If we are to take it in terms of money, let us see the difference between the approach to this problem in Britain and here in Canada. The estimates for 1952-53 in Britain for civil defence amounted to £45,600,000. At the present value of the pound, and having regard to the difference in population, that would be over $40 million allocated by the central government of Canada to deal with this problem. I am not, for one, advocating any reckless, loose expenditure. Most certainly I am not recommending that expenditures be made except in conformity with a clearly understood plan.

However, let us see how far short we are from the position in Britain. Under the civil defence act in Britain they are actually dealing with the possible organization that might be involved in the event of disaster. After all, that is what every one of us must recognize to be the purpose of this organization, little though we like to contemplate it. Under the civil defence act in the United Kingdom the work is divided under various departments of government, and those responsibilities would be assumed by several ministers and would be taken over by them in the event of the emergency. Those ministries now are training for their responsibilities. Thus, under the civil defence act we find several ministries that would be jointly responsible for civil defence in the event of an emergency.

Those ministries are as follows: home office; ministry of health; ministry of housing and local government; ministry of food; ministry of transport; ministry of education; ministry of works; ministry of labour and national service; general post office; ministry of supply; board of trade; ministry of fuel and power; national assistance board; ministry of national insurance; ministry of agriculture and fisheries. There is opposite each one of those ministries a clear allocation of responsibility. Merely as an example I quote what we find in the case of the ministry of housing and local government. These are the civil defence functions:

> Evacuation, billeting or rehousing of persons made homeless by enemy action; information centres for the public; the disposal of the dead; repairs of damaged houses, demolition of unsafe buildings; the maintenance of water supplies and sewage services.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the allocation of tasks to only one department of all these several departments I have mentioned to which tasks have been allocated under this civil defence act of 1948 in Britain.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this subject has not yet been approached in an atmosphere of reality. There are civil defence acts in this country, some of the provinces have them. But when the minister speaks about the fact that there is co-operation with each province, how good will that informal co-operation be if under any unhappy circumstances we should suddenly be confronted with actual bombing?

Mr. Martin: I am sure my hon. friend would agree it is very important to try to have as much co-operation as one can?

Mr. Drew: I agree, and I agree also that it is wise to have accurate information. The minister will recall that just after he told us Ontario had accepted the proposals of this government in April last, on April 29 the minister responsible for civil defence in Ontario said that no such arrangements existed. These are the words he is reported to have used:

> Ontario and Quebec definitely did not agree to the proposal. We told the federal officials we were not interested in the scheme. We do not intend to saddle our municipalities with all kinds of new expenditures.

There, Mr. Chairman, is the crux of the whole problem. By a steady process of centralization this government has left the municipalities without any flexibility of taxing powers. Yet by this course of action they have been imposing upon the municipalities the main responsibility for the burden of preparing for civil defence. Whatever may be said in any other country, let us deal with Canada. There is not an hon. member in this house who is in any way intimately associated with municipal affairs today who does not know that the municipalities have not the flexibility of resources, and have not now the financial power to meet the demands that would be imposed upon them.

There is another reason why they should not be asked to do this, and why this should be dealt with in this parliament under a civil defence act which would actually recognize the problem. We know quite well that Montreal and Toronto are the largest centres, and with their concentration of industrial production would require the greatest measure of organization. And yet according to the words of the minister himself, the city of Toronto is devoting less to that purpose than many of the smaller municipalities. Here in the city of Ottawa there might be some of us who might have a personal interest in the effectiveness of a civil defence organization. And my impression is that there is no substantial measure of a civil defence organization within the present framework of what is being done.

Mr. Martin: If I might interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, I would say that that is true in the city of Ottawa as such. But in the federal service in 37 buildings there are civil servants to the number of 4,200 who are engaged in civil defence work, and of that 4,200 I can say that 1,900 have been fully trained.

Mr. Drew: Then the minister has just answered the proposition or explained the soundness of my argument. Here in Ottawa they have found it necessary to improvise an organization because of the ineffectiveness of his general plan. And he has himself supported that argument by pointing out that they have under their control civil servants in the government who have set up something which he believes is in the nature of an effective organization, and which is only possible because of that control, and which is in spite of, not because of, the general plan laid down by the government. That is exactly the situation which exists across the country.

Mr. Martin: I still have hopes of Charlotte.

Mr. Drew: I would imagine that in the city of Ottawa there has been considerable evidence of the reason why the mayor of Ottawa does not display the same confidence in the government, or even the same hope as has been expressed by the minister and, I should say, with considerable justification, in view of the abundance of justification in other respects in connection with the Municipal Grants Act.

But, to come back to the problem before us, let us just see how completely unreal this plan is. We all know that seaports are in a peculiarly hazardous position. We all know that the most likely manner in which seaports would be likely to be attacked would be by bombs carried in ships, not by air. We know that a seaport is a primary target. Why should a seaport of, let us say, 100,000 population, be shouldered with very special defence requirements and expenditure, and another city of 100,000, which may be far better able to spend the money, not be called upon, or not be in the strategic position that suggests any comparable form of civil defence?

No one surely would suggest that there is any similarity or that there is not a great difference between the nature of the civil defence program that might be regarded as desirable in some of the cities such as Noranda, Sudbury, Niagara Falls, Trail, Kitimat and Arvida, as compared with other cities of the same size, perhaps, but without any similarly so far as a target would be concerned. Why should those municipalities be shouldered with a very special responsibility of organizing their civil defence and paying for it; or why should the province whose finances are also limited be called upon to pay for those special arrangements?

No, this situation has no reality; and it is not comparable most certainly in any way to the situation in the United Kingdom under their civil defence act which lays down plans for the period of what we hope will be continuing peace, but which also lays down detailed plans to meet the eventuality for which the act is designed if, unhappily, civil defence should have to be used.

The minister is well aware that neither the government of Ontario nor the government of Quebec nor the governments of the other provinces agree with the proposals that have been put forward. And there have been positive proposals put before this government; and I would like to indicate what they are. I suggest they are worthy of consideration by this House of Commons, and that something should be incorporated in a civil defence act passed by the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada which would deal effectively with them.

One of the important things is of course the recruitment of personnel. The recruitment of personnel involves expense. The more vulnerable targets such as an aluminum centre, a power centre, a nickel centre or automobile centres such as Oshawa and Windsor, or any other centre that has a high war potential or defence potential, would be called upon to make more than ordinary preparations. Specially high recruitment calls for intense organization.

One of the suggestions made was that for every registered member of a local civil defence organization there should be a specific grant by the federal government that would relate directly to the number of registered and trained civil defence workers. It would have a sense of reality in relation to the needs of the particular communities, depending upon their strategic significance.

Another point that was greatly emphasized was the importance of abandoning large defence buildings, or large defence centres. In fact the contention has been made—and I believe it is sound—that it is unwise to spend money on civil defence headquarters located right in the centre of communities, because when those communities become targets the whole civil defence structure would be paralysed right away. Emphasis has been placed upon the desirability of having the organization apart from the perimeter of target areas.

In fact the argument has been put forward that there be fire-fighting equipment with flexible mobile units also operating from the perimeter of threatened areas, so that in the event of threatened areas becoming targets in an area they could be served by such mobile units. This would follow the plan in operation in the United Kingdom at this time.

Also there is the tremendous need emphasized by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich for those who are trained in the handling of crowds, who are trained in organized plans for evacuation, and for the handling of traffic under pressure. Those who have seen from the air the crowds which attend the running of the Queen's Plate, or similar events in other parts of Canada, will realize that there are those who are called upon to specialize in that particular type of traffic organization.

Then, fire and panic are two of the most serious considerations. Panic is not the least of these, as is so tragically portrayed with such terrible realism in this book to which I have referred.

Surveys of roads should be made under the authority of the federal government. Such a survey of roads should not be a superficial matter; it should be a definite, positive and complete survey, with pickets allotted and stationed at key points along those roads to deal with the results of fire and the possibility of panic or overcrowding on the highway.

Then, there is not merely evacuation, in the sense of moving people, there is also the very real problem of the evacuation of older people, people who are not able to move around themselves.

All this calls for something of a much more central measure of authority than now exists.

I submit that, in their order, fire fighting, traffic control and welfare are the things that need to be brought under some over-all federal plan; by all means with the co-operation of the provinces, by all means with the co-operation of the municipalities, but under an act of parliament that recognizes that this is a national problem.

Again I come back to the question of finances. To do these things the municipalities are simply incapable at this time of shouldering the burdens that would be imposed upon them; so also are the provincial governments. As was said by the Hon. Arthur Welsh, the minister in the Ontario government who is responsible for this matter: Ontario and Quebec are not going to saddle their municipalities with all kinds of new expenditures.

It does not mean a lack of co-operation; it means that they are facing the realities of the problems before them. No one questions the earnestness with which those associated with this work have been carrying on their work. Those who know him personally, as well as those who know him merely by reputation, would have no hesitation in expressing their admiration of the work by General Worthington under extremely difficult circumstances, and under extremely frustrating conditions. I may say that those who know General Penhale will be sure of his ability to perform the tasks that he has been called upon to carry out.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: These childish interruptions that do not find their way on to the pages of Hansard such as I just heard from the minister opposite, are not in keeping with the seriousness of this subject. The interjection was not made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I want to make that clear. The minister who made the interjection is the one who has a habit of doing so under all circumstances when he is in the house.

Mr. Abbott: I cannot resist it.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Finance cannot resist being childish in regard to an important subject such as this. But, Mr. Chairman, as was put forward very simply before, this is either a serious subject or it is not. If it is a serious subject, as has been emphasized by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, then let us have a civil defence act that will operate throughout the whole of Canada. There will be no hesitation about the acceptance of the proposition that effective civil defence is a national problem.

Let this government encourage enlistment by an adequate contribution for each registered and trained member of the local civil defence organization. Let there be a co-ordination of activities with the utmost co-operation by the provincial governments and the municipalities, with finances adequate for the purpose.

Let us be quite sure about one thing in suggesting that the federal government accept this responsibility. If the task has to be done, it is not going to cost any more if the burden is shouldered by this government than if it is carried by the other governments which by this government have been deprived of their taxing powers. If it is going to be done at all, it is going to cost the same amount whoever does it. Therefore the government which is the only government that can co-ordinate these activities can do so on a national basis. We agree with the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Saanich.

Mr. Abbott: Wrong again.

Mr. Drew: Esquimalt-Saanich; this is a subject that should be kept on a civil basis, because it is, as the name implies, civil defence. The fact that it is civil defence and that the voluntary co-operation of civilians should be sought in no way deprives this problem of its national character; and even though at this stage new legislation might not be possible, we would at least be dealing with this subject now. If we had the assurance of the minister that at the next session there would be a civil defence act introduced I assure the minister that he would find general support throughout the house for that proposal.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

The Chairman: When the committee considered this department last we were discussing resolution 515. Shall the resolution carry?

Item agreed to.

War veterans allowances and other benefits—

517. War veterans allowances, $27,365,500.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this item provides for the payment of war veterans allowances. When the minister dealt with this subject on June 17 he had this to say, as found at page 6195 of Hansard:

I could not see how a major change could be made in this legislation—

He was of course dealing with the war veterans allowance legislation. I continue:

—which would break the ties that have existed between war veterans allowances and old age pensions, a relationship which has always existed between those two pieces of legislation.

That statement by the minister is inaccurate in view of the changes that have been made in the old age pension legislation. I would ask him to clarify how he justifies making the statement that there are those strong ties that have existed between war veterans allowances and old age pensions.

As the committee knows, some years ago the old age pension was changed to old age security, and it is payable automatically without any means test to everyone who reaches the age of 70 years. There is no ceiling whatever on the earnings or income that a recipient of old age security may have. In view of these changes I wish the minister would explain just what connection there now is between the war veterans allowance and old age security.

I point out to him that in addition to the payment of $40 a month which is made automatically by the dominion government, some of the provincial governments add a supplement. I believe British Columbia and Alberta pay an additional $15 which of course brings the payment to a larger amount than the war veterans allowance recipient gets.

In view of the emphasis the minister places on this fact that there is this very strong tie between the war veterans allowance and the old age pension, I believe that in justice to the veterans of this country he should explain just how he reaches the conclusion that there is such a tie.

Then, with regard to the old age assistance, as distinct from old age security, that assistance is on a means test basis and it is paid at the age of 65. If there is to be any parallel between that type of payment and the war veterans allowance then the latter allowance should be made at the age of 55 instead of 60. Then, the old age assistance is quite unlike old age security for in the former case one-half is paid by the dominion and the other half by the provinces. There is provision for additional payment by some of the provinces. I believe the two provinces I have mentioned, British Columbia and Alberta, bring the old age assistance payment up to $55 a month, subject of course to a means test.

But I have instanced those two types of old age pension, first, the old age security and then the old age assistance, and I wish the minister would explain just what he means when he says that the war veterans allowance must remain tied to the old age pension. In view of the facts I have outlined I think there is very little connection left between payments to the front-line troops and either one of these old age payments.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I believe there is very little I can add to what I have already said on this particular matter regarding the relationship between the war veterans allowance, and what used to be known as the old age pension, now known as old age assistance, and the old age security payments. In my remarks the other day I mentioned that the history of this relation had been made very clear by the hon. member for Acadia, and I know that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is as familiar as I am, if not more so, with the history of war veterans allowance.

I explained the other day, as I have on other occasions, that the war veterans allowance was instituted in an attempt to make available to those who could qualify under the terms of the act the same kind of benefits as a citizen could draw under the Old Age Pensions Act and that ever since the act was instituted in 1930, there has always been a relation between the payments made under the two separate acts. When the amount of the old age pension was raised from $20 to $30 and then $40 the same increases were made in the war veterans allowance, and the ceilings which were incorporated in the acts as regards permissible income have always borne a relation with each other. I think if the hon. member will look up the debate which took place when this act was first brought before parliament he will find I am justified in making this assertion.

Mr. Green: This point is of the utmost importance because the minister based his whole case for refusing to give any further consideration to war veterans allowance on the fact that the war veterans allowance must be tied to the old age pension. That is the basis for the government's refusal to do anything about the War Veterans Allowance Act. Now, I have no intention of pursuing the matter further tonight beyond pointing out that when the old age pension was put on an automatic basis it was made payable without a means test to everyone in Canada who reached the age of 70. When that was done that pension no longer had any connection with the war veterans allowance.

Veterans should be treated on an entirely different basis. The claim of those fighting men to war veterans allowance should not be tied down to any old age security payment or old age assistance payment and the whole war veterans allowance picture should be treated on its own merits rather than there being an attempt made to tie it up with the old age pension because it is no longer connected with that; furthermore, as I pointed out the other night, the claim of these men to consideration on the part of the Canadian government rests on far stronger ground than the claim of the civilian because it is based on their willingness to give their lives for their country.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, there is no intention on my part to delay the passage of the minister's estimates by repeating arguments already advanced by several of my colleagues. I concur wholly in their observations with respect to the inadequacy of the amount paid. Moreover, I concur in their argument that the income ceilings are altogether too low. I also concur wholly in the observation made by my colleague the hon. member for Acadia, namely, that when a veteran in receipt of war veterans allowance reaches the age of 60 the means test should be abolished. After all, it is nothing more than a recognition of the principle that the veteran has a prior right at the age of 60.

There are two other matters to which I would like to refer briefly. The first relates to the widows of imperial veterans. Under the regulations as they stand today an imperial veteran resident in Canada for a period of 20 years becomes eligible for the war veterans allowance. Should he die subsequent to the receipt of the war veterans allowance his widow is entitled to an allowance. However, the situation which has come to my attention in my own constituency is that there are a number of imperial veterans, or possibly I should say there were, who died after having resided in Canada for a period of 19 years or 19 years 6 months. Because of the death of that imperial veteran before he established his residential qualification his wife is entirely without benefit. I consider that to be wholly unfair. Had the imperial veteran lived an additional six months or one year he would have qualified and upon his death his wife would have qualified for that benefit. Surely it is only fair and proper that we should recognize the existence of the imperial veteran's widow once she has herself established a 20-year residence in Canada. I urge the minister and the government to give favourable consideration to that particular problem. The mere fact that such cases have come to my attention in my own constituency does not mean that the only widows so affected are in my constituency. There must be a number of them all across Canada.

Secondly, with respect to the amount paid to the recipient of war veterans allowance and the allowable maximum income, I would point out to the minister that there are two types of veterans who are in receipt of this allowance. One is the person who, not being eligible for a pension, should be made eligible for a pension but has not been able to convince the commission that his disability was attributable to war service or aggravated thereby. He may be wholly incapacitated with the result that, if he is a single man, his income is limited to $600 a year. If he is a married man his income is limited to $1,080 a year. But if he is a recipient of war veterans allowance and is not wholly incapacitated, being single he receives $600 a year plus whatever he is able to earn over and above the $600, of course providing that the maximum does not exceed the allowable maximum. I think the government would be justified in establishing a sliding scale of benefits.

Ordinarily I would be hesitant about suggesting that you take recipients of war veterans allowance and put them in two categories. But certainly you are justified in taking the recipient of war veterans allowance who is wholly incapacitated and allowing him more by way of basic allowance than you would allow a man who suffers a 50 per cent or a 25 per cent disability and is able to earn sufficient to bring him up to the total maximum allowable income under the act. I say to the minister that I think the government would be completely justified in establishing a sliding scale of benefits taking into consideration the physical condition of the recipient and also taking into consideration, in the light of his disability, his earning power.

I therefore make this suggestion to the minister. I could take my full 40 minutes in relation to this matter, but I do not intend to do so. Before another session of parliament rolls around I hope the minister and his department and the government will give favourable consideration to the widow of the imperial veteran and to the recipient of war veterans allowance.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, my support, like that of all the private members of this house, for an increase in the war veterans allowance and for the other changes proposed by the Canadian Legion, is well known and I do not need to take any further time tonight to spell it out. There is, however, just one thing I should like to say.

Inevitably we in this house follow the newspapers, particularly the articles that are written as to what is happening in the House of Commons and what may yet happen. It seems to me that of late our friends in the press gallery have all indulged in a good deal of prophecy, each of them trying to see if he could ring the bell. There is one member of the press gallery who received recognition a short while ago for his accuracy in forecasting the results of the federal election of last August. I notice that that member of the press gallery—I refer to Mr. Alex Hume —wrote a story just a few days ago. I believe it appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday. In it he said that there are already 17 items of business on the list for the next session of parliament. Knowing Mr. Hume's record and his reputation for being a fairly good prophet, I looked through that list with keen interest. I dared to hope that amongst those 17 items there would be included something indicating his belief that action would be taken to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act at the next session. The other night the Minister of Veterans Affairs, as reported at page 6197 of Hansard of June 17, 1954, said this:

> I can assure hon. members that the recommendations made by the veterans affairs committee to the effect that this matter should be considered with sympathy by the government will receive the attention of my colleagues and myself.

Despite that assurance that this recommendation would be given consideration, Mr. Hume did not find it possible to include in his forecast of items already on the list for the next session the possibility of something being done about the War Veterans Allowance Act. I could hope that that was an oversight on his part. I hope it is not because of his knowing what is going on. If it is, I hope the government will change its mind. If it is not going to do something about this matter at this session I hope it will do something about it in the very early stages of the next session of parliament.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous payments—

521. To provide for payments to the Last Post fund; for the payment under regulations of funeral and cemetery charges; for the cost and erection of headstones in Canada; for the maintenance of departmental cemeteries; for the maintenance of Canadian battlefields memorials in France and Belgium and for Canada's share of the expenditures of the imperial war graves commission, $1,503,400.

Mr. Nicholson: I have been waiting for some months to express my thanks to the minister for the courtesy that was extended to me by his officers when I was in Europe last year. Colonel Alan Chambers who was in charge of the D.V.A. office in London was kind enough to make arrangements so that I could visit the Vimy memorial and some of the other cemeteries in France. Those who have not seen the Vimy memorial have missed visiting one of the finest memorials anywhere. It was designed by Walter S. Allward, of Toronto. Those who go to Vimy from all parts of the world have been very kind in the references they have made in the guest book there.

I think a special word of appreciation should be paid to Mr. Paul Piroson and Madame Piroson for the outstanding work they have done in looking after the memorial. I am sure that the relatives of soldiers who were buried in France and in Europe during the first or the second world war would receive a good deal of comfort from visiting any of these cemeteries. I do not know of any cemeteries in Canada that are kept in as good condition as are the cemeteries that I visited last fall. I merely want to thank the minister for the courtesy extended to me by his officers and to express appreciation for the outstanding work that is being done there by those who are looking after the cemeteries.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I just want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that I do not think the regulations concerning payments from the Last Post fund are sufficiently publicized. I am repeatedly running into people in the Legion and veterans and their dependents who are not aware of the regulations under which payments are made. I would suggest that something be done to bring again to the attention of Legion branches and people interested the regulations in connection with the Last Post fund and under what conditions payment is made for the burial of the dead.

Mr. Dinsdale: On May 4 I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question concerning the record of the burial plot for Canadian servicemen buried in war graves overseas. At that time the particular point I raised was that $1.25 was being charged for a copy of the entry in the cemetery and memorial registers which gave details of the plot. The minister indicated that this charge of $1.25 was in payment for pamphlets, books and other printed material issued by the imperial war graves commission to each of the cemeteries in which commonwealth forces are buried. At the time I did not pursue the matter further because I wanted to be sure of the facts.

I have discovered that the charge is not for descriptive pamphlets, books, et cetera, but is for the specific registration of the individual serviceman involved. A prepared form is sent out to the family of the deceased veteran asking them if they would like to pay $1.25 for this specific individual registry which describes the plot record of their member of the family. I am sure the minister has inquiries from time to time concerning the graves overseas.

I know that as a private member of the house I have had several anxious inquiries from constituents who have a loved one buried in one of these war cemeteries overseas. The suggestion has been put forward that some assistance might be given to make it possible for mothers of deceased personnel to make a pilgrimage to the graves of their sons. I do not know whether that suggestion has ever been considered seriously by the department, but it comes to me frequently enough to make me wonder if it is feasible at all. I would suggest that the charge of $1.25 for the individual record is perhaps going a little too far. Members of the families of deceased personnel would like to have the information, and they resent very much having to pay $1.25 for that record. Has the minister any further comment?

Mr. Lapointe: As I mentioned at the time the hon. member brought this question before the house, these books to which the hon. member refers contain not only the names of all ex-servicemen of the commonwealth who may be buried in a particular cemetery. There is also a histoy of the cemetery and the campaigns that took place in that particular region which brought about the setting up of the cemetery. They include the names of every man buried there. But I should like to remind the hon. member that every next-of-kin is advised and receives an official notice which is the official registration—I do not know whether I am using the right word—of the plot in the cemetery where the particular ex-serviceman is buried together with a photograph of the grave. That of course is provided free of charge and every next-of-kin has received this except of course in the cases of ex-servicemen who have no known graves, who were lost.

However, the other publication is in the nature of a historical document which is published by the imperial war graves commission. At the present time all cemeteries have not been so covered, but I understand it is their plan to do so and I also understand that the same practice was followed after the first war. The same practice is followed in connection with all imperial war graves cemeteries all over the world.

Mr. Dinsdale: My reason for rising is that I have discovered that it is not a booklet but an individual record of the individual grave. I have checked with the war graves commission and I have checked with the parties who first complained to me. It is not a book of historical facts concerning the grave. It is a prepared form sent out to the next-of-kin asking if they would like this individual registration and is not a book of history.

Mr. Lapointe: If my hon. friend will permit me, it is quite true that a form is sent to every next-of-kin. I have only seen one of these cemetery registers because up to now only one has been received by the Canadian secretary of the imperial war graves commission. It was passed on to me, and the description I have given my hon. friend of that publication is exactly as I have said. I am sorry I have not a copy with me because I could show it to him. It is a booklet about 8 inches by 6 inches containing about fifty pages. It gives the history of the cemetery, the campaigns in that area, and finally the name of every man buried there together with pictures of the cemetery and the surrounding district. I will be very glad to pass it on to my hon. friend so that he may judge for himself.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have a copy of the form which refers to the specific index. I have not got it with me now, but I think perhaps we had better have an exchange of forms. If the minister will send me his I will send him mine and I think he will find it is not a booklet. It identifies one specific grave with the name, location of the cemetery and so on.

Mr. Montgomery: With respect to this point, the other day I received a letter in response to which I wrote for further information. I thought I would have it before these estimates were discussed. How soon does the mother or wife receive a photograph of the grave as was mentioned by the minister a moment ago? The minister mentioned that the next-of-kin receives a photograph of the grave or tombstone. How long is it before that is received?

Mr. Lapointe: I am afraid I could not say exactly. As my hon. friend undoubtedly knows, when the cemeteries were first established they were provided with wooden crosses. These are now being replaced by headstones, and my understanding is that the photograph is sent only after the headstone has been installed. Furthermore, when the headstones were first placed in Canadian cemeteries the designations of the individual units to which the ex-servicemen belonged were not inscribed. In other words, someone who had been killed while serving with an infantry regiment would have his name and the initials "C.I.C.", Canadian Infantry Corps. Representations were made to the imperial war graves commission that the Canadian regiments and the Canadian public generally felt that they would like to see the designation of the unit to which the men belonged placed on the headstones in these cemeteries. In many cases the headstones had to be taken away and are being replaced with new headstones on which appears the designation of the unit of the ex-serviceman. There again you have a reason for the delay in sending these photographs. But a definite program is being followed that each next-of-kin will receive a photograph of the grave of the buried ex-serviceman.

Mr. Montgomery: That answers my question partly. It may be that the information I received was not quite correct. This person had received a letter asking for $2, and the information was not given me whether the letter came from Ottawa or overseas. They were asked for $2 for a picture of the grave and tombstone, and I had the idea that they were to get them free. I understand from the minister now that that is true, that when the grave is completed and the tombstone is finally in place they will get them free.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Lennard: What kind of racket is going on?

Mr. Lapointe: That is my understanding, and I have never heard of a change being made. If my hon. friend has a specific case I wish he would bring it to my personal attention and I will look into it.

Mr. Montgomery: If I get further information, I will.

Item agreed to.

Canadian pension commission—

523. Administration expenses, $2,202,908.

Mr. Churchill: This item concerns the pension commission. In reading the report of the Department of Veterans Affairs I was endeavouring to examine the statistics concerning the number of cases that came before the Canadian pension commission, and I found that I had to look at pages 40 and 41, where the veterans bureau reported, and then on pages 69 and 70 where the report of the Canadian pension commission is given. One finds that the figures do not correspond. Might I suggest that these two bodies co-operate in publishing their findings so that there is some relationship between those figures submitted by the two groups. They are both undertaking the same work, and it makes it a little easier for the purpose of one who is investigating if the figures are the same.

I shall give one example. On page 41 appeal board hearings are listed as 1,823, and the Canadian pension commission gives that figure as 1,754. I do not propose to speak at length on this problem, but I should like to repeat what I said earlier this session that I believe the work of the pension commission needs to be reviewed. We have been going on now for years accepting the work of the pension commission without much in the way of criticism. I am not offering any serious criticism at the moment. I believe the work of the commission has been good. I believe the very fact it has been good means that it could stand a detailed review as well as any other department.

The reason I suggest that the work of the Canadian pension commission should be reviewed, and I hope it will be eventually by a standing committee on veterans affairs, is that I feel some of their work is hindered by limitations in the act. It may be hindered by limitations within the pension commission itself, but I do not know. I prefer to think it is because of the act. The reason I put that forward is that I am rather unfavourably impressed by the number of cases which come before the pension commission and end by being rejected. It seems to me there is a weakness here when cases can be heard on many different occasions. There is the matter of hope deferred for the applicant, then the case finally ends in failure. Of course, that is not always the case. There is a survival rate in these cases that come up for several hearings.

Under the pension commission arrangements first war cases may have a first hearing, then a second hearing, followed by the appeal board. Then, world war II cases may have an initial hearing and then several renewals as follows: first renewal, second renewal, third renewal, further renewal and then appeal. Checking the figures on page 41 of the report, I find that on further renewal—this would be second war cases—eight were allowed by the Canadian pension commission, which means that those eight cases were heard on five different occasions. I am rather surprised that in this sifting process a case that is granted on the fifth hearing should not be granted much earlier.

Then the report shows those that were allowed by the Canadian pension commission, having gone through five hearings, and we find 18 of them were allowed. This does not take into account those which, having passed through three, four or five hearings, are subsequently allowed on appeal. It is for that reason I suggest the work of the pension commission might very well be reviewed. Something might be done to enlarge its function in some way so that the applicants would not be put through all this trouble of hearing after hearing before their cases are finally determined.

One thing that might be investigated in reviewing the work of the pension commission is the length of time that is spent in some of these cases. They must consider them for a very long period indeed. I suggest another reason for reviewing the work of the pension commission and that is to discover in what circumstances the benefit of the doubt clause is used. I have been told it enters into every case but I take that with a grain of salt. I know of instances where, in my opinion, the benefit of the doubt clause should have been invoked and was not. This clause was put into the act for the express purpose, as I understand it, of permitting the pension commission to decide marginal cases and allowing the benefit of the doubt where the weight of evidence did not seem to be entirely in favour of the applicant. In many cases the weight of the evidence is not in favour of the applicant, and for many reasons, one being that further evidence could not be brought forward. Why could not the work of the pension commission be reviewed with regard to that and if the act needs to be altered, then let it be altered?

I am finishing my remarks now, but I should like the minister to let me know the qualifications for the appointment of a member of the pension commission.

Mr. Lapointe: My hon. friend asks what are the qualifications for appointment to the pension commission. As he well knows, there is nothing in the act setting out those qualifications. Generally speaking one requires some experience in dealing with veterans affairs, with veterans legislation, with veterans themselves. In other cases professional experience and qualifications have been essential. That at times has been the case since I have been Minister of Veterans Affairs because it has been necessary to appoint commissioners with medical qualifications, coupled with a knowledge of service conditions and experience in dealing with servicemen. Those were the qualifications upon which these commissioners were appointed. Outside of that, I would say it is left entirely to the judgment of the governor general in council, as specified under the act.

Mr. Churchill: I was wondering, Mr. Chairman, whether in appointing the commissioners there was a balance as between the three services? Is the question of active service considered when it comes to the appointment of a commissioner, as well as the branch of the service with which he served? Does the question of the rank a man has occupied during service enter into consideration at all?

Mr. Lapointe: I know that the three services are represented on the commission. I also know that every one of the commissioners has seen active service in a theatre of war.

Mr. Churchill: I hope the minister will take into consideration some of the things I have already said. Then, I would like to add this, that the pension commission has its own internal appeal board. It may look different from what the facts actually are. I would point out that a person may be turned down by the pension commission and then is permitted an appeal. He discovers that the appeal board consists of three of the commissioners who were not originally on his case.

I think what happens from that arrangement is this, that the commissioners are interchanging their cases. For instance three of them may sit on a case and find against it. Then when it comes up for appeal, three of their colleagues would have to hear that appeal while the first three, in their turn, may be hearing an appeal from the three who are now listening to the case the first three originally tried.

There is this danger within a commission, of a group of colleagues passing cases back and forth among themselves. It might well be worthy of consideration to have an appeal board separate and apart from those who are handling these other cases. Has the minister given consideration to that matter at any time?

524. Pensions for disability and death, including pensions granted under the authority of the civilian government employees (war) compensation order, P.C. 45/8848 of November 22, 1944, which shall be subject to the Pension Act; and including Newfoundland special awards, $128,030,500.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is the item for the payment of pensions. During the discussion in committee one weakness came to light which I think could be remedied by a regulation. Some years ago a provision was made under which a veteran who had been wounded could have his pension increased automatically by a certain percentage as he reached different ages. But that did not apply to a pensioner who was getting a pension of 80 per cent or over.

In the committee it was explained that the reason the increases stopped with the veteran who was getting an 80 per cent pension or more was that at that time an 80 per cent pension carried with it an automatic pension for the widow, whether the veteran died of his pensionable disability or not.

In order that the widows of those men who had suffered gunshot wounds should not lose out in case a man died from something different, let us say from a disease of one kind or another, this regulation was brought into effect. As the minister knows, a few years ago that 80 per cent line was reduced to 50 per cent, so that the widow of every 50 per cent pensioner would automatically get a pension on his death, no matter what the cause of death might be.

I do suggest that now it would be fair to make this automatic increase apply to the men who have 80 per cent disability or over. I know for example if a man has his arm off right at the shoulder he cannot get more than 80 per cent, under the present system of assessment, although actually that man as he becomes older is completely disabled. I think a veteran with a wound of that type should be able to qualify for an automatic increase, just as his comrades could do who started out with a 60 per cent instead of an 80 per cent disability.

I think there has been an oversight in this instance in not having the regulation changed at the time that the automatic protection for the widow was reduced in the case of 80 per cent disability to that of 50 per cent disability. I wonder if the minister would give some thought to that situation during the recess, so that it could be remedied by a regulation or by a change in the method of assessment. As I understand it there is no need to have amending legislation.

Mr. Lapointe: I shall be glad most certainly to look into the matter. Of course one would have to consider the purpose of the original regulation. My understanding is that it was given originally for the benefit of the amputees. All these men suffering from gunshot wounds had fixed assessments. A man who had lost his arm at the elbow had a fixed assessment. One who lost his whole arm, or his leg, had a fixed assessment. And as he grew older, although his pensionable disability showed no sign of aggravation—in other words his arm cut off at the elbow was still in the same condition—his general condition, particularly in the case of leg amputees, did deteriorate.

Various conditions were thought to result from an amputation. As he had a fixed assessment of, let us say 60 per cent for the loss of a leg at a certain level, the commission could not increase the disability pension simply in regard to that. To compensate for general deterioration an automatic disability increase was put through in the regulations.

In the case of another sort of disability pensioner, one for instance who might have suffered from a heart condition which was assessed at 30 per cent at the time he was discharged, as the years go by and as his heart condition deteriorates, he returns to the commission and gets a new assessment, which the other man could not obtain. I understand that was the principle which brought about this regulation. However I will be glad to study the point my hon. friend has brought forward.

Mr. Green: The difficulty is that a man who had his arm off at the elbow does get an automatic increase.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Green: But the man who had it off at the shoulder does not get that automatic increase, because he was getting an 80 per cent pension at the start. And there was no provision made for increasing anyone with an 80 per cent pension. But he deserves it just as much as the other chap.

The difficulty was, of course, that the widow of the man who only had his arm off at the elbow could not qualify for pension unless he was getting an 80 per cent pension. Therefore the increases were graduated so that when he got to the top stage he would be getting 80 per cent and his widow would become eligible. But so far as the two men themselves were concerned, the man who had his arm off right at the shoulder does not get any increase at all; he receives no automatic increase.

I do not think that is fair; I think he should receive it. I know of cases where men have that disability and they cannot get more than 80 per cent.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act—

526. To provide for the cost of administration of Veterans' Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $4,907,146.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, although I was not a member of the special committee on veterans affairs I did make it a point to read every word of evidence taken before that committee. While perusing the minutes of the proceedings and evidence for Tuesday, May 25, 1954, I came across this rather interesting exchange of questions and answers. I refer to page 138 of the proceedings, where the hon. member for Acadia asked this question:

I would like to ask Mr. Rutherford one question. Can you tell us how the veterans who were settled on government land in the special areas in the so-called "drought area" are getting on? I am especially interested in that because I know you were a little leery in the first instance about settling any veterans in there but finally under pressure from the veterans themselves you did allow a few to settle in there and I understand they are doing very well.

A. I cannot answer that very definitely, Mr. Quelch. There were a few who did not succeed but those who are there now are getting along very well.

Q. About the same percentage of arrears as the rest of Canada?

A. We have more arrears in the Red Deer region.

Naturally that drew my attention very quickly. I continue:

There are only two other regions which have more arrears than Red Deer. I think this report indicates that Dauphin and Grande Prairie have more than Red Deer. It should not be as bad as it is. I believe Mr. Allam has one at Drumheller.

A person seeing and reading that might well come to a wholly erroneous impression. As hon. members know, I represent the Red Deer constituency and have represented that constituency for more than fourteen years. I have lived in that section of Alberta for a period of twenty-five years. I say without fear of successful contradiction that the Red Deer area is one of the finest mixed farming areas in the whole Dominion of Canada. Settled between Olds and Lacombe are as many if not more veterans settled under V.L.A. than in any comparable area in the Dominion of Canada. I wish to compliment the officials of V.L.A., first for having permitted so many veterans to settle in that area. Second, I wish to compliment them upon exercising a good deal of care in satisfying themselves that the land upon which those veterans were all settled was reasonably good land. Of course I may interject by saying that most of it is, unless you get too far out. But this is a very important thing. We are subjected to natural hazards in that area. We have had some very bad hail years in the Red Deer area. In 1952 many of the farm crops were devastated as a consequence of hail.

I have said in this house before that owing to the regulations under which P.F.A. operates it is extremely difficult for many of the farmers in that area to qualify for P.F.A. benefits. To farm in an area like the Red Deer area is costly, as it is costly in most mixed farming areas. When hail comes along crops are devastated. The individual is faced with the costs involved in the planting of that crop. He is also faced with costs involved in feeding livestock and in procuring seed for the following year.

I know from personal experience two things. The men who are settled under V.L.A. in the Red Deer area are in the main fine types of individuals, anxious to succeed in their chosen occupation. I also pay tribute at this time to the men of V.L.A. in that area who are administering the V.L.A. I know most of those men. I have discussed these matters with them and as one said to me one day, it does seem that for some reason or other the forces of nature pick out these veterans when a hail storm comes through.

I mention that for this reason. I appreciate first the desire of V.L.A. to collect during good years, and we have had some good years. But in assessing good and bad years, for goodness' sake let them not overlook the fact that there may be a bad year in a particular area. In the particular area of Alberta that I represent they have been most unfortunate in the fact that they have had some very bad experiences from the standpoint of hail. I trust that the officials of V.L.A. in Ottawa will pay considerable heed to the advice given to them by the local officials of V.L.A. Do not just simply pick out a sheet and say: Well, here is Red Deer; it is bad compared with the rest of Canada. I am not using that word myself; it is in the evidence. It makes it seem as though it is bad. Do not just simply say: Well, times are good in the country. The picture is reasonably good as far as V.L.A. settlers are concerned, but there is this dark spot in the Red Deer area. I suggest to V.L.A. here that they make a very close examination of the things that happen in a local area before undertaking, as part of their general over-all policy, to put on the pressure during so-called good years.

Let it not be thought, Mr. Chairman, that I am offering one word of defence for the fellow who can pay and will not. I dare say there are some of those even in my own area, but I also dare say that they constitute a very small percentage of the total. I am not standing in defence of those persons. My associations with the V.L.A. boys in the Red Deer area have been what could be described as excellent. They have good men in there. They know conditions. They are trying to do their job well. I only hope that Ottawa, as I said before, will not just simply pick out one sheet after another and say the situation out there is bad; we have to get these boys in Red Deer to put the pressure on. Let them find out why there should be substantial arrears in that area.

I do not believe it is any criticism of V.L.A. at all. I come forth in defence actually in defence of my own area which, as I said at the beginning, is one of the finest mixed farming sections in the Dominion of Canada. I thought probably that anyone reading this evidence might carry away an improper impression and certainly I feel it is my duty, knowing the facts, to make sure that no such incorrect impression is carried away by anyone.

Item agreed to.

528. To provide for the payment of grants to veterans settled on provincial lands in accordance with agreements with provincial governments under section 38 of the Veterans' Land Act and payment of grants to veterans settled on dominion lands, in accordance with an agreement with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources under section 38 of the Veterans' Land Act, $375,000.

Mr. Herridge: This item provides for the payment of grants to veterans settled on provincial lands in accordance with agreements with provincial governments, and is reduced from $575,000 to $375,000, a reduction of $200,000. In view of the explanation given by the director to the committee that there had not been as many veterans taking advantage of this legislation as was expected, I can understand the reduction; but I do hope the administration of the Veterans Land Act does not throw up the sponge in this respect, because I am quite sure that as the years go by there will be more and more veterans settling under these terms. Up to recent years industrial conditions, wages and things of that sort have probably been against it. In addition to that, I do suggest that, particularly in the western provinces, that while we are supposed to have a great deal of land available for settlement it is remarkable how the land available for settlement close to roads and transportation is growing less and less each year. I do hope that the administration makes every effort to co-operate with any provincial government that has land available to try to get them to reserve suitable locations that may be used within the next few years.

Item agreed to.

530. To provide for the reduction of indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement of a settler in respect of a property in his possession, the title of which is held by the director, or such soldier settler loans which are administered by the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, by an amount which will reduce his indebtedness to an amount in keeping with the productive capacity of the property or his ability to repay his indebtedness under regulations approved by the governor in council, $25,000.

Mr. Quelch: This is the item that the hon. member for Battle River always took an intense interest in. It will be recalled that every year he had his annual resolution calling for free title for veterans. I am a little bit concerned to notice this year that the amount of the vote has been reduced from $150,000 to $25,000. I hope that means that now all those soldier settlers have had their outstanding liabilities reduced to an amount which is easily manageable on their part. I hate to hold the committee up, but I should like the assurance from the minister that now all those veterans still settled under the old Soldier Settlement Act have had their liabilities reduced. How many are left?

Mr. Lapointe: Without going into great detail in this matter, I might recall that the last time I made a statement on this question of reduction on soldier settlement debts was on January 27 of this year. At that time, following the speech of the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose, I brought down the number of cases remaining to 134 and that figure has now been reduced to 51, details of which are as follows. Twenty-two eligible contract holders wish to pay off their loan in accordance with their contract; 17 eligible contract holders do not qualify under the provisions of the order in council, that is their circumstances are such that a reduction is not warranted; 12 settlers are eligible and qualify for the reduction but notwithstanding repeated efforts on our part to have them make an acceptable offer they have for various reasons failed to do so. That makes 29 cases remaining to be dealt with. At that time I stated to the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose that I would personally go through the number of remaining files and I would be willing to discuss them with him. I have done so and after studying the record of these 29 cases I cannot help but think the director is right in his decision not to grant these 17 any reduction in debt in view of the circumstances in which they are now living.

Mr. Quelch: Would $25,000 be adequate to reduce the debt?

Mr. Lapointe: Quite adequate.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Legislation.

Mr. Green: I am afraid I will have to call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman. We have got the Department of Veterans Affairs through and we are not prepared to go on with legislation.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, we have succeeded in doing one-half of the work which I outlined for today in my statement on Saturday. Is there any other department the committee is prepared to dispose of if it is not prepared to dispose of legislation?

Mr. Green: I think we should call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall change slightly the program I laid out on Saturday. We will take privy council first and then legislation. Otherwise we will follow the agenda set out on Saturday with this exception that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) completes his estimates he would like to take the supplementary estimates on northern affairs.

It being eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present the second report of the joint committee of both houses on the library of parliament.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): By leave I should like to move:

That this house do now concur in the report of the joint committee on the library of parliament which has just been read.

Motion agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

TABLING OF NOTES EXCHANGED BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to table two copies in English and two copies in French of notes exchanged between the United States ambassador to Canada and myself, on June 7 and June 16, respectively, on the subject of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Hon. members will see from these notes that the United States government, in transmitting copies of the Wiley Act recently adopted by congress, stated that it was anxious to undertake discussions with the Canadian government on the subject of the seaway. Canada is prepared to do so at the earliest date convenient to both governments.

Because it may not be very clear why discussions between the two governments should be held at this time, it might be useful for me to add a few words of explanation. In 1951, the Canadian parliament enacted the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act which allows a Canadian corporation to build the seaway from lake Erie to the port of Montreal in Canadian territory. By exchange of notes dated June 30, 1952, and tabled in parliament on July 1, 1952, Canada and the United States agreed that the power project in the international rapids section should be built jointly by Canada and the United States and that this project should be separated, as far as is possible, from the seaway project. As for the seaway project, the exchange of notes of June 30, 1952, between Canada and the United States embodied an arrangement whereby Canada would build the seaway between lake Erie and the port of Montreal on its side of the boundary. This was, of course, before the passage of the Wiley Act which provided for United States participation.

With the passage of the Wiley Act, the situation could be summed up as follows: Canada is fully empowered by its own legislation to build the seaway from lake Erie to Montreal; an international agreement or arrangement between Canada and the United States has recorded the agreement of both countries to this course of action. However, hon. members will recall that as far back as January 9, 1953, and as late as May 6, 1954, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) declared that the Canadian government was prepared to discuss any specific proposal which the United States government might wish to make, the sense of which would be to vary that portion of the arrangements of June 30, 1952, dealing with the seaway, provided no delay would be caused in the construction of the seaway or power projects, as a result of the consideration of such proposal. Finally, the congress of the United States decided, in May 1954, to build a segment of this seaway entirely within United States territory. Clearly, then, if the object of the Wiley Act is to be achieved, it becomes necessary to hold discussions between Canada and the United States in order to modify the existing arrangements between the governments as contained in the notes of June 30, 1952.

Because of the nature of the arrangements of June 30, 1952, and of undertakings given by Canada, talks must be undertaken soon if they are not to delay the seaway or power projects. Canada accordingly suggested on June 16 that discussions between officials of both governments be held in Ottawa in the week of June 28, for the purpose of preparing specific topics which might form the basis for subsequent intergovernmental discussions. I have not heard yet from the United States ambassador what exact date would be agreeable to his government, but I expect that the talks will get under way in Ottawa in the very near future.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words about this but with particular reference to one source of satisfaction which I feel should be in the mind of every hon. member and every Canadian, that we have reached the point when talks of this kind can take place. Very naturally there has been great emphasis upon the opportunity for larger ships to pass up and down the St. Lawrence to the upper waters of our great inland waterways. Naturally also great emphasis has been placed upon the much needed and immense resources of electric energy which will become available.

I am inclined to think, however, that perhaps one of the most valuable features of the undertaking which is contemplated by this conference is the unique evidence which will be given not merely of our verbal and very real expressions of understanding between Canada and the United States, but of one of the most remarkable and practical examples of international co-operation the world has ever seen, and I am not aware of any similar undertaking along the boundary of any other two nations. As we see that waterway go ahead, as we see the power development take place and the greatly needed horsepower become available for industry and for the farms and homes of this province as well as New York state, let us thank God that two nations can live together, work together, and understand each other as these two nations do.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that up to a certain point I agree with what the Leader of the Opposition has said. As I have said in this house before, I think that under certain foreseeable circumstances it might be better if one or the other of the two countries undertook this project of its own volition. I believe that would prevent any complications in the future. However, discussions are to take place with regard to a joint undertaking. I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government will carry out the pledge given that this co-operation and the preparation for it must involve no unnecessary delay. We have had so many years of discussion about this project that if there is any disposition to delay I think the matter should be proceeded with by Canada. We have the legislation and the government has the authority, and I think the project should be proceeded with by Canada alone if necessary.

I agree with the Leader of the Opposition, however, that the demonstration of the undertaking of a power project on a joint basis is sufficient evidence to the world that two nations can live together side by side with a contiguous boundary and be able to undertake a joint project of this description. However, I hope there will be no delay, and if there is any disposition to delay I hope the government will proceed to build this as a Canadian project; because, as I have already said and I would like to emphasize this, I think that for the future it would be better if one or other of the two governments undertook this project of its own volition, and I would have liked to have seen Canada undertake this project in that way.

QUESTIONS

SERVICE HOSPITALS—DIET COST PER DIEM

Mr. Balcom:

What is the per diem cost of hospital diet per patient in service hospitals (a) navy; (b) army; (c) Royal Canadian Air Force?

Mr. Blanchette:

Unless a member of the services requires a special diet, he receives the ordinary ration and the average cost of this is 93 cents per day. The cost of the special diets varies with the locality, the hospital and the diet.

OLD AGE SECURITY—LIENS COLLECTED

Mr. Hansell:

1. How many liens have the government collected on estates of old age pensioners under the Old Age Pensions Act, since the Old Age Security Act came into force?
2. What is the total amount collected?
3. What amounts were collected from each province?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would agree to perhaps reword this question or allow it to drop. We had a chat on it the other day.

Mr. Hansell: Would the minister agree to allow it to stand on the order paper and not pursue the answer for a little while? I am in touch with the Alberta government respecting this, so perhaps it could be allowed to stand meantime.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the question be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Question stands.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

WHEAT BOARD RECEIPTS OF TOUGH GRAIN

Mr. Argue:

1. What were the wheat board receipts of tough grain by grades for the crop year 1952-53?
2. What quantity of this grain was dried (a) by artificial means; (b) by natural drying?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GUATEMALA—INQUIRY AS TO SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs is yet in a position to answer several questions we put to him recently regarding the situation in Guatemala? I have in mind in particular my question of June 19 as to the source of the arms being used by the invaders, and the question of my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) on June 21 as to whether there has been any attempt at foreign interference in the dispute on behalf of either side.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to make a short statement on this matter yesterday, but I thought it would be courteous for me to wait until the hon. member for Winnipeg North, who asked the original question, was in his place. I can say now, as I would have said yesterday, that there is not enough information to give any adequate or final answer to the questions that have been asked.

The political situation in regard to developments in Guatemala is certainly not clear, though the military position would appear, on the information at our disposal, to be reaching a climax. To the best of my knowledge, based on information we have received, the attacking forces in Guatemala seem to be Guatemalan, though some non-Guatemalans may be included in those forces.

As hon. members know, the United Nations has intervened. A meeting of the security council was requested by the Guatemalan government, and it was held, immediately after their request, last Sunday. At that meeting representatives of Guatemala alleged invasion and aggression by "foreign mercenaries", but made no charges against any other country, neighbouring or otherwise. Thereupon the delegates of Brazil and Colombia introduced a resolution at the security council to submit the question urgently to the Organization of American States. That resolution was approved by a majority but was vetoed by the delegate of the Soviet union. Thereupon the delegate of France introduced a resolution calling for the immediate termination of any action likely to cause bloodshed, and requesting all members of the United Nations to refrain from giving assistance to any such action. That resolution was carried unanimously.

We have received messages direct from Guatemala from the Canadian government trade commissioner in that city, and he has told us that the lives and property of Canadian citizens were not at that time in any danger. A later message received yesterday afternoon indicated that matters would be reaching a climax very shortly indeed. Apart from the trade commissioner and his family, there are, as far as we know, about 24 Canadian residents in Guatemala.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish merely to make a comment in relation to the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) because it does suggest that perhaps a good deal of caution should be exercised in approaching this subject. I was extremely interested when I received last Saturday morning a letter from the secretary of the communist party in Canada urging that, along with other believers in democracy, we should assert our views with regard to the Guatemalan situation. I was extremely interested in the speed with which the party line had been declared and duly indicated by the servants of Moscow here in Canada. I wish to make this perfectly clear: I am not for one moment suggesting that any question —and very proper questions they were— devoted to this subject should not be asked. I cannot, however, refrain from expressing my interest in the promptness with which our communists here in this country follow the party line and the orders from Moscow. I propose to keep with some interest that communication received only the day after the trouble started in Guatemala, as evidence at least of the efficiency of this world treachery.

Mr. Coldwell: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, in view of the reference which has just been made. I too received that letter. I hope the Leader of the Opposition replied to it as I did, stating that I would pay much more attention to it if the communist party had made similar protest when the Czechoslovakian government and some other governments were overthrown, and that until they did that, their expressions of opinion—even when I shared them, as I did in part in this instance— could not impress me as being consistent or command our respect.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DISQUALIFICATION FOR BENEFITS UNDER ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. Gauthier (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour a question of which I have given him notice: Has there been any change by regulation or otherwise in the interpretation of section 41 of the Unemployment Insurance Act—disqualification for benefits— in the case of a stoppage of work due to a labour dispute where only a small classified group of the main bargaining unit withdraws its labour from the service of the employer; and what is the position under the act of the main body of workers in the bargaining unit?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his question. In reply to the first part of it, I can tell him that there has been no change. In reply to the second part, I do not think I can do better than to quote part of section 41 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which reads as follows:

> 41. (1) An insured person is disqualified from receiving benefit if he has lost his employment by reason of a stoppage of work due to a labour dispute at the factory, workshop or other premises at which he was employed unless he has, during the stoppage of work, become bona fide employed elsewhere in the occupation that he usually follows, or has become regularly engaged in some other occupation; but this disqualification lasts only so long as the stoppage of work continues.
> (2) An insured person is not disqualified under this section if he proves
> (a) that he is not participating in, or financing or directly interested in the labour dispute that caused the stoppage of work, and
> (b) that he does not belong to a grade or class of workers of which immediately before the commencement of the stoppage there were members employed at the premises at which the stoppage is taking place any of whom are participating in, financing or directly interested in the dispute.

To that I would add that in a decision in 1951 the Canadian umpire, who is the final authority under our Unemployment Insurance Act, said as follows:

> I readily endorse the following remarks made by the British umpire: "It seems to me that the intention of the act is to exclude from benefits, in addition to the workers who are directly interested, those who are indirectly interested by reason of the terms and conditions of their employment being the same as the persons who are directly interested".

In a number of decisions the Canadian umpire has maintained the principle set out in his 1951 decision from which I have just quoted. I would draw the attention of the hon. member to decisions—C.U.B. 981-1019—of the umpire, copies of which are available. I can send them to him if he wishes me to do so.

VETERANS LAND ACT

REQUEST FOR EARLY CIRCULATION OF ACT WITH AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I must apologize for not giving him notice but in these hectic days one gets a good deal of unanticipated information. I am informed that consolidated copies of the Veterans Land Act, with the amendments recently passed by parliament, will not be available for circulation until this fall. In view of the importance of these amendments and their length, can the parliamentary assistant say whether arrangements could be made to have this act, which is extremely important to veterans, printed and circulated at an earlier date?

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): I will look into the matter and advise the hon. member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, might I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I think it concerns all hon. members in that they will want to adjust their schedules throughout the coming months. Does the Prime Minister care to give the house some idea as to when we might reconvene? Can he say whether it will be in the late fall or the first part of the next year?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. gentleman any information about that matter, Mr. Speaker. The question has not yet been considered by the government.

PUBLIC SERVICE

FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK—STATIONARY ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN IN OTTAWA AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Have arrangements yet been made for stationary engineers and firemen employed by the federal government in the Ottawa area to be put on the five-day 40-hour week? If not, how soon will such arrangements be made?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): The hon. gentleman sent notice of this question to my office but I did not arrive at the office until two minutes to eleven.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Did you sleep in?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not have time to inquire about the matter. I find that on May 3 I said, in reply to a question, that this matter was under consideration. I imagine that as the hon. gentleman is asking the question, it means that the consideration has not been concluded or he would have known about it; therefore I can assume that it is still under consideration. As the hon. gentleman well knows, it is not the custom of the government to anticipate announcements of things the government is going to do.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO REPORTED INTERVIEW GIVEN BY LIEUTENANT GENERAL GUY G. SIMONDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. May I say that I had the question drafted and ready to send to him but I did not arrive at the house until the bell was ringing; consequently it was not sent. Perhaps he can take it as notice and answer the question later. I may say that I intended to send him the clipping upon which the question is based. Has the Minister of National Defence any comments to make on a reported interview given by Lieutenant General Guy G. Simonds, in which he stated that "the vast majority of Canadian officers share his view that every youth in the country should receive two years' military training"? Was the subject of the interview discussed with the minister at any time before such a statement was made publicly by the head of our defence forces?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): When I noticed this report, Mr. Speaker, I naturally caused inquiries to be made, and I received from General Simonds a telegram explaining the circumstances of his statement and also stating more fully and perhaps more accurately what he said. He was at a meeting of officers of the Canadian Army in Saint John, New Brunswick, and after a talk he gave them he was asked a question which is quite frequently put on similar occasions. I myself have been asked it a great number of times. He was asked what his views were on the subject of national service. He made a reply which I think you could expect almost any officer to make, namely that he would be glad to see every youth in the country receive two years' military training. Then he went on to say:

> I believe the vast majority of experienced soldiers would agree with me. But such training was impossible unless it received the wholehearted support of the people of this country and that was a matter for judgment and decision by political leaders, not soldiers. In any event experience tended to show that a period of universal military service of less than two years increased rather than diminished the problem of meeting commitment overseas. Further a system of universal military service was not a substitution for voluntary service, it could only supplement and never replace the voluntary system.

Mr. Coldwell: I think it is rather regrettable that, in the press as I saw it last night, that statement was not reported more fully.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Privy council office—
345. General administration, $373,405.

Mr. Drew: Has the Prime Minister any statement to make?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I do not think there is any statement I could make about the privy council that would be of real interest to the house. If there are questions I will be glad to attempt to answer them.

Mr. Drew: I merely asked the question in view of the fact that I have certain comments to make and wished to know whether the Prime Minister intended to say anything. It does seem to me that on this first item of the privy council estimates it is appropriate to mention certain subjects which are of concern to all of us and in regard to which the Prime Minister of necessity under our system must assume responsibility. I propose to direct my remarks to four particular subjects that it seems to me have emerged as extremely important subjects during the course of the present session.

I now wish to place these before the Prime Minister at this stage of the session in view of the fact that it is within his power to deal with them while the house is not in session. Moreover, I believe these things are things which should be dealt with before we meet again some time later this year. The first of these subjects is the business of parliament itself; the second is the judiciary; the third, a conference between federal and provincial governments; and the fourth a commonwealth conference. It is to those subjects that I propose to address my remarks because of my belief that all of them are subjects that can be, and under our system must be, dealt with upon the responsibility of the government itself. I have no intention of reviewing the extended comments there have been on different occasions about the business of the house during the present session, beyond such reference as it seems to me is appropriate to emphasize my belief that much can be done between now and the time we meet again to assure that we shall not have another session such as that which is now drawing to a close.

I know that there may be little occasion to emphasize the role of the prime minister under our parliamentary system. Sometimes, however, it does seem that even in this House of Commons there is a tendency to disregard the fact that the position of prime minister under our parliamentary system and similar parliamentary systems within the commonwealth is very different from that of a prime minister under any other system or even the head of state under a republican system. In Canada, in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand or any of the nations of the commonwealth, in Asia or in other parts of the world, the prime minister has a measure of power and authority which has led some writers to speak of the position as a democratic dictatorship.

I refer to that description, used in textbooks which express complete approval of our system, with no suggestion of criticism but rather merely to emphasize the extent of the authority that is conferred upon the prime minister under our system. He is the individual called upon by the representative of the queen or the king, as the case may be, at any given time in the history of our system to form a government. Within this country we have had the good fortune to have nearly always a clear and satisfactory majority on one side or the other. In a country where the responsibility of office has been shared for almost an equal number of years by two parties, and only two parties, it has contributed greatly to the maintenance of our system that we have not found ourselves dependent upon an uncertain association of parties without a common purpose.

Where there is a clear party majority, no matter what may be said about the large majority on this occasion, the fact remains that as long as there is a working majority the result is very similar in any event. The government takes the responsibility for initiating legislation. The government rides or falls upon the confidence of parliament expressed in the legislation to which the government commits itself. Therefore any prime minister must of necessity be very careful to consult the sentiment of the members of his own party after having carefully canvassed the sentiment of the cabinet in the first instance. That is the strength of our system. That can also be the weakness of our system if the authority and power conferred in that way are not exercised in the manner that will produce the best results from both the administrative and the legislative points of view.

I come back to the position of prime minister. Having been called upon to form a government, he names the members of the cabinet. To that extent it is definitely a government of his choice. There are historic cases where prime ministers in other countries decided to have a general consultation respecting the composition of the cabinet with some disastrous results, as all students of constitutional history will recall. From that point on the prime minister by virtue of his office has, under our parliamentary system, a unique responsibility not only for legislation, for what is done, but also for the business of parliament itself.

During the past session there have been extended discussions with respect to amendment of rules. I do not intend to review the nature of the discussions in those committee meetings. It would be neither proper nor desirable that I should do so. However, it is a matter of common knowledge that much discussion has been devoted to the matter of rules which would expedite the proceedings of the house. At any rate, that much has been openly discussed in the press with full knowledge of what has taken place in the meetings of these committees. On different occasions when reference has been made to the manner in which the business of the house is dealt with and presented to the house, the comment on the other side has been that our sessions would not be so long if members of the opposition did not talk so long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I was just going to say that I do not blame members on the opposite side for injecting comments of this kind because it is only human nature to find criticism of their own course unwelcome. However, today, and in this particular season of the year, I am not anxious to arouse unduly the sensitive nature of members on the other side in regard to this subject. I am simply recalling that it has been pointed out we have a very strong belief that there are those who would welcome complete silence from the opposition.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Now, you see how far this has gone because one of the hon. members says, "hear, hear".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Weir: That would be the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Drew: I must admit that one of the problems with these microphones is that you no longer know exactly from what part of the house comments are coming. I simply want to point out, without in any way entering into an argument of this kind, that if there is to be an improvement in the conduct of business in the house, it will be the prime minister—whether the present Prime Minister or any other prime minister at any time —who will very largely determine the way in which business is conducted. His must be the responsibility for guiding the meetings of the privy council, the estimates of which are now before us. His must be the responsibility of leading the house; his must be the responsibility of placing before the house, whether on his own part or through one of his ministers, the measures of the government by which the government will seek an expression of confidence from parliament.

I therefore wish to refer to those discussions which have been taking place in regard to the rules. The business of this house will not be expedited in any way by attempting to pass rules which limit the opportunity for debate. The business of this house will be speeded up and made more effective by the proper organization of the business of the house from the first day we meet.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): This is out of order.

Mr. Drew: On this occasion, the loud speakers have not in any way led me to mistake the source of that remark. I would point out that anything is out of order in the minds of some hon. members if it happens they do not wish to hear any opposition expressed to the procedure here.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order.

Mr. Drew: I am making a positive suggestion that next session—

Mr. Harris: I did not hear the interjection, and I do not know who made it or what it was about, but if there is any doubt about this discussion being out of order, may I point out that the rules are being presently considered by a committee. This committee has made no report to the house, and therefore it is not proper to discuss the matter here.

Mr. Drew: I am not discussing any recommendations to be made, Mr. Chairman. I am discussing what will expedite the proceedings of the house. I would also ask the minister who has just spoken, through you, Mr. Chairman, if recommendations are going to be made at this session in regard to the changing of the rules?

Mr. Harris: I can readily answer that question. Hon. members opposite asked that it should not be done.

The Chairman: I believe the Leader of the Opposition is in order in discussing generally the business of the house. He realizes, of course, he cannot discuss this question of the rules, which has been before a committee, as no report has been presented and we must not anticipate that report.

Mr. Drew: As you will recognize, Mr. Chairman, I have been discussing this subject from a general point of view for the very reason mentioned. I would point out that the interjection which has just been made by the minister illustrates the very point I have been seeking to make with regard to the conduct of business. The reason advanced was that a committee is discussing the rules, and therefore it would not be proper to discuss any aspect of the rules; yet the minister suggests that we are not going to consider the rules, so by that procedure a blanket is thrown over this whole discussion.

Mr. Harris: I hope we can be regular in our debates, and I know from former occasions it has been desirable to let hon. members make their speeches rather than to interrupt them. However, I did not make that answer. The committee has not finalized its recommendations, and what the committee may decide to do I do not know, being only one of 21 members.

Mr. Drew: I have no desire to conduct a debate at arm's length with the minister, but I understood him to say there would be no report on the rule changes because some members on the other side did not wish it done. I took his words to mean exactly what they said. In fact, I was rather pleased that this was one of the first occasions upon which the views of the opposition were being accorded some recognition.

We can dispose of that, however, because the chairman has said that a general discussion is quite proper. I am pointing out that the speed with which we are able to proceed at the next session will depend upon what is done between now and the beginning of the next session. It is to that I am now directing these remarks. When the session begins, there will be a speech from the throne, as there was at the beginning of this and every other session. The speech from the throne, prepared by Her Majesty's advisers, is in fact a statement by the government of the business it intends to present to parliament. It is a guide to the members and to the public, as to what the government has already decided to do. It is a guide to the members on the other side of the house as to those things which they should try to bring forward if they feel there are subjects which are not otherwise going to be presented.

Since the government in that speech from the throne is stating what it proposes to do, then presumably before that statement is made a decision has already been made in cabinet in regard to each of these matters. In fact, it is not conceivable that any such statement would be made without a decision in advance by the cabinet. After that decision has been made by the cabinet, then in the ordinary course of events the legislation which is announced in the speech from the throne can be prepared in advance. In fact, unless it has been prepared in something approximating draft form it is difficult to understand how the cabinet could have given approval to the general idea. It is a matter of common knowledge that when any cabinet decides that a certain thing is going to be done, it does so upon the basis of a memorandum which substantially sets out what is contemplated in the form of legislation.

For that very reason, there can be no difficulty whatever in having most of the legislation ready at the time the session meets. Within a few days of the speech from the throne being read by Her Majesty's representative, a substantial part of the legislation could be put on the order paper. If that were done, then hon. members on both sides of the house would have the opportunity to examine that legislation, to avail themselves of the opportunities that are afforded for inquiry from people who are experts in the various fields, and to know in advance what it is that is to be considered.

Let us take just one example. For many weeks—I am inclined to think it is perhaps for some three months—we have been under the impression that legislation was to come forward to deal with amendments to judges' salaries. We were told that there was to be an amendment to the Judges Act. I believe that answer was given in response to a question I directed to the Prime Minister some time ago.

Even before that, however, there have been comments in the press about the likelihood of this taking place; and in this case the comments were shown to be well informed. However, the legislation that actually came down was not legislation of the kind contemplated. It will be recalled by hon. members that I have asked on different occasions if the Prime Minister would inform us in regard to the nature of the legislation, or when we might expect it; and, without attempting to give the exact words, the information received was that the government was not ready to give us this information.

Because it was thought that a measure dealing with judges' salaries was under consideration—incidentally, I might say it was known that consultation was taking place in regard to this subject between the government of Canada and representatives of at least some of the provincial governments—hon. members did not raise this subject by way of a substantive motion, or otherwise.

Now we find that the amendment to the Judges Act is not an amendment such as had been contemplated by many members, but is an amendment which calls for the appointment of two new judges, one to the superior court of Alberta and the other to the superior court of British Columbia. Without in any way considering the merits or the details of this subject, at least it can be said that hon. members were under the impression that the subject of judges' salaries was going to come forward.

Then, without any suggestion of raising another subject that, at least outside this house, might offer some possibility for extended argument, there is the fact that from the very time we heard the speech from the throne we were told that there was going to be an amendment to the Municipal Grants Act. For that very reason, substantive motions which we have presented on other occasions in regard to relief of the municipalities from certain taxes, and assessments on property, were not presented because we knew it had been stated that on the order paper there was going to be a resolution referring to the question of assistance to the municipalities.

Now we find, at this stage of the session, that the act is not going to be proceeded with. On the one hand we have the statement in the speech from the throne that an amendment was going to be presented—and, after all, that is a subject that must have been decided on, one way or another. It is a bill which surely should have been prepared. Not only do we not have the opportunity to deal with that act but, by virtue of the fact that a resolution has been on the order paper relating to it, we have been denied the opportunity to have other discussion take place which could have produced results.

When I made the comment I did make a short time ago in regard to members of the opposition being heard, may I say there have been occasions—and I certainly commend those ministers who have accepted these opportunities—to make various amendments on the basis of proposals which came from the opposition. I can recall an amendment accepted by the Minister of Justice, and another amendment accepted by the minister of the new department which deals with northern affairs. I recall an amendment accepted by the Minister of National Revenue, as well as amendments accepted by other ministers. These were accepted in good spirit, as constructive suggestions which the government felt might improve the legislation they were presenting.

This is an indication of the value of having an early opportunity to consider legislation and to discuss it with those who can give sound advice. It would seem to me that well over half—perhaps three-quarters—of the legislation that would come forward in a session could be on the order paper within the first two weeks. After all, most of the bills are short, interpreting decisions already made by the government when the speech from the throne is prepared.

If those were on the order paper, particularly at the time we meet before Christmas, then during the extended Christmas holidays hon. members, who do take these tasks seriously—and the discussion that takes place indicates just how seriously they accept their responsibilities—would then come back with information that would make it possible to deal with these subjects much more rapidly.

Moreover, I am convinced that, if legislation were brought forward in this way, the debate on the speech from the throne would be greatly shortened. Hon. members would know what subjects were going to come up, and what the nature of the discussions would be within the framework of legislation they had already seen. For the same reason, the debate on the budget would be greatly shortened. This undoubtedly would encourage the direction of debate to positive measures before the house either by way of bills or by resolution.

Therefore in the light of what has happened during a session which is, at least, the second longest in Canadian history, and the least productive—

An hon. Member: The third longest.

Mr. Drew: I am informed that only the session of 1903 was longer. However, whether it is the second or the third longest, may I say that this is certainly the longest of any session which has produced very little of a positive nature, with the exception of the amendments to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly the dullest.

Mr. Drew: Yes, as one hon. member opposite has said, it is the dullest, because the house has floundered without any leadership in regard to its business during practically the whole of the session.

Hon. members have had to seek information by every device possible. We all know even within the last few days how rigidly the government refuses to open doors to information which is not confidential, by any ordinary meaning of the word, but which would have helped greatly to expedite the business of the house.

We do know that one of the departments, which proceeds most rapidly once its estimates come before the house, is the Department of External Affairs. And that is because, by custom, those estimates are referred to a committee, and dealt with there. When they come back to the house, hon. members know that representatives from both sides of the house have examined the items; and therefore, subject to such general debate as may take place in regard to external affairs, the house proceeds to deal with the estimates very quickly. I feel therefore that the same practice could be employed with very great advantage in the case of the Department of National Defence, in the case of the Department of Labour and in the case of other departments which naturally require some examination if the business is to be done expeditiously.

I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that there are always measures which cannot be ready when the house meets. I recognize that in this session there was a tremendous undertaking carried out by hon. members and by the other place in the amendment of the Criminal Code. The Minister of Justice and I do not always agree, but I wish to say without any reservation that hon. members greatly admired the patience and detail with which he dealt with these extremely important amendments to one of the heaviest and most important pieces of legislation of the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada. That work of course of necessity was bound to take a long time; but may I point out that the task of the Minister of Justice and of the committee would have been a hopeless one if the house had been suddenly confronted with that mass of legislation dealing with the rights of the individual in Canada under the Criminal Code. What made it possible for the minister to proceed in an orderly way, and what made it possible for the opposition to deal with it in an orderly way—and may I say that the chairman of the committee of our own party, the hon. member for Kamloops, is equally to be commended for the manner in which he followed section by section in the legislation before the house, as did other members of that committee—what made it possible for this legislation to be dealt with in an orderly way was that it was presented to the special committee early in the session. May I say that this could never have been done unless hon. members, and particularly the members of the legal committees of both sides of the house, had been able to examine this in advance, to check with legal experts outside, members of the bar association and others in regard to the implication of various amendments that were made.

Compare that, Mr. Chairman, with the act presented a short time ago to provide what is described as insurance for the civil servants. Here we had a bill which came before us without any opportunity being presented to hon. members to explore this subject, and without any opportunity for the representatives of the civil servants themselves really to present their case and check with their own members on what they thought of this unusual measure which had been brought forward by the Minister of Finance. There is a contrast, there is an illustration of the difference. There is proof of the advantage of having legislation come before us early.

However, during the course of any session new subjects of immense importance will arise, and naturally it will then be the responsibility of the government to deal with those subjects. However, when that is done, let us have the legislation just as quickly as we can and not at the last moment, as we have on some occasions during this session. I therefore urge the Prime Minister with all earnestness to see what can be done between now and the beginning of the next session to have the legislation which will interpret the decisions of the government drafted in advance and placed on the order paper. Then, when that is done, the moment that we can proceed with the completion of the debate on the speech from the throne, to have the committees set up and start work right away, and not months afterwards, as is usually the case. That would hasten the business of the session and not crowd those reports in at the last moment, as now happens. I repeat, there is only one person in this house who can successfully bring that about, and that is the Prime Minister, the man who, under our parliamentary system, has been entrusted with the immense power as well as responsibility of Prime Minister of Canada. With great earnestness I seek consideration of the views I have expressed.

The second point I mentioned was the judiciary. I need not for one moment seek to emphasize the importance of the judiciary to the Prime Minister, who is a great credit to the profession of which he is a highly honoured member. Both as past president and as honorary president of the Canadian Bar Association, he recognizes in all its significance the importance to Canada of an impartial judiciary. The only comment I propose to make in regard to this vitally important part of our constitutional organization in Canada is that, now appeals to the privy council have been abolished, the importance of every appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada is greater than ever before. I am sure every hon. member will agree with me that we have reason for great pride in the history, the traditions and the personnel throughout the years of the Supreme Court of Canada. I would not wish to pass from this subject without saying that I know that all hon. members regret that time in its inevitable course has brought the resignation of the very distinguished Chief Justice who retired the day before yesterday, because there is not one of us whose admiration for his work in that high office is not in itself evidence of our satisfaction with what has been done in that court.

However, I simply seek to emphasize that in maintaining our great legal traditions, each appointment to the high court will of course become more important than ever before. Then, there are the courts of the provinces, the superior courts and the county courts. There it is of vital importance that the impartiality of each judge be an assurance of the extension of open-handed justice on every level. The record of our judiciary in this country on every level is one of which we have every reason to be proud. I make these comments only because we know that this subject is one that is under consideration, and to the distinguished member of the bar who occupies the office of Prime Minister I simply direct these remarks as an expression of hope on the part of every hon. member that the appointments that are made to the bench throughout Canada, whether it be the Supreme Court of Canada, the superior courts of the provinces or the county courts, will be appointments which will command the confidence and increasing respect of every Canadian.

The third subject that I propose to mention is the need of a conference between the federal and the provincial governments. It is not necessary, nor do I intend, to provoke some of the interjections that would doubtless be made if I sought to review at any length this extremely important subject.

The Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, since it is extremely difficult to determine relevancy under this particular item. I did not interrupt him when he was discussing the business of the house, as I felt that of course government business must be brought forward by the government and that he was within his rights in pursuing that discussion. In view of the fact that the rules committee had been set up it would be out of order to discuss that particular matter. Then, also, I did not interrupt the Leader of the Opposition when he initiated a short discussion on the judiciary, although I felt that could more properly be brought up under the estimates of the Department of Justice which are still to come before us. Now I understand, from the remarks previously made by the Leader of the Opposition, that he intends to discuss a federal-provincial conference. I do not wish to anticipate the manner in which he proposes to deal with that subject, but at present it would appear to me very difficult for the hon. gentleman to make such a discussion relevant to item 345. It must be realized that all manner of subjects will come before the privy council, but I cannot allow that to be taken as what I might call an excuse for discussing all manner of subjects under this particular vote. Therefore, I do feel the Leader of the Opposition should confine his remarks to the actual administration of the privy council office and not wander too far afield on other subjects.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, that is just exactly what I am doing. This is the only vote under which I can properly direct to the Prime Minister, as head of the privy council, the point I am making, and it is to him in his capacity as head of the privy council that I am directing my remarks on a subject which I have already said I do not propose to discuss in detail for the very reasons put forward by the chairman of the committee.

As we near the end of this session I simply point out that it must be the responsibility of the Prime Minister, as chairman of the privy council, and it can be the responsibility of no one else, to call together between now and the time we meet again a conference of the federal and provincial governments to discuss the outstanding problems which are causing great concern to many Canadians.

I have no intention whatever of dealing with the merits of the issues which have been raised. No hon. member of this house, however, should disregard the fact that, unless there is some attempt to bring together the federal government and the governments of the provinces to explore the outstanding problems, increasing difficulties and friction may occur. I urge the Prime Minister, no matter what his views as chairman of the privy council may be in regard to the position of the government of Canada, or the position of any other government, to recognize what he himself has said. I would like to quote his words because they relate to this very subject.

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the Leader of the Opposition once more. In addition to the remarks which I previously made with regard to the relevancy of his remarks, I now find that a motion on a subject of this kind was negatived on division on April 12 of this year when there was an amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. Coldwell to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference from time to time, and so on. In view of the fact that such an amendment was negatived on that date, I feel the Leader of the Opposition is really out of order in attempting to discuss this question at this time and under this particular vote.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the subject under discussion in April was not a request to call a conference between now and the beginning of next session. The subject then under discussion related to facts that were then before the house. I would point out that the Prime Minister said this, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of June 1, 1954:

> "Perhaps the most knotty problem of all which we had to face in recent years is that of the allocation of taxation revenues to enable governments in Canada at their different levels to carry out their constitutional responsibility.
> "Under the terms of the British North America Act, both the provincial and federal authorities have the right to impose taxes in certain fields.
> "Temporary agreements have been made with all the provinces but one, yet the basic problem of finding an acceptable solution that will allow all the provinces to preserve their rights and at the same time allow the governments to carry out their responsibilities, still remains."

It is to those words and that statement, and the problem before us now, Mr. Chairman, that I am directing my remarks, and I close my remarks in regard to this subject with the most earnest request to the Prime Minister that, whatever discussions may have taken place, whatever difference there may be, it be recognized that this is a subject of concern to all Canadians, that no one province alone is involved in this consideration, and that it would be extremely helpful to the parliament of Canada during the next session, in carrying out its responsibilities, if between now and that time a conference could be called at the instance of the Prime Minister, who is the only person who can call it, so that we know then something of what measure of agreement can be reached as to the procedure that will be followed in seeking a solution to our financial and constitutional problem.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the fourth subject I mentioned, namely a commonwealth conference.

The Chairman: Order. May I point out to the Leader of the Opposition that remarks on the subject of a commonwealth conference would meet with the same objection that I previously raised. As I said before, all manner of subjects come before the privy council, but that does not give any hon. member the right to discuss any and all manner of subjects on this particular vote, and I must ask the Leader of the Opposition to confine his remarks to this item and not discuss items which are far afield from this subject.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am discussing an item that relates to the position of the chairman of the privy council and it is only the chairman of the privy council who can, on behalf of Canada, take any steps that would effectively lead to a commonwealth conference. There is no other item of these estimates under which I could discuss this subject. I do so with the knowledge that next week the, shall I say, greatest parliamentary democrat in the world today is going to be a visitor here in Ottawa. I would strongly urge that at that time, when Sir Winston Churchill and Mr. Anthony Eden are here, the Prime Minister, as chairman of the privy council and Her Majesty the Queen's adviser, shall indicate, as an expression of the hope of the House of Commons and the people of Canada, that there be as soon as possible a conference of representatives of the nations of the commonwealth to consider those many things which may be of some advantage to all of us in the years ahead.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to strain any ruling that might be given by suggesting in detail the subjects that would come forward. I would point out that when the leaders of the governments of the commonwealth met in London last year at the coronation the opportunity was limited for that kind of discussion which could lead to such beneficial results on an occasion such as this. Other conferences have taken place. Other conferences have failed. Only a few days ago the disarmament conference ended in complete failure. We know that the Geneva conference simply carries on with hope, and with little but hope. Here, however, is a conference of nations bound together in a common parliamentary system and with a common loyalty to the great traditions of the rule of law and the supremacy of parliament to which we all adhere. Here within this fellowship of nations are material and human resources which challenge the imagination of every one of us. Within this fellowship of member nations are more than 600 million people in Asia, in Europe, on the North American continent, and in the distant waters of the Pacific as well as on the great African continent. Here is something which offers hope to us and to all the rest of the world.

Let us take first things first. Here we have presented to us a chance to show what conferences can do and, out of the success of such a conference as this, to offer hope of greater success at other conferences in the years ahead. With respect to a wider friendship still with the United States our nearest neighbour, with France our ancient ally, and with the other nations with which we have been so closely associated, what greater challenge could we present than to show what we can do to our mutual advantage in marshalling the material as well as the human resources for the common benefit of ourselves and of all mankind? That is something that presents both a challenge and an opportunity to the Prime Minister, the chairman of the privy council, who in his recent trip around the world, saw something of the way in which Canada can and will be heard by other nations without any suggestion that we are trying to impose our will. Let no one fear that, in establishing more effective understanding within this great commonwealth—with all its tongues, all its races, all its creeds and all its traditions—we would in any way be creating any barriers between ourselves and the United States. On the contrary, we would offer to them greater evidence of how other conferences can proceed.

[The Chairman.]

May I just quote a few words written in a magnificent editorial in the New York Times last Sunday when, in a great newspaper, an effort was made to dispose of the suggestion of the existence of deep and fundamental differences between the United States and the United Kingdom. May I quote these words:

> There will be no deep conflict between this country and Britain: Not until Moscow adopts the golden rule as its sole policy, not until the moon turns blue—and not then.

Mr. Chairman, not until the moon turns blue—and not then—can there be misunderstanding between Canada and the United States. Let us give to them dramatic evidence of the fact that we are members of a wider world fellowship and that when they deal with us in a friendly manner, as they do, they deal with us as a partner in a wider association. That in itself would bring the great human and material resources of the United States still closer in harmony and in fellowship, with resulting immense benefits for us, for the commonwealth, for the United States and for the whole world.

The Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Mr. Blackmore: Does the Prime Minister desire to reply before others have something to say concerning this matter?

Mr. St. Laurent: If there are others who have something to say concerning this matter, I think I should perhaps hear them before I make a reply in order that I may not have to make more than one.

Mr. Blackmore: I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition has noted that one of the finest occasions on which to raise matters of great national importance is the occasion on which the Prime Minister's estimates are before the House of Commons. I am glad that he raised the four points which he raised. I should like to ask the Prime Minister some questions which he will be able to answer when he answers the Leader of the Opposition. These questions of mine have to do in considerable measure with the matter of the great foe which we are engaged in fighting across the world, namely communism. The first question is this. Does the Prime Minister propose to win the cold war? That may seem like a silly question. I hope the Prime Minister can make it look silly.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think he heard the hon. member.

Mr. Blackmore: I will say it again if he did not hear me. Question No. 2 is this. If so, what has he done in that respect since last August 10, designed to win that cold war: (1) to recognize communist measures; (2) to offset them; (3) to counter-attack? I now have reference strictly to the cold war. The third question is this. Has the Prime Minister had brought to his attention the communist over-all world plan to win completely domination over the world in the next twenty years, as that plan was outlined in a document recently presented before United States governing bodies by Senator Knowland and summarized in the Ottawa Journal on June 1, 1954, at page 2? Fourth, what specific measures has the Prime Minister taken to offset communism in Canada, first, in discovering what are the techniques communism has employed? When I began studying this matter I found that my lack of knowledge about communist techniques was astounding to me. Second, what is the degree of success communism has attained in Canada? Third, what are the possible means available to Canada of combating communism in Canada? Again I have particular reference to the cold war as it is being conducted in Canada. Just to indicate to the Prime Minister how serious this problem really is and what is going on right under his nose—

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I must apologize for interrupting again, but you can see how far we are going to be afield if, on the estimates of the privy council, we discuss the cold war which has been discussed during this session on more occasions, I think, than at any other time since the Korean incident. We had a long discussion on external affairs and I would hope that we do not repeat it or even discuss the matter in any form on these particular estimates.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the virtue of what the minister has said. My object is to concentrate attention on something and what to do about it. One of the things that just desolate a person sitting in this chamber year after year is the tremendous amount of babbling there is against people—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: Just wait until I say the next thing and then see whether you will say "hear, hear". As I say, one of the things that desolate a person sitting in this chamber year after year is the tremendous amount of babbling against the wrongs which we have with never a suggestion as to what to do about them. Literally volumes are filled by members of the official opposition crying out against ills and trying to convey to the country that if only they were in the position occupied by the Prime Minister all would be perfectly well.

The Chairman: Order. I believe the point of order raised by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is very well taken. I have listened to the questions put forward by the hon. member for Lethbridge, and I should like to point out to him that in my opinion these questions might more properly be advanced under the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Therefore I would ask his co-operation at this time.

Mr. Blackmore: I agree with you that they would be quite suitable under the estimates of the Minister of Justice, but all the points which could be taken up with the Prime Minister on an occasion like this would be appropriate to be discussed under the estimates of one or other of the many ministers who govern under the Prime Minister. Consequently I think the suggestion the chairman has made rather loses its validity in the light of what I have just said. I still believe that I shall have plenty to take up with the Department of Justice after I get before the Prime Minister those things that I wish to say today. There are not very many of them. It will not take me more than seven or eight minutes, and if the chairman will let me proceed I think he will find that they are not out of order to be brought up on the first item of the estimates of the man upon whom the full responsibility rests for everything that occurs in Canada.

The Chairman: If I were to follow the hon. gentleman's argument to its logical conclusion we would be able to discuss any subject whatsoever under item 345. The hon. member will note that this item deals with the general administration of the privy council office. I request the co-operation of hon. members in limiting their discussion to that item. At this late stage of the session I do not wish to be forced to make a definite ruling against a member, and I do ask the hon. member for Lethbridge to limit his remarks to this item and to refrain from the general remarks which he has been making.

Mr. Blackmore: My remarks from now on will be very specific, I assure you. I do think, however, with all deference to your opinion, that what I am saying is quite as relevant to this department as were the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: Of course two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. Nicholson: That still does not make it right.

Mr. Blackmore: With your tolerance, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask two more questions. Does the Prime Minister know specifically what is the communist line in America for 1954? This will be of importance when one undertakes to determine whether or not the remarks of any member of this house, any person speaking over the C.B.C., or any minister, are remarks that follow the communist line. There is a definite communist line for 1954. There was a definite communist line for 1953. Once one knew this line one could detect a communist speech anywhere. To illustrate to the Prime Minister what I have in mind, I am going to beg the permission of the committee to read a quotation from one of the radio commentators—

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. As I said before, I hope I am not forced to make a definite ruling, but if I am forced to do so I intend to do so very quickly. The hon. member said he had two questions to ask. One of them has been asked. I am not going to interrupt him if he wishes to ask the second question without further comment, but if there is further comment along these lines I am afraid I must make the definite ruling that this is out of order.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to cause you any annoyance or to be out of order in the slightest degree, but I have an excessively important message to deliver to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Blackmore: I am the judge of that. Every member of this house has the right, by virtue of the responsibility that was placed upon him when he was elected, to put the case as he sees fit.

Mr. Pickersgill: Within the rules.

Mr. Blackmore: I am going to ask you if you would consider that I would be out of order if I were to give an outline of the communist plans for the next twenty years as found in a document—

The Chairman: Order. I thought I had indicated sufficiently clearly when I was on my feet before that I do consider this line of discussion very much out of order under this item. If the hon. member wishes to ask his second question I will allow that, but I cannot allow any further discussion on this subject at this time.

Mr. Blackmore: I will bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I give notice to the Minister of Justice that I will have this in mind when his estimates are before us.

Item agreed to.

Federal district commission—

347. To provide for maintenance and improvement of grounds adjoining government buildings at Ottawa, and to authorize an amount not exceeding $132,000 for construction, improvements and operation of the parks, parkway system and other works under the control of the federal district commission which is additional to the sum of $300,000 granted by chapter 112, revised statutes, $475,085.

Mr. Nicholson: There are at least two problems that have been brought to my attention in connection with expropriation. I should like to draw the Prime Minister's attention to section 46 of the Exchequer Court Act. In quite a number of cases property belonging to citizens of Ottawa was expropriated by the crown in 1947, and settlement has not yet been made. As the act now stands, it requires that settlement be made as at the time of expropriation, which in this case would be 1947. I am sure the Prime Minister will be the first to admit that if it is necessary for the state to take the property of citizens they should not be worse off because of the taking of the property than they would be if it had not been done.

I would suggest that the Exchequer Court Act be amended to make provision for settlement as at the time of expropriation or as at the time the state takes the property. I am sure the Prime Minister will agree that it would cost twice as much now in some cases to replace the property as it would have in 1947. I wish the Prime Minister would give consideration to introducing an amendment to this act next year so that settlement may be made as at the time of expropriation or as at the time that payment is being made by the state.

Mr. Fulton: I notice that the amount here is in excess of the sum of $300,000 provided for under the statute. It is over the $300,000 this year and it was also in excess of that last year. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it appears to be established as the result of experience that the amount provided by the statute is apparently inadequate, and that possibly the proper way to handle it might be to amend the statute to provide for a larger annual amount rather than having to go on voting supplementary amounts each year.

Mr. St. Laurent: Some consideration has been given to an amendment of the statute, but I think it is perhaps still desirable to have this distinction between the amount provided by the statute and the appropriation asked for each year. The amount provided by statute has been considered as the amount required to maintain the properties vested in the federal district commission, while under the other item we provide for the administration, care and upkeep of the grounds surrounding public buildings in Ottawa. Most of that work is done by the federal district commission so as not to have duplication of two organizations.

The federal district commission is responsible for the driveways and parkways, and has the equipment and personnel necessary for that work which is also appropriate to the kind of work that has to be done on the grounds surrounding government buildings. They have been required, therefore, over the last many years to have that personnel do the two jobs. The overhead is divided between the statutory grant and the vote on the basis of 50 per cent to each. The amount required for the proper maintenance of the grounds surrounding government buildings is increasing with the increase, of course, in the cost of labour, as well as the increase in the areas that have to be given attention. I feel it is really more economical than if public works had one organization and the federal district commission had another organization to take care of work of the same class. There is only one greenhouse which supplies all the bulbs and plants for landscaping both the parkways, driveways that are vested in the federal district commission and the other government property.

Mr. Fulton: Then, this might be best tidied up by providing in the statute itself that the federal district commission shall be responsible for the maintenance of the grounds, lawns, etc.; in other words, everything but the building itself.

Mr. St. Laurent: There is consideration being given to that.

When we get to the supplementary estimates the hon. gentleman will find a one dollar item to take care of that and regularize the procedure. In the meantime, the same thing has been done over the years.

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask the Prime Minister upon which of his items he will be answering these questions?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think I am out of order, but the general discussion we have had this morning on the administration of the privy council is one example of the many things that have prolonged this session. It is the first time in my experience that I have heard the suggestion the Prime Minister was responsible for everything that happened in Canada. It is the first time I have been described even as a democratic dictator. I have never felt that my dictatorship was of the same kind as is usually associated with that word.

Mr. Drew: Just so there will be no mistakes on the record, Mr. Chairman, if the record is examined it will be seen I did not apply that word to the Prime Minister. I said that textbooks used that term in relation to the power of the Prime Minister under our parliamentary system.

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to the four points mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, I believe everyone is agreed that we did make a genuine effort this time to have most of the legislation on the order paper within the first week that parliament was sitting. As early as November 18, parliament having met on November 12, there were 6 bills and 7 resolutions on the order paper; by December 8, there were 11 bills and 5 resolutions; on January 19, 12 bills and 4 resolutions; and by February 10, 14 bills and 3 resolutions. But I confess I have been disappointed at the time it took to get the drafts of some of the subsequent bills that had to be brought before parliament. I can assure the Leader of the Opposition and the house that I was just as disappointed as anyone else over the fact that it did take some time, but I assure the house also there is a serious effort to have legislation on the order paper as early as possible.

With respect to the judiciary, I think the Leader of the Opposition and all members of parliament are in agreement that we are very fortunate in having had gentlemen of the character we have had in the administration of justice. As a very old personal friend of the Chief Justice, who retired at midnight between June 21 and June 22 from his responsibilities, I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition for the very kind remarks he has made about him. I know that the hon. gentleman has achieved what could be the highest ambition of any young man who enters into the profession of law, and who advances progressively and rapidly in that career. He was a distinguished barrister: that I know from having crossed swords with him almost half a century ago. He was also a distinguished superior court judge of the superior court of Quebec: that I know from having been before him on more than one occasion in that capacity. He was a distinguished puisne judge of the supreme court, and subsequently a distinguished Chief Justice of that court.

It was not my privilege to appear before him while he was Chief Justice because events had caused me to follow other paths. But I had been before him on many occasions when he was one of the puisne judges of the court. I know that it will be a great satisfaction to him to have had this tribute to his career expressed in this house. I do wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition for making it possible to have that tribute expressed this morning.

The hon. member suggests that there should be a dominion-provincial conference. There certainly will be a dominion-provincial conference just as soon as we can have something concrete to discuss in that conference. With respect to the fiscal relations, they are governed by a contract, in so far as nine of the provinces are concerned, which neither the Leader of the Opposition nor I would wish to repudiate. They have been contracts made in good faith by those provinces and so far as we are concerned they must be carried out in the spirit in which they were made. There would have to be some alternative suggested. In discharging the responsibilities, which are not of the over-all extent mentioned by the hon. member for Lethbridge but which are nevertheless heavy, I would not wish to call a conference and say to them: "Well now, gentlemen, you are here and what are we going to talk about; what can we suggest or consider as an alternative to what we have?"

That is one reason why serious consideration should be given, and is being given, to the suggestion from the successor of the Leader of the Opposition, as premier of Ontario, of a preliminary discussion at the level of high, technical officials. With respect to a commonwealth conference—

Mr. Fulton: Is that the economic committee?

Mr. St. Laurent: The economic committee that has been referred to, that was referred to in 1945.

We are all, I think, in both the federal and the provincial fields, anxious to find something that will be satisfactory; because we are all not only Canadians but, I think, good Canadians. And we are all living together, and are bound to continue to live together. It is unfortunate that so much is required for public services at all levels; and it is particularly unfortunate that the federal authorities have to take such a large part of the taxation that is available for the services. That creates a difficult situation. I will not go beyond that.

With respect to a commonwealth conference, there is no doubt that that is something that will arise in the course of the informal conversations we will be having. But from the impressions I brought back from the East, a conference to deal with matters affecting the East would, I think, have a better chance of being successful if it were one that was sought by the governments of the East, and that implied no possible suggestion that we of the West wanted to direct the proper policies for the solution of these eastern difficulties.

There has been a suggestion that there be a conference either of prime ministers or of ministers of foreign affairs; and I think the suggestion has been made that it would be preferable if that conference were promoted by the governments of the East rather than by the governments of the West. In any event the aim would be, as the Leader of the Opposition said, something that would be helpful. And it will be through informal discussions that we will find out what is apt to be most helpful.

Then, with respect to the questions of the hon. member for Lethbridge, I must confess that I get no confidential information from any communist sources, and that I am not cognizant of what may be the real line of the communists for North America in 1954. The hon. member certainly was not putting his first question as anything more than just a preliminary, when he asked, "Do we want to win the cold war? Does the Prime Minister want to win the cold war?" The Prime Minister does not feel that he can win the cold war; the Prime Minister feels that Canada, and all the free countries, are doing their best and will continue to do their best to win the cold war; because together they wish and they hope to win the cold war.

I do not think I would be prepared to suggest establishing as a proper precedent a procedure on estimates under which we would not consider the amounts to be voted, but simply use the discussion of the estimates as an opportunity to discuss anything with which a minister whose estimates are under consideration may be concerned. I think it may develop that there is much to be said for the suggestion that the details, respecting some departments, might perhaps be considered more appropriately in working committees, and that when they then come back to the house it might be proper to have these discussions on very interesting but somewhat academic aspects of government policy. But it would be difficult to have the business of the house arranged in such a way when there would not be several occasions when somewhat different aspects of the same questions would be up for discussion.

I do not think any of us believe it is by rigid rules that matters of that kind can be dealt with. It does not matter very much what the language of a rule may be; if there is a serious attempt to go around it, my experience in the house has been that that attempt is usually successful. So he will try not to give the opposition parties any occasion for feeling that anything is being held back, or any reason for feeling that we are not doing our best to make it possible to have the business of the country discussed in an orderly and perhaps in a somewhat more expeditious way than has been the case during this session.

But in order to proceed more expeditiously each one of us will have to be doing his best to that end. We will continue to try to have the legislation brought down just as early as possible, because we agree that that will be helpful.

I apologize to you, Mr. Chairman, for having taken this time; but I thought that, these general remarks having been made, it might have been looked upon by my hon. friends opposite as somewhat discourteous if I did not make some attempt to reply. And it is for that reason that I did venture to make these few comments.

Item agreed to.

700. General administration—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the Prime Minister one question. He will recall that during the discussion of his estimates in April of 1953 I asked him whether he was making any progress with the implementation of the Massey commission recommendation that there be established a Canada council on arts, letters and humanities. He will probably recall the answer he gave at that time, as I do.

May I ask if he has made any progress in the meantime in his attempt to interest certain individuals in accepting appointments to such a Canada council.

Mr. St. Laurent: I must be perfectly frank with the hon. member and say that I have not made any attempt to deal with that problem since I came back from my visit around the world. I had correspondence with several people prior to the session, but I must admit that since I came back from my tour I have not had any opportunity to go further with that project.

This special item is not something that deals particularly with that. It is because we did not expect, when the general estimates were prepared, that we would be able to start on the printing of the consolidation of the statutory orders and regulations during this fiscal year. We now find that it will be possible to make a start before the end of the fiscal year on printing them, and that is the reason for this supplementary item.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister does intend to pursue the matter of a Canada council when it is possible for him to do so?

Mr. St. Laurent: I was discussing it with one of my colleagues yesterday.

Item agreed to.

159. To authorize and provide for the reimbursement to the lieutenant-governors of the provinces of Canada of the costs of travelling and hospitality incurred in the exercise of their duties up to a maximum per annum for each as follows: (a) where the population of the province at the last decennial census did not exceed 500,000, $5,000; (b) where the population of the province at the last decennial census exceeded 500,000, $5,000 plus $1,000 per each 100,000 or fraction of 100,000 of population over 500,000, but not exceeding $12,000 in any case, $86,000.

Mr. Fulton: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman, until I find the place.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

The Chairman: Carried on division?

LEGISLATION

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members will find these estimates starting at page 31 and the details commencing at page 247.

202. General administration—estimates of the Clerk, $1,250,777.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is the item covering the general administration—estimates of the Clerk, and I would like to know what the situation is now with regard to the terms of employment of the protective staff of the House of Commons. We have here I think the finest corps—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I might inform him that that subject comes under the estimates of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a brief word under this item. First of all, I wonder if I could have the privilege of welcoming back to the floor of the house for a few moments our esteemed first commoner. Along with that welcome I should like to express once again my words of appreciation and commendation both to His Honour, Mr. Speaker, and to his deputy minister—I believe that is the status that is occupied by the Clerk of this house—for the excellent way in which they are administering the affairs of the House of Commons in so far as they come under their direction.

The one question I would like to put to Mr. Speaker relates to the pension situation in so far as the employees of the House of Commons are concerned. I know His Honour will recall that some years ago some of us had quite a bit to say about the desirability of having a pension plan for House of Commons employees, particularly those not otherwise covered. In the main the need for a special plan such as that which we used to advocate has been obviated by the change from the Civil Service Superannuation Act to the Public Service Superannuation Act. As I understand it the main difference between the two is that the act we now have goes beyond civil servants and includes all those employed in the public service providing they meet the conditions laid down in the Public Service Superannuation Act.

I have in my hand a very interesting little booklet prepared by the public service superannuation branch of the Department of Finance at Ottawa entitled "Your Superannuation Plan", on page 7 of which I read these words:

> With a few exceptions, this act provides that every full time employee in the public service, male or female, married or single, with an annual rate of salary of $900 or more, will start to build up his superannuation credits after no more than a year of substantially continuous employment.

I realize that under that provision any employee of the House of Commons who is here the year round, whether that employee is on a permanent or classified basis or not, is covered by the new Public Service Superannuation Act providing his or her salary is $900 or more per annum. But what about our sessional employees? I am thinking of all the people who work here for as much of the year as we require them and who may earn more than $900 for that portion of the year and come back from year to year. Are they covered? If not, is consideration being given to finding some way in which they can be covered?

Mr. Speaker: The sessional employees are not covered but it is our understanding that some consideration is being given to the establishment of some scheme or pension plan which would apply to sessional employees in the public service. As the hon. member knows, we have several employees who are hired on a sessional basis and cannot be employed otherwise because of the nature of the business which the House of Commons carries on. The house is in session only for so many months each year and therefore once the session is over we have to sever our connections with many of these employees.

Our difficulty at the moment is that once they have been in our service for 25 sessions, or 10, 15, or 20 years, we feel there should be some way of retiring them with certain compensation. As it is now, they are retired with, I believe, one month's leave together with one month's pay for every five years they have been in the service. I must point out in that connection that up until recently the system was that employees who had been working on a sessional basis or who had been working here all the year round and who were not under the Civil Service Act were upon retirement receiving only $100 together with $10 for every year of service. Take now, for example, a man who had been working here for 10 years. When he retired all he received was $100 and $10 for every year, which would mean $200 for his 10 years' service, and that would have been the end of the matter.

This situation was carefully considered and it was felt that pending any other arrangements the employees who had to be retired should be given the same benefits as those which they could enjoy if placed under the civil service commission, namely one month's retirement leave plus one month's pay for every five years' service. In other words, an employee who had been working here 10 years would receive three months' full pay. That puts them in a position which is perhaps six or seven times better than the position in which they were a few months ago.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that an improvement has been made along the lines that have been indicated with respect to employees who retire, and I welcome even more Mr. Speaker's assurance that the matter of some pension arrangement for employees in this group is under consideration. From the very good attention which the Speaker and the Clerk give to all these matters that come under their jurisdiction I know that, if they are pursuing it, it will be pursued with diligence. They certainly have my backing and, I believe, that of hon. members generally.

I just want to say this further word. I want to express the hope that as little time as possible will be lost in bringing this matter to a conclusion, for this reason amongst others. So often it happens that after a time employees who have been in a service for a certain number of years are accorded certain pension rights and with those rights is accorded the privilege of going back and covering past service. When that time comes, frequently the amount of money involved in covering past service can be quite a huge sum and it can become quite a problem for some of these people to know whether or not to try to cover that past service. For that reason I hope there will be as little delay as possible in dealing with the matter of some definite pension arrangement for all our House of Commons employees who come back year after year even although they may be on a sessional basis. I am sure I can speak for hon. members generally when I say to the Speaker and to the Clerk that, in their pursuit of this matter, they have our support.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to say a word in support of what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, and to commend Mr. Speaker for the action that has already been taken. He is well aware of the fact that there are in the House of Commons members who have already interested themselves in this problem and who are prepared to support any move that may be made along that line. The sessional employees have given and are giving faithful service. Through perhaps an oversight in the years gone by, the question of superannuation for them has not been considered. It is a welcome move now. We hope that the Speaker will be encouraged by the support he is getting from members of the committee and that he will press on with this particular needed reform.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to say that I heartily support the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I had intended to make similar comments in two or three minutes but he has taken the wind out of my sails. I shall therefore get on his boat.

Mr. Hansell: There is one point I should like to bring out. It has reference to the comparative amounts spent for help required by the office of the Leader of the Opposition and by the leaders of other groups. In the details given with regard to the office of the Leader of the Opposition I notice that there are seven on that particular staff, which is composed of a private secretary, a secretary, a clerk and four stenographers. Mr. Chairman, I would not want that number of helpers on that staff to be reduced. In fact, if the Leader of the Opposition finds that he needs even more help, I would be quite willing to say that he should have it. However, there is this point to be considered. We know that the Leader of the Opposition occupies a rather special place on the opposition benches in the House of Commons. He is recognized as the leader of the official opposition. Nevertheless, the opposition or the work of his party has no reason, particularly, to be any more effective than that of the other smaller groups. The point I want to put over to you, Mr. Chairman, is that, when it comes to the matter of performing a vital function as leaders of opposition groups, the other leaders have just as much work to do as has the Leader of the Opposition. Yet the leaders of the other groups have to be satisfied with one or two on their staff.

I am therefore putting up this plea. It seems to me that more help should be given to the leaders of the other parties in respect of secretarial help, research and that sort of thing. I know that the leader of this party is exceptionally busy. Frankly, I do not know how he is able to get through all his work and do the job he is really doing here in the House of Commons. As I say, I have no idea whatsoever of intimating that seven on the staff in the office of the Leader of the Opposition are too many. I would not say so. However, I say that the help and the staff given to the leaders of the other groups should be increased.

Item agreed to.

203. Estimates of the Sergeant-at-Arms, $726,540.

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation of the conditions of service of the protective force of the House of Commons? I have in mind particularly whether they are on a five-day week, the number of hours they work each day, and also what provisions are made for their holidays. I believe that the conditions are not nearly as favourable as they are in the civil service generally and in industry. I would ask His Honour to outline just what these conditions are and what prospects there are for improvement.

From my observations—and I think every hon. member of the committee will agree—this protective force of ours is doing a splendid job. I do not believe there is a finer force in the country. They not only have to keep order around the building but, in addition, they come in contact with hundreds of thousands of tourists every year. I do not know what is the number of tourists who go through this House of Commons in the course of a year, but I believe it runs into several hundred thousand. It is not always an easy job to handle, in a friendly and kindly way, these groups going through the building. Yet I have never known any other type of contact throughout the years I have been here. I think it is really wonderful the way these men handle the people who are in and out of the building. They of all people should have up-to-date working conditions. Perhaps His Honour could explain to us just what the conditions are at the present time?

Mr. Speaker: I agree with everything the hon. member has said with regard to the loyalty and the effectiveness of the services rendered by the members of the protective staff. The problem presented to them during a few months of the year is the additional work due to the number of welcomed tourists who come to Ottawa. This was a matter of concern to the Clerk and to myself, and we have examined the situation. Of course, in years gone by we did not have as many tourists visiting us as we now have. There are members of the protective staff who, for one reason or another, do not act as guides. There are several of them who have to perform these additional duties, and who have to take around the building these groups of students and visitors and explain to them what is to be seen around the buildings. That caused them to work during the summer months on a more active basis than those who were only doing ordinary shift work. Having that in mind, we wanted to give some adequate remuneration in order to cover this additional work. That was a very difficult problem to settle because we did not want to put one constable in a position that would be unfair compared with the position of another. It was decided that many of the corporals who do this work of guiding tourists around the building would be promoted to the rank of sergeant and would receive the additional amount of pay that that would necessarily involve. I think this went through the house recently after recommendation by the civil service commission, and if they are not now in receipt of the additional money which this promotion commands they should be receiving it very shortly.

There was another feature involved in the general promotion of corporals to the rank of sergeant. Arrangements had to be made to make sure that there would be a sergeant in charge of every shift throughout the week in order to bring about a fair distribution of the number of hours they have to work in a week. This building has to be protected every day of the week, including holidays. As far as the holidays of these men are concerned, I am not quite sure as to the exact position. The Clerk has given me certain information but I am not quite sure that I recall every detail. Perhaps I might give the correct explanation to the hon. member privately if that is agreeable to him.

However, I am certain of one thing. From conversations I have had with the chief of the protective staff and with the Sergeant-at-Arms, under whose jurisdiction the protective staffs happens to fall, I can say that there are no complaints whatsoever as to the conditions under which these men work at the moment, either with respect to hours of work or the holiday period.

Mr. Green: If I were His Honour I would not be too sure of that. I think he should make a thorough investigation to find out what the conditions are. For example, do these men get their holidays all at one time or are they given a certain length of time at one period and then further time later? I understand there is some such arrangement, and I do not see why they should not be given a proper holiday all at one time in the same way as other civil servants. I should also like to know whether or not they are on a five-day week and how long they work each day. The house has been sitting much longer than usual this session and probably will in future sessions. The time has come to review the whole situation. It may be that a larger staff is necessary. Can His Honour tell us something further about holidays, the length of the work week and the number of hours worked in a day?

Mr. Speaker: I agree with the hon. member that something will have to be done by way of establishing better conditions with respect to the number of hours these gentlemen have to work, but that is under consideration at the moment. The first move in this respect was taken by eliminating the rank of corporal and promoting the corporals to the status of sergeants, thus giving the chief of the protective staff more officers to take care of the direction of the men throughout the week.

One must keep in mind that the tourist season extends from the first of May until the first of November, and it is very difficult to arrange for the men of the protective staff to take their holidays during the summer months when most of them are employed guiding the thousands and thousands of tourists who visit the capital during those months. They are entitled to one month's holiday. With respect to holidays during the year to which they are entitled and which they are not able to take, their annual holiday is lengthened by the number of days on which they were called upon to work when they really should not have been on the job. I am talking about statutory holidays and the like.

As to the number of hours worked in a week, there are three shifts of eight hours each. However, as I said, we are looking into that situation. After all, it is not very long ago that the five-day 40-hour week was established and certain readjustment is necessary. But the difficulty is increased in the case of the protective staff because of the fact that while certain members of the force who have been here for many years do very well the ordinary work of the protective staff they do not work as guides during the tourist season. That creates difficulties in the establishment of an over-all uniform system for all the men because while they are all qualified as protective staff employees they may not all be particularly qualified for the position of guide which is an important duty that many of them have to perform in addition to their ordinary duties as members of the protective staff.

I can assure the hon. member that the point he has raised is receiving careful consideration at the moment, and we hope to be in a position to put these men on a basis which will give them full satisfaction and will be fair to all of them. So far as conditions of employment and personnel are concerned, from the contacts and conversations I have had with the gentleman referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as my deputy minister, I can say that no one is more human in his approach to these various employment problems, and I am satisfied that, having studied the matter as he has in the last few months, he will soon come forward with a recommendation that will be acceptable to hon. members.

Mr. Green: Apparently the force is not yet on the 40-hour week?

Mr. Speaker: Not quite, but they will be. We are gradually working toward that under the new system, and the first step was taken by abolishing the position of corporal in order to create more sergeants. We are on our way to establishing something which will amount to the 40-hour week.

Mr. Herridge: I shall only detain the committee for a minute or two because I presume that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is expecting a lengthy debate on his estimates. I want to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and to express my personal appreciation of the efficiency and courtesy of the protective staff, the messenger staff, the elevator staff and the other staffs of the House of Commons. They work under somewhat unusual and trying conditions at times involving on occasion long hours, and I think all members appreciate the work they do.

I also want to express my appreciation to Mr. Speaker and his deputy for their readiness to give sympathetic consideration to any staff problem that is brought to their attention. Their sense of justice and their willingness to remedy anything that appears to be wrong is in our best traditions.

Mr. Hosking: Before the item carries, I should like to bring something to the attention of the Speaker. I am not sure it has to do with his estimates, but I am sure he will bring it to the attention of the proper person. I have never seen any member of the cabinet or the Speaker visiting the peace tower, but I suggest that there are thousands and thousands of visitors who do. It would be most helpful, and a service the parliament buildings should provide, if around the peace tower, on all four sides, bronze plaques were laid on top of the ramparts so that a person could look at the plaque and easily ascertain the important historical sites and buildings around the city of Ottawa. This sort of thing is done in many monuments, and if you happen to have visited Washington monument in the District of Columbia, you will find they have very beautiful ones there, which are very helpful.

I am sure that if the members of the government had heard many of the remarks of visitors in the peace tower, they would have realized that some type of map laid on top of the ramparts of the peace tower would be of great advantage.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the words of the hon. member will reach the Department of Public Works and most careful consideration will be given to his thought.

Mr. Hansell: I do not like to rise to bring up trivial matters, especially at this late hour, but I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to one particular point. I am wondering whether or not there is close enough liaison between those who are responsible for what takes place on the lawns outside in front of the parliament buildings and the protective staff here. Very often there are festivities taking place out there, usually on a Sunday afternoon, and when you make inquiries no one seems to know what is going on. I have had that experience two or three times. Sometimes there are activities there that are very enjoyable and inspiring. I recall that two or three Sundays ago there was a parade of cadets, and it was inspiring indeed. I have yet to get any information concerning what was going on; nobody seems to know very much about it.

There is just one other matter, and that is the old problem of parking space. I know that we do not want to have the grounds marred in any way, and I would not like to see a lot of cars lined up in front of the buildings, blocking the view. I know that is a problem that the Sergeant-at-Arms has had to wrestle with, and I am going to make this suggestion. I do not suppose it is new to him. I am wondering what purpose the lawn on the west side of the west block serves. I doubt very much whether anyone goes out there very often. Could that not be paved and turned into a parking lot? I do not think it would spoil the appearance of the building at all. It is too far removed and is up on top of a hill. Very few people pass that way, and I think the area would accommodate quite a number of cars. I make these two suggestions, and it is not necessary for Mr. Speaker to reply to them. Perhaps he could take them under advisement.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

104. Departmental administration, $1,843,627.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the minister going to make any remarks?

Mr. Abbott: No, Mr. Chairman; I usually make my remarks in the course of the budget speech and on a variety of other occasions during the year. I am ready to answer questions, but I have never felt any useful purpose was served by my making any extended statement on my estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister was very generous in not adding that he could not see there was any useful purpose in anyone else making any extended remarks.

Mr. Abbott: No, I welcome that.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister is much too polite to say anything like that. However, I hope I can show my appreciation and the reputation I hope I have earned for brevity by not taking more than a few minutes. The actual finance estimates in themselves invite very little comment, because, of the $936 million which is to be voted, only $34 million is really to be voted and the rest is provided by statute. A great deal of the money to be provided is for interest on government debts, grants to provinces, and so on. There are indeed only one or two items to which I want to refer particularly.

One to which I want to refer particularly was mentioned by the Auditor General in his report, at page 33, and it has to do with advances to the old age security fund. Hon. members will recall that the fund is operated under a special act. There are three taxes earmarked for it, and for reasons which seemed inadequate to many people in this house it has been dealt with separately and has involved a special accounting problem of its own to which the Auditor General refers. There has been a deficiency, and it has had to be dealt with. The minister referred to it himself at pages 3729 and 3730 of Hansard for April 6, 1954. I wish to refer to it very briefly.

In the year 1952-53 there was a deficiency of some $99 million, which was taken care of by an advance from the consolidated revenue fund. The minister, having carried that as an asset, and that is the reason really underlying the Auditor General's comment, has now written it off out of reserves which have been built up since 1940 or 1941 and which now amount to something like $500 million or $600 million. This reserve is a genuine reserve because it has been taken year by year out of the annual receipts. The only reason I am referring to this, and I presume the only reason the Auditor General raised it, is perhaps to remind us again of the curious complicated situation which has arisen by reason of this special compartment in which we have kept the old age security fund. Perhaps the minister will later say a word as to whether he thinks that fund is coming to be anywhere near self-sustaining.

I am going to say very little about expenditures. A great deal has been said about them. Expenditures get to be like the weather, I am afraid. We talk about them, but do little or nothing. Gradually and unconsciously, and perhaps foolishly, we have slipped into a position where we apparently feel that we can afford to spend nearly $5 billion, without saying very much about it. It seems almost the other day the minister was telling us, just before the Korea episode, that he did not believe we could expect to spend much less than we were spending that year, which was $2,400 million; in other words, about half of what we are spending now. The minister said to us then that we could not spend less than that if we wanted to get the things that we were getting at the time. It was hard to argue against that—that if we wanted those things, then we had to pay for them. Our economy is operating now at a substantially higher level, of course, and those who are good at figures will no doubt tell us that we can stand a lot more than we could stand then. Actually, we are standing it, and, in a way, we are becoming rather complacent about it.

I have quoted before, and I shall quote again, what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said last February about the budget. He said it was decided that this would be a year to loosen the purse strings and step up our public works program. It is hard to expect, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce, presumably with the approval of his colleagues, makes a remark of that kind, that economy is going to be in the air. And it is not going to be in the air until people become economy minded.

At the present time it seems impossible to interest them in doing very much along that line. Nevertheless I wish to register a question about this complacent attitude. Sometimes we are not as rich as we think we are. Sometimes people who have been riding along easily and making heavy expenditures find that they would have been wiser not to do so. Indeed, there are signs now that we are coming to the proof of the pudding. We have been prospering largely by reason of huge expenditures. Certainly we have a huge productive capacity. As I go around the outskirts of the city in which I live, and see the enormous expansion taking place, sometimes I become almost alarmed —although I entirely deny the title of pessimist.

I ask myself this question: Are we sure we are going to be able to sell all these goods? I remind myself, and I also remind the committee, that one of the reasons which enter largely into our prosperity at the moment is that the government is spending a lot of money. In other words we, the taxpayers, are providing a lot of money—billions of dollars of it—which go into expenditures, and which produce the same kind of wages as any other investment. We roll along, and this money accumulates, and everything seems just grand.

But while we are doing that, and while the minister very appropriately points out the large amounts of public expenditure going into the gross national product, I point out that one aspect of these expenditures is that they are entering into our costs and increasing our costs, and if we are reaching the stage of really stiff competition, as many people believe we are, it is going to be a very important question to face.

Meanwhile I am not going to say any more about the problem of economy. We are not going to grapple with economy until there is a feeling for it abroad. That is the essence of democracy. You will hardly get a government to go very much ahead of public opinion. If the government can spend money, as they have been spending it, and go back and get elected, they just say, "So what!" They say, "Why should we not go on? The people like expenditures." And I think a good many people do. Economy comes only when we reach the stage of saying, "Can we do without it?" So long as we keep on saying, "It is very pleasant and convenient to have it"—which we have been saying—we will not get anywhere in curbing expenditures.

I know the minister feels that he is actually a kind of ogre to the other departments, that he treats them very rough, and that if it were not for him expenditures would be twice as great. And that may all be true. But I am reiterating what I have said before, that we will never get anywhere in economies until people are told, "That is what is to be spent, and no more".

As I said a moment ago, the estimates of the Department of Finance, so far as their details are concerned, do not invite much by way of comment. But the finance department has a significance which goes far beyond these actual items that we are voting this afternoon.

The tentacles of the finance department reach everywhere. Nobody can escape the long arm of the tax collector. The minister fully recognizes that in his budget speech. In fact the budget speech is really what is known in the United States as a speech on the state of the nation. That is one of the things which give the budget speech the importance that it has. In other words, we all recognize—and I am sure the minister recognizes it first of all—that tax measures cannot be considered in a vacuum.

The minister's speech covered as I said the whole state of the nation. We may think that it is always optimistic. This year I think the minister's glasses were a little bit rose-coloured and the speech had the aspects of a lullaby. But people like lullabies.

I am accused of being a pessimist, but I deny that. To those who would accuse me I would reply that I think the ministers seem to me to indulge in orgies of optimism, whereas I am only a moderate drinker. And we reach somewhat different results.

We have grown somewhat accustomed to living in a boom in Canada. It has become embodied in our thinking. And now, if we have reached a stage where there is even a levelling off, it will give us quite a shock. In other words we have to run fast to keep where we are. If there is even a flattening out it will seem like being on the skids.

The minister reviewed 1953, and declared the gross national product as satisfactory. Of course 1953 constituted a record. I should like to read very briefly one or two of the statements the minister made in commenting on 1954. As reported at page 3727 he said:

> It is clear that industry as a whole has such confidence in the future of the economy that it intends to undertake greater capital investment than ever before.

I think that is correct. Then he goes on to say:

> The expenditures of the federal government on goods and services, as well as those of provincial and municipal governments, will increase moderately this year.

And finally, on the same page:

> My general conclusion is that our national product in 1954 will be at least equal to 1953, and probably higher; in other words I think that an upswing in the second half of the year will more than compensate for the declines that are evident in certain branches of industry at present.

Now, as I say, we should remember that 1953 was a record year; and we should not be entirely disappointed if 1954 does not quite keep up. I think there are a great many signs that 1954 is not going to keep up to the 1953 level, and that we should prepare ourselves accordingly.

I want to add to what I said about the effect of government expenditures on cost. Because if we are getting into a more and more competitive field, then I think we have to remind ourselves of the portion of our selling cost which comes from taxes. I am thinking of the condition at home and abroad, but particularly abroad. Of course, at home both the sales tax and the income tax affect prices. Abroad the sales tax does not affect prices of our exports.

But, to return to the income tax, let me point out that a very considerable portion of the income tax on corporations, which yielded last year some $1,200 million, is and must be reflected in costs. The personal income tax, to the extent that it results in increased wages, is also reflected in costs.

I think we have to face the fact—and a very unpleasant fact it is—that the expectation we all had that when income tax would be spread out widely, that would make people economy minded, has not proved to be so. The income tax has in fact come to be regarded as just another deduction from pay envelopes. I think it is no exaggeration to say there is a feeling that there is almost a right, at any rate, a very strong argument, to get an increase in pay to compensate for any increase in the income tax. That is a matter which again will be significant if we are entering into a situation where we are going to face a real test of earning on these many billions of dollars of expenditures in a competitive market. The question of taxation will strike us from an angle that we have perhaps been rather insensitive to in these last years.

In his budget speech the minister did not neglect this. He told us of the difficulties that were arising. He mentioned tariff applications. I want to read two paragraphs from a recent letter of the minister. The letter is dated May 12 and is addressed to the tariff board. In this letter he directs them to conduct an inquiry into wool. The letter reads in part as follows:

> I have received numerous representations from the woollen industry in Canada to the effect that, as a result of price changes, the 50-cent maximum duty prescribed under the British preferential rate of tariff item 554b has become anomalous and unrealistic, and that, as a consequence, the industry has suffered, and is suffering, serious injury; indeed, it has been claimed that the continued existence of the industry is in jeopardy.
> Undoubtedly the Canadian government will wish to give special consideration to this tariff item, and particularly to the specific maximum thereunder, in the coming GATT renegotiations, and therefore will wish to have readily available all relevant information concerning the Canadian woollen industry and concerning as well the implications for the Canadian economy of imports of wool fabrics from the United Kingdom.

I am quite satisfied the minister wrote that letter with great unwillingness.

Mr. Abbott: No, on the contrary; I was very anxious to write it.

Mr. Macdonnell: Let me explain myself. I am quite satisfied the minister regretted the situation which had arisen to cause the writing of the letter. Let me put it that way. I perhaps should warn the minister that he will be regarded with dark suspicion by the Winnipeg Free Press for even indulging in this inquiry, but I have no doubt he will be able to satisfy them that anything—

Mr. Abbott: The minister believes in getting the facts, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am telling the minister that it may be of use to suggest that anything that he does that the Free Press does not like has been suggested to him by the naughty Tories. They will accept that explanation very readily indeed.

The minister—and this is the last reference I want to make to his prediction in the speeches—refers to the United States and to the upswing which he hopes and expects is going to come there in the last six months of the year. It seems to me that what can be fairly said of the present business situation is this. No serious person doubts the continued forward movement of Canada over the years. Nothing can prevent the development of our great resources, and the prosperity which that will bring, but nevertheless there may be minor hollows and rises in the general course. I think it is perfectly clear that since last autumn business activity has had a gentle tapering off; however I do not think anyone has the right to say there is any sign of a sharp drop. But we are at the moment in a way on the defensive, and the dynamic factors which have sped us along with almost breathless speed are, for the moment, definitely weaker. One of the questions that arise in men's minds is whether in this period of boom expansion we have built and expanded almost regardless of cost. I heard only yesterday of factories built where the costs had been vastly in excess of the estimate. That is not a new story, of course, but the person who told me this—and he was a shrewd observer—said, I sometimes wonder whether we have really had enough regard to costs. I heard the other day of one factory making the expenditure of a good many millions which is approaching completion where they were evidently perturbed. They are within a couple of months of production, but they have no business at the moment. That is one of those things that may cure itself.

It has become fashionable in certain quarters to suggest that anyone who is not going through the motions of a cheer-leader is dragging down the economy. My feeling is—and I hope we shall get something today—we are entitled to get from the government their serious assessment of the situation as it is today. It is almost three months since the minister spoke to us. He gave us his serious assessment then. We are going off now for months, and I hope he will bring us up to date today. What we want from the government is realism. We want to be treated as adults, and allowed to see the situation as it appears to the government, because sermons and admonitions are not enough. There are various classes and groups of people at the present time who are not finding it too easy and who are facing a competition such as they have not faced for some time, and of course the more competitive the situation the more serious the condition.

In a recent article of the Wall Street Journal there was a letter from the staff reporter which causes one a good deal of thought. This reporter had been here. He was reporting on the large import into Canada of United States goods, and said this:

> Moreover, the larger-scale mass production techniques of many American producers permit them to offer many of their goods at prices well below those of Canadian manufacturers whose operations are geared to smaller and therefore higher-cost output.

Then he gives this illustration, which troubles one because it brings up very vividly the position of a Canadian manufacturer. He says this:

> And look at what Empire Brass Manufacturing Company Limited has been doing. This firm, one of Canada's biggest plumbing fixture makers, in recent weeks has actually imported some United States made faucets and similar hardware and supplied them to its customers in place of its own Empire brand items. Meanwhile 800 workers at Empire's own London, Ontario, factory have been reduced to a four-day work week.

That, Mr. Chairman, just brings back to our minds the fact that for fifteen years we have been in a seller's market. Now, apparently we are in a buyer's market. The implications and results of that are definite, and could become very serious.

As to exports abroad, I am going to say nothing. We have had the classic question of wheat debated here, and I am not going to do more that remind people that it is a kind of symbol of what other exporters are going to find as well. I have referred to the optimism of the ministers. That is good; nobody wants anything else, but I want to mention in passing that some groups in Canada may be disposed to query this optimism. I refer to the textile people, and I need not do more than mention the letter which the minister has written. Then there are the electrical appliance people. I have already referred to Empire Brass. Farm income is down from $2,154 million after expansion and depreciation in 1951 to $1,900 million in 1952 and $1,656 million in 1953. These are the latest figures I could get. Business failures are troublesome. In the first quarter of 1954 they jumped to 680 compared with 382 last year, and liabilities jumped to $17,660,000 as against $7,151,000. These are serious things.

I come to the question of the maritimes, and I want to mention only what was said yesterday about the failure to decentralize. I think that is a place where we can legitimately complain against the government because I think there have been neglected opportunities with regard to the position of the maritimes. When we consider the amounts we spent, first of all during the war, and even more important perhaps, since the war, I can see no reason why more could not have been done. I have in mind the answers given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If we had a real sense of solidarity here and a feeling that our country cannot be prosperous if a substantial section is unprosperous, then I think a more co-operative attitude might have been taken with regard to the maritimes. There is trouble in the retail trade and I shall do nothing more than refer to a speech made by Mr. Burton of Simpsons-Sears the other day in which he, himself a huge retailer, referred, with sympathy and understanding and I am sure sincerity, to the position of the smaller retailers and, incidentally, remarked on the injuries which they were suffering by that ill-omened piece of legislation, the Resale Price Maintenance Act of two years ago.

Now, we come to the United States tariff attitude and I quote from a statement made in Montreal the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as reported in the Montreal Gazette for June 17:

> There is an obvious surge in the world today towards freer trade, Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, said here last night. And he told 150 commonwealth business leaders that their countries had made "great progress in getting rid of import controls which were rendered necessary by the post-war emergency."

If one considers the over-all situation it seems to me the minister had the wrong word because we cannot talk about this situation without including the United States; and to say there is any "surge" in the United States today towards freer trade is just a misuse of words. I am afraid that if we were accurate we would say that the tide is ebbing and not flowing. At the present time there is an anxiously awaited report from the federal tariff commission, I think it is called, in which it is greatly feared that zinc, lead, and fillets may be affected, which, added to the other things already affected, would certainly not be a good thing for our exporters.

Again, Mr. Chairman, one cannot ask the government for unreasonable things, but one can, I think, ask them for direct answers to direct questions, and I suggest we are not getting them. The situation reminds me a little of the exercises in our French textbooks at school, which I have mentioned before in this house which were in the form of question and answer and often the answer had nothing to do with the question. For example, the question would be, "Have you the pen of the teacher?" and the answer would be, "No, but I have the knife of the butcher." In the same way, when we ask the Minister of Finance questions, imagine for example when a manufacturer comes to him and asks him if he can do anything to help him cut down costs, or do anything about taxes, the minister would reply, "No, but you remember me speaking about sharpening pencils, curtailing the cost of management, and making labour more efficient." In addition, if I may paraphrase the answer which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given to those who asked, have you sold the 1953 crop, his answer might be, "No, but we had 32·5 per cent of the world wheat trade during 1951-52."

Now, Mr. Chairman, no doubt you and the minister will be glad to know that I am almost finished, and again I might urge that what we are asking of the government is quite reasonable and that I hope the minister will make a statement today. We want the problem stated. Of course, our future is bright in the main but there are special problems at the moment and I would like to hear the government's assessment of these problems. I think we are entitled to ask the government to give us a much better performance than has been the case in the maritimes. I think their efforts at decentralization have been weak and ineffective in the extreme. If in past history there had not been much broader and more courageous views than those adopted by the government at this moment, we would not be where we are today.

Another thing I want to mention is the purchases from Britain, mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Eglinton, and I want to reiterate what he said then about the remark of Mr. Duncan of the Massey-Harris Company, who advanced the view that by switching seven per cent of the United States purchases to the United Kingdom we could balance our trade with the United Kingdom. That, of course, brings in the whole question of defence purchases from the United Kingdom which seem to me to be far below what they might be.

The last point I wish to make is on the possibility of a commonwealth conference which has already been mentioned here today; and I wish to remind you again, Mr. Chairman, of what I quoted a few moments ago from the Minister of Trade and Commerce in which he spoke about what had been done by the United Kingdom. One would hope, not for a policy of restrictionism but a policy of liberalizing trade if and when such a conference is held.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the comments I wish to make. I feel that we might well hope that the minister will, pursuant to what he did almost three months ago, let us know how the problem looks now from where he sits.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of inflicting a long speech on the committee at this stage of the proceedings, because after all we have had a number of discussions on monetary policy at the various stages of the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act.

However, there are a couple of matters I wish to draw to the attention of the minister, and a couple of problems which were raised on several occasions during the discussion on the Bank Act to indicate that certain happenings have created a situation which poses a rather serious problem.

I think the minister would agree that the grain growers of western Canada today are facing a very difficult situation, in part from the fact that a large amount of grain has not been sold and in part from the fact that there has been a serious drop in prices during the past year to the extent where the price of wheat has fallen by over 30 cents a bushel. That is not going to affect merely the grain growers. That situation is going to have an adverse effect upon the whole of Canada, because we know that when the prices of farm commodities decrease the sale of products of eastern Canada become seriously reduced in the west.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance stated that government intervention or expenditure is not a cure for the problems of those industries when supply has temporarily outrun demand at home and abroad. The basic solution for those industries must be to produce more efficiently, eliminate waste, reduce costs, and search for new markets. The minister's statement to that effect can be found at page 3727 of Hansard.

While I think we will all agree with the soundness of that statement, nevertheless I think the minister should also have added that the situation might require a change in government policy in order to meet that situation, and a change in certain government monetary policies. In so far as agriculture producing more efficiently is concerned, I believe they are producing as efficiently now as any other industry in this country. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture in their brief made, I believe, that statement, and I think their brief supports that contention. Consequently, I doubt very much whether it is possible for agriculture today to reduce their costs any further than they already have. They have eliminated labour costs wherever possible by utilizing the most modern machinery and, from the experience I have had with agriculture, and it covers a period of around 40 years, I believe agriculture is operating very efficiently.

I would agree that somehow or other we will have to reduce agricultural costs in order to feed the world. The Minister of Agriculture, speaking before the FAO conference, stated that the cost of agricultural products in this country was so high that he doubted whether other countries could afford to buy them. If that statement is true, are we just going to sit down and lose our markets, or are we going to do everything in our power to make it possible for our agricultural products to compete with those of other nations in the world?

How could the minister help in that situation? There are two things that I think this government could do that would help agriculture in that matter; not only would it help agriculture but I think it would help all other exporters. First of all, there is the question of the value of the Canadian dollar.

Does the minister believe that it is really an advantage to the people of Canada to maintain the Canadian dollar at a level higher than that of the currency of any other country in the world? If our dollar was back to the level at which it was when it was 90 per cent of the United States dollar, the farmers would be receiving approximately another 20 cents a bushel for their wheat. Of course the same thing would be true with regard to other agricultural products that were exported.

The minister might argue that all other exporters are in the same position, but that is not quite true because the price of agricultural products in Canada is determined by the price at which they are sold abroad. That is not altogether true of secondary industries. They very often maintain two price systems. They sell at one price in Canada and at another price externally. But in Canada the domestic price of farm products is governed entirely by the external price. Therefore when a drop takes place abroad, the price of the commodity in Canada falls at the same time.

I do not think the minister would suggest that that is a matter that is beyond the control of the government. I think the minister would agree that there are many ways in which this government could control the value of the Canadian dollar. Of course I know he will say that if you drop the value of the Canadian dollar, it is going to cost us more for our imports. I think the main thing at the present time is to try to sell more exports. In order to do that we have got to maintain our goods at competitive prices. At the present time we are having to compete with nations whose currency in every case is depreciated below United States currency. That fact has placed us in a very difficult position. Of course the United States is a competitor of ours. Our currency is even above that of the United States. That is one step that the government can take that I think would greatly help the agricultural exporter.

Then there is another matter which I think deserves consideration. It is one that I have raised many times in the House of Commons since 1945. I think probably my contention will bear more weight today because there are many more people today who realize the truth or the soundness of what we have advocated since 1945, namely that it is the responsibility of an exporting country to accept the currency of importing nations for a proportion of its exports.

The United States have been selling surplus farm products under the United States mutual security act since 1951, and the foreign currency they have accepted has been used for the purpose of financing defence projects. Now, however, they are considering going far beyond that. In the U.S. News and World Report I notice a statement showing that there is to be quite a change in the administration's policy with regard to the acceptance of sterling and other foreign currencies. I put this quotation on Hansard on June 15, as reported at page 5997. I am therefore not going to quote the whole thing at this time. It is interesting, however, to note that it is a disposal plan for farm surpluses and that it has received the administration's approval. Besides being utilized for financing defence projects it can be used for the following purposes:

> In addition, the president would be authorized to use the foreign money for local improvements in the buying country, to pay U.S. obligations there, to buy military equipment, to help develop new markets for U.S. farm products, or for loans to promote world trade.

In fact, it could be used for almost anything. Now it points out that they expect to be able to have better trade with India because they would accept rupees instead of demanding American dollars. That policy is bound to affect the farmers in this country because we are having to compete with the United States in the sale of our commodities.

If the United States are going to sell their farm products to the other countries of the world and to accept their currencies instead of demanding American dollars whilst we in Canada insist upon their paying us in Canadian dollars, it is quite easy to believe that many of those nations, lacking Canadian or American dollars, will buy from the United States instead of buying from Canada because they will have the wherewithal with which to buy. I hope the minister will be able to tell us whether or not any consideration is being given to that matter.

I suppose the minister might say we are doing it to a modified extent under the Colombo plan and that is true; under the Colombo plan we accept the currency of other nations, and then that currency is invested in projects within the country concerned. But that is only done to a modified degree, to the extent of some $25 million I believe. It therefore has little effect upon our trade as a whole.

The minister may say that we could not afford to do it and he may ask: What would we do with a lot of foreign currency? On the other hand I claim that where we have surplus goods that we cannot sell, we could very well afford to do it because if we do not sell those surplus commodities, what will happen? The producers of those surplus commodities are going to be told, as they are being told from day to day by the financial press, that they cannot expect to sell goods that are not wanted, that they must realize that in the final analysis there is only one law, namely the law of supply and demand. If therefore these producers are going to have to be governed by the law of supply and demand, there is only one thing that they can do and that is to reduce their production or cut their production down to the point where there will be a greater demand for their goods, so that the demand equals the reduced supply. Then the price will go up and the surplus will disappear. But if that is done, we lose those exports entirely.

It would be far better to export those goods at the present time and to accept foreign currencies for them rather than to reduce our production so that there are no surplus goods. I would say that for anyone to suggest that the solution is to cut our production is to take a defeatist attitude. It is taking the attitude that we have got to reduce our production in order to obtain a fair price. I think it would be far better to maintain our production at a high level so long as that production is needed in any part of the world. There is no question today that our production is needed. It is largely a matter of financing. If we are willing to do as the United States apparently are now doing, namely to accept the currency of other nations, I think we would find it much easier to dispose of our surplus commodities.

There is one other point I wish to refer to. A great deal of concern is being felt over the present price of agricultural products. I would point out to the minister that he cannot suggest that the farmers of this country should be prepared to compete with the farmers of other countries, because that is not the situation. The farmers of this country are not having to compete with the farmers of the United States. The farmers of this country are now having to compete with the United States treasury because the United States treasury is underwriting the price of farm products. When the United States cut the price of wheat by 10 cents a bushel it therefore was not the farmers that took that loss because the United States government has underwritten the price of wheat at $2.20 a bushel.

Mr. Abbott: I hate to interrupt my hon. friend, Mr. Chairman, but do we have to discuss wheat again on my estimates?

Mr. Quelch: I am only discussing wheat to the extent that the price of wheat or the sale of wheat is affected by the policy of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance can greatly affect the sale of wheat or any other commodity either by accepting foreign currency in payment or by changing the value of the Canadian dollar. We raised that matter in the banking and commerce committee. We asked Mr. Graham Towers whether or not he thought it would be advisable to reduce the value of the Canadian dollar. He said that was a matter that he would discuss only within four walls in giving advice to the government. He was not prepared to make a statement outside. The minister, however, represents the government. He is not under that same limitation. I hope he will be in a position either to justify maintaining the Canadian dollar at the present rate or to give us some indication that, in the near future, there will be removed the handicap which the farmers are under as a result of having to sell under an appreciated dollar. Those are the only two points I want to raise at the present time.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I feel I should perhaps say a word about what has been said by the two hon. members. I listened with a good deal of interest to what the hon. member for Greenwood had to say. By tradition I suppose it is possible to cover a fairly wide field on the first item of the estimates of any particular department. He certainly covered the waterfront.

Mr. Macdonnell: I just tried to imitate the minister in a small way.

Mr. Abbott: I do not intend to imitate him in that respect. It is a tradition that once a year the Minister of Finance makes a comprehensive and considered statement of the financial and economic position of the country and ventures into the field of prophecy. In the eight years that I have been Minister of Finance I have only ventured into that hazardous field once a year. I do not intend to break that precedent now. As a matter of fact I think it is undesirable that the minister should attempt from month to month to make new prophecies about the condition of the economy. If something radical happened it perhaps would be wise to try to give some indication, but I shall content myself with saying that nothing that has happened since I delivered my budget speech two or three months ago has caused me to change the qualified forecasts which I made in that speech.

The hon. member referred to the advances to the old age security fund. There again I dealt with that in my budget speech. I indicated that I expected there would be a further deficit in the coming year of somewhere between $40 million and $50 million and that under ordinary circumstances it perhaps would be prudent to increase the contribution in order to take care of that. I did say that it seemed to me this was not a year in which one should increase taxes if that could be avoided, and therefore I postponed making any recommendation.

The hon. member for Acadia has raised two points with which I will deal briefly. I agree with him it is extremely unfortunate that the price of one of our great export commodities, grain, wheat in particular, has fallen to the extent to which it has fallen. That has been dealt with at some length by my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is due, as we appreciate, to a series of big crops not only in this country but in other countries. The hon. member suggested that exports of wheat might be helped by a depreciation of the Canadian dollar. We have a free exchange now. The government does not attempt to influence the level at which the Canadian dollar is quoted in terms of other currencies. That is the position which we have taken since we freed the Canadian dollar in September of 1950.

I am not one of those who believe in the competitive depreciation of currencies. I believe that when a nation depreciates its currency the advantages are very short-run indeed. We had experience with fixed exchange rates and exchange controls over a considerable number of years. That was necessary, I think, under war conditions, but the experience after the war was not too happy. I am sure a good many members of the committee will recall the drastic import restrictions which we had to put in effect in 1947 when we tried to defend the fixed exchange rate of the Canadian dollar at that time. I would hesitate to invite a repetition of that experience.

Therefore I do not believe that any action which the Canadian government might take to put a fixed exchange value on the Canadian dollar could possibly be successful without pretty drastic exchange controls. I for one would not be prepared to recommend at this time a return to that form of control.

As to taking sterling for our exports of wheat, that is not a new suggestion. Again, that was dealt with by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the course of his remarks. I do not know of any country today in which we can sell substantial quantities of wheat for sterling, and certainly not in the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom is interested in the price of wheat but not in purchasing it for sterling. So far as India is concerned today, they are not buying wheat at all. They have notified the international wheat agreement that they do not want to take their quota. They have had a fine rice crop, a good grain crop, and they do not need wheat and are not going to buy any substantial quantity.

I understand the Poles are short of wheat, and we might take some Polish zlotys, if that is the currency that is prevalent in Poland, but I do not know just what we would do with them. I doubt if that would receive very widespread support. Taking foreign currencies for any commodity, which we do not need for purchases in the area from which we take it, is simply selling that commodity on credit and, as I have said before, assuming not only the credit risk but the exchange risk as well.

My hon. friend referred to United States sales for local currencies. I am told these are on a very limited scale. They have made some sales to Spain and they are going to use the proceeds in Spanish pesetas to pay for air bases in Spain. We are not building any air bases in Spain. I believe there are other modest sales of a similar character, but I am personally convinced that even if we were prepared to extend credit by selling for local currencies it would not substantially increase our sales of wheat. I do not know if there is any other point.

Mr. Quelch: May I ask a question? The minister has read statements from time to time by officials of the United Kingdom blaming their reduction of purchases from Canada, especially farm products, on the fact that they have not got the dollars to pay for them. They may be just whistling in the air, but they keep coming over here and making that statement. It has been made by a number of their representatives.

Mr. Abbott: They are trying to urge us to buy more in the United Kingdom. They would like to get into our market as a substitute for somebody else, and if they can do it competitively they can get in here. There is nothing to prevent them. They have a preference so far as tariffs are concerned over the United States, but they are not interested in buying wheat or any other commodity on credit today, whether it is in sterling or anything else.

Mr. Quelch: Why would the United States be widening the use of foreign currencies if they did not think they were going to gain markets by doing so? According to a statement appearing in the U.S. News and World Report, they are going to widen the purposes for which foreign currencies can be used. They are not merely going to use them for investment in defence projects but utilize them for practically anything at all.

Mr. Abbott: The information I have does not coincide with the information my hon. friend has read in the U.S. News and World Report.

Mr. Quelch: It does not coincide with that?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Michener: With respect to departmental administration, I notice there is an item for professional and special services which is a recurring item in most of the departmental accounts. Would the minister explain what kind of expenditure is covered by that item, professional and special services? I see the amount is $7,000 for this year, but there are no details in the public accounts.

Mr. Abbott: That provides for legal fees and court costs that may have to be paid by the Department of Finance in the coming fiscal year. That will include the expenses of court cases, if any, which have to be settled or disposed of under the old wartime prices and trade board administration and the foreign exchange control administration. We still have a number of those cases which are going through the courts, and that is what the item is intended to cover.

Mr. Michener: Mostly professional services.

Mr. Abbott: Right.

Mr. Michener: In the absence of the hon. member for Hamilton West I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that whereas last year there were two office girls and one office boy on his general staff it appears that this year there will be two office boys. I know that will not be very popular with the hon. member for Hamilton West and is not in line with the practice of the department presided over by the acknowledged feminist, the Secretary of State. I notice he has one office girl whereas he had one office boy last year.

Mr. Abbott: I understand the lady has been promoted. We still have her on strength but her remplacante is an office boy.

Item agreed to.

Administration of various acts and costs of special functions—

107. The Bank Act—salaries and expenses of the inspector general of banks' office, $35,670.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to take this occasion of expressing the feeling which those of us who are on the banking and commerce committee had, that we were fortunate in our inspector of banks.

Mr. Abbott: I most heartily endorse the sentiment, and I thank my hon. friend for voicing it.

Item agreed to.

108. Administration of the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, and the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, 1946, $86,465.

Mr. Quelch: If the present situation continues in the west and the farmers are not able to sell their grain and thereby have difficulty meeting their payments under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, I hope the government will be very lenient in allowing the banks to extend the period of time over which these loans may be repaid. I understand the banks have to get permission from the government before they can extend the period of time over which these repayments are made.

Mr. Hansell: May I ask the minister whether the functions of the farm loan board under the Farm Improvement Loans Act are determined—

Mr. Abbott: Those are two different things, of course. Under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the loans are made to the banks. The farm loan board is a crown corporation which has the function of making mortgage loans on farms.

Mr. Hansell: Under what item does that come?

Mr. Abbott: There is no vote for the farm loan board because it is an independent crown corporation.

Mr. Hansell: The policy of the board is not governed by the government itself?

Mr. Abbott: Well, it is governed by the government itself because the members of the board are appointed by the government, but it is a self-sustaining organization just as is Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I could try to answer any questions my hon. friend wanted to ask.

Mr. Hansell: My question is this. There are some areas in Alberta where the farm loan board will not make loans. Is that decision made by the farm loan board itself or has the government any influence in that respect?

Mr. Abbott: Any decision of that kind must be made by the farm loan board. I was not aware that was the case, but that is a decision that would be made by the management of the farm loan board.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of the Royal Canadian Mint and the assay office, Vancouver, B.C.—

110. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,145,465.

Mr. Michener: This is always a very interesting operation, namely the operation of the mint. I think I read, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian government was minting a new nickel coin made of nickel. I wonder if the minister would give us an indication of how much it costs to make a nickel?

Mr. Abbott: I doubt if I have got that information. We are changing back to the five-cent coin made of nickel, which was discontinued when that material was in critical short supply. My information is that the changeback will be on January 1, next. As to the breakdown of the cost of making that coin, I doubt if we would have that breakdown. There is a profit. The mint operates at a profit, but I do not think we have the breakdown of cost as between minting subsidiary coins and the minting of 25 cent, 50 cent and one dollar silver pieces.

Mr. Michener: I take it there is a running account for it, an account for the silver and the nickel which is accredited with the value of the coinage that is minted and offset by the cost of minting and redeeming it. It would be interesting to know, within an approximate figure, how much it costs to make these new nickel coins.

Mr. Abbott: I am sorry, but I have not that detailed information here. I have no doubt it is available. I have some gross figures in the report of the Royal Canadian Mint, and no doubt my friend has seen them, for the calendar year 1953. There are some gross figures and the totals of expenditure which shows an excess of income over expenditure for the mint as a whole of some $3,800,000. I have not a breakdown as between the individual mint operations.

Mr. Michener: I appreciate these coins have to be minted, but if I could just get that figure I should be happy to have it.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be happy to try and get it and send it to my friend.

Mr. Michener: Would this be the proper place to ask about the amount of gold bullion the government has accumulated and whether during the past year the government has accumulated all the newly mined gold submitted to it by the mines of Canada?

Mr. Abbott: I believe that appears in the report of the exchange fund account. I have published those figures monthly, showing the proportion of gold. At the end of May, 1954, the official holdings of gold were $1,027·3 million, and the total gold processed for the mint in the calendar year 1953—I shall have to get that figure.

Mr. Michener: Practically all the newly mined gold, I take it, is being retained.

Mr. Abbott: I would think so, and perhaps a bit more. There is, of course, a small amount of gold that is sold on the free market, as my hon. friend knows. Then, there is a further amount that is supplied for the use of the arts. I have not a breakdown here as to the actual figure at the end of May.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Is there any gold purchased from any other source than Canadian producers?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Macdonnell: To show how right the hon. member for St. Paul's was in saying how interesting the mint was, I might say that I had a school boy visiting me here. It was his duty to go back and report on what he had seen, and I was invited to be present. He gave a most eloquent speech all about the mint and did not even mention the fact that there was such a thing as the House of Commons here.

Inadvertently, Mr. Chairman, I missed the tariff board item. The minister, in his speech three months ago, indicated that applications were mounting and—

Mr. Abbott: Are we reverting to 109, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: I called item 109 but I think the hon. member might raise his question now.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the minister say anything in addition to what he said in his budget speech as to the indication of tariff-mindedness, let us say, arising. We have seen the minister's letter with regard to wool, and it may be he thinks that with that, and what he said in his budget speech, he has nothing to add. If he took that position, I would not press him, but if he could tell us anything more about it, we would be happy to hear it. We have been in the position for 15 years, really, of having tariffs, you might say almost, let out of our lives, with all their complexity. They seem to be coming back, and if the minister can say anything about it, it might be useful.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps this might be interesting to my hon. friend. Since 1949 the board has made a number of inquiries into customs tariff on subjects which have been referred by the Minister of Finance. At present there are four references before the board, the most recent one being the inquiry into woven woollen goods under tariff item 554B. Since 1949 the board has had 160 appeals lodged with it from decisions of the Department of National Revenue, of which 11 are still pending, and there are 10 I believe that have been appealed to the exchequer court. I believe it will be apparent the board has been pretty active in recent years.

Item agreed to.

112. Administration of employees' instalment purchase plan, including sale and delivery of Canada savings bonds to government employees, and of employees' group insurance plans, $133,451.

Mr. Macdonnell: This item is concerned with the annual amortization of bond discount, premiums and commissions. I notice there is an increase of $6 million.

Mr. Abbott: This is vote 112?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, it is at the top of page 17.

Mr. Abbott: No, that is a statutory item. My friend has the wrong item. Vote 112 concerns administration of employees instalment purchase plan.

Item agreed to.

Contingencies and miscellaneous—

114. To provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses including authority to re-use any sums repaid to this appropriation from other appropriations, and special compensation or other rewards for inventions or practical suggestions for improvements, $1,000,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to ask a question regarding the large increase in the amortization item at the top of page 17.

Mr. Abbott: That is a statutory item.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: That is the annual statutory item for amortization of bond discount, premiums and commissions on new bond issues. The explanation is that bonds totalling $200 million at 2¼ per cent for two years and four months were sold March 1, 1953, at 97·85 per cent less commission, and on November 1, 1953, $700 million was sold, $400 million 2¼ per cent bonds due July 1, 1955, at 98·00 per cent and $300 million 3 per cent bonds due May 1, 1958, at 97·15 per cent.

As these are mainly short-term loans the annual amortization charges for discounts and commissions are high and exceed completed or reduced amortization on matured or maturing issues by some $6 million.

The bonds are issued at a discount. The bond discount and the interest rate reflect the true interest rate.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the minister spell out the actual interest rate involved in the transaction?

Mr. Abbott: That was done when the bonds were issued. I cannot say offhand what it was. It is a mathematical calculation.

115. Cost of telephone service at Ottawa for all departments, $987,400.

Mr. Michener: This deals with telephone expense. Would the minister indicate how the telephone expense of the civil service is handled. I note that in each of the departmental estimates there is an item for telephone expense. We have here an item headed, "Cost of telephone service at Ottawa for all departments". That, I take it, is the actual cost to the Bell Telephone Company in this city for telephones in all departments.

Mr. Abbott: Yes; the Department of Finance carries the cost of the maintenance of Bell Telephone Company connections throughout the various departments of government in the Ottawa city area. That includes departmental direct lines, local and private, branch exchange equipment, operators' salaries, cost of printing the government telephone directory and so on. The item in the individual votes would relate, I presume, to the long distance calls made by those departments, as well as out-of-town telephones. But this item covers only the Ottawa telephone service. If various departments have, as most of them would, telephones in other areas, those would be included in the departmental vote.

Mr. Michener: I note at the end of the item there is a credit for the amount recoverable for salaries and other expenses from other government departments using the Toronto switchboard service. The amount is $84,200. What is the mechanics of that arrangement?

Mr. Abbott: I will get that information. It is an inter-office credit, of course, as my hon. friend will appreciate.

Mr. Michener: It seems to indicate that the Toronto telephone arrangement is like the Ottawa one.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that we operate a switchboard in Toronto which is paid for in this vote, and we charge it back to other departments.

Mr. Noseworthy: Who is responsible for the fact that the departmental telephone directory we receive for use is always a year behind?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid my department must take the responsibility, but I am not sure why the delay occurs.

Item agreed to.

116. Amount required to cover losses incurred on foreign exchange tendered in payment of accounts receivable, $5,000.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I should like to inquire about this item for a dollar. It seems to me a few years ago one of these dollar items moved the film board to Montreal.

Mr. Abbott: This is not a dollar item. The dollar mentioned there is an appropriation not required; it is a balancing item.

Mr. Michener: Under what item would we discuss payroll costs, including superannuation payments? If it has been passed I would ask the minister about the increase in the contribution to the superannuation account. It was $16 million last year and it is $39 million this year, or an increase of about $22 million.

Mr. Abbott: It is a statutory item, but I shall give an explanation. We have not yet reached it, but I shall have the information for the hon. member when we do reach it.

Mr. Knowles: Item 653 deals with superannuation, and I shall have one or two questions to ask when we reach it. Perhaps this information could be given then.

Mr. Abbott: I have the information here. The substantial increase is mainly attributable to the influx of approximately 60,000 so-called temporary employees as contributors to the superannuation account. The remainder is attributable to such things as increased permanencies in 1953, promotions and the like. In classifying those persons as permanent, and making them eligible for superannuation, the government had to pay into the fund an amount sufficient to cover the government's share.

Mr. Michener: Is the superannuation fund maintained for the federal civil service on a sound actuarial basis, or is it a fund that is being built up, and is not yet on a sound basis?

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend will recall —I am not sure whether he was in the house at the time—I tabled a report made by the Department of Insurance. That was the last actuarial report. It showed at that time a substantial deficit on an actuarial basis. The government is taking steps to correct that situation. We have paid into the fund, I believe, some $175 million toward making up the deficit, and have indicated that a further amount will be paid in as it becomes possible to do so. But in the meantime the full actuarial deficit is carried as a deficit, and the interest is paid each year—credited year by year—on that deficit. So I think it is quite correct to say that the fund is on an actuarially sound basis.

Item agreed to.

652. Comptroller of the treasury—central office and branch offices administration—further amount required, $167,010.

Mr. Michener: I should like to ask a question about the university grants. I realize we have passed it, but I notice it is a little larger than last year. My information is that the total university population has been declining since war-veteran students have graduated.

Mr. Abbott: That is all the better for the universities, because the grant is based upon total population, not university population. It is 50 cents per head of population as determined by the bureau of statistics; and the grant is then divided among the eligible universities, based upon university enrolments. So that if there are a smaller number they would get a higher per capita amount.

Mr. Dinsdale: If I might refer to the matter of university grants, I believe the national conference of Canadian universities recommended changing the base of payment from 50 cents per head of our population to a basis of $125 per student. The chief reason for this suggested change arises from the fact that the maritime provinces in particular are somewhat discriminated against on the present basis. I wonder if the minister has given consideration to this recommendation.

Mr. Abbott: Various suggestions have been made, of course, that the base does operate somewhat unfairly in respect of certain provinces. But on balance the government feels the present arrangement which is based on provincial population and enrolment in universities is as fair as can be worked out at this time.

Mr. Coldwell: Unfortunately, I was out of the chamber when item 113 was called. I notice that last week when I was away, incidentally, the minister said, as reported at page 6047 of Hansard, in connection with the Municipal Grants Act:

> When that item is called we shall have an opportunity to discuss the matter and I can indicate, in a general way, the nature of the amendments which the government has in mind.

Mr. Abbott: We can revert to that for a moment. Perhaps I might say this to my hon. friend. There is something in excess of $3 million which will be paid out to various municipalities which qualify this fiscal year. I suppose it would be inappropriate for me to indicate in detail the provisions of the proposed legislation, but I can say this. It is estimated that it will involve an annual expenditure of something of the order of $6 million in all, and will approximately double the number of municipalities which will be eligible to receive a grant under the act. Other than that I do not suppose I had better say anything at this time. As I indicated in my statement, it would be available for the calendar year 1955.

653. Superannuation and retirement acts, administration—further amount required, $13,837.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say just a few words on item 653. First of all, I must confess that the last time I addressed a few words to the Minister of Finance on the plight of superannuated civil servants, namely, the great numbers of those already retired, I thought it would be the last time I would be doing so. I thought that by the time today rolled around the Minister of Finance might have left us. I am glad he is still with us.

Mr. Abbott: Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: Since he is still with us, I hope he will even yet give consideration to this matter. I have no intention of repeating the many arguments—I think strong arguments—which I have given to the minister in years gone by since he first came into the Department of Finance as to why the government, as a model employer, should do something about the pensions of retired civil servants, particularly those in the lower brackets. I agree with his contention that the Public Service Superannuation Act, as it now stands, is an excellent pension plan; certainly for those who are now in the public service the minister and the government have done well. But in the case of those who retired before the plan was put on its present excellent basis, and in the case of those who retired at such a time that their pension was calculated on the basis of the years when their rates of pay were very low, the situation is certainly nothing of which the government as an employer can be proud. I urge as strongly as I can once again that something should be done to supplement the pensions of those people.

The minister knows what the figures are, and people generally must know because I have put them on the record, and they have been published in the press a good many times. There are far too many of these faithful servants who are on pensions of $20, $30, $40 and $50 a month, which I submit is not good enough for the government of Canada.

One of the arguments the minister has advanced from time to time—I am going to confine myself today to just one argument and one reply to him—is that this pension is on the basis of a contractual relationship. He says that these people paid certain amounts into the fund at the time they were employed, and they knew what the arrangement was. He says that if you alter the amount of the pension now, it would upset that contractual arrangement. I submit, Mr. Chairman, there are other instances which are somewhat similar, where increases have been made.

I have told the minister about other governments and other private bodies until, if he has kept all the material I have given him, he must have quite a file on the matter. I want to give him one more example, one that I happen to know about in a personal way. Perhaps that is the reason I have not referred to it in the past. I happen to belong to a trade union, the International Typographical Union, which has a pension plan of its own, a very good pension plan, good enough at any rate that the Department of National Revenue has approved it.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is going to have two pensions, then?

Mr. Knowles: As long as the Minister of Finance is around they will both be taxable, and as long as I stay in parliament I will not draw either of them.

In regard to the pension under the International Typographical Union, I would like to point this out. The amount of that pension used to be $10 a week or $520 a year. During the past ten years or twelve years it has been increased, step by step, until at the present time it is $20 a week or $1,040 a year. Does the minister suppose that that union pays the higher rate of pension only to those who have gone on pension since the rate was increased? Not a bit of it! That higher pension of $20 a week, or $1,040 a year, is paid to all of those who are on the pension, including those who went on it when it was only $10 a week, and including those who were contributing to it when the amounts paid into the fund were a great deal smaller than they are at the present time. I have given that example because it is one the details of which I happen to be familiar with. I know there are many other plans like that.

I want to say to the minister quite frankly that I do not think the government has a leg to stand on in insisting that it cannot do something for these people. If the minister wants to do something that will really give him a place in the hall of fame before he lays down the portfolio of finance, I suggest he pay some attention to the plight of these people and make some arrangement to increase the amount of the pensions of those already retired, particularly those in the lower brackets.

Mr. Abbott: There is no purpose in my rehashing the points which I have made before. Whatever may be done under the International Typographical Union pension plan—I am sure it is very generous—we are dealing with taxpayers' money here. These things have to be paid for out of taxes levied on all the taxpayers of Canada, and a great many of those who have had to provide for their old age by contractual arrangements or otherwise do not get any automatic increase in their pensions, with this exception, that we have introduced in the last few years the old age pension plan of $40 at age 70. Most of those pensioners to whom my hon. friend refers are very elderly people, people whose small pensions are due to the comparatively short time of their service in the public service. They benefit from the $40 old age pension, payable at age 70. That, incidentally, does not apply to some of the countries to which he has referred where civil servants' pensions were increased.

Mr. Knowles: I want to add one word, Mr. Chairman. The minister says that this has to be paid for out of the money of the taxpayers. The plan to which I have referred is paid for out of the money contributed by the members of the union. What happens in that case is that the older members who contributed smaller amounts in years gone by are getting larger pensions now because those who are now working are paying in larger amounts. I am proud to belong to a union that recognizes that principle, and I should like to see this government, and society as a whole, recognize it, too.

Mr. Dinsdale: I would like to say a word on this item. I recall last year there was discussion along this line on one particular problem. It was a rather extended discussion at the time and it related to the peculiar position of the former employees of the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment and the soldier settlement board. I followed the discussion last year with a good deal of interest, as did a good many hon. members in this chamber. Apparently the arguments that were put forward impressed the minister because he promised to give the matter serious consideration. The crux of the problem is that the employees of these two departments were not in a position to become permanent employees because of a policy decision and as a result they did not benefit on the five-year basis for superannuation, which is the right of superannuated civil servants under part II of the superannuation act of 1924. The minister made the statement that if any erroneous decision had been made he would be glad to consider the whole situation and if he became convinced that any substantial injustice in principle had been done he would be glad to give consideration to ways and means of redressing it. I would like to know what the present status of this special group of employees is.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I promised last year that I would have a very extensive individual investigation made of these cases. It is not a new question, as I think hon. members realize, and it has come up here several times before. Legal opinion has been obtained on it and it has been refused before. I had a detailed investigation made of this particular case and I have a very long statement here with which I frankly hesitate to weary the committee. In essence I can sum it up by reading the last two paragraphs:

> After giving careful consideration to all arguments that have been advanced, I cannot be persuaded that the Public Service Superannuation Act leaves any substantial injustices in principle unremedied. The basis of the Civil Service Superannuation Act was that to enjoy the benefit of the five-year average salary in calculating the allowance a person had to be a civil servant within the meaning of the act on July 19, 1924. No evidence has been advanced to show that the employees in question were permanent then and any action which might have been taken to provide for them at the time, while considered, was not, in fact, taken. Thus they, along with the thousands of other temporary employees in 1924, have come under the ten year average salary for superannuation purposes.

[Mr. Knowles.]

> While it is true that this is the only case of which I know where a department has been excluded almost as a whole,—

That was the old department of soldiers' civil re-establishment.

> —yet it never was made a permanent department. Even if it were decided that something should be done for those employees whom the department thought should have been made permanent in 1924, how can one be sure how many would, in fact, have been. One brief on behalf of these employees has, in fact, requested that all of them be given the benefit of the five year average which, if granted, would have been altogether unfair to all other temporary employees in 1924.
> I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that I cannot recommend to the government that this benefit of the use of the five-year average salary in determining superannuation benefits be conferred on these employees.

If my hon. friend would like to have it I would be happy to send him a rather more extensive memorandum breaking down the number of individual cases, and so on.

Mr. Dinsdale: I thank the minister for that statement. There is just one other point. The minister will probably recall that the emphasis during the discussion last year was not on the legal right as defined by the act, but on the moral right. These people would have become permanent civil servants had it been possible for them to do so, and the representations which were made last year emphasized the point that according to the act they were excluded. However, because there was a moral principle involved emphasis was placed on the fact that the department should do something by way of amendment to recognize this special case.

Mr. Abbott: Here again, Mr. Chairman, the difficulty was that this was considered in 1924, 1925 and 1926 and during the early thirties, and it was rejected. A great many of the civil servants who might have been entitled to benefit through a change in the rule have, of course, long since died and, as I say, 30 years later I cannot recommend that an exception—and it would be an exception—should be made for this particular group. As I said, it relates only to the average period of service, and the question of superannuation might never have been raised had it not been for the fact that there have been quite substantial increases over the past 10 years.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says these people should be considered as being in a position comparable to other temporary employees who have not obtained the benefit of the five-year average provision. What impresses me about this is that representations on behalf of these former D.S.C.R. and S.S.B. employees have been made by associations of civil servants, and I cannot imagine that an association of civil servants would be making such representations on behalf of a restricted group, if those representations seemed to be unfair to other and larger numbers in that group.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member's imagination is not as great as mine. I not only imagine it but I know it happens every day.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister has a better imagination than I, but it does not seem to me to be logical and I do not think that is the way in which responsible representatives of employee organizations operate. I want to support the representations made by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris that consideration might even yet be given to this matter on its moral basis. These people know they have lost out so far as the law is concerned, and some of them have told me that if it were merely a legal battle they would have gone to the courts rather than come here. They feel a change in the law is necessary and hence their appeal to parliament. I hope that even yet the minister will find it in his heart to give consideration to this matter.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

National parks branch—

National parks and historic sites services—

692. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—further amount required, $98,250.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I would like some information on the breakdown of this item, and I would like to know what expenditures are available for Fundy national park.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, this is a supplementary item of $98,000-odd out of the main vote in this department of $3,600,000-odd which provides for capital expenditure in national parks, national historic sites, and includes construction and so on. It is to provide for the completion of certain projects started during the last fiscal year which it was hoped could be paid for before the conclusion of that year but which it was not possible to do. It includes such items as the construction of an open kitchen-dining room at Banff government camps and replacement of certain bridges in the Jasper national park and things of that sort. It is pretty well divided among the various national parks.

Item agreed to.

Northern administration and lands branch—

695. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—further amount required, $581,681.

Mr. MacLean: Will the minister be kind enough to make a brief statement with regard to the removal of these two towns in the Northwest Territories and the circumstances requiring it?

Mr. Abbott: I am sorry that my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is not here. He would be much better informed about the matter than am I. As I think the committee is aware—an announcement was made here some time ago—it is going to become necessary to remove Aklavik from its present site, because of the condition of the terrain, to some more solid ground not too far away. This will take place over a considerable period of time. This particular item covers the expenses of the sites selection party to proceed from Aklavik to Coppermine for investigation of the area, purchase of lumber for use in the construction of buildings and other work on the new site of the Aklavik settlement. There are also some smaller items for other matters. The amount included here for the Aklavik move totals $105,000. It is considered that this, with some other items, constitute a relatively modest amount compared with the total cost, and this amount is all that will be expended this year.

Mr. Fulton: Is it the intention that the dominion government should pay the whole cost of the moving of this community? Does this represent only the cost of removing dominion government property?

Mr. Abbott: No. I speak subject to correction. Since the move is being made at the suggestion of the dominion government and since there is no organized municipal arrangement in that area, I think the cost of removing Aklavik from its present site to a more suitable site will be borne by the federal government.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Supreme Court of Canada—

164. Administration, $195,485.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): When the minister's estimates were before the committee previously, I inquired with regard to the work of the R.C.M.P. at Ipperwash military camp. Will the minister report now?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might suggest to the committee that we follow the practice of raising these matters when the police estimates are reached? I have a number of branch heads who advise me, and I should like to have the appropriate one beside me. When the police estimates are reached, I shall be glad to deal with any matter that is raised.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): That procedure is quite agreeable, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fulton: This is the item which, as I understand it, covers the administration of the Supreme Court of Canada. There is naturally curiosity—it is more than curiosity; I think it is a proper interest—on the part of many as to the situation with regard to the appointment of a chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada to replace the Chief Justice who has just retired. Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Chairman. I know that the government is obviously—and quite properly—not to be expected to give any hint as to whom it has in mind before it is prepared to announce the appointment. But the question I want to ask—which is, I think, a proper one—is this: may it be expected in the near future? What is the position with respect to the imminence of the appointment?

Mr. Garson: The appointment of the chief justice is, I think, the prerogative of the Prime Minister. I think perhaps he could answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I would not want to say just on what day it will be made, but it is not intended that we shall all get away for our holidays before it is dealt with.

Mr. Blackmore: I think the minister was in the chamber when I was asking the Prime Minister a number of questions about Canada's policy with regard to combating communism or the communist conspiracy.

Mr. Garson: May I make the suggestion, Mr. Chairman—as was remarked this afternoon, I think to my friend the hon. member for Lethbridge, if I am not mistaken—that he ask that question on the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? We shall be coming to them shortly, I hope. On that occasion perhaps he would raise the matter and at that time I should be glad to deal with it.

Mr. Blackmore: If the minister is quite satisfied to have it all discussed under the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, that is all right. However, among the things about which I was asking the Prime Minister there are, as the minister will readily recognize, a good many which would not particularly come under the jurisdiction of the mounted police. They would come under the jurisdiction of the government at a much higher level. If the minister is quite content to have the whole discussion under the estimates of the mounted police, I shall be quite happy to wait until they are reached.

Mr. Harris: Carried.

Mr. Blackmore: That is agreed?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Combines Investigation Act—

168. Restrictive trade practices commission, $71,668.

Mr. Fulton: I want to pause at item 168 for a moment because I think it is important that we should discuss investigations now being carried on by the restrictive trade practices commission into the subject of loss leaders. The whole situation arises out of legislation which was passed here in December, 1951, and which eliminated the only protection the retail trade of Canada had at that time against this practice, that is against the loss-leader practice. We gave quite extensive warnings to the government, on behalf of the retail trade, that there was then an imminent danger that if the protection of resale price maintenance was removed, many retailers would be ruined by resort to the loss leader and to other unfair competitive practices which had been previously followed and against which the device of resale price maintenance was worked out largely by the retail trade itself.

We now find, Mr. Chairman, that the loss-leader practice has, in fact, assumed the serious proportions which we forecast at that time, in 1951. It has unfortunately to be recorded that the government to date has taken no action whatsoever to deal in a positive way with the threat which the loss-leader practice presents to the retail trade. They have taken certain preliminary steps in that they have asked the restrictive trade practices commission to investigate and consider the matter. Recently the commission has commenced public hearings. I understand that those hearings will not be concluded for a month or two yet. We are therefore faced with the situation that nothing can be done until that report comes in, and presumably nothing effective can be done until this fall, if parliament should meet in November. Hence it is probably not until at least early next year that the retailers can expect any action to protect them against what is going on.

I want to ask the minister to let us know what the thinking of the government is with respect to this matter and to give us an indication, if he can, of the action it is proposed to take and how soon it is proposed to take it when the report is made.

I do this because the figures with regard to commercial failures are quite disturbing. I do not wish to be taken as suggesting, because it is not my intention, that the trend shown by the increased number of commercial failures results exclusively from the legislation passed in 1951 and from the subsequent reappearance of the loss-leader practice. But I do suggest that when we find on the one hand that the retail trade itself is convinced, and has stated so publicly on a number of occasions, that this loss-leader practice is closely tied up with commercial failures, and when we find on the other hand a disturbing increase in the number of commercial failures, we are justified, and unfortunately justified, in saying that the forecast which we made in 1951 is now being fulfilled.

What we said in 1951 was that the retailers required some protection against the loss-leader practice and if that protection was not given it would have disastrous results on the retail trade. The government took a much more sanguine view. They said: Oh well, we do not think the loss-leader practice will ever recur under existing economic conditions but if it does we will consider it then and we will be in a position to do something about it. I obtained recently from the bureau of statistics tables of figures showing the number of commercial failures in Canada for every year since 1949, and I should like to put them on the record because they substantiate what I have said to the effect that there is a disturbing situation in that regard.

The first figures I shall give are for all types of commercial failures in Canada reported under the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Winding Up acts. There were 1,045 in 1949, 1,275 in 1950, 1,349 in 1951, 1,434 in 1952 and 1,617 in 1953. It will be seen that while these figures do not establish conclusively that the current increase in commercial failures results from the legislation of 1951, nevertheless there has been a disturbing increase in the last two years and an increase of 183 in 1953 over 1952.

In attempting to relate this specifically to the retail trade I was told by the bureau of statistics that they do not have the figures in that form but they do have a subdivision for "total trade" which they tell me would be mainly retail establishments. The record of failures under that subheading shows the same increase in 1953 over 1952. The situation is even more alarming if you compare the first quarters. I should point out that the figures for 1954, the current year, are only complete up to the end of the first quarter. They show a very much more disturbing increase in the number of failures in the first quarter this year over the first quarter last year. They also show a steady increase in the first quarter of each year since the first quarter of 1951. They do show a drop in 1953, but that trend seems to have been reversed at the present time. The total figures for the first quarter of every year from 1949 are as follows: 270 for 1949, 382 for 1950, 402 for 1951, 470 for 1952, 382 for 1953 and 680 for 1954.

Taking the subheading of "total trade", which is as near as the bureau can come with respect to the retail trade figures, the figures for the first quarters of each of these years, 1949 to 1954, are as follows: 93 in 1949, 149 in 1950, 168 in 1951, 186 in 1952, 146 in 1953 which is a slight drop, and then an alarming increase to 299 for the first quarter of 1954. I put these figures on the record to show that a discussion of the position of the retail trade and the impact on that trade of the loss leader practice is not one which is carried on in the realm of abstraction. It is a very concrete and disturbing situation that we are dealing with.

That of course is borne out by the statements of the retail trade itself. I have followed the press reports of the representations made to the restrictive trade practices commission in the course of its public hearings. I have not seen all the briefs and I can only assume and accept these press reports as representing accurate summaries of the presentation. I should like to place before the committee some of the views expressed by the retailers either individually or by association spokesmen, as reported—

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Were these views expressed by retailers or other commercial concerns which had failed, or were they views expressed by retailers generally?

Mr. Fulton: The views I am now coming to are those of retailers generally. I do not think any of those who appeared before the commission were in fact bankrupt or had failed. That I do not know. That does not appear from the articles. As I read the articles, they were representations made by merchants continuing in business or else by trade associations.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member is not citing these quotations as proving his point as to the cause of any failures that took place?

Mr. Fulton: I certainly am. In the extracts which I shall read I will be quoting opinions to the effect that the re-emergence of the loss-leader practice has a very direct bearing on the number of commercial failures.

Mr. Garson: Yes, but these are not the explanations of merchants who themselves have failed.

Mr. Fulton: That I am not able to state conclusively. I do not think any of the representations I shall be quoting were made by people who had in fact failed. Some of them may have been, but I do not think so. This is a report that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 2, 1954 and it deals with the hearings held in Toronto. It reads in part as follows:

> John Jardine, a spokesman for the Canadian sporting goods and cycle association, said large department and chain stores "seem bent on putting the small merchants out of business. We are meeting prices in what I am sure is a suicide race", he said. "If we don't maintain these prices we are sure to go out of business."
> The wholesale hardware association urged a return of legislation to stop loss leader selling.

Then there is a reference to another spokesman, Fred R. Cavers of St. Catharines, Ontario. I have not had an opportunity to look up the genealogical tree of this gentleman, but I point out that his name bears a resemblance to that of one of the members of the house. He comes from St. Catharines, Ontario, and I think that city is very near the constituency represented by the hon. member whom I have in mind. The report reads:

> Fred R. Cavers of St. Catharines, Ontario, speaking for electrical appliance dealers, condemned cut price sales on vacuum cleaners and television sets in his area as "vicious and predatory business practices". Cavers claimed some merchants were advertising "nailed down loss leaders", yet fining a salesman $5 if he sold the bargain item instead of "using it as a come-on" after getting customers in the store.

That refers to the criticism made by reputable retailers that a brand-name article will be advertised at a cut price, lower than the price for which neighbouring stores are selling it, as a come-on to get the customer in the store. But when the customer is in the store he is told: Oh, I am sorry, but the last of those was sold five minutes ago, but we have so and so and such and such which we assure you is every bit as good. But the customer finds the price is quite different. That is all tied up with the loss leader practice, which does not help the consumer.

Another presentation made before the commission in Montreal, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of June 8, was made on behalf of the Quebec retail tobacco association by Mr. H. J. Garfinkel, honorary president of the association. His presentation is summarized as follows:

> Mr. Garfinkel said the last defence of the retailer had been demolished with abolition of price maintenance—the selling of goods at uniform prices by all retailers.
> The small retailer's profit on cigarettes, he added, had not been excessive. It was a little more than 3 cents in 1939 for a 20-cent package and not quite 4 cents for the present-day 33-cent pack.
> But if the small retailers were to compete with chain stores, he said, they actually would have to take a loss of a tenth of a cent a pack.
> The large stores, the brief continued, selling cigarettes only as an incidental, can afford to take this loss if it brings in customers for other goods. But the small tobacconists depend on cigarettes for more than two-thirds of their sales.

He went on to describe the emergence of bankruptcy in some very large tobacco retail concerns in the United States and said:

> Only definite action on dominion, provincial, or municipal levels can save the Canadian tobacconist from the same fate.

There was another presentation on the following day, June 9, reported in the Gazette, by Mr. F. G. Samis, commercial manager of the Northern Electric Company. The report reads as follows:

> Mr. Samis included among predatory price-cutters retailers selling goods at a loss as a come-on for other products. He said all price-cutting was not bad, naming progressive price-cutting and protective price cuttings as ethical practices.
> Price maintenance would allow these methods, he explained, but would prevent price wars.
> George Pynn, appliance manager for Northern Electric, said in reply to a question he did not know of any manufacturer who had dropped a retailer cutting prices for justifiable reasons.

Then, the last report I have, and I think it was the last session of the commission in Montreal, is taken from the Montreal Gazette of June 11 and reports the presentation made by the radio-television manufacturers association of Canada as follows:

> A member of the association's delegation, Harry Marpole, of the R.C.A. Victor Company of Canada, later said bankruptcy was up considerably among his company's retail dealers since the government had removed price maintenance.
> "We have experienced", he said, "in the last twelve months, approximately 10 times the number of bankruptcies among our dealers as the average of the five years preceding that period."
> He said the cause was that dealers were forced to sell at prices that were too low for their budgets.
> He said he did not think there had been overproduction of television sets by his company last year.

Another witness who was heard at the time of this presentation was Mr. L. P. Fournier, credit manager of the Gerin, Trudeau Company. The report states that he—> —warned that unless price maintenance was re-established many persons of bankrupt businesses would become unemployed.

They in turn would become dependent on public support paid for by the consumers whom the abolition of price maintenance was intended to help in the first place.

I have read those quotations, Mr. Chairman, to establish that in the view of the retailers, based upon their experience, and in the view of manufacturers who supply retailers, the re-emergence of the loss-leader practice has had exactly the result it was feared it would have by retailers at the time when protection against it was eliminated in 1951. The results which we forecast this would have, unless the government brought in some concurrent arrangements which would enable the retailer to protect himself in that regard, are exactly what has happened. I should be clear on that. What has happened is what we forecast. The government did not take any action when it removed the protection, and the disastrous consequences to the retailer have followed.

Mr. Studer: What about the consumers?

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend asks about the consumer. I have some tables here which show to what extent the consumers may have benefited. I know that the figures are rather dangerous, and I said that although the figures show an alarming increase in the number of commercial failures, I am not prepared to say that that is entirely or exclusively attributable to the 1951 legislation. In the same way I hope that my hon. friends will not say that any reduction in the cost of living has been entirely attributable to that 1951 legislation. If they do make that argument, then I still do not think they could take very much comfort from it because the reduction is so small as to be virtually negligible.

The figures for the consumer price index are as follows: On January 1, 1952, 118·2; January 1, 1953, 115·5; January 1, 1954, 115·7 and on May 1, 1954, 115·7. It will be seen that in the three year period there has been a reduction in the consumer price index of 2·5 points. If my hon. friends are going to take much comfort out of that, then they can attribute the whole of it, if they like, to the action taken by the government in 1951. I still do not think it will comfort them very much, nor will it comfort the consumer. The consumer will be as disturbed as we are by what is happening to the small merchant in Canada as a result of the loss of protection he is now experiencing.

I should like to review for a moment what was said back in 1951, and show that not even the action forecast by the government has yet been taken. As reported on page 2451 of Hansard for December 28, 1951, we pointed out to the government this was a danger to the retail trade and we asked them what they proposed to do about it. Perhaps I could ask the indulgence of the committee while I read some remarks which I made on that occasion, because I want to show how clearly we warned the government as to what might happen. Discussing this situation I said, as reported at page 2451 of Hansard for December 28, 1951:

The proof of what I am saying is found in the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday when, as set out at page 2385, he was attempting to justify the government's willingness to rush the small retailers of Canada into oblivion, and leave with a few big giants of industry the control of the distribution of goods in this country. He said:

"I made the statement the other day, and I repeat it, that if as a result of this legislation or as a result of any other condition there develops a contrary abuse, the government will consider what recommendations it should make to parliament to deal with that contrary abuse."

He was referring to the possibility of the loss-leader practice. Well, I would ask the Prime Minister or, since he is not in his seat, the Minister of Justice, just how long he thinks it will take to consider and work out that recommendation? At what stage will the government decide that it has become necessary to work out some alternative form of protection? How many retailers will have to go to the wall? How many bankruptcies will have to take place in Canada? How many small concerns will have to be taken over by the giants of the distributive trades before the government decides the time has come at which they must give consideration to some alternative form of protection for the small retailer? Will it be one, or twenty-one, or a hundred or five hundred? How many thousands will have to be lost by small retailers before the government decides it is time to act?

The minister referred me to a statement he had made previously but which, as I pointed out to him, was not an answer to that particular question. At a later stage, at the top of page 2496 of Hansard for that day, the minister did say that the government would act quickly if a serious situation developed. He said that if the loss-leader practice emerged, and if it assumed serious proportions, then they would look very carefully at section 498A of the Criminal Code to see if something could be done. We asked him if that had been effective, and he said in his knowledge it had only been used once, so that is where that matter was left.

However, at an earlier stage he said that the government—perhaps I had better read the quotation from page 2496:

Should it become apparent that section 498A is not adequate to deal with any abuse of that sort which might make its appearance, then we are in a position, because of the work which has already been done, to follow out quite quickly any policy which might be agreed upon by the government at that time. But our own view coincides with that of the committee, that as long as present economic conditions continue there is no substantial likelihood of widespread predatory price cutting or loss leaders.

I think that is all I need to quote from the previous debate. What I have quoted proves conclusively that the government was warned that this loss-leader practice would re-emerge. They said they did not believe that it would re-emerge, but that if it did they would be in a position to act quickly as a result of the work which had already been done.

Yet we find this serious situation confronting the retail trade of Canada, where they are being very substantially prejudiced by this practice. And what has the government done? As I pointed out earlier, it has done nothing of a positive nature. After having said they would be in a position to act quickly, the best they have been able to do is to instruct a commission to consider the matter, to hold public hearings and to bring in a report.

I suggest it is a fair inference to draw from what was said by the Minister of Justice in 1951, that the government intended us to understand at that time that it would be ready to act quickly, and that it would not be necessary for it to go about the country three years later inquiring into the matter and asking retailers to state facts which are already known; that is, that they are now suffering, and suffering severely, as a result of what was done in 1951, and as a result of that action not being accompanied by the corresponding action we asked for in 1951, to enable them to provide their own protection against the loss-leader practice.

I have made this brief review of the situation because I believe the House of Commons and the country should now hear from the minister just what the government proposes to do by way of action to protect the retail trade. And I say this because I do not believe there is anyone in the house or in the country who, if he stops to think, will not agree with me when I say that there is no more important group of people in Canada and in the maintenance of a sound economy than the small and independent retail dealers.

We believe that the health of the economy is indicated by the number of people who are self-employed, and gainfully employed, in commercial pursuits of one kind or another. We do not believe that it is either safe or healthy to see developing a tendency where the small and independent man goes to the wall, and his place is taken by the giant concern, with an inevitable drift toward a situation where everybody will be the employee of somebody else. Where everybody is an employee of somebody else, it means you will have a few giant concerns in the country for whom, in the long run, far too many people work. And it is that danger and that trend we are concerned to see dealt with. And it is because of the desirability of preserving in Canada the maximum number of small and independent concerns that I say the government is bound at this time to indicate what action it intends to take to protect those interests.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's case seems to be that, inasmuch as he alleges that commercial failures are on the increase, and that they follow the government's legislation in 1951 banning resale price maintenance that therefore the legislation is the cause of the commercial failures. This is the ancient and hoary fallacy of post hoc, ergo propter hoc—because B follows A, therefore A is the cause of B; or because A is associated with B, therefore one is the cause of the other.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister permit me—

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend may deal with it when I have finished.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has misinterpreted and distorted my argument. But I will correct it later.

Mr. Garson: Moreover while I reject this reasoning completely, I reject with greater vehemence the premise upon which it is based.

Mr. Fulton: Tell us what you are going to do for the retailer.

Mr. Garson: I do not know that I could tell my hon. friend anything, but if he will let me make my speech I will endeavour to explain my own viewpoint.

To begin with my hon. friend has quoted figures from an unimpeachable source as establishing the commercial failures in Canada. But if he had examined those figures with a little greater care he would have seen that the bankruptcies included those estates, whether commercial or otherwise, which are under $500 in value, after deducting claims of secured creditors. He would also find there is a very heavy element in the figures he quoted of estates of wage earners where the assets of the estate are $500 or less, after deducting the claims of secured creditors.

For example, in the first three months of 1953 the total number of estates were 375, and out of that total number there were 178 bankruptcies in which the value of assets, exclusive of preferred claims, was less than $500. By no stretch of the imagination could all these, many of which involved wage earners, be regarded as commercial failures. Thus even if my hon. friend argued more logically than he did, he could not fail, since he started from a false premise, to reach a fallacy, and that is what he has reached.

Now, my hon. friend has raised this question at a time when this matter of loss leaders is under consideration by the restrictive trade practices commission. This commission is going about the country hearing from those sources from which my hon. friend quoted, commercial organizations of one kind or another who are opposed to the government legislation, and hearing also from sources from which my hon. friend did not quote, the Canadian Association of Consumers, for example, who are supporting the government legislation.

Until that report is brought in I think perhaps he would agree that the best course we could follow in this chamber is to await the considered view of the commission—the considered view which I am sure it will bring forth. But if my hon. friend did not wish to do that, at least he could have gone to an appropriate source to get figures which would have been clearly relevant to the point he was attempting to make. I suggest he could have gone to a recent study made, not by any government agency or by a royal commission appointed by the government, but by the well known firm of Dun and Bradstreet, which is an outstanding authority on commercial failures. This firm recently made a study of commercial failures. Their statistics relate wholly to commercial failures, and they include not only those cases which have got into the bankruptcy courts, but commercial failures which have not got into bankruptcy courts but which, for the purposes of my hon. friend's reasoning, are as closely relevant as if they had.

And what do they find? My hon. friend will see their finding in a recent issue of the Financial Post, that of June 19, 1954, under the heading "Why 1,093 Businesses Failed in 1953". This is a complete analysis grouped by cause of failure and by class of business. Surely here is the very point with which my hon. friend professed to deal in his speech. He was attempting to argue that it was the loss leaders, made possible in some measure as he would contend by the government's legislation in 1951 abolishing resale price maintenance, which was the cause of these commercial failures.

Well, this is the same kind of problem to which the firm of Dun and Bradstreet addressed themselves in their study. And they found that the principal causes of the 1953 commercial failures can be divided into two groups—first, underlying causes and, secondly, apparent causes. The underlying causes are 5·8 per cent neglect; 1·1 per cent fraud; 18 per cent lack of experience in the line; 35·9 per cent lack of managerial experience; 13·1 per cent unbalanced experience. The footnote to the heading is:

> Experience not well rounded in sales, finance, purchasing and production on the part of an individual in case of a proprietorship, or of two or more partners or officers constituting a management unit.

Then the next heading is: 22·8 per cent, incompetence; 3·1 per cent, disaster. These constitute the underlying causes.

Then, under the head of apparent causes they give: 1·3 per cent, bad habits; 3 per cent, poor health; ·1 per cent, marital difficulties; 1·4 per cent, other; ·4 per cent, false financial statements; ·2 per cent, premeditated overbuy; ·4 per cent, irregular disposal of assets; ·1 per cent other; 51·3 per cent, inadequate sales; 7·8 per cent, heavy operating expenses; 18·9 per cent, receivables difficulties; 8·1 per cent, inventory difficulties; 6·7 per cent, excessive fixed assets; 3·5 per cent, poor location; 14·1 per cent, competitive weakness; ·47 per cent, other.

Under the next heading: Fire, 1·7 per cent; burglary, ·2 per cent; employees' fraud, ·4 per cent; other, ·8 per cent. That accounts for the whole, and there is not under either one of those headings underlying causes or apparent causes any suggestion whatever that loss leaders have been the cause of those commercial failures. This is the report of a commercial concern which is an authority upon commercial failures and which after studying this problem has brought out this report to their customers.

Mr. Fulton: Of course there is not.

Mr. Garson: By way of replying to this argument—because that is the argument he has to reply to—and if I wished to I could cite another article by Mr. Honderich, financial editor of the Toronto Star, substantially to the same effect that loss leaders were not the cause of these bankruptcies—by way of replying to this type of authentic material, my hon. friend brings into this house statistics that ignore a lot of non-commercial bankruptcies. He wants us to believe, by the simple process of his telling us so, that on the basis of the increase in bankruptcies, therefore it was loss leaders that caused the increase in bankruptcies.

It is true that commercial failures have been increasing in Canada as in the United States. A copy of an article, for example, from the New York Journal of Commerce of June 10, 1954, indicates that although resale price maintenance, as the hon. member for Kamloops well knows, is not forbidden except in three states, and in the District of Columbia of the United States of America; in spite of the fact that these conditions, as he appears to argue, are ideal for commercial retailers in the United States, who can indulge in resale price maintenance as much as they like; in spite of that, failures in the United States, have been higher in 1954 than in 1953 particularly in the fields of automotive retailing and household appliances. This is also the Canadian experience. But I would suggest to my hon. friend that where we have a phenomenon of that kind occurring on both sides of the line, and in the United States no abolition of resale price maintenance, but the great benefits of that which my hon. friend urges in full force there, and they have a particularly heavy rate of failures in the same lines as we have; in spite of that we on this side of the line have abolished resale price maintenance, the answer to the business failures in each case has to be found in other causes than loss leaders.

Take again a breakdown of some of these figures. It will indicate that we have no reason to believe that the increase is due in any significant degree to the resale price maintenance legislation. For example, the number of commercial failures under the heading of "furniture and household furnishings", a field in which complaints about price cutting on appliances have been numerous, have ranged from 24 in 1949 to 39 in 1951 to 64 in 1953, or an increase in 1953 of 64 per cent over 1951.

On the other hand failures under the heading of "automotive products", a field in which resale price maintenance has not been significant, have ranged for the same years from 35 to 40 to 85, an increase in 1953 of 112 per cent over 1951.

My hon. friend from Kamloops is alleging that the increase in bankruptcies is the result of these loss leaders that he is complaining about. How does he explain that there is a higher number of bankruptcies in the case where there has been relatively little price cutting, as compared with a lower number of bankruptcies in another industry where there has been a greater amount of it? By every test that one can apply to both his facts and his reasoning, his case is disproven by his own arguments, and certainly disproven by studies such as the one by Dun and Bradstreet, to which I have made reference.

Mr. Fulton: Unfortunately the minister cannot deal with an argument on its merits, but has to resort to a misinterpretation of it, or at the best a careless interpretation of it. The minister has sought to twist my argument, by ignoring those parts of it where I stated that I had been careful not to attribute the whole of the effect to one particular cause, and by saying that I was doing exactly that which I said I was not doing. I could not have said more clearly that I was not claiming that simply because commercial failures had increased subsequent to the elimination of the protection against loss leaders, I was arguing that therefore the whole of the increased number of commercial failures was due to that action. I could not have said it more clearly, and yet the minister rises in his place and deliberately ignores that fact and says that I am saying that because there has been an increase in the number of commercial failures I have therefore argued that it followed that it was exclusively attributable to the government legislation in 1951. That is the kind of argument—

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: No; I shall complete my argument first. That is the kind of argument the minister tries to use, a kind of setting up a straw man to knock down that he uses to divert people's minds from the main arguments made, and in doing so of course completely failing to deal with the merits of those arguments.

Then he also carelessly jumped to the conclusion that I had not carefully analysed the figures that I quoted, and he said that I had included a lot of the failures which were not trade failures at all. It is perfectly true that I gave first of all figures for the total of all types, but I was careful to add that I had discussed the matter with the official of the bureau of statistics with whom I was speaking and he had pointed out to me this could not be presumed to be an accurate guide—

Mr. Garson: Why use it, then, if it is not an accurate guide?

Mr. Fulton: —and I therefore said, I will give a subtotal. I gave two sets of figures, the first to show the trend of increased failures in this country, then I said I was giving a subtotal which is headed "total trade", and I pointed out that the bureau told me that would be mainly retail trade. I gave that set of figures, and how on earth the minister can then stand in his place and say I was giving figures which included a number of wage earners passes my comprehension. That is the sort of argument that the Minister of Justice uses in answer to the case I was seeking to make.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: I wish the minister had listened to me instead of sitting there with a closed mind, having apparently concluded at the outset that there could not be any merit in the case. I used the exact figures, but he appears to have sat there with a closed mind and thought that we on this side of the house would use the same sort of futile and puerile argument that he himself might have used. I can assure him that would not be the case.

Then, he goes on to give the result of a survey by Dun and Bradstreet. I have the highest regard for Dun and Bradstreet but I cannot agree when the minister says that my argument is demolished by that survey and because neither Dun and Bradstreet nor any other statistical survey has attributed the causes of bankruptcy to the loss-leader practice. If it is the loss-leader practice which has resulted in the bankruptcy of many of these retailers, then that means they are being driven out of business by the loss-leader practice followed elsewhere than in their own stores. They probably went bankrupt because as a result they could not sell a sufficient volume of goods at a price which would meet the cost of operation.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Just one moment. Because of that, bankruptcy would be ascribed to one of the ordinary commercial headings with respect to that business. It is perfectly obvious that the cause of the bankruptcy would not be ascribed, in a cold statistical survey, to the fact that somebody else was following the loss-leader practice. The merchant might say, "I am being ruined by the loss-leader practice being followed elsewhere. People do not come to my store because they are being lured into other stores by this predatory practice—"

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member not agree that in making this study of the causes of bankruptcy Dun and Bradstreet officials would ask retailers the causes of their going into bankruptcy and if they felt that the use of the loss-leader practice by their competitors was the reason then surely they would have said so.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member had listened carefully he would have learned that according to the second table read by the minister there was a heading referring to competition —was it "excessive competition"?

Mr. Garson: No, competitive weakness.

Mr. Fulton: Well, that is the sort of heading that would be used. Because if a merchant being asked these questions were to say, "Well, I went out of business because the fellow down the street undersold me," it is hardly feasible to expect a reputable statistical firm such as Dun and Bradstreet would draw the conclusion and put it down statistically that these bankruptcies resulted from the loss-leader practice being followed elsewhere. It is much more probable that a number of such bankruptcies would be ascribed to managerial incompetence. I suppose one might argue that the dealer, finding himself at a competitive disadvantage as a result of the loss-leader practice being followed elsewhere, should, strictly speaking, close up his doors and go out of business before he became bankrupt. Therefore, the fact that he struggled along and finally went bankrupt could in the cold-blooded realm of statistics be ascribed to managerial incompetence. But that does not alter the basic reason behind it, for it is due to the loss-leader practice—the unfair competitive practice—being followed by a number of large commercial firms, and chain stores in particular.

While the Dun and Bradstreet figures are interesting, that survey in no way deals with the case and, in fact, the minister, by this smokescreen he endeavoured to throw up, has carefully avoided dealing with the basic question, namely, what are you going to do to protect the retailer? Or is the minister asking us to draw the conclusion from his failure to deal with that question that the official government attitude at the moment is that the retailers are all wet when they say they are being severely injured by this loss-leader practice? I think we are still entitled to an answer to the question as to what the government proposes to do, and I would press the minister to give an answer.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend does not need to press me about giving him an answer to that question. I have said, not only during the present exchange but on previous occasions, that we had instructed the restrictive trade practices commission to examine the whole problem of loss leaders and they are at the present time engaged in holding a series of meetings in various cities in Canada hearing from retail and wholesale merchants, manufacturers, from the Canadian Association of Consumers and others. Indeed if my hon. friend from Kamloops wishes to make representations to that body as to his views on the situation with regard to loss leaders then he is quite at liberty to do so. The government intends to receive the report of this commission and to decide in the light of that report what policy, if any, it will recommend to parliament. Now, I do not know how more rationally or more intelligently a controversial problem of this sort—and it is controversial because by no means every person in Canada accepts my hon. friend's views on this matter; indeed there are a great many people who have views in the other direction—can be handled. The government's course is an eminently proper one and that is to have an objective examination made of this controversial question by a competent body and then base its consideration of the matter upon the report of that body.

Mr. Fulton: Let me just wind up my remarks in this way. While I do not accept for a moment the minister's view as to the meritorious nature of the course to be followed, I must say it has been clearly established that if this course is to be followed, it should have been followed two or three years ago. As I indicated at the outset of my remarks, it was pointed out to the government clearly in 1951, both when the special committee of the house was sitting and in the course of the discussion which followed in this chamber, that there was the gravest danger of the re-emergence of the loss-leader practice as a result of the government's legislation. The government cannot deny that it had that danger clearly pointed out to it both by the retail trade itself and by hon. members of this house. What the minister said at that time has already been quoted by me but I will quote his words again:

> We are in a position because of the work which has already been done to follow out quite quickly any policy which may be agreed upon by the government at that time.

We pointed out that the loss-leader practice could re-emerge and assume serious proportions and it did emerge and it did assume serious proportions some time ago, and yet the government is still not in any position to do anything about it.

I can only repeat what I said before, that particularly in the case of those retailers who are going to the wall, whatever action the government may take obviously comes some two or three years too late. In spite of the fact that they had repeated warnings the government declined to take action until it was too late.

Mr. Coldwell: I want to ask the minister this question in view of the discussion on loss leaders. I have heard a great deal about this throughout the country and I would ask the minister how he proposes to obtain a competitive free enterprise system and at the same time deal with this particular problem. I think it would be very difficult for the government, or indeed for any party that was wholly wedded to free enterprise and the competitive system of trade and commerce, to draw up legislation which would deal with this problem. Can the minister answer that conundrum now, or shall we leave it until he receives the report from the commission?

Mr. Garson: I do not mind attempting to comment on my hon. friend's question even if I cannot answer it. But by the way I think it might more properly have been addressed to the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with that.

Mr. Garson: He is a great exponent of free enterprise and he should answer that question.

Mr. Fleming: Do you not believe in free enterprise?

Mr. Garson: Indeed we do and we act accordingly. That is the difference between my hon. friend from Eglinton and the members on this side of the house. The answer to the question of the leader of the C.C.F. party is this. This is the great difficulty in regard to this question. In our disposition of the problem of loss leaders which has arisen we must be careful that, in an attempt to protect certain persons against loss leaders, we do not seriously impede or even prevent the operation of free enterprise. I am glad that my friend, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, asked the question. I think he probably knew this when he asked that rhetorical question. That was the reason why we have appointed a competent board to hear both sides of the case and so that we can have the best possible material upon which to judge what line of action should be taken as between preserving free enterprise on the one hand and relieving difficulties of individuals on the other.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, this debate today recalls to the minds of those of us who were in the House of Commons in December, 1951, the debate at that time which occupied some days in the house after the matter of resale price maintenance had been considered at some length in a committee of the house. It recalls an episode in which the government with great haste sought to perpetrate a hoax upon the consumers of Canada, and to seize upon a scapegoat in the form of the practice of resale price maintenance as the means by which that hoax would be perpetrated upon the consuming public of Canada.

This legislation which was enacted in December, 1951, came at a time when prices were rising swiftly in this country and when the effects of a rapidly rising cost of living were being keenly felt by the consuming public of Canada. The government was a party to the rapid rise in the cost of living for in that year the government, not satisfied with an already too high burden of taxation which it had imposed upon the Canadian people, chose that very time to increase the burden of taxation, particularly those taxes which entered into the cost of living. That was the year in which they raised the sales tax from 8 per cent to 10 per cent. That was the year in which they raised the excise tax on many commodities that entered into the cost of living of the average Canadian household up to figures like 25 per cent and 35 per cent. That was the year in which they applied excise taxes up to 15 per cent on many commodities on which no excise tax had been levied up to that time.

We now see chickens coming home to roost in this year 1954. In December 1951 the government sought to fool the Canadian people. They sought to make the Canadian public believe that the practice of resale price maintenance was contributing to this soaring increase in the cost of living that plagued the consuming public at that time. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the legislation then passed, which had the effect of banning resale price maintenance, contributed nothing to lowering the cost of living. Indeed, before the inquiry conducted in the fall of 1951 in committee had run its course, the Prime Minister had given the government's whole case away.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Fleming: A little later I shall be glad to have my hon. friend's question. I will pause in a moment for that purpose. As I say, the Prime Minister had given the government's whole case away when on October 15, 1951, he admitted to the house that the abolition of resale price maintenance would make no material contribution to reducing the cost of living. That admission gave away the whole government case on this point. Indeed that was apparent when the Minister of Justice sought so desperately, after the legislation was back before the house, to try to justify that legislation.

I shall now be glad to deal with my hon. friend's inquiry.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, from what the hon. gentleman has said, I infer that he is maintaining that the abolition of resale price maintenance had no effect whatsoever. If that is the case, how does the practice of loss leaders become possible after it has been repealed to any extent that it was not possible before? Either he is arguing against the hon. member for Kamloops or there is nothing in his argument.

Mr. Fleming: That is a sample of the kind of question that the Secretary of State quite frequently of late has been obtruding into the remarks of members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Garson: Why does the hon. member not answer the question?

Mr. Fleming: He takes the floor to ask a question, but he does not content himself with a question. He goes on and tries to smuggle these speeches of his into the remarks of other members.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am learning fast from my hon. friend.

Mr. Fleming: There he is again, Mr. Chairman, with springs in his trousers; he cannot keep his seat. I well recall the remark made by an eminent Ontario judge on one occasion to a counsel who kept bouncing up and down. As the Secretary of State seems to have the same difficulty I will pass on the same advice as that which was given on this occasion by this eminent Ontario judge when he addressed the counsel in these words: "Mr. So-and-so, may I suggest that you take a seidlitz powder".

Mr. Garson: In reply to the question of the Secretary of State is my hon. friend's answer that he should take a seidlitz powder?

Mr. Fleming: If the Minister of Justice will possess his soul in patience he will hear my answer to the remarks of the Secretary of State who, after all, is not interested in getting an answer. He is not even listening to anything right now. He is engaged in conversation over there. He was only interested in trying to interrupt my speech and to interpolate his own views for what little they are worth. If the Minister of Justice will now just pay attention he will hear that I have a good deal to say on the subject to which the Secretary of State referred in his comments.

Mr. Hosking: Let us get on with the business.

Mr. Fleming: We will get through with the business much faster if the hon. gentlemen over there will possess their souls in patience and will try to control their vagrant tongues.

An hon. Member: Patience is a virtue.

Mr. Fleming: I think my patience is as great as theirs. I can stand here as long as their tongues wag to no effect. If they wish to get on with the business, let them stop their silly interruptions.

Mr. Knowles: Wag away.

Mr. Fleming: Can we get on with the business, Mr. Chairman?

I was saying that the chickens are coming home to roost. The fact is that it may have been relatively easy, as the government surveyed the situation in December, 1951, to expect that they would get away with what they were doing, because we then had a situation where there was a sellers' market; people could sell virtually whatever they had to sell. Therefore the problem of the loss leader, which is inherent in this question, did not arise in pressing form. However, in June, 1954, we have a far different situation. Competition is infinitely keener today than it was two and a half years ago. In the retail trade as well as in industry and commerce generally in this country the situation is far different. We can see arising now, Mr. Chairman, the effects that were inevitable in this legislation. It took time for those effects to demonstrate themselves, but they are demonstrating themselves today. The practice of the loss leader—a vicious practice, if ever there was one—was inevitable following upon the legislation of December, 1951.

That question of finding some way of dealing with the vicious practice of the loss leader did engage the committee that wrestled with this subject, and I recall that some hon. members opposite—the hon. member for Spadina, for instance—did try to come to grips with what they realized was a problem that would inevitably arise, namely, the loss-leader practice. They were not able to work out any satisfactory legislative formula to deal with the problem of the loss leader. That, sir, is the inherent weakness and defect of the legislation that was passed in December, 1951.

The government, determined to carry through the project on which it had started at that time, that hoax I have referred to, was prepared to go ahead willy-nilly, recklessly, and to see to it that legislation passed without having put before parliament any satisfactory legislative formula to prevent the rise of the loss-leader practice. The fact is that efforts were made at that time to devise some legislation to deal with the problem of the loss leader, but nobody was able to come up with a satisfactory legislative formula to deal with it.

But the government was not to be deterred. Loss of face was one thing they would not brook. The Minister of Justice was quite concerned at that time in trying to appear to do something in this field of competition to help the public, forgetting that he was the man who had suppressed for ten long months in defiance of the law of this country the McGregor report on the alleged milling combine. When the minister talks today about his belief in free enterprise, tries to make the rafters ring in this chamber, and says that he acts according to his belief, let me recall to his apparently deficient memory the fact that nobody who has held the portfolio of justice has done any more to weaken the system of free enterprise or the people's belief in it than was done by his wilful and illegal suppression of the McGregor report on the alleged milling combine.

The situation that we see today arising out of keen competition is the kind of situation which brings about a resurgence of the loss-leader practice. The Minister of Justice has not denied today the resurgence of the loss-leader practice. Indeed, he could not. It is known by everyone who has any knowledge of current commercial practices, particularly in the retail field, that the loss-leader practice is flourishing today and is doing very great harm to the legitimate retail trade. That, indeed, is the reason the Minister of Justice appointed this commission. He waited two and a half long years until the chickens had come home to roost, until this vicious practice was flourishing again, before he took any steps to initiate an inquiry into it.

Nobody quarrels with his institution of an inquiry. What we deplore is that he waited for two and a half long years to set up this inquiry. The warnings were there, given to him in December, 1951, but he just would not listen to them, and he has waited until this evil practice has flourished again before he has taken even this elementary step of beginning an inquiry into the practice. The practice is in existence. He knows it. He has been dilatory in the face of the revival of a vicious practice, a practice whose return was inevitable once parliament passed the legislation that this government imposed upon it in December, 1951.

The retail difficulties are all there today. The practice of loss-leader selling is wreaking its havoc in the Canadian retail trade. It is not confined to any one particular commodity. It has become quite widespread in the Canadian retail trade. It is accompanied by its usual evil geniuses, misleading advertising, refusal to give service, as well as those other features of the loss-leader practice which were so clearly described before the committee in its sittings in the autumn of 1951.

In a very shallow approach to this question today the minister has sought to distract attention from some very real points that were raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops. The way he handled figures in the course of his remarks was something weird and wonderful to behold. He took the figures of commercial failures, figures which are issued by government sources and which show that the rate of commercial failures in the early months of this year is double that of a year ago—as a matter of fact it is more than double in terms of the liabilities—and sought to discount all that argument by saying that the figures included failures on the part of wage earners.

Let us just put the Minister of Justice straight on this. I have before me the publication of the dominion bureau of statistics in relation to this matter. It carries the figures of commercial failures down to the end of the first three months of this year. What do we see as to the number of failures of wage earners in this total? The total of commercial failures in the first three months of this year was 680. The number of failures of wage earners was just fifty-nine, something like 8 or 9 per cent of the total. Because the 8 or 9 per cent of wage-earner failures are included in this total, the Minister of Justice, following his concepts of logic, proposes to discard all the figures that were put before us. He knows perfectly well that it is not necessary to bring before the house any figures of actual failures. He knows all too well that there exists in the commercial retail trade today a situation which has been developing for some time under his eyes while he has been so dilatory, a situation which has become infinitely more serious and is today becoming more and more acute by reason of the flourishing of the loss-leader practice. We hold the Minister of Justice, the government—

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: —and its legislation of 1951 responsible for the resurgence and revival of the loss-leader practice in the retail trade in Canada today.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): Will the hon. member permit a question? I wonder whether the hon. member has taken this fact into consideration, that we have gone from a sellers' market into a buyers' market. Where is the balance then, and why blame the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Trade and Commerce or anybody else? We have gone from a sellers' market into a buyers' market so far as retailers, wholesalers, manufacturers and everybody else are concerned.

Mr. Fleming: Apparently the hon. member was not following what I said earlier because I said that very thing not more than ten minutes ago. He was over there talking to the Secretary of State when I was saying that very thing. I brought that point forward to illustrate the fact that the situation that exists today in the Canadian retail trade is a very different situation from that which existed in December, 1951. It was all very well for the government to put over this hoax in December, 1951, to abolish resale price maintenance without the public then being able to see the inevitable evils that would follow, but today with a buyers' market we do see the inevitable consequences, namely, the revival of the vicious practice of the loss leader.

It was inevitable once the government had this legislation passed in 1951. It has taken time for the situation to change, but the situation has changed, as my hon. friend has said. Now we see the return of the loss-leader practice, and we see it flourishing today. It is a deplorable fact that it is a practice that is doing very great harm in the retail trade of Canada today, and we hold the government responsible.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): Would you say that is the difference between the big dealer and the marginal operator?

Mr. Fleming: Pardon?

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): The big dealer and the marginal operator—is that the difference?

Mr. Fleming: I am glad to have my hon. friend raise the point about the big dealers because he might remember that the biggest retailer in Canada supported the government's legislation in 1951. We said at that time that we were fighting for the small retailer and that if you permitted the return of the loss-leader practice, inevitably you would see more small retailers close up and more and more of the retail trade of Canada being concentrated in the hands of the big retailers. That is what was said at that time, Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Coldwell: It is after six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Do I understand that there is unanimous consent to proceed through the usual dinner adjournment?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: There not being unanimous consent, and since it is six o'clock, I do leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, prior to the dinner recess there had been some discussion indicating that there might possibly be a difference of opinion between the two sides of this house as to what may be cause and what may be effect in the present situation. Now, we may not agree on the causes, but we can agree, surely, on the effects as we see them today. And those effects are a revival, in a flourishing condition, of the vicious practice of the loss leader. And, so far as cause is concerned, whether the practice itself has brought on much or little of the present condition, the fact is that the present condition in the Canadian retail trade, one of increasingly keen competition, is the kind of situation in which the loss-leader practice was bound to be revived. And that has followed; and we say it has followed inevitably. It followed because of the enactment of the legislation in December 1951 at the behest of the government. Had that legislation not been enacted we would see today the benefits of the practices that had, before that time, eliminated the loss-leader practice from Canadian retail selling.

There are those who profess to see advantages to the consumer in a situation of this kind. Well, of course there are advantages to the consumer in a competitive situation such as we have today. Wherever you have a buyers' market, as at the present time, naturally there are advantages to the consumer—just as in December 1951, in the midst of a sellers' market the seller did possess an advantage in dealing with the consumer.

But it would be a very great mistake to think that the practice we are complaining about now, this evil loss-leader practice, has brought benefit to the Canadian public. Competition may be—and I have indicated that it is—of advantage to the Canadian consumer. But it is a very different thing to say that the loss-leader practice works to the advantage of the consumer.

There may be thought to be some short-term advantages to the consumer in the loss-leader practice. Some consumers think that there are bargains to be had under these conditions. Well, as hon. members who have had experience in retailing well know, the fact of the matter is that the first victim of the loss-leader practice is the consumer himself, as a class.

These so-called price wars are in many cases simply fictitious. The loss leader that is put out and becomes a bait for attracting the unsuspecting public into the retail store is put on sale at only short intervals, then withdrawn, and more expensive merchandise is put in its place. These are but some of the phases of the loss-leader practice which have been exposed whenever inquiries have been held, whether in this country or elsewhere. And in the 308-page volume published in April following an inquiry made by the restrictive trade practices commission, at the request of the Minister of Justice, we see catalogued on page after page these iniquitous phases of the practice of loss-leader selling.

I am sure no one in the house will have the temerity to justify or defend the loss-leader practice. It is vicious from start to finish, and in every respect. And the extent to which the loss-leader practice flourishes marks also the extent to which the small retailer is placed in jeopardy, because the effect of this practice inevitably and invariably has been to concentrate retail business in the larger outlets at the expense of the small retailer.

From what I have seen of it of late in Toronto, it is the small retailer—in many cases the young veteran who established himself in business since the war—who is feeling most keenly the effects of the loss-leader as practised by larger retailers.

So let no one try to justify this practice, as though it were of some benefit to the consumer. The consumer is the person who will lose out in the long run by reason of the curtailment of retail outlets and the gradual submergence of the small retailer in favour of the concentration of business in the hands of the larger retailer.

Finally, I offer one word in reference to legislation in the United States. This afternoon the minister made some reference to this subject and sought to draw an inference from it which I suggest is not warranted, and which is not particularly material to the point at issue. It is undoubtedly a fact that there are bankruptcies in the United States in retail trade today. But in those cases it is part of the general picture of meeting competition. It is part of the general condition that exists in the retail trade today. In their case it is not the result of legislation which opens the way for the loss-leader practice.

In 45 of the 48 states of the American union there is legislation commonly called fair trade legislation which permits resale price maintenance and thus combats the loss-leader practice. The constitutionality of that legislation was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States when it refused leave to appeal from a decision affirming the constitutionality of this state legislation. Something of this kind would be altogether desirable in this country.

There must be legislation, Mr. Chairman, which will make it possible for business to be cleansed of the loss-leader practice. Can it be done by a legislative enactment which will specifically prohibit the loss-leader practice? Well, all that I can say on that subject is this. Out of the experience of sitting in that committee in the autumn of 1951 and through the debates of this house which preceded and followed the sittings of the committee, all I can say is that at that time at any rate no member of the committee, no member of the house, no adviser of the Department of Justice was able to bring forward a satisfactory enactment to prohibit the practice of loss-leader selling.

The hon. member for Spadina attempted to write such a section in the committee. It was found, in the view of the committee, not to offer a workable solution. If the commission that the Minister of Justice has set up and is now holding sittings is able to bring forward some legislative formula to prohibit the loss-leader practice then they will have done something that nobody has been able to do effectively up to the present time. In truth, Mr. Chairman, the effective antidote to the loss leader, the vicious loss-leader practice, is the kind of practice within industry which was permitted under the laws that existed prior to December 1951, and which is prohibited today by legislation enacted by this parliament at the request of the government.

While I have no wish to prejudge the findings of the commission I will say this, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that if they are being asked to write a legislative provision prohibiting specifically the loss-leader practice, they have been assigned an impossible task. It will have to be left to other methods to grapple with this vicious practice, and I for my part express my regret that the government, for partisan reasons, in 1951 denied to business the opportunity of cleansing the retail trade in this country from the vicious loss-leader practice.

Mr. Yuill: It might be interesting to the minister to get a little firsthand information pertaining to the loss-leader business. I happen to be one of those small merchants who unwittingly found himself enmeshed in these very tactics. I have been running a retail business for a number of years. I have always run it on a live and let live principle. I enjoy quite a considerable patronage in our town. It is only a small town of about 1,600 or 1,700 people. We had two other meat merchants there. We have a nice business and are doing it legitimately. Just about the time that I was elected to come to Ottawa a very fine supermarket was set up in our town. I know that most people who are familiar with the meat business know that the hamburger trade is perhaps the same to the retail butcher as the cough drops are to the Smith Brothers. It is very important. As a matter of fact, you cannot survive without it. I enjoyed a very large trade. I gave them the very best that was to be had. It was always fresh and good, and the price was always right. Therefore I obtained about 90 per cent of all the hamburger business in our town. I have 95 per cent of all the restaurant and hotel business. It was very important business.

So far as the hamburger was concerned, I was selling it pretty well on a break-even basis. But this famous unit came to town and perhaps they felt that the hamburger level was most vulnerable so far as my business was concerned, and they concentrated on that. The result was they were quoting hamburger at less than 25 cents a pound. They were paying the same as I was, 37 cents and 39 cents a pound for beef. You can see the effect that would have on legitimate trade.

I believe the retail merchants serve a very useful purpose in a community. We enjoy the confidence and the support, not only of the people of the town but of people from quite a distance away from the community. They were quite happy and satisfied. As a matter of fact in the twelve years or thirteen years that I have been there my business has increased about thirteen times what it was when I bought it in the spring of 1942. That should be proof enough that the people must have felt they were getting a square deal. This unit came to town with perhaps a hundred times as much money as I had, and they viciously tried to put the skids under my business as well as under the other gentlemen who were doing a legitimate business in our town. If you need any evidence, I can give it to you. I can tell you where to go and get that evidence. There is no monkey or no funny business about this; it is a reality.

I sincerely hope it will not result in two or three more cases of bankruptcy because of unfair tactics from that angle. I am not pleading particularly for myself. I am not afraid of legitimate business. I happen to be mayor of that town. I am serving my fifth term there now. I have never yet tried to discourage anyone from coming in there and opening up in opposition to my own business or to any other business. When people come to a town and make a gentleman's agreement that they are going to do business on the level and then they come out with those tactics, it is about time that this government or somebody started to reckon with that kind of condition.

What I am saying goes for small merchants in our town or anywhere else. If I am going to be steamrollered and pushed aside because big business likes to come in there and steamroller us out of business, it is about time that this government took some action in the matter. I am not particularly in favour of price controls. I have worked under price controls and I do not relish them too much, but the minister would be well advised to consider ways and means of keeping this business on the level and to give every man the opportunity to live in a free country.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister tell us when it is expected the commission will conclude its inquiries and be able to make a report?

Mr. Garson: I expect that they should conclude their inquiries some time before the end of August, and we would hope that the report would be available some time this fall.

Mr. Fulton: They have finished in Toronto and Montreal? Are they now in the maritimes or going west?

Mr. Garson: They are going west.

Mr. Coldwell: I am going to pass one remark. I am wondering whether I am really with "Alice" in "Wonderland". We have free enterprise parties all over the house and they are asking the government to interfere with free competition.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said a little while ago—perhaps I will not say any more; it was a private conversation. I will say, however, that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar knows very well that the remark he has just made is not a proper interpretation of what is asked for here. I can tell the hon. gentleman if he really expects the house to be closed by Saturday he should refrain from making that sort of remark. I suggest that as a matter of fact what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would like to see, in keeping with the political doctrines to which he subscribes, is the continuance of conditions which would create a demand for government interference and control of everything. That would suit the purpose of the hon. gentleman.

We recognize that human nature has certain weaknesses and what we are trying to prevent are the abuses which will result from the kind of thing which the hon. gentleman wants continued. We maintain that these abuses are brought about under the system which is permitted as a result of the government legislation of 1951. The protection that had been worked out previously by business and commercial interests on a voluntary and co-operative basis was working well, as the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out, in the interests of both the buyer and the seller. But it is now made illegal to follow that form of self-protection as a result of the ill-advised course followed by the government in 1951. We are not asking for any governmental protection for anyone. We are merely asking that those interested in the matter should be allowed to work out their own means of self-protection, a means which at the present time is made illegal by the government.

[Mr. Yuill.]

Item agreed to.

Combines Investigation Act—

169. Office of investigation and research, $334,580.

Mr. Fulton: Could the minister tell us what other inquiries are now in hand in the investigation and research branch?

Mr. Garson: I cannot very well disclose those that are in hand by the investigation and research branch. I can indicate those that have been reported on to the commission itself within the past fiscal year or are still pending in some form or other. I will give the list. There is resale price maintenance of chinaware, coarse paper, household supplies, electric wire and cable, fine paper; price discrimination in hardware; the match case; resale price maintenance of soap, rubber and gasoline in Vancouver.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask whether all of the reports that have been submitted have been made public?

Mr. Garson: All reports submitted by the commission have been made public.

Item agreed to.

Combines Investigation Act—

665. Office of investigation and research—further amount required, $43,000.

Mr. Fulton: I notice that for the office of investigation and research there is this further amount requested of $43,000. I wonder if this is for the expansion in the field of investigation and research undertaken by this department. Is the minister able to comment?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite right in his assumption that this covers a general expansion of the work.

Item agreed to.

172. Yukon Territory—administration of justice, $49,808.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, it is perhaps rather a long jump from loss leaders to judges' salaries but I would like to say one word on that subject. I speak as a former member of the legal profession, or at least I was a member of the legal profession until last November, and I speak as one who has no expectation of being appointed chief justice of Canada and indeed has no aspirations even to be a puisne judge. I say that in case I might be suspected of being interested. I think many of the members of the legal profession in this house are greatly concerned about the problem of judges' salaries and I rise to express the hope that the minister has not abandoned his efforts in this field because I feel there is a problem and an important one. Everyone knows the necessity for maintaining the independence, impartiality and quality of the bench.

Mr. Harris: This covers police magistrates, not judges.

Mr. Michener: It may not be entirely in order but I want to say that I for one do hope that although we have not before us a solution we will in due course have one.

Item agreed to.

General—

173. Expenses of committee appointed to advise on principles and procedures relating to remission service, $10,000.

Mr. Winch: Just a brief question. Can the minister tell us what progress has been made with this inquiry and just when he anticipates a report will be available?

Mr. Garson: I would not think the report would be available until next year. I would not like to say exactly when but I do not think it will be available before that time. This is quite a full inquiry into the whole field of remission and parole and the committee will examine the matter carefully here and will then examine the systems they have in England and Belgium before making a report to us.

Item agreed to.

667. Expenses of the royal commission on the law of insanity as a defence in criminal cases and on the criminal law relating to criminal sexual psychopaths, $72,250.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister give us any indication as to when the commission will conclude their study and make a report?

Mr. Garson: That too will take some time since it is intended to be a definitive study. In addition, as my hon. friend is no doubt aware, the chairman of that commission, Chief Justice McRuer, is the chairman of another body made up of himself, Judge Kinnear and Dr. Gustave Desrochers, which is dealing with criminal sexual psychopaths. We hope there will be a simultaneous report.

Mr. Fulton: Have you any indication as to when?

Mr. Garson: No, sir.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps they do not know themselves.

Mr. Garson: Quite right.

Item agreed to.

174. Administration of the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries, including $40,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies, as may be approved by the treasury board, $375,296.

Mr. Winch: Could the minister tell us if there is any examination under way at the present time regarding some of the regulations in force in our penitentiaries? I fully realize that a person who breaks the law must pay the penalty and such persons must not be coddled. There is no question about that. But I do think the time has come for the revision of some of these regulations. I think they are a little bit too onerous. For example, I think an inmate of the penitentiary is allowed two letters per month. If a man is in a penitentiary for a considerable number of years it seems to me a little bit tough that he should be tied down to two letters a month, or three if he does not have any visitors for a period of four weeks. I have spoken to men in the penitentiary and they tell me they can send a letter to their wives, one to their mothers, and that is all. They cannot write their brothers, sisters, or others. I am wondering if there is any possibility of reconsidering regulations such as that and introducing some slight change for the better.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member must be clairvoyant because it so happens that that particular matter is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. Nicholson: The last time we had the minister's estimates before us he had a report on this twelve-year-old boy who is serving a two-year sentence in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. The hon. member for The Battlefords suggested that there certainly must be two sides to this story. The minister promised to get a report from his officers. I wonder if he has that report available?

Mr. Garson: Yes. I have it here somewhere. I undertook with my hon. friend from Mackenzie to get a report as to how this boy was getting along in the penitentiary. This is the report. I am not going to give his name, of course, or his number:

—has been transferred to the federal training centre on the 26th March, 1954, one day after his admission to St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. Because of his youth and need of sympathy and comprehension he was given special treatment. A scooter was provided,—

That sounds rather extraordinary but I think those members who saw him in the penitentiary will realize that it makes sense in an exceptional case like this to provide a scooter for an inmate of a penitentiary. The report continues:

—he was given small toy trucks, a meccano set etc., etc.—and as it is known that every boy wants to be the owner of a dog, he was given a young pup. —is segregated from the older and wiser inmates—he has a room, all by himself, in the hospital wing, where he has contacts with the hospital orderlies. Takes his meals in the chief steward's office under the supervision of a trustee-inmate—works at light duties—goes to school and does much physical exercises in the gymnasium under the coaching and guidance of the P.T. instructor. Seems to have adjusted fairly well to his new mode of living and no doubt is better off here than any other place he ever went—

Then it is noted here by the conscientious officer that it was only the scooter that was paid for at public expense. The other playthings were supplied by voluntary contributions from the officers.

Mr. Nicholson: This report supports the opinion that I expressed here. I think the content of the minister's report would indicate that the young lad is really quite a promising lad. I am sure that he is now having a better time than he ever had before. I wonder whether the minister sent along the report he placed on Hansard the last time he discussed the matter? Would he indicate whether he has sent that report along to the officers at the training school and has asked them to comment on that sort of report.

The point I am trying to get at is this. Here is a lad who, I think, should not have been in the penitentiary at any time in his life. The fact that he has had this preferred treatment from the officers at the federal training school would indicate that they think he has the makings of a citizen. But as I understood the situation before, he would be a problem of the provincial authorities and, if he gets a long enough sentence, he becomes a problem for the federal authorities. I think that the report that was placed on the record before was certainly a very one-sided report. I wish at the same time the minister would ask his officers to comment on the sort of report that he placed on the record.

Mr. Dinsdale: On June 3, when the Department of Justice estimates were before the committee, I made a short statement on the problem of after-care of the discharged prisoners. I was glad to hear the minister say that recidivism has decreased to an encouraging extent since the new reform program was instituted. I just want to pursue the matter further at this time and to obtain some further details, if possible, as to how the problem of after-care is being met by the department.

First of all may I say this. Under this item 174 I notice that again there is $40,000 set aside for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies as may be approved by the treasury board. I presume that that amount is divided among the three voluntary societies that were mentioned on June 3, namely the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society and the Salvation Army. I wonder whether it is possible for the minister to indicate just what the percentage of distribution is.

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps my hon. friend's previous remarks were confined to a local situation, and that it would perhaps be more accurate if I were to give the figures for the whole of Canada.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is fine.

Mr. Garson: They are as follows for 1953-54: The Canadian Penal Association, Toronto, $1,500; the Canadian Welfare Association, Winnipeg, $3,500; the Catholic Rehabilitation Service, Montreal, $500; the Elizabeth Fry Society, Kingston, $250; the John Howard Society at the following places: St. John's, Newfoundland, $500; Halifax, Nova Scotia, $2,000; Moncton, New Brunswick, $1,000; Saint John, New Brunswick, $500; Montreal, Quebec, $1,750; Toronto, Ontario, $7,750; Saskatoon, $1,000; Calgary, $3,000; Vancouver, $3,250; Victoria, $750; la Société d'Orientation et de Réhabilitation, Montreal, $5,000; Salvation Army public service, Toronto, $2,000. That is a total of $35,000.

Mr. Dinsdale: I wish to thank the minister for that information. As he has indicated in those figures, the support is widely distributed across the country. I think any money spent in this way is used to the best possible advantage because from any knowledge I have of the problem the only facilities available outside the penitentiary for carrying out a program of after-care are provided by these voluntary groups.

I have one further question in this regard. The minister indicated that in the case of these prisoners coming up for discharge a trained psychologist makes a thorough examination of the case. I presume that when he uses the word "psychologist" he indicates that there is just one person engaged for this activity for all the institutions in Canada. I looked in the estimates and I note that there is a vote for one psychologist only. On this point, may I say that an employment circular was sent out from the remission service of the Department of Justice—it is competition number 54594, June 3, 1954—advertising for a clemency officer. I conclude that this is an addition to the staff and is in addition to the psychologist who has already been referred to. Perhaps I had better complete my remarks on this topic while I am on my feet.

Mr. Garson: Might I answer these questions now? By doing so I will not overlook any of them.

Mr. Dinsdale: All right.

Mr. Garson: The clemency officer is not an officer of the penitentiary service at all. He is attached to the remission service, and he investigates and advises upon the exercise of clemency in remission matters. As regards the psychologist, I think my hon. friend from Brandon-Souris will find if he will look at Hansard that what I said before was that we had a psychiatrist in nearly all of the penitentiaries, and that we had likewise in each penitentiary an official who is called a classification officer but who is a trained psychologist. It may be that my hon. friend has reference to another psychologist who will come on the staff under the name of psychologist, but all our classification officers are university graduates trained in psychology, and we have them in addition to our psychiatrists.

Mr. Dinsdale: Perhaps I have misunderstood that point. I was looking specifically for psychologists and I could find a reference only to one. On the question of after-care, I am interested in the re-establishment credits that are available to prisoners. While voluntary organizations, particularly the Salvation Army, provide hostel facilities and so forth for the discharged prisoner, in the first few weeks following his discharge he is pretty largely dependent on any re-establishment credit he has built up during his stay in the institution. Has there been any increase in the per diem allowance within recent years? It was a very small sum. I should also like to know whether it is given in a lump sum or apportioned over a period of time so that the man will not, in the first flush of freedom, spend it on riotous living and get himself into further difficulty.

The same problem confronted the serviceman. There were various checks and balances on re-establishment credits so that the serviceman would make the best use of the money. In the case of a discharged prisoner the problem is of course all the greater. Finally, is it possible for the prisoner while he is in the institution to build up additional credits as the result of his work in the prison workshops and, if so, on what basis?

Mr. Garson: Every prisoner when he is discharged gets a suit of clothes and his transportation. Prior to 1951 prisoners were paid —it was not by way of gift at all—a flat five cents per day for the work they did while in prison. They had the privilege of spending a small portion of that. As a matter of fact there was not too much on which to spend it and the bulk of it would be saved against release. We felt that this was a rather inadequate wage. At the present time, as the result of a change made in 1951, 15 per cent of the penitentiary inmates are being paid a wage of 20 cents per day, 45 per cent are being paid 15 cents per day and 40 per cent 10 cents per day. The great bulk of this accumulates and since it is the prisoner's own money we do not hold it back over a period of time after his release. We give him the whole amount when he is discharged.

I think I should add that he is discharged under an arrangement made before his discharge between the classification officer and the prisoners' aid society in charge of his case, such as the John Howard Society, the Salvation Army. The employment service of Canada also are interested in seeing to it that he can get employment. Therefore although he has not much money he has a pretty good chance to become re-established, particularly with the assistance he gets both from the penitentiary officials and these other re-establishment bodies.

Mr. Winch: Actually when a man comes out of a penitentiary he has not a great deal of money. I am told that the average is around $25. While in prison he has to spend money for tobacco and other things which he can buy at the commissariat in the penitentiary. Everything possible should be done to encourage these men to build up their own resources because if they come out of the penitentiary with a sufficient amount of money there is only a small chance that they will go back to a life of crime.

I feel there is one way in which the penitentiary officials can give greater encouragement, and I should like to commend it to the attention of the minister. In my estimation the penitentiary authorities are doing a magnificent job at the present time in the encouragement of hobbies. I know that in the British Columbia penitentiary the work, attitude and encouragement of the officials are excellent. The men are responding, and they are taking to hobbies in such a manner that some very skilled work is being done. Unfortunately, however, they are up against the problem of really making any money out of their hobbies on account of the lack of a market. I understand that in the past organized labour has always objected to anything manufactured in a penitentiary being sold on the open market, but I fail to see why organized labour should be afraid of the marketing of the quantity of hobby goods that would come out of our penitentiaries.

I should like the minister to give consideration to giving greater assistance to inmates in the marketing of their hobby products. I think it would give them a great deal of encouragement. It would enable them to have more money at the time of their release and to a great extent might provide them with trades which they could enter on being released. I have been asked in the past few days where I got this wonderful tie I have been wearing. It is a hand-painted tie. I have been asked by members where they can buy one. It came from the British Columbia penitentiary. It is the hobby work of one of the inmates, a chap who is serving seven years. This is not the first time he has been in the penitentiary, but now he is doing this beautiful work. Inlay work, straw work and needlework are also being carried on and some marvellous things are being done.

I am certain that what are hobbies to these men at the present time can become trades or professions if they are given a little more assistance in the marketing of their products. I hope the minister, with all his other duties and responsibilities, will see if more attention cannot be given to overcoming the problem of the marketing of hobby products.

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe that the work done in our penitentiaries extends far beyond hobbycrafts. The inmates engage in rather extensive furniture construction, shoe manufacturing and so forth. Can the minister tell us whether any of these products are disposed of to government departments? For example, public works uses considerable quantities of furniture and the armed forces use quite a number of shoes. If there is a problem in marketing these goods, as indicated by the hon. member for Vancouver East, it seems to me that might be a potential outlet. In my opinion the competition that might be provided by prison labour is greatly overexaggerated. I do not have the statistics, but I do not imagine that the total penitentiary population engaged in this type of activity would be more than 2,000. They do not work the full day because of the institutional schedule; they work only four hours a day five days a week. This would not represent a very formidable labour force, and yet it seems to me that they might find a ready market for their articles with some of the government departments. Just what is the situation in that regard?

Mr. Garson: I want to express my gratification at the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. One of the problems in providing genuine work for the inmates of the penitentiary, than which there is no greater rehabilitative agent —I mean real work and not just some make-work exercise that the prisoners do grudgingly—one of the great problems, I say, is public opinion which is opposed to having the production of prison labour come into competition with commercial articles. I am glad to have the members of the opposition express the views that they have expressed tonight.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris is quite right in saying, and I think his figures are approximately right too, that our prisoners form such a small proportion of the total working force of the nation that the competition of their product cannot be very alarming. Actually, however, this product is surprisingly good; our production has gone up from some $600,000 to over $1,200,000, although there is included in that a lot of the goods and services which are produced by the inmates of penitentiaries for their own use. As minister I am very glad to have this expression of opinion because we are considering the matter at this time and the suggestions made by hon. members are very apropos.

With regard to the sale of the hobbycrafts, the prisoners may send their products to relatives or they can sell them to the officers or visitors in the prison. From time to time special sales are arranged by service clubs or John Howard societies, where the sponsorship of an organization of that sort invites public interest and avoids public criticism.

Item agreed to.

175. Operation and maintenance of penitentiaries, including supplies and services relating thereto; administration, operation, repair and upkeep of buildings, works and equipment; maintenance, discharge and transfer of inmates; compensation to discharged inmates permanently disabled while in penitentiaries, $8,497,572.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask a question concerning the employees in penitentiaries, and the number of veterans among that group. The total of employees appears to be 1,543. Of that number I should like to know how many are veterans? In the report of the commissioner of penitentiaries on page 9, dealing with appointments for the year 1952-53, there is a statement that reads as follows:

> During this fiscal year there were 244 appointments; eighty-two were veterans with overseas active service.

This means that in that year one-third of those who were appointed were veterans with overseas active service. Has the minister available the figures by institutions, showing the total number of employees and the number of veterans in that particular institution?

Mr. Garson: I believe I should point out, Mr. Chairman, that veterans have the usual veterans preference in appointments to the staff of the penitentiary. If there are not more veterans on the staff than there are it is not through any policy on our part. It is simply because those who would be eligible under the veterans preference for positions in the penitentiary have not applied. I will give my hon. friend the figures he asked for in just a moment.

I am afraid I have not with me the totals for the whole staff, but the total number of veterans appointed from April 1, 1953 to March 31, 1954, is as follows—this is the total number of veterans by institution: Kingston, out of a total of 30, the number of veterans was 11; St. Vincent de Paul, 4; federal training centre, 10; Dorchester, 16; Manitoba, 11; British Columbia, 29; Saskatchewan, 6; Collin's Bay, 1; there was a total of 98 in the institutions and then 4 at headquarters for a total of 102.

Mr. Churchill: That is 102 veterans?

Mr. Garson: That is 102 veterans with overseas service.

Mr. Churchill: In giving the list the minister started in with Kingston and gave the total number appointed as 30, 11 of whom were veterans. Could the minister give the same figures for the other institutions?

Mr. Garson: Yes, certainly. St. Vincent de Paul, total 47; federal training centre, total 44; Dorchester, total 18; Manitoba, 18; British Columbia, 33; Saskatchewan, 19; Collin's Bay, 23; headquarters, 18.

Mr. Churchill: I accept the minister's statement, Mr. Chairman, that the veterans preference is recognized. From these figures it is obvious that quite a number of veterans are being employed. I hope that every care is taken to see that that is the case, and at no institution are veterans applications not received. Would the minister have any knowledge of any instance of applications of veterans not being received and dealt with?

Mr. Garson: Absolutely not, sir.

Mr. Weir: I should like to make an observation or two in connection with this item. I think we all appreciate very much the improvements that have been made in more recent times in so far as our penitentiaries are concerned, and more particularly the craftwork and the training of the inmates of the institution for useful occupations when they go back into civilian life. In our own penitentiary in Manitoba, those of us who have had the privilege of visiting the institution recognize the very valuable groundwork of training that is being done there in fitting these people to take their part in life when they get out again.

I happen to have in my hand another little innovation which I thought indicated a very useful effort on the part of the institution. It is the publication of a little pamphlet in the form of a monthly news bulletin known as the Mountain Echo. It is a well prepared booklet having to do mostly with the institution, the life therein and some of the personnel. I look upon it as a creditable effort, and one in which those who are associated with the institution, particularly those within it, can take pride. The publication is in my opinion something that should be commended.

Then I understand an effort has been made recently to introduce sports to these institutions. From what I can gather, and from the contacts I have had with the institution in Manitoba, this innovation has played a very important part and is well accepted by those who are there. When outside teams and competitors take part in the games the results are good not only for the institution but for those from the outside, in that it gives an opportunity to see just what the rules of the game are, and it also gives the opportunity for the participants from outside and inside the institution to meet each other.

However I have risen more particularly at this time to ask the minister a question concerning the hours of labour guards who are associated with the institution are obliged to work. I realize the government introduced a 40-hour five-day week in many government services, but that it did not apply to the penitentiaries. It may well be that it is not possible to do all this at once. But I do submit to the minister—and I hope he will keep this in mind—that in my view guard duty at penitentiaries is one of the most hazardous, if one may so describe it, one of the most dangerous, and certainly one of the most nerve-straining occupations in which one could indulge. And if any branch of government service is to be recognized as being entitled to shorter hours of employment, then I suggest the guards and others in the penitentiaries are in that position.

I recognize immediately that a project of this kind would go beyond the guards. At the same time it would have to include personnel who are carrying on training, and things of that nature. At the same time I believe it would be admitted that, after all, the guards have the greatest measure of responsibility, and are perhaps under the greatest strain of any group in the institutions. I would hope that early steps could be taken to place them in the same position as others in the government service, so that they may have the advantage of the shorter hours of employment, and that such a program might be worked out in the not too distant future. I wonder if the minister could indicate any plans directed to that end, or if he would tell us what is being considered in this connection.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend from Portage-Neepawa will recall that when the Minister of Finance announced the granting of the 40-hour week in the federal civil service he indicated at that time that there were some operating services in which it was not possible to introduce that provision. The penitentiaries form one of those operating services. One of the reasons as provincial governments have found is that, in institutions such as federal penitentiaries, provincial mental hospitals, provincial prisons and the like, up until the present time the difficulties of introducing the 40-hour week have proven to be insuperable, with the result that they have not been introduced in any of those institutions. I think it is likely that the introduction of the 40-hour week in our institutions would probably coincide with that in the corresponding provincial institutions.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I have one further question.

An hon. Member: Ah!

Mr. Dinsdale: Somebody over there is in distress.

I note at page 227 that considerable sums are set aside for construction, improvements and new equipment in the penitentiaries. In that connection I presume that, as is indicated by the heading, the new equipment concerns the extension of training programs. When the minister replies I would appreciate it if in a general way, and without giving too much detail, he would indicate the purpose for which this money is being used. I would ask him particularly to tell us how much of the vote is distributed between technical training and vocational training.

Contacts I have had with this type of work going on in the penitentiaries indicate that there is a substantial percentage of money for penitentiary training being used for the training of machinists, and that the investment in machinery is high. It is pointed out however that the enrolment in that particular type of work is low in proportion to the amount of money invested in the machines.

[Mr. Weir.]

In the institution I contacted the suggestion was put forward that perhaps the emphasis might be placed upon broader vocational training rather than training in a specialized category, and that the net results would be more beneficial. That is, it seems difficult to get a sufficient number of prisoners interested in strictly technical training as contrasted with other vocational opportunities. What is the situation?

Mr. Garson: I do not know where my hon. friend got the information that there is any difficulty in persuading prisoners to take, for example, machinists courses. I have been through the Collin's Bay vocational training school, and when I was there all these courses were up to their full complement. There were as many pupils as the instructors could handle. I believe that is typical. The equipment used in all the courses—plumbing, steamfitting, carpentry, masonry, machinists and the like—has been most effective in producing good results. I believe I am right in saying that the rate of recidivism is less than 15 per cent among those inmates who have taken these vocational training courses, and have subsequently been released from prison. This is a very low rate indeed when one considers that the percentage of recidivism among prisoners in the penitentiaries is up around 38 per cent in respect of previous penitentiary sentences and 77 per cent in respect of the service of previous terms in penitentiaries, reformatories or provincial jails sentences. Therefore, while this is a fairly large item of expenditure I think we get big dividends from it not only in the rehabilitation of prisoners but in the saving of future costs of maintaining them if they have to come back in prison again.

Mr. Dinsdale: I do not want to press this matter too closely. Are there any statistics indicating the numbers involved in the various trades?

Mr. Garson: Yes, my hon. friend will find it in the penitentiary report. If he has not one I will send him one.

Mr. Churchill: Just on the subject of education, I want to say one word. I will not delay the committee. Two years ago I discussed this subject and asked for more complete information with regard to the education of those who are in our penitentiaries. I note that more complete information has been supplied. I thank the minister for that. I do not for one minute think that it came as a result of my discussion in the house. I note on page 177 the complete list of excellent tables. Would it not be much better to show the recidivists by the same system as is shown elsewhere. On page 177 the recidivists are grouped under school grades 1 to 13 rather than putting them into the more normal division of elementary and high school. I suggest that that is a change for another year.

Mr. Garson: I would be inclined to agree with my hon. friend, but those statistics are prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Churchill: Pass the word on to them.

Mr. Garson: Fine.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to ask a question by reading a sentence from page 12 which refers to overcrowding conditions. I understand that this has not been mentioned before:

Owing to the overcrowding conditions at these two institutions,—

The reference there was to St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary and Kingston penitentiary.

—transfers were arranged to Dorchester and Manitoba penitentiaries where more accommodation was available.

Will the minister say a word as to overcrowding? It seems to me to be a serious matter. I should like to know whether this is further taken care of, or are arrangements in hand to take care of it.

Mr. Garson: The answer to the question that was asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is that these moneys were being spent largely for buildings, and this is also the answer to the question which my hon. friend has just asked. We are providing in these estimates that are under consideration fairly substantial sums of money to increase our accommodation for prisoners.

The fact of the matter is that our penitentiary population reached its low point in 1943, at which time it was slightly under 3,000 inmates. It stood fairly constant until about 1946, and from that time started to increase, and has increased pretty steadily year by year, until as of April 30 of the present year it went over the 5,000 mark. We have had to receive these inmates, and house and care for them.

Mr. Macdonnell: Are these figures strictly comparable? Do they refer to exactly the same classes?

Mr. Garson: That is the total population of the penitentiaries, and that has presented a substantial problem because it is an increase of 66 per cent in a fairly short period. And that is one reason why we appreciate the suggestions of the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Brandon-Souris about finding greater acceptance of the products of prison labour. We have not only to house those prisoners, we have to keep them employed at some useful occupation. This heavy increase in penitentiary population has come about notwithstanding the fact that we have been able to improve the rate of recidivism of those inmates who are discharged from the penitentiary. Usually it is not our own graduate coming back upon us. We have been holding down our own rate of recidivism; but as the rate of recidivism from our institutions went down the rate of crime in society generally has been going up.

One of the purposes of our commission on remissions is to see if we cannot by some different system of parole, not only remission in the federal field but also parole in the provincial field, have a smaller number of inmates in our provincial prisons or federal prisons to take care of in proportion to the total number of prisoners convicted. On the American continent we have as compared with Britain and some of the European countries a quite high percentage of prisoners who upon being convicted are sentenced to imprisonment in our institutions. If we were able by a new system of parole or remission to cut that percentage down it would be one way of reducing the prison population both in our federal and in our provincial institutions. As matters have been up to the present time, we have just had to accept this increase in persons sentenced to imprisonment in federal penitentiaries. We have had very little control over this ourselves. We try to keep the factors over which we have control in order. It is the factors over which we have no control which are not in good shape. As a result we have to accept these prisoners and make provision for them.

Item agreed to.

407. Administration, operation and maintenance, $7,223,936.

Mr. Fulton: I have a question or two about this item. I understood that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were acquiring a large building out here as a new headquarters at a cost of some $6 million. I do not find it listed anywhere under acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, or under the administration item or anywhere else.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that I cannot assist my hon. friend in that regard. We are the occupants of it as the mounted police, but the purchase of it would be arranged through the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Fulton: That is different from the other items in the minister's department. There is a substantial amount provided for acquisition or construction of buildings and works for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend will see in the details that they are for the most part buildings and works for detachment headquarters, and residences for officers, scattered throughout Canada.

Mr. Fulton: The details are not given, but that is the explanation. It is being acquired by the Department of Public Works. Has the minister readily available information as to the total number of officers and men in the force and a comparison of the number of officers and men who are accounted for under this first item, headquarters administration, national police services, and so forth, and the number of men who are accounted for under officers and men under land and air services, and marine services.

Mr. Garson: The figures that my hon. friend wants are as follows: Headquarters administration, the present strength 335; national police services, present strength 97; training establishments, present strength, 540. The grand total of these, 972. Does that cover the point?

Mr. Fulton: That is the first part. I take it that the figure of 540 covers recruits undergoing training as well as the administrative personnel of this department?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Then I come to the other part of the question. Could the minister say the number of officers and men accounted for under the items for land, air services, and marine services? The total would do.

Mr. Garson: The present strength of the land services is 3,639; the air services 32; and marine services 210.

Mr. Fulton: I suppose the grand total would account for the pay figures.

Mr. Garson: No, there are other items. We have 455 civilian employees.

Mr. Fulton: But they would not be covered under the pay item dealing with members of the force.

Mr. Garson: They come under that total. There is another item covering 917 civil servants but they come in under a different primary. My hon. friend can therefore leave out the figure 917, but the remaining 455 civilian employees are included in the total he has before him.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: Are they stationed at headquarters or included in the land, air, or marine services?

Mr. Garson: I do not know what my hon. friend is looking at but if he looks at the grand total of pay for the forces then that will include all the items we have stated, namely, headquarters administration, national police services, training establishments, land, air, and marine services, and civilian employees.

Mr. Fulton: Then I will come to the reason for my question. I notice that under this first item, which puzzles me, details of which are given at page 474, there is an item listed for pay for members of the force amounting to $4,385,630. Then under item 409, details at page 476, there is an amount of $14,132,180 for pay for members of the force. And under item 411 details of which are at page 477 there is an item covering the marine services in relation to pay of members of the force, amounting to $900,151. My question was directed to the fact that the total pay for the headquarters staff members of the force is over one-quarter of the total for the land, air, and marine services. The total for the headquarters staff is $4,385,630 while the total for the services other than headquarters is approximately $15,032,000. Therefore more than one-quarter of the pay of the members of the forces is devoted to the pay of those at headquarters. That is why I asked for the breakdown because it occurred to me to ask whether that is not a rather high proportion of the total personnel of the force. It appears there is approximately one-quarter of the total force stationed at headquarters. I realize my comment might have to be modified and that this apparently includes the training establishment. That is why I would like to be certain that the figure of 540 is inclusive of all the recruits who are undergoing training and does not merely indicate administrative personnel.

Mr. Garson: I do not know whether my hon. friend has this breakdown before him but the total to which he refers does include 425 constables who are undergoing training. That is to say they are not included there in the training establishment, but from time to time there will be constables at this training establishment receiving training who would normally be elsewhere and that loads the headquarters payroll by the 400-odd constables who come to headquarters from time to time to take training courses in these training establishments.

Mr. Fulton: That is the factor which probably explains the high proportion who are on headquarters strength. Now does this training establishment, whose strength has now been given as a total of 540, include those at the training establishment here in Ottawa, or does it cover whatever other training establishments there may be elsewhere? I understand there is a training establishment at Regina. Would that be carried on headquarters strength?

Mr. Garson: This item does exactly what it says. It covers training establishments at Ottawa or elsewhere. The main training establishment outside of Ottawa is at Regina.

Mr. Fulton: All attributed for this purpose to headquarters?

Mr. Garson: Yes. It includes two superintendents; four inspectors; one sub-inspector; one company sergeant major; eight staff sergeants; 19 sergeants; 32 corporals, 425 constables; and 48 special constables.

Mr. Fulton: What about recruits? Would they be included in the total for the purposes of pay?

Mr. Garson: The recruits are included in the 425 constables.

Mr. Fulton: One other matter in this regard which is common to the detail in all three of the main divisions deals with headquarters, and land, air, and marine services. I notice, for example, by reference to page 474 of the details with respect to civilian personnel that there is an item covering approximate requirements for increases in rates of pay amounting to $92,000. When it comes to pay of members of the forces amounting to $4,385,630 and other items relating to the force there is no provision for any increase in the rates of pay. I am wondering whether the increases in rates of pay which have been provided or are in contemplation are, in fact, confined to the civilian personnel?

Mr. Garson: As my hon. friend will recall from time to time during the period he has served here in the House of Commons there have been increases in the rates of pay of the members of the force; I refer to the actual constables, officers and so forth of the force. The increases applicable to officers and members of the force are so provided, whereas these civilian employees come under the civil service rates and have to be set up separately.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Is the minister now in a position to give a statement or report on the Ipperwash matter?

Mr. Garson: Yes. I think I have that here, Mr. Chairman. As my hon. friend will recall, the question he asked is set out at page 5486 of Hansard. I do not think it is necessary for me to read that question into the record again. The report that I have with regard to that matter is as follows. It takes the form of a letter dated June 14, 1954, from deputy commissioner J. D. Bird to myself relative to the question which my hon. friend asked. It reads as follows:

> Re: Theft of stores from Department of National Defence (Army)—Camp Ipperwash, Ontario
> The news clipping from the Free Press,—

I suppose that would be the London Free Press.

> —dated April 30, 1954, and the page from Hansard of June 3, 1954, forwarded with your memorandum of 7-6-54, are returned herewith.
> A review of all reports on file at this headquarters which deal with this investigation, has been made. There is no indication that a civilian was stopped on a street to effect seizure of any article. The news clipping indicates that a Thedford man was stopped on the street and his shoes removed. We have no report of such an incident having taken place. Further, reports do state that on two occasions, civilians were found to be in possession of army footwear and, as they had no other shoes, the civilians were allowed to retain them until they were able to purchase others and then hand over the army boots to our investigator.
> This investigation is being conducted to ascertain whether or not infractions of the pertinent sections of the Criminal Code of Canada have been contravened (sections 433 and 439) and, in some cases, exhibits have been handed over voluntarily and, in others, were seized under the authority of a search warrant. We have no record of any case where one of these procedures was not followed.

That is to say, they were either handed over voluntarily—which would be quite lawful—or they were seized under the authority of a search warrant, as I correctly surmised when my hon. friend asked the question the other day. Hence there is no impropriety of any kind.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I thank the minister.

Mr. Blackmore: I realize that the minister would like to finish these estimates tonight, Mr. Chairman. I am wondering whether he would rather go on with the other items and let me say what I have to say later on or whether he would rather let me say what I have to say now?

Mr. Garson: I have no preference, Mr. Chairman. If there are no other points that any of the other hon. members wish to raise, perhaps my hon. friend might make his remarks now.

Mr. Fulton: I have one or two items I want to ask about later on.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister was in the house this morning when I began asking the Prime Minister concerning his preparations to meet communism. My own feeling is that, as a nation and as individuals, we are not taking communism nearly seriously enough and that we are not taking anything like the measures we ought to take to cope with it. That is why I asked the Prime Minister those questions this morning. I think probably it might be well just to review those questions briefly so that we shall have them in our minds as I begin asking the questions I desire to ask.

I asked the Prime Minister first of all whether he intended to win the cold war. He implied that he intended to do so all right, but he did not say it as though he meant it very much, as far as I was concerned. This being so, what has he done in that respect, since last August 10, designed to win the cold war? The Prime Minister did not get around to answering that question at all. I should like to know what the Minister of Justice would say with respect to that matter. If I conceive the matter aright, the minister is the custodian of the internal security of Canada just as the Minister of National Defence is the custodian of the external security of Canada. If the minister disagrees with my conclusions in any of these respects, he might tell me so. Is that not a satisfactory way of putting it?

Mr. Garson: Yes sir.

Mr. Blackmore: Then we shall proceed on that basis. If that is the case, one would naturally conclude that the Minister of Justice would have charge of moves made to offset the attack of communism. In other words, in the cold war he would not be remaining just on the defensive. He would be counter-attacking and he would be able to give us the measures which he had used in the counter-attack. He would also be able to give us some idea concerning the success or the lack of success of his attack. I may be all wrong, Mr. Chairman, but I have not been able to find a single measure on the part of Canada that could by any stretch of the imagination be looked upon as a Canadian attack. We just seem to be sitting here in Canada like a lot of sitting ducks and to be letting the communists blaze away at us with all their methods of propaganda, shedding the shot as best we can and hoping that we shall be able to survive the last one. That is just the impression that Canada gives me. I hope I am wrong but I am afraid I am right. I should like to open up that whole matter and to have the minister talk frankly to us as he likes to do. I admire the way the minister talks frankly to us and takes us into his confidence. I should like to hear from him. I am really anxious about this whole thing.

I asked whether the Prime Minister had had brought to his attention the communist over-all plan. The communists never stop. They have never stopped since 1917. In fact, the people who built up communism before 1917 were at work for many generations before that time. They never miss a trick. They never lose a play. They never stop. Long before they have won one victory, they know what the next victories are going to be and where they are going to strike. For example, I point to Guatemala. I imagine that they had the taking over of Guatemala all planned five years ago. I just hope that they are not planning on taking over British Columbia next. Certainly they have the stage all set for British Columbia next. That is just how close danger could be to us, I am afraid. Of course, I am not reflecting on the vigilance of the people in charge of British Columbia.

But later in the course of my remarks I probably will refer to a rather alarming article which appeared in the Financial Post of December 12, 1953. I think I will send it to the minister. Has he seen it? Then I take it he knows what is in the article. It certainly spoils a person's sleep for several weeks to contemplate that. That article says that there are 90,000 communists in British Columbia, and they are probably all ready to march. The writer of the article says 90,000, and in a general way I think he is not a man who should be disregarded.

Therefore I am afraid the Prime Minister would have to say that he had not done a single thing since August 10 to meet this situation. He did not know anything about the communist over-all world plan and he had not done anything to meet the offensive which is coming into Canada constantly from communist countries in the form of a cold war. I asked the Prime Minister also what specific measures he has taken to offset communism in Canada. How much does he know about the state of affairs in Canada?

I asked him particularly about three matters. What has he done to find out what are the techniques that communism has employed; what is the degree of success that communism has attained in Canada, and what are the possible means available to Canada to combat communism in Canada? I am afraid the answer to every one of these three would be just plain nothing. If that is the case, then probably the responsibility rests on the minister.

If at any time he wishes to put me right as I go along I will welcome his speaking because I have no desire at all to misrepresent the situation as it is. I have all respect for the minister. Then I asked: Does the Prime Minister know specifically what is the communist line in America for 1954? I pointed out that if a person knew what their line is in 1954 he would be able to tell when anyone spoke supporting that line. If anyone should speak supporting that line we would say at once, "That fellow is a communist, he will bear watching".

I asked the Prime Minister if he knew what the communist line was in 1953. There has been a change. They change their line every once in a while just like skilful players of chess, checkers or any other game. As a matter of fact, the communist high command just plays across the world like a skilful performer playing the piano. It just has us so completely dazzled, so completely bewildered that we do not even know what is going on. All we know is that something is happening to us but we have not the slightest idea what is causing it or how it is being produced. In many cases we blunder right into their line and help them just like a person playing checkers who jumps his own man. That is my general impression with respect to this matter.

I wanted to give the Prime Minister an idea of the sort of thing with which he is confronted here in Canada. I offered to read a passage from a broadcast in May and to comment on that broadcast. I want to be perfectly fair in every way both to Canada and to the man concerned. The other day I asked the question: Who selected J. B. McGeachy to be on the speakers' list of the C.B.C.? There are several reasons why I asked that question. As hon. members will recall, I did not accuse Mr. McGeachy of being a communist. I did not accuse him of being disloyal. Some people try to make out that I did but I did not. But I was concerned. Let me read a short passage from his broadcast of May 9 as it was monitored to me. There may be errors in these words but I think they are accurate. Those who got them got them pretty accurately. He is talking about the Indo-China situation at a time when we were all greatly concerned about Indo-China and wondering if there was not something we could do to stop the progress of the Chinese communists, representing the Russian communists, into Indo-China. Here is what he told the Canadian people:

> But without going in for prophecy, I will venture these opinions: First, that the best result to be hoped for in Indo-China is an armistice, followed by some compromise arrangement which, if possible, will give the Indo-Chinese a chance to decide what form of government they prefer; and second, that the west must come somehow to terms with, and live with, the Asian social revolution—

Notice the words, "social revolution", which it is not.

> —whether it takes a communist form or, as in India, Pakistan and elsewhere, a non-communist form. No amount of military force exercised by the west will decide, from this day forward, the destiny of any Asian state.

May I tell the house how that affects me. In the first place, we were hoping to contain communism. I do not think there is anyone in the house who relishes seeing China extend her control to all of southeast Asia, including India, Pakistan and Burma, and then to Japan, Malaya and the Philippines. Is there any person in this country who would contemplate a prospect like that with equanimity? Is that not exactly what this man is suggesting?

Mr. Michener: On a point of order, as I understand it we are dealing with the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. As far as I know their jurisdiction does not extend to southeast Asia, and it seems to me—

Mr. Blackmore: I did not get the last words.

Mr. Michener: The jurisdiction and responsibility of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do not extend to southeast Asia. If we are to finish these estimates tonight, I suggest that we stick to the point. Not only is the hon. member out of order but he has made some highly improper aspersions against a very reputable journalist by the name of McGeachy who is a person known to many members of the house, and such aspersions are resented.

Mr. Blackmore: I hope the hon. member, being a new member, learns better how to interpret what a man says than he has during this session. I have made no aspersions against this gentleman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. A point of order having been raised at this time, I think perhaps I should indicate my reaction to the point of order of the hon. member for St. Paul's. The remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge have been causing me some worry because I did not want to interrupt him. I believe that it is my duty as chairman not to seek ways and means of ruling a member out of order but to so interpret the rules of the house that he is not hampered in what he has to say. However, it is perfectly correct that the item before the house is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

It is my understanding that the physical combating of communism in Canada is in the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Therefore the hon. member for Lethbridge is entirely within his rights in discussing the combating of communism in Canada. I cannot help but agree that so far as we are aware the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have nothing to do with the combating of communism outside of Canada. Therefore when the hon. member for Lethbridge gets into countries far afield he might perhaps be in order under the Department of External Affairs but I cannot agree that he is in order under an item dealing with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I think that the members of the committee are anxious to give the hon. member for Lethbridge a chance to say what he wishes to say in connection with the problem in Canada. If the hon. member will confine his remarks to Canada, I will do what I can to ensure that he proceeds uninterrupted.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, you have established a most enviable record for fairness in the past, and I am sure you will do the same tonight.

Mr. Michener: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Chairman, which I think will clear up the whole matter. I may have misunderstood the hon. member, and I am glad to accept his statement, if I understand it correctly, that he does not cast any reflection on Mr. McGeachy in what he is saying tonight.

Mr. Blackmore: I made that clear. How many times does a person have to say that in good plain English before it registers?

I believe you were not in the chair, Mr. Chairman, or perhaps not in the chamber when I raised this matter this morning when the estimates of the Minister of Justice were opened. It was understood at that time I would be discussing the cold war, the whole struggle of the cold war and not necessarily in its relation to the way the mounted police would exercise their function in the country, so that would give me considerable latitude in order to reach out and deal with the communist question as a whole.

Now, it was to clear myself for that kind of attack that I pointed out to the minister, at the outset of my remarks, that as I thought the Minister of National Defence was responsible for the external security of Canada, the Minister of Justice was responsible for the internal security. May I now proceed to discuss the cold war? I believe that everyone will recognize that when Indo-China was attacked it strengthened the hands of communists in Canada and weakened the hands of those opposed to communism. Every one of these moves that I have indicated, the fall of the rest of eastern Asia, the fall of Japan, the fall of Korea, would certainly be steps in the cold war that would win victories over the people of the United States and of Canada.

I believe that with these considerations I am quite in order in the way I am proceeding. I would be glad to hear if the minister thinks I am not, but I cannot see how one could deal with communism and the cold war without looking upon it in a global way. After all, every move that they make is designed to accomplish a certain objective. If I, in your judgment, Mr. Chairman, begin to err as I go forward then I wish you would call my attention to the fact. I have no desire to do that, but I do have a desire to meet this problem of communism as a responsible member of the Canadian House of Commons in this fateful year of 1954 ought to do, having in mind that there are 15 million people in Canada who are dependent for their security upon us. I do not want to see a Guatemala in Canada or in any part of Canada.

Now, if I may proceed, I shall deal with the question of Mr. McGeachy's speech. I should be glad if the hon. member who raised the question would follow now, and if I seem to be casting any aspersions on this hon. gentleman I shall be glad to hear it and to modify my remarks. I have no desire to hurt anybody. My opinion is that Mr. McGeachy had no intention whatever of following the communist line in this speech, but I believe he was following the communist line in this speech. This is what I gather from this speech. His statement from, "without making any prophecy . . ." down to ". . . any Asian state", constituted an announcement to Russia and China that the green light is turned on. They are free to go ahead and conquer Japan, Malaya or the Philippines because we cannot stop them, and we have to learn to get along with all these people if they rebel under the direction, and with the assistance, of China.

In so far as Syngman Rhee and Chiang Kai-shek are concerned we are abandoning the freedom of their peoples by announcing there is no hope. To the United States it was an announcement that she should stand alone. If she wants to go over there and stop the Chinese, well and good; it is her lookout and we are not having anything to do with it. To all freedom-loving people in southeast Asia, and there are plenty of them who took part in the struggle in Indo-China, it amounted to this: you better make terms, boys, because you are going to be under the communists anyhow and there is no use getting them angry. To all the people of Canada it amounted to saying it is very little concern of ours. To communists everywhere it amounted to saying: full steam ahead, boys; the sun is shining, so make hay.

Moreover, all through this passage ran two implied falsehoods. I am not saying that Mr. McGeachy intended them to be falsehoods but I am going to point them out and let hon. members draw their own conclusions as to how he should have made these two mistakes. He implied quite clearly that communism is a revolution. Communism never has been a revolution. From the beginning it has been a conquest by a conspiracy of men who went from the United States in large measure, were financed from the United States, and went across to Russia and beat down the Russian government. They established control and extended their control over Russia and from Russia to where we see them now. To call such a movement as that a revolution is to misuse the word "revolution".

The second error was even to suggest that communism may ever be satisfied with less than world conquest. We have made some terrible mistakes as American people since 1945 because we persisted in believing that somehow, somewhere we could get Russians to be satisfied, sit down and live peacefully. They have no thought of doing that. They take every move as a beachhead from which to make another move. They have told us over and over again that they intend to conquer the world. Why could a man like Mr. McGeachy make two such blunders as that, and why would the C.B.C. employ a man who would make blunders like that? You have these two blunders going to the people all over Canada and down into the United States as far as his voice would carry. I believe that is altogether different from the way it ought to be.

Perhaps I should give some evidence against the idea that communism is a revolution. May I read this very small excerpt from the economic council's letter in the United States dated April 1, 1954, letter No. 332. I read these words:

> The U.S.S.R. is not a world power in the sense we have always thought—a government naturally looking out for its own interests but maintaining certain general standards of honour and integrity in international dealings. Rather, this Soviet government is nothing else than a gang of plotters who succeeded in the confused days of 1917 in making itself master of Petrograd formerly St. Petersburg, now Leningrad and extending that mastery to all of Russia.

May I interrupt now to ask if there is any hon. member in the house who can offer any reason why that statement is not absolutely correct? It is entirely in accordance with all the evidence that has come down to us right from the time that the United States conducted their most searching inquiry into communism in 1919, when they were so close to the event they could name all the people who took part.

The next paragraph reads this way:

> And now with the astounding assistance of the United States, it controls most of the Eurasian continent. It threatens to take over all southeast Asia, Japan, the Middle East, Italy, even France. It has a third of Germany under its inhuman control. There is not a country in the world, including the United States, that is not threatened with subjugation.

I do not think anyone would seriously question the accuracy of that statement. The people who prepared this letter are generally very careful, scholarly and reliable in what they say. And as I said, the information I have concerning the whole communist conspiracy bears out exactly what they say. In the light of that I ask whether J. B. McGeachy was following the communist line. He was saying just exactly what Russia would like him to say. He was giving comfort to the enemy, and in great volume. He was saying what every communist in the world would like him to say. And he was demoralizing every person opposed to communism who heard him, and making us feel unhappy.

Now, that is just one simple little illustration of the cold war, and the methods which Russia is using. People say: "What! Do you say Mr. McGeachy was an agent of Russia?" Oh, I would hate to say that, but there may be men in Canada with a good deal of power who have much more sympathy with Russia than they have with Canada, and those men could have had a lot of influence in getting that man put on the C.B.C. list of speakers. That is as far as I will go in that respect.

Then, before I finish what I have to say tonight, I wish to place on record a statement which apparently is authentic and which shows what the plans of the Chinese and the Russians are, right from here to 20 years from today, when they are confident that they will be ruling the world, including us. But I will come to that after a while.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, do it now.

Mr. Blackmore: I will ask the minister if he agrees that we are in a fight to the finish against the communist conspiracy that rules Russia. I do not believe the minister will say under the circumstances that we are not. Very well, if we are in a fight to the finish, we are spending $2 billion a year preparing our army to go and fight. I said to the Minister of National Defence the other day that it was just simply idle to spend all this money in preparing the army if we are going to allow ourselves to be beaten through the back door and the basement window. And that is exactly what we are doing when we turn a man like J. B. McGeachy loose on this country, through the C.B.C. Speeches like this—and certainly he has given others though perhaps not as bad as this—but a speech like this I think everyone will agree should not be allowed; and it will be agreed that I have not put an unfair interpretation upon it, especially as it was delivered on May 9.

And now may I read a statement coming from an exceedingly valuable book. I hope the minister has read it, but as he is a very busy man perhaps he has not had time to read it. I hope he will have a very dependable man in his department read the book and study it with the utmost care. I refer to "The Iron Curtain Over America" by Dr. John Beaty, published in 1952. I imagine this book is the most pertinent one bearing on what we are talking about tonight. Dr. Beaty says this in his introduction:

> Only an informed American people can save America, and they can save it only if all those to whom it is given to know will share their knowledge with others.

That is all I am trying to do tonight, to share the little knowledge I have with others. This book, by the way, was published in 1952 and Dr. John Beaty is one of the finest scholars to be found anywhere in the world on this particular subject. He is an American who has had a most impressive career.

Now may I give an outline of the communist aims, as they are contained in a document which was read into the Congressional Record by Senator Knowland quite recently. He is not sure this is authentic, but it bears all the evidence of being authentic, and would appear to be the work of Chou En-lai, who is one of the master minds of China, and one of the master minds of the world today. This statement, by the way, is to be found at page 2 of the Ottawa Journal of June 1, where hon. members may read it if they wish. These are the steps Chou En-lai, or whoever wrote this document, says will be followed:

> 1. We will avoid war until victory is certain.

How long will we have to avoid war before victory is certain if China goes on and takes over all of Asia, including Japan with her 87 million people and her wonderful productive potential?

> 2. Isolate the United States by all possible means.
> 3. Britain must be placated by (a) the possibility of settling major issues,—

And that is what is troubling them today—the possibility of getting these people to be satisfied.

> —(b) opportunities for trade, which Britain sorely needs.

Britain is not like us, possessed of rich resources. She has to trade to live. If we will not trade with her, she must trade with the east. And the sooner we understand that in America, the better.

> 4. France has to be influenced by war-weariness and fear of Germany.

France is going that way right now, isn't she?

> 5. We will liberate Indo-China.
> 6. We will liberate Burma next.

As though Burma needed liberating!

> 7. We will liberate Thailand next.
> 8. The whole of Indonesia will be in the hands of communists by 1960.

In the light of the progress they have been making recently, that does not look extravagant, does it?

> 9. Japan will capitulate after peaceful revolution backed by force by China and the Soviet union.

All we have to do is bear in mind the very serious difficulty Japan has with her 87 million in those restricted islands, with the small empire she once had now taken away from her, the extreme difficulty she has in securing the means to live. All we have to do is keep those conditions in mind with respect to Japan, and we will see what must almost certainly happen to her.

> 10. If war can be averted the success of our plans for other parts of Asia is almost assured. This task will be completed in 1965.
> 11. Then would follow a wave of revolution throughout Africa.

We do not put that beyond the realm of possibility, do we?

> 12. Total economic collapse in capitalistic western Europe would follow as soon as Asia and Africa are disconnected from western Europe.

They would have no place to sell their goods, nowhere to buy from, and being capitalist, they would think they could not live. Then western Europe will capitulate and fall to communism.

> 13. With the fall of western Europe, remaining capitalist countries will face economic collapse and industrial breakdowns.

That may sound extreme until one looks at the pathetic spectacle that Canada and the United States are making right now in respect of wheat. Because we cannot sell wheat abroad, we fear we cannot live! We bring down the price of our wheat. We begin to create a price cutting panic. We would simply have to sell abroad! If we could not we would have to sit down, droop our shoulders and cry because we could not sell it.

Mr. Habel: What has the R.C.M.P. to do with that?

Mr. Blackmore: The point is that if we cannot manage our affairs better than that, we should be able to. And surely the hon. member, who has been a member of a legislature—

Mr. Habel: May I ask—

Mr. Blackmore: May I finish my speech. Then this hon. member will answer any question the hon. member wishes to ask.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Will both hon. members resume their seats, please. The hon. member for Lethbridge who has the floor can be interrupted only with his own consent, which he will indicate by resuming his seat and which he refuses by not resuming his seat; unless some hon. member rises on a point of order or of privilege, which I will then hear. The hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you. May I say to my hon. friend—he is new to the house and I want to be courteous—if he wants to ask a question, just rise and say: Will the hon. member permit a question? Let me finish the statement, and then he can put his question. That is the only sensible way of going about it. I was just pointing out the fact that our wheat experience right now is one of the clearest evidences of what would happen to the whole of America, including Canada, if being orthodox in our monetary thinking, we could no longer sell our production abroad to Europe and other foreign parts. We just have not learned how to distribute our wheat. We shall not be able to maintain ourselves any longer, we will think, although we are one of the richest areas on earth! Surely the hon. member can see that. That is in accordance with hard economic facts.

Mr. Garson: I wonder whether the hon. member for Lethbridge would permit me to interrupt, if I may use that word, his very interesting speech, to give him the answers to the questions he asked.

Mr. Blackmore: I will be very glad to.

Mr. Garson: And he may resume his speech afterwards.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Blackmore: Let me finish with Chou En-lai, so that we shall have the whole thing together. The fourteenth point: Canada and South America will find themselves in the same hopeless and defenceless condition. Twenty years from now, that Chinese statesman says, the world revolution will be an accomplished fact.

I shall take the hon. member's question if he would like to ask it.

Mr. Habel: It is not for me to defend the mounted police. The minister is much more capable of doing that than I am. This is my question. Has the hon. member had any dealings with the mounted police in regard to communist activities?

Mr. Blackmore: Of course I do not see just what bearing that has on the point I am dealing with now.

Mr. Habel: If the hon. member has any information to give to the mounted police he has only to do as I have done at different times and he would find them to be most co-operative and in fact ready to act at any time. I can relate one circumstance where the parish priest in my riding—at that time I was a member of the provincial house—was very much worried about the activities of one man in his parish, a newcomer in fact. I met the mounted policeman who was at that time stationed at Timmins. I asked him to stop on his way back at that place and see the parish priest. He had no sooner walked into the parish priest's house than he was greeted by the parish priest and he said: "Most likely, Reverend Father, you are going to ask me about Mr. So and So." The parish priest was really surprised. He said: "Yes, that is exactly the case." The policeman said: "You need not worry; we know all the facts about that man; we are following every move he makes." I can tell the hon. member it would be far better for him to give any information he has to the mounted police. By so doing he would certainly serve his country better than to try to start in this country what other countries have tried to do by throwing smears on everybody in the country.

Mr. Blackmore: In the first place, "the member" did not try to throw a smear at anyone, and I challenge the hon. member to show that I did. I am telling the absolute truth, not smearing anyone. If the facts are smearing a man, it is his own fault.

The next point is this, if the mounted police are as magnificent a force as the hon. member believes they are, and I believe they are too, why not give them the ghost of a chance and not have propaganda coming in here making their work many times more difficult? Surely, there is a limit to the endurance of any force of men! I am merely pointing out the terrible dangers that confront us, and which will probably run right on if we do nothing to offset them. The hon. member will be lost before he will realize what is happening.

Mr. Garson: First of all, I want to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Lethbridge for the very very kind and rather unusual action on his part in allowing me to interrupt his remarks to answer the questions which he has asked. As the hon. member has correctly stated, the responsibility of the special branch of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of myself as the minister in charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the internal precautions against communism in Canada. Those internal precautions have already been the subject of reference in the debate on the justice estimates previously this session. I made a statement then in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East, which I should like to repeat now because I think what I said then is precisely relevant to the points which the hon. member for Lethbridge has been raising this evening.

As I understand the hon. member he wants to get an answer to these questions. He asked:

> What specific measure has the Prime Minister—and in that connotation I include the Prime Minister, the government and the mounted police—taken to offset communism in Canada?
> (a) In discovering what techniques communism is employing?
> (b) What is the degree of success communism has obtained in Canada?
> (c) What are the possible means available to Canada of combating communism in Canada?

I pointed out when this matter was before the committee previously that what we were discussing in questions like these was the practice of espionage and counter-espionage, and I said that I was sure hon. members upon the least reflection would agree that it would be a grave error indeed to discuss here any of the activities of the special branch of the mounted police and especially to admit or deny any allegations of sometimes irresponsible people claiming to have been in our employ in counter-espionage. I said, and I now quote directly from Hansard at page 5464:

> We are all aware that the practice of espionage and counter-espionage, the contest between enemy nations to secure and to prevent the securing of intelligence involves the building up, as completely as possible, of a large mass of information; and oftentimes the answer in the affirmative or negative to some simple statement of fact may be the last item needed to complete the general pattern of, if I may use that figure of speech, the jigsaw puzzle which the intelligence department is trying to put together; and this last simple answer may finally determine what that whole pattern is.
> In counter-espionage work there is therefore only one safe policy to follow, and that is the policy of complete reticence about our counter-espionage and complete reticence in respect of the espionage against which we are trying to protect Canada. It > is for that reason that we have consistently refused to say anything with regard to the allegations of gentlemen like—

A certain gentleman whom I then named; and it is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that I am sure my hon. friend, the hon. member for Lethbridge, would be the last man in this house to take any action or to ask any questions the answers to which would give any aid or comfort to the communists whether inside or outside of Canada. I pay him that tribute.

But I think the hon. member himself will agree upon reflection that if we were to discuss in this house the techniques which communism is employing, and made disclosures as frank as those disclosures I like to make in relation to other branches of the Department of Justice, there is nothing in the world that would be more helpful to the communists than to know precisely how much we do know about them and therefore by inference what we do not know. No one would be more happy to have this information than the communists themselves.

In the same way, if we were to indicate the opinion of our experts in the special branch as to the degree of success communism has attained in Canada—and we think we know something about this matter—then that information disclosed in this house would be carried thence in the press of the world. What action could we take which would help the communists more than that?

If I were to answer the third question as to what other possible means are available in Canada for combating communism in Canada I would be giving away our whole program of counter-espionage and by that means largely destroying its usefulness. It is for that reason and that reason only that I must reluctantly refuse to answer the questions my hon. friend from Lethbridge has asked. Even after what I said the other day in this debate upon the Department of Justice estimates in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East, I have not reached that conclusion nor did I reach that conclusion with regard to the specific questions asked by my hon. friend, until I had again conferred, after my hon. friend has asked questions of the Prime Minister, with the high officials of the special branch of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This is the opinion which they expressed with regard to the specific questions asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge:

> Upon a study of (a), (b), and (c)—

These were the three branches of my hon. friend's question.

> —it becomes very apparent that they are all-embracing and if answered would supply intelligence to not only communists themselves but to foreign powers, and as we know that both the communists and certain foreign powers are continually attempting to procure this type of information,—

And may I say, Mr. Chairman, that I think pretty largely unsuccessfully.

—we deem it most inadvisable to supply this to them, in even the barest detail. It is, therefore, suggested that the question be answered along the following lines:

And they suggested the type of answer which I am now giving. I must say, Mr. Chairman, I have always admired the frankness and candour of the hon. member for Lethbridge and I am temperamentally disposed to be frank and candid myself. I would have very much preferred to have given him a detailed answer on all these questions but I am sure he will agree upon reflection that to do so would certainly not be in the best interests of Canada.

Now, if I may, while I am on my feet, I think I should discharge an act of friendship to a gentleman whose name has come into this discussion. The gentleman to whom I refer is Mr. J. B. McGeachy. I have known him for many years. Indeed, I know him better than I know the hon. member for Lethbridge and I have known the hon. member for quite some time. I knew Mr. McGeachy when he was a reporter and editorial writer on the Winnipeg Free Press back in the 1930's. He afterwards became a very distinguished member of the staff of the British Broadcasting Corporation and on his return to Canada he has had an equally distinguished journalistic and broadcasting career here. One does not have to agree with all of his utterances to be sure that those who know him as I do would agree that he is not disposed to favour communism. As one who knows Mr. McGeachy I can say that whatever my hon. friend may say about his views, Mr. McGeachy is certainly not a communist by any stretch of the imagination. He is a good, loyal, intelligent Canadian and while my hon. friend from Lethbridge may not agree with all of his opinions I do not think that that warrants any accusation of him being in any way disposed to favour the communists or communism.

Mr. Hansell: I hope the hon. member for Lethbridge will not mind if I say a few words at this juncture. I do not want to interrupt the continuity of anything he might wish to say, but I would like to say briefly that I listened with a good deal of interest to the minister's reply and I would sum it up by saying that the minister seems particularly responsible for matters that might be stressed in terms of physical sabotage, and that the R.C.M.P. is certainly doing a good job in preparing information and warning the government of what is going on particularly in a physical sense. Perhaps they know everything that is happening within those organizations in which communist card holders may be at work. They are ready to pick up anyone who may sabotage a piece of machinery, or something of that kind. But it seems that some of us are not quite satisfied with government action in another field of sabotage and that is in the sabotaging of our minds and our moral standards, and action in helping to prepare the people to withstand the onslaught of communist propaganda which might come from innocent sources.

The name of a certain reporter has been brought into the discussion. Fortunately or unfortunately it may be a matter of interpretation, and it is true that the discussion could have taken place without any names being brought into the picture. But just as sure as I was born if the hon. member for Lethbridge had read some extract from a speech given over the air someone would be bound to rise and ask who gave the speech, so there is little difference. It might come from an innocent source but the fact remains that there is a process of conditioning going on, a conditioning of the mentality of our Canadian people to accept the enemy as they attempt to come in by the back door, and some of us are not satisfied that the government is taking appropriate steps in that respect. That is something you cannot handcuff. You cannot handcuff an idea. The only way you can meet it is with a counter-idea and we are not satisfied that that is being done.

The minister could have answered on behalf of the mounted police along the lines I have indicated. We are all free to say we believe they are doing a good job, but it is this other angle about which we have so much concern. You can have sabotage by the back door method just as easily as you can have it by the blowing up of a few factories, and more so. That is where the greater danger may lie in this whole thing.

I hope the hon. member for Lethbridge will excuse me for just butting in at this particular point.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Macleod has made it unnecessary for me to answer the minister. I think he has done an admirable job. He has put the situation in just exactly the way it needs to be put. I will just refer to the question of Mr. McGeachy since he has been mentioned. I am sure all that I have heard about him indicates that the estimate made by the Minister of Justice is exactly right concerning him. I am satisfied that he is an admirable gentleman, although I have never met him. I hope to meet him some day and to have him as a good friend.

I would say this to the minister. In the first place, if there are speakers like Mr. McGeachy who are following the communist line, maybe unwittingly, over the radio, surely the government should know enough about what the communist line is to be able to detect all these speeches which are along the communist line and cause them to be modified; or if it is deemed wise that such speeches should be given, why not have speeches too that will answer them?

An hon. Member: Who will censor them?

Mr. Blackmore: We can easily find people to censor them. I am sure the hon. member can ask questions which are much more worth while than that if he tried to do so.

What I have said concerning this passage from Mr. McGeachy's speech I believe will stand up flawlessly under the interpretation which I have placed on it. There will be no answer to what I have said. Coming as it did, it was comfort to the enemy in every respect. That speech could have been answered by another speech by some other gentleman putting forward the other point of view. That is a measure that the minister might have mentioned, but did not mention.

I thank the minister very much for the interpolation. I think I will now follow on and give some other considerations which I believe to be of tremendous importance at this time in Canada. Certain it is that regardless of all that we may say we are losing the cold war. I think there is not a responsible member in this chamber who will not agree that we are losing the cold war.

An hon. Member: That is comfort to the enemy.

Mr. Blackmore: That is true. It is comfort to the enemy. But we may just as well confess it and then try to do something about it.

The next thing is this. We won world war II. We poured out blood and treasure. We won it. But certain people inside the administrations of the nations that won the war threw China into the hands of the enemy and put the whole body of freedom-loving nations in a position where it is doubtful that we shall be able to survive. That is a terrible thing. For us to contribute to that process any further borders on simple foolhardiness. We simply must do something to change all that.

May I now go on commenting to some extent on certain other aspects of this question as I see them. There are three main aspects of the fight against communism. In the first place, we have to deal with spying. Then we have to deal with sabotage. Then we have to deal with propaganda which influences public opinion and shapes our policies. I think the hon. member for MacLeod did fairly well with regard to the subject of sabotage and its danger.

As far as spying is concerned, may I say that although the minister thinks that Russia does not know our secrets, I doubt whether we have in Canada a secret that Russia does not know better than we know it. When ministers of the government tell us that they do not want to let us have information because the enemy will get it, I often think that about the only people in the country who do not know it are the Canadian people generally and the members of the House of Commons. All the Russians and Chinese will know our secrets. That is what they have done with regard to United States secrets and that is what they are doing with ours—make no mistake about that—because they had already done it in 1945 and 1946 when Gouzenko came out and made the surprising revelations he made to us. As far as spying to obtain secrets is concerned, I have dealt with that matter. As to sabotage, it is extremely dangerous. Those 90,000 people in British Columbia are cause for genuine concern.

The minister feels that the mounted police are able to deal with them. Individually, man for man, I would say that the mounted police are as capable of dealing with a situation like that as are any force of men on the face of this earth. But I believe that it is well that we should look across the fence and see what is happening in the next yard. Here is something that J. Edgar Hoover told the United States subcommittee on appropriations on December 9, 1953, regarding the 1955 appropriation request for the federal bureau of investigation. From page 163 may I quote a paragraph:

> The investigative burden in covering the communist underground has been increased tremendously as is shown by the fact that where one agent was formerly needed for proper coverage, we now require as many as 9 or 10 by reason of their greater security consciousness in carrying out their conspirational activities. We have to change our surveillances more frequently by reason of their shifting of party members.

This report goes on through several pages giving material concerning difficulties being encountered down there in the United States because the communists have gone underground. They have stopped carrying communist cards. They have stopped using telephones. They have stopped meeting in public. Many of them live right down underground. The report gives many other facts concerning them. I am just doubtful that the minister has put such an additional number of mounted police into the fight against communism in Canada as would be necessary to counter-balance the increased number which the F.B.I. have put into the fight against communism in the United States. If he has done so, well and good. I do not ask him to tell us. But if he has not done so, I would suggest that he had better take steps to increase the mounted police force in order to give them a fighting chance.

With regard to propaganda, I wonder whether the minister has read the book "While you Slept" by John T. Flynn, published in 1951, if I remember the date correctly. "While You Slept" is an account of the way in which the American people were softened up to the loss of China and how China was consequently thrown away by the United States into the hands of Russia. The betrayal was achieved by certain agents within the United States, including Owen Lattimore, Edgar Snow, Dean Acheson and several others. The whole story is given concerning the articles they wrote, the books they wrote, the criticisms of books they made and all the various other devices whereby the whole United States people were deceived concerning China until it was too late and China was gone, with 400 million people. There is not anything that the minister could read with greater profit than that book. If he has not read "The Iron Curtain Over America" I suggest that he read that book with great thoroughness, because it shows exactly the same thing that Flynn showed, only with much more extensive documentation. It contains unanswerable evidence showing the kind of techniques which are being employed by the communists in the cold war in order to achieve their objectives. I just wanted to mention that in passing.

I should now like to go a little bit further into the communist techniques in the cold war, coming a little bit closer to our own selves and what is happening to us just now.

There is a man in the United States, Professor Louis Francis Budenz who is, I presume, one of the greatest authorities on communism in America, a man who was himself in high command in the communist party, a man who was himself editor of the communist Daily Worker, who discontinued his connections with the communist party and came over to our side, as Gouzenko did, and who has since that time been very useful in all the investigations of spies which the United States has conducted. This man Budenz has written several articles, two of which I have before me. I am going to quote some information from some of the articles that he has written. He says—

The Chairman: Order. When I took the chair a few minutes ago the hon. member was discussing members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who might be devoted to a particular purpose. I thought that was quite in order. But now that the hon. member seems to be going farther afield, I am quite certain that a general discussion of the kind upon which he is now entering is not in order under this item dealing with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I would ask the hon. member to devote his attention more particularly to the item under discussion.

Mr. Blackmore: Your Honour will remember that I rose to take up this matter on the first item, where it would have been completely in order, and the minister requested that I defer the discussion until we came to the mounted police.

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order—

Mr. Blackmore: Let me put my case first. Surely the hon. member can let me do that. There was, I think, a quite satisfactory understanding between myself and the minister that if I deferred the discussion until we got to the mounted police it would be quite all right to urge the matter and discuss the whole question on the broadest scale. Is that not correct?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I think there was a misunderstanding. We had already passed the first item of the Department of Justice before we started tonight. We were on remission service, and I think the Minister of Justice would have no right to commit us to go back to the first item when we passed that the last time these estimates were considered.

The Chairman: Order. I recall that earlier today I suggested to the hon. member for Lethbridge that a question he had asked dealing with the communist threat might more properly be asked under the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That was by no means an invitation to enter into a general discussion of the kind upon which he is now entering. I do not wish to hamper him unduly, but at the same time I must point out that I must attempt to enforce the rules of the house with regard to debate, and

I cannot take undue cognizance of some alleged agreement entered into between the hon. member and the minister. I must protect the privileges of all hon. members and see that the debate is relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, the minister did not reply, as I recall it.

Mr. Garson: I think the situation was this, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Mackenzie is quite right in saying that we had passed the first item. We were, I think, on the fourth item of my estimates, and the sense of observation which I made at that time was that inasmuch as my hon. friend's remarks concerning the mounted police could not be applied to the remission service, or any of the other specific items of my department, he might defer them until we got to the mounted police where it would be quite appropriate for him to make them. But I think that is as far as my remarks went.

Mr. Blackmore: That is not in accordance with my recollection of the matter. I watched for the first item with great care, and if it passed it was because I could not hear the number called by the chair. I fully intended to speak on the first item and I believe I did. Whether or not Hansard will show that, I am not sure. However, I fully intended to discuss this matter on the first item. I realized fully that it was an advantage to the minister in getting his estimates through and an advantage to the house to consider all the items of the minister except this last one before I opened this discussion because I knew there would be a good deal of disagreement concerning the subject matter inasmuch as it is information of vital concern and upon which there is much disagreement.

I do feel that under the circumstances I would not be infringing on the rules of the house very much if I went on with what I was planning to say for the remaining part of my speech. But if you feel that I would be doing so I shall have to desist from speaking further. I have here two or three very striking illustrations of the devices and techniques which the communists have used in the United States and Canada and I think they would simply astonish hon. members and would be of great value to the Minister of Justice in dealing with the communist menace. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in your hands.

Mr. Nicholson: Further to the point of honour—the point of order—the hon. member for Lethbridge is a very co-operative member, and I think he understood we were on item No. 1 of the Department of Justice when we started. But if he was here when these estimates were considered by the committee before he will recall that the first item was passed at that time, and it really was not in order for him to start a discussion on the first item today. When we started today we were on one of the items farther down in the list, item 163, I believe. We passed the first item of the minister's estimates some time ago.

Mr. Blackmore: I am in your hands, Mr. Chairman. If you say I should discontinue my speech I will discontinue.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
Land and air services—
409. Operation and maintenance of divisions, $23,488,839.

Mr. MacLean: I think I can probably put my question on this item. I notice that the details in the back of the book give an estimate of the revenue derived from the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I also notice that it is estimated that the expenditure for the year 1954-55 will be considerably more. Yet at the same time I believe it is estimated that the revenue for the year 1953-54 will be about $1 million less than the revenue for the previous year. Can the minister give us any indication of the estimate of revenue for 1954-55 and also the source of this revenue? I presume it stems from services performed by the mounted police on behalf of provinces and municipalities. I should also like, if it is convenient, a statement of the amounts paid by the various provinces for services rendered by the R.C.M.P. in the enforcement of provincial laws.

Mr. Garson: The following is the breakdown:

Royal Canadian Mounted Police revenue, 1953-54

|---|---|
| Policing provinces | $2,953,307.30 |
| Policing municipalities | 883,880.47 |
| Sub-total | 3,837,187.77 |
| Personnel on loan to remission branch, Department of Justice | 4,606.32 |
| Protection to Bank of Canada agencies | 58,892.83 |
| Racetrack supervision | 22,974.49 |
| Deductions from pay for quarters | 562,068.38 |
| Deductions from pay for meals and rations | 369,305.45 |
| Grand Total | $4,855,035.24 |

Mr. MacLean: One further question in that connection; I notice the total amount is the same for the previous year?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. MacLean: But I notice that last year, 1953-54 was about a million dollars less than the year before that. Would the minister be kind enough to indicate why this sudden drop of about 20 per cent?

Mr. Garson: I did not hear my hon. friend's last question.

Mr. MacLean: On page 475 of the estimates book it indicates the revenue for the year ending 1954, as compared with the year ending 1953 has taken a sudden drop. Why is that so?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the explanation for the approximately $1 million difference is that in that year the Minister of Finance requested that the books be closed for the first time on March 31. The result was that the revenues for the year in which that cut-off applied, were reduced, and the revenue for the subsequent year increased, by the amount of revenue of that month of April.

Item agreed to.

Land and air services—

410. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $3,779,049.

Mr. MacLean: This item comes under a general heading of land and air services, and is concerned with the construction or acquisition of new equipment. Would the minister say if there is an item included for the replacement of any aircraft?

Mr. Garson: The answer to my hon. friend's question is that the item to which he refers on page 477 does not include payment for any new aircraft, but the cost of aircraft is included in a supplementary which we will be passing shortly.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister mind explaining, in general terms, the sort of buildings, works and land that is covered by this item. I realize that the operations of this force are farflung, but I observe the amount being spent on buildings, works, land and equipment runs in the order of $3,800,000 this year, as it did last year. This is a fairly substantial item. In view of the fact that the force, when it gives service to municipalities or provinces, requires those municipalities to provide accommodation, I am wondering what continuing requirement could necessitate such a heavy sum?

Mr. Garson: I would be glad to do that, but it would take a good deal of time.

Mr. Fulton: I am not asking for any details, but for what sort of things are these moneys to be used? Why is there a continuing need? Is it for new housing in the far north or what sort of thing is it?

Mr. Garson: I shall give my hon. friend the first group of items. There are detachment quarters in Newfoundland; then detachment quarters in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and so on. Those items take up some six pages.

Mr. Fulton: In that connection, are these quarters for detachments which are involved in policing at the request of the province or for policing that comes under federal responsibility?

Mr. Garson: I do not think that distinction which my hon. friend is drawing actually fits, because in those eight provinces of Canada in which there are not only agreements between the federal government and the provincial government but also agreements between the federal government and certain municipal governments to provide for policing, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the only police force in those provinces for federal and provincial purposes, and in the municipalities they serve, the only police force for municipal purposes as well. It is in relation to that over-all responsibility which the force is discharging that the provision for these buildings is made.

Mr. Fulton: Is it not the case where, for instance, in a municipality—I am quite certain it is—the mounted police have an arrangement with the municipality, the municipality provides the police with office accommodation and jail accommodation? I understand that is provided direct by the municipality, and not even by the mounted police and charged back, but detachment offices are provided by the municipality. It is for that reason I want to know whether these items are connected with strictly federal responsibilities of the force or whether they are in any sense for provincial requirements?

Mr. Garson: I think my answer still stands. When the force is in a province doing all the federal work, all the provincial work and some of the municipal work in those provinces in which it has municipal contracts, the provision of accommodation for members of the force is a provision of accommodation for that number of men required for the purpose of doing all the federal work, plus all the provincial work, plus whatever municipal work is being done. So far as the accommodation the municipality itself provides, that is limited to office and lock-up accommodation.

Mr. Fulton: This is housing?

Mr. Garson: Yes, this is housing as well.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

411. Operation and maintenance, $1,385,264.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister give us any idea as to the extent of these marine services?

Mr. Garson: The vote for marine services, Mr. Chairman, is to meet the operating expenses of the marine division of the mounted police. It includes the salaries of the members of the mounted police and also civil servants that are employed in connection with marine services. It is used in the enforcement of federal statutes along the seaboard and inland waters, for example, in connection with the matter of smuggling, customs inspections and the like. It maintains all the preventive controls and it assists the land division of the police force in the transport of personnel, and in carrying out police investigation in areas where the only means of travel is by water.

Mr. Charlton: Would there be a boat on the great lakes, for instance?

Mr. Garson: Yes, there are boats there, although I am sure my hon. friend realizes that the bulk of the work and the ships we have under this division are on the two coasts, the Atlantic and the Pacific. We have for example the R.C.M.P. Carnduff at Kingston, Ontario, and another at Sault Ste. Marie, and others at Sarnia and Windsor.

Mr. Charlton: Patrol boats in each of those locations.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Item agreed to.

413. Grant to the Chief Constables' Association of Canada, $500.

Mr. Fleming: I should like briefly to discuss a matter on this item, as it involves a grant to the chief constables' association. It draws attention to the desire of the R.C.M.P. to maintain close liaison with the various police forces in Canada. I am concerned, as well, with the maintenance of liaison between the R.C.M.P. and the Department of National Revenue.

If my information is correct, representations have been made over a period of some considerable time by various associations of chief constables and police forces in Canada to the Department of National Revenue and the R.C.M.P. with a view to banning the importation of slingshots and Malayan style throwing daggers. It is a serious enough matter for the association of chief constables and police forces in this country to make representations with respect to it.

I brought this matter forward in the house on March 25, and asked if representations had been made on the subject recently. On March 26, as reported at page 3365 of Hansard, the Minister of National Revenue said:

> Our records indicate that no such representations have been received of recent date.

Now unless the minister was splitting hairs in the use of the word "recent" then my information indicates that there has been faulty liaison between the Department of National Revenue and the R.C.M.P. on the point, because I am told there was one communication dated June 5, 1953, that went from Mr. A. S. Kenney of the department to the R.C.M.P. Would the minister indicate the position?

Mr. Garson: We have not the files of 1953 with us tonight, but I shall be glad to look into this matter.

Mr. Fleming: I am not asking for the production of any particular letter. But I am concerned about the maintenance of some semblance of liaison between the Department of National Revenue and the R.C.M.P. when matters are important enough that associations of our chief constables and police forces make representations to the government.

Mr. Garson: I can assure my hon. friend there is no lack of liaison between the R.C.M.P. and the Department of National Revenue. I shall be glad personally to look into this matter and see what has been the fate of the letter to which he has referred. If it has not been attended to, it would be a very strange thing because I can safely say that all communications of that kind are carefully attended to as a matter of routine.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Taxation division—

299. General administration, $2,413,361.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Chairman, when dealing with the estimates for the customs and excise division of the Department of National Revenue I undertook to provide for the information of the house typical examples of the operation of section 35(6) of the Customs Act. At that time I read to the house a list of typical goods which were being affected by this legislation, and I mentioned various things about it. Among these I referred to printed acetate foulard piece goods. The question was asked by the hon. member for Calgary North.

At this time in connection with the estimates of the Department of National Revenue I would answer the hon. member's question in this way: This case is a typical illustration of the effect of the section. An importation of acetate foulard piece goods was made on February 22, 1954. The invoice price to the importer was 65 cents per yard. The goods had been originally introduced to their home market around May, 1953, at a price of 85 cents per yard. From May, 1953 to the date of the importation the price on the home market declined gradually from 85 cents to 65 cents, the price paid by the importer. The officers of the department, on examining the invoices, felt that investigation was necessary in accordance with our instructions which I read to the house on Friday, and personal investigation was accordingly made in the United States at the office of the exporter. This investigation provided the department with the volume of sales made on the home market and the prices prevailing during the six months immediately preceding the date of shipment to Canada, as is required by the act as amended last December.

As a result, the appraised value was set at 74·45 cents per yard. The difference, therefore, in the price to the importer and the appraised value on which duty and taxes were applied was the difference between 65 cents and 74·45 cents, that is, 9·45 cents.

Without the same elaboration as I have given in this case, I will refer to one or two other similar instances, one concerning a different type of textile, another one concerning refrigerators.

An importation on March 23 of over 100 pairs of drapes was invoiced at $6 per pair. These drapes, over the six months immediately preceding shipment to Canada, had dropped in price from $8.25 to $5 a pair. Following investigation by the department, the goods were appraised at $6.64 per pair, an increase in value for duty of 64 cents a pair.

Another typical example relates to the importation of household refrigerators entered at customs on February 22 last. This particular model was invoiced at $154.50. Investigation on the home market showed that during the six months immediately prior to shipment, the price had dropped from $179.70 to $163.70. After investigation the weighted average price over these six months was determined as being $178.48 which, under the law, is the appraised value for purposes of applying duties and taxes.

Then, Mr. Chairman, on this item in the estimates concerning the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue I should like to make the following statement:

For some years now it has been my custom to make a few preliminary comments regarding the taxation division's estimates so that hon. members might be assisted in their consideration of these figures.

The taxation division will require $26,166,993 to operate for the 1954-55 fiscal period. This represents an increase of about $2,750,000 over last year, practically all of which is due to our salary requirements. The income tax appeal board is being provided with $74,920 which is $3,700 more than last year. All of this increase is due to the increased rates of pay.

As at April 1, 1954, there was a full-time staff of 6,134 people employed by this division. At the same time last year the staff was 5,918. The total payroll provided in these estimates is $22,756,343. After eliminating the amount provided for the revision in rates of pay, there is an increase in this year's salary requirements of about $950,000. As I have indicated in previous years at this time, every effort is being made to secure highly qualified technical personnel who must be made available to the division if the work is to be carried on promptly and efficiently. This increase in staff over last year is an indication that we are meeting with some success in this direction. However, we will continue in the present fiscal year to seek out these technical people and funds are provided in these estimates for that purpose.

In addition to the full-time staff we are continuing the policy of engaging temporary employees during the filing period. The use of these temporary employees has gradually increased from year to year until this year during the filing period just passed 1,164 temporary employees were hired. Through the use of this casual help we are able to dispose of the peak work-loads promptly and avoid building up backlogs. It has been possible, too, to reduce the number of permanent clerical employees.

During the fiscal period ending March 31, 1954 the division received 4,858,438 individual returns and processed about the same number. This represents an increase of 300,000 returns over the last fiscal period and the inventory remains about the same at 42,137 returns.

During the same period 70,965 corporation returns were received, compared with 66,206 received during the fiscal period ending March 31, 1953. The inventory of corporation returns at March 31 this year was 18,723, compared with 18,102 last year.

These figures show, therefore, that although the number of income tax returns being filed is increasing each year, the division has been able consistently to maintain or improve its position.

As at May 22, 1954, refunds had been issued to about 1,900,000 taxpayers who had filed 1953 returns. The total of these refunds was $100,591,000.

During the 1953-54 fiscal period the revenue collected by the division totalled $2,613,000,000. The administrative costs of collecting these taxes was 86 cents per $100. I submit that that is a very low rate.

Dealing with items other than salaries there are no new allotments of any significance provided for in this year's estimates. On the other hand, the division has been able to effect notable reductions in certain of its expenditures. For example, there is a decrease in the provision for travelling expenses of $95,000. This is due partly to a reduction in removal expenses as compared with last year and partly to certain other economies which it will be possible to make during this fiscal period. The provision for office stationery and supplies has been reduced by $40,000 and advertising by $12,000.

The provision for office machine equipment, which shows an increase of $94,000, is to be used to replace obsolete and worn-out accounting machines with more modern equipment which will, in addition, make it possible to simplify and improve our accounting procedures. This will conclude the replacement program commenced two years ago. It also provides for the installation of cash register machines in the district offices in order to properly protect crown funds and to eliminate existing cumbersome methods of accounting for the division's revenue.

Hon. members will be interested to know that during the past year the district office at Dawson city in the Yukon has been closed and the new district office at Whitehorse is now in operation.

Construction of new premises is being carried on at Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, Hamilton, Ontario, and Sherbrooke, Quebec. Alterations to provide better accommodation are being carried on at Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, and Windsor, Ontario. The alterations to premises at Victoria, British Columbia, have been completed. It is proposed to open a district office in the Rouyn-Noranda district when the premises are ready.

With respect to the income tax appeal board, there were 393 appeals filed in 1953 and during the same period the board disposed of 387. As at April 1 there were 199 appeals being dealt with.

I believe that these few brief remarks have brought out the more important factors in connection with the estimates of the taxation division, but I shall be glad to provide any additional information that hon. members may require.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am grateful for the minister's statement which gives us a great many relevant facts. He has drawn our attention to various satisfactory features. I noticed with approval that advertising and travelling expenses were down. I do not propose to go in detail into the further figures which the minister has given because he has given us an adequate statement. I want to spend just a few minutes in talking about what I will call the spirit of the administration of the act because it is very important.

The minister has already indicated that a very large percentage of our whole taxation, roughly three-fifths, is derived from income tax. I think he said $2,600 million odd, about 50 per cent corporation and 50 per cent personal. The view is almost universally held now that the tax is a fair one; that the right basis of taxation is to pay according to ability to pay. It is rather ironical for me to recall that in a certain city in Canada in the 1920's the board of trade passed a resolution to the effect that they approved of the principle of income tax. There were two contrary expressions of opinion which reached me regarding that. One of my friends said: "Why did you not pass a resolution that the telephone was a useful thing?" But other people at that time were very indignant that the income tax had been approved by a responsible body of men. I mention that merely to indicate how opinion has moved in those years.

What I want to say about the act is that there are really two attitudes toward it. One is that certain types of citizens employ clever lawyers to enable them to evade the intent of the act. The other is that the act is administered in a heartless way in certain cases, quite contrary to common sense, and therefore contrary to what must have been the intention of parliament. I propose to give one or two illustrations for the minister's consideration, but I want to stress for a moment those two contrary attitudes.

I hold in my hand an interesting article on the income tax which appeared in the "Canadian Chartered Accountant" for April. It quotes at some length from a British case in which Lord Simon, the then lord chancellor, referred rather critically to citizens who were inclined to employ clever lawyers who he suggested were trying to evade the intent of the act. On the other hand, the writer of this article goes on to state the other side and to say that there are cases where the government seeks to place interpretations on the provisions of the act which are both inequitable and diametrically opposed to ordinary legitimate business practices. I want to dwell on that just for a moment because it seems to me that it is very important to try to get our minds clear on that.

On the one hand, there is nothing I detest more than the person who manages to evade his just tax and thereby puts burdens on other people. Therefore, one wants vigilance on the part of the department. On the other hand, I am equally sure that one wants fairness, because there is the type of mind, there is the type of person who, if he is able to convince himself that the act is not administered fairly, then regards himself as quite justified in practising any evasion which he is able to practise. Therefore I say that we want vigilance and fairness, and I propose to bring to the minister's attention a few instances, seeking to explore this situation and to satisfy ourselves as far as we can in the short time which can be available for this discussion at this time, that the two are fairly held in balance.

The minister has given us a good deal of evidence of vigilance. We have had some complaints as to the method in which vigilance has been manifested and I propose to bring to the minister's attention one or two cases where I think vigilance, or perhaps vigilance plus an extreme interpretation in the courts, seemed to be in a fair way to work injustice.

I believe that that has been corrected by statute, in one instance I want to give, viz. the averaging of farm income. I believe that has been corrected by an amendment to the statute. But I want to read briefly the effect of the legal interpretation, which I believe was the accepted law for a time, because it seems to me to show that there is a danger for legalism to run riot. The description of this case I shall read now, and then comment further on it:

> In the series of cases arising from the administration's attitude on the proper interpretation of section 39(1), we have the courts placed in the humorous position of deciding that "parliament's intention" was that if a farmer did not file all of his tax returns in the averaged period on time, he was not entitled to average. I doubt very much if anyone, knowing parliament's attitude towards farmers, would seriously contend that that was parliament's intention. Can you imagine parliament passing on that section if the Minister of Finance, or someone for him, had said at the time, "This section means that any farmer who has failed by inadvertence to file one of the returns of the five averaged years on time being late by so much as one day, may lose thousands of dollars of tax refund, while at the same time remaining subject to the normal penalties for late filing, which parliament has previously decided were fair punishment for the offence"?

When I read that it seemed to me to be an indication of what I call the necessity for fairness, because I cannot believe that anyone would argue that parliament did intend that. The point I stress is that here is a case where a penalty was provided by the act itself for failure to file a return and yet another surely unintended penalty was also exacted. I feel that this is contrary, not only to the words I read a moment ago, namely legitimate business practice, but so contrary to common sense that the Department of National Revenue should have taken immediate steps to have that set right by legislation if necessary. I understand that has been done by my reading of what the Minister of Finance said with regard to this Nielsen case. In answer to my question the minister said as reported at page 5607 of Hansard for June 7:

> I understand that the difficulty in the Nielsen case was taken care of in the amendment last year. I am assured that is correct. I have forgotten what the Nielsen case was.

I would like to stop at this point and ask the minister if he will comment on that and let me know whether that is correct. Following that I have some further questions to ask but may I just say before I take my seat at this stage that I think that in the interests of the act and in the interests of all concerned there should be a fine balance between vigilance and fairness, and that ought to be possible to achieve. I think there should also be vigilance on the part of those whose duty it is to examine the affairs of the department and bring to the attention of the minister cases in which it looks as though legalism had run riot.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I am informed by the officers of my department and I know it to be a fact that the Department of National Revenue in the preparation of the budget brings up such cases and makes recommendations with reference to what appear to be instances of unfairness or anomalies in the act. But I think in view of the fact that it had been discussed this year in the amendment to the act that position from now on will probably be well taken care of.

Mr. Macdonnell: But can the minister not give me something more definite than that on this particular point? I understood from the Minister of Finance that the amendment to which he referred was passed a year ago. I feel I should have an assurance on that point.

Mr. McCann: The fact is that this case to which my hon. friend refers took place before the amendment was introduced a year ago.

Since that time it has been administered in strict accordance with the act and the amendment to that act.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have no reason to doubt that, but what I want to know is whether the minister can say that the amendment as interpreted to me by the department will remove this entirely oppressive and to me unfair situation which existed before, and under which a man who had been late one day was penalized and not allowed to use that year in his averaging.

Mr. McCann: As I understand it, and having listened to the discussion here on the Income Tax Act, the year in which the taxpayer was late in filing his return is dropped and the averaging is then for another period.

Mr. Macdonnell: That does not seem to me to be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. McCann: Well, Mr. Chairman, that is the explanation I have. I submit this is neither the time nor the place to be arguing about the provisions of the law. If the hon. member has questions to ask with reference as to how the law is to be administered we will attempt to answer.

Mr. Macdonnell: But that is what I am asking.

Mr. McCann: What is the hon. member's specific question?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am asking whether the law as now administered has got away from this situation which I read to the minister and which reads:

> This section means that any farmer who has failed by inadvertence to file one of the returns of the five averaged years on time, being late by so much as one day, may lose thousands of dollars of tax refund—

I understood he was not allowed to use that year but now the explanation the minister gives me is that he might not still be allowed to use the year but that that year may go out and he will have to wait for another year. If that is the situation I do not see how it has been improved at all.

Mr. McCann: In this case and prior to the amendment, if a man had, say, two or three years and arrived at 1950 and was late then he lost the advantage there, he would then have to start again and did not get the advantage of the averaging until he had come to 1955.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister means he lost all those years?

Mr. McCann: Yes. Under the amendment he loses only that year and the three previous years are brought into effect. He loses that year and the average is five. Three and two more afterwards which would bring him up to 1952.

Mr. Macdonnell: That certainly is a substantial improvement for the better and, as the minister says, we are not here to write law. However, I wish to bring up another case and this case is Collins v. the Minister of National Revenue and it deals with the position of a news vendor who was not allowed in the judgment of the court any allowance for his liability to accept returns of unsold magazines. The courts held that the two contracts involved in that case were not conditional on each other but were independent. An article I have on the subject in the magazine I have already mentioned states:

> Would any businessman or member of parliament seriously contend that a retailer would have signed a contract to purchase magazines unless the distributor bound himself by contract to take back those which could not be sold?

Would the minister let me know what the situation is on that? I take it the case is familiar.

Mr. McCann: There is nothing in the law which allows that. This is not in the same class as returned milk bottles, oil barrels, and the like. And there is nothing in the law covering unread, unused, and unsold magazines. If the hon. member wants to advocate that we will bring it to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am seeking to find out the spirit which prevails in the department. Let us get away from the law for a moment. The minister told me a moment ago that in cases regarded as unfair his department would take the initiative. When the statute is producing perhaps unexpected results which appear to be unfair, the minister indicated a moment ago that his department would raise the question with the Department of Finance.

Let me now ask the minister this question with regard to this case to which I have just referred. Does the minister regard that as a fair situation? Does he regard it as the ordinary relationship between man and man in business? That is the test.

Mr. McCann: Whether or not it is fair or unfair is not for me to judge. But in dealing with the particular item which the hon. member has under question, namely, the people who deal in magazines and get them from a wholesale concern, if they destroy them they get no allowance. If they return them to the party from whom they have bought them they get an allowance with reference to them and they can deduct that amount from the amount of money which was owing to the concern from which they bought them.

Mr. Fleming: I have one question to raise, Mr. Chairman. It is with regard to the work of the various assessors. Does the department keep any record of the results of the work of the assessors, as to how much they are able to raise the tax over that which is estimated as payable in the return? Is a record kept of the results of their work in that regard?

Mr. McCann: No. There is not a record kept of their particular work. A record of the office is kept. A record is kept of how much is collected over and above what the assessment is as made by the taxpayer and what is actually concerned, along with the extra money that is collected by reason of reassessment. I think I know the point that the hon. member has in mind. It has been asserted that some of our assessors are working on the basis that the more they produce, the better it is for them in the matter of advancement in the office. That is not the case. Individual records are not kept. Records are not kept of individual assessors as to the amount by which they have raised the assessment of those taxpayers whose returns they have been examining.

Mr. Fleming: I am glad to hear the minister's statement on that point. When he speaks about a record being kept for the whole office, I take it that he is referring to the district?

Mr. McCann: The district office.

Mr. Knowles: Under the heading of administration of the taxation division there is a matter which I should like to put to the minister. My question arises out of a subject that I have been following with a measure of interest for a couple of years. I confess that I was first attracted to it because I happened to notice an article in the New York Times about two years ago written by a namesake of mine. I do not know him but his name is Clayton Knowles.

An hon. Member: It must have been a long article.

Mr. Knowles: I hear someone across the gangway suggesting that it must have been a long article. It was. At any rate, from that time down to the present I have been noticing that a good deal of publicity has been given to a case which seemed to start in Canada and which has now resulted in nine men being indicted in the United States on a charge of evading $16,400,000 in United States income taxes.

I am not going to go into all the details of this story for I have no doubt that the department has a file on it. It is on that assumption that I wish to ask a question or two. The fact is that these nine men included three Canadians, Isadore J. Klein, Albert McLennan and George Norgan, all of Vancouver. There was a story on this matter under a Canadian Press dateline in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, May 12, 1954. There was also one under BUP dateline in the Vancouver Sun of May 11, 1954. In these stories and in other items which I have it is indicated that these three Canadians, along with one American, who was the brother of one of them, did fairly well in the liquor business at the end of world war II and shortly thereafter. According to testimony given at one of the committees set up by the United States congress and which went into the matter of shortcomings on the part of employees in the department of internal revenue in that country, it came out that these four men—the three Canadians whom I have named and the brother of one of them—started off back in 1944 by throwing $1,000 each into a firm—

Mr. McCann: We know the history of that whole case.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to hear that. That means that I can shorten up my remarks. But perhaps for the record, a little bit of the story should be told. These men put $1,000 each into a firm known as United Distillers Limited. As I have it, within a few years they had pyramided that $4,000 to $20 million.

Mr. McCann: Would it satisfy the hon. gentleman if I told him that as far as the Canadian taxpayers are concerned, returns have been made, assessments have been made and the tax in full collected. It was one of the largest amounts of taxes from that type of business that were ever collected in this country. The crown has been protected.

Mr. Knowles: That is very close to my point. What I should like to know is this. I appreciate the fact that the minister and the department are most zealous in matters like this. The minister has already given evidence of that fact by showing that he is familiar with the case. In view of the fact that it has now been brought out that these people appeared to have defrauded the United States income tax authorities, has there been since that time a review of the case to determine whether or not these people short-changed the Canadian income tax authorities?

I have one other question, apart from any that might arise out of the minister's answer. Perhaps the minister can answer that question before I put the other one.

Mr. McCann: We have followed with great interest what has been taking place in the United States. I just want to assure the hon. gentleman that we were one jump ahead of the American authorities. When these same people attempted to bring that money back into Canada or when it came back into Canada, it went into revenue and they paid the taxes on it.

Mr. Knowles: I suppose if I were to ask him a question as to the amount of money that was paid—

Mr. McCann: You would not get it.

Mr. Knowles: —I would be reminded of the secrecy provision of the Income Tax Act, references to which have been appearing in the newspapers lately because of a recent supreme court decision. I take it that if there was any criminal charge involved in this matter all that information would have to be brought out. I am glad to have the minister's statement that Canada was one jump ahead of the Americans in connection with this matter. Did he say "a jump ahead of the Americans" or "a jump ahead of these three men"?

Mr. McCann: A jump ahead of the American revenue department in the matter of collecting taxes.

Mr. Knowles: My point is this. Even if the minister feels that Canada was a jump ahead and obtained a fairly sizeable chunk of income tax out of these people, since it has now been charged that they evaded $16,400,000 liability in respect of income taxes in the United Stats, it would seem to me that it is a matter for reviewing again.

These people apparently were pretty smart. If they pyramided $4,000 into a profit of $20 million in a matter of a very few years they are people who certainly should be looked at very carefully.

The other question I want to put to the minister is this. In the article that appeared in the Vancouver Sun on Tuesday, May 11, which characterized this matter as the biggest tax charge in United States history, there was a postscript to the story about the Canadian aspect of the matter, and it is to that I particularly want to direct the minister's attention. It reads as follows:

> The suit was launched following investigation of the tax charges in the United States in 1952, and the B.C. court of appeal is now threshing out the action of the three men in refusing to answer questions in connection with the lawsuit.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The three men are the three whose names I have already given, and this part of the article has to do with a lawsuit which is something in the nature of a family squabble. At any rate, the article goes on to say:

> Mrs. Netta Bell, widow of Nat Bell, and their two children, Angela and Jack, are asking $2½ million as their share of the $25 million profits made by United Distillers.

That is the company I was referring to, and I take it that the large sum of taxes the minister says the treasury got was either from United Distillers or from the three individuals. Does he care to say, or does that contravene secrecy?

Mr. McCann: It was from the corporation, United Distillers, but this Bell case is the case of an individual shareholder against the company.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. McCann: Our department has nothing to do with that whatever.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. I appreciate the interruption so we can realize we are both talking about the same matter. The next paragraph in the story in the Vancouver Sun of May 11, 1954, reads as follows:

> The Bells allege that through intervention of Canadian income tax authorities $15 million of the huge profits was returned to the company, and they say this was used to purchase shares in the company in the names of secret nominees.

Can the minister explain that startling statement? I do not think he would want to slough it off. The Bells allege that through the intervention of the Canadian income tax authorities $15 million of the huge profits was returned to the company. What does that mean?

Mr. McCann: I am familiar with the case but I would not like to make a comment on a lawsuit and allegation of that type while the matter is still under consideration. It would be very injudicious of me to make any statement in connection with it on behalf of the department. I can only say that we are not involved in this lawsuit, nor have we an interest in it except if it should turn out that the money goes to Bell as the result of the suit. Then we would have to look into the matter of whether or not it was taxable.

Mr. Knowles: Has there been any request by either side in this legal dispute for information regarding income tax returns of United Distillers Limited?

Mr. McCann: Well—

Mr. Knowles: If there was such a request —did the minister say no?

Mr. McCann: The only place we could give that information would be in court, and none of our officials has been subpoenaed to go to court.

Mr. Knowles: If such a request were to come what would be the attitude of the minister, especially in the light of the recent ruling of the supreme court?

Mr. McCann: We have not got that judgment yet and have not had an opportunity to read it.

Mr. Knowles: I will not pursue the matter further at this time. But even though the minister is satisfied that the matter has been taken care of properly, I express the hope, in view of the rather staggering way in which these people seem to have defrauded the United States treasury, that another look be taken at the matter to determine whether or not the Canadian treasury got all that it should have got out of these people.

Mr. McCann: Our interest in this case continues just as consistently and as diligently as when we started five years ago, and we will continue to maintain that interest and take such action as may be necessary if action is indicated.

Mr. Knowles: See that you do.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister will probably regard it as a very obvious comment, but I take it that in view of this extraordinarily complicated international financial and legal tangle the department has availed itself of the very best available legal talent on both sides of the border. I say that is obvious, but I should like to feel perfectly reassured.

Mr. McCann: It is not only obvious; it is a fact.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think the minister is aware that from time to time complaints come from the west concerning income tax problems, and it seems that this year they have been even more numerous than before. Rather than make a formal statement on the problem, perhaps I can get the information I desire by asking one or two questions. How many inspectors are employed by the department, and how many are located in each of the prairie provinces? I ask that question because the idea is abroad that the prairies are a special target for income tax inspectors.

Mr. McCann: Our set-up does not go entirely by provinces. It goes by taxation districts. For instance, the office here for the Ottawa district takes in part of the province of Ontario and that part of the province of Quebec adjacent to Ottawa. The hon. member asked about farm assessors. There are three in Charlottetown, five in Halifax and Sydney, four in Saint John, New Brunswick, fourteen in Quebec, Sherbrooke and Montreal, eighty in Ontario, fifty-five in Winnipeg, Regina and Saskatoon, forty in Calgary and Edmonton, eleven in Vancouver and none in Whitehorse.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you for that information. How many additional assessments have been demanded from prairie farmers in the past fiscal year? Some farmers complain that it is unusual not to be asked for an additional income tax contribution, and they resent particularly the 6 per cent interest charged on the so-called unpaid balances. How many additional assessments were made last year?

Mr. McCann: Additional assessments?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, reassessments, demands.

Mr. McCann: I think I can clear up this whole matter. As a matter of fact I promised to give an answer to the hon. member for Calgary North when he discussed the matter of farm assessment earlier in the session. I have given very careful thought to the subject, and I think if I were to put this statement on the record—it will only take a few minutes—it might answer many of the questions that have been asked and would be an answer to some of the criticism. May I put in on the record without reading it? If not, I will take the time to read it.

In view of recent critical statements made in the house and elsewhere with respect to the taxation division's assessing and investigation methods, particularly in dealing with farmers, a few general remarks in this connection may help to clarify our position.

In order to bring my remarks into proper perspective, I should like to state some of the things which are well known to all hon. members and which must be borne in mind when considering the income tax.

The majority of the citizens of this country honestly and conscientiously pay their proper taxes. There is, however, a minority who, not having enjoyed the opportunity of much formal education, do not understand the income tax law, or are not capable of correctly calculating their tax liability. There are still others, unfortunately, who resent having to pay their taxes and who take every means to avoid or evade the payment of their proper liability.

Now the majority who pay their taxes depend on the activities of my officers in the taxation division to discover those who have not paid and to make these delinquents aware of their obligations and to ensure that they pay their share of the cost of their government. This does not apply to farmers only; it applies to taxpayers in all walks of life. Farmers are one group in the community and they must receive the attention of my officers in the same way as all other groups. I am sure that no person would suggest that the farmers should be overlooked or ignored.

It has been again suggested that farmers in some parts of the country have been singled out for discriminatory attention as compared with those elsewhere. Hon. members may recall my statement of March 12, 1952, Hansard page 361, refuting previous criticisms of this type, and pointing out the hazards inherent in attempting to use averages and broad generalizations of statistical data prepared for one purpose to establish specific conclusions for other purposes. At that time I freely admitted that our officers, being human, occasionally made mistakes, but they were honest mistakes which they were most anxious to rectify when they became apparent. I do not propose to embark on a further review of what I said at that time, but I believe it is equally applicable today and my current remarks may be considered as a further development and clarification of the stand then taken.

There have been from time to time a variety of approaches used in checking farmers' returns, and other classes of returns, in different areas. Methods tried and found satisfactory in one district are adopted by, or adapted to, others. Methods found wanting are rejected. New methods are continually being developed. As is recognized in all types of checking, auditing or investigational work, improvement in methods is only achieved by the use of imagination and experiment. We cannot overlook the wide variation in types of farming in Canada, many of which require different checking methods.

As our experience broadens a certain amount of standardization in general methods is taking place. For example, in the past exception has been taken to the division's procedure in some prairie districts of making requests by mail for farmers to meet assessors at central points for the purpose of reviewing their income tax returns and supporting records. It was originally thought that this approach was both satisfactory to the farmers and most efficient from an administrative viewpoint. However, as a result of our experience it has been found preferable to have the assessors in the prairie districts call on farm taxpayers at their home addresses, unless individual circumstances make alternative arrangements more convenient to the farmer. It is unreasonable, however, to anticipate elimination of local variations found necessary to meet local conditions.

[Mr. McCann.]

Representations have also been made respecting some of the techniques in general use, particularly the so-called "net worth" approach. It has been suggested that we either abandon this assessment basis completely in so far as farmers are concerned, or restrict the net worth period to one or two years.

Before dealing with these suggestions I would like to give the house some indication of the extent of the activities to which such violent objection has been taken in some quarters. As a result of a special survey made recently it has been ascertained that in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953 less than 6 per cent of farmers' returns filed with the offices serving the three prairie provinces were assessed on a net worth basis. Now, remember that, less than 6 per cent were on a net worth basis. In the same period those offices assessed about 5 per cent of the returns filed by all other unincorporated businesses on that basis. To my mind, these figures indicate that the number of cases in which it was necessary to resort to a net worth basis of assessment was not unduly large. While the percentage of net worth actions with respect to farm returns was slightly higher than for other businesses this can, I think, be accounted for by the fact that farmers as a class do not keep as good records of their income and expenses as other classes of taxpayers.

Perhaps a word or two of explanation on the basic principle on which net worth assessments are based will be helpful. A net worth computation of income is based on the premise that the increase in a person's net assets between two dates, added to the amount of money spent for personal and family purposes, represents his income for the intervening period from all sources. If this result is adjusted where necessary by deducting moneys received from non-taxable sources, such as inheritance, gifts, or other capital gains, and by adding thereto any losses of a capital nature, we arrive at the income subject to tax. This principle is recognized as sound from an accounting viewpoint, and has been accepted on numerous occasions by the courts.

Hon. members should appreciate that an assessor does not resort to the comparative net worth basis of assessment as a matter of choice. He would much prefer to base the assessment on the taxpayer's actual income as disclosed by complete and accurate day-to-day records. However where there are no records or the records are shown to be incomplete and serious discrepancies in the taxpayer's returns cannot be reconciled with known facts, the assessment must be made on the best information available. Under these circumstances the net worth approach is often the only reasonably accurate method remaining for the assessor to use in determining the taxpayer's income. It is used under similar conditions for all classes of taxpayers.

There has been critical comment on the fact that our assessors ask certain personal questions in compiling their statements which, it is suggested, have nothing to do with income tax. I assure you such questions are not an expression of idle curiosity on the part of the assessors. It must be obvious that one cannot determine a person's expenditure for food, clothing, recreation, furniture, education of children, medical bills, and the many other items entering into his family cost of living, without asking personal questions. Nor can one ascertain the assets or liabilities at certain dates, or the source and amounts of non-taxable income received, without asking such questions. We must not overlook the fact that these questions are directed as often as not to ascertaining facts of direct benefit to the taxpayer. In one recent case there was criticism of the fact that an assessor questioned the amount and use made of an ex-serviceman's gratuities. I believe that criticism was made by the hon. member for Calgary North. The fact is that the assessor was endeavouring to establish the amount of capital gain he could deduct from the veteran's income subject to tax.

An argument frequently encountered is that farmers generally have neither the time nor the education to keep proper records. All taxpayers in business, or who pay or collect taxes, are required by law to keep sufficiently detailed records to permit accurate determination of their net incomes. It has never been suggested that complicated formal accounting records are necessary for the average farmer, but he should keep a simple day-to-day record of his business transactions affecting revenue and expense. To exempt farmers from the responsibility of keeping records, or from net worth determination of income where necessary, or to drastically curtail the period applicable, could only be interpreted as unwarranted discrimination against other classes of taxpayers.

The advocates of such restrictions in the division's activities contend that, having once accepted a return without question or investigation, the division is showing bad faith in going back at some future date to reopen a return. This seems to resolve itself into an argument that if the taxpayer succeeds in an understatement or wilful suppression of income, or fails to keep accurate records without immediate detection, the division should be forever barred from collection of the proper tax. I assure you that we have resisted and will continue to resist such suggestions.

There are, I believe, adequate legal safeguards to prevent the authorities from unreasonable zeal in this matter of reassessment. I quote from subsection 4 of section 46 of the Income Tax Act:

> (4) The minister may at any time assess tax, interest or penalties and may
> (a) at any time, if the taxpayer or person filing the return has made any misrepresentation or committed any fraud in filing the return or supplying information under this act, and
> (b) within 6 years from the day of an original assessment in any other case,
> reassess or make additional assessments.

It will be noted that while the division's authority to assess or reassess is unlimited in the event of misrepresentation or fraud, a six-year limit is provided in all other cases.

A brief outline of our administrative methods illustrating the practical effect of our policies will indicate that this six-year general limit is not unreasonably long. The Canadian system of taxation is one of self-assessment and the taxpayer is required to make a return of his income and calculate his tax. In order to give proper service in such matters as the issuance of notices of assessment and the payment of refunds, as well as to improve the over-all administration of the division, we have in recent years subjected all returns to a rapid examination at the time of filing and, after correction of obvious errors, issued assessment notices almost immediately, acknowledging payments received and showing balances apparently owing or refunds of indicated overpayments. This phase of the program has met with almost unanimous public approval.

It is obviously necessary, however, as time and staff permit, to re-examine some of these returns. Methods of selection used vary but such considerations as complexity or scale of operation of the taxpayer, the necessity to check discrepancies, or the discovery of errors or omissions not previously discernible, all play their part. It may be said that all adjustments should be completed on the first examination, but when one reflects that over four million returns were filed in 1952, it will be evident that this could be done only by sacrificing the objective of prompt handling noted above, or by the use of an abortively large untrained seasonal staff, with a consequent loss of assessing quality, not to mention revenue. An important consideration is also the fact that errors of returns, particularly sustained suppressions of income, are frequently only apparent on concurrent examination of several years' returns of the same taxpayer. This is not feasible at a time when most of our district offices' daily intake of returns may number in the hundreds or thousands.

The re-examination of returns is therefore an orderly, continuous process throughout the year, interrupted to a limited degree by diversion of sufficient regular staff during the peak filing season to supervise and assist a comparatively small temporary clerical staff employed for that period to complete the first recording and examination of returns. I am satisfied that the relatively small but well trained permanent staff we now have employed under the present system is preferable, both from an efficiency and economy viewpoint, to the possible alternatives available.

Another frequently misunderstood phase of income tax administration is enforcement. It has doubtless come to the attention of many members that we sometimes find it necessary to take punitive legal action under the act. All classes of taxpayers have on occasion been prosecuted for failure to file returns of income, or for filing fraudulent returns. Such actions are invariably only initiated after the most careful review of all circumstances by senior officials of the division. The Income Tax Act, like any other law of vital importance to the national revenue, contains provisions necessary to its enforcement, but I can assure the house that the penalties provided are used only in cases involving refusal of taxpayers to comply with reasonable requests for returns or other information, or where wilful tax evasion is established.

We are keenly aware of the importance of good public relations in the difficult task of tax collection, and much has been done by way of radio and newspaper publicity, and through the medium of departmental publications, such as the farmer's and fisherman's guide, to explain our functions and requirements to the taxpaying public. I feel, however, that our best public relations medium is the day-to-day contact of our staff with the public, and all officers of the division are instructed to use the utmost tact and courtesy in their duties. In exercising their combined functions of collection and enforcement the psychological difficulties encountered cannot be overlooked, as it is too much to expect a tax collector to be welcomed with open arms. Consequently, we must expect some complaints—indeed the relatively small number is gratifying—but we cannot permit these complaints to curtail the legitimate and vitally necessary activities of the division.

[Mr. McCann.]

We are glad to look into all reasonable objections raised, but we ask the co-operation of the public, their advisers, organized trade groups, and the members of this house in ensuring the representations made are reasonable in the light of all relevant facts.

I am sorry to take up so much of the time of the house in putting on the record this information, but I think it will be very useful to hon. members particularly in explaining methods which we use in the taxation branch. We are open at all times to suggestions from members of parliament with reference to giving a better service and guaranteeing revenues to the crown.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think I should have stuck to my question. I have only one brief comment arising from the minister's statement. I agree that the problem is partially one of public relations and educating the farmers. But it seems to me, too, that the educational process might very well work both ways. Assessors are skilled in financial matters and in systems of accountancy; but sometimes I suspect that they lack insight into the psychology of the prairie farmers, and also agricultural procedure. Otherwise they would not rub the farmers the wrong way so frequently.

Information I am getting continuously is that in many cases they approach farmers with an attitude of suspicion and mistrust, and sometimes of superiority. One illustration of this is in connection with a group of Mennonite farmers who are upright and God-fearing people, as all hon. members know. The attitude displayed to many of them is that they are deliberately defrauding the government. As one of these farmers said to me, almost with tears in his eyes, "We would not defraud the government; in fact we pray every day for this government".

Mr. McCann: Most people do.

Mr. Dinsdale: And I suggested to him that in view of my knowledge of the situation they had better spend their time praying for the country.

But we will not pursue this matter further at the moment. I think the statement does answer some of the questions asked. There could be further discussion as to detail if time permitted. I should like to emphasize again that I think the educational process is a two-way process; and if assessors will remember that they are the servants, not the masters of the public, some of this friction might be avoided.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am told that private soldiers in the reserve army are now being assessed for income tax on their pay, and that that has now begun after some years during which they were not so assessed. Is that correct?

Mr. McCann: The fact is that they were always taxable. The hon. member has referred to their return. When they are back in this country the tax deductions are made at the source.

Mr. Macdonnell: No, I am dealing with the reserve army. My understanding is that whether or not they are taxable, the tax has not been exacted. They have not been assessed and they are now automatically to be assessed. Furthermore they are being pursued for the arrears of the years during which they were not assessed. That seems to me a great hardship, if it is true.

Mr. McCann: That is hardly correct. They are not being pursued for arrears. It is not likely that they were in arrears because they were always taxable but the deductions were not made. The practice now is that deductions are made from their pay whether they get it monthly or quarterly, just the same as with any other taxpayer.

Mr. Macdonnell: Am I wrongly informed when I am told that though taxable the department did not exact the tax from them for this year? Is that in error?

Mr. McCann: That is not correct.

Mr. Harris: You are in error.

Mr. McCann: You are in error. The member of the army is in default; you are not in default. The soldier was probably in default, and they may have gone back on him to collect.

Mr. Macdonnell: Just one further question. I want to be quite sure that there is no change in the policy of the department? It is apparently clear there has been no change in the law, but I am informed from a pretty responsible source that there is a change in the policy and that the department, whether they thought it was wise to put the telescope to the blind eye in connection with this matter, did get I suppose very little from their pay as privates. The minister has now told me, as I understand it, there has been no change in policy at all. Is that correct?

Mr. McCann: No, just a change in method. John Jones was in the reserve army and he was getting army pay. He put in his return like anybody else at the end of the year, and he paid his tax. Now he gets his pay and deduction is made from each pay, whether it is monthly, quarterly or whatever it is, and sent in to the department. He is in the same position as if he was working for the Massey-Harris Company.

Mr. Macdonnell: That may be the explanation.

Mr. Pallett: In answer to the question put by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris the minister indicated that as I heard it there were, 14 assessors in Quebec and 80 in Ontario. Is there any explanation for the difference in the number?

Mr. McCann: As I explained it at the time, the figures I gave were for three offices in the province of Quebec, at Quebec, Sherbrooke and Montreal. There are ten farm assessors in that group. Then, when you come to Ottawa, the Ottawa office has ten, but they are probably serving as much in Quebec. The offices are not set up within the borders of the provinces. Therefore you cannot compare the ten in the province of Quebec and say that these are all of the Quebec assessors that there are. There are more than that. However, there are more farm assessors in Ontario than in any of the other provinces. We have 11 offices in Ontario. In Winnipeg we have 31; in Regina, 32; in Saskatoon, 23; in Calgary, 20 and in Edmonton, 20. It depends upon where they are needed most.

Mr. Pallett: One further question. Can the minister tell me what is the total number of farm assessors in Quebec as opposed to the 80 in Ontario?

Mr. McCann: Fourteen as opposed to the 80. If you take another five or six who are working out of Ottawa in the province of Quebec it would probably work out as 20 working in the province of Quebec as against about 70 in Ontario.

Mr. Pallett: Is there any explanation for the difference in number? Are there three times as many farmers in Ontario as in Quebec?

Mr. McCann: I have not got the statistics here of the number of farmers in either of the provinces, but there are more returns from farmers in the province of Ontario than there would be in the province of Quebec. The situation in Quebec is a different thing. That has to be understood. We have heard that complaint for years with reference to getting after farmers in Alberta and in Saskatchewan. The raising of wheat in these prairie provinces is an industry. In the province of Quebec farming is a way of life, where they raise big families and they do not have any income tax to pay.

Mr. Pallett: The baby bonus is supposed to take care of the big families.

Some hon. Members: Cheap!

Mr. Macdonnell: I notice on page 370 that the number of special investigators has multiplied by two or three times.

Mr. McCann: The answer to that, Mr. Chairman, is that it is mostly a change in classification. A lot of these people who are now designated as special investigators were formerly assessors.

Item agreed to.

Taxation division—
300. District offices, $23,753,632.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have one question about the distribution of forms. It has been suggested to me that not sufficient forms get to certain post offices. Can the minister indicate in a word the system which is used in distributing forms?

Mr. McCann: We engage what may be called professionals to do that for us and pay them a fee, and they use the post offices as a distributing centre. It costs the government $420,000 a year to have these forms printed. In order that there might be a better distribution we engage a firm—I have forgotten the name for the moment—and pay them a fee, and they look after the distribution. In most communities they are distributed either through the taxation office, if there is one in the community, or through the local post office in smaller places. Anybody who cannot procure them that way can drop a letter to the department and they are sent to them.

Mr. Macdonnell: About half way down page 371 I notice that there is a chauffeur added to the staff who was not there last year. Does that mean that some officer has grown in status to the point that he is entitled to a chauffeur, or is it a general utility one?

Mr. McCann: I think we are too frugal in that. We have one automobile for the whole of Canada in the taxation division, and that is in Montreal.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: I move that the house do now adjourn. It would seem that we are narrowing the field of activity considerably, but we shall need a lot of time tomorrow to complete the work before us. We should like to alter the program I have already indicated by taking the post office items first, and then follow in the manner I indicated the other day.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.22 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 24, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay on the table the report of the civil service commission respecting the transfer of certain employees of the House of Commons to the staff of the library of parliament.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, if I can have the leave of the house I should like to move:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting the transfer of certain employees of the House of Commons to the staff of the library of parliament, tabled this day, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

TABLING OF REPORT OF CANADIAN MARITIME COMMISSION

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table in manuscript form the seventh report of the Canadian maritime commission covering the period between April 1, 1953, and March 31, 1954.

Mr. Green: Will copies be available for members?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, just as quickly as they can be printed.

COLOMBO PLAN

CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE TO MEET IN OTTAWA OCTOBER 4 TO OCTOBER 9

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the house at this time that the annual meeting of the Colombo plan consultative committee will be held in Ottawa from October 4 to October 9. Previous meetings have been held in Sydney, London, Colombo, Karachi and New Delhi.

The countries participating in or associated with the Colombo plan now include Australia, Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, India, Indonesia, Laos, Nepal, New Zealand, Pakistan, the United Kingdom, the United States and Viet Nam. Dependent territories of the United Kingdom in southeast Asia—the Federation of Malaya, Singapore, Brunei, North Borneo and Sarawak—also fall within the scope of the plan. Thailand and the Philippines have sent observers to some previous meetings of the consultative committee and have been invited to send representatives to the Ottawa meetings.

I am sure hon. members will be glad to know that it is intended that the meetings should be held in this building, with the consent of the Speakers of both houses. It is expected that the opening session, which will be held in this chamber, will be addressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and by leaders of some of the visiting delegations.

The Colombo plan, which was framed to cover the six-year period from June 1951 to June 1957, is now in its third year. The consultative committee meets annually to discuss common problems, to review the progress of economic development and basic economic trends in countries of the Colombo plan area, and to survey the contributions which member countries are making to economic development in this region. A progress report by the consultative committee is published at the conclusion of the meetings. I am confident that the Ottawa meeting, like previous meetings, will be of real value to all the Colombo plan countries, and I know that I speak for all members of the house when I say that we are very glad that we shall have the privilege of receiving the members of the committee in Ottawa next fall.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CELEBRATION OF FEAST OF ST. JEAN BAPTISTE

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I could hardly let the feast of St. Jean Baptiste go by without extending my best wishes to all my French-speaking compatriots in this house. On the occasion of this, their national holiday, I would like to say to all my French-speaking fellow citizens, first how sorry we are to be unable to take part in the celebrations which are now taking place in the province of Quebec and throughout the country, next that we who are at this time sitting in this parliament have now and always have had the greatest regard for them, a regard which is inspired by the best traditions of this country and which is such that we never fail to put their interest above everything.

In conclusion I wish to say that this feast is of very great importance for our compatriots. I should therefore like to pray our blessed patron saint to keep them in this confederation of ours, a durable institution which they could not do without.

Mr. Speaker: Normally it would be out of order to extend greetings of this kind and if, in these dying days of the session, I might have proved to be somewhat negligent, I trust St. Jean Baptiste will forgive me.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING —DIRECTIVE RESPECTING PINE BOARD ROOFING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Public Works. Has the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation recently issued instructions that pine boards for roofing on houses constructed under the National Housing Act shall not be wider than eight inches? If so, has consideration been given to the adverse effect this order may have on the lumber trade in Canada?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of this question. I understand that such instructions were contained in a directive to inspectors which was issued two months ago. The new national building code, which has been under study and preparation for some years, was issued on June 1 by the national research council, providing that such roofing should not be wider than six inches. As the code is adopted by municipalities, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will, of course, conform to its provisions.

In the meantime, we shall continue to give consideration to the question as to what effect this directive may have on the lumber trade.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORTS RESPECTING APPOINTMENTS TO AUTHORITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that there is reason to believe that appointments will be made to the St. Lawrence seaway authority before next session, and further, in view of the statement in today's Globe and Mail as well as in other newspapers that Mr. R. A. C. Henry is likely to be appointed to the St. Lawrence seaway authority, can the Prime Minister assure us that such appointment will not take place in view of other positions which would be in conflict with such an appointment?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article or the report in the Globe and Mail. I do not think that I quite appreciate what the hon. gentleman is referring to as something that would make it unwise to have Mr. Henry appointed to that board. I know of no such consideration. However, I can assure the hon. gentleman that no decision has been reached yet and that in making appointments to that board, the government will endeavour to give consideration to every factor that could possibly affect the efficiency and the prestige of the board.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has indicated that he is not aware of the reason for caution that I suggested, I would point out that, as of present record, Mr. R. A. C. Henry is shown as being a director of Marine Industries Limited, which is a company whose powers are such that Mr. Henry's position in the case noted would obviously conflict with an appointment such as that to the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Mr. Henry, if he were to become a member of that authority, would feel that nothing should be left behind that would in any way reflect upon the complete independence and objectivity of the actions of that authority.

FLOODS

REPORTED DAMAGE IN NORTHEASTERN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister received a telegram from Weekes, Saskatchewan, suggesting that a flood disaster area be declared as the result of the flood damage in northeastern Saskatchewan?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I have a telegram which I received from a municipality in that area. I may say that when I was passing through Regina last Monday I met the minister of highways of the province of Saskatchewan. He had just been up to Weekes or at least he had been there a short time before and he described to me the condition which exists there. I am quite sure that the hon. member understands that this is a matter which is dealt with by the provincial authorities. Any representations that would be made to us eventually would come from the provincial authorities rather than from elsewhere.

VETERANS LAND ACT

STATEMENT ON EARLY CIRCULATION OF ACT WITH AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) inquired as to when copies of the Veterans Land Act as amended will be available. I am informed that it is hoped that these copies will be ready for distribution within two or three weeks after Bill No. 459 receives the royal assent. In the meantime V.L.A. representatives in the field have been notified and instructed as to the new amendments, and I can assure the hon. member that there will be no delay whatsoever in implementing this new and important legislation.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

342. Operations—including salaries and other expenses of staff post offices, district offices, railway mail service staffs, and supplies, equipment and other items for revenue post offices, also including administration; and including, notwithstanding section 16 of the Civil Service Act, payment, in such amount or amounts as may be approved from time to time by the treasury board, to civil servants who are hired as casual employees, $76,007,630.

Mrs. Fairclough: There are one or two questions I should like to ask on this item. In the first place I notice that the department has increased staff by the addition of 5 mail transportation officers. I should like the minister to tell us just what the duties of these officers are. It looks like the creation of a new position. There is another item to which I desire to refer. I believe I mentioned it on the first item of the estimates. I refer to what are now called senior transcribers. It would appear that this is a new classification. They are probably the same employees transferred from the classification formerly described as stenographers grade 2B and grade 2A and now to be known as senior transcribers, grade 2 and grade 1. If the minister would explain these changes in staff, I am sure the committee would be interested.

Mr. Cote: The employees of the department doing typing and stenographic work are reclassified on the basis of their competence and general efficiency over a six-month period. This classification scheme has worked exceptionally well and has permitted a reduction in the total number of stenographic positions. Hon. members will notice a reduction from 146 to 139 in the number of positions. At the same time it permits the better workers to receive some adjustment in their salaries based on their competence and efficiency. As far as the transportation officers are concerned, they are engaged in the implementation of the Woods-Gordon report.

Mrs. Fairclough: I presume the position of senior transcriber is a new classification—

Mr. Cote: A new classification.

Mrs. Fairclough: —which has been introduced because these people have reached the last bracket in the stenographic classification. Is that correct?

Mr. Cote: Not exactly. It is a reclassification by the civil service commission based on the efficiency of the employees.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure I know what the minister means by that, but there is one other item about which I should like to speak. I notice that the boot allowance is $222,000 and was the same last year. Will the minister tell us how much each man receives in boot allowance, whether the amount has been increased and when, and how much of the $222,000 was expended last year?

Mr. Cote: The boot allowance is $15.60 twice yearly, and the last one was paid in May, 1954.

Mrs. Fairclough: How much of the total of $222,000 was expended? What was the actual amount paid to all employees as boot allowance?

Mr. Cote: The total amount for the year 1953-54 is $205,780.

Mrs. Fairclough: Perhaps the minister will tell me whether the amount of $15.60 twice yearly is the same amount that has been paid for years and years or if there has been an adjustment in the amount in the last few years when the price of all clothing has gone up considerably. I should also like to know if the boot allowance is supposed to cover the entire cost of the shoes, boots, rubber footwear and so on that the postal carriers are required to purchase for their use in the course of their duties.

Mr. Cote: To answer the first part of the question, it has varied from year to year and it is only for boots. The amount is fixed after inquiry as to the purchase price for similar articles.

Mrs. Fairclough: When was it last raised?

Mr. Cote: It has been practically the same for the last two years. I am sorry I have not got the figures for the previous year.

Mrs. Fairclough: The last item in the list of details on page 416 is uniforms and letter carrier satchels, and the amount is reduced from $697,000 to $263,000. I understand that is because uniforms are supplied every second year. I have had some little experience with the Post Office Department and its employees and I have some knowledge of the uniforms that have been supplied. This leads me to ask the minister a question which he may think is facetious, but I assure him it is not intended as such. In view of the classification here, I wonder whether the uniforms are made by the same people who make the letter carrier satchels. If so, are they primarily makers of uniforms or makers of letter carrier satchels?

Mr. Cote: The uniforms are made by a firm which specializes in that sort of work. It is done after an inquiry has been made and an understanding reached. A meeting is held at which the employees are represented.

Mrs. Fairclough: If the minister will inquire into the matter a little bit he will find that the measurements are taken in a very offhand manner. I think about thirty seconds per employee is the time spent on that, and the uniforms really would fit better if they were just made in small, medium and large sizes. In fact, I suspect that is about how they are made and that the manner of taking measurements is a camouflage. I would advise the minister to inquire into that matter and to actually talk to some of the postal carriers. I know that much of the information that reaches him reaches him through the usual channels, and probably by the time it gets to him it is slightly coloured. I am often interested to hear the minister say that such and such took place after consultation with the employees. Then I get an entirely opposite story from some of the employees, and I have had sufficient experience with employee relations to realize that when a story goes through several hands it may have a slightly different complexion by the time it reaches the head than it had where it started. But quite apart from the abominable fit of these uniforms, does the minister not think that it might be well to separate these two articles? It seems to me it might be better to put uniforms and boot allowance together. I cannot see that uniforms and letter carrier satchels have any relation to each other.

Mr. Cote: I understand the natural taste for fashion of my hon. friend. I think she will understand that it is very hard to have employees all over the country of the same stature. But we are doing our best to make the uniforms suitable. There is a special board on which the employees have their representatives, and it is through consultation with these representatives that we come to a decision as to the types of uniform. If there are some who are not satisfied they have every right to complain to this board. If my hon. friend has some special names in mind, I will be glad to receive them personally, and if there is really something that can be corrected we will be pleased to investigate and make the correction.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I think that is a rather poor excuse because the transportation companies, the fire departments and police departments of the various cities manage to take measurements of their employees and supply them with uniforms which look neat. If I might say one last word on this subject, I think the letter carriers' satchels fit better than the uniforms in most cases.

Mr. Noseworthy: I wonder whether the Postmaster General has any information as yet as a result of his check-up on working conditions in the Fleet street post office in Toronto which he undertook some weeks ago.

Mr. Cote: The committee is still working on this question and they have not yet filed their final report.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have just one other question. I wonder whether the minister could enlighten us on the mysteries of the classifications of employees in the post office? I note, for instance, the postal staff ranges all the way from grade 1 to grade 14. Is that general in other departments or is it applicable only to the post office? I further note that a grade 14 postal employee gets about the same salary as grade 7 in other departments. Now, it is a great mystery to me. I do not know whether it is to the Postmaster General, but perhaps he can enlighten us on that.

Mr. Cote: The technical classifications are made by the civil service commission and relate only to the Post Office Department, but the clerical classifications relate to all departments.

Mr. Michener: I have two or three items to take up with the minister. By way of introduction, I should like to thank him for his courtesy in dealing with the rather minute complaints I have passed on to him from time to time, and which he endeavoured to investigate. In the departmental estimates I see there is an item for $192,000 for films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity. This amounts to something more than 10 per cent of the administration expenses, and I wonder if the minister would indicate what amount was spent under that heading last year. What films were made and for what purpose?

Mr. Cote: The item of $192,000 covers all the following items: advertising, general, $100,000; advertising, Christmas, $40,000; films, national film board, annual Christmas trailer, $2,500; "all-up" film, nothing this year; postal exhibits, displays and floats, $12,000; photography, national film board, $2,500; art work on posters and exhibits, $3,500; truck signs, $4,300; meals of employees while on duty at postal exhibits, $700; "teamwork pays" series of posters and management bulletins purchased from G. Wilson Co. of Toronto. The posters are directed towards building employee morale, and bulletins are for supervisors on proper handling of employees. This program is in effect at headquarters, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg and Toronto with the possibility of extension to other centres, $10,000; motion signs for post office lobbies, $2,000; "Canada Welcomes You", a pamphlet handed to tourists at border points and containing information about postage rates, $3,500; householder leaflets concerning "mail early" programs, distribution 3 million, $10,000; householder leaflet concerning postal zones, $1,000. This brings the total to $192,000.

Mr. Michener: Would the minister indicate the purpose of the newspaper advertising involving $100,000.

Mr. Cote: It is to keep the public informed about postal rates, early mailing notices, changes in hours and all sorts of postal matters.

Miss Bennett: Following upon the question of the hon. member for St. Paul's, I should like the minister to tell us how he chooses the media through which he does the advertising concerning changes in rates or notices about Christmas mailing. For instance, I have in mind that on or about April 1 there were several advertisements appearing in various newspapers in the county in which I live, but I observed there was no advertising in the local paper in Georgetown which serves a community of from 3,500 to 4,000. If we are to advertise efficiently, it seems to me the department should be advertising in all the local papers. Would the minister tell me how this choice is made?

Mr. Cote: It is done through the A.B.C. circulation by an advertising company. We do the advertising through the Walsh advertising company in Montreal and Toronto. They have to establish certain lines of demarcation. As an example, if a newspaper has no bona fide subscribers it is not considered, because that is one of the conditions necessary to be classified by A.B.C. We are not doing it ourselves; we are doing it through an advertising agency which considers all the qualifications of the respective newspapers.

Miss Bennett: It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that is a very arbitrary and unfair way of choosing a method of advertising, that is through the audit bureau. I take it that is what the minister indicates. The newspapers are not necessarily all members of this audit bureau, and does that mean those newspapers that do not happen to be members of the bureau get no advertising?

Mr. Cote: We have only a small amount of money to cover this advertising. If we had enough money to spend, and if we considered it advisable to spend that money, we could probably give this advertising to all the local newspapers. The advertising company has to find a way to make a choice, and that choice is made on the basis of circulation and experience, which might place some newspapers in a higher class than the others.

Miss Bennett: I appreciate that there should be economy in the department, and particularly in the spending of the public's money, but I am not sure we are getting the most efficient service when we observe Post Office Department notices can appear in papers serving perhaps from 1,500 to 2,000, while a newspaper serving a community of from 3,500 to 4,000 gets no advertising at all. I think that does not work toward efficiency in the department. These advertisements mean a great deal to the local weekly papers and, if possible, some fair way of allotting advertising should be undertaken by the minister. I say that just by way of suggestion to him, because it means a great deal to these local weekly papers. They give a very fine service in getting information out to the public, and keeping the public informed. I suggest that the minister and those in his department should look into the possibility of placing in the hands of those weekly newspapers any business that could be given to them, keeping in mind always the principles of sound business practice.

May I say that the minister has always been most kind to me in any communications I have had with him, and I would appreciate his giving this matter his consideration on behalf of all the weekly newspapers throughout the country. I suggest to him that it is an important matter.

Mr. Cote: I wish I could fulfil the hon. member's suggestion, for which I thank her. However, as a department we are not experts in advertising, and that is why we rely upon agencies. If there is anything that can be done along the lines suggested by the hon. member, we will look into it.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, the second item to which I wish to refer is one which has been raised by the Auditor General, and to which I referred earlier in the session. At page 38 of the Auditor General's report a suggestion is made to the Post Office Department which it seems to me has considerable merit as a means of effecting economy.

As hon. members know, the department had to come to parliament asking for an increase in rates to offset the heavier expenditures as a result of which, it was indicated, the department would have operated at a loss. So that every economy I suggest is worthy of careful attention.

The one I have in mind is related to the post office savings bank which has been carrying on for a great many years and in many communities and local areas and has fulfilled a useful service. This is particularly true where there are no branches of chartered banks readily available. I am not suggesting therefore that the service be discontinued. The point to which the Auditor General calls attention is that out of 278,000 accounts, 150,000 are inactive, the money involved having remained in that status for years.

He gives an illustration of an account opened in 1878 with a deposit of $700, in which there have been no transactions since that time. I would suppose that after this interval of time the depositor is dead. After some decades of bookkeeping, the adding of interest and the occupying of the time of employees in the post office bank to no good purpose, the balance in that account now stands at $5,448.

Hon. members will have in mind the fact that the Bank Act provides a scheme for dealing with unclaimed deposits held in the chartered banks. Interest is added for ten years, and then the account is transferrred to the Bank of Canada. The Auditor General suggests that the same procedure could be applied to the post office savings bank, with substantial reductions in the unnecessary carrying of small accounts which are dead.

This might give rise to a review of the postal savings offices now maintained, because where there are adequate banking facilities it is difficult to see how the post office savings bank is required. Certainly there is no advantage in the interest rate allowed, because I believe it stands at 2 per cent, just as it is in the savings accounts in the chartered banks. If there are chartered banks and trust companies operating savings accounts readily available in a community, it seems to me that this duplication of banking facilities might very well be avoided by having many of these offices closed, thus leaving the business to the chartered banks—keeping in mind always the fact that communities in which banking facilities are not available should not be deprived of those facilities.

I rise at this point because I notice the business of the postal savings offices has dropped off very substantially. In fact, looking over the report of the Post Office Department—I do not have it before me this morning—it becomes apparent that there is no great demand for this type of savings office. Withdrawals in the last ten years have almost equalled deposits, and it does not look as though the public requires this service that is now being maintained. Certainly it does not require the maintenance of accounts which long since have ceased to be active. I do recommend this to the minister for his consideration as a very direct way of effecting an economy in the department.

If the minister has no comment I have one further point.

Mr. Cote: I am glad the hon. member has brought this matter to my attention. He may rest assured that all the points he has raised, as set out in the Woods-Gordon report, have been considered, and are continually under consideration by the department.

Mr. Michener: When parliament meets again we will look forward to some action having been taken.

Mr. Cote: If the hon. member wishes, I could give an explanation right now, although I would not want to lengthen debate unnecessarily. It can be pointed out however that the Woods-Gordon report indicated that the cost of operation of the savings bank has been estimated by the cost ascertainment division of the department to amount to $377,000 annually. It has been repeated several times and quoted as the amount which would be saved if the bank were discontinued. Such is not the case.

The $377,000 mentioned covers not only the employees actually engaged full time on savings bank work at headquarters of the department but also employees in post offices, who spend a small portion of their time on savings bank work. It also covers a proportion of the salaries of administrative officers at headquarters and at various district offices and post offices in the field.

If the bank were discontinued it would not be possible to make a saving of $377,000. It would not be possible to make an immediate saving of the total expenditures at headquarters.

It should also be taken into consideration that the money now on deposit is obtained at a cost of 2 per cent for interest, plus less than 1 per cent for all administration costs. This should be compared with the higher administration costs and possibly higher rates for funds borrowed by the government from other sources.

The savings bank is utilized a great deal by a certain sector of the Canadian public who have always been accustomed to a government savings bank. Furthermore, at points where we have military camps the savings bank is unquestionably a desirable and well utilized service.

This is why at the present time we have decided not to discontinue the savings banks. The hon. member has brought up the question of "closed" accounts, and we are actually investigating each case. We are constantly considering the whole question so that, if it is necessary to make a change, we shall have all the information.

Mr. Michener: I am not advocating the discontinuance of the post office savings bank because, as I said in opening my remarks, I believe it performs a necessary service in some communities. But it seems to me that 150,000 inactive accounts out of a total of 278,000 leaves a good deal of room for economy such as the Auditor General has recommended. The service is already being given by the chartered banks.

Mr. Cote: The cases to which the hon. member has referred are gradually being investigated.

Mr. Michener: This involves a change in the law for which a pattern has already been set. Those of us who served on the banking and commerce committee were told what the chartered banks do with their accounts after they have become inactive for a period of ten years. It is a matter of bringing the post office savings department under that.

Mr. Noseworthy: Is there any special expense incurred by the Post Office Department in looking after these inactive accounts, or any disadvantage in the government having these deposits?

Mr. Cote: Very little.

Mr. Noseworthy: I can see no reason why that money should not lie in a government account as well as in a private-bank account.

Mr. Michener: To keep the record straight, I am not suggesting that it lie in a private-bank account. If an account in a private bank is inactive for ten years it is transferred to the Bank of Canada and becomes a government account. I am suggesting it could be transferred from one government account to another government account where, as an inactive account, it could be handled more cheaply.

Item agreed to.

343. Transportation—movement of mail by land, air and water, including administration, $48,524,258.

Mr. Nowlan: This item covers transportation of mail by land, air and water, and also administration. There is one matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the minister in this connection. It is a matter within my personal experience, which happened during the past few weeks. In May of this year it was necessary for me to send some passports down to Montreal to a friend of mine who was leaving for Europe. I did not have time to send the passports to Wolfville and I arranged to send them to my friend in Montreal and have him pick them up there prior to his sailing for Great Britain.

On Thursday evening, May 27, at ten o'clock, I mailed in the post office here in this building a special delivery registered letter addressed to my friend in Montreal at Notre Dame de Grace. The letter arrived in Montreal at 1.40 a.m. on Friday, the 28th. I heard no more about the matter until, on the following Wednesday, my friend phoned me from Montreal. He was not in hysterics, but under a reasonable degree of excitement, in view of the fact that he was sailing that night and there were no passports. I got in touch with the assistant postmaster here who was most co-operative. He got Mr. Dempsey of the investigation branch of the Post Office Department, who was certainly very co-operative and very efficient. To make a long story short, Mr. Chairman, at two o'clock on Wednesday afternoon Mr. Dempsey located this letter lying in the Notre Dame de Grace post office. It had been there from Friday night until Wednesday. I could have walked to Montreal in that time. It was raining, and I would have had to walk rather slowly, but I could have walked to Montreal in a rainstorm, delivered the letter and been back here and had a good night's sleep in that time. As a matter of fact, probably I could have made two journeys. There is something radically wrong with a special delivery system that works in that way. It is true the mail courier called at this home and there was nobody there. I am not in a position to comment on that. The people who were in the home say that there was always someone there.

I wonder just what the regulations are. I understood that if somebody called with a special delivery letter and made some memo it should have been left. I understood that they were required to call at least twice. This envelope has marked on it "one call" and somebody initialed it. I hardly think that is the worst of it. Mr. Dempsey was able to locate this letter shortly before two o'clock on Wednesday afternoon. My friend was sailing that night. Mr. Dempsey told me himself that the postmaster in Notre Dame de Grace said it was impossible to deliver the letter until the next morning. That would be on Thursday. I want to be fair. He said: "If you want to have that done now I will issue special instructions to have that done." Why in the name of common sense would it be necessary to have to get special instructions issued to deliver something which has already been lying around there for five days? I have heard a lot about the forty-hour week, the five-day week and the eight-hour day, but I wonder what hours are in force when at two o'clock in the afternoon a letter which has been missing for five days is discovered and they say: "Well, we are sorry we cannot deliver this until the next morning", despite the fact that I spent about $20 in telephone calls getting in touch with various parties and telling my friend to sit there in Montreal, and also to the postmaster, inquiring as to why it was not delivered. In the end I telephoned the man to whom this letter was addressed and said: "Don't take any more chances in this thing. We have found the letter." He hired a taxi and drove out to the post office and got the letter and came back with it; otherwise it would not have been delivered yet. I know the Postmaster General is not responsible himself for this situation. I do not expect him to deliver the mail. I know he will understand that this is not uttered in any way against himself; but when you pay money for a special delivery letter, I think you assume, and the public assumes, that you are going to get efficient and speedy service. As a matter of fact, you get a poor quality service. I do think the Postmaster General or the department should warn the people particularly not to pay for special delivery letters, and if they do they are just taking a chance. They will deliver the letter only in certain hours, and it is much more difficult to get it than it would be if it was sent by ordinary post. I would suggest that special delivery be refused by the Post Office Department in any case where there are no couriers who will make special delivery of them. If there is to be no special delivery why call it "special delivery"? You pay 20 cents for a special delivery stamp and I presume the department takes in quite a lot of money out of that. There must be hundreds of thousands of them throughout the country. The public expect a little bit better service than we got in this case. Why a letter should lie around in the post office from Saturday morning until the following Wednesday I cannot understand. I can understand that with the five-day week no one works on Saturday and you would not expect anyone to work on Sunday. Even so, there was still Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. The letter was growing moss by the time it was discovered. Had it not been for Mr. Dempsey we would not have found it yet; the passport would have been of no use on this occasion.

I draw it to the attention of the minister. I think it is indicative of a situation which occurs very often, and something which should be investigated by the department.

Mr. Cote: This is a case where I think I should first remind my hon. friend that we deliver twice, and if the person to whom the letter is addressed is not there, then we leave a notice. This is exactly what happened in this case.

Mr. Nowlan: If it happened in this case why put "one call" on the letter?

Mr. Cote: I will come to that.

Mr. Cote: There might be some contradiction, but here is the information I have:

Re: Registered special delivery letter
No. 647, addressed to Dr. Konstanty
Rayski-Kietlicz, 4069 Northcliffe,
Notre Dame de Grace, Montreal.
Was received in Montreal on the 28th May at 3.52 a.m. via flight 240 from Ottawa.
It was given to the special delivery contractor at 8.10 a.m. on the same morning. He called at the above address but received no answer.

That was the first delivery. I continue:

Therefore, he brought it back to the general post office registration branch at 1.30 p.m.
On the 29th May, 5.20 a.m. the letter was sent out to Notre Dame de Grace postal station for delivery by letter carrier. It was taken out by the letter carrier, but still there was no answer to the call—

That was the second delivery. I continue:

—so he left a card indicating that it was to be called for at Notre Dame de Grace postal station.
The letter in question was placed in the general delivery, Notre Dame de Grace postal station on the 31st May, where it remained until called for on June 2.

There might be a difference in the appreciation of the facts, I do not know; but these are the facts I have. My hon. friend might have been informed that the letter was delivered only once. We have information based on facts. That does not mean that this or any other system is perfect. Incidentally, my hon. friend called my attention to the fact that the postmaster there refused to allow the letter to be delivered. I do not know about that but I will have inquiries made. However, in the main the rules and regulations have been applied in this case as in other cases. We made two deliveries and on both occasions there was no one there and, as the regulations require, we left a note. We know these facts to be accurate and I believe they are as have been reported to us. I believe that in the circumstances we did what the postal regulations require us to do.

Mr. Nowlan: I can only say, Mr. Chairman, that if the minister did not make a mistake in the information he gave me then there must be something wrong, in view of the fact that he states it left the office for delivery at 5.20 a.m.—

Mr. Cote: No, that is not exact. On the 29th of May it was sent from the office at 5.20 for delivery to the postal station and it would then be taken by the letter carrier. But when he called there was no one there and he left a card. It was sent to the postal station and then given to the letter carrier to deliver and he attempted to deliver it but without success.

Mr. Nowlan: Well, the envelope I have here has only one call marked on it. I would imagine that a proper carrier who had instructions to deliver this letter according to the regulations would make more than one call, but this has only one call marked with some initials after it. As I said, I am not going to debate the facts. The minister has given some of the facts according to his report—

Mr. Cote: We have a full report here.

Mr. Nowlan: Well, I have the facts from people who are thoroughly reliable and they say there was always someone in the house and that no card was ever left there. They even took up the carpet and moved the bookcase to see whether the card may somehow have slipped under them but they were unable to find any card. I think this is a situation which indicates that the system might be reviewed, because after a survey of the facts in this case it seems rather strange that the letter should have lain there without being delivered. It might even lie there for a year. Would you allow that to happen, or what would you do in a case like this?

Mr. Cote: After two deliveries without success we leave a card requesting the people to call for the letter. That is exactly what was done in this case. We have the names of all the employees who tried to deliver the letter. I do not say the system we have is perfect but we are trying to improve not only this part but other parts of the service. As far as the regulations are concerned I believe, and I think the hon. member will agree, that we have followed the regulations and attempted a delivery on two occasions without success. We then left the card. As it may be of some interest to my hon. friend, I might inform him that according to regulations special deliveries are made from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. every day including Sunday.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, on this item I wonder if the minister would make a brief statement for the information of the public on a matter about which there is some confusion, namely just when and where letters can be carried by air with an ordinary five-cent stamp, and when anyone wanting special air delivery has to affix a special stamp.

Mr. Cote: All first-class mail is taken by air up to eight ounces when it will speed the delivery of such mail.

Mr. Knowles: Is it not the case that this applies only to mail delivered in Canada?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: It does not apply to letters sent to the United States, for example?

Mr. Cote: No, for domestic delivery only.

Mr. Knowles: If anyone wished to send a letter to the United States by air mail he would have to affix a seven-cent stamp.

Mr. Cote: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

344. Financial services, including audit of revenue, money order and savings bank business; and postage stamps, $2,586,950.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I notice in the details of this item at page 419 there is an item for the renting of accounting machines amounting to $42,000 and another for the printing of money order forms amounting to $147,000. Are those accounting machines rented from private firms or from any other government department, and is the printing done by the government printing office in regard to these money order forms?

Mr. Cote: The $42,000 item provides for the rental of machines necessary for accounting. They are rented.

Mr. Noseworthy: From a private firm?

Mr. Cote: Exactly.

Mr. Noseworthy: The post office does not own any of them?

Mr. Cote: No.

Mr. Noseworthy: In regard to the printing of money order forms for which there is an item of $147,000, is that printing done outside the government printing bureau?

Mr. Cote: Yes, by contracts.

Mrs. Fairclough: I suppose these machines are tabulating machines? The punch card type of machine?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: Before this item is carried, Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the attention of the minister to one matter which I believe has already been brought to his attention on various occasions. This item covers postage stamps and I know the minister has adopted the principle that stamps cannot be issued in commemoration of the founding of any particular city or town. I do not think anyone can quarrel with him on that because, if the department issued special stamps commemorating the establishment of one city, naturally the people in another city would feel they would have to receive the same consideration, and special-issue postage stamps would have to be issued for every town and city in the Dominion of Canada. And we know that could not be done.

But the minister has already been approached by one historical organization requesting that next year a special stamp be issued in commemoration of the founding of the first settlement of white persons north of the gulf of Mexico. It is to this that I wish to draw the minister's attention. I believe when the minister received the application he assumed that it was a stamp to commemorate the founding of the town of Port Royal. Incidentally, the town of Port Royal grew out of that settlement. Champlain established the first permanent white settlement north of the gulf of Mexico at Port Royal, and the 350th anniversary of that occasion will be celebrated next year.

I think it is an historical event of profound significance and one in the celebration of which I think the national film board and other federal organizations have been requested to co-operate. I believe they will.

I am going to take the liberty of urging this historical society to resubmit its application to the minister and I hope he will reconsider it and give the matter favourable consideration, not because it is a town or community but because this was one of the great historical events which went to the making of this nation. If that event had happened in the country to the south of us, I am sure that they would have several issues of stamps, several flags, several anthems; they would have many things done. Our government has rebuilt Port Royal in order to show the historical significance of it. As the parliamentary assistant well knows, the government spent $100,000, $200,000 or more—I do not know exactly how much—in order to rebuild, in its original shape, the habitation of Champlain, the old wooden log building which I am sure many hon. members have seen, with its wooden pegs and hand-drawn nails. It was rebuilt because it was realized that this was an historical shrine. Because of the 350th anniversary of the founding of this settlement, I am making this suggestion. I am not going to take up any more time of the committee now, but I urge the minister to reconsider this matter. It has the support of the historical societies throughout the whole dominion. It has the support of the government of Nova Scotia. I think it has a broad appeal to each and every one of us in this country.

Mr. MacLean: In connection with what the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has just been saying, I should like to point out that, if I recall rightly—and I am just speaking from memory—I believe I have seen a special stamp which was issued in 1908 to commemorate the 300th anniversary of Champlain's founding of the city of Quebec. I think perhaps there is a precedent there.

Mr. Knowles: In line with what has just been suggested by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and the hon. member for Queens, I should like to express once again the hope that consideration might be given to the recognition of the 100th anniversary of the opening of the first post office in western Canada. I agree with the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings that there is no point in having too many of these stamps. Their value would be cheapened if that course were followed. However, I suggest that we do not have too many events of this kind yet, particularly in western Canada, that can be celebrated.

Surely the 100th anniversary of the opening of the first post office in western Canada is an event that should be recognized. I believe that anniversary will occur at the end of February next year. If the Postmaster General still finds it impossible to recognize the event by the issuing of a commemorative stamp, perhaps I should invite him to come out with me next February when the event is recognized. As he knows, that first post office in western Canada is located in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre and is an old building which has been put into shape and is being cared for by the historical society of Manitoba.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The matter I wish to deal with is something which I have had brought to my attention by several people. It is the fact that some of our postage stamps, even of the new issue, are pale and anaemic. Also, for those people who probably have not 100 per cent eyesight, the figures designating the value could be improved on. I just bring these matters to the minister's attention so that when any changes are being considered—

Mr. Nowlan: Make them so people can see the figures.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes; they might be made so that people can see the figures.

Mr. Small: There is a question I should like to ask the minister. A couple of months ago an announcement was made that a new machine for sorting the mail had been developed by the engineers in the department and that it would possibly be installed in Toronto, Hamilton or some of the larger cities. It was to be a rather expensive machine. At the time the increased postal rates debate was going on we were searching to find economies in the department. This would have been a good proposition to have been introduced then. The expense is so great that it is out of the question at the present time. However, I understand it is going to be of such benefit that it would take care of all the Post Office Department requirements in connection with sorting letters. Can the minister give us any information on that development or as to the possibility of its introduction in the future?

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Small: No. Can the minister give us any information as to this new machine or its introduction?

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to elaborate on this matter at this time because I did so previously. It will take a few years before we are in a position to operate the machine. We are working on it now. The national research council has helped in telling us that it would work. Our experts and technical engineers have made progress. I hope it will be possible to make use of it sooner rather than later, but it will take a few years before we are actually able to operate the machine. Once it is in operation it will represent a fantastic advance in the sortation of mail; it will be unique in the world.

Mr. Small: I thank the minister for his statement. I think that is information the committee should have.

Mr. Churchill: I just want to refer to the matter of commemorative stamps which was raised by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and supported by the hon. member for Queens and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think it would be helpful if the minister would make a statement on this subject which is of intense interest to everybody in the country, and would let us know what is the general policy of his department with regard to it. It would also be helpful if he could give us a list of the commemorative stamps that have been published recently.

As has been pointed out, if too many of these stamps are put out, the whole idea is cheapened. That is why I suggest that perhaps there must be some well-outlined policy that the department has adopted. If not, it is for us to discuss now what it should be. The commemorative stamp serves a useful purpose. I grant that the minister might be inundated with requests for them unless it was made clear what should be done with regard to that type of issue. If the minister would give us an explanation now, perhaps the matter would be cleared up.

Mr. Cote: I do not want to elaborate again at length on that subject but I may say this. The basic principle with regard to the issuing of these stamps is, first, that the subject must be of national interest. The suggestions which have already been made today, just within five minutes, show that, if it were possible, not only every member of the committee but every person in the country would like to have a commemorative stamp of his own. Therefore each case must be studied on its merits. The event must be one of national interest. On the other hand, I may say that Canada has an extremely high reputation. We do not issue stamps every day of the week, every week of the month and every month of the year. We have regard to the timing and we try to issue the stamp when we deem it necessary. Because of that fact, our issues of stamps are well received in all parts of the world. I do not want to make comparisons with any other country but I may say this. Those countries which have made a business of frequently issuing stamps find that the stamps have no value, philatelically speaking. To come back to the basic principle, I say again that the subject must be of national interest. Otherwise there is no line of demarcation. If that were not the principle followed, we would be swamped—as we are—with all sorts of suggestions. They are good suggestions in themselves. But if we were issuing a commemorative stamp for my home town anniversary or for the home town of anybody else, in which there might be some minor feature of national interest but more local interest, there would be no limit or no end to the requests. In those circumstances, we would not be able to respond to all the demands we have and would have.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am not advocating the issue of large numbers of commemorative stamps. What I am really interested in is a declaration of policy. The minister has pointed out that national interest is the most important factor. Would he tell us then who makes the decision and would he strengthen his position by giving us a list of commemorative stamps that have recently been published? It would then be open to us to determine whether national interest has been the overriding factor.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am waiting for a reply.

Mr. Cote: I might refer my hon. friend to the Postmaster General's report for 1953, page 12. I will not impose the reading of all this on my hon. friend, but I might read the second paragraph. It reads as follows:

> On July 26, 1952, a 4 cent postage stamp was issued to commemorate the 18th international Red Cross conference which was held in Toronto. Additional commemorative postage stamps were issued on November 3, 3 cent and 4 cent denominations, displaying portraits of the two former prime ministers, Hon. Sir John J. C. Abbott and Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. These two postage stamp issues were a part of a series that will eventually display portraits of all of those former prime ministers who have not previously had their portraits reproduced on postage stamps. On the same date there was issued a 7 cent postage stamp depicting a Canada goose in flight. This stamp was issued to replace the 7 cent commemorative postage stamp that was first issued on September 24, 1951.

I am informed that we do that each year, and I will be glad to give my hon. friend more information if he wishes to have it. We will send him a complete list if he wants to have it.

Mr. Knowles: Like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I am glad to have had a statement of policy by the minister in connection with this matter, but I must confess that I still think the opening of the first post office in western Canada 100 years ago is an event of national interest. I think it is of just as much national interest as what is on this 4 cent stamp that I hold in my hand. I see the minister straining his eyes to see what it is. It is a walrus. At least, I think it is. I am not too familiar with the animal. But I ask the question, of what greater national interest is a walrus than an event in the history of Canada such as that to which I have referred?

Having mentioned this first post office in western Canada, and having done so on a number of occasions, I hope I may be permitted to take a moment to tell you, Mr. Chairman, since as a British Columbia member you frequently have occasion to go through Winnipeg, and also to tell all members of the house where this post office is located. When you travel through Winnipeg by Canadian Pacific Railway, if you will just step out the front door of the station during the hour stopover that usually takes place there and look across the street you will see this log structure to which I have had occasion to make reference quite a number of times. It is that log structure which was the house of the late Mr. Ross in which the first post office in western Canada was opened in February, 1855.

Mr. Cote: In order to add to the information given by my hon. friend, the stamp he showed was one of an issue of 4 cent and 5 cent wildlife design stamps issued in April, 1953. The series of wildlife stamps was introduced for annual issue to support Canada's national wildlife week and the preservation of wild life. The grey coloured 4 cent stamp depicts a walrus and the blue coloured 5 cent stamp depicts a beaver. These two stamps will be short-term commemorative issues. The stamps were designed by Emanuel Hahn of Toronto.

Mr. Churchill: What is the quantity of commemorative stamps issued? Is there some policy with regard to that? How great or how small is the issue?

Mr. Cote: I will give the postage stamp impressions purchased. In 1951-52 there were 1,863,845,000 stamps and in 1952-53 there were 1,870,075,000 stamps.

Mr. Churchill: How many were commemorative?

Mr. Cote: I have not got that breakdown, but those are the total impressions purchased in 1951-52 and 1952-53.

Mr. MacLean: What the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just said reminded me that perhaps the time has come, as the walrus said, to speak of many things. Therefore I should like to ask the minister if he can indicate to the committee what series of stamps, if any, have been approved for issue in the near future that have not yet appeared. Perhaps he might give that for the year ahead. I am thinking particularly of any commemorative stamps that may have been approved but have not yet been issued in connection with such events as the British Empire games.

Mr. Cote: It is not news to the committee that we have issued a new set of stamps depicting the Queen to replace the not so successful stamp on the coronation. We must admit that the new one is far better. I am sorry that I cannot answer the second part of the question as to commemorative stamps for the coming year.

Mr. MacLean: I was not referring to the present general issue with the new likeness of the Queen. I was thinking of any special stamps which have already been approved but have not yet appeared.

Mr. Cote: There are none so far.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): If I may be permitted to revert to item 343 for a moment, I should like to ask the minister what percentage of first class mail is actually transported by air?

Mr. Cote: What percentage?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes, what percentage of first class mail is actually airborne?

Mr. Cote: The closest I can come to it now is between 30 and 40 per cent.

Item agreed to.

699. Operations—further amount required, $1,265,904.

Mr. Knowles: This supplementary item is a companion item to one we had in the main estimates a few moments ago. In other words, it has to do with the same question of operations. I should like to say a few words concerning a matter which comes under the operations branch. I have in my hand sessional paper No. 94-M, which was tabled in the house on Tuesday, June 22, 1954. It contains some 89 pages. Most of it, indeed almost all of it, is correspondence between the operations branch of the post office and certain people in Winnipeg. The subject matter of this return is the matter of appointments to small post offices situated in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre. As hon. members will readily gather, this 89-page document is a companion volume to the one my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, displayed in the house a few weeks ago. When I indicate that it is a companion volume I mean to indicate that there is a good deal of similarity between the other document and this document, and it is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to make a speech that would be merely a duplication of the excellent speech made on this question of patronage in the Post Office Department by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

This document does bring out one or two points in addition to the points that were brought out in the sessional paper which was displayed by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I may say at the outset, Mr. Chairman, that practically the same names appear in this file as appeared in my colleague's file. There are names such as those of Alderman Peter Taraska, Mr. D. W. W. Revie, the secretary to the Minister of Justice and one or two others. In other words, the same people seem to be involved in this correspondence with the operations branch regarding post office appointments in the various constituencies in the Winnipeg area. There is also correspondence with the same secretary of the Manitoba and northwestern Ontario command of the Canadian Legion, and one additional person who turns up in this file who did not turn up in the other file. This additional person is Mr. W. A. Molloy.

Perhaps I should identify some of these people. Mr. D. W. W. Revie, to whom I have already referred, is an official of the Manitoba Liberal-Progressive Association. Mr. Peter Taraska was the Liberal candidate in Winnipeg North in 1945 and 1949, on both of which occasions he was defeated by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North. In 1953 he came over to Winnipeg North Centre and gave me the benefit of his candidacy as the Liberal candidate and once again enjoyed defeat. Mr. W. A. Molloy was the Liberal candidate in Winnipeg North Centre in 1949. As I pointed out there is also a good deal of correspondence in this file, as in the other one, between the operations branch and the secretary of the Minister of Justice. There seem to be no letters addressed directly to the Minister of Justice and no letters written by the Minister of Justice. Rather the letters are to the minister's secretary and she is asked to forward the minister's recommendation. She replies stating that her minister recommends such and such and then another letter goes back to the secretary of the Minister of Justice advising that her minister's recommendation has been accepted.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, it would be an imposition on my part were I to regale the house with the same kind of outline as was given by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North. But I do feel I should draw attention to one or two aspects of this file which are a little different. I have referred to the fact there are letters here addressed to the same Alderman Peter Taraska, who had a good deal to do with appointments in Winnipeg North and he has had something to do with appointments in Winnipeg North Centre as well. This seems to have begun about the time he moved over and became a candidate in Winnipeg North Centre.

The case of Mr. Molloy is extremely interesting. I find that there has been correspondence, according to this file, with him with respect to five different small post office appointments in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre. In only one of those five cases, so far as I can ascertain from going through this file, did Mr. Molloy make a recommendation; that was back in 1949. I do not know why, but apparently Mr. Molloy does not seem to be too interested in this matter of post office patronage. I say that to his credit, and I repeat that he was my Liberal opponent in 1949. Indeed, I ask hon. members to note this with regard to the other four cases. They are found on pages 18 to 23; 26 to 31; 49 to 55; and 80 to 85 of this sessional paper that I hold in my hand. Those page numbers are inclusive in all cases. Strangely enough in each of those cases hon. members will notice that I have referred to six pages in the file—six letters—and the pattern is the same in all four instances.

First of all, there is a letter—let me take the first one I gave as an example, pages 18 to 23 of this file. As hon. members know, these files are built up from the bottom, sc we start on page 23. Starting with that page, we note that on May 29, 1950, a letter went to Mr. Molloy from the director of operations, advising him of a certain vacancy and asking him for his recommendation. There was no answer immediately, so on June 19, 1950 a second letter went to Mr. Molloy with respect to the same vacancy. Mr. Molloy answered that letter on June 23, 1950. His letter, addressed to the director of operations reads as follows:

> I acknowledge your request for recommendation of a suitable person for permanent appointment as postmaster at the above-mentioned post office.
> I thank you for referring this matter to me, and I wish to advise that I am not in a position to make any recommendations.

That is the third letter on the file. First, there are two letters to Mr. Molloy advising him of the vacancy and asking him for his recommendation. Then, Mr. Molloy writes back and says he is not in a position to make any recommendation. Following that, there are three more letters addressed to Mr. Molloy still telling him about this vacancy and eventually telling him what has happened in the matter.

Mr. Nicholson: Three more?

Mr. Knowles: Three more letters after Mr. Molloy had indicated in a rather tactful manner his disinterest in this question. I am not going to read all of these letters. I have indicated by giving the page numbers that there are four instances exactly the same, where two letters are written to Mr. Molloy telling him of a vacancy and inviting him to make recommendations. He writes back and says, I have none to make, but the department goes on writing him three more times after that.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Molloy must be a good man.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Molloy is a very fine man. As I pointed out a while ago, he was the Liberal candidate in 1949 and joined a long succession of Liberal candidates who have stood in Winnipeg North Centre, but that is as far as they got.

Mr. Martin: They still have hopes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Molloy has since transferred his political interest to other parts of the city of Winnipeg. The point of this is obvious. Even when you have a political person out in the field who is obviously disinterested in post office patronage, the operations branch keeps fostering it. I submit that is very clear evidence that this business of patronage in the post office is fostered and pursued by the Post Office Department here at Ottawa. I think it is fair to say that Liberal members themselves, and even defeated candidates, would be quite glad if this whole business of patronage in the Post Office Department were discontinued. And in view of this evidence that it is being foisted upon them by the operations branch, I feel very strongly that serious consideration should be given by the department to discontinuing this patronage in the matter of making these post office appointments.

Perhaps I should go a little further with regard to this one case. I can give it as a sample, because the pattern is practically the same throughout the whole file. With respect to this Winnipeg sub-post office No. 15, situated in the heart of my constituency, not only was Mr. Molloy written to, but the provincial secretary of the Canadian Legion was advised. Oddly enough, or perhaps significantly, the letter to the provincial secretary of the Canadian Legion is a form letter, a mimeographed letter, with the secretary's name put in. In the case of the letters to Mr. Molloy, four out of five of them were original letters. The provincial secretary of the Canadian Legion was written to, but there is no reply on the file.

Then, D. W. W. Revie, 803 Charles building—I am sure that should read Childs building—was also written to about it. He made no reply so far as the file is concerned. But this is not so in the case of the correspondence addressed to the secretary of the Minister of Justice. First there is a letter to her asking for her minister's recommendation. There is a reply from her indicating whom the minister recommends. And then there is a reply back to her stating that the appointment has been made in keeping with the recommendation of that secretary's minister. I do not think it is very fair to a secretary to a minister to put her in the position of having to carry on this correspondence in her name. If the Minister of Justice is going to be the dispenser of patronage in respect of these matters in Manitoba—and I would point out that his constituency is that of Marquette, which is up on the Saskatchewan boundary, and this matter has to do with a constituency in the city of Winnipeg—if he is going to do it, then I suggest he should do it over his own signature.

As I say, the hon. member for Winnipeg North has made very clear what is going on with respect to the matter, and I do not need to go further with it. But so far as this aspect of the matter is concerned I do wish to point out what struck me when I got this file, namely that even when a man like Mr. Molloy is not very interested in the patronage aspect of the matter, it is continued by these letters from the operations branch, which he does not bother to answer.

Of course that is not so in connection with Mr. Taraska. There is no letter to him that is not answered. He seems to be active in these matters.

Then, there is one other point. I am now looking at page 22 in the file which happens to be a letter addressed to Mr. Molloy; but there are quite a few letters in the file which are like this one. It reads in part as follows:

> The order of preference which, according to law, is observed in making such appointment is as follows:—
> (a) patron of the office entitled to disability preference;
> (b) patron of the office entitled to overseas preference;
> (c) patrons not entitled to preference under either (a) or (b);
> (d) non-patron entitled to disability preference;
> (e) non-patron entitled to overseas preference;
> (f) non-patron not entitled to preference under either (d) or (e).

Now, as I say, these people who are asked for their recommendations are informed that according to law this is the order of preference. The question I would like to put is this—

Mr. Cote: It is strictly followed.

Mr. Knowles: What happens if a person like Mr. Taraska or Mr. Molloy or Mr. Revie or the secretary to the Minister of Justice, or anybody else, recommends anyone who does not come under these categories? What happens in that event?

Mr. Cote: I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question, because we should not dramatize it too much. This was done after a committee of the house decided to do so, following recommendations and information. And it is done to avoid the great expense that would be involved if we had to send an inspector perhaps 100 or 200 miles. It would cost more than the annual revenue of these little post offices.

And that is exactly why in 1932 a committee decided to follow this procedure—that is, to ask for information and recommendations from the member or the defeated candidate, because the committee felt they were the persons in the best position to give this information.

And now, to come to the question asked by the hon. member. Let me say that the order of preference is strictly followed. And when A, B or C recommends somebody who does not fall within the order of preference the recommendation is not followed. We receive this information or these recommendations in respect of the appointments to be made, but those recommendations are not appointments by any means. And it is going a little too far when an attempt is made to dramatize this matter.

I am glad my hon. friend adopted the tone he did this morning, because there was considerable difference between the tone he used and that used by his colleague from Winnipeg North. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has brought forward some factual reports.

Mr. Knowles: So did the member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Cote: Yes; but within the meaning of that word, they are not patronage. This is just a useful proceeding to get information. Appointments are made in the order of preference mentioned by my hon. friend, and not because the information is given by A, B or C.

Mr. Knowles: What happens if one of these unofficial people makes a recommendation of a person who does not fit into the order of preference?

Mr. Cote: He is not appointed.

Mr. Knowles: Such a person does not get the appointment?

Mr. Cote: No. If a man who is recommended or suggested does not fit within the order of preference, then he is not appointed.

Mr. Knowles: I am very glad to hear that. Now, just a word or two further. The Postmaster General seems to be satisfied that it is perfectly all right to follow this system of getting these items of information from these unofficial people. It has never been my view that in any business concern it is a matter of economy to have people do things for nothing. In the end they can turn out to be very costly.

I would point out that Mr. Taraska, Mr. Molloy and Mr. Revie, who figure in this correspondence, have no official standing so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, or so far as the government of Canada is concerned.

Mr. Cote: And they make no appointments, either.

Mr. Knowles: No, but their advice is sought, and their recommendations are sought.

Mr. Cote: They are asked for information because they are in a position to give information. But giving information does not mean that they make appointments.

Mr. Knowles: I have not read all the 89 pages of this file, because I received it only a day or two ago, and there have been other things to do. But, so far as I have been able to go through it I do not find any appointments that were made, except those recommended by these people. And the person who has the highest batting average is the secretary to the Minister of Justice, speaking on behalf of the minister. Mr. Taraska has a very good batting average, too.

My point is that it is these people, who are not now employed in the Post Office Department at all, who seem to be the people who are playing an important part. And perhaps one of the reasons I have been speaking calmly is that to my mind the case I am presenting is so clear that there is no need to shout. You shout when your point is weak.

Mr. Cote: I am satisfied with your tone.

Mr. Knowles: But this point is strong. Let me make it clear—

An hon. Member: Crystal.

Mr. Knowles: Somebody used the word "crystal".

Mr. Cote: Crystal clear.

Mr. Knowles: Let me make it crystal clear that I do not think we people here should be involved in this kind of business at all. I do not want the minister to ask me for my recommendations with regard to these appointments. I want him to do this work in and through his department. But I do want him to clarify what he said a moment ago when he referred to the practice of writing to defeated candidates and members of parliament. He means defeated Liberal candidates and Liberal members of parliament.

Mr. Cote: Why not?

Mr. Knowles: I take it from that question that the Postmaster General thinks that the patronage system is all right. I may tell him it went out a long time ago in any democracy worthy of the name.

Mr. Weir: My hon. friend has been attempting to make something significant out of a couple of returns that have been brought down in connection with post office matters in the two constituencies in Winnipeg, and from his observations one would think that the people whose names have been referred to have done something wrong, when they have intervened in a matter which is not their business. Well, I think it is regrettable that he took occasion to dig these people's names out in the manner in which he has. They are all good, responsible, reputable citizens. If they happen to be Liberals, they are that much better.

I come back to the practice that has been in effect in this country for a long period of time in so far as post office appointments are concerned. I do not think there is very much wrong with it. If, as he apparently would suggest, we should turn the selection of postmasters in the smaller postal stations over to the civil service commission or to some other branch, I am sure it would add greatly to the expense and it would not bring about greater efficiency or greater satisfaction to the public.

I am sure that in these cases—I will not say so much for the city constituencies, but I will so far as the country post offices are concerned—apart from elected members or people who have been candidates no one is in a position to give the same type of satisfactory recommendations that these people can. It is often not easy to get people to take certain post offices in certain outlying areas. The point I make is that any elected person, if you like, or any defeated candidate, is going to attempt to secure the person who will do the job efficiently and well and who is acceptable to the community.

My hon. friend the Postmaster General referred to the conditions of appointment and I am sure that no one is going to step very far afield in making recommendations to the Postmaster General for the selection of postmasters that do not conform to those conditions. I am sure that if anyone were to recommend a civilian ahead of a pensioner who was equally qualified and equally entitled, he would hear from the community in no uncertain manner. Therefore one is governed by his conscience in matters of this kind. I cannot for the life of me see how you are going to devise a system that works any better than this, unless you are going to bring the whole thing under the civil service commission, which I am sure would add greatly to its cost.

Let me say this to my hon. friend. As he knows, I have been here some little time, and I presume he will ask for files on the constituency of Portage-Neepawa, and I hope he does.

Mr. Knowles: You are putting ideas in my head.

Mr. Weir: I will tell him this. In all the experience I have had, I have had more trouble and more irritation over appointments made by the civil service commission than anything that I ever had to do with. So it works both ways. I do not think I would have done any better had I tried to inject myself into the larger post offices in the appointments made by the civil service commission; but I do know that my own experience is that there has been more fuss made over appointments made by the civil service commission than over any other types of appointments that have been made. Let me give you one illustration which I find very curious. Take a civil service appointment, where one man in a competition is rated for the appointment by the commission and he gets the position. Within months, not years, another office comes open, and this man, as he is entitled to do, applies in the second competition. In the one competition he is placed at the top of the list and gets the appointment. In the other competition, with the same competitors, he is placed fourth or fifth on the list and somebody else gets the appointment. How are you going to explain that? It happened to be out of my category. I was not interested in it, and I was glad to be out of it, but these things can work both ways, even in so far as appointments by the civil service commission are concerned.

I am going to say nothing more about this except this. If these are the greatest mistakes that have been made by the Postmaster General, or if these are the biggest complaints that my hon. friends can dig up about the administration of the Post Office Department even in the province of Manitoba, I am afraid that we shall have to say that our Postmaster General and those associated with him are pretty pure in the administration of that department.

Mr. Knight: I have one word on this, and it is in regard to the opinions of the member of parliament vis-à-vis the opinions of defeated candidates. That is the one thing that I cannot get straight. I am interested to hear the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa defend the patronage system. If that is their opinion they are entitled to it, and they are on record in regard to it. I have no quarrel with that expression of opinion, but I do not believe in that system. I do not believe it is worth anything to anybody.

Mr. Weir: May I just submit one question to my hon. friend? This system is in vogue at the present time. Do I take it that my hon. friend would rather have the officials of the Post Office Department go out and take recommendations from the drugstore operator, the storekeeper, the bank manager or somebody else instead of from a duly elected person or one who has offered himself for public service?

Mr. Knight: My answer to that question is largely yes. If the administrators of the Post Office Department are efficient, and if the appointments are made on the basis of efficiency and convenience, I suggest then they should do it and that members of parliament or defeated candidates should have nothing to do with it. But I do want to say just one thing. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa has said that somebody may be appointed who is suitable to the community, and from that angle I was interested in it. He wants someone suitable to the community, and he goes out to get the advice of somebody who has proven himself to be unsuitable to the community as far as being elected as a member of parliament is concerned. They go to that man to find out who is suitable to the community. I imagine a great many people in Saskatoon—I will flatter myself and say there are not too many; there are some—think I am not suitable for that constituency.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member sitting on the other side of the house can make that statement and I love him for it. He is just like a lot of the people in my constituency who happen to belong to the unfortunate political designation of my hon. friend. The point I want to make is that it is a ridiculous thing to me as a member of parliament for Saskatoon. I do not want to be bothered with anything like that. I want you people over there to put into these jobs people who are supposed to be qualified to carry on their work efficiently; make your appointments and you will never hear a growl from me in that department; but I do say this in respect to consulting the defeated candidate to find a man suitable to the community. In doing that you are consulting a man who will recommend a man who in the opinion of the defeated candidate would be suitable to that community, but he himself who is advising the department on this man is a man who has proven to be unacceptable and unsuitable to his community.

An hon. Member: Rejected.

Mr. Knight: Rejected by his community, and this is the man to whom my hon. friend goes for advice. They consult the defeated candidates. The question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was fair and it was not answered.

Mr. Cote: What question?

Mr. Knight: The question is, in the case of a defeated candidate belonging to another party but the Liberal party, does the Postmaster General write to him?

Mr. Cote: We receive recommendations and information from members of every party and we even receive recommendations from many of my hon. friends opposite.

[Mr. Knight.]

Mr. Knight: The minister can wriggle and he is in a good place in which to learn how to do that, but I am asking the minister this question. And let me put it in this specific manner. If we had an election tomorrow and if I were defeated for the constituency of Saskatoon, during the following three or four years would I be receiving letters from the Postmaster General asking for recommendations, or, as he puts it, for information?

Mr. Cote: I can answer that question in two ways.

Mr. Knight: There are two ways—yes and no.

Mr. Cote: The hon. member has asked a question and he should at least permit me to answer. He told me a few moments ago he did not want to be bothered so I do not think we should bother him. Secondly, he has asked me what I would do tomorrow. Well, I will tell him tomorrow.

Mr. Knight: The minister has simply wriggled around the question and refused to answer it. I can only accept that as his answer. It is on the record.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, before we carry this item I want to support the case made by my colleagues. I might say that I have a great deal of confidence in the officials of his department. But the interjection made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle prompts me to say that in the last copy of the Saskatchewan Gazette there was an item stating that Mr. G. M. Ferrie of Invermay had been made commissioner of oaths by the C.C.F. government. I was not consulted about that appointment and I offer no objection because I do not want to be consulted by this government or the government of Saskatchewan as to who should or should not be appointed to government positions, but I hope the Postmaster General will have another look at this patronage question.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I want to be fair to everyone but the hon. member who has just spoken wrote an article in his local newspaper telling the people there that he was the one who obtained certain concessions by means of pressure on this government. I think if that is the way in which my hon. friend—

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I would ask the Postmaster General to quote from the article he mentions. I deny the charge he has made and I suggest he put the article in question on the record. If he cannot do so I suggest he withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I am ready to be corrected if correction is needed, but I am referring to the erection of a public building in my hon. friend's riding about which he wrote that he had obtained it because he forced the government to do so.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I must ask the Postmaster General to withdraw his remarks or substantiate his statement by putting the article in question on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind the committee that we are not debating the erection of a public building. I have followed very closely what has been said by the Postmaster General. The minister suggested that the hon. member for Mackenzie had written certain things in a newspaper article and the hon. member for Mackenzie said, "I deny that", and the Postmaster General said, "I am willing to be corrected if correction is needed." I take it from the Postmaster General's remarks that he has accepted the denial of the hon. member for Mackenzie, as he is bound to do.

Mr. Nicholson: But, Mr. Chairman, I would like the Postmaster General to put on record that he withdraws the remarks he has made. He is nodding his head but I would like him to withdraw his statement.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I am willing to withdraw that remark, but may I just point out to the committee that I was informed that an article was written by my hon. friend in a local newspaper in his own constituency. He did not deny he wrote the article. If what I said is incorrect, then I am willing to withdraw my remarks.

Mr. Nicholson: I write a weekly letter for the newspapers in my constituency and I am quite prepared to have the minister quote from anything I have written at any time to show—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think I must point out to the hon. member that the Postmaster General has accepted the hon. member's denial and withdrawn any misinterpretation he may have placed on the information he received.

Item agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—
177. Departmental administration, $683,551.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find the vote on page 28 of the blue book and the details commencing on page 229.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, at various times during the session I have had the feeling that I should like to give the members of the committee of the whole a good deal of information with regard to the activities listed in pages 28, 29 and 30, but at this late date I must confess that I shall curtail my remarks. If I leave out some of these activities, I hope hon. members will not think that I do not consider them to be important, because I do. However, the things that I shall refer to are perhaps those which, in my opinion, require a little bit of explanation.

The estimates represent an increase over last year of $4,044,957 due, in large measure, to the general salary revision for civil servants announced last December and the normal increase in the contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. That $4 million approximately is an increase for both agencies, the department proper and the unemployment insurance commission. Staff strength remains virtually the same as last year, with no change with regard to the unemployment insurance commission and an increase of one in the Department of Labour. The members of both these staffs have continued to render excellent service during the year. The consistently high quality of their work is, I think, a credit to the public administration in Canada.

The industrial relations branch is provided for in votes 180, 181 and 182. The last fiscal year was a period of good industrial relations in the industries within federal jurisdiction. Out of 184,000 workers involved in 78 disputes dealt with during the fiscal year by our conciliation officers and boards, less than 1,600 workers were involved in a total of two strikes. Of the 78 disputes, 59 were settled, and 16 were still being dealt with at the end of the year, by conciliation officers and boards. In one case, conciliation proceedings lapsed without a settlement but also without a strike, and strike action occurred in two cases. I think this is a good record. Let me interject the pious prayer that we may have as satisfactory a record during the oncoming months. This branch is also responsible for the administration of legislation governing wages and working conditions on government contracts, for the promotion of productivity to the benefit of both workers and employers through the medium of labour-management production committees, and for the administration of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act.

The Canada Fair Employment Practices Act is, as the committee knows, new legislation and the experience so far gained under it has been encouraging. When the act came into effect at the beginning of last July, steps were taken to make its provisions known to the public, and particularly to the employers and trade unions whose operations fall within federal jurisdiction.

I believe that educational activity is an essential element in the administration of this legislation, and a broader program of educational publicity is planned for the present fiscal year.

No serious enforcement problems have been met in the administration of the legislation thus far. Up until the end of last May only three official complaints of alleged violations of the act had been received, and all three had been quickly settled either by correspondence or by direct investigation and conciliation.

One of the most encouraging features of the experience we have had in administering this legislation has been the willingness of employers and trade unions generally to co-operate in the work of establishing employment practices that may truly be called "fair".

Amendments to the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act have been the subject of debate at this session of the house and, for that reason, I intend to limit my remarks to the activities under votes 189 and 190. In vote 189 there is an increase over last year of $84,200. This additional sum is necessary mainly because of an expansion in our apprenticeship training program. This program, in co-operation with the provinces, is one of the most important training projects in which the department participates. As its name suggests, it is designed to stimulate apprenticeship and, in doing this, to ensure that this country will have an adequate supply of the tradesmen whose skills play such an important role in maintaining and developing the productive power of our economy.

Earlier this session I promised to say a word on my estimates about the retraining of unemployed persons. I might refer, if I may, to item 189 in the main estimates and item 669 in the supplementary estimates. Heretofore, trainees in these classes have been referred for training individually by the local offices of our national employment service. The nature and extent of the training in each case has been determined by the availability of definite jobs on completion of training and the capacity and previous experience of the trainee. Recently serious unemployment situations have developed in a number of localities. In some cases displaced workers have been absorbed in other plants or industries, but in other cases workers possessing specialized skills have found it impossible to find suitable employment in other fields. The provisions and conditions of schedule M are being reviewed with a view to facilitating the establishment of special training programs to provide such workers with new skills which will fit them for employment in other industries or occupations. In addition, a special committee of the advisory council on vocational training has been named to study this program and officials of the Department of Labour and of the unemployment insurance commission have been designated to co-operate with the provinces in dealing with specific situations.

In vote 190 of the main estimates, which provides for payments to the provinces for capital expenditures in connection with vocational schools, a decrease of $100,000 is shown. This reduction is because the obligations of the federal government under the vocational schools assistance agreement have been met in all areas of Canada except Newfoundland and the Northwest Territories. During the past ten years a total of $30 million has been made available under this agreement for sharing with the provincial governments the cost of building, equipping and operating vocational and technical schools of less than university grade.

Provision is again made, in vote 185, for the farm labour program which has been carried on ever since world war II. During the past year, farm labour agreements were concluded with all provinces except Newfoundland and, under these agreements, organized movements of farm workers were carried out to meet seasonal demands in different areas. The program is a co-operative venture and is characterized by the excellent teamwork of provincial officials and officers of the Department of Labour and the national employment service. It has served, in large measure, as a means of overcoming the shortage of farm labour which we in Canada have experienced for over a decade, and it will continue to operate during the present fiscal year. As a matter of fact, it is operating now. Farm workers are being recruited for certain crops at the present time.

It has been necessary not only to carry on a farm labour program aimed at the most effective utilization of the farm labour force, but also to supplement that force from time to time by bringing immigrant farm workers to Canada in organized groups. These group movements have been used to meet unsatisfied demands for labour in several basic industries and there are indications that some such movements will have to be organized this year. On the whole, however, this is likely to be on a smaller scale and, consequently, the provision made for it in vote 194 represents a reduction of $115,574.

I want to make special mention of item No. 186 initiated in my estimates for the first time last year for a women's bureau. During the year the civil service commission undertook a survey and competition for the purpose of finding a suitable head for this bureau. I did not think, I can tell the committee frankly, that it would take so long to bring this task to a conclusion, but I am glad to say now that it is expected that an announcement will be made very shortly as to the person selected for this post by the commission.

During the past year the economic and research branch continued its important work of research and analysis, providing to both the government and the public accurate information on vital subjects such as manpower, factors affecting levels of employment and unemployment, trade union organization, collective bargaining trends and the incidence of work stoppages resulting from industrial disputes. Much of this research material has been printed in the Labour Gazette, a publication which needs no introduction to hon. members.

I should like to say something about the help being given by my department to establish a comprehensive plan for the rehabilitation of Canada's disabled. This work is being done in close co-operation with the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Veterans Affairs. It has been greatly aided by suggestions made by the national advisory committee on rehabilitation. The government has offered to make to each province, on a matching basis, a maximum contribution of $15,000 a year through my department towards the salaries and expenses of a provincial rehabilitation co-ordinator and his staff, and towards the cost of supplying certain rehabilitation services not otherwise provided for.

Last year the national co-ordinator, Mr. Ian Campbell, accompanied by the senior medical officer of the Department of National Health and Welfare, discussed this offer with the appropriate government officials in each of the provinces, and these discussions have produced encouraging results. To date, eight provinces—Saskatchewan, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Newfoundland, Alberta, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and Nova Scotia—have signed the co-ordination agreement, and it is now being studied in all the remaining provinces. This rehabilitation effort is of course closely co-ordinated with the federal-provincial pension plan for the permanently disabled initiated this year by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to turn to the estimates of the unemployment insurance commission. There are three votes, one for the administration of the act, one for the contribution of the government to the fund, and one for the transfer of unemployed workers to areas where jobs are available. The vote for administration shows an increase over last year of $2,227,753. Most of this is to be used to meet increases in salary requirements resulting from the general salary revision, normal statutory increments and casual assistance to handle an enlarged load of claims for unemployment insurance benefit. The number of claims received in the fiscal year 1952-53 was 17 per cent greater than in the fiscal year 1951-52, and the number received in the twelve months to the end of March, 1954, was about 25 per cent greater than in the corresponding period of the previous fiscal year.

In spite of this increasing claim load, the payment of unemployment insurance benefit has been speeded up appreciably by the judicious use of casual help during the mid-winter period of seasonal unemployment, and, I may add again, without any addition whatsoever to permanent full-time staff. During the fiscal year 1953-54 a total of $186,850,766 was paid out in benefit, and the number of beneficiaries was 950,000. Total contributions were $190,409,070, with the government contributing $31,735,794 of this amount. At the close of the last fiscal year the balance in the unemployment insurance fund was $881,-278,689, an increase of $29,693,525 over the balance on March 31, 1953.

The most important function of the commission of course is the operation of the employment service. The value of this work cannot be overemphasized. The fact that both employers and workers have at their disposal, without direct charge to them, a national organization manned by men and women experienced in the field of employment is of great value in a country such as ours where mobility of workers is so very important. During the last fiscal year 966,880 placements were made by the national employment service.

Under the provisions of the act the Minister of Finance from time to time credits the fund, out of moneys provided by parliament, with an amount equal to one-fifth of the aggregate contributions made to the fund by employers and employees. Over the years good employment conditions and annual increases in the working force have increased the total contribution of employers and employees and the government contribution has risen accordingly.

The item for the transfer of labour, vote 197, remains unchanged from the previous year in the main estimates but an increase has been recommended in the supplementary estimates now before the house, and is found in vote 671. This item is designed, and the reason for the increase is, to assist in the transfer of unemployed Canadian workers to places where employment is available. Expenditures are made when they can be recovered from employers who are willing to pay the transportation costs of these transfers and, to that extent, provide a revolving fund of working capital to aid in the movement of workers to jobs. Where such a refund cannot be assured and where the minister finds that conditions in an area are such as to warrant such action, he may use this vote to assist unemployed workers in meeting the cost of moving to a job elsewhere. That concludes what I want to say on the opening of my estimates.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, any approach to the estimates of the labour department at this time must take cognizance of the present unhappy employment situation. Despite the optimism expressed by the minister and his officials in announcements which have been forthcoming within the last couple of days, there are still many distressing conditions and the clouds are far from having been dissipated. However, before going into the matter of the unemployment problem as such, there are a few other matters of departmental jurisdiction and labour matters in general on which I should like to make a few remarks. I preface those remarks with the observation that I believe, as I stated a moment ago, that the most important problem is now the pressing one of how we shall find jobs for those workers who are now unemployed.

But there are these administrative matters that should be referred to at this time, and I shall take a few minutes to speak of several matters which have claimed my attention recently. First of all I should like to say something about apprenticeship. The minister made some remarks about it in his statement, and I am pleased to see that the government has recognized the importance of this phase of employment by the increase of $84,000 odd under item 189, which the minister mentioned, and the $125,000 in the supplementary estimates.

It is a fact that there is a grave need for skilled workers in Canada today, and it is a peculiar thing that, in a time when employment generally is at its lowest ebb for many years, there is still this grave need for skilled workers. We are still importing into this country people with peculiar skills to fill positions which otherwise might be taken by Canadian workmen or by those who are already here. I believe everyone who is experienced in labour matters will agree that it is desirable that the learning of skills should be at the practical level.

I am one of those people who believe probably we have a tendency to depend too much upon the teaching of skills in our various academic institutions. We leave too little to the actual practical application of those skills. If then, as has been shown to be the case, there happens to be a lack of incentive on the part of young people to apprentice themselves to a given trade, we might well ask ourselves just whose fault it is. Certainly, it is not entirely the fault of the employer, nor is it entirely the fault of the trade unions, most of whom have apprenticeship schemes of their own and definite rules whereby these people acquire the training they need.

But I suggest to the minister that even the increased amounts to which he has already drawn attention will not entice young people into the learning of specific trade skills unless some other incentive is given to them. While I realize that the minister has had committees working on this very point, I suggest to him that money alone is not going to bring these people into the skilled trades. About six months ago in the Financial Post I noticed a summary of apprenticeship matters. There is a table there indicating that training is falling off, and it gives the ratio of allowed apprentices to journeymen. The interesting thing is, for instance, that for bricklayers and masons, while the number of apprentices allowed is 426, the actual number of apprentices employed is only 178. An even worse picture is given with regard to carpenters, where carpenters were allowed 2,475 apprentices and only 333 were actually employed; plasterers and lathers were allowed 242, and only 103 were employed; painters were allowed 1,984 and only 39 were employed. There is a similar picture for plumbers and steamfitters, with 1,514 allowed and 765 employed; electricians, 2,580 allowed and 637 employed.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that is not only a most interesting picture but also a most deplorable one. Here, in no case have we even 50 per cent of the allowable apprentices employed—oh, yes, plumbers and steamfitters just manage to come up to the 50 per cent mark. In all other cases the ratio is extremely low and in some, notably in the case of painters, it is quite deplorable. This table only shows the picture in a few of these skilled trades, but I would think it would be similar in others. I would suggest the department should concern itself with a scheme for educating the young people of this country to the importance of these skilled trades and to the opportunities which are open to them in these fields. I believe it is very important to Canada that our young people should be learning these skills and that they should learn them at the most practical level, right in the employment of those industries that will ultimately need them when they have attained journeyman's status.

Along this line of employment at various levels, I should like to speak for a few minutes about the older workers. While workers generally are concerned over employment these days, it is nevertheless a fact the older worker has a general concern of a very different order. Attention has been drawn by many persons in editorials, and in discussion groups on the radio, to the increasing life expectancy of the people of this nation. It is a fact we are living longer these days. We are living longer, and we can expect to live longer still because we have learned how to take care of ourselves. For this we can thank our scientists whose research along medical and scientific lines has produced knowledge that has resulted in the defeat of disease in some cases, in its alleviation in others, and the general enrichment of health in the life of the average person.

It is true that there is a changing age pattern, and it is not yet static. We hope it never will be. We hope that the pattern will continue to change and enlarge. If this is true, then the present retirement pattern is scarcely realistic, taking into consideration the life expectancy of most persons today. The question has been asked before, and it will be asked again, should a longer span of life mean a longer span of work? Of course, this is a question which each individual must ask for himself because many people retire voluntarily at an even younger age than that usually dictated by industry and by the professions.

If it is conceded then that the span of work should bear some relationship to the span of life, then the whole pattern of employment and the age of retirement, which of course is optional, as I said, might well undergo radical changes. With retirement pensions based on the longer work expectancy, it might well be that those over 40 years of age, and who have been experiencing difficulty in finding employment once they have been severed from employment, would not be in such an undesirable position with respect to industry as in the past.

The other day I noticed a United Nations report on work opportunities for older women, and an interesting comment which came by way of a memorandum from the British ministry of labour and national service. Their remarks were these:

> For compelling social and economic reasons the door must be open widely to the employment of men and women able and willing to work, irrespective of age. These social and economic reasons are not remote and abstract. This is essentially a human problem of providing a proper place in our society for the ever growing proportion of elderly persons. The solution to this problem requires a radically changed outlook on the part of employers, workers and the general public. Age 65 for men and 60 for women ought no longer to be regarded as normal retiring age.

The remarks I have just read, Mr. Chairman, from the British ministry's memorandum will find an echo, I am sure, in the hearts of many people today who are at or approaching retirement age and who feel that they still have a great contribution to make to the life of this country. Certain it is that we are even now faced with a fantastic waste of skills and experience, which is sure to be more pronounced as time goes on. I think we must ask ourselves, and the Department of Labour must consider, whether or not we can afford this waste in an expanding economy. And if the answer is that we cannot afford it, then we should make a definite study of this particular problem, with a view to finding its solution.

I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the Government Employees Compensation Act, because I notice in the April issue of the Labour Gazette, to which he has referred, there appears an item in which an official of the compensation branch is quoted as saying the following:

> Some important changes in the Government Employees Compensation Act have been recommended by an interdepartmental committee and are being incorporated in a bill that it is hoped will be submitted to parliament at the current session.

Well, we have seen nothing of that bill, and I am wondering what progress, if any, has been made, or whether the government has thought better of the proposal. Or, if not either of these, is the bill just shelved for this session?

Of course we realize that the matter of federal government compensation is administered by the provinces. Just last year seven of those provinces made rather drastic changes in their amounts of payment, as well as changes in their regulations. As I understand it, all these changes become applicable automatically to federal employees who suffer injury, and who come under government compensation regulations. I feel however it would be interesting for the house to know just what progress has been made in the study which, apparently, is currently under way.

I should like also to make some observations in respect of the anti-discrimination legislation passed by the last parliament, and in which all of us concurred. I am pleased to hear the minister's remarks with reference to the educational aspect of the work of his department; and I noticed only recently in a news release coming from his department, and also in one of the labour publications, that there is to be a series of eight radio broadcasts commencing next week. It is pointed out that they are to have wide coverage, right across Canada.

No doubt this is part of the educational program the department has undertaken. However, I should like to draw attention to the fact that, while apparently the government is making an effort to bring this legislation to the attention of as many people as possible, the scope of the program could be widened very materially, and greater realism could be given to the whole picture if the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act were amended so as to include within its provisions certain provisions of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. Along with the representations which have been made to the minister by different organizations, I urge that consideration be given to the inclusion of those provisions in the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act.

It is nearly two years since the minister first told us that the department was undertaking a complete revision of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Last year when the committee on industrial relations met, and was considering the matters referred to it by the house, once again the minister stated the act was being revised, and that the revisions would be placed before the House of Commons for ratification. I realize he did not set a time limit, and I also understand that no doubt it is quite a job. But it seems to me we should be making greater progress. After all, two years is a reasonable length of time in which to expect some sort of report, even if only an interim report. I should like very much to see something done to bring the act up to date and to remove from it that peculiar patchwork-quilt pattern it presents at the present time.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Certainly it is true that conditions have changed greatly even within the last ten years; and I think it is about time the minister made some announcement as to when we may expect a revision of this act.

A matter which has claimed a considerable amount of my attention in the last year is the establishment of the women's bureau. Or perhaps I should have said the "non-establishment", because I find that while a year ago we budgeted for $21,560, the estimates indicate that only about $2,560 was spent. I suspect most of that amount was spent in advertising for a director, because that is about the only bit of activity discernible at this distance from the department.

I would ask the minister whether anyone is actually working in this branch. Has it been set up? Is there anyone there? A year ago provision was made for three or four employees. Provision is made again this year, the only difference being that there is to be an increase in salaries—an increase which, I must say, applies to people who were never employed.

Apparently the minister has had some difficulty in securing someone to fill the post of director. I recognize that in the establishment of a new branch it is always difficult to decide upon the qualifications required to produce the desired results. But, in line with my remarks in the house in connection with the civil service estimates, I would say to the minister that if more women—or even some women—were included in courses such as the administration course just completed at Kemptville, there might not be the same difficulty in determining the qualifications of civil servants who would be encouraged to apply for positions like this.

I cannot understand why it has been so very difficult to secure a director. The minister now says he expects one will be appointed soon. Despite that statement however I notice that while the vote is now increased by $2,530 over last year, the amount asked for stationery and office supplies is down by $500 as compared with last year, and that the amount for publications and reports is down to the extent of $1,000. On the other hand salaries have been increased to the extent of $4,030. I am interested in learning the reasoning which would prompt that kind of budgeting. It would look as though the operations of the office are predicated upon an assumption of inactivity for at least another six months. And yet salaries have been increased to take care of a full year's operation.

It is most important that this bureau get under way as soon as possible. Frequently we hear remarks in the house and elsewhere to the effect that the number of women employees is likely to diminish as circumstances change, and that there are certain classifications of employment not open to women and certain other classifications for which they are not suited. Yet we find in a return from the Department of Labour that 1·8 per cent of the 116,432 women now employed in Canada are employed as labourers, or positions which would indicate fairly heavy work. Some are in transportation, others in farming, and even some in construction work. Certainly these are occupations in which one would not expect to find great numbers of women.

Quite apart from the type of work they are doing, it is a fact that the numbers of women employed and seeking employment increase every day. I was interested in an article written not so long ago by Mr. James Barrie, who writes an excellent column on labour matters for the Hamilton Spectator. It is a most interesting daily column and I recommend it to hon. members. He brought out the point that one out of every seven women employed is the sole support of her family. Probably this picture has not presented itself to many people heretofore. They might very well consider that one in seven of all the women employed are employed because they must support dependents. He goes on to say that the reasons that motivate the woman worker today are exactly those that motivated the woman of pioneer days who, because of her position, had to work at home weaving, making clothing and producing many of the household goods. He says it just seems to be that the circumstances differ. In the old days the woman made these things with her own hands, so that the family could enjoy them. Today she goes out to work in plant and factory so that the money she earns may buy them. That is a point we might well consider. We should realize that women in employment are not going to decrease in number but are going to increase, and consequently the problems which they will encounter in employment will increase with the numbers of employees, and the federal Department of Labour should get a move on and get this women's bureau operating, and not finally jump in when the problems have become so numerous that they will not be able to cope with them.

I had intended to say a few words on unemployment insurance, but time is slipping away and I have some other remarks to make. Therefore I shall content myself with just two requests, which I have made before, and which I could not overlook when speaking on the labour estimates. My first request is that the minister abolish regulation 5A (1). It has been a thorn in the flesh for some time now. It has been changed a couple of times. The fact that it has been changed would indicate that the department itself is not too sure of it. I urge the minister to see that this clause is taken right out of the regulations. It permits a discrimination against women that does not exist against any other types of employees. I can see no reason for having this discriminatory clause in the regulations. It just offends one section of worker. I urge him to take it right out of the regulations and be done with it.

The other matter on which I wish to speak is the appointment of a woman to the unemployment insurance commission. I have made this request every year and I make it again. I have an idea that the minister's reply will have something to say about the way in which the commission is set up and as to how the appointments are made. I am quite well aware of that, but there is nothing in the regulations that would prohibit the enlargement of the commission by one member, and I urge the minister to take this strongly under advisement, because I am sure the women workers of this country need and deserve representation on that commission. I am sure of one thing. If there was a woman on that commission clause 5A (1) would not be written into the regulations.

There is another major problem which has been in existence for a long time. I refer to the responsibility for unemployed employables. I have spoken on this matter in the house on a good many occasions, and not only on the labour estimates. It is a problem that is assuming considerable importance in the life of the present-day unemployment picture. A short time ago a pamphlet was published by the Canadian Welfare Council which is entitled "Public Assistance and the Unemployed". I am sure the minister is familiar with its contents. If any hon. members are not I would suggest that they get this pamphlet and study it. In the introduction it points out the various committees which have been set up and the reports that have been made from 1938 on. It makes this statement:

> No action has been taken on the recommendations in any of these for public assistance to the employable unemployed.

The recommendations have been gone over in this house on numerous occasions. Probably the best known are those which are made in the dominion-provincial conference report and which were set out as government recommendations. And yet nothing has been done to implement them.

To come back to this pamphlet of the Canadian Welfare Council, may I say that a number of suggestions and recommendations are made. I shall not attempt to name them all, but the ones that immediately attract my attention are these. The first one I should like to refer to is No. 2 in the recommendations. It states that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be kept under constant review. I am sure we all agree with that, Mr. Chairman, because this act has been in operation for some twelve or thirteen years. I believe the minister tabled the thirteenth report this morning. Basically there has been very little change in it.

Under the heading, "Review of the Unemployment Insurance Act", the report cites various points which should be kept constantly in mind. The report claims that the duration of supplementary benefits should be extended and the amount increased in keeping with increasing costs of living. It mentions also that the greatest possible flexibility in procedures should be permitted in order to meet needs quickly and with the minimum of administrative difficulty. One of the other recommendations, which is important, is one which has been made in this house on two or three occasions in the last couple of years. It reads:

> The needs of the unemployed in periods of "abnormal" unemployment, national or regional, should be planned for in advance, by the legislative provision of extended benefits for persons who have exhausted their insurance rights—

It goes on to state a point that was brought out in the dominion-provincial report, not in quite these words, that the federal government should assume most of the financial responsibility for the residual assistance required by all employable unemployed persons not provided for adequately by unemployment insurance or extended benefits. It proceeds to set out ways and means for doing just that.

I cannot see how the federal government can escape responsibility when, by its own admission, by its own statistics, it is proved that there is still a large percentage, almost one-half of the labour force in Canada, which is not insured or insurable under the act. There are several other comments in this pamphlet which are worthy of consideration, but once again I find time getting away from me. I should like to say this. The matter of responsibility for unemployed employables, and those who have exhausted benefits, or for one reason or another are unable to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, is of very grave concern to everyone in this country. The mayors and reeves association made their own particular contribution to the consideration of this problem. I hold in my hand press reports which quote various mayors and reeves and their comments on what is to them a very grievous problem.

It is true that social service and welfare workers across the country have also made representations to the government. The real estate taxpayers of the municipalities know full well who is going to pay the shot for increased welfare costs in times of serious unemployment. We could very well ask ourselves just how bad it must be before the federal government will take the matter into consideration. If, as has been claimed on several occasions, the provinces should enter into the matter, then let us get together with the provinces and find out wherein lies the solution to this problem. Let us take the load off the backs of the home owners in Canada who are otherwise forced to carry the entire load of unemployment relief for these people who should be covered by the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to come to the most important problem which we have to face today, and that is this matter of serious unemployment into which we have fallen this year, and from which it looks as though we will not easily recover. If the employment situation is a cause of concern in the month of June at the time when the difficulties of seasonal employment would, we are told, have been overcome, what can we expect for next autumn and winter? Has the government an answer to that question? If so, this house and the worried people of this nation should hear about it. Has the minister taken any steps to inaugurate a program of training for unemployed persons in parts of Canada other than at Marysville? Has the program undertaken there been as successful as the minister had hoped that it would be?

I notice that as late as about three weeks ago the publicity director for the textile workers union reported that the Minister of Labour told a recent textile delegation to Ottawa that he is considering initiating a scheme of vocational training for unemployed textile workers. I would like to hear about that and to know just what is being done.

On May 13 in a news release from the minister's own department reference was made to ways and means of extending training for unemployed persons, a matter which the minister apparently had urged upon the delegates to the Canadian vocational training advisory council. But, whatever the picture is at the present time, we would like to know just what is being done.

The minister referred to an amount in the estimates for moving jobless persons from one part of the country to another. But how many of these people can be moved? I would venture to say that only those who are single and have no domestic responsibilities can really be moved to another part of the country, because it is an almost impossible task to uproot a man and his family from one municipality to another even if it is only a matter of a few miles away. These are matters which we have to consider.

It is all very well to say quite blithely, "We will move some of the jobless from one district and put them down in another district." But if the minister tries to put such a scheme in operation he will find it is an entirely different matter.

There have been a number of reports issued, so many in fact that it is almost impossible to keep track of them, in which there have been assertions by various members of the government and by some of the leaders in industry that the present labour situation is largely due to seasonal fluctuation. But I contend, Mr. Chairman, that this is a totally false viewpoint and I should like to spend a few minutes on this matter of seasonal unemployment.

Personally I am sick and tired of the phrase. I think it has been overworked. I think it is becoming an excuse for anything and everything regardless of whether seasonal or not.

The other day the monthly report from the minister's department was issued and it stated that the spring pick-up is now in full swing. But I contend that any pick-up, spring pick-up or otherwise, which leaves over 358,000 people out of work is not swinging very freely and, in fact, despite that pick-up, 7 per cent of our labour force remains idle. In view of that, does the minister think that 7 per cent of the labour force is a negligible amount, particularly in the month of May, which is the month in which these figures were issued?

Every month since the first of the year little squibs have appeared in the newspapers carrying optimistic headings, but the figures are dreadful. For example, one reads, "Unemployment rise is halted on the first day of June." Yet the figures show that in the city of Hamilton there were 10,220 people seeking work and the week before there had been 10,178. In other words, there were 42 more people seeking work on a day on which the "unemployment rise was halted". Another one reads "fewer males seeking jobs than a week ago." But it fails to show that there were a lot more women seeking work than the week before. Here is another, "Number seeking work declines," and there again the figures show that the number of males seeking work had declined by about 100 and the number of women seeking work had increased by 200. Yet another, "Jobless figures show increase", and that is the only pessimistic headline among all of these. But then it seeks to alibi the matter of increase in unemployment as of June 12 by starting out in this fashion: "The temporary closing down of the Ford plant at Oakville made a considerable difference." Well, of course, that is what causes unemployment, namely, a shutdown or lay-off. But why alibi that? Why not say the jobless figures show an increase? It might be said, "Oh, yes, but this is only because the plant has had a lay-off or a shutdown." But that is what causes unemployment, and it is still unemployment no matter what the reason for it may be. It does not help anyone to say, "Well, this is only a temporary condition and you will all be back at work in a month or so." If there is no pay envelope coming in it is still tough to take for all these workmen and their families.

Even in the trade papers issued by the banks the story is much the same and we find an apology for the current conditions, though it is a rather watered-down apology, for it says, referring to the increase in number of unemployed: An increase of 36,000 relative to mid-March is below the seasonal increase reported in 1953.

All the way through these various press reports there have been apologies or half apologies for conditions, but in every case it says, "Well, true enough, conditions are bad but not as bad as they might be." Or, "Everything is going along fine, true enough at a somewhat slower pace than last year."

But even after saying that employment increased seasonally but at a slower pace, the report from the minister's department states that the unemployment level was about twice as high as for the same period a year earlier. In other words, it is increasing but not fast enough, and it is still twice as bad as it was a year ago. So the picture goes on all the way down the line, and while the minister has had a committee working on the problem of seasonal unemployment the number of industries which claim to suffer from seasonal unemployment have increased. Perhaps what the minister should do is to throw out the committee. Perhaps seasonal unemployment might not then be so bad if the committee did not function. Possibly it should be the other way around, and perhaps the committee in its deliberations has found more industries are affected by seasonal unemployment than the minister has been aware of previously. But whatever the case is, it is still true that the number of industries which are now deemed to be suffering from seasonal unemployment is greater than it was. Yet at the same time the work of this committee was supposed to be to find ways and means of relieving that situation.

In the April issue of the Labour Gazette I find a complete report of this committee. I read the thing through. It makes some recommendations. This report came down on February 17. I wonder what the minister's department has done to implement any of the provisions of that report? Four months have elapsed and in those four months we have gone through some fairly rugged times; and it looks to me as though we shall go through more of them. I should like to know what the minister proposes to do with regard to the recommendations of that committee. Will the recommendations be left as were the recommendations of other committees which I cited in connection with the responsibility for unemployed employables, or will the department really get down to work and try to do something about them?

After all, Mr. Chairman, the outlook is far from bright. It is only about a month ago that the minister at a meeting in Montreal was bragging that we had passed the unemployment peak for this year. I use the word "bragging" advisedly because I do not blame him for that. I am sure that any little break in the clouds must have looked particularly bright to him. But an article which appeared in the Belleville Intelligencer points out that the effect of unemployment is cumulative, and it goes on to say this:

> Many of those who were unemployed during the past winter exhausted their benefits. Getting jobs this spring, they will easily qualify for more benefits next winter, should they again become unemployed—but the periods for which they will be entitled to draw these benefits are likely to be shorter. If seasonal unemployment were to continue, even the man who, through years of steady employment, had built up a right to receive benefits for the maximum period of one year would eventually find his "savings" had dwindled away.

It then goes on to say this:

> That is why, just because the employment situation improves with the coming of spring, we cannot afford to be complacent about the factors which left men without work during the winter.
> Unemployment insurance, like a savings account, is a great friend in need, but it is no adequate substitute for steady employment.

Mr. Chairman, the time which is at my disposal has expired but I should just like to say a few more words. No nation is greater than its people, and no economy is stronger than the degree of employment it provides. What makes prosperity? Jobs make prosperity. The labour income of this country has been cited as being 62·3 per cent of the total personal income. What happens to our economy when more and more people are unemployed? What happens to us when pay envelopes are cut off from those workers? It is not the millions of dollars which are poured into oil fields or mining operations that make prosperity, lucrative though the returns from those operations may be. It is jobs for Canadian workers. They and they alone are the backbone of this economy.

When a government becomes so short-sighted that it seeks to tax commodities right out of a competitive position; when the members of that government blithely refuse to regard the danger signals; and when complacency permits unemployment to mount without any attempt being made to correct the situation, save where it happens to hit the constituency represented by a cabinet minister, then the danger to the economy is grave indeed. It is grave not alone because of what has already happened but because of the indifference of those who should be planning for the months ahead when, following a historical pattern of employment, we may expect less employment than in these summer months. If the government is misjudged—if it has been making plans—then let us know what those plans are. Let the minister tell the House of Commons what he intends to do and thus take the load of anxiety off the shoulders of all those people in this country who have been worrying themselves sick over the situation.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to discuss the minister's estimates; there is a great deal of meat in them. I am going to be as brief and as realistic as I possibly can. I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Hamilton West and during the course of her remarks I was wondering about certain things. She made a good deal of valid criticism on many matters, but in the final analysis, when it comes to a matter of regulating the economy of this country to cure the problems that she complained of, I think she forgot that both she and the minister play on the same team.

Mr. Fulton: Be careful.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is only the hon. member's conception of it.

Mr. Gillis: All right. Before I am through I hope I shall be able to convince the hon. member. I have been sitting here and looking at the minister, whom I have known for a long time. I am sure that the next four or five years in the field about which we are talking today are going to be some of the toughest years this country will ever have gone through and that it is going to take a great deal of serious thinking and co-operation on the part of all of us if we are to avoid the greatest possible dislocation and discontent among our people.

I appreciate the fact that the minister is obliged to play according to the rules of the game. That is what I meant when I said that the hon. member for Hamilton West and the minister, when it comes to the mechanics of society, are playing on the same team. They both believe in a system of free enterprise. The minister is doing the best he can to make a very bad state of mechanics work. The old 1903 model Ford car cannot compete with the Cadillac of today. That is exactly the position that the system is in.

Mr. Michener: A socialist Cadillac?

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member has not the slightest idea what he means when he says "socialism". I would suggest that some time during this debate he define socialism for us. He is just frightened of that word because the manufacturers association and the bankers association and those who are responsible for unemployment in this country have told him that there is something bad about socialism and he continues to throw that bogeyman around. Let him tell us something about it during this debate.

Mr. Michener: I shall be very glad to do so. I believe what I say.

Mr. Gillis: All right. I should like to hear his definition. I have heard that crack made so often that I am getting fed up with it.

To return to this matter of unemployment, may I say this. Unemployment is merely the symptom of a disease in the body politic. That is all it is. Why have we unemployment in this country today? That is the first question. If you get a disease, you call in a doctor and put yourself in his hands for examination and diagnosis. Then when he tells you what is wrong with the body, he will generally recommend something to cure it. The reason we have unemployment today in Canada is international cutthroat competition. There is not anyone who can dispute that statement. Why has our textile industry gone practically out of business? Simply because they cannot compete with the textile industry in the United States and with textiles coming in from Britain. The basic philosophy of both the Liberal and Conservative parties is to maintain the status quo, the system of free enterprise, and the basis of that is competition. Textile workers are unemployed in Canada because international competition is preventing the selling of Canadian textiles and the maintenance of the standards that have been built up. That is why textile workers are unemployed.

The same thing is true of the electrical appliance industry. That industry is making the same complaint. They are laying off men. They cannot compete with the products of other countries. It is competition again that is responsible for unemployment in that industry. The same thing is true of the automobile industry. There is competition between Ford, Chrysler, General Motors, the little English cars, and to some extent today cars coming in from Europe in the cheaper price field. Again it is competition.

We are only starting to get into this situation. We would have had it for a long time if it had not been for Korea. Prior to the outbreak of hostilities in Korea we were pretty much in the same position with respect to employment as we are today. But we diverted a lot of money to the manufacture of armaments, threw them away and still maintained full employment and prosperity. We have got to examine that question if we are going to get any sanity in our economic set-up.

I do not expect the Minister of Labour to cure unemployment as long as the country has to function in the way it is functioning today. Drastic changes will have to be made not only in Canada but elsewhere because today the problem is world-wide. In my judgment the final answer to unemployment in the world rests with the United Nations. We set up the United Nations Organization in the first place to maintain peace and negotiate international difficulties in the only way that befits this day and age, that of sensible people sitting around a table and working out their problems in a sensible way. But in addition to giving it the responsibility of policing the peace of the world we set up other organizations in conjunction with the United Nations that were designed to iron out the kinks in other fields. We set up the world bank to deal with the question of international finance and the world food organization that was going to distribute the surplus foods of the world to people without food.

In the final analysis that is where the answer to this whole problem will be found, and it will not be found by fighting among ourselves either in Canada or in the United States. All of the mechanics are there but they are not permitted to work because of this other idea of competition. We have had two or three hundred years of competition. We have had two wars and a partial war with depressions between wars. Surely it is time that we smartened up and began to realize that the mechanics that have pretty well destroyed us over the last two or three generations cannot work. Some serious thinking has to be done about the problem, and we must realize that about 75 per cent of the people of the world are starving to death.

The answer to unemployment in Canada and the United States lies in international trade, and unless we can free the channels of trade and get our goods moving to places where they are needed we are not going to cure unemployment. Do not forget that countries are going to have to give up some of their sovereignty if they are going to take part in a world government. They are going to have to try to do something for the world and not stick to the old outmoded machinery just because it was good for their grandfathers. The difficulty in the world today is to get people to let go of anything that they think belongs to them. You do not have to leave this chamber to see that. When you suggest changing the hours and cutting speeches from forty minutes to thirty minutes everybody gets on their high horse and says that ten minutes belongs to them and they are going to hang on to it.

It is a difficult thing to get individuals, sections of a nation or a nation to let go of things that they consider are their right, but before an answer is found to the problem of distribution throughout the world some concessions will have to be made. It is a question of distribution. Unemployment is a misnomer. We have got an abundance, and every time we have an abundance we get in trouble. We have learned how to build atomic bombs and all that kind of thing but we have never learned how to distribute food. Getting that food into somebody else's hands is a terribly difficult problem.

I have no intention of delivering a lecture on socialism. I hope my friend will give us one when he gets a chance to talk. I want to make certain suggestions as to things we can do that might relieve the spots where there is trouble. I leave the thought with the Minister of Labour that at this time in 1954 unemployment is 90 per cent worse than at the same time in 1953. That is not good, but as I said before you cannot solve the problem alone. You have got to get co-operation. You have got to get the surpluses of the country moving. No matter whether we sell them or give them away, we have got to get them moving. Otherwise we will have more unemployment.

But there is something that can be done. The minister will remember that he has had some correspondence on the question of the relationship of section 108 of the Unemployment Insurance Act and subsection 1(f) of section 31 of the same act. I sound like a lawyer, but this is what I mean. In July, 1953, about 1,600 men were laid off at colliery 1B of the Dominion Coal Company. At the time they were laid off they were paid their vacation pay covering two weeks coming to them in 1953 and a week coming to them in 1954. That was in July, 1953. The unemployment insurance commission, applying subsection 1(f) of section 31, decided that they were not entitled to unemployment insurance because they had received that vacation pay.

In my opinion a section in the act that permits a ruling of that kind is wrong. These men paid their unemployment insurance dues in order to protect them during a period of unemployment. When these 1,600 men were laid off en bloc they were unemployed. They were not on vacation. They paid for that insurance in order to get certain benefits as laid down by the act if they were unemployed, and they were unemployed. The three weeks' pay they received was received as the result of the trade union agreement between the employer and the employees. It was a gratuity which they were paid for services rendered. I want to leave this thought with the minister.

When an industry shuts down for vacation purposes it is not compulsory to go on vacation. If it had been the case of an ordinary vacation and these men had wanted to remain at their employment they would have got their vacation pay and wages for the period that they worked. In my judgment that should influence the people who made the decision in that case to either change that regulation so that the situation can be treated as straight unemployment or the regulation as it stands should be interpreted to mean that these men were unemployed, which they were. They were laid off. Let me deal with how section 108 comes into the picture. These men went back to work a month or two ago, although some are not back yet. If their employment had been continuous, in August of this year, they would have been getting their ordinary two weeks' vacation. There is no vacation coming to them, because they have not been working a year.

These mines will close down at that time for the two-week vacation period, because that is part of the agreement between the men and the company. These men will find themselves laid off for two weeks, and they will not be able to draw any unemployment insurance because they will not have worked a sufficient time to make the necessary number of contributions that would entitle them to draw unemployment insurance. They were laid off, and they will be laid off again for vacation purposes, and they will be penalized again so far as unemployment insurance is concerned.

There are about 1,600 men affected, and in my judgment the unemployment insurance commission owes that group of men three weeks' unemployment insurance. I would suggest that the minister and some of his officials take a look at the section of the act I have mentioned and at least determine the status of those men when they start their vacation period. They will not have any vacation pay. If they were not entitled to it when they were laid off first, then they should certainly be entitled to it when they are idle in August for vacation purposes and have not any vacation pay coming to them. They should not lose it at both ends; they should get the protection for which they paid. The minister and his department can do something about that, and I hope they will.

The second matter to which I should like to draw his attention is also a matter about which he can do something. At Moncton, New Brunswick, there is an agency known as the Drake-Merritt employment agency which selects personnel in Canada for contracts that are in the hands of the United States government in Labrador and Newfoundland. This Drake-Merritt agency has recruiters, people who go around and pick up men for these jobs. They are not taking their men through the national employment office. I want to stress again that the employers of this country who are looking for employees ignore, in so far as they can, the national employment offices. The big employers in this country did not want the national employment offices. They accepted them partially during the war when there was a shortage of labour, but I know that so far as the steel company is concerned and the coal company, they do not put their requirements through any national employment office. They pick up their own personnel through their own agency.

Now, this Drake-Merritt agency in Moncton, under some arrangement with the Newfoundland government, must take all the unskilled labour they can get from Newfoundland. The skilled labour can be picked up anywhere. I am making this complaint to the minister on behalf of the national employment office in Sydney. There are mechanics, machine tool workers and skilled tradesmen of all kinds registered at this office, and to my knowledge that office has been trying to get the recruiters at Moncton to take some of that skilled labour. They have not been successful so far in getting any co-operation from the recruiters who operate from this agency. I would suggest to the minister that this is a United States agency and it should at least work through the employment offices rather than pick up their personnel wherever they see fit. I would suggest the minister might communicate with this agency from Ottawa, and do something to have this condition rectified.

There is another thing about which the minister can do something. A complaint was made in this house on one or two occasions that there was a possibility that immigrants coming into this country were being used by employers for the purpose of reducing wages. The evidence I heard here in the house was not conclusive proof that that might be taking place. I have accurate information, however, that there was a lumber firm at North River Bridge in Nova Scotia, known as the Mariana timber company, which tried to secure 200 immigrants from Montreal to work in the lumber camp established in that area. This shows that there is a labour supply available in Montreal through immigration circles if the regulations can be circumvented by an employer who wants to pay less than the going wage.

I want to tell the minister again that it was due to the vigilance of one of his offices that the employer did not obtain the personnel through immigration circles in Montreal. I am not saying that the immigration people in Montreal would have co-operated, but the evidence is that there is a source there to which employers can apply for surplus immigrants who are in that area if they can find a way of short-circuiting the regulations. The fact that this employer asked for 200 immigrants to work at wages that would be much below those prevailing in the area proves that there are employers in this country who will make use of immigrants for that purpose unless the labour department is on its toes and makes it compulsory to route all immigrants for employment purposes through the proper channels. If a surplus labour force is built up in this way in some centres, then employers who are interested in the economy of this country can obtain labour at bargain prices. The area into which these labourers would have been moved could be called a depressed area, so there are labourers available in the area. This employer would have brought in 200 more men to dump into the area because he wanted to make a few more cents on the cutting of lumber.

I mention this now to the minister because one of his offices was smart enough to put a sprag in that kind of thing. However, the next area in which that type of thing occurs, the office might not be so vigilant. I feel there should be some definite understanding between the department of immigration and the Department of Labour that immigrants brought into this country cannot be used for that purpose.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that everyone wants to get home, just as I do. I am going to finish by saying this in connection with the matter of vocational training. I have told the minister privately, and I have told him publicly, about the great need all over this country for vocational training, with particular emphasis on the island of Cape Breton. That island is one of the biggest industrial sections east of Montreal, where a third of Canada's basic steel is turned out, as well as about half its coal. And employment conditions are bad. I do not think I need stress to the minister the need for a vocational training school in that area, because he is fully aware of it. But the angle I do want to stress is this, that the reason there is no vocational school in the area is that apparently the provincial government has not been able to raise money to match the grants of the federal government, under the agreements applying to the provinces.

At some time the department is going to have to sit down with the provinces and try to work out some kind of agreement that will enable some vocational training to be carried on in all the provinces across Canada. It is not possible today to get equality in all these fields, because of the differences in provincial income. We have gone into that matter on many occasions. I am sure if the government in Nova Scotia would co-operate with the federal government, something could be done. I know this, that the federal government has leaned over backwards, but the province has just shrugged it off with the statement that it cannot match the grants.

If there is a dominion-provincial conference —and indications are that there may be—this matter should be on the agenda, with a view to getting some equality across the country in the matter of vocational training.

That is all I have to say at the moment. There are some thought-provoking items in the minister's estimates, and no doubt very soon we will be chucking some short questions in his direction.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, this group believes it should avail itself of this opportunity to say something on the first item in the estimates of the Department of Labour. Before going into the particular theme I had planned, however, I should like to make one or two observations concerning the speeches of hon. members who have preceded me in the debate.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I am not so much concerned about the little bit of by-play which may have gone on between the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Hamilton West, when the former indicated that the latter was playing on the same team as the minister. I do not know whether or not they are on the same team. I cannot quite reconcile myself to the belief that the Liberal party in Canada is in every particular a free enterprise party. However, this may all be a matter of interpretation.

If anyone were to ask me which side of the game I am playing on I would say that I am not going to be on either side, just so long as the rules continue as they are now. I do not think the game is to be played between the free enterprise side and the socialist side. Surely that is not the problem. As I see it, the problem is not one as to who plays the game, or the plays they make, on whatever side they may be. The problem is that the rules of the game are wrong. No matter how it is played, under the present rules no side will win, and the whole country will lose.

I believe that sometimes we need to redefine the purpose of industry and of government. It appears to me, if I may judge from speeches made in the house, that hon. members appear to think that the purpose of industry is to provide jobs. I do not think that is correct. It is not my belief that industry exists primarily to create jobs. I believe a coal mine exists to produce coal, that an automobile industry is there to produce automobiles, and that an oil well is drilled to produce oil. The purpose of industry is to produce those things which the people of the country enjoy.

Then we hear this attitude: Well, now, the government is supposed to manage industry so that industry can provide jobs. In other words, it is said that indirectly the government exists for the purpose of giving jobs. I do not think that is right, either—that it is the purpose of government to give jobs. If it is, then we might as well have the extreme socialist state and say: Now you are in power; just take over and put everybody to work. If that is what the people want, it can be done—as it is done in certain parts of the world.

The fact of the matter is that industry exists for the purpose of producing the things the nation requires to enjoy a high standard of living. And when industry has done its job—and in this instance it has—the problem that is basic is this: How are we going to distribute among the people the things industry has produced so that the people can have them?

A moment ago I said that at times we must redefine our terms. We say that people need jobs, that they have got to have jobs, that they want jobs. It is all very well to say that; but when the statement is completely analysed we realize that it is not jobs people want. The fact is this, Mr. Chairman, that if it is jobs they want, then all their lives they work as hard as they can to acquire enough income so that they do not need to have jobs.

What people must have is income; and when we think in terms of income another factor enters the economic picture. I said a moment ago the purpose of industry was to produce goods. When industry has done its job of producing goods we should be able to sit back and say: Now we have surely accomplished a great thing in this country; now we can sit back and enjoy ourselves. But that is not the way it works out, at all. When industry has done its job and has produced an abundance of everything we just sit back and, instead of taking out our pipes and smoking them, with the thought that we can take it easy, everyone becomes worried lest they are going to starve in the midst of this abundance that industry has been able to supply.

Even the hon. member for Cape Breton South said that we have an abundance, and that the problem is one of distribution. We have been telling parliament and the country that very thing for the last 18 years. Of course it is a problem of distribution. Let me ask, how can that problem of distribution be met? By putting everybody to work and producing more? The hon. member for Cape Breton South did not answer that. I know a little play went on between him and one of the hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party in respect to defining socialism. The hon. member asked him to define it. I am not so particularly anxious whether he does it or not, but may I tell you what I should like. I should like some of these socialists to define socialism for us. I should like to know just exactly how, if there were a socialist government in this country, they would distribute the abundance by giving everyone what is known as full employment. I should like to know that. I should like to hear them say how it could be done; I should like them to give us a picture of how they would administer that matter from the very beginning to the ultimate end. Trace it all the way through. Say: We would first do this; second, we would do this, until we would eventually arrive at this stage. I should like them to tell us how they would handle that thing step by step. I should like to know whether it is worth while plunging this country into a state of extreme socialism. As far as I can diagnose what is happening in the world today—I may be wrong; they can correct me if I am wrong—I do not believe that there has been what our C.C.F. friends would term a socialist government in the world that has solved the unemployment problem. The only governments that have actually solved the unemployment problem have been the extreme socialist states, those that are behind the iron curtain, or the national socialists of Germany previous to the war. Those are the only governments I know of that have been able to do it. What I say is, it is not a matter necessarily of solving the unemployment problem. It should not be looked upon as being a problem; it should be looked upon as being an accomplishment that we have been able to reach such a vast stage of production with the least amount of work. It should be an accomplishment to be able to take the sweat and the toil from the backs of our workers. It should be an accomplishment, if we can produce an abundance with five hours' work a day instead of eight hours' a day or a forty-hour week. That should be an accomplishment, but instead it is a problem.

The problem of course is income. We in this group claim that the present functioning of the economic arrangement, such as we have, does not return enough money out of the process of production to buy all the goods produced; therefore incomes must be supplemented. We have been proclaiming that for many years, and that is the thesis upon which we work.

These are some preliminary observations I wanted to make, complementary to the speeches that have already been made; but I rose particularly to present another angle that is not usually referred to in the course of a debate on labour. It may be casually mentioned at times, but I should like to present this for the minister's consideration. I know his department realizes the situation and I am sure they have not been idle in doing what they can in at least trying to diagnose the problem; whether they have the remedy for it or not is another thing.

I should like to put up a plea for the older worker. That is a problem in the present-day functioning of industry in respect to labour. How often do we hear of a man of forty or forty-five or fifty coming home and saying: "Well, I do not know; but I guess I am getting too old". They do not want to employ the older man any more even though he is not particularly old as far as the numerical age is concerned. It is common talk that they do not want to employ older men any more. This is a young man's age. Well, it may be a young man's age to a large extent. I do not wish to discourage the young man at all; it is a young man's age very largely. We live in an age of speed. Our best pilots and aeronautical engineers and so forth are very largely young men. They like adventure; they are able to do it. When a man gets to be thirty-five or so he cannot fly with the same precision as he used to. That is the claim, and there may be something in it. I am not saying it is not very largely a young man's age. But, after all, if you take all the older brains out of our modern civilization I do not think there will be very much left to run it. However, there appears to be that idea abroad. It is largely a mental condition that even management in industry has adopted. They believe that the younger man can do more than the older man. They fear that there are certain obstacles in the way of the full use of our older workers. I think it is largely developed by a mental prejudice rather than anything else.

That mental prejudice can be broken down into three thoughts that I believe will hardly bear investigation. The first one is that the older worker is not readily adaptable to learning new techniques in a rapidly developing age. The second is that absenteeism is a problem and that absenteeism is found largely among older people because accidents are more frequent or perhaps sickness is more frequent. That idea could be exploded. The third is that age brings a sort of slow-down and lessens production. I believe that all these three ideas can be exploded when they are looked into and analysed.

As I said, I do not believe these prejudices are well-founded. The danger of these prejudices remaining in the minds of management is that they prejudge the situation rather than investigate it seriously.

I should like to put on the record some thoughts. One authority has said that a man of sixty may be as young, as vigorous and vital as the average man of forty. I want to quote from a reference to the ageing process by Dr. Edward J. Sheglitz, a leading American geriatrician, who says:

> The changes which come are not all decline. I think there is a general opinion that it is all downhill. Speed of reaction does diminish; but endurance increases in certain capacities.

[Mr. Hansell.]

> It is not without significance that the records for all the sprints are held by youngsters but the marathon records are held by men 38 to 45 and have been for many years. Endurance of a certain type, for the long, slow grind, the continuous type of labour operation, increases. As speed declines, skill declines, judgment increases. The mental changes are not all decline either. There is some depreciation in the ability to learn but it is extraordinarily less than the average person assumes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is another quotation from Dr. Nathan W. Shock, chief of the cardiovascular diseases and gerontology section of the United States public health service:

> It should be pointed out that no differences in efficiency in the performance of moderate work are observed between the ages of 17 and 71 years. This finding is of considerable importance since most work of an industrial nature falls within the classification of "moderate work".

Now, Mr. Chairman, in taking the matter of the adaptability of age to new techniques I think experience has to a large extent given the lie to that old saying "You cannot teach an old dog new tricks". As somebody said, "You can teach old dogs new tricks if the old dog wants to learn and if the teacher is smarter than the dog."

The psychological research department of Columbia University, which dealt with the mental ability of several hundred test cases of older workers, found that the intellectual power to learn does not change between the ages of 20 and beyond 70, and we are told that in this same investigation by Columbia University which dealt with the efforts of a class of 300 to learn the Russian language, there was no significant difference between the ages with respect to their ability to learn.

Now, let us deal for a moment with the accident frequency and the absenteeism rate as age increases. I do not think I need labour the point by argumentation but I do wish to put on the record a table which was devised by the bureau of labour statistics, a branch of the United States government. This analysis was published three or four years ago and perhaps, Mr. Chairman, in order to save time I might have the consent of the committee to put this table on the record. It covers only about a dozen items and it would save time, and figures are laborious in any event.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member permission to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hansell: The table is as follows:

| Age Group | Absenteeism per 100 work days | Non-disabling injuries per million work hours |
|---|---|---|
| All age groups | 3·4 | 980 |
| Under 20 years | 5·5 | 1,230 |
| 20-24 years | 4·9 | 1,500 |
| 25-29 years | 4·3 | 1,560 |
| 30-34 years | 3·6 | 1,420 |
| 35-39 years | 3·4 | 1,240 |
| 40-44 years | 3·5 | 1,050 |
| 45-49 years | 3·4 | 990 |
| 50-54 years | 3·3 | 740 |
| 55-59 years | 2·8 | 630 |
| 60-64 years | 2·9 | 560 |
| 65-69 years | 3·3 | 430 |
| 70-74 years | 3·2 | 320 |

I do not think I need say any more, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the older workers except to suggest to the government that they might perhaps do something along the lines I have suggested. How they are going to do it is their own business, and perhaps they are already doing something along that line, but perhaps management requires to be re-educated in this matter. I do not know what procedure the government has of making suggestions to management throughout the country but I do believe they could embark on a study of this thing and present it to management throughout the country and say, "We want you to do all you can to encourage and employ older workers." After all, even though they may say, "Well, we think we are getting more out of our younger workers," the fact is that in 25 or 30 years' time the younger worker becomes the older worker.

It will certainly work to the advantage of management to recognize the abilities of the older worker. For one thing he has experience behind him, steadiness and reliability, and surely when it comes to a question of craftsmanship age is a contributing factor in the quality of such craftsmanship. You cannot learn to be a real craftsman within a few months. I know we are living in a modern age and it is surprising what can be done. I am not a craftsman, but it is surprising what I can do around my home with my little power tools, my circular saw, wood turner, and a few other things, but I do not claim to be a real craftsman. As a matter of fact, and I think the minister is well aware of this, we are not turning out the type of craftsman in Canada that they are turning out in some of the older countries. That is a well-known fact and you only have to look over your shoulder to see it.

Some of the immigrants who come from the older countries of Europe such as the Scandinavian countries, Germany, France, and others, have spent years apprenticing themselves to certain arts within the realm of labour. Even painters spend years apprenticing themselves to their craft. No one would think there was much of a job in slap dabbing a brush over a barn. But I had an experience not so long ago when one of these immigrants came to a neighbour of mine who wanted a paint job done and the immigrant said he would do it in so many hours. He said, "It will take me longer to do it than my competitor but I will guarantee that it will last longer and be a better job." My neighbour thought the matter over. He could have had the job done a little cheaper by another man who was not such an experienced painter, but he decided to pay a little more for the services of the skilled man, and when that job was completed my neighbour said to me, "Well, I did not make any mistake in having that man do the job." However, Mr. Chairman, I simply mention that in passing as an illustration.

Men can become real craftsman only by many long years of applying their hands, minds and tools to the task. I think there should be plenty of places in our industry for our older workers. My plea this afternoon is for the older worker, and when the minister comes to reply I would appreciate it if he would give the committee some idea of what the government is doing to encourage industry to keep the older worker in employment.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I have some questions on the various items but I also have a few general remarks to make, and they can probably be made at this stage. Before I go into the question of unemployment I want to call to the minister's attention one particular case. A month ago I placed on the order paper a number of questions having regard to the relationship of a company known as the R. F. Welch company with the department of immigration and the Department of Transport. Only a couple of days ago I received some correspondence from the general chairman of the brotherhood of maintenance of way employees of the Canadian National Railways with reference to a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. The general chairman says this:

> As general chairman of the brotherhood of maintenance of way employees on western lines of the Canadian National Railways, I am very much interested in the outcome of questions raised by you...in respect to the R. F. Welch company.
> We have attempted to contact the upper brackets in C.N.R. officialdom in an effort to get release from a condition which has given us great concern for years . . .
> In November, 1951,—

And I think this is the point that the minister may be interested in and may be able to do something about:

—the labour relations board certified our brotherhood as the bargaining agent for all maintenance of way employees including extra gang labourers. The C.N. has been evading the certification by transferring certain of these men over to R. F. Welch for payroll purposes in spite of the fact that the work performed is in all respects identical with that performed by other extra gangs under complete supervision of the C.N.R.

Other trade unions have called to my attention the fact that this particular company, which appears to be working very closely with both the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of Transport, has been running foul of and evading trade union practices for some time. I just wanted to call that matter to the minister's attention as a separate item.

Mr. Gregg: Will my hon. friend repeat the name of the company?

Mr. Noseworthy: The name is the R. F. Welch company.

I listened with a great deal of attention to everything the minister had to say with regard to the retraining of the unemployed. Like the minister himself, I am keenly interested in any kind of training or education. I believe—as I am sure does the minister—that any man or woman acquires a greater capacity for becoming a better citizen by reason of the fact that he or she acquires training or education in any field. The heartbreaking thing about the present situation is that it is our skilled workers in Canada today who are unemployed. My experience is that, while the unskilled jobs are being taken to a large extent by new Canadians, our own skilled and trained Canadian workers can find no jobs.

I just recall one particular instance as an example of many. It is that of a man about whom I have been writing to the minister, a man who was trained in a skill four years in the services; he drew skilled pay and was trained for that particular vocation. He had five or six years' employment with a specialized branch of the minister's own department. He took six months' specialized training at a well recognized technical institute at the department's expense. Yet he has been three or four months looking for a job and is unable to get any assistance from the minister's employment officers. That is the situation in which we find ourselves today.

While I am all for retraining—as much of it as we can get—I do not think that retraining alone is going to meet our problem. As long as the government considers that its only responsibility with regard to employment is to create an atmosphere that will be conducive to full employment instead of taking some practical measures to provide employment, we are going to have this problem before us.

There is a great deal of truth in what the hon. member for Cape Breton South said with regard to the capitalist system or the system now better known as the free enterprise system and which the government supports. I challenge the minister or any supporter of the free enterprise system to point out any prolonged period in human history during which that system has been able to maintain full employment during peacetime. We were saved from unemployment in the thirties by the war. We were saved from mounting unemployment again by Korea. Unless we can get some little war started somewhere to replace Korea, we are going to be faced with a situation of increasing unemployment.

I want to deal with something a little bit more specific because I know that, as indicated, it is beyond the minister's power to do anything about changing the system. The best he can hope for, in order to maintain employment, is that the international tension with regard to communism does not ease to the extent where we can lop about $1 billion off our defence budget. The day we cut $1 billion from the defence budget, on that day the minister's headaches will increase as will the unemployment. That is a part of the system.

There is another matter that is a bit of a worry to the unemployed. I know that we have the unemployed with us now and it looks as though we are going to have them with us in increasing numbers when the fall comes again. One thing that is causing a great deal of dissatisfaction among some of those unemployed is that, because of stringent rules with regard to unemployment insurance, many of them are unable to draw the full amount of unemployment insurance which they have built up over the years. Generally they have not been able to get the requisite number of days in the specific years to entitle them to withdraw from that fund all the credits that they have built up. Now, an unemployed man who cannot get a job, who cannot get any help from the government's employment offices, who knows that over the years he has built up a backlog of unemployment insurance and who finds that he cannot draw more than a part of that because he cannot fulfil certain rigid conditions, is not in a very happy frame of mind about it. I would suggest to the minister that some steps be taken to see if it is not possible to make provision that an unemployed man for whom a job cannot be found and who has unemployment insurance built up to his credit may be able to withdraw at least the full amount of that even though he is not able to comply with the regulations requiring a definite number of days in certain years. I think it would do something to soften the disappointment and disillusionment of some of the unemployed regarding unemployment insurance.

There is one other result of mounting unemployment that I want to bring to the minister's attention. With that, I will leave the rest of my questions for the individual items. That matter is the burden which is already falling upon local municipalities with respect to the support of employable unemployed. We are back now where we were in the 1930's when those who needed municipal relief were passed from the municipality to the provincial government, from the provincial government to the federal and back again and were given the merry-go-round treatment. Today the provincial governments say that provision for these unemployed employables is a federal matter, and generally speaking they are refusing to do anything about it.

A municipality just cannot stand by and see citizens of the municipality starve or families go without food. Consequently local taxpayers are being called upon to bear that burden which certainly should be borne by one or both of the major governments. I have two resolutions here. As a matter of fact they are copies of resolutions that were sent to the minister, and I have no doubt he is familiar with them. They were sent by the municipal council of the township of York which forms the major part of the riding of York South. They both have to do with the question of unemployment relief. The first calls upon the federal and provincial governments to get together with representatives of local governments to see if this problem cannot be ironed out before the situation becomes more desperate than it is at the present time. The resolution reads as follows:

> . . . that the provincial and federal governments be requested to arrange for the immediate holding of a further federal and provincial conference at which representatives of local governments will be permitted to be present for the consideration of a broad adjustment in the tax basis between the federal and provincial governments and local municipalities and for the purpose of finding some immediate means of relieving municipal governments from demands for increased unemployment relief, which the municipal taxpayers are unable to bear . . .

The other resolution I wish to put on the record is similar and reads as follows:

> That whereas the number of employable persons who are unemployed is increasing in number in this and other municipalities, and in most cases such persons have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits and are accordingly forced to appeal to the municipal relief department for assistance in providing food, clothing and shelter;
> And whereas the government of the province of Ontario has taken the position that relief for unemployed employables is the responsibility of the dominion government and not of the provincial government;
> And whereas the welfare departments of this and other municipalities are unable to assume the responsibility of financing the cost of relief to such unemployed employables which should be the actual responsibility of the federal and provincial governments as recommended in the interim report of the Ontario provincial-municipal relations committee;
> And whereas up to date no action has been taken by the federal and provincial governments to meet the present situation and the possibility of more serious unemployment conditions arising;
> Therefore be it resolved that the government of the Dominion of Canada be strongly urged to provide directly or through the municipalities a suitable formula to meet such situations as they arise, in order that the municipalities may be better able to cope with the problem without unduly and improperly burdening their ratepayers . . .

These are the only two matters I am going to raise on the general discussion: the question of unexhausted unemployment insurance which the unemployed are unable to draw because of the department's regulations; and the question of who is going to feed, clothe and house the unemployed employables, a matter which is becoming more serious every day to industrial municipalities. If the minister will make some comment on these matters we will appreciate it.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I rise with some apprehension to speak on the estimates of the labour department inasmuch as approximately a week ago a small but determined delegation met with the Minister of Labour and officials of his department and the unemployment insurance commission. May I express to the Minister of Labour and the heads of his department on behalf of the members of the delegation their thanks for and appreciation of the wonderful reception they were given by the minister and his officials, their attentiveness, and the time they spent in listening to the problem that they presented at that time. However, they did not go away with any assurance except that the minister promised, and has followed up his promise, that close contact would be maintained with the Oshawa unemployment insurance commission so that if the unemployment situation there becomes any more serious than it is at the present time some action will be taken by the department in order to meet the situation. This was appreciated.

Nevertheless no definite policy was expressed by the government for the purpose of alleviating unemployment. When I listened some few months ago to the six-day debate on unemployment that took place in the house it struck me that the government was rather uninterested, and at that time seasonal unemployment was given as the reason or excuse for the situation. I am amazed that the government did not take any action at that time to show that they were willing to look for some solution in order to forestall any further increase in unemployment in Canada. I do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to discuss unemployment generally as it affects all of Canada. My prime interest is in the area that I represent, and particularly the area under the jurisdiction of the unemployment insurance commission office located in Oshawa.

In April of this year there were 3,443 unemployed registered in that office, and a month later in May there were 3,961. A year ago at the same time there were 1,519, so from this it can be seen that the increase is close to 160 per cent as compared with a year ago. As of April 15 of this year some 670 unemployed were removed from the list for supplementary benefits. What has happened to those people seems to be a mystery, because they seem to have disappeared. Thank heavens, not too many of them have gone on the relief rolls of the city of Oshawa, but that is no guarantee that they might not do so before too long.

I am saying these things, and repeating what has been presented to the minister by this delegation, simply for the record because the matter is serious enough that it should be emphasized over and over again in order to impress the government with the situation as it is now. During these discussions the question arises as to who is responsible for unemployment. In certain quarters there seems to be some doubt. The responsible labour organizations of this country have stated that unemployment is the problem of the federal government, and with that I concur. However, the government seems to feel that it is a sort of combined provincial and federal responsibility, and that the provincial governments should take the initial step in bringing to the attention of the federal government the seriousness of the problem in a particular province or a particular area in that province.

Neither the municipal nor the provincial governments, Mr. Chairman, can exert control over the causes of unemployment, which are, of course, economic. Only the federal government is in a position to exert control over these economic and financial policies. Canada has always depended, and will probably continue to depend for many years to come, upon foreign trade to maintain a level of economic activity that will guarantee a high employment scale. Only the federal government is in a position to influence even slightly our position in this respect. Only the federal government can regulate national financial and tariff policies or exert any control over other factors in Canada's economic picture that have a bearing on unemployment.

I maintain, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the responsibility for measures to offset or relieve unemployment must be laid mainly at the door of the federal administration. Unemployment, because of the complexity of the whole economic structure in the modern world, is a federal and not a local responsibility. It should be recognized as such. It is the federal, and not the provincial or municipal administrations that shape national policy, which is the main factor in determining employment or unemployment.

I should like now to take up the matter of unemployment insurance. Since its inception in 1940, unemployment insurance has been a great help to the working people in Canada. It is quite true that in the early stages of unemployment insurance, the rules and benefits had to be more or less rigid in order to build up the fund sufficiently to maintain its solvency. Since that time, although there have been some inroads into the fund, jobless insurance has stood up very well. We find that on March 31, 1954, the unemployment insurance fund stood at $881,274,000, compared with $851,585,000 for the same day in 1953. This represents a gain of nearly $30 million during that period.

There have been certain amendments made to this act since it was first introduced that have benefited many of the people affected by the act. First of all, there was an increase in the benefits from a maximum of $21 for a person with a dependent to $24. There was also an amendment which allowed a person who was in receipt of benefits from the unemployment insurance fund, and who during that period of time became ill, to continue drawing unemployment insurance benefits. Then, there was a reduction by three in the number of waiting days, and that was also a step in the right direction. Previously the waiting period had been eight days, which meant that there were nine non-compensable days at the beginning of the benefit period, since the first day in any period of unemployment is non-compensatory.

The reduction of the waiting period from eight days to five days meant that the initial non-compensable period was reduced from nine days to six.

Now, these amendments were very welcome additions to the act. The minister told the unemployment delegation which appeared before him a week ago, and myself, that the unemployment insurance commission was reviewing the benefit structure of the act. I am sure he is unable to divulge information in that respect because the review is probably still in progress at this time. May I make some observations and perhaps some recommendations which may be considered in connection with that review of the Unemployment Insurance Act. There have been various submissions made by labour organizations that have appeared before the government this year to the effect that a higher bracket of benefits should be instituted because there are people who are earning over $48 a week. These labour bodies also recommended that the present maximum should be increased from $24 to $40. I believe it could be left to the minister and those associated with him in the review of the act whether it is done in that way or whether it is done on a percentage basis.

I feel, however, that some substantial increase should be made because of the fact that in certain areas in Canada employees are earning wages that enable them to build up commitments in connection with their family life. Certainly the maximum of $24 at the present time is barely sufficient to pay for the board of a family consisting of a man, his wife, and possibly three or four children. Definitely it does not permit the head of the family to carry out the commitments of insurance or the commitments of a mortgage, as well as the few luxuries that we feel Canadians are proud to possess and should have at their disposal.

To my mind it should be increased on a percentage basis possibly to the extent of two-thirds, in a manner somewhat similar to the way in which the Ontario compensation board establishes its rates when a person meets with an accident in a plant.

Consideration should also be given to a longer minimum period of benefit for which a claimant may qualify. It is considered that the maximum period of approximately a year should be sufficient for the normal occurrence of unemployment. But there is some concern for the worker who is eligible for only the minimum period of six weeks, as he may be facing a period of unemployment of longer duration.

I feel that the waiting period should be eliminated altogether. At the present time it is six days. A person who is laid off one day should, in my opinion, become eligible immediately to draw his benefits as of the following day. As it is at the present time, a person who has been laid off must register at the unemployment insurance office, and the waiting period commences from the day of registration. Let us consider the case of a person laid off one day and who, through some misfortune, is unable to register at the unemployment insurance office on the following day. It may be that he is called out of town on a matter of urgency, and may be away for a week. Upon his return he registers, but can draw insurance only from the date of registration. Because of the misfortune that has befallen someone in his family he has not had time to register, and is forced to lose the time he was away. I repeat that in my view a person should be eligible for unemployment insurance from the day following his lay-off or termination of employment.

Regarding the supplementary benefits, the period of time is set aside from October to March. From the experience of a few years it is felt in all circles who are interested in this matter that this should be extended from October to June, inclusive. I would bring to the attention of the minister the case of a married woman covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act. As an example we will consider the married woman who is employed in one municipality and who, through necessity, must move to another. She is not eligible for the benefits of unemployment insurance until she has worked 90 days in the new location, in order to establish her qualifications. I say this penalty of 90 days should not be imposed, and that such a person should be eligible for unemployment insurance as though she had not moved from the original locality.

Let us consider the case of a single girl who is employed and eligible for unemployment insurance. She gets married and leaves her employment. Under the present act she is unable to draw unemployment insurance unless she obtains employment and works at it for 90 days. I feel that this penalty should be eliminated.

Then there is the person who is employed and is laid off, and who under the present act is eligible for unemployment insurance. But if that person is fired from his job—and there may be various circumstances under which a person is fired, through no fault of his own—under the act he is penalized for a period of six weeks before he can make application for unemployment insurance.

I shall not take up further time of the committee, because within the next few days we are most anxious to get as much done as possible. I did feel however that it would be proper for me to rise at this time and bring these matters, which I feel are important, to the attention of the minister. I would hope that he would give some heed to these recommendations, and that at least a portion of them might be included in the amendments to come before the house at the next session for purposes of review and implementation.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, I doubt if the usual benign look on your face would continue at this time in the session were I to respond to the invitation extended to me by the honourable and amiable member from Cape Breton South. I am not disposed to quarrel with him when he describes as a model 1903 Ford the machine the government is attempting to operate, but I fail to recognize the brilliance of the 1954 Cadillac that was supposed to emerge from my hon. friend's criticism of the government.

However, I have risen today to remind the minister of a promise he made. And, incidentally, before I proceed further, I would be delighted to engage in offering a description of socialism at any time. And if the hon. member wants a definition now I could give him one. I must say, though, that it does not entirely suit him.

Mr. Gillis: Perhaps I could give four others to offset it.

Mr. Michener: I dare say. I find some difficulty in associating socialism with the hon. member, on many occasions.

On May 20, as reported at page 4901 of Hansard, I asked the minister the following question, which is directly related to that discussed today by hon. members:

> Does the government consider it to be the responsibility of the municipalities or the provincial governments to provide maintenance for a large number of those unemployed who are able and willing to work at this time but who cannot find employment and whose unemployment insurance benefits have run out?

Very properly the minister indicated that he would treat the question as a notice.

On the following day, when the question was repeated by the hon. member for Hamilton West, the minister said this, as reported at page 4950 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I think the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for St. Paul's is a matter which affects government policy and which could not be dealt with during the short question and answer period in the house. As I mentioned yesterday in response to another question, I shall be glad to discuss the matter when my estimates come before the house during the next few days.

"The next few days" have arrived. The minister is asking the committee to vote supply for his department, and I suggest it is up to him to indicate government policy and his department's views with respect to this very important and urgent question.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, there are two or three items I wish to bring to the attention of the minister before this vote carries. On two different occasions when dealing with labour problems I have drawn to the minister's attention what I consider one of the primary problems not only of labour and management but of Canadians generally.

I think that Canadians are a bit worried about the recurrence of industrial strife. Probably this is a case of fools rushing in where angels fear to tread, but it does seem to me that some method must eventually be found to overcome this difficulty. In all other human relations courts are set up to deal with disputes between man and man. It would seem to me that if the proper, wise justices were selected some of this industrial strife would be done away with.

On other occasions I have suggested to the minister that an increasing number of firms throughout Canada and the United States have adopted the profit-sharing plan. I am not going to go into that again. The very fact that more and more firms are turning to that type of arrangement, under which labour in the factory is a partner in the firm, as it were, indicates its popularity. If the company has a successful year, labour also has a successful year. I am just going to take this opportunity to highlight, as it were, one of the most successful plans, namely, that of the Dofasco Company. I am going to read just a little from their report:

> For the benefit of non-fund members, the plan is an agreement between the company, the fund members and the trustees under which each member saves 5 per cent of his salary or wage each year up to $5,000 (a total maximum saving of $150 per year) and the company on its part agrees to pay in not less than 10 per cent of its net earnings and not more than four times the fund members' saving. In practice, the share of profits has always exceeded the minimum and for the last two years has come close to the maximum. The plan is open to all full-time Dofasco employees who have been with the company continuously for three or more years and so far no one eligible has refused to join.
> The fund has grown from a modest beginning in May of 1938, with about 750 members, to its present size with about 2,500 members and assets of $13 million.

That in itself points out some of the benefits, how production can be increased and how the cost of the product can be decreased to the consumer and at the same time the labourer in that particular industry benefit from his services.

I should now like to quote from a recent issue of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce magazine:

In the recent submission to the ministers of finance and national revenue by the executive council of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce prior to the last budget, the executive pointed out that "the present basis of taxing deferred profit sharing plans . . . subjects the employee to tax on the contributions made to the plan by the employer, and also on the earnings of the plan at the time such contributions are made or such earnings accrued, although the employee does not receive such moneys until some later date and in some instances may never receive them. The submission suggested that the beneficiaries, under a deferred profit sharing plan, be taxed when they receive the actual benefits.

That submission is a good one, and one that the minister might recommend to his colleagues as an important incentive to other firms in Canada to consider introducing this type of profit-sharing plan.

Other speakers have said something about the unemployment situation. The latest figures indicate that there are almost twice as many unemployed now as there were a year ago at this time. During the early part of this session considerable emphasis was laid on the fact that it was seasonal. I do not think you can answer the criticisms now by saying that it is seasonal. Other factors are involved. In my estimation one of the biggest factors is that inflation has helped to price Canadian products out of many world markets. There is also the fact that a large number of Canadian people are in receipt of less money. They have less money to spend, especially those who are on short time, and more especially farmers whose incomes have been greatly reduced, regardless of what the Minister of Agriculture may wish to say to the contrary.

Let me go back to the budget. It did not do anything to relieve the situation so far as labour is concerned. There was no reduction in taxation to relieve the low income groups to any great extent, and consequently their purchasing power, as I mentioned before, has not been augmented so far as the budget was concerned.

I should like to mention another matter. I realize it is not a federal matter in a sense. It has to do with the workmen's compensation acts, not only of the province of Ontario but of other provinces. My suggestion is that a three-man medical board should rule on questions of dispute as to whether a man is eligible for assistance under the workmen's compensation act or not. In some cases arbitrary rulings are made. An independent medical board might find differently and would give the labourer the benefit of the doubt, as it were, to improve relations between labour on the one hand and the administration of the workmen's compensation on the other. If this independent board brought in a report it would be respected and it would improve relations. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to make a few brief remarks on this first item. First of all, I should like to say I sympathize in every respect with the minister, because he has had a particularly difficult time this year owing to the world economic situation generally. It would be a particularly difficult situation for anyone in the minister's position.

There seems little doubt that unemployment has been on the increase this year over last year. I do not mean to reiterate what has already been said. A certain amount of it has been seasonal, but the facts would indicate that unemployment at this period of the year, as compared with the same period last year, is considerably greater. In this regard I refer to an item on the front page of the London Free Press of Wednesday, June 23, of this year. I quote as follows:

Informants said that at May 27 about 336,000 persons were registered for work with national employment service. This was down from 549,000 at April 15, the last figure made public in the government's monthly labour surveys.

However, it was still more than 60 per cent higher than the 202,000 in late May of 1953. At that time, though, Canada's labour force was smaller.

In this regard I would also like to quote very briefly from a press notice which appeared in the Sentinel Review of Woodstock, Ontario, which indicates certain figures relative to that part of Canada. It states:

In Ingersoll, however, the situation is not as encouraging since April figures showed 210 unemployed compared with 193 at the end of May.

In other words, the number decreased slightly over the period of a month.

Benefit payments were increased from $16,000 in May, 1953, to $32,000 in May 1954.

Generally speaking, and according to what we have heard and what has been indicated in press notices, it appears that unemployment is considerably greater at this time than it was at the same time last year.

I would like to make some remarks with respect to the textile industry. It is an industry which is of considerable importance to the people of my riding as there are a great many textile workers there. The textile industry as we have heard many times in this house this session is sometimes called a depressed industry. It has suffered severely during the last few years and there have been substantial lay-offs which apparently still continue. I would like to read a paragraph from a letter I received from one of the prominent union leaders in the textile industry in the city of Woodstock, Mr. E. B. Tilford, who states:

> Harvey Knit laid off 32 people on Friday the 4th of June and 12 more on Friday the 11th so they are not so good.

He then makes further reference to other matters which are not relevant to this discussion, but his letter indicates that the textile industry is still having its difficulties. Undoubtedly the whole answer in this regard lies in the policy the government will adopt with reference to this particular industry. We all know that during the war years we had to have a textile industry for war purposes and after the war the industry was encouraged to continue production because of the great shortage of consumer material. Consequently, the textile industry continued to do fairly well immediately after the war but eventually the heavy demand for clothing, fabrics and draperies and other products of the industry fell off and many of these textile units, sometimes referred to as marginal units, found it difficult to survive in our economy.

I fully realize that raising the tariffs in this matter is not an answer because it only raises the cost, but if we are going to have any kind of textile industry at all, which can successfully compete with similar industries in countries such as Japan and India where they have very low wage rates, we are going to have to keep some sort of tariff barriers to protect the workers in this industry. It must inevitably depend on what policy the government is going to adopt and how much of the textile industry they determine we are going to keep in operation.

I think all hon. members will agree that a certain proportion of the textile industry must be retained for national defence and other purposes which are uneconomic in themselves, and indeed it may very well be that at the present time some portions of the textile industry are marginal or uneconomic, though I do not think that as yet we have the proper figures in this regard. However, the government must decide to what extent various portions of the primary and secondary textile industry can be let go, so to speak, and since this matter concerns trade and commerce as well as labour I think that before any decision is reached by the government in this regard the matter should be thoroughly examined.

There are two suggestions I would like to make to the minister. The first is with respect to unemployment generally. It seems to me that during this last winter we had a particularly unpleasant picture in Canada with a large number of persons becoming unemployed, and indeed in much larger number than we have had for many years. This, of course, was referred to as seasonal unemployment and undoubtedly it was to a large extent. However when large groups of people become unemployed it is fairly axiomatic that their purchasing power goes down and we then begin to start that long downward spiral of deflation which has the accumulative effect, like a snowball, and generally wrecks the economy.

I have heard this suggestion by a number of persons and I certainly hope the minister will look into it if he has not already done so. The suggestion is as follows: When unemployment in the country reaches a certain figure, which would have to be decided upon, and let us say for the purposes of example, 300,000 or 250,000, the amount of benefit paid for unemployment insurance be increased. The figure involved of course would have to be decided after careful study. However, this plan would have a much quicker effect in stopping this downward spiral than would the suggestion of instituting a program of public works. That plan would more quickly scotch and stop the downward spiral of so-called added deflation.

Since the geographic and climatic conditions of Canada make it almost inevitable that Canada suffer permanently from this problem of seasonal unemployment, my suggestion would be that, in order to stabilize the economy and eliminate so to speak the crest and trough of unemployment between the seasons, everyone in Canada contribute to a certain extent in overcoming this situation. Because of the climatic and seasonal conditions under which we live I do not think it is unreasonable to suggest that these fluctuations in unemployment be moderated a little possibly by some form of extra taxation. I think we will all generally agree that the economy of our country would be much better if we did not have these seasonal dips in the unemployment situation, and if the purchasing power of those temporarily out of work on a seasonal basis could be kept up so that the economic effects all the way down the line would be considerably lessened.

With respect to the textile industry generally there is a brief suggestion I would like to make. If a large industry employing large numbers of persons such as the textile industry is to be dislocated as a matter of national policy on a permanent basis then it hardly seems fair that all those persons employed in that industry be thrown out of work at once. In other words, if the government takes the view that in our trading relations with other countries such as Japan we will have to buy something from them in return for their buying our agricultural products—and that is the line of reasoning I have often heard expressed—and that in the national interest they should dislocate an industry such as the textile industry, which was encouraged and built up during the war in some cases on an artificial basis, then large numbers will be thrown out of work.

I think that will be unfair for two reasons. First of all it is very unfair to those people from a personal point of view so far as their families are concerned and because it will cause great hardship. From a broader economic point of view, it naturally tends to dislocate the economy of the country if a large number of people are thrown out of work all at once. I think there will be little argument about that statement.

If it is found necessary not to protect the textile industry or any other industry that might get into a similar situation by additional tariffs or something of that nature, and if it seems necessary to allow a portion or even a large part of this industry to go by the boards, so to speak, and to go out of business, then in the interests of the persons employed in the industry, I think something should be done for them. If an industry is allowed to go by the board, to coin a phrase, in the national interest I think everyone in the country should share a proportion of that burden and that it should not fall just on those who are employed in that particular industry.

It might mean some sort of small tax levy, but until these people who are out of a job because of national economic policy can find other employment I think that under these circumstances the benefits to these people should be raised. The situation is no fault of their own. It is a matter of national policy in a particular industry. I know that the minister will probably say, "In a broad sense, that might apply to any industry", and that the national policy might occasionally hit one industry from time to time. That is true. I would not make that suggestion in a general way. But when you get one industry that has been built up to a large size and is a large employer of persons, and when as a permanent policy some portion of that industry is going to be put out of commission, so to speak, in my opinion those persons who are out of a job because of this policy should be given, until they can be re-absorbed, a higher rate of unemployment benefit. I agree that—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think now possibly the hon. member can make himself heard.

Mr. Nesbitt: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I should like also to suggest in this regard something to which I know the minister is himself sympathetic. When an industry is dislocated, as the textile industry is, quite possibly a scheme such as that which I have heard has been started in Marysville—which I believe is in the minister's constituency; it is a scheme of retraining people who have been in this industry—might be implemented. I think that is an excellent suggestion. But while these people are being retrained, I think they should draw these somewhat increased benefits I have suggested because it is a question of reallocating these particular persons from one job to another.

Also, as my colleague the hon. member for Hamilton West pointed out earlier today, this question of moving large groups of the population from one part of the country causes great expense and hardship. The textile industry, or the parts of it that are apparently marginal and are going out of business, are often located in communities in which there is only one industry. I suppose that is the situation in the towns in the Ottawa valley, one in the minister's constituency and many others. The textile industry often seems to be located in small villages and towns. If the people of these places are going to be permanently out of work, and even if they are paid some unemployment benefits or something along that line at a rate higher than that at which they are now paid, and even if they are retrained, the job of moving those people from one centre of population to another where they can get future employment is going to be an expensive one.

If people are forced to move because of this national policy, I feel that possibly some percentage of their expenses ought to be contributed to by the government which, of course, is the people of Canada. As I said before, if things of this nature are done for the benefit in the long run of the people of Canada, everybody should contribute his small share and we should not just make a certain percentage of the population suffer.

I know the minister will likely say that it is not the intention of the government to try to create ghost towns out of some of these textile towns that may have to go and that they hope that the people can be retrained and find new jobs in those communities. Nevertheless, there will be a large number of persons who, as a result of the present textile situation, will have to move in the long run; and, as I have said, I feel that those persons should have a part of their moving expenses contributed to.

Mr. Gregg: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to acknowledge the tolerant and helpful tone in which the speakers this afternoon have presented their views on the general item of my estimates. With very few exceptions, all of those who have spoken so far have mentioned one item. If the hon. member for Hamilton West will not consider me discourteous, I should like to deal with that item first. I may say that she also mentioned it. I refer to the responsibility, as it has been called, for the welfare of the unemployed employables. Much has been said about that matter.

However, I think there are several things that should be said again. One of them is this. The so-called offer or the agreement, as it has been called in some cases, of 1945 was never in reality crystallized into an agreement. I think all hon. members will agree with that statement. That being so, there have been many things that have happened since. One of those things has been the setting up of the federal-provincial tax arrangements. Those arrangements have been made in the light of the fact that there was no agreement on the offers and counter-offers that were put forward and were left in the air in 1945. I think that situation should be made clear because I am quite certain—as some hon. members have indicated this afternoon—that those representing some municipalities in this country have felt quite sincerely that there was a crystallization of responsibility at that time when, in reality, there was not.

That being true, a great many other things have happened since that time. It was on the basis that no responsibility had been assumed there by the federal government definitely for the unemployed employables—except for unemployment insurance which I will go into in a moment—that the federal taxpayers, through the federal government, assumed some responsibility for the costs of what we used to call the unemployed unemployables, namely, older people over 70. As a second step this year the unemployed unemployables came partly within the scope of the federal field through the bill brought in by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

There is one other statement that should also be made. I think it will be agreed by all hon. members here that the federal government should not go out to the municipalities and make individual arrangements with those municipalities on these matters without the knowledge, or without the request or the concurrence of the province in which those municipalities exist. I think every one of our provinces has a minister of municipal affairs. Certainly this province has one, and my own province has one. I believe the minister of municipal affairs for this province represents a constituency not so far from here. As has been mentioned this afternoon, during the past winter when representatives of municipal governments and trade unions came here and interviewed members of the cabinet, the Minister of Labour and his officials and presented their briefs, it was found that practically all of them came from the province of Ontario. I can state this afternoon that as far as I know no representations were made during this past winter or spring by the province of Ontario to the federal government on behalf of those municipalities that have presented their case.

In his remarks the hon. member for St. Paul's kindly reminded me of a promise which I had made. Following what I have just said, I should like to tell him that I did not forget the promise. I will not say that the notes I made afterwards would answer his question fully, but nevertheless I should like to refer to it, and in so doing perhaps I might be considered as having referred to all the questions that have been put forward this afternoon on the subject of the responsibility of municipal, provincial and federal governments in respect of unemployment assistance.

My colleagues, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance and others, have said on earlier occasions in this session and others that since the passage of the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1940 the federal government has accepted the responsibility for developing and administering that act for the protection of the welfare of the fit workers of Canada. As part of that responsibility the coverage of the act has been gradually extended from time to time. The effort to extend the coverage is continuing, and at the present time an attempt is being made to bring in other groups. It was also said this afternoon that the financial cost involved when workers of Canada are unemployed should devolve upon the federal treasury. I contend that that is true at the present time because in addition to contributing $32 million during the calendar year 1953, or one-sixth of the total paid into the unemployment insurance fund, the federal government has assumed full responsibility for the administration of the unemployment insurance program and the national employment service at a cost of $25 million a year.

In other words, during the last fiscal year federal taxpayers paid a total of $57 million for the purpose of protecting the fit workers of Canada against hardship when they are unemployed. So far as I know, during recent years the contribution of most of the provincial governments and municipalities toward assistance of the unemployed employables has been relatively light. In some cases provincial governments have decided to turn over this responsibility to the municipalities, and in those instances no provincial expenditures have been incurred during recent years.

In addition to unemployment insurance, the federal government has increased substantially assistance extended through other social security and related measures in the last ten years. I am not going to deal with them in detail this afternoon because members of the committee know what has been done through the federal treasury. When I spoke at the beginning of the unemployment debate in February I indicated then that no representations had been made by provincial governments that they were unable to cope with the situation in their provinces, and the same holds true today. We have received no such request, and I should like to repeat that we regard unemployment as a matter of concern to all levels of government. It is not the exclusive worry of any one level, and we feel it can only be dealt with satisfactorily by co-operative action by all concerned.

Several other matters were referred to by other members. One of them concerned the retraining of unemployed persons under an agreement known by the department as schedule M for the training of unemployed persons. The hon. member for Hamilton West rather implied that the only place the Minister of Labour had put that into effect was in his own province. I can tell her that it was put into effect quickly in my own province to help to relieve the difficulty in the textile industry because the provincial government was on the mark and was ready with a plan to propose to the Minister of Labour who was happy to put it into effect under schedule M, for which he already had received authority.

There again I can say to her, without wanting to be insistent, without wanting to be impertinent, that because of the large number of representations we have had from the province of Ontario this year we have suggested to the government of Ontario that we would be willing to co-operate under schedule M within the province, but up to this time they have not entered into an agreement.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is it not so that there is an entirely different arrangement in the province of Ontario entered into by the Ontario industrial and educational council and the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and that a new ten-year agreement was drawn up this year?

Mr. Gregg: Between the provincial government and the federal government?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Gregg: No, there has been no agreement drawn up under schedule M.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, but this does away with the necessity for operating under schedule M, does it not? It is a complicated agreement, and I understand it expired this year and that a new ten-year agreement was drawn up.

Mr. Gregg: We have had no application from the government of Ontario for matching dollars for the training of fit unemployed workers. As I indicated in my opening remarks, the estimates envisage extending that field if the provinces are prepared to do so and if it is felt that assistance can be given in the provision of greater skills for the individual, thus assisting in helping to solve unemployment to that extent in the particular vicinity as well as adding to the sum total of skilled personnel in Canada.

I agree with everything the hon. member for Hamilton West said regarding apprenticeship training. The total number registered as of March 31 this year was 12,900, but that is not nearly enough. It is a field of training which is of the utmost importance, but I am sure that the hon. member will agree that it is again a field where the federal government cannot impose its will. We have a very capable, active and aggressive voluntary committee working on the matter, and I believe management and organized labour are coming to realize more and more the importance of apprenticeship training.

With all that has been said this afternoon regarding older workers, I agree. I should like to reassure the committee that not only in the Department of Labour but elsewhere we are doing everything we can to encourage the employment of older workers. The government itself through the civil service commission has set an example this year, I believe, in the retention of older workers for a longer period than formerly, and through the civil service commission has perhaps cast a slightly more friendly eye on applicants who are no longer young.

The hon. member for Macleod referred to the suggestion that is made that older workers are unable to learn new techniques. I can assure him that is a prejudice that has been proved to be wrong. As to absenteeism, the attendance to their work of older workers has proved to be much higher than that of younger workers. The charge has also been made that the use of older workers means a lessening of production, but that is not true.

In connection with this matter some of the members of the committee may have noted that the Canadian Manufacturers Association has conducted a very broad based survey during the last few months, the results of which were incorporated in a recent issue of their magazine. The subject of older workers and the matter of seasonal unemployment were brought forward at their convention, and are the top items on their agenda not only for study but for carrying on experiments within certain parts of Canada.

My hon. friend referred to the Government Employees Compensation Act. This act, as she said, is a co-ordinating act and the benefits arising out of it to federal employees come under the province in which the federal employee happens to be. The amendments to it were pretty well administrative and routine. There was some difference of opinion as to whether the amount accruing to a federal employee who, for instance, was injured in British Columbia when his place of employment was in Ottawa should receive payment through Ontario or British Columbia. I can tell her it is my intention to bring this forward as soon as these kinks are ironed out. I made a reference to the women's bureau in my opening remarks.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said there were going to be tough years ahead. I hope they are not going to be as tough as he indicated. He also stated that the hon. member for Hamilton West and I were on the same team. For my part, I am quite satisfied with that.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister noticed that I disclaimed that.

Mr. Gregg: I noticed my hon. friend did not brag about it.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South brought up two points, one of which was specifically related to Cape Breton and concerned a very important group of men. I am going to tell him here and now, without taking up the time of the committee, that following the end of this session, which I hope will be very soon, we will investigate that matter once more.

Mr. Gillis: I might say the section of the act to which I referred could apply in that way in any part of Canada in which similar circumstances arose.

Mr. Gregg: As the hon. member knows, under the act we have not only the commission but umpires and other bodies, so we will have the appropriate people take a new look at the situation before the new holiday period rolls around. The same remarks apply to his second point with regard to the Moncton office recruiting workers for the north. I believe the same remarks apply to the third point as well.

In so far as the hon. member's last point is concerned, I could not agree with him more. Perhaps I should not say so, but I feel that since the greater portion of Nova Scotia is now to be tied together at last by the Canso causeway I would hope before too long there might be a vocational school located there.

The hon. member for Macleod asked what the government was doing in connection with the older worker. If I may I am going to send him along a copy, not of a speech I made but of a report that was made to me on that subject. I am sure it will answer the questions he had in mind. We are really doing something worth while in that connection. The value that is being brought about lies in the fact that employers and trade unions are more and more recognizing the facts that the hon. member for Macleod brought forth, that is the problems arising out of the longer life expectancy today and people who have nothing to do getting fed up with life. Therein lies the hope for providing more useful employment for the older people and thus adding to the productivity of the country.

The hon. member for York South referred to the matter concerning the R. F. Welch company. I will look into that. I should like to refute completely the remark which my hon. friend made when he said that unless we get a little war we are going to have terrible times. I do not think my hon. friend really believed that. In spite of the sympathy that was passed on to the Minister of Labour this afternoon, I would rather see success at Geneva and a peaceful world established by some means or other than have whatever value there may be from the superficial employment that comes from expenditure of money to be blasted away in the air.

The hon. member for Ontario, as well as others, proposed some amendments to the act. It was suggested that there could be a rearrangement of the benefits that might be of value during another serious period. I can tell the committee that even though the session is nearly over and even though we are approaching summer, my department is taking a very serious and continuous look at this act in the light of experience gained during the past winter. I believe that we will all agree that this last winter is the first time anything approaching a severe test of the effectiveness of the Unemployment Insurance Act has occurred.

I shall admit at once that the total number of unemployed has been large. I can admit, too, that the government has been greatly concerned and I can assure the committee that steps are being taken to guard against hardships in the future, just as I hope the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act has softened the really heavy sting of hardship during the seasonal unemployment of this past winter.

Mr. Noseworthy: Before the committee takes recess, may I say that I would not want the minister to get the impression that I advocated another little war, nor would I want him to give the impression on the record that I did so. My statement was that wars have saved us from unemployment in the past and that unquestionably a little war would save us from unemployment now as long as the capitalist system remains in vogue.

Mr. Gregg: I admit at once that I knew my hon. friend was not advocating war. I believe he knew that I did not understand him as saying that. I should like to say again, with regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Middlesex East, that that is a really constructive suggestion. He has made it before. This afternoon he said that everything possible should be done to encourage the profit sharing plan in industry as a method of working towards industrial peace. However, the federal government cannot impose such a plan.

Mr. Drew: There is one subject with which I wish to deal in connection with this item, Mr. Chairman. It will take me less than five minutes. If there is not going to be further discussion, then perhaps we could deal with this item if that is satisfactory to the committee.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drew: I wish to deal with the statement made by the minister growing out of the remarks in regard to responsibility for unemployment in the municipalities. The minister in seeking to correct impressions that have been conveyed made statements that are directly contrary to the record.

He was referring to a statement that had been made about the problems of the municipalities. He in some measure brushed aside the seriousness of that situation. But I would point out that as recently as June 9 representatives of 900 municipalities meeting in Windsor were agreed that unemployment now is serious, and that the question of unemployment relief for the municipalities is critical in many cases. They urged that the government recognize this fact and that it do something about it.

The minister explained that the difficulty arose out of certain discussions in 1945. Without attempting to quote his exact words he said there were certain proposals put forward and that the proposals put forward and the conditions submitted were not agreed to, and that therefore the discussions ended. They did not end in 1945. Those discussions began on August 6, 1945, and they continued on different occasions until the adjournment on May 6, 1946. There was no refusal at any time, as the record shows, of the proposals put forward by the federal government nor was there on the other hand a refusal of the proposals put forward alternatively by the provincial governments.

If the record is examined—and there is a Hansard record—it will be seen that it was expected that the meeting was only adjourning and that a meeting would be called again at the instance of the federal government. The agreements that later emerged were not agreements resulting from negotiations arising from this discussion. They resulted from a statement by the minister of finance at that time, Mr. Ilsley, that the money arrangements would be made by the federal government. It was not a question of negotiation; it was a statement that this would be done. And certain provinces entered into an agreement on that basis.

The minister has said that there are substantial payments going back to the municipalities. That is true. But, Mr. Chairman, I mention this to put on record the fact that there is only one reason this conference did not continue and that was the failure of the dominion government to reconvene the conference which adjourned on May 6, 1946. It is difficult to imagine how much greater concentration of taxation is needed before the federal government will deal with the problem.

It now is getting the major proportion of all taxes in Canada. How much farther does it have to go before it can deal with this matter of employable unemployed or unemployable unemployed which today gives so much concern to the municipalities, as is indicated by the resolution passed at Windsor early this month?

I leave that subject now. Referring back to certain statements I have made before, if the minister thinks—and I hope he does—that it would be advisable to have some discussions as to the way in which this could be dealt with, and so as to meet the arguments I have put forward in asking for a conference between the federal and provincial governments, and to meet the conditions that the mayors and reeves from 900 municipalities in Ontario have placed on record, then I say the way to do it, the way to lay the foundation for the solution of this problem is to have a conference right away between the federal and provincial governments, not merely to discuss constitutional problems but to discuss this extremely important problem which today is particularly unfair in its application to municipalities right across Canada.

Item agreed to.

178. To provide for expenses of the economics and research branch, $528,366.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question with respect to item 178, which has to do with the economics and research branch. As a matter of fact, a great many very useful statistics are available from this branch, but there is one set of figures that I believe is not available. I understand figures are kept showing the number of man-hours lost per year due to industrial disputes of one kind or another. But so far as I can ascertain, there are no figures showing the number of man-hours lost due to sickness or accident. I wonder if it is possible to have statistics kept on that point.

Mr. Gregg: I agree with my hon. friend that they have not been available. But may I take that as a suggestion for consideration during the summer recess.

Mrs. Fairclough: Are we not going to adjourn? It is ten minutes after six.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that we carry through the dinner hour, or that I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Harris: I think hon. members opposite would like to have a short time to get ready for some further questioning of the minister. However I do not think there are any further questions on this item. Perhaps we could carry it, and then adjourn.

Mrs. Fairclough: Perhaps we could adjourn until 7.15.

Mr. Harris: I do not think that is necessary. We could adjourn until seven o'clock.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Drew.]

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

180. Fair wages, conciliation, industrial relations, industrial disputes investigations including the administration of legislation relating thereto, and for activities re promotion of co-operation in industry between labour and management, $468,714.

Mr. Knowles: Item 180 has to do, amongst other things, with the conciliation of industrial disputes. Has the Minister of Labour any comments he would care to make regarding the dispute between the railway companies and the non-operating employees?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, the representatives of management and of the unions met last Thursday, and then adjourned and met again on Tuesday afternoon. Before the meeting adjourned on Tuesday afternoon I understand that they made an arrangement that they would not at that time make any public pronouncements as to the negotiations up to that point. They having done that, consequently I cannot make any comment regarding it. All that I can say is that the ending of the meeting on Tuesday afternoon was left open to reassemble on the invitation of either of the two parties.

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate the position the minister takes in view of the meetings of last Thursday and this Tuesday between the two sides to the dispute. However, there are a few words that I should like to say. The first thing I want to say—perhaps it is unnecessary for me to say it in view of the situation but I shall say it anyway—is that I trust that the Minister of Labour will put his best brains and everything he has got into the effort to avoid this dispute resulting in a strike. I am sure it is the desire of everyone, including the employees, that there not be a strike.

Mr. Gregg: And the employers.

Mr. Knowles: The only reason I neglected to say that was that could be taken for granted. But it so happens that the employees are voting on the question as to whether or not to back up their demands by going to the length of a strike, and it is possible that they may cast an affirmative vote on that matter. That was my reason for referring to the employees, for even though they may vote for a strike they would rather not see one.

There can be no doubt that it would be disturbing to the economy of the country as a whole and disturbing to the people of Canada if there were another railway tie-up such as we had in 1950. I must say, however, that what disturbs me most about this situation is that I do not feel there is sufficient understanding of the position of the men. I refer to the non-operating employees who have presented certain demands to their employers. "Demands" happens to be the word that is used, but in my view it is of the nature of things that, with technological progress and other improvements in industry and in our economy, the workers have a right to share in that progress and in those improvements. I cannot see the logic of those who would contend that there arrives a time when workers such as our railway employees should be satisfied with what they are getting and should ask for nothing more.

Mr. Harris: Nobody in this house has said that.

Mr. Knowles: No, no one in this house has said that, but there are people in the country—

Mr. Harris: Would it not be better if you left that?

Mr. Knowles: —who express that view. I should be very glad if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration would give us the benefit of his comments on this important matter. I say I feel that the workers in this instance have been most responsible in what they have requested. As everyone knows, they have not asked for any increase in their hourly rates of pay. They have asked for a series of what are known as fringe benefits. They have asked for an increase in the number of annual holidays with pay to be granted to the workers; they have asked for a certain number of statutory holidays throughout the year; they have asked for certain sick benefits and also for certain overtime rates of pay for Sunday work.

As hon. members will recognize, in all cases these are what are known as fringe benefits. We do not know what went on at the meetings in Montreal last Thursday or the earlier part of this week, but it is a matter of public record what happened as a result of the deliberations of the board over which Mr. Justice Kellock presided a while ago.

As hon. members are aware, in addition to Mr. Justice Kellock, there were two other members of the board, one representing the railway companies and the other representing the railway employees. Nevertheless that board did not produce what might be called a proper report. It was not possible apparently for any two of them to get together on a set of conclusions. What happened was that three reports were made. That is not without significance. To me this is the disturbing feature of this whole situation, that the member of that board representing the railway companies and apparently speaking for them refused to give a single inch. His report was an uncompromising recommendation that nothing that the men were requesting be granted. On the other hand, the representative of the employees did make a report which represented a scaling down to some extent of the requests or the demands of the employees.

One does not know just what relationship exists in a situation like that, although I have been a member of such boards myself and I know a little about it. But one can assume that when the representatives of the employees suggested a settlement on the basis of a slight scaling down of those demands that that indicates a willingness on the part of the employees to enter into something of a compromise. That seems to be the situation as it stands at the moment. The companies are not prepared to move an inch, but the men are prepared to compromise.

It is because of that situation that there is a great deal of feeling about this issue amongst the employees affected, and I share their feeling. I have been in pretty close contact with these employees across the years and indeed there are a great many of them in my own constituency. I was home for a couple of days a week or so ago and I made contact with some of them while I was there, and I can say that the feeling about this situation is very high. The reason it is high is because of that uncompromising stand taken by the employers even in the face of the willingness of the employees to enter into some sort of compromise. One reason I say this in this House of Commons is because I hope that it may contribute to what I feel is necessary, namely, an understanding by the public of the position of the men. They do not want to suffer the loss of time and pay which will result from a strike, but they also feel, because of a situation such as that which now faces them, that they have no alternative but to back up their just and reasonable demands by the use of the only weapon that is in their hands.

When I say I hope the minister will give this matter his best attention I imagine it is already on the top of his priority list and that I do not need to say that to him. Indeed, with all the other matters that have been thrown into his lap this afternoon I do not see how he is going to have much of a holiday this summer. But I hope, if necessary, he will call in any of his colleagues who may be able to help him so that they may join with him in trying to solve this problem by giving whatever publicity is necessary to the issues in the case, I urge him to do his level best to see to it that a strike is avoided if it possibly can be, but also to see to it that justice is done to these men.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are those who will say, "Well, why should they not withdraw their demands; why should the company be asked to move in view of the financial position which they say is theirs at the present time?" Well, it is the same old story, Mr. Chairman, as I indicated a moment ago. The fact of the matter is that as time goes on we do make progress with regard to technological improvements, and the amount of wealth that can be produced with a certain amount of labour power keeps growing. The tendency is for labour always to have to put up a struggle to get its just share of that increased production of wealth in which our workers participate to such a great extent. I know there are arguments that will be put forth on the other side, but I must say that I feel very strongly for the position of the men. I think they are making very just and reasonable demands and I hope that a solution will be found that will make it unnecessary for them to go out on strike, but which at the same time will do justice to the men and will give them a larger share of the wealth they are producing, which they are asking for not in any increase in hourly rates of pay but in these other social benefits which in my view they thoroughly deserve.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had to say and with some of his remarks I concur. However, I must say, having taken part myself in labour negotiations, that I realize full well there is a time when it becomes a matter of saving face on both sides of the fence. The negotiator who can produce a formula by which the two factions can come together and from which each of them can be content with the report which they take back to their individual factions is going to be the person who saves the day.

But it looks very much as though we are headed for an impasse in this particular matter. I do not think so myself, I think we are probably remote from the time when we will reach that stage. But nevertheless I think that all of us should realize the weaknesses of human nature. After all, all of those people on both sides, whether on the side of management or labour, are human and they want to save face. They hate to give in to the other side and yet they realize over their better judgment that certain elements emerge that are probably unforeseen.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that this is a slim house tonight. I know that we should be considering very seriously the implications of a problem which, if it is allowed to develop, might blow up in our faces and affect all of our people in the entire Dominion of Canada. I think those of us who are here should very seriously consider what our responsibility is in that regard, and so accordingly I urge the Minister of Labour to use his influence to see to it that a conciliatory attitude is adopted by both factions in this dispute.

I have a great deal of sympathy for those people who realize the time is not ripe for a demand for an increase in wages. They know that their only hope is to get some concession in the way of fringe benefits. An absolutely adamant stand on the side of the employer is going to achieve nothing. It is only going to stiffen the backs of those who have been instructed by their union membership to make demands which have come up perhaps through the ranks, or possibly have been suggested to the rank and file of employees as reasonable demands to be made upon the employing agency.

Whatever the situation may be it boils down to a matter of conciliation, a word which has become common in our everyday life. I urge the minister to use his best offices to stop this before it goes so far that neither side can give in and still save face. I would urge him to stop it now by means of conciliation before we are forced into a position where even members of this house will have to take a stand, as they did once before, for or against an arbitrary decision. I ask the minister to do that. I think that is what every member of the committee has in mind.

Mr. Gregg: I give to the committee and to the hon. members who have spoken my complete promise that nothing will be left undone by my department or by the government to accomplish a mutually equitable solution to the problem.

Item agreed to.

182. Administration of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, $9,200.

Mr. Michener: There is one minor point I wish to raise under this item. There are votes for travelling expenses and postage but not for any personnel. The administration seems to be operating in a vacuum. I suppose the personnel who administer the act are in on the general staff of the department. Is that the answer?

Mr. Gregg: Yes. The industrial relations personnel administer the act. This item is just for the special things arising out of the expenses of the board.

Mr. Michener: May I ask the minister to give me a figure that I missed on the third item, namely, the annuities vote. What is the amount this year required to maintain the reserve under the Government Annuities Act? The last figure was for 1952-53, in the amount of $743,666. I would appreciate having the figure for the year last concluded.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member asked for what figure?

Mr. Michener: The amount required to maintain the reserve under the Government Annuities Act.

Mr. Gregg: From the statement for the year ended March 31, 1954, the transfer to maintain the reserve was $98,911.57.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: If we have reverted to the annuities item, Mr. Chairman, may I ask what is meant by security premiums, the amount of which has increased? I agree that it is a small amount, but I am rather curious as to what is meant by the term "security premiums", found at page 233, item 22, which has increased from $4,000 to $4,500.

Mr. Gregg: I understand that item is for bonding of our annuity agents.

Item agreed to.

184. Labour Gazette, authorized by Labour Department Act, $136,043.

Mrs. Fairclough: This is something that we find not only in connection with the Labour Gazette but all the way through the pattern. Every item has an increase in postage. The reason I marked this one particularly was that there was no item at all for postage last year. This year there is $400. I notice under general administration there is an increase from $15,000 to $25,000. That is quite a sizeable amount. I do not want to raise this matter on every single item of the minister's estimates but I should be greatly interested to know why these postage amounts are so stupendous this year in comparison with last year.

Mr. Gregg: I think it will be found in other departments. It is because of a ruling of the Post Office Department that my department, and the Labour Gazette in particular, have to pay for all registered mail and all special service mail. Formerly it went free.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is a very interesting point because I remember raising this matter myself on the post office estimates. I refer to the matter of having the various departments charge their postage to their expenses and credit the Post Office Department. But on looking through the estimates I notice that the other departments have not done so.

Mr. Harris: Oh, yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, no. Maybe the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has done so, but I went through the estimates today and I found a great many instances in which the amount was exactly the same as it had been in former years.

Mr. Harris: Let us take that matter up with those departments.

Mrs. Fairclough: Either it is an over-all policy or it is not an over-all policy. As a matter of fact, I personally think that it would be a good thing if every department was charged for its postage and that amount was credited to the Post Office Department. I think it would give a clearer picture of postal revenue and expenses. But I notice that, all the way through the labour estimates, this matter of postage is quite an item, with increases in some places as I have just mentioned from $15,000 to $25,000 and in other cases increases of lesser amounts. But I notice other departments also in which there is no increase whatever. If that is the explanation, I wonder whether it is government policy or whether it is not government policy.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: No. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. Harris: Since I perhaps started this argument, I might say this. I must apologize for doing so. I do not want to hold up the committee. I have not the time to go through the various estimates. I have just looked at the Department of Agriculture and I notice that it has been done there. I know my own department is now charging postage whereas it has not done so before. I daresay that if I have time I can unearth some figures that might satisfy my hon. friend. But it is the policy, as I understand it, that has been decided upon.

Mrs. Fairclough: It may be, Mr. Chairman, that some of the departments had already inaugurated this service.

Mr. Harris: It may be so.

Mrs. Fairclough: However I open my book of estimates at random and I look at defence production and at page 154 I find they had $30,000 last year and that they have $30,000 this year. I turn over the pages and I see national health and welfare; I find that under the heading of immigration medical services they had $2,600 last year and they have $2,600 this year. Everyone knows the volume of material that goes out from the Department of National Health and Welfare. I turn over quickly to the laboratory of hygiene of the Department of National Health and Welfare and I see an item of $100 for last year and $100 for this year. Then I turn to—

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member would come back to the Department of Labour, if she would.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I have only brought this matter in because the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has said that it is the policy of the government. Apparently it is not the policy of the government.

Mr. Harris: As I say, I cannot keep up with my hon. friend who is very quick-witted and has read from the pages she has looked at. I have looked at the Department of National Health and Welfare—she mentioned that department—and at page 327 there is an increase in the postal charges shown there.

Mrs. Fairclough: How much?

Mr. Harris: It is $1,000. As I say, I do not want to continue this argument because we are considering the estimates of the Department of Labour. If my hon. friend will take my word for it, I will go through the whole of the estimates before the evening is out and see if I cannot convince her that there have been increases.

Mrs. Fairclough: An increase of $1,000, from $6,500 to $7,500 is not a great deal of difference, is it?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, last night when I was going through my appropriations for the Department of National Revenue, I myself was rather surprised that the postage for national revenue cost $725,000 a year. Of course, we are dealing with 4,500,000 people who make income tax returns. That is $125,000 in excess of the amount we paid last year. I enter into this discussion because of the fact that for the last eight or ten years I have presided, I would think, at 99 per cent of the meetings of treasury board. As a matter of good accounting we expect that each department should pay its postage account to the Post Office Department. Therefore I think the increase in postage expenditure in the labour department is quite justified.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not object to it at all. I think it is the adoption of a realistic attitude. The Minister of National Revenue has cited one instance, but on page 361 I find there is an increase from $200 to $8,000 in the customs and excise division. Then I see that the inspection, investigation and audit services branch decided to leave their postage at exactly the same amount. So it goes down the line. Some departments have done it and some have not. It just brings us right back to the contention which I made on the post office estimates, that if the departments would pay their own postage we would not have needed an increase in postage rates.

Item agreed to.

186. To provide for expenses of a women's bureau, $24,090.

Mr. Knowles: Has the director of this bureau been appointed yet?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman. In my opening remarks this afternoon I made an apology, on behalf of the civil service commission, for taking such a long time to provide a woman for this post, but I have hopes that they will have a recommendation to make in the very near future. I would make one comment on what the hon. member for Hamilton West said. She criticized mildly the fact that we had not established the junior positions during the past year. We refrained from doing that deliberately. I have felt from the beginning of this plan that the whole form of a women's bureau in relation to my department and the unemployment insurance commission, where the greatest scope lies so far as the country generally is concerned, would depend upon the character and capacity of the woman chosen to head the branch, and that it would be unfair to her to build up something and hand it to her when we were starting on this work. I am hoping to have a more complete report when I have occasion to talk about this subject again.

Mrs. Fairclough: I hope the minister will have something by the time we next come together.

Item agreed to.

187. To provide for payments to implement a program for the rehabilitation of disabled persons, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, and administrative expenses connected therewith, $197,513.

Mrs. Fairclough: I see that the amount voted last year was $195,000 and that the amount actually expended was $101,000. Yet the appropriation requested for this year is $197,000, very close to twice the amount actually expended last year. I should like the minister to tell us why they need twice the amount expended last year. Will he also tell us what program is anticipated which necessitates an increase from $15,000 to $25,000 in the amount for radio, film and other publicity.

Mr. Gregg: In response to the first question, the past year has been a period of organization, as I pointed out in my opening remarks. It has been a year of discussion on the part of the two officials, one from my department and one from the Department of National Health and Welfare. They have taken up this matter with all the provinces in the utmost detail for the purpose of working out a co-operative plan. As in so many things, the initiative has to be taken by the province and we assist financially. We assist financially in a special way here in that we assist the provinces in the provision of a provincial co-ordinator. Therefore the first year of organization is not an indication at all of the amount of money that we will need. I am sure we will need that amount of money during the coming year.

The other point has to do with the amount set out for publicity and information. In the early stages of getting into action on this plan we believe that a good deal of its success will depend upon co-operating with the provinces in making the plan known, in assisting in the placement of disabled persons after they have been medically rehabilitated and trained and in encouraging employers to employ a larger number of rehabilitated disabled people.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure no one objects to any amounts which are expended for this purpose, but it is a little confusing to find these things in two different departments and to try to bring them together and form a clear picture. That is the sole reason I asked the question.

Mr. Gregg: I am very glad my hon. friend mentioned that because I should like to take a moment to say that the reason why we in Canada have been so long in getting the plan under way is that it is a matter that comes within the scope of municipal, provincial and federal governments, a vast array of national organizations both specialized and miscellaneous, and a great array of provincial and municipal organizations and voluntary agencies which have been doing magnificent work in this field. But after three or four years of patient and loyal effort on the part of a great many people throughout the country we have worked out what I believe is a unified plan that is going to work well towards the objective we have in mind.

Mrs. Fairclough: I cannot help but comment on that because it has been my very happy experience to work closely with some of the people who are doing this community work. I am sure the minister will agree with me that it would be impossible to do this work if it were not for the voluntary services of people throughout this country from Halifax to Victoria in the rehabilitation of disabled persons, not only the rehabilitation of those of mature years but the training of young people too. I realize that the training of young people probably comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare, but they eventually come under the minister's department. I cannot speak too strongly of the great contribution which is made by people who have their own responsibilities but who give greatly of their time and effort in order to supplement whatever contributions are made by the various levels of government towards the rehabilitation of these people.

Mr. Macdonnell: I would venture to make an appeal to the minister by reason of what has just been said by the hon. member for Hamilton West, and I think agreed to by him. I want to ask the minister if he will make a very special appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare emphasizing the great importance of the voluntary organization. I sought to do that on the minister's estimates but I am not at all sure I made a very good job of it and I would be very pleased if the Minister of Labour would assist.

Mr. Gregg: I am sure it will not be needed but I will be very glad to do that. It is quite true that in this effort the voluntary agencies are in the front line and governments are there as allies, financially and otherwise, to help in the effective work which has been carried on.

Mr. Macdonnell: I suggest that the minister might use that phrase "front line" to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I doubt if he has that conception at the moment.

Item agreed to.

Vocational training co-ordination—

189. Training payments to the provinces, $4,290,000.

Mr. Noseworthy: Would the minister tell us which provinces, if any, failed to take advantage of the federal grant last year, and how much was involved.

Mr. Gregg: There are, as my hon. friend knows, a number of agreements with the provinces. We have one, for instance, which my hon. friend mentioned this afternoon, under schedule M. We have one for youth training, one for apprenticeship training, and so on. Did my hon. friend have any particular type of training grant in mind? My hon. friend meant capital grants, was that it?

Mr. Noseworthy: I asked for training grants, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Gregg: Well, I have, for instance, apprenticeship training; did my hon. friend want that?

Mr. Noseworthy: Has the minister not a recapitulation of the amounts available for each province and the amount of the total that was taken up by each province?

Mr. Gregg: I can give my hon. friend the figures for the youth training, for the apprenticeship training and for the vocational training. Then, we have, of course, the armed services personnel training which is carried 100 per cent by the federal government. The figures for youth training are as follows: Newfoundland, allotment, $30,500; at the end of March, 1954, the actual was $8,000; Nova Scotia, allotment, $43,740; actual, $19,398.49; Prince Edward Island, allotment, $7,000; actual, $3,957; New Brunswick, allotment, $43,450; actual, $22,884; Quebec, allotment, $175,000; actual, $132,157; Ontario, allotment, $100,000; actual, $40,000; Manitoba, allotment, $17,500; actual, $8,278; Saskatchewan, allotment, $45,000; actual, $39,145; Alberta, allotment, $32,500; actual, $16,506; British Columbia, allotment, $52,000; actual, $44,825.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to say that the figures the minister has put on the record just now clearly indicate the reason we have not the vocational training that we should have. It is not the fault of the federal government.

Mr. McCann: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillis: The allotment for Nova Scotia was $43,000, and they took up only $19,000. The only province that did take up their quota fairly well was Saskatchewan. Ontario had an allotment of $100,000 and took up only $40,000. We ought to get some organization back in the provinces that is going to co-operate, and at least try to take advantage of the money that is available for carrying on this program.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is all very well, but as long as the federal government takes the major share of taxes of the country I do not know how they can expect the provinces to match them dollar for dollar.

Mr. Gillis: It is not very often I have to defend the federal government, but the shoe is on the other foot.

Mrs. Fairclough: You have been doing it all along, brother.

Mr. Gillis: The shoe is on the other foot.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Knowles: He is not on your team, so you should hardly call him "brother".

Mrs. Fairclough: The heck he is not; he has been defending the federal government ever since I came here this session.

Mr. Gillis: Any time I get up in this house, I know the difference between the labour estimates and the post office estimates, and any time I say something in this house I generally try to have all the facts and put them honestly. The "crack" the hon. member just made clearly indicates she is not very well acquainted with the facts, because according to those figures the provinces definitely are not co-operating with the federal government in taking advantage of the funds made available for vocational training.

Mr. McCann: Those figures were for youth training.

Mr. Gregg: I should make it clear—

Mr. Gillis: I understood they were for one schedule. We are not dealing with schedule M or with rehabilitation, we are dealing with the youth training program.

Mr. Gregg: These figures were for one schedule only, the youth training program. There are others that refer to the apprenticeship training program, the vocational training program, the armed services personnel training, defence industries and so on. The main one, or the large one, is for federal assistance grants to vocational training schools.

Mr. Gillis: That is right, but if the minister went into the whole picture it would be much worse. I am talking about the schedule to which the minister referred, and I resent the observation by the hon. member for Hamilton West that I defend the government. I am merely trying to be honest about this thing. I am not concerned about making political propaganda out of the situation in the provinces which needs correcting. The only way to correct it is to understand where the trouble lies, and so far as I can see the trouble lies with the provinces.

The excuse that the government is taking most of the taxes is not a valid one, because most of the provinces that are under the dominion-provincial taxing agreements are better off financially than if they were not under them. I have taken a look at my own province, and I am interested in it. I want to get some vocational training in that province. If the fault is with the province, then that is where I am going to place the responsibility and that is not defending the federal government. It is trying to get something done in a field where the provinces are not measuring up. If they cannot match the federal government dollar for dollar, then it is up to the provinces to say so. It is not good government to allow hundreds of boys and girls to come out of school, largely because of economic circumstances, when they are still untrained for anything and when there is this amount of money available to help train them. If any province is not able to take up the money that is available, then it is nearly time the government of that province was replaced by somebody else.

Mrs. Fairclough: I notice, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Cape Breton South frequently defends the government on something that is of a federal nature only, like post offices, which he has introduced into this discussion, but nevertheless—

Mr. Gillis: You introduced it; you have been talking post office rates all night.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, I have not.

The Chairman: Order.

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member must have a peculiar echo in his brain, but in any event, Mr. Chairman, he does defend the government on everything that affects federal policies. When it comes to provincial policies, he defends the only one province that is governed by the party to which he gives loyalty.

Mr. Gillis: It is not any provincial policy at all.

Mr. Macdonnell: I feel I should like to know a little more about this item. I want to read the item, and perhaps the minister would say a word of explanation. There is the sum of $513,000 for youth training and $931,500 for apprenticeship training. Would the minister explain exactly how that works? And then I find a further amount for vocational school assistance; one for foremanship and supervisory training, and then the following:

> Training of persons to fit them for gainful employment or for defence industries including vocational training for the physically disabled.

And then there is a further sum of $100,000 for the training of persons to fit them for the armed forces. There must be a wide variety of objects and purposes. Would the minister give us the position with respect to those?

Mr. Gregg: To take first the apprenticeship training, to which we have just referred in passing. That is carried out on a fifty-fifty basis between the provinces and the federal government. Does the hon. member want details as to figures?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, but would the minister explain how this is done. I remember being in a plant and seeing some youths apprenticed there. Would they come under this scheme? Is this done in co-operation with industry?

Mr. Gregg: It is done in co-operation with industry, and in some cases assists in bearing some of the cost. But whatever costs there may be in those provinces which industry does not bear, then they are shared equally between the provinces and the federal government. But every encouragement is given industry to do as much of this work as it possibly can, not only because of the cost but because we feel it is more effective if industry does it rather than by establishing apprenticeship schools.

Mr. Macdonnell: It would seem to me that if industry would do it it would be more realistic and effective. But when industry does not do it, what is the relationship of those apprentices which are in industry? Are they like visitors who are in there, just looking on, or are they an integral part of the work going forward?

Mr. Noseworthy: While we are on this point let me say that I hold no more brief for the Liberal government in Ottawa than I do for the Conservative government in Ontario. But I do suggest that school boards should be made cognizant of the amount of the grants made by the federal government. I know of school boards in Ontario where federal grants have been given through the provincial government, and the school boards have been given to understand that the entire grant was paid by the provincial government.

Mr. Churchill: Concerning this item which has to do with trade training, and the training of persons to fit them for the armed forces, as set out at page 238, I notice that the amount listed is $100,000. In the report of the Department of Labour at page 87 there is a table showing the federal allotment as $138,542. And then in the same table, breaking down the people enrolled under training and the like, it indicates that for those training for the army in New Brunswick there is a payment of $12,585.50, and the total days training is shown as 5,668.

Then if one follows it down you see the Quebec army plan, the Manitoba army plan and the Alberta army plan. You find there is a difference in the cost of a day's training in each one of those provinces. It varies from something over $2 in New Brunswick to more than $3 in Manitoba.

Then, at page 76 of the report of the Department of Labour it speaks of this trade training for the armed services, and says in the last paragraph:

During the year 62 instructors were hired by Canadian vocational training for this purpose, the money being provided by the Department of National Defence.

The question I would ask based upon those figures is this: What is the nature of this training, and why is not the cost of it the same from province to province? In what way is the money allotted for this purpose expended? Is it expended for the payment of other instructors rather than those who are provided by the Department of National Defence, or is it for some other purpose?

Mr. Gregg: I shall come back in a moment to the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood. My hon. friend knows that this training is done by the provinces, through the federal government, where 100 per cent of the cost is paid, because it is being done on behalf of the armed forces. In the Department of Labour we are acting merely as a sort of honest broker between the Department of National Defence, the provinces and the schools.

The other question asked was as to the variation in costs, as to why it is much cheaper in New Brunswick than in Manitoba. Well, the obvious answer is that we are a poorer people than you are in Manitoba. But I think it is due to the fact that there are bound to be variations in the schools, and the number of students under training. Consequently this would govern the cost per head in training.

Then to answer the other question concerning apprenticeship training, I shall refer to my memorandum. This is a renewed apprenticeship training agreement. As I said a moment ago, this schedule was the basis of training under separate agreements between the federal government and the provincial governments. So that apprenticeship training is an agreement all by itself. The renewed apprenticeship training agreement is in operation in all provinces except Quebec and Prince Edward Island. The Northwest Territories have also entered into an agreement recently. The agreements which cover a ten-year period expire on March 31, 1964. The purpose of the apprenticeship agreement is to promote and develop training programs for indentured apprentices registered under various provincial laws and regulations, and to encourage the training of more skilled workers in all types of industrial employment where apprenticeship is applicable.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Subject to the amount voted annually by parliament the federal government shares equally with the provincial governments in the cost of organizing and operating special training classes, and maintaining adequate field supervision of provincially controlled apprenticeship programs. Apprentices registered March 31, 1954 totalled 12,902. The apprenticeship program of Quebec differs from that in the other provinces, as it is controlled by special committees operating in designated zones, and is financed by assessment.

Mr. Macdonnell: How many are there under agreement?

Mr. Gregg: As at March 31, 1954 there were registered for training, all told, 12,902.

Mr. Macdonnell: Under the apprenticeship scheme?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, under the apprenticeship scheme.

Mr. Macdonnell: And the amount appropriated for it is $900,000. Will the minister just tell us what the relationship is? We will say that there is an apprentice working in a factory; is that correct.

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: How much does he receive from public funds and how much from his employer?

Mr. Gregg: When he is at school we pay an allowance, and the tuition fee at the school. When he is taking his training with private industry, then private industry absorbs all the cost.

Item agreed to.

190. Payments to the provinces for capital expenditures for vocational schools, buildings and equipment, $300,000.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am rather surprised that these items are so small for past capital expenditures. Can the minister tell us in what provinces that $400,000 was spent last year, and just what the conditions are on which those grants are made?

Mr. Gregg: The reason the amount is so small is that we had cleared up prior to this year practically all the payments that were owing by the federal government on schools that had been constructed during the post-war period. The amount last year was to provide for commitments only in Newfoundland, Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. Noseworthy: What are the conditions under which this money is available?

Mr. Gregg: The conditions are that the vocational school or the technical school must be up to certain general standards that are satisfactory to the kind of training that our department feels should be done, and following that the cost is matched on a fifty-fifty basis with the provinces.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the minister give the provinces which have participated?

Mr. Gregg: Newfoundland, Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. Gillis: These are grants, of course, and every province will take them all up. There is no matching in this. The minister indicated that only Newfoundland, Ontario and Manitoba received anything by way of grant last year. Under what circumstances does the minister start negotiations for the establishment of a vocational school or high school? Am I right in assuming that the province must first decide to build a school in some section of the province, determine the cost and the federal government will then offer a grant in aid of a certain amount of money. Suppose you are putting up a school that costs $2 million. The grant made by the federal government is a small fraction of that, is it not?

Mr. Gregg: Fifty per cent, if within the allotment.

Mr. Gillis: Fifty per cent of the total cost of the erection of the school. Once the school is in operation, its maintenance is in the hands of the municipality in the province? There is no grant by the federal government for maintenance?

Mr. Gregg: We pay 50 per cent up to a maximum annually.

Mr. Gillis: After it is in operation, who maintains it? What I am interested in now is this. How do you get started on this application for a school? Does the provincial government make application to the federal government, or do they build a school and determine the cost and bill the federal government for it?

Mr. Gregg: The normal way is for the provincial officials to discuss it with our officials at the planning stage. This will include the size, the cost, et cetera, and we pay 50 per cent of the cost within their allotment.

Mr. Gillis: What I am thinking of now is this: Newfoundland gets $300,000 of these estimates by way of capital assistance.

Mr. Gregg: May I make an explanation, because I think it is important? We were working on a ten-year period from 1945 to 1955. This of course is another outgrowth of the war. The ten years are ending this fiscal year. We shall now be going on, I hope, to another period in the future. During the ten-year period certain amounts were allotted federally to each province. The amounts were not all spent in one year. They may be spent as the schools proceed.

It might be of assistance if I just put on the record how much these allotments were in that ten-year period and how much was spent, because it would be unfair to say that because that small amount of money was paid to those three provinces this year that is all they received. It might give a distorted picture. I will give this in round figures: Newfoundland, allotment $219,000. No claim has yet been made in Newfoundland. I am going to give the whole thing.

Prince Edward Island, federal allotment $61,500 for buildings; paid, $61,500; allotment for equipment, $20,500; claims paid, $20,500.

Nova Scotia, allotment for buildings, $378,000; claims paid, $378,000; for equipment, allotment, $126,000; claims paid, $68,000.

New Brunswick, allotment for buildings, $324,750; paid, $324,750; for equipment, $108,000; paid, $108,000.

Quebec, allotment for buildings, $2,354,000; paid, $2,354,000; for equipment, $784,000 allotted; $784,000 paid.

Ontario, $2,272,000 allotted for buildings; paid, $2,273,000; for equipment, allotted $757,800; paid, $534,060.

Manitoba, allotted for buildings, $492,000; paid, $373,000; for equipment, $164,000; paid, $74,000.

Saskatchewan, allotted for buildings, $643,000; for equipment, $214,000; paid, $214,000.

Alberta, allotted for buildings, $525,000; paid, $525,000; allotted for equipment, $175,000; paid, $175,000.

British Columbia, allotted for buildings, $446,000; paid, $446,000; allotted for equipment and paid $148,000.

Northwest Territories, allotted, $12,700; it has not yet been paid.

Mr. Gillis: These were ten-year agreements? Does the minister renew these agreements this year?

Mr. Gregg: They may be renewed after March 31, 1955.

Mr. Montgomery: I thought I knew something about this, but between the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the answers given I am all mixed up, and I think I shall have to ask the minister a question or two. These are not grants, are they? Is this money not paid more or less under what we call arrears? Does the municipality or the school board not decide on the buildings, with the approval of the department of education of the province, and then the building is erected? The federal government deals with the provinces after the building has been erected and has been approved by the department of education? In other words, there is no particular grant given to a province and they get it whether they use it or not? It is paid in arrears, is it not?

Mr. Gregg: I do not think I said that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Montgomery: No, it was the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Gregg: The provinces knew what they could expect if they were able to provide the kind of buildings for the purpose, and then went ahead, consulting along the line. When the construction was ended, 50 per cent was paid by the provinces and 50 per cent by the federal government up to the amount of the allotment for each province. Some provinces have spent additional amounts over the allotments.

Mr. Noseworthy: Is the minister in a position yet to indicate what is likely to be the nature of the next ten-year agreement? Will that be more or less left for the future?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman, I am not in a position at the present time to say that, as my hon. friend will understand.

Item agreed to.

Terminable services—

192. To provide for expenditures incurred in implementing recommendations of the national advisory council on manpower, and for the administrative costs of the council, $11,700.

Mrs. Fairclough: Would the minister say what has happened on these terminable services. This item provides for expenditures incurred in implementing recommendations of the national advisory council on manpower, and for the administrative costs of the council. Last year the item was $66,780 and this year it is $11,700. According to the details there was one item last year covering office stationery and supplies amounting to $55,000, which is a sizeable amount, and this year it is reduced to $500. Would the minister say whether this means that the activities of this council have been, I might say, curtailed, though that is a very mild word. Has it been wiped out or what has happened to it?

Mr. Gregg: No, the council has been doing very good work. We have only had one meeting and I hope we will not have to have meetings of the full council more often than that. On some other occasion I would be glad to give a full report of the activities of the council and indeed I explained them fully to the hon. member for Broadview last year. The reason the vote is so much smaller this year is that last year under the advice of the council a certain amount of material was stockpiled against the day when it might be needed in case of an emergency. This is a non-recurring item.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, do not get excited. The total expenditure last year was $4,231 and the amount appropriated last year was $66,780. That seems to be a magnificent piece of budgeting. This year, in spite of the fact that $4,231 were expended for last year, we have an estimate of $11,700. How does the minister explain that this particular item will cover almost three times the expenditure last year despite the curtailment of the activities of the council?

Mr. Gregg: If my hon. friend will look at page 29 she will see that under item 192 for 1953-54 there was an estimate of $66,780, and for 1954-55, that is this year, the estimate is $11,700.

Mrs. Fairclough: But that is not a very good comparison because although they estimated to the extent of $66,780 last year they spent only $4,000 and now the estimate of expenditure amounts to $11,700, which is three times as much.

Mr. Macdonnell: What about the $55,000?

Mr. Gregg: In reply to the hon. member for Hamilton West I might say that this is due to the fact that we expect to have one more meeting of the council this year.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will that one meeting cost $7,000?

Mr. Macdonnell: I would like to know what this council does. The minister has told us they have had a laudably small number of meetings. I think that is desirable. But I would like to know just what they do. The item reads, "implementing recommendations of the national advisory council." I think it would be reasonable for us to know what we are implementing.

Mr. Gregg: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think my hon. friend would want me to go into a full report tonight. I did that on one or two other occasions. In 1950 there was an apparent need for an organization through which the employers, workers, farmers, women, and other groups could bring their views bearing on manpower problems to the attention of the minister and the Department of Labour, and this very excellent council was organized to carry out this work.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister has not answered the basic question which I put in regard to the sharp cut in the appropriation for this department amounting to about one-sixth. The minister has just made a statement about the tremendous amount of work done by this council last year and yet they did it on $4,000. Does the minister say that $11,000 is going to produce three times the result? Or does he say that in view of the appropriation of $66,000 for last year this council is practically going out of existence?

Mr. Gregg: I shall not admit the latter point at all. All I will say to my hon. friend is that this council is not in the same category as a branch or sub-branch of the department which has a stabilized expenditure that can be figured exactly. Certain plans are under way which vary from year to year.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister said a few minutes ago that it cost almost $7,000 to call a meeting of this council. But they spent only $4,000 last year and they are calling for $11,000 this year. They had an appropriation of $66,000 last year and I think the committee should have an explanation.

Mr. Gregg: The normal expenditure for calling a meeting together is $1,114.

Mr. Montgomery: Is the personnel of this council more or less permanent?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Like the hon. member for Hamilton West I am a bit confused by these figures and I think we should get them straight. Let me read what these figures say. The item on page 29 asks for $11,700 for 1954-55 and indicates that this is a decrease of $55,000 from last year when the item was $66,780. So far so good. Now, on page 240 I confess I become confused because first of all we have a reiteration of the figures on page 29, namely the request for $11,700—and I still feel the hon. member for Hamilton West has not been answered very well on that point—and then there is the figure of $66,000 for last year. But following that we have another figure which does not seem to tie up with anything because it says "fiscal year, 1952-53, expenditure $106,099; fiscal year 1953-54: estimated total $4,231." I must admit I am completely confused.

Mr. Gregg: I do not think there is anything confusing about it. When we prepared the estimates last November we felt and still feel that there are certain projects during this fiscal year that the council could well undertake and carry through and it was known at that time that an amount in the estimates would be required to do it.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am not at all satisfied with this. In the first instance the amount for office stationery and supplies has been reduced from $55,000 to $500. Everyone who ever ran an office knows that the measure of your activity is, to some extent, the amount of supplies and so on that you use in your office. But to cut the thing right down to 1 per cent is a ridiculous item. Then you turn around, on the other hand, and you have "allowances and expenses of council members and others" raised from $9,000 to $10,000. I think this committee is entitled to some explanation of this item. Travelling expenses have gone down from $1,500 to $1,000. Terminable allowances have been wiped out completely. Office stationery and supplies have been reduced, as I said, from $55,000 to $500. Yet the allowances and expenses of council members and others have gone up from $9,000 to $10,000. What is the answer?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I hope that my hon. friend will not think that there is anything deep and devious here at all. I tried to explain the matter of the office expenditure. Office expenditure is the wrong word there. It was a special kind of paper that was required for a special kind of use to have ready in case of need. That happened only once and it will not happen this year. Consequently we did not put the amount in the estimates.

Mrs. Fairclough: You mean to say the inventories on hand will last for how many years?

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister does not know.

Item agreed to.

194. To provide for expenses that may be incurred in the arranging for and the movement of workers from outside Canada to work on farms and other essential industry in Canada when Canadian labour is not available to meet the need, including costs connected with the supervision and welfare of persons already immigrated to Canada; administrative expenses connected therewith and to provide for expenditures under agreements with the provinces authorized by the governor in council, $878,258.

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister please explain the procedure under this estimate which is to provide for expenses that may be incurred in the arranging for and the movement of workers from outside Canada to work on farms. From what country do they come? What citizens of which country get assistance under this vote? How is it applied?

Mr. Gregg: Where firms require workers the Department of Labour, in co-operation with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, if it has not those workers available in Canada, co-operates to bring over groups of workers. They come from any country in which the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is operating.

Mrs. Fairclough: Under this item there is a decrease of $115,574. In the supplementary estimates there is—wait a minute, maybe I have the wrong amount—no, in the supplementary estimates it is under unemployment insurance commission. It is to provide for the transfer of labour to and from—

Mr. Gregg: That is a different item.

Mrs. Fairclough: I know, but it is for the same thing, is it not?

Mr. Gregg: No. It is a different thing.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul, I would think, because it says in the one instance, in item 194:

To provide for expenses that may be incurred in the arranging for and the movement of workers from outside Canada—

In the other case it says:

To provide for the transfer of labour to and from places where employment is available—

And so on. It is still juggling with labour.

Mr. Gregg: One has to do with workers coming into Canada and their getting work; the other has to do with moving workers from one part of Canada to another.

Mrs. Fairclough: Just a minute. It is still a case of juggling workers around, is it not?

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to have some information as to the number of people involved. The item reads:

To provide for expenses that may be incurred in the arranging for and the movement of workers from outside Canada—

And so on. I think we should have quite a little bit of information as to just what is involved. We are trying to get through these estimates, Mr. Chairman, but we are not trying to pass everything in a rush, only to be asked questions afterwards which make us look like ninnies for not having asked them.

Mr. Gregg: I am glad to give all the information that is required.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister is very good about it, but there are certain signs of impatience in the committee which makes it a little bit difficult for us to continue.

Mr. Abbott: Summer heat.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Gregg: The technique of group movements was developed in 1946 when 2,876 Polish soldiers who had served with the British in General Anders' army were brought to Canada for employment on farms. I mention that only to indicate its inception. I am not going to trace down the history of it from there. During the fiscal year 1953-54 there have been 9,952 immigrants brought forward in group movements, including 3,543 domestics, British, German and Greek; 5,003 farm workers and sugar beet workers; 1,142 track maintenance workers and 264 general labourers from the island of Malta.

In previous years substantial numbers of immigrant workers were brought forward in group movements for employment in woods work and mining but there was no demand for this type of worker during the fiscal year 1953-54.

Displaced persons who came forward in previous years were provided with free ocean transportation by the international refugee organization. Since IRO ceased operations on December 31, 1951, there is no provision for free transportation to immigrants coming to Canada. The cost of ocean transportation for immigrants coming to Canada in group movements is now provided by way of assisted passage loans granted by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in some instances and in other instances the immigrants themselves pay their ocean passage.

The Department of Labour pays the cost of inland transportation for domestic workers and farm workers, provided they are placed in employment by the national employment service or the federal-provincial farm labour committees, and provided that such workers remain in the employment to which they are assigned for a period of one year. I should of course add there that they do not always all do that. If there is any other information my hon. friend would like to have, I shall try to give it to him.

Mr. Macdonnell: This seems to be like a piece carved out of what one would expect to be the functions of the department of immigration. What is the relationship between the two departments? Why, for example, is this particular activity assumed by the Department of Labour? Is there any other feature or factor of immigration which is assumed by the Department of Labour and not by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?

Mr. Gregg: The main reason is that the requirements for those workers come to the attention of the national employment service and the Department of Labour in the first instance and they are subject—

Mr. Macdonnell: May I interject a question there? Are they different from all other immigrants in that respect and are all those that are included in the description the minister has just given covered under this grant?

Mr. Gregg: Only those that I mentioned. Those categories that I mentioned are included in this move of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Cardiff: Do these groups come out for farm labour or are they employed in any kind of labour that is needed?

Mr. Gregg: I will give my hon. friend the groups for this last year. That will give him an idea. For the last year the figures are as follows: General labourers, 264; farm workers, single males, 2,448; farm couples, 478; farm families, 166; sugar beet families, 1,506; special church groups—that is in co-operation with church organizations and agricultural organizations—405; then on construction, 1,142; domestics 3,318, domestic couples, 224. Those are the only categories, namely, construction and farming.

Mr. Cardiff: What denominations were they? What church denominations?

Mr. Gregg: Lutheran, Baptist, Roman Catholic, Methodist and Mennonites.

Mr. Abbott: No Anglicans?

Mr. Montgomery: Are any of these expenses returned? It was our understanding that money was advanced by the immigration department to pay the way of certain people coming out here to work as farm and other types of labourers, and that there was a revolving fund set-up under which the money was repaid. I understand this has nothing to do with that type of immigrant. If not, are these people expected to refund to the department the money advanced? For instance, there is an item here of $30,000 for travelling expenses and then an item for food and other supplies. I suppose the purpose of these items is to look after these immigrants until they are settled.

Mr. Gregg: In these cases their transportation to this country is paid.

Mr. Montgomery: And it is not refunded?

Mr. Gregg: It is not refunded.

Mrs. Fairclough: With respect to the details on page 241, what is the explanation for the reduction in the amount for professional and special services from $162,000 to $15,000 and for the reduction from $55,000 to nothing in the case of rental of buildings?

Mr. Gregg: When these groups came over here, particularly in the winter months, it was necessary for them to have a stopping place until they were moved out to their places of work. Consequently some of the buildings at Ajax were utilized during that period, but last year we closed that out.

Mrs. Fairclough: That still does not explain the reduction in professional and special services from $162,000 to $15,000.

Mr. Gregg: The catering there was defined as a special service.

Mr. Gillis: I am also a bit puzzled about this item. It is not only farm labour that is involved. The amount of money provided is quite large and the item states that it is to be used for the movement of workers from outside Canada to essential industry and so forth when Canadian labour is not available. There is a lot of Canadian labour available in this country at the present time. When you look at the details on page 241 it makes you wonder what kind of services are provided. The amount for housing, board and maintenance is dropping. The amount for professional and special services has gone up.

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Mr. Gillis: There was $90,000 last year and this year there is $125,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is food and other supplies. You are on the wrong line.

Mr. Gillis: The rest of the items appear to be about the same, and it would seem to be more or less a permanent organization. The amount for rental of buildings has gone down but the amounts for repairs and upkeep of equipment, electricity, heat, water rates and other municipal services, sundries and hospitalization expenses appear to be about the same. Is this vote, the details of which are set out on page 241, for the purpose of maintaining some centre to house immigrants coming into the country as farm or industrial labourers until such time as employment is found for them? Is money provided to move them from one section of the country to the other? Is it for the purpose of maintaining a centre for immigrants? That is what it looks like.

Mr. Gregg: That is correct. As I said a moment ago we have cut down radically on that kind of stopping place. There were two, one at St. Paul l'Ermite outside Montreal and one at Ajax in Ontario. We have closed down the one at Ajax but we still maintain the one hostel near Montreal. As to the emergency professional and medical services, they are provided for the people who are there from time to time.

Mr. Gillis: Are similar services available to the scores of unemployed people who are and have been permanent residents of this country? I know that in Ontario, the maritimes and all the provinces you will find pockets where there is unemployment. Are such services available to our own unemployed? Can they get transportation from one section of the country to the other to a job? Is there some centre to which they can report where they will be fed, clothed and provided with hospitalization in case of illness? Could these centres be utilized for the purpose of moving our own people around the country?

The minister will remember that in April of this year there were 56,000 Canadians receiving supplementary unemployment insurance benefits who went off the rolls completely at the 15th of April. We know there were 56,000, and we also know there were many more. Are there no services available under this department that would provide the same kind of protection for these people? That is pretty full protection. I am not objecting but I do think that people who have lived in Canada for a good many years and have paid their taxes and are now out of work through no fault of their own and are off the unemployment relief rolls are at least entitled to the same consideration as people we may bring into the country. The least we should do is to equalize the situation so that people who have been here will have the same kind of privileges if they are out of work as are being provided at this place in Montreal.

Mr. Gregg: I think the hon. member will recognize that these were emergency cases of a temporary nature. These people were brought in, taken to the hospital and were only there for a very short time until they went to their work. I am glad to say that it has been possible to lessen the amount of that kind of accommodation. I might also say that under a later item some provision is made for co-operating in helping to move Canadians who are unemployed to other places where employment may be found, although it does not fill all the requirements.

Mr. Herridge: I am not quite clear on this item. Is this the only item under any department of government providing assistance to farm workers in Canada?

Mr. Gregg: We passed that one. That was item 185.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Herridge: We are on item 194. Is that the only item that makes provision—

Mr. Gregg: Item 185 on page 28.

Mr. Herridge: This item also makes provision for farm workers. I was wondering whether this included them all or only a percentage of them. There is a great deal of complaint about many of these people coming to this country under the pretext of going on a farm and then "doing a bunk". There is no question about it. I want to read a short extract from the Saskatchewan News published by the government of Saskatchewan. It is headed, "Few Immigrants for Farm Work", and reads as follows:

> The federal-provincial farm labour committee has recommended that no more than 100 German farm immigrants be confirmed for placement in Saskatchewan this year. L. J. Hutchison, secretary of the committee, said the recommendation was based on the realization that German farm immigrants had not assisted materially in reducing the farm labour shortage.
> He explained that a reason for this is the movement of labour from agriculture to industry which is evident across Canada and which is particularly true with respect to German farm immigrants placed on Saskatchewan farms.

I do not know about Saskatchewan conditions but I have heard general complaints that these people who get assistance to come to Canada to work on farms have no more idea of working on farms than I have at the present time. They stay for a while and then disappear into industry. I do not think it is good enough that this government should assist people to come here to work on farms under those conditions. I think the same amount of money could be better used to help some Nova Scotia people get to employment in western Canada.

Mr. Noseworthy: I understood the minister to say that these grants for hospitalization and medical services are of a temporary nature for immigrants coming into this country who become ill and have to go to hospitals. There is a $150,000 grant there. Any experience that I have had with the department of immigration would indicate that anyone coming to this country is given a thorough medical checkup before he comes here. It would seem that these people who, as the minister indicated, are brought here by employers may get in without any such medical checkup as ordinary immigrants receive. I believe that requires some explanation.

Before the minister answers there is just one other question I should like to ask. The minister told us that this grant is for payments, in co-operation or conjunction with the department of immigration, for workers who are brought in by employers. Has the minister any record there of the names of some of the larger employers who are bringing in these people?

Mr. Gregg: No, I have not the names of the employers, Mr. Chairman, because there would be a long list. Most of them are farmers who are employing farm workers. I should have added to my remarks, so as to allay the fears of my hon. friends, that this comes about as a result of close liaison between the officials of the Department of Labour and the farm labour committee as well as representatives of each of the departments of agriculture in the provinces. These people meet, and I recall I was present at the meeting when Saskatchewan representatives were here. They stated how many and what kinds they wanted. They discussed the question of the difficulty of keeping the new Canadians on the farm as well as the difficulty of keeping domestic help for the housewife. I can assure my hon. friend that they are not brought in if there are Canadian workers available to do that work.

The other question raised was as to how could we make sure these immigrants fulfil their year's obligation. This is a very difficult question with which the farm labour committee has wrestled for two or three years. They have not got the complete answer as yet but they feel they are making some improvement. As I said in my opening remarks, the operations under this vote will be less this year than they have been in the last few years.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have just one other question, Mr. Chairman. I notice that there is $125,000 in this item for professional and special services. What is the nature of the professional services receiving the bulk of the $125,000?

Mr. Gregg: If my hon. friend looks at page 242 he will see that $30,000 is for professional services and hospitalization expenses.

Mr. Noseworthy: No, the item to which I am referring is on page 241, the second item, professional services and special services, $125,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, that is for food and supply.

Mr. Gregg: On page 241 to which my hon. friend refers, at the bottom of the page there is an item for housing, board and maintenance; then, there is a subhead, professional and special services, $15,000. It that right?

Mr. Noseworthy: Yes, the next item.

Mr. Gregg: The next item is for food and other supplies, $125,000. As I said, that will go to take care of accommodation at the hospital.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to ask a question or two about the organization we have that is involved in this operation consisting of the provinces, the Department of Labour, and at some point the department of immigration. First of all, what offices has the Department of Labour in Europe?

Mr. Gregg: We have no offices except personnel attached to the office of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Macdonnell: In other words, the department uses the offices of the department of immigration in Europe, with personnel from the Department of Labour attached?

Mr. Gregg: You mean on the continent of Europe?

Mr. Macdonnell: On the continent of Europe.

Mr. Gregg: There is very little on the continent of Europe; it is mainly in London.

Mr. Macdonnell: Perhaps the minister would be able to say whether this item we are discussing now applies chiefly in the United Kingdom? Do the people concerned in this thing come chiefly from the United Kingdom and can this be regarded as a United Kingdom operation?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman, these are officials that the Department of Labour has in London mainly, I think with one or two others on the continent. They are not specifically for these groups of people, but on behalf of the Department of Labour with regard to all immigrants. These officials are able to advise immigrants with certain skills as to the working opportunities in Canada, and when applicants come in to be interviewed they would be available for that purpose. They are there for that purpose.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister says available to all immigrants; do I understand then that the Department of Labour concerns itself, to some extent, with all immigrants?

Mr. Gregg: Only at the request of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration officials at that point where interviews may be required with respect to certain qualifications.

Mr. Macdonnell: Who is responsible for selecting, screening and passing on immigrants?

Mr. Gregg: Our people are on the selection team at that point.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister expand that a little by saying who is on the selection team? My question is; who seeks out and passes on the immigrants? I take it the minister says it is a team.

Mr. Gregg: The department of immigration.

Mr. Macdonnell: The department of immigration?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: And they are responsible until when, until the immigrant arrives in Canada?

Mr. Abbott: What difference does it make?

Mr. Gregg: They are responsible until they arrive in Canada and, in some cases, until the new Canadian is placed. Our national employment offices co-operate in that placement at all times.

Mr. Macdonnell: The Minister of Finance says, "What difference does it make?" I think I am justified in saying that it may make quite a lot of difference. I believe that sometimes there is a good deal of difficulty and even of confusion as between the two departments. I wish to be perfectly frank and to ask at what point there is a division of responsibility as between the two departments. There is every chance of a difficulty arising. It would be a great surprise if it did not arise, and I would like to know exactly what the division of responsibility is.

Mr. Gregg: I can assure my hon. friend there is no difficulty between the two departments. The responsibility for immigration rests with the immigration branch. The Department of Labour, the national employment service and the unemployment insurance commission in these various activities act in all respects as an agent of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in co-operation toward achieving a common purpose of getting immigrants over.

Mr. Macdonnell: I understand the minister is speaking about activities in Europe at the moment. What happens when they arrive here? Who is responsible for these people we are talking about when they arrive here? Under which department do they come, then?

Mr. Gregg: These we are talking about under this special vote, because of the fact that they have been demanded or required through our machinery in the employment office—the federal-provincial farm labour committee—are moved from the point of landing in Canada and go perhaps to a hostel, but often go to their employers, and are there turned over and placed. Is that an answer to my hon. friend's question?

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Macdonnell: Let me be clear. Up to arrival in Canada they are under the immigration department, and when they reach Canada they come under the Department of Labour, which then governs their movements?

Mr. Gregg: That is right.

Mr. Montgomery: May I ask a further question. When the immigrant comes out and is placed on the farm, he seems to be under the supervision of the immigration officer. Can the minister explain how it is that he comes under that officer? That is what is confusing us. Immigrants who have arrived on farms in communities we know are supervised by immigration officials. The man representing the department seems to be an immigration officer. It may be that we are all wrong, and that it is the Department of Labour. I would like to know that.

Mr. Gregg: Naturally it is the desire that a representative of the department of immigration in the area keep supervision over the progress of new Canadians during their early period in the country.

Mr. Montgomery: He places him on the farm?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Barnett: As I understand the picture these people are brought in under a joint arrangement between the immigration department and the Department of Labour. I understand the minister to say that once they arrive in Canada the Department of Labour accepts some responsibility after they have landed. My question is this: During the year in which they are working under the arrangement under which they came to Canada, do they come under the supervision of the federal Department of Labour or of the various provincial departments of labour in respect to their hours of work, the sort of wages paid, and other working conditions? Does the Department of Labour accept responsibility for that during the first year?

Mr. Gregg: To go back again; the request for them is made with the concurrence of the representative of the provincial department of agriculture—in connection with agricultural workers. In that province the minimum amount that those new Canadians will be paid when they arrive at the farms is already decided each year at the annual meeting of the committee. So that that is settled, and the information is conveyed to these men going on the farms when they arrive in Saskatchewan or Alberta. And it is then the responsibility of this department in conjunction with the provincial department of agriculture to see that that agreement is carried into effect.

Mr. Fulton: Has the figure been given as to how many were brought in under the aegis of this activity of the Department of Labour?

Mr. Gregg: I gave that earlier in the evening.

Mr. Fulton: And how many it is anticipated will be brought in this year?

Mr. Gregg: I gave that information earlier in the evening.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister recall it offhand?

Mr. Gregg: It is 9,952 in 1953-54.

Mr. Fulton: And it is anticipated that how many will be brought in this year?

Mr. Gregg: It is estimated there will be about 8,000.

Mr. Fulton: There is one thing that interests me considerably, and that is the amount for hospitalization and medical aid. This year it is $155,000. What has been the experience in that regard? Has it been necessary to provide that amount of hospitalization and medical aid for these people brought in?

Mr. Abbott: Order for return.

Mr. Gregg: If my hon. friend would agree, I would prefer to make that an order for return. I would like to give him a more complete explanation of it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, it begins to look as though probably I have been labouring under a misapprehension. All along I have thought that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was probably responsible for some of the reports which come to me from abroad, and from some of the people who come to this country from abroad. Now I am inclined to think that, after all, he is innocent, and that the particular misdemeanour may lie with the Department of Labour.

I have people come to my office telling me that in various places in Europe, as well as in London, England, they were painted glowing pictures of what was available for them in Canada. Then they come here and find out there is no work at all for them. It is difficult to nail these things down, but I must say that I have always blamed the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. But after what has developed here I am beginning to wonder just who is to blame; and I would like to know.

Mr. Abbott: All very confusing.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would like to know, if I can, so that I can nail it down. Someone overseas is definitely giving a very glowing picture of what conditions are in Canada; but when these people come out here they find there is no work available for them. I think there should be some explanation. Someone should be able to tie this right down to an individual, somewhere.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Fairclough: You do it, if you are so smart.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman—

Mrs. Fairclough: I was not referring to the minister. I meant one of the members in the back row.

Mr. Harris: I will be glad to explain the responsibility and the chain of command in connection with immigration when we come to my estimates.

Mr. Fulton: When will that be?

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister will say it is the Department of Labour when he comes to his estimates.

Mr. Pallett: There is an item of $325,000 for transportation costs. Can the minister tell me how much of that is recovered?

Mr. Gregg: None.

Mr. Pallett: To what travel particularly has it reference? Is that paid for bringing immigrants to jobs in this country?

Mr. Gregg: From the time they arrive at the port to their place of work.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment insurance commission—

195. Administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, including expenditures incurred in connection with the activities of the national employment service as delegated by the Minister of Labour in accordance with section 97 of the act, $23,122,859.

Mr. Carter: Is the minister in a position to make any further statement in respect to unemployment insurance to fishermen or wage earners or any scheme that may benefit small self-employed operators?

Mr. Gregg: A group of officials are working at the present time and looking into the position of workers in agriculture and in the fishing industry in relation to unemployment insurance. I should add perhaps that as far as fishermen are concerned, the officials are considering the position not only of wage earners but also of sharemen and own-account fishermen. Hon. members will appreciate that this is not a simple problem, and there are a good many matters which have to be taken into account before any decision is made as to whether it would be possible to extend coverage to them. Until a report is made and considered by the government it is not possible for me to say whether coverage can be broadened to include all these workers.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have two questions on this item, Mr. Chairman. The first one I asked at the beginning. Can the minister tell us whether there is any likelihood or possibility of the department making it possible for unemployed, who have accumulated an unemployment insurance backlog, to draw on that fund, although the present restrictions regarding the number of days per month are not complied with? It is pretty difficult for unemployed who are in desperate circumstances and who over the past years have built up a sizeable sum of unemployment insurance to find that they can only draw a part of it because of the department's regulations.

Mr. Gregg: I am sure the hon. member will agree that the unemployment insurance plan must be kept actuarially sound, but I will take his remarks of the early part of the evening as well as those now and have them reviewed by those who are at present studying the act.

Mr. Noseworthy: This is my second question. I notice in the details that we have a few well-paid personnel in the unemployment insurance commission and the administrative offices. A few of them are in the $7,000, $8,000, $10,000 and one in the $12,000 class. I notice that there are about 165 office managers who apparently never get out of the $3,000 class. They may get up to something over $3,000, but they never get up to $4,000 or in the $4,000 class. I know a considerable number of those managers. They have to be bankers, accountants, public relations men, public welfare officers; they have to combine a dozen different vocations in one to manage some of these large unemployment insurance offices. Is the department giving any consideration to stepping up the salaries of these 165 managers, all of whom are still either in the lower $3,000 or middle $3,000 brackets?

Mr. Gregg: These have all been considered during the past year and of course the civil service commission has taken into consideration the work load of the office and all the factors that my hon. friend is concerned with.

Mr. Knowles: Is the unemployment insurance commission, or any other section or officials under the jurisdiction of the minister, giving any serious or detailed study to the question of a guaranteed annual wage? The minister knows that that is now a major question in the field of labour-management relations.

Mr. Gregg: No, not any more than I am sure my officials in the department and the commission give study to anything that affects labour, but certainly are not giving any study to it as something that should be sponsored by my department.

Mr. Knowles: I shall just make one remark. I suggest that in this department where a great deal of study is made of many matters, where a great deal of serious research is carried out, a very serious study should be made of this question. I suggest it is the coming issue, indeed it is here now, this feeling on the part of labour and on the part of workers. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, can mutter if he wishes, but he is on a guaranteed annual wage, as are many professional and salaried people. Industrial workers feel that they too are entitled to a guaranteed annual wage. I urge that this matter be considered.

Mr. Pallett: Can the minister tell the committee how many people who once paid unemployment insurance are now no longer paying it? By that I mean students, single girls who got married and people who went from the salary classification which required them to pay unemployment insurance and thus graduated from that classification. Can the minister give me that figure? Can he also indicate to the committee how much money is represented by the amounts that they have paid in which they are not now entitled to draw on by reason of their having discontinued paying in?

Mr. Gregg: I do not think it answers my hon. friend's question, but the percentage of Canada's working force now under the act is about 75 per cent. It would be impossible for me to say how many of the other 25 per cent is or would like to be. All I know is that some of them would be, but I do not think that answers the whole of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Pallett: Did I understand the minister to imply that no records are kept of people who have paid into this unemployment insurance fund and now are no longer paying into it? That was the question.

Mr. Gregg: No, they may have left the country. We have no means of keeping track of them after they disappear from our records.

Mr. Barnett: I should like very much to make some extended remarks on the question of the unemployment insurance commission.

However, I have on one or two previous occasions expressed some of my views as to in what direction I feel the present act should be extended. I do not propose to take the time of the committee at any length at this time. While I am on my feet I should like to say a word in support of the remarks expressed by the hon. member for York South in regard to the heavy load which many of the local unemployment insurance office managers are carrying today, with their manifold responsibilities, and to suggest that I too feel serious consideration should be given to the possibility of making that office one which does lead to something of a higher level of income than at present applies to them. I feel that in large measure the whole success of the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act, particularly in the matter of personal relationships and the general feeling toward it in the communities scattered across the country, depends so much upon the personality and efficiency of the person who holds that office. I must say I have had a very good experience in dealing with persons in that position.

One other matter on which I was prepared to ask the minister questions relates to the extension of the unemployment insurance benefits to quite a large section of the workers of Canada who are in the fishing industry. I was very pleased to see that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo has indicated some interest in the matter. I listened with interest to the statement the minister made and I realize there are some practical difficulties in the way of achieving this end. However, I am firmly convinced that these practical difficulties are not insurmountable and I trust the minister will give very serious consideration to the question of bringing these people in under the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I might point out that there are a good many workers in various fields engaged in various forms of piece-rate work who are covered by the provision of the act, and there are workers in other fields whose employment is not always of a very regular nature for whom ways and means have been found of bringing them under the act. I hope that by the time we come to consider the estimates of the unemployment insurance commission next year there will be some scheme in operation for bringing fishermen under the provision of the act.

Item agreed to.

197. To provide for the transfer of labour to and from places where employment is available and expenses incidental thereto, in accordance with regulations of the governor in council, $75,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: I wonder if the minister could tell us exactly how much was spent in providing for the transfer of labour as described in this item?

Mr. Gregg: As I outlined at the commencement of my remarks this is mainly a revolving fund. Last year $192,000 was spent out of the basic $75,000 which was voted. In other words, the fund revolved to that extent.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister has mentioned the figure of $192,000 but looking at the details on page 246 it is very difficult to discern the actual amount spent. Can the minister give us any details showing how this figure of $192,000 is arrived at as compared with the appropriation of $75,000. There is an item marked "estimated total, $6,000" on page 246.

Mr. Gregg: That was made up six months ago. At the end of the fiscal year, March 31, 1954, the total debt outstanding was $165 out of a total of $191,493.55 that had been advanced.

Mrs. Fairclough: I find that extremely confusing. According to the details at page 246 the actual expenditure up to December 31, 1953 was $18,287, which is patently someone's guess, and then the estimated total for 1953-54 is $6,000. The minister mentioned a total of about $192,000. But the appropriation last year was $75,000 and the appropriation this year is for the same amount and bears no relation whatever to the figure the minister mentioned.

Mr. Gregg: It is a revolving fund used over and over again. At the time the estimate was made the amounts owing by people to whom money had been advanced was $18,000 and the most recent figure was $165.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then I understand that this is a revolving fund of $75,000 and there is $165 in the fund so there is some $74,000 owing to the government at the moment.

Mr. Gregg: It is the other way around.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is a credit of $75,000 and you tell me that you received $165 so that means there is over $74,000 outstanding.

Mr. Gregg: No, the amount outstanding is $165.

Mrs. Fairclough: But you had $75,000 in the fund originally.

Mr. Gregg: We received that back except for $165.

Mrs. Fairclough: Why do you appropriate $75,000 every single year? You have an appropriation of $75,000. What do you do with it? Do you split it up at the end of the year?

Mr. Gregg: It lapses at the end of the year.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am not naive enough to think that $75,000 can rattle around without falling some place. What happens to it?

Mr. Gregg: It goes back at the end of the year.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then you appropriate that amount again?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Administration services—
210. Departmental administration, $470,422.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members will find this department starting at page 33 and the details outlined at page 258. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Nowlan: Is the minister going to make a statement at this stage with reference to the work of the coal board?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I think when these estimates were before the committee some months ago I requested that we deal with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and then the coal board afterwards. I think there was agreement on it at that time.

Mr. Nowlan: At that time it was understood, I believe, that the coal board would be dealt with first. I was not here at that time but I have heard some discussion about this matter since, and in view of the fact that tonight we are working under some pressure I think it might be advisable that the departmental estimates be considered as a sort of packaged deal. I think it would be better if we dealt with the whole thing at one time, and I think if the minister has a statement to make it would be better if he made it now rather than later.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I feel quite sure we would make better time if we dealt with the coal board separately.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. The minister's estimates were before the house a couple of months ago and at that time the coal question was a pretty serious one and the cabinet had it under consideration. The minister suggested we leave that question alone until such time as he was in a position to make a statement arising out of cabinet consideration.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

But that is ancient history now. There is not any doubt that the minister is likely in a position now to make a statement as to what the government's policy is on the whole matter of fuel. I think it would be just as well if he could make that statement now and then we could discuss it. Then when we get over this item we could run through the other items very quickly. But if we are going to stick, as I think we are, on that controversial subject, I think that is a good way of tying all of the items up.

Mr. Prudham: I can make a statement on coal when we reach that item but as there are various officials here I think it would be much better to deal with the items of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys first and then deal with coal.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps if I might interject at this point, I might say that my recollection is this. I have not the reference before me but I think it was more or less agreed in the committee the last time that this specialized item would come under its own heading on account of the availability of the technical advice which would be here at that time. I might point out that owing to the practice that we have been carrying out I do not feel that I have any right to prevent any member from discussing the coal board on the first item if he wishes to do so. But I might say at the same time that neither am I in any position to compel the minister to make a statement on the coal board before that item is reached. I think we have found with several of the departments that when we have one rather major item included in the first item and two or three members speak on it—it may be the coal board or something else—and then two or three members speak on some other branch of departmental activities in which they are interested, generally speaking there is someone who wishes to speak on the coal board again and the result is that the debate is not too orderly. In order to work out a procedure that might be suitable to all it was thought that in a case like this it would be better if, when we call the coal board, we discuss coal; and we certainly could not be discussing anything else. However, I am in the hands of the committee. Resolution 210 is before the committee.

Mr. Gillis: I should just like to ask the minister this question. The reason the minister wants to leave this coal question alone tonight is that the officials are not available. Is that it?

Mr. Prudham: The officials are in the gallery but there are two deputy ministers involved. I should like to have the coal officials here when we are discussing coal. I do not think it is an unreasonable request. I think it would be in the interests of the committee to consider these two departments separately. It was only about two years ago that the coal board was attached to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys or at least at that time I was made responsible for it. Prior to that time the coal board had no connection with this department. As I have said, there are two deputies involved. In order to promote an orderly discussion of the estimates, I think that is the way it should be handled.

Mr. Gillis: The minister means that there are two deputy ministers who are not available tonight?

Mr. Prudham: Yes they are available. They are here in the gallery.

Mr. Gillis: Is there any reason why we cannot call the coal item first?

An hon. Member: Let us deal with the first item.

Mr. Gillis: Just a minute. On the minister's first item, as was indicated by the chairman, any matter that comes within the scope of his department may be discussed; it is in order to discuss any such matter as far as the House of Commons is concerned. It is a couple of months since the members of the house, with regard to the coal industry—and it was facing a crisis—co-operated with the minister to the extent of leaving the matter alone because of a reasonable request at that time when the cabinet were working on the details of the matter. However, it is entirely up to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, if he wants to go ahead with the discussion tonight. As far as I am concerned, I would just as soon make my statement now, but I should like to hear the minister announce government policy first with regard to the coal situation.

Mr. Prudham: If the committee wishes to discuss coal first, it is quite agreeable to me that we should do so; but I do not think we should combine the two matters.

Mr. Gillis: Let us call the coal board estimate.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether I cannot make formally the suggestion which I think is in the mind of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, namely, that item 210 stand and that you call item 237?

Mr. Dickey: Let us pass item 210.

Mr. Knowles: It is all right if the committee wants to pass item 210, and then call item 237 so that hon. members, if they wish to discuss coal, will be able to do so.

Mr. Abbott: Item 210 carried.

The Deputy Chairman: While the committee is in charge of its own procedure to some extent, I should like to know the views of the minister who is to pilot these estimates through the committee. I should like to know whether he would prefer to have item 237 called at this time or not.

Mr. Nowlan: Naturally, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to insist on any particular procedure. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, this is an item that has stood over for a long while and it stood at the request of the minister. He said he wanted to be in a position to announce government policy. I think he should be able to deal with this matter now and to deal with the coal board estimates. But if it is the unanimous wish of the committee to do otherwise, that is all right. I certainly do not want to waste our time talking about procedural matters at this stage. If it is the unanimous wish of the committee that we defer discussion of coal until item 237 is called, that procedure is satisfactory to me. I think we should adopt the suggestion which has been made and call that item now. But if it is not the unanimous wish of the committee to do so, I will not discuss the coal board at this time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether you would ask the committee whether item 210 is now agreed to on the understanding that the next item to be called would be item 237?

Mr. McCann: No. Take them in consecutive order.

Mr. Gillis: Let us go on and discuss coal.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys any reply to make to the suggestions made from the opposition?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I still maintain that we should either discuss coal or take the items in order. I do not think we should mix up the discussion of the coal board with discussion of the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I think it would contribute to orderly discussion if we kept these matters separate.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that I call item 237?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that we now deal with the items of the coal board. Perhaps that would meet the wishes of the committee.

Item stands.

Dominion coal board—
237. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $114,380.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Chairman, I propose at this time to make a résumé of the operations of the coal board and to try to give as clear a picture as I can of the state of the coal industry as it exists at the present time. Canada is still a young nation and is at an early stage in the development of its resources. To some it may seem rather unfortunate at this time that our resources of fuel are so far removed from the main markets. But, as Canada develops industrially, and with the spread of industry from central Canada, the distribution problem with regard to fuel supplies will lessen.

However, for those of us who are living today in the present formative era, effective distribution presents a serious problem. The federal government during the past 26 years has assisted coal movements in Canada by freight subventions. The rate and the variety of these subventions have varied from time to time to meet changing conditions. Through two world wars the contribution made by the Canadian coal industry to the national defence effort has at least partly justified these expenditures of public funds.

Since 1948 with the discovery of oil and gas in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, and with the increased supplies of oil from other parts of the world, severe competition has been experienced by the coal industry in Canada and for that matter in the United States and other parts of the world.

In western Canada, the Canadian National Railways passes through oil fields; and heavy oil suitable for locomotive use is available in large quantities at low cost. As a result the Canadian National Railways has converted the greater part of its remaining steam locomotives to oil and within a year the system will be burning very little coal on its lines west of the great lakes. The main line of the Canadian National Railways between Edmonton and the Pacific coast is now completely converted to oil locomotives and diesels. Many of the mines in central Alberta were almost entirely dependent on sales to the railway company and, as a result of this recent development, these mines are now nearly all closed.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

In southern Alberta and British Columbia, where the main producing area is in the Crowsnest pass, the Canadian Pacific Railway has followed a different policy. In the first place, the Canadian Pacific Railway is further removed from the sources of oil and it would therefore find it less profitable to convert to oil. The C.P.R. still continues to buy over 1½ million tons of coal for locomotive use per year. I understand the Canadian Pacific is not buying any United States coal for use on its lines west of the great lakes, and it is even hauling Canadian coal eastward from its coaling point at the head of the lakes. As a result the coal mines of the Crowsnest pass, although facing stiff competition from oil and gas in the domestic and commercial fields, have still a basic market in the C.P.R. requirements. A steady decline in the purchase of coal by both railways can be expected.

Recently there was a mine casualty at Coleman, Alberta. The Coleman collieries international mine is now closed, presumably on account of the lack of markets. Another factor in this situation is the existence of a second mine operated by the same company but which has a very short life expectancy. By closing the Coleman international mine at this time and concentrating on the mine with the short life the company will be able to recover a maximum amount of coal. This they could not expect to do effectively by a less concentrated effort. Meanwhile the international mine is being kept in repair and when the mine being operated at the present time is exhausted the working force will be transferred back to the international mine.

Once coal is extracted it cannot be replaced, and inevitably the time comes when a mine is depleted. People engaged in mining operations always face the hazards of disruptions and of making adjustments when a mine is closed. Recently the Alberta government passed a coal marketing act. I understand that the coal mining operators were consulted in this connection and assisted the provincial government in working out and drafting the provisions of the act. This legislation provides for classification of the various types of coal produced in the province. It also requires that coal offered for sale must be labelled as to grade and analysis. This year the federal government is relating its subvention policy to the provisions of the Alberta coal sales act.

Generally speaking the coals of the prairie section of Alberta have a high moisture content, are friable and have a relatively low b.t.u. value. Most coal mining on the prairies is now carried on by stripping methods involving the use of power machinery and a relatively small working force.

Coals in grade 5, Alberta standards, have been completely removed from eligibility for subvention aid. Strip mining operations in grade 4, which includes coal produced in the Drumheller valley, have also been declared ineligible for subvention assistance. Briefly, coals eligible at the present time for subvention aid are produced by underground mines in the Drumheller and Lethbridge areas and from the foothills and mountain mines.

Coal operators have estimated there is a market for western steam coal in northwestern Ontario to the extent of about 100,000 tons a year. The subvention rate last year was insufficient to permit western coal to compete in that market with United States coal. The subvention rate was raised by a recent order in council to the extent of 65 cents per ton additional to enable Canadian mines to meet this competition. The rate in that area is now $3.50 per ton.

The domestic market for Alberta coal in Ontario has always been restricted by the fact that much of the western coal shipped east was of comparatively low quality and would not store in the open without disintegration and danger of spontaneous combustion. The change in regulations, eliminating the lower quality coals from subvention assistance, should take care of that factor.

Another handicap to efficient marketing of western coal in central Canada is that up to the present time there has been no central selling agency. I was pleased to learn that coal operators in the west are now in the process of setting up such a selling agency. This agency would have the responsibility of marketing the bulk of western coal shipped to central Canada. By this arrangement coal will be sold on grade, possibly under trademarks, and customers will be able to buy with confidence.

Another encouraging feature of the marketing problem is that Alberta and British Columbia coal mining companies have been successful in negotiating a five year stabilized freight rate with both railways. Another stabilizing factor is indicated, I believe, by a news item which I saw the other day that the unions have agreed to forgo any increase in wages for the coming year. This will enable the mines to proceed with marketing arrangements with a degree of stability and confidence that has been lacking heretofore. In the west the production per man day is relatively high, production per man day in Alberta and British Columbia mines being approximately 4·79 tons per man day.

Turning now to the maritimes, in which the hon. member for Cape Breton South is particularly interested. The major part of the coal mining industry is in Nova Scotia with a relatively small portion in New Brunswick. The main problem as I see it is the high cost of production. The production per man day in the maritimes is very low, being two tons per man day or less. In that area a great many of the mines extend out under the ocean for several miles with resulting high transportation costs and loss of time between the pithead and the working face.

Following the war the Carroll commission studied the problems of the Canadian coal industry, and one of the recommendations of that commission was that the federal government should assist in the mechanization of the maritime coal industry. A fund of $10 million was established to be lent for that purpose. Immediately following the war the American coal industry, which is the chief supplier of coal requirements of central Canada, embarked on an intensive mechanization program which was completed in a comparatively short time.

The mechanization program in Nova Scotia has been delayed for various reasons until it is now at least two and a half years behind schedule. One result is that American coal is now competitive even in the home market in the maritimes. While American coal has decreased in price since the war, the price of Nova Scotia coal has continued to increase. During the period from 1948, when the mechanization program was started, to 1953 the actual cost of producing a ton of coal by the major company in the area increased approximately $2.25 a ton.

The mechanization program by the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, although considerably behind schedule, has made progress. One of the main efforts was the production of a mechanical miner. This miner was developed in the machine shops of Trenton Industries and is now at the production stage. Some fourteen of the machines are in actual operation and it is anticipated that within a very short time there will be a total of twenty-seven. I had the privilege of seeing this machine in operation and it literally throws out a river of coal. I am told that it can produce as much as 500 tons in an eight hour shift. This machine is a credit to the ingenuity and resourcefulness of Nova Scotia engineers and workmen.

I believe that some very noteworthy progress has been made in coal preparation and cleaning, especially at Old Sydney mines. I am told that the cost of production has levelled off and is showing signs of a decline this year. At the present time the Dominion Coal Company is making a careful study and reassessment of the original mechanization program with a view to modifying it, if necessary, to meet changed conditions. As yet the coal board has not received the final report from the company.

Several of the smaller independent companies have taken advantage of the mechanization loan and have installed machinery with very satisfactory results. In any discussion of the over-all problem in Nova Scotia we should keep in mind that the Dominion Coal Company and its subsidiaries produce about 90 per cent of the total output of coal and employ about 81 per cent of the labour. In considering the problems of this company's operation, therefore, we are dealing with the major problems of the Nova Scotia coal industry.

As I said before, the main problem of the industry is the high cost of production. Although the subvention assistance administered by the dominion coal board is providing a market for coal produced in that area, nevertheless the industry is vulnerable because of the high cost of production. This is true, even in the maritimes, where markets are being lost to other types of fuel. It is estimated that there are 90,000 oil burning installations in Nova Scotia.

I spent about a week in the coal fields of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick last November. My observation at that time was that the people of the area were not supporting the coal mining industry as they should, because it is by far the largest single industry in that area. I was very surprised to see oil and propane gas tanks serving residences, business premises and industrial establishments. It is estimated that oil has displaced at least half a million tons of coal per year in that area.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a free country and one cannot blame anyone for burning oil or more convenient types of fuel if he can afford to do so. However by burning coal in their homes, offices and factories the people of Nova Scotia can help to stabilize this important industry on which their basic prosperity depends. The development of modern coal stoking and burning equipment has gone a long way towards making coal just as convenient to use as the liquid or gas fuels. Consumers, coal dealers, furnace equipment companies and chambers of commerce can do much to promote the use of coal. They must realize that if the coal industry is lost, the whole economy of the maritimes will suffer.

Further, I believe that the management of industries should consider very carefully the risk of converting from coal to oil, because I believe they would probably reach the conclusion to stay with coal. In the event of a war or an international emergency, supplies of oil would be endangered and quite possibly cut off. I know that some major industries have already decided to continue to use coal just for that reason. Recently a large delegation, including the ministers of mines for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and their advisers, Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation officials, representatives of two unions and two independent operators associations, came to Ottawa to discuss ways and means of solving the problems of the industry. One of the main results of that meeting was the establishment of a committee with representatives of the unions, companies, provincial governments, various boards of trade and similar organizations through the area to promote the more efficient and extensive use of coal.

On May 20 I attended a gathering in Halifax sponsored by the provincial government for the purpose of initiating a province-wide campaign to enlist the support of the community for the greater and more efficient use of coal. The meeting was well attended and it was quite evident that the people of the area were beginning to realize that the future of the industry depends largely on its own efforts, and the continued support of the community.

Employment in the Nova Scotia coal industry has been relatively high, as compared with the United States or other parts of the world. The subvention policy, administered by the dominion coal board, has provided a market for all the quality coal produced in that area since the war, and that condition obtains for this year as well. But, as I told the meeting in Halifax, if the industry is not supported in its home market it becomes increasingly difficult to justify continued aid from the taxpayers of Canada. I believe that if the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick meet the challenge of lowering the cost of production and supporting the industry in the home market, they will soon put the industry on a sounder basis.

There is a long history in the maritime coal industry, according to rumours I have heard, of difficult labour-management relations. But I am convinced, from personal observation and regardless of the past, that there is presently a good relationship between management and labour and a growing sense of responsibility. I am convinced that both management and the executive of the unions are very sincere and are doing their best to work out the salvation of the industry. If the present campaign to enlist the support of consumers is successful, it will help, not only to preserve the home market but to provide much needed encouragement for those who are struggling directly with the problem.

The dominion coal board has engaged the services of Dr. A. G. Christie, professor emeritus of the Johns Hopkins University, who is an outstanding expert on thermal power development, to make a survey of the power establishment and potential of the maritime provinces with a view to promoting the greater use of coal in the production of cheaper power. He is presently engaged in that survey and the report will be made available to provincial governments and private industry. This is being done on the theory that the production of power will consume more coal, and cheaper power will attract more industry which will also enlarge the market for coal. We are hopeful that Dr. Christie's report will lead to beneficial results.

The Mordell project to develop a coal-fired gas turbine is in its third year. The results to date have been satisfactory. The machine is presently in operation for testing purposes. The results are being carefully studied with a view to the next step which will be practical application. The results are being carefully watched by the railroads and other industrialists. Similar experiments are being carried on in Great Britain and the United States and their results are being carefully checked with experience gained at McGill.

Our laboratories at the fuels division of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are continually experimenting with coal combustion problems, relating to the Mordell experiment and other enterprises, and also new uses for coal. The experiment carried on in the fuels division are closely co-ordinated with other efforts throughout the world, and with other efforts throughout Canada by provincial governments and others. The experiments in this field require large capital investments in equipment, and in planning the work of the department an effort is made not to duplicate work done by the provinces or by other agencies in the United States and Great Britain. At the present time the fuels division is carrying on an experiment which was initiated by the United States bureau of mines and discontinued at the time of the last change of administration.

Although there have been no recent spectacular results to report, the field of research is not being neglected. Two-thirds of the funds available to the fuels division of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are being spent on coal research. There is now a staff of approximately 50 engaged in this work. The annual cost of coal research to this department is $332,750 for this year, including the Mordell project.

I believe that the provincial government of Nova Scotia and others in the industry are giving careful study to the possibility of heating by electricity. This would indirectly promote greater use of coal, and would perhaps provide the answer to oil competition for domestic heating. Our country is expanding rapidly. If Canada reaches a population of 22 million by 1975, we will require for all purposes at least 2·5 times more fuel than we now use. Although the coal industry is now fighting for its life, I am sure that within a few years coal will play an increasingly important role in the supply of energy and fuel. We believe that it is in the national interest to extend support to this industry for the year 1954.

Before resuming my seat I should like to pay tribute to the dominion coal board, and also to the permanent staff of the coal board. The members of the dominion coal board serve without pay and come here several times a year to assist the government in the problem of administering the subventions, the problems of research and the over-all problems of the industry.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the statement the minister has given dealing with the problems of the coal industry. Certainly I am not in a position to comment on the suggested program he has brought forward—or possibly failed to bring forward, I am not sure which—with respect to the Alberta and western coal industry. That is a matter in connection with which I am sure hon. members from western Canada can make comment, when they see fit to do so.

But I must say, so far as his proposals for the coal industry of the east are concerned, that we have not been furnished with a particularly sumptuous fare tonight. After all, these discussions were delayed from March until now so that the minister could give us an announcement of government policy. And having heard that announcement we find that Dr. Christie has been retained to make further research studies in the use of coal. We appreciate any research that is to be conducted; but that is not very much to offer an industry upon which the whole life of the maritime provinces depends.

The minister has also commented on the fact that Nova Scotians must support the coal industry, and has also said that he was down there recently attending a dinner given in Halifax. I shall comment upon that dinner in a few moments. I think possibly the sumptuous fare he received that night was on a more generous scale than he is proposing to offer to the industry at the present time. Because apparently he was impressed by the argument which was advanced that night, that Nova Scotians must burn more coal if the industry is to survive. And we realize that in that province there is a responsibility on everyone to support an industry which means a great deal to the province. But that, in itself, is not a solution. If I recall his figures correctly, the minister said a moment ago that about 500,000 tons has been supplanted by the installation of oil burners in the maritime provinces, and 500,000 tons is no mean amount. I grant that. But that, in itself, is no answer to the problem.

One would hesitate at this late hour of the night and late date in the session to take the time of the committee to deal with this problem, were it not for the fact that this is of vital interest to the people of the maritime provinces. Not only is it of vital interest to the people represented by my hon. friend from Cape Breton South, and other constituencies in that area, but it is also vital to all of us in the maritime provinces. It is vital to the hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island, and to the hon. member for Charlotte, in the extreme southwest corner of New Brunswick. It is of vital interest to the Annapolis valley; for the economy of the maritime provinces, to a greater or lesser extent, is reflected in the prosperity of the industrial area of Cape Breton. And if that area goes down, or is prejudiced to any material extent, then we are all prejudiced. And that is why I do not apologize for speaking at this time.

The minister has referred to a dinner he attended. I read a press report concerning it and, if I recall correctly, the minister of mines in Nova Scotia said at that dinner that the coal industry brought directly to Nova Scotia more money than is received in that province for family allowances, old age pensions, and all the cash payments made by the dominion treasury to the provincial treasury of Nova Scotia, which is a very substantial amount of money. One can easily see what that means in the purchase of agricultural products and everything else in the maritime provinces.

There is no doubt that the coal industry as a whole is in a bad way. One does not have to reinforce that statement with figures. I have some figures which are published by the minister's department and which show a reduction in the consumption of coal—a reduction not only in Nova Scotia. The minister has said that Nova Scotians must save the coal industry. Well, look at the consumption of Canadian coal as a whole and you will find, using round figures, that in 1949-50 the nation consumed 19,726,000 tons, that in 1951 that amount had fallen to 18,400,000 tons and that by 1953-54 it is estimated that it is going to fall to 15,500,000 tons. In other words there is a fall of 4 million tons in the last two years in the consumption of Canadian coal by the nation. And a substantial part of that reduction comes of course from the use of American coal. There are various explanations offered. The minister has suggested that one reason has been the installation of oil burners. I know people are inclined to blame the railways for the installation of diesel engines. Indeed, sometimes I have indulged in some such criticism, myself.

I noticed the other day, in reading the evidence of Mr. Donald Gordon before the committee of this house, that he gave figures to show—and I shall not repeat the figures at this time—what the dieselization had meant in a reduction in the consumption of coal in Canada. And, although it is substantial, it is not such an impressive figure. He made this positive statement, that the Canadian National Railways could and would buy every ton of coal produced by the maritime mines, of adequate quality, if the price was right. In other words he indicated that it was not a matter of coal being supplanted by dieselization, but that to a certain extent at any rate it was a matter of government policy, as to whether the government-owned railway was prepared to buy coal from our mines at this time.

That is something I would impress upon the minister, as well as the fact that Nova Scotians must burn more coal. We have to consider how many government institutions have supplanted coal-burning installations with oil-burning, and how much coal is being burned by the railways today, or could be burned.

I say again it is not a matter of dieselization so much as it is one of government policy as to how much coal will be used. And this is not the first time that the coal industry has faced a disastrous situation. My memory goes back, as I am sure the memory of the hon. member for Cape Breton South does, to earlier days in Nova Scotia when the mines in that province, as it was then said, were facing disaster. And whatever one may say of a company which today is operating 90 per cent of those mines, certainly one can say at least that the labour situation is vastly improved over what it was in the twenties. I recall a time when special mounted police were requested by the Nova Scotia government to ride down miners on the streets because they were protesting against unemployment, and the virtual starvation which was in existence at that time.

The consumption of Nova Scotia coal at that time was down to a matter of a few hundred thousand tons, and I think it is only right to say that it was due to the energy, the courage and the imagination of two men, and those who were associated with them at that time—the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, who was then prime minister of Canada, and Gordon Harrington, then premier of Nova Scotia, and the minister of mines—that that situation was solved.

We find, for instance, that in 1931 and 1932 only 413,000 tons of maritime coal moved outside for consumption. In face of that disaster the Bennett government, at the request of the Nova Scotia government, increased subventions materially, and as a result the consumption of Nova Scotia coal jumped in the next year or two years later to 1,600,000 tons, an increase of over 400 per cent, and went on from there to over 2 million tons. Even today it is still at the level of 1,600,000 tons. That shows what can be done by, as I say, imagination, energy and courage directed toward the solution of the problem.

I am not suggesting for one moment, Mr. Chairman, that increased subventions are going to solve this problem, except to a minor degree; but it was used as a solution at that time, and it proved successful. It gave to the industry what one might call a shot in the arm, which pulled it out of the slough into which it had fallen. We had a reorganization of the company; we had better labour relations, and as a result we went on until we came to the situation with which we are confronted today. I believe that again something can be done to improve this situation if you have imagination and if you face the situation realistically.

In its report the coal board set forth what it believes must be the solution of this problem. I will not read it. At page 13 we find the following:

> That the Canadian coal mining industry is vital to our national economy is axiomatic. The best approach to these problems appears to be by way of concerted courses of action by the federal government, the provinces and components of the trade itself.

What is the future? Is there a future for this industry? I think the minister, by his own departmental officials, establishes definitely that there is. The other day we listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce speaking in this house. He was dealing with atomic energy. He outlined the demands for increased electrical energy in this country which were to follow if Canada pursued the normal course of development. Without checking on his figures, as I recall them, he stated that by 1975, if Canada had developed every bit of hydroelectric energy which would be available, including the proposed development of the St. Lawrence seaway, we would still be 10 million horsepower short of full requirements of the development of industry, and he suggested that some of that would come, he hoped, from atomic energy. I hope he is right. But why concentrate on the development of atomic energy for this purpose? I think that a large amount of that power could come from a further utilization of coal.

The minister paid tribute to the officers and members of the dominion coal board. I join in that. I hold in my hand a speech which was delivered to the mining institute by Mr. O'Brien, who was assistant to the chairman of the dominion coal board. He deals exhaustively with the situation as it is today, and points out that the total consumption of Canadian coal this year has dropped down to 15,500,000 tons. He says it is going to drop still further. He fears it may take a substantial drop. Do not forget that the total, including United States imports, was 32 million tons. He goes on to say that on the basis of any reasonable estimate, and I think his estimates are reasonable, it would appear that by 1965, and that is not very far away as time goes, we are going to use 45 million tons of coal in this country. That is going to tax the coal-producing facilities which we have today. Therefore I say this is a matter of national economy, not only from the standpoint of saving the economic framework of the maritimes but also from the standpoint of the nation as a whole; it is essential that we safeguard this mining industry.

I do not have to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that a mine is not like a restaurant. You cannot close it up today, put a padlock on the door, go away and come back ten years from now, clean out the spiders and cobwebs, put in a new stove and start operations. You have to maintain those facilities.

The minister has told us about our mines being expensive. We realize they are based under the sea; we realize that the seams go down under the sea. We realize also there are problems of flooding, and the rest of it, which once allowed to get away from us would be almost insuperable to deal with in the future. Therefore I say that the figures definitely establish there will be a need for Canadian coal, a great deal of Canadian coal, over the next few years. The minister says that his department realizes the importance of it. I say that if that is the case, then certainly there must be a greater degree of co-operation than we have had heretofore in the development and the maintenance of that industry.

There are many ways in which it could be done of course. There is the steel industry of the maritimes, one of the great potential markets for coal. It should be further extended and developed. One can feel a little bit unhappy about threats which one sees today in the export of ores to other parts of Canada rather than to Cape Breton where, if we had them, and under co-operation with management, a greater steel industry could be established and far more coal could be used.

The minister referred to the development of electric energy from the use of coal. He said that a survey is being made of the use of coal for that purpose. Well, power demands for energy are expanding, Mr. Chairman, but the answer to that is to provide more industrialization. If we have more industries in the maritime provinces we will need more energy, and therefore we will be able to use more coal.

I want to pay tribute to the Nova Scotia Light and Power Company for the way in which that company is burning Nova Scotia coal today and is offering a greater market for that coal in the future. I am told by engineers that oil is almost competitive with coal today. When speaking about oil potentials we must remember this. Almost half of our time in this house is directed toward international affairs and the possibility of crises; in other words, the possibility of war. Do not ever forget, Mr. Chairman, that all of the oil that comes into the eastern seaboard is brought in by ship. We have no pipe lines in the east, and we will not have them, as far as one can see, in any possible foreseeable future. We therefore cannot allow a situation to develop where our industrial life, our domestic economy, is dependent upon the importation of oil, because it might be cut off at any moment of time.

The minister referred to research. That has been discussed before. The minister has mentioned also the possibility of the turbine engine. He says that research has gone on for three years, and is going to go on further. I think it should go on, Mr. Chairman, much more rapidly. Possibly there lies the solution to a major problem of the coal industry. If they could solve the problem of avoiding the ash, the engineers say that the engine is just about ready for commercial use. That is quite possible. I have seen the engines and the engineers before the railway committee, and we read of them in other places. Once a few more kinks are ironed out, the turbine engine can produce power more economically than any other instrument known to man. If that happens you will have a demand for coal there which will solve the problems, not only of the coal mines of the east but also of Alberta and elsewhere.

I am not suggesting this in any criticism of the present minister because he was not there at the time, at least he was not the minister in that department. I am told by one who played a great part in the original research on that engine that he had to borrow—I think that is the polite term—some money from the national research board because there was not enough available for him in his own department to start the initial research on this engine which offers such great possibilities. As I said, this requires a great deal more imagination than has been shown up to the present time.

I must say I was somewhat dismayed when I read of this dinner to which the minister referred some time ago. He said he went down and had dinner in Halifax which was attended by the minister of mines for Nova Scotia. There was a great fanfare of trumpets at that time and we were told that this was a meeting to solve the problems of the industry in Nova Scotia. The business leaders from all over the province, cabinet ministers, and our own minister were all invited and Nova Scotia coal, very properly cleaned, was piled on the tablecloth at the meeting. So one can see how delicate this was. The suggestion was made that the solution to the problem lay in the removal of the oil burner by the civilian population and the reinstallation of coal.

As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, I realize we have some responsibility in this matter, but I do not think we are going to solve the problems affecting this major industry by urging Nova Scotians to take out all oil burners and put back coal. I do not know how many of the executives and officers of the coal board who were there that night have already taken out their oil burners and installed coal. It is an interesting question and the answer would be even more interesting if you could get it. That suggestion seems somewhat analogous to farmers urging people to take the car out of the garage and put in a horse so that they can sell more hay. That possibility is about as remote as the people of Nova Scotia taking out their oil burners and installing coal, and I fear they are not going to solve the problems of the Nova Scotia coal industry in that manner. I do not think that scheme would work even if the financial representatives who were present that evening would undertake to finance the reinstallation of coal burners.

As I said, I do not think that is the solution to the problem and I hope it does not presage any move whereby a solution will be sought along these lines so that someone can come along later on and say, "you were given the opportunity and failed to take it. Now, regretfully and reluctantly we have to do something more drastic about it." I would hesitate to think that that would happen but it is pretty hard at the moment to come to any other conclusion as to why this was done.

I do not intend to take up any more of the time of the committee. I simply want to reiterate again the importance of this industry and the fact that I believe that through these various developments on electric energy, research on the turbine engine and by other means more and more coal can be used. But ultimately the responsibility must rest on hon. gentlemen opposite because financial assistance will probably be required and I think I can say, Mr. Chairman, regardless of the political affinities, that the representatives in this house from the maritime provinces are not going to stand idly by and see this great industry cut down to such an extent that our whole economic fabric is threatened to a greater extent than ever before. Certainly the cities and towns of Cape Breton island cannot be allowed to become deserted villages and the Canso causeway, designed for the development of that area, allowed to become simply an easy avenue of escape for unemployed miners so as to get out of Cape Breton island and into Ontario. That is what it may be used for if we do not get more emphasis, more direction, and more help in that industry than is the case today.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am disappointed that this item had to remain in the blue book until this stage of the session. I anticipated there would be a discussion on this subject much sooner than this, otherwise I would have raised it on a motion to go into supply because it is a question of great urgency and importance and I do not give the minister very much credit for the way in which he handled it.

But I am not going to criticize the minister because he is relatively new to his present position. This industry faces a very serious crisis. There was a meeting held on March 12 in this city at which representatives of the mine workers union, the coal companies, and members of the provincial government were present and the recommendations made at that meeting, so I understand, went to the cabinet. The main reason why we delayed this discussion was to give the minister an opportunity of finding out exactly what the government policy was so he could announce it in the house and lay the basis for discussion. But that announcement was never made in this house until tonight, and as far as I am concerned I am disappointed with it.

However during the period when we were waiting for the minister to issue a statement arising out of the deliberations of the cabinet the minister issued a statement to the press and I would suggest to him that in future it would be good policy for any minister in this house to make his announcements in the House of Commons before making them through the public press.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. The hon. member is wrong. I am quite sure I did not make any statement to the press. What the hon. member may be referring to are the orders in council approving the extension of subventions at the same rate as last year.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to argue that point with the minister. I have half a dozen clippings here from newspapers in which he is reported to have stated that the government had increased the subventions and made a sort of packaged deal with Westville, Nova Scotia, and so on. These are matters which arose out of the cabinet deliberations based on that meeting. This announcement was never made in the house. However, I guess we all make mistakes.

I want to assure the chairman and members of the committee in this house that as far as I am concerned I am not fighting for the maintenance of the coal mining industry because it provides good jobs. It is the last job I would recommend anyone to undertake as a means of obtaining a livelihood. I have done a lot of it myself and I hope that I live to see the day when it will not be necessary for men to go underground and sweat and go through the misery I have gone through in operations of that kind in order to obtain a bite to eat, and that is about what it amounts to. Therefore, I do not want anyone to think that I am pleading for the maintenance of that industry because it is a good means of obtaining a livelihood for those who are obliged to go underground and dig coal.

I am not including those who operate these coal mines and those who have investments. It is a relatively good position to be on the board of directors or in the higher echelon of officials, but as a means of livelihood for a man who has to dig coal, and I do not care whether he gets it with modern means or with the old-time shovel, it is still a long, hard, backbreaking job in which you become prematurely old at the age of 35 or 40, when your back begins to break, and then you are seeking a cure for arthritis for the rest of your life.

Another thing I am not doing is asking for charity for the people of Cape Breton island. They are pioneers. They are the stock that came to this country when there was very little in it and they chopped down the trees and built whatever there is in the way of industry and civilization in that part of the country and in other stretches of this country.

They are not the kind of people who want charity. If they have to get out, they will do so and they will not do much squawking about it. But in order to get an intelligent discussion of this problem there are two or three things that we must think about. The first one is this. We must make an assessment of the value of this industry in the Canadian economy. If it is not of any value, it should not be maintained. But if it is of some value in the economy of the country, it should be maintained just as we have to maintain wheat and other essentials.

I am first going to point out what the coal industry means to that community. The minister knows that about 30,000 people are employed there. There are another couple of thousand in Newfoundland in the iron industry. Let it not be forgotten that coal is the basis of the iron and steel industries. All of that set-up is dependent upon the maintenance of a basic coal industry. The corporation produces half of the bituminous coal mined in Canada. Its steel plant at Trenton and so on is based on coal. Coal is the main prop of the whole economy of Nova Scotia. What does it mean to Canada as a whole?

I assume that the minister and every other responsible member of this committee think that we are going to build up and to expand the steel industry in this country. Any nation that asserts that it is an industrial nation but does not develop a basic steel industry is only trying to fool someone. It is necessary to have a basic steel industry in a country like Canada. You cannot have a basic steel industry without bituminous coal. That is something that must be remembered. When there is talk about letting the basic bituminous coal industry go in Canada, it means that you are going to let your steel industry go also because you have no other fuel which will take the place of coal, whether it is oil, natural gas, atomic energy or anything else. You must have bituminous coal and you must coke it in order to turn out basic steel. So if for no other reason than for the sake of the national economy of a country that in the future will be a great industrial section of North America, in my judgment it is necessary to have a coal industry. The basis of the economy of an industrial nation is steel. The basis for steel is the bituminous coal industry. For these reasons this industry is important to this country.

The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is a good witness to call on the subject of the importance of the industry. In the Ottawa Citizen of February 4, 1954, the minister makes a very good statement. This article was written by Austin Cross, and the minister is likely to remember it. In that article written by Mr. Cross the minister points out the importance of the coal industry in the event of another war; the possibility of an increase in the coal needs of Canada; the fact that you cannot measure the oil deposits accurately; that you do not know how much you have; that there is not any assurance that it is going to last forever; that with the development of air transport and ships the use of oil is so great today that the drain on it is going to be terrific in the future; that to think about letting the coal industry go, as I mentioned a few moments ago, considering the factors I mentioned is not to be considered. The minister builds the thing up to a much greater extent. I do not want to read his own statement back to him but it is a good statement with regard to assessing the value of the coal industry in Canada's future.

There is another analysis made here just recently. Quoting the dominion coal board, this writer points out as follows:

> "Final analysis of Canada's future energy requirements," reports the dominion coal board, "indicates that the demand for coal will substantially increase over the present level from about the year 1965 onwards. A major problem facing the Canadian coal industry is how to bridge the gap between today's lowered consumption and the expected augmented demand of the future."

That is a realistic position for the coal board to take. However, there is quite a large gap there between 1954 and 1965. It is too long to keep coal miners on unemployment insurance; and if they are not on unemployment insurance, it is a long time to be hungry. The coal board is there definitely warning, as did the minister, that by the year 1965 we are going to need a coal industry. As the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings-Hants pointed out—

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Gillis: Yes; the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. I always get that holy trinity mixed up. As I say, he indicated that closing up a coal mine is not just like closing up a restaurant or a beer parlour. If you close a coal mine—particularly one of those submarine mines—and leave it shut down for three or four months, that is the end of it. It takes in water very fast; it fills with gas; the roof will cave in; and the first thing you know you have no mine to come back to.

Another thing that needs to be remembered is this. If you get your trained coal miners out of that industry and into something else, you will not get them back into it. A great many people proceed on the assumption that you can take anybody and put him down in a coal mine and he can dig coal. That is a wrong assumption. The Americans found that out in 1920 when they thought they could dig coal with bayonets in Colorado. Fairly soon they did not have any bayonets, they did not have any soldiers going to dig coal and they did not have any coal mine.

To become a coal miner, in a submarine mine in Nova Scotia at least, there is a certain procedure that must be followed. You are not even permitted to go to the coal face and be recognized as a coal miner or to engage in that work until you have had three years of apprenticeship. After you have had three years of apprenticeship you must write an examination and be qualified before you get a certificate. That is just the ordinary Joe who digs coal. It takes him at least 3½ years before he is allowed by law to go to the coal face in any mine in Nova Scotia. Of course when you get into your managers and your overmen and those categories, the mathematics required is equivalent to a university education. You just cannot get that kind of people overnight. It takes time to get them.

In that industry in Nova Scotia at the present time you have a well-trained staff. If they were displaced and got away from there, you would not be able to replace them in this generation. If by 1965 the requirements of the country are as forecast by the coal board, someone in this country must take some responsibility for the maintenance of the industry. I think that is all I need to say as to the value of the industry, not only in the economy of Nova Scotia but in the future development of Canada.

There is another question we shall have to ask ourselves, and I hope someone in the opposition will not accuse me of looking for a seat in the Senate or of always defending the government. I like to call the shots as I see them. That industry is in bad shape. Who is responsible? The answer to that question is obvious. The coal resources of any province are in the hands of the province. The government of the province is the custodian of the resources for the people of the province. That is the first point to remember.

The second thing to remember is that the provincial government leases that resource to the corporation. Under the terms of the lease the corporation has the right to manage it. During the last twenty-five or thirty years the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation has had a complete monopoly in the province as far as coal is concerned. Under the present scheme of things nobody has a right to dictate to the provincial government or the company as to how they should manage the industry. So they go along and they get into difficulties. I want hon. members to remember that the federal government has no authority to give orders either to the province or to the corporation as to the management of the industry.

There was no authority at all until the outbreak of the war. Then it was made a national industry under the War Measures Act and the federal government had some say. But after the war was over the authority reverted to the province. Therefore whatever is wrong about the condition of the industry from the standpoint of marketing and salesmanship, the responsibility for that rests squarely on the shoulders of the provincial government and the corporation. After a lot of discussion in the house from year to year the government finally appointed a royal commission which brought in a report analysing the industry from coast to coast and saying what they thought should be done. The minority report contained a recommendation to set up a dominion coal board.

On June 17, 1947 a bill was passed by the house establishing the dominion coal board. If members will look at that legislation they will see that it gives the board very little authority. The explanatory note merely stated that the bill provided for the setting up of the dominion coal board, that the board would have advisory functions under section 6 and administrative functions under section 8, and that its regular officers, clerks, employees and so on would be civil servants. The board merely had an advisory function. But that was one thing at least that was done to bring about some regulation on a national scale. An effort was made to see what could be done about developing the mechanics to make it work.

After a lot of deliberation and consideration legislation was passed by the house to assist the producers of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces. I heard arguments advanced before the passage of the bill that production was down and costs were high, and the reason that was given was absenteeism, that the men were not working. That was the swan song of the corporation for several years. You do not hear that any more. However that was said to be the trouble. The industry was in bad shape but it was said that the company was not responsible. Therefore this legislation was introduced to lend them some money for the purpose of carrying out a program of mechanization.

I am not going to repeat my opinions. I said a good many times in the house long before that legislation was passed that that kind of program would not be of very much value. Of course I only worked in these mines for twenty-six years. I did not know anything about them, but someone with a little book knowledge comes in as general manager and he knows all about it. An appropriation of $10 million was made and a mechanization program was started. The minister told us tonight in his policy statement that the program is two and a half years behind. That is pretty good engineering, two and a half years behind with a mechanization program that was going to increase production tremendously.

It did not increase production. Just on the eve of the federal election the company closed one of their largest collieries, the one in which they installed their first heavy electrical equipment. Of course this business of mechanization is a misnomer so far as these collieries are concerned. These mines were always mechanized. The coal was cut and bored by machinery, but the machinery was operated by compressed air. The change-over could be more properly termed an electrification program because they put in electrical equipment to replace air-driven machines.

That mine was closed affecting some 1,600 men. It was done overnight with no notice except a radio announcement that they were not working any more. So far as the company was concerned, that was all the notice the men got, although there was talk about the closing for a year before. At that time the men made an offer to the provincial government and the company. They said: "There is no need to close the mine. It is faulty engineering that is the trouble. Give us that mine for one month and we will increase production by 40 per cent. Let us have a try at it and get these engineers out of the way for a while". But the mine closed. It is now back in operation.

The company is hollering today because in the maritime provinces there are 90,000 domestic units using oil or propane gas. Whose fault is that? Is that the fault of the people? If you are operating a business, have a commodity to sell and do not sell it, it is not the fault of the customer who may turn to some other commodity. The fact that oil and propane gas installations have been made to that extent in the maritime provinces adds up to a faulty sales policy on the part of the company, and nothing else.

[Mr. Gillis.]

The minister did not say this but I said it to a board of trade meeting in Sydney at which the general manager of the company was present. I said that I was prepared to argue that the Canadian National Railways had carried out their dieselization program too fast. I said that in the house and in the railway committee to Mr. Gordon before any diesels were used on the C.N.R. I told Mr. Gordon that he should make haste slowly with that program and give the coal industry a chance to adapt itself. But while we can criticize the C.N.R., and rightly so, for carrying out dieselization east of Montreal too rapidly, I should like to ask the minister if he knows that at the steel plant in Sydney, operated by the same corporation that operates the coal mines only thirteen miles away, there are thirteen diesel engines doing the shunting in the general yard which has meant that some 1,200 tons of coal per month are no longer used.

That is the company that is operating the coal mines. I should also like to ask the minister if he knows that in a recent swing-over in their open hearth operations the company installed electric equipment that displaced the use of another few thousand tons of coal. They changed to electricity. They can argue of course that it was done because they have to cut costs and so on. That is fine, but if we are going to sell that coal—and I have told them this—to people in eastern and western Canada, including the Canadian National Railways, the company should lead the way by using their own product in their own business in and around the steel plant.

Now, the responsibility rests with the provinces. There is where the first responsibility lies, with the company and with the provincial government. I go over these disabilities and try to place them where they belong, but that is not the cure for this situation. In my judgment, there is an answer. The coal industry today cannot be looked at by itself. It has to be looked at as one section of the whole fuel industry because they all tie in together. We are spending a lot of money in the development of hydroelectric power in Ontario, in the state of New York and so forth; we are rushing at it in just such a manner as the Canadian National rushed to put in these diesels. At the same time we are building pipe lines from coast to coast. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce clearly indicated that there was too much haste in building a certain pipe line to the west coast on the assumption they were going to supply the area with oil. It is more economic to bring in oil by a different method, and people are buying the oil brought in in that way. We are going to pipe natural gas from Alberta all the way down to the east. The coal industry is making a bid to come back.

Does that not tell the minister that in a country like Canada the first requirement before you are going to get anywhere is to try to develop in the centre of the country a body like the coal board. This board would have to have more personnel, a couple of fuel engineers, a few economists and some accountants, who could sit down and examine the country and ascertain the most economic use of oil, gas, electricity or coal in the different zones across this country. Let us stop for a moment and think about the newspaper reports we have seen for the past several months. We are being told that atomic energy is about ready. A few days ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us quite definitely that atomic energy would be used in the foreseeable future for the generation of power and at a cost at the switchboard which would be equivalent to coal selling for $8 per ton.

The minister indicated there is a survey being made in the maritimes of the possible uses of thermal power. If the use of atomic energy is so close, do you not think we are being very foolish in the rush there is today across the country to pipe this oil and gas to various centres? Atomic energy might make these things obsolete next year. I know there is a huge experiment being conducted in Britain. I believe the minister has a committee investigating this question today. What we need is a competent body with some authority because there are certain people in this country who, if they see they can make a dollar in the stock market, will go out and build a pipe line. There are other people who do not realize what the future fuel will be, who will put money into a particular development of a fuel that will perhaps be obsolete next year.

If we are going to be sensible, and if there is a dominion-provincial conference, I believe the proposition should be put to the provincial governments concerning the establishment of a national fuel policy. We can call each other names all we like; we can blame this fellow, that fellow and the other fellow, but in the final analysis if we do not get authority in the hands of some central organization that has the power to analyse the problem and correlate all the fuels that are in their embryo stages today, I am fairly sure that within the next four or five years we are going to wind up with a mess on our hands in the fuel field. This is a field with which we cannot afford to fool because it is at the root of our whole economy.

In so far as this turbine engine is concerned, I know that everyone who expresses an opinion on it is only making a good guess, but I think the statements in the press during the last several months to the effect that the turbine engine will be the saviour of the coal industry is bad psychology. I have looked at it, and I know the minister has been down to look at it, as has the chairman of the coal board. I do not believe that engine as it is today will ever be in service in a locomotive. Of course that is not yet determined, and the only way it can be determined is for the Canadian National to get a large appropriation of money, put their engineers in there to see what kind of locomotive it would need. Then they would have to build a locomotive to accommodate it, and that would take a long time. I do not believe that is a solution of the present difficulties of the coal industry.

As the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings said a moment ago, it might perhaps be the best method for the generation of power in small power plants using coal. However, I still do not believe that that engine will be ready for any commercial use within at least the next ten years; that is my own opinion. It is only a guess, but that is all anyone can make at the present time.

I am sorry that at this stage in the session I had to get up and say this, Mr. Chairman. I want to seriously suggest to the minister that so far as I can see there is no other solution for this whole fuel problem in Canada except getting a competent body, and making arrangements with the provincial governments to make this industry a national industry. Then you could take all the fuels, have them examined realistically by competent people and determine what use you are going to make of them in relation to the possibility of atomic energy in the foreseeable future for industrial purposes.

Mr. Prudham: May I ask the hon. member a question? Did he suggest that all sources of fuel should be nationalized?

Mr. Gillis: I do not know what the minister means by "nationalized", Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Prudham: I do not know what the hon. member means by it.

Mr. Gillis: I did not use the term. I never used the word at all because there are too many people who do not understand it and it has too many bad connotations. The minister will recall what was done during the war. It is peculiar that we can work so effectively in a crisis. One of the first things that was done was that the coal industry was made a national industry. People were put in to handle it who had authority; wages went up; standards were raised and we got vacations with pay for the first time in the history of the industry. Everything went along fine. As soon as the war was over the machinery was unscrambled. I should like to see you take authority for the whole fuel industry across this country as you did during the war. If a war broke out now you would do it overnight; you would have to do it in order to avoid a lot of overlapping, extra costs, competition and mix-up in the fuel industry—

Mr. Prudham: Perhaps shut off the oil into Nova Scotia?

Mr. Gillis: What was that? No, I do not say cut it off at all. The minister cannot say that because he does not know any more about it than most people who talk about it. We are all feeling our way, but we are honestly trying to get rid of a bad mess. The minister knows this very well. The mess the coal industry is in today is due to the fact that you have been working on the same mechanics for the last 75 or 80 years. It has always been in trouble; this is not the first time. As far back as I can remember it has been in trouble because of faulty mechanics. And it always will be in trouble the way it is today.

Then so far as that business of nationalization is concerned, I seem to have more confidence in the federal government than most of the ministers have because I am quite prepared to hand over the organization and direction of the fuel industry of this country to the federal government, as the elected representatives of the people of Canada. I would rather take a chance on the attitude of the minister of the government, to whom I can talk in the House of Commons, than take a chance on some president of a board of directors living down on mount Royal in Montreal, whom I never have a chance to talk to. If the minister wants to call that nationalization, all right. The only thing is that I am a little bit sorry he is afraid of himself.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: I am prepared to go on, if the committee agrees. Perhaps after I have concluded my remarks the item might pass—I do not know.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South is a very good friend of mine. In our speeches on coal we always seem to be able to hit it off pretty well. He, of course, has some practical knowledge. My knowledge is gained from studies I have been able to make, and conferences I have been able to have with those in the coal mining industry. But I will say this, that while the hon. member is a very good friend of mine I do not think he answered the minister's question with respect to nationalization.

We listened this evening to what has come to be known as the minister's policy speech, upon the introduction of the departmental estimates. I should like to make only one or two comments on what he said. He mentioned the fact that the government had been interested in the coal mining industry for the last 28 years, and lauded the work of the coal board, and in that I agree with him. Perhaps the coal board has not had all the authority it may have desired, but so far as the responsibilities placed upon it are concerned I do not think anyone would criticize that board.

The minister mentioned subventions. I am quite willing to give the government all the credit necessary for the introduction of its subventions policy. Because I am quite certain that the coal mining industry of Canada, particularly that of western Canada, would have folded up many years ago had it not been for the subventions paid on the movement of coal. I will give the government all credit for that.

Nevertheless I do maintain, and have maintained over the years, that the government has never really had an adequate national coal policy. The minister was quite apologetic in his speech when he referred to the present situation in the coal mining industry of Canada. He made special mention of the problem in the Crowsnest pass where recently a very substantial coal mine was closed down. He said that these mines in the Crowsnest pass will have a reasonable chance, but in the very next breath he pointed out to us that one of the largest coal mines in the Crowsnest pass area, the International Coal and Coke Company, had closed down. How they can have a reasonable chance when at the same time they are closing down, I do not know.

To my mind the minister's speech painted a rather gloomy picture. He did say he was hopeful, and it is a good thing to be hopeful. But we also hear it said that hope deferred maketh the heart sick. While he said he was hopeful, he said also that the coal mining industry is fighting for its life. That is the expression he used, that it is fighting for its life. And then he proceeded to say, "But I am confident". Now it is a very nice thing to be hopeful, and it is also a nice thing to be confident. When I go back to my constituency and have to meet the coal miners and the coal mine operators—those who are operating mines about to fold up—I will have to tell them, "Well, the minister has confidence." I am afraid the coal miners are apt to turn to me and say, "That is all right, Hansell, but confidence does not put any pork chops on our tables, nor does it buy the baby any shoes. You can't run the coal mining industry on hope and confidence."

Of course the picture is not all one-sided. While the minister painted a gloomy picture, he said he was facing the facts. The situation is becoming desperate. Some months ago I received telegrams from various parts of my constituency in the Crowsnest pass calling my attention to the fact that these mines were closing down. I have one resolution here from a meeting held at Natal in British Columbia, also in the Crowsnest pass. This community is not in my constituency, but is bordering it. I am sure other hon. members may have received a similar resolution. It was passed at a meeting attended by residents of the Crowsnest pass area in Alberta and British Columbia, and reads as follows:

Resolved that we press upon both the provincial and federal governments to implement a Canadian policy which will enable Canadian coal to supply the Canadian market, which will bring the establishment of the industries to process coal for its by-products; which will increase unemployment insurance benefits and make them continuous until steady work is available; which will recognize that the welfare of the mines and the mining industry is a government responsibility, and it is their duty to provide either work or full maintenance.

The other telegram comes from a public meeting held in the town of Blairmore. I have another telegram from a member of the local legislature. I shall not read these, but they show the seriousness of the situation, because these were sent pursuant to the announcement that these coal mines were closing down. I brought the matter up in the house at that time and, if I may, I shall read the minister's answer. I asked my question when the orders of the day were called on March 24. My question was as follows:

Has the government any knowledge of the report appearing in the Calgary Albertan that the coal mines in Coleman, Alberta, are to close down operations on March 31, and that other mines in the Crowsnest pass are likely to follow with shutdowns? If so, does the government contemplate any remedial action?

And I want hon. members to take note of the answer the minister gave. It is quite lengthy, but the part I wish to call to the attention of the committee is this:—

Mr. Prudham: Read it all.

Mr. Hansell: All right, I shall, but I did not want to take the time.

Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report to which my hon. friend refers. I am sure all hon. members know that the coal industry in both eastern and western Canada is experiencing difficulty at the present time. In western Canada the industry's difficulties have been brought about largely through competition from oil and gas. I need not remind hon. members that the natural resources belong to the provinces. The province of Alberta has prospered enormously from the sale of natural gas and oil rights; only recently I saw a report of one sale amounting to over $30 million for two comparatively small areas of land.

This is the part that I was going to quote, without the other, for the sake of brevity:

The province of Alberta is prospering from these recent developments. The coal industry is suffering from these developments. What I would like to know is, what is the Alberta government going to do about it?

I do not like to be mean in my expressions, but I am going to tell the minister that I regard that as nothing but a cheap political answer. What has the Alberta government done about it? In his speech tonight the minister had something to say about what the Alberta government had been doing in respect to the coal mining industry there. Perhaps I can read a passage from Premier Manning's budget speech of a few months ago. This budget speech was given on March 5. I asked the minister the question on March 24. As I say, the budget speech was delivered on March 5; therefore the minister should have known what the Alberta government had been doing about it. On page 10 of Mr. Manning's budget speech, published by the queen's printer, we find the following:

Alberta's important coal industry has, in recent years, suffered from loss of markets to competitive fuels. Replacement of railway locomotives by diesel units and the conversion of coal burning locomotives to oil burners has greatly reduced what formerly was a substantial market for bituminous coal. Oil and gas progressively have eliminated coal from local domestic and industrial markets, while excessive transportation costs have made the capture and retention of eastern Canadian markets extremely difficult. Production in 1953 totalled 5,917,423 tons, a decrease of 1,277,049 tons from the previous year.

The government has assured the industry of its full co-operation in a renewed effort to increase the sale of Alberta coal in eastern markets and in this endeavour the government of the province of Ontario and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys of the government of Canada have indicated active support. The government is convinced that a long-range solution to the problems facing our coal mining industry must be sought in fields other than the utilization of coal in its natural state. With this in mind, the legislature at this session will be asked to approve a substantial appropriation to provide a research laboratory for the Alberta research council with special pilot plant facilities for coal research. The government of Canada has agreed to assist in staffing this research laboratory with qualified personnel to carry out this important program from which it is hoped beneficial results will be obtained.

The minister knew that when he asked what the Alberta government was doing. That is why I say it was a cheap political answer. I am quite sure the minister will not deny that the Alberta government have co-operated in every way possible with his own department in order to bring about a better day for the coal mining industry. I never heard Mr. Manning or anyone in the Alberta government criticize the minister's department. I believe there is the best of co-operation between the two departments. Why? Because they both have something to gain, the country has something to gain, and I am not going to say that the minister's department is not anxious to care for the welfare of the country or of the coal mining industry or whatever comes under that department. The fact is I do not think they know where they are going in respect to a national coal policy.

The situation is serious, Mr. Chairman. Might I say this: Not only has the Alberta government done that, they have done something further, and this is something the minister did not mention in his speech tonight. At the recent legislative session the Alberta government appropriated $100,000 for the rehabilitation of unemployed coal miners so that they could be taken somewhere else and be re-established. That is a magnanimous thing because the situation is serious, without very much hope for the future. Therefore it is a matter of what are these men going to do? They have built their homes there; they have raised their families there; they have worked in the mines all their lives; they are competent coal miners. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, it takes a lifetime to develop a coal miner, and when they grow older or are thrown out of work there is nothing much else they can do. They have to be put somewhere or rehabilitated, and encouraged to establish some place else if possible. The Alberta government recognized that and appropriated $100,000 for the purpose. When I was home a few weeks ago one of the ministers of the Alberta government was down in the Crowsnest pass looking over the situation and taking applications. In one day they had about 300 applications. That is what the Alberta government is doing, Mr. Chairman, if the minister wants to know. It is not the first time of course that the coal mining industry has had to face a serious situation.

We in this group have brought these things to the attention of the government many times. For the last two years, year in and year out, the hon. member for Red Deer has urged the government to take further steps to make something of this coal mining industry by bringing into existence a real coal policy. The hon. member for Bow River has the Drumheller coal mining industry in his constituency. I referred to the hon. member for Red Deer. He has the coal mining industry in the community of Nordegg, and I have a coal mining industry in the Crowsnest pass. The hon. member for Lethbridge has a coal mining industry there.

We are interested in this because in Alberta there are countless millions and millions of tons of coal in those hills. I said it was serious, Mr. Chairman, and it is. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Calgary Herald that the hon. member for Red Deer handed to me. It indicates something of the seriousness of the situation. It appeared in the Calgary Herald on March 1, 1954. I will not read the whole article. It states that statistics show that the coal production in Alberta alone—these are not national figures —dropped 1,277,049 tons in 1953. The output in 1952 was 7,194,472 tons; in 1953 it was 5,917,423 tons. The highest production in Alberta was in 1946 when it ran to about 9 million tons. At that time 200 mines were operating. Now there are just 150 mines. In 1946, 9,153 people were employed in those mines; now the employment is less than 7,000 and since this was written several mines have closed down. Another article appeared in the Calgary Herald of May 26, 1954 and it states according to a Canadian Press dispatch:

> Supplies of coal available for consumption in Canada reached a 13-year-old low total of 38,163,000 tons in 1953.

These are the figures for the Dominion of Canada now.

> The bureau of statistics announced today in a preliminary report that the total was 8 per cent lower than the 41,620,000 tons available in 1952.

In other words, an 8 per cent drop.

> Domestic production of coal fell to 15,896,000 tons in 1953 from 17,579,000 tons the year before.

Here is a drop in one year of nearly two million tons. I say the situation in the coal mining industry in Canada, not only in Alberta, is serious. This department of government must have some responsibility. Otherwise this part of the minister's department would not exist. They must recognize some responsibility otherwise they would not have a coal board. But what have they done? What are they doing?

I said a little while ago that we should compliment them on their subvention policy throughout the years, but in reality if you look at it that is not something that the coal board or the minister's own department necessarily worked out. This is a financial arrangement, and all they had to do was simply to go to the Minister of Finance or the treasury board and say, "We can do this if we can subvent the railways for the movement of coal. Have you got the money?" And when the treasury board answers, "yes, we will pay that sum of money," then that part is taken care of. It is a solution from a financial angle rather than a solution with respect to a coal policy.

But I wish to say that there is no question in my mind that the government have failed in some of their announced objectives. I have here a copy of Hansard for May 13, 1953 and at page 5284 the minister is reported as saying in answer to a question put to him from this corner of the house:

The dominion coal board was created by legislation and brought into being by proclamation on October 21, 1947. The board at an early stage in its deliberations adopted, with the concurrence of the minister, a series of principles that in effect may be recognized as a coal policy. These principles are:

Now let me read them, they are five in number. This is the minister's statement as he continued:

(1) The maintenance of an adequate supply of coal for our national requirements;
(2) The support of a sound and healthy coal producing industry in Canada;
(3) The development of steady and adequate markets for the output from Canadian mines;
(4) The provision at fair wages of reasonably full employment for Canadian miners;
(5) The possible extensions of the market for Canadian coals, with the resultant savings of foreign exchange.

Now, let us see how far they have succeeded in that coal policy:

(1) The maintenance of an adequate supply of coal for our national requirements;

Well, we will say that they have succeeded in that. I do not know that the credit necessarily goes to the government. The coal mining industry is able to supply our national requirements, but we will give credit to the government for success No. 1.

(2) The support of a sound and healthy coal producing industry in Canada;

They have failed, the industry is not healthy.

(3) The development of steady and adequate markets for the output from Canadian mines;

The verdict: failed.

(4) The provision at fair wages of reasonably full employment for Canadian miners;

Verdict: failed.

(5) The possible extensions of the market for Canadian coals, with the resultant savings of foreign exchange.

What verdict shall we write on the tombstone? Failed! There you have it.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, that is not all. The thing is becoming a bit of a joke. That was what the minister said on May 13, 1953. But almost a year after that, as late as February, 1954, the minister comes out and says the same thing, knowing that four parts of his declaration of policy had been a failure. I have here the report of an interview the minister gave. The clipping does not say to whom he gave that interview, but the minister will know. Here is a report from the Montreal Gazette dated February 19, 1954. It is a Canadian Press dispatch. The heading is "Canada Needs All Her Fuel—Prudham". The article states:

Canada should not neglect any of her sources of fuel—she will need them all, mines minister Prudham said today.

I will not read all of this article but this is the thought I wish to emphasize:

On coal policy, the minister said the government favours: maintenance of an adequate coal supply for Canada's national requirements.

What he said a year ago.

A sound and healthy coal industry;

What he said a year ago.

—finding of steady markets for Canadian coal;

Just what he said a year ago.

—reasonably full employment and fair wages for miners and possible development of new equipment and methods which would lower production and transportation costs.

He said it all a year ago and yet he continued to say it then, even though he knew as late as February, 1954, that the coal mining industry of the Crowsnest pass and other parts of Canada was about to fold up. It seems to me such an accurate repetition that the minister must simply have recited it. Whether he knew he was reciting I do not know. Perhaps he was like me when I was a boy at school and I used to labour through these literary gems—

An hon. Member: You have not changed much.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps I have not, but I think I have come a long way since those days. We used to study in our class in literature a book called "The Lays of Ancient Rome". But what did I want to know about the "Lays of Ancient Rome?" I was more interested in the "Lays" of the old pasture across the road from my front gate. Yet I laboured and memorized and I would stand up and quote passage after passage. I did not know what it was all about. I did not know anything about the "Lays of Ancient Rome" and I was not concerned about them. But here the minister repeats five things and turns around a year later, gives an interview, and repeats the same thing knowing full well, of course, that in at least four parts of his declaration he has failed.

I have a report from the Financial Times for February 19, and it is really the same report as the other, but it elaborates a little bit. It states the same sort of thing:

Canada must conserve its "energy supply" declared Hon. George Prudham, minister of mines.

I do not think I need to detain the committee much longer. How can the minister say these things when the evidence is to the contrary? I have another dispatch here. I must have dropped that piece of paper. Maybe it is a good thing that I did so. In any event, I have my notes here. The bureau of statistics not long ago said—oh yes. Here it is. This was the clipping I read—that this 13-year-old low fell by about 2 million tons. That is from the dominion bureau of statistics. It was not the hon. member for Red Deer who said it. It was not the member for Bow River who said it. The hon. member for Cape Breton South said it was not he who said it. It was not the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings who said it, nor was it the hon. member for Lethbridge or the hon. member for Macleod. Those are the figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics. We pay $5 million a year for them to hunt out the statistics for us. Now on the heels of those statistics, the minister comes along and declares this as Canada's policy. It is a policy as to which four points have failed and the other one is successful by reason of the fact that the coal mining industry is doing what it can.

I am not going to detain the committee any longer but I will say this. The minister's appraisal tonight was an honest report. As gloomy as it was, he faced the facts. I think it is well that we should face the facts. If we cannot arrive at a national policy so that the coal mining industry may be established as it should be established—if we are not going to do that—let us tell them so. That is the proper thing to do. I believe that the minister in his speech has just done that tonight.

If we have to move forward to a more progressive age where we are now substituting other fuels, then let us tell the coal mining industry that and let us tell these coal miners that. Let us tell the coal miners, "These are the facts. We may as well tell you that. We will appropriate a little bit of money to see you re-established somewhere else". That is the best thing we can do.

I do not blame the minister for his speech. He has faced the facts. As far as facing the facts is concerned, I am with him and wish him luck in his extremely difficult task. I realize that that is a difficult task. It is difficult by reason of the fact that we are living in an age of progress. Nevertheless the coal is there and the day may come when we may need it. But in the meantime, if we have to move forward and keep abreast of progress, then let us move forward; but let us tell the coal mining industry and the coal miners the actual facts.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Chairman, the subject now before the committee, namely, the dominion coal board estimates, is one which is of great interest and importance to the people of my constituency. In my riding we have several large coal-producing collieries; in fact, the coal industry is the base of the economy, not only in my riding but in the whole of Nova Scotia. That is the reason I am going to make a few observations at this time. As the hour is late, I will be brief.

To give you some idea of the importance of the coal industry in Nova Scotia, I should like to point out that salaries and wages paid to coal miners in Nova Scotia in 1952 amounted to $35,709,646. The steel industry at Sydney and Trenton is dependent upon maritime coal, and salaries and wages paid by this industry in Nova Scotia in 1952 amounted to $36,970,000. The transportation of the coal and steel products from the mines and steel works is a third large item in the maritime economy which is dependent upon coal.

The very existence of North Sydney, Sydney Mines, Sydney, New Waterford, Glace Bay, Stellarton, New Glasgow, Westville and Springhill, and many other small towns, depends largely upon the continuous production and use of coal. There are about 120,000 people living and working in these towns and the business connections, the requirements for food and merchandise of all kinds spread out through all Nova Scotia. Without this firm base, the economy of Nova Scotia would be in a very bad and perilous condition.

I think, Mr. Chairman, these facts clearly show the value of coal in the economy of the province by the sea and, in fact, to the whole of the maritimes. The situation is one that requires careful analysis so that this industry may be permitted to make its proper contribution to the economy of Canada.

I am sure everyone in this house realizes that the difficulties of eastern and western Canada arise largely from our geographical position. The fathers of confederation recognized this when confederation was brought about. They, in their wisdom, deliberately turned their backs upon a cheap or low-level economic life for Canada and accepted the handicaps of our national geography by planning for an economic life artificially maintained at that level required by our various interests, and not dependent upon the American trade. We all know that we in Canada pay more for our automobiles, our machinery, our textiles and a host of other articles because the fathers of confederation deliberately set out to build a nation.

Today our costs are higher than those of our neighbours because of duties, freight rates, and other handicaps and similar causes that were accepted as part of the price of nationhood. These costs can be substantially reduced by eliminating tariffs, buying in the cheaper American market and by this means committing suicide as a Canadian nation. I think I am quite safe in saying that there are very few among us who are willing to exchange our nationhood for the purpose of solving any of our regional problems.

In their deliberations the fathers of confederation and succeeding governments recognized that the coal industry of the maritime provinces should receive the same help and safeguards as the manufacturing industries of the central provinces. This help has been extended in many ways since the first examination of the situation by a select committee of the House of Commons in 1877, when it was proposed that a duty be imposed on United States coal.

The duties have fluctuated and today the only remaining duty is one of 50 cents per ton on bituminous coal imported from the United States. Drawbacks of this duty are allowed on a very large tonnage and the effect of the duty is offset to some degree by the present favourable exchange on the United States dollar. Added to these difficulties is a new and serious competitor to the coal industry of the maritimes in the form of cheap imported heavy fuel oil and the recent development of natural gas. Heavy fuel oil is produced in foreign refineries and is being dumped at the present time upon the world market at whatever price it will bring.

The congress of the United States has been petitioned to impose a heavy duty upon this oil and it has been reported that by mutual agreement between producers and importers the importation of this oil into the Atlantic seaboard of the United States is being restricted. There is a duty of one-third of a cent per gallon on oil entering Canada, which is roughly equal in fuel value to about 50 cents per ton of coal. Our maritime coal industry is practically wide open to this competition.

There is also a substantial production of heavy fuel oil by oil refineries in the maritime provinces from crude oil imported by sea from foreign countries free of any duty. I am sure you will agree with me that the coal industry of the maritime provinces, facing the kind of competition that I have indicated, is labouring under great disadvantages, disadvantages that only action by the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, can solve. Perhaps the suggestion made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South that all Canadian fuels be brought under a competent body would focus attention on the best method to use our fuels in the interests of Canada.

The federal government has helped. In fact, without the help of the government the industry would not have survived. Successive governments have for many years provided assistance to the coal industry by means of subventions. These subventions have been particularly important to the maritime provinces and have enabled the Nova Scotia industry to market some two to three million tons of coal in the Quebec and Ontario markets each year. This has been of benefit to Nova Scotia by providing a market for the extra output, and by maintaining a high and fairly constant level of production has held down costs. It has been of benefit to the central provinces by enabling the maritimes to purchase that much more of the manufactured goods of Ontario and Quebec. It has been of benefit to the nation by providing an additional tie of common interests between the central and the seaboard provinces.

The coal mines are having a very difficult time these days for various reasons. There is no need for me to enumerate these reasons at this time. I am sure that the government is fully aware of them and is helping to find a solution in so far as the federal government has the authority to do so.

The subject, Mr. Chairman, is a technical one and it is involved. I make no pretence at being an expert. I am not, like the hon. member for Cape Breton South, a miner, but I have grown up among miners. I have worked with them and I have worked for them. I know they have legitimate difficulties, and I am sure that with the combined intelligence of the members of this House of Commons and the understanding and co-operation of the provinces concerned a solution for the coal industry will be found.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MacLean: Ten o'clock.

Mr. MacEachen: —the discussion—

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, the committee has been sitting for ten hours today already, and I think in fairness not only to the membership of the committee but to the staff of the house we should rise and report progress.

The Deputy Chairman: I am entirely in the hands of the committee. Perhaps I might say something at this stage which it is not really my duty to say. If hon. members have a prorogation date in view that they hope to reach, it can be reached only by concluding the business which remains to be done.

Mr. Fulton: We have until Saturday.

The Deputy Chairman: Therefore it will be in the hands of the members of the committee when that date is reached.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there consent to sit later?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

In the morning we shall take the amendments made in the other place with respect to the public service superannuation bill and then proceed with the business I indicated earlier.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 25, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF MARITIME COAL PRODUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I wish to lay on the table the annual report of the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act for the year ended March 31, 1954. No new loans were granted during the current year.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—DIRECTIVE RESPECTING PINE BOARD ROOFING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Public Works. Has the government given further consideration to representations received from white pine manufacturers that the present standards under the N.H.A., not permitting the use of pine in greater than eight-inch widths for roof sheathing, are restricting the sale of this type of lumber?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): In view of the current surplus of white pine boards in wide widths, the government has asked Central Mortgage to modify the National Housing Act standards now limiting the width of boards used for roof sheathing, to permit roofs to be boarded with white pine in widths in excess of eight inches.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STELLARTON, NOVA SCOTIA—CLOSING OF RAILWAY REPAIR SHOP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a situation existing in Stellarton, Nova Scotia, which indicates that the car repair shop at Stellarton has been closed down and that this in addition to the 500 miners already out of work is, according to Mayor Sobey of Stellarton, causing an extremely serious unemployment situation. I would point out that in addition to the closing of the repair shop I am informed by the mayor by telegram that there is also further lay-off of personnel on the Canadian National Railways at Stellarton.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be allowed to take this question as notice, and inquire what the position is from the Canadian National Railways and report later. Will my hon. friend let me see the telegram?

Mr. Drew: I should be happy to do so. In view of the stage of the session at which we are, may I suggest that when the minister obtains the information he might make a statement to us, in view of the fact that the general situation was under discussion yesterday and that the information with regard to this matter did not come to my attention until this morning.

Mr. Chevrier: I will undertake to obtain the information as quickly as I can do so. I must point out to the hon. member, however, that the information I will get will be from the office of the Canadian National Railways at Montreal which, in turn, would have to get it from their maritime regional office. It may not be possible to get it in time before prorogation. However, I assure the hon. member that I will undertake to do it with all haste.

Mr. Macdonnell: We shall be here all day.

PUBLIC SERVICE

FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK—STATIONARY ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN IN OTTAWA AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State whether he is yet in a position to answer my question of Wednesday as to when the stationary engineers and firemen employed by the federal government in the Ottawa area will be put on the five-day 40-hour week?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker; I cannot answer the question. The matter is still under consideration.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE PAYMENT OF DEATH BENEFITS UP TO MAXIMUM OF $5,000—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 463, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might give a word of explanation. The amendment consists of adding two sections to the bill, the second one merely the coming into force section but the first one providing in effect that members of the public service on July 1, 1954 may, prior to November 1, 1954, elect not to be participants in the scheme. I should hasten to say that I give full credit for this amendment to Their Honours in the other place and to the active and energetic maiden ladies in Ottawa who pressed this matter strongly.

Mr. Drew: They have been reading the proceedings in the House of Commons.

Mr. Abbott: I did not recommend the amendment. I agreed to accept it. But I should be less than frank if I did not say that I do so with some misgivings. On November 1 the government will, of course, have to review the results of these options not to participate. If they are negligible in quantity the plan can be proceeded with. But if they are of any substantial number, I think it would mean that the government would not feel that the bill should be proclaimed.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the iron pressure which we are under from the leader of the house, I think a few minutes might be devoted to commenting on this situation. It is natural for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to give all the credit to the other place and it is equally natural for us to appropriate a large part of it to ourselves. This is one of these incidents—and there are not as many of them as we should like to see—that operate to give a modicum of encouragement to the opposition. We know that in many cases where our efforts bear no fruit, we are right—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell: —and a review of the facts would bear that out. But, alas, unfortunately justice is not always done at once and we very often have to wait for endorsement. So, Mr. Speaker, it is especially pleasant when the endorsement comes very quickly, and I am sure that the minister, being a generous fellow, will not grudge the fact that we take most of the credit ourselves.

Mr. Abbott: I would have appreciated the credit more if my hon. friend had given the grounds on which he wished this measure postponed.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will make reference to the giving of grounds, and I wish to say that when I refer to the opposition I do not refer exclusively to the official opposition because we had, I am glad to say, support from elsewhere, from the Social Credit group.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell: Oh, it is quite possible to disagree on some things and yet agree on others. I will say at this point that I am sure one of the regrets of the government is that they have not been able to stay the course with their socialist friends but have had to depart. This amendment, Mr. Speaker, while it does not go as far as we would like, is in the right direction, and it at least does something to improve a bad bill. I want to point out that it is ironical that the serried ranks which voted for the bill, the whole bill and nothing but the bill a couple of weeks ago, without even having had time, I suppose, to read the evidence taken before the committee, will now vote for the amendment, but that is at it may be. They voted for the bill without evidence and they now vote for the amendment without evidence. It is interesting to note that the amendment was not even referred to the banking and commerce committee.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one very interesting lesson from this event, and it is particularly interesting in view of the speeches which were made on this side of the gangway some little time ago about the Senate. It is interesting to realize that this shows that there is one deliberative body of parliament, namely, the Senate.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: The Senate did debate this. They weighed the evidence. They considered the interests of those affected, which does seem a reasonable course. But as we all know—

Mr. Pickersgill: It evidently does not need any reform.

Mr. Macdonnell: —no such course was followed in this house—

Mr. Abbott: No reform now.

Mr. Macdonnell: —or in the committee of this house. We remember the incidents, and they can be very briefly related. The minister on May 26—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. gentleman would like to review all the proceedings with respect to this bill—

Mr. Macdonnell: Very few, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: —and although he proposes to do it in a very brief way I must remind him of what one can read at page 535 of Bourinot, where it says:

> When amendments made by one house to a bill from the other house are received back, and are under consideration, it is not regular to discuss the bill itself, or its principle, or the policy of the government thereon; but the debate must be confined to the amendments.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, may I point out that whenever I quote Bourinot I am told it is out of date.

Mr. Speaker: It may be that when the hon. gentleman has quoted Bourinot on certain occasions Bourinot has happened to be out of date, but it happens that on this occasion he is not.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling, and in order to make sure that I shall not depart from it I shall keep these amendments in my hand all the time I am speaking. The only point in this very short speech I am making—

Mr. Abbott: Ten minutes so far.

Mr. Macdonnell: —is to come to the point of these amendments and to stress the fact that I hope, now that a little light has been let in on the minds of the government and they have gone part of the way in the right direction, they may be prepared to go a little further. In order to establish that point, Mr. Speaker, there is just a little more by way of foundation that I feel is necessary. I want to point out briefly—

Mr. Abbott: Christmas is coming.

Mr. Macdonnell: —the facts which are relevant, that on the 26th of May the bill was introduced in this house, far too late, then went to the committee—

Mr. Abbott: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: —that the civil service officials—

Mr. Abbott: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: —had only a week in which to ascertain the views of their members, that their views were strong and unanimous on two points, that I moved an amendment in the committee which was supported by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I wish to emphasize the fact that there was no debate on the merits by reading two lines, Mr. Speaker, from the proceedings of the committee after I had moved my amendment and after the hon. member for Peace River had spoken.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think, especially at this stage of the session, that we should expect hon. members to say in words that they adhere to a ruling and then carry on with further words indicating that the ruling does not mean anything at all to them. I think I have been quite lenient with the hon. member. I know he wanted to give a little bit of the background of the debate and the proceedings with respect to this measure although his remarks should have been confined entirely to the amendment which he said he approved. If he has the amendments before him, as he says, then I would suggest that perhaps he should pay attention to the amendments before him and not to other sheets that he is holding in his other hand. Perhaps that is what is confusing the hon. member. He has the amendments in the one hand and the sheets in the other, and perhaps he could combine the two. I would ask him to confine his remarks to the amendments and not to review the proceedings in connection with this matter.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will put the other papers away. Seriously, I do have one more point with respect to this matter to which I want to make reference, and it would only take me a moment or two to outline it.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member think that even if, being out of order, he will not take very long to make his remarks I must agree with him that he should be allowed to be out of order even for a minute? I think he has taken that much time to be out of order, and I think I have been very patient.

Mr. Macdonnell: You are always patient, and I try to be patient too.

Mr. Abbott: Be firm, not patient.

Mr. Macdonnell: I come now to the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have been coming to it all the time, Mr. Speaker, but I am right there now. This amendment does give civil servants a chance to opt out. Subsection 2 of the amended section 52 says that an election made under the section is irrevocable. To me there is almost a slight element of threat in that. In spite of what the minister said about his own preference, I do hope that the government, having approved this amendment, will not in any way hedge on it, because in my view what has happened, as I tried to say a moment ago, is that partial light has been let in on the minds of the government, and I hope that they will go further.

I just want to add this one thing. I have referred to the fact that in the deliberative assembly this matter was deliberated. It is surprising that the best the leader of the other place could say for this legislation was that it is not all bad. That was in the newspapers, Mr. Speaker, and I am able to tell you that it is accurate. I hope that in these circumstances, having made the change which has been made, having at last recognized the unanimous representations made by the representatives of the civil servants that this compulsory feature was obnoxious, the government will keep their minds open and, as I say, having gone a little way in the right direction, may find it in their hearts to go still further.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have no sheets in either hand, Mr. Speaker, so perhaps I can keep in order. Something has been said this morning as to who should get the credit for the amendments that are now before us. Since the last speaker favours the amendments, he naturally talked in those terms, and since I do not like what is being done perhaps I should decide where to put the blame. I do not put the blame on the official opposition in this house or on Their Honours in the other place. I put the blame where it belongs, on the government, for accepting these amendments and moving their adoption as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has done this morning.

So far as the substance of the amendments is concerned, it is quite clear what is involved. As I understand it, the substance of these amendments is that arrangements will be made for those who are in government employ, on or before July 1—

Mr. Abbott: On July 1.

Mr. Knowles: —on July 1, to contract out of this insurance plan if they do so before the 1st of November.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Knowles: Anyone who comes into government employ—

Mr. Abbott: And the government, of course, reserves its position to decide whether a sufficient number are in to make the scheme worth while.

Mr. Knowles: I am coming to that. I was starting to say that those who may come into government employ after July 1 would not have the right to contract out. It is understood also that any of those who are now in government employ and who decide to contract out prior to November 1, would not have the right to get in again afterwards.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: The other provision set out in these amendments is for a coming into force clause. I understand that the reason for having a coming into force clause rather than the usual arrangement that the bill become law upon royal assent is, as the Minister of Finance said just now by way of interruption, so that the government can reconsider its position if it wishes to do so after November 1.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have to pay some attention to what the government has announced as its intention, in the light of that coming into force clause which is proposed in these amendments. I understand it has been indicated that if a negligible number of persons, say of the order of 2 per cent, contract out, that will make no difference; but it has also been indicated that if as many as 25 per cent contract out, the government may decide not to proclaim the bill.

Mr. Abbott: It would certainly be out at 25 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: We are getting it clear. If there are 25 per cent who decide they do not want this provision, the bill will not be proclaimed. However, the understanding is that in between 2 per cent and 25 per cent the government will reconsider its position.

I must say that to me this is a strange form of democracy. What is being said is that if one person says no and three persons say yes, the bill will not be proclaimed. I would say that if the government wanted to amend the bill to modify the compulsory feature to make it possible for those who do not wish to have this insurance to deny themselves that right, the government might have done it in that way, with whatever modifications might be necessary. But to take this position that if one out of four does not want it the other three who do cannot have it—

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend appreciates that this materially affects the rate.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that, and that is what I was saying. If the government wanted to modify the compulsory feature and make whatever change was necessary in the rates so as to have it on an optional basis, that in my view would have been a responsible way to approach this matter. But to put it on the basis of a veto, which is what is provided in this arrangement, is I think contrary to the democratic way of doing things. I put the blame where I believe it belongs. Perhaps the Minister of Finance did not think up this idea, and I will give him credit for moving his motion this morning reluctantly, but I point out it does not matter whether he moved it with reluctance or with exuberance, if the motion passes the result is the same.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the government has taken this position. As I say, I do not object to the government deciding to change the bill if it wishes to do so by making certain modifications on its own responsibility. But I think it is wrong, and I think it is unfair to have it announced to civil servants generally—it is almost a threat, if you like—that if 25 per cent, a decided minority, say no then the 75 per cent cannot have the advantages of this very beneficial piece of legislation. The government was very proud of this legislation. It was put to a vote several times by the government, and it was supported. The government insisted on knowing where the house stood on the matter.

I regret that the Minister of Finance has given in to this pressure, particularly in making the announcement that if 25 per cent are opposed to the legislation the other 75 per cent cannot have it. I do not think that is in keeping with true democracy.

Mr. Abbott: I just want to add one word. This is a measure that is of benefit for civil servants, not for the government and not for the taxpayers of Canada. When it was represented in the other place, by this aggressive organization of maiden ladies here in Ottawa, that there should be a chance to opt out of the plan, the government felt that was perhaps not unreasonable. However, if more than 20 or 25 per cent do not want it, the plan just falls to the ground. It was devised on the assumption that all members of the civil service would be in it.

If you have an optional plan and a smaller group, then I think the arrangements should be made with an ordinary life insurance company to take out group insurance. This is another type of plan. I would have preferred the hon. member for Greenwood to have opposed the plan on the basis that he would prefer this sort of thing to be handled by the life insurance companies. He did not do it on that basis. He asked for delay, saying we did not have a chance to study the measure. It is a very simple plan in its essence. It does not require any long study, especially for one as experienced as the hon. member for Greenwood, to know exactly what the plan implies.

The position is that the government does not want to force this on civil servants. The government believed it was a desirable plan, and personally I am hopeful an overwhelming proportion of the civil servants will want it. The government will take a completely neutral position. It will make facilities available for exercising this option, and then it will be up to the civil servants themselves.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a question? Will the government do anything by way of trying to give publicity amongst the civil servants as to the advantages of the plan?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I do not like to see my genial friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) suffer embarrassment at any time. I do not like to embarrass him. However, I am going to have to read him a bit of a lecture again this morning. I remind the minister that we are not in committee and therefore there should have not have been the exchange that just took place.

Mr. Abbott: I had the right to close the debate, did I not, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Low: I rose to my feet.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might explain why I allowed the Minister of Finance to say a word. I understood that he was referring to a statement that he had made and which, in his view, had not been correctly understood by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I was watching the minister so that he would not go farther than that because, had he gone farther than just putting the records straight as to what he had said earlier, which might have been misunderstood by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I would have stopped him. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that we are not in committee and that normally the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should not have been put. But it could have been put later when the minister will be entitled to use his right of reply.

Mr. Abbott: I apologize to the hon. member for Peace River. Had I known he intended to speak, I would not have risen.

Mr. Low: I can understand how people some distance from the minister may not easily be seen, and perhaps if I had shouted at the top of my voice, to start with, the minister might have withheld what he wanted to say, or did say, until I had finished. However, I have no desire whatever to embarrass the minister, although I am afraid that he is suffering embarrassment now. It is the embarrassment of not having taken a close enough look at this bill, to begin with.

I thought, Mr. Speaker, that we had presented a pretty sound argument to support the position we took on the bill. And perhaps the most important argument was this, that even although it could be proved that a civil servant would not be able to have as cheap a form of death benefit as he would get if all the members were forced into it under a compulsory scheme, even if that were the case—and I am not convinced that it is the case—there is no justification whatsoever in attempting to force 25 per cent or 30 per cent, or even any percentage, to accept this compulsory feature.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) likes the compulsory feature because he says that the great majority will benefit by having that feature in. But just let me point out once again that while 75 per cent, if that is the percentage that were going to go in, are certainly entitled to the best that they can get, they are not entitled to have anything more than the best they can get, if it means forcing other people to sacrifice for them. That is the principle at stake, and that is the principle we have got to keep in mind.

We are very glad that the minister has finally seen fit to accept this change. I do not blame the government—indeed I compliment them upon having finally yielded to a recognition of those people who are concerned. And if that is not true democracy, then I do not know what true democracy is. Democracy certainly envisages a government with a will to govern.

Mr. Knowles: Not the will of the minority.

Mr. Low: The will of the minority has to be respected, and you do not respect them.

Mr. Knowles: Oh yes, we do.

Mr. Low: No, you do not. And that is the principle you put forward. You neglect the will of the minority. You wish to force them to take what you think is good for the majority. That is a principle with which we do not agree, and that is exactly the reason why I supported the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) in his motion on third reading of the bill. I am prepared to join with any party when it stands behind the principle of freedom—I do not care what party it is. It was because of the fact that my hon. friend from Greenwood was upholding the principle of individual freedom that I stood behind him. May I say that I am very happy the minister has finally yielded—whatever it may have been he yielded to—and has seen the light.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member favour permitting people to contract out of paying taxation for education?

Mr. Low: My hon. friend knows that that is not in the same class at all. He knows that very well. He is very fond of putting questions about taxation and education. But he knows very well that is not in the same class at all.

Mr. Knowles: It certainly is.

Mr. Low: No, it is not—and nothing even remotely approaching it.

Let me just say this, that I am glad the government has removed the compulsory feature and has decided to give civil servants the right of election. I do not care where the credit goes for this. If the credit goes to the Senate, then let me say I am satisfied that hon. members in the other place were moved by the arguments that had been advanced in the House of Commons. And I am satisfied it was because they were moved by those arguments, and were thinking pretty carefully about the matter, that they did suggest the amendments that have now been placed in the bill.

Let me say once again that I think this is one of the real justifications for a second chamber. It is one of the reasons I feel that, in any effort to reform the Senate, we should be very careful not to abolish it; because this is one justification for keeping them here.

Of course my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre will say it is one of the best reasons for abolishing them.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: That is the difference in our approach.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that we should not go into the question of Senate reform in this debate.

Mr. Low: I was just saying that it is the difference in our approach. We have upheld constantly the principle of individual freedom, and we are going to continue to uphold that principle, irrespective of what others have to say.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have only two or three brief observations to make.

I am glad that I have lived to see this day. I am glad I have lived to see a situation in which a government which was riding very high, here in this chamber, on this particular matter only a week ago Monday, June 14, has now come before the house and is prepared to eliminate from this bill much of the compulsory feature which was contained in the bill, and to which we took such strong objection.

But when the bill was under discussion then the government was not prepared to listen. They were not prepared to entertain any suggestion for delay so that there could be further consideration of the subject. But in the eleven intervening days something has happened, and now we find the government coming forward and asking the House of Commons to amend this bill so as to afford at least a limited opportunity to those employed in the civil service on July 1 to contract themselves out of this plan.

To the extent to which reason and common sense have triumphed over the government juggernaut that was not prepared to brook any delay, or to give any opportunity to the civil service to put its views forward eleven days ago, we should be thankful indeed to the other place. We of the official opposition sought in the interests of freedom and fair play to eliminate this compulsory feature. We did not succeed, because in the last analysis the majority overruled us. But, now that reason and fair play have triumphed, we ought to give the other place all due credit for what they have done in that respect.

Mr. Dickey: Praising the Senate.

Mr. Fleming: I will praise anybody who does a reasonable thing, and I am waiting for the day when the hon. member for Halifax does the first reasonable thing that I am able to praise.

Then, there are one or two other points I should like to mention. The first has to do with one or two remarks of the Minister of Finance, in a manifestly sneering voice, about maiden ladies in the civil service.

Mr. Abbott: Not at all, not at all; I was simply stating the facts. There is nothing sneering about it.

Mr. Fleming: The tone of the minister's remarks was unmistakable, Mr. Speaker, and was very disparaging to the maiden ladies of the civil service. I wish to make two observations.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Did you not rule that discussion on this matter had to be relevant to the amendments?

Mr. Speaker: That of course was the ruling, but some hon. gentlemen take a long time to introduce their subject. It may be that now the hon. member for Eglinton is going into another phase of his remarks. He is merely introducing what will be his relevant subject in a moment. I am very patiently waiting for that; but in any debate, if one speaker makes a remark which the other one picks up—for instance, a moment ago we almost went into the subject of Senate reform again just because one hon. member happened to mention that the action taken by the Senate with respect to these amendments justified the establishment of a second chamber. Well, we cannot open up that subject, and I hope we shall not come back to it.

The hon. member for Eglinton said that some of the expressions used by the minister were, in his view, sneering remarks. The minister said that they were no such thing. The hon. member for Eglinton is supposed to take the statement made by the minister as being the one by which he must abide. Where do we go from here? We are studying the amendments. The hon. member for Eglinton is studying the amendments; we are all studying them. I have them before me. They seem to me to be very simple ones. It all depends on how elaborate one wants to make his remarks.

The hon. member for Eglinton is usually relevant in anything that he wishes to say, and I hope that on this occasion he will not depart from his ordinary line of conduct.

Mr. Fleming: There is no likelihood whatever of the member for Eglinton departing from relevancy in this debate, because if the Minister of Finance was relevant in his remarks this morning I will be relevant also since my remarks will be directed to the remarks of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps that is not relevant. If in the general exposition of views in reply to another member some passing references are made to matters which do not come directly under the scope of this amendment, I do not think that one member can pick out one passing reference made here and there in somebody else's speech and say I am going to direct my remarks exclusively to that. I think he must treat that as a passing reference, as well.

Mr. Fleming: I am not basing my remarks on that theme at all. The Minister of Finance gave as one of the reasons for the amendments, now before us, having been passed by the Senate and now being recommended to the house by the government for adoption, the fact that there had been pressure from maiden ladies in the civil service. I intend to make two observations about that, as the reason for those amendments.

The first is that maiden ladies in the civil service have as much right as anyone else in the civil service to make their views known.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear; I heartily agree.

Mr. Fleming: In the second place, the Minister of Finance had better not assume that the opposition within the civil service to the compulsory features of this scheme was confined to the maiden ladies. One of the points I sought to make in the debate was that no one could say, until there had been consultation with the civil servants, what their feeling is. All I can say is that such contacts as I have had with married men in the civil service who have spoken to me indicate that many of them do not want this plan, and they object to the compulsory deductions from their salaries to pay for it.

The third matter on which I should like to make brief comment is this. It is a curious conception of what is democracy as expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). His intimation was that if the civil servants have an opportunity of giving free expression to their views in this matter, and 75 per cent of them should indicate they want this plan, they have the right to have it and automatically to impose that plan on the other 25 per cent and to compel the government to make these deductions from the salaries and pay of the other 25 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, just to keep the record straight. What I said was that I object to the government denying it to the 75 per cent because 25 per cent did not want it. I said quite clearly that if the government wanted to amend the bill taking out the compulsory feature that I was prepared for the government to do that on its own responsibility. What I objected to was the announcement that if 25 per cent are opposed and do not want to take advantage of the plan, that it would be denied to the other 75 per cent.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fleming: That is a fair statement. Clearly that is a statement of the hon. gentleman's views. That is his position. Then the responsibility rests with the government as to whether the plan will be killed or not, but I would take strong—

Mr. Knowles: That is the purpose of the coming into force clause before us now.

Mr. Fleming: But I would take strong issue with any suggestion that because 75 per cent are in favour of the plan, for that reason the government ought to go forward and make those deductions from the other 25 per cent even against their clearly expressed wishes.

The final matter is the minister's statement that the government will take a neutral position. That is indeed a welcome statement, Mr. Speaker. It is extraordinary; it is so different from the statement on this very same matter, Mr. Speaker, the compulsory aspect of this bill which is involved in the amendment, which was expressed by the Minister of Finance in this house just eleven days ago. Then he said: in the opinion of the government, this is an excellent plan, and we do not see any reason for delay. It was sufficient, in the government's view, that they thought that the plan was good for those to whom it was to apply at their cost. There has been a radical change in the attitude of the government in those eleven days.

What is the particular reason for this change? Goodness only knows. It may be that the views of the civil servants, those who are going to be affected, have somehow begun to register on the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. When this matter was before us a week ago Monday, unquestionably not more than 15 per cent of the members of this house knew the evidence that was taken before the banking and commerce committee. I do not suppose that there was more than one minister at the most in the cabinet who had taken the trouble to read the evidence at that time. Well, it may be that the views expressed by the civil servants, through their responsible representatives, have begun to make some impression; but whatever has happened in those eleven days, it is indeed a radical change, Mr. Speaker, and one for the better; and we may hope that the government, having seen some light, having retraced its arbitrary footsteps in this matter, will see fit to follow this example in other similar situations in the future.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Dominion coal board—

237. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $114,380.

Mr. MacEachen: The discussion of the coal industry in this debate so far has proceeded on the basis of three assumptions. First, that the coal industry is indispensable to the economy of Canada, especially in times of national emergency. Second, that the satisfaction of the long run energy requirements of this country must depend in part on coal. The third assumption is that the coal industry, as a source of employment and earnings, is crucial to the industrial economy of Nova Scotia. These three considerations, Mr. Chairman, are of sufficient weight to provide a solid basis for a firm and generous policy of support to the coal industry. In the past this policy of encouragement has been carried forward in the main through, first, the small customs tariff, second, subventions on the movement of coal, and third, the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act.

The customs tariff and especially the subventions policy had their origin in the competitive advantage and consequent threat of imported United States coal. Since 1928, approximately 31 million tons of Nova Scotia coal have been moved at an expenditure of approximately $40 million. As long as the chief threat to the Canadian coal industry came from imported United States coal, this subvention policy seemed adequate to maintain stability in the industry. However, within recent years the source and form of the competition to the coal industry has changed abruptly. The major form of present competition is not from imported coal but from fuel substitutes, and fuel substitutes in some cases of Canadian and not foreign origin.

The dominion coal board report states:

> It appeared certain that this factor, namely, the inroads of oil and natural gas would occasion further dislocation in the industry as pipeline facilities expanded and the railroads pressed forward their program of dieselization and conversion.

Later the report states:

> The Niagara power development and the St. Lawrence seaway and power project threaten to make available a supply of secondary power which would involve the temporary displacement of some tonnages of coal as far east as Montreal.

I believe the new forms of competition have brought greater and more formidable difficulties in the development of a suitable coal policy. The difficulties are apparent because fuel substitutes are produced in Canada by fellow Canadians.

However formidable the difficulties, the only satisfactory attitude to the current crisis is an attitude of realism taking into account that the chief ingredient in the development of the coal industry is a product that will hold the market against fuel substitutes.

This view is accepted without question. It was recognized in the enactment of the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act under whose terms millions have already been made available to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation and other coal companies for mechanization with the anticipation of lowering the cost of production. Up to the present time no lower costs have resulted from mechanization.

The president of Dosco now expresses doubt as to whether the deterioration in the market for coal will warrant the continuation of a mechanization program. But it should be borne in mind that an improved market outlook depends upon lowering production costs, and that each of these desirable outcomes is indispensable to the future of the coal industry. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, any reluctance to pursue the mechanization program, as a lower cost device, either on the part of the government or of the industry, must be resisted because such a position means that the industry expects a guaranteed market as a precondition of cost-reducing innovations, which are in themselves the only way to assure a coal market.

The program recently initiated by the provincial government, in co-operation with the industry, to stimulate the home consumption of coal is a step in the right direction. Sales in the home market have already decreased by 500,000 tons per year. Annual production of this magnitude creates employment for 1,000 men. Part of this decrease is due to the switchover by industry and domestic users from coal to oil. This program of stimulating consumption of coal in the maritime market deserves all possible encouragement, and I think it is important because it may hold the line against further encroachment of oil until the pay-off point is reached in certain research projects into new uses for coal.

Reference has already been made to the research being conducted at McGill University by Professor Mordell into the coal-fired gas turbine, in the fuel division of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Though the coal crisis hit the headlines very dramatically this winter, scientists have been working quietly and painstakingly to discover ways by which coal may compete effectively with oil as a fuel and as an industrial raw material. Of particular interest and importance is the work of the Nova Scotia research foundation, not only because of its own research, but because it is in contact with research into coal being undertaken in Europe and the United States.

Among experiments which are outlined in the annual report of the Nova Scotia research foundation are, first, research into the burning of coal underground to recover energy and by-products. Underground gasification of coal would permit the use of thin seams of coal. Second, research into development of methods of handling and burning Nova Scotia coal to eliminate the nuisance of smoke, hand-firing and ash removal from domestic furnaces. Third, study into methods of coal carbonization. Interest in this process springs from the collection of coal tar chemicals as potential raw material in chemical industries.

I believe this research deserves all possible encouragement and public support.

Of all the research that is now going on into further uses of coal, no series of experiments is fraught with greater possibilities than the work now under way at Morgantown, West Virginia. Equipment developed by the United States bureau of mines, in association with the engineering firm of Babcock and Wilcox, is producing gas from coal in surface units.

If this gasification should prove to be suitable and economical for Nova Scotia coals, then the future markets for the industry may not be solid coal transported by subvention assistance to the central market, but a coal market at the pithead at conversion units turning coal into gas for domestic and industrial use in the maritimes and Quebec. Nova Scotia coals have been tested at Morgantown, and at some future date it is even possible that gas from Nova Scotia coal will move by pipe line into the large consuming centres.

If this type of research proves practical, then it may provide the real answer to the problem of a Nova Scotia coal industry.

I now come back to an earlier point, Mr. Chairman. All progress in the coal industry rests, in my judgment, on a more competitive fuel. It is commonly believed that the chief way of reducing costs is through mechanization. Up to the present time, no reduction in costs has occurred through the installation of big machinery. I am not advocating that this program should be stopped.

It is my belief however, given the proper motivation and the proper conditions, the human resources—the people in the industry —could increase productivity far beyond the expectations now placed on the installation of big machines. I believe this increased productivity could take place with greater rewards in form of income and human satisfaction. Maybe the chief error of modern business is to plan for every conceivable phase of the productive process except the proper motivation and satisfaction of the human resources.

I am glad the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred last night to the engineering know-how latent in the working force in the Cape Breton mines. That the human resources of the coal industry—and of most other industries—have untapped sources of ingenuity, skill and ideas is the first attitude to be taken towards this problem. How can one release this productivity? First, by setting up a structure within the mines whereby the combined creativeness of the work force can influence productive decisions. Second, by the development of a productivity yardstick that measures increased group performance and a reward system that puts punch into team work. Finally, by the acceptance by management and the union of each other as essential institutions in the industry.

I believe there exists today in the Nova Scotia coal industry a basis for the introduction of such a joint system of union-management co-operation. I am not advocating a speed-up. I am not advocating anything that will weaken either management or union. I am advocating a formula that will strengthen both as well as strengthen the industry.

The chief exponent of this type of relationship is a former union president and former research director of the United Steel Workers of America. At present he is on the staff of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. I refer to Mr. Joe Scanlon. Joe Scanlon has applied his productivity plans, based on the above ingredients, in a variety of industries with remarkable success. Unions like his approach to productivity and so do managements.

Last week I had the opportunity to discuss once again with Mr. Scanlon in Boston the success of his work in the German coal mines at the end of the war when coal production was one of the chief problems of Germany. Joe Scanlon's staff succeeded in achieving concrete results in improving the productivity of those mines. I believe the same approach is worthy of serious consideration in connection with the Nova Scotia industry, because this industry is vital to the welfare of my province.

Mr. Chairman, discussion of the coal industry in Nova Scotia has centred in the main on the problems of the chief operator and the communities to which its operations extend. It is in that general vein that I have made my remarks up to the present time. However exclusive attention to the interests of the chief operator is not consistent with the welfare of other smaller communities.

When I return to my constituency I shall visit two communities now languishing because of the state of the coal industry, namely Inverness and Port Hood. When I return to Inverness, almost every miner in that community will be walking the main street because there is no market in which it is possible to dispose of their coal which is excellent for domestic purposes. Inverness town has been the chief casualty of the Nova Scotia coal industry, and already it has borne too great a share of the burden and sacrifices involved in the current adjustments of that industry.

I invite from the dominion coal board increased attention to the problems of the independent operators in the small communities, in finding markets and also in developing methods to share in a fair manner among all communities the burden of the present difficulties of the coal industry.

Mr. Lusby: I should like to join in this discussion briefly in order to make a few remarks from the point of view of my own county of Cumberland where the coal industry is one of vital importance. In that county about 1,800 men are engaged in the actual mining of coal, and they with their families —apart from the other people connected with the industry in other capacities—constitute a substantial segment of our entire population. Of our two mining areas, Springhill, which is one of our leading towns—its patriotic citizens are inclined to call it the leading town—is almost entirely dependent upon its collieries which are operated there by a subsidiary of Dosco, the chief producer in Cape Breton. In the other mining area, namely the Joggins-River Hebert area, several so-called independent mines are located. Their relative importance in the picture is practically as great. Certainly any closing of the mines would entail a large degree of depopulation.

I therefore welcome any opportunity to urge upon the House of Commons and upon this government the gravity of the problems which are now facing the Nova Scotia coal industry and the need for an expanding and comprehensive program of assistance in order that the industry may be enabled to survive.

More publicity has, I think, been given to the problems of the industry in Cape Breton and in Pictou county than in Cumberland. As yet perhaps we have not been as seriously affected as have those other sections of the province. But the picture in the Joggins-River Hebert area where, as I said there are small independent mines operating, is already dark, and with summer coming on, of course, the unemployment situation there is going to be worse than it has been during the winter months. They face, of course, the problem which the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond just mentioned. Their problems are somewhat different from and possibly more difficult of solution than those of the larger operators. But in any event the problems of the future are much the same for all coal communities. The same or much the same solutions must be found if the coal industry is to survive in Nova Scotia. The implications, of course, reach far beyond the immediate areas I have named; for if the industry perishes, then the whole economy of the province, which is based to a substantial degree upon coal, will receive another of those shattering blows which it has received so often since confederation.

Since the last decades of the nineteenth century the coal industry has maintained a place of major importance in the economic life of Cumberland county. It has had varying fortunes, but to date it has always been able to survive all the dangers which have from time to time threatened it, although never before so ominously as at the present time.

To go back to the beginnings with us, history records that even in the distant days of the French settlements boatloads of coal from the Joggins seams went up and down the coast to fire the forges of the sturdy blacksmiths of the Acadian villages. That thought takes us back to the romantic days of Evangeline. I do not think Longfellow's poem mentions it, but I daresay that Basil the blacksmith was using Joggins coal. However, we are not living in the past, and certainly there is very little room to find any poetry in the coal situation as it exists today. Many descendants of those early Acadians, I may add, still find work in the pits of the Joggins area and they face now possibly another expulsion, an economic expulsion from their ancestral soil.

The problems of the Nova Scotia coal industry have, I know, been dealt with in considerable detail, and I think they are fairly well known to most members of the house, even to those who have no immediate concern with them. Lack of industrial development in the maritimes, distance from the markets of central Canada coupled with the nearness of American sources of supply, adverse natural conditions which are a very strong factor in the situation in Nova Scotia —the depth of the Springhill mines, for example—militating against low costs of production, the increasing use of hydro-electric power and finally, of course, the increasing competition from oil and natural gas, now undoubtedly in a stage of rapid intensification, these and the marketing difficulties which they create are the present emergent problems of the industry.

It has been said that our coal industry has itself to blame for very much of its present plight. I would be ready to allow a certain measure of truth to this, at least with regard to the past, but I think it is also true to say today, from what I have seen of management and labour relations, that both management and labour today realize fully the gravity of the situation and are ready and willing to play their part in the fight to save the industry. I know that both are giving very strong support to the campaign which has been inaugurated in the maritimes to promote the use of coal in preference to other fuels, chiefly oil. It is hoped that the campaign will win back a substantial market for coal. I believe that both management and labour are now willing to co-operate fully in the endeavour to attain a maximum in efficiency of production, something which is of vital importance to the Nova Scotia industry. Some progress of course has been made along this line, but it is a long and difficult road which they must travel. Certainly time will be needed before any substantial results can be obtained, and unfortunately the next few years will be crucial ones for the industry.

It has been generally forecast—indeed, I think it is the considered opinion of the dominion coal board—that by the middle sixties the increase in population and in industrial development in Canada will create a situation whereby the demand for coal will have reached a point at which the industry can maintain itself on at least its present level. Assuming the correctness of this forecast, the industry is not moribund in the sense that we must visualize a perpetually expanding program of governmental assistance to keep it on its feet. But, as I say, the next decade will be the crucial years, and undoubtedly the need for assistance to the coal mining industry will remain very great. Anyone questioning the wisdom of furnishing such assistance as may be required must, I think, weigh against the undoubtedly high cost attendant upon that what I call the much higher cost, both tangible and intangible, of allowing the industry to perish.

At this stage all my remarks are made with the full and, I may say, the uneasy knowledge that as far as any prophecies for the future are concerned the whole picture may be completely changed by the coming of atomic power for industry. If it comes, as it undoubtedly will, it will probably affect profoundly the whole economic face of the country and, I hope, with benefit to the maritimes. But I think such speculation as that at the present time may be left, in the discussion of this subject, until such time as these possibilities of atomic power, strong though they undoubtedly are, have reached the stage of reality and the effect of atomic power upon the use of conventional fuel can be more accurately determined.

On the basis of confirmed knowledge the death of our coal industry would in time of peace, in my opinion, create a very serious sapping of our economic strength and our industrial prospects. It would mean that the maritime provinces would be pushed deeper into the economic mire. It would mean widespread unemployment, distressed areas, the depopulation of towns and villages, for one of the tragedies of the situation is that in most cases the coal mining community is almost entirely dependent upon that one industry. It would mean that the people from these towns and villages would have to undergo a forced exile to distant parts of the country, or perhaps even beyond their own borders. A situation like that would undoubtedly provide a spawning ground for communism and its evil doctrines.

In time of war—I know this has been touched on before but I think perhaps it is not amiss that I should mention it again—the loss of the industry would be revealed as a very serious gap in our national security, a serious impairment to our capacity for either defence or attack. For the proof of that statement I think we have to go no farther than to the days of the last world conflict. Coal and steel were the twin pillars of our war effort then, and so far no adequate proved substitute for either is at hand, while the threat of aggression hangs over us almost constantly. I need hardly emphasize that this is no time for any gambling with matters which may affect our national security.

When we consider therefore the costs, the penalties attendant upon the loss of the Canadian coal industry, I think we can assert with confidence, as I do, that it is a matter of national self-interest that this government, in conjunction of course with the provincial governments immediately concerned, should bend every effort to ensure that such a loss shall not occur.

The principle of federal assistance to the coal industry is not a novel one. We have the system of freight subventions instituted in 1928, over a quarter of a century ago, which throughout that time has been a mainstay of the industry. We have such acts as the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act under which loans are available for mechanization and modernization of mines. In Nova Scotia that has not produced great results yet, but there are possibilities and some work has been done. I am very glad to know that the government, as the estimates under discussion show, realizes fully the desirability of continuing and expanding the system of freight subventions.

There is also the assistance given in connection with the use of coal in the manufacture of iron and steel. We have the dominion coal board itself which I think has done a great deal to aid the industry. However, I think within the limits of its existing statutory powers it could be made an even more efficient instrument to that end. The government has furnished substantial assistance in connection with the very promising development at McGill University of a coal-fired gas turbine engine. That may prove to be of some substantial help to the coal industry once it is brought to perfection.

All these measures have accomplished much to aid the coal industry in its fight for survival, and I say without any hesitation that all the expenditures involved may be considered money very well spent in the national interest. In another aspect there has been a promising beginning. I refer to the inquiry now under way into the possibilities of producing more electricity from coal in the maritimes. I am rather particularly interested in that because one of the earliest, if not the earliest, of the successful developments on the North American continent in producing electricity from coal at or near the pithead was carried out at Chignecto in my constituency.

As a matter of fact most of the electricity used in the county of Cumberland today is produced by a coal-fired plant situated at Maccan near the River Hebert-Joggins mines. There is, however, one field of assistance to the coal mining industry which I consider is very largely unexplored in this country. That is the field of research to discover new and commercially practicable uses for coal apart altogether from its conventional use as fuel. That, incidentally, is a field which would not be affected by any development of atomic power.

It has long been known, of course, that coal is a potential source of numerous products of high market value. I have a list here of a few examples which are as follows: perfume, gasoline, alcohol, disinfectant, dyes, ammonia, and fertilizer. Since the list ranges from perfume to fertilizers, one can see how wide a range of potential products coal contains. In essence, all of these products are in the blackness of a lump of coal. In most cases they are extractable by scientific methods already known, but unfortunately not yet at competitive costs. Much has been done abroad in the way of discovering new and better methods of extraction. The last speaker mentioned some experiments being conducted in the United States. The Nova Scotia government, within the limits of its resources, is doing its utmost to aid the coal industry by maintaining a close liaison with the experiments that are being conducted by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It is keeping in touch also with European experiments which have as their objective the development of soil conditioners from coal.

I understand that some Nova Scotia coal has been successfully used as the basis of an experiment along that line. It seems to me the federal government has not yet concerned itself to the extent it should in this field. I should like to suggest that no matter what is being done abroad we should not be content to await results from the United States or from Europe. I feel that Canada should be in the forefront of this, as in all other fields of industrial research.

One of the statutory objectives of the dominion coal board is, I believe, as follows:

> The board may undertake or cause to be undertaken researches and investigations with respect to:
> (c) The physical and chemical characteristics of coal produced in Canada with a view to developing new uses therefor.

I should like to urge that the existing powers of the board in that respect be put to much wider use than has been the case so far. This will involve a substantial expenditure undoubtedly, but I am firmly convinced that, in common with all sums which have been already expended and are being expended to assist the coal industry, these further sums devoted to that purpose could be considered money very well spent in the national interest.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I should like to assure the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys that we in Cumberland county, and I know the same holds true for the rest of Nova Scotia as well as for other coal producing areas in Canada, appreciate greatly the time and attention that he has given to the problems of the coal industry in Canada. The spirit of genuine co-operation he has shown in this regard cannot be too highly commended.

Mr. Blackmore: I have two desires in rising, Mr. Chairman, first of all, to get what I have to say said quickly, and secondly to say the things that need to be said. I wish, at the outset, to commend the minister for the manner in which he has attacked the problem. I believe his introductory speech last night was a model and I should like to encourage him to continue the deep interest he has already shown.

I want to say something to him in all kindness, and I hope he will not be offended, but I believe it is a matter he needs to have drawn to his attention. At the moment, we in Alberta have the idea that he gives altogether too much attention to his quarrel with the Social Credit movement in that province. If he would just forget his quarrel with that government and with that movement, and remember that he is the responsible minister of the crown for this whole country, then he would not say things like those to which the hon. member for Macleod referred last night, wondering what Alberta is doing about this coal problem. I thought I really should say that in all kindness because the minister has great possibilities, and I want to see him attain them with all the speed of which he is capable.

In respect of the problem of coal which confronts us, I do not wish to review the various aspects of the problem. I know they are very difficult. I believe I know pretty well all the things that stand in the way of finding a solution for Alberta's coal problem. When I first came to Ottawa I devoted a great deal of attention to the subject of coal, and did what a member could to help get our coal down into Ontario and Quebec markets. In those days we had not discovered the gas and oil in Alberta to any such extent as we have since discovered it. We had not conceived the feasibility of the idea of bringing that gas and oil down here by pipes. Now, of course, those things are practically an accomplishment. I gave up talking about coal for a while because I realized that there seemed to be difficulties which were insuperable, but my interest has continued nevertheless.

There are three or four things I think that need to be pointed out as a sort of summary to what has already been said. What seems to be worrying the coal producing areas more than anything else at the moment is the unemployment that has resulted in the coal producing communities. If we could somehow manage to provide employment for the men who have been displaced by a reduction in markets for coal, and the final closing of the mines, then the urgency of the problem at the moment would, in large measure, be eliminated. I am sure the minister realizes that. What is troubling the people, for example, in the Shaughnessy area is that they do not know where to turn to find work with which to support their families. I mention Shaughnessy, but that is only one of the mines that have been seriously affected in my constituency.

There is one aspect of the question that the hon. member for Cape Breton South mentioned last night which I must say has given me a somewhat new slant. I gather from a statement of the minister to which the hon. member referred, that the minister foresees a time in the not too distant future when we, in Canada, may have a need for all the fuel production of which we are capable. I do not know whether I am misinterpreting the report or whether the reporter misinterpreted the minister, but I do not really quite see how there could be such a development of Canadian industry and population within 11 years as to make the country capable of using all the fuel productive capacity we have. If there is, so much the better.

I believe another matter the hon. member for Cape Breton South mentioned last night is most pertinent to the needs of the situation connected with the problem. We must take steps to see that no mine shall have its coal producing capacity destroyed or seriously impaired through disuse over a number of years. I believe that is a very important point. In trying to draft a policy for the next two years, we ought to bear that in mind. I am sure the minister has done so.

The next matter, to which of course everyone referred, is the developing competition with coal on the part of other fuels, such as oil, gas, gasoline, electricity and finally atomic power. There is a probability that even solar energy will be competitive. Men are talking about a means of taking energy out of the sun and using it for industrial and domestic purposes. We must recognize that competition is an actual fact, and will continue to be a fact. In so far as western Canada and eastern Canada are concerned, the competition of United States coal with our own fuel is and is likely long to be a serious matter for us. In that connection I am not sure that I have the figures correct, but the minister will check me if I am wrong. However, as I recall it we are importing from the United States something like two tons of coal for every ton we are producing in Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. Prudham: I will answer that later.

Mr. Blackmore: I just wished to make sure. We will change the figure, if what I have said is not correct. I think it is correct to say however that we are importing much more coal from the United States than we are actually producing in Canada. Naturally this makes people in the east and the west feel resentful when we have difficulty in marketing our coal in Canada.

I know, of course, the difficulties which arise. There are the long distances we have to transport our coal. Nevertheless we must face this very important fact, that if we used all our productivity to produce coal, as we have thus far developed it, we would not be producing as much coal as Canada now consumes.

I wish now to say a word in respect of Alberta's coal producing capacity, as a whole. Alberta is peculiar in several respects as regards her coal production. She produces a wide variety of coal. Some of it is almost as valuable as anthracite, and then we produce coal all the way down the scale, until we come to something that is very close to lignite. That is a point worth bearing in mind.

Then the next point to bear in mind is that Alberta's mines are rather widely distributed, although it is a fact that they are all in the one province of Alberta.

Mr. Prudham: If I might interrupt the hon. member at this point, I would give him the figures for which he asked. He has asked about Canadian production, as compared with imports. In 1953 Canadian production was 15,896,000 tons while imports were 22,521,787 tons.

Mr. Blackmore: I thank the minister for that information. It makes the disparity less aggravating. And yet, even those figures are impressive, are they not?

Then, I was about to refer to the distribution of Alberta mines, which means that if we use the different kinds of coal coming from the different mines in Alberta, in the development of industry for the future, we have a wide possibility of variation in industrial development in Alberta. That is another point worth mentioning.

The next important fact about Alberta coal is that, in a general way, it is economical to produce. We do not have anything to compare with the difficulties confronting the people of Nova Scotia, who have to go down under the sea floor in order to find the coal and bring it out. On the other hand, in Alberta we have a good many areas where strip mining is quite practicable, and indeed was practised during the second world war. That also is a point which should not be forgotten particularly when making a plea for Alberta's coal production.

The next important thing in respect of Alberta is that she is capable of tremendous industrial development. Up to the present time of course the industrial centres in Canada have been in Ontario and Quebec, and no doubt a good many people in those provinces would like to have it continue so. But I believe when they begin to think in terms of the nation, and of over-all security, they will realize it will be greatly to their advantage to have a vast amount of industrial development take place in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia so that there will be two powerful industrial areas in Canada. That ought to be borne in mind when we plan.

One could give a good example from the last war, to illustrate the point I have in mind. I would refer to the fact that while I was in Great Britain in 1941 as a member of the Empire Parliamentary Association delegation from Canada, I was told that Great Britain at the time of the war was divided into 12 areas. The aim was to make each of those 12 areas self-sufficient so that if an enemy were to conquer even 11 of them, the twelfth could still carry on and support a substantial war effort, with the hope ultimately of expelling the foe and defeating him.

I suggest that is a good thing for us to reflect upon in Canada. If a foe were to come to our country and destroy the industry of Ontario and Quebec, in large measure it would leave Canada almost defenceless from an industrial point of view. I think that is not a sound condition to encourage for the future, when there is so much danger. What I say strengthens my general contention that we should keep in mind the possibility of making Alberta the great industrial centre in Canada which it is capable of becoming.

Therefore it is of great importance that we preserve the coal mines in Alberta, and maintain their coal producing capacity. That is a matter which I suggest is very much worth remembering. To have a powerful industry developed in Alberta would strengthen us in both peace and war. In peacetime it would enable us to support a much larger population, and in wartime of course it would give us additional fighting strengtn.

What is the solution? There is the great problem. I do not hesitate to say right now that I think the solution is increased subventions to put Alberta coal into Ontario and Quebec so as to displace American coal. I know about the objections to shutting out American coal. That subject has been referred to by previous speakers. But everybody knows—and I wish to be careful not to use the wrong word—about the unpredictability of the labour unions in the United States. It would be possible for those labour unions in the United States to create a disturbance while we were in a war which might shut us off from our supply of coal from the United States, and thus embarrass us most seriously in our endeavour to keep up industrial production in Ontario and Quebec. We might as well face that fact now, while we can do something about it.

Consequently, from a national standpoint I think it is of compelling importance that we produce our own coal and get it into these two industrial provinces even as a temporary measure where it will be sorely needed. If we do not later feel that we can stand economically the financial strain of providing continually those subventions for both Alberta and Nova Scotia, then, as was suggested last night by the hon. member for Macleod, we might endeavour to determine by such study as is possible just about how many of these coal mines we need to close ultimately, and then determine the policy of closing these coal mines one by one, two by two or three by three, as the case may be, after warning those engaged in the coal mines concerned that their work will discontinue at a certain time. Then we would have to make provision for their reabsorption into the economy of Canada.

I think that would be a sound method of approach, and I commend it to the minister. It may be that over a long period it will not be found economically feasible to support the coal producing capacity of Canada. If so, then at least let us go about the problem in a sensible way, and endeavour to have a plan of procedure whereby the closing of our mines would inflict the least possible damage on the Canadian economy.

It has been pointed out that the processing of the coal probably offers the way out. I realize that Germany has had wonderful success in this kind of development, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. It is true that Germany has had phenomenal success in processing coal. But let us remember that Germany has 66 million people, and that they are rather closely concentrated. The result is that when products are processed from coal there is a ready market for them. Contrast that condition of population with our own. We have 15 million people thinly spread out over some 3,500 miles of territory. If a person were to establish a coal processing plant which would produce fur coats, which I understand the Germans produce, or any of the three or four dozen of the products which they have found it to be greatly to their advantage to produce, we would be handicapped seriously by the shortage of markets locally and even from a national standpoint. The cost of transporting the finished products from Ontario to Alberta or from Alberta to Ontario or from Alberta to the Yukon would be almost prohibitive. Having that in mind, I think we shall stop looking to the processing of coal as an immediate source of remedy for the problem which confronts us, no matter how much possibility there may be in the processing of coal some time in the future—I am altogether in favour of processing, I may say.

I believe I have said about all I had in mind to say. I will repeat once more, I do believe that it would be altogether in the interest of Canada to give notice to the United States just as soon as we can, and as kindly as we can, that we do not feel that it is in the interests of the United States or of Canada that Canada should be largely dependent upon her friendly neighbour for coal or for any other fuel. After all, we intend to be a great nation. It is vitally in the interest of the United States that we should be a great nation. If calamity should befall her she would have someone on whom to rely for assistance. If we were too greatly integrated with the United States and calamity befell her it would involve us also. I do believe that if we approach the United States people in that attitude they will soon come to agree with our thinking that we should immediately proceed to import our coal needs from Alberta and from the maritimes to Quebec and Ontario. If we grant the subventions which are necessary to bring these coals into these two provinces I think probably that will prove to be the best immediate method of attacking the problem.

Mr. Barnett: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the thought-provoking speeches which have been made on this coal problem from the various quarters of the house. The story of the situation that the coal industry finds itself in has been pretty well told. I could supplement that story to some extent by the story of the situation of the coal mining industry of Vancouver island, which happens to be our oldest industry there, apart from the original fur-trading period; but I believe it would be repetitious if I were to do that at this stage. I will merely say that the facts of the industry there are similar to those which other hon. members have described in other parts of the country.

In view of the kind of speeches that have been made upon this subject, which shows that some hon. members have been giving this problem a great deal of serious attention, I found myself rather disturbed last night by the reaction that the minister appeared to have to the speech which was made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Apparently his only reaction to the serious proposal which the hon. member put forward for the development of a national fuel policy under a national fuel board was some rather flippant interjection about nationalization. I should like to suggest that if the minister is going to allow his prejudices about "izations" and "isms" or anything of that kind to stand in the way of his taking a constructive and thoughtful approach to the solution of this problem, that is not the serious attitude which should properly be taken by a minister of the crown in this country. Before this discussion is over I hope the minister will make clear that he has a more serious interest in his duties than was indicated by the remark he made in reference to the speech by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. At the time the remark was interjected I happened to be glancing at a report I received in my mail box, the annual report of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which I notice is a company apparently owned by the government of Canada, and which has been entrusted with finances to the extent of something over $196 million.

When a minister of a government which has been responsible for bringing into being an organization of this kind takes a flippant attitude towards suggestions made in all seriousness that we should try to take an over-all look at the question of fuel in this country, then I suggest it is not in keeping with the realities of life in Canada as we have them today. I myself have suggested, for example, that we should try to seek a more co-ordinated approach to the transportation problem in this country. Certainly no two things are more important and basic in the industrial era than transportation and fuel. Therefore I wish to emphasize the importance of the suggestion being made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South that this is not something which can be considered apart from other aspects of our Canadian economy; and if the minister is content to allow to continue what I would call a state of economic balkanization in the country, it will only lead to further and further troubles. Surely, in this day and age he should agree that this is something which should be approached from the over-all picture, and that we should seek in this parliament to guide and direct a policy which will be in the interests of all the people of Canada, including the people who are engaged in this important industry.

Mr. Gillis: There is a statutory vote for the coal board of $400,000. It is an old thing. I should like to call the minister's attention to the fact that there is a tariff of 50 cents a ton on bituminous coal at the United States border, but there is a drawback on that tariff of 49 cents permitted on imported coal when it is used for metallurgical purposes. We in turn have the $400,000 as some concession to the Canadian industry that uses coal for the making of steel. I would suggest that the coal board take a look at that. We are spending $400,000 on our own industry, which wipes out the effect of the tariff of 50 cents a ton. When you grant a drawback of 49 cents a ton to the importer you wipe out the effect of the tariff. If that tariff was to protect the Canadian bituminous industry in the first place, then it should remain and have that effect. To put it on and then wipe it out, because most of the coal imported is used for industrial purposes, does not seem to make sense. I am not objecting to the vote here. I think our industry is entitled to that amount of money, if we continue to grant the drawback to importers of the United States coal who use it for metallurgical purposes. I am bringing that to the attention of the coal board and the minister and I would urge them to take a look at this old statutory provision and see whether it is not having some effect in encouraging the importation of United States coal.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the comments of the hon. member for Cape Breton South not only today but in his speech last night during which he emphasized that we should give encouragement to the building and strengthening of our steel industry. I believe that that statutory provision was designed in the first place to encourage our steel industry. The steel industry of Nova Scotia does not use United States coal and therefore it is given the equivalent of the tariff conditions other companies enjoy.

I wish to thank hon. members for the constructive speeches they have made concerning the problems of the coal industry. I was somewhat surprised at the very mild tone of the speech by the hon. member for Lethbridge this morning. He referred to a private quarrel I had with the Social Credit party. I do not mind admitting that I do not subscribe to their theories, but in so far as the coal industry is concerned I have no quarrel with them. I would like to refer to some of the remarks made in this debate, with particular reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Macleod last evening.

He referred to a question he had asked in this house some time ago and to the answer I gave at that time. He gave no notice of that question; it was directed to the Minister of Labour; and in turn it was referred to me without notice. He said my reply was a cheap political answer. He is entitled to his opinion. But I am going to say that I think his question had some political implications. However, I am very pleased with the result that seemed to stem from that question and answer. The following week the Alberta government announced they were providing $100,000 for the rehabilitation of miners, and I hope that that question and answer had some influence on their decision.

Several hon. members have asked for a national fuel policy. This is an old story. Ever since I have been in parliament that proposal has always been brought up on these estimates. But as yet I have never met anyone who could state concisely what he meant by a "national fuel policy" or "national coal policy".

This government's policy in regard to coal has been clearly stated. For the past 26 years it has been the policy of this and other federal governments to assist Canadian coal to market by means of freight subventions. Those subventions are designed to make Canadian coal competitive with the United States imported coal. By the approval of the estimates now before this house this policy will be extended for the year 1954.

Assistance to the industry has also been given in other ways, as outlined in my statement to the committee, by research, by way of loans for mechanization, and assistance to the mine operators by way of studies of preparation and mining problems. Several hon. members have rightly stressed the importance of research. In my statement I outlined some of the research projects in which this government is engaged at the present time. We have one of our fuel division engineers in Europe studying and observing the experiments being carried on over there.

Just a few days ago the report of the British fuel commission was issued and it mentioned a new process being used in France, and I think also in Holland, to convert bituminous coal to anthracite. The chief of the fuels division in the last couple of days sent word to our man in England to be sure to look at this experiment before he returns.

[Mr. Prudham.]

Other forms of energy and fuel do not come under the jurisdiction of the dominion coal board, but just for a moment I would like to refer to these other fields of fuel and energy to show how they fit into the national picture. Up until a very few months ago this government had no stated policy in regard to natural gas for the simple reason that we had no gas with which to deal. Until the government of Alberta declared a surplus of gas for export this government had no jurisdiction. I need not take up the time of the committee to review recent developments in this field, because they have already been debated and carefully examined during the present session. To put it briefly, I might state that the government's policy was outlined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as recorded at page 2929 of Hansard of March 13, 1953, and I quote his words:

> Therefore the policy of the government of Canada is to refuse permits for moving natural gas by pipeline across an international boundary until such time as we are convinced that there can be no economic use, present or future, for that natural gas within Canada.

The government's gas policy has not changed since that statement, and I am sure hon. members are very pleased to note the progress that has been made toward the construction of the east-west gas pipe line.

Since 1907 the federal government has rigidly controlled the export of electricity from Canada. During the last war the government initiated a project which is known as the Chalk River project for the development of atomic energy. We are all very pleased to know that Canada is in the forefront of progress in this field. Canada's atomic research is directed to peacetime application.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce announced to the house just recently that the method of development of electric power from this source is now well advanced. The hydroelectric power sources in Ontario will soon have been fully exploited, and other sources such as natural gas, atomic energy, as well as coal and oil, will, of necessity, have to be used to supplement the hydro power.

In a country developing as rapidly as Canada, we cannot have a static or rigid policy. Any federal government policy in regard to resource development must, of necessity, be flexible and capable of meeting the challenge of changing conditions.

It is all very well for Premier Manning and the Social Credit members from Alberta to try to "pass the buck" to this government by making the vague statement that we should have a national fuel policy. I say that because I have here a press clipping which quotes Premier Manning as stating, when he announced his $100,000 fund, that the only cure for this problem was a national fuel policy.

In 1930 the resources of the western provinces were transferred from this government to the provincial governments and with that transfer the provincial governments assumed the responsibility for the development as well as the benefit they would derive from these resources. Since 1935 the Alberta government has received in coal fees, rentals, and royalties, more than $8 million. During the same period the federal government has paid out $16,300,000 by way of freight subventions. This last figure does not include special wartime payments and production subsidies amounting to over $5,800,000. The estimates now before us provide more than $2,500,000 additional for the same purpose this year. The coal industry is suffering because of the development of gas and oil. I do not think it seems reasonable for the provincial government of Alberta to try to sidestep its responsibility with regard to coal simply by calling for a national fuel policy.

Mr. Low: They are not trying to sidestep their responsibility.

Mr. Prudham: Perhaps the press report is wrong. I am prompted to say this because of the press report of what Premier Manning said.

Mr. Low: They are not trying to sidestep their responsibility.

Mr. Prudham: I will accept the hon. member's statement. Because the coal industry is in difficulties, according to the press report, Premier Manning says it is up to this government to do something about it. I wonder what his attitude would be with regard to gas and oil? As long as they are making millions of dollars out of gas and oil, Mr. Chairman, you may be sure that they will consider that that is purely a provincial matter.

Mr. Castleden: Call it one o'clock.

Mr. Prudham: The Alberta government have done something about the coal industry. They have done considerable research and they are co-operating fully with our department. The hon. member for Macleod last night mentioned the fact that they are building a new research building and that this department is providing much of the technical staff. They have collected $8 million from the coal industry of Alberta since 1935. They are now offering $100,000 to help to move the miners out of the mining areas.

A fuel policy administered nationally would have to have teeth in it. A national fuel policy such as that asked for by several members—especially by the hon. member for Macleod—would be entirely ineffective without some form of rigid control. Of course, according to my understanding of Social Credit philosophy, that would be entirely in accord with the application of that philosophy.

Mr. Low: The minister does not understand it.

Mr. Prudham: I do not think anybody else does either. Such controls undoubtedly would include strict supervision of the development and production of all forms of energy. Those are powers which are beyond the scope of the federal government. Property, civil rights and natural resources are provincial responsibilities.

The federal government has an over-all responsibility to all the people of Canada for the co-ordination and the fostering of resources development. This responsibility is being discharged without regimentation and without interference with provincial rights. No one knows yet what effect gas will have on the fuel and energy situation in central Canada and no one knows what effect atomic energy will have. All these great sources of energy, including oil and coal, are the keys to the unlocking of our great natural resources. As long as this government is in power the national policy will be to encourage the best possible use of all sources of fuel and energy for all Canadians.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Low: No, Mr. Chairman; call it one o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the committee like to dispose of items 237 and 238, under the heading of dominion coal board, before we rise for lunch.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Low: No.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I do not take part in the debate today because I feel that I have anything important to contribute to the solution of the coal problem in Canada, but I do feel that it is essential that I take a few minutes of the time of the committee this afternoon to give consideration to some statements which were made by the minister just prior to the lunch hour. However, before I do that I should like to state briefly the impression I got from the discussion that has already taken place concerning this matter. I listened attentively last night and today to speeches made about the coal problem. I must say that I was impressed with the seriousness and the earnestness with which this problem has been discussed.

I particularly want to mention the speech delivered today by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. I thought his contribution to the debate was excellent and down to earth. He evidently has given a great deal of thought to this problem with which his own province is faced, and which is perhaps one of the great problems of the maritimes. I believe that the more we study what he had to say the more we will see in it by way of possible improvement in the coal situation.

I must say of course that the problem in western Canada is considerably different from the problem in the east, if for no other reason than the fact that we have been developing for some years now our oil and gas resources, and the outstanding development that has taken place has contributed in no small measure to the difficulties under which the coal mining industry carries on. We have in Alberta cheap natural gas and oil, both of which compete, in fact in many places more than compete, with coal. So there is little wonder that we have difficulty there.

It is quite true to say that the development of oil and gas in such quantities has contributed to the real problems faced by the coal people. In addition, we of course have great quantities of propane being used now far and wide by the farmers and other rural dwellers, so there is no wonder that there is difficulty. However, there are some spots which I think should begin to show a little light at the other end of the tunnel. I do not know how far we can look for relief for the coal industry to the experiments and research that are being carried out to try to find successful conversion methods. However, the other day I was talking with a man who seems to know something about conversion and he tells me that there is a good possibility that certain coals in the foothills of the Rocky mountains not too far from the city of Calgary could be converted successfully into electric power at the mine head.

The mining of the coal is quite cheap. The conducting lines for the electricity would be short enough to make possible the taking of the power to the northwestern United States and the selling of it there to the northwest power pool at a price that would make mining the coal a successful venture. I am told that there is a possibility that this sort of thing could develop in the next few years, and I have every reason to believe that the power situation in the northwestern United States is such that the people in the area would be glad to get power from such a source as I have mentioned, especially if the conversion of the coal into power can be accomplished at a reasonable price. Therefore we might perhaps see some such thing as that.

Let us suppose for a minute that the Alberta government, interested and very much concerned as it is in the question of helping the coal industry of the province, should make the efforts that they think should be made to encourage the building of great power plants in and near the coal fields. Let us also suppose that some arrangement could be worked out with the northwestern United States power pool to buy the electrical power and that we get the whole thing worked up to the point where agreements are about to be signed. I am going to ask the minister just how far the government of the province of Alberta could go without running into a very rigid federal policy.

Mr. Prudham: May I answer now?

Mr. Low: If the minister does not mind I would prefer that he answer that, along with some other points, at the end of my speech. I also have something more to say about this very subject. I draw that to the minister's attention for the reason that in his remarks this morning he seemed to forget the place that the government of Canada occupies in the control of fuel policy. I point out to him in the friendliest possible way that if Alberta were to go all out to develop the kind of thing about which I have been speaking it would not be very long until they would run smack into a rigid federal policy—

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Low: —into which they would simply have to fit. They would have to come to Ottawa and get permission to export the power generated in that way.

Mr. Prudham: No difficulty.

Mr. Low: I am not saying how difficult or otherwise it would be. I am not talking about difficulty. What I am talking about is the fact, and I have reason for mentioning it. I said that I probably would not have anything very important to contribute to the solution of the coal problem, but in the minister's speech before lunch he became provocative, as I shall show. I know full well that the Liberal party is having plenty of difficulties in Alberta. That is no reason at all why the minister should make his every utterance with respect to the problems of the province cheap and political, as the hon. member for Macleod said last night. In his summary today the minister indulged in some provocative statements which I shall examine, and they were again of a cheap, political nature. I hasten to admit that is his right and privilege if he wants to do it. Certainly it is. But I also remind the minister that he must not be surprised if, when such statements are made, we who come from Alberta reply to his political utterances, and reply vigorously, even if the hour to finish up the business is late and the house is trying to reach prorogation soon.

The minister sought to excuse his indulgence in provocative speech by saying that the question that was asked by the hon. member for Macleod on March 24 had political implications. Now, Mr. Chairman, I read the question again for the consideration of hon. members, and particularly the minister. It would take some long stretch of the imagination for anybody to see political implications in this question. As I considered it again at noon, I thought it was quite straightforward. I read it from page 3289 of Hansard for March 24:

> Has the government any knowledge of the report appearing in the Calgary Albertan that the coal mines in Coleman, Alberta, are to close down operations on March 31, and that other mines in the Crowsnest pass are likely to follow with shutdowns?
> If so, does the government contemplate any remedial action?

I have heard many questions asked of ministers in this session of a like nature which received straightforward replies in exactly the same tone and which were satisfactory. I cannot quite understand why the minister would avail himself of that question to try to excuse the political answer he gave on that occasion by saying he thought it had political implications. The fact is that the hon. member for Macleod told me there were no political implications; he had no underhanded motives whatever. He wanted to find out the truth about the situation because here was a tragedy happening in his constituency. How can anyone say that there are political implications in a straightforward question that affects the lives and welfare of hundreds, perhaps thousands of people who live in a particular constituency? I thought that the member for Macleod had been very mild in the way he asked the question.

I remember, too, on the very day, March 24, when the minister gave his reply about which the hon. member for Macleod complained last night. I thought then that some day the minister was asking for a dressing down, and he got it last night. Of course, because of that, he smarts under the dressing down the hon. member for Macleod gave him, and as a consequence I am going to show the house just how political the minister can get by way of retribution. There were several members who took part in this debate, and who asked the minister and the government to consider adopting a national fuel policy. The minister admitted that himself. He said several members in this debate have asked for a national fuel policy. There were, and I heard them.

The interesting thing is that when he dealt with national fuel policy he came right back to pick up particularly the hon. member for Macleod, who had asked, in the same way as others had, for a national fuel policy. Then, the minister proceeded to become somewhat abusive in connection with it, but never once to the others. What does it indicate? It indicates that he continues, day after day and week after week, to smart under the difficulties the Liberal party are having in Alberta. He cannot get his mind above that. In the course of his summary before noon, he said that certain subventions had been paid by the government of Canada to Alberta producers over a period of 26 years. Those subventions were designed to make Canadian coal competitive with the United States imported coal.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, what better national policy there could be than to adopt those measures which would in very deed make Canadian coal competitive with imported United States coal? But the fact of the matter is that subventions have not done so, and the best evidence of that is that we continue to import into Canada a very large tonnage of United States coal each year. What we ask for when we ask for a national coal policy is a policy that, in very deed, will make it possible for Canadian producers, no matter where they are, to compete favourably with imported coal. In this way we could develop our mines to the point where we could be self-sufficient, as the hon. member for Lethbridge so well said this morning. What safer policy could we adopt than that which would induce the production of that amount of coal which would make us, in case of emergency, self-sufficient?

While the minister admits to a certain amount of national policy, also by his very words he condemns his own policy because it does not do what he thought it was designed to do. Now, that is the situation in a nutshell. In another part of his summary my hon. friend did mention a statement that had been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as recorded at page 2929 of

Hansard for March 13, 1953. I repeat what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said on that occasion:

> Therefore the policy of the government of Canada is to refuse permits for moving natural gas by pipe line across an international boundary until such time as we are convinced there can be no economic use, present or future, for that natural gas within Canada.

Now, the only reason I refer to the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is that it has a direct bearing on something the minister said this morning. I should like hon. members to keep that statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in mind, because if there is a rigid policy that has been set out for governing fuels, that is the policy. When people talk about rigidity of controls, then well might we say, where can you find them more rigid than that?

The minister went on to say something like this: It is all very well for Premier Manning and the Social Credit members from Alberta to try to pass the buck to this government by making vague statements that we should have a national fuel policy. Now, why would he be so ready to go back to Mr. Manning and the Social Credit government of Alberta or Social Credit members from Alberta, in a statement of that kind? He goes on to explain he mentioned that because he had a press clipping that quoted Premier Manning as stating, when he announced his $100,000 fund for the rehabilitation of miners, that the only cure for the problem was a national fuel policy. Well, now, the hon. member for Cape Breton South demanded a national fuel policy, and others who spoke asked for a national fuel policy. But the minister had to go back and rebuke and criticize Social Credit members and, in particular, Mr. Manning, the premier of Alberta, because they asked for a national fuel policy. And he seemed to think that he had to make some political capital out of that. We have all been asking for a national fuel policy; and you now have at least part of an element of a national fuel policy, some of which is exceedingly rigid and some of which is not.

What is the harm then, what is the sin, in asking for a national fuel policy? Well, of course my hon. friend, as I said before, criticizes us particularly because he carries around a political chip on his shoulder all the time. He seems to feel that he has enemies around here.

He very wisely made the statement this morning that the coal industry is suffering because of the development of gas and oil. But he then tries to hook on to that this further statement, that he did not think that it would seem reasonable for the provincial government of Alberta to try to sidestep its responsibilities with regard to coal simply by calling for a national fuel policy. And then, a little later on, he went on to say that the Alberta government are doing something about coal. Then he paid tribute to them for what they are doing.

I point out to the minister that the federal government, by virtue of the fact that they have accepted certain definite responsibilities in connection with mines and technical surveys, and coal, have upon them the obligation to develop a national fuel policy. We are discussing right now, as a matter of fact, item No. 237 which deals with the dominion coal board, and I notice that the minister is asking us—we are not asking him, he is asking us—to give him $10,365,014 to administer the national coal policy. And then, because we are discussing an item like that for $10 million to administer a national coal policy, he takes political umbrage at our demanding that we be given a sight of that policy that the government are not administering. That is all.

And when we ask that there be a policy, one which no province in Canada by itself could possibly lay down and carry out, from the very nature of our federal arrangement, we run into this difficulty, that the minister turns around and says he thinks it is unreasonable for a provincial government like that of Alberta to try to sidestep its responsibility with regard to coal by simply calling for a national fuel policy. I point out to the minister that the province of Alberta is not attempting to sidestep its responsibility or to throw it off on to him, or anybody else. But we do ask that, when the government or people of this country put up several millions of dollars a year for the administration of a fuel policy, they be given that policy.

That is the whole story. We feel that we have a right to ask for it and that he has no excuse for dragging it into the gutter of politics.

Mr. Prudham: Down to your level.

Mr. Low: The minister said some other things which I think must bear examination. He said in the course of his speech before lunch that he wondered what the attitude of Mr. Manning would be with regard to gas and oil. And then he threw out this rather pointed statement that "as long as they are making millions of dollars out of gas and oil, Mr. Chairman, you may be sure they are considering that it is purely a provincial matter".

Now, Mr. Chairman, that was entirely uncalled for. That was straining to try to find some way to vent his political spleen, particularly in respect of Mr. Manning's attitude with regard to oil and gas—and the minister knows it. I seem to have to remind him quite often about these things. Mr. Manning and his government sought by every possible means within their power to find a good market for oil and gas when, by excellent administration, they had achieved their development. Now, in his efforts to find a market, especially for gas, he found himself up against a policy declared by the federal government, which policy forbade the government of Alberta seeking a market in the middle western United States. But Mr. Manning said that he would support the federal government policy in Canada. He also said he would co-operate to the fullest extent, Mr. Chairman, even though there were some disabilities attached to the policy with regard to the price to the producers.

It was known by everyone who had gone into the matter fully that the best market for Alberta gas would have been in the middle western United States. But we did not fight that. Mr. Manning said, "Certainly, since the federal government has laid down a specific policy, we are acquainted with it and we will work with it." That was the attitude of the premier of Alberta with respect to gas and oil. And they did not for one second attempt to say that it was a provincial matter, as the minister has charged this morning. I will repeat his words—"I wonder what the attitude of the premier of Alberta would be with regard to gas and oil. So long as they are making millions of dollars out of gas and oil you may be sure they will continue to consider that it is a purely provincial matter."

We do not. We consider that it is a federal matter, and we have co-operated, the province has co-operated, with respect to such matters. And if the minister would just try to be fair about it I am satisfied that he would say so.

We have not at all considered oil and gas as a purely provincial matter. We have fitted in with the federal policy, and we want to make it work in the interests of Canada. No matter what the minister says, he cannot get away with what he said. The Alberta government wants to be as co-operative as possible with every minister in this government, and I am satisfied that they have been so.

I want to come to one other point which I believe is very important. The minister said this morning that the Alberta government had done something about the coal industry. He admitted we had achieved quite a good deal in research, and he went on to say that Alberta co-operated fully with his department. Well, if that is so, why in the name of common sense did he go out of his way to attack them in this house?

Mr. Prudham: Just answering an attack.

Mr. Low: Why did he go out of his way to show his political bias when, at the same time, he said they co-operated fully with his department? It is a pretty poor way to go about getting co-operation. And it was done simply because the hon. member for Macleod—and it was for no other reason—proceeded to dress the minister down for a distinctly different reason, that the minister came back and attacked the government of Alberta. In trying to cast some further reflection upon Alberta he makes the statement that the Alberta government has collected $8 million from the coal industry of Alberta since 1935. And he goes on and adds to it—for the purpose of belittling them and for no other reason—that we are now offering $100,000 to help move the miners out of the mining area. There is no other reason in the world for his putting it that way. It is just a straight case of attempting to belittle. I want to point out to the minister that he is not correct when he says that the government of Alberta collected $8 million since 1935 from the coal industry. It was not from the coal industry. What the government of the province of Alberta did in that period from 1935 was to collect something like $8 million as rental for the people of Alberta from the use of one of the people's valuable resources; that is all, a straight rental for the purpose of reimbursing the people of the province for the use of one of their resources.

I know exactly what the minister has in mind. For a good long time the policy of the Liberal party has been to dispose of the people's resources by deed of gift and so forth to political adherents so that they could work them and get the income for themselves. That has been done for many years.

Mr. Prudham: Give us one instance.

Mr. Low: Yes, I will give you one instance. All you have to do is to take a look at what the Sifton family got out of Alberta. I had a chance to look at it, because I was in a position to look at it, a straight deed of gift to political heelers.

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member had better take a look into some of his own treasury house deals.

Mr. Low: I have had a chance to look into this, too, and all the answers the minister is capable of making here this afternoon will not help him to colour his case against Alberta. I say that the purpose of the statement he made about the $8 million income and the $100,000 to help the people in the mining areas was simply to try to belittle the government and minimize the truth.

I do not want to take too much more time, but I do want to end by referring to a national fuel policy. By way of showing some grievance, the minister referred to a national fuel policy such as that asked for by several members. He emphasized that asked for by the hon. member for Macleod, and said such a policy, especially that asked for by the hon. member for Macleod, would be entirely ineffective without some form of rigid controls. And he repeated, "Of course, according to my understanding of the Social Credit philosophy, that would be entirely in accord with the application of their philosophy".

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am asking the minister to take the speech of the hon. member for Macleod and show this committee one instance, one small fraction, of difference between the national fuel policy that he asked for and the one asked for by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. There was not a single difference. He asked for a national fuel policy. That is what the hon. member for Cape Breton South asked for, and the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, and many others. There was not the slightest difference between them, and yet the minister comes out and tries to cast aspersions by saying "especially that asked for by the hon. member for Macleod, would have to have rigid controls and that is in accord with the Social Credit philosophy."

Let me tell the minister that the hon. member for Macleod did not advocate a fuel policy involving rigid controls at all. Social Credit does not involve any such policy. He will have to take my word for it this afternoon, because I am not going into a debate on Social Credit policy. If he wants to at some time or other I shall give him plenty of opportunity to do so, and when that time comes he will not debate it. The thing I want to point out to my hon. friend is that he has used his talents particularly for the purpose of trying to cast aspersions when he should have been doing his level best to try to work out better methods of co-operation, because I am here to tell him that we cannot possibly solve the coal problem—it is a serious one in this country—unless we have the utmost of co-operation between provincial governments and the dominion government; and some vision, courtesy and courage. We are prepared to go into such an arrangement of real co-operation, and we will do it without getting down into the mud of politics. But we expect the minister to play the game decently.

Mr. Herridge: I shall be only two or three minutes. I see the Minister of Finance looking rather anxiously at me. I listened with a great deal of interest to a number of speeches on the coal industry of Canada and I have every sympathy with the members who are concerned with the difficulties. I must congratulate the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond particularly, whose speech was the product of a trained mind, and who speaks with exactitude and uses language with precision. I enjoyed it very much indeed.

I just want to take two or three minutes to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that we have a number of mining communities in the southeastern section of British Columbia that are suffering from a depression as the result of a drop in the price of base metals. These communities were built up as a result of early day exploration and this has resulted in the investment of large amounts of capital in mines, in communities and in public services.

I do wish to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the companies, trade unions, and communities concerned are very anxious that he frequently nudge the elbows of his colleagues to make certain that this situation is kept under review and that everything be done that can be done to protect the interests of these people.

I am going to read briefly from a resolution I have received and then conclude, Mr. Chairman. This is the opinion of a good many organizations in the district:

> The Slocan district board of trade is greatly concerned over the possibility of the United States government imposing a higher tariff on lead and zinc entering the United States.
> It costs as much to produce these metals in this area as it does in the western states and we are already paying 0·75 cents a pound duty for lead and 0·6 cents a pound duty for zinc.
>
> Any increase in the tariff would cause further hardship in an area which is already depressed due to the low price of these metals, and would certainly delay the re-opening of several properties which are hoping to operate in the near future.
> We strongly urge that the government of Canada make every effort to see that Canada is not placed in the same category as those countries which are in a position to dump these metals at low prices, due to the fact that they do not pay wages near the level enjoyed by American and Canadian workmen.

Then I have a letter here from one of the local unions. They are asking for governmental attention to this question and government support, and are urging that if necessary the government take retaliatory measures, if the Americans increase the tariffs on these metals, by increasing the charges to the United States on such desirable Canadian natural resources as nickel, asbestos, uranium and any other which lends itself to that purpose.

I bring this to the attention of the minister because I promised the organizations concerned to mention it in the house before this session closed. I do urge the minister to use every means in his power to protect the interests of the mining communities concerned, and if necessary by the imposition of duties on the products suggested.

Mr. Michener: There are two minerals produced in the province of Ontario which deserve a brief mention at this time. The first is natural gas. It may be thought by many hon. members that, because of the vast natural gas fields in western Canada, those are the only sources of natural gas in Canada. The fact is that Ontario is a very old producer and is still producing natural gas, and is discovering new fields every year. The recent discoveries of natural gas in southwestern Ontario indicate a supply which will be of considerable importance in the domestic market. I raise this, Mr. Chairman, because the minister is concerned with natural gas which crosses provincial boundaries, and my point deals with the protection of the local producers of natural gas which would seem to be the concern of both this government and the government of Ontario. Recently arrangements were made to import natural gas across the Niagara frontier and at Windsor in very substantial quantities, and I understand that substantial contracts have been made with the Union Gas Company Limited which is the main distributing agency in that area. I think the two governments who bear the responsibility in this matter should attempt to secure for the local producers of natural gas a fair share of the market when these substantial quantities of imported gas, both from the south and in due course, we hope, from western Canada, become available; otherwise the development of the many undiscovered gas pools in Ontario will be retarded and the industry stifled.

The other mineral with which I wish to deal is gold, and the provisions made under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act are, of course, a saving factor in that situation. I shall not take the time to go into the problem in detail. My concern is mainly with the gold producers of Ontario, and the fact is that of the 78 gold mines which were producing in 1939 only one-third are in operation today. As everyone knows, that is due to the double handicap of the reduction in the price of gold which they mine, amounting to $4 per ounce or 11 per cent, and the increase, on the other hand, in the cost of production, materials and labour. The cost of materials between 1940 and 1953 ranged from a 48 per cent increase in the cost of dynamite, to 246 per cent increase in the cost of spruce planking used in the mines. In the same way the cost of paper used in the mining industry rose in the same period by 100 per cent. The position of the gold producers compared with the producers of other metals is quite striking. Nickel has enjoyed an increase in price of 29 cents to 57 cents, or an increase of 97 per cent; newsprint has increased by 152 per cent, and other natural products have increased in proportion, so that this problem which has been recognized by the provision of a statutory subsidy in these estimates is one which I am sure will not be overlooked by the minister in the immediate future.

I am not one of those who believe that this condition will continue. I am confident that gold, as a monetary base, will assume its former position in due course as the basis for a broadened international trade, and I am confident that a new price, in conformity with its scarcity value and its proper relationship to other prices, will be re-established. It is significant that in March of this year the buying and selling of gold on the open market after a lapse of 15 years was resumed in London, and there are many other factors which indicate that a monetary system based on gold was one of the casualties of the war. I think that socialistic experiments will in due course be found necessary in any broadened international trade picture.

I am not going to labour that point because much business remains to be done. But I did want to make that passing reference in order to assure the minister that the Ontario producers of both these minerals are watching developments with interest.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to make a speech on this occasion because I realize that a number of members of the committee have train reservations for next Wednesday and I think it would be desirable that we should not go beyond that date. However, there is a question I would like to ask the minister regarding the general administration of his department. I noticed on looking at the amounts indicating the requirements for increases in pay that percentagewise these seem to vary from one branch to another. I will give a few examples as I have roughly figured them out. In the administration of the department the bulk increase in salary seems to be eight per cent, whereas in the mines branch administration it seems to be seven per cent. In the surveys and mapping branch, the hydrographic part, it seems to be three and a half per cent, and in the geodetic survey it seems to be three per cent. In the international boundary commission it is two per cent, and in the legal surveys and aeronautical charts branch it is five per cent. In the map compilation and reproduction branch it seems to be ten per cent. Could the minister say something about the variation in the increases?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I can quite understand my hon. friend's question. In previous years we had an establishment which was not always filled. We had positions set up and in many cases we did not have persons for those positions. That is the reason why there is a discrepancy between the various branches.

While I am on my feet I would like to answer the hon. member for St. Paul's. He asked about the control of production and sale of gas in Ontario. The Ontario government recently passed an act to control the production and import of gas into the province and it will be under that act that the gas will be controlled.

Mr. Michener: I was concerned about the importation of gas because that seems to me beyond the original jurisdiction.

Mr. Prudham: There is very close co-operation between this government and the Ontario government and if they present a problem of that kind I am sure it will receive very careful consideration.

The hon. member also mentioned the number of gold mines at present in operation and, I believe, he has been misled by our 1953 statement. Reports from the various mines that apply for gold mining assistance often come in after the close of the fiscal year. The number of mines in operation in 1953 after reports were in was 91, 63 of which were auriferous mines, 23 placer mines, and five on the free market.

Mr. Michener: I was just referring to the gold mines in Ontario, not in the whole of Canada. The figures would naturally differ from those in the report.

Mr. Prudham: Before we go further, Mr. Chairman, I should like to pay a word of tribute to the hon. member who first spoke on the estimates of this department. I refer to the late hon. member for York West. He made a quite lengthy statement and it was a very constructive one. I may say that he was always courteous. He was always an advocate of private enterprise. He believed strongly in the increasing use of gold in our economy. I believe the last words of his in the House of Commons are typical of his whole belief and attitude with regard to the importance of the great mineral resources of this country. On March 19 he concluded his remarks in this way, as reported at page 3184 of Hansard:

> . . . I sincerely hope that I have shown you, sir, and to hon. members who may not be interested in mining as much as I am, that today the greatest internal challenge we have in Canada is the development of our natural resources.

His passing is a great loss to this parliament, to the mining community and to the whole nation.

Explosives Act—

211. Explosives Act—administration, operation and maintenance, $97,988.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all members of the committee, especially those of this party, appreciate what the minister has said. We in this party join with him in his words of regret that the member of this committee who took such a keen interest in the minister's department was so tragically killed in the aircraft accident at Moose Jaw.

I have one question to ask on this item 211. Can the minister tell us whether the new explosives laboratory of his department which was being built out near Uplands is in operation?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mines branch—

212. Mines branch administration, $81,158.

Mr. MacLean: I should like to take this opportunity of pointing out to the committee the great importance of a new metal which is being developed in this country. I have in mind its great importance in the light of new developments in the aircraft industry with the advent of the jet engine. I refer, of course, to titanium. It is a metal that has not been used commercially to any great extent up until now but it has properties which are suitable for new developments in the design of high performance jet engines. I wonder whether the minister could make a brief statement as to what progress his department is making with regard to the concentration, analysis and reduction of titanium, especially with reference to the deposits in eastern Quebec.

Mr. Prudham: I have here a report from the deputy minister which I think will cover what my hon. friend is asking for.

The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has been instrumental in bringing together all phases of a potential titanium industry in Canada. Total annual titanium requirements in Canada are at present negligible but it is estimated that by 1960 Canada will be able to support a titanium industry about one-tenth the size of the United States industry. The largest Canadian use for titanium metal would be in aircraft manufacture.

Mines branch has assessed the technical practicability of the various titanium production methods being contemplated in Canada and has supplied the Department of Defence Production with data which might be of assistance in formulating policies with regard to government encouragement of the development of a Canadian titanium industry. The branch has given technical assistance to both Dominion Magnesium Limited, and Shawinigan Water & Power Company during the development of their respective processes. The quality of the titanium produced by each process has been evaluated.

Primary or sponge titanium now sells for from $4.50 to $5.00 a pound in the United States. Under the pressure of competition and by taking full advantage of technical advancements, the currently-used Kroll process could probably produce primary titanium to sell for $3.50 a pound. Shawinigan estimates that a plant using its electrolytic process could produce titanium at a rate of 1,000 tons per year to sell for about $3 per pound. The Shawinigan process is a distinctly Canadian development and would use titanium raw material from Canadian ores. However, it has only been proven on a large laboratory scale, 4 pounds per day per cell. There are admitted unknowns to be encountered in expanding the scale of operations ten times, a step necessary for commercial operations. The government is assisting Shawinigan in the preliminary stages of this expansion.

The mines branch has a broad titanium research program well in hand. This program covers all phases from the treatment of Canadian titanium ores through purification of the metal to melting, alloying, forging, and casting of titanium. Knowledge gained during this program will be available to any Canadian industry engaged in titanium processing or use.

217. To provide for payments to McGill University in connection with the development of a coal-fired gas turbine, $100,000.

Mr. MacLean: I wonder whether the minister has any further progress report that he might briefly make with regard to the research at McGill University?

Mr. Prudham: Several hon. members were down to see the Mordell plant some time ago. Since that visit the plant has been in operation for long periods at a time, and no additional difficulties have been encountered. The men in charge of our fuels division are quite optimistic about the project. As I said in my opening remarks, the next step will be that of making practical use of it. No one knows exactly where it will find the most useful application. I know that some industrialists are looking at it with a view to producing power units. As I said, the railways are also watching it. As I mentioned this morning, one of our engineers is at present in England studying a similar effort there. We are also co-ordinating the results of the Mordell experiment with experiments in the United States.

Geological survey of Canada—

Geological surveys—

218. Administration, operation and maintenance, including the expenses of the national advisory committee on research in the geological sciences, an amount of $1,500 for Canada's share of the cost of the committee on mineral resources and geology, London, England, and an amount of $25,000 for grants in aid of geological research in Canadian universities, $2,235,425.

Mr. Michener: It is interesting to note the extent to which the geological survey is taking to the air. This estimate includes $145,000 for the charter of aircraft as against $30,000 last year. This is probably significant of trends in mapping and geological surveying. I recall that an extensive aerial survey of Ontario was under way some years ago by the provincial department of lands and forests. I assume that other provinces have been doing surveys of that kind. I also assume the work at all levels of government is made available one to the other and co-ordinated so that there is no overlapping or duplication. On this particular point I would be interested in knowing what firms and aircraft are used by the department in the course of this service.

Mr. Prudham: The department only controls one aircraft. We usually call for tenders for specific types of work, and through the air transport board the work is allotted to the firm that has the best equipment and the most favourable price. I think the increase that my hon. friend referred to is accounted for to a large extent by a helicopter operation that is under way at the present time between Hudson bay and Yellowknife. It is a geological reconnaissance, and a party of about eight men is able to do in one season what it would ordinarily take a ground party twenty-five years to do.

Mr. Michener: Would the minister give the name of the company whose aircraft were chartered last year and, if it is settled for this year, what company will be doing the work.

Mr. Prudham: We hire aircraft from a great number of companies. It is difficult at the moment to give all the names, but we can do that.

Mr. Michener: Would the minister table a list of the companies whose aircraft were chartered last year and the amount paid to each?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Michener: And if there are current contracts, the same information for this year.

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the minister give us a break-down of the item of $25,000 to Canadian universities?

Mr. Prudham: The allocation of the $25,000 has not been finally agreed on for this year. Nearly all the major universities participate. I have it for last year. The distribution last year was: University of British Columbia, $1,494 and $1,800 or a total of $3,294; Dalhousie University, $650; University of Manitoba, $1,500; McGill University, $1,500; McMaster University, $4,435; Queen's University, $4,077; University of Saskatchewan, $2,563; University of Toronto, $4,550; and University of Western Ontario, $2,410.

Mr. Low: Can the minister tell us what is the basis of the allocation to the universities?

Mr. Prudham: The projects that the university is willing to undertake. I am told that we usually get about twice as many requests as we have money available for but it is used to assist projects that it is thought will be of value in the opinion of the department.

Mr. MacLean: Under this item I notice there is $1,500 for Canada's share of the cost of the committee on mineral resources and geology, London, England. Could the minister say briefly what are the activities of that committee?

Mr. Prudham: That money is to support a continuing committee that is supported by all commonwealth countries as a clearing house for information from the various commonwealth countries and a liaison for the exchange of scientific information.

220. Surveys and mapping branch administration, $53,012.

Mr. MacLean: I should like to make a brief comment with respect to the policy of naming new topographical features such as lakes and so on in rather remote parts of Canada in honour of certain veterans of the last war who gave their lives in the service of their country, usually under very special circumstances. I was especially pleased to learn of this scheme. It gave me pleasure because I know, for example, that a lake in northern Manitoba has been named after one of my crew who was murdered by the gestapo. Having said that, I have two brief questions for the minister on this item. Has the vacancy on the Canadian board of geographical names, created by the death of Senator Jones, been filled or will it be filled shortly? I should also like figures on the revenue derived last year from the sale of aerial photographs by the national air photographic library.

Mr. Prudham: Each province has a representative on the board of geographical names, and there are representatives of the department as well. They act independently of the department. Each provincial representative, I believe, submits the views of his own province with regard to names. Senator Jones' position has not been filled yet. With respect to the revenue derived from the sale of aerial photographs that does not come under this item.

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps the minister could table that information later.

Mr. Prudham: I am told the Department of National Defence sells the photographs. They have the negatives of all photographs and any reproductions are secured from that department.

Canadian hydrographic service—

224. Construction or acquisition of new equipment, $1,612,945.

Mr. Michener: How many boats are operated by the hydrographic service?

Mr. Prudham: There are nineteen in all. Seven are what might be termed large ships, and then there are ten launches and some other small craft.

Mr. Michener: Are they in all the coastal waters of Canada?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, as well as inland waters. The smaller launches are operated on inland waters.

Mr. Michener: There is an item of $9,000 odd here for laundry and dry cleaning which I suppose is a rather unusual item in connection with the operation of these boats.

Mr. Prudham: That would cover the linen, laundry and uniforms of the crews.

Mr. Michener: Of the nineteen boats?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Geographical branch—

231. Geographical branch—administration, operation and maintenance, including a grant of $250 to the Canadian association of geographers, $283,385.

Mr. MacLean: Can the minister tell the committee what progress is being made in the production of the new Canadian atlas?

Mr. Prudham: It is expected that it will be finished next year.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

30. Marketing service administration, $287,343.

Mr. Herridge: When the minister's estimates were before the house, I made a plea on behalf of the apple growers of Canada and particularly British Columbia, that every effort be made to regain our markets in Great Britain. I asked the minister to inform the house what his department was doing in this connection. In his reply the minister overlooked my question and I should like the parliamentary assistant to give me any information he can.

Mr. McCubbin: In reply to the question asked by the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, all I can say at the moment is that our deputy minister and the deputy minister of trade and commerce are attending a conference in London. Unfortunately, they are not back yet, neither have we a report from them. I am sorry I cannot give the hon. member a better answer, but I hope there will be a satisfactory answer when they come back. They were certainly going to bring up this question of apples at that conference.

Mr. Nowlan: In that connection, Mr. Chairman, I know it was only a few days ago that Mr. Peter Thorneycroft, the president of the board of trade in Great Britain, was here. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce had consultations with him, as well as did representatives of the fruit industry of Nova Scotia and possibly British Columbia. I know the British Columbia representatives were in Toronto, and I believe they also met him here in Ottawa. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant could make any comments on the conference that took place here, even if he cannot make comments on the one that may be taking place on Monday in London?

Mr. McCubbin: In respect to that, Mr. Chairman, I may say that during these consultations the minister mentioned the question of apples to Mr. Thorneycroft. He said that this matter would be discussed at the conference in London, so the matter was left there.

Mr. Nowlan: I know the parliamentary assistant is always optimistic. Can he not give us an optimistic statement now?

Mr. McCubbin: I am an optimist, and I am optimistic on this occasion. However, I cannot express any opinion until a report is received from those attending the conference.

Mr. Nowlan: In connection with marketing service administration—perhaps my comments could come under this item or under a floor price item—I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant to a situation which was created in the east last year. Quite frankly, I believe it reflects on the marketing administration. There was an agreement entered into, to which the department was at least a party, with respect to a marketing scheme for Prince Edward Island potatoes. Subsequently, owing to the efforts of New Brunswick members, that scheme was enlarged to embrace the potato growers of New Brunswick. With respect to that, we have no complaint whatever. I think the members from both New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island deserve consideration, and undoubtedly they negotiated a proper agreement and one which, in so far as possible, safeguarded their interests.

Unfortunately, at least in so far as the scheme with respect to Prince Edward Island was concerned which was the first one and perhaps was not based on the same experience as the New Brunswick scheme, there was no provision made to provide for orderly marketing. In order to get the price that was guaranteed the growers had to get rid of their crop before a certain date, and no restrictions whatever were placed on them. As a result the growers moved the potatoes into the most available market, the market which naturally appealed to them, and that was the Nova Scotia market where everyone would like to move if they had the opportunity. Since the Prince Edward Island personnel could not move there, they moved their production and flooded the Halifax market with potatoes to such an extent that the Nova Scotia growers suffered very heavy losses. Frankly, I think somebody slipped in that connection.

I can remember not too many years ago when a marketing arrangement was entered into between the apple growers of Nova Scotia and the dominion government. It was not actually a marketing arrangement, but it was an arrangement into which the government entered and one of the conditions of that arrangement was that the Nova Scotia grower could not ship any apples to either Ontario or Quebec during the growing season. In other words, the growers in Ontario and Quebec were receiving some protection because of the fact that the Nova Scotia grower received some moneys from the dominion treasury. I feel the same principle should have been followed with respect to the marketing of potatoes. I want to bring that to the attention of the parliamentary assistant.

I know the parliamentary assistant is conversant with it, because the matter caused a great many headaches and many discussions. I have a file a foot thick with respect to it, containing complaints from Nova Scotia growers. I reiterate that we have no objection to any agreement entered into with the Prince Edward Island growers or the New Brunswick growers, but there should have been a stipulation attached to that contract that would not have allowed them to dump, because that is what they did, their production in Nova Scotia. They dumped these potatoes into the Halifax market and Prince Edward Island potatoes were selling far below the cost of production and shipment from the Annapolis valley to that market. The same thing happened to a lesser extent in Ontario and Quebec. There were protests from Ontario and Quebec growers with respect to that. To put it mildly, it was not an intelligent deal. As a matter of fact, to express it frankly, it was a stupid deal, and one which I believe the department should watch very carefully in future. In making marketing agreements we should see that, as a result, we do not create a disorderly market instead of an orderly market.

Mr. Charlton: Since the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has referred to this potato situation I may say there has been considerable controversy in Ontario regarding it. I did have some correspondence with the chairman of the prices support board and I believe that the situation will be ironed out in another year. It did cause considerable concern amongst the Ontario and Quebec growers, but since the situation has been pointed out by the Ontario potato producers organization I hope something will be done about it before another year. I think I mentioned before, when the minister was here, that there seems to be a considerable amount of difference between the postage and telephone rates in all the items. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant can explain the difference this year as compared with last year.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to support what previous speakers have mentioned with regard to the marketing of potatoes last year. I have no doubt representations have been made to the parliamentary assistant, because he represents Middlesex West, which is a good potato growing area.

As I have said all along, the price support program has been a dismal failure. And it has been a failure so far as the potato growers in Ontario are concerned, because the maritimers were subsidized and allowed to bring potatoes into Ontario.

Mr. Nowlan: Please excuse Nova Scotia.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): It might be Nova Scotia next year. If the program does not apply to the whole crop right across Canada, then the result is that one group of people is paying to subsidize the other. I suggest that is not a satisfactory way to do it. I have no doubt the parliamentary assistant is aware of this situation and will probably take care of it.

Mr. Montgomery: Since New Brunswick potatoes have been brought into the picture I think I should say just a few words. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, from Nova Scotia, and the hon. member who has spoken from Ontario, may be dissatisfied, and I think they have some grounds for their complaint. I think, too, that during the last season the department learned a good many lessons in this connection.

To be quite frank about it, I am inclined to be in favour of the present program. At least theoretically, to my mind it is a good thing. I come from a constituency which is known as one of the greatest potato growing areas in Canada, one which depends almost entirely upon the potato crop. It is clear that when people must depend upon one particular commodity to sustain their economy they are in great difficulty when something goes wrong.

Down my way certainly the people are not all happy, but there are some who are. I am in hopes that the department has learned its lesson. If such an agreement is entered into in another year I believe all the provinces asking for the agreement should start off on a target date. In other words, one province should not be allowed to enter the agreement before another and start selling its potatoes earlier. While Nova Scotia may have a complaint, we certainly had one during the fall and previous to January 1954. Because, as soon as the Prince Edward Island board entered the picture, they knocked the price down on the market. This meant that anyone else who tried to arrange steady and orderly marketing could not do so. However, when New Brunswick came on the market under a board, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick boards co-operated. If Nova Scotia wants to enter the picture with Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick they will have to have a board.

I think it should be insisted upon that a certain date be fixed at which all boards will begin to operate. So long as any one board is operating separately there will be some difficulty.

Then there is another point I would like to mention. This spring in my area there were a few farmers left with practically 90 per cent of their potatoes on hand, either in their cellars or in their potato houses. They just could not get rid of them, although they had signed up with the board. Only a few days ago I received a letter from a man who still had 90 per cent of his potatoes, and who claims he signed up early in the winter. However, the board has never called for any of his potatoes. This man is only one of a certain number who find themselves in that position. They have to take a loss, because they get nothing unless they deliver their potatoes to the board. On the other hand, those who got rid of their potatoes received more money than if they had been operating on a free market.

It may be urged that this matter is outside the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Agriculture, and that may be true. I suggest however that the federal department might use considerable influence, and if the growers want a floor price, the department could say to them, "You must take the potatoes from the farmers on a percentage basis, similar to that which obtains in connection with wheat deliveries in the western provinces, where they take so many bushels per acre." In this way one farmer would not be able to sell three or four thousand barrels of potatoes while another has to hold his until the following April or May.

Anyone who knows anything about the potato business knows very well that after May 10 potatoes shrink very quickly, unless they are in a very cool potato house. Once that starts the inspector comes along, and there is tremendous shrinkage. You find you cannot sell your potatoes, because we know that the consumers will not buy potatoes that are shrivelled and sprouted. Once potatoes have sprouts about ten inches long they lose their flavour and will not sell. So it is important that every farmer be treated as nearly as possible in the same way, so that everything would be sold through a marketing board.

I am wondering if Ontario really suffered very much. Had a board been set up in this province I doubt very much whether they would have been guaranteed a price greater than would have been in line with the cost of production and the movement of their potatoes to the market in Ontario. I doubt very much if they lost money because boards are operating in the maritime provinces. And before I take my seat I would draw the attention of people in Ontario who are producing potatoes, or producing anything else, to the terms of confederation which state that we are to have some preference when entering this market.

Mr. Charlton: The parliamentary assistant has not answered my question concerning postage and telephones.

Mr. McCubbin: I intend to answer, but I have been listening to the potato discussion, and I wished to deal with all those subjects when I spoke. I will not forget what the hon. member has asked.

Mr. Charlton: I believe that is the end of the potato discussion.

Mr. McCubbin: As the hon. member for Middlesex East has said, I come from a potato growing district. Many of the farmers in my constituency produce potatoes. The criticism I have heard from three hon. members is one I have heard in my own riding. In Ontario we could have come under a co-operative marketing plan, just as Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick have. Nova Scotia could have done so, too. Unfortunately in Ontario this year we have not done that. The result has been that potatoes have been coming into Ontario from those other two provinces and depressing our market. Our potato growers do not like that. It is hard to overcome, of course, unless we have a potato marketing scheme of our own —which we hope we will have in other years. It was my privilege just a few months ago to go down to North Carolina, in the United States, which is a great potato-growing state, as hon. members know. In that state there is a market for a lot of the maritime potatoes. They like our potatoes. I was glad to hear them say they liked the potatoes that come from the maritime provinces. The committee knows that 95 per cent of the seed in that state comes from Prince Edward Island, which speaks well for the potato growers of that province. That is the way we like it, but nevertheless in that state I heard the same criticism that is heard here, that some other states farther west were growing potatoes and shipping them over their borders and depressing their markets. The problems that we have here are the problems that they have down in the United States as well.

Of course we like to have interprovincial trade even though it sometimes hurts us; but we hope, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings mentioned, that next year we shall be able to work it out on a better basis even though we did suffer during the past year.

Item agreed to.

31. Agricultural economics, $630,153.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I should have dealt with this when the hon. member for Kootenay West asked his question about apples, but I thought it came more directly under agricultural economics. On June 11, I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question about the likelihood of our getting a substantial order in re-entering the United Kingdom market for apples, because I had noticed press reports to the effect that the United Kingdom had indicated they were able to allocate dollars for the purchase of cheese. That indicates that as a result of the improvement in their economic situation over there they should be able to become once again a substantial purchaser of food from this continent. That certainly is our hope. I understand it is theirs. However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in answer to the question on June 11, as reported at page 5829 of Hansard:

> So far as fruits are concerned, we have had an indication that the United Kingdom is allocating dollars to cover purchase of certain canned fruits, but negotiations regarding apples are still in progress.

That was confirmed by what the parliamentary assistant has just said to the hon. member for Kootenay West, as I understood the answer. Since the United Kingdom is again becoming a potential market for Canadian agricultural produce, there is no group of agricultural producers in this country more interested in re-entering that market than the apple producers, and particularly those of British Columbia, I venture to say, to whom that market was more important than to any others. Perhaps my hon. friend from Nova Scotia might say it was equally important to them, but certainly it was very important to the apple producers of our province. In the discussions with the United Kingdom, is anything being said or done with respect to obtaining some concessions on the tariff treatment accorded to Canadian apples? The parliamentary assistant will remember that up until 1947 or 1948 we enjoyed a preferential tariff with the British market which was abandoned. Coincidentally with the abandonment of that preferential tariff, the British stopped buying anyway because of the shortage of dollars. The indications are now that they will be a potential apple-buying country. Is anything being done to restore to us that advantageous position in the British market which was of such great benefit to our apple producers?

Mr. McCubbin: Every avenue that can be explored is being explored. That market has been a good one in years gone by for British Columbia apples as well as Nova Scotia apples, and we hope it will be some time in the future, and I hope that the future is not too far away. I am sorry I cannot give a more favourable reply, but I am always optimistic. Unfortunately I cannot give any better reply at this time.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant does know what lines of approach are being taken by the Canadian delegations. Were any instructions issued to them on the basis of which we shall be able to say we are exploring this line or that line?

Mr. McCubbin: Every avenue that can be explored is being explored. We are doing that.

Mr. Fulton: Are we justified in assuming from that that this line of approach is being pursued?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes, every avenue.

Mr. Charlton: I want to ask the parliamentary assistant a question about the cheese deal with Great Britain this year. Has he anything to say about that?

Mr. McCubbin: I am sorry; I cannot give an answer to my hon. friend except that he knows as well as I do that the Ontario people are over there right now and are trying to enter into negotiations with the British for the purchase of Canadian cheese. We have not had any report from them as yet.

Mr. Charlton: I hope that the dominion Department of Agriculture and the dominion government are doing more to help the Ontario producers this year than they did last year to sell the cheese.

Mr. McCubbin: They will help them every year.

Mr. Charlton: They did not help last year.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not intend to enter into any discussion on this matter of agricultural economics, although frankly I was the one who asked to have it stand over because I knew that the hon. member for Kamloops had something to bring up. I also had something I wanted to raise at this time. I do not think now is the opportune time to do it because of the schedule under which we are working.

Mr. Fulton: We have until the end of next week.

Mr. Nowlan: We may have until the end of next week, but at the same time I do not want to be the person responsible for holding us here until the end of next week. Item 31, having to do with agricultural economics, which we are now discussing, certainly opens up a wide field. I think it suggests a weakness in our system, in trying to consider these matters at such a late hour when we cannot possibly discuss them in the way in which we should. The minister is not here now, and I am not going to ask the parliamentary assistant to engage in any philosophical discussion on the matter, but I am wondering just what the department does think about it, and I am simply raising this now so that another year, when we reassemble and the same situation exists, the departmental spokesman, the minister and the parliamentary assistant should be in a position to discuss this matter, because it goes to the root of the whole agricultural problem.

I am thinking, for instance, of a letter I had the other day from one of the larger farmers. I am not sure whether his facts are right or not, but he said in that letter that a producer in Holland, such as he, was subsidized to the extent of $4 an acre. He said: "I have a thousand acres in production and therefore I could earn $4,000 from the government if I were in Holland, and no wonder I could sell my products at such a price". He referred to a Scotch immigrant who was working on the farm who said that on the farm on which he was working in Scotland just before he came out, when a cow gave birth to a calf it was subsidized to the extent of £19.10s.

Mr. Dickey: For the cow?

Mr. Nowlan: For the cow; I am sure the hon. member for Halifax will appreciate these facts if he stays here long enough. For the cow and the calf there was a subsidy of £19.10s., which is more than this particular grower could get for several head of cattle. I know the minister spoke about the fact that it was difficult for us to compete in world markets because of our cost of production. It is not only the cost of production; it is the cost of subsidization on the other side with which we are in competition. We have had a great deal of talk recently from our western friends, the wheat growers, about incentives to wheat production. They are encountering difficulties which agriculture in general has encountered.

I think it goes to the root of our problem. I should like to know what the minister thinks about it, and what the department feels about it. Are we waiting for the rest of the world to cut out these practices, as we think they should, or are we going to do something to meet them? In the meantime, what happens to our agriculture while we are caught in between the two positions? I am not suggesting what position we should take, but I do suggest that it goes to the very root of the agricultural problem of this country today.

I hope that when these estimates are before the house a year from now we shall at least have a greater opportunity to discuss them and perhaps in some way have the department suggest to us the policy which they propose to follow, and hon. members, by intelligent discussion and co-operation, can help hammer out a policy which will assist agriculture at this time.

Mr. Jones: I should like to add a word to what the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Kootenay West have already said about the British Columbia apple industry. The minister is fully aware that for the last thirty years our apple industry has been geared up to the United Kingdom demand for apples. We pruned trees, planted varieties and did everything we could to meet the demands of that market, and that was done at the original suggestion of the federal government. We carried out their wishes to the best of our ability to produce the exact type of apples they wanted in the United Kingdom. I understand the situation today is that the British people like our apples very much, but before they can import them they require some sort of concession on the part of the Canadian government whereby there will be a balance of trade. Does the parliamentary assistant know if any concession has been offered with a view to regaining the market in Britain for apples? One other question. In connection with the negotiations now taking place, is there a member of the fruit industry from British Columbia taking part in these negotiations?

Mr. McCubbin: Mr. Chairman, I understand there is no one from the fruit industry at this conference in London but, as I told the hon. member for Kamloops, every possible avenue is being explored, and everything we can do will be done. When the delegates report back perhaps some of the things mentioned will require to be taken into consideration, but I cannot, of course, comment on that at this time.

Mr. Fulton: Does the parliamentary assistant know whether our delegation has been authorized to make any offer which would make it possible for us to get back into this profitable market?

Mr. McCubbin: No, they have a wide open field.

Item agreed to.

44. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,899,245.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, just before this item is carried I might just say that I do not want to enter into another discussion this afternoon on the P.F.R.A. and I do not intend to say anything controversial at this point. I simply want to say that I was in western Canada last week and visited my own constituency for a few days. As hon. members know, that is the constituency that would be most affected favourably by the Saskatchewan river dam project. I merely wish to tell the government this afternoon, though I observe there is no minister present and, of course, the parliamentary assistant does not attend the meetings of the cabinet—

An hon. Member: There is one minister here.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not notice the Secretary of State, but perhaps he will be able to carry my message. I want to tell the minister that, having just returned from my own constituency, I know there is considerable disappointment at recent statements that have been made in regard to this project. I want to say on behalf of my constituents that they hope that consideration will be given to this matter in the near future so that it can be proceeded with without delay. It may be said at the moment that irrigation is not necessary. I quite agree that, with some farms under three to six feet of water, it does not seem to be the time to be discussing irrigation. But those of us who have lived in western Canada for 40 years or more, as some of us have done, know there are periods when there is dry, drought weather, which involve the country in very large expenditures for feed and for the relief of the stricken population. It seems to me that, when we have wet years, that is the time to prepare for the dry years which must inevitably follow. I do not wish to discuss this subject in a controversial manner this afternoon or to argue once again in favour of it, but all I would simply say through the parliamentary assistant, or the Secretary of State, if you like, is that the people I represent in this house are very anxious to have this matter settled and proceeded with. They feel the provincial government has made a generous offer to bear a large part of the expenditure, indeed larger than I anticipated the province would or should be called upon to bear, but that offer has been made and they are prepared to stand by it. I am taking this opportunity, perhaps the last opportunity this session, to express the hope that serious consideration will be given to this project and that it will be undertaken in the near future.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to delay the committee at this period of the session but this matter is of such importance to the people of Saskatchewan that I think hon. members will forgive me if I take a few moments to deal with it, especially in view of the fact that it is several years since I have spoken on this matter in this house. Members will have seen the answer which was given to the question I asked of the ministry and which was reported in yesterday's Hansard, and that answer discloses a situation which I would like to draw to the attention of the government.

I am aware of the fact that the Prime Minister and the government have taken the attitude that they will recommend this South Saskatchewan river dam project if they are satisfied that the required expenditure is warranted as in the public interest. I would like to say that it is the attitude, certainly at least of the majority of the people of Saskatchewan, that they can have great faith in the fairness of the Prime Minister and the present government. They are satisfied that if and when a case is made out for the construction of this project it will be unhesitatingly proceeded with. It is in that spirit that I make these few remarks this afternoon.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the hon. member think a case has been made out? I am quite sure he does.

Mr. Tucker: As far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that the project should be proceeded with, but I realize that we must convince the people of the other nine provinces of Canada, and it is with that idea in mind that I speak. I feel that if we can place the facts before our fellow citizens in the other provinces of Canada and the Prime Minister and prove that we have a good case then I have no doubt as to what the decision will be.

The answer to the question I asked yesterday discloses a situation which must lead our people to ask themselves how the problem it discloses is to be met. I asked what the population of Canada was according to the census of 1941, and I then asked what the estimated population was now, and for the population of the various provinces in 1941 and now according to the latest estimates. The answer I received is to be found at page 6609 of Hansard and it reveals that the population of Canada as of June 2, 1941, excluding Newfoundland, was 11,506,655. The estimated population as of June 1, 1953, was 14,398,000, also excluding Newfoundland. That shows that our country had had a splendid increase in population during that time, and an increase that should make every Canadian gratified. We had an increase, without considering Newfoundland, of 25·6 per cent. In other words, in that period of a little bit over a decade our population had increased by one-quarter. But when one looks at the population of Saskatchewan, instead of our sharing in that great development in which we all take such pride we find that our province's population has decreased during that period by 3 per cent. It is the only province in Canada which had a decrease during that period.

Mr. Gour (Russell): That is because they have a C.C.F. government.

Mr. Coldwell: That is not the reason, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Tucker: It is pointed out that there is a C.C.F. government there and that that is the reason for lack of development. But I am also saying that other things should be taken into consideration as having to do with that situation.

During that same period Prince Edward Island had an increase in population of 11·5 per cent; Nova Scotia, 14·7 per cent; New Brunswick, 17·2 per cent; Quebec, 28·1 per cent; Ontario, 29·3 per cent; Manitoba, 10·9 per cent; Saskatchewan, as I say, had a decrease of 3·9 per cent. Alberta had an increase of 25·9 per cent; British Columbia, an increase of 50·4 per cent; Yukon, an increase of 83·2 per cent; Northwest Territories, an increase of 33 per cent. There is the picture of our growth that I think every Canadian should look at. If there is anything that can be done by the federal government to see to it that Saskatchewan shares with the rest of the country in that great forward march, I think it should be done. I am sure that everybody in all the rest of the provinces of Canada would be ready to do anything within reason to help us to share in that development. When it is remembered that every other single province has had a tremendous increase in population, that our country as a whole has had an increase of 25 per cent, and that we in Saskatchewan have gone back during that period of the greatest development our country has ever known so far as population is concerned, it seems to me that we have a case to put before not only this government but the provincial government.

A royal commission was set up to make an investigation into this matter. I do not intend at this time to go into this matter otherwise than to suggest a few important points. The royal commission considered the question of irrigation and the advantages of irrigation. I would point out that, from that standpoint, there is a strong case to be made out for the construction of this as an irrigation system. It can irrigate about half a million acres. In periods of drought those half million acres would produce feed and fodder which would help to maintain our livestock industry in a substantial part of the province. That result in itself, outside of the increased production on irrigated lands, would have, in stabilizing our agriculture, an effect which it is hard to estimate.

Any farmer who went through the period of the drought in the thirties and who had perhaps spent almost a lifetime in building up a herd of valuable cattle knows what happened. It got to the point where the dominion government, to try to help us out, was even fetching in fodder from as far away as Nova Scotia. Obviously the attitude had to be taken that as much livestock should be disposed of as possible. The farmers had to dispose of cattle at as low as one cent a pound. Herds were practically wiped out and the savings and work of hardworking people disappeared because of what happened. Had there been a place in the province, 500,000 acres in extent, which could have been put to growing fodder and feed, that situation would not have needed to develop.

The farmers in Saskatchewan realize that, while we are having plenty of rain today, just as sure as they live in that great central plain, drought will come again. They also realize that if nothing fundamental is done, they are going to be up against the same difficulty again, that of not having feed and fodder for their herds. That realization has a deterring effect upon the building up of our mixed farming industry in Saskatchewan.

Surely if we want to increase our population we must encourage our people to go into mixed farming and not to go more and more into the field of bigger and bigger grain farms. When the latter course is followed, it means, of course, that farm people have to go elsewhere in order to make a living as farms get bigger and bigger, and bigger machinery is used. The people in the rest of Canada I am sure are deeply interested in seeing to it that the farming population of Saskatchewan is not cut down year by year because, of course, in the long run that cut will also mean that the urban population of Saskatchewan will begin to diminish.

There is another angle to the irrigation problem. There are people who need to be settled upon land. Irrigation would provide farms upon which we could resettle many people who are today looking for land. It would help in that regard. So much for the advantage of the scheme from the irrigation standpoint.

Then there is the question of electric power. The province of Saskatchewan today is engaged on a program of farm electrification. Last year I think they connected almost 6,000 farmers with electricity. While I was in the legislature out there, I unceasingly took the attitude that if we were going to halt the trend of farmers away from the farms and into the cities, we had to give the people on the farms the same amenities of life and the same comforts as they would have if they lived in the city. One of the ways in which that may be done is by having electricity on the farms.

The government of Saskatchewan has embarked upon an energetic farm electrification program which I advocated strongly and which I am glad to see now being gone ahead with. We are told that 75,000 farms in Saskatchewan can be connected economically with electricity. That program not only will tend to keep people happily on the farms but it will also promote mixed farming. It will make it more profitable. It will make mixed farming more efficient and it will make it possible to do it more economically. If we can in that way halt the trend away from the country and into the cities, and halt the trend away from mixed farming to large grain farming, by constructing this dam project thereby making electricity available more cheaply—and especially when the provincial government is ready to pay the cost of that feature of it—surely it is something that should be done. But it cannot be done unless the dam is put in there. That is an important consideration.

There is also the matter of industrial development. We realize that the reason why some other provinces have gone ahead so fast is that they have benefited by great industrial development. To have industrial development you need minerals and electricity. You need gas, perhaps; but above all, you need plenty of water for most modern industrial processes. In most of the settled area of Saskatchewan there is not a large constant supply of water. It looks as though we have plenty of natural gas to provide for a great increase and expansion in industry. But, in order to have that increase, we need to have plenty of water for industrial purposes. That is a feature that I think was not given due weight in the report of the royal commission. The royal commission dealt with the question of irrigation and dealt with the question of electricity. They dealt with those two items mainly, but they did not deal with the social value of this project from the standpoint of laying the foundation for the over-all expansion and development of our province.

So far as the question of developing electricity and irrigation is concerned, it is quite true that for some time the project perhaps will not much more than pay interest on the capital invested by the federal government. I think that it will do that in a very short time after it is completed. I think the studies showed that the increase in agricultural production would amount to at least $6 million in value, taking the value of that production at average prices for farm products over a long term. The way things stand today I think we can look for prices not to go back to the low level of previous years, but even with that conservative estimate the increase in value of agricultural production would be at least $6 million. I think it also is the experience that if you have an increase in the income of your farmers by $6 million it will lead to an over-all increase in the income of other people by at least twice that amount, which suggests that at the very minimum the increase in production as the result of this irrigation project would be at least $18 million.

About 20 per cent of the national income is paid in taxes, and 20 per cent of $18 million would amount to $3·6 million. If you consider what the dominion would have to spend on the project, even assuming that it would be far more than the amount of $70 million envisaged by the last conference of experts, even supposing that the dominion would have to spend $100 million, with the government getting their money at approximately 3½ per cent the amount of $3·6 million I have just mentioned will carry the interest on $100 million. That is from the irrigation aspect alone. On top of that you have to consider that there will be cheaper electricity and plenty of water provided right in the midst of the settled area of Saskatchewan which is bound to lead to a tremendous industrial expansion because we have the other necessary element the minerals there.

We have 80,000 square miles of the Pre-Cambrian shield right in Saskatchewan. This is the same shield, the same mineral formation, that is providing the iron in Labrador, the same formation that has resulted in the establishment of various mines in northern Manitoba and Ontario.

If Saskatchewan could get electricity and plenty of water, instead of being the weak link in the development of our country it would, I am satisfied, become one of Canada's soundest and strongest links. That is a feature to which I suggest the royal commission did not give enough attention, the effect that the project would have upon the industrial development of our province.

As I said at the outset, I do not intend to impose on the good will of the committee at this particular moment, but I suggest that we recognize the fact that in the past hundred years we have had at least three bad periods of drought in western Canada. I have been told by people who went into that area in the nineties that it was so dry that there were cracks in the ground into which a horse's leg would go. I went through the period of drought in the thirties. If hon. members had seen what some people had to go through during that period they would certainly want to do something about it so that when drought comes again, as come it will, the people of that part of Saskatchewan will feel that their fellow citizens in the rest of Canada have taken concrete steps to try to protect them against a recurrence of the worst effects of that terrible experience.

The people of Saskatchewan appreciated the attitude of the rest of Canada in providing them with help during the last drought period, not only help in the form of grants of money but in supplying them with vegetables and other things to help them over that difficult period. But the people of Saskatchewan would like the people of the rest of Canada to take steps to enable them to fight what lies ahead themselves without having to ask for assistance.

Mr. Coldwell: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tucker: That is what I say to my fellow citizens of the rest of Canada. You were generous when we needed help in the thirties. You did not hesitate to put through a very fine measure of help in the form of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to protect our farmers in the event of drought. This has been a great thing for the farmers of western Canada. We have one of the finest systems any place in the world under P.F.R.A. of bringing light land under grass, providing small irrigation schemes, dugouts and so on. I have been told by people who have some experience in these matters that the P.F.R.A. scheme put into effect by the people of Canada for western Canada is one of the finest in the whole world.

The scheme I am now suggesting will cost quite a bit more than any of these other projects, but with Canada strong financially and in every other way, with Canada still rapidly growing in strength and having in mind the things that we could do in the thirties and forties, surely we can say now that here is a scheme that will provide a really solid foundation which will carry and supplement these other things if we run into a bad drought again. I suggest that the saving by the irrigation of the land alone in respect of the P.F.A.A. will amount to close to half a million dollars a year on the average. A saving of that proportion will be well worth while in helping to pay the cost of carrying this dam proposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tucker: I know that it is already referred to in that way by a lot of people in western Canada. I hope that it is regarded otherwise here—as something in connection with which we may look to our fellow citizens of the rest of Canada with confidence. We take pride in what is being done in other parts of Canada. Now, above all, western Canada takes great pride in the fact that Canada said that, if necessary, she would go it alone on the St. Lawrence seaway proposition, that she would no longer be held up by the unwillingness of the United States to participate. I say, Mr. Chairman, that far away as we are from the St. Lawrence, there was no place in all Canada where there was more approval of that attitude of the government of our country than there was right in Saskatchewan.

We are great supporters of the idea of the development of our country. The people of Saskatchewan, coming as they do from pretty well all parts of the western world, have become a group of people who have a very firm devotion to Canada as their country. The people of Saskatchewan are 100 per cent behind anything they see that will help Canada to stand on its own feet, anything that is necessary to lay the foundation for an even greater country. All we ask is that the people of Canada generally look at our situation and realize clearly that we do not want to be the weak link in the chain of the development of our country in an agricultural way, with the possibility of another drought hanging over our heads. All we ask is that our fellow Canadians realize that we are not experiencing the great development that is being experienced in the rest of Canada, that our sons and daughters are having to leave Saskatchewan and go elsewhere to make a living, that our population is going down while that of the rest of the country is going up. We say to the rest of Canada: We rejoice in your prosperity and development but give us a chance to pull our weight. If you will give us that chance you will have reason to be proud of Saskatchewan just as Saskatchewan is proud of Canada.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I cannot very well refrain from saying a word or two in this discussion since my own city is the city which, of all cities in Canada, would benefit most from the proposed dam. I too am not going into any controversial aspects of the question, and I congratulate the hon. member for Rosthern on the very good speech he has made. I am glad to hear he is totally in favour of the project. We will have to change the minds of some of the people of Canada and we will have to change the mind of the Prime Minister. While I do not agree with him, may I say that I admire the honesty and integrity of the statement the Prime Minister made when he said that he did not yet see that the national interest would be served by this amount of money on this particular project. I think that is an honest attitude. The only thing to which I have ever objected in the speeches that have been made by hon. members on the other side of the house is that this project has been used, I am afraid, as political bait before elections. I believe the Prime Minister's forthright statement previous to the last election, and it was an honest statement, has done much to clear the air in that regard.

I was afraid the hon. member for Rosthern was going to get off the track on which he had promised to keep when one of his colleagues interjected something about the population of Saskatchewan having decreased because we had a C.C.F. government there. Both the hon. member who made the interjection and my hon. friend who, for the last five or six years, has been fighting that government, know perfectly well that is not true.

Mr. Tucker: If my hon. friend says I know that quite well, I will not accept it because I believe that, if it had not been for the fear of that government during at least its first two years, private capital would have entered the province and we would have had a greater development than we have.

Mr. Coldwell: There was a drop in population before the C.C.F. government took office.

Mr. Knight: My hon. friend was going to leave politics out of it.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. Tucker: I did not mention it until my friend suggested I knew something which I did not say. I tell him that I believe the Saskatchewan C.C.F. government has contributed substantially to the failure of our province to develop faster than it has. If my hon. friend wants my belief from me, he gets it; that is what I believe.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Saskatoon has the floor and cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Tucker: I rose on a question of privilege. The hon. member suggested I had said something I knew perfectly well was wrong.

Mr. Knight: I want to say to the hon. member for Rosthern—

Mr. Tucker: I tell him that he himself knows his own city would have had greater development. A big metal smelting plant would have been established in Saskatoon instead of Edmonton if natural gas had been found shortly before it was. The provincial minister of highways said that just the other day.

Mr. Coldwell: The Liberals in power found no gas.

Mr. Knight: What I said was, the hon. gentleman who interjected tried to persuade my hon. friend from Rosthern to adopt the idea that the reason for the decrease in population in Saskatchewan was due to a C.C.F. government, when he knew, and the hon. member for Rosthern knew, that that was not the fact. I did not suggest the hon. member has not always told what he believed upon every occasion upon which he has been attacking the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan. In so far as this point is concerned, the hon. member has started something and I do not want to continue it. I could talk for 40 minutes on this, if I wanted to do so, but no one wants to hear me and I do not want to do so.

However, the hon. member for Rosthern did say something about Saskatchewan being the weak link in the development of Canada. He said, in rebuttal of what I had suggested, that apparently it was still the weak link in Canada because people could not invest their money as a result of the fear of the Saskatchewan government. I would refer him, therefore, to a survey made by Professor Britnell of the University of Saskatchewan, a man for whom people have the highest respect for his ability as an economist, a man who has gone to foreign countries to assess situations and been greatly praised for his findings. I find that Professor Britnell, at page 450 of the report, had this to say:

> Thus, over a five-year period, annual capital expenditures exactly doubled in Alberta, increased by 71 per cent in Saskatchewan, but—

Why should I read about Manitoba?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knight: All right.

> . . . by only 21 per cent in Manitoba, as compared with 61 per cent for the whole country.

I am not suggesting the hon. member for Rosthern does not tell the truth. I am simply giving Dr. Britnell's findings in the economic survey, which, so far as I am concerned, I am prepared to accept. The total investment in Canada from 1948 to 1953 went up by 61 per cent. In Saskatchewan, it went up by 71 per cent, or 10 per cent higher than the national average. I did not intend to start any controversy, but then I do not mind taking on my hon. friend any time either in Saskatchewan or elsewhere. My hon. friend has been doing his best out there for the last six years and now he is back here. I shall say no more about that.

I was going on to say a word about the causes of the decrease in population. I must not say what my hon. friend knows quite well, because he will assert something else. My hon. friend has been playing around too long with the Minister of Agriculture, so he has various answers to fit various occasions. However, everybody knows that the depopulation of Saskatchewan, if indeed it is serious enough to be called that, has been due to the mechanization of the farms. My hon. friend knows that. It is also due to the fact—

Mr. Tucker: Your hon. friend does not know that at all. The same thing has happened in the rest of Canada; so far as mechanization is concerned they have had it too, and their population has gone up.

The Chairman: I must ask the hon. member to allow the hon. member who has the floor to proceed without interruption.

Mr. Tucker: Let him not say that I know something that I do not know. Let him make his own speech.

The Chairman: I do not believe the hon. member has any point of privilege, and therefore the hon. member for Saskatoon should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Knight: I am rather pleased that my hon. friend has returned—

Mr. Tucker: Let the hon. member for Saskatoon deal with the matter before us.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member has been so quiet these last few months, we have hardly been able to believe it. I am quite intrigued that he is coming back into character. This mechanization did have a serious effect on the population, and it occurred at the time the boys went to the last war. They went to the last war to serve their country, and when they returned from overseas they found the farms mechanized to such an extent there were much larger farms and there was no place for many of them to fit in.

Let me again congratulate my hon. friend upon what he said. I shall not say what he said or did not say, because that is not safe. I do want to say a word about this business of rainfall. Some people have argued that this dam is not necessary because this year we have a lot of water, in fact perhaps too much so far as wheat is concerned. What we need in Saskatchewan to increase our population is a change in the type of farming; that is, to some extent to get away from wheat farming and get to the farming of such things as beet sugar, cattle and all the rest of it.

What rain we have had this year, and we have had plenty, is not yet sufficient for that type of farming. If we had a rainfall which would permit successful mixed farming of that type, to grow beet sugar and the like, it would be so great it would simply ruin our wheat crop. We have to have water, therefore. What we do want is water in a moderately dry climate; water which must be put on that land by artificial means. We will have a new type of farming. I do not believe we will have the same farmers we have now. I doubt very much if the same farmers in Saskatchewan will be willing to get out with a hoe, a shovel and in long rubber boots to push water around the place. They have been on a tractor too long for that.

This whole question ties up with immigration. We will have people, for instance, from Holland, a country that does that sort of work. We can get very good people if we can show them an area where there is irrigation. We would not get them to come there and carry out practices which it had not been their life's work to do. When the Canadian Pacific irrigated the land around the Bow river there was no difficulty whatever in selling the farms at high prices for those days, $75 an acre to people from the United States who had been working on irrigated land. So they came in there and, so far as I know, they have prospered. At any rate they have done their own province of Alberta and Canada as a whole some good. I would like to see more of that sort of thing in Saskatchewan.

In the circumstances I shall not say more. I must say I was surprised a moment ago to hear that here in the house we are operating tonight on a schedule. I hope that is true, although I am afraid that perhaps it is not. In any case, owing to circumstances, I shall not pursue the argument any further. I hope that from now on this dam will be something to which we can look forward. And if I may take the risk of again incurring the anger of my hon. friend, I would suggest that I hope he or the Minister of Agriculture or any other Liberal speakers from now on will not use this subject any more as political bait, until the head of the government of this country and the cabinet make up their minds that, in all circumstances, this expenditure is justified from the point of view of the good of the whole nation, as I believe it to be.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to see this vote for P.F.R.A., but I am sorry that, to date, the government has not seen fit to extend its application to British Columbia. We all realize its excellent advantages more and more as we hear discussions between members from both sides of the house.

For years the farm organizations in British Columbia have been urging the government to extend the terms of this act to British Columbia. And my British Columbia colleague from Kamloops has been foremost in the House of Commons in advocating this same policy. I wish to say that I support that request, and I trust that when these estimates come before us again the legislation will be so amended that there will be provision for this type of work in British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I cannot allow this item to pass without making my bow to the hon. member for Kootenay West for the way in which he also has agitated for the extension of this act to British Columbia.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to carry forward the discussion on the Saskatchewan dam. It is not because I lack interest in it, because I do feel it is very important to all the western provinces. But I would like to bring to the attention of the committee again the problem of conservation and flood control on the Assiniboine river. We do not hear very much about this subject.

Mr. Harris: That would come under item 50.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am referring to a P.F.R.A. project.

The Chairman: Item 50 deals with the Assiniboine river, diking and cut-off.

Mr. Dinsdale: It could come under that item or, I suggest, it could come under this one.

[Mr. Knight.]

Mr. Harris: Go ahead; speak up.

Mr. Dinsdale: The only time we have any discussion of this subject is during the annual consideration of the estimates. Perhaps the reason we do not hear so much about it is that members from Manitoba are not so vociferous as members from Saskatchewan. This subject has been under consideration since 1886. Last year when I questioned the Minister of Agriculture on the matter he referred me to a report on conservation and flood control on the Assiniboine river that was prepared by the P.F.R.A. branch, and completed and published in December, 1952.

I discover in that report a very comprehensive consideration of the whole problem. I raise this matter at this late hour in the session because throughout the day, today, over the radio I have been hearing that flood conditions on the Assiniboine river have reached the city of Brandon, and that the mayor of that city has requested that a large section of the low-lying area be evacuated.

The last press dispatch I have on the subject, dated Saturday, June 19, appears in the Brandon Daily Sun as follows:

> The city works department employees are busily engaged in building temporary dykes and the civil defence committee is preparing emergency accommodation for use in case evacuation of the homes in the threatened area becomes necessary.

That has now become necessary, and once again the flood tide is rolling through the Assiniboine basin. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not here, because he is fully cognizant of the problem. In 1950, when the Assiniboine river last reached flood level, he made a personal visit to the area and examined the situation for himself. The report to which I have referred recommends two major projects in flood control and conservation in the Assiniboine basin. I refer to the Russell reservoir at Russell, Manitoba, and the Portage la Prairie diversion. These two projects are actually proposed in connection with the larger flood program in the city of Winnipeg. Because, as hon. members know, the Assiniboine eventually flows into the Red river at Winnipeg.

I should like to ask just what has been done in regard to the report published in 1952. As I indicated, the minister said last spring when we were considering the estimates that the matter was under consideration. As this condition has been developing from 1886, and has been under consideration since that time, I would hope this year that some specific information might be available as to what the department contemplates in regard to the recommendations of the report.

Mr. Harrison: I should like to say a word or two regarding the Saskatchewan dam development. I am somewhat in agreement, for a change, with the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, in what he said the other evening.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but perhaps this is the best time to do so. It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FINAL REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. Speaker: If I may have the indulgence of the house, I would like to present the second and final report of the special committee appointed to consider the procedure of this house. It is not intended to move concurrence in this report at this sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

JOSEPH DELPHIS GUILLAUME DELORME

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. 434, for the relief of Joseph Delphis Guillaume Delorme—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of making an appeal to certain hon. gentlemen opposite. I listened this morning to the very eloquent words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in another context, in which he said he thought it was a queer sort of democracy where one person could say no and deny something to three people who want to say yes. He said in another context that he thought the will of the majority should prevail and the will of the minority should not be allowed to thwart it. It seems to me, sir, that everything that can usefully be said on this bill has already been said and there is no reason why the house should not divide on it and the will of the majority prevail. I appeal to the hon. gentlemen opposite to follow out the precepts that were laid down by their spokesman this morning.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I would point out with due respect to the Secretary of State that we on this side of the house know something about private bills; that these divorce bills are not government bills. We know that the Prime Minister has made that abundantly clear upon every occasion upon which he has spoken upon divorce in this house. We on this side of the house have had the experience of moving private bills and we have had the experience of having to put up with the fate that happened to them because some member or two or a dozen on the government side of the house did not agree with our philosophy or perhaps with some particular issue which was the subject of our private bill.

This bill was last considered on Tuesday, and I gave the house due notice then—and I have heard nothing from the Secretary of State except what he has just said now in regard to it—that I was opposed to the passing of this bill; that I proposed to debate that question; that I proposed to show the reasons why I am opposed to the granting of this divorce. Thus it is that I am not likely to bother too much about the evidence which would support the view opposite to my own, and I shall be exceedingly proud—I said "proud", because I know the ability of the Secretary of State as a debater—if he will rise in his place and argue the other side of the case. Let me remind the Secretary of State that the only time—I should not say "the only time", because technically this bill has been before this house four times; but on one occasion at least it did receive some consideration owing to the fact that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam happened to notice the thing as it passed through the mill. It happened to be a big fat divorce bill—I think that was the term he used—so he thought he would read it. Even after that it passed all these stages. From then on I concluded that this bill should not pass. It was a perfect example of the way this house does not perform its duty in scrutinizing these measures.

Yes, we have this committee of the Senate, of course. It has proven not to be infallible. I said this: I am prepared to debate this bill and I am prepared to debate every bill where I think there is a reasonable chance of killing the bill, provided that there might be injustice involved. I do not say that about bills which are unopposed. I know that in these unopposed bills there is collusion and plenty of it; but where the home is broken up, if these people have agreed to live apart, if they are living apart, if there is no purpose to be served in joining together or trying to join together people who are incompatible, then I am not bothering too much about it. But where there is a woman—and there is a woman in this case—or a man to whom any injustice is done, I shall fight that case and I shall fight every case on the floor of this house, and I shall fight it in the miscellaneous private bills committee.

My hon. friend talks about passing this bill being the will of the majority. I tell him that if every man in this house were taken out behind the curtains and you asked him to look you in the eye and say honestly and say from his heart whether he is in favour of the way in which this House of Commons, the Senate and this committee deal with these things, if he is an honest man he will look you in the face and say: I am sick and tired of this rotten thing; let us get it out of the forum of this House of Commons.

Mr. Hosking: What about the petitioner? My hon. friend has told us of his attitude toward divorce.

Mr. Knowles: What about the woman?

Mr. Castleden: And separation allowance?

Mr. Hosking: I am talking about the petitioner.

Mr. Knight: I know my hon. friend believes in simply rubber stamping whatever the Senate has done. I do not believe in that.

Mr. Hosking: You know better than that.

Mr. Knight: My hon. friend has illustrated a prejudiced type of mind in the discussion of this thing ever since this particular case came up, and I do not want to elaborate upon it, but I can if necessary. In the meantime, we have the hon. member's name recorded—I refer to the private members' bills—and in that connection he did vote "yea" that all these ten divorce bills be considered in that way without even reading the numbers and the names.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege; that is absolutely untrue. I seconded the motion that they be dealt with individually. I do not want my hon. friend speaking for me in this house. If I want to make a speech in this house I will make my own speech.

Mr. Knight: I apologize unreservedly to the hon. gentleman. For a moment I was excited.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. As soon as I sit down the hon. member for Saskatoon may continue his remarks. We may regard the incident between himself and the hon. member for Wellington South concluded. In the debate on clause 1 of the bill which is before us there may be, the committee will agree, no practical advantage in the chairman at the moment becoming too particular as to adherence to the rules. The only thing is that every time the rules are not adhered to the occasion becomes a precedent for another, and I think it is my duty to point out to the hon. member for Saskatoon that the over-all procedure on divorce bills is not before the committee at the moment. He has unlimited rights to debate the merits or demerits of clause 1 of this bill, and clause 1 is the bill. But we are less likely to have a repetition of the unfortunate incident that almost occurred if we stick to the matter before the committee instead of endeavouring at this late stage to debate a very debatable question, namely, the manner of handling divorce cases as a whole, which might have been in order on the second reading but which, my hon. friend will agree, is not before the committee at the moment.

Mr. Knight: Will you give me at least this much indulgence? Will you let me make my apologies to my hon. friend? Perhaps I was a trifle moved at the moment, and I made an error when I said that my hon. friend was one of those who asked that the bills be taken en masse on that particular occasion. I was totally and completely wrong. What I had meant to say was that he was recorded as being one of those who had voted in support of the preamble of this bill, which would have granted the divorce. Having said that, I cannot do anything else but again give him my humble apologies for having made that mistake. I hope I put myself in the clear in regard to the other matter at the same time.

This bill was considered a few days ago. It was considered on June 22, as will be found by referring to page 6482 of Hansard. In case any of my hon. friends wish to refer to that particular page, I want to warn them that there were a good many copies of yesterday's Hansard from which a number of pages were left out. When I went to refer to what I had said on the last day I could not find a part of my speech. The Hansard pages from 6467 to 6482 inclusive were missing in my copy. I then went to borrow the copy of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I found that the same thing had happened there. Finally, I did obtain a correct copy. I expect it happened to only one run of print. I found on page 6475 what the Secretary of State, who has interjected in this debate with an appeal of something or other, said on that occasion, and I shall try to answer him. He said:

> Does this procedure have to be inflicted on the whole house?

I say yes, by the machinery which is set up for handling this matter, and I am most sorry to say that it does. The whole question, sir, is most distasteful to me and I must say that I am almost certainly not in character when I have to do this sort of thing.

Then I want to say a word in regard to the debate which took place in this house and I refer in particular to the hon. member for Charlevoix and his remarks as reported at page 6482 of Hansard where he is reported as having said:

> After listening to all these complaints about these bills and listening to all this talk I am just wondering whether these hon. members who are complaining about these bills find their conscience bothered enough to rise and vote against the bills.

To that query, sir, and it is a legitimate one, my answer is yes. My conscience bothers me sufficiently so that I shall vote against this bill if the opportunity arises. I shall vote against any divorce bill in this house if in my own mind that decision is justified. What does one base one's decision upon? Well, he must base it, I suppose, on the evidence. I had hoped, sir, that there would be enough latitude given me to talk a little around this thing, but I have a very good copy of the evidence here if the house insists that I inflict it upon them, and I can quote from the evidence at some length. However, I am still hoping that will not be necessary, particularly in regard to the details and in regard to certain names.

I find that Bill No. 434 is of such a nature that I am compelled to vote against it. I find that according to the record of the miscellaneous private bills committee the preamble of this bill was opposed on a vote by six members of that committee. I propose to tell the committee who those six members were: The hon. members for Regina City, Lapointe, Macleod, Saskatoon, Mackenzie, and Burnaby-Coquitlam. I would like to say to the hon. member for Charlevoix, who is not here at the moment, and with whom I am not very well acquainted, that I imagine that with his background and training I expect he would be opposed to the whole idea of divorce in general upon moral and religious grounds, and I am going to suggest to him that if he go out behind the curtains and go up to the offices and gather in people of like mind and bring them into this house he could kill every divorce that came before this house at any time. I am not suggesting he should do that, but I am telling him he could do that if he so desires. Why does he not do that?

Why do they absent themselves from these votes? Where are they today? Where will they be when this divorce bill is voted upon, if it is voted upon today? I venture to say that there will be a smaller proportion in this house when the vote comes up than there was in the miscellaneous private bills committee of which I speak.

So, sir, on this matter of conscience let me turn the challenge back upon him. If it is a matter of conscience that he should oppose divorce bills then he should oppose them. If it is a matter of conscience for me to oppose this bill today then I am going to oppose it.

I do not expect my hon. friend has organized any group to come in here and kill this bill on conscientious grounds. If they are here I do not see them. As a matter of fact, sir, I do not see any hon. member on the government side of this house who is recorded as having done anything but vote for this particular divorce bill and so I propose to read to you the names of those who supported the preamble in the committee and by so doing recorded themselves as being in favour of this particular divorce.

The vote on the preamble is recorded and this is the vote on which I was unfortunate enough to blame my hon. friend. Those who voted for it were as follows: The hon. members for Timmins, Victoria—and I hope I have got them right for I do not want someone else jumping on my back—Wellington South, Parkdale, Jacques Cartier-Lasalle, Cumberland, the junior member for Queens, and Papineau. It is interesting to note that the latter was the gentleman who went on that committee instead of the hon. member for Laurier who had resigned and that the substitute also voted for that divorce. Then I have the hon. members for Lisgar, Manitoba; Middlesex East; and Selkirk. That is the record, and now the committee has the names of those who voted for and against this particular divorce from both sides of the house.

Just in case you think that was a small committee I want to point out, perhaps in justice to those concerned, that three members abstained from voting. They were the hon. members for High Park, Niagara Falls, and Wetaskiwin. That is the total number of the committee and this will show just how interested those men are in their work, and do not think I am blaming them for not being interested. There are 50 on that committee and the number present when that vote was taken was 20, three of whom abstained.

That is something of the history of this particular bill. I am still avoiding the evidence but I will come to it because I am going to try to show this house that this woman had a case equally as good perhaps against her husband. It happens in many cases that the men have the advantage in this thing, and I think that is probably chiefly true in the two provinces concerned, for there the man is the money earner and in many cases the keeper of the purse. The man probably has more know-how in legal matters and it is pretty hard for a woman in certain circumstances to set out with $1,500 in cash to start with, then the counsel's fees, and then find the money to pay these Peeping Tom investigators while they are engaged in their business, if we can call it business. The man can initiate that sort of thing and he sometimes gets away with it.

Now I want to say another word about this bill which originated, as so many of these bills do, in the province of Quebec. Some of them originated in the province of Newfoundland and I need not go into the history of why we get divorce cases from these two provinces. But I want to say that I deplore, whether in these two provinces, my own province, or any other province, the increase in the number of divorce cases, for it is a lamentable and pitiable thing, and the effect is that at this session of parliament we have had probably the greatest number of divorce cases, though the margin is small, than have ever been presented before at any one session of the Canadian House of Commons, certainly as far back as I think 1943 or 1947, and on a ten-year basis. I think it is on a ten-year basis. If any one of my hon. friends would like to get a record of that, I would commend them to the Senate committee report on divorce. It is No. 55. It is the minutes of proceedings of the Senate committee of Canada. It was issued on May 12, 1954. It will show them statistics there on divorce generally which I think they will find interesting to read.

I may say that this bill is one of 382 bills which were initiated from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland in this session. I see that the number from Newfoundland was 9, so it will not be hard for you to do the necessary mathematics and discover how many were initiated in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. How does the hon. gentleman relate the statistics to this particular bill which you ruled was the only thing which could be discussed?

Mr. Knight: This bill, as I was saying when I was interrupted, originated in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I raised a point of order.

Mr. Knight: We have come—

The Deputy Chairman: The Secretary of State has raised a point of order which, if I may say so, is at least very nearly correct.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: That is fairly good for him.

An hon. Member: Close enough.

[Mr. Knight.]

The Deputy Chairman: I think that with some co-operation from the hon. member who now has the floor we might keep this discussion away from the method of the handling of divorces as a whole, which is an extremely large subject. I do not think that I can rule the hon. member for Saskatoon out of order in relating this particular incident to one of a series of incidents and perhaps proving that they are on the increase or on the decrease. At the moment I feel that the hon. member for Saskatoon is not too far out of order for it to be necessary for the chair to interrupt.

Mr. Knight: I want to say that I think I was in order because I was discussing this bill. As a matter of fact, I was saying "this bill" when the hon. member interrupted me. I was just talking about this bill. I was saying that this bill originated from the province of Quebec where these matters are not dealt with in the same fashion as they are dealt with in other provinces. Our committee—and I am talking about the miscellaneous private bills committee which considered this bill—consisted of men, the great majority of whom were not from the province of Quebec or from the province of Newfoundland. I am submitting that it is quite a great responsibility for us, who have different arrangements with regard to divorce in our provinces, to take total responsibility or almost total responsibility for having to deal with cases which come from other provinces. I definitely feel that this case and cases like it should be more in the hands of the people of the provinces in which they originate than in those of people who come from provinces which have other arrangements with regard to these matters.

I am not suggesting for one moment that anybody wants to force anything upon the province of Quebec. It is the right of Quebec, as it is the right of Newfoundland, to handle their own marriage problems in their own way. This case is one out of a number of cases which, as I say, are on the increase and which are going to take up an increasing amount of the time of the House of Commons.

So much, sir, for that part of it. As to the history of the bill before us, I went over that matter previously when I spoke the other day. Let us get it straight, though, so that it may be all together. It passed the Senate committee. It passed and the divorce was granted. It passed first reading in the House of Commons. No voices were raised against it. It passed second reading without consideration. Then it came back to the committee of the whole. Then, as I said, somebody read it quite by accident and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moved that it be referred back to the miscellaneous private bills committee for further consideration there and by the house. My hon. friend talks about majorities. He says "Why must the majority be thwarted by one man?". I do not know whether he was honouring me with the title or to whom he referred, but that is what he said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was quoting the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knight: He is a much greater man than I.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Knight: I thank you, sir, for the compliment that you have paid to my hon. friend. I am pointing this out to the Secretary of State, when he talks about the will of the majority. I would suggest that the members of this house gave an honest vote in that case—

Mr. Pickersgill: Give us a chance.

Mr. Knight: There is no reason to suggest that they did not do so on the previous occasion. There is nothing to suggest that they did not read the evidence. There is everything to suggest that they had made up their minds and decided "This thing needs another scrutiny", and therefore sent it back to the miscellaneous private bills committee for that purpose.

Mr. Hosking: We looked at it.

Mr. Knight: We are going to get into the detail of this bill, maybe before my time is up; I do not know. My hon. friend reminds me that the majority was 66 to 63. After all, that is a majority. I have seen the government sustained by about that number.

In this particular bill the man was suing the woman. At this point I was going to make the remarks that I have just made with regard to the man in many of these cases having a tremendous advantage over the woman, having regard to the matter of funds. He is the keeper of the funds. There are fees paid on account of this bill and the others that were presented to this house of $80,226 at this session. That may be a startling figure but it is one which may be obtained from that pamphlet from the Senate which I have just quoted.

I now want to come to the evidence before the committee. That is the part that I would have liked to avoid, but it is difficult in my present predicament to talk about generalities if I am not allowed to do so. Let me say this. When this bill and others was before the Senate we were told, "These gentlemen in the other place see the witnesses, they see the look in their eyes, they see the kind of people they are, they see them in person and they have that advantage." I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I heard the evidence in this particular case, that I saw the witnesses, and that I heard two witnesses who did not appear before the committee of the other place because for some reason or other they were not called. I heard counsel on both sides make their arguments. I came to certain conclusions and I am going to have a word or two to say about those conclusions.

By the way, I suppose it would not be polite, Mr. Chairman, if I talked to you in French, but if you will permit me to do so, I should like to quote something from a little paper here; I would call it a rag. I do not think I would pay too much attention to it ordinarily. The reason I am paying attention to it now and the reason I quote it here is that it was the subject of a question in our committee and it therefore comes into the position of being in order. I found a little thing in it when I was looking it over today. I found another passage which, with your permission, I shall read directly. The reason I am doing this is to defend the Liberal government and my Liberal friends from what I think is a deliberate slander. My hon. friends will be pleased if I do that.

(Translation):

The Ottawa Liberals are quite annoyed with the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland for not wanting to set up their own divorce courts like the other provinces. In fact, in these two provinces, divorce is still the responsibility of the federal government.

(Text):

That, as the Prime Minister has often told us, is completely untrue.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): What paper is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. Knight: I quote from what I consider to be a rag. It is called Ici Montreal.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Who is the editor?

Mr. Knight: I have not the faintest idea.

An hon. Member: Your brother.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Who said that?

Mr. Knight: I am merely submitting it because it is exhibit "A" in the evidence that was brought out before the committee. That particular passage which I have read I think is completely wrong.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The hon. member had better withdraw that remark.

Mr. Knight: It is completely wrong. I am defending the government. The statement that divorces from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland are under the jurisdiction of the federal government is incorrect. The Prime Minister has explained many times that any person in either of these provinces who desires a divorce comes to the foot of the throne and has a special bill passed. That is why these are private bills and not public bills. I wanted to make that perfectly clear. Nobody wants this to be a provincial matter if a province does not like it. I do not know anybody—Liberals, Conservatives or people of any other political or religious faith—who insists that these provinces should set up courts of their own.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I should like to know the name of the editor of this newspaper.

Mr. Knight: I am sorry, but I am not responsible for the editor's name.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I should like to know the name. He must have a name.

Mr. Knight: I will give my hon. friend the paper when I have finished and he can find out. Now, I come to my real reason for raising this particular matter. I suppose it is perfectly legitimate for me in dealing with a law case, as it is for my learned friends, to dispute the credibility of the witnesses. I have this little item, and once more it is from Ici Montreal. The only reason I wish to refer to it is that the petitioner was asked whether the statement in this paper, correct or not as it may be, was true, and he said that it was true. I propose to read it. It is also in French, and reads as follows:

William Delorme a comparu, le 21 avril dernier, sous une accusation d'avoir attenté à la pudeur d'une dénommée...

—and my friends will excuse me if I leave the girl's name out.

Il devra subir son enquête préliminaire et demeurera entre temps en liberté sous caution de $950, que son père a fournie en donnant comme garantie de la présence de l'accusé, sa propriété évaluée à $10,000.

I see the chairman looking at me in some doubt. He is wondering whether I am on the course. I shall translate the article. It says:

William Delorme appeared on the 21st of April last under an accusation of attempted rape against . . . He will have to submit to his preliminary inquiry and will in the meantime be at liberty under bail of $950 which his father furnished for him. His guarantee for the presence of the accused is his own private property valued at $10,000.

That is the gentleman who is suing his wife for a divorce.

Mr. Reinke: On a point of order, my hon. friend forgets to mention that this charge was later withdrawn—

[Mr. Knight.]

Mr. Knight: If my hon. friend will permit me to make my speech—

Mr. Reinke: —and replaced with a charge of common assault.

Mr. Knight: I am not withdrawing these remarks by any manner of means. Counsel asked the petitioner: "Is that charge true?" He said, "Yes, it is true." Then he modified his statement. I only have his word for it, but he did modify his statement and said that the type of charge had been changed. I am not sure, because these committee meetings are not recorded, but I think he also said that the amount of bail had been reduced. I am merely, Mr. Chairman, trying to shake the credibility of the witness in your mind. I think that is a legitimate thing to do.

I want to come now to the main charge of this man that his wife had committed adultery. He tells us that nineteen years ago was the first time he knew of the adultery of his wife. He had come home at an unexpected time and had found his wife occupying sleeping quarters with another man. He said that he had found that also upon another occasion. So his counsel said: "What did you do?" He said, "I went out and cried." They asked him, "Did you wake them up?" He said, "I did not." On another occasion he said, "I went off to the hockey game and I cried." For nineteen years that man said he knew that she had been living in adultery with another man. When he found out about it he went out and cried, but he lived and cohabited with her for the next nineteen years, although he had said in his petition that he had by no means condoned the adultery of which she was accused.

I ask you: Why did he only now bring this petition of divorce against his wife? Well, the home was broken up. Why did he not bring suit immediately he discovered these things? Oh, he said, on account of the children. But nineteen years later when his wife, whom he had deserted in the meantime, brought a case in the Quebec courts for a separation which the petitioner allowed to go by default, and when my friend—I must not call him that—when the petitioner discovered he had to pay $20 a week and was liable to have to do so for the rest of his life, he suddenly decided that this wife of his was a bad woman and that somehow or other he would have to get rid of her. I should like to refer to a certain part of the evidence contained in the 383rd report of the Senate committee, but I am not sure whether I can find it. Oh yes, here it is on page 12. The petitioner was being questioned by Mr. Lefrancois, his counsel. This is the passage:

Q. Now, did you decide to do something about it?
A. Well, it is then that I decided to do something.
By the Acting Chairman:
Q. When?
A. After she started legal proceedings against me. It was then I decided to do something.

Let us examine this question of the children for whom he showed such consideration, the little children who of course could not be disgraced by the stigma that would be attached to them. Who are these children? There are two boys. One is now eighteen and is unmarried and the other is twenty. They were before the committee. They were on the witness stand. The petitioner was asked where his children lived. He did not know where either of them lived. He was asked about his friendship with his children, and he said that the last time he saw one of them—I have forgotten which one—he called him a name in French so dirty that he could not bear to translate it into English in this committee.

Then they asked these children what they thought of their father. They said they had been beaten, kicked and abused by him and that they had to leave home. That is the man who could not sue this woman for a divorce on the ground of adultery to which he swore because the children's name had to be protected. What a farce! On the stand that woman said that she knew her husband had been unfaithful to her. This is one instance where the case might just as well have been reversed with equal justice. It so happened that it was the petitioner who sued her and not she him.

I could go on. I have a lot of other evidence. I saw the whole proceeding. On the one side there was the mother with her family. On the other side were the professional investigators, the principal one of whom admitted that he had received a small bonus of $20 over and above his fee for having come home with the bacon. I ask you: Are you going to believe that woman's son, that fine young boy in Her Majesty's air force uniform? Counsel tried to attack his character in committee and I refused to permit that. On the one side was this soldier lad, a fine, clean, good boy of twenty years of age, standing there to protect his mother, and on the other side these professional people. You should see them. There was the one fellow, slick, smooth, poised, with his story off by heart, and then he had as helper that poor creature, that unfortunate anaemic looking fellow with the weak chin. Hon. members who were on the committee will remember him. He did not know whether he was going to get any money at all out of this thing. He was a "peeping Tom". He did it in his spare time. I do not know whether or not he did it for fun, but he was an electrician. He loved to do this after dark. He did not know whether he would get $5 or $10, but his boss had already obtained $310.

Finally, let us refer to the evidence itself. How was it obtained? It was obtained on the top of a ladder in the dark of night with a little flashlight shining in a window. Three men climbed the ladder at once, which looked a little foolish to me; but here they are with a little flashlight shining away to the far end of the room. The bed was on the far side away from the window. There were two people in bed. The woman was on the other side, and they admitted in their evidence that these people were almost completely covered. He said he did see part of the man's forehead and identified him that way.

There they were on the ladder. Well, they got off the ladder and they got off it in a hurry. Why did they get off it in a hurry? Because they heard the provincial police were coming. And why were they afraid of the provincial police if they were doing no wrong? How did this fellow make this identification? Because the week before he had gone to this woman and had lied to her. I asked him about that, and he said it was not really lying. He told her he was sent by the electric company to check up on these fuses. He went in to talk to the woman and he admitted to me he lied to her.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to have to interrupt the eloquent and hon. gentleman but he has now taken two minutes over his time.

Mr. Knight: If you would just give me two minutes more, I could finish.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. gentleman permission to speak for a further two minutes?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hosking: I take part in this debate for one reason. I could not agree more with everything the hon. member has said, every single thing he has described, except where he said that I voted in favour of all these divorces being considered at one time. I do want to say this, that he pointed out some very interesting figures when he said that the four people who voted against this divorce in committee were C.C.F. members. We all know that the aim of the C.C.F. party is to discredit and get rid of the Senate and they are using these divorce cases as an excuse.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hosking: This is continually referred to as a very improper way of handling divorces, so in order to discredit the Senate, they refer to these divorce cases one after the other—

Mr. Regier: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman: I was one of the four C.C.F. members to whom the speaker has just referred, and I think it ill behooves him to impute ulterior motives to me. I can say I voted in the cause of human justice, irrespective of how any other hon. member in the committee voted.

The Deputy Chairman: The point raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is undoubtedly correct. I was listening carefully to the hon. member who has the floor, and I did not interpret the remarks as imputing motives, but I would suggest that I have already stated this afternoon that an over-all discussion of Senate divorce procedure, and so forth, is out of order. Perhaps the hon. member who just took his seat has exceeded the letter of the ruling I have been endeavouring to make, but I trust the hon. member who now has the floor will not exceed it to any great extent.

Mr. Hosking: I shall explain what I was proceeding to do, had I not been interrupted. The hon. member stopped me from making the explanation quite clear. We came here to judge these divorce cases on their merits, purely and simply.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hosking: The hon. member who preceded me gave most damning evidence as to why divorce should be granted. He explained all the reasons why it should be granted, but the reason that they are now debating it, as he said in his speech of last Tuesday, is to prevent these divorces at every opportunity. In other words, by his actions, and by the actions of his supporters in that party, he is going to prevent the divorce being completed in this house purely and simply to discredit the Senate.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, but I must ask the hon. member for Wellington South to withdraw unconditionally that remark. The suggestion that any hon. member in this house or any group of hon. members have been guided in casting their vote by an entirely different question, is one which cannot be allowed to remain.

[Mr. Hosking.]

Mr. Hosking: I am quite prepared to withdraw, Mr. Chairman. Then, I should like to say this. We all know the evidence in these divorce cases is heard by a committee of the Senate. I am prepared to say that the lawyers who have the unpleasant task of examining the evidence in those cases would be accepted in any county across this dominion as judges. They have sat on these cases, listened to the evidence in all its detail, and have come to their conclusion. Subsequent to that the committee has sat and all the members listened to the evidence. When they have heard enough evidence they have decided to cast their votes one way or the other.

In this particular case there were 11 in favour of saying that this was no longer a marriage, and there were six against, four of whom were C.C.F. members. At all times this C.C.F. group take a stand that they hope will make the House of Commons do something with regard to the method of handling divorces. My plea in this case is this. I agree with the evidence that this man found his wife sleeping with another man. This man's wife left him and went to live in another house with a man who happened to be a cousin, a Mr. Delorme, a man with the same name. This man immediately creeps in and lives in the same house with Delorme's wife. Then there are the two children in the family who address this boarder living in the house with the mother as "uncle"; that is the connection between the family.

Mr. Winch: He was an uncle.

Mr. Hosking: He was a cousin, and by marriage he was an uncle. There was no blood relationship, and he had no right to expect to take up any other position. The family clearly referred to the boarder with whom the mother was living as "uncle". Someone said, "Is this not your cousin, your father's cousin?" They said, "Well, we call him uncle". I have no disagreement at all with the evidence that has been presented. Remember this, and I say it sincerely, I have no more grief for the husband than I have for the wife. They were both the same. There was no proper marriage in this home, and for those reasons we gave a divorce. For those reasons the divorce committee set up by the Senate found that the evidence was sufficient and recommended a private bill be put through this house to dissolve the marriage.

Our committee met and heard the evidence. Twenty members of that committee decided to dissolve the marriage and only four members of the C.C.F., whose actions throughout all these divorces have been to delay and discredit the method of protecting the minorities in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland, voted against it. They have always said we will make this minority agree with the majority. They will have to do it by talking this bill out, and they will subjugate the minority to their wishes. And after two fair hearings, both in the Senate committee and in our committee, if anyone talks this bill out, then he is discrediting the House of Commons in the eyes of the people of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Winch: You are doing a fair job of it right now.

Mr. Hosking: And that is the only part I shall take in this debate. I have no desire to see divorce take place anywhere. I would like to see a country in which there were no divorces. I have the benefit of having the best wife in the whole country, and I consider her my greatest asset. I disagree heartily with divorce. But when we have a Senate committee examining evidence and agreeing that there should be a divorce, and in addition to that when we have a committee of the House of Commons also agreeing that there should be a divorce, then I think it is a shameful thing for a very small party in the parliament of Canada to stand up and say, "I will talk this bill out. I will not allow it to pass. I will flout all the ethics of parliament."

That is a performance, Mr. Chairman, that is oppressive to a minority of people in two provinces of this country, who will think they are being oppressed. And I think further, it is flouting the will of parliament that has set up a divorce committee to hear the evidence in these divorce cases.

I would point out again that the head of the divorce committee in the Senate is a man who is well qualified for his work and who would be acceptable on any bench in the Dominion of Canada. And if there are mistakes—and I am not suggesting there are human beings who do not make mistakes—if there are mistakes made in the divorce committee, I am convinced they are no more glaring and no more frequent, indeed, possibly less frequent, than the mistakes made in the courts of this country.

I would plead with the house—and I am going to take my seat now—not to talk this out. But if hon. members do talk it out, then that is their problem. But in the opinion of hon. members who have taken part in this discussion on divorce, it would be a discredit to the House of Commons and its procedure if a few men, by making a farce of that procedure, can flout the wishes of so many other people.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he think it would be fair to this woman, who does not want this divorce, who would suffer the loss of money and suffer reproach to her name, if this House of Commons should pass this divorce against her will?

Mr. Hosking: I will answer that. If this woman had not left her husband, and had not gone to live in a house, and have this other person who had been following her for sixteen years move into that house and live there, and if her family had not referred to him affectionately as "uncle" and when asked again they said "uncle, no not cousin", I would have taken a different attitude.

I would think since she has done that she has flouted all the rights to alimony. Why should a man pay her to live with another man? That does not seem reasonable to me.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege—and again I shall be brief. I think the hon. member for Saskatoon misrepresented what I said, although I am sure he did not intend to do so. I believe he misunderstood what I said at the beginning of the debate. I took no position on this bill. I merely asked to be allowed to take a position on it by my vote. And I hope that, now that the hon. member for Saskatoon has had his say, he will let the great majority of us in the House of Commons who do not say very much at least have the right to vote on this bill.

Mr. Castleden: It has been interesting to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Wellington South. Oddly enough he is taking exception to our action in this case because he thinks we are doing an injustice. On the other hand we are taking this action because we think there is a great possibility of an injustice in which we do not want to have any part. I am sure the possibility of injustice is just as abhorrent to other members in the committee as it is to him. Therefore we should be more careful when a responsibility of this kind is placed upon us when there is a possibility of someone accusing us of being guilty of an injustice.

Then, we have another duty and responsibility to Canada's parliament and our parliamentary institutions. After reading the evidence of the witnesses on both sides in this case I certainly came to the conclusion that there was not sufficient proof on either side to make a decision in the matter. The evidence was conflicting; it was poor evidence, and there is grave doubt in my mind that justice would be served by the passing of this bill.

If both houses of parliament err in this matter, then the prestige of parliament suffers. Our responsibility in this field is too great to permit that to happen. We certainly cannot treat the matter lightly. Parliament makes laws; that is our duty. Parliament appoints judges. The cabinet and the government control our courts. One of the greatest functions of parliament is to maintain that justice that is one of the foundations upon which democracy is built. The prestige of parliament is fundamental to that.

I would ask hon. members to contemplate the results of any demonstration that parliament is unable to administer justice within its own halls. If within the borders of parliament we do not administer justice, and if we make errors—

Mr. Hosking: Would you remarry them and make them live together again?

Mr. Castleden: I am not judging the case. I am just talking about whether we in Canada dare to be guilty of an injustice.

Mr. Hosking: You are doing an injustice.

Mr. Castleden: You can be the judge of that.

Mr. Hosking: I am.

Mr. Castleden: Any move which might result in an injustice being perpetrated is not just a reflection upon members of the House of Commons, but it lowers the standard of the prestige of parliament in the eyes of all the people of Canada.

Mr. Hosking: You are doing that yourself.

Mr. Castleden: It is not the function of parliament to judge. The courts are established to decide right and wrong, and we ask that the functions of the courts be carried out. We have no quarrel with the other place; we realize they have a difficult task to perform. We would like to see them rid of it, and I am sure they would like to be rid of it themselves.

Mr. Hosking: That is why you are preventing this divorce from going through.

Mr. Castleden: No.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

[Mr. Castleden.]

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The Chairman: We were considering item 44.

Mr. Nowlan: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

Mr. Harrison: When the committee rose at five o'clock to consider private bills I was making a few remarks on the Saskatchewan dam. I said at that time there was a considerable area of agreement between the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and myself regarding his statement that the dam was approved of by all members in Saskatchewan. Later in his remarks, when describing the conditions in the 1930's when we had the dried-out period in the west, he said that when he drove down a street in Moose Jaw he was unable to see the engine of his car. Hon. members may have thought he had had a slip of the tongue, but what he was actually describing was the dust condition. We are not able to see the engines of our cars today, but there are hoods over them and they are largely ornamented with chrome. But in those days he was likely in the same condition as most residents of Saskatchewan. If they owned an automobile at that time the hood had long since blown away or had been used to repair the barn or to put a roof on some utilitarian building in the backyard.

That was the condition that existed at that time. What the hon. member was describing was that the dust conditions were so bad that as he drove down the street no doubt he had no hood on his car and he could not see the motor, not because there was a hood there but because of the dust. These were desperate days, and we do not want to see a recurrence. That is something we have no control over. Conservation of water is something over which we have some control. I agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre when he says that all members from Saskatchewan are favourable to this dam. In this respect I am different from most members from Saskatchewan in that in my own constituency we have lots of water. As a matter of fact, in the Meadow Lake area we could fill this dam perhaps 150 times or 200 times over without any difficulty. We do realize that when other parts of the country are prosperous it makes a lot of difference to us as well.

I am in agreement with the hon. member for Saskatoon who said that when this project is shown to be something that will benefit the nation as a whole it should be gone ahead with. This is about all I have to say at this time. I just want to indicate that I too am in agreement with the construction of the dam. When it is a national project, when we know that it is something that will benefit the nation as a whole, we should go ahead with it.

Mr. Mang: If or when this project is undertaken some of its store of water will be passing through the river Qu'Appelle, which is the northern boundary of the constituency I represent. Therefore, I hope the committee will forgive me for taxing its patience for about two minutes at this time. There are only two points I want to emphasize because I think the matter has been very thoroughly covered, particularly by the hon. member for Rosthern this afternoon. I endorse wholeheartedly the appeal he made to people from all parts of Canada and to members from all parts of Canada who represent constituencies in this house. To my mind the final decision to build this project will be made when members from other parts of Canada decide that it is in the national interest so to do.

The area in question has been under discussion for a long time. In fact we read of discussions having taken place or interest shown in the area where this dam would be constructed as far back as 150 years ago. In 1804, John McDonald of Garth, who represented the North West Company in western Canada, gathered a great deal of Indian legend concerning this area where at certain times at high flood the river would reverse its course. That is the area at the bend of the South Saskatchewan, and not so many miles from there are the headwaters of the Qu'Appelle river. So much interest was created at that time by those reports that various expeditions were organized to investigate the possibilities.

In fact waterways in western Canada is a subject that has been discussed internationally as far back as 1822 when there was a meeting between representatives of the United States and of Canada to discuss the feasibility of developing a waterway which would connect the great lakes and the Red river valley. Nothing much came of that, but there was a certain amount of interest and in July, 1859 a steamship by the name of "Anson" arrived at Fort Garry. Interest was again aroused and the Canadian government sent an expedition from eastern Canada headed by Henry Hind, professor of geology of Trinity College, Toronto, called the Assiniboine and Saskatchewan exploring expedition. Hind had the vision of creating a waterway which would make it possible to travel by water from Fort Garry, now Winnipeg, right thrcugh along the Assiniboine, the Qu'Appelle, the Saskatchewan and the Bow river to the foothills of the Rockies. It is worth while mentioning the interest evidenced by the British government in this area when they sent out Captain Palliser in 1858.

I mention these few skimpy historical facts for this purpose and this purpose alone, namely, to show that the waterways of the western plains had been considered of national and also international interest long before 1954. I believe the interest was first aroused by the old Indian legends conveyed to the white people about 1804 when John McDonald made his explorations for the North West Company while trading with the Indians. I set forth these few historical facts because I believe that when the government and parliament makes its decision it could be helpful to be fully aware of the historical background of the project.

I am not going to cover the points raised by other hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Rosthern, but I want to stress another more practical point in particular. If this dam is constructed in the area I have mentioned it will constitute the main source of water supply for a large percentage of the people of Saskatchewan. The people in the city of Regina, some 75,000 in number, and the people in the city of Moose Jaw, the third largest city in Saskatchewan, will be assisted in obtaining a better water supply if the dam is built. Let me point out, in addition, that at the present time, as most hon. members know, there is a project by which water is going to be led from Buffalo Pound lake through to the city of Regina by pipe line. Buffalo Pound lake is the headwaters of the Qu'Appelle river.

It is desirable in all our water supplies to have the water pure, tasty, and as high a quality as possible. If we have a diversion of the South Saskatchewan by virtue of such a project as the South Saskatchewan dam then the water will be flowing through Buffalo Pound lake until it finally finds its way into the Qu'Appelle river and then on down to Manitoba. In order to keep the water as pure as possible it is desirable to have a steady flow from the headwaters, but in this case the headwaters are not of sufficient flow to provide the required degree of freshness in that water and it would have to be treated. I am not saying it is not pure at the present time because Moose Jaw is using this water. It would be desirable to have a larger volume of water available so that the quality would be considerably improved. This project when completed will accomplish this.

Let me remind members of the committee that this will be a very large structure. If the people of Canada decide to undertake this project then we will be creating a lake about two-thirds the length of lake Erie. I do not think many people allow their imagination to dwell on the fact that in the heart of one of the finest agricultural areas of this country we will be providing a lake of such magnitude. Apart from irrigation and power requirements more than 100,000 people in the heart of Saskatchewan are depending on this project for better and purer drinking water. I would like to add my voice to that of those who have already spoken on this subject and I would like to urge all members of the house to consider both the background, the necessity, and the economic value to the Canadian people as a whole and particularly in the area, of this project. It will help the people of Saskatchewan to a better life personally and in making a living. It will increase the natural growth, strength, and the virility of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Charlton: Can the parliamentary assistant answer my question?

Mr. McCubbin: I believe the hon. member's question had to do with the increase in postage expenditure. In former years letters sent out from our department were sent out free of charge, but now they are sent out on a charge basis and the post office charges us for all such letters and the cost to the department is naturally increased in the process. That is why there is an item there which was not there in former years.

Mr. Charlton: But in some cases there is less postage this year than last year for certain items and it would not appear to be due to an increase in the postage rate. Some items are less but others have been practically doubled and there does not seem to be any logical answer. I would like to have the variation explained.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could say a word on this because the hon. member asked me exactly the same question on my estimates. There has been a change in policy with regard to postage and postal meters were installed and there is an item for each department to cover the cost of this postage. There may be some departments that previously had special delivery or air mail and that would have been charged to the department and perhaps account for the discrepancy between last year and this. But there has been a change in policy, as I believe the leader of the house pointed out when my estimates were up and on these items there are increases in nearly every department.

Mr. Charlton: But on page 117 of the details there is an item which was $4,500 last year and which is reduced to $3,500 this year.

Mr. McCubbin: In which department?

Mr. Charlton: It is under item 45 and I understand we are dealing with items 44 and 45 simultaneously. The explanation advanced by the Secretary of State may be perfectly all right but I do not think it explains a decrease of $1,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I understand that this covers branches of the department outside Ottawa and there had to be an item covering that in previous years. It is at the headquarters in Ottawa that the policy change to which I have referred has been introduced. This other item is in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps they have been sending less mail.

Mr. Charlton: But that explanation does not cover the fact that it is less in some items and more in others.

Mr. Dinsdale: Could the parliamentary assistant reply to my query?

Mr. McCubbin: I understand that was with respect to the survey made of the Assiniboine river. That survey was undertaken along with the Red river survey at a time when they had flood trouble in the Red river valley a few years ago. These few projects were undertaken together but what is going to take place with respect to the survey in which my hon. friend is interested, I am not in a position to say. The other matter the hon. member mentioned had to do with flooding at Brandon, but that is entirely a provincial and municipal problem and of course if they cannot handle that then it is up to the provincial government to appeal to us for assistance.

Mr. Dinsdale: I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the whole Red river valley problem is under review and constant attention because it is all part of the same difficulty. The flooding extends over the whole Assiniboine basin. It involves about 200,000 acres of land, I think, and about 700,000 population. As I indicated in my remarks, surveys have taken place from time to time ever since 1886 but the recent surveys during and since the disastrous flood of 1950 suggest that more urgent action is going to be taken.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Charlton: No. I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant to the minister could tell us why it is necessary to have 29 extra people working under this department this year. He might also explain this minor item, probably, of $91,000 for "purchase of bulls for pastures". It happens to be just the same figure as it was last year. I do not know whether they buy so many bulls each year. But it is extremely good figuring if they go out and buy a number of bulls and have them work out at the same figure for each year.

Mr. Knowles: Last year it was horses.

Mr. McCubbin: Of course, that was just an estimate. It might be $70,000 this year and it might be $100,000. It is somewhere in that neighbourhood. It will not likely run over $91,000.

Mr. Charlton: Is that the complete explanation? The item reads "purchase of bulls for pastures". Where are the pastures? What kind of bulls are they? Why is it necessary to have so many? Do not people supply any of their own bulls out there any more?

Mr. Fulton: The Liberal party supplies all the bull out there.

Mr. McCubbin: I do not wish to go into a lengthy discussion about this matter but the situation will be understood by anyone who has been out in western Canada and has seen these fine community pastures which were set up in the days of drought, where the farmers come and put their cattle in. The government tries to buy the best bulls they can buy and then they turn them into these pastures in order to assist the farmers. There are 62 community pastures throughout these provinces. A great many bulls are put in them.

Mr. Charlton: It is very nice to have the government supply the bulls for these pastures, but after all it is a matter of $91,000. We have always paid for our own bulls down east.

Mr. Weir: You sold a lot of them out west.

Mr. Charlton: If we can sell them to the government and get that price for them, I think it is a good idea.

Mr. McCubbin: Of course, you must remember that the farmers of western Canada contribute to this service themselves. What I mean is that we may have to make up a little bit some years but they pay 75 cents a head per month to put their cattle in these pastures. It does not all come out of the government because the farmers contribute to it themselves.

Mr. Charlton: What is the charge, 75 cents per month?

Mr. McCubbin: Seventy-five cents per head per month.

Mr. Charlton: That is still a very reasonable charge for pasture, with bull service too.

Mr. Castleden: I should like to say how much the farmers of the west appreciate the service of the community pastures. In the item this year I notice a sum of $462,000 for the construction of community and $642,000 for operation, improvement and maintenance of community pastures. Where are the new pastures to be constructed? Can the parliamentary assistant give us the location of these? Can he tell us approximately how many pastures are involved with regard to construction? What is the cost per pasture?

Mr. McCubbin: Mr. Chairman, there has been increased acreage in some of the pastures in the north and eastern part of Saskatchewan. That is why the sum of money has been set aside, so that these pastures might be enlarged and increased, refenced and looked after.

Mr. Castleden: No new pastures as such are being constructed?

Mr. McCubbin: No. I think there are 62 of them.

Mr. Castleden: How about the other item of $642,000 for operation, improvement and maintenance of community pastures.

Mr. McCubbin: What item are you on?

Mr. Castleden: It is page 115 of your estimates.

Mr. McCubbin: I know; but what item are you on?

Mr. Castleden: I stood up when you were on item 44.

An hon. Member: It was passed.

Mr. Charlton: No; it was not.

Mr. Castleden: It is under item 44. There are two items on page 115 in the estimates under item 44, which runs from page 113 to 115.

Mr. McCubbin: I certainly have the information all here. My hon. friend will know where these places are better than I do. I have all the information here as to where the money has been spent; in the Wilner pasture, the Royal pasture, the Antelope park pasture, the Mantario pasture. Also there is the construction of a new pasture in Manitoba.

Mr. Castleden: That is fine.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Weir: Did I understand my hon. friend to say that he had a pasture there for antelope?

Mr. McCubbin: No. That is for livestock and cattle. The name is Antelope park.

Mr. Castleden: These are not new ones?

Mr. McCubbin: No. These are ones that are being enlarged and completed.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Charlton: No. I asked the parliamentary assistant a moment ago about the extra 29 help in the one item. I notice here that there are 83 extra in the next item. That is item No. 45. I wonder whether he could give us some explanation as to why that extra help is necessary. I see there are extra maintenance supervisors here at a salary running from $3,160 to $3,720. There is one extra agricultural supervisor. I wonder whether that is the one we saw so much about in the papers a few months ago?

Mr. Weir: Which item is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. Charlton: Items 44 and 45. They are being taken simultaneously. It is page 116 in the details.

Mr. McCubbin: In reply to the question that has just been asked me I would say that a good deal of extra new help had to be procured and hired for the Bow river project where there has been a good deal of settlement taken from below Swift Current and moved over into that area.

Mr. Charlton: This is the Bow river irrigation project, is it?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes, in Alberta.

Mr. Charlton: And the extra amount is needed for that project?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes, to enlarge it and develop it so that it will be in shape for these settlers to move there.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to commend the Department of Agriculture for the enlargement and development of these green pastures. It is extremely difficult for people who live in Ontario or in an area where rainfall is abundant to appreciate the circumstances under which men attempt to raise livestock in the Palliser triangle. It is an area in which it is extremely difficult to live and raise livestock because while some years there may be a considerable amount of rain in other years there will be no rain. If there is not a community pasture with plenty of water and with care taken concerning the forage on that pasture, then the raising of cattle is rendered almost impossible in that area. I say this just to help people who come from places where there is more water from the sky to understand what all this is about. The department is very wise in pursuing a policy of expanding these pastures as it is now doing and has done.

Item agreed to.

47. Land protection, reclamation and development in British Columbia under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $143,000.

Mr. Fulton: This is the vote for land protection, reclamation and development in British Columbia. Of course it would be desirable to have the P.F.R.A. extended to the province in which case there would not have to be a separate vote for this item. I am interested in one particular project which would have to be covered under a vote such as this as things stand now. I refer to the request that has been put forward by the province on behalf of the trustees of the B.C. fruit lands irrigation district for rehabilitation of their irrigation scheme near Kamloops. I understand the matter has been submitted by the province to the government here, under the arrangement which was outlined by the Minister of Agriculture back in 1947, with a request that the federal government, if it approves the project, participate in the cost. In turn the matter has been submitted by Ottawa to the P.F.R.A. head office in Regina for study. The minister was kind enough to assure me when out there a week or so ago that he would try to expedite that study. I have discussed the matter with the officials of the P.F.R.A. here, and I am wondering whether any report has been received and, if so, whether the parliamentary assistant is in a position to tell me what stage the matter has reached. He has people before him who will be conversant with the matter and who may be able to state what the situation is.

Mr. McCubbin: I am conversant with the matter and I understand what the hon. member is speaking about. The department has been in communication with the authorities out there. The minister wrote a letter yesterday, I believe, to Mr. Sommers, the minister of lands and forests of the province, with respect to the matter. Discussions are taking place and the hon. member can rest assured that something will be done in the near future if the province and the dominion can come to an agreement on the project.

Mr. Fulton: Is there some new requirement that has to be met by the province? Is it a question of the soundness of the engineering scheme itself? I want to know whether there is any stumbling block. There have been quite a few in the past, and I would be glad to know if there is any stumbling block in the way now which requires removal because if there is we would like to know what it is so that we can deal with it.

Mr. McCubbin: I do not think there is. Discussions are always taking place with respect to all these irrigation projects. As the hon. member knows, there are some that the dominion and the province handle jointly and there are some that the dominion, the province and the interested people in the community handle under a three-way agreement. These are some of the things that are being worked out with the province in respect of this project.

Mr. Fulton: Then I will ask if I may have a copy of the correspondence. I have been in touch with the provincial minister, the federal minister and the local authorities and on each occasion they have always assured me—particularly the department here—that I would be kept informed. Yet quite frequently it happens that something develops which is thrown up later, and then you have to go back over the whole ground again. I should like to know what the picture is. I do not want to delay the discussion tonight but I want to be assured I will be kept informed of the course of negotiations.

Mr. McCubbin: I do not think there is anything further that I can say or do because discussions are under way, and until these break down I do not think there is anything we need to do with respect to the matter.

Mr. Fulton: They have broken down so many times in the past.

Mr. Castleden: With respect to the P.F.A.A. item I notice that there is a reduction in the amount. It is evident already that there is going to be a large amount of land in the prairie provinces that will be eligible for P.F.A.A. assistance on account of flooding. Is there sufficient staff on hand to do the job of inspection work that is anticipated for this year?

Mr. McCubbin: Of course the hon. member understands that this is done under a special fund. Only the administration end of it comes under our department. We have had some good years when the amount for administration has been reduced. It may have to be more next year. We have budgeted for approximately the same amount as we have had in the last two or three years. We may be wrong and we may be right. Possibly we have budgeted for too much, or possibly not enough. If we do not have enough we can bring in a supplementary estimate when parliament meets again.

Item agreed to.

49. Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, $2,097,180.

Mr. Purdy: Mr. Chairman, after all the dry talk from the west, perhaps we can come down to the maritimes where the maritime marshland rehabilitation activities are somewhat comparable to prairie farm rehabilitation. I am sure that any observer in the gallery of the house during this session would come to the conclusion that the only place in Canada where any agriculture is carried on is the western provinces. If my figures are right, one-third of those in Canada who make their living off the land reside in the three western provinces and, important though it is to the income of this country, they produce little more than two-fifths of the cash income from farms. Therefore I do believe that agriculture in the rest of Canada should receive some attention.

I come now to the question of maritime marshland rehabilitation. This project, as I said a moment ago, is comparable to what is going on in the west. At the outset I should like to say how pleased we in the maritime provinces are that this great work has been undertaken. We have a splendid force of men working there and they are doing a good job. It is true that when they first came to the area a great many of them were in the position of dealing with something new. They were used to having one or two floods a year to control. In the regions adjoining the bay of Fundy there are four floods a day to look after. The tide goes out twice a day and comes in twice a day and each tide, whether in or out, is a rush of water. As a matter of fact at Burntcoat in my constituency we have the highest tides in the world. The difference between high tide and low tide is 62 feet.

That is the kind of situation these engineers found themselves confronted with when they started to rehabilitate our marshlands. Sometimes I wonder just what manner of men the old Acadians were who won these lands back from the sea. They had no engineering staff. They were their own engineers. For tools they had a spade, an axe and probably a plow. For power they had a team of oxen. Yet they built the works, reclaimed the lands, and the works have stood the test for centuries. I only hope that in our present day and generation our men are building as well as the people of old.

Now, I might speak of this Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act. It was my privilege, in the former days when I was a member of this house, to be somewhat interested in this project. I recall very well that we carried the ball on that item between 1936 and 1945. We had the subject before the committee on rehabilitation, and they recommended it. Then, we took it up with the Minister of Agriculture and with the ministers of agriculture of the three maritime provinces. The provincial ministers looked upon it as an entirely federal project. After some discussion it was decided that those of us who were very much interested in this project should perhaps take a little more active part, so there was an unofficial committee formed. This unofficial committee conferred on the problem with the Minister of Agriculture and the various provincial ministers of agriculture. The committee consisted of the hon. member for Westmorland, then Mr. Emmerson; the then member for Queens, Prince Edward Island, Mr. Douglas, and myself. Unfortunately, the two first-named gentlemen have now gone to their great reward, so it remains for me, as the last remaining member of the committee, to perhaps reminisce for one moment.

As I say, we went to work and we eventually persuaded the provincial ministers of agriculture that they should also participate in this great project. Eventually it was worked out as a three-way plan, with the federal government keeping the water off the land; the provincial government arranging for the larger drainage canals, and the land owners looking after the small drainage canals. As I said a moment ago, we worked on this project for years. It was my great pleasure, before my services were dispensed with for a time by the electors of Colchester-Hants, to find in the estimates a small amount for general surveys and for a little exploratory work. I am happy today to see that the infant I left here in 1945 has now grown to a very commendable size. As a matter of fact the expenditure on the project, including this year, has been something in the neighbourhood of $8 million or $9 million, along with considerable provincial money and the land owners' contributions.

Now, with that background I was probably a little bit prejudiced but rather interested the other day to hear the Leader of the Opposition claim that the Bennett administration was responsible for the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; that may be so. Possibly they are responsible to the same extent the Rhodes-Harrington government in Nova Scotia was responsible for old age pensions. They passed such an act, and then never did anything about it. It is peculiar how the Conservatives try to take credit for these things. I recall being in the local house at the time this legislation was enacted, and I had something to do with the provincial government legislation which is complementary to this act. I recall that in the federal parliament the then member for Colchester-Hants said that the Minister of Agriculture was entitled to some credit for putting in this act but that the member for Cumberland, Mr. Black, was entitled to most of the credit. When I recall some of the things that happened from 1935 to 1945, I can say that it is true Mr. Black did make two or three speeches in the house. However, I know from experience that with a project like this you have to do more work than speak in the house.

However, this great project is continuing and there are now 119 marsh bodies under this reclamation scheme in the maritimes. They have reclaimed some 66,000 acres and along with this there are 375,000 acres of land being operated. Perhaps that is not a large area in the grain growing country, but in the maritimes it is quite a lot of land. Again I wish to compliment the engineers and the director of this work for what they are doing. There is just one other thought I am going to leave with them. Their work is not yet completed. Let them carry on, and complete the work.

There is another problem in the maritimes, and that is our meadow lands and our interval lands. When our marshlands are reclaimed this commission should, during the interval, be studying what could be done to save the interval lands because year by year they are going to the sea. Unless we can keep a good percentage of our people in Nova Scotia gainfully employed on the land we will not be able to take our full part in this great dominion as our forefathers intended we should do. As I say, if the engineers in the maritime field could study the problem along our various river valleys—such great rivers as the Stewiacke, Musquodoboit, North Salmon and St. Mary's—they will find there are large areas going to sea. After it goes to sea, it is no good. If we could keep these areas in production in Nova Scotia, it would maintain this beauty spot and this great asset to Canada.

Mr. Montgomery: I just want to ask a question or two. The hon. member for Colchester-Hants has reviewed the situation. On page 122 of the estimates book, there is an item for construction or acquisition of buildings and works, $1,551,000. Does the word "building" mean the construction of buildings or is that for the building of dikes to keep the water out?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes, that is for the building of aboideau and dikes.

Mr. Montgomery: It is not buildings?

Mr. McCubbin: No.

Mr. Montgomery: I notice that this item is $400,000 less this year. Is that determined by the amount of work that is laid out ahead of time or is it just an estimate that is up and down each year?

Mr. McCubbin: Unfortunately, last year we were not able to do all that we planned on doing. There was an overestimate. We hope the work can be completed this year.

Item agreed to.

51. To provide for administrative expenses, Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, $104,615.

Mr. Charlton: Under this Agricultural Prices Support Act item, I wonder whether the minister could tell us just what products, and the amounts, the government is now holding?

Mr. McCubbin: The only product the agricultural prices support board is holding now is butter, to the extent of 32 million or 33 million pounds. We are not holding any other products, any meat of any kind. We have sold about 25 million pounds of butter.

Mr. Charlton: Is the board still holding 32 million pounds? I understood a great deal more was sold. What was the maximum amount of butter held this year during the spring period?

Mr. McCubbin: About 33 million pounds was the maximum held.

Mr. Charlton: What about all that butter which we heard was sold for two and a half cents less than the floor?

Mr. McCubbin: We sold 24 million pounds, and we have acquired new butter this year. We hold only 8 million or 9 million pounds of the old butter, and the rest of the butter I mentioned is new.

Mr. Charlton: Since you sold the other?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: I was talking to the minister yesterday, and I did not understand him to say that.

Item agreed to.

644. To provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council, for assistance to farmers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan for crop losses that occurred between the 1st day of August, 1950, and the 14th day of May, 1953, in respect of which there is no authority under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to make awards, $17,000.

Mr. Charlton: At page 19 of the details I find an item of $17,000 for assistance to farmers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan for crop losses in respect of which there is no authority under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to make awards. These losses occurred, according to the estimate, between August 1, 1950 and May 14, 1953, and it is pointed out that there is no authority under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to make awards. No detail is given at page 19. Under what circumstances are those amounts paid out, when they do not come under the act?

Mr. McCubbin: These were some farmers lying outside the area that came under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The act was amended last year but it was not amended in time to cover them. These farmers are just on the outside area, and would not be covered by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Yet they were entitled to assistance.

Mr. Charlton: Has the act been changed to include single farms within townships? The sum of $17,000 will not go very far. It would not be just on the odd individual farm, would it?

Mr. McCubbin: It refers to a few farmers on crown land just outside the area. They have been brought under it now.

Mr. Coldwell: Were those farms contiguous to the area, or were they included in the enlarged area as an irregular group? There is no authority under the act, is there, for the department to enlarge the area, other than the one laid down in the act? This would include those who were outside what one might call the geometric area, is that what it is?

Mr. McCubbin: That is my understanding of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I happened to be on the legislation committee when this provision was proposed, and I remember the facts. Parliament on May 14, 1953 included this area within the act, and this is to pay for losses in the period of time before it was included. There were some hard cases.

Mr. Charlton: It includes both Manitoba and Saskatchewan. I am not suggesting there is anything wrong with this, but I think we should have more detail about this $17,000. It says quite plainly that there is no authority under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to make awards.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

Mr. Charlton: It cannot be as the Secretary of State says.

Mr. Pickersgill: Authority is being sought here because there is no authority under the act.

Mr. Charlton: You said the act was amended in 1952, did you not?

Mr. Pickersgill: On May 14, 1953, and this area was brought under the act. But this estimate is to seek authority to pay between August 1, 1950 and May 1953, when it was not under the act. This is asking parliament to give authority now.

Mr. Charlton: It says:

> To provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council, for assistance to farmers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan for crop losses that occurred between the 1st day of August, 1950, and the 14th day of May, 1953, in respect of which there is no authority under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to make awards.

It does not say anything about any act being changed there, at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am explaining that the act was not changed on that date.

Mr. McCubbin: Like the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand I found it difficult to understand this vote. I believe it would be well if I were to place the explanation on record that is given with respect to it.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act, paragraph (c), subsection 3 of section 3, was amended in 1950 to provide, inter alia, that crown and municipal lands not sold or granted prior to December 31, 1940, would not be eligible for award. An amendment in 1951 excluded from the provisions of the 1950 amendment all lands lying north of the south boundary of township sixty in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. A further amendment in 1953 excluded from the provisions of the 1950 amendment other lands in the northern parts of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

The amendment of 1951 with respect to the lands in Alberta and British Columbia came into force on August 1, 1950, while the 1953 amendment with respect to the Manitoba and Saskatchewan lands became effective on May 14, 1953.

The situation is the same in all four provinces with respect to the lands affected by these amendments, and the advisability of making the effective dates the same has been recommended because a number of farmers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan excluded from award by the 1950 amendment suffered crop losses prior to 1953 and it is felt that they are as entitled to awards as the farmers in Alberta. However, the number of such farmers and the amount involved is so small, being no more than $17,000, it is recommended instead that an ex gratia payment be made to such farmers.

According to a Department of Justice opinion, such ex gratia payments can be made to these farmers upon executive approval, but it would be necessary to have a special item in the supplementary estimates to which the payments would be charged.

Mr. Michener: The substance of the remarks of the parliamentary assistant, as I understand it, is that this was contrary to legislation passed by parliament, and this estimate is now brought forward to be approved by parliament in another form.

Mr. McCubbin: That is right.

Mr. Michener: And I suppose the minister justifies it on the basis of some equities that make it proper. But the fact remains that we are undoing what parliament has already done.

Mr. Coldwell: My understanding is that this is to bring it into line with farmers in other provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: It is to put the farmers of Saskatchewan on the same basis as farmers in British Columbia and Alberta, who were treated that way under the amendment. If that is what it is, then there is no objection to it. But I must say that it struck me in the same way as it did my hon. friend, that unless there is a question of equity involved and this removes the unfairness, there could be no excuse for it. Then, the amount is small, and that struck me rather forcibly, because I would have thought there would have been many more farmers entitled to this than apparently there are, according to this vote.

Mr. Macdonnell: However attractive it may be to have people altering the law in order to produce what they consider to be equity, it is rather a far-reaching conception, if they are prepared to accept it. We might have different ideas of what equities are. It often happens even among such reasonable men as ourselves. One really wonders how far it is going to go. The question of legislation by estimate has been up here before, and I think the Prime Minister went on record as frowning on it very severely.

This may be the one exception that should be tolerated. It seems to me a very questionable procedure.

Mr. Michener: It is obvious we cannot inquire into the equities of the cases here tonight. If the minister would table a list of cases and the payments made to these people, then any hon. member who is interested in inquiring could see it. That would probably meet the situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: The only reason I intervene in this is that I am a member of the government and I was present when the decision was made to ask the committee to pass this estimate. No payments have yet been made because the government had no authority to make any payment. We are now humbly asking this committee to allow us to make the payments. The argument that was put before us, and which convinced us that we should ask for this, was that in 1950 certain townships up to a certain distance north—I cannot remember the parallel of latitude—were included under the act in British Columbia and Alberta. Saskatchewan and Manitoba were not included because there were practically no farming areas that far north in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It was subsequently discovered that there were a few areas in the northern parts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba which should be included, and we in the government felt that what parliament thought was good for Alberta and British Columbia, parliament would think was good for Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It so happened that parliament had brought Manitoba and Saskatchewan under the act last year, but it was found there were a few cases of hardship in the intervening period between those two dates, and it was thought that to amend the whole act for this purpose would really not be warranted; that this was the kind of thing that could properly be provided for in the estimates. That is the explanation, and that is why we are asking authority to make these payments.

Mr. Charlton: By the same token, if an individual in Ontario, for instance, had a complete crop failure he would be as much entitled to this as anyone else. It is outside the area, and the government is starting a precedent, and you might have demands from many sections.

Mr. Pickersgill: As it was explained to us, these payments are governed by the same rules precisely as are applied under the act. They are not individual cases. They are governed by the same rules as are applied under the act generally. The rules of the act are applied, but the act was not amended for that area at that time.

Mr. Michener: Surely there is no mystery about it. If the minister would file the numbers of the payments that have been made—obviously these are ascertainable—running to $17,000 it would answer the question. The areas that are affected are very clear. I suggest that the information should be given to this committee, because the committee is being asked by vote to undo what parliament has already done by legislation. The information should be tabled before the estimate is passed.

Mr. Weaver: Perhaps I can give some information to the committee that would make this clear. As has already been said, the act was amended in 1951 to bring in certain parts of Alberta and British Columbia. The date in the amendment was such that payments were made on the 1950 crop, which hon. members will recall was frozen in northern Alberta. The same thing was done last year with regard to the area now under discussion, in northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan; but owing to an oversight the date of payment was made August, 1953, instead of August, 1951, taking in the crop that had been damaged similarly in northern Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Some of the inequity rose in this way. About three years ago certain crown lands in the provinces were excluded by this house because they had not been settled up to that time. These two amendments corrected that point, but while they did exist those who had settled on lands under the Veterans Land Act did get those payments. Therefore all through those years some farmers got the payments and their next-door neighbours who were not settled under the Veterans Land Act did not get them. That led to inequities, and that is the reason for the small number concerned.

For about five or six years after the war only veterans were allowed to settle on those lands. About two years ago, before this amendment was made, others besides veterans were allowed to settle there and they are the ones on whom the hardship was worked. They were the ones who were excluded. This corrects that condition. Some of these people lost their crops in the floods in the areas of The Pas, and in the Mackenzie constituency and in the area north of Swan River. Those who were not veterans did not get the payments.

Mr. Michener: Is the parliamentary assistant prepared to give the information I have asked for, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. McCubbin: I do not see any reason why it cannot be tabled but unfortunately we have not got it as yet.

Mr. Michener: I appreciate that, and that is why I suggest it be tabled.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Field services—
142. Fishermen's indemnity and loan plan—administrative expenses, $209,565.

Mr. Nowlan: This item provides for the administrative expenses of the fishermen's indemnity and loan plan. This is a new item. The total amount involved is $209,565, which is a fairly sizeable amount. Can the minister or the parliamentary assistant give us a breakdown of what is involved in this amount? How much has been lent? How many loans are outstanding? In other words, give us a background of this amount for head office expenses.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): This item is for the administration of the fishermen's indemnity and loan plan; it has nothing whatever to do with loans.

Mr. Nowlan: It says: "Administrative expenses".

Mr. MacNaught: No loans have been made.

Mr. Nowlan: I note the item says "administrative expenses—fishermen's indemnity and loan plan." If the item means anything it means administrative expenses and nothing else. Frankly it seems to me to be a very large amount for administrative expenses. I should like to know how much of it involves loans.

Mr. MacNaught: This item is provided for the administration of the indemnity fund; that is, lobster trap insurance and boat insurance. As will be obvious to hon. members, there is a tremendous amount of waterfront to be covered, and a number of officials are needed to administer all the details in connection with the appraisal of boats and lobster traps, and the inspection of loss and damage claims. For example, when an insurance application is made, the boats or traps have to be looked at, inspected, and appraised. Similarly when a loss occurs, an inspection has to be made to see if a loss has been made, whether that loss is actual, and the amount of the loss, or claim for damage.

There are 41 officials involved, five at headquarters, 14 in Newfoundland, 10 in the maritime area, six in the Gaspe area and six in the Pacific coast area. There are considerable travelling expenses involved because the officials have to travel to the different fishing communities to carry out these duties. There is also some chartering of boats necessary and all these items make up the amount in the estimate.

Mr. Nowlan: How many are on the board?

Mr. MacNaught: There is no board, Mr. Chairman, because this work is carried out departmentally.

Mr. Nowlan: How many insurance plans are there in effect?

Mr. MacNaught: I have the information here. When the estimates were last before the house the hon. member for, I believe, Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare asked for that information and the minister promised to place it on the record. I have it here and I will read it in part. The number of certificates of eligibility issued to May 31, 1954 under the "fishermen's indemnity fund—vessels" was 1,783, and the appraised value of these vessels was $2,660,496. The total premiums collected amounted to $26,000-odd, and the amount of disbursements on claims amounted to $17,543.82. In connection with lobster traps indemnity fund the number of certificates of eligibility were 771. The number of lobster traps involved was 125,243, and the total premiums collected amounted to $14,321.75.

Mr. Nowlan: What were the losses?

Mr. MacNaught: The losses amounted to $15,855.50, so in the case of lobster traps the losses were greater than the premiums. In the case of the vessels the premiums were some $8,000-odd greater than the losses. I have this table here which breaks down the figures into provinces and with the consent of the committee I will put this table on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to place this table on the record?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacNaught: The table is as follows:

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the parliamentary assistant for this information. Frankly it appears to be a somewhat large amount. Of course, this is the first year in which it has appeared, but apparently we have 1,700 certificates issued on fishing craft and 700 for lobster traps. That is roughly 2,500-plus and we have $17,000 of a loss in one case and a $15,000 loss in the other. The total administrative expenses amount to $209,000. I do not think any insurance company would feel that they could operate on that basis. I am not suggesting that this fund should not be operated in that way. I think it is a good fund and I think it does offer some benefits to fishermen which are badly needed. In a year's time, of course, when we have a basis of comparison we can then check the year's operation and see just how reasonable these expenditures are. But when one looks at the details, without discussing them at length, I must say that the expenditure appears to be rather high. I think a year from now, when these matters are under consideration by the committee, the minister should be able to give us a clearer breakdown of the work done in the administering of this relatively small sum of money. I notice there is a substantial amount for boats and I suppose this covers Newfoundland where it is likely to be more than it would be on the mainland because the mainland could be covered by automobiles. But I would point out again that the item seems to me to be altogether too high for what is involved in the work of this department and we will expect a clearer accounting when this item comes before the committee again.

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps I should say at the outset to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that we have points in British Columbia which are not easily accessible.

Mr. Nowlan: This is not for British Columbia.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, my reason for rising is to ask the minister whether it is anticipated that the staff listed here to service this plan will be the permanent staff and whether the number employed in connection with the organization of the scheme will be reduced as the scheme is streamlined.

Mr. MacNaught: We do not anticipate there will be any reduction in the number of personnel required to carry out the administration of the plan. It may well be that as it goes along and more fishermen and boat owners take advantage of it, more officials may be needed.

Mr. Macdonnell: I would like to ask about the item amounting to $30,000 covering travelling and removal expenses.

Mr. MacNaught: This item provides for travelling and living expenses of the officials at headquarters responsible for the administration of the plan while absent from headquarters on plan business, and this covers the expenses of four area administrators, senior members of their staff and appraisers in the field. At headquarters the amount involved is $2,500; in the Newfoundland area $9,000; in the maritime area $8,800; in the Gaspe area $5,500; and in the Pacific area $4,200.

Mr. Macdonnell: I still do not understand the use of the word "removal".

Mr. MacNaught: It is civil service terminology, Mr. Chairman, and this item applies when it is necessary to move a person who is domiciled in one area to another with his family and effects.

Mr. Macdonnell: I can understand it in that sense even if this were not the civil service, but the way in which the parliamentary assistant spoke before I understood this travelling expenses item was simply for people moving about. Do I understand there is included in that item the cost of actual removal expenses where a man stationed in one place is moved to another?

Mr. MacNaught: That is correct.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

143. To provide for the destruction of harbour and gray seals, $40,000.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I notice this item has increased from $30,000 to $40,000 and it provides for the destruction of harbour and gray seals. When the first item for this department was being discussed I ventured to suggest that this perhaps was not the simple solution to the question of the preservation of our fish supplies it would seem to be on the surface. It seems to me that perhaps the harbour seals are being painted as darker villains than they actually are and thereby a simple way is found to say that we are looking after the question of the conservation of our fish supply.

I suggested that it was perfectly logical that since there were far more harbour and gray seals in existence 200 or 300 years ago than there are now, at a time when North America was first discovered and at that time our waters were literally teeming with fish, therefore the harbour seals could not be the cause of depletion entirely. I went on to suggest that perhaps the depletion was due in part to some more obscure reason. I suggested that it might be due to the pollution of our shore waters by various chemicals that are let flow into our rivers.

In that connection, I may say it is a fact that some miscroscopic organisms are extremely vulnerable to poisoning in that regard. Every farmer knows that if he has a millpond a mile long and a quarter of a mile wide, if algae starts to grow on it all he has to do it to dump in a couple of pounds of copper sulphate and the algae is killed. These microscopic organisms are extremely sensitive to poisoning. I remember too that the whole life cycle of sea animals, fish and sea birds relies on plankton. They all, in the end, are dependent on this microscopic life that multiplies in the sea, under favourable conditions, at a rapid rate. It seems to me that perhaps the cause of the depletion of our fish supplies in the coastal waters may not be due so much to the seals but to the pollution of the coastal waters. It may be a very dilute pollution, but nevertheless that could be the reason. I would suggest that perhaps some research might be carried on in that regard if it has not already been done. It may have been done.

Naturally I have not the facilities at my hand which are available to the department, so I was not able to find out in the short space of time allotted to me whether research in this connection had been done or not. I therefore took a short cut, I must admit. I looked through some literature to see if I could find any comments that were recorded in the past to indicate that such a thing might be true. I found a letter which was written from St. John's, Newfoundland, in 1583 by an individual who happened to be visiting there. He was a Hungarian called Stephanus Parmenius. He was from Buda in Hungary. Of course Buda is now part of Budapest. It was written to Richard Hakluyt in London, and had to do with his impressions of Newfoundland. No doubt the Secretary of State would be interested to know what he had to say. In one connection he says this:

. . . we mooved the Admirall to set the woods a fire, that so wee might have space, and entrance to take view of the Countrey, which motion did nothing displease him, were it not for feare of great inconvenience that might thereof insue: for it was reported and confirmed by very credible persons, that when the like happened by chance in another Port, the fish never came to the place about it, for the space of 7. whole years after, by reason of the waters made bitter by the Turpentine, and Rosen of the trees, which ranne into the rivers upon the firing of them.

Then again, just to make sure that I was not quoting one crackpot's idea of why the fish went away, I looked about to see if I could find something that might further confirm this idea and I turned to Nicolas Denys' description of Acadia which was written about 1671. He has this to say:

From the end of the spring and during the summer and autumn, there often occur thunderstorms, but they do not last. Nevertheless the thunder falls sometimes in fire and strikes in the woods, where everything is so dry that it continues there some three weeks or a month. Unless rain falls sufficiently to extinguish it, the fire will burn sometimes ten, twelve, and fifteen leagues of country. At evening and at night, one sees the smoke ten and a dozen leagues away. On the side to which the wind is carrying it, it is seen very far off. In the places where that occurs all the animals flee from it fifteen and twenty leagues. If this happens upon the border of the sea, where the water from the rains can wash down into it, all the fish flee from it, and there will be no fishery the following year, nor water-fowl on the coast; hence the fishing vessels must seek other places, or else they will accomplish nothing. I have seen this happen not by the fire from the sky, but by the accident of a cannonier, who, drying his powder on Miscou—

That is Miscou island down in New Brunswick.

—set it afire in using tobacco, and the fire reduced to cinders a good part of the woods of the island. The result was that the following year there was no cod on the coast, so that the fishermen were obliged to so seek their fish elsewhere.

I just make those suggestions to point out to the parliamentary assistant and to the Secretary of State that perhaps this question of conservation of our fish is not quite so obvious a thing as just killing a few extra seals; because before the balance of nature was disturbed by the white man in North America there was an abundance of seals and also a superabundance of fish. I do not think we can bring that imbalance back into balance by just destroying a few seals. I would therefore suggest that a little bit of research work in connection with this matter might be justified.

While I am speaking on the subject of conservation very briefly, I should like to recommend to hon. members an excellent book that has just been published recently incidentally by a man who is an employee of the federal government. This book-writing is a hobby on the side. It is an excellent book which will bring home to young people the life cycles of the sea and, I think, make them understand the whole problem of conservation as it applies to the sea. It is called "Peter the Sea Trout" and is written by Mel Thistle.

Fisheries Research Board of Canada—
144. Headquarters administration, $131,090.

Mr. Hamilton: I have one or two comments which I rather hope will be helpful to the government. Before I make them, however, I should like to ask a simple question of the acting minister or the parliamentary assistant. How many members are there in the fisheries research board?

Mr. MacNaught: There are 18 members on the board.

Mr. Hamilton: They serve without pay. Is that correct?

Mr. MacNaught: They get per diem allowances when they meet.

Mr. Hamilton: Is that particular item included in your estimates at any point?

Mr. MacNaught: It is "honoraria to board members and others", $2,700.

Mr. Hamilton: I think you will find that was for last year, Mr. Chairman. There is a blank for this year. Of course, travelling expenses have gone up by $8,000. Perhaps they are going to pay them in that way.

Mr. MacNaught: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there is a change this year in the item. The honoraria are dropped and the per diem allowances are now included in the item "travel by board members, $20,000".

Mr. Hamilton: You know, Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to deal with this matter to any extent, but when you dig into something is it not amazing what you find? Here we have a case where in the past people willingly—and we can only presume and I want to think and do think it was willingly —were giving their services to the government of Canada and were being paid a straightforward amount as an honorarium on which you could put your finger. This year we have a switch. We are taking that amount and, in the very words of the parliamentary assistant, are now including it in travelling expenses. As I remember it, he used the words, "The honoraria are now included in travelling expenses". We are hiding it. We are taking away from this parliament the opportunity to examine exactly what we are doing. Not only are we hiding it but we are taking $2,700 last year under honoraria and turning it into an $8,000 increase in travelling expenses, and that is probably why they are hiding it.

As a comparative newcomer it is astonishing to me to find something like that being done and I think it is certainly something which is not to the credit either of the government or the person who drew up these estimates. It gives one cause to wonder, among other things, how many other similar items are hidden in these estimates which are called one thing and which are actually another. As a matter of fact, are there any other similar cases with respect to the fisheries research board about which the parliamentary assistant knows and can tell us?

Mr. MacNaught: The only thing I can point out to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace is that this item is handled in exactly the same manner as it is handled by other boards, for example, the national research council and other similar boards. It is approved by the treasury board and it is in exactly the same terms.

Mr. Hamilton: That is interesting information. Therefore we can assume that the other departments of the government which have similar boards are also hiding honoraria under the designation of travelling expenses. I think that would be a safe assumption and, of course, interestingly enough we must not lose sight of the fact—

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. member is under a misapprehension. Honoraria were paid last year. They are no longer being paid. A change has been made in policy. The people who used to be paid honoraria are now paid a per diem allowance which is part of the travelling expenses.

Mr. Hamilton: That is again an interesting statement. It is not quite the way I heard it before. Can the minister tell us whether this amount as honoraria was taxable?

[Mr. Hamilton.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid I am not an expert on the subject. I have never received an honorarium.

Mr. Hamilton: I think it is a safe assumption to say that such honoraria are taxable. I think it is also a very definite statement of fact that travelling expenses as such are not taxable. I think it is very interesting that the department, for reasons known to themselves, have chosen to follow this course of action. It almost sounds as if one department of the government is trying to do the other out of a certain amount of revenue, although at that it is a rather commendable feature.

In general for a few moments tonight I should like to deal with some of the publications issued by the fisheries research board which are included in these estimates. I asked a question about this matter on the orders of the day some time ago. The Minister of Fisheries apparently did not read the question. He read the newspaper reports thereon, and he replied at some length in the house a while ago. At that time the minister claimed that the purpose of these publications was to exchange information between scientists in Canada and elsewhere, and with that we can have very little quarrel. Referring to these publications, the minister said that it is really a measure of economy avoiding waste by duplication of effort just through the limited publication of current investigations.

The interesting thing about that is that according to the return tabled in the house by the Secretary of State in answer to my question none of these publications has ever been sold, not one copy, and not one copy has been distributed without charge. In other words, according to the parliamentary return tabled in the house, the printing of these publications has served absolutely no useful purpose. They have been printed and they have not been distributed. The parliamentary return is sessional paper No. 117-A, tabled on Wednesday, April 7, 1954.

The minister in the course of his remarks did make one rather interesting assertion. In order to demonstrate the small cost to the taxpayer, as the minister saw it, of these various publications he argued that the wastage which he admitted can be calculated by taking the remaining copies which are on hand and valuing them at their selling price. The resulting figure according to him represents the waste arising from the printing of the publications. I am going to explore this a litle bit because it smacks very much of the same kind of financial wizardry which we were discussing a few minutes ago in connection with travelling expenses. The minister said, as found at page 4506 of Hansard of May 7:

> The important point as far as waste is concerned is the amount which is surplus.

As an example of his mathematics, he referred to the publication covering the cruising speed of goldfish. You will remember that one. There was another one on "Abdominal Width and Sexual Maturity of Female Lobsters on the Canadian Atlantic Coast", commonly referred to by most of the newspapers as "The sex life of the lobster". With reference to the one on the cruising speed of goldfish the minister said:

> We have thirteen copies of this left at 20 cents each, which means a surplus cost of $2.60.

The argument that the selling price and not the cost of the publication determines the cost of the service to the taxpayer is completely misleading, unethical and fallacious. It is like saying that the fire department of a city does not cost the municipal taxpayer a cent because he does not have to foot the bill when he calls the fire department to put out a fire. If you used this argument in the way it is used by the minister you could print a million copies of a publication for free distribution, then decide not to distribute them, and there would be no wastage because even as thirteen times 20 cents is $2.60—and he says that is the surplus cost in that case—a million times zero is still zero.

Therefore according to his argument a million copies of a publication which he has printed and then decided to throw away have not cost the taxpayer a cent. Obviously too this sort of argument means that the more valuable a publication becomes in so far as its selling price is concerned, the more the taxpayer is saved by the government giving it away. This curious type of saving increases steadily as more and more copies are given away for nothing.

For example, if the government has on hand 1,000 copies of a $2 publication, the wastage according to the minister's reasoning is $2,000. If they give away 500 copies, the wastage drops to only $1,000. If they give them all away, then there is no wastage at all. I am using the minister's reasoning and everything except the minister's figures. Pursuing this argument to its logical conclusion, and using the minister's reasoning exactly as he used it—it must be good reasoning because he is a Rhodes scholar, Mr. Chairman; if this is the type of reasoning that comes from Rhodes scholars on the government side, I am glad we have a different type of Rhodes scholar on our side.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

An hon. Member: So are we.

Mr. Hamilton: In pursuing this Rhodes scholar type of reasoning, there would be absolutely no wastage at all if, as soon as these publications were received from the printer, they were all dumped into the Ottawa river. Perhaps that is what the minister had in mind when he developed his arguments. In any event, I shudder to think what might happen if some of the rumours we have heard recently become true and the Minister of Fisheries becomes the Minister of Finance, and retains his philosophy that the more you throw away the more you save. It practically qualifies him to lead the Social Credit party.

An hon. Member: Louder and funnier.

Mr. Hamilton: A few days ago the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings told a very interesting little story in the house. As I remember it was about a fish ladder built in his constituency, only when the ladder was built there was not any water so they had to go around and bail the fish out, then dump them above the ladder. This sounds amusing at first. It is hard to believe that any sensible, sane, sound group of men would do things like that.

But let us have another example, stating facts again, to see what these hon. gentlemen from the other side can do. In his attempt to defend some of these publications, you will remember the publications which the parliamentary return said had not been sold or given away, one of them concerned the cruising speed of goldfish. The minister said it resulted from research in connection with the Hell's Gate fishway in the Fraser river canyon. He said these were fish studies carried out in order to determine the range and cruising speed of fish. Then he went on to say how valuable that information was in connection with fisheries.

The truth of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that according to the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission, bulletin 3, page 10, the right bank of the fishway was completed in the spring of 1945. The left bank fishway was constructed in two sections; the lower end was completed in the spring of 1945 and the upper section was not finished until the spring of 1946. In other words, everything was done by the spring of 1946. The pamphlet referred to was received for publication in March, 1947, covering experiments carried out between October 25 and November 30, 1946. This is an interesting fact, because it shows just how the taxpayer's money can be spent, and the government attitude towards so many of these things. It is apparent that, having completed in the spring of 1946 the new fishways at an approximate cost of $2 million, about six months later in the fall of 1946 the government commenced an experiment with goldfish to see whether the fishways would work.

I think, Mr. Chairman, in all sincerity that we can stand here and be glad that despite such bungling the fishways do work and that they are doing a job for the fisheries on the Pacific coast. Certainly it is no thanks to the government who built them first, then tried to find out later whether or not they worked.

Undoubtedly we are going to hear from one or two hon. members before very long who will try to turn these words of mine, as the Minister of Fisheries did previously; try to turn them into some sort of indictment of fisheries research generally. They will try to infer from these words that I am opposed to constructive undertakings in this field. I suppose that is part of debate, taking sincere words of a member on this side of the house and trying to controvert them or twist them and make them mean something else. I want to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, to all those who may read or hear these remarks, that honest publication of worth-while things which are needed and used by people or by scientists is a good thing. I want to make it quite plain that, in my estimation at least, and I think that of my colleagues, good research, purposeful research, sincere and intelligent research is something that has the wholehearted approbation of myself and my colleagues.

But, Mr. Chairman, that does not necessarily condone, and I do not condone, such things as research which is carried on after a project is completed in order to see whether it is going to work. It does not condone publication of research which nobody wants to read. It does not condone, in another field, the transfer of remuneration to people who may be doing this research from a branch in which it is taxable into a field in which it is not taxable. It does not condone the hiding of honoraria and other things like that, and including them in another category. It does not condone, Mr. Chairman—the government will be glad to hear this because we are coming to the end of the session and it is probably the last thing I will have to say this session; I am glad I can make this my closing remarks—for one moment the continuous wastage of public funds which could be more effectively spent in other ways, and the almost misrepresentation of this wastage and the attempt to make it sound as if it was doing a useful purpose.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not intend to allow what the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace has said to go without the feeble attempt of someone who was not good enough to get a Rhodes scholarship to reply to it.

Mr. Hamilton: I have not got one either.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman said his observations were sincere. I am not going to question his sincerity, but one is forced to question either his sincerity or his intelligence. I have in my hand the sessional paper from which the hon. member quoted, and of course when it is read it does not give the impression that he has sought to give to it. The answer came only from the department for which I have the constitutional responsibility, the department of public printing and stationery—it did not come from the Department of Fisheries at all—and it begins with this note:

> The above are excerpts from government publications which are not available for free distribution—

That means free distribution by the printing bureau. In other words they are for sale, and they are in the catalogue if anybody wants to buy them. It appeared that nobody did want to buy them from the queen's printer; and I think it is perfectly obvious why nobody wanted to buy them from the queen's printer because, in spite of their titillating titles, I do not think they are very popular reading, and I doubt if even my hon. friend from Kamloops would be very worried about having them in the hands of children. They are provided by the department concerned—in this case the Department of Fisheries—for the use of technical staffs and for exchange purposes between scientists.

I said a little while ago that I did not know whether honoraria were taxable, because I never had received an honorarium. But, as hon. members know, I used to be an academic—while I was still respectable—and in that capacity I occasionally published articles in magazines. One could always get a number of extra copies of them for practically nothing, for about the cost of the paper. Putting the impression on a few extra copies, even by the Queen's Quarterly, which I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood would agree is not run extravagantly or wastefully, could be done at almost no extra cost.

That is why these extra prints are produced. And they are stuck in the catalogue—that is in the queen's printer's catalogue—just in case somebody somewhere might see them and want to buy one of them. And it is done in order to make this a complete catalogue of all government publications.

I have made it my business to know a little about what the fisheries research board is doing, because it concerns the livelihood of most of the people who voted for me, and most of the people who voted against me in the last election. And I doubt if there is any organization in the whole of the government service that is doing better work. I do not say there are not many others that are doing just as good work, but I do not think they are doing better work than is being done by this board. And I am sure the papers they publish are things that are worth having some permanent record of. I do not pretend to be a scientist and I am not going to pretend that I can say precisely what they are worth.

Then, on the other point raised by the hon. member, while I am no expert on the income tax, I am told that whether an allowance is called an honorarium or a per diem allowance, the income tax branch takes exactly the same view of it.

Mr. Green: On May 7 I asked the minister about the situation in Hecate strait so far as the crab fisheries are concerned. At that time he promised to bring in some figures. I should like to point out to the parliamentary assistant that this situation appears to be very serious, namely, that American fishing vessels are getting the great bulk of the crabs being caught in Hecate strait. They are taking them up to an American fishing port in Alaska, and apparently are doing a big business. Canadians are worried for fear the whole fisheries will be ruined before something is done by the government.

I have here a copy of a publication known as the Pacific Fisherman. This is the issue of August, 1953. In it I find an interesting article with the heading "Pacific Pearl of Alaska". Pacific Pearl is the name of an American company. Then there is a subheading which states "New Industry is built upon Hecate Strait Crab Resource". Reading the first paragraph, I find this:

> Four years have made Ketchikan, Alaska, the principal center of Pacific crab canning—four years and one company—Pacific Pearl of Alaska, Inc., which initiated the operation there in 1950.

Then the article goes on to say:

> Two developments took Pacific Pearl to Alaska: First, the cyclic shortage of crabs on the Washington coast, where the organization previously had centered its activities.
> Second, the proving of a substantial population of Pacific crabs in the international waters of Dixon entrance and Hecate strait.

Dixon entrance is between the northern shore of the Queen Charlotte islands and Alaska; but Hecate strait lies between Queen Charlotte islands and the mainland of British Columbia. The article explains that there are eight of these boats carrying on the crab fisheries. It goes on to say:

> These boats are able to carry around 1,200 dozen crabs each in a full load. All are equipped to use their holds as live tanks, supplied by pumps with a constant supply of fresh sea-water . . . Each boat fishes from 400 to 500 crab pots—drum-shaped iron frames, protected from electrolysis by rubber coverings, and with the netting made of stainless steel wire.

Then we find the subheading "International Ocean Waters yield Prime Crab Catch". It shows clearly that the Americans regard Hecate strait as international waters in which they have as much right as Canadians. It says:

> Fishing is done in international waters in Dixon entrance, through which passes the boundary line between Alaska and British Columbia; and in Hecate strait, separating the Queen Charlotte islands from the Canadian mainland . . . In mid-summer at the latitude of Dixon entrance and Hecate strait the long hours of daylight permit the crab boats to find and haul their pots 21 hours out of the 24. Operations usually are suspended at midnight, to be resumed at 3 in the morning. Such hours mean hard work for the crew, and the job is anything but a rest. Once a boat has run her string, she heads for home—

That is, for Alaska.

> —without a moment's waiting. Her hold is full of thousands of scuttling, clawing crabs, as lively and pugnacious as when they crawled and clashed on the sandy sea bed.

These crabs, which I claim are Canadian crabs, are taken to an Alaskan port and are shipped into the mainland of the United States as American crabs. They do not have to pay any duty. A Canadian fisherman who catches some of the crabs in the strait has to pay duty in order to sell those same crabs to the United States. The only place he has any protection at all is within three miles of the shore, and I believe that practically all the crab fishing is done beyond the three-mile limit.

I believe the crab fisheries off the Washington coast have been pretty well cleaned out, and I am afraid the same will happen in Hecate strait. We will wake up one of these days to find that while we have been trying to get up enough courage to tell the Americans that Hecate strait is Canadian territorial water, their fishermen will have cleaned out all the Canadian crabs. The parliamentary assistant must realize that that situation is intolerable. I hope he can give some reassurance tonight that the government is moving to put a stop to this procedure.

Mr. MacNaught: When the estimates were before the committee on May 7 the minister did promise to bring in certain information for the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra relative to crab fishing catches in Hecate strait.

Data concerning the catch of crabs by Americans in the year 1953 are not yet available. The only source from which we can get this information is Seattle, and it is not yet available to us for 1953. However we do know that there were 19 crab fishing vessels all well equipped with the latest offshore pots and operating at that time in Hecate strait.

Mr. Green: Is that 1953 or 1954?

Mr. MacNaught: As of June 20, 1953 there were 19 crab fishing vessels all equipped with live wells and the latest offshore pots. Of this number 10 were American, 8 from Washington state and two from California. These were using 5,100 crab pots. The remaining eight were Canadian vessels fishing 2,990 pots. The American fishery, however, in 1953 represented an increase of 2,500 traps over 1952. Then I can give the hon. member the statistics for the last three years. The American catch of crabs in Hecate strait: in 1950 they had six operating vessels and the catch was 880,292 pounds; in 1951 they had seven vessels operating and the catch was 960,749 pounds; in 1952 they had five vessels operating there and the catch was 1,169,062 pounds.

During the same period the landings of crabs taken by Canadian fishermen in the area of Hecate strait and Dixon entrance were for the year 1950, 722,000 pounds; in 1951, 808,303 pounds; in 1952, 1,105,100 pounds, and for 1953, 1,703,500 pounds.

Mr. Green: Has the parliamentary assistant the figures for Hecate strait as distinguished from the other?

Mr. MacNaught: No.

Mr. Green: These are not the figures I asked for. I asked for the figures for Hecate strait. The parliamentary assistant has included the figures from Dixon entrance, which I was not questioning.

Mr. MacNaught: The American figures I gave are for Hecate strait, purely for Hecate strait.

Mr. Green: The figures for the Americans were only Hecate strait?

Mr. MacNaught: Hecate strait.

Mr. Green: What are the Canadian figures?

Mr. MacNaught: I have not them broken down in that way. I am told that the statistical department has not broken them down in that way.

Mr. Green: The Canadian figures are valueless if they include Hecate strait and Dixon entrance. Incidentally, the American figures are higher than the Canadian figures as it is except 1950, and the latter include both Hecate strait and Dixon entrance.

Mr. MacNaught: That is the way the figures are kept in our breakdown. I regret I cannot give any other figures at this time.

[Mr. MacNaught.]

Mr. Green: I am told that as much as 80 per cent of the crabs taken from the three-mile limit in Hecate strait are taken by the Americans. Do the parliamentary assistant's officials quarrel with that estimate?

Mr. MacNaught: The officials tell me they can neither confirm nor deny that statement. They have no means of knowing whether it is correct or not.

Mr. Green: This fisheries research board has scientists on Queen Charlotte islands every summer. Is it not possible for them to find out what is happening there?

Mr. MacNaught: It would be possible for our officials to break these statistics down as far as Canadian catches are concerned, but as far as American catches are concerned, we have to rely on figures furnished by the American officials.

Mr. Green: Will the parliamentary assistant get those figures? He has given me the Canadian crab figures for the Dixon entrance and Hecate strait combined. He can have the Hecate strait figures sent to me during the recess.

Mr. MacNaught: I will endeavour to do that, Mr. Chairman. Whenever the figures are provided to me, I will see that they are forwarded to the hon. member.

In connection with the other matter he brought up, namely, the international aspect of the Hecate strait, this is a matter that has caused concern to the department for many years. At the present time, as the hon. gentleman knows, it is receiving the consideration of an interdepartmental committee. I do not know when a report will be available, but I know the matter is receiving active consideration.

Mr. Green: No actual step has been taken since we discussed this matter in the house earlier in the session?

Mr. MacNaught: No.

Mr. Green: Has the Canadian government taken the stand that Hecate strait is Canadian territorial water?

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that our view has always been that it is territorial water, and the American view is that it is the open sea. The same thing applies of course on the east coast in a good many places. We have never been able to reconcile a good many of these differences. As the hon. member knows, there is a case before the international court at the present time which may codify the international law in this respect. But there is no very effective way in which we can force the Americans to accept our view.

Mr. Green: In other words, there is no way in which we can stop the Americans from taking our crabs?

Mr. Pickersgill: We say they are ours; they say they are in the open sea.

Mr. Green: You are not going to stop at that. Does the minister say that Canada is going to sit back because the Americans say this water is international water and there is nothing we can do about it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the government would be delighted to have any practical suggestion that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, or any other hon. member, could make as to how we can get the Americans to accept our view, as we certainly would like to have them accept our view.

Mr. Green: Why not have the matter taken to the international court? Is there any objection to that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I could not say, but I shall be glad to bring the suggestion to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. MacNaught: Before the item passes, may I say that before he was called home this morning owing to some illness in his family, the hon. member for Charlotte asked me if I would make one comment when this item was before the committee. He wanted to know whether any additions would be made to the St. Andrews biological station this year. I want to put on record the fact that the department is aware that the space available there for scientists is rather inadequate, and that every consideration is being given to the advisability of enlarging it.

Item agreed to.

145. Operation and maintenance, $1,995,939.

Mr. Michener: The item which has just been passed, this item and the next two items cover substantially all of the research work of the Department of Fisheries, and includes the substantial amount of $2,500,000. The research which relates to great lakes fisheries, I take it, is carried on in conjunction with the research board with which I had some association in Ontario. I am interested to know the relationship between the federal fisheries research board and the inland fisheries research and whether its jurisdiction is nation-wide. If the parliamentary assistant can tell me that I should like to make one or two further comments.

Mr. MacNaught: The scope of the board is nation-wide; it covers all of Canada, since it is carrying on investigations in the inland waters as well as on the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts.

Mr. Michener: I take it the investigation in the great lakes is carried on in conjunction with provincial agencies, and that the whole thing is co-ordinated, as it ought to be. It is a very important and difficult kind of research, as I know. As every fisherman knows, the habits, the presence and the absence of fish, what makes them come and go, and where they are, is one of the most difficult things to deal with scientifically. The experiments on the great lakes that are helping to maintain these inland fisheries are of great importance, I assume, to people on both coasts and in all sections who make their livelihood from fishing.

The board with which I was concerned was the Ontario research board. It was made up of knowledgeable and reputable people who were good enough to lend their time and effort to direction of very substantial research expenditures. It is gratifying to know that there are people who will come forward for this kind of activity. I was interested to know the size of this board. I take it, it is distributed geographically, which is only fair. If the parliamentary assistant has no objection I am sure parliament would be glad to have the names of these people who are offering themselves voluntarily in this way to the furtherance of scientific research. If the names could be given to the committee so that we could recognize them for the work they are doing I would appreciate it.

Mr. MacNaught: I have not the names in front of me at the moment, but if this item could pass, one of the officials will write them up and then I can put them on the record in a few moments.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I cannot help but be interested in an item amounting to more than $107,000 for travelling expenses. I am just wondering whether the parliamentary assistant or the minister, who gave us such a delightful exposition in Twillingate in answer to my last question, would care to give us a breakdown.

Mr. MacNaught: This item of $107,000 is made up as follows: directors and senior staff, $34,000; investigators in the field, $41,000; transportation of student assistants, $7,000; transportation of employees, $2,000; and removal expenses, $350.

It covers the travelling expenses of the directors of the stations on visits to the headquarters of the board, and attending meetings, and the expenses of directors and senior staff in following up the work in the field, as well as attending conferences and scientific meetings. The work of the biological stations, particularly, is spread over large areas and the workers must cover those areas at intervals and for varying periods of time. This item makes provision for this necessary cost of the investigations. The terms approved for the employment of student assistants provide for the payment of transportation expenses, less $30, in reporting for duty and returning to home or university and this item provides for those costs. The provision of transportation to work of employees at the Atlantic biological station and the Pacific biological station is also included. Included also is provision for changing the headquarters of an employee of the Pacific biological station and paying his removal expenses.

Mr. Hamilton: The first item in the breakdown was $34,000?

Mr. MacNaught: That is correct.

Mr. Hamilton: Exactly on whom was that spent?

Mr. MacNaught: The directors and the senior staff.

Mr. Hamilton: How many people?

Mr. MacNaught: It seems from the check of the statistics in front of me that about 125 persons are covered.

Mr. Hamilton: The fisheries research department then has 125 directors and senior staff. Is that a correct assumption from the parliamentary assistant's answer?

Mr. MacNaught: That is approximately correct.

Mr. Hamilton: In other words we have here, Mr. Chairman, an organization whose staff appears to be composed entirely of generals with very few privates. That would seem to be the case for we have in the headquarters administration about 14 people—

Mr. Dickey: We have 450 people there.

Mr. Hamilton: —and in the operation and maintenance staff we have some 442 including such persons as 73 seasonal assistants. I am sure they are not included in the group, and I am quite sure assistant scientists would not be included.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely assistant scientists must be regarded as senior personnel. Look at the salaries.

Mr. Hamilton: I do not think we said "personnel". We said directors and senior staff. In other words, senior officials. I know it is a little bit annoying to the parliamentary assistant but we have seen cases in which we have had to watch the terminology being used in this house very carefully—

[Mr. MacNaught.]

Mr. Harris: We certainly have.

Mr. Hamilton: In other words, one out of every three of the people involved in this scientific organization would appear to be senior members of the senior staff. Is that correct?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder what else the hon. member would expect in a scientific organization which is engaged primarily in research. Would he expect a major number of the employees to be common labourers or office boys or would he expect them to be scientists?

Item agreed to.

147. To provide for federal share of administrative expenses of great lakes fisheries research committee established jointly with the province of Ontario; and to provide for a program designed to eliminate lampreys in the great lakes, $165,000.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how the department is getting along with the elimination of the lampreys in the great lakes which play such havoc with whitefish and other fish. I am just asking that out of curiosity because I think we have heard about this every year and I would like to hear about it once more.

Mr. MacNaught: Perhaps I could refer the hon. gentleman to an article which was published in the Trade News of May 1954 and if the hon. gentleman has not got a copy I will see that he gets one.

Mr. Coldwell: Thank you very much.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I notice there has been a substantial increase in this item and I wonder if the parliamentary assistant could explain in what way the activities of this particular enterprise are going to be augmented.

Mr. MacNaught: The federal government and the Ontario provincial government last year established a great lakes fisheries research committee to carry on and expand fisheries research in the Canadian waters of the great lakes, and various experiments are being carried out there, especially on lake Superior. The lampreys have now penetrated as far as lake Superior and experiments will be carried out in the rivers leading in from the Canadian side of lake Superior.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the parliamentary assistant mean that because of the entry of the lampreys into lake Superior that the amount for the investigation has been trebled for this year?

Mr. MacNaught: Well, it is more than an investigation. Electrical devices are to be used to see if they will be effective in killing the lampreys and they are also experimenting with certain types of poison. It has really got beyond the experimental stage now.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure the parliamentary assistant will agree with me that it would arouse anyone's curiosity when the amount is trebled even if we were to admit that this money was being spent for a good purpose. But we would still like to have an explanation of the increase from $50,000 to $150,000 and we would like to know just what the department proposes to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose the fact that the Ontario government is also willing to spend more on this project will reassure the hon. lady.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is this a case of matching expenditure?

Mr. MacNaught: Yes, the Ontario government pays an amount equal to that paid by the federal government.

Mr. Macdonnell: That seems to me to be an extraordinary argument. For all we know the Ontario government may be using exactly the same argument to justify their item.

Mr. Pickersgill: They probably are.

Mr. Macdonnell: Surely the minister can think of a better answer than that.

Mr. Nesbitt: Could the parliamentary assistant give us an idea of how many personnel are involved in these experiments?

Mr. MacNaught: I am afraid I cannot give that information to the hon. gentleman. Day labourers are used in these electrical and other installations and we have no record here of how many day labourers will be involved in the carrying out of these installations.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant could tell us how many personnel there were supervising these installations or whatever they were.

Mr. MacNaught: I am told that the main part of the supervision is being done by officials of the government of Ontario, and that one official from our department is acting as liaison between the federal Department of Fisheries and the Ontario government.

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, Mr. Chairman; but how many officials are there involved altogether? What I mean is this: If the federal government is putting up all this money, albeit that it is the Ontario government that is being assisted in the matter, surely we should have some idea as to how many persons are involved, what they are doing or how many lampreys are being killed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should be glad to have the Ontario government asked to give us that information. I agree with the hon. member for Greenwood that my rather flippant answer was not meant to be taken seriously.

Mrs. Fairclough: We do not take it seriously.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be glad to see that inquiries are made. The officials have not that information here now. I shall be glad to see that inquiries are made of the Ontario government, if the officials have not the information in their possession, and to make it available to my hon. friend.

Mr. Nesbitt: From that answer I take it that while this rather substantial amount of money is to be paid out, no one seems to know exactly what it is for.

An hon. Member: Are you against it?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MacNaught: Before the item carries I should like to deal with one matter that has been raised. The hon. member for St. Paul's asked me if I would be kind enough to get him a list of the members of the board. The list has now come into my hands and I shall read it or put it on the record.

An hon. Member: Put it on the record.

Mr. MacNaught: The chairman is Dr. J. L. Kask, who is full-time chairman; Dr. J. H. L. Johnstone, Dalhousie University, Halifax; Dr. Raymond Gushue, St. John's, Newfoundland; Mr. O. F. Mackenzie, Halifax; Mr. J. H. MacKichan, Halifax; Dr. C. W. Argue, University of New Brunswick, Fredericton; Dr. Lucien Piche, University of Montreal; Dr. P. E. Gagnon, Laval University; Dr. A. T. M. Cameron, McGill University; Dr. G. B. Reed, Queen's University; Dr. J. R. Dymond, University of Toronto; Dean I. M. Fraser, University of Saskatchewan; Dr. W. A. Clemens, University of British Columbia; Mr. R. E. Walker, Vancouver, B.C.; Mr. K. F. Harding, Prince Rupert, B.C., and Dr. A. L. Pritchard of the Department of Fisheries.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, Mr. Chairman; I do not think we should leave the matter as it is. I do not think it is fair to the minister that his flippant answer should be left as it is. I think that either this $165,000 item should be explained or that it should stand until it can be explained.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall endeavour to give as serious an explanation as can possibly be given of this item. I have never seen a lamprey. I am reminded by a very distinguished member of this committee that King John died of a surfeit of these animals. I hope the committee this evening is not going to suffer the same fate. As I understand it, the lamprey is an extremely serious pest in the great lakes where a large number of very worthy citizens of this province—and many of them in the county in which I happened to be born, Norfolk county—make their living. I understand that the Ontario government and the federal government became seriously concerned about this matter and that we were able to arrange some kind of co-operation with the Americans. I am not sure of what the details of this arrangement were; after all, this is not my department. I understand that we did reach an arrangement in co-operation with the Ontario government which, as hon. members know, administers the fisheries in that province, whereby we were to contribute 50 per cent of the cost of this scheme.

Perhaps this is not the right kind of political statement to make, but our experience in most of our dealings with the Ontario government has been that when they go into a project of this sort with us, they do so seriously and co-operate well. I am quite convinced that this is being done well. If there are any specific details that I cannot give or that the hon. member for St. Paul's cannot give—after all, he has had perhaps more to do with starting this project than anyone else in the committee—I shall be glad to make an effort to get them.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to make one thing quite clear. I have in the past spent some time on commercial fishing boats on the great lakes; that is, on boats out of Port Dover in the riding from which the Secretary of State comes, his birthplace. I realize that this is a great problem and an important one. I have some firsthand personal knowledge of it. But despite the fact that I have no doubt or that, in fact, I have every confidence that everything the Ontario government does in this regard is excellent, nevertheless as a matter of principle I do not think it is exactly wise that the federal government—although with the best of intentions—should vote large sums of money like this without knowing exactly what they are for.

Item agreed to.

Special—

155. To provide for administration expenses of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944, $85,875.

Mr. Hamilton: Can we get, for the year ended March 31, 1954, information as to how much was spent actually in support of fisheries prices under this act and perhaps even a forecast of the amount it might be in the coming year?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry, it will take a second to find the figures.

Mr. MacNaught: That information was given in a reply to a question asked by the junior member for Halifax and put on Hansard last week. I have a copy of it here. The answer to the question asked by the hon. member was: purchase 1949 production, $82,000; deficiency payments on Labrador, 1950 production, $446,000. In 1953 the government purchased approximately $950,000 worth of salted codfish for relief purposes in Greece and Korea. Purchases from Newfoundland amounted to $500,000, from Nova Scotia, $190,000, New Brunswick, $10,000, and Quebec, $250,000. The amounts were based on the carry-over of the 1952 fish in each province. Deficiency payments were also authorized in Quebec and Newfoundland; the Quebec payments amounting to $37,000, and the Newfoundland payments, which have not yet been made up, will approximate $600,000.

Mr. Hamilton: That is for the period ending when?

Mr. MacNaught: March 31, 1954.

Mr. Hamilton: Have you comparative figures for the period ending March 31, 1953? In other words, if we add the two figures for deficiency payments together we get approximately $637,000, $600,000 in Newfoundland and some $37,000 in Quebec. Could we have the comparative figures for the preceding year?

Mr. MacNaught: On page 10 of the sixth annual report I find that the payment for the Newfoundland shore caught salted codfish support program amounted to $37,000.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the parliamentary assistant quite sure that the two figures he has given us are strictly comparable? He says that in the year ended March 31, 1953 the support program entailed an expenditure of approximately $38,000. I do not think it was quite that much. I think it was about $36,500 and they issued 1,307 cheques. Can he tell us whether the figures he has given are strictly comparable with the figures for the year ended March 31, 1954 totalling over $600,000?

Mr. MacNaught: I am informed by my officials it is not now possible because there was considerable overlapping between the two periods. The accounts for the 1953-1954 period moreover are not completely closed yet. There are still some outstanding.

Mr. Hamilton: The point I am concerned about is whether these payments are being made on the same basis. Are these estimates, when they are finally resolved, going to show that they were made for exactly the same reason? Has there been any change in the reason? The parliamentary assistant will notice that he has told us that payments in the year ended March 31, 1954 are almost twenty times as great as they were in the year ended March 31, 1953.

Mr. MacNaught: The very obvious answer to that is that the need for deficiency payments last year was much greater than it was in the preceding year.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

761. To provide for the restoration of the special account in the consolidated revenue fund established by section 36 of the National Housing Act, 1954, by the amount paid out of the special account in respect of housing and land development projects undertaken jointly with the governments of the provinces during the fiscal year 1953-54, $9,000,000.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. Bourget: This item is an amount of $9 million. Hon. members will recall that the National Housing Act, 1954, by section 36, subsection 5, established a special account in the consolidated revenue fund to which shall be credited out of the consolidated revenue fund the sum of $50 million. From this fund the corporation borrows the money required to finance federal-provincial projects during the current year. This item is to re-establish the amount of $50 million that appeared at the beginning of the year.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does that mean that expenditures out of this fund are being reimbursed from the consolidated revenue fund? In other words, you have a reserve there of $50 million. Is that correct?

Mr. Bourget: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: And the yearly expenditures are to be reimbursed by this vote out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Bourget: This is a special account that has been established in the amount of $50 million. Suppose in a year we spend $8 million, $9 million or $10 million. Next year we have to reimburse that special account up to the amount of $50 million at which it was originally established.

Mrs. Fairclough: In other words, it is a type of revolving fund in reverse.

Mr. Bourget: Of this kind, yes.

Item agreed to.

762. To provide for advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purposes of subsection one of section 37 of the National Housing Act, 1954, in respect of housing projects for veterans, for the acquisition of land for housing projects, and for housing projects at Gander, Newfoundland, for sale or rental—further amount required, including authority for housing at Pembroke, Ontario, for the rental or sale to employees of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, $1,110,000.

Mr. Green: Would the parliamentary assistant explain this item?

Mr. Bourget: This item is to provide for advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 37 of the National Housing Act, 1954, in respect of housing projects for veterans, for the acquisition of land for housing projects, and for housing projects at Gander, Newfoundland, for sale or rental. This further amount is required, including authority for housing at Pembroke, Ontario, for the rental or sale to employees of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. That is the reason why this further amount of $1,110,000 is required.

Mr. Green: Is this development at Pembroke something new? Does it mean that no more people can be accommodated at Deep River?

Mr. Bourget: I am told that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited feels that they have to stop further housing expenditure at Deep River, and they think it would be better to construct new housing at Pembroke. That is the reason why this item is for housing at Pembroke.

Mr. Green: Is this a new development? Apparently they are now going to start a second Deep River settlement at Pembroke in effect. Is that the idea?

Mr. Bourget: No, it is just to erect fifty new houses at Pembroke so there will not be further housing at Deep River.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we turn to the Department of Public Works supplementary item 407?

Mr. Bourget: Before we leave Central Mortgage, could we pass items 721 and 722?

721. To provide for the expenses incurred by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in constructing and supervising construction of married quarters, schools and related services on behalf of the Department of National Defence—further amount required, including authority for such expenses incurred in connection with rental housing for the Department of National Defence, $750,000.

Mr. Green: This appears to be in connection with the construction of married quarters, schools and so on for the Department of National Defence. Why is that amount not charged to the vote of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Bourget: Because it is an amount, Mr. Chairman, to be voted to the organization that is spending the money.

Mr. Green: This only covers expenses of Central Mortgage as distinguished from the cost of construction, is that right?

Mr. Bourget: It is administrative expenses to carry out the work.

Mr. Green: Is there any system of charging such expenses to the Department of National Defence? I do not see why Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should be charged with that figure?

Mr. Bourget: It is because the Auditor General believes it is proper to vote the money to the organization that is spending it.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact, then, that the Department of National Defence, when it shows a figure of so many dollars as the cost of putting up these works, is not showing a full cost because these administrative charges are charged against Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Bourget: What my hon. friend has just said is correct. It is because the Auditor General asked that these expenditures be voted to Central Mortgage and not be capitalized.

Mr. Michener: The amount is quite substantial as a fee for supervision of construction of housing for the Department of National Defence. I wonder if we could have the total cost of construction which was accomplished by this amount of supervision, so we could relate the two together. What is the amount that has already been charged to the Department of National Defence for actual construction, and where are the projects?

Mr. Bourget: I am told that it will be about $37 million.

Mr. Michener: Where were those houses built?

Mr. Bourget: I have here a breakdown of that item. We have 1,327 units for the army at a cost of $17,162,000. We also have 7 schools at a cost of $1,982,000. Then, for the navy, we have married quarters, 131 units at a cost of $1,458,000 and 3 schools at a cost of $740,000. For the air force we have married quarters, 456 units at a total cost of $6,596,000, and 3 schools at a cost of $380,000.

Mr. Michener: That is all in Canada?

Mr. Bourget: Yes, Mr. Chairman, all in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: We have got now a large figure for the amount spent on the construction of these works. But this item of $750,000 is to be for expenditures incurred by Central Mortgage and Housing in supervising construction. Now, that has got nothing to do, I take it, with bricks, mortar or anything that goes into a building. What are the expenses incurred by Central Mortgage? Are those personal services, such as an architect rendered, or what? I think we should know more as to how this amount is arrived at.

Mr. Bourget: This amount is to pay the corporation for the amount of salaries of persons engaged in the work of supervision, plus 50 per cent of such salaries to cover overhead, travelling expenses, telephone, group insurance and so forth.

Mr. Green: There was a vote in the ordinary estimates under item 406 of $700,000 for this purpose. Does that mean there is a total of $1,450,000 for this purpose?

Mr. Bourget: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is right, because since the main estimates were presented additional projects have been given to Central Mortgage. Those are projects additional to the ones covered in vote 406.

Mr. Michener: That is roughly a 5 per cent charge. I am interested in knowing how Central Mortgage financed this item in advance of the voting of the funds by parliament. We are asked here to repay a cost that has already been paid or incurred, and I would be interested in the mechanics of it, so as to explain the Auditor General's viewpoint.

Mr. Bourget: This money has not been spent yet. It will be spent.

Mr. Michener: The houses have been built, I understand, and the work done.

Mr. Bourget: The work is not done.

Mr. Michener: It is for construction to be done in the future?

Mr. Bourget: In the future.

Mr. Pallett: Does the amount include architectural work for these buildings?

Mr. Bourget: No, Mr. Chairman, only to the extent that Central Mortgage would provide the house plans.

Mr. Pallett: Central Mortgage provides the plans for these schools, and you have authorized the construction of so many schools. Does the parliamentary assistant know how many rooms there are in each school? There are seven schools in one item at a cost of $1,982,000, and that breaks down to about $280,000 per school; there are three schools at $740,000, which breaks down to about $250,000 per school; and three at $380,000 which breaks down to about $126,000 per school.

Mr. Bourget: The number of rooms per school range from six, 8, 10, 12 to 14. So far as the price per room is concerned, it is about $22,000.

Mr. Pallett: Does the parliamentary assistant know that the cost per schoolroom in Ontario is approximately $12,000 or $13,000?

Mr. McIlraith: No, it is not, and has not been for years.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to be clear on this. I refer to item 406 in the estimates covering an amount of $700,000 to provide for expenditures incurred by Central Mortgage in connection with the supervision of the construction of married quarters. Now, then, item 721 is apparently for exactly the same purpose. It seems odd that an entirely duplicate set of buildings is covered by item 721. What is this new project? May we have some details; I am not clear about it at the moment.

Mr. Bourget: I have a list here of the additions made since the main estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is this in addition to the project which was in hand at the time of the main estimates?

Mr. Bourget: Yes, this is in addition. Those projects were presented to Central Mortgage after the main estimates were tabled.

Mr. Michener: Is the total of the two $37 million? What is the additional amount.

Mr. Bourget: I am told the total of the two will be around $60 million.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—further amount required—
707. Ottawa, $2,050,000.

Mr. Green: Why was it necessary to have this amount in the supplementary estimates? It is two-thirds of the total vote. The Department of Public Works is supposed to have the new look, and we understood that they had everything up to date.

Mr. McIlraith: They have.

Mr. Macdonnell: We want evidence of it.

Mr. Green: They are asking for an additional $2 million for public buildings in Ottawa, in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Bourget: I am told $1 million is for the seminary and $1 million for property on Wellington street which was expropriated last year.

Mr. Green: Why was not at least some of this amount indicated in the main estimates?

Mr. Bourget: I am told that at that time the decision had not been taken. That is why it had to be brought in with the supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

Engineering branch; graving docks—
711. Prince Rupert dry dock and shipyard and appurtenant works—to provide for operating losses and essential repairs for the period January 1 to March 31, 1954, $39,000.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I am sure you would want me to ask a question on this, because it has to do with the Prince Rupert dry dock. Apparently this item is to cover operating loss and essential repairs for the period January 1 to March 31, 1954. What is going to happen from then on? It is of the utmost importance that this dry dock be continued in operation at Prince Rupert, and I am wondering what provision has been made to bring about that result.

Mr. Bourget: The only information I have is the statement made by the Minister of Transport at the time to the effect that the Canadian National Railways has advertised to sell the dry dock. So far as this department is concerned, I do not think we have any more information regarding it, except that the sale has been postponed until the end of September. It has been delayed six months.

Mr. Green: There is no provision in the estimates for operating the dry dock after March 31 of this year?

Mr. Bourget: That is right.

Mr. Green: I notice that the Minister of Transport is in the house at the moment. If the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Public Works is not aware of what provision has been made for continuing the operating of the dry dock, perhaps the Minister of Transport could give us the information.

Mr. Chevrier: All I can say is that my recollection is that the operation of the dry dock is to continue for another period of six months; and thereafter the president of the Canadian National Railways has made the statement to the effect that one of the officers of the railways in Vancouver—I believe it is Mr. Allen—has been placed in charge of the disposal of the dry dock. Meantime it may be possible to find a purchaser or to make some arrangement with persons who might be interested either in Prince Rupert or in Vancouver.

Mr. Green: Does that mean that if no purchaser can be found by September 30 this year this dry dock is to cease operating?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not say that. I think if that is the case we will have to take another look at the situation as it is then.

Mr. Green: Is there any vote in the estimates which could be used to continue the operation of the dry dock?

Mr. Chevrier: Not in the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: And apparently there is nothing in the Department of Public Works, because this vote we are considering is only for the period up to March 31, 1954.

Mr. Chevrier: As I said earlier my understanding is that there is provision for continuance until the end of the six months period.

Mr. Green: I hope some arrangement will be made so that the dry dock can be kept in operation. It would be a disaster of the first magnitude if it were not to be continued. The whole of that northern country is developing, with the opening up of Kitimat and the possible smelter on the Taku river in northwestern British Columbia, and it would really be a great tragedy if the dry dock at Prince Rupert is to be out of operation.

Item agreed to.

Roads and bridges—

712. Maintenance and operation—further amount required, $59,000.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Public Works made a statement on May 12 which is to be found at page 4645 of Hansard in which he said the government was going to contribute a certain amount toward the construction of the Marpole bridge across the north arm of the Fraser river. There does not seem to be any vote in the supplementary estimates to cover that assistance. In what way will it be provided?

Mr. Bourget: I am told that we have no agreement thus far with the province. If I remember correctly, when the main estimates were being considered the minister said that he would consider the question but he made no commitment. If I recall correctly he did make an offer. I think that offer was made to British Columbia to the amount of $400,000.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Bourget: But no acceptance has been received from the province.

Mr. Green: The minister made a commitment of $400,000 on May 12?

Mr. Bourget: Yes.

Mr. Green: I notice the following in the Vancouver Province of June 23:

> Public Works Minister P. A. Gaglardi today said the provincial government will build toll stations on the planned $10,000,000 Oak street bridge "if Ottawa and Vancouver refuse to pay their one-third shares."
>
> He said tenders for the Marpole bridge replacement will be called in November and construction will definitely start next spring.
> "The bridge will take two years to build, so the federal government and Vancouver will have that time to make up their minds how far they'll go to help." said Mr. Gaglardi.
> "Our one-third share is available and we'll start building with it. Toll stations are not being drawn into the working plans, but they can be added if we find we will need them to get the other shares. But, the people of Vancouver and Richmond have suffered from that pile of junk (his view of Marpole bridge) too long now."

Have any steps been taken by the Department of Public Works since this definite commitment of May 12 of this year to have this whole position reviewed with the provincial government and the city of Vancouver? The commitment seemed to be definite enough. I do not see how the government can back out of it, although I believe that Vancouver electors turned down the plebiscite which would have permitted the sale of the airport. I have been told that, I am not sure it is actually so, but that surely has nothing to do with the question of replacing this bridge. I would urge that the department have a further look at this situation and get in consultation with the provincial government about it. Each government should pay one-third of the cost. There is no sense in just putting on a few repairs to the old bridge, which is about all that can be done, if the total amount involved is only to be $1,200,000. I believe the dominion government will have to pay one-third of the total cost of the new bridge, and should do so because it serves the airport primarily.

Mr. Bourget: I think the amount of $400,000 has been offered to the province to build the Marpole bridge, but I am informed that they want to build the bridge at Oak street.

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Bourget: So far, I do not think—

Mr. Green: Does that mean then that unless the provincial government agrees to this ridiculous scheme of simply putting a lift on the old Marpole bridge, the dominion government will not make any contribution at all?

Mr. Bourget: I am told that they will probably make the same offer for the Oak street bridge.

Mr. Green: The dominion government will pay $400,000 on a new bridge on Oak street?

Mr. Bourget: That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: I hope they will have a further look at it because they are going to have to pay more than that.

Mr. Bourget: I am not making any comment on that statement.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—
718. Ontario, $435,900.

Mr. Michener: This item appears to supplement vote 392 in the main estimates which provides $6,573,000 for works there listed. I should like if possible to have the particulars of the new expenditure proposed in Ontario additional to those in the main estimates and which I see are listed here for $435,900.

Mr. Bourget: They are all set out on page 30, Hamilton, Moosonee, Oshawa, Port Stanley, Sombra.

Mrs. Fairclough: Has any part of this amount which is listed for Hamilton to do with the Burlington bridge canal?

Mr. Bourget: No.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Can the parliamentary assistant give details of the Port Stanley, Ontario, estimate.

Mr. Bourget: This amount is to provide for repairs to a section of the west pier which is considered too dangerous to be used by the public.

Mr. Michener: The wharf at Moosonee to cost $75,000 is supposed to serve the hospital on the island? Has the parliamentary assistant information here as to where that wharf is to be built, whether on the mainland or on the island. If on the island, on which side of the island is it supposed to be?

Mr. Bourget: I am told it is to be built on the mainland and it is not only for the hospital but also for the use of the trading companies and settlers.

Mr. Michener: It is on the mainland?

Mr. Bourget: It is on the mainland.

Mr. Michener: And the whole $75,000 is to be spent on the mainland at Moosonee?

Mr. Bourget: Yes, it is for the wharf.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

56. Departmental administration, $340,230.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find the vote on page 9 of the blue book and the details on page 128.

Mr. Fulton: I presume that the minister—

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Fulton: I presume the minister will follow the usual practice, which he himself has pointed out is the practice, of making a statement on the first item on the operations of his department.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As the hon. member says, it has been my custom to place before the committee on the first item some of the details of the department during the past year, especially when we have unfortunately not had an opportunity to discuss the department this session except briefly on the citizenship amendment. It has been my custom to mention in some general way the extent and the nature of immigration during the past calendar year, and to table with the consent of the committee the return for that year. I would ask therefore, Mr. Chairman, that I be permitted to table a comparison of the immigration for 1952 and 1953.

The Chairman: Do I understand the minister wishes this table placed on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The table follows:

* Included with professional for first three months.—Inclus dans "professions" pour les trois premiers mois.

† Included with other groups for first three months.—Inclus dans d'autres groupes pour les trois premiers mois.

By way of explanation, Mr. Chairman, during the last year, it may be recalled I suggested on the estimates that we would continue the policy during that year approximately as it had been in the preceding year, and I hazarded the forecast in the month of May as to the number who might be admitted during the year. As it turned out, the number who came in was 168,868, which was about 4,370 more than the preceding year. Their origins conformed pretty generally to the pattern of 1952, although the British element in the immigration increased in 1953.

In round figures the result was this. We have 47,000 British; 9,300 Americans; 68,000 north Europeans and 43,000 of others. That, by the way, Mr. Chairman, completes a period of time from January 1, 1946. If the committee is interested, during that period of time we received 292,962 British; 265,510 other north Europeans; 70,250 Americans and 329,424 all others.

During the fall of last year we considered what the policy for 1954 should be, and after taking into account all the factors then available we decided that this year we should maintain immigration at about the level of last year, bearing in mind that we make a semi-annual survey of the absorptive capacity of this country and that we would look at the policy again this spring.

As hon. members know there have been some protests against immigration in some circles during the past few months, but these protests I am glad to say were of a strictly limited nature, simply placing before the government some of the difficulties which could be encountered if an unlimited selection of immigrants were made, and if there were not a close watch kept on the numbers admitted from time to time. I think I can safely say that with perhaps one exception I have not had any reference to a complete stopping of immigration in any correspondence I have had so far this year. Therefore, we enter this spring with a feeling that conditions in Canada would permit the admission of the same number of people as last year and we have had no particular reason for altering that opinion at the present time.

Nevertheless we have taken the view that it is desirable to keep a closer check from month to month on the admission of persons from abroad, and in particular to advise people who seek admission to Canada of the employment opportunities available here. There are two persons involved in immigration. There is the Canadian and the would-be immigrant. We owe a duty to the former as well as the latter, and the would-be immigrant should be told the situation as it is in Canada. It would not be fair to him to encourage his desire to come here if in fact we were not able to offer him the immediate employment he has to have and the security he wants to obtain at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, we have taken the precaution of advising people, especially in the skilled trades, as to the immediate opportunities in Canada rather than about the long-term opportunities, and we also advise them about housing conditions and the like.

With this in mind we have recently reviewed the situation again and have altered some of the classes of persons and occupations which may be admitted, and have advised our officers abroad accordingly, with the result that the expectation is that the numbers coming forward this year may be slightly lower than last year because of a more detailed attempt to suggest that in certain occupations there may be limited employment during the latter part of this year, and because we intend to do this year what he have done in the past two years, namely, restrict immigrants in the fall months having in mind the difficulties which overtake persons when they do not obtain employment they can hold throughout the winter. We have followed this policy during the past two years, I believe, to the satisfaction of everyone who has anything to do with immigrants. We propose to move the date from the end of October to the end of September, which is the date on which persons may arrive in Canada for open placement at our settlement offices. The result will probably be that while there will not be a substantially lower number coming in, there will be some reduction in the number from the 168,000 admitted last year.

Now I turn for a moment to the Indian affairs branch in order to report briefly on it. I shall be glad, Mr. Chairman, to give any detail in answer to questions which will probably be asked about education, welfare, and other matters, but I think it would be appropriate for me to point out that last fall, as hon. members will probably recall, we had another of those very valuable conferences with representative Indians, and following the previous practice I would ask leave to table a report of that conference as I have done on former occasions and have it printed as an appendix to Hansard.

The Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.*

Mr. Harris: To mention just a few figures about Indian affairs. Last year we built 972 new houses for the accommodation of Indians on reserves in accordance with our policy of continuing to build suitable housing every year. We have had a noteworthy increase in the attendance of Indian children at the schools, and the number as of March 31 was 31,555. This is an increase of 2,756 or nearly 10 per cent over last year, and the number of Indians now attending non-Indian schools stands at 3,381, an increase of 531 over the figure reported a year ago.

Mr. Coldwell: I wonder if the minister could give a breakdown of the school children in their respective grades so that we may learn how many are at high school, and so on. The minister might give that breakdown later on.

Mr. Harris: Certainly. I could not leave the subject of education, Mr. Chairman, without mentioning a recent agreement we reached with the corporation of the city of Sarnia which, I hope, will serve as an example on other occasions. As hon. members are aware, the reserve is in and about Sarnia and the population is closely mixed and allied with the people of that community. We found that the school we had there was somewhat old and required repairs and we negotiated an agreement with the corporation, the effect of which will be that we will pay for the construction of three classrooms as part of another school being built by the board of education of that city. We will pay a per capita annual grant to the board of education so that from now on there will be no separate Indian school in and about Sarnia and the Indian children will be free to attend not only that particular school but any of the schools in that city. I suggest that is an ideal situation and I think the plan can be worked out successfully. There may be some difficulties to overcome but I hope that will be the end of our functions with respect to education on that reserve.

I should also mention, Mr. Chairman, a very useful committee which was formed in the Ontario legislature and which visited Indians in this province throughout the past 12 months. The province was naturally concerned with the condition of those early settlers in Ontario and wished to learn for their own purposes about the economic conditions, educational standards, health standards and the like. The present government asked the legislature to appoint a committee and that was done. They toured the province in a manner which I have not found possible yet since I took over this office. I believe they visited every reserve and interviewed large numbers of chiefs and principal men. They have reported on those aspects of Indian life, not only within their own competence but within the competence of this government and, I might say, at our request and at their own desire.

We supplied them with our own good offices in every place and made whatever arrangements we could to be of assistance to them. I am grateful to them for the commendation they gave this department and its officials in their report for their attendance upon them and the good work which is being done in many reserves. The report suggests, without in any way transgressing on the separate fields of provincial and dominion activity, that it would be useful if we would meet with them to consider the welfare of our Indian people since, after all, it is agreed they are part of our community and every effort should be made by every level of government to assist in that work. While I have not been able to follow up that suggestion as yet, I propose to approach the provincial government having in mind the suggestion in their report and to have the officials of this department confer with them on the questions they have raised.

The citizenship branch has little to do except the registration of naturalization and the maintaining of records. But as I have indicated on other occasions in the house, their work is increasing and will increase noticeably during the next two or three years. The first substantial numbers of those who came to our shores since the war came in 1947, so that a considerable number of them are now here more than the required five years and are, according to the statistics, beginning to apply for citizenship. A few figures, I think, to show that would indicate what I mean. In 1952-53 there were about 15,000 declarations of intention filed while last year the figure had increased to 25,400. We anticipate that that increase in applications will continue for at least another year or two until it levels off.

With respect to the other branches of government for which I have some responsibility, namely, the national gallery and the national film board, I do not propose to say anything at this point because we had some debate about the national gallery on the supplementary estimates and we had a lengthy debate on the national film board in February. I would hope that we could dispose of these particular branches by questions and answers when we come to them. Of course that applies to all the other branches which I have already mentioned.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee appreciates the minister's review of the work of his department. Since we have had a fairly good day today I hope the committee might feel that it was time to adjourn now so that tomorrow we could give to that department our undivided attention and that attention which it deserves.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Coldwell: Ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Do I understand that there is not unanimous consent to proceed? Shall I rise, report the resolutions and request leave to sit again?

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: For tomorrow I gather from the hon. member for Kamloops that we shall give to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration that careful attention that it deserves and that when that business is completed we shall take the appropriation bills and any other matters that might arise incidentally. I would appreciate it if some time we could be given some indication about the probable closing hour.

Mr. Speaker: As it is 11.30, this house stands adjourned—

Mr. Knowles: Ten thirty.

Mr. Speaker: As it is 10.30, this house stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. Drew: Ten o'clock?

Mr. Harris: Did you say something? Did you say ten o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I regret—

Mr. Knowles: Bring the mace back.

Mr. Harris: I heard someone saying "ten o'clock", Mr. Speaker, and my first thought was that they were referring to ten o'clock tonight. But if that was an effort to ask the house leader that we should meet at ten o'clock tomorrow morning instead of eleven, I would ask the house to consider that suggestion. I personally would recommend it. If other hon. members would like to have it that way, I am sure we could use that hour to some advantage.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: I think actually the situation was that His Honour had inadvertently said "as it is 11.30" when it is actually 10.30, and that is the way "ten o'clock" was used. I wonder whether perhaps a compromise could be suggested about ten o'clock tomorrow. One can do only so much. I am anxious that we should be in a position to discuss intelligently and vigorously the minister's department.

Mr. Coldwell: The only objection I have to the suggestion, I may say—and I am willing to come at ten o'clock tomorrow morning—is that some members have already gone home. They may not know that the house is meeting at ten o'clock or 10.30 tomorrow morning. I do not think it is fair to the members who left at ten o'clock, which is our time of adjournment, that we should meet earlier and they should not know that we are meeting. Some of them may have a question that they would like to ask on the last morning on the orders of the day. I do not know of any such questions and I do not know of any such persons. But, out of courtesy to the members who have left, I think the small number in the house tonight should not decide to meet early and thus deprive them of any right they may have tomorrow. That is my only objection to the suggestion.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I think the leader of the C.C.F. party probably is on good grounds, generally speaking. But we have a rule around here that says that hon. members should stay and do the business of the house. While I am sure we would not want anyone to feel that having waited until tomorrow to ask a question, he did not have an opportunity to ask it. I would think that everyone would realize that there are enough members of all parties present to take care of any matters that might arise. I would suggest that we adopt the suggestion as to 10.30 and count on the hon. member for Kamloops to keep us going until all members arrive at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: I have expressed my view. I am not going to press it.

Mr. Macdonnell: Might it not be possible, by consent, to have orders of the day called at eleven o'clock or a little bit later, when all danger will have entirely disappeared?

Mr. Drew: I do not want to add much to what has been said. I quite appreciate what has been said by the leader of the C.C.F. party. I think perhaps if we sat at ten o'clock there might be sufficient room for that opportunity to be denied. If we sit at 10.30 I think it is likely that the orders of the day might still be before us when those who did not otherwise know we were meeting earlier would have arrived. I think it would expedite the work of the house if we meet that extra half hour earlier.

Mr. Coldwell: I said that I was not pressing my view.

Mr. Knowles: We are taking up nearly half an hour now.

Mr. Speaker: As it is 10.30, this house stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10.30 in the forenoon.

On motion of Mr. Harris the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m. until tomorrow at 10.30 a.m.

APPENDIX

Summary of the proceedings of a conference with representative Indians held in Ottawa October 26-28, 1953.

(1) On February 28, March 1, 2 and 3, 1951, a conference was held with representative Indians and officers of Indian associations from all those regions of Canada where there is an Indian population except the Northwest Territories. The purpose of that conference was to discuss the provisions of Bill 79 to revise the Indian Act, and a summary of the proceedings of that conference appears as appendix B, House of Commons debates, March 16, 1951.

(2) On October 26, 27 and 28, 1953, a second conference was held in Ottawa with representative Indians and officers of Indian associations, whose names are set out in schedule "A" hereto. In addition to the representatives, the minister, deputy minister and headquarters officials of the Indian affairs branch, the conference was attended by the Indian commissioner for British Columbia and all regional supervisors from the provinces.

(3) As in 1951, the purpose of this second conference was to discuss the provisions of the Indian Act and as well to suggest amendments to it in the light of experience gained since it came into force September 4, 1951. Much of the discussion was devoted to the administration of the act rather than specific amendments to it. Officials of the Indian affairs branch reported on particular sections of the act which they administer. Following this all sections of the act were considered.

(4) Upon the conclusion of this phase of the work of the conference there was a general discussion on matters pertaining to the health of the Indian people with officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

(5) It was again evident from the discussion that the problems of Indian communities varied from reserve to reserve and region to region and these differences accounted for the variety of viewpoints expressed towards particular sections of the act. It was the unanimous view of those present, however, that the present act had been beneficial to all Indians.

(6) As in 1951, all of the representatives were opposed to section 86, which deals with taxation, and also section 112, which provides for the enfranchisement of bands or individual members thereof after committees of inquiry.

(7) With respect to section 86, all of the representatives favoured the exemption contained in subsection (1), but thought that it did not go far enough. It was again asserted that under article 13 of the terms of union between Canada and the province of British Columbia the Indians of British Columbia were not liable to taxation. Representations were made that the Indians in British Columbia living on reserves on the coast and conducting fishing as their only occupation are denied the benefit of tax exemption although Indians in the interior of the province and elsewhere engaged in grazing cattle on reserves enjoy that exemption. A strong argument was made that the tax exemption should be extended to Indian fishermen whether the owner of a ship or engaged in a joint venture. With respect to subsection (2), which relates to a waiver of exemption from taxation under the Canada Elections Act, it was suggested that consideration be given to allowing the Indians to vote without the necessity of executing a waiver. Two representatives, however, were opposed to forcing the right to vote on the Indians.

(8) With respect to section 9, which provides for the protest of the inclusion, omission, addition or deletion of persons on band lists, three different opinions were expressed. Three representatives said that all persons who were registered on band lists at the time the act came into force should continue to be members and favoured the elimination of this section from the act, and the dropping of all protests. Eleven representatives, however, favoured the section but were of opinion that the time limit for protesting the inclusion of persons on a list should be extended beyond the six-month period provided in this section to give a further opportunity for lodging protests. One representative was in favour of section 9 as it now stands.

(9) As in 1951 the same three views were again expressed with regard to sections 93-96 dealing with the sale and possession of intoxicants: (1) complete prohibition; (2) retention of the sections in the present act; (3) that provincial liquor laws be made applicable to Indians. Eleven representatives were of opinion that the liquor provisions in the Indian Act should be deleted and that the Indians should become subject to the provincial laws with respect to the sale and possession of intoxicants. Six representatives were in favour of retaining the present sections of the act. Two of these, however, were opposed to any extension of liquor privileges to Indians as provided by section 95 without the Indians being consulted first.

(10) It was generally felt that the principle of registering illegitimate children set out in section 11 (e) ought to be retained. It was suggested, however, by two representatives, that illegitimate children in certain circumstances should not be allowed to benefit from the funds of the band.

(11) Although unanimously accepted in principle in 1951, payment of a per capita share of the capital and revenue moneys of a band to persons who become voluntarily enfranchised as provided by section 15 (a) was now objected to by one representative. It was asserted that a woman member of a band could apply for enfranchisement and receive her per capita share and subsequently remarry into the band and be again enfranchised with her husband and obtain still another per capita share. It was stated that the funds of the band should remain intact for the benefit of future generations. The opposite view was taken by other representatives who were of opinion that a member of a band had an inalienable interest in the property of the band and should be entitled to take his per capita share of the moneys when leaving the band. One representative suggested that an Indian woman who marries a non-Indian should have an option of taking a per capita share of the moneys of the band or continue to share in the distribution of annuities, interest moneys and rents as provided in the former act.

(12) Section 19, which deals with surveys and subdivisions, was opposed by the same representatives as in 1951. They contended that there are certain areas in Alberta and Saskatchewan where the subdivision of reserves is not suitable nor acceptable, and for that reason surveys and subdivisions should only be carried out with the consent of the council of the band or of the band. It was the general feeling of the other representatives that surveys were beneficial and necessary and that this work should be carried out expeditiously.

(13) With respect to section 20 there was now no feeling that temporary possession of land led to insecurity as was the case in 1951. On the contrary, it was the feeling of several representatives that the period of temporary possession should be extended from two to five years, and possibly ten years, to find out if the Indian is capable of making proper use of the land. Seven representatives were of opinion that the present two-year period is satisfactory, while six representatives thought that the land should be granted on a temporary basis of five years or more instead of the present two years. It was also suggested by one representative that there should be some provision in the act which would permit cancellation of a certificate of possession in cases where the Indian to whom the land is allotted does not make proper use of it.

(14) It was recommended by one representative that the provisions of section 39 should be changed to permit a surrender to be assented to by referendum with polls established at convenient places on the reserve.

(15) With respect to section 60, which provides that at the request of a band the governor in council may grant to the band the right to exercise control and management over lands in the reserve as may be deemed advisable, it was suggested by one representative that this provision be amended to provide that the request be made by the council of the band rather than the band. It was mentioned that in the case of a large band it was extremely difficult to get a majority of the voters together to hold a vote to request application of this provision. It was pointed out that at the conference in 1951 when this provision was discussed, it was the general feeling of the representatives that the request should be made by the band, and this view was held this year by all the other representatives.

(16) With regard to the voting age of band members in band elections set out in section 76, it was the opinion of seven representatives that the age should be the same as that which applies in provincial elections. However, seven other representatives were of opinion that the age should remain at twenty-one as provided in the act.

(17) Similarly there was a difference of opinion regarding the term of office of chiefs and councillors. It was again felt by a number of representatives that the two-year term of office provided in section 77 was not sufficiently long to enable members of band councils to gain sufficient experience for the most effective management of band affairs. A term of office of three, four and five years was suggested. On the other hand, some representatives felt that the term of office of band councils should be similar to that in effect in municipalities and the two-year term should be retained.

(18) Section 88 was discussed at some length but there was no opinion in favour of a change and I was asked, and gave the assurance, that there was no present intention to alter it.

(19) It was suggested by one representative that a peace officer should have a warrant rather than the authority now provided in section 101.

(20) With respect to section 108, which provides for the voluntary enfranchisement of Indians, one representative objected to the minor unmarried children being enfranchised with their parents. It was considered by this representative that such children should be given the option at age twenty-one of being enfranchised or retaining membership in the band. It was also suggested by this representative that an Indian woman who marries a non-Indian and is subsequently deserted or widowed should be able to return to band membership with the consent of the band council or the band, and that minor unmarried children of an Indian woman who marries a non-Indian should not be automatically enfranchised. Another representative objected to the automatic enfranchisement of an Indian woman who marries a non-Indian because such woman would be deprived of any right to an interest in subsequent sales of land which was given the members of the Indian band and their posterity forever.

(21) Section 110(2), (3) and (4), which provides for the grant of land to enfranchised Indians was unanimously approved by the representatives in 1951, but was objected to this year by one representative who considered that these provisions should be deleted from the act. This objection was not based on experience as there have been no decisions made under these provisions.

(22) With respect to section 120, it was recommended by one representative that all schools should be non-denominational except the minimum number of residential schools required to take care of unfortunate children. However, arrangements should be made for religious instruction in such schools by a clergyman of the appropriate faith. Another representative suggested that the band should determine the denomination of teachers by a majority vote of the electors of the band rather than have the denomination of teachers determined in the manner set out in this section.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, June 26, 1954

The house met at 10.30 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. VINCENT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "FINANCIAL TIMES"

Mr. Auguste Vincent (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have in my hand a very amusing article signed by Tempus which appeared in the Financial Times of June 25 in which reference was made to the member for the constituency of Longueuil. I have Hansard at hand to prove that I have addressed the house on nine different occasions during this session, my first in parliament. I am most amused to think that these speeches and remarks, according to Tempus, might have been delivered directly from my bathtub in St. Lambert, Quebec. Frankly, Mandrake the magician could not have done better. As for Tempus, who wishes to have a photograph of me, I have tried to meet him face to face for the past three days but have not been able to. I have not been able to see him. He did not even call me. It is proper to say that "Tempus fugit". Therefore I wish to reassure him that as soon as I get back to Montreal I will send him a photograph with my best regards.

QUESTIONS

R.C.A.F.—CIVILIAN AIRCRAFT ROUTES

Mr. Fulton:

1. Prior to April 8, 1954, were any arrangements or orders in effect for the transmission to Royal Canadian Air Force stations from which aircraft operate, situate on or near civilian aircraft routes, of the flight schedules of such civilian aircraft?
2. If so, what were the arrangements?
3. Did orders then exist requiring the communication of such information, or the relevant parts thereof, as received by such stations, to all personnel having responsibility for the operation of or actually operating, aircraft from such Royal Canadian Air Force stations and covering the course of action to be followed by such aircraft under the circumstances?
4. If so, what were the arrangements or orders?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2. Aircraft of the Royal Canadian Air Force are subject to the same flying regulations as are other aircraft. When flying under weather conditions requiring instrument flying, special rules apply and all aircraft, whether civil or military, are controlled by Department of Transport air traffic control centres. Under I.F.R. conditions, in addition to being separated, R.C.A.F. and other airfields are kept fully informed of the whereabouts of other aircraft in the vicinity. Under weather conditions, when visible flying rules apply, all aircraft provide for their own separation by conforming with the normal rules of the air.

3 and 4. When operating under instrument flight rules in or near air space controlled by Department of Transport air traffic centre, R.C.A.F., like civil aircraft, must obtain clearance from air traffic control and consequently, both R.C.A.F. and civilian personnel having responsibility for the operation of aircraft, receive communication of the information referred to. Under visual flight conditions, it is the responsibility of pilots to maintain the proper separation of aircraft.

CAMP GAGETOWN, N.B.

Mr. Hansell:

1. Has the government purchased, leased or taken over land known as Camp Gagetown in New Brunswick for defence purposes?
2. If so, what was the purchase price or terms of the lease?
3. Has the government sold or leased the pulpwood rights on this land to any persons or company?
4. If so, to whom and on what terms?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.
2. The total purchase price is not yet known as negotiations with former owners are not yet complete.
3. No.
4. Not applicable.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

56. Departmental administration, $340,230.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, last night the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration gave us a brief review of the activities of his department, outlining the work done by the three main branches. In my remarks this morning I shall confine myself pretty well to the immigration branch. First of all, however, I wish to express regret that this department seems to be one which is always left until the last minute when intelligent discussion and adequate review are entirely impossible.

The minister has been pressed on a number of occasions this year to bring on his estimates somewhat in advance of the last day. He has indicated from time to time that he feels his department has been adequately discussed on previous occasions. The fact is that we have not had an adequate or full discussion of this department since 1950, and that for the three years since then until the present time the department has in fact been discussed for approximately only three days and one hour. I looked up the record. In 1951 this department was discussed for one day, and that actually was not a full day, the discussion only occupying 22 pages of Hansard which, according to my calculations, would be somewhere between two and three hours. That was on June 28. The session ended that year on June 30.

In 1952 again the department was discussed on only one day, the main estimates occupying again only 22 pages of Hansard or, being generous, a discussion of perhaps three hours. That was on July 4, the day of prorogation. In 1953, last year, it was discussed on three occasions. The first was the end of the evening on April 23 when the discussion occupied 7½ pages of Hansard. The department was called on the next day, April 24, when the full day was devoted to it. However, at that time there were morning sittings and many committees sitting, and in fact one member complained that he had not been able to be here although he had some things he wanted to say. It was not called again until May 14 when it was discussed for approximately one minute, just long enough to carry one item.

These figures show, as I say, that since 1950 we have been able to discuss this department only on two days for about 3 hours each, one other full day, and one hour on another day. And again in 1954 we find ourselves in the position where this department is left until the very close of the session when we are up against a deadline, and because of the atmosphere in which we are now working it is just not sensible to suggest that we can have a proper discussion of the affairs of this very important branch of government.

Looking through the records of past discussions to find out what was said, I find that there is a reason which occurs to mind immediately why the minister should leave his department always until this stage of the session. It has not been adequately discussed since 1950 for the reason that in 1950, when there was time to have an adequate discussion, the department was very severely criticized. It was severely criticized by a number of members on the government side of the house, who had some quite severe things to say about the policy or lack of policy being followed in the administration, particularly of the immigration branch of the department. I can well understand why the minister, therefore, is anxious to avoid discussion of his estimates so far as possible and has been successful in doing so.

I notice that in the debate of 1950 the hon. member for Rosedale made a fairly extensive review of the department. He made a statement with which, as a matter of fact, I cannot agree, when he said that in our immigration policy preference is given to immigrants of English, Irish, Scottish, French and American extraction. In the course of the same debate the hon. member for Spadina spoke at some length and his remarks will be found at pages 3584 and following of Hansard for 1950. He criticized the policy of the government as being "not a policy at all". He went on to say:

> My purpose in speaking tonight is to try to build a fire under the minister and the department so that he may get on with his job.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the fire lighted by the hon. member for Spadina, if in fact it was lighted, appears to have burned out some years ago, so what we are doing now is raking over some rather dead ashes.

The hon. member for Spadina at page 3586 of Hansard also spoke in a most earnest manner urging the government to foster immigration from the United Kingdom. I regret to say that it is my view, according to the figures which have been placed on Hansard each year in the course of this review, that that has not been done to the extent it should have been.

What happened after these efforts in 1950? In 1951 we had a good year in immigration. There were some 190,000 immigrants admitted to Canada. The totals admitted during the next three years declined substantially from that level, so that not only have we a decline in the numbers being admitted but it is my view that the policy laid out by the government in 1947 by the then prime minister, and since that time subscribed to and reiterated by the present minister, is not being fulfilled. I have reference particularly to the situation regarding the maintenance of the ethnic balance of this country. If one looks at the figures put on the record again by the minister last night, and I have them in detail before me in a release from the statistical unit of the department, it will be seen that when you have 47,077 from the United Kingdom plus 9,000 from the United States, making a total of 56,000 of that category admitted in the year, and in the same year you have 68,675 north Europeans, including 35,015 Germans and you have 43,737 others, including 24,219 from Italy, it is not possible to agree with the minister when he says the policy of preserving the ethnic balance within the country is being followed.

From time to time we on this side of the house have made it perfectly clear we do not ask for any special preference being given to any one country as a source of origin of immigration or that we should concentrate exclusively on bringing in immigrants from that country. I want to reiterate that position here this morning. We subscribed to the view that Canada should take immigrants who are capable of being absorbed into both our economic and cultural background from any country where suitable immigrants offer. But we do say that should be tempered, if you like, to fit in with this policy of maintaining the ethnic balance and, not distorting the cultural or economic situation in Canada. The figures which I have placed upon the record as to the experience in that regard indicate clearly that principle is not being observed.

We have also, from time to time, criticized the government for apparent inability to work out an intelligent and vigorous application of the assisted passage loan scheme as applied to the United Kingdom, so that we may encourage more immigration from there. I have been given information as to the countries in which that scheme was applied, and the number of immigrants brought forward under that scheme since February, 1951, up to December 31, 1952, which I was given to understand was the last day for which figures were available.

Mr. Harris: I made a return in the house which brought it down to some time this year.

Mr. Fulton: I confess, then, that I have overlooked that. If the figures up to date present a different picture from the one I have drawn as a result of the figures I have, then I hope the minister will be quick to point it out. Up to that time, out of a total of 78,403 admitted, there were 4,361 from the United Kingdom; 22,224 from Germany and Austria, and a very small number, something in the neighbourhood of 1,700 or 1,800 from other European countries. The proportions between those countries from which immigrants have come under this scheme worked out at approximately 15·4 per cent from the United Kingdom, 78·2 per cent from Germany and Austria and 6·3 per cent from elsewhere. Once again the figures show that with respect to preserving the ethnic balance of this country, the assisted passage loan scheme is not being equitably applied to the different countries of Europe, in that the United Kingdom has a disproportionately low number of immigrants coming out under that scheme.

Now, there are other matters which are causing concern in connection with the immigration policy of the government. One of these is the picture with respect to the fact that, of the large number of immigrants coming from Italy, practically none came from the north. I draw the attention of the committee to a series of articles appearing recently in the Vancouver Sun and written by Stanley Burke. He pointed out that last year Canada had taken more immigrants from Italy than any other country had taken. He obtained figures from the Italian government which showed that 24,000 went to Canada, and only 400 returned. Out of 10,000 who went to the United States, 2,400 returned. Immigrants to the Argentine totalled 13,000, and almost that many made the "disillusioned" trip home.

Now, sir, I do not mean to say that we should not take immigrants from that country. They have made good citizens. What is pointed out is that the great bulk of those who have been coming so far appear to have been from southern Italy. What is suggested, and I should like to hear the minister's comments on the matter, is that we should, in so far as our industrialization is increasing, give more attention to immigrants from northern Italy. Those who come from southern Italy at the moment tend to be a rural people but they do not fit in well with the present Canadian farm picture. While they are farmers themselves, they are accustomed to living in villages, in a very closely integrated communal life, and they find life on Canadian farms somewhat lonesome so they tend to gravitate immediately back to the city. Well, when they get to the city they are not at all qualified or trained as industrial workers, and so they find themselves completely out of place. The suggestion has been made that in our policy of soliciting immigrants from Italy we should pay more attention than we do to those in northern Italy. Experience has shown that the latter make excellent Canadian citizens, with background of industrial and technical training. These people would be much easier to fit into the Canadian scene than those drawn exclusively from southern Italy.

What I have said is by way of a general survey of the immigration picture as I see it today. I should like now to turn for a moment to some particular criticisms of the department, and to say I find that there are a number of procedures being followed today which impose hardships and unfairness in many cases.

I have in mind the situation of the Chinese who are attempting to bring over their children. I know the minister has received a brief on this matter from the Chinese benevolent association, dated April 1954. I shall not go into the details in this connection, but I think it is important to point out that the department still appears to attach undue and rigid importance to the results of X-ray examinations. We have had it out with the minister before, where Chinese here in Canada want their children to be brought in. The department in Hong Kong has the children examined and X-ray photographs are taken. If the department feels that the X-ray photographs indicate a bone structure of lesser or greater maturity than might be expected in the child for whom application is made, they say that according to the X-ray picture they cannot accept this child as the one applied for.

The department adheres rigidly to the decision, notwithstanding the fact that the father may have produced testimony from relations here and back in China, as well as his own sworn affidavit, establishing on the basis of evidence from those who know the facts that this child is his own.

According to my information, the United States has rejected this X-ray procedure. While they may not have rejected it completely, they laid down the principle in the forties that where there was positive evidence, not otherwise contested, that the child was in fact the child applied for, then it was not a proper course to rely upon X-ray evidence discrediting identity. A number of cases in the United States established that, and the principle they follow is that unless there is direct evidence to contradict the evidence of the applicant, then the evidence of the applicant prevails. However, that principle is not being followed in Canada, and there are a number of cases of unfairness resulting in respect of these applicants for admission from China. We are dealing here, not with Chinese applying to come to Canada, but with people who morally and legally are in fact Canadian citizens, because they are the children of Canadian citizens. So I cannot understand why the department adheres so rigidly to this and other administrative practices which in fact make discrimination between Canadian citizens.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Those principles are not followed in the case of applications from other Canadian citizens but only, so far as I can make out, in the case of applications from Chinese. And I would suggest that in the light of certain recent court decisions, particularly that of Leong Ba Chi, if I have the name right, the department would be well advised to review its administrative practice in this field, and not only to avoid having its own administrative decisions reversed by the courts but also to avoid putting these applicants to such great expense.

In the instance to which I have referred, where the question arose as to whether the child was in fact the child of the applicant—and it was not based upon X-rays, but rather on a question of law—it had to be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, and one can imagine the expense to the applicant and the incidental cost as well as the heartbreak in the meantime until this barrier of administrative obstinacy was broken down, and the courts saw to it that justice was done.

Another series of incidents recently have given rise to a feeling of concern in connection with deportation orders made under circumstances which seemed to be unfair to those persons ordered for deportation. I am going to refer to only one of these cases, to which reference is made in the Ottawa Journal of April 24. This is the case of Mrs. Shirley Brent.

The article is headed "Justice Raps Deport Order—Even He Can't Understand It." The article is dated at Toronto, and is a Canadian Press report. It states:

> Mr. Justice Wilson of the Supreme Court of Ontario criticized the Canadian immigration department Friday and said it should have disclosed any information it had against Mrs. Shirley Brent, 23, of Buffalo, N.Y.

He deferred judgment in the matter. The article goes on:

> Testimony was the woman entered Canada as a visitor January 1 as Shirley Taylor and was married to Barry Brent, of Toronto, March 9. On January 28 she appeared before an immigration board and was told she "didn't meet requirements".
>
> John D. Pickup, of Toronto, representing the immigration department, said no reasons had to be given under the statutes.
> "Fine state of affairs in this country where there is supposed to be justice," said Mr. Justice Wilson.

Then the report goes on to summarize the argument of Mr. Pickup as to the reasons why the department did not disclose the details behind the order. It then continues:

> Said Mr. Justice Wilson: "That is perfectly plain to the immigration people, but I must confess I would like you to explain it to me."
> Mr. Pickup: "It could be that she might become a public charge, or that she lacked education, or because of political affiliations.

Mr. Justice Wilson: "But surely, in fairness, the department should indicate what her shortcomings are; that's an illustration of how people coming to this country don't get fair treatment."

That is a fact which is causing concern. On a number of occasions I have been in conversation with people acting for prospective immigrants, although I do not think I have been in actual conversation with anyone acting for a prospective deportee. But where they are acting for a prospective immigrant they may get a rejection letter from the department saying, "We have to advise you that your application for the admission of this person cannot be granted." Then they have the greatest difficulty in finding out from the department the reasons why the application cannot be granted. They ask for a review. The reason they ask for the review is that they hope that in the course of the review some reason will be elicited, and the case against the application made clear to them, so that they will know what case they have to meet and whether in fact the reasons given by the department are reasons which in their opinion are valid, under the present immigration law, or whether they consider the department is misapplying or misinterpreting the present regulations.

But again they may receive a letter to the effect—"We regret to inform you that, after review, it is not possible to grant the application." Then the question will be asked: Where do we go from there? How do we go about discussing the merits of the case with the department, if we cannot be told on what grounds the department rejects the application?

I can see that there is one branch of cases—and I submit one only—where there is justification for not giving all the reasons, and that is where an applicant is rejected on grounds of security. That would be a case where, upon investigation, it has been disclosed that there is some background indicating that, for reasons of loyalty, such person would not be a desirable immigrant. I can understand that the department certainly should not disclose the details, because of the principle which is generally accepted that to disclose the details, where the information came from, when it was received, and so on, would enable those hostile powers, powers which are not friendly to Canada, to get details of our security system. I submit, however, that in cases where it is relied upon as the reason against the admission, still that fact should be stated.

I agree there is justification in that one type of case for the department not to go into the details, but I cannot see any justification in any other instance for the department not to give detailed reasons why it refuses admission, so that the applicant and his representatives will know what case they have to meet and can decide whether to press it further and whether, as I say, they agree the department is correctly interpreting the immigration laws, or whether in their view they are not, so that the matter could be taken further. At the present time they are at a loss to know what to do when they get this polite but improperly blank refusal to grant the application.

In this connection I note the number of cases where, in respect to the application for the admission of children of Chinese who are Canadian citizens, as well as in other cases, this feeling is becoming widespread. The representatives of the applicants do not know where or how to deal with it. I say we are entitled to hear from the minister this morning a review of details of the administrative practices within the department by which they deal with these applications. I urge that in future in all cases coming up for disposal the department should indicate to the applicant or his representative the reasons for its rejection of the application.

There is one interesting set of figures that I want to place upon the record in closing this survey of immigration, Mr. Chairman. The minister told us last night that, according to the review of Canada's absorptive capacity made this year, the government feels that approximately the same number as last year could safely be admitted to Canada. He did tell us, however, that a review of economic conditions in Canada indicated, if I understood him correctly, that prospective immigrants overseas should be given a stark and stern picture of the employment opportunities in Canada so that they would not arrive here and be disappointed on finding that the opportunities are not those which they have expected. If I heard him correctly, he went on to say that as a result of what I might call the stern outline which is to be given to these applicants, there may be a slightly reduced number coming this year in comparison with the number who came last year.

That is a sound policy, and perhaps it is based on past experience. I know cases have been drawn to the attention of hon. members of immigrants complaining that they were given a rosy picture. They came out and found that conditions were different and they felt that they were unfairly treated. That is most undesirable. We want in Canada people who are able to face hardships and surmount them. That has been our tradition; it would be unwise and unfair to encourage people to come here under the impression that there are opportunities which may not be realized when they get here. This emphasizes the need for care, and I am glad that the department is going to follow that policy.

The other day I drew the minister's attention to the case of an immigrant from Germany who, apparently because of misapprehension on the part of the immigration officers, had been given to understand that he could obtain employment as an aircraft engineer. That was his employment in Germany. When he arrived here he found that, by the terms of a regulation made in Canada, he could not be licensed unless he was a Canadian citizen or came from a country where there were reciprocal arrangements with Canada in that regard, and it so happened that Germany is not such a country. I admit this is rather a technical matter, and it is perhaps asking the immigration officer to be superhuman to know all the regulations in that field. I expect the information was given in good faith over in Germany, but I cite it as an example of the care which is necessary so as not to mislead prospective immigrants.

In the picture presented by the minister's review his statement that there might be a somewhat smaller number coming to Canada as compared with last year is interesting. I hold in my hand a survey made by the Canadian Citizenship Council appearing in their publication "Citizenship Items" of February, 1954. I want to place this picture before the committee because I think it would be well for the department and the government to review their impression of the absorptive capacity of Canada. I will read the article in extenso because it is put in a clear and impressive form. It is headed: "How fast are we growing?" Before I get into the article I should say that very frequently the government, particularly, and others, say that we are now taking in all that we can practically absorb into Canada this year, and that Canada's immigration policy is aggressive and contributing substantially to the growth of the nation. The article is as follows:

Some have said "figures don't lie"; others that "you can do anything with figures".

We have assembled here, obtained from authoritative sources, figures relating to our population growth during the decade ending June 30, 1951. In that time our population increased from 11,507,000 to 14,009,000 (some 2,502,000, including 349,000 when Newfoundland became the tenth province).

The greatest factor was that of natural increase. Births exceeded deaths by nearly two million.

The net migration figures—that is, immigration less emigration—are rather interesting. During the decade, some 548,000 newcomers came to Canada, while some 388,000 persons departed to take up residence elsewhere, leaving a net gain by migration of only 160,000, or an average of about 16,000 per year. As at least 6,000 of these were dependents, net migration in the decade did not add to the labour force of the country much over ·2 per cent each year.

However, this decade included in its first half war years, when immigration was relatively light compared with more recent years. But if we look at the figures for the period of June 30, 1945 to June 30, 1951, we find that immigration totalled 464,000, emigration 293,000, leaving a net of 171,000, or an approximate average of 34,200 per year. This would mean an approximate addition to the labour force of less than 20,000 per year.

I have added the words "per year" because there appears to be a slight omission in the actual text. I continue:

From time to time we have heard, and read, that Canada's absorptive capacity, as far as immigration is concerned, is about 2 per cent a year. Net migration for the decade resulted in an average yearly increase of only ·13 per cent, and for the second half, only ·28 per cent.

When we first glanced at these figures, we were somehow reminded of Lewis Carroll. The Queen is speaking. "A slow sort of country. Now, here, you see, it takes all the running you can do, to keep in the same place. If you must get somewhere else, you must run at least twice as fast as that."

The situation, of course, is not quite like that. However the figures do suggest that for the decade period, in order to replenish the loss through emigration, we had to average about 40,000 newcomers per year, and during the second half of the decade, about 60,000. For during the decade, for every 55 immigrants, we lost through emigration 39 persons.

On the basis of that conclusion, which appears to be accurate and to be substantiated by the figures, one can see, Mr. Chairman, that if in order to replenish losses through emigration we had to take in about 60,000 immigrants, then in a year when we take in 168,000 immigrants we are adding to the net population only slightly over 100,000 persons a year by immigration.

Now, in a population of approximately 14,500,000 and in a country with the tremendous growth potential of Canada, I think those figures are interesting and they cast an important light on this question of whether we are approaching our absorptive capacity, and I submit that they indicate that the department should take a good new look at this problem from the point of view of ascertaining whether they are in fact pursuing an aggressive and vigorous policy of immigration, as the minister has frequently claimed we are.

I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of May 5 headed, "Harris Defends Government Stand on Quebec Tax". I do not know how that crept in but apparently the minister had something to say on that subject as well. But this clipping contains these extracts:

Canada will have a population of about 23 million in 1974, Citizenship Minister Harris predicted last night.

Mr. Harris, in charge of citizenship and immigration, said in an address over the political free time series of the C.B.C.:

"If I may . . . peer into the future, it would be to say that in 20 years we shall have about 23 million people instead of 15 million people; that we shall be consuming then nearly all the beef, pork and similar farm products that we produce and pay our farmers a good price for them; that our workmen will have a higher . . . standard of living, and that our exports will not be subject to the fluctuations of one or two specialized markets."

All of which, Mr. Chairman, is a very pleasant and gratifying picture and I hope it is fulfilled. But I would submit that the rate of growth as forecast by the minister is perhaps unduly pessimistic, although perhaps it is realistic in the light of the government's snail-pace immigration policy. A growth in population from 15 million to 23 million would mean an approximate growth of 8 million people, and for that to be realized over 20 years would work out, as I calculate it, to about 400,000 people a year. Therefore, on the basis of that figure of 400,000 people, since the present annual net gain by immigration would appear to be approximately 100,000, that leaves the natural increase in the present population to account for the remainder of approximately 300,000 per year. The government has no control over the birth rate; and taking the over-all picture for the rate of growth, at least by immigration, that appears to me to be a very cautious and unduly slow rate of growth to be predicted for this country, particularly in the light of predictions that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. That might have to be modified as a result of government inaction to a prediction that the second half of the twentieth century belongs to Canada, and certainly if this forecast by the minister is to be fulfilled it will have to be postponed further and modified to read that the first half of the twenty-first century belongs to Canada. But I hope that this government will not be in power sufficiently long to retard Canada's rate of growth to that extent.

That, Mr. Chairman, about completes the review I had intended to undertake of the immigration situation in Canada today. We have in the past benefited enormously by the immigration we have had, and we believe that that experience and that pattern can be repeated in the future. We believe, however, that the government is not showing any signs of doing what it said it intended to do, that is, pursue a vigorous and realistic immigration policy, or of pursuing that also within the principle the government itself laid down, the principle of maintaining the ethnic balance of the country.

I submit that the figures I have placed on the record establish the inadequacies of the government's present program in these respects, and I urge the minister and hon. members opposite—as the hon. member for Spadina did in 1950—to take out their flints and stones and try once again to strike a spark which will light a fire under the immigration department of this government.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kamloops has, I think, given a very interesting criticism and review of some of our immigration policies, and I too propose to say something about immigration and then perhaps turn to the other departments of government which are administered by the present minister of immigration.

I think, of course, that immigration, if it is to be successful, must be realistic. It must give the people who come into this country a true impression of the kind of country to which they are coming, the kind of life they may expect to lead in this country, and we who are here already should give them a welcoming hand.

Perhaps I can say this as one who was an immigrant to this country almost 45 years ago. I say this because in my first year or two I fell in among a friendly group of Canadian citizens in western Canada, and through them I became a very happy citizen of this country in which since then my life has been and will be spent.

Therefore, I think that one of the things that the people across our country should do is to do their level best to welcome immigrants when they come into the country and assist them in finding their feet in what is, after all, a very new life for all of them.

During my 45 years' experience in western Canada I have seen people coming into the country who at the time looked perhaps rather difficult to absorb into our Canadian way of life. I am not so alarmed about the ethnic balance as is my hon. friend from Kamloops. In my lifetime I have seen in western Canada people who came into this country from eastern, central, and southern Europe, and I have worked among them and have come to know them very well. I must say that sometimes these people were exploited by those who were already here. But I have had the pleasure over the last number of years of seeing the children of these immigrants—depressed peasants, very often, from those parts of Europe to which I have referred—play a very important part in the life of our country.

Indeed, just over a week ago I had the privilege of being able to accept an invitation to witness the opening of a large Roman Catholic church in my constituency, and I was very happy indeed to meet the new bishop of Saskatoon. Many of the immigrants who came from eastern Europe gave all their children an opportunity to integrate themselves into the life of this country, and among them is the new bishop of Saskatoon who, I am certain, will play a very worthy and important part in the life of the province to which his parents came.

It made me feel a little bit older than I am, because he was born near the town when I was principal at Sedley, Saskatchewan. It made me feel that, after all, life was passing along. I think I had some of his family at school in those days. I just mention that matter in passing, because, as I say, I am not so much worried about the ethnic origin of people who are coming to this country. Of course, I want to see the people who come here become imbued with our spirit of democracy, to understand our parliamentary and other democratic institutions, and to become good citizens of Canada. That I have seen them do. If we have a carefully planned system of immigration I believe that we shall meet with the success that we have met in the past. We have an excellent school system in our various provinces. The teachers in the schools throughout the years have done a great deal indeed to build up the kind of citizenship of which I think we can all be proud, not only in western Canada but all over this country.

What I was going to say is this. I think every care should be exercised to see that immigrants, when they plan to come to this country, are given a correct impression of what they will find when they reach here. I am also going to say, from my own personal experience, that I was fortunate, as I have already said, about the Alberta people among whom I landed 45 years ago. But I recall an immigration lecture which I heard before leaving Devonshire.

I had bought my ticket to Edmonton, Alberta, in January 1910. Shortly afterwards an immigration agent from the government or from the railways—I forget which it was—visited the little town where I was born and where I was at that time. I went to the lecture and I saw some beautiful pictures of Canada. Among them was a picture of the city to which I was going, namely the city of Edmonton. Then the next picture that was thrown on the screen was that of rather nice-looking girls picking peaches in an orchard. The placing together of those two pictures led me to think that when I got to Edmonton I would find peach orchards. As a matter of fact, I remember driving from Strathcona, as it was then—it is south Edmonton now—into north Edmonton as it is today, because there was no C.P.R. station there then; and crossing the river valley by bus I saw some cottages with a few little trees that I understood afterwards were poplar trees. I turned to a gentleman whom I had met on the train and had been talking to, and I said, "I suppose those are peach trees". That was the effect of the placing on the screen of two pictures in close proximity.

An hon. Member: What about the girls?

Mr. Coldwell: I was already engaged to be married at the time so perhaps I was not as interested in the girls; but they were very nice-looking girls, I remember. That brings me to this point. What was being done in those days is being done now.

I have here a clipping from a London evening paper—it is from an issue in February of this year—containing a report of a lecture in the civic hall at Croydon early in February. We are told that there was an audience of 800. The article says this:

> Canada was in need of many types of workers, but the main shortage was in artisans, farmers, qualified nurses, shorthand typists and domestic helpers, said Mr. Don Brown,—

I do not know who Mr. Don Brown is. I am quite sure he is not our colleague from Essex West.

> —a Canadian government official, at an emigration lecture, organized by Messrs. Thomas Cook & Son, and held at the civic hall, Croydon, on Monday.

The heading of this article is, "What Canada Offers her Immigrants: Work for All, Low Cost of Living, Lower Taxes".

Mr. Fulton: Government policy!

Mr. Coldwell: Then the article goes on to state:

> It was impossible to guarantee jobs or living accommodation before immigrants arrived, as much depended on the qualifications, experience and personality of the individual, but in a land as vast as Canada it was not hard to find work.

I have not much quarrel with that statement.

Mr. Harris: I would not think you would.

Mr. Coldwell: The article continues:

> Some people found places to live in only a few weeks after they arrived but usually it took three to six months.

Then it goes on to speak of the number of houses we have built. Then it continues:

> The houses were usually detached bungalows with central heating and built-in cupboards, each with about six rooms.

An immigrant would be puzzled to find living accommodation of that description. Then it goes on to say this:

> The national average wage was about £20 a week, but even emigrants who were fully qualified could not expect to earn that amount for the first few months, because they would have to adapt themselves to Canadian standards and ways of life.

Then the following is in quotes:

"The cost of living in Canada is less than it is here—

That is in Britain.

—and the average man can save 12 per cent of his weekly wage and still have a car, television and washing machine," added Mr. Brown. "He can earn £17 a week without paying any tax at all."—

Mr. Fulton: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coldwell: The article continues:

"Income tax is about a third of what you would pay in England."

Mr. Fulton: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coldwell: I venture to think that if any of those 800 people came to Canada as a result of that lecture, they would be disillusioned and disappointed, would write letters back to this London evening paper and would tell them how they had been tricked into believing that conditions were quite different from what they actually are in this country. That kind of thing hurts immigration rather than aids it. The article went on to talk about education for the children. It states:

Education was under the control of the various provinces, but it was free up to the university standard and, even then, only a nominal fee was charged.

In most provinces today high school education requires some fee. I would not call the university fees today nominal fees. Nor would I agree with this statement:

Many students paid for their own college education by working during the summer holidays.

They can help themselves through college or university during their summer holidays, but with university fees what they are today and the cost of board and room what it is today, a statement of that description is also deceptive.

Of course the British immigrant is now becoming extremely conscious of the fact that we have no national health plan in this country, and that our social security system is incomplete and behind their own. Consequently Mr. Brown had this to say:

There was no national health scheme as such, but there were many comparable services, and a form of family allowance which was payable for each child, including the first.

A lecture of that description is, I think, deceptive and wholly wrong and should be stopped by our Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

As if to confirm all this, I have in my hand a letter received sometime ago from a gentleman who lived in Canada for a long time. He reminds me that I met him on two or three occasions in the city of Toronto. I am not going to read his letter, but I am going to say that he tells me that he had lived in Canada for 40 years and that he is a 100 per cent imperial pensioner. He says he went to England to live—he is not an Englishman; he is a Scandinavian—because he could not exist in Canada on an imperial pension. That gives the opposite side of the story that the cost of living is less in Canada than it is in the United Kingdom. Then he goes on to tell me that he was in a shipping office near the place from which the letter was written, namely Thirsk, Yorkshire, in England, an agency for the Canadian Pacific Railway, where a young man was giving a lecture on Canada and trying to persuade people to emigrate to this country. This man goes on to say:

. . . it sounded so lovely, lots of houses, lots of jobs at $60 a week, no worries of any kind, pictures of Canadian farms, typical farms, with huge houses and lots of cows around them, no trouble to get one of these anywhere you like, just buy a ticket on the C.P.R. . . .

He goes on to say:

Now I know Canada needs population, but to drag people from the farm here with a lot of false promises is not fair, as England's biggest problem is food and they are desperate for farm workers here. I met a family here a day or so ago that went out to Canada three months ago and had to live all over the place and nobody wanted mother because she had done wrong and had a baby. What about that?

I will be glad to show the minister the letter afterwards. Of course I saw, as I have no doubt the minister did, the story in the Journal of June 23 of the 20-year-old German immigrant who said that he had been lured to Canada by promises of immigration officials in Germany of "a job for every man within 48 hours". I am drawing these cases to the attention of the minister so that greater care may be exercised. As one who was an immigrant to this country many years ago, I know perfectly well that there is no need to present a false picture, that if a person coming here is told the truth about this country, if he is willing to fit into the community and do what he can for himself and the community in which he lives in Canada, he will be perfectly all right. I think there is no country in the world which offers greater opportunities to young men or young women than does Canada. What I am saying to the minister is that we have got to be careful that we do not give an entirely false picture and cause disillusionment and bitter disappointment.

I also want to say something about the sponsoring of immigrants. I believe that Canada recognizes certain organizations as sponsoring organizations, shall I call them.

We have the Lutheran or so-called confessional groups in Germany, certain Roman Catholic organizations and other organizations. Yesterday I met in this city a German lady who is here to attend the international conference of social workers or the conference of international social workers—I forget which is correct—in Toronto in the next few days. She was telling me about the international labour assistance organization which has its headquarters in Brussels. It is of course a non-communist organization and is associated with the international federation of trade unions, which of course is an anti-communist international organization. Incidentally, our two labour congresses are both members of the international federation of trade unions, and I believe that through the international trade union organization they make some contribution towards the international labour assistance organization. This organization not only assists in the immigration of displaced persons. This lady told me that she knew the organization had some 500 suitable immigrants who wanted to come to Canada.

The organization is recognized by the economic and social council of the United Nations. In addition to assisting able-bodied immigrants to emigrate to other countries, it is also active in looking after some of those who are unable to look after themselves, the aged and the sick. I think the immigration branch might look into this organization through our embassies and other channels with a view to making use of it and giving it recognition, because that is important. These organizations usually receive financial support from semi-private or private sources like the Ford foundation, and recognition by Canada would be very helpful in obtaining assistance from such sources. I ask the minister to look into the matter and see if something can be done to accord some recognition to a worth-while organization of this description.

The hon. member for Kamloops mentioned discrimination. I feel that there has been discrimination in the department of immigration. I quite agree with all that he had to say about our Chinese immigrants. I know many worthy Chinese who are now citizens of Canada who have had great difficulty in obtaining the admission of their children to this country. I support the hon. member for Kamloops in the plea he has made that the method of determining parentage should be reviewed by the department and that sworn statements might be given more credence than has been the case in the past.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

But I do not think that discrimination stops there. I can think of some of our commonwealth associates, people from the West Indies, for example, where some of the oldest colonies of Britain are situated, people who have been associated with us in bonds of citizenship for centuries. If these people from the West Indies are coloured or even slightly coloured they have a very difficult task in trying to get into our country and settle here. Even if they are students they have difficulties in remaining here beyond the time they have set as being required for them to obtain their degree or education.

Of course the same applies to the East Indians. I do not know how long our Indian fellow associates in the British commonwealth are going to tolerate discrimination against people of East Indian origin. In other respects also I think there has been discrimination. I have heard from time to time about discrimination even in the choice of people from Europe.

At the end of the war we had departmental officials overseas who thought that every person who was more or less socialistic or associated with a socialistic organization was a communist. Yet among the bitterest opponents of modern communism are those to be found in the socialist parties of Europe. Before we send officials over there to screen people we should be very careful to see that they are told exactly what the position is in that respect.

I have said something about immigration. I want to make it perfectly clear first of all that I think the minister's policy of having a cut-off date so that immigrants will not arrive here in the depth of winter or in autumn when winter is approaching and be faced with hardships is a good policy. I support that. I think that immigration should be properly planned. We should try to bring in immigrants and place them where they can be placed without displacing Canadian workers. If displacement of Canadian workers is allowed, I think it will cause a great deal of opposition to immigration as such. This country requires more population and the opportunities that are here for great expansion should be taken advantage of under a careful plan.

There is one other group I should like to mention in connection with immigration. I believe our department might perhaps give a little more attention to trying to bring in orphans for adoption. I know of people in this country who are sending over $15 each month to Europe to maintain a war orphan in Europe. I believe that end would be much better served if we could bring a child into this country, and place that child in a good

Canadian home, because there are homes that are seeking children for adoption. The child could be brought up in a Canadian home, in a Canadian environment and then would become a first class citizen of our country. I mention the immigration of orphans as worthy of consideration.

I do not want to speak too long, but I want to say one other thing in connection with the Indian department. I was very happy last night to hear about the situation at Sarnia. I believe that the minister, in encouraging the co-education, if you like, of Indian and Canadian children—Indians are of course Canadians but I mean children of Indian origin and children of Anglo-Saxon, French and other origins—is doing a good thing. I believe that is something that should be encouraged everywhere. I have never been satisfied with the residential school as the solution to our Indian problem; I have never been satisfied that was a wise thing. I know it is not always possible, but I think it would be better to have these Indian children mixing, in so far as possible, with white children. They may be in separate schools or public schools, but let the two groups attend the same school. I am convinced if that is done we shall find the Indian child has just the same kind of ability as the average white child. I do not believe there is any difference in individual aptitudes or intelligence because of the colour of the skin.

I am quite sure that in the past we have not given the Indian child the opportunity that child should have had to live a full and decent life. I know we are not touching on health, but it is satisfactory to know that the health of the Indian population is being improved by the provinces and the dominion in co-operation with one another. This has resulted in an increase in the Indian population. I believe that is all to the good. After all, the Indians are the original occupants of this country and have a culture of their own. I have never agreed with the view that was expressed in some quarters half a century ago that time would settle the Indian problem because the Indians would become extinct. I am happy to know that is not happening. Given the opportunities for education, I believe that the Indian boy and girl can achieve an educational standing and enter useful fields of endeavour, not only on the farm and in industry, but in some of the higher branches of learning. I am, therefore, very happy to know that the minister is encouraging this type of association and co-education.

I know that the house is hoping to prorogue today, so I propose to take up no more time with this department. I have tried to say all I want to say at the moment. I believe we are all interested in doing the best to promote the kind of immigration we believe will build up the kind of Canada that we hope will develop in the future.

Mr. Drew: May I say that I do not intend to make a comprehensive review of the subject, in view of the extremely able analysis of it that has been presented by the hon. member for Kamloops on behalf of our party. May I say that I agree substantially with almost everything that has been said by the leader of the C.C.F. party. I would not wish to be misunderstood, but I could not help noticing his statement that the socialist parties are the most ardent antagonists of communism. May I say, without any reservation, that my regard for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is such that I can support from my own knowledge any statement as to his very strong views on that, but I hesitate to let his statement go unchallenged.

Mr. Coldwell: Perhaps I should put it the other way around, that the socialist parties of Europe are the most hated by the communist party.

Mr. Drew: That, of course, opens the door to other approaches, and I do not wish to extend the argument through a historical review. However, I would not like to forget that Mr. Nenni of the socialist party in Italy is not offering a very good example of opposition to the communist party.

Mr. Coldwell: There are black sheep in every group.

Mr. Drew: We all have them, but I do want to make it clear in raising that question that my personal regard for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is such that I would not in any way associate the comments I am making about any party elsewhere with my own belief as to his own firm stand on this subject.

I do wish also to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Peace River, who stood aside to permit me to speak because I have an appointment at 12.30. May I just interpolate, Mr. Chairman, another aside that has not to do with immigration. In view of the press report which I hear appeared this morning, I hope that this will not be taken as evidence of forming some alliance between the Conservative and Social Credit parties. I might say that the other comments to that effect are just as ridiculous as any suggestion of this kind would be. My statements in regard to our position as a Conservative party are clearly on record in that respect. With very high regard for the individuals who belong to the other party, I have made it clear our views are very strong in regard to the position of our own party. I am quite convinced from things I have seen that the hon. member for Peace River is equally strong in his statement as to the very great difference of opinion on their side as well. I do not want, therefore, any of those who have made these ridiculous statements anonymously, which were picked up in the press this morning, to suggest that this gives confirming evidence of the childish statements that were referred to earlier this morning.

Now, coming to the subject of immigration, I wish to deal with certain specific points that are outside of the ambit of the excellent presentation that has been made in regard to this subject by the hon. member for Kamloops. I want to deal, first of all, with the ethnic press. I deal with that first because I believe there is something here of tremendous importance in relation to the newcomers to Canada who are neither of Anglo-Saxon nor of French stock. In Canada there are a substantial number of newspapers published in the language of those who are making Canada their home. Each one of us, recognizing the difficulty we have in learning even a second language right in our country under the methods of instruction that we have, will realize that many of the newcomers are going to have great difficulty, I am sure, in reading English. For that reason, they will naturally turn to the newspapers that are printed in the language to which they are accustomed.

It is very important to remember that there are some 25 communist newspapers in Canada, openly declared communist newspapers, appearing in the language of these newcomers. Most of them, unhappily, are published in Toronto. That, I hope, is because of its central location rather than for any other reason. For people anxious to read news in their own tongues, people anxious to read news in perhaps the only language they are able to read, for the time being, will be very likely to avail themselves of the opportunity of reading whatever is presented. And I think it is of very great importance to us that we assist in every way we can those democratic, loyal and very earnest publications which are anxious to create a spirit of real affection for Canada.

I think that can be done in different ways. We know that a great deal of money is spent in this country for advertising. Sometimes we are critical of the total amount. There are certain types of advertising which I think are legitimate in every way, and which perhaps could be increased, while others are decreased. I think it is very important that the ethnic press, which reaches a very large number of people who still find it difficult to read in either English or French, should receive their fair share of advertisements from all departments of government. I do not think we should look upon this merely as giving financial assistance to the ethnic press. I think we should recognize it as a channel through which government agencies could reach people in a way that cannot be done otherwise. However, even if sometimes it were a case of assisting them financially, I would still feel that it would be justified under the circumstances I have outlined.

We should remember that the communist press is well financed. It is financed from Russia. They get news dispatches from behind the iron curtain—very long news dispatches, for which they pay nothing. They get those regularly, in regular telegraph forms. Naturally this makes interesting reading for many people who came from those countries. The loyal ethnic press, the ethnic press that wishes to help all of us to advance the understanding of Canada on the part of newcomers from other lands, should receive encouragement not only from the government but from all our business advertisers, so that those people may be able to do better the job of citizenship which they can do so well.

The figures of the number of people affected by this situation are impressive. We know that not long ago these figures showed that of the more than a million people who have come to Canada since the end of the war, two-thirds are of neither Anglo-Saxon nor French stock. We know that a very large number of those people—close to 700,000—can be reached most easily through what we describe as the ethnic press. I therefore ask the government, and particularly the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, to recognize the advantages of reaching the people through notices that would be designed particularly for them as to ways in which they can have things done that need to be done in this country. This would help the newcomers, it would help the press and it would help all Canadians. After all, these people who have chosen Canada as their home have a very special problem. They do not know where to go to get many things done. A mother may be about to have a child, but she may not have information as to how to reach a doctor, or what hospital facilities are available. Those who are seeking employment may not know where they can get information on that subject. And so it goes through a long range of subjects. And the ethnic press would be the best place to have that information available in a simple, compact and readily understandable form.

I can say from very careful observation of the contents of the anti-communist ethnic press, and from contact with the editors and publishers of those papers, that there are no people in Canada more anxious to instil in the minds of newcomers from countries whose languages they use in their publications a deep and abiding faith in the country they have chosen to make their home. I think it is important for each one of us, whether through channels of government, by personal association or by business advertising, to assist them in every way it can be done.

Now I wish to refer to something said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He spoke about the difficulty in connection with certain aspects of immigration; he spoke about some of the uncertainties in the handling of immigrants. I have referred to this subject before and shall not enlarge upon it now. I am satisfied a great deal could be done; I am satisfied a great deal should have been done long ago to simplify our immigration procedure overseas. There is no reason in the world why prospective immigrants should not have a simplified procedure which would bring together under a single roof most of the things that need to be done before they come here.

For instance, there is no reason why medical examination, information in regard to exchange and money, details in regard to transportation—every subject of that kind—should not be brought together under a single roof in those larger centres where these people are going to try to find out how they get to Canada.

Another thing that causes infinite heartache in the minds of prospective immigrants is uncertainty as to time and as to the method in which people are examined medically. They travel long distances to have medical examinations when, I am sure, local examination could take place just as satisfactorily. People in different countries of Europe are called upon to travel long distances which, having regard to their countries, would be considered just as great as if people here were called upon to go from Vancouver to Ottawa to be medically examined before undertaking some venture of this kind.

I am certain there is a more simplified procedure that could be followed. I am sure also that much could be done to give earlier knowledge of the time they are likely to leave, because most of these people are being vouched for by relatives on this side. We are dealing with human beings, people with deep family emotions—not with files of paper. People on this side are perhaps waiting in anguish, wondering what is happening on the other side, and all they learn is that inquiries have not been completed. Those inquiries are conducted under a wide-open power that really gives a measure of dictatorial authority that I would imagine the minister himself would hardly regard as being desirable.

This was summed up in an article which appeared in Toronto Saturday Night of May 22, where it says:

> The present Immigration Act obviously confers arbitrary powers on petty officials and leaves much too much room for discriminatory, unfair treatment of visitors and settlers. It is up to Mr. Harris to present to parliament amendments to the act which will make it a clear, just vehicle for the regulation of immigration—and at the same time to ensure that his department is organized to apply the regulations with courtesy and reason.

I am satisfied that that is a simple and moderate statement of the requirements, and that unfortunately we will not be able to satisfy those requirements at this time.

Before passing on to the next subject I wish to point out that this is not the first time we have waited until the last day of the session to deal with this vitally important subject. What we are dealing with is the growth of Canada. We are dealing with human beings who, we hope, are going to make good Canadian citizens. It is a subject of vital importance. Perhaps there is no more important department than the department of immigration. The way in which these newcomers in their hundreds of thousands are handled, dealt with and encouraged to become good Canadians is perhaps one of the things most vital and fundamental to the strength of this country in the future. Just to indicate that this is not something new, may I quote what I said on this subject on July 4, 1952, as reported at page 4276 of Hansard:

> Before we pass this item, I want to suggest that perhaps what is happening this afternoon indicates the advantage to any important department of holding its estimates off until the last moment. This subject is being discussed in an atmosphere of complacency that is wholly out of line with the sentiments of the people of this country generally toward the administration of this department. It has already been said today, and I feel sure it is true, that next to the burden of taxation and the high cost of living there is no single subject about which there is as much dissatisfaction as there is in regard to our over-all policy of immigration.

I said that on July 4, 1952; I repeat it today, but I repeat also that the people of this country are becoming increasingly concerned about the uncertainty as to what rules really do apply. Part of that uncertainty is due to the fact that the minister has not taken this house into his confidence to the extent that he should.

Supply—Citizenship and Immigration

I want to deal next with something that should have been cleaner up long ago. On March 15, 1952, an article was written by a highly qualified writer, Mr. Blair Fraser, in Maclean's magazine under the challenging title "How racketeers sold entry into Canada". Unless the facts are challenged, and they have not been satisfactorily challenged by the government, that article disclosed one of the most barefaced and heartless rackets in the history of this country. On a number of occasions questions have been asked in regard to this subject and as to what is being done. For instance, on December 9, 1952, I asked a question which had succeeded several earlier questions. I asked the following question on that day, as reported at pages 458 and 459 of Hansard:

I should like to ask a question of the minister of immigration. Is the minister in a position to report to the house what steps have been taken in connection with the disclosure of fraudulent conduct which was discussed in the house last session, and in respect of which we were informed inquiries were being conducted, and that action would be taken?

The present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who was the minister then, replied:

Yes. The charges against five or six people are now being prepared, in consultation with the Department of Justice. I think—although this is my own opinion—that they will likely be laid in the course of the next month, at the outside.

Whatever the department and the government have done about this matter following that, parliament has not heard about it. This is something that is not merely a case of prosecution of a few men. This discloses a wide-open, barefaced racket under which people were taking money to bring some immigrants here. Unhappily it would appear they were more successful in getting some of them here than those who have been following the normal methods have been. The fact is the success they have had in bringing people here only encourages racketeering of that kind. When they find the difficulties in following the normal methods they perhaps are encouraged to follow abnormal methods, and they may be encouraged to believe that that is part of the process of bringing people to this country. Not only do we want a clean record, in the opinion of countries from which we expect immigrants at this time, but we must make sure that any more rackets of this kind are disclosed in the utmost detail, and leave no uncertainty that this is being dealt with with justice, with even-handed consideration and in the firmest possible way, wherever irregularities are disclosed.

[Mr. Drew.]

The minister should bring this committee fully up to date in regard to this matter and let us know exactly what has taken place; not merely to prosecute if there have been grounds for prosecution, but to clean out the condition that made it possible for that racket to develop in the first place in different countries in Europe.

I want to deal with something that I regard as extremely serious. It has been mentioned here before. I just want to mention the tale of two men because they tell such a different story. I want to read first from a Canadian Press dispatch of April 14 of this year:

Hon. Walter Harris, immigration minister, has declined to comment on a departmental decision ordering the deportation to France of Mr. and Mrs. Henri Zorin of Quebec city. The Zorins were ordered deported after Mr. Zorin was convicted on a charge of assault and paid a $50 fine. Under immigration regulations immigrants convicted of crimes are deported automatically.

The assault charge arose in connection with Mr. Zorin's defence of his wife after she was assaulted in Quebec city. Mr. Zorin pleaded ignorance of Canadian laws and said he would have appealed the sentence if he had known that deportation would be automatic.

That man, defending his wife from assault, convicted formally in respect of that sentence, was deported. Let me refer to another very unusual case where a man is still enjoying the full advantages of living in Canada. I am going to refer again and in greater detail than I have before to a case that I think should cause concern to all Canadians, and above all it should cause concern to those people in responsible positions in our labour organizations who have done so much to establish respect for the standards of organized labour in Canada. I think we have every reason to be proud of the respect for law and order and the demands for respect for law and order which have been expressed by the great leaders of our recognized labour organizations in this country. It is for the reason that we want the very highest recognition of what has been done by men in positions of responsibility in the labour organizations of this country that I draw attention to this unusual case once again, because it is far from satisfactory that a man with the record he has should have been given the extraordinarily preferred treatment which contrasts so remarkably with that extended to Mr. Zorin who was deported—because a conviction automatically carries with it deportation.

I refer again to the case of a man named Harold Banks. This is a subject that involves not only the Department of Citizenship and Immigration but the Department of Justice and the Department of Labour as well. This man came to Canada some years ago for the specific purpose of carrying out activities of a particular kind in the way of labour organization. I think very real questions might be raised in regard to permitting him to come in under any circumstances if his record in the United States was actually known. I am unable to say whether his record was known at the time he came in. It has been known since then, however. I think it is important to realize that, as contrasted with Mr. Zorin, this man, having come in specifically for the purpose of organizing in Canada under a temporary permit, was admitted for permanent residence in Canada on May 8, 1952, after he had already been convicted under the Customs Act here in Canada the month before.

Surely if conviction in one case means deportation, conviction in another case should at least give rise to some inquiry as to the man's background before he is given permission to remain as a permanent resident. Therefore, I think it is necessary now to withdraw any veil of secrecy in regard to the record of this man, who has been in the courts of this country on more than one occasion since he came here.

I said before and I repeat that he demonstrated his acceptance of the privilege of being in Canada by being in possession of 36,000 smuggled cigarettes, in April 1952, and being convicted on a charge with respect to those cigarettes that month and fined $200. That was four times more than Mr. Zorin was fined. In addition to that, his automobile was seized, but was subsequently released because they were unable to prove that he had actually been the smuggler. But he was convicted of being in possession of 36,000 smuggled cigarettes the month before he was given permission to become a permanent resident in Canada.

This man had been convicted on different occasions in the United States. One of those convictions in 1930 carried with it a sentence of fourteen years in San Quentin prison. That, after all, is not something that should be disregarded, and it was known to the department before this man went to Geneva this year with the permission and approval of the Minister of Labour. His appointment was paid for from the general fund of the ILO to which Canada is a contributor, and in that way Canadian funds were used, through the formal approval of the government, to send this man as a Canadian representative at this gathering on this occasion dealing with a specific branch of labour organization activities.

That was not his first conviction in the United States. In a form of what we might call release, he received a rehabilitation certificate in March 1934 under which, as a result of an act of the governor of the state, he received what is called a certificate of pardon. That does not mean pardon in the sense of absolving an individual from the crime. It merely means that this rehabilitation certificate, in other words a declaration of good conduct by special order of the governor, was given this man, and he was released. But on December 5, 1947, at Richmond, California, he was charged as an ex-convict with being in possession of firearms. The formal charge in regard to firearms was dismissed and on a reduced charge of disturbing the peace he was convicted and fined $20 or ten days. This record was known to the government this year at the time this man went to Geneva and before he left. It was known to the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour as weli as to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an old rule, which should be firmly respected, that no man is guilty unless proved guilty and there must always be a presumption of innocence. But when you see facts such as this, and when you learn that this man came to Canada and was not only convicted under the Customs Act but also twice charged and acquitted here, one begins to inquire, and surely the pattern of charges should at least be a warning to the government. One cannot disregard the fact that this man was charged on June 28, 1942, with child stealing in the United States, though there is no evidence of conviction in that case. Later he was charged with murder and acquitted.

Now, let me emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that he was convicted on other charges. Surely there is some pattern here; and, in view of that, some concern must be felt when a man shows such a regular habit of getting into the courts under serious charges of this kind, no matter whether acquittals follow or not, and particularly when there are convictions for other crimes.

These factors were before this government, and these facts were known to this government for some time. Mr. Zorin defends his wife, is convicted of assault, and is deported to France. Mr. Banks carries on these activities and receives government acceptance of his nomination. Do not let the government say that the responsibility in this case was the responsibility of the highly respected members of one of our largest labour organizations. After all, they were not in possesion of these facts; they did not have this record which the government had; and they did not know his background. This man was the head of a union which was dealing with a type of organization that was directly related to the conference which was taking place in Geneva, and it might not be unnatural that his name would occur to them for nomination.

But it was the responsibility of the Minister of Labour, the responsibility of the Minister of Justice, and certainly the responsibility of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to consider the seriousness of this, because this question was raised in this house on several occasions before that man left. Why the difference between those two cases?

I think there is another point that should be considered, and this is something that should be of interest to organized labour in this country. While we certainly would not wish to keep out of Canada anyone who is desirous of coming to Canada, whose record is clean, and who is likely to become a good citizen, nevertheless I think that most of us might well like to feel that those who are in positions of great responsibility are men who are likely to become good Canadians.

Now, let us see what happens. This man is in the fortunate position of automatically drawing $500,000 a year through the dues paid to him. Nearly $300,000 of that amount comes from four main inland steamship companies, and the remainder from other companies with which he is associated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no evidence that he accounts for any of this. I should think the Minister of Labour would be extremely interested in a situation of that kind. I should think the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration would be extremely interested, and I should think also that the Minister of Justice would be greatly interested in the methods adopted in other departments to make sure that people coming into this country are likely to be law-abiding citizens. On the record, this man is most unlikely to be a good Canadian at any time. On the record, this man has not demonstrated that he is desirous of accepting our laws. He has already broken our laws on the basis of an established court conviction.

I say with deep sincerity—and, after all, out of long experience in a position of administrative responsibility—that I know how great undoubtedly is the desire of the heads of our unions in this country to maintain law and order and to make sure that every great labour organization is a part of the Canadian society in the very highest sense of that word. For that reason I would point out that we are still waiting to hear one word about the board of inquiry we were told would be set up with regard to this particular man.

I would have thought that the minister would have acted the very next morning, the moment these facts were brought to his attention, and that he would not have waited until they were brought out here in the house. If anything resulted from that inquiry, we do not know about it. We lack information not because a number of questions have not been asked; it is because we have not been taken into the confidence of the minister.

Mr. Chairman, the department of immigration is the department through which future citizens of Canada are brought into this country. I should like to know the reason for the difference in the treatment of the two men. Why was Mr. Zorin sent so promptly back to France? Why does Mr. Banks remain? Mr. Zorin's only offence, so far as we know, was that he defended the honour of his wife. Mr. Banks' record is before us for all to see. Even if there were not a single conviction, the regularity with which he finds his way through the doorways of the courts should in itself have proved to be some warning. No matter how many acquittals there may be, the extraordinary facility with which he gets involved in serious charges might in itself have led to some inquiry. There has been standing against him a conviction sufficiently important to call for a sentence of fourteen years in San Quentin penitentiary, of which number he served only four. Those are things which relate to the way in which we are going to bring people to Canada.

We have still unanswered those clear and specific charges that appeared in Maclean's magazine. We have unanswered questions that have been asked over and over again with regard to different people that are here. I could repeat several examples in addition to the Zorin case. I could name men whose service in the cause of freedom entitled them to consideration and respect but who have been harassed by the department while Mr. Banks has been living the life of Riley with the assistance of the government.

Mr. Chairman, this subject is too serious, even at this last day of the session, to be left wide open. If it is not possible for this subject to be fully dealt with, I submit that the unanswered disclosures call for one thing. Although the Prime Minister is not here, I press my request. May I say that I do not raise that point in any way as even implying criticism of the Prime Minister, because I know of the heavy responsibilities he accepts;

I know that right now he is preparing for an extremely important conference next week. But through the channels of Hansard and all the ministers who are here, I press with the utmost earnestness my request that a royal commission be appointed to inquire into the administration of the department of immigration so that we may know what lies behind these unanswered questions that are before us.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, it had not been my intention to lead off for our group in the discussion of this extremely important matter of immigration, but because of the illness of the gentleman who was to lead off for us I find it necessary to pinch-hit for him. I do so because I feel that this whole matter of immigration is of such great importance to Canada that there should be an expression from all groups in the House of Commons, either by way of criticism or commendation or caution to the minister and the officials of his department.

Immigration is of tremendous importance to a country like Canada. We find ourselves with vast expanses of a country which is sparsely populated. In a world of unrest and confusion, it is hardly likely that the people of overpopulated countries—people who could be classed as underprivileged people —would remain satisfied for long to look across the ocean and to see Canada carrying on in these vast domains with a population of 15 million people. That they would be satisfied is something that one just could not expect. There are many people in various countries who would be anxious to come to a country like Canada and to have an opportunity to carve out for themselves a home and to build up for themselves a decent standard of living. It is therefore true that one of our great problems today is to increase our population, and to do so in a way that will benefit the country as a whole and will make out of Canada the country that we want it to be. It is because I realize the importance of the matter that I decided I should say something about immigration.

In general I find myself in support of the minister's policy. It is a policy which could be described as one of selective immigration. Before I launch into a discussion of some of the matters that are related to selective immigration, may I just say a word about the minister himself. I feel that the minister is doing a good job. I have a high regard for him and for the attitude that he takes towards his work. He takes his work seriously and I know that he takes a pride in what he thinks is a good job. He has always given most careful attention to anything that I have brought before him, and I think I can say the same for every employee in his department. He not only takes a deep pride in what he thinks is a good job, but I believe that he goes out of his way to find out wherein his own feelings and policies may be at fault and that he tries to correct them. I wanted to say those things because I believe them to be true. They express my genuine feeling. I wanted to pass on that word of commendation to the minister because I know that in his efforts he will have to take a good many boots in the place that is built into men to be booted.

In our efforts to increase our population, I think we must continue to use care and good judgment. In our screening of prospective immigrants I think we should ever bear in mind that we want our Canadian population to be a choice people. That does not mean to say, by any means, that we are prejudiced against any people, no matter where they may live on the face of the earth. However, I believe that in Canada we have had a choice people. My judgment is that there is not on the face of the earth a people who can be said to be more choice than the Canadian population. I am taking it by and large from one end of the country to the other. Let us keep it so. We have had a high name. We have had a fine reputation through the whole world. Let us keep that reputation. We can keep it if we conduct our immigration policy with a single eye to continuing to build a choice Canadian population.

The people who love British ideals of freedom, justice and enterprise should, it seems to me, be the first considered for permanent entry into Canada. It is altogether too difficult in days like these to inculcate these principles into people who have not known them and who have not been educated in these ideas. There are too many areas on the face of the earth where people have not learned to appreciate British ideals of justice, freedom and enterprise. I think that in our screening we have got to be careful, at least until such time as our population has grown sufficiently by bringing in the choicest people. Then we may be able to relax a bit and allow some others to come when the great weight of opinion in the country will be such that newcomers can be easily taught who are unaware of our background and our ideals. I think, as I said, that we have got to be exceedingly careful at least for the time being. People who will come to love Canada and to make this country their home, with all that that implies, should receive the nod first.

I do not see any good sense in bringing prospective citizens into our country about whom there would be some doubt as to their ability to come to love the country. While

I am saying that, may I add that it is becoming increasingly difficult, under the barrage of propaganda that covers the entire earth, for people to concentrate their love upon country. Some call that nationalism, and they criticize this inculcation of love of country because they say it becomes narrow nationalism. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will take my chances with them before I will with these psychoneurotics who have no capacity to love anything and who call themselves citizens of the world.

We want the kind of people in the country who will come to love Canada. It is the only way we can build up that real patriotism, that real feeling of affection that will make them struggle for the country instead of against it. There are altogether too many who are capable of loving and living a lie. I have often thought of an expression which is not very wholesome in its sound, but it certainly carries the right connotation. Even a louse will cling to the flesh on which it feeds. I think we ought to think of that in connection with our immigration policy. We need in our country people who are ready to pioneer, who are ready to work and to put up with some hardships in order to win for themselves a measure of material security, people who at the same time will be prepared to take their responsibilities of citizenship.

In bringing that kind of people to our country I think it is important for us to give them every help and every encouragement that we can so that they can be prepared to take their responsibilities of citizenship. They have got to understand, and if they are to understand then we have got to be prepared to make the wisest use of their own languages.

Something has been said here today about the ethnic press. I support what the Leader of the Opposition said in that regard. I believe the ethnic press offers one of the finest ways by which we can get over to these newcomers to Canada in their own language, the language they understand and appreciate, what our ideals consist of, what we expect of them and how they can best integrate themselves into the Canadian way of life and protect themselves against the propaganda that all too often besets them immediately they enter the country.

I have been keenly interested in the possibilities of the use of the ethnic press to help our immigrants to this country. After talking with the editors of such papers, I have often wondered why it is that the foreign language press is neglected. I do not mean by not giving them moral support. That is not what I am trying to get over. I think that we should be going out of our way to give encouragement to the loyal foreign language press of this country; but, as I say, it is not merely a question of moral encouragement. There is another thing. According to Allan Boyd, who seems to be something of an authority on the foreign language press, the communist foreign language press in Canada is well organized, and the interesting thing is that it is well supported. How? Well, support means finance to keep the paper going, to make it possible to have sufficient employees of the kind required to do a job.

How is it that they can get advertising? They get it and they get plenty of it, but the loyal foreign language press cannot. It does seem to me that there are ways by which we can ensure these foreign language newspapers that are loyal the means by which they can continue to publish their efforts. Why would it not be possible for the federal and provincial governments to take advertising in these newspapers? The Post Office Department has to advertise. The Department of National Defence has to do a lot of advertising. The Department of Trade and Commerce has to do a great deal of advertising. Even the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has to do a lot of advertising.

I have heard such hon. members as the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace criticize expenditures for advertising. Nevertheless I feel that the government, if it is to make the wisest use of this great educational factor, should go out of the way to take advertising in the loyal foreign language press of Canada. I want to quote briefly the substance of something that was published in the Financial Post on November 1, 1952, in this same connection. Speaking of the use of the ethnic press, the article has this to say:

> Fighting the propaganda of the left-wing papers is Canada's democratic foreign language press. Editorially, all of the 139 free papers are for democracy and the Canadian way of life, though their effectiveness is sometimes hampered by the multitude of national factions and the opposing ideas they represent.

The article goes on to point out that the great weakness of the loyal foreign language press is lack of facilities, which is quite unlike the Kremlin-supported foreign language press in Canada. It goes on to say that the subversive effect of the Kremlin-supported papers is beyond our comprehension, and it must be remembered that these Kremlin-supported papers get into the hands of our immigrants immediately they arrive in this country. The papers are in their language and these people do not know and have no way of knowing. I say the best way to make it known to them is to use, by every means possible, the loyal foreign language press. The Financial Post article goes on to say:

Set against these inadequate tools—

Of the loyal press.

—is the editor's important responsibility to link the new world way of life with former traditions and to introduce Canada to his readers. Many of the editors—

Speaking of the loyal press.

—having experienced Soviet oppression have a dynamic yardstick with which to measure the value of Canadian freedom and are eager to combat subversive elements among their peoples. They actually make up one of the most active anti-communist groups in the country today. Often, because of their limited, personal resources, it's an unequal battle.

Now, let us see that it is made a more equal battle. I support by every vehemence at my command the appeal made in this connection by the Leader of the Opposition.

There is another thing I believe we ought to keep in mind as we contemplate the policies we shall follow with respect to screening and measuring the type of prospective immigrants. I believe that in making our selection we should be sure that the selectees have a proper background, both of tradition and of experience, so as to be better able to find and properly fill positions that will yield them a satisfactory living in this country. In this connection, I think we should be exceedingly careful to ensure that our prospective immigrants know exactly the conditions to which they are coming in Canada. Much has been said about that already, and I shall not repeat it. Let us not be guilty of continuing to allow beautiful pictures to be presented to these prospective immigrants, pictures that prove not to be in keeping with the facts when they arrive here. Let us give them the truth, and see that they get the truth. Furthermore, let us be sure that when they do come they are the type of people who can fit into the jobs that are here for them.

I am not one of those who worry too much about the matter of employment. I know a lot has been said by various groups and labour unions who think that immigration is too rapid. We have to use some caution, of course, but I believe that if we are reasonably cautious about the speed of the application of our immigration plans we can assure every single one of these people who come a decent job. I believe, with the Globe and Mail, as expressed in their editorial of December 15, 1953, that every immigrant who comes into the country, who is a capable and well selected immigrant, makes jobs for people. I believe that is a fact. I heard a delightful talk by the minister of immigration down at the Chateau Laurier not so long ago on the occasion of the annual scout dinner.

I recall a lot of the things he said, and when this Globe and Mail editorial was drawn to my attention, I discovered that one of the employees of the department of immigration, speaking at Niagara Falls last autumn, had said almost essentially the things the minister said down at that dinner. I just wanted to mention one or two of the things that were pointed out in this editorial, which is headed, "One in Five". It starts out this way:

Sometime early in the new year, Canada will receive its millionth post-war immigrant. This newspaper would sooner it were the two millionth or three millionth, because it firmly believes that Canada's biggest problem—and the root of nearly all the other problems—is its lack of population.

I want to point out to the Globe and Mail that it is just as well not to get into too big a hurry. I think we ought to take a reasonable speed and keep it. Then, the editor goes on:

This is not a desirable state of affairs. Nor, we believe, is it necessary. Given proper leadership at the top, the Canadian people would accept large-scale immigration as a basic principle of national policy.

I emphasize that. Farther down the editorial continues:

. . . Mr. John D. Sharp, the department's regional liaison officer at Niagara Falls, last week showed that city's junior chamber of commerce how immigrants make jobs for established Canadians. He pointed out that about 38 per cent of post-war immigrants have bought cars;—

I remember the minister mentioned that down at the Chateau Laurier.

—and about 40 per cent own their own homes. Something more than 40 per cent have household appliances, such as refrigerators, and 52 per cent are living in single-family houses with everything that implies in the way of domestic purchases.

I point out, Mr. Chairman, those are impressive figures, and they indicate clearly that those people who are being brought to this country are successfully integrating themselves into Canadian life. They are not putting other people out of work because every time they buy an automobile or an electrical appliance or a home, they are giving work to some Canadian people who are already established here. I do not, therefore, fear too much any large scale immigration, so long as it is brought about under careful screening arrangements and a carefully selective policy.

Something has been said about discrimination, and the Chinese have been mentioned. I have had quite a lot of experience in this matter, and I want to preface what I have to say about it with this remark. Taking it by and large, the Chinese people of this country are good citizens. I have found nearly all whom I have met good Canadian citizens. They are ready to take their responsibilities. I know the problem the minister is facing, but I do believe that on some occasions too little attention has been paid to the sworn statements purporting to establish relationships between prospective Canadian immigrants and Canadian citizens who have been in the country for many years.

I know something of the problems involved, but I keep coming back to the pertinent fact that in these things we are dealing with human beings who have just as poignant feelings, deep and tender emotions, as we have even though their skins may be a different colour. There are many borderline cases, difficult to handle. I know it is difficult, under present circumstances, to establish true relationships between the applicant for entry into Canada and Canadian citizens already here, but they are not so many in number. I believe because they are not so numerous we might perhaps relax a little bit in connection with some of these cases and allow the children to come in.

I know of cases, for example, where the wives of Canadian citizens remained in the old country, and when the communist revolution took place they went through untold suffering. Actually, some of them did adopt the children of brothers and sisters who were killed in the communist coup. In all respects it would seem to me that these children belong to the mother who took them, cared for them, and adopted them. It does seem to me that in the few cases that could be clearly established, even though those children may not be under the age limit, we could relax the act. I believe it would be wise to strain a point and let them come in with the mother and father and keep together. I believe they would make good Canadian citizens. As I say, they are so few in number, it would not complicate our problem here very much, if at all. Even though in their great care to fulfil the letter of the law I feel the departmental officials, in some cases, have been too discriminatory, nevertheless I have always found the immigration officials ready and willing to re-examine the facts. I have discovered that, and I want to pay that tribute to them. They have always been ready and willing to re-examine facts and, it seems to me, they have done a good job.

I do not want to take too much time because I realize we want to get to the end of this session. However, I would have liked time to refer to the Indian problem at some greater length, because I believe there is a real problem, and I would say only this to the minister, that that problem is in connection with band autonomy. I am sure he realizes that problem.

Some things have been said about granting Indian bands full autonomy, to determine who should be the members of bands and who should not. This matter is full of repercussions and dangers, and just how to handle the situation is not clear to me. I am afraid I cannot advise the minister on that point. I am sure however that it is something that will engage his attention because, now that bands are coming into some wealth—oil and other mineral wealth —it seems to me there is the inclination all too frequently that, in their exercise of autonomy, bands will try to limit their numbers unreasonably so as to make it possible for each member of a band to have more wealth.

That is a problem that will have to be faced. As I have said, I have not been able to determine just how it will be done. I would however ask that the minister give it his consideration, because it is a real problem.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Kamloops and others who have spoken, I regret that these important estimates have come so late in the session. It is a question of too little and too late—too little time to discuss them and too late to take advantage of that time.

I must say, in line with what some others have said, I am an immigrant. My parents were farming people in England, who came to this country and nearly froze to death on the prairies. Then we saw some magnificent advertising about British Columbia, the Kootenay country—apple trees in bloom halfway up the mountain. And when we got there, there were no trees in bloom, in fact no apple trees. I remember my father purchasing some settlers' effects in Winnipeg, and there was included in those effects 200 feet of inch-and-a-half rope to pull the trees down. Well, we spent a lot of our money, but fortunately for us, some of our relatives died in England, and we survived that rather difficult period.

I do think the present unemployment situation and the criticism from various places indicate certain weaknesses in the government's immigration policy. Let me say before proceeding further that I realize fully the difficulties of the minister's task.

People have a habit of rising in the house and asking for a vigorous immigration policy, and then of rising again and complaining about unemployment. I realize that, and I hope that in what I shall say I shall be strictly logical. However, growing dissatisfaction seems to be indicated by the representations made by municipalities, which representations, I am sure, the minister has received. It is indicated by the growing concern of trade unions and of certain Legion branches in some areas. It is also indicated in the correspondence received by members of the House of Commons—and in this connection I shall refer to one or two items.

I have here a telegram dated May 17 from the association of Kootenay municipalities which, I have no doubt, the minister also received. This organization represents 20 municipalities, and the telegram indicates that they are very much concerned about the unemployment situation, and the fact that unemployed immigrants were causing these municipalities certain expense. This is the telegram I received:

> The association of Kootenay municipalities respectfully suggest that the federal government immediately restrict that immigration which will in any way aggravate the unemployment of Canadian citizens.

And this is signed by Roger N. Chester, secretary. That is an indication that municipalities are experiencing some difficulty because of unemployed immigrants.

Then the Ottawa Journal of April 27, 1954, carried the following heading: "Sault Claims 1,000 Immigrants on Relief". The first paragraph states:

> An angry city council blasted the federal government last night for an immigration policy which it said had dumped 1,000 penniless and jobless immigrants on its relief rolls.

And it goes on in a similar vein.

Then I have here an article from the Nelson Daily News of April 17, 1954, under the heading "Employment of Destitute Immigrants by Works Projects Urged at Legion Meet". The article goes on to say that the East Kootenay Canadian Legion zone meeting discussed the plight of hundreds of immigrants who are now destitute from unemployment, and asked that the federal Department of Public Works undertake projects to relieve that condition.

I also have here an article from the Kootenay Free Press published in Trail. It is dated February 18, 1954, and carries the heading "Rain Soaks Jobless Immigrant's Hovel". It describes an immigrant living in a hovel made from lumber scantlings and cardboard.

And here I have the article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 23, and to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred, bearing the heading, "Jobs for All in 48 Hours Lure to German Immigrant." The item goes on to explain that this immigrant considered that Canada was oversold to him.

I believe this does indicate some lack of planning in respect of our immigration policy, and a certain lack of realism as to what the situation may be in Canada a few months ahead.

In addition to the criticism of the over-all policy, I find considerable criticism of the policy in respect of immigrants for farm work. This was discussed when the estimates of the Department of Labour were before us. It would seem that these people are pretty well coached in Europe. Some who are unsuited for farming say that they are coming to Canada to farm. They receive assistance, and then apparently they go into industry shortly after arrival.

There is considerable opposition from trade unions to the bringing of immigrants from Europe by railroad contractors, where these immigrants would find work on the railroads, where no collective agreements exist, and where they can be employed at lower wage scales and under poorer working conditions than exist where collective agreements are in effect.

I intend to ask some questions concerning a matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. However, as it is now one o'clock, perhaps I might be permitted to resume after lunch.

Mr. Harris: I am in agreement with my hon. friend, but I am wondering if we could shorten the lunch hour by making it two o'clock instead of two-thirty.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the lunch-hour adjournment shall end at two o'clock instead of two-thirty?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

---

The committee resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: In continuing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal briefly with a question that concerns the members of this group and I am sure a good many members of the house and a good many Canadians. Because there may be wives and children involved in these cases I am not going to mention names, I shall simply say, Mr. So and So.

Supply—Citizenship and Immigration

Earlier in the session the hon, member for Winnipeg North asked certain questions in the house as follows:

1. Are any French nationals now resident in Canada who have been convicted in the French courts of treason or of collaboration with the German occupying forces?

A. Yes.

2. If so, how many and who are they?

A. The department knows of the following:

Five names are mentioned. I continue:

3. How many, if any, entered the country illegally and have now been permitted to stay?

A. All the above named. Copies of the orders in council under which they were landed were tabled in the House of Commons on the 11th day of March, 1949.

4. How many have applied for Canadian citizenship?

A. Four.

5. How many have been granted Canadian citizenship?

A. Three.

Another set of questions was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North as follows:

1. When and how did . . . . . enter Canada?

A. On December 1, 1946, as a non-immigrant. As the House of Commons was informed on March 2, 1949, . . . . . was granted a landing under authority of order in council P.C. 2920, dated June 29, 1948.

2. Was he, at any time, an inspector of the Waffen SS?

A. Information not available.

3. Has he been sentenced in any French court for treason?

4. If so, what was the sentence?

A. He was sentenced to death in absentia by a French court of justice as guilty of having had dealings with a foreign power with a view to encouraging the undertakings of that power against France.

5. Has . . . . . been granted Canadian citizenship?

A. Yes.

In dealing with this subject I want to draw the attention of the committee to the section of the Immigration Act dealing with prohibited classes. Section 4 (1) (d) says:

persons who have been convicted of, or admit having committed, any crime involving moral turpitude.

These are the persons who are prohibited from entering Canada. Then again clause (r) reads:

(r) persons who have been found guilty of high treason or treason or of conspiring against His Majesty, or of assisting His Majesty's enemies in time of war, or of any similar offence against any of His Majesty's allies.

Section 10 of the Canadian Citizenship Act reads:

(1) the minister may, in his discretion, grant a certificate of citizenship to any person who is not a Canadian citizen and who makes application for that purpose and satisfies the court...

[Mr. Herridge.]

And so on.

Paragraph (b) reads:

(b) he has been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence therein;
(d) he is of good character.

In view of the law we cannot understand how these people were permitted to stay in Canada and how they were granted Canadian citizenship. We have in our possession copies of the judgments of the French courts, which were sent to us from Paris. I am not reading the judgments, but I am going to read a couple of lines with respect to the sentences in each case.

Mr. Harris: Which case?

Mr. Herridge: In fairness, Mr. Chairman, as I mentioned before, I do not want to give the names. I will send the minister my slip when I am through. The part of the judgment in the first case reads as follows:

. . . found guilty of anti-national actions against France, sentenced in absentia to imprisonment at hard labour for life and to national degradation for life, July 3, 1945, by the court of justice of Agen.

In the second case:

. . . sentenced to five years imprisonment and to national degradation for life by the court of justice of Toulouse for collaborationist sentiments.

In the third case:

. . . sentenced in absentia to the death penalty and forfeiture of all his property for treason, January 10, 1945, by the court of justice of Toulouse.

In the fourth case:

. . . sentenced in absentia by the court of justice of La Haute-Savoie to imprisonment at hard labour for life, national degradation for life and forfeiture of all property, February 26, 1946, for collaboration with the enemy.

In the fifth case:

. . . sentenced March 28, 1945, in absentia to death as guilty for dealings in time of war with a foreign power with a view to encourage that power against France.

Inspector Waffen S.S.

That means he was serving the German gestapo very well indeed.

These men entered Canada under false names, with false passports, and were provided with false visas. I might say that a high French government official stated they belonged to an organization who murdered the French minister, Georges Mandel, in the forest of Fontainebleau, massacred resisters, and betrayed allied parachutists who were hidden by brave Frenchmen who were shot. Some of these parachutists may have been some of our own men.

Canadian citizenship is a very valuable possession that should be granted only to persons who qualify according to the law.

When I was speaking on this question I could not help remembering the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in 1946 when he was introducing the Canadian Citizenship Act. I recall them vividly because I always take pleasure in listening to the organ-like cadences of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On that occasion he pulled out all the stops and the pedal fortissimo. I want to read a portion of that speech as it appears in Hansard of April 2, 1946, at page 505. This is the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was then the secretary of state, speaking:

> But there is no finer club in the world so far as we are concerned than the club that I would characterize as the Canadian family. We should want, therefore, to impress upon new Canadians whom we shall welcome and want to share in our national endeavours that they are joining no mean society but a society that will give them freedom and an opportunity perhaps that they have not had in other lands, and at the same time to point out to them the nature of the obligation undertaken and tell them something of the kind of country and the kind of general political basis of the Canadian society itself.

And then again the minister on page 502 of the same volume:

> For the national unity of Canada and for the future and greatness of this country it is felt to be of the utmost importance that all of us, new Canadians or old, have a consciousness of a common purpose and common interests as Canadians; that all of us be able to say with pride and say with meaning: "I am a Canadian citizen."

I am sure every hon. member of this house, Mr. Chairman, agrees with those sentiments. But we cannot understand how those sentiments can be given expression by a minister of this government when we find the sort of people I have mentioned being permitted to enter Canada and being granted citizenship in this country. The government of which the hon. gentleman is a member saw fit to grant citizenship to persons who have proved traitors to France, traitors to our cause, traitors to all we hold most precious and sacred, and traitors to the ideals upon which Canadian citizenship is based.

Those people now have the right to say, "I am a Canadian citizen." We in this group strongly protest this action and while I am not one of those who wish to see the death penalty imposed upon any person, I think that this government, when it discovered those persons were in Canada and had entered illegally, ought to have been told, in view of their records, to depart to more suitable places as Count de Bernonville did. There is no place in Canada, Mr. Chairman, for people who have proven themselves so untrue to all the things we stand for.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure investigations were held by the proper authorities in the immigration branch and by the R.C.M.P., but if there were, I am afraid they must have listened to the romantic tales told by those people. We think this house is entitled to an explanation of the reason why these people were given citizenship and allowed to stay in Canada. I am of the opinion that the minister was not told the facts by some of his officials before these decisions were made. We all have great respect for the minister, and while we differ with him on occasion I am quite sure he is very anxious to see that we have the right type of people coming to Canada, and obtaining citizenship.

The minister comes from a very fine Canadian family. He served with distinction in the second world war, and I am quite sure the hon. and gallant member must feel somewhat uncomfortable when he realizes that his department has made it possible for persons who were traitors to France and traitors to Christian civilization to say now, "I am a Canadian citizen."

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the minister will make some explanation to the house of this most unseemly procedure. I could give some other cases but we have not yet received the documents. However, these are not isolated cases and they are more extensive than appears on the surface.

I am confident that our immigration service overseas is not all it is supposed to be, not only with respect to matters brought before the house this morning by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, but also with respect to the glowing picture with which immigrants seem to be presented. The service does not appear to make certain in all cases that the people we admit to this country are people who can become good Canadian citizens and subscribe to our democratic ideals. In my opinion the minister would be well advised to go to Europe personally and visit some of his own immigration offices and see what is happening there.

I support some of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members who have spoken in this debate to the effect that there is not effective screening of some people who come to Canada at this time. I realize there are difficulties and even though there is careful screening some unsuitable people are bound to slip through the screen; but we are of the opinion that not enough attention is being given to stop that type of person.

I have had several questions brought to my attention recently, and indeed one of the managers of our national employment service brought to my attention the arrogance with which a former SS man treated him because he could not give him a job immediately. I can also tell you of an experience I had recently with another immigrant. I spoke to this chap because I am always interested in finding out how they are getting on, and I said to him, "How do you like Canada?" He said, "Well, not too much". I said, "What is wrong?" and he said, "In Canada you say 'Uncle Louie' and in Germany we say 'Herr Adenauer' ". I said, "What else is wrong?" and he said, "In Canada when a Canadian soldier is in a restaurant and a Canadian officer comes in he goes on eating. But in Germany when a German officer comes in a soldier stands up, salutes, and opens the door". Then I said, "What else?" and he replied, "Too many Jews in Canada. Hitler fixed them". I did not want to get upset with the man but I hope he will change his ideas after living here some time. However, that shows that we are getting people into Canada who, after all that has happened in recent years, have not any idea of what we stand for in this country. Certainly there are hundreds of thousands of good German people anxious to come to this country who want to live under improved conditions and accept our democratic way of life. But I do not think it is necessary to bring to this country people who still adhere to the philosophy of those who saw fit to join the German elite guard and SS troops. Now, that is all I am going to say in this connection.

I say these things with conviction and feeling because Canadian citizenship means something and it is something we should extend to people who in accepting it realize they are accepting one of the most valued citizenships in the world. I might add that the conversation with the man about whom I spoke was held in the presence of the widow of one of the finest men who ever lived in Canada, a man of Jewish descent and who died 10 years ago from his war disability.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I leave that subject at that point, and I now want to say a few words on our general immigration policy. I think that in certain aspects our policy, other than the policy for screening, is unfair to Canadians and unfair to the immigrants. I do not think we should bring in immigrants unless we are certain they are going to be placed in employment and are not going to compete with Canadians for already scarce housing. The present unplanned policy is unfair to Canadians and the immigrants concerned. It is now providing competition for employment and for scarce housing. We recognize our national responsibility to help ease the tremendous burdens created in Europe and other countries, and we think we have got to do all we can to provide homes for those people who need them. That is why the C.C.F. party has continually urged a certain program with respect to immigration. That program is an assurance that standards of employment, wages, hours, and conditions of work of immigrants shall not be less than those in effect for other Canadians. Careful preparation and planning to ensure that houses and jobs are available for those who come and that the livelihood and living standards of our present population are not threatened. Also, non-discriminatory selection of immigrants from all countries and categories subject only to the limitations of a planned immigration scheme. Our immigration policy should provide for the bringing to Canada of as many desirable immigrants as can be absorbed into our economy without creating unemployment or intensifying the housing shortage.

We should also make very certain that no undesirable persons are allowed into Canada or obtain Canadian citizenship. As I said before there are multitudes of good people from other lands who would make excellent citizens in this country. I also think we should stop bringing immigrants to Canada to work on contract labour on railroads and projects like that where there are no collective agreements and on which they can be exploited and employed for less than persons employed for that class of labour generally receive.

Now, I want to make a plea for the admission of certain persons who are relatives of Canadian citizens of Chinese origin and I would like to make that plea as vigorous as I can. I realize some of these people have been admitted to the country and permitted to obtain citizenship. I might say that I had a long association with many excellent Canadian citizens of Chinese origin. They never become charges of the state and never ask for any government assistance. That fact is recognized across this country. They live in peace and harmony with other residents and have become essential ingredients of many communities in Canada. I urge the minister to give serious consideration to the brief presented by the Chinese benevolent association in which they ask for an easing of the regulations. As a matter of fact, we are showing discrimination against certain Canadian citizens, namely these Canadian citizens of Chinese origin, East Indian origin and other origins. We are treating them differently from the way in which other citizens in Canada are treated. This brief asks for consideration of certain important things. I am not going to take the time to deal with them at the moment. I am sure that the minister has gone over the subject carefully.

I urge that the representations of these excellent Canadian citizens of Chinese origin be sympathetically considered by the minister and his department.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, it would appear that the committee is endeavouring to complete today consideration of this extremely important department. I therefore will not hold up matters unduly. However, I think it is unfortunate that we are pressed for time in considering such an important subject as the one that is before the committee at the present time.

The whole problem of immigration is one of the most complex ones that could be considered today because it deals with the subject of population movements. The movements of population have a vitally important bearing upon the delicate and difficult question of international affairs. Immigration is a matter that is extremely vital to Canada because, with the exception of a few North American Indians and Eskimos, all of us in this country are either immigrants or the descendants of immigrants.

Since the war there has been an increasing emphasis on the necessity for increasing our human resources just as rapidly as possible. In the discussion today other hon. members have referred to the present change in attitude with regard to immigration arising from the unemployment situation of the past winter. As a result of the changing economic circumstances as our post-war boom tends to settle down, we find that there have been extremes of optimism and pessimism expressed in regard to the problem of immigration. We still see rather extravagant prophecies as to the population potential of Canada for the immediate future. On the other hand, there are those who recommend a severe tightening up on the influx of new citizens by the process of immigration.

Coming as I do from the western part of Canada, I tend to side with the more optimistic viewpoint. Perhaps that is because we in the west are continually faced with the wide open spaces and it becomes almost inevitable that the westerner leans toward an optimistic attitude with regard to population prospects for the future.

In a newspaper comment which dealt with the observance of 40 years of political activity in this country by the Minister of Agriculture I was interested to read that, in summing up that long experience in the public life of his country, he stressed—and stressed it strongly—the need for a larger population. Then yesterday the hon. member for Rosthern, speaking on the subject of the Saskatchewan dam, also dealt with the population problem from the western point of view. In Manitoba we have reached a provincial population of 790,000. In that vast geographic area a population of 790,000 is merely the proverbial drop in the bucket. I can understand why the Minister of Agriculture and other hon. members on the government side of the chamber are leaning strongly towards the need for a rapid increase in population resources within the restrictions of the ebb and flow of the economic situation. The only final solution for our western problems, of course, is an expansion of the domestic markets by means of population increase.

All that is merely by way of introduction. We could spend a long time in discussing many of the points that have been raised. The fact that they are so numerous and so complex merely indicates that there is a great need for a comprehensive consideration of this important subject of immigration. Such a comprehensive consideration of the subject is not going to be possible today nor, unfortunately, has it been possible since I came to the House of Commons in 1951. Perhaps some time in the not too far distant future there might be provided an opportunity to come to more realistic grips with this subject which has so many facets and which has such great significance for a young, developing and expanding country such as is our Dominion of Canada.

I have endeavoured to look back into the record of Canadian immigration in the past since confederation. So far as I can see, there has never been an aggressive policy carried out in this regard. Since we became a nation, the tendency has been to drift with the tide and to proceed on the basis of a stop-and-go policy. As far as the historical record indicates, there has been a general lack of imagination and vision. The immigration influx from time to time has been determined more by circumstances outside of Canada than by vigorous action from within. There is a possible exception to that statement in the movement of immigrants into the western plains when they were first opened for settlement. But the other great periods of immigration have been largely the result of circumstances beyond the shores of Canada. An example of such a period is the post-world-war I period when, owing to disturbed conditions in Europe, there was a large influx of new citizens into Canada. Then along came the depression and up until 1947 or 1948 immigration remained comparatively static. In the report of the minister of mines and resources—under which department immigration was handled in those days—for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, at page 234 I was interested to read the following statement, which indicates that even during the depths of the depression the officials responsible had a somewhat guilty conscience concerning our half-hearted immigration program. The report says:

> Were it not for the fact that the Canadian public has become accustomed to small immigration returns from year to year the statement now published that Canada, with its vast territory and immense natural resources, received last year only 1,300 newcomers per month would be a matter of comment, having in mind the contribution that immigration has made to the opening up of the dominion in the past.

That state of affairs persisted, as I have indicated, until 1947. Then because of external pressure, again in the first instance largely arising from the refugee problem created by world war II, the government of Canada reluctantly moved into more active immigration again. As you read the debates of the house on immigration in the immediate post-war years or in the last two years of the war, 1944, 1945, 1946 and 1947, you see there was a growing demand that Canada do something regarding the very urgent problem of the millions of refugees who had emerged out of the war situation. I came to the conclusion that members of parliament expressing public opinion were away ahead of the government with regard to the problem of displaced persons. As the result of the urgings of members, action was finally taken in 1947 and since that time we have had a fairly aggressive immigration program. However, I cannot help but comment that as the result of this historic reluctance to act in an aggressive manner, which has been characteristic of Canadian immigration policy right from the beginning of confederation, we missed out on a good many excellent potential Canadians. We missed out on a large number of refugee children, and I cannot help but think that if we had adopted, on a permanent basis, with respect to refugee children a policy similar to that which was adopted in the early years of the war when children were evacuated temporarily from the United Kingdom because of the spread of aerial bombardment, we would have made a great humanitarian gesture, a gesture that would have paid off in rich dividends in the future.

That is water under the bridge, but I refer to that situation because it is still typical of the attitude we find prevailing with respect to immigration policy at the present time. There is a lack of broad imagination and vision, although as the result of public opinion and parliamentary pressure we are beginning to move forward.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

There is another aspect of immigration which interests me. It seems to me that we have largely ignored humanitarian considerations in our immigration program. The fact that we have waited for external pressure, instead of initiating any aggressive program in the past, is indicative of this situation. Our attitude towards deportation, which was outlined by the Leader of the Opposition and other speakers in this debate, is also typical of the lack of humanitarian concern. I think it is extremely unfortunate in view of the world situation in this mid-twentieth century period. There might have been some excuse for such an attitude in the past before the international concept of human activity emerged, but today we are forced to consider the age-old questions: Am I my brother's keeper? Who is my neighbour? Belief in the inherent inferiority and superiority of various races was fairly widely accepted even in Christian countries, notwithstanding the biblical dictum that He hath made of one blood all nations to dwell on the face of the earth. That belief in inherent inferiority and superiority was more or less generally accepted a few decades ago. But fortunately these ideas are tending to disappear under the pressure of circumstances as we are forced to rub shoulders more closely with the representatives of the various nations of the world.

Other members speaking today have referred to the broad principles and policy under which Canadian immigration is carried on, and I am not going to repeat what has already been said. I think all members of the house would agree that there must be some process of selection, on an ethnic basis, if you wish. You must keep out obvious undesirables, criminal types, mental incompetents and so forth, and the economic factor must be considered. But I am going to raise once more a subject that has been dealt with by almost every member who has spoken today, the question of the obvious discrimination towards Canadian citizens of Chinese origin. I feel that the legislation on our statute books respecting immigration is a carry-over from an attitude of mind that should have disappeared in our twentieth century civilization. I am not going to go into details concerning the Chinese problem, but it seems to me that the principle enunciated in the house on June 28, 1951, as recorded at page 4863 of Hansard, has not been applied as broadly as it might have been under the circumstances. At that time the minister, who had been questioned on a problem of the immigration of dependents of Canadian citizens of Chinese origin, said:

Having in mind the present situation in China—

He was referring of course to the political disturbances there.

—and the known desire of parents to have their children with them, we have come to the conclusion that we will give consideration to those cases of unmarried children over twenty-one up to the age of twenty-five, to see if the circumstances warrant their admission on the grounds I have stated.

On the grounds of hardship.

Now, that was a very encouraging announcement, because ever since the disturbing events on the Chinese mainland the problem of the movement of dependents of Canadian citizens of Chinese origin has become increasingly urgent. I find that in application, however, of this broader principle, it only applies to those who are the remaining survivors of the family on the mainland. If there is any other member of the family still resident within China, no exception is made in the 21-year limitation for unmarried children.

This has resulted in a problem that was inevitable. The children of Canadian citizens succeed in getting to Hong Kong, which is the jumping-off point to Canada; and, because of the narrow application of the regulation, that is as far as they get. I understand the brief from the Chinese benevolent society indicates there are some 6,000 of them in Hong Kong waiting permission to join a father, in most cases, because the Chinese population in this country has tended to be largely a male population, owing to earlier policy in regard to their admission.

Perhaps I could emphasize the problem by just giving broadly one or two cases. I am interested in two cases in which the children are between 21 and 25. One is the son of a Chinese laundryman who is alone, and looking for someone to take over his business. The other is the son of a Chinese Canadian restaurant owner, who again is alone and he is quite willing to sponsor his son. He is quite willing to assure the son will not become an economic liability, and to comply with all the other demands of our Canadian immigration policy. The only reason both children are not admissible is that there are relatives still remaining on the mainland. They are in Hong Kong. They cannot go back to the mainland on pain of death. I do not believe they would be too popular with the present regime there, and they cannot go forward because of the regulations. This does constitute a humanitarian problem of some considerable proportions.

I do not believe we need to labour that point any further. But it seems to require the sort of action that was finally taken in the immediate post-war years in dealing with the refugee problem in Europe. When the Canadian government finally did get under way, after pressure from parliament and public opinion, a tremendous job was done, but many lives were lost and much suffering was caused because we delayed our action in that regard.

I said that most members of the house agreed broadly with the present policy of the department of immigration. If there is one query I would raise it is the seemingly arbitrary power of the officials of the department. In order to assure flexibility in immigration affairs, it seems that officials of the department, by means of order in council, can almost control the immigration situation as they wish. This fact is illustrated in so far as deportation matters are concerned where the officials, without recourse to the normal channels of justice, can arbitrarily deport immigrants from this country.

There is another query that comes to my mind, and I have endeavoured to gather some information on this very complex problem. At the moment it would appear that the occupational categories are being strongly stressed with reference to the movement of immigrants from Europe. The categories that are being stressed are those of domestics and agricultural workers. In looking at the statistics for the past two years, 1952 and 1953, this has resulted in a rather substantial influx of immigrants from Holland, from Germany and from Italy. In endeavouring to obtain information on this matter, I find that the reason these categories apply to these particular countries is the obvious reason that they are more amenable to the work of domestics or agricultural workers. I find, looking at the statistics for immigration from Greece for 1952, we have 1,691 and for the calendar year 1953, we have 2,059.

I happen to know there is quite a strong demand for a less restrictive policy in regard to immigration from Greece. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Greek situation would be comparable to the Italian situation so far as domestic and labour requirements were concerned. The answer seems to be just the reverse, that the Greeks do not adapt as readily in this country as do the Italians. There are Greek citizens in Canada already who, it would seem, have made a very successful adjustment to their new life in Canada. Notwithstanding this occupational factor, I have discovered that it is not compulsory for an immigrant to remain indefinitely in domestic or agricultural work. In fact, the period of service at the maximum, I understand, is one year, and on the average the immigrants from those countries stay on the job to which they are originally sent for a period of some two months. There would seem to be other factors involved than the straight occupational requirement. Unfortunately, that is as far as I got with the inquiry because, as I say, it is a matter of policy, and nothing further could be said on the matter.

Other members want to have something to say in this discussion, so I should like to conclude by suggesting that a topic of such importance as immigration, connected as it is with the general problem of population and human resources of this country, should receive wider consideration by this house than it has in the past. During my first session here in 1951, amendments were introduced to the act. They had been passed before I was aware they were before the house. In 1952, when the new act was introduced, the experience was exactly the same. I would very strongly suggest that we would have a more realistic immigration policy if members were brought more closely in contact with the scheme of things. All these divergent viewpoints created the belief that immigrants are a threat to the workers in this country. On the other hand the urgent demand of the west for larger population can be reconciled only if members have an opportunity to gather all the information and data involved and then, on the basis of that information, determine the policy that is best for this country.

I do not think such an important matter should be left entirely in the hands of officials of the department. I realize that we are having almost a full day's debate on the subject, but I wonder if what has been said in this debate by hon. members will have much effect in changing the present attitude towards some of these urgent problems to which reference has already been made.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that, just as in the immediate post-war years, when we had a refugee problem to contend with, and there was a tremendous pressure of population in Europe, the people of Canada would be only too willing to make a maximum effort in assisting to solve this problem. Likewise I feel that if, through their elected representatives, the people are taken into the confidence of the department, and are allowed to have the necessary information, rather than simply be told that a certain person is inadmissible on grounds that cannot be revealed, we shall be able to come closer to a reconciliation of the pessimistic and optimistic viewpoints in these matters.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

In the past the people of Canada have been ahead of their government in their thinking, so far as this matter is concerned. They have responded, when they have been called upon to respond in connection with the solution of very urgent population problems in the world. They would respond today in a similar manner if they had the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am sure all of us appreciate the minister's difficulties in the matter of immigration at the present time. While I think most Canadians agree that a few million people cannot expect to hold half a continent indefinitely, while other countries in the world are crowded, and while most people are agreed that it would be in the interests of the over-all Canadian economy that we have a larger population to share our tax burden, our transportation charges and the like, the question becomes involved and one about which there is a great deal of disagreement when we run into a period such as we are facing at the present time.

So long as our economy was expanding, so long as there was full employment, so long as skilled mechanics were needed, industrial workers were needed and labourers were needed, the Canadian people generally welcomed immigration. But today, with several hundred thousand Canadians unemployed, and with limited housing accommodation, the people of Canada by and large resent the influx of large numbers of immigrants. During a period of unemployment trade unions across this country are questioning the right of the government to bring large numbers of immigrants to the country at this time, thus swelling the army of unemployed.

People who find difficulty securing housing accommodation often resent the fact that new Canadians can obtain housing, or occupy housing, the supply of which is very limited. The influx of large numbers of immigrants at a time such as this does not lend itself to the creation of a spirit of friendliness as between Canadian citizens and new Canadians, nor does it do anything but stir up trouble and difficulty.

Much as we need a larger population in this country, the first responsibility of the government, if it is to supply that need, and if the government is to admit large numbers of people to this country, is to take measures to see that employment is available, as well as housing accommodation.

There are certain sections of the press and certain interests across Canada that are clamouring for more immigration. Those same sections of the press and those same interests are generally decrying the fact that industrial workers are receiving too much money. They are decrying the fact that costs are going up, and they attribute the rise in those costs to the rising wage scales.

There are many special interests involved in bringing immigrants to this country. I would think that one of the minister's difficulties, one he must guard against in the interests of the whole country, is that he must see to it that the immigrants brought to this country are not brought here by any special interests, to serve those interests primarily. What we want in this country are immigrants who will become good Canadians, who are brought here for that purpose, and are not brought here for the purpose of serving any particular interest.

I suppose we have always been faced with the problem of employers interested in immigration for the sake of getting cheap labour. We have that class of employer with us today, and I am quite sure the minister would be the last person who would want to encourage immigration to serve special economic interests and to reduce the scale of wages for Canadian workers. It does not matter what that special group is, whether it is a religious group, a national group or an economic group, if that group is particularly interested in bringing immigrants to this country for the purpose of furthering the interests of that particular group, then I think the minister has to be on guard. We do not want this country filled up merely for the sake of filling it up with immigrants who are brought here to serve any particular interested group. As I have said before, in the interests of Canada, we want immigrants who will become worthy and loyal Canadian citizens.

I have a few special problems that I want to bring to the minister's attention. They are of a general nature and I think had better be brought up at this particular point. I have already spoken of employers bringing immigrants into this country for the sake of reducing our wage scale. Since early June I have had on the order paper a series of some thirteen questions, which were made an order for return a week ago, but the answers to which I have no hope whatever of receiving this session. These questions relate to one employer, the R. F. Welch company. Among other questions on the order paper, which probably the minister can answer today, are these: What arrangement, if any, has the R. F. Welch company with the department of immigration for the purpose of bringing immigrant workers to this country? Is my information correct that this particular company had an office established in some European countries, offices established on the maritime coast and offices established in the Union station at Toronto, next door to the government's own department of immigration? What is the nature of the contracts under which these workers are brought in by that company?

My information is that the immigrants brought into this country by that particular company are brought to work first of all on the Canadian National Railways. I am informed by trade union organizers that these newly arrived immigrants stay but a short time on their first job, and then are replaced by a new batch of immigrants. I am informed by the general chairman of the brotherhood of maintenance of way employees of the Canadian National Railways that the Canadian National Railways itself has been evading the order of a labour relations board, dated November, 1951, by transferring these newly arrived workers to the R. F. Welch company for payroll purposes, instead of keeping them on the Canadian National, and consequently are keeping these men employed at much lower rates than the rates fixed in the contract entered into with the workers union.

That is one problem I want to call to the minister's attention. Another complaint I get is that certain employers are able to persuade newly arrived immigrants that if they join a trade union, or participate in trade union activities, they will be deported. I should like the minister to tell us that personally. I doubt if anyone—

Mr. Harris: May I say at this moment I never heard of such a matter from anyone, and if my hon. friends know of any trade unions who have that complaint, will they please send it to me and talk about it with me before they bring it up here in this house. I have no objection to my hon. friend speaking, of course, but it is really unfortunate that we now hear for the first time of complaints that I have no opportunity to investigate.

Mr. Noseworthy: This whole matter can be cleared up with a statement from the minister to the effect that no one is ever deported from this country because he joined a legitimate trade union or participated in legitimate trade union activities.

Mr. Harris: I say that unhesitatingly, and if anybody suggested that that should be so I would oppose it in this house.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am very happy to have the minister put that statement on the record.

I have one other question to raise with the minister regarding immigration. It is one that I have dealt with on other occasions. I am merely going to ask the minister to tell us what action, if any, the government has taken or proposes to take as the result of the brief presented to him during the latter part of April by the Negro Citizenship Association on behalf of immigrants from the West Indies, those British subjects who, by regulation of the immigration department, are not British subjects and cannot be classified as British subjects for immigration purposes. What consideration was given to that brief? I shall not take the time of the committee to put the points of that brief on the record. The minister has the brief. I merely ask him to comment on it.

Mr. Michener: I do not wish to repeat, and therefore I shall limit my statement as to the principles involved to an affirmation of my belief that immigration is desirable and necessary, and that its general effect is clearly to add to the sum total of employment, although in some places and at some time it may seem to have the opposite effect. The specific matters I wish to bring up are matters of practice and I do say that with some diffidence because my experience with the administration of the act is limited and these are impressions formed from that rather limited experience.

I appreciate there have been instances which perhaps have generated an attitude of over-caution if not suspicion in the administration of the act in order to be sure that the department is not deceived in enforcing the act and the policy of the government.

I would like to make a plea for a more sympathetic approach in certain cases. Those cases are the ones in which family relationships are involved. In the name of common humanity it seems to me that in these cases the utmost amount of sympathy should be displayed in the administration of the act. After all, the subject matter of the administration is human beings and not chattels or livestock. They are people who have family relationships and family feelings. I have in mind three different sorts of cases which will illustrate the type of approach I am suggesting.

First, there is the case of a wife in England of a Canadian citizen living in Canada and naturally she wishes to join him here. Her difficulty is a scar on her lung which naturally is a matter of concern from the medical point of view. After her case had been deferred for some time and being in great anxiety to be accepted she visited private doctors and was examined apparently to their satisfaction, but permission is still being refused. That is a case of family separation and a case in which if there is any doubt I think a decision should be made in favour of family unity rather than the converse.

Then another type of case involves the nephew of a Polish Canadian resident engineer of reputation and standing who will shortly become a Canadian citizen. This case illustrates what I have in mind and regardless of the merits of the case I think it makes the point. This Polish uncle in Canada has no children and he and his wife established here wish to bring their nephew in and adopt and rear him as their own child. He is not an infant. He was behind the iron curtain as a young man in his late teens and he was so anxious to join his relatives that he shipped as a seaman on a Polish freighter and when he got into an English port he jumped overboard and swam ashore. He is in England now and would like to join his uncle. They would like to have him here. That is another case in which there are family ties involved and in which it seems to me a little different approach is needed than the cold and mechanical application of the immigration rules.

The third type of case is that of the children of Chinese Canadian citizens. Their plight has been dealt with sufficiently today and I wish to associate myself with what has been said on their behalf. There are not many involved and it seems to me that if any error is to be made in these cases it should be made, in cases where family ties are involved, in favour of unifying families rather than keeping them separated. If it is a matter of tipping the scales then I suggest that in such cases the scale ought to be tipped if necessary. It comes down to humanizing what might, where large numbers of people are involved, deteriorate into mechanical administration.

Another point in the administration of this act which involves thousands of decisions in the course of a year is the question of admittance. Since we had 168,000 admitted last year I think it would be fair to suppose that an equal number or perhaps even more were interviewed and not admitted. I realize this is a great administrative problem but it seems to me, as one who has been accustomed to the determination of truth in the open court where the parties are represented, that something of that procedure might well be applied to the department of immigration.

I am not well enough versed in the administration of the act to know whether counsel are allowed to appear with an applicant, but I do know in many cases it is difficult for the party involved to determine why a decision has been what it was. Very often if the applicant knew he could answer the objection, and it seems to me that what is in issue in these proceedings is of equal importance to the issues in criminal prosecutions or civil suits involving personal and property rights, and it warrants the same sort of treatment as a Canadian or foreign citizen can get under the judicial process.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, what I suggest is that the minister, who is also a lawyer, should look into the possibility of regularizing the procedure in a way in which those parties who come before administration officers for a decision involving their admission to Canada know the basis on which a decision will be taken, have the right to be represented, and the right to know that decision so that the whole matter be dealt with as far as possible in a judicial manner.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the hour is getting late I trust the minister will excuse me if I make my remarks almost in point form in order to save a little time.

First of all, I would like to say that in my dealings with the officers of the department I have always found the minister and his officials most considerate and they have always looked into any matters I have had occasion to inquire about with courtesy and promptness.

On the question of immigration I think we all agree, as many speakers have pointed out, that we must have more people in order to develop our country, create more employment and more markets. But I think the method of obtaining these people might be somewhat altered. I should like to say at the present time that very many fine people have come into this country, and in my own riding we have a great many people from The Netherlands about whom I would like to say that they are just about as fine a type of citizen as we have got from any place.

In regard to the policy of immigration there are one or two suggestions I would like to make. We have heard a great deal during this session and within the last few days about seasonal unemployment in Canada, and this seems to take place mainly during the months of December, January, February, and March. I imagine this suggestion has probably been explored by the department but if not I suggest that the minister look into the possibility of this suggestion. I suggest that immigrants should be brought into this country in months other than December, January, February, and March if at all possible because during these months seasonal unemployment is at its worst and it simply makes it more difficult to absorb these people into jobs.

The next thing about which I should like to make some brief remarks is the matter of the secrecy in which a good deal of the departmental work seems to go on. I fully realize that in matters of screening people that are coming into Canada and the methods that are used to do this naturally must be secret and cannot be open to the public. But in other things I cannot see why this great secrecy must prevail.

As a brief example, may I say that I had a case recently where a lady came over from Germany under an agreement to marry a man, but when she came here she did not marry him. She did not wish to do so and I understand she intimated that she did not wish to do so because she did not think he had sufficient finances; and she was looking for another more affluent husband. That may or may not have been true. Those are the reports that I received. I looked into the matter rather carefully. The department investigated the matter and probably did so much more carefully than I did. I made some inquiries of the department through the deputy minister. I said I should like to find out the results of their investigation. In a letter received from the deputy minister on June 2 last the following paragraph appeared:

> You ask that you be permitted to see the reports obtained in this case with reference to the failure to marry. Departmental records are strictly confidential and it is therefore impossible for me to accede to your request.

As I say, in matters of screening for national security I can see that those reports must be confidential. But in matters like this I can see no reason for keeping it in confidence. There is a question in this particular case whether people suitable or not suitable are being brought into this country. I think in those matters, where national security is not at stake, that these reports should be open to people who are interested in the case and in particular to members of the House of Commons.

There is one other remark that I should like to make at this time. I should like to put this in the form of a question to the minister. He may be familiar with the circumstances or he may not. It is a matter that aroused interest in western Ontario about a year ago or possibly a little longer. There were a great many reports in the newspaper at that time about German immigrants who were on farms, and about a large black car arriving, two or three people getting out and talking to the immigrant and the next day the immigrant had gone, lock, stock and barrel, or perhaps I should say bag and baggage.

Mr. Harris: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, but I think I can save him a great deal of time by saying that there was not a black car.

Mr. Nesbitt: Possibly it was a green one.

Mr. Harris: No. Just to settle the matter now, perhaps, and to save my hon. friend time, I might say this. All this difficulty arose because a black car with a Quebec licence, containing two immigrants, brother and uncle of the one in the hon. member's county, visited him on Sunday and he disappeared next day. The disappearance was blamed on this car.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am glad to hear that the minister has looked into the case and has investigated it. I am glad that is the explanation the minister received. However, I have had another explanation presented to me. Briefly it was as follows. Perhaps the minister would care to make a comment. I was told this as to a number of German immigrants who, I understand, had their passages assisted by the government on condition that they remain as agricultural labourers until such time as their passage is paid back. A number of them came over in those circumstances. I was told that certain manufacturers in various parts of the country—I understand from the province of Quebec in the textile industry—approached these people and agreed to pay off the amount they owed the government if they would work under a certain contract of labour for a period of time. These immigrants are told that if they break this contract they will be sent home. The purpose of this is that a number of people from Germany who were supposed to be agricultural labourers and really are not, got over here and got into factories where they wished to work and certain manufacturers, I understand, in this way obtained cheaper labour. As I say, I have had this report from two or three sources which I believe to be reliable. I have no factual information. I should like to put it to the minister in the form of a question on which he may wish to comment.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

The next thing I wish to mention is the matter of citizenship. I should like to make a few brief suggestions on the methods of presenting citizenship certificates at the present time. I fully realize that in the county courts at the present time—at least in some of them; I know it is done in our own county—a local judge makes a nice little speech to these people. If that procedure were followed out all through the country I am sure it would be highly satisfactory. When people who come to this country receive their citizenship certificates, I think the duties and responsibilities of citizenship should be impressed upon them to a little bit greater extent than is done at the present time. I just throw this out as a suggestion. The minister might, once a year, make a tour through the country and appear at a number of places—or, if owing to his duties he was unable to do so, the chief justice of each province could do something similar—and present the new citizens with their certificates of citizenship and give them a brief address at the time, or possibly a not so brief address, on the duties and responsibilities of citizenship in this country. At the same time possibly a booklet could be issued on the Canadian way of life, and everyman's edition of our constitution and form of government. I think that would be a good suggestion because when these people get their certificates mailed to them, that fact fails to impress upon them the duties of Canadian citizenship. I think that a little bit more solemnity in the matter would probably be of considerable benefit.

I have two further brief remarks to make. The first is on the national gallery. I think the national gallery of Canada is doing a particularly fine job. They have a fine collection of paintings, particularly Canadian paintings. I should like to see more of the money that is spent on paintings spent on Canadian paintings. Among the paintings there is a collection of paintings by one of our first painters, namely Cornelius Kreighoff. The Tom Thomson collection is very good. If it were possible to get more of them, I think it would be better. When people from other countries come to the national gallery here, they want to see evidence of Canadian culture. While the evidence there is very good at the present time, nevertheless I think there should be more. If large sums of money are to be spent on the acquisition of oil paintings, I think at least a large proportion of it should go for Canadian paintings.

The reason I mention this matter is that I recall the acquisition of five paintings by certain European artists for the sum of $360,000. I know the minister made some remarks about this matter some time ago, I believe at the end of last March. He said that these paintings were purchased for the purpose of illustrating certain periods of certain European schools of art. That may be all very well and good. But, as I pointed out, these pictures were painted by relatively obscure artists. There were five of them, and they cost a total of $360,000. That works out to about $72,000 apiece.

In this regard I refer to a news item in the Toronto Globe and Mail of Wednesday, May 19 last, which refers to the Toronto art gallery being robbed of a very famous painting. As a matter of fact, it was a world-famous painting called "Elevation of the Cross" by Peter Paul Rubens, who was certainly not an obscure artist. This painting was one of the more famous paintings in the world and it was valued at $30,000. I do not understand how these paintings by relatively obscure artists would be valued at $72,000 apiece. It is something that does not seem reasonable to me. Possibly the minister, when making his remarks, would care to give us a little bit of further information in this regard. I should be interested to know how these paintings were purchased. Was it by a private deal? Was it by public auction? Who did the purchasing and were any commissions paid? I think these matters are of considerable interest.

The last item I should like to mention or to which I should like to make a brief reference is the national film board. I think the work of this board has been very good in the past. Some of the movies, particularly the one "Stratford Adventure", as I believe it was called, is a particularly fine movie and I imagine that not only will it be a fine movie from a cultural point of view but probably it will be a money-maker, as I understand it is likely to be.

I should like to mention a play that has been written by Judge Eric Cross in our county and called "The Patriots".

He was formerly minister of municipal affairs for the province of Ontario, attorney general and also minister of education. He has had wide cultural experience and has done quite a bit of work in this field. This play, "The Patriots", is about Canada in the period from 1837 to 1848. It deals with the rebellion in Upper and Lower Canada. Robert Baldwin is the central figure and hero of the play. It deals with such famous people as Bishop Strachan, Samuel Lount, William Lyon Mackenzie, Louis Lafontaine and others. I have seen the play and have had some experience in one way and another in the theatre. I have seen many plays on Broadway not as good as this one written by Judge Eric Cross.

It has already been presented by Queen's University. It is being presented by the London Little Theatre next year, which is the largest little theatre in Canada. It was presented for five days this year by the Woodstock Little Theatre to capacity houses, and I understand that the province of Ontario is considering this play as possible reading for the Ontario schools.

It has been suggested that the play might very well be made into a movie by the national film board. I know there are many technical difficulties but I think the matter should be considered. It is a fine play from a theatrical and historical point of view. I know that Judge Cross spent many months in very careful research. Here we have a fine play, historically accurate, which would be of great educational benefit to the children in our schools. They could see our history in action, and I would strongly urge the minister to refer this matter to the national film board for consideration.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, among this storm of criticism I should like to inject a pleasanter note, if my hon. friends to my right will forgive me.

Mr. Fulton: You will spoil the whole atmosphere.

Mr. Knight: I do not think anyone can accuse me particularly of not performing my function of being a critic of the government at times and, indeed, of most of its work. However, I do want to say something which is a rather personal matter because it applies to the minister himself. I am not going to echo the words which would be spoken by the hon. member for Fort William if he were here because he would utter a sort of blanket benediction upon the cabinet minister as such. But I do want to pay him a tribute as a minister and as a man and to thank him personally for the courtesy, care and consideration which he has displayed with respect to any matter having to do with the admission of immigrants or other matters which I have had occasion to take up with him since he took over this portfolio. I do that without reservation but I do reserve of course my right to criticize when I feel it is justified. When I indicated to my hon. friend here that I was going to interject these remarks into this debate he said that probably the minister would consider that I had been softened up so far as criticism was concerned by the kindly acts. However, that was just in the spirit of fun. I simply want to reiterate what I had intended to say and what I did say when I rose from my seat.

Supply—Citizenship and Immigration

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I too want to say a few words on this question this afternoon. It has been many a day since I have listened to as many worth-while speeches and contributions as I have heard in the debate that has taken place today. I am not going to take very much time. In my opinion the hon. member for Kootenay West, the hon. member for Kamloops and the Leader of the Opposition presented the views of most Canadians today so far as immigration is concerned. I do want to say something about the question raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West with respect to the treatment that traitors to the cause of freedom have received and also the two cases that the Leader of the Opposition presented. They certainly seem to hurt. I do not think Canadians generally like that attitude and the way things were handled in these instances because on the other hand they see that it is very difficult for deserving people, sometimes relatives of people already in Canada, to get into this country because of one reason—I was going to say excuse—or another.

I know of one particular case. This man was turned down and there were questions asked and answers given. I made some inquiries in the country in which he lived. I had been led to believe by the immigration department that he was ill and not able to work. I found out that he was holding down two jobs in his own country, and when he finally arrived here he made a very good citizen. Maybe he was too good a worker and someone here was afraid that he was going to hold down two jobs. Maybe that is the reason someone did not want him.

I think it was the hon. member for Kootenay West who mentioned the matter of relatives of Canadians whether they be Chinese Canadians or others. It was pointed out that these people are prepared to provide for their relatives if illness should overtake them. I think we are sometimes a little bit sticky about that although I do know that if such people fall ill and have to be hospitalized at the expense of the state the department is criticized because they allowed these people to enter the country. Several members have mentioned the relatives of Chinese Canadians and I will not dwell on that. I think the minister has already made up his mind what he is going to do about that situation. I hope he will deal with it in a Christian, democratic and humane way. I know that he will.

Some mention has been made of the rosy pictures of life in Canada that is given to citizens of other countries. I have a case in hand right at the moment. This man was coming to this country and was desirous of purchasing a farm. A certain figure was named and he was told that if he had that much money he could establish himself quite easily on a farm in Canada. That amount might have been all right back in the thirties but it was only about one-third of what is needed today. Having come to this country, having severed all his connections in the old country, he now finds having bought a farm that he does not have money for seed, machinery or livestock and that he also has a good-sized mortgage. He is going to be an old man before he gets out of the hole he is now in. Probably that amount of money would have been sufficient in some hinterland location but not in the settled parts of Canada.

I know of a German citizen who was denied access to this country. He looked around in his own land for a position and he now is harbour master of one of the great harbours of Germany. Why should he have been turned down? It was not because of the screening that is done. I have never been able to find out the reason. He was well educated and a very able man. When he was a prisoner of war in this country the farm people he was with thought a great deal of him. After he had returned to Germany and got this job he sent money back to the family with whom he had worked and paid for their trip to Germany and back out of his own pocket. He thought so much of that farm family with whom he worked during the years he was a prisoner of war, he did that for them.

Injustices do seem to occur in the department of citizenship, but at the same time I suppose we in this country have to treat everyone alike. This couple wrote me a letter after becoming Canadian citizens. In writing the letter to me the lady said:

> At the age of 17 my husband joined the imperial army and fought in world war I, and then served 9 years in India. Then he came to Canada and years later, at the beginning of the war in 1939, he joined the Canadian army and served in the Canadian army until his discharge at the close of the war. It was not until he decided to visit some friends in the United States, he found out he was not a Canadian citizen.

It was at the last court held in London, Ontario, that he and his wife received their Canadian citizenship. It seems to me a peculiar thing that a man who served the cause in the two world wars would need to go through the process of getting Canadian citizenship.

I want to deal next with the Indian affairs branch. Indian affairs is one of those things for which I suppose there is not always an answer. I just had the opportunity of talking with the new director and I am very pleased. I think he will do a good job in that department. I realize it is a difficult department, and what you do in one case perhaps does not satisfy in another. I am just going to mention one particular case.

Early in March of this year two brothers who had an interest in a piece of property wrote to the Indian agent indicating that when the estate was settled they would like to purchase the property. The Indian affairs branch did not advise them that it was not for sale, and later they found that the property had been leased to other than an Indian. When I made inquiry it was pointed out to me that the brothers had not indicated they wanted to lease it, but had wanted to buy it. I know very well that if the brothers had been told they could not buy the property but could lease it they would have been glad to lease it. In the meantime the damage had been done and the men are out of that property for another year. Now, these are good people. One of the men is a pattern and dye maker in the city of Detroit, holding down a good position. I do not wonder that they are a little bitter at the administration over the way things are handled.

Throughout my constituency there is a certain amount of uneasiness about the policy of the immigration department. I believe the minister knows that as well as, if not better than I do. It has probably been brought to his attention, and no doubt he will take steps to correct it. Some things have been said during the debate about the minister's department being held off until the last. Well, some department has to be last no matter what happens, and certainly I would not criticize the minister on that account.

I feel that these other matters I have brought to the attention of the minister will be taken care of by him. If he does not, then we will criticize him or his successor at the next session.

Mr. Churchill: My interest in immigration, Mr. Chairman, ranges over the whole field. There is one topic with which I want to deal today, and that is the long-term trend in so far as policy is concerned. In the past I have been very much interested in the policy of the department of immigration, and I am not sure we have yet a clear answer. I was looking at an article in the Legionary for January, 1953, written by a gentleman named E. H. Gurton called "The Truth about Immigration". In that article Mr. Gurton draws attention to the racial origin of the population of this country at the time of confederation, and the change that has taken place from that day to this. For example, in quoting from the census returns from 1901 to 1951, he shows that in 1901 the people of British origin in this country amounted to 57·03 per cent; French were 30·71 per cent; and others 12·26 per cent. Then, the writer follows it through decade after decade to 1951 where the percentages are as follows: British, 47·89; French, 30·83; others, 21·28, indicating a decline in the people of British origin in this country of approximately 10 per cent.

Then he goes on to attempt to forecast the racial basis of our population at the end of this century, and suggests that if the present immigration policy is continued, at the end of the century the people of British origin in the country will be 32 per cent; French, 30 per cent and others 38 per cent.

I am not going to deal further with that article on this occasion, Mr. Chairman, but I would draw attention to the annual report of the department for the year ended March 31, 1952. I have been looking at the table on page 28 and have made a calculation from it of those people who have come from overseas and I am excluding the section dealing with immigration from the United States of America. Those who have come from overseas who are of British stock, or as they are called here British nationals, are as follows: 1900 to 1909, approximately 60 per cent were of that stock; 1910 to 1919, 64 per cent; 1920 to 1929, 56 per cent; 1930 to 1939, 45 per cent; 1940 to 1949, 60 per cent. Over a period of 50 years, I believe the British nationals, as the report calls them, were more than 50 per cent of the total number of immigrants coming to this country from overseas.

I am not going to debate the question as to what type of people are most desirable in Canada. We are well aware of the great number of races that are represented in this country, and we are well aware of the great contribution members of those various races are making. I raise no objection whatsoever to any racial group within the country. I am simply drawing attention to the fact that there are certain marked differences within our country, and certain changes taking place. But, as I say, we fully understand that most of the rest of the world is represented in Canada at the present time. The table at pages 30 and 31 showing the racial origins of immigrants, and nationalities, for the fiscal year just ended, indicates that other than English, Irish, Scottish, Welsh and French, 39 races have been represented in the group of immigrants entering Canada.

However the question raised in my mind is this: What is the long-term policy with regard to immigration. Is there a long-term policy that bears any relationship to the question of racial origin? Or should a policy bear any relationship to the question of racial origin? Those are questions that puzzle me. I notice from the table from which I have just quoted that in this last year for which the department is reporting, the largest racial group entering this country was German, the second largest was Italian, the third largest was Dutch and the fourth largest was Polish.

Mr. Harris: I wonder if the hon. member would be completely fair and not class the English as a group, but rather class those from the British Isles as a group.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, I think the minister is becoming unduly disturbed. I am not attempting to be unfair at all.

Mr. Harris: The hon. member made that statement on a former occasion, and I believe I corrected him at that time. I pointed out that when he used the word "English" he was referring to English people, and not to Scottish, Welsh or Irish. Whereas, for our purposes we lump them together; and I think most people do that in Canada. The people of Canada think in terms of the British people, people from the British Isles. And I am sure if my hon. friend would use that classification he would not be indicating, as he is about to do now, that people of British origin are about fifth in order.

Mr. Churchill: No, by no means; I had no intention of saying that at all. These groups I am speaking of are exclusive of the ones I mentioned earlier. I am speaking of the 39 different groups, other than English, Irish, Scotch, Welsh and French, who have entered this country. And I was giving the four, in their order of importance. I was not attempting in any way to indicate that the people from the British Isles did not exceed any one of those groups.

Mr. Harris: I am sorry if I misunderstood my hon. friend.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps the minister should attempt with me the same type of softening up process the hon. member for Saskatoon has reported. I have not had the pleasure of that treatment.

The conclusion I draw from my remarks so far is that there appears to be something in the nature of a policy—or is it just accidental? —whereby some groups appear here in larger numbers than do others. Is it important that we should give our attention to this particular question? I am not certain that the minister has gone into this problem and thought it out as to the various racial bases for these particular countries. But it may well be that we should give some consideration to it. If Mr. Gurton's forecast is accurate, showing that within another 50-year period people of British stock, who comprised 57 per cent in 1901, by the end of this century will comprise only 32 per cent, it is obvious that there will be a considerable change in the nature of our people.

Whether that change is desirable or not, I am not questioning at the moment. I do know from practical experience in life that the process of assimilating immigrants to the Canadian way of life is not the easiest thing in the world. I spent a sufficient number of years in the field of education to know the difficulties that confront the Canadian people in assimilating even the best of immigrants to the Canadian way of life. And as I have said on other occasions in the house, that needs to be taken into consideration when you are dealing with the question of immigration. Immigrants are brought in here and distributed across the country. The municipalities then must assume the burden of assimilating them to the Canadian way of life, and making them good Canadian citizens. And the greater part of that burden falls on the shoulders of those who are in the field of education. It also falls upon the shoulders of the taxpayers who support the school system.

I am not at all certain that the government in formulating its policy with regard to immigration, if it has one, has taken that into account. I think it is a vitally important matter. We are concerned not only with the numbers of people who enter this country, it is not a question of whether we will have 15 million or 30 million; rather we are concerned with the type of people who are here, and the type of citizens they may become.

Now, to complete my statistical survey. I gather from these figures in the departmental report that a major change in policy occurred in 1949. Up to that date the British nationals coming to this country numbered over 50 per cent of the total number of immigrants who came here annually. In 1949 the situation changed. Let me place on Hansard the figures as they appear in table No. 1 at page 28. People coming from the British Isles, including all those other areas in Great Britain I mentioned earlier, totalled 42,830 in 1949. Others, from overseas—not from the United States—totalled 75,467. Then, in 1950 there were 20,062 from the British Isles and 58,700 others. In 1951 the figure for the British Isles is 17,161 and for the others it is 60,187. In 1952 there were 39,261 from the British Isles and 164,189 others. A percentage basis for those four years indicates that approximately 25 per cent of the total number of immigrants from overseas were British nationals. I suggest this constitutes a major change in the immigration policy of this country.

Whether it has been a policy change or an accidental occurrence, I do not know. I put those facts and figures before the committee for the purpose of assisting in our investigation of the problem. But I think that if we continue conducting immigration into this country without an adequate policy in respect of racial origins that we expect to have in Canada in the future, we might be making a serious mistake.

At the same time I am not here to say that we should exclude one type or another of the races throughout the world. But it appears to me that perhaps by indirect means we are making it more advantageous or easier for some groups to come to this country than others.

The question arises: Why? Why should it be easier for certain people from Europe to come here under assisted passage schemes than it is for others? Is there a policy in this respect, or are we just drifting along? Do we want to see this country end up at the turn of the century, if Mr. Gurton's estimate is correct, with people of British stock numbering only 32 per cent. I do not know at the moment whether that would be desirable or not, but I pose the question for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: It would require a man of sterner stuff than I am to make a speech at this time of the last day of the session. But I do want to make one or two comments. In the first place I want to underline what was said by the hon. member for Kamloops, that it is highly undesirable that this debate should have been left to the last day. I suppose one can argue very sincerely that probably at the present time the immigration department and the debate of its estimates are more important than any other debate we have had. What we are doing actually in the immigration department is to decide on what kind of people we are going to be, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said, or, to bring it closer home, we are deciding on the kind of people with whom our descendants are going to intermarry in the coming years.

I repeat, it is unfortunate in the highest degree that it is left like this. I suppose, however, it has sanction, or even sanctification in the eyes of the government because I understand that great parliamentary manager, the late prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, laid it down as a guiding rule that in the case of the controversial departments it was wise to leave them until the end, and then the heat would drive the opposition out and they would get away without much debate. I have no doubt that is a consideration. Perhaps it is a case of the evil that men do lives after them. I leave that to the judgment of the committee.

I would repeat that it is unfortunate that it is almost impossible to give this great problem the consideration which it should have at the moment. Of course the reason it is controversial is the fact of unemployment. We know that only three or four years ago the minister used to speak freely and very interestingly about immigration, but he has not had very much to say lately, and certainly he did not get very far in what he said this morning. I do want to raise this question because I believe it is pertinent. I hold in my hand a letter signed by a gentleman by the name of F. S. Walker. This letter appeared in the Globe and Mail on June 11, and reads in part as follows:

> I am a recent immigrant to Canada. Is it too much to ask Canadian immigration authorities not to send skilled men from the engineering trades to Canada until Canadian industry can absorb them? Skilled men arriving here at the present time are, like myself, unable to find employment, their skill being lost to England and not wanted in Canada.

There is more to the letter which I shall not read, but I shall read the editorial note at the bottom:

> National employment officials report that conditions in certain engineering lines are currently "a bit tight" but that they hope for improvement later this year.

I do hope the minister will let us know just what is the line taken by our officials in Europe. It will be very hard for them of course to come clean and to say that jobs are not easy to get in Canada at the moment, but I do hope that what this letter depicts is not what is commonly being done; in other words, that people are not being encouraged to give up skilled jobs in Europe and to come here.

I shall not detain the committee longer, Mr. Chairman. I wish to repeat, sometimes we in the opposition are told that however little influence we seem to have at the moment, our words are not always wasted, and that they may even be listened to and remembered on future occasions. I do hope that next year this important subject will not be left to the hot 26th of June when the serried ranks of the government are trying to drive us out.

Item agreed to.

Citizenship—
57. Citizenship registration branch, $221,654.

Mr. Fulton: I was under a misapprehension. I thought the minister had risen to reply.

Mr. Harris: I had.

Mr. Fulton: I did not intend to let this item go by without asking a few questions. I understood the minister wanted to make general observations in reply to comments on the first item.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps anything I might say now might help my hon. friends to pass the rest of the items with dispatch. I would like to have a few moments. I realize that one should not add to the burden of the committee on his own estimates. However, there have been a few things said that require explanation and perhaps defence.

Before I make these remarks may I thank hon. members for their kind references to myself and especially for those which are directed to the officials of the department. I quite realize—and I think every hon. member does—that the immigration branch, devoted as it is to a wholly personal problem, is bound to be the subject of anxiety, irritation and at time disagreements on decisions which have been made. Anybody listening to the debate today would fully appreciate the balance of opinion that there is in the house about immigration.

We have had I think only one speech that could be described as anti-immigration, and we have had one or two who professed to support immigration but who were dubious about its value at this particular moment, or at least dubious about some of the matters involved in it. I think I can safely say that all the rest of the remarks were directed to supporting the policy of immigration, though perhaps disagreeing with particular details which were properly mentioned. In these circumstances I would be the first to agree that hon. members could bring before the committee many more cases than they have mentioned in which it would seem that the decision might not meet the approval of the hon. member himself, and might be made differently under a different minister. That is fully appreciated.

I am grateful for references to those cases, and I shall look at them again, though in many instances I have already seen them myself. Before I mention in detail what has been said, I do want to suggest that the aspersions cast upon me about holding my estimates to the final day are wholly unfounded. This is only the second occasion on which it did occur. Far from not having a full debate on this subject at various times, we had quite a lengthy debate last session. At any rate we had such a debate as met the approval of hon. members opposite.

Mr. Fulton: One full day.

Mr. Harris: One full day plus an hour and a half on another day, but that full day was on April 24, and we did not rise until May 14.

Mr. Fulton: On that occasion we had only one item before us.

Mr. Harris: If my hon. friend wanted to debate longer than the seven or eight hours that he took I am sure that he could have done so.

Mr. Fulton: You did not call them again until the end of the session.

Mr. Harris: Then, sir, on June 28, 1951, we had two and a half hours, which seemed to be sufficient for hon. members, because we did not adjourn until two days later. However, this is only quibbling about detail. I am sure that if hon. members wished to debate this subject at greater length they would have done so.

May I make particular reference to many of the problems which have been raised, first by the hon. member for Kamloops and then the others. Each year we have a discussion about the Chinese, the negro and the East Indian cases which come before us, and each year we attempt to ascertain whether it would be desirable to extend the classes of those admissible in those groups. Each year we have cases brought to our attention which are borderline cases; but since I have been in charge of this department the numbers of Chinese citizens coming forward have steadily risen until the year before last they reached the figure of 2,300, I think, settling back to about 1,929 last year and at the moment they are running ahead of that again this year. There would, of course, be more if circumstances permitted them to come out of China, but for the information of hon. members may I say that it would appear that more of them are coming out of China now than were doing so a year ago.

I have not a brief to offer for the validity of the examination of these people by the X-ray method except to say that it has been in use for many years here, and it is not the only ground on which an applicant is refused entry. I have made that clear on other occasions on which I have spoken, and I have pointed out that if the X-ray is the only evidence we have that this person is not likely to be the person we are considering in the application the chances are that he would be admitted. As I believe hon. members know, we are using a variable rule of two years one way or another in the reading of that X-ray plate, and I am satisfied that it is as reasonably accurate as any other method for the purpose we have in mind.

The Leader of the Opposition raised two cases and I propose to deal with them very briefly. The first case he mentioned happens to be before the courts and perhaps I ought to follow the course of wisdom which is traditional in this house and say very little more about it. I made that clear when I answered the question asked by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe on that very subject some weeks ago. I told him the case was before the courts and I was not in a position to make any comment. I think perhaps I could follow that course again today, though it is regrettable that the Leader of the Opposition sought to interpret the case in a manner which, with all due respect to him, does not bear very much resemblance to the facts.

The other case he raised concerned Mr. Harold Banks, and may I say again that this is one of those instances in which the assumptions may turn out to be incorrect. We have had some discussion in the house about this particular case, and I remember about May 8 or 10 the hon. member for Hamilton West asked me whether a board of inquiry had been ordered on this case. My answer was, "No". Had that question been asked any time within the last three weeks my answer would have been, "Yes, I ordered a board of inquiry for the purpose of obtaining the record as it is and as I suppose it to be before the officers charged with the responsibility of considering the admission or right to settle in Canada of this particular person." That board will meet in Montreal. It so happens that I am the person to whom an appeal can be made and I feel I should not discuss this case today either. I could perhaps talk about the facts but I do not think it would be fair to indicate any opinion since the facts, when presented to me, should be viewed at that time in a manner as free from previous opinions as it is possible to be.

Mrs. Fairclough: Did I understand the minister to say whether a date had been set for the meeting of that board?

Mr. Harris: It has not been set and I have no particular control over that. We have regular boards of inquiry and they take their turn depending on how much they have to do.

The Leader of the Opposition made reference to an article in Maclean's magazine dealing with a so-called racket in Montreal in which persons were engaged in illegal practices with respect to the admission of immigrants. Once again, with great respect to the Leader of the Opposition in his absence, I might say he was not aware of the facts in this case. I made an answer to him over a year ago to the effect that prosecutions were being launched and I thought there was no particular reason for making reference to these prosecutions until further inquiry was made. There is nothing sinister about it. The racket was in existence and it was uncovered by the department itself with the result that up to the moment one of the gentlemen involved has been convicted and fined $100 and $250 and dismissed from the service; another one was fined $200; still another was fined $250 and given three months in which to raise the fine and in default to serve one month and two months to run consecutively; one other person is still before the courts, and still another has not been apprehended because he is in the United Kingdom and I understand he was able to avoid extradition on that account. That accounts for those who were involved in the proceedings.

The leader of the C.C.F. party referred me to a letter he received from a person abroad and I think I can deal very briefly with that. This was a news item carrying a report of a meeting addressed by one of our officers, Mr. Don Brown. Mr. Brown is one of our better officers in the United Kingdom and while I fully understand and share the view that we cannot permit an overoptimistic picture to be delineated I do not think any hon. member here, especially those who have been criticizing the government for not having encouraged enough immigration, would wish our officers abroad not to be reasonably optimistic about the future in Canada. How to balance that in an address is, of course, obvious. You must put in qualifications but you must also state the facts on which you base the desire of the Canadian government to have people in the audience come to Canada, and if in the course of reporting, these qualifications do not appear, or if in the normal method of reporting meetings the full story is not given I do not feel we should complain either to the press in the first instance or to our officer.

I just want to run through the complaints made because they are similar to many which have been made and have no more justification. For example, the officer began by saying, quite properly, that it usually took three to six months to obtain accommodation of a permanent nature. I am sure no one can complain of that. Then he said that the national average wage was about £20 a week. I have not looked up the statistics lately but the last ones I saw showed that the average wage in Canada was around $56 and that is about £20 at the present depreciated value. He then said:

> The cost of living in Canada is less than it is here and the average man can save 12 per cent of his weekly wage and still have a car, and so on.

The last figures I saw in regard to national savings in Canada showed a fraction over 11 per cent. He then said that education was under the provinces and it was free up to university standards. I admit that in most of our high schools you have to pay for your books. He was then quoted this morning as saying:

> He can earn £17 a week without paying any tax at all. Income tax is about a third of what you would pay in England.

Obviously he was talking about income tax and I am sure any hon. member who wishes to do the mathematics involved would agree that a man can earn £17 in this country, if he is a married man, and not pay income tax. He then went on to say that there was no national health scheme but suggested there were many comparable services in the form of family allowances payable for each child including the first one. I think that is a purely factual statement of conditions in Canada and does not mislead anybody as to the facts here. However, I come back to my previous statement that I believe that these officers abroad, if they are to discharge the duties which most of us seem to favour, would want to leave with the people in the audience the impression that we want them to come here. When he went there to address them, he went there to encourage them to come to Canada but at the same time, he did not go there to misstate any pertinent facts or to misstate any facts at all.

The hon. member for Kootenay West spoke on behalf of himself and, I understand the hon. member for Winnipeg North in particular, with respect to alleged collaborators. I only want to add one comment to the consideration of this question. It is difficult to decide in post-war years the degree of responsibility for many things that are done. I have had that point brought to my attention forcibly since the hon. member for Winnipeg North mentioned this subject in the early winter. It must be remembered that these convictions, so-called, were all by methods they use in France for prosecuting people; there were convictions in absentia. They are interim judgments delivered in the absence of the person accused and are subject to review at the request of the person—

Mr. Fulton: Just like your immigration findings.

Mr. Harris: They are subject to review at the request of the person concerned when he learns about the conviction. One of these persons whose name was disclosed in the return made to the hon. member for Winnipeg North has since that return was made forwarded me a decision of a French court dissolving the conviction against him on the ground that there was no evidence and restoring to him whatever rights he had before the interim conviction. Therefore my hon. friend will not take it for granted that in all these cases the circumstances were as they might have appeared in the original transcript of the judgment. Following his practice, I will not mention the names of those concerned.

The leader of the C.C.F. party also spoke of the desire that we might use a certain organization abroad; that is, one particular labour organization. We do, of course, employ or use the services of the intergovernmental committee for European migration, as we call it, for the handling of refugees. We feel that we should not have too many of these organizations because there might be overlapping. Since there is one central organization to deal with all refugees, we have followed the practice of supporting that organization since the war. I think we ought to continue to do so. Nevertheless, the organization referred to by his correspondent, namely, the international free trade union group in Brussels, will be considered in order to see what they could add to our knowledge on the subject of immigration and the proceedings under it.

The hon. member for York South raised the question of trade unionism with regard to immigrants and I think I have disposed of that matter. He also spoke of the problem of those British subjects in the West Indies and of the answer we are going to make to the brief which was presented by the negro association of Toronto. I can only make this answer at the moment, Mr. Chairman. Upon receiving the brief we studied it. I examined the statistics with regard to these persons and I found that there has been a steady increase in the numbers of negroes from the West Indies being admitted to Canada. If we leave the present regulations as they are for the time being I think the numbers will probably increase in any event and that we shall have what I would consider to be a reasonably fair representation of these people in the flow of immigrants to Canada. I could place before the house the shifting changes in the numbers but I can assure hon. members that they are on the increase. In addition to the close relative groups who come in in almost every case I should not say as of right but nevertheless almost so, we have a special merit case and we have been using it with respect to these people.

I think the hon. member for Kootenay West also spoke of a particularly offensive person whom he met on the coast. I would not want to defend conduct such as he has described. I would only hope that this person who came from Germany would learn that however much he might like to ape the traditions of a regime that we hope has gone forever, those things are not wanted or desirable in Canada.

Mr. Herridge: That is what I hope.

Mr. Harris: I have always taken the view —and I think it has been true of most hon. members—that service in the German army by a German national should not be held against him. That is his duty in time of war.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister apply that principle to the SS, the elite guard?

Mr. Harris: I shall come to that matter. I have taken the view that under those circumstances we may very well receive people who, with their military training and perhaps with a training of mind that we do not approve, might carry forward in peacetime certain undesirable characteristics; but that if the peacetime record of the person is good or, shall I say, not bad, the fact that he was in the German army should not be held against him.

The hon. member for Kamloops has asked me a direct question with respect to the SS troops. We have repeatedly had reports of former SS troopers being in Canada. Like some of these other stories that have been mentioned this afternoon, they crop up from time to time. There may be some people here who belonged to the SS. I do not know. We have never consciously admitted them. Yet I recognize the fact that you can deceive one of our immigration officers. You can deceive the screening group. You can deceive everybody and can get into Canada.

I want to make this one exception to what I have said. I think there is no reason why I should not make this clear. At one period in the war nationals of countries that were occupied by Germany were conscripted into the army and put into the SS divisions. I could give the reasons for that. It was that the German general staff did not want them in the German formations; at least that appears to have been the case. So when we obtain an application here from a close relative for the bringing forward of a relative who had served in these groups, we look at the record to find whether, in fact, he may have been a Roumanian or a Pole or from some of these other occupied countries, whether he was a volunteer or a conscript, the circumstances of his service and his whole personal record. But those cases are quite few in number. The general practice is that anybody who has served in the SS troops is not welcome to this country.

I think the hon. member for St. Paul's made one general reference to some of our difficulties. I appreciated the friendly manner in which he acknowledged there were certain difficulties. I do not think the department overlooks the humanitarian aspect at all, but we are bound to refuse even close relative requests under the circumstances I have just mentioned. We do refuse such requests. It would therefore be easy to point to cases where very close relatives could not understand why they could not bring forward the one that they wanted to bring forward. At the same time we find it impossible to grant their requests.

The hon. member for Oxford referred to an incident in western Ontario last fall. He need not be surprised that I am aware of it. I read the newspapers just as he does and, I say with great respect, perhaps go a little further and have the department investigate the circumstances. I do not mean to cast any reflection on my hon. friend by what I have just said. It did happen that at one period there were a number of German and other farm workers who left their employment. This took place over a short time. The number was not large; I do not think it exceeded twenty. Coincidentally the story about the black car arose. I apologize for saying that there was no black car. What I meant was there was no black car of this nature.

One of these men was upset by his relatives who had happened to settle in Quebec and the following day he left. The impression got about that in the motorcar was a person who was going about soliciting people to leave their employment. We followed up the story and found in almost every case that those who had left were working, some in the brickyard at Cooksville and others in the city of Toronto. There was no recruiting for industries in the province of Quebec that we could find.

I only mention that to suggest that we do try to follow up these things in every way we can in order that these persons shall carry out the obligations they have undertaken. I think I have covered all the particular cases that have been raised.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked me to table a return showing Indian children attending non-Indian schools, and I should like to have permission to do that.

The Chairman: Has the minister leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The table is as follows:

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: I understand that items 56 and 57 are carried but that the hon. member for Kamloops wanted to ask a question on item 57.

Mr. Fulton: No, item 58.

58. Citizenship branch, $697,031.

Mr. Fulton: There is one thing here which disturbs me a little. It has to do with the total amount asked for. If the minister will look at the details on page 130 he will understand the nature of my question. The details show that in the last fiscal year there was asked for in the estimates an amount of $615,464. A little further down the details show that the total actually spent in that fiscal year was $505,464, or exactly $110,000 less than was estimated. Yet this year the department is asking for $697,031, or $82,000 more than was estimated last year and $192,000 more than was spent last year. I am puzzled and concerned to know the reason why, although they spent last year less than they asked for, they are asking this year for more than they asked for last year, and $192,000 more than they actually spent.

Mr. Harris: The figure my hon. friend uses is an estimated figure which is made up in November before these estimates are submitted to treasury board, and that is why we feel that a certain margin is required here. It is one of those estimates that does vary a bit and I think he will find, if I may say so, that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration keeps its estimates down pretty close and has the reputation of being one of the three or four departments that have reduced their estimates on occasions.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Fulton: I think I must give the minister credit for that. I believe there are two or three items here where less is being asked for than was sought last year, but this seems to me to be a particularly outstanding case where your estimate was $110,000 more than you spent last year and yet you are asking for $82,000 more than you estimated last year. If the minister could tell us what was actually spent last year and that the estimate of expenditures given in the details was considerably less than was actually spent then I could understand that the estimate might be larger this year. But I emphasize again that on the basis of what was actually spent up to December 31, plus what you estimated you would spend for the balance of the fiscal year, it is indicated that you would spend $505,000 during the year which is $110,000 less than you originally submitted in your estimates. Yet you are asking for $190,000 more than that.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend must remember that in the estimates for this fiscal year we are obliged to raise the pay of every one represented in the details because of the general increase last fall. In addition we have the normal increases in salaries because of the seniority attained.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is one item I should like to raise in that connection. I notice that you are up $50,000 on language texts for citizenship classes.

Mr. Harris: Has my hon. friend any objection to that or is he helping me out?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not quite sure. I just want to know more about it. It seems a rather steep rise. Are there so many more classes requiring language texts that it is 50 per cent greater?

Mr. Harris: I could give a list of the books that are being published this year under this particular item. There are 16 of them, and they total $140,430. If my hon. friend wants to have them put on the record, I will do so.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The list is as follows:

Mr. MacLean: There have been a great many interesting speeches today on the very important topics of citizenship and immigration, but I have got the impression that the accent was on the immigration side of things. I think that the question of citizenship is extremely important too. It is not my intention to take up much time of the committee, but I should like to express certain opinions and make a suggestion to the minister.

It seems to me that if one looks back over the history of civilizations which existed before our own one finds that time proved that they did not have the permanency that their citizens imagined that they had. It is also the fact that most of these civilizations collapsed and were overrun, not because they were destroyed by conquest from without but simply because they rotted from within. These civilizations were developed by very energetic people who had a strong sense of purpose, who put up with hardships and who knew what they stood for, but after a few generations of soft living and a faltering of the ideals of their ancestors the then citizens shirked their responsibilities as far as their way of life was concerned, and it was only a matter of time until they were overrun.

I feel there is a danger of that happening to us. I have been shocked, particularly since entering public life, by the abysmal ignorance of large groups of Canadian citizens with regard to our system of civilization and government and their responsibilities in connection therewith. You will find this ignorance not only among the illiterate but among people who look upon themselves as being well educated and people who have quite a bit of formal education, high school graduates and even university graduates.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member should come to Newfoundland. We have a higher level there.

Mr. MacLean: I hope you are right. I am glad to hear the Secretary of State say that, and I hope that is not due to the fact that Newfoundland has only lately come into confederation.

Mr. Fulton: The Secretary of State has only recently gone down to Newfoundland.

Mr. MacLean: I find, for instance, that many people who consider themselves fairly well educated have no knowledge as to the various fields of federal, provincial and municipal governments. For instance, they have no knowledge with respect to such a simple question as to what government is responsible for the upkeep of roads or other public works.

It is rather disheartening to realize the little value the average citizen places on his right to exercise his franchise. There are thousands of people in Canada who do not ever bother to vote, and in some cases the ones who do feel that they are doing someone a favour by casting their ballot; that it is something they must be coaxed into or pushed into or even bribed into doing. There are people who believe that the vote is a marketable asset which they try to sell to the highest bidder, if there are any around. I feel that is an unfortunate situation. If our system is to survive, I believe as much as possible should be done to educate, not only the new immigrants coming into the country but our own citizens whose people have been here for generations as to their responsibility. These people should be given an elementary knowledge of our system of government and the importance of the things for which it stands.

Only the other day most of the members of this committee had an opportunity of hearing General Gruenther speak. He said at that time that one of the greatest dangers to our western civilization was the fact that we seem in danger of losing the ideological war. Our western civilization does not seem to know for what it stands. He went on to say that it is not enough to be against communism, we must be for democracy. I agree with that 100 per cent.

I have been pleased to see some excellent booklets which the department put out a year or two ago in this regard. The series covers our land, our history, our government and so forth. I believe they are very good, although I think the particular title for "our government" would be more apt if it were "our system of government".

Mr. Harris: I assure the committee that was unconscious, and it will not be done again.

Mr. MacLean: I must say that these booklets are very good but they do not go far enough. I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. It would be money well spent if he were to sponsor a film or a series of films on these topics.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member for Kamloops agree?

Mr. MacLean: I believe he would, because if films are used for the right purpose it is money well spent. However, you can squander money in that way. There would not be perhaps any objection to a well made film or series of films on our system of government. There could be one on municipal government, provincial government and federal government, and one on our system of justice. I feel that is another thing upon which many of our citizens are rather vague.

I have said that I do not want to take up too much time of the committee, but I would be pleased if the minister would give consideration to something along that line.

Mr. Michener: Early in the session we amended the act and eliminated the first declaration of intention to become a citizen. Can the minister say whether that will result in some monetary saving in administration? If so, what will be that saving?

Mr. Harris: The forms which would be used for the current period had already been purchased but we will not be spending money for this purpose in the future. I do not believe there will be much of a saving on this particular item until the next fiscal year.

Mr. Montgomery: I should like to ask the minister, in connection with item 58, about the language texts for citizenship classes, $140,000. Can the minister give me some information as to how that money was spent?

Mr. Harris: I just finished answering that question for the hon. member for Greenwood. I said I would put it on the record. May I at this moment say to the hon. member for Queens that since the 1949-50 fiscal year we have spent $62,360 on film strips, chiefly to be used in citizenship classes.

Since this reminds me of something the Leader of the Opposition said, I want to say something about the ethnic press. I am quite conscious of the support that was quite evident here today for the ethnic press who are doing their best to keep the newly arrived immigrants from embracing any doctrine that would be disadvantageous to Canada. As I have said on many occasions, we make it clear to these people when they come that the test that will be applied later on to their citizenship is their conduct in the meantime and their beliefs. Something over two years ago I met the ethnic press, and I believe the committee will realize one has to be careful in these matters, but we did set aside a sum of money for use in advertising through that press. We are continuing it this year, and will continue because the editors and publishers of those newspapers and periodicals deserve our support in refuting the false arguments that one could so easily fall into believing if he were not guided correctly.

I should like to table copies of a report, in English and in French, of the first national seminar on citizenship. I may say copies will be distributed.

Immigration branch—

59. Administration of the Immigration Act, $968,610.

Mr. Fulton I am not going to seek to revive the discussion we have already had, Mr. Chairman, but I could not let the matter stand without pointing out that, probably because of the pressure of time, of which the minister is now a victim as well as ourselves, the minister did not deal with the fundamental policy matters concerning immigration which were raised in the course of this discussion. The minister did not deal with the matter of the country of origin or the matter of the changing composition of present groups making up the total immigration, nor with the question of enlarging our effort in connection with immigration generally. I can only assume that is due to one of two things. Either the government has no policy in this regard or has not considered the matter in all its implications or else, as I have said is equally probably, the minister finds himself a victim of the shortage of time that is allotted for the discussion of these estimates. I believe it is regrettable that this department should be disposed of this year without any reply from the minister on these important points.

There are some questions I want to ask the minister on this item which provides for the administration to the Immigration Act. I come back to what was referred to in the course of general discussion, and that is the adminstrative practices in dealing with these immigration applications. If what I have to say appears critical I want to make it clear my criticism is not directed against the immigration officials in their capacity of administering this act. My criticism, although it may appear to be directed towards them, is based on the fact that there appears to be no directive or if there is any directive it is designed to direct them to deal with the matter along certain lines and to give certain answers or provide certain information which is, in my view, desirable to be provided. I do not regard that as an irresponsibility of the officials concerned; that seems to me to be a matter of policy which must, of course, come from the top. So what I am concerned with is the policy with respect to the administration of immigration.

I am aware that there are many complaints about which I alleged in a general way this morning, that when an application is rejected, it is most difficult, if not impossible, for the applicant himself or his representative—if he is represented by counsel—to obtain a clear-cut and concise statement of the reasons why the application was rejected.

There are several aspects of the matter I would like to ask about. The minister will recall an announcement in the house in 1951 with respect to the children of Chinese-Canadian citizens in which it was indicated that the provisions would be relaxed whereby in the case of those over 21 and up to 25, where there was hardship or merit, there would be provision made for their entry. I wonder therefore if the minister could define that type of hardship, or the grounds of merit, relied upon to produce in certain cases permits for entry. We would like to know the lines of policy which are being followed. So far as I am concerned it would appear that one case is dealt with favourably and that another of a similar nature is refused.

As I say, the lack of reasons given for refusal makes it almost impossible to know whether to appeal or how to conduct the appeal. Would the minister say a word or two in describing the type of case where hardship or merit would apply, and give examples where these have been relied upon as justifiable admissions.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, it must be obvious to the committee that as soon as I made the announcement almost every Chinese citizen in Canada who had a son in China over the age of 21 and under 25 made application for his admission to Canada. And, of course, that is an exaggerated statement because they are still coming in. Nevertheless we were faced with all the applications which could be sent in as a result of that. We had some question in our minds as to what precisely we could do by way of definition. And we finally left the definition just precisely as I indicated, that each case would have to be dealt with on its merits, realizing of course that the decisions might not be correct in some cases but that on the average they would be acceptable.

Perhaps the committee would be interested to know the number who have come in under this grouping. There have been 23 of the age of 21; 19 aged 22; 7 aged 23; 6 aged 24 and 10 aged 25 in the month of May of this year only. That is a representative month. The total is 65 in this group.

Now, if it happened that a son was well established in China, so far as we could decide, and if the father here had other children either to look after his business or to look after him in his old age, that would be the type of case that would not meet the definition of hardship. If on the other hand the father happened to be the sole proprietor of a business, if he was getting on in years and had a son abroad of that age who could come forward and assist him, that could be a case where hardship would intervene. We would consider it a case of hardship and grant the request.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask a question with respect to all cases of this kind, and immigration applications generally. Can the minister give an assurance that it will be laid down as a matter of policy that in these cases, except where it is a matter of security or political loyalty, a duly appointed representative of the applicant will be allowed to have access to the files and documents on which such refusal is based so that he will be able to prepare a case on appeal either to the minister or to an immigration appeal board, if one were set up or, if necessary, to a court? There has been occasion for a ruling of this kind. Many times counsel have had great difficulty in obtaining information upon which to base applications; and the same applies to members of parliament.

Mr. Harris: Is my hon. friend referring to Chinese cases, or is he making a general reference?

Mr. Fulton: I am referring particularly to the Chinese; but I would refer to it generally, because I think it covers a general situation.

Mr. Harris: I do not think I can agree to the suggestion made by the hon. member. We have been through all this before. I know the representations which have been made to him presumably by the same persons who have seen me.

Mr. Fulton: Various people have been making these representations.

Mr. Harris: I agree; but I was thinking of particular groups.

Mr. Fulton: The Chinese benevolent society and others.

Mr. Harris: Yes. As the hon. member knows, we discussed this at some length—perhaps not this particular detail, but the over-all theory of immigration—when we were revising the Immigration Act two years ago. And all but one member in that committee—and I think this was endorsed by the house—held the view that immigration could not possibly become a matter of law, and we did not want to get into the system which obtains in some other countries whereby we would try to define in a law those persons who could be admitted to Canada, so that one could approach the courts in this country and have a judge decide in an action at law whether an applicant came within the terms of the law.

We went into that matter at some length, and indeed the minister brought it to the attention of the committee, pointing out that the discretion vested in the minister was so extensive that, as the Leader of the Opposition said today, the power was so great that "even the minister might not wish to exercise it."

Nevertheless the committee did decide that the theory of immigration in Canada must be that the minister would be responsible to parliament to explain the policy in detail, and his administration of it; and if the administration of the act and of the policy did not meet with the approval of hon. members, then the minister would be subjected to such criticism as members felt they should make. It was felt that we could not have these things going through our courts with decisions being made on the law.

Starting from that, it seems to me it would not be possible, nor would it be desirable for that matter, to disclose to the applicants information which is on the file in this department, and which would lead the minister and those under him to come to a conclusion in a particular case. I did not understand my hon. friend's concluding words, when he said that hon. members do not have access to these documents. I have never hesitated to offer a file to any member who asked for it, always knowing that, under his responsibility as a member of parliament, such member would consider it confidential. Yet at the same time I know the hon. member has in mind cases where, to the applicants, it would seem that if they knew the problem in the mind of the official they could meet such specialized objection by producing new evidence. I shall not attempt to make a joke of a serious matter, but I could say that we have people who come to our office and say, "I am so and so; what do I have to tell you in order to get into Canada?"

That is something we do not want to encourage. So that I think we ought to leave it the way it is. I grant you that quite probably members of parliament in particular should be given all the information available to enable them to criticize a minister of the government. But I do not think that we can have an applicant going outside the department and suing in the courts in an attempt to prove his right to enter Canada. As I say, the committee decided that should not be done.

Mr. Fulton: The minister realizes of course that both the Supreme Court of Canada and the courts of British Columbia have lately laid it down that applicants for admission to Canada do have certain legal rights.

Mr. Harris: No, they did not.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, they did. And it was on the basis of Chinese who alleged that under the law they were Canadian citizens. They were applying for admission to Canada, and their admission had been refused by the departmental officials. The courts said that there is a legal right, and that this right is conferred upon them under Canadian legislation as it exists today. The departmental officials were ordered to review the decision that they had made, as a matter of law.

One of the cases involved the question of whether an adoption in China was legal, and whether our courts should recognize it and, if so, whether the immigration branch should recognize it and give effect to it on this application for admission to Canada. Therefore it is not correct to say, whatever may have been the intention when the committee had the Immigration Act before it, that there are no legal rights involved here.

Then, further, this applies, as I pointed out, not only to applications from these Chinese but it applies particularly where a deportation arises. I referred the committee this monring to the case where a judge of the Ontario supreme court felt it was inconsistent with standards of Canadian justice that the reasons for the deportation order should not be communicated to the person concerned so that her counsel could meet the case in court. I think, particularly in the case of deportation—

Mr. Harris: Would my hon. friend permit me?

Mr. Fulton: —there must be the fullest disclosure.

Mr. Harris: I am not familiar with the case the hon. member referred to first about the adopted child. I must say that my former remarks would be subject to that. But referring to the other case the Supreme Court of Canada did not say anything about legal rights whatever except that the department should process the case. The difficulty there was that the application was sent in. The officer concerned wrote a letter saying that because of certain circumstances we cannot proceed with the application you filed. The supreme court said that is not so; you must proceed with it. They made no decision whatever on the merits of the case, recognizing I think that they did not have the authority to do so.

With respect to the case in Toronto, my hon. friend is taking advantage of me just as his leader did, because it is before the courts in Toronto. I can show him that file, and I am satisfied, even though he is making the speech, that he himself would do as I did and order the deportation of that person.

Mr. Fulton: That may be so. Mr. Chairman, but my point is this. I am not discussing the case or the merits of the case, I am discussing what was said by the judge obiter dictum. He could see no reason why the reasons for the deportation should not be communicated.

Mr. Harris: If my hon. friend comes and looks at the file—

Mr. Fulton: Good heavens, that indicates to me something which I find quite unacceptable, that the judges of our courts cannot be told the reasons for these things. The minister says he has adequate reasons, but that to me is perfectly unacceptable. Personally, the minister would have to do a great deal more arguing to satisfy me it was an acceptable proposition. I have a specific question to put before the committee with respect to the implications in these cases where the applicant urges Canadian citizenship. I have discussed this matter generally with the Chinese benevolent association, and it is my understanding that they are not really satisfied with the investigation that is made in Hong Kong. I do not want to be unfair to the officials there. They probably work under pressure and under difficult circumstances, but where these people claim and say that they can provide prima facie proof that they are in fact Canadian citizens by birth and have been back to China, then they should have the right to come here.

I understand they would not object to posting a bond or purchasing a return ticket. They should have the right to come here if their application is rejected and prove their case to the minister before a Canadian court. The minister, at least by inference, suggested that where there was a matter of law involved it might be regarded as a case not to be entirely at his discretion. There is a question of law involved as to whether this person is or is not a Canadian citizen. If they cannot prove that in court in Hong Kong, if they cannot assert their claim there, then I suggest it would be fair, and I think it would relieve the pressure on the department and might cut out a lot of correspondence, to have them come over here and submit their case to Canadian courts. Until they get the permission from the department they cannot make arrangements with the transportation company to bring them.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Harris: I have just one word on that. We are in a rather awkward position on these cases. There are not very many of them. I know of only three or four at the moment. These are people who approach our officers in Hong Kong and say: "We are Canadian citizens." It happens that the immigration department has nothing to do about Canadian citizens. They have a right to enter Canada by law. We cannot bar them and do not. It is the responsibility of the Department of External Affairs to deal with Canadian citizens abroad who wish to come to Canada. Nevertheless, it happens, as a matter of convenience, that our senior officer in Hong Kong functions in this particular case for the Department of External Affairs. I recognize the difficulty that confronts a person who says: "I am a Canadian citizen" to prove it, and of the officer abroad who has the responsibility of making a decision. Representations have been made about this matter, and I have been considering it to see if I can find a way by which no Canadian citizen would be barred from re-entering Canada because of the lack of information which there may be at the port where he is, if there is such information available in Canada.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was glad to hear the minister say that the case of the children of Canadian citizens over 21 years of age—the father living alone in this country—would be given special consideration. That is the situation in many of these cases because of the fact that the families have been separated for years. I want to press the inquiry a little further, because I was of the understanding that the emphasis was just the other way; that if there were any members of the family remaining on the mainland, regardless of the situation of the father in Canada, that case would not be considered.

Mr. Harris: Will my hon. friend let me have the case he has in mind?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: One question arises from the letter I read. What instructions are given to our representatives in Europe at the moment? When they are giving a picture of the situation do they take into consideration the fact that employment is not as good as it was a year ago? Are there instructions to try to give the clearest picture they can of the actual problem?

Mr. Harris: Yes. We try to keep abreast of conditions here and give our instructions to our officers abroad on a timely basis, and not too far behind conditions. If I remember correctly, I do not think there is any real difficulty of an engineer getting employment in Canada. I would be surprised if that particular trade was one about which we had sent special instructions abroad. It may happen that this particular person has had the misfortune of not getting employment. I am sure our settlement officers will work overtime to get him another place as soon as possible.

Mr. Hamilton: In answering questions of the hon. member for Kamloops regarding the inaccessibility of certain information on which decisions are based, the minister left one point which at least to my satisfaction was not answered. I would like it explained just a little bit. I am speaking of a person seeking entry into Canada who is refused permission to come in as an immigrant without having the grounds on which that refusal is based given to him. Because of the condition of records in Europe and in other parts of the world, particularly in Europe, and with all of the uncertainties that occur in an investigation such as that, it is quite conceivable that the information procured by the department may be wrong. I am not speaking of a particular case. I know of many where it could be argued, but I would rather speak in general terms. It is conceivable that the information procured by the department may be wrong, may be completely erroneous.

As I see it at the present time this almost star chamber attitude on this particular aspect of the problem means that a person has no opportunity whatsoever to go to the minister and his department and give them information in order to pursue the matter further and perhaps correct any errors which may have crept into the information they have. Can the minister explain how that happens?

Mr. Harris: I am sure my hon. friend knows that we consider many cases six, seven and even eight times, and that the situation is not as simple as he makes it out to be. Indeed, far from there being a star chamber court of any kind, our officers abroad are there for the purpose of getting immigrants and not for preventing them coming to Canada, unless the circumstances are such that the people concerned are barred under the regulations. When we tell people they cannot come in there are not very many who get in touch with me and ask why. I seldom have appeals of this nature and I do not very often get letters except from members of parliament, and quite properly they write me and ask for an explanation. But I think in most cases the reason is usually fairly obvious and probably known to the disappointed applicant. Nevertheless, I assure the hon. member that if a person has a good case and he is persistent about it we recognize that the information we have might be added to and other interpretations placed upon it so that the person who is rejected might very well convince us that he should be admitted.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the minister answer my question regarding the operations of the Welch company in Canada?

Mr. Harris: I forgot about that, Mr. Chairman. The Welch company is an independent contractor which builds railway projects and as such it is independent of the railways. My hon. friend this afternoon made some reference to the relationship between persons going from the Canadian National Railways to the Welch company. As I indicated about something else, this is news to me. The Welch company is one of the few companies that accept contracts for the building of railways in remote areas and they are constantly asking us to provide immigrants because after checking with the national employment service they are unable to obtain labourers to go into these remote areas to work, and they contact the immigration office which supplies these people with immigrant workers. They pay wages which occasionally come under criticism in the press, but the wages are always within the standards set in each of the provinces in which this work is carried out and, in fact, in some cases I think they are fairly generous. We have had two or three complaints, one from Manitoba and one from British Columbia. We investigated both of them and we found that the conditions were not as outlined in the newspaper reports but were due to some exaggerated statements made by a discharged employee.

As far as I am concerned our relationship with the Welch company is a good one and we provide them with workers they could not otherwise obtain in order to carry out the work which I think helps the people of Canada generally.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister says they bring in workers for railway projects because workers cannot be found in Canada. But just a couple of days ago I received a protest from the trades and labour council of Fort William protesting against the fact that the Welch company had brought in a number of immigrants from Portugal while the people of Fort William, who were looking for the jobs these immigrants from Portugal were given, could not obtain work.

Mr. Harris: I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that these are not maintenance workers on the railway. They are labourers carrying stones and other things about. They are not permanent railway workers but common day labourers and in every case before we bring these people in we check with the national employment service to find out if they can fulfil the requirements.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am encouraged by the minister's expansive mood to ask one further question on the point raised by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. I have been interested in cases in which the grounds given for exclusion were marked confidential. Earlier in the discussion today the minister said that the circumstances of war are not weighted so heavily in considering applications for immigration, and by private inquiry I discovered that the grounds for exclusion are related to what was regarded as subversive activity during the war. May I take the liberty of placing this case before the minister?

Mr. Harris: By all means.

Item agreed to.

62. To provide, subject to the approval of treasury board, for trans-oceanic and inland transportation assistance for immigrants, including care en route and while awaiting employment, $500,000.

Mr. Bell: I would like to ask the minister what obligations are placed upon an immigrant coming out under the assisted loan passage scheme to remain in his intended occupation.

Mr. Harris: We have had discussions every session on this matter on the estimates and my hon. friend could profitably read the past discussions. But briefly, if we loan him the money to come here he is obliged to remain in employment which we stipulated up to a period of 24 months depending on the time set for the repayment of the loan.

Mr. Bell: I just want to make one comment in connection with that. I had a question on the order paper earlier this session asking about the plan, how much had been given out, and how much had been collected, and according to the answer I was pleased to note that something like 79 per cent had been collected. But I asked just how many remained at their stipulated jobs for the period intended and I received the answer that no statistics are maintained. I feel they could easily be gathered because in collecting the loan that has been made there must be some record kept as to where the cheques come from and I offer this as a suggestion. With the present criticism that seems to exist on some aspects of immigration generally I think we should definitely have a record available as to how many come out under the assisted plan and whether they stay at their intended occupation for the stipulated periods. For all we know it may be just a blind or a ruse to bring out a certain group and they may leave after three or four months, even though the loan is paid back in 80 per cent of the cases.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend should not suggest that this government does anything for any motive other than that which it announces. The assisted passage loan scheme was announced by me some three years ago for a specific purpose and it received the endorsation of the house. In fact, I was congratulated for introducing it, and the only criticism there has been with respect to it is the question my hon. friend raises, namely, that the persons who come do not live up to their obligations. But no one in this house has yet suggested that we abandon a policy of that kind. Indeed I think they would prefer that this service be continued and that we continue our efforts to assist people in this way.

Mr. Bell: I would like to make it clear that I was not criticizing the plan. I simply asked that figures be made available as to the number of those who remained in their intended occupations.

Mr. Harris: Until my hon. friend asked the question no one else did, and we have been trying to study the matter to see if we can get an answer.

Item agreed to.

Welfare of Indians—

69. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $962,524.

Mr. Michener: Has any figure been worked out on the total public expenditure per capita? There is a very substantial expenditure here of $18 million. In the Department of National Health and Welfare there is another $15 million for health services with respect to Indians and Eskimos. It would be interesting to have it if there is such a figure at hand. It would be interesting to know what it is per capita for the population.

Mr. Harris: I have not that figure, but I will get it for my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Education—

73. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $3,824,200.

Mr. Fulton: This morning the minister gave us a brief survey of the educational work being done in the department. He referred to arrangements with one of the municipalities for education of the Indian children in their schools. I should like to ask him now with respect to the provision that is being made for education by way of building Indian schools. It is a large item and I want to put my question in such a form that it will not take much time to answer it. Is it possible to give us a brief outline, of not more than a couple of minutes' duration, of the schools which are being built and the increased student capacity which is being provided under the vote we are now discussing?

Mr. Harris: I could give the breakdown by provinces of the item under consideration. If the committee would give me permission to do so, I would put it on Hansard. It is as follows:

Mr. Fulton: I am more particularly interested in the actual number of students accommodated than I am in the number of dollars being spent on schools.

Mr. Harris: This is based on the present day. Enrolment increased by 3,200 last year. We are almost keeping pace now. The backlog of, I think it was, 8,000 Indian children without school accommodation four years ago is now down to about 2,500.

Mr. Fulton: How many do you expect to accommodate this year with this item? If the minister cannot give me that information now, perhaps he could send it to me later.

Mr. Harris: This year we hope to construct 69 classrooms.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to ask the minister whether the breakdown, which he has indicated he is tabling, indicates the items of the various expenditures within the provinces?

Mr. Harris: No; it does not. However, I could give that information to my hon. friend. What he wants is with respect to British Columbia, I suppose.

Mr. Barnett: The minister is putting that information on the record?

Mr. Harris: No. I will write to my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

National Gallery of Canada—

75. Administration, operation and maintenance, including industrial design division, $252,185.

Mr. Hamilton: Has the minister any reason to believe that any of the paintings purchased by the national gallery have subsequently been found to be other than as originally represented or, in other words, to be forgeries in any way?

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have one brief question, this being the last item. Has the minister considered the possibility of extending the service in the department of immigration? I know that the people here are very busy. There must be a great many requests from people trying to get information as to people who came to Canada some years ago, with reference to getting old age pension. It has been my experience—and I think it has been that of most hon. members—that it takes a great deal of time to get this information. I was wondering whether there was some possibility of increasing the staff in that department.

Mr. Harris: I realize that our staff is sometimes shorthanded, but our records are improving daily. I do not think that now there is much in the way of delay with respect to landing records and similar information with respect to elderly people. At any rate, if there is, we shall be glad to hurry the matter along as quickly as we can.

Mr. Hamilton: When I asked the question before the minister shook his head, I know. I just wanted to put that on the record so that we would have it definitely indicated that there was an answer to the question.

An hon. Member: Which way did he shake it, up or down?

Mr. Hamilton: He shook his head in a negative manner. There was a reason for asking the question.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask to what extent it is the policy of the national gallery to send collections of works of art to various parts of the country so that those people who, through various circumstances, are unable to come here, may have an opportunity to see some of these works in the original as well as in the reproduction?

Mr. Harris: There are two functions to the national gallery. The first is to maintain a gallery here. The second is to aid the provincial galleries by sending exhibitions to them as requested and as within the competence of the gallery here. As my hon. friend knows, the board of trustees are representative of all sections of the country. They are most anxious that exhibitions tour the country so that local galleries can show some of the paintings we have, if that is what my hon. friend had in mind. I assure him that the extension service is one of the most important parts of the gallery's work.

Mr. Knight: I should just like to say that I would agree with the minister's last remark in particular. I think that the extension services are perhaps even more vitally important than are the services provided here in Ottawa. While I risk this comment being out of order at this late date, I would say that the matter of a national library, to my way of thinking, should perform the same function. If we are going to promote national interest and cultural interest in this country, I think we should be building up extension services rather than building up some super de luxe library and national gallery at the capital. After all the main function of a public library is service to the public. I should simply like to express myself as being in favour of the extension of both services of that type.

Mr. Michener: As a last question, I should like to ask the minister how he manages to know so much about his department, to lead the house and to answer as well the 16 or 17 letters that he probably receives from every member during the course of the session?

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask one other brief question of the minister who has, shall I say, the ultimate responsibility. After all, I suppose the ultimate responsibility for any department devolves upon the minister. But, with respect to item 76—

The Chairman: Order. Is item 75 carried?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Item agreed to.

76. Payment to the national gallery purchase account for the purpose of acquiring works of art in conformity with section 8 of the National Gallery Act, $130,000.

Mr. Knight: I am really helping things along here. Who has the responsibility for the choice of these various works of art? I need not tell the minister that of late there has been some criticism with regard to certain works of art that were purchased. There was some question as to whether they were value for the money expended. Is there a board or is the matter left to the officials of the national gallery or the head of the national gallery himself, or who does that sort of thing?

Mr. Harris: I know there has been criticism but I did not know there had been any criticism directed at the national gallery with respect to the works of art. One of my hon. friend's compatriots objected to the expenditure purely on the ground of economy. I do not think he objected to it on the ground of artistic value.

Mr. Knight: What does the minister mean by one of my compatriots?

Mr. Harris: To be exact, I meant the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Knight: He is not a compatriot of mine.

An hon. Member: Of the same party.

Mr. Knight: Let us call him a colleague or something like that, but not a "compatriot".

Mr. Harris: I did not intend to use the wrong word, Mr. Chairman. The purchase of works of art is undertaken for the gallery by the director himself together with his advisers, narrowing the field down and submitting alternatives to the board of trustees for the ultimate choice. It happens that the board of trustees in most cases are persons who are not only well informed on art matters generally but particularly well informed by in many cases having studied the collection concerned. It is true that the director consults the minister before he consults the board in the sense that he wishes to have my agreement with his plans, but I do not try to exercise any taste in the matter. I leave that to the board of trustees, and I am sure they are very competent to carry out the purchases.

Mr. Knight: I would point out that this is a very narrow and specialized field and these works of art involve so much money that the purpose of my question was to be sure that the people involved were competent in this field not only on a narrow provincial or even national basis. Most of us are not competent to judge whether a picture is worth $100,000 or $300,000, and while I want to get the best works of art obtainable I am anxious to see that we do not have to pay huge sums on the supposition that these things are something particular when perhaps there might be more care exercised in such purchases.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think it would be proper to let this item carry—

Mr. Abbott: Who is going to have the last question?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am trying to.

Mr. Fulton: In view of the attitude of the Minister of Finance and certain others over things which have been said before with respect to the time allowed for the discussion of this department, I want to make certain it will not be misunderstood or stated in future years that the house must have been satisfied with the time allowed because it carried all the items in this department before six o'clock. We are not satisfied with the time which has been available for the discussion of this department and I say, with all friendliness to the minister, that were it not for the fact that His Excellency is on the way to close the session we would be carrying on and would carry on for some considerable time, probably for another day, the discussion of the affairs of this department before it would have been adequately dealt with. I want it clearly on the record that we are terminating this discussion now because of arrangements which have been made for the closing of the session and only for that reason.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, the sums of $2,360,432,364.67 and $42,314,732, respectively, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 479, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1955.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, June 26, 1954

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Mr. Justice Kerwin, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber at six o'clock p.m. on the 26th June, 1954, for the purpose of proroguing the first session of the twenty-second parliament.

(Administrative)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SITTING SUSPENDED

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be convenient to suspend this sitting until such time as we are informed that the other house has passed upon this bill which has now been adopted. It might be understood that when the bell rings we will come back to our places here to receive the messenger from the other place.

Mr. Green: It will only be a few minutes.

Mr. St. Laurent: I imagine it will take quite a few minutes for the other place to give consideration to this bill. I know my experience has been that there are always some remarks made about the fact that they are required to consider a matter of such importance in a very short time. Therefore I would imagine that it would certainly not be possible for this house to resume its sitting before six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The sitting is suspended.

At 5.40 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The sitting resumed at 6.15 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might take the few minutes at our disposal to inform hon. members that because of the fact that the members of our staff have been working strenuously, especially in the last month, we have decided to give the usual three days bonus to our sessional employees.

We have also considered the week end which follows Confederation day. Hon. members will have noticed that July 1 falls on a Thursday and our permanent employees would have had to come back to work on Friday, July 2, and would be off on July 3 and 4. We have, therefore, decided to give them the long week end from July 1 until Monday, July 5. I am sure all hon. members will approve.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): On behalf of all members, Mr. Speaker, I think I should say what has been said many times during the session, that we appreciate the courtesy and care with which you attend to your duties, and the needs particularly of those who become embroiled in arguments on procedure. I am sure that the house has approved of your dignified, careful and efficient discharge of the duties of the office you hold.

May I also thank my hon. friends opposite for being so kind on many occasions in assisting me in arranging the business of the house. I wish to say that I agree with everything that has been said to the effect that the working of the house can be assisted materially by arrangements that are reached and which, in most cases, can be carried out with a certain amount of patience and diligence.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to express thanks to the house leader for the great deal of trouble he has taken in trying to make the passing of the estimates as convenient as possible to those of us on this side.

As for you, Mr. Speaker, I think that I particularly should express this because you really have been very kind to me. We on this side do feel, with the greatest sincerity, that you have always tried to maintain the highest traditions of this house, including the tradition of strict impartiality.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to agree with all that has been said by the previous speakers, and to extend our appreciation for the courtesy extended by the leader of the house on many occasions, and our sincere affection for you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hansell: I am about, Mr. Speaker, to give the shortest speech in history. We concur.

Mr. Speaker: May I be permitted to say that these short speeches are sometimes very effective and very pleasant. I want to thank hon. members for their words of appreciation. I know that they are directed not only to myself but also to my deputy and the deputy chairman of committees—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: —as well as the Clerk of the House, the deputy clerk and the officials working under them, who have shown loyalty at all times and have given effective service to all hon. members. I thank all hon. members for their co-operation.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

After which the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the first session of the twenty-second parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

As I bring the present session to a close, the political tension throughout the world is a grim reminder that the first concern of the government must be the maintenance of the necessary strength to deter aggression while we continue to strive for the establishment of peace in the world.

Our country is meeting every commitment we have made for our national defence and for international projects for relief, rehabilitation, technical assistance and the economic advancement of other peoples materially less fortunate than our own.

Our external trade continues at a high level. Although there is still in western Canada a huge volume of wheat resulting from three successive record crops, our grain exports continue to exceed the ten year average.

You have approved a trade agreement with Japan designed to assist in developing our growing trade with that country. Trade agreements have also been concluded, for the first time, with Spain and Portugal which, with improved arrangements with Italy and Brazil, should assist us in the recovery of historic markets in those countries.

In recognition of the growing importance of our northern territories, you enacted legislation establishing the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

We all rejoiced at the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which removed the last serious legal obstacle to the development of the St. Lawrence project and which now clears the way for actual construction of both the navigation facilities and the power installations.

The Pipe Lines Act was amended to give jurisdiction to the board of transport commissioners over all companies authorized to construct or operate interprovincial or international oil or gas pipe lines and most of the difficulties in the way of the building of a pipe line to transport natural gas from Alberta to Ontario and Quebec have been overcome.

You enacted a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to extend its lines in northern Quebec and northern Ontario.

The National Housing Act was revised and provision made to increase and broaden the supply of mortgage money so that more people with moderate incomes would be able to find facilities to assist them in building their own homes.

As required by law you made the decennial revision of the Bank Act at the present session and extended the charters of the eleven chartered banks for a period of ten years. Among the amendments made were those which permit a bank to make loans on the security of insured mortgages and to make small loans on the security of household goods and chattels. The Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act were also revised.

In further recognition of the services of Canada's veterans of two world wars and of Korea you have made amendments to the War Service Grants Act; the Veterans Land Act; and the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act; the Veterans Benefit Act; and the Pension Act.

You enacted a measure to provide for a federal contribution to the payment in co-operation with the provincial governments of pensions to disabled persons in need over the age of eighteen years. This legislation is a further instalment in the long-range social security program of the government.

During this session you completed the revision of the Criminal Code.

To meet the situation created by the decision of the courts that extra-provincial highway transport was under the jurisdiction of this parliament, you enacted a measure to provide for the regulation in agreement with the provincial authorities of interprovincial and international highway transport by provincial agencies established to regulate highway transport within the several provinces.

Other measures which you enacted included: the Ontario-Manitoba Boundary Act 1953; the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act 1953; an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec; the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act; the Export and Import Permits Act; Fire Losses Replacement Account Act; the Canadian Forces Act 1954; an act respecting inventions by public servants; and an act to provide diplomatic and consular immunities for commonwealth representatives in Canada.

Amendments have been made to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act; the Explosives Act; the Telegraphs Act; the National Parks Act; the Customs Act; the acts respecting the Northwest Territories; the Senate and House of Commons Act; the Salaries Act; the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act; the Patent Act; the Post Office Act; the Export Credits Insurance Act; the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; the Department of Transport Act; the Radio Act; the Public Service Superannuation Act; the Judges Act; the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; the Navigable Waters Protection Act; the Canadian Citizenship Act; the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act; the Research Council Act; the National Harbours Board Act; the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act; the Atomic Energy Control Act; the Excise Tax Act; the Excise Act; the act respecting the superannuation of government employees transferred to crown corporations; the Income Tax Act; and the Customs Tariff.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision which you have made for all essential services for the current fiscal year.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

In relieving you from attendance upon your parliamentary duties I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless you.
