Vancouver Province of June 18. I refer to Norman Whittall. He had this to say:

> If Canada "goes it alone" on the natural gas pipeline from the Peace river, the United States will ask to come in, said Norman R. Whittall, one of the chief figures in Westcoast Transmission Company's battle for the line.
> "We should build a 24-inch gas line to Vancouver, irrespective of anything else," he commented when informed of today's turndown by the United States federal power commission.

I believe the original plan was to put in a 24-inch line. The article continues:

> The citizens of British Columbia should support the project and the government should guarantee the bonds. It is only a matter of time until there will be so much pressure from an educated American public that federal power commission will be forced to upset its ruling. Gas reserves of the Pacific Northwest Pipeline Corporation are not sufficient to supply the potential market in the Pacific northwest area of the United States."

I believe the main objective now is to see that the construction of a pipe line is not unduly delayed. It would be vital for defence production on the west coast as well as being vital for the development of the north country and of the province as a whole. I realize that on Saturday the minister said he would do everything he could to help get this situation remedied, but I have been wondering whether a project of this kind would qualify for capital assistance under the minister's department. It may be that such would not be the case, but I ask the minister whether he would be willing to have a complete investigation made of the situation just as soon as possible after the house rises. I know I do not need to ask for his assurance that he will do everything within his power to see that this project goes ahead.

We have lost the first battle, but we have not lost the war. I believe this scheme is so important to the future of Canada that some means should be found of bringing about the construction of the line through co-operation of the people interested and of the provincial government; and whatever help can be given by the dominion government should be made available. Could the minister say whether this would be a project which could be made eligible for capital assistance under the vote in his department?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, it does not come under any of the rules governing capital assistance about which I know. I might say that the policy for the sale of western gas is made in the west and not, I am sorry to say, in Ottawa, because I think we might do a little better. There has always been a theory advanced that the best market for western gas is in the United States, and a great exponent of that theory is the hon. member for Calgary South. I believe his views are shared by the premier of Alberta. That theory is that all we have to do is to deliver the gas across the international boundary and it would be snapped up immediately. I have thought for a long time that the sponsors of this project were taking rather a long shot in attempting to serve that particular market by gas from the Peace river area. I felt that the other applicants who proposed to take the gas from southern Alberta should have received more consideration than they were given in this house. I remember that my hon. friend himself led a filibuster during two sessions of parliament to prevent those proposals receiving consideration in this house. I felt that a supply from southern Alberta would have had a much better chance of entering that market rather than a pipe line from northern Alberta. All I can say for this government is that we have done everything we possibly could to see that western gas was made available and done all we could to help the marketing of that gas. I believe in doing everything to develop our economy and the use of our natural resources to the best advantage. I have long maintained that the best market for Alberta's gas is in Canada, and that the greatest contribution that gas could make to the economy of any part of the country is to find markets for it in Canada. That is what we are attempting to do.

I would point out that we had to wait two years after the first application for export to the United States was granted before we could get permission to export gas to eastern Canada. We obtained that permit during the last two or three months and that is a project to which I think the government can give some assistance. As both projects were started by others and controlled by others, and for which the permits are given by others it has been very difficult for this government to get a toehold to an extent that we could be really useful.

I think I am as interested as anyone else in making sure that Canada develops to the fullest extent possible using all her natural resources, and I am very sorry indeed that that gas in the Peace river area is going to be tied up for some time at least. However, I think the decision to bring in gas from the San Juan basin is only a temporary hold-up because I believe there is not enough gas in that area to supply the domestic users and there is nothing available for industry. I presume there will in time be a demand for northern gas if it is then available, but the difference is that the franchise for the area has been given to the United States company and I presume the Canadian company will be required to deal with that company rather than deal directly with the consumers, which I think will be unfortunate.

Mr. Green: Is it a fact that the bulk of the gas in the Peace river district is in British Columbia and not in Alberta?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think the larger quantity of the gas as committed to this particular project lies in Alberta, but a good part of it lies in British Columbia, and I dare say more drilling would disclose more gas in British Columbia. I therefore think it would be correct to say that the supply is in both provinces.

Mr. Fulton: When we asked the minister about this matter the other day he said that there would be no obstacle at this end in the way of making arrangements between west gas and the Pacific Northwest company. I just wish to briefly support what has been said here by the previous speakers as to the importance to the development of our province of finding an outlet for this gas, and I should like to ask the minister whether I am correct in my understanding that up to the present time it has always been considered that the logical outlet for Peace river gas was the Pacific northwest. Can he tell me if that is still the case? While I know we cannot say whether a private company will make a deal with another private company, and certainly there is no way in which we can or should compel them to do so, is it not obvious and logical, when you have gas bursting the wells—I do not want to exaggerate it—and we are told the Pacific northwest area of the United States has a growth potential considerably in excess of that which can be supplied from the San Juan fields, that such an arrangement would be a practical and desirable one, and that the two companies should get together and work out an arrangement for a supply fitting into the grid for which the United States company now has the franchise to put in available Peace river gas so that the demands of that area would be met and the gas come down through our province? It seems to me the interest of both countries would then be met, and the potential shortage of gas in the Pacific northwest would be supplemented by gas from the Peace river area. The interests of British Columbia as an entity would also be served. I do not want to ask the minister to be a prophet, but I would be interested in knowing whether that strikes him as a logical and desirable plan.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not think I should comment as to what would be logical and desirable. The Westcoast Transmission Company has an export permit for a certain quantity of gas from that area and certainly this government will take no action to interfere in any arrangement that may be found possible to provide for the disposal of that gas in the United States. But I might add that I am not sufficiently familiar with all the facts and therefore I do not like to comment.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to pursue that subject because gas, like coal, is in a difficult position owing to the lack of a national fuel policy, and some day hon. members will begin to understand that. I am going to discuss the minister's estimates and his report on defence production. Before I do that I want to assure the minister that I am not unmindful of the difficulties that exist in getting any kind of equality either in the manufacture or in the styling of material across this country. Take the geographical difficulties and the B.N.A. stop blocks, mix a little bit of selfishness, and you have a combination that is pretty difficult to sort out.

But I was glad this morning to hear the hon. member for Eglinton, who lives in central Canada, take a national position in the matter of getting a more balanced economy, and I was also glad to listen to the contribution of the hon. member for Nanaimo, who is from the far west.

This Department of Defence Production is not only a defence department but a purchasing agency, and as I see it this department could be a nucleus for a very useful instrument in the whole economy of Canada. In reading over the functions of the department as outlined in the report, it looks to me that this is in effect a planning commission that has to do not only with the buying of material for defence but with assisting industries necessary to defence. In that way, if it had the authority to do so, it could have the function of correcting a great many things that are maladjusted in our economic set-up today in Canada. I hope that some thinking will be done along those lines.

For years since coming into the House of Commons I have been moving a resolution in the house with regard to the need for the decentralization of industry and pointing out the overdevelopment in the centre of Canada arising out of the last war. It is that overdevelopment in industry that has set off a search for power in the central provinces. There the industries developed themselves into a black-out for some years during the war and after it.

If hon. members are reading the press they will realize that today in the United States those who are advising on national defence are urging the United States industrialists to, as it were, free the economy by decentralizing their industrial set-up, particularly their defence plants. That is something that is more necessary in Canada, I think, than it is in the United States. With the industrial development we have in Canada today, two atomic bombs could knock out the whole set-up and you would have, east or west, nothing to supplement it. I think it is nearly time that we began to think along those lines. This is the department which could do something, with the functions they now have of practically organizing industry necessary to defence and of purchasing defence requirements. In fact, the minister is spending most of the money that is appropriated for national defence. I think some thinking is necessary along the lines of decentralization not only to make for a better balance in our economy but as a means of protecting ourselves in the event of war. Nobody is sure whether war may or may not come. In considering our whole defence set-up, I believe that some thinking is necessary along the lines of decentralization.

The minister's report, at page 16, points out that the largest portion of Canada's defence orders, $223 million, was placed in connection with aircraft and so forth. I am not going to read that portion of the report. However, it clearly points out that practically all the money spent for national defence is spent through the minister's department. Then again, in the estimates at page 154, I think you will find the answer as to why most of the development in defence plants, contracts and so forth has taken place in the centre of the country. If hon. members will look at page 154, they will see in the details of the estimates a section captioned "Officers on Loan from Business and Industry for which Salary Provision is not required". In that group of officials of the minister's department you will find mentioned the positions, without names, of directors, assistant director, associate director, deputy director, other assistants, advisers and consultants and so on down to a legal adviser.

That was the kind of set-up we had all during the war. When we were building industry after industry mostly in the central part of Canada, the planning at that time was done on behalf of the government by dollar-a-year men. They were men who were taken in from the large industries across Canada. It is only natural—it is only human nature—that, if an official is in a position of spending the taxpayers' money for the purpose of expanding an industry, creating an industry or selling a commodity, he is going to think of his own plant or firm. I think that was the main reason why you had during the war in the centre of the country a lop-sided development in our industrial creations.

In the spending of the $2 billion that is indicated in these estimates for the creation of industry and for defence purchasing these officers or men in positions of direction at this time—in every field, from the legal fraternity down to the economist, the consultant and the contract expert—are all on loan from some industry, I presume, from the centre of Canada. Before consideration of his estimates is concluded, the minister can tell us who make up that personnel and where they come from. In my judgment it is personnel of that kind who are not particular as to how the economy is protected or what kind of development takes place as long as the firm or plant for which they work is looked after. They are not in here for nothing. They do not live for nothing. Someone is paying their salaries. The someone they are thinking of and working for is the someone who is paying their salaries. I am reasonably sure that not many of these directors, consultants, legal advisers and contract experts came in here from Nova Scotia—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Many of them came from Nova Scotia.

Mr. Gillis: —with the exception, of course, of the minister's parliamentary assistant; and of course he is only one man and it is rather difficult for him to watch the whole crowd. As I say, in my judgment that is why we did not get a balanced economy in the country. This is one matter that might be given consideration if the minister's department is going to continue as it is. I hope it will continue because, as I said previously, this could be a good nucleus of a planning commission that could take under consideration many of the problems that are created today because sufficient thinking has not been done about them.

Again, at page 38 of the minister's report there is another item that provokes my thought and supports exactly what I was saying a few moments ago. At page 38 of the minister's report there is a section with the caption "Small Industries Division" and at the bottom of the page there is this paragraph:

> Much of the educational and liaison work of the division was completed during the year, as most companies interested in securing defence orders had made their facilities known and understood the policies and procedures followed by the department. As a result, the district offices were closed down at the end of the year and the Ottawa staff was reduced to two industry relations officers.

That suggests to me that the dollar a year men of the big industries, or those fellows who were working for nothing, were quite satisfied in planning the work of the department that there was no need of small industries in this country, that the big ones could take care of everything and if they were not big enough they could be expanded. There are many parts of this country where small industry is not only needed but the economy is in desperate straits because industries are dying. The report of the department says that they have been turning out all kinds of guns, machine tools and other equipment for the NATO countries. That equipment goes to Europe. The shortest route to Europe is from Sydney, Nova Scotia. There is a huge steel plant there. I have never been able to understand why, under such a set-up as that of the minister's department, some of the materials for the NATO countries are not manufactured in that part of the country where the raw steel, iron ore and labour are available.

It is right at tidewater. I never could understand why these things are manufactured in central Canada and dragged all the way across the country to be shipped instead of being manufactured in that part of the country and shipped from there. As I said when I began, with a little bit of selfishness and the geographical difficulties and the difficulties created by the British North America Act, you have got a pretty tough combination. I think it is that little bit of selfishness that keeps everything centralized in Ontario and Quebec because logically and economically the place to manufacture and ship equipment for the NATO countries is in the maritime provinces.

I can understand risk capital not going in there, but I cannot understand a department like the minister's, which is investing the taxpayers' money, placing industry that is going to turn out that kind of equipment in the most illogical part of the country where the products have to be dragged across the country to the sea to be shipped. In many cases the raw material is taken from that part of the country, processed in the central provinces and the finished products are then transported to Halifax, Montreal or Sydney to be shipped. I am pretty sure that if the minister were doing that kind of planning for himself it would not be done that way.

But I am afraid that much of the planning, as I said before, is done by people who are interested in maintaining the kind of set-up we have in Canada today, with centralization of everything in the two central provinces. Let me give the minister two examples of the attitude: "We are not particular what happens in other parts of the country as long as we are selling our own commodity". I asked the Minister of National Defence a question yesterday with respect to the large naval base at Sydney, Nova Scotia. There is a steel plant within half a mile of the base, and at that steel plant there is a large wire and nail mill. At the present time at least 50 per cent of the people usually employed in that nail mill are unemployed. Why are nails dragged from Hamilton, Ontario, for use on that naval base at Sydney, Nova Scotia? Why could they not have been bought half a mile away? They could have been purchased more cheaply because you would not have the freight rate to pay for the long haul from Hamilton to Sydney.

That is merely an example but it is a very pertinent one; because, if that is what goes on with respect to a small purchase like that what takes place when the contract runs into millions of dollars?

The second example I wish to bring to the minister's attention has to do with the heating of national defence buildings. I have a couple of their requisition forms in my hand. The armouries at Sackville, New Brunswick, are located within a few miles of the coal mines at Springhill, Nova Scotia. Up until 1953 these armouries were heated by coal purchased from the Springhill area at a cost of $16.50 a ton.

When the contract was sent out in 1953 the dealer in Moncton, New Brunswick, who supplied the coal was told that in the future he had to supply anthracite coal from the United States. He wrote and said that it was rather difficult, that he would have to bring it in in small lots and it would be difficult to handle it in that way. Do not forget that the use of anthracite coal increased the cost of heating the building over 100 per cent. It cost $35 a ton while the other cost $16.50 a ton. But that switch was made. I should like to ask the minister if the person who prepared that form and sent it out was not more interested in promoting the sale of United States coal than he was in maintaining some market for an industry that was in very serious economic difficulties at the time.

These are only two examples, nails and coal, and these things took place in a section of the country where, as the minister knows, unemployment is perhaps more serious than in any other part of Canada. Both the provincial government and the people of the province have pointed out that they face a crisis that is beyond their control, but even with respect to such small items that part of the country was ignored and forgotten. In the light of these two small examples, I am reasonably sure that the same thinking runs through all the planning of the purchasing of defence requirements, the letting of contracts and so forth.

I am not saying this by way of criticism. I am bringing it to the minister's attention now because there is a lot of money still to be spent on national defence, and national defence is going to last as long as we last. One of the best means of civil defence that I know of today is to try to get those who are planning our defence production requirements to think in terms of not putting all our eggs in one basket and concentrating practically all our production in eastern Ontario where it can be knocked out with one bomb. What I have suggested is in my opinion one of the best means of civil defence that I can think of at the present time. In addition, it would at least mean a livelihood to people in sections of Canada which are at the crossroads today unless something is done.

I am not going to say any more. I want the minister to do some thinking about this matter because I am convinced that men do not enter the service of the government from Canada Packers, National Steel or any of these other industries for nothing. There is remuneration somewhere. They are working for somebody who is paying their salaries, and their planning will be done in accordance with the best interests of the people who are paying their wages.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think I should reply to this immediately. I am disappointed in my hon. friend. I have heard him make some very able and fair-minded speeches in the nineteen years we have sat in the House of Commons. I can hardly believe that he thinks that people offer their services and their services are being accepted with the sole thought that they will promote the interests of their own particular business. That is the statement he has just made. In the first place people do not offer their services. We have to go out and find them, make arrangements with their companies and beg them to come here. In the second place, never in all my experience with men borrowed from industry have I known these men to help their own industries deliberately. In fact they usually lean backward. If there is not enough business to go around in the industry, they usually say: Fill the others up and our people will do the best they can. That has been the attitude in my experience. My hon. friend has suggested the only reason the maritime provinces are not full of defence plants is that we have selfish people in Ottawa who prevented the plants going there.

Let us analyse that statement. When we find something to be manufactured, we first look to existing industry to carry out that operation. The only reason that we sponsor new building at all is that existing industry has not sufficient capacity to produce what is required. You say, if the industry has not enough productive capacity, why not move a plant to Nova Scotia and build there? The difficulty is that it requires some specialized skill to be able to produce most things that are in short supply. In the first place, someone must know the kind of plant that is required, the kind of equipment that is required, and must have the nucleus of an organization. At least, they must have skilled and experienced engineers, operators skilled in management of that particular enterprise, then they must draw on a nucleus of skilled labour in the area. You cannot attract that kind of labour from one area to an area where the workers have every reason to believe the plant cannot exist under highly competitive conditions.

You have those factors to consider. I suggest we have not neglected the maritimes, and have taken there all the industries we could take. I will tell the hon. member one of the worst mistakes I ever made in planning industry was to put up $5 million to help in the construction of a plate mill at Sydney. This plate mill operated for two or three months, and when the war was over it was broken up and dispersed; that was the last of the plate mill and the last of the government's $5 million. It is quite useless to establish industries to do a war job that cannot exist under normal conditions. It does not do the district any good. True, it provides employment for a short time, and spreads around some money for a short time. But the fact the plant is standing there idle does more harm to the area than if the project had never been started.

What have we been able to do for the maritimes? I am rather proud of the fact I persuaded an English aircraft manufacturer to establish himself in Halifax. Our Canadian manufacturers were not willing to do that. We had tried to get several of them to consider establishing an aircraft plant at Halifax. However, when the Fairey Aviation Company came out, I happened to see them before anyone else did. I particularly asked them to take a good look at Halifax, because I thought they could do very well there. They did that, and as my hon. friend knows, that company has established a very substantial industry in Nova Scotia.

We had an opportunity to help establish an electronics industry in the maritimes, too, but that is not doing so well. It has created considerable employment, and I am very hopeful that it can survive during normal times. The hon. member has talked about a shipyard in Cape Breton. I do not remember any shipyard in Cape Breton before the Department of Defence Production started to function.

Mr. Gillis: It is a naval base.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A naval base; nevertheless it was built by the Department of Defence Production. I hope it will be a substantial industry. The Ferguson shipyards are there, but that is a small operation except for the contracts from the Department of Defence Production. Amherst has a substantial industry. We kept that industry busy when the department of munitions and supply was functioning, but when the department went out of business, the industry closed down. When the Department of Defence Production started to function, the industry opened up and is now a substantial employer of men. I think if the hon. member will look around Nova Scotia, he will find that the department has supported existing industry and has brought in any industry willing to go to the maritimes and capable of surviving after military requirements had been provided for.

When it is suggested that the men in the department here tried to locate those industries somewhere else, I assure the hon. member that if they had not worked to establish industry in the maritimes, none of these industries would have been in Nova Scotia today. It has taken the loyal cooperation of every man in the Department of Defence Production to see that those industries were located there and to see that they have been brought to the state of prosperity they are enjoying today.

The hon. member has spoken of two examples of malfeasance, if you like, on the part of the department. One concerns these nails. I should like to know how many nails? Did the hon. member count the kegs? The fact of the matter is that nails are sold everywhere. We have a nail plant in Sydney, Cape Breton; we have a nail plant in Hamilton and we have a nail plant in Vancouver. I can assure him that Sydney nails are sold in Vancouver, and

I have every reason to believe that Sydney nails are sold in Hamilton. I am certain the Steel Company of Canada offer nails for sale in Sydney and in Vancouver as well. I do not believe the Vancouver plant reaches down that far because it is a small operation, not associated with a primary producer.

These nails are undoubtedly on sale in hardware stores. A man might have needed a keg of nails, and while waiting for a shipment may have gone into a hardware store and bought a keg of nails without paying too much attention to the label on the barrel. They might have been shipped out of naval stores and routed in there incorrectly. It is the policy of the department not only to pay slightly more for products coming from the maritime areas or provinces not having substantial industry, but to go to some trouble to try to build up those areas. It is our policy, on an even break, to always buy from the operation nearest to the consuming plant. I should like to know more about those nails. I have asked our general purchasing department, but they can find no trace of any order of Hamilton nails for Sydney.

Mr. Gillis: I saw them.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): How many did you see?

Mr. Gillis: I have seen ten or fifteen kegs.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That may be a lot of nails in that particular operation, but it is not a great many nails. I suppose they are worth about $5 a keg, something like that, and that would be $75 worth of nails.

Then the hon. member spoke about coal at Sackville. He has been told about that. We get the specifications from the Department of National Defence. It is the privilege of that department to write the specifications for what they require, and our department purchases as requested. The specifications came over calling for anthracite coal for that particular armoury. They were processed through the department. I think these specifications should have been called to someone's attention. The complaints came in, and it was called to the attention of the Department of National Defence. They admitted the mistake, and the next coal that is ordered there will, of course, be local coal. I presume when you are buying a billion dollars worth of supplies a year, mistakes will happen. I have been rather happy they have not been great in number, but that was undoubtedly a mistake which is being corrected.

Mr. Gillis: I am glad that I deliberately made my talk provocative.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You should not accuse people of being dishonest. Not dishonest, human.

Mr. Gillis: I wanted the minister to say something about these things, and he would not have paid any attention to me if I had not made the talk provocative.

There is one thing I want to tell the minister. You can find skilled personnel in that area for any plant you wish to establish. You can find electricians, mechanics, machinists, machine tool makers, and you will find a lot of them in the Cape Breton area who are not working. In so far as the plate mill is concerned, that mill was built twice. I am not blaming the federal government for all the disabilities of Nova Scotia, because in my judgment the provincial government is about 50 per cent responsible. The other 50 per cent could be shared between the federal government and Dominion Steel and Coal company.

That mill was built twice, you know. It was built in the first war at a cost of $11 million, and never produced a thing. Then, all the machinery from the mill disappeared. I think if anyone looked around he would find it over at Ojibway falls in Ontario. I know the story very well, and I know the minister does, too. Because it was I who urged him to get some guts into the mill when the second war started. And he did. He equipped it as a modern, up-to-date mill, employing 600 people, and all were trained personnel. It was doing a good job while the federal government was in the shipbuilding business. But as soon as the war was over and the federal government went out of the shipbuilding business there was no further market for that plate.

At that time we were importing 90 per cent of our steel plate from the United States. Why Dosco did not maintain that mill is not hard to understand. They have a mill somewhere else; and you subsidize the raw material coming up.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Dosco has no other plate mill.

Mr. Gillis: Well, it may be raw material. I just do not know why they did not maintain that mill. The question may be one of raw material. They may be supplying their own fabricating plant up here with the raw material they are turning out. Nevertheless there was a market in Canada for steel plate.

I questioned the minister in the House of Commons, and asked him if he would be willing to hand that mill over to the provincial government to operate as a crown company. The minister was fair about it; he said that he would be; but the provincial government did not have any intention of going into the business. So that 600 men were laid off from that mill, and it went out of production. The equipment that was in the mill is now over behind the iron curtain. That mill as a matter of fact was sold to Czechoslovakia.

I suggest that is not a very good example. It was a case of complete neglect and stupidity. I am not blaming the minister for it, because he did try to get someone to use it. However, that is the story about that mill. Before the minister's estimates are completed I wish he would tell us about these advisers, consultants and experts—some 16 of them. I do not want their names, but I would like to know where they came from and what companies they represented, just to see how many of them are from Nova Scotia.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think that has been filed with the Clerk. If my hon. friend will look up the records of the House of Commons, I believe he will find that information.

While we are discussing scandals, perhaps I might clear up this other scandal. I will not name the firm these documents refer to, except to say we have made no sale of bearings to this firm during 1953 or 1954. I think perhaps if we go farther back we will find we never made a sale to the company. But there was a sale of bearings to a Quebec company in November of 1953, out of London, Ontario, and included in a long list of spare parts were a few bearings—not many. And that is the only sale of bearings we can find—and it had nothing to do with this Ontario company. I might say—

Mr. Fleming: I suppose it is possible they might have acquired them from the person who purchased them from Crown Assets?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, they get them from all over the world. That is one of the largest parts companies in the empire. We had a case not long ago, where they were doing business abroad, and we said that they could not take the business because they were exporting United States parts through Canada. They showed they bought the parts in Europe, and brought us invoices from all over Europe to show where they had collected them. But they have never bought bearings, so far as we can find, from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. We called for tenders for certain bearings, as my hon. friend said, and this firm turned up 42nd in the list of offers. There were 41 firms quoting lower prices on that particular list than did the firm he mentioned. So I suggest that perhaps the scandal he scented there is not present.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Fleming: Well, the quotation by this firm in question has nothing to do with the point. The point I made is that at the time when the government was purchasing these bearings—and there is no trouble about identifying them, because the designating number of each is given—this company apparently was selling bearings of the same kind. While it may not be certain that these latter bearings had come from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, obviously they had come through either Crown Assets Disposal Corporation or its predecessor, War Assets Corporation.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No; they probably obtained them from the disposal corporation in the United States, which is a quite separate operation from anything we run. They certainly did not buy those bearings recently either from Crown Assets Disposal or from its predecessor, War Assets Corporation. I can assure my hon. friend of that. But I think the probable explanation is that they bought them in the United States and imported them.

Mr. Fleming: I gather the minister is indicating that his inquiry has gone back over 1953 and 1954. What about—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): These particular bearings were a late model.

Mr. Fleming: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The particular bearings we are talking about were a late model. Bearings become obsolete.

Mr. Fleming: Has an inquiry been made prior to 1953?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We are told there is no recent record in Crown Assets Disposal Corporation of the contractor having bought roller bearings at any stage.

Mr. Fleming: I accept the minister's statement, of course; but what I am concerned about is that someone else made a purchase, and then delivered over to this dealer. I expect that some of these purchasers who were doing business with Crown Assets Disposal Corporation did their business through agents, and were not necessarily making purchases in their own names.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We can find only one sale of bearings, and that was a clean-out operation at London. Naturally when we clear up a plant, instead of going shopping with three or four bearings individually and finding a market, we offer job lots. And there are people who buy in job lots. This particular job lot is the only one we have been able to find that had bearings in it. And, as I say, it went to a Quebec firm.

Mr. Fleming: What is the date of it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): November 1953. There were only a few bearings.

Mr. Hansell: I wonder if I might ask the minister a very simple question. The answer may not be quite as simple as the question. I am wondering where the minister's department, the Department of Defence suggest this has nothing to do with the Department of National Defence in the location and building of various defence projects.

My question is based upon a telegram received this morning from the hon. member for Cariboo. This telegram was sent to the hon. member for Peace River, the leader of this group, and is as follows:

> Could you ask ministry in view of prospective transfer of R.C.A.F. western headquarters from Vancouver and strategic importance of Prince George in northern defences, will ministry say whether consideration will be given to transferring headquarters to Prince George. Is ministry aware of advantages of Prince George airport?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That of course is a matter entirely for the Department of National Defence, as to where it has its headquarters. As far as procurement goes, it is the function of the Department of National Defence to say what it wants, furnish the specification, determine the place of delivery and the time of delivery, and to make the money available by a financial encumbrance. After that it is the function of the Department of Defence Production to determine how the material will be procured and where it will be procured, and all factors of that kind.

Mr. Hansell: The proper procedure then is to call this matter to the attention of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was interested this morning to hear the minister announce that it is his intention to place the Department of Defence Production on a more permanent basis. Its activities have assumed such proportions now that this development is very important and necessary. I know it will bring much satisfaction to the aircraft industry especially which has been uncertain as to its future in the economy of this country. At the same time I was disappointed a few months ago to learn that the small defence industries branch of the department was winding up its affairs. It is this particular aspect of the departmental activities that I wish to say something about this afternoon.

Is this branch of the department winding up its affairs because it is felt that its program has been completed, or does the reason arise from the fact that the Department of Defence Production has found it is impossible to work out the original purpose of the small defence industries branch? I have the feeling that the latter reason must be the one because, as I said, the small defence industries branch was initiated to assist in the work of decentralization of defence industries. We have had several dissertations on this theme during the discussion today and no doubt there will be more before we wind up our discussion this afternoon. As I see the effects of the operation of the small defence industries branch, I cannot come to the conclusion that it has had the desired effect, at least in my part of the country, that was originally intended. I would appreciate very much if the minister could indicate why it has been decided to discontinue the work of this important branch.

I sometimes wonder if the minister has come under the influence of the myth that so far as industrial development is concerned the west is catching up with the east. That is an idea that is very frequently put forward even in well-informed circles of this country. In fact I have even heard it from some of my fellow members from the province of Manitoba.

During the budget debate I referred to some statistics which indicated that the reverse was the fact. That is, that rather than catching up, the western provinces are actually going farther behind. The boom that they are enjoying, in comparison to the economic boom in Ontario and Quebec, is a relatively minor one. On June 18 I received a parliamentary return which brings these figures up to 1953, and I note the same trends are continued. I asked for the statistics of total new investment in manufacturing, the number of new post-war manufacturing plants and the employment resulting from the establishment of those plants as well as the total production figures, and I see that in each case the trends are strongly in favour of the large central provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

In view of the fact that I have had several members ask to see these statistics, I am wondering whether I can get the permission of the committee to have them placed on the record.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What are they?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member permission to place them on Hansard?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What exactly are these statistics? Read a few until we see what they are.

Mr. Dinsdale: All right. I will give some examples. I did not want to take up the time of the committee to read these statistics. In regard to the first question, the total new investment in manufacturing is presented for the years 1947 through to 1953 inclusive. It covers each of the provinces. I will give as an example the figures for 1953. In Newfoundland the new investment was—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, I suggest this has nothing to do with the Department of Defence Production. That is overall new investment.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, it is the total.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We are not responsible for all investment, just defence investment. I do not see why my hon. friend should be permitted to put that on Hansard in a debate on the estimates of defence production.

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe the figures are included in the statistics.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They may be buried there. If the hon. member wishes to select those—

Mr. McCann: Is it an answer or an order for return?

Mr. Dinsdale: It is an order for return. May I read them?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, if you are interested in hearing all about other kinds of investment in Canada you may permit him to put them on Hansard, but it has nothing to do with the estimates we are discussing. I do not think my hon. friend should clutter up Hansard or take up the time of the committee with something that is irrelevant.

The Chairman: The hon. member apparently has not unanimous consent to place the statistics on Hansard. Therefore, he may not do so. I will allow him to read only those statistics which have to do with the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Dinsdale: Just by way of illustration, actually I am bringing forward the statistics, Mr. Chairman, to back up the point I am making that there is a myth abroad in the country that industrial development in the west is keeping pace with or moving ahead of the new industrial development in the central provinces. I am merely bringing forth these statistics to point out that the facts are contrary to that contention. Because I have not received permission to place these figures on the record, may I be permitted to read the statistics for each of the years I have outlined, or for the year 1953? I think they will amply demonstrate the point I am endeavouring to make.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Once again may I ask my hon. friend whether he is reading the statistics of the Department of Defence Production? What is he reading?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am reading the statistics of the total new investment in manufacturing industries in Canada, as broken down on a provincial basis.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that there is no provision in these estimates for funds to cover the total investment in Canada, and I object to the hon. member taking up the time of the committee for that purpose.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the point taken by the Minister of Defence Production is valid.

Mr. Fleming: May I say a word on that point, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Do you wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, Mr. Chairman. What the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is doing, as I understand it, is bringing forward information with respect to industrial development in the province of Manitoba as bearing directly on his contention that in the distribution of contracts awarded by the Department of Defence Production Manitoba should have received more of these contracts than have been awarded to it, and these figures are designed to indicate the industrial capacity of that province to meet any burden that may be involved in accepting defence contracts.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If that is the purpose, Mr. Chairman, he can proceed, but I do not think that is what the hon. member has in mind.

The Chairman: Order. Further than that I do not think that the reading of statistics with regard to general investment would serve the purpose which the hon. member for Eglinton has mentioned. If the hon. member for Brandon-Souris wishes to read statistics having to do with defence contracts, or the Department of Defence Production, that is an entirely different matter.

Mr. Dinsdale: Well, Mr. Chairman, permit me to quote briefly the statistics for Manitoba, Quebec and Ontario which I think will perhaps solve the difficulty. Manitoba's total investment for 1953 amounted to $10·5 million, for Ontario the figure was $486·3 million and for Quebec $171·8 million. On a percentage basis that is 1·1 per cent for Manitoba, 51·8 per cent for Ontario, and 18·3 per cent for Quebec. If I continued to quote these statistics dealing with the number of plants and the total production involved it would be shown that they are on a similar percentage. Some hon. members have requested permission to see these statistics, but in view of the decision of the committee I am afraid they will have to be passed around on a hand to hand basis.

The point I was making, and I think perhaps the hon. member for Eglinton outlined it quite succinctly, is that there is no basis of truth at all in the idea that the western provinces as well as the maritime provinces are catching up or even keeping pace with the industrial development in the central provinces. The reason why I bring this matter into a discussion on the defence production estimates is that I think the minister has succumbed to the myth himself. Speaking in Winnipeg last spring before the chamber of commerce the minister took issue with members of parliament from the west who were constantly decrying the industrial development situation in Canada and pointing out that there was a continuing imbalance. By that statement he implied, I believe, that things were not as bad as they had been in the west, and that any western member who took that attitude was promoting bad public relations for the district he represented.

The same opinion has been expressed by Dr. Firestone, of the Department of Trade and Commerce, when he said in an address before the trade and industry officials of the ten provincial governments that there were no longer any "have-not" provinces in Canada, and that every one of them was a "have". He added, and I quote him directly:

> True, some provinces have more of one thing than another, but every province has found that it has a good deal of natural resources that can be put to good use with hard work, drive, vision and the proverbial good luck. In other words, the opportunities are there—it is a question of grasping them.

I agree broadly with his idea, but the truth is that, so far as the actual situation in Canada is concerned, those words are still in the realm of prophecy. The very fact that this house clings so tenaciously to tax rental agreements indicates that we recognize the principle that there are certain areas in this country that need additional support because they occupy an unfavourable economic and financial position. Nevertheless, I agree with the broad general principle outlined by Dr. Firestone. It is true that in terms of potential the prairies as well as the maritimes are not to be classified as "have-not" provinces. We have all sorts of potential, but at the moment we are underdeveloped, underpopulated. I do not need those detailed statistics to bring forth sufficient evidence to prove that point.

Every time redistribution comes up for discussion in this house it is the west which suffers in terms of representation here, and that representation is on a—

The Chairman: Order. I can think of two or three departments on which I could allow this speech to be made, but I do not see how I can possibly allow it on the estimates of the Department of Defence Production, and I must ask the hon. member to co-operate by directing his remarks to the estimates of this department.

Mr. Dinsdale: The whole basis for my remarks, Mr. Chairman, is the discontinuance of the small industries branch of this defence department. As I said in my opening remarks, I cannot imagine that this branch of the department has been discontinued because it has completed its work. I feel it has been discontinued because it has been found impossible, due to overwhelming economic and political pressure from the central provinces, for the small defence industries branch to carry out the original purpose for which it was established. In supporting that contention I have pointed out that a situation still exists in these underdeveloped areas of Canada, if I may use that phrase, which demands the continued operation of the work of this department. I cannot imagine anything which could be more closely related to the subject matter now under discussion.

We in the western provinces, and certainly in Manitoba, are not interested in handouts. That has tended to be the policy of the central government for years when we get into economic difficulties during a depression or as indicated by the tax rental agreements. We want an expression of confidence in our future from this government here at Ottawa. I believe that the tremendous sums involved in expenditures by the Department of Defence Production have provided a golden opportunity for the dominion government to assist in overcoming some of these historical trends, the pressure from the central provinces, which produce such an uneven development in other parts of the country.

Our provincial government in Manitoba is beginning to cope with the problem on the local level. Our minister of resources and development has been making contacts in the United States and in the United Kingdom in order to help to overcome the problem so far as possible on the provincial level. However, I say that if we are going to compete successfully with the tremendous social power that is generated by the concentration of population in this central part of Canada, the federal government should seize every possible opportunity for a more equitable distribution of industry.

In concluding, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister why the small defence industry activity has been discontinued.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If my hon. friend will refer to the report of the Department of Defence Production for the year 1953 he will find the answer. Under the heading "Small Industries Division", the report sets out the function of the division and the section finishes with this paragraph:

> Much of the educational and liaison work of the division was completed during the year, as most companies interested in securing defence orders had made their facilities known and understood the policies and procedures followed by the department. As a result, the district offices were closed down at the end of the year and the Ottawa staff was reduced to two industry relations officers.

In other words, the work is being done; but in an effort to promote economy we did not believe it was worth while to carry ten branch offices in the provinces when the work left to be done was not sufficient to keep them busy. We have therefore concentrated the work in Ottawa in the person of two industry relations officers. I think that nowhere is there to be found a better example of the work of the small industries division than is to be found in the work in the Winnipeg area. If you will talk to the small manufacturers there, I think they will tell you that they are doing government work because they were introduced to the work by the small industries division. They know their way around now and they do not need anyone to hold their hands. That is the situation all across Canada. The small manufacturer as well as the large manufacturer understands the work or the function of the department.

I might point out to my hon. friend that since this department was formed in 1951, it has placed orders in the number of 386,585. If he thinks that all those orders have been placed with big business, he could not be more wrong. I think that far more of them have been placed with businesses with a capitalization under $100,000 than have been placed with businesses with a capitalization of more than that.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I just wish to speak briefly again. The fact that the minister mentioned the Winnipeg area does not deal with the problem I was raising because Winnipeg is a large metropolitan community with a very healthy economic base. In fact most of the industrial development that has taken place in the province of Manitoba since the war has taken place in that area which has almost half of our population resources. In Manitoba we are cursed with double centralization, namely centralization in the east and this centralization in one large urban area. The latest statistics I have indicate that 85 per cent of new industries have developed within the greater Winnipeg area.

Let me carry this matter just one stage further. One of the reasons why I emphasize the role of the defence production department in this matter of decentralization is that the work is directly connected with defence and, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South pointed out, it is only good defence planning to carry out as comprehensive as possible dispersal of defence potential. I listened carefully to the minister when he made his statement this morning dealing with the aircraft industry. He referred to the widespread dispersal of the aircraft industry, particularly that part of the industry dealing with the manufacturing of component parts, and he mentioned mostly large urban areas. I did not hear one small centre mentioned. There was Halifax, Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver and so on.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): And Amherst, Nova Scotia.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes; and Amherst.

Mr. Dickey: St. Jean, Quebec and Edmonton.

Mr. Dinsdale: Let us look at the Russian program in contrast to our own. They have 360 factories engaged in the manufacturing of aircraft and the component parts thereof. I have obtained that information from Jane's "All the World's Aircraft" which is supposed to be a very reliable document on these matters. Of these 360 factories, 35 are airframe factories, 30 are aero-engine factories and 265 are producing the other smaller components. They are dispersed just as widely as possible throughout the expansive geographic area of the U.S.S.R. In addition to general dispersal they are concentrating on northern development with regard to their industrial activity and they have above the 53rd parallel 50 cities which have been established on an industrial base. We have just one city north of the 53rd parallel. The point I wish to make is that we should not contribute to bigness and the overdevelopment of these metropolitan areas but try to support in every way possible the development of small industries in smaller communities. That is real decentralization. The small industry in the small community is able to cope successfully with the larger industrial plants in most circumstances, but certainly it cannot do so when it comes to manufacturing activities that are closely integrated with our whole defence program.

If it was not for private activities in this regard, there would be little industrial development at all in Manitoba at the present time because the degree of prosperity and progress that we have, particularly in the western section of the province, is based on the oil activity that has emerged during the past three years. As the minister well knows, that activity is largely in the hands of private operators. Again I would emphasize not concentration in Winnipeg or in the larger urban areas but support wherever possible in the small communities. It seems to me that is the main purpose for the establishment of this small industries division.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): In the course of my remarks on the first item this morning the minister took exception to my referring to the original estimate of the cost of minesweepers as a target price. He insisted that it was merely an estimate and objected to my use of the term "target price". I should like to see if we can get some information with regard to the cost of these vessels since I understand that one of them has now been completed on the west coast. I would refer the minister to page 539 of Hansard of December 2, 1953, when I attempted last to elicit some information from the government on the cost of these projects. At that time I asked this question of the government:

1. What were the prices originally set for the construction of minesweepers which were under construction in shipyards in eastern Canada and British Columbia in the years 1951, 1952 and 1953?
2. Were these prices increased?
3. If so, when, and by how much?
4. What were the reasons for the increases?
5. What is the contract price for the most recent contracts let for the construction of minesweepers?

You will observe that the minister placed an answer on Hansard to the effect that all that had been done at that time was to make an estimate of probable costs. A certain sum of money was provided to start construction on four of these vessels and later the sum of $9,750,000 was provided to enable the construction of ten additional ones to be started. He tells us that contracts were awarded providing for payment to the contractors of up to $925,000 per vessel and that additional sums have been authorized from time to time against which payments have been made to the contractors. The rest of my question he dismisses as not applicable.

If we grant that it was not possible for the government to get a closer estimate at that time, I think now is the time that we should have some more figures. I have reason to believe, and I trust that the minister will correct me if I am wrong, that about twelve months after the original estimate of $925,000 was set it was revised and it was discovered to be some 83 per cent out, not a very good estimate. It was decided that it had to be revised upwards to $1,600,000 applicable, if I am correct, to all the hulls then under construction in Canadian shipyards with the exception of one that was being constructed in the Yarrows shipyard in Victoria where the price was raised to $1,300,000 due to the fact that their wholly-owned subsidiary, Burrard Dry Dock of Vancouver, had already had $300,000 of work on the particular vessel. On the basis of the minister's statement on the 2nd of December when he said that we would have to wait until the vessels were completed before knowing what the costs were going to be, and considering that one has now been completed on the west coast, I should like to ask the minister—and he should be able to tell us—what has been the total cost of that vessel. What are the authorizations for further payments on these minesweepers that are still under construction? I should also like to know on what basis these increases in estimates have been made and whether now there has been set a final, definite price at which we can expect to get minesweepers completed, with due regard of course to any further increases in costs in the immediate future.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am sorry to say that I have not with me the exact cost of the ten minesweepers that have been completed, but it is slightly under $4 million per minesweeper. It varies for the different yards. I think the lowest cost yard happens to be at Port Arthur, Ontario, with which I am very pleased, and some of the higher costs are found in one or two of the yards the hon. member has mentioned. However, I think they are all being bought for slightly under $4 million. That is exclusive of armament, fire control equipment and stores.

When a requisition comes from the Department of National Defence for a new type of ship, it is accompanied by an estimate. The estimate is made by the man who proposes to design the ship. We have no way of knowing what the ship is going to look like when it is designed. The design is perhaps finished a year or so later. We accept the estimate. As the designs go forward we try to estimate what the position is from time to time, but design changes are made almost up until the date of commissioning. The work is carried out on a basis of cost plus a fee. The cost is just what the yard finds it necessary under supervision to spend on the building of the ship. We believe we now know sufficient about the cost of a minesweeper to set up a target price. In fixing a target price say we find that the lowest cost ship built is $3½ million. We consider that with their past experience they should do a bit better in the future and we set the target at $3¼ million. If the final price is less than that, the shipyard gets a bonus. If it costs more than the target, the shipyard fee is cut accordingly. That is a target price contract, and it is fixed on a price that is sufficiently well known to be established and agreed upon as fair by the crown and the contractor.

Mr. Montgomery: I should like to say a few words on the problem of decentralization and good planning for the future. I find myself in agreement to quite an extent with the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Cape Breton South. When the minister answered the hon. member for Cape Breton South he gave a lot of information about what had been done in Nova Scotia. I listened to see if anything was being done for New Brunswick because the maritimes in general were being discussed. Since I did not hear the minister say anything about New Brunswick, would he be good enough to put on record what has been done by way of assisting industry there and having production carried out by existing industries in New Brunswick? If nothing has been done, which I would not be too surprised to learn, possibly he might give us a reason for it. It might be a different reason from what I suspect he may say, namely, that there is a shortage of power there.

I think this department will have a great deal to do in the future with the over-all picture of planning for the defence of this country and in my opinion the department should expand their thinking and plan to assist these areas. If they do not have existing industries today it might be good business to help industries to get started thereby assisting in the development of natural resources such as power. As time goes on, it is going to be more important for defence industries to be scattered throughout the country. I think that is becoming the generally accepted view. That being so, has the minister any information about New Brunswick?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am surprised that the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has not noticed the fairly substantial industry being built there at the present time. At least $30 million is being spent on the army camp at Gagetown which will be a continuing industry for that part of the country and one that will absorb local products in a way that no other industry I can think of would equal. He must also know that we have been supporting a very substantial industry in Saint John, the Saint John Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company. If he will look around the province, I think he will find other industries that are playing a very substantial part. I know that there is one on the north shore at Bathurst that is doing an excellent job for the department. In order to help someone you must find the person to help, and the person who wants help must indicate he wants help. He must indicate what he is capable of doing. Wherever we find that type of person or that type of industry in New Brunswick or anywhere else, we give them help. I suggest that Mr. Hesler of Sackville might be able to tell my hon. friend about the help he has had from the crown in developing industry there and in Nova Scotia.

I do not believe I could give a catalogue of all the industries that have been developed in New Brunswick. I suggest the hon. member will find the government has really spent, in proportion, about as much there as in any part of Canada. If he does not believe it, let him look into the Gagetown area.

Mr. Gillis: The minister's estimates are not so easy to discuss. For example, we are only voting in the estimates before us about $40,328,813, but in the national defence estimates there is also an item for $1,902,822,500 that the minister is going to spend, or at least a large percentage of it. The report of the Department of Defence Production for January 1 to December 31, 1953, is the only guide one can get as to what happens to the money that was voted for national defence in that year. I should like to ask the minister this question. On page 47 of that report, table 3, Canadian defence orders placed in Canada from April 1, 1951, to December 31, 1953, there is a total of $2,894,481, and then again on page 49, Canadian government expenditures on defence procurement, table 7, you will find a total there from April 1, 1951, to December 31, 1953, of $2,783,306. I should like to find out from the minister, just to see how unreasonable I was when I made my statement, the amount or percentage of that money that was spent in the maritime provinces?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In order to do that we would have to analyse how much Dosco steel went into our construction and how much the basic industries down there supplied to us. It is quite impossible to get these statistics in a form that means anything. Dosco has been working at full capacity, and I presume at least 50 per cent of the production went into some form of defence construction. I suppose the production would be $50 million or $60 million a year, so we will say we have been spending half of that there. What we have been spending with Fairey in Nova Scotia or Dominion Coal Company to support defence installations, I cannot say. I do not believe anyone could ever analyse that.

Mr. Gillis: I agree, but I did see figures on it in the press some time ago, and that is what made me ask the question. The percentage was very small. Let us leave that and go to procurement. The minister had to step up or expand existing industry for the purpose of manufacturing munitions, gun apparatus, machine tools and so forth that were to be supplied to the NATO countries under our commitments to NATO. Can the minister give me any idea whether or not there was any new industry established in the maritimes or the expansion of any existing industry to take care of the manufacture of equipment necessary to supply NATO under our agreement?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No special facilities are set up to supply NATO. NATO is supplied by the facilities that supply our own defence needs. I know that we installed one of the biggest presses ever installed in the British empire in the plant of Nova Scotia Steel in Trenton to make ship shafts and heavy shafting. This was for ships that went to NATO and ships that stayed in Canada, and various purposes. I recall no special equipment ever set up anywhere to make material exclusively for NATO.

Mr. Gillis: All the minister's department has done so far, then, is to make use of existing industry to produce equipment needed by national defence?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is not true, either.

Mr. Gillis: There has not been any investment at all in new industry or plant expansion?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, yes. There was an investment in Dosco for the new press I mentioned that was installed there; that must have run into several million dollars. The Fairey aircraft industry was not there before the Korean episode. It is a reasonably new industry. We have Cossor, and that was not there before Korea. Certainly Amherst was not working before Korea, and now this plant is very busy, that is the enamel and heating plant. You could go through the maritimes and find a good many plants that have been expanded. I noticed that the accelerated depreciation for New Brunswick alone runs into $6 million, and that is only one item.

The trouble with making any analysis of these things is that you can never make it complete. Someone can come along and say you should have included this or that, and so you should. You would have to break the thing down to find out what the total production of maritime industry is, and then you would have to estimate how much of that went into defence production.

Mr. Gillis: I am not trying to embarrass the minister, but I will have to go home very soon and answer all these questions.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am sure the hon. member will be congratulated on the job he has done.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like some information regarding the contract to supply naval fuel oil for Esquimalt. On June 14 of this year, I was given answers to some questions I had asked regarding the supply of this fuel oil. I was informed that the contract had been let to White Petroleums, who were agents for the Union Oil Company of California. I was informed also that this fuel was derived from foreign crude oil, and that it was being delivered to Esquimalt by the company tankers.

I was rather surprised that we should have been purchasing foreign oil for our naval vessels, in view of the announced policy of the department that, so far as possible, they would obtain the supplies from Canadian sources, and particularly in view of the fact that only recently some $93 million has been spent on the construction of a pipe line from northern Alberta to Vancouver, and that large sums of money have been expended in the construction of refineries. In addition to that, about a million dollars has been spent by Imperial Oil Company to develop a wharf for the oil tankers in Vancouver.

Furthermore, I believe that in the past the fuel oil for the navy had been delivered to Vancouver and it had been conveyed from Vancouver to Esquimalt naval fuel base by the Canadian naval tanker H.M.C.S. Dundurn. So far as I know, that procedure was carried out satisfactorily. I would therefore like to be informed as to the total amount of fuel oil for this year's contract, both bunker and diesel oil, the price which has been paid, and also an explanation as to why it has become necessary to obtain fuel oil from foreign crude, when, it seems to me, at the present time there is an abundance of Alberta oil available on the west coast. In fact we heard only within the last few days of a statement by the president of the Imperial Oil Company, and supported by the executives of other companies out on the west coast, that they expect rather difficult times in being able to find markets for Canadian oil.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I believe I am in an excellent position to answer the question, because when I saw the requisition coming through I thought there must be something wrong with it when they were buying oil in California. I sent it back for a complete explanation. I was not too happy about the explanation I received, so I had an expert in to discuss it.

The cold fact is that west coast consumption—and it must be kept in mind that this is residual oil—the consumption of residual oil is about 17,000 barrels a day, and refinery production in that area is about 7,000 barrels a day. So that about 10,000 barrels of residual oil are being brought into the area every day.

We could have placed the order at a slightly higher cost with Canadian refineries, and taken their residual oil for the navy, which would simply have meant that the ordinary consumer would have been using California oil to that additional extent. The only difference would have been that the crown would have paid the local price, which is somewhat higher than the landed price of California crude, and the difference between the two would have gone to the trade, instead of to the crown.

By buying California residual oil and taking advantage of the lower price and the discount on California crude there was considerable saving in dollars. As I say, the local supply of residual oil is fully utilized. My hon. friend will understand that gasoline is cracked in the Vancouver area. The quantity of residual oil depends wholly upon the demand for gasoline. If that demand is small, then the residual oil produced by the refineries is small. With the "cat-crackers" used there now, we get less and less residual oil as a proportion of the total crude which comes into the refinery.

Mr. Pearkes: We were short of the type of fuel oil required, and it was not available at Vancouver. Is that correct?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Michener: There has been a considerable reduction in the expenditures of this department. The department is a big spending agency and, while it is proper to recognize its accomplishments—and the right hon. gentleman is frequently recognized in glowing terms for his accomplishments—it is also relevant to call attention to the shortcomings of the department in the discharge of its duties. I have no doubt the minister will expect the opposition to call these matters to his attention and to that of hon. members in the committee.

I wish to refer to two items with which the Auditor General was dissatisfied. These are reported at page 20 of the Auditor General's report for 1953. The two items there relate to contracts which, under section 17 of the Defence Production Act, require to be approved by the governor in council. The complaint of the Auditor General is that although the contracts were originally approved by the governor in council subsequent alterations to the advantage of the contractor were made as routine departmental procedure.

The Auditor General has taken the view, and quite properly, that where a contract has initially to follow a certain procedure, any change or alteration should be made only after following the same procedure, that is with the sanction of the governor in council.

In the first instance there was a discount of two per cent which a contractor had agreed to take for payment within thirty days. After the governor in council had dealt with the contract there was an amendment made by which that discount was removed.

In the second instance an allowance was made after a contract had been formally approved.

Then, there is a third item at page 21 about which I should like to ask the minister. In this case it appears that an allowance was made to a firm which had undertaken to make overcoats from cloth supplied by the department. The allowance was necessary because the cloth was found not to be up to specifications. It had shrunk in the course of manufacture, and caused the contractor considerable loss. So far as the contractor was concerned, apparently the department quite properly recognized that it was not the fault of the tailoring firm, and allowed $62,762 as compensation for extra loss by reason of the faulty cloth.

The important point is this: Did the department, which had purchased this cloth and supplied it to the contractor, then follow up to recover from its supplier the value of the amount it had paid out as damages? It seems to me this could have been recovered properly as damages payable by the supplier of the faulty cloth, which had not been properly shrunk.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that the reason for that payment was that the cloth supplied by the department was defective, in that it shrank. It was not the fault of the contractor. An adjustment was made so that the contractor would escape unharmed. The cloth was drawn from government stores. At that stage it was impossible to trace its origin. The adjustment was debited to the cloth account. My hon. friend will realize we buy our cloth in long runs so as to get the full mill discount. We have perhaps $20 million worth of cloth in store at all times, and that cloth is supplied to contractors for uniforms and for government clothing generally.

Apparently there was a mistake in the inspection of the cloth. It was called to everyone's attention, but it was impossible at that stage to trace where the error was made, or even where the cloth came from.

Mr. Michener: I appreciate that if it was impossible to identify the supplier of the cloth it would be difficult to claim back, as I have suggested. I would like to have the minister's assurance on this point. If the department follows ordinary business practice, such as prevails in private business, then certainly a claim would be made back against the supplier of the cloth.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): And it certainly would have been, if we had been able to identify the supplier at that stage. But it did lead to a tightening up in our inspections. I think all we can say is that we are pretty sure it will not happen again.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): With reference to minesweepers, I notice in the answer given by the minister on December 2 he gave a figure of $3,900,000 to enable starts on four vessels. Also there was authority to pay to the contractors up to $925,000 per vessel. When one does a little arithmetic he sees the idea was that $50,000 was to be the fee of the contracting firms, we will say, for the construction of those vessels. Can the minister now tell us what proportion of $4 million which he now states these vessels are actually going to cost, rather than the $925,000 which was estimated, is to be in the form of a fee for the contracting firms? What is the percentage?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They now have the cost of the first minesweeper at Yarrows at $3,767,000. The second ship of the lead yard is $3,475,000. The cost is coming down as the yards gains experience. The fee for the contractor is 5 per cent according to the Department of Defence Production formula, which includes only certain costs. It is considerably less than the apparent 5 per cent, but it is based on 5 per cent of the cost.

Mr. Castleden: In that regard, section 17 of the Defence Production Act requires an order in council to authorize such a contract. How is the authorization made? Does the minister go back and get a new order in council for each increase in the price? May I have the number of the order in council which was passed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There must be a dozen of them for every minesweeper, I should think. We go to council and have certain funds made available for building a minesweeper, we will say, and the work would stop when these funds are exhausted, unless in the meantime we have had a supplementary order in council. But every order in council is filed with the Clerk. I do not know how I can get the hon. member a list. I should think that if he dipped into the pile anywhere he would find one.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): A separate order in council?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, absolutely separate.

Mr. Castleden: Does the minister arrange for bids on account of the increase, or is the original bid given out and then you give this to Yarrows? The figure of $927,000 is for the original tender, I presume.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The work is allocated to the various yards following a recommendation of the maritime commission, which studies the skills and also the need for work in the particular yard. At the time the work is placed, we are free of any plans for the ships. The plans are developed as a ship is built, and with this new type of construction we are pretty well helpless as far as costs of the first ship are concerned. When the second ship comes along we have plans fully developed, and at that time we attempt to work out an incentive price contract based on the target.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I regret very much the minister cannot tell us the number of one of these orders in council, because I have tried to get hold of them and I have been informed that they are now with the treasury board.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, I should have said treasury board minutes. They are all tabled.

Mr. Fleming: I put some questions to the minister this morning with which he has not dealt. Perhaps we could run over them briefly now.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall be glad to deal with them, if you like. I was just waiting for the opportunity. The first one I think dealt with the relationship of D.D.P. and Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fleming: Is it the same as it was a year ago?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Exactly, yes. In other words, the Department of National Defence indicates what is required, writes a specification for the article, determines the place and time of delivery, and from that point the Department of Defence Production takes over and carries out the work at its discretion, subject to inspection and acceptance by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fleming: The Department of Defence Production takes no responsibility in regard to quantity or necessity?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No. That of course has first to be approved by the responsible committee of the Department of National Defence. Then it goes to treasury board and is approved there as being reasonable and in accordance with the appropriations of the department. The treasury board authorizes an allotment or financial encumbrance. In other words, at the proper stage we get from the treasury board a financial encumbrance which indicates that certain funds have been encumbered to pay for the material requisitioned. At that stage we take over. We may decide to build a plant to manufacture the article or we may decide to buy it from an existing Canadian plant, or we may decide that the circumstances are such that we should import from outside the country. That is a decision of the Department of Defence Production.

Then, my hon. friend discussed the purchasing policy, as to whether goods should be manufactured in Canada, or, if purchased outside of Canada, whether from the United Kingdom or from the United States; and he indicated it is the free choice of the department. That is hardly the case. Unless there is a substantial saving, the policy is to purchase in Canada, and if the volume is sufficient we will even set up facilities to manufacture in Canada. The strategic situation intervenes there to a point. In other words, if we are building a naval ship, should we manufacture all components in Canada? The view has been, if we are undertaking to build naval ships in Canada, we should also build the components in Canada so that, in the event of war, we are self-contained in that particular field. But if the situation is that we had been purchasing too much in the United States and too little in the United Kingdom, I would point out that probably more than 50 per cent of our purchases outside of Canada have been in the field of aircraft. In the early stages we have purchased aircraft engines in the United States. It is said that we should have purchased in Britain. Britain herself was buying aircraft and aircraft engines from the United States. I suppose even today Britain's armament includes more F-86's, some manufactured in Canada and some in the United States, and all powered with engines made in North America, than planes of British manufacture with British engines. It would therefore be necessary that aircraft expenditure be largely directed towards the United States. We did undertake to manufacture one training plane, the T-33, and there we were able to buy Rolls-Royce engines in England. There happened to be a line of engines of which they had a small surplus that could be devoted to this purpose; but generally speaking it was not possible, within the last year at least, to buy any substantial aircraft or aircraft parts in the United Kingdom.

Another factor that must be taken into consideration is that the army has adopted United States standards for most of its weapons. We were able to buy our tanks in the United Kingdom. The United States came to the same conclusion, as we did, that the Centurion tank was the best heavy tank being produced anywhere, and we both bought our tanks in the United Kingdom. We also bought an aircraft carrier in the United Kingdom and we are having it modernized in the United Kingdom. Where it has been possible to buy in the United Kingdom we have done so. That has been our policy and as a matter of fact we never lose an opportunity to buy in the United Kingdom rather than in the United States. The nature of our armament is such that we have been forced to buy very heavily in the United States.

I might point out that the United States has also bought armament from Canada. The accounts are not in balance, but they are not far out. In the year 1953 the United States bought more in Canada than we bought in the United States. That is a factor we must keep in mind in connection with purchases in the United States. Capital assistance is provided only when a certain product is needed and no other avenue is open except by paying capital assistance either to equip the plant with specialized machinery or to build an addition to the existing plant.

Mr. Fleming: May I interrupt the minister there? Did I understand him to say that last year the United States government spent more on defence procurement in Canada than Canada spent in the United States?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is my recollection, although I can check.

Mr. Fleming: I think the minister is wrong. If he will look at the table in his report at page 50, appendix F, it will be seen that the United States government's expenditures on defence procurement in Canada during 1953 amounted to $127 million, whereas table 8, page 49, shows that the Canadian government expenditures on defence procurement in the United States for 1953 amounted to $129,724,000. In addition to that we find that, according to page 47, Canadian defence orders placed in the United States in 1953 amounted to $61 million.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I had in mind the procurement figures, which are a little different.

Mr. Fleming: Even there we bought a little more from them than they from us during 1953.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In the fiscal year 1953-54 we paid them $107 million and they paid us $126 million. The orders placed go the other way. I am talking about the actual payments, not the deliveries.

Mr. Fleming: Can the minister say what expenditures the Department of Defence Production made in purchases for civil defence, which would presumably be for the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We have bought articles on requisition for the civil defence organization. We bought pumpers and blankets. They are not obliged to buy through the department but they frequently do so. I do not know what they buy outside the department.

Mr. Fleming: I take it the same situation does not obtain as between the Department of Defence Production and the Department of National Health and Welfare, on the one hand, as exists between the Department of Defence Production and the Department of National Defence, on the other. In other words, the Department of National Health and Welfare makes only a limited use of the purchasing facilities of the Department of Defence Production in matters pertaining to civil defence?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The minister has told me that we buy everything he buys, so I would say that the situation is exactly the same as exists with respect to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fleming: On page 21 of the report we have the statement:

> The United States, however, remained the largest single source of supply for machine tools.

This matter of machine tools is one of some importance and I wonder if the minister can hold out some hope that we are not going to continue to be so dependent on the United States for that important commodity.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That situation arose because of availability. At the beginning of the Korean war there was a great rush to buy machine tools. We bought all we could in England, the United States, and a few from the continent because work was being held up owing to the lack of machine tools. Of course, that is not the situation today. I doubt if the department has bought many machine tools in the United States for some months. In the early days of Korea it was a question of availability, and the situation was exactly the same at the beginning of the second world war.

Mr. Fleming: Could the minister tell us what proportion of the expenditure made through his department last year was made on purchases without calling tenders?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): These figures go back to the beginning. Of all orders placed on behalf of the Department of National Defence, 4·4 per cent were negotiated contracts. Of orders placed in Canada on behalf of the Department of National Defence, excluding foreign contracts, negotiated contracts amounted to 2·3 per cent. Of orders over $10,000 placed in Canada, negotiated orders amounted to 4·4 per cent. Very little is left in the way of negotiated cost-plus orders today for we are able to establish the price of everything either on a fixed price basis or an incentive basis.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister say more about that? There is quite a lot of concern in regard to the matter of purchasing without tenders and also in relation to cost-plus contracts. I think we would like to hear a fuller explanation in regard to the matter of purchases without tender under present conditions, because it is quite apparent that the market conditions under which the department is now purchasing are very different from those under which the department was purchasing a year or two ago. We would be glad to hear about the extent to which the department has been able to abandon the cost-plus contract in favour of what the minister has called the "incentive contract".

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If we get a requisition for, say, CF-100's there is only one place we can buy them and that is from the manufacturer. You could hardly call for tenders on CF-100's, and in that case the best we can do is to negotiate a basis for production. It may not be a cost-plus contract but it certainly is a negotiated contract. In addition, if we want to buy General Motors transmissions, and we do buy a considerable quantity because they are standard in our larger motor transports, then we have to go to General Motors to buy them. In other words, we cannot call for competitive tenders when there is only one source of supply. It might easily be a firm price, but in most cases it is a negotiated price and must necessarily be so. There are certain things in which we have a choice and for which we call for tenders.

Mr. Fleming: May we take it that in the case of anything in the nature of a product that is to some extent a standardized and not a custom product the department is firmly adhering to the policy of purchasing by tender?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Invariably.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister then make some further comment about the extent to which the department is abandoning the cost-plus contract in favour of the incentive contract?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think it has been months since we have placed a cost-plus contract on construction. We had a case where we were doing secret radar work and using plans furnished by the United States. We were not allowed to distribute these plans generally and therefore we had no option but to place a cost-plus contract. That, however, was an unusual case and I know of no similar case since that occasion. At certain remote spots where it would obviously be too expensive to send in two contractors to estimate a job we sometimes place a cost-plus contract. I think Churchill is a case in point, though later contracts there have not been issued on a cost-plus basis. I am told that over the last year or so we have been getting excellent competition on almost every type of construction regardless of where located.

Mr. Fleming: What is the nature of this incentive contract to which the minister referred?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This type of contract is normally used in manufacturing. The contractor and the government agree that a certain price is a reasonable price at a certain stage of production. If by extra skill the contractor is then able to produce for less than that price, he gets a bonus on his fee. If on the other hand his production costs more than the target price, he gets a smaller fee than the contract would otherwise call for.

Mr. Fleming: You are not applying that procedure under any construction contracts? It is only on manufacturing contracts that you apply that incentive?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. That is not the type of contract that applies very well to construction.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of public and private bills.

At five o'clock the Deputy Speaker resumed the chair.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are a number of divorce bills on the order paper. Shall these be entertained in one motion?

Mr. Knowles: As I indicated last time, Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to the house going into committee on these bills on one motion provided it is understood that, when we get into committee of the whole, we shall take them one at a time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: These bills may be referred together under standing order 110. Of course the hon. member will have his usual privileges when we reach the committee stage.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bills Nos. 449 to 458 inclusive and Bill No. 434.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

FRANCIS WALSH

The house in committee on Bill No. 449, for the relief of Francis Walsh—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, when we were last at this business a week ago today, I had something to say about this Bill No. 449. I do not think I need to add anything more to what I said a week ago when I gave a few of the details and pointed out that in my view the particulars of this case underline the fact that this type of thing is hardly the business of members of parliament.

HILDA ANNE DARKE MARSHALL

The house in committee on Bill No. 450, for the relief of Hilda Anne Darke Marshall —Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this is another case which, like the one we have just dealt with, is an extremely unhappy one. It does not look as though there is much we can do about it. I suppose it can be said that if we pass this bill we are in a legal sense dissolving the marriage of the two people whose names appear on the front page of the book of evidence which I hold in my hand. Actually it would appear that that marriage, for all practical purposes, has already been dissolved by the fact that the husband in this case appears to have deserted his wife. Evidence from a coal dealer and a carpenter was introduced in the other place to suggest that the respondent in this case is now living with someone else in the city of Toronto, and that they are living together as man and wife. The evidence is not direct; it is circumstantial, but it seems to be fairly strong.

CLAUDE RAPHAEL SACCHITELLE

The house in committee on Bill No. 451, for the relief of Claude Raphael Sacchitelle —Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, this bill asks us to dissolve the marriage, in this case, of an unfortunate chap who is at present on active service in Korea. He is the one who is making the application. Having regard to most of the evidence, I think one would come to the conclusion that a divorce perhaps should be granted, on the evidence that we have. But unfortunately, in recent months in the House of Commons—at this session at any rate—we have come to question some of the evidence and some of the recommendations with regard to these divorce bills.

It has been our custom to pass these divorce bills in large numbers. The procedure is to have the evidence heard in a committee of the other place. They make their recommendations on them. A House of Commons committee deals with them. The members of that committee then recommend them to this house. Under these circumstances it has been customary for the House of Commons to pass these bills in what is a sort of production-line procedure or a steam roller proposition. However, recently a case came to our attention here and, on going through the evidence, a number of us questioned it. Our questioning resulted in the case being sent back.

Mr. Harris: Just pay attention to this particular one and not to the other one.

Mr. Castleden: That was an outstanding exception. I should like to say that it is quite in order, since the evidence in that case turned out to be so bad that we turned the case back. The evidence was so bad that the applicant withdrew his case entirely. I think that is a basic reason why we in the House of Commons should question this evidence very closely.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Did the hon. member go to the committee where this sort of thing is done? Does this procedure have to be inflicted on the whole house?

An hon. Member: I hope not.

Mr. Knowles: A brilliant contribution.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am not proceeding to rule on the question of order, if any, raised by the Secretary of State. But I should like to say now to the hon. member for Yorkton and to the committee as a whole that I think perhaps the remarks he has just made have amply demonstrated the value, when we are in committee on a bill, of restricting our discussion to the bill which we are discussing. I have no knowledge of the merits of either case. But to discuss the demerits of one case during consideration of another case where perhaps those demerits would not apply is, I think, one of the things that the rules of the House of Commons are trying to get away from when they say that discussion shall be restricted to the subject before the committee. It is not my intention to endeavour to be very strict in imposing rules on this committee at this time, for reasons which will appear obvious to everybody. However, when the hon. member is discussing specifically a case as distinguished from general remarks, I would ask him to discuss specifically only the case which we have before us.

Mr. Castleden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. From what you have said I presume that it would not be correct to discuss even the procedure on these bills when they come before this house. Certainly after what happened in the other place and after what was said, on a question of privilege, by certain members here where motives were imputed, I think we should at least have an opportunity to reply. For that reason I think every one of these cases should be carefully examined. I suggest this one might be carefully examined. Perhaps at a later time it would be well for me to rise on a question of privilege and ask to be given the opportunity at least to reply to those who impute motives to us when in the interests of justice we ask that a case be sent back to have it reviewed. I think that is about all I have to say. I will have more to say on the other cases.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in this case because of a particular point that is raised by it. It is a matter I have taken the trouble to do some reading about, and I think it should be of interest to members of the house who are members of the medical profession and also to those who are members of the legal profession. My reading on the subject which is raised by this case led me in particular to examine a very excellent paper entitled "Medical Privilege" which was given by Mr. Justice Samuel Freedman of the court of queen's bench, Winnipeg, Manitoba, at a recent meeting of the Manitoba medico-legal society at Winnipeg. Mr. Justice Freedman was dealing in this article with the question as to whether or not there should be extended to medical practitioners throughout Canada the protection in courts which is enjoyed by members of the legal profession. The reason I read the article and the reason I want to make some references to it is because that question arose in connection with this case.

I do not wish to put any names on Hansard so I will use letters where I wish to delete names. But with that qualification I should like to read an extract from page 12 of the evidence in the case now before us under Bill No. 451. One of the examiners who was asking questions before the committee in the other place said:

> Q. Mrs. X, Dr. Y cannot be required to reveal any information he may have received by examining or treating you in his professional capacity, but you have the right if you wish to permit him to do so—to consent that he do so and give him that authority. You do not have to give him that authority if you do not want to.
> [The Deputy Chairman.]
>
> By the Chairman: You understand that, that you may give him permission to tell us what was the result of his findings?
>
> A. Yes.
> Q. You are willing to do that?
> A. Yes, I am.

I will not bother to read the next part of the proceedings which is the evidence given by the physician whom I have characterized as Dr. Y and which became rather important evidence in connection with this application for divorce. In fact, after this doctor had given his evidence the chairman of the committee, Senator Roebuck, said:

> That is very good evidence. Thank you, very much.

There is no question about it that the evidence was the kind of evidence that was useful in a case such as this. I wish to make it clear that the woman in question did give her consent to this medical man giving evidence before the Senate committee which he had gained in his professional capacity as an attending physician. The point I raise is to me a very interesting one. Was it appropriate for it to be suggested in a hearing in a committee of the parliament of Canada, on the soil of the province of Ontario, if you will, that a doctor could not be required to give evidence obtained in his professional capacity? It is in that connection that I find this lecture by my friend, Mr. Justice Samuel Freedman, very interesting. He tells us that the basis of the law regarding medical privilege so far as the United Kingdom is concerned and so far as Canada is concerned, except for the province of Quebec, goes away back to 1776. He says:

> It is the year 1776. The scene is Westminster Hall, and the occasion is the trial before the Right Hon. the House of Peers of Elizabeth, Duchess of Kingston, for bigamy. The noble lady is charged with having gone through a form of marriage with the Duke of Kingston while her first husband, Augustus John Hervey, later Earl of Bristol, was still—

Mr. Hunter: On a point of order, I should like to point out to the hon. member that, while this doubtless may be a most fascinating legal point for him to discuss, it has no relevancy whatsoever to the decision in the case before us. The decision in the case was that that this woman committed adultery and therefore the divorce was granted. I would point out, purely on the grounds of relevancy, that what the hon. member is discussing has nothing to do with the decision of this house.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am thoroughly in agreement with the ruling you have made from time to time, even if that ruling sometimes impinges upon what I would like to say myself, that in discussing these bills we should discuss the particular case that is before us at any one time. I have accepted your stricture that we must not wander off into a discussion as to what happened with respect to other bills. But I submit that when we have before us a bill, the major portion of the evidence of which is based on what was stated by a doctor, I have the right to raise the question as to the propriety of it being said in the committee of the other house that there was such a thing as medical privilege on which that doctor and that patient could rely. My purpose in referring to the paper given by Mr. Justice Freedman is to prove my point that medical privilege does not obtain in the courts of Canada outside of the province of Quebec. If it is uninteresting or distasteful for me to read at length from Mr. Justice Freedman's article, I am prepared to curtail my quotations from this article, but I think there is no question but that I should be permitted to quote sufficiently from this article to prove my point that medical privilege in the courts of this country, with the exception of those in the province of Quebec, does not apply. It is that that I want to establish from Mr. Justice Freedman's article. If Your Honour wishes to make a ruling on that point, I will sit down until the ruling is made.

Mr. Harris: May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman? If my hon. friend satisfies himself that in fact there is no such privilege, do I take it that he then feels that the evidence was not sufficient and he is going to oppose this particular bill?

Mr. Knowles: I think it is fair to say that without the evidence given by this doctor the decision might have been different, even in the other place.

Mr. Harris: My question was not a hypothetical one and need not have been answered by the use of "might". We are trying to decide this case, or my hon. friend is trying to decide it himself, and either one of two results follows. Either he decides that the evidence was sufficient or that it was not. We could very well save the time of parliament by allowing him to be satisfied that there is no such thing as medical privilege and let him come to his own conclusion with that in mind.

Mr. Knowles: I do not think it is up to me to make a decision for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Harris: I would not rely on your judgment.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad the minister said that he would not rely on my judgment. That is exactly the point of debate in this house, so that all the arguments can be brought out on the basis of which every member can make up his own mind.

The Deputy Chairman: I think I can satisfy the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at least for the moment by saying that for the moment the question before the committee is whether or not clause 1 of this bill will be adopted. I cannot come to the conclusion that the hon. member is out of order in discussing the methods whereby evidence was or was not admitted upon which clause 1 was recommended to us. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Mr. Knowles: By way of compromise, I shall certainly reduce what I had intended to do by way of quoting from the article by Mr. Justice Freedman. He gives a very interesting history of this question, but ends up by saying:

> Were this paper concerned merely with a declaration of the law on whether a doctor is entitled to professional privilege it could end at this point. Our law is clear. He has no such right.

Later in the article or in the footnotes, Mr. Justice Freedman makes it clear that in Quebec there is such a privilege. Indeed, in the Quebec civil code it is provided that a witness cannot be compelled to declare what has been revealed to him confidentially in his professional character as a religious or legal adviser, or as an officer of state where public policy is concerned. This provision covers religious and legal people, but then in the Quebec medical act, section 60, subsection 2, there is the following provision:

> No physician may be compelled to declare what has been revealed to him in his professional character.

Mr. Justice Freedman points out that that privilege applies in Quebec, and that is the only place in Canada where it applies. That being the case, I submit it does not apply in Ontario, and in this instance the hearing was held within the territorial limits of the province of Ontario. The doctor in question was an Ontario doctor residing in Kingston. The patient whom he had examined had been examined at Kingston, and yet it was suggested to him that he had a privilege which does not obtain.

Now, one of the problems involved in all of this and the difficulty in dealing with cases like this, where at least one of the parties is a resident in a province where they do not want divorce courts, is that in this case the law of that province was imported into the proceedings held here at Ottawa. I feel it was quite wrong for the senators to take that position. Perhaps there is a case for changing the law with regard to medical privilege. Mr. Justice Freedman does not come to that conclusion. He feels the law should not be changed.

As I say, I rose not to discuss the details of the case itself, except with respect to this one point. Whether or not the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration accepts my judgment, I submit with due respect for his judgment that Their Honours were wrong when they imported into a hearing on Ontario soil a provision that applies in Quebec but does not apply anywhere else in Canada.

Mr. Harris: I hope there is no feeling that I would not accept my hon. friend's judgment on occasion, but I have really not the time to come to a conclusion about the law of medical privilege. I have looked at it off and on for something approaching 30 years, but I do not feel I could discuss it learnedly in 40 minutes like my hon. friend. For that reason, I do not know how he could come to the conclusion he has stated in that regard in such a short time.

Mr. Knowles: I was prepared to give the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration the conclusion of my esteemed and learned friend, Mr. Justice Freedman of Winnipeg.

Mr. Crestohl: I feel the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has missed the point entirely. I do not believe this is a question of medical privilege. I believe it is a question of whether or not the law of the province of Quebec can be pleaded in Ontario. Perhaps the hon. member is not aware of the fact that the law of a person's domicile will follow him into any other province in Canada. If the province of Quebec is this man's domicile, he can plead that law in the province of Ontario as it affects the person.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad the hon. member for Cartier has raised that point. I thought I had answered it. The doctor and the patient are both residents of the province of Ontario, and the hearing took place in Ontario. The point the hon. member has made would have been valid had it been a Quebec doctor or evidence on behalf of a Quebec patient, but it was an Ontario doctor who had examined an Ontario patient in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Hunter: I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, this discussion is entirely out of order. After all, the Senate divorce committee is not bound by the rules of evidence of any province of Canada. It is bound by the rules under which it operates. A discussion here of whether or not they have the right to do this or that has no relevancy whatever. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must realize that the committee is not bound by those rules, and the discussion is entirely out of order.

Mr. Castleden: Surely it is proper for this committee to look into the evidence, and if there is something wrong with the evidence, something with which they disagree, it would be proper to draw the attention of this house to that and, perhaps as in the other case, have it referred back to the private bills committee.

Mr. Hunter: I would think that would be a most improper thing. If the hon. member wishes to reform the rules of the Senate committee, I would suggest he move over there and do what he can.

Mr. Nicholson: This case is typical of the problems that come to us when we read the evidence. As mentioned by my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton, the petitioner is a soldier on active service in Korea. Apparently there were some domestic troubles shortly after the couple were married, but I feel it is unfortunate that the petitioner was not given a chance to come back from Korea to appear in person and to state whether or not he was prepared to try again.

The evidence that appears in connection with Bill No. 451 would indicate that the petitioner's wife has not been loyal to him during his absence. In view of the fact he is the one seeking the divorce, I feel he might have been called. I noticed that the question of collusion is raised in connection with this case. I am sure that the hon. member for Victoria, on reading this evidence along with the evidence in many more cases, will certainly consider there is every indication there is collusion in connection with these cases.

Apparently the soldier in Korea has information concerning the misconduct of his wife, and also has information concerning the man who has come into the home to break up the home. As a matter of fact, apparently the man who has come into the picture was here in Ottawa. When the solicitor for the petitioner mentioned that the man was here in attendance but did not think it necessary to call him, the chairman said, "I do not think so; I think we will recommend the case." The case was recommended.

I would say that it was unfortunate the soldier was not given a chance to come home from Korea. If there was a big hurry to get this through, if an injustice had been done to him during the time he was away, I think the least that could have been done was to have him brought back and given a chance to appear in person. As I said, it is difficult to assess these cases when members of the house do not have an opportunity to hear the people involved. Even after one does hear the people involved, as was the case with one other petition, it would appear that a committee of this house is not able to deal with the matter properly. I hope that we will be relieved of the responsibility of deciding whether or not the recommendation made by the other house should be accepted in cases of this sort.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Castleden: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman; the hon. member suggested that perhaps I should go to the other place in an attempt to help bring justice in these cases. I want it made abundantly clear that we are not blaming the other place. They have their nasty duty to perform. Unfortunately, because of the nature of this case, and the large number of cases considered, they have a very difficult job to perform; and I am sorry some of the results have been what they were. I think there is evidence here of what has happened, and that these cases should not be dealt with by parliament at all. One Toronto paper remarks that this procedure made a mockery out of justice and a farce out of the law.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I was going to meet the hon. member in the spirit in which he had risen, and state that I am not too sure whether he could rise to a question of privilege or not. That is, the point is whether you should rise to a question of privilege if the remark about which complaint is made could be construed as a compliment.

I would point out however that no matter where the editorial was published, it is not permissible in this chamber to quote publications which are critical of what goes on in parliament. That, I think, is a well accepted rule.

Now that I am on my feet I would ask the committee to co-operate with the chair in a matter which is causing me considerable worry. As we sit here we have the right to review what has been done by a committee of the Senate, and we have the right to come to a contrary conclusion, if we see fit. By so doing we therefore come to the conclusion that the decision reached by the committee of the other place was a wrong one. So far as that is concerned, there can be no question at all as to the right of this committee. It is perhaps somewhat difficult for us to discuss that conclusion without being somewhat critical of the methods adopted in the other place.

I am afraid that one of the duties I have, so long as I sit here, is to see that this committee shall not give expression to views which could be regarded as offensive by those who have this duty in the other place. Hon. members will understand that I am not trying to bridle this committee in any way. But I am asking hon. members, when they are critical of the result of what has been done by the committee of the other place, that they express their criticism in the least offensive terms possible. I believe it is a well known principle that members of neither house shall use expressions which might be offensive to members of the other.

I am sure hon. members will realize the difficulties of the situation, and will appreciate the responsibilities which, in the long run, are mine. I am asking the assistance of hon. members.

ISABEL MARY PEEBLES BROWN MACARTNEY-FILGATE

The house in committee on Bill No. 452, for the relief of Isabel Mary Peebles Brown Macartney-Filgate—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, first of all may I echo the sentiments of the Secretary of State when he says that he hopes we will not much longer have to go through this very nasty procedure which, I am sure, is distasteful to all of us. So far as I am concerned, I would say, "How long, O Lord, how long?" But so long as I am a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee and a member of the House of Commons I intend to see that at least some of these cases shall have thorough consideration. That is as I see my duty in the matter.

I am a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee, and I was in the room when these ten bills, of which this is one, were considered. I have noticed that my hon. friend, the hon. member for Parkdale, the chairman of that committee, and a gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect, has interjected remarks on two or three occasions. I had not intended to say anything of what I shall now say but under the circumstances perhaps I had better do so, because it is not only the committee in the other place that can make mistakes.

There is always of course the question as to whether these bills should be considered en bloc or considered one at a time. And by the way, before I forget what I wish to say, let me give notice here and now to the members of the miscellaneous private bills committee, and to the various counsel who appear in divorce cases, that so long as I am on that committee and there is before it a contested divorce, whether others take this procedure or not I will do my part to see that such a case is thoroughly reviewed by that committee.

As usual, in the committee I made my little protest, in which I said that I was in favour of considering these bills one by one. I appealed to the chairman and he replied, "Mr. Knight must know that that is not in my hands, and it is not in the hands of the committee." I am not criticizing the chairman, because I suppose he is only human. There was nothing I could do about it. So one of the members of the committee who supports the government offered a motion that the bills be considered en bloc. Hon. members will know of course what the result was. Hon. members in this group who were protesting were defeated by a vote. I may say I asked for a recorded vote on that particular occasion. He who runs may read, because the vote is recorded, and the names of those who asked that the bills be considered en bloc are on record with the clerk of one of the committees of the house.

I do not want to go into that phase of the matter at too great length. We continued to consider the contested case, for which counsel appeared and witnesses were called on both sides. Apparently everyone was in a hurry, and the ten bills were passed—1,2,3,4,5,6—like that. No, I should not say, "1,2,3,4,5,6"—I should say simply 1 to 10. And so we were ready for the next case, about which I shall have something to say when it comes up on the next occasion, which I presume will be Friday of this week, if the house is still sitting.

However, the result of the whole thing was that the committee had to be called back next morning and the procedure had to be repeated painfully again because, as every hon. member knows—and I certainly did know—a committee, whether it be a private bills committee, or something else, is simply an extension of the committee of the whole house. And, as is stated in Beauchesne, what rules the House of Commons rules the conduct of that committee. The procedure is laid down, and is not in the hands of the committee.

That was the story of those ten bills and we did pass them at the next sitting of the committee. The result is that they are now back in the House of Commons. I should like now for a moment to talk about the particular bill before us.

The hon. member for Wellington South and I had some argument in committee about collusion, and I referred him to his Latin dictionary. This is a case where I certainly suspect collusion. It is a peculiar case. Like my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, I am not going to mention names, but this case refers to an Englishman who came out to this country and settled in the city of Montreal. He married an English lady and after a space of time the lady went back to Great Britain and is now living there. She did not appear at all before the Senate committee.

My learned friends will know the term—I do not—but the fact is that counsel backed up her petition with some kind of sworn statement over there. That was the way the petition was presented to the Senate committee. And then the most amazing thing happened. This respondent, this man who was accused of adultery—and one would almost think he was proud of the fact—became the principal witness for the petitioner. My hon. friend and I had a disagreement. He said it did not involve collusion. Well, if it is not collusion, then I do not know the meaning of the word.

Let me read from the evidence—and my hon. friend will not expect me, I know, to mention names, because I have no taste for this sort of thing. I do not like to see these names dragged out before the public and recorded in Hansard. But here is part of the evidence. This question was asked:

> Has there been any collusion or agreement between you and your wife in order to obtain this divorce?

The respondent said: "No." Then, Mr. Lapin, who I presume was the counsel, warned the witness. He said:

> The witness does not have to answer questions as to adultery.

If the respondent had not answered questions as to the adultery and implicated himself in doing so, then the divorce would not have been granted. Then we come down to the further question. In this instance again Mr. Lapin asked:

> In your wife's petition your wife complains that between the 25th of March and some time in April you committed adultery with - - - - . Is that true?

I can almost see him clapping his chest and saying: Yes, that is me; I am the man. Well, that is it. That was the evidence on which the divorce was granted.

An hon. Member: He was bragging.

Mr. Knight: He was bragging, but I do not know what about. It is not something that a man should brag about. The chairman of the committee in the other place seemed to be rather surprised and said: If you have another witness you may call him.

Apparently he was surprised that any other witness was needed. Then this respondent who was so willing to confess before the committee that he was an adulterer said that he had another fellow there, a personal friend. He produced the friend who said, yes, my friend has told me many times, and so on. He said a few things that are flavourable but not favourable, and on that basis this divorce was simply granted. I suggest that if there was not collusion, then I for one do not know what collusion is. My hon. friend says he knows the meaning of the word but I do not, if this is not a case of collusion.

Mr. Knowles: I just wish to point out that so far since five o'clock we have dealt with four cases. In three of them we have had the situation to which the hon. member for Saskatoon has just referred, namely, that the chief witness against the guilty party has been the guilty party himself.

Like the hon. member for Saskatoon, I feel that that certainly raises very seriously the question as to whether or not some collusion is involved.

The house in committee on Bill No. 453, for the relief of Wilfrid Lavoie—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: This is a disappointing case, too. I find these people were married away back in 1913. They lived together until 1935. They have a son who is now 34 years of age and a daughter 32 years of age. It does seem most unfortunate that this marriage went on the rocks. Apparently the woman in the case is living at the present time in the home of another man. The evidence, a bit flimsy I must say, was such that even a lady senator who was a member of the committee wondered—at least so I judge from her question, which I need not put on the record in its exact terms—whether it might not be the case that this woman was living there just as a housekeeper. In my view the evidence does not seem to be strong in any other direction. However, Mr. Chairman, Their Honours seemed satisfied. That being the case, most members here seem to feel that we have nothing to do but to go along with them. I do express my regret that this elderly couple have had this happen to their marriage.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to point out that in this case likewise the couple had lived together quite a few years before they fell apart. They were married in 1936 and lived happily together for nearly fifteen years. According to the husband, a friend of his came along and spoiled it all. The evidence does not make very choice reading.

factors in the situation, whether it was cause or effect, was a little too much drink.

[Mr. Knowles.]

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: This is another unhappy case. There are three children who are not yet grown up.

Mr. Nicholson: On page 10 of the evidence the question was asked when the boy was giving evidence, as follows:

> Shortly after your father and mother separated, let us say when you were about eight and a half or nine years of age, do you remember anything happening around the house where your mother was living?

Particularly where young children are involved in these cases, we should give careful consideration regarding what it is going to do to the children. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, in so many of these cases the introduction of alcohol into the home during the early days of the marriage seems to have been a major factor in putting things out of kilter. The evidence in this case would indicate that Their Honours in the other place were quite justified in recommending the divorce. I think we should note that there were three young children involved during the time when the trouble was developing.

Mr. Maltais: After listening to all these complaints about these bills and listening to all this talk I am just wondering whether these hon. members who are complaining about these bills find their conscience bothered enough to rise and vote against the bills.

JOSEPH DELPHIS GUILLAUME DELORME

The house in committee on Bill No. 434, for the relief of Joseph Delphis Guillaume Delorme—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, this is one of 462 bills which have been presented to the Senate committee at this session. It is true that 63 of these bills were not proceeded with, the reason being that they were presented too late and I suppose in the normal course of events they will come before us next year. However, of this total 382 were recommended by the Senate, and three were rejected by the Senate. It will therefore be seen that in most of these cases the evidence must have been pretty good or at least satisfying to the Senate committee. Fourteen were withdrawn, one of which turned out to be the rather notorious case which I shall not mention here.

In regard to this particular bill I think it would be a good thing if we looked into its history as it passed through its various stages. In the first place, this bill was presented to the Senate committee which passed it and a divorce was recommended. It then came into this house for first reading and as is usual in the case of most bills it did not receive very detailed consideration on that first reading. It then came up for second reading and was passed, again without consideration. It then came into committee and it was only by sheerest accident that one of my colleagues noticed it was a contested case and by the bulk of the evidence it appeared as though there had been considerable argument. He took the case up and read it through. In committee of the whole he spoke on the bill and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at the end of that day's debate moved that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be sent back to the miscellaneous private bills committee for further consideration.

The vote on that motion in this house is now past history. The house voted by 66 to 63, presumably upon the reading of the evidence or upon the validity of the arguments advanced by my colleague, to send it back, and the bill which had already passed the infallible committee in the other place, and passed its first and second readings in this house was recommended to be sent back to the miscellaneous private bills committee for further consideration.

I want to point out that we who are members of that committee are sometimes placed in an unfortunate position. There was one famous case which was before the committee last year and it was discovered that a minor technical mistake had been made. The committee was called back the next morning so that the chairman could put in the words: "Shall I report the bill?" The next day there were three times as many members attending that committee and I think it is fair to say that most of them came from the government side of the house. The case was re-opened and the decision reversed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, how does the hon. gentleman relate that to the bill now before the committee?

Mr. Knight: I am just coming to the bill. I know the Secretary of State is wondering why we should have to put up with this kind of stuff and I agree with him, but I am now going to relate this to the bill now before us.

I will now come to some facts which I will present to the committee and which I hope my hon. friend the Secretary of State will think over. In that other case of last session it was unfortunate that one of the members in this house happened to be a partner in the law firm which brought that petition and I am going to say now that I have complete sympathy with the hon. member in this house who was somewhat similarly affected in the case of today. There is a member in this house today, and he is sitting in this house now, who found it necessary to resign from this particular committee because his son happened to be the counsel for the petitioner in this case. May I say that the hon. gentleman acted up to his name in being honourable. He came to me and told me the circumstances and explained why he was resigning from the committee and having nothing to do with the case. I expect he explained to other members of the committee also his son's connection with the case. My sympathy goes out to him in the awkward situation in which he was placed. His decision, of course, meant that he took no part in this case and he was a mere spectator. One can readily understand the awkwardness of the situation because in and about that committee he would naturally meet his son and his son's client, and that is not a very nice situation. Incidentally, when the hon. member resigned his resignation was put through this house, no doubt by the Liberal whip, though I do not remember the occasion. However, another gentleman was put on in his place and that particular gentleman happened to be one of those recorded as voting for this particular divorce. Incidentally, may I point out that I asked for a recorded vote on that committee and the names of those who voted for and against can easily be found on the records.

I have only another minute at my disposal, Mr. Chairman, and I want to say in regard to this case that I am going to go thoroughly into the evidence and deal with the matter in this house. I shall not mention any names but I am going to see to it if I can that this divorce bill does not pass for the reason that I think it should not pass, and when the third reading stage arrives I shall ask one of my colleagues to move that this bill be not now read a third time, but be read six months hence. May I call it six o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

79. To provide capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by private contractors engaged in defence contracts, or by crown plants operated on a management-fee basis, or by crown companies under direction of the Minister of Defence Production, subject to approval of treasury board, $25,000,000.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to ask the minister which of the crown plants or the crown companies mentioned in this particular item are engaged in the production of aircraft or components of aircraft.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think every plant engaged in the production of aircraft or components of aircraft are included in this item to some extent. Avro of Canada has been the largest. There is Canadair, Lucas-Rotax, Pratt and Whitney, and Sperry. I think if the hon. member will name the plant, I can tell him whether or not it is included.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): None of these are crown corporations?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The crown owns the physical property. No; none of them is a crown corporation.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The physical properties are owned by the crown?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes; the physical properties are owned by the crown.

Mr. Pallett: Can the minister tell the committee how much was given to A. V. Roe this last year? At the same time would he mind advising the committee whether, together with these grants, there was any form of control over the operation of the company? Also would he advise the committee in connection with those plants whether any agreements which the companies have entered into are ever assigned to the crown or directly to the department?

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, I have been explaining that, where capital assistance is given, the crown retains the title to the asset created by the capital assistance. For example, we own the Avro engine plant, or did so until recently. We sold it back to the company some time ago. In some places capital assistance may extend only to machinery. If that is the case, we own the machinery that is purchased with the capital assistance. It is painted a distinctive colour, the number of the machine is registered in our central registry, and we are free to go in and recapture the machine whenever we like.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The operators pay no rent for this machinery?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not if they are working on government work. However, if they are working on private work they pay a rental.

Mr. Pallett: Will the minister tell me whether any agreements entered into by A. V. Roe have been assigned to the crown? I refer specifically to a water agreement with the township of Toronto which was originally entered into when this was a crown company, and then the assets were sold to the A. V. Roe company as a private company. I wonder whether the minister would say what disposition was made of that particular water agreement?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That agreement is rather complicated in that the final negotiation is just in progress at the moment. The original arrangement has been revamped. The original arrangement was that we would put up the money through Avro. I think it was an amount of $450,000. The water supply plant was built using those funds. The arrangement was that the money was to be returned to Avro and as Avro recovered the money, the money was to be returned to us. I understand that a new arrangement is being negotiated which is a little bit more clean-cut than the other one and which will be more satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. Pallett: I have another question. Is the crown a party to this new agreement or is it between A. V. Roe as a private company and the municipality?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The crown is not a party to the agreement; no. It is between Avro and the municipality.

Mr. Pallett: Will the minister also answer my first question as to the amount of aid that was given to A. V. Roe during this last year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The actual expenditure in 1953-54 as of May 31, 1954 was $6,526,525. Is that the figure my hon. friend wanted?

Mr. Pallett: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: That brings me back to the questions which I asked the minister this morning and which arise out of this sale of the A. V. Roe plant at Malton to A. V. Roe Canada Limited. May I ask what policy is involved here or what led to the purchase? Is it the government's policy to dispose of these plants? I understood that the price was designed to recoup the government for the actual money it put into the plant, namely, some $17 million. I come back to the questions I asked this morning. What is the policy of the government with respect to plants of this kind in which the government has had a proprietary interest?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The government builds a plant for a particular function. For example, in order to produce the CF-100 and the Orenda engine at the rate required it was necessary to build additional facilities for Avro Canada. They were not available elsewhere. The facilities were built by the crown and were owned by the crown. We received an offer from Avro to pay for the facilities; that is, we received an offer to pay for the building, the crown to retain the machinery. The arrangement entered into was that the payment would be the actual amount expended less normal depreciation on the building for the period of its productive use. I think I could give my hon. friend the figures if he wants them.

Mr. Fleming: I think probably the figures I gave this morning are approximately correct.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Fleming: In other words, the crown had invested some $35 million in the plant and had sold the building for between $17 million and $17,500,000, retaining the equipment in which there is an investment of about $17 million. But I am rather seeking the policy involved. Is it the policy of the government to dispose of crown-owned plants, where it is possible to do so, on the basis of recoupment of the crown's investment in them?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. So long as the crown is protected in the sale, it is our policy to sell plants built for the Korean emergency on that basis, namely, the cost of the plant less normal depreciation during its period of use. The protection in the Avro deal is found in this clause:

> Whilst reserving the right to engage in other activities if the volume of Canadian government contracts so warrants, Avro hereby declares that its primary fields of activity are the manufacture of aircraft, aircraft engines and associated equipment, and design and development relating thereto, and agrees that the assets hereby purchased will be made available for such manufacture, design and development during a period of ten years from the date hereof, and that, during such period, Avro will give priority to the performance of contracts entered into with Her Majesty.

That is the standard clause which protects the position of the crown in the event of a sale.

Mr. Fleming: I take it that it is the policy of the government to dispose of other plants on similar terms.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Mr. Fleming: One final question about equipment. With such protection as is afforded by the clause the minister has just read, was there some reason for retaining the ownership of the equipment or was it that the A. V. Roe company was not prepared to purchase the equipment?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The company was not prepared to make an investment in special purpose equipment of that magnitude. My hon. friend is somewhat underestimating the value of the equipment. The total cost of the plant is $53 million, and the difference between the $53 million and the $17 million represents the cost of the equipment. The equipment is specially procured to manufacture a certain type of jet engine. That equipment is owned by the crown and ownership will be retained by the crown unless it is decided to dispose of the equipment at a later date.

Item agreed to.

80. To provide for payment of grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown-owned defence plants operated by private contractors. $400,000.

Mr. Pallett: I have some comments to make on this item. While these plants are crown-owned, the people who are operating them are operating various types of businesses in competition with people who own their own plants and who are paying the local municipal levy at the regular assessment rate. I suggest to the committee that preferential treatment is given to people who are operating manufacturing concerns in crown-owned buildings. My other point is that the services required for crown-owned buildings are no less than those required for other types of buildings in a municipality. I suggest that a proper form of paying these taxes be adopted and that taxes be paid on each building on the basis of the assessment as determined by the municipality rather than adopting a rule of thumb method by which one municipality gets $10,000 and another one gets a different amount without any proper basis being established to give these grants in accordance with the needs of the municipality and the assessment determined by the municipality. It would seem to me that an amount of $400,000 for 1953-54 and the same amount for 1954-55 is not consistent with the fact that municipal taxes are rising because of increased costs. If your assets have remained approximately the same over the two years and you are still paying the same amount you have not taken into account any increase in the municipal burden in the last year.

I strongly suggest to the committee that this figure must have been picked out of the hat somewhere along the line and that it cannot be based on any factual foundation. I suggest that consideration should be given to paying the municipalities the actual taxes that are determined by them on the basis of the assessed value of the properties rather than to give a grant that to my mind has no sound basis.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If I may clear up the first point with respect to these plants being in competition with privately-owned industries, that is not the case. If privately-owned industries were able to do the job we would not have built the plants. These plants are built for special purposes. It sounds quite logical to my hon. friend to say that we should pay whatever the municipality assesses, but there are several factors that interfere with that. One is that we often furnish services that other plants would expect to receive from the municipality. That is one factor. Another factor is that under the British North America Act the crown is not liable for taxes. Therefore instead of paying taxes we make a grant in lieu of taxes, but the grant is generally comparable to the taxes that a privately-owned plant would pay under exactly the same circumstances. Often it is a bit more than the privately-owned plant is paying. Usually privately-owned plants have tax deals going back many years which protect them today. If my hon. friend will suggest a township that thinks it should do better I will be glad to discuss that particular problem. It is difficult to discuss the problem in general.

Mr. Pallett: The minister suggests that these plants provide services that other plants do not provide. What does he have in mind?

[Mr. Pallett.]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Often water and light.

Mr. Pallett: Water and light.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): And their own fire protection as a rule.

Mr. Pallett: The minister also referred to tax deals. Does the minister know of any particular tax deals entered into by private firms that are prevailing at the present time in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I know of a lot of private tax deals. I helped to negotiate them in my days of private practice as a consulting engineer.

Mr. Pallett: That prevails at the present time in the province of Ontario? There are none in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, no.

Mr. Pallett: I think that is a misunderstanding that should be clarified at this point.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If my hon. friend knows of any complaint about our tax arrangement perhaps he would tell us about it. We settle these matters by negotiation with the reeve of the municipality. To date we have been quite successful in working out a result reasonably satisfactory to both parties, and I think if we are allowed to work out our own salvation we will continue to do so.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Arsenals Limited—

83. Construction, improvements and new equipment, $4,777,000.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Can the minister give us any information on this item? I notice that we are going to spend almost two and a half times what we spent last year, and yet on page 12 of the report of the department I find these words:

> Most of the key defence facilities needed for the present defence program had been established by the end of the year and, with the major expansion of plant and equipment completed, the need for capital assistance decreased.

There may not be any conflict here, but it seems strange to find an indication in this report that the major construction is through and then to see an item almost two and a half times as large as last year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That expenditure is largely for Canadian Arsenals, to be expended at their explosives plant at Valleyfield. The nature of ammunition is constantly changing, and we find that we must provide for the manufacture of a new type of explosive, particularly for rockets. That expenditure is for that particular purpose. It is a crown-owned plant.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Civil defence—

288. To provide for the civil defence program, $6,498,253.

Mr. Pearkes: Does the minister wish to say anything on this important subject at the present time?

Mr. Martin: Not at this time.

Mr. Pearkes: I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this subject is of great importance to the life of this country and even though the session may be far advanced and we are all hoping to return to our homes in the near future, I do believe that some words should be said on this matter. I should like to offer a few observations. During the past day, and previous to that during the month of May, we were discussing the estimates of the Department of National Defence. We have passed in the estimates for that department the sum of approximately $2 billion, but I must call attention to the fact that the armed forces would be quite useless, no matter how strong they might be, if the civilian base of this country were knocked out and if the will of the civilian population were destroyed.

So far as the defence of this continent is concerned, the responsibility of the armed forces, of course, would be to keep the attacking enemy as far away as possible from our Canadian cities. It would also be the responsibility of the armed forces, I should think, to provide the civil defence organization and the peoples of the land with as early warning as possible. Having discharged those duties, it would seem to me that the responsibility for limiting the damage which might be caused, taking care of the casualties and mitigating the general suffering which would be inherent with that attack, would be the responsibility of the civil organization. I do not believe we can be so optimistic as to think we can stop every bomber from getting through. Some will get through to their target, but we trust that the numbers will be extremely few.

If any bombers do get through, many of the essential services will be destroyed. It will be the responsibility, therefore, of the civil organization to restore those essential services and ensure that there is as little disruption as possible to the general life of the country. I think, in broad general terms, that might be considered as an indication of the sort of tasks, the sort of objectives, of any civil defence organization which exists.

Some four or five years ago in this house I suggested that the responsibility for civil defence be removed from the Department of National Defence to some other department. Shortly after I had made that suggestion—no doubt other people had made it before—the Prime Minister removed the responsibility for civil defence from national defence to national health and welfare, thereby, rightly in my opinion, emphasizing the essentially civilian nature of civil defence. After all, civil defence really boils down to a scheme, in the main voluntary, in which one neighbour prepares himself to help another neighbour in the event of the dire results of a war and an attack upon this country.

I believe that the neighbourly nature of civil defence should be emphasized. I, for one, do not regard civil defence as a sort of fourth arm of the fighting services. Some people do. Since that day when civil defence was placed under the Minister of National Health and Welfare there have been considerable strides made in the development of our civil defence organization. Only those who fail to appreciate the difficulties that confront any department which tries to build up an organization which is essentially voluntary, the objects of which are rather nebulous, would dare say that the scheme for civil defence to date has been a failure. I do not believe that, and I should like to go on record as paying tribute to all those people who have taken part in building up the organization, from the minister and his staff here in Ottawa to the permanently employed officials in the various provinces and municipalities and the thousands of voluntary workers who have come forward and given of their time to try and create this great scheme for civil defence.

If the development and progress can be recorded, at the same time I do not think we can sit back and say that the progress is entirely satisfactory and that we do not feel that further endeavours should be made. The amount of progress which can be achieved will, to a certain extent, depend upon the funds which are voted by this parliament. I notice that when the present minister took over this department he had to get through as best he could with what I described as a very meagre amount, some $2 million. I notice that in more recent times the amount has advanced to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $6·5 million. I do not think that amount of money has been spent during the last year. There may be reasons why the sums voted by parliament for civil defence have not been spent. At the same time I feel it is highly desirable that the department should take full advantage of the funds which are made available by this parliament for the purposes for which they are allocated.

The general system, so far as I know, for the allocation of funds is that the federal government contributes dollar for dollar with each province. Each province has to be prepared and willing to enter into that dominion-provincial scheme. I regret to say that all the provinces have not agreed to go into that scheme and therefore we find that progress throughout the country is varied. In some provinces where they are keenly alive to the necessity of civil defence, and where the provincial contributions have been generous and have been matched by the dominion grants, there can be seen definite progress.

But as there are still some provinces I believe which have not entered into the scheme, such information as I have would indicate that the progress has not been as satisfactory in those provinces. In spite of the lack of any provincial grant, some municipalities in those provinces have made very considerable grants out of their civil funds, and I think a great deal of credit is due to those cities and urban centres where they have made contributions out of their very limited resources which, unfortunately, cannot be matched by the federal grants because those federal grants are allocated only for the help of the provinces. However some assistance can be given in the way of equipment.

Until there is a uniform system throughout the country, and a recognition on the part of all levels of government as to their own responsibility, and until those responsibilities are clearly defined, we shall never have a uniform system of civil defence across the whole of our land. It seems to me we are now threatened with what amounts to a new look, so far as civil defence is concerned; because the original civil defence plan was designed, first of all, to take care of the casualties and the damage caused by the ordinary high explosive bombs. From there they moved forward to the Hiroshima type of attack, by the A-bomb. Now we have reached the position where there is a far more deadly bomb, sometimes referred to as the H-bomb, and which is known to be in the possession of many powers.

Therefore it would be foolish for civil defence merely to base its plans for organization on the assumption that we might be attacked only with high explosive or even with A-bombs. The devastating effect of an H-bomb is, shall we say—and I do not think I am exaggerating—ten times as great as might have been experienced from an A-bomb of the type used at the end of the war.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Instead of only partially destroying a limited area in a city we must fact the fact that it is possible now for whole cities to be destroyed.

And so I say we have to take a new look at our civil defence. And if we are going to do that, then it seems to me now is the time when we have to invest real authority in the hands of the minister responsible for the department, and when we have to give him a constitutional position backed by an act of parliament. I think the time has now come for the government to give serious consideration to the introduction of a civil defence act. This is not a new or original idea. There are civil defence acts in existence in the United Kingdom, in the United States and in several of our provinces. But in this country where we have a federation, and where a great deal of autonomy is vested in the various provincial governments, I feel that in a matter which transcends boundaries between provinces and where co-ordination is required from the Atlantic to the Pacific now is the time for the government to introduce a civil defence act.

I make that suggestion to the minister because I know that all matters dealing with civil defence are the concern of many different departments. Obviously one realizes at once the interdependence of civil defence with the Department of National Defence. But then one need only stop for a moment to realize that civil defence is very closely related to other departments. Obviously, if there is going to be a destruction of public services, then the Department of Public Works would be very closely related with the work of civil defence. It would be closely related, not only after a bomb had fallen but in the preparatory stages before an attack.

For instance one of the major threats in civil defence matters today is the necessity of evacuating many of the larger cities. Exercises were carried out in a northwestern state recently in which large cities were evacuated, and most important lessons were drawn from that plan for mass evacuation. In a country where so many of our cities are located on rivers, and where our highways are limited, it can easily be seen that in the preparation for the evacuation of any of our large cities it might be necessary to have an extensive public works program. Perhaps one might have to provide additional bridges or tunnels, or to make new highways leading out of cities. All those things are very closely related to civil defence planning. Transport enters into the question. Of course the railways have to be kept running and the mails must be delivered. There must be protection against the possibility of sabotage.

The Department of Justice enters into the picture because there would be all kinds of legal matters. And so, without enlarging on the point, I feel some sort of committee of ministers may have to be set up; and certainly the various departments will have to have persons allocated as secretaries for civil defence matters in those particular departments.

I think the time has now come when not only should we have an act governing civil defence regulations, but that there should be an official at the level of a deputy minister who would be in charge of civil defence, who would be able to confer with senior officials in other departments, and who would have to have seniority sufficient to permit him to attend meetings of chiefs of staff.

Then you say: What subjects would a civil defence act be expected to cover? Well, I can only outline these. My ideas are drawn from existing civil defence acts. For instance, the responsibility of the civil defence minister would be defined in relation to any civil defence services which exist. There are a limited number of regularly employed civil defence personnel. At the present time they are in the main restricted to instructors in the various provinces. I am not certain that an expansion is not required in that respect.

In other countries there is the idea of flying columns or very mobile columns of civil defence workers who are always ready and available. One can see in the thickly-settled portions of our country in eastern Canada the value which would accrue from having a number of flying columns located outside of the principal cities so that they could move in, in case of a disaster. Those flying columns, at least some of them, should be permanently enrolled, and those that are permanently enrolled during the time when there is no threat could be used, it seems to me, as administrators and instructors.

Then of course the majority of the corps of civil defence workers would be those who are not permanently employed in civil defence work, and there are that great mass of men and women who are voluntarily giving their services at this time. But surely responsibility rests on the shoulders of the minister in so far as those voluntary workers are concerned, and obviously the definition of those responsibilities would be laid out in any act.

Furthermore, there is the whole question of the storage of essential equipment. If one is going to work on the assumption that evacuation may be necessary in certain areas, provision has to be made for the caring of the people who have been moved out of some city, and who will at least for the time being have to sojourn in the rural districts surrounding that city that may be the target. Whether the bombs have fallen in that city or not, anyway, for the time being the care of those people will have to be looked after.

There are bound to be questions regarding the acquisition of land for the building of shelters, report centres and that sort of thing. There will be much that will be required along these lines. Therefore, I feel there are many responsibilities which have to be clearly defined, and can only be clearly defined and can only be given a legal status if they are incorporated in an act of parliament.

Then comes the question of the financial responsibility between the various provinces. We cannot go on any longer in this haphazard way of saying that if a province wishes to make a contribution for civil defence, then the federal government will match its contribution. We have got past the day when it is purely a local responsibility.

Earlier I indicated that there may be some major construction works which would be required if we are working on the thought of possible evacuation of certain areas, or even if we are providing some sort of shelters for essential plants, industrial work, or organizational headquarters. It seems to me that the construction of those major projects should and must be undertaken by the federal government. I do not think that you can place the responsibility of developing a major constructional project upon some local organization. I suggest that it will be essential that we have drawn up in this act a very clear definition as to responsibility as it exists between the various levels of government. I do feel that if the time has not come when the federal government is prepared to take over the full responsibility for civil defence, certainly the time has arrived when the federal government must take over responsibility for the major constructional projects which are required under what I have referred to as the "new look" which must be given to civil defence.

If there is a sudden emergency we may expect that the army is in training or in the process of mobilization in Canada and will be able to take over some of the duties of civil defence in the early stages of any war; but if the army is called upon to do that you are delaying the important tasks which confront the army because in those early days of mobilization any distraction from the process of organizing units and training men only delays and may very easily be disastrous with respect to the army's entry into the war. Therefore I feel that one has to have the civil defence organization in existence in peacetime. You do not want the full organization, but there must be a nucleus around which you can build up very rapidly the required services.

I have mentioned the question of the importance of having mobile columns outside of the cities. I go one step further. I am not satisfied that the mobile columns should be more and more equipped with motor vehicles, but I think you have to have them airborne and possibly using helicopters so that they can enter into a devastated area. They are the key people who would be able to take charge at once, who will be able to restore the broken services and will be able to supervise the voluntary workers who will be partially trained.

I feel there is a danger in relying too much upon the armed forces to provide that essential work, and in fact I have from the very beginning stressed what I consider to be the civilian nature of civil defence. I see great need for skilled traffic control personnel provided by men who have had experience in organizing great parades or supervising spectators going to some large sporting event.

I hope the minister, before these estimates are put through, will be able to outline what progress has been made. I should feel happy if he would say that he is prepared to introduce at the next session of parliament a civil defence act, because I do not believe we are going to make any progress until we get an act of that nature. In addition, before the estimates are concluded I hope the minister will be able to tell us something about the financial responsibilities as between the different layers of government. I do not think this haphazard take it or leave it attitude is satisfactory, and it does not assure the sort of co-ordinated scheme covering Canada that we need at the present time.

Mr. Cavers: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take advantage of this occasion to say a few words on this important matter of civil defence. It is a subject which should be of utmost concern to every citizen because it comes so close to the very life of every person in Canada. Great progress has been made by the department of national welfare in the past few years and I am glad the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in the house at this time because he has shown an intensive interest in the organization of this branch of his department. The best evidence of his determination to do something about civil defence is the fact that no less than 650 Canadian community civil defence organizations are now in existence.

In more than 200 communities, of which St. Catharines and Lincoln county is an outstanding example, these services are organized and personnel are being trained. The remainder are now in various stages of organization, training, and development. To man these organizations throughout the country more than 163,000 people have been enrolled for various important duties. It is hoped that this total, which includes civil government employees and citizen volunteers, will be substantially increased over the next 12 months.

I have made mention of the extent of local organization across the country because it is local effort and individual initiative that is of importance in the problem of civil defence. I agree with the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich when he says that civil defence should not be the fourth arm of the army. I think civil defence is a task which should be assumed by the citizens in our country in a neighbourly fashion so that neighbours are working together for their self-preservation. Most localities have tackled the problem in a realistic manner, but in some municipalities the effort has fallen far short of what is required if we are to give adequate protection to our citizens.

We have a great need for civil defence in Canada. While Canada, with other freedom-loving nations, is making every effort to secure world peace by mediation and diplomatic negotiation at the United Nations, and by building up a bulwark against aggression through the instrument of NATO, we must recognize that the threat of war is ever present. It is well for us to make reasonable preparation for the protection of our civilian population and of essential public services now existing within our communities.

At one time in our history, wars were fought on distant battlefields, far distant from the civilian community. But today, with the evolution of guided missiles and atomic warfare, war has been brought to our very doorsteps. We cannot enjoy a sense of security even in our own homes. Should a major conflagration take place in this country then civil defence will be our first requirement. It has been said, and said quite rightly, that civil defence has added a third dimension to citizenship, namely, the obligation to protect ourselves and our homes from direct enemy attack.

The targets for any possible future enemy attack would be our heavy industrial installations; our hydroelectric developments; and our transportation systems on the land, in the air and on the water. Within the past week I read, as no doubt did other hon. members, a pamphlet known as The Bulletin published by the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association and in the course of an article on management in civil defence it is asserted that it is the individual responsibility of management to take care of civil defence in their own line of business. The article continues:

> To assist plant management, the federal civil defence co-ordinator has in process of publication a revised "Civil Defence Manual No. 6" which deals with industrial plant protection. It should soon be available in quantity, either directly or through provincial co-ordinators. This manual in itself is able to give only an outline, but it does lay down the principles involved and suggests steps to be taken.

I am sure that industrialists throughout our country will avail themselves of the opportunity to develop a civil defence organization within their own plants. It is probable that these key locations I have mentioned would be the centres of strategic importance most likely to be attacked.

Steps have been taken by the federal government to provide a system of advance warning so that provincial and local organizations can be alerted to the danger of enemy air attack. The armed forces have established a radar system across the northern part of this country to detect and identify unknown aircraft which might come within our borders. But once the warning has been given the local civil defence organization comes into operation.

The aims of civil defence are to reduce loss of life; to avoid confusion among the local citizens; to provide medical and nursing assistance; to restore public utilities that might be blown up; to minimize property damage, and to ensure the continuation of essential industries. Those are the problems that concern our civil defence organizations if we should be attacked.

I have emphasized already what I believe are the essential steps to be followed in the successful establishment of civil defence groups. In order to establish a strong local committee it is necessary to supply strong, aggressive, and courageous leadership. We, in the county of Lincoln, have been fortunate in finding an individual with such qualities in the person of Brigadier General R. Gordon Whitelaw. Brigadier Whitelaw distinguished himself by his outstanding service in two world wars.

He has thrown himself into the work of civil defence organization in an enthusiastic and vigorous manner. His hours are long; his effort is tremendous and he serves without remuneration of any kind. I wish to express publicly my thanks to Brigadier General Gordon Whitelaw for his unselfish devotion to duty in this field of endeavour. Brigadier Whitelaw has gathered about him a corps of outstanding people with a spirit of community interest, including merchants, industrialists, factory employees, professional people, and agriculturists who are giving of their time and effort providing a strong organization in our community.

Brigadier Whitelaw tells me he feels that a reasonable start can be made only by educating the general public to the dangers that are around us and the need for the protection of our citizens. Three series of articles were published by the local group in the St. Catharines Standard, the local press. Two panel discussions have been broadcast over radio station CKTB and over 8,000 pamphlets on personal survival have been distributed in the local area. A civil defence week was observed last October when two special programs were staged in all local theatres. The John Labatt civil defence disaster convoy was brought in for demonstration in Thorold, Merritton and St. Catharines. Civil defence literature has been handed out by I.O.D.E. volunteers in several larger stores in the district. The director himself has addressed 56 meetings of service clubs, veterans clubs, home and school associations, church groups and parent-teachers groups.

Great care must be taken in the selection of suitable personnel for key positions. As an example, Mr. Joseph Bishop, who had had considerable experience in demolition clearance in England during the war, was given complete charge of this branch of the work. A medical man was given charge of the emergency and ambulance branch, and so on. The organization is set up on a control system. It provides for a central committee made up of representatives from all the councils of the municipalities concerned. The director, of course, is the head of the organization and he has under his jurisdiction three deputy directors: deputy director G in charge of intelligence, deputy director A in charge of personnel and administration, and deputy director Q in charge of supply, equipment, transport and buildings. These men, in co-operation with the fire-fighting group, the police group and the rescue group are able to provide a nucleus for a great service in our community.

A bimonthly civil defence newsletter is sent out to all civil defence personnel. Those newsletters are well worth reading. There are approximately 2,200 in the organization who are receiving weekly training. It is difficult to obtain trained instructors and suitable accommodation. Several of our outstanding citizens have taken advantage of the excellent courses provided by the Department of National Health and Welfare both here and at the new school in Arnprior. I am informed by these people who have become prominent and efficient leaders that the courses which they have received have provided them with excellent experience in this type of work.

The city of St. Catharines has turned over one of the unused city schools as a headquarters for civil defence activities. In this building equipment is stored and classes of instruction are carried out each week. The director has held 198 conferences for local civil defence key personnel in order to explain their responsibilities and duties and to discuss methods of procedure.

It is interesting to note that the federal and provincial governments have agreed to pay compensation to enrolled members of civil defence organizations who might be injured or maimed during their course of instruction or training.

Excellent progress has been made in organizing civil defence in St. Catharines and district schools. A co-ordinator and two deputies have been appointed. They work in conjunction with the principals and teachers in the schools, both public and separate, and they are providing each day drills for the children of the city in order that they might be made aware of what they ought to do should an attack come.

Each year the St. Catharines civil defence organization enters into a joint scheme with Niagara Falls, Ontario; Niagara Falls, New York; and other border communities in order that they may carry on a joint evacuation in the whole Niagara frontier. The effort last year held in October was most successful. It is anticipated that better results will be achieved when the Niagara Falls, N.Y., exercise is held this coming October.

What is the cost of this program? I believe it is important that I should say something about the cost to local municipalities. The total budget for the areas engaged in this work amounts to $6,291.11. It is distributed among their local municipalities as follows:

Distribution of Civil Defence Budget

| Municipality | Per cent | Total Cost |
|---|---|---|
| City of St. Catharines ..... | 55·502 | $3,330.12 |
| Township of Grantham .... | 24·053 | 1,443.18 |
| Town of Thorold ..... | 9·636 | 578.16 |
| Town of Merritton ..... | 7·055 | 423.30 |
| Town of Port Dalhousie .... | 3·754 | 225.24 |
| | 100·00 | $6,000.00 |
| Carried over from 1953 ..... | | 291.11 |
| | | $6,291.11 |

This is the effort that is being made by the municipalities throughout the county of Lincoln. I think it is a good record. I think it is probably a better record than that of some other parts of Canada. I am hopeful that some scheme may yet be devised between the province of Ontario and the federal government in order that the municipalities in our community may avail themselves of the opportunity to obtain from the federal government some grant to assist them in this type of work.

Why is it so difficult to organize civil defence in Ontario and throughout Canada? The first reason is that none of our cities have ever suffered a really serious actual disaster. The second reason is that Ontario, being far removed from both seacoasts, has not been seriously threatened by war for nearly 150 years. These reasons must be blamed for much of the public apathy that exists at the present time. However, I believe that I have pointed out tonight that given the proper leadership, maintained by adequate municipal support and the encouragement and assistance of the Department of National Health and Welfare, any community can build for itself an adequate measure of protection for its citizens who may be under severe stress and heavy attack.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the constructive and interesting remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. I think he made a most interesting contribution to this debate. I listened with interest to the speaker who has just resumed his seat, particularly because he emphasized one aspect of civil defence that has been very much in my mind in recent years. I have taken an interest in the subject ever since civil defence was organized. I have kept in close contact with the officials of the various municipalities in my riding, the civil defence co-ordinators, the fire chiefs and other interested people in local groups, and I have had an opportunity to discuss the varying and changing problems with these people.

I must say I represent a constituency that, relatively speaking, is very well organized for civil defence. As a matter of fact the province of British Columbia is, relatively speaking, well organized for civil defence, particularly when you realize that 2·5 per cent of the total population of the province is enrolled in the civil defence organization at this time. But we have even beaten that in Kootenay West. I have one community, Kinnaird, in which 10 per cent of the total population are enrolled in the civil defence organization.

I think the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich hit the nail on the head when he said that this is the result of neighbourly co-operation. In fairness to those who live in larger centres, I think I should say that I have found from experience in all types of community activity that it is much easier to get neighbourly community co-operation in a small community than in a large city because in a small community each person who is a member of the organization or unit feels that they are wanted, that they are someone important and are doing an effective job.

I quite realize that city conditions present a greater problem to the organization of civil defence than small communities. As far as Kootenay West is concerned, the whole idea of organizing civil defence has been to organize it to meet any form of disaster. We recognize the necessity for civil defence to meet the possibility of disaster from attack. We have dealt with the question of floods on the Columbia and Kootenay rivers, the possibility of having to deal with large fires and with forest fires. Only within the last month or two it was anticipated for some two or three weeks that the Columbia river might rise and seriously flood a portion of the city of Trail and other communities. I may say that the whole civil defence organization was ready to go into action at a moment's notice to build dikes and provide the things required to protect the city of Trail and other communities against the possible flooding of the Columbia and other rivers.

I must repeat again that for civil defence to be successful the first necessity is that it must be based on local interest, local organization and local co-operation. In my district in all the municipalities the great majority of local organizations such as the Red Cross, the Legion, trade unions, fire brigades and so on, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, the West Kootenay Power and Light Company, all the large logging companies and their employees have worked together through elected representatives to build a foundation for a very successful civil defence organization under excellent local leadership. I have definitely come to the conclusion that no federal or provincial action with respect to civil defence can be successful unless you have that sort of co-operation at the local or rank and file level. That is the reason for the measure of success that has been attained in the district I represent.

Before passing on, I want to pay particular tribute to Major Matheson, who was the co-ordinator in the Nelson area covering the greater part of Kootenay West and the small communities, and to Mr. Marcolin, of Trail, who is the co-ordinator for, you might say, the target area of my constituency. They have both done excellent work in dealing with the questions of evacuation, rescue, medical attention, transportation, communication, organization of food supplies and reception areas. Every outlying village in my district has been visited. There are local committees. Every house, every hall, every building capable of receiving people has been listed. Even my own little log shack is going to be used in case of necessity. All the local fire brigades are taking an active part in this organization.

Earlier in the debate I heard some reference to hose standardization. Hose standardization has been in effect in British Columbia and Alberta as a result of the provincial governments concerned accepting their responsibility in that respect. So far as the question of hose standardization in British Columbia is concerned, it was the fire chief of the city of Nelson who first emphasized that at the first meetings held in Vancouver when the civil defence organization was formed. A number of our active workers in civil defence have attended the civil defence school in Ottawa. They have come down here over a period of two or three years and all of them tell me that they were very pleased with the training and experience and that they thought the training, experience and information they received were most useful and beneficial.

But now we meet a new situation. As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said, we need to take a new look at civil defence, and that is recognized by all these local groups that are doing such good work. I think recent developments require a re-examination of the whole civil defence organization and the measures taken to defend and protect the civil population. In that respect I have seen editorials in many newspapers, and I should like to quote a paragraph from one that appeared in the Citizen of April 12 headed "Civil Defence in the H-Bomb Age". It reads in part as follows:

> Civil defence plans are everywhere undergoing a re-examination as a result of the H-bomb explosions in the Pacific. Although discouragement was the first reaction, second thoughts confirm the importance of continued efforts to prepare for disaster. Plans must, of course, be adapted to the possibility of destruction more terrible than the atomic bomb could produce.

I think that reaction to recent developments must be met by the federal government and those responsible at senior levels by some guidance, some instruction and, shall I say, some new leadership. I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich with respect to this suggestion that we should have a civil defence act. I had not considered the question before but it seems to have a great deal of merit. Having thought it over since the hon. member spoke, it is my opinion that federal civil defence legislation will dissipate the amorphous situation that exists to some extent at the present time in the administration of civil defence throughout the country.

I hope the minister will give close attention to that suggestion. I also think, in view of the differing financial capabilities of the various governments, that the federal government should reassess the capacity of certain provincial governments to undertake civil defence satisfactorily. Like the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, I do not think it is sufficient to say: If you wish to go into civil defence, we will go along with you and share some of the expense. I think the provincial governments have got to accept their responsibility. That is why I think civil defence legislation would remove somewhat the lack of cohesion that exists today, would define exactly the responsibility of federal, provincial and municipal governments and the people themselves, would provide an opportunity for a definition of the financial responsibilities of all levels of government, and would in general provide the cohesion through legislation that I think is necessary to bring civil defence to the peak of efficiency necessary in Canada at this time.

Mr. Holowach: I should like to say a few words with respect to the subject under discussion at the present time. I do so because I believe that civil defence is a matter of immediate urgency and grave concern to the people of Canada. Fundamentally civil defence involves the safeguarding of Canadian lives. Since there will be no time, in the event that hostilities and all-out fighting begins, to make preparations, advance preparations are necessary.

Mr. Martin: Will the hon. member excuse me if I leave the chamber for a few moments? I shall be right back and I have asked that the hon. member's remarks be followed closely.

Mr. Holowach: Certainly. Advance preparations may well mean the difference between some semblance of morale and ultimate victory and chaos and defeat.

No sane person in the country wants blood spilling. We certainly hope that civil defence will never become a reality in Canada. In the light of what is happening in the world today we have no other recourse except to take every precaution we possibly can. For those reasons and many more it is regrettable that this important subject, and many of the other controversial matters which are on the agenda at the present time, were not brought up sooner because they certainly justify the full force of debate and the views of every single member in this house.

We notice in the estimates for 1954-55 the vote for civil defence is listed as $6,498,253, which implies a decrease of $8,034 as compared to the amount in the estimates for 1953-54. In comparison with the amounts that are being spent on military defence, I feel that this is but a scratch on the surface of the problem. We read every day in the newspapers of the precarious state of affairs in the world. I personally look upon civil defence measures as being equally as important as military defence. These two precautions certainly cannot be divorced from one another. The urgency of building up our civil defence program is clearly illustrated by statements that appear in our daily newspapers. Here is one that appeared in the Montreal Gazette of June 19, 1954. The heading reads, "Ottawa favours nuclear weapons in any war". It is written by Dave McIntosh, and the article goes on to say:

> Canada's defence officials favour—out of necessity—use of nuclear weapons in the event of war.

Further on the article states:

> Canada's defence chiefs do not hold any false hopes that the North Atlantic alliance forces in Europe could beat Russia on the ground. NATO forces are considered the barest minimum to hold off a Russian attack long enough for the United States air force and the R.A.F. to swing into action with nuclear weapons and destroy Russia's ability to wage war.

We know that such action could bring counter-strikes upon our own country. In reviewing the present military situation Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery speaking in Paris on May 24 emphasized the urgency of civil defence. The statement appeared in the New York Times of Tuesday, May 25, and reads as follows:

> A successful western defence against this threat requires up-to-strength, combat-ready regular army divisions, well-organized reserves, trained and ready to fight, a supply system built in peacetime and ready to roll in war, and sound civil defence and home-front morale.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the urgency of civil defence might best be understood by illustration. There are two facts which I believe are proper to recall at this time. The first fact is that those forces opposed to our way of life are on the offensive. We are on the defensive. They certainly have as their ultimate aim world conquest for communism. Flush with various diplomatic victories at Geneva and elsewhere, armed with propaganda and great military strength, they now control an area from the river Elbe to the borders of Alaska, an area inhabited by over 800 million people or one out of every three human beings who inhabit this planet.

With some of the south Asian countries unable to defend themselves, perhaps even before we meet again another 500 million human beings may be subjugated. I feel these facts emphasize the urgency of our own military and civil defence preparations. At this rate fragments of Europe and this continent may soon be the only places that are not under communist rule.

The second point I should like to make is that we are still free and unfettered and wish to remain that way. We insist that every precaution be taken, both from a military and civil defence point of view, to safeguard this nation. In order to be effective I believe that civil defence should be conducted on a municipal or community level with as little interference as possible from the central agencies. The matters of co-ordination of defence planning, standardization of defence equipment, guidance and financial cost should be federal responsibilities. This follows the precept that the first responsibility of the federal government is to safeguard the lives and interests of the people. I say this because it seems to me that much of our defence planning has been hampered by argument as to where the financial responsibility lies.

It seems to me we are wasting a great deal of time fiddling on the theme as to who is financially responsible when there is so much to be done and so little time in which to do it. We in the province of Alberta have from the very outset realized the responsibilities which we have in the matter of civil defence. I believe the minister will bear me out when I say that the government of Alberta has given full co-operation in the matter. However, simply because the government of Alberta gives full co-operation in the matter of civil defence should not mean discriminating against our province in the matter of financial assistance or that greater financial inducements be given to those who are less prone to assume their responsibility. A statement of policy from the minister at an early date clarifying the federal government's financial responsibility in this matter will, I believe, clear the decks for quick action and enable the various provinces to expedite those steps which will ensure some degree of safety for their people.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, the position of this group was set forth capably on Saturday by my seatmate, the hon. member for Cape Breton South. He pointed out that we are opposed to any suggestion that control of civil defence should be vested in the military authorities or in the Department of National Defence. Rather, we think it should remain where it is, in the civilian department. We urge that the minister be given more authority either by legislation or by agreement with the provinces in order that he may be in a better position to seek co-operation and to assist in the co-ordination of the efforts of provincial and municipal groups in this matter.

In the third place we believe that the minister should have a much larger budget for civil defence than the one presented to us tonight. Yesterday we voted close to $2 billion for national defence; this afternoon we voted $40 million for defence production, and tonight we are asked to vote about $6,500,000 for civil defence. The contrast between these figures is, I think, some indication of the fact that the government itself does not take this matter of civil defence very seriously. Certain it is that it is not taken seriously in the part of Ontario from which I come. The metropolitan areas of this province just do not take civil defence seriously.

There is a great dearth of enthusiasm in the subject, I think partly because our people just cannot grasp the fact that an invasion and destruction of our country or our metropolitan areas is now possible. I do not think the serious threat to our country and indeed to civilization is realized by our people.

In the second place there is very little confidence that much can be done by way of civil defence to protect us from destruction by the hydrogen bomb. There is a dearth of information regarding just what is being done or what can be done. And there is I think a lack of confidence in the present civil defence program to meet the kind of emergency that we would be called upon to meet in case of invasion.

We continue to debate our constitutional rights; whether the federal government, the provinces or municipal bodies should accept the responsibility. We continue to quarrel about the division of costs, as to who should pay this and who should pay that. Meantime I think that we should either take this question seriously or forget about it altogether.

If we are to take it seriously, then I think it is necessary that agreement be reached with the provincial authorities whereby more power can be vested in the federal minister in charge of this department, in order that we may really get on with the job of building up a civil defence organization across this country. And certainly the government should consider spending more money than is asked in this vote for that purpose. The amount of almost $6,500,000 we are asked to vote tonight is to be spent in this way: $2 million for administration, $2 million for grants in aid to the provinces, and $2,400,000 for materials and supplies.

As has been indicated already, a successful civil defence organization depends upon the co-operation of community groups and of provincial governments. But certainly the leadership for the development of a national civil defence organization must of necessity come from the federal department in charge. I think the provinces have some reason to disagree with the terms under which grants in aid are made. After all, in the event of invasion, and of our having to avail ourselves of our civil defence organization, of necessity most of the services and of the personnel will be supplied by the municipalities. In their personnel, in their local organization, in their hospitals and in their police forces as well as their fire departments, the provinces and municipalities have the nucleus of what eventually must become the main part of the local civil defence organization.

In the light of the provisions already made by local and provincial authorities, if the federal government is to take the matter of civil defence seriously and is anxious to see a strong organization built up across this country, then the federal government should reconsider the terms on which this paltry $2 million in grants in aid to the provinces is made. The federal government must come to realize that this is a much more serious business than it seems to realize. It demands of that government a much larger share of the cost of organizing such a defence.

If we can build and organize a system of national civil defence, even though we may never be called upon to use that system, the very fact that in building such an organization we have been able to bring local communities together in a co-operative effort, and to co-operate in a common purpose to have facilities for the benefit of the community itself, means that we shall have achieved a purpose that in my opinion will be well worth the expenditure of money and effort put into it. Even though we are never called upon to use the organization for the purpose for which it was intended, an organization of that kind will, by the very fact that it is brought into the various communities and has enlisted the services in that community into co-operative enterprise, have made a big contribution to our democratic way of life.

In concluding these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I say that we shall oppose any suggestion that the Department of National Defence should take over civil defence. We shall support any move made to secure co-operation and agreement with the provinces by which more authority can be vested in the minister for the purpose of co-ordinating the efforts of the communities and the provinces across this country in the matter of civil defence. We urge that the federal government take this entire matter of civil defence much more closely into consideration and that a larger budget than the present be provided.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the statement has frequently been made that military spending and preparations for a coming war were always made for the war just past; that is, that they were one war behind. However true that may have been as far as military planning is concerned—I do not think it was true to any great extent in many instances—it is certainly true so far as civil defence is concerned in Canada at the present time. In other words, the activities which have been carried on in civil defence in Canada have been ones really based on experience secured in Great Britain during the last war, and based to a large extent on the concept of the ordinary type of bombs and the problems attendant upon bombing of that kind.

To a large extent the responsibility for civil defence has been passed on to the provinces and to the municipal authorities, and the hope has been that they, with voluntary assistance from the general population, would get an organization set up which would be adequate to look after civil defence matters. That is all very well in its way, but in the atomic age I do not think it is anything like sufficient.

It has been indicated by several of the speakers who preceded me that something much more definite and much more dynamic needs to be done, much better leadership needs to be given and more finances provided by the dominion government in order to provide anything in the way of an effective civil defence. I have nothing against what has been done up to date. The emphasis so far has been on fire fighting, the provision of fire fighting equipment, the standardization of hose couplings and things along that line, rescue work and organization in cities for that rescue work, first aid and the provision of first aid classes for voluntary workers and so on. That is all good. That is all still necessary; it will all be needed and it can all be made use of. But a great deal more is necessary if we are to have anything in the nature of an effective civil defence organization set up in Canada to meet an atomic bomb attack.

If we are in earnest about this thing, if we believe at all that we are likely to have need of the civil defence organizations; in other words, if we believe there is going to be an attack on Canada, we must predicate our thinking on the basis that it is likely to be an atomic attack so far as certain big concentrations of population and industry are concerned.

To have any sort of realistic civil defence organization, it must be based on that predication; otherwise we might just as well do practically nothing about it. If we accept that premise which is, as far as I can see, the only one we can accept, then I think we have got to accept the fact that much more important than this fire fighting, this rescue work and the first aid is going to be the evacuation of those large centres of population and the finding of places for the people that have to be sheltered, fed and so forth. In other words the whole concept of civil defence really has to be sighted in that direction rather than sighted in the direction of fire fighting in a particular locality, rescue work there and the taking of people from houses that have been bombed to a neighbouring house, and so forth.

If you have an atomic bomb attack on Toronto, for example, you are going to have the entire city of Toronto unfit for human habitation as a result of radioactivity, because most of the buildings will be destroyed or badly damaged, and they are not going to be fit for occupancy. There you will have on your hands the problem of evacuating, if possible. If you have warning you are going to evacuate as many people from those areas as possible before the attack takes place. We would hope that a large number would be evacuated before the attack takes place, but after it does take place the people who have survived would have to be evacuated from that area.

Any realistic civil defence planning must have in mind places where these people can go; therefore it seems to me there are four things in particular which are the essential needs in civil defence planning at the present time and in civil defence plants. The first is the evacuation of people of the larger centres of population, the ones that are likely targets. An evacuation plan of course involves the matter of the use of all available transportation, traffic control and so on, and of course places to which these people can go.

In certain provinces, for example, such as the province of New Brunswick, I do not think there would be any problem if you had to evacuate the only two cities that would perhaps ever have to be evacuated there, namely, Saint John and Moncton. There would be no problem in finding sufficient places for the people from those cities in towns and villages and on the farms in the province of New Brunswick. You have not much of a problem there; it is just a matter of making the plans and then seeing that a sufficient number of people know about them so that they can be carried out.

But when you come to the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and particularly Montreal and Toronto, you have a terrific problem on your hands. After you succeeded in evacuating all the population from these two cities where would you put them? There is just not enough room in the form of houses, summer cottages and everything else to put that large number of people. There would not be enough room to accommodate the people who were not destroyed in the blast, if that took place. Therefore, some provision has to be made for these people to go to if an evacuation ever becomes necessary.

A great deal of course can be done in the utilization of farm buildings, summer cottages and things of that sort as temporary shelters, but it seems to me another essential at the present time is the provision of a considerable amount of tentage, places as storehouses or whatever you wish to call it in strategic areas around the country. Fortunately in this country we have provinces which have a large number of lakes that have summer cottages around them and quite a lot of amenities. The provision of water is already there, and so on. This would be the sort of place, I would think, where there should be dumps of tents that could be made use of to make what in wartime we called an emergency town around what is at the present time a comparatively small summer resort. As far as I know nothing along that line has been done. I think that is one of the essentials in any civil defence plan at the present time.

It is no good of course to put these people out in these various areas north of Toronto, Montreal and so forth, unless there is something to eat when they get there. Therefore, in addition to the provision of tentage, we need to have dumps or storehouses of food, food, of course, which can be kept for long periods, such as flour, canned meats, concentrated foods of various sorts, necessities at least, so that the necessities of life can be provided for the people that would evacuate to those areas. I refer to something that would correspond to some extent to the iron rations, as they were called, that were carried by every soldier during the last war and the war before, only of course on a much bigger scale.

The fourth essential is the provision of medical supplies for the treatment of numerous casualties likely to require treatment in these evacuation areas. This is one thing on which I know something has already been done. Provision has been made for a certain number of medical kits and a start has been made in that direction, but as far as I know it is just a start and it is not even close to approaching the needs or necessities of the situation. I understand these medical kits consist of surgical operating instruments, but to my mind what is even more necessary is the provision of drugs, particularly those types necessary in the treatment of burns, radiation, and that sort of thing.

I do not want to take up a great deal of the time of the committee in going into these various points in detail. One could make a ten or fifteen minute speech on each of the four points I have mentioned, namely, evacuation plans, the provision of tenting, the provision of food in dumps, and the provision of medical supplies in dumps. However, for the moment I have touched on what I consider to be the crux of the matter as far as civil defence is concerned, and I would like to hear from the minister as to what progress, if any, has been made along the lines I have mentioned. In other words, what steps have been taken to meet a likely atomic attack rather than the type of planning we have had up to date which was adopted really to meet an ordinary bomb attack?

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, before the minister answers I would like to make one or two brief comments. I would like to say in the first place that the speech to which we have just listened strikes me as much the most practical approach to this question I have ever heard. What I want to do is merely to underline one or two of the things which have been said and which really are, as it were, background material to this problem. In the first place I must say I agree fully with what the hon. member for York South said, namely that either we should take this very seriously or forget about it altogether. Secondly, I should like to underline what the hon. member for Edmonton East said to the effect that the matter was one of immediate urgency and great concern to the people of Canada. If he had said it should be a matter of great urgency and immediate concern I would agree with him fully, but I would like to question whether in fact it is a matter of great urgency and immediate concern to one out of a hundred people in Canada. That seems to be the trouble.

I listened with great interest and some amazement to the speech made by the hon. member for Lincoln and if the situation in Lincoln is as he described it then I think we should congratulate him. I was surprised when he mentioned that 163,000 people had been enrolled in the civil defence organizations and I hope the minister when he comes to speak will tell us more about that. It seems to me the job the government has to do is a very difficult one and it has not even been scratched as yet nor have the people of Canada yet been made conscious of this problem. If I am terribly ignorant of the facts and if the people in the part of Canada in which I live are the only ones who are asleep and doing nothing to look after themselves I will be ready to be set right on it, but at the moment it seems to me, as the hon. member for York South pointed out, that we are doing neither one thing or the other. We seem to be like the city fathers of Coventry who decided it was not worth doing anything about civil defence. I believe Sir Winston Churchill answered them, though I do not know how effectively.

I think the problem is one of tremendous difficulty and in spite of the figures mentioned by the hon. member for Lincoln the problem has not even been scratched as yet because the ordinary citizen of Canada is not prepared to do anything about it. It is something about which he does not like to think, and will not think about, and I hope that when the minister comes to answer he will give us a good deal of information. I hope the minister will be utterly realistic about it and tell us the true situation, however unpalatable the truth may be. The minister has a job to do. In his spare time he is supposed to deal with these matters which are of tremendous importance. If we had a bombing attack tomorrow the minister would be grievously and very unfairly blamed for what would be the fault of us all, and I suggest therefore that we be given a very realistic appreciation of this situation as it is and not as we would like it to be.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I think all of the speeches given tonight have been very helpful and I will begin by dealing with the speech made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South last week and that made tonight by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. I cannot find much to quarrel with in most of the speeches given tonight. As the hon. member for Greenwood has just stated, this is a very difficult matter and anyone who is charged with this particular responsibility has indeed a thankless and very difficult task.

I was interested and encouraged by the observations of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, particularly when he said that since our debate last year he had noted that very considerable progress had been made in the matter of civil defence in Canada. The credit for that does not rest with any particular group but is the result I think of the large measure of co-operation that exists throughout the country and which is greater than is generally appreciated.

Having noted some progress, I fully agree with the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that the nature of the problem, apart altogether from the assessment of its immediacy, is precisely as he stated. We cannot sit back and say the progress is entirely satisfactory, because it is not satisfactory. It is not satisfactory here nor is it satisfactory in any country in the world. The British home secretary, Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, in the British House of Commons found himself faced with the same kind of questions that have attended the debate here tonight, and the remark which the British Prime Minister, Sir Winston Churchill, made with regard to the attitude taken by some citizens of Coventry is a valid response which we can all make I think to anyone in Canada who claims that civil defence has now been made obsolete as a result of thermonuclear developments. I know of no responsible group in Canada that has taken that position.

The hon. member for Calgary North, in his constructive speech, outlined the steps he thought should be taken in the light of the development of the hydrogen bomb and the four new phases which might be given consideration at this time. He mentioned evacuation and I might associate with that what is evacuation in principle but what is called tactical dispersal of population. The hydrogen bomb has forced us to give consideration to evacuation and tactical dispersal of population.

The hon. member urged that a committee be set up to consider plans with respect to this matter. I would point out that that has been done. We not only have a departmental committee but we have a committee on which the United States and Great Britain share membership with our Canadian representatives. That matter is being carefully studied but it would not be accurate to say that we have yet formulated the kind of plans originally projected as necessary following the first hydrogen detonation. As soon as the first hydrogen bomb was exploded we were told there were detailed plans already worked out for the evacuation of cities such as New York. but I can say that that is not the case. However, in the United States, Great Britain and in Canada these matters are being given consideration. We hope in Canada in the fall to be able to test out the evacuation plan of one Canadian community yet to be announced.

With regard to medical supplies, my hon. friend referred to surgical kits. Of course our stockpiling program is much more extensive than that. To date we have spent almost $2,500,000 on medical supplies which include drugs, instruments and the sort of thing my hon. friend mentioned; blankets and much else besides, and these are being placed in strategic areas in the country. The matter of tents, and other emergency shelter accommodation, of course is one that is closely related to the question of evacuation and comes within the responsibility of mutual aid and reception areas, as was so helpfully outlined by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. For 3½ years now we have had an expert committee studying the question of food supplies and emergency feeding arrangements in the event of the kind of disaster occurring which we all hope will not take place.

One of the encouraging things in this debate tonight, it seems to me, has been the recognition of the fact that civil defence, in order to be effective—apart altogether from what the central and provincial governments must do—depends in the final analysis for its success on the voluntary effort of the Canadian citizen in his or her community. We started civil defence in Canada, as was done in the United States, on the basis of the experience of Great Britain. We have consistently used the services of their officers and notably those of Sir John Hodsoll who had charge of civil defence in Britain during the war and who kept emphasizing the importance, notwithstanding the difficulty, of bringing home so far as possible the necessity for local community organization and of recognizing that there in the main rested the secret of the success of an adequate civil defence organization. This fact was recognized also in the United States when President Eisenhower in February of this year said:

> Civil defence responsibilities primarily belong to the state and local governments—recruiting, training and organizing volunteers to meet any emergency. The immediate job of the federal government . . . is to supply technical guidance, and to continue to strengthen its civil defence stockpile of medical, engineering and related supplies and equipment.

Again, in his budget statement a few months ago—and this is an important statement—he said this:

> Much planning, organization, and training remains to be done, however, to make this strategy of civil defence fully effective at all levels of government. It will be the federal responsibility, as reflected in this budget, to provide warning of impending attacks, and to stockpile medical supplies. The federal government will not assume the responsibilities which belong to local governments and volunteer forces, but will supplement state and local resources, provide necessary information on weapons' effects, and advise and assist states and localities . . .
> This great problem is really outside the realm of money and material preparation. Its solution is in conviction and belief, in readiness and discipline—in those things that need to be done by the population to save itself.

That represents our view and that is equally the view of Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom.

Before I announce our financial arrangements pursuant to a recent dominion-provincial conference I should like to say this in view of what was said here tonight by one or two members. There has been the fullest co-operation between the two senior levels of government. I do not say that every province has agreed with the decision we have taken. One province, namely the province of Quebec, has co-operated by coming to the meetings and has taken its part in our planning at the centre. It has acted as the distributing agency for much educational material which we have provided. But it has taken the position that it does not propose to spend any of its own money in assisting municipalities in the matter of civil defence.

In the province of Ontario, the provincial government there took the position that the new formula which I am going to refer to in a few moments was one to which they could not accede. They did not propose to make any grants themselves to any municipalities. By way of parentheses I should explain that under the present financial arrangement we are not able to make any grants direct to the municipalities unless the province also makes a grant. The result is that certain municipalities who have their own budget and who have been carrying on without provincial help have for that reason not been receiving any direct assistance from the federal government.

[Mr. Martin.]

In the case of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, they have not been receiving any money from the provincial governments. Nevertheless, in the province of Ontario no one should conclude that that province is not concerning itself seriously with civil defence. We may have our differences of opinion. That is natural with any group. We may have our differences of opinion as to whether a particular effort is more desirable than another. But in the province of Ontario there are over 200 communities which have a civil defence organization in various stages of development.

The hon. member for Lincoln tonight referred to his own city of St. Catharines. He was perfectly justified in doing so because it is a most outstanding example. In that community there are 2,200 civil defence workers. The community provides its own budget. Their civil defence director, who works at the job day and night, is doing so on a voluntary basis. The result of his efforts is seen in the picture which the hon. member for Lincoln so ably outlined tonight.

In Ontario the provincial government has taken the position that at this time it does not propose to make grants to the municipalities directly. I am sure however that it would be prepared to accept moneys from the federal government to assist the municipalities. Incidentally about $250,000 is now being spent in the province of Ontario. Most of that money is being spent in a program of standardization of hose couplings—a program costing over $1 million—to which the federal government has contributed roughly one-third. A program of standardization of hose couplings is, of course, an extremely important item in the development of a civil defence program. In addition to that, they have an administrative budget which provides for the services of their administrator who said the other day in Sudbury that just as soon as Ontario's standardization of hose couplings program has been completed, it is the hope that Ontario will give consideration to further provincial funds being made available in support of civil defence.

I should like to say that within the past ten days I have had a chat with the premier of the province of Ontario. From my conversation with him I am satisfied that we shall be able to work out, within the formula to which I shall later refer, a satisfactory arrangement supplemental to that now being carried on in the province of Ontario. It is wrong to assume that the only kind of assistance the federal government has given to the provinces with regard to civil defence is in the matter of matching grants.

The only matching grants that exist thus far represent a sum of about $1,400,000. The rest of the expenditures last year, provision for sirens, provision for certain civil defence equipment, civil defence clothing and all that sort of thing, represents not a grant to the municipalities or provinces on a matching basis but an outright grant paid entirely by the federal government. For instance, there is no matching provision with respect to our civil defence school at Arnprior. We have trained over 4,000 individuals there who have come from all over Canada at federal expense and have been maintained in the college at federal expense. The 4,000 people trained in that college, now under the direction of General Penhale, have provided among others the civil defence co-ordinators throughout the country. These in turn have trained another 40,000 people.

That represents a very substantial contribution entirely by the federal government. Then there is the matter of films, pamphlets and folders. All that sort of thing is done entirely by the federal government, and these things are given to the provinces as the distributing agencies. When civil defence was established in Canada it was done on the basis that this was a federal state and that we had to work with the provinces. That was what the provinces wanted; that is what the provinces want today. In each province there is a civil defence minister. He is the agent through whom we address ourselves to the municipalities, and it seems to me, having in mind the character of civil defence in Canada, that is the kind of pattern we should follow.

In the fiscal year 1954-55 we propose, in addition to the things the federal government does for which it pays 100 per cent and which represent more than two-thirds of the federal expenditure, to make available $2 million which will be available to the provinces and the municipalities under the matching grant program for approved civil defence projects. To indicate the distribution of these grants to the provinces perhaps I might be allowed to put on Hansard a statement showing what this will mean to each province compared with the moneys made available to them in 1953-54. May I have the permission of the committee to have these figures put on Hansard?

The Chairman: Has the minister leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: The table is as follows:

| | 1954-55 | 1953-54 |
|---|---|---|
| Newfoundland | $ 45,863.17 | $ 32,978 |
| Prince Edward Island | 10,827.18 | 7,874 |
| Nova Scotia | 92,128.19 | 65,696 |
| New Brunswick | 63,777.00 | 45,956 |
| Quebec | 603,375.16 | 433,081 |
| Ontario | 692,035.92 | 492,008 |
| Manitoba | 117,285.72 | 83,367 |
| Saskatchewan | 91,490.08 | 66,538 |
| Alberta | 118,921.86 | 85,545 |
| British Columbia | 187,271.78 | 132,616 |

From this table it will be seen that in the province of Quebec, for instance, the province could receive this year $603,000 odd for the purpose of carrying out projects on a matching basis. Last year they could have received $433,000 odd. Last year Ontario could have received $492,000 and under the new arrangement this year will receive $692,000. I will not deal with the figures for each province because it would take too much time. I have taken the two larger provinces. Perhaps I might take Alberta because in Alberta I think they have done, as have other provinces, an outstanding job. Last year we made available to the province of Alberta $85,000 under this matching arrangement. This year they will get $118,000.

In order to ensure the most effective utilization of these funds, an entirely new formula has been worked out in co-operation with the provinces, and as the result of a dominion-provincial conference held in this building about two weeks ago. This formula will permit federal aid to municipalities undertaking civil defence projects, regardless of whether or not provincial assistance is available. The federal grant to municipalities, however, can be increased up to double the basic amount for any project for which provincial aid is also available.

Under the revised formula of civil defence expenditures will be broken down into the following six classifications:

1. Organization and administration.

2. Training, equipment and operations.

3. Warning communications and other civil defence equipment for which there is no peacetime use.

4. Construction for civil defence purposes such as control centres.

5. Civil defence operational equipment having a peacetime use.

6. Purchase of clothing, including uniforms, for civil defence workers.

As a matter of policy, not more than one-quarter of the total provincial quota will normally be allocated to any one of the six main divisions of civil defence expenditure. This, we hope, will have the effect of developing a well advanced and well balanced program. For projects falling within the first four expenditure groups, which include civil defence services having no direct peacetime application, the federal government will contribute a minimum of 25 per cent of the cost of any approved project regardless of whether a provincial grant is made. In addition, the federal government will also match any provincial contribution to the same project up to an over-all maximum of 50 per cent of the total cost. Thus, for projects supported by all three governments, the costs will be shared as follows: 50 per cent by the federal government, 25 per cent by the provincial government and 25 per cent by the municipal government.

That, basically, is the pattern of assistance given civil defence operations by the central government in Great Britain to the municipal bodies in the United Kingdom. For expenditures falling within the last two classifications, those having a peacetime value, the arrangements will be the same as in the past. The federal government in that case will match dollar for dollar any provincial contributions.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich noted progress over last year and I am sure he would want me to supplement that by noting that our 1954-55 budget for civil defence, $6,500,000, is more than five times the combined budgets of the provincial governments which total $848,000 and the twenty-two municipal corporate target areas which represent a total of $386,000. Total provincial and municipal expenses to date represent a figure of about $1,234,000.

The hon. member for Greenwood said to me that I should tell the house the situation exactly as we see it, and that is what I am seeking to do. Before I take my seat, I wish to state that within the past month we have asked the provincial authorities to give us their latest figures on the extent of civil defence organization throughout the country. All of them have reported to us, and the figure totals some 163,000 individuals in 600 different communities, in varying phases of organization, undoubtedly some good, some not as good and some that cannot be commended at all.

I think I can say in fairness, because I am close to the situation in the United States through being a member of the United States-Canadian committee, and because of what Sir John Hodsoll has said, that this is comparable to the United Kingdom and is better than the United States. In terms of contributions, our financial contributions represent roughly 47 cents per capita whereas those of the United States represent roughly 29 cents per capita. Therefore I think I can say in all honesty that we are building what the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said was our role now, a nuclear organization in as many areas of the country as we think that should be done. We are providing the basic organization. I am sure that at this time we could get more people to enrol. We could have more excitement, more agitation. We could do what they do in some other places, have signs in hotels and all that sort of thing indicating extraordinary activity.

We have decided that the course that we are taking is the wisest course. It is based upon our assessment of the likelihood of the danger. We could be wrong and, as the hon. member for Greenwood said, if we were wrong I would certainly be the individual who would feel the consequences of that error more than anyone else. I can only say that I feel we are proceeding on the right basis. I feel that what has been said here tonight will help us greatly in the continued difficult task which is ours in co-operation with all provinces and municipalities, the task of building up a practical, sensible organization which will be capable of effective operation when needed.

Mr. Drew: I start by mentioning the fact that even before the minister had stopped discussing the subject that he has described as being one of such utmost importance, I hear a number of hon. members opposite impatiently shouting "carried". I would suggest that those who are impatient in regard to the discussion of civil defence might have read a book, if they have not already done so, under the title of "Tomorrow", by Wylie. If they did, they would have a rather clearer picture of what would happen in this country if there were a bombing attack under the ineffective method now in force.

The emphasis the minister has placed on the statements he has made has not given them any more effectiveness. When the minister talks about our situation being comparable to that in the United Kingdom, he starts by immediately disregarding the recommendations made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. He overlooks the tremendous importance of the suggestion made that there should be a civil defence act in Canada. We start with the fact our position is not comparable in any way with that in the United Kingdom.

I was surprised when the minister quoted from words used by the President of the United States in certain formal statements to congress, and then went on to say that this represents the position in Britain; that is not correct. In Britain civil defence is under the government at Westminster, and is under the civil defence act. The government at Westminster recognized that civil defence is the problem of the national government.
